Thirty years ago, the LGBT started to get more media attention and special interest groups began to dredge for dollars, as AIDS and AIDS research became the issues of the day. Homosexuals had started to garner sympathy, but even though the American Psychiatric Association was pressured into removing homosexuality from the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, people at large still deemed the gay lifestyle to be largely abnormal and detrimental to society.

Gays didn’t seem to mind operating on the fringes of society back then: in fact, they would oftentimes derisively refer to heterosexuals as “breeders” who would never know the “joys” of life with multiple sex partners and no responsibilities.

Then, in 1990, three homosexual couples attempted to obtain marriage licenses in Hawaii, and sued when their requests were refused. Oddly enough, the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund–one of the LGBT's leading legal pitbulls–declined to represent them, as it reportedly debated the importance of marriage itself and whether taking the matter to court was a wise strategy.

The Supreme Court of Hawaii held in Baehr v. Miike that the state legislature had the right to restrict licenses to mixed-gender couples, and the Defense of Marriage Act was passed in 1996 in large part due to the events surrounding the case.

It seemed like the issue could finally be laid to rest, but then, in 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its Lawrence v. Texas ruling, which prevented states from criminalizing homosexual sexual activities. Armed with the government's first official sanctioning of anal sex and coprophilia, a plethora of legal measures began to fall like dominoes. All of a sudden, gays, for the first time in decades, suddenly realized that the states had apparently been denying them certain "rights," even though they hadn't sought or even cared about these "rights" in the past.

Civil unions began sprouting up all over the place. Adoption laws changed. Before long, "Don't Ask Don't Tell" was a thing of the past, and DOMA was eviscerated. Liberal jurists, armed with a warped interpretation of Loving v. Virginia and the chant of "gay is the new black" in one hand and payoffs from pro-LGBT businesses in the other summarily trampled on the 10th Amendment rights of the states.

All of this set the stage for the Obergefell ruling this past June, which made a prominent addition to a long and ever-lengthening line of U.S. Supreme Court blunders. Now, we're facing the prospect of living in a society where gender and sexual orientation are legally treated as "fluid" concepts and men can walk into women's bathrooms anytime they feel like it, no questions asked.

Welcome To The Dystopia

Brothers, we are only two steps away from finding ourselves smack-dab in the middle of the world anticipated in The Forever War. Forty years ago, the American nuclear family–consisting of a strong, level-headed man, a faithful, dutiful wife and respectful children–was not only considered the gold standard in terms of familial structures; but was in fact the ONLY standard.

Now, every five minutes, from Campbell's Soup commercials to Wells Fargo ads, the mainstream media is bombarding us with a torrential downpour of ultra-liberal propaganda. Just about every show on television nowadays either has a gay, lesbian, or trans-something character or actor on it (Transparent, Sense8 and Orange is the New Black immediately come to mind).

ANYTHING is a family now, and all types of sexual activities (except heterosexual activities conducive to stable relationships, of course), are encouraged. And if you don't agree, you're charged with committing thoughtcrime and are ostracized at best, and economically steamrolled at worst. And as the LGBT's staunchest allies will tell you, they're just getting warmed up.

All of this took place in the space of a generation. How long before forced reeducation camps are set up to re-program those who aren't willing to don pink tutus and declare that "gay is okay"? For that matter, how long before being heterosexual in and of itself becomes a crime? That's not as farfetched as you may think.

As the concept of "family" continues to be warped and contorted, gender roles continue to be redefined, men and women continue to be placed at odds with each other by those who would love nothing more than to see millions of single people wandering around, disillusioned by failed heterosexual relationships and ripe for the picking, and every act engaged in by heterosexual males ranging from "man-spreading" and speaking to women on the street to exaggerating about having a new car or job is deemed a criminal offense, can we really say we're far from that reality now?

And just like in Haldeman's novel, we're seeing this thing spread like wildfire all over the globe, so those who think they can just go to a remote island, kick back, and enjoy the decline are in for a rude awakening. Gentlemen, it's time for us to take back the pen, take back the sword, take back the mike, and start drafting the future we want to see ourselves and our families living in, before it's too late.

Read More: America Is Becoming A Homosexual Nation

Ray Coleman
Ray is just an average Joe who has an interesting way of viewing the world. When he's not pondering the deeper meaning of the human condition, he's fishing off the coast of Florida and trying to figure out which driver can get him over the 180-yard mark.

Why Are Swedish Police Protecting Migrants Who Molest Young Girls At Concerts?

January 17, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

For years, sexual assaults by groups of men were committed at a festival in Stockholm. But word of this never got out to the public. The reason? The perpetrators were immigrants, many of them "unaccompanied minors" from Afghanistan. Not only did the mainstream media choose to ignore what was going on, but even more outrageously the police kept quiet as well. Exposed documents reveal that the police hide information that might "play into the hands" of the nationalist and conservative party, the Sweden Democrats.

Sexual predators in the crowd

In August last year, there was a music festival in the Swedish capital, called "We are Sthlm." Many young girls came to see the big star Zara Larsson perform. So did a bunch of immigrant youths as well, but they had something else in mind. During the concert they molested the young girls, touched their private parts and tried getting their hands under the girls' clothes.

One eyewitness says that in just one night, police and security guards had to intervene against around 90 males, both young and old. Anna, 15 years old, was at the festival and remembers what happened:

> Especially at the concerts it was very horrible. Immediately when you went into the crowd they started feeling you up. They surrounded us, one of my friends fell down and then they threw themselves over her immediately. They didn't care that you said no, or that you had a boyfriend.

As Zara Larsson performed, young girls were being molested in the crowd.

The eyewitness mentioned above, a psychologist at the local police department, turned to Swedish leading newspaper Dagens Nyheter to report what he had seen. He contacted journalist Hanne Kjöller, who he thought would have enough integrity to cover such a sensitive issue as immigrant criminality. But he was wrong. He has now revealed his correspondence with the journalist to Nyheter Idag.

> She was very interested and listened until I told her that all the boys and men that were apprehended were unaccompanied [minors] from Afghanistan and Syria. I sensed that she changed the tone [of her voice]. But she also said that she would contact the police.

The journalist was given a phone number to a police officer who was on duty at the festival. He wanted to give his recollection of the events and the systematic sexual assaults. But the journalist didn’t seem interested in hearing his side of the story.

> We got in touch and talked briefly, and she said she would call back, which she did not. So I looked for her, she did not call back. I tried to reach her at another time, but I never heard back from her again. I called several times, cannot say exactly how many. It was over a three or four day period.

Journalist Hanne Kjöller. She describes herself as a “liberal feminist”

Several months later, after the sexual assaults in Cologne were exposed, Hanne Kjöller sent a message to the psychologist saying that she wanted to talk to him again. She explained why she didn’t follow up on the story at first, that her editor called it “SD fabrications,” referring to the nationalist party the Sweden Democrats. The psychologist decided to instead turn to alternative news website Nyheter Idag.

The police were in on the cover-up

Mainstream journalists weren’t the only ones who prevented assaults at the festival from being known. The police were keeping quiet about it as well. The sexual molestation of young girls, which went on at “We are Sthlm” both in 2014 and 2015, were never reported to the public.

The festival proceeded calmly, according to a statement released by the police. But internal memos sent to police chiefs and the Stockholm police media centre were very clear about what was happening. One of them states that “the problem of younger men rubbing themselves on young girls in the sea of people has reappeared as in previous years.” The documents also confirm that the perpetrators were immigrants.

> These are so-called refugee youths primarily from Afghanistan. Several from the gang were arrested for sexual harassment. The gang was also responsible for several fights during the evening. One complainant had their arm dislocated.

Not one word of these crimes got out to the public. Newspaper Dagens Nyheter has talked to policemen saying that they deliberately avoid reporting crimes when the perpetrators have a foreign background. Police Chief Peter Ågren explains why.

> This is a sore point. Sometimes we do not dare to say how things really are because we believe it will play into the hands of the Sweden Democrats. We have to take responsibility for this within the police.

In an internal letter, which has now been exposed, the press officer of the police gives directions on how to write about crimes on the authority's website. Descriptions like the perpetrator's ethnicity or skin color are not allowed to be published on the website. The reason for this new policy is also stated in the letter.

> Critique is sometimes expressed against the police's reporting of peoples' skin color. It is viewed as racist. As the police is not racist and neither should be viewed as such, from now on the instructions below apply.

The police can't be trusted anymore

What's new about this scandal is not that the mainstream media are biased, hate the nationalist Sweden Democrats, and don't want to report on immigrant crimes. We knew that already. The disturbing news here is that the police are in on it as well. They have become politically correct to the point where they can't do their job right anymore. If they had been open about the assaults at the festival, many girls might have been saved from harm.

While it's repugnant and shameful, one can explain why the police are covering up immigrant crimes. They have been vilified by the establishment left for many years now. Swedish police officers have the same problem as their American counterparts—every time they're forced to take action against a non-white perpetrator, people lose their shit and automatically brand them racist.

Being called a racist is one of the worst things that can happen to you in this day and age. For the police, it’s a matter of trust. They need the public on their side to be able to investigate crimes properly and communicate with ordinary citizens. If they are perceived as racist, it will make their work more difficult, especially in suburbs where many immigrants live.

The police have, in an attempt to improve their reputation, chosen the politically correct path. That choice backfired on them. We now know that the police can’t be trusted to enforce the law fairly, and to treat criminals the same without regard for their skin color. The biggest price for that was paid by those girls at the festival, whose innocence was sacrificed on the altar of political correctness.

What do you call a country where the police force has a political agenda?

Read More: Islamists Harass Swedes In Increasingly Immigrant-Filled Swedish Suburbs

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

5 Reasons Why Israel Is One Of The World’s Most Successful States

January 18, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

The nation of Israel is often held up by cuckservatives and Jews as an example of a country that has succeeded in the face of overwhelming odds. Despite being surrounded by hostile states, repeatedly being invaded by their neighbors, and lacking oil deposits like other Middle Eastern nations, the Israelis have built their country into one of the most economically powerful and stable states in the world.

Why does Israel continue to prosper while other Western nations collapse? The answer is because the Israeli government puts the interests of its citizens first. Israelis are strongly nationalistic and their country’s leadership chooses its policies based on how they will benefit native citizens, as opposed to other Western nations that kowtow to the golden calves of diversity and multiculturalism. Here are the reasons why Israel is so successful, and what the rest of the West can learn from them…

1. Israel actively works to ensure that Jews will remain a majority

You'll often hear leftists cheering (and cuckservatives lamenting) the fact that many Western nations will soon have majority non-white populations. For example, Gregor Gysi, a prominent far-left Jewish politician in Germany, has referred to native Germans as "Nazis" and said that their inability to have offspring is "fortunate." Leftist and cuckservative politicians in the U.S. and elsewhere justify their support for mass immigration on the basis that importing large numbers of foreigners is the only way to compensate for falling native birthrates.

Israel was explicitly founded as a homeland for the Jewish people and its government has worked to ensure that it remains one. For example, only Jews are allowed to immigrate to Israel and become citizens, a process referred to as "aliyah" (Hebrew for "ascent"). Not only does Israel have zero tolerance for illegal immigration, the government has also constructed border walls along the West Bank and Egyptian borders to deter invaders, and the country is also home to the world's largest illegal alien detention facility.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has also flatly refused to accept Syrian refugees, despite the fact that not only does his nation share a land border with Syria, Israel has been illegally occupying Syrian territory—the Golan Heights—for nearly fifty years.

Not only does Israel fight to keep non-Jews from immigrating, but the government also incentivizes its native citizens to marry and have children in order to keep the nation's Arab minority from gaining demographic ground. Israel's fertility rate is one of the highest in the developed world, at 3.04 babies per woman; the Jewish birthrate in Israel has skyrocketed in the past decade while the Arab birthrate has fallen.

Additionally, Israel takes active steps to prevent people living on public assistance and other undesirable groups from having children. For example, the government requires African Jewish migrants to take Depo-Provera shots as a condition for immigrating and accepting welfare. Israel is so adamant about maintaining its status as a Jewish-majority nation that it forbids Jews from marrying non-Jews, and the government even discourages

Jewish women from dating Arab men.

2. Israel requires its citizens to serve in the military

Because Israel is surrounded by hostile states who have repeatedly invaded it in the past, the Israelis maintain a strong tradition of mandatory military service. With few exceptions, all Israeli men are required to serve a minimum of three years in the Israeli Defense Forces; all women are required to serve two years. Ordinary Israelis may also be drafted to return to the military in times of invasion or other crises. Prime Minister Netanyahu also served in the military as a young man, in sharp contrast to President Obama:

While the IDF is probably overrated as a fighting force—Israel's humiliating defeat at the hands of Hezbollah during the 2006 Lebanon War being proof of this—the government's commitment to mandatory military service is a boon to Israeli society. By requiring all citizens to serve in the IDF, Israel instills good values in its youth, gives them a stake in the country's existence, and also keeps its populace combat-ready in the event of disaster.

3. Israel's politicians support the country's national interests

In most countries in the West, the major political parties are dominated by internationalists who agitate for more immigration, more “free trade” agreements, and more multiculturalism. Whether it’s the Democrats and the Republicans in the U.S., the Conservatives and Labour in the U.K., or the Conservatives, Liberals and NDP in Canada, the largest political parties are in basic agreement on the wonders of diversity and mass immigration.

In sharp contrast, Israel’s dominant political party, Likud, is unabashedly nationalist and puts Israel first. As I mentioned above, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has taken a hard-line against illegal immigration and Syrian refugees. He’s been rewarded with electoral victory after victory, and is on track to become Israel’s longest-serving prime minister ever, exceeding the tenure of David Ben-Gurion, Israel’s founder. Conversely, Israel’s major left-wing party, Labor, has been losing ground for the past decade.

Israel is also not shy about flexing its muscle on the international stage. The large number of diaspora Jews in the U.S.—as well as Dispensationalist evangelical Christians—enables Israel to have considerable sway over American politics. Israel collects large amounts of foreign aid from the U.S. despite having a wealthy, first-world economy, and American foreign policy is driven by our country’s “alliance” with Israel.

In short, the relationship between Israel and the U.S. is akin to that of a hot chick and her beta orbiter. Blaming Israelis for this is as dumb as blaming the aforementioned hot chick for accepting free gifts from said orbiters. Whatever you can say about Netanyahu and the Israeli government, you can’t argue that he doesn’t put his nation above all else.

4. Israel is patriarchal and allows men to marry and form families

Most Western countries have severely crippled the freedom of men to manage their wives and children with punitive, anti-male legislation and generous welfare policies. By rewarding women who get knocked up with government cheese, the U.S. and other countries are incentivizing single motherhood and disincentivizing the formation of nuclear families. It's gotten so bad that in some countries, it's considered "domestic abuse" if a man tries to keep his wife or girlfriend from wasting his money on frivolous purchases.

While Israel is not immune to the forces of sterility and subversion that are ruining the rest of the West—for example, Tel Aviv is known as the gay capital of the Middle East—Israeli society is among the most traditionalist and patriarchal in the West. In particular, Israel's population growth is being driven by Orthodox Jews, who strictly adhere to traditional gender roles: the man is the head of the household, and the woman is expected to submit to him as a wife and mother. Orthodox Judaism is so patriarchal that women are barred from divorcing without their husbands' permission.

Not only that, feminists have become increasingly vocal in their opposition to Israel, citing the government's mistreatment of Palestinians as a reason. Left-wing forces as a whole have sympathized with the Palestinian plight for years, with anti-Zionist activists calling for a boycott of Israeli products and divestment from the country itself, much in the same way the international community did to South Africa during the apartheid years.

5. Israeli society places religion front and center

Return of Kings publisher Roosh and other commentators have pointed to the death of Christianity as a major reason for the West's decline. Without a religious and moral framework to guide society, people inevitably descend into mindless hedonism and degeneracy. While it's debatable whether a Christian renaissance in the West is even possible, there's no denying that Christianity provided innumerable benefits to America and other nations.

As mentioned above, Israel fervently defends its status as a Jewish homeland, and this includes emphasizing Judaism's religious aspects. God and religion are inescapable aspects of everyday life in Israel, and ultra-Orthodox minorities such as the Hasidim are growing in both numbers and prominence. Some Israelis are so fanatical about their Jewishness that they openly call for Christian missionaries to be banned from the country.

As you can see, Israel's success as a nation is due to the fact that it rejects many of the trends that dominate the rest of the West. While the U.S., Canada, Britain and other countries are eagerly greasing the slide to Gomorrah, Israelis continue to venerate God, the patriarchal family, and nationalism. This is even more striking when you consider that Israelis co-exist with a hostile, antagonistic population in their midst: the Palestinians.

Regardless of how you feel about Israel as a nation or about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, there is no denying that the West has much to learn from their successes. By resisting the cultural Marxism that has gripped much of humanity, Israel has given itself a strong chance of survival in the future. America would do well to emulate some of what Israel is doing if she hopes to become great again.

Read More: The Damaging Effects Of Jewish Intellectualism And Activism On Western Culture

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The End Goal Of Western Progressivism Is Depopulation

January 18, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Not long ago I proposed that decreasing birth rates in the Western world is happening due to some cosmic force that is seeking balance upon the universe. I missed the mark. The force is not something cosmic or metaphysical, but human. After studying the evidence, it's clear that there is a conscious scheme to control the human population through both cultural and biological means, which allows the elite to sustain or elevate their power and wealth.

The first piece of evidence showing you have been primed to favor depopulation is that you most likely agree to at least two of the following three statements, even if you consider yourself "red pill":

- "Agendas or schemes by the global elite should be first considered a 'conspiracy theory.'"
- "There are too many people on planet Earth."
- "Needs of the environment must come before plans to increase human fertility."

It's not a coincidence that you are already on board with depopulation agenda, and if you live in a Westernized nation, you came to that conclusion "naturally" because since you were in grade school, you have been bombarded with messages about the dangers of over-population and the fragility of the environment. It turns out that all the progressive ideas being spread in the West have one thing in common: they all limit human reproduction.

Here is a short list of progressive causes that have percolated from intellectuals and later sponsored or hijacked by billionaire activists and major government institutions of the West.

1. Abortion is a bodily “choice,” not human murder. Result: it decreases population.

2. Birth control is a “choice” that allows women to better practice consumer lifestyles. Result: it decreases population.

3. Female empowerment in the form of feminism and egalitarianism pushes women into corporate work with the goal of delaying motherhood (or eliminating it outright). Result: it decreases reproduction and family formation.

4. Promotion of sterile human relationships in the form of homosexuality and transsexuality can’t possibly result in the creation of life. Result: it decreases population, reproduction, and traditional family formation.

5. Promotion of atheism, nihilism, individualism, and consumerism as suitable alternatives to traditional living via nuclear family units. Result: it decreases reproduction and traditional family formation.

6. The needs of the “environment” must be served before that of living humans. Result: it makes human guilty of family formation.

7. Massive waves of foreign immigrants are encouraged entry into Western nations to break bonds between tribe and neighbor that decrease notions of nationalism and patriotism while transferring fertility and economic resources from native people to foreigers. Result: it decreases relative population of native citizens.

All of the above decreases the reproductive rate, either directly through the killing of life, or indirectly by promoting guilt and alternative lifestyles that are incompatible with the creation of life. At the same time, immigrant populations are allowed to grow at a faster rate that the natives’ ability to reproduce.

Those who rule over us don’t need more Americans or European-derived people to cement their power and wealth within nations they control through government institutions and transnational organizations and corporations. How would it benefit them if a baby boom takes place among those from American conservative states that believe in the first and second amendments? If you were king of the land, and you regularly met with those who helped you rule, would you really want the type of people who are most likely to overthrow you to reproduce up to their biological maximum, or would you want to hurt their reproductive potential while pushing every degenerate cause under the sun in an effort to limit their numbers?

I wrote Cultural Collapse Theory a year ago, where I detail the specific mechanism that progressivism destroys a host culture, but I could easily re-title it to Population Collapse Theory without having to make many changes to the text. I must admit that I feel a bit foolish for taking so long to realize the agenda all along is depopulation, especially when the elite have openly shared and discussed their plans. All you need to do when watching their interviews is to replace the buzzwords “population control” and “sustainable development” for “depopulation of Western natives.” This is often done under the guise of curing third-world poverty or making the Earth “more livable” for Western children that will never be born.

Here are a few public statements that show how depopulation agenda is important to those who dictate government and corporate policy:

Prince Charles commenting on population control:

> I could have chosen Mumbai, Cairo or Mexico City; wherever you look, the world’s population is increasing fast. It goes up by the equivalent of the entire population of the United Kingdom every year. Which means that this poor planet of ours, which already struggles to sustain 6.8 billion people, will somehow have to support over 9 billion people within 50 years.

John P. Holdren, Barack Obama’s top science advisor:

> A program of sterilizing women after their second or third child, despite the relatively greater difficulty of the operation than vasectomy, might be easier to implement than trying to sterilize men. The development of a long-term sterilizing capsule that could be implanted under the skin and removed when pregnancy is desired opens additional possibilities for coercive fertility control.

David Rockefeller, gloablist who refuses to die:

Ted Turner, founder of CNN and one of the largest landowners in the United States:

Margaret Sanger, founder of Planned Parenthood, which successfully used abortion to decimate the black population in the United States:

> The most merciful thing that a family does to one of its infant members is to kill it.

Thomas Ferguson, former official of U.S. State Department Office of Population Affairs:

> There is a single theme behind all our work—we must reduce population levels. Either governments do it our way, through nice clean methods, or they will get the kinds of mess that we have in El Salvador, or in Iran or in Beirut. Population is a political problem. Once population is out of control, it requires authoritarian government, even fascism, to reduce it….

Bill Gates talked about using one of his foundations to play god in Africa and limit the population using biological means. It's quite interesting to see a dorky looking geek so interested in population control, but then again his father served as head of Planned Parenthood.

Gates' friend, Warren Buffet, is also on board with depopulation. He gave $3 billion to his wife's Susan Thompson Buffett Foundation. Take a guess as to where that foundation donates most of its money? Planned Parenthood.

> The tax records also show that most of the foundation's spending goes to abortion and contraception advocacy and research. According to Access Philanthropy, a research institute that focuses on the giving preferences of foundations and corporate donors, family planning is one of the Susan Thompson Buffett Foundation's main purposes. The foundation's nonprofit 990 tax form shows that in 2008, Planned Parenthood and its affiliates in the U.S. received about $45 million; the international arm of the organization got about $8 million. There is no line item for the Ryan program [pro-abortion organization] or the Family Planning Fellowship [pro-abortion organization]. But the foundation paid out around $50 million to universities with one or both of the programs.

By now you should note that the more sinister the individual, the more they are portrayed by the media as harmless, awkwardly geeky, and folksy (e.g. Mark Zuckerberg, the Google founders, and the CEO of Starbucks).

There's the 1974 document titled National Security Study Memorandum 200 (full PDF text), commissioned by Henry Kissinger, whose obsession with international order led him to the conclusion that rising population of some countries would threaten US interests, and that contraception must be promoted within them to limit their population. Kissinger, another zombie globalist who won't die, is still instrumental in dictating policies around the world through his consulting firm Kissinger Associates.

The United Nations has an action plan called Agenda 21 that advocates for "sustainable development." One way it does that is through worldwide promotion of feminism, which has the effect of removing women from the family home and into corporate workplaces that are under control by the same gloabalists in the UN club. As any Western nation's population chart can tell you, feminism goes hand-in-hand with depopulation. The UN offers confirmation that feminism is a great form of birth control since they consider it essential for "sustainable development," globalist code for reducing the birth rate.

> [Human settlement improvements] should be based on technical cooperation activities, partnerships among the public, private and community sectors and > participation in the decision-making process by community groups and special interest groups such as women, indigenous people, the elderly and the disabled. These approaches should form the core principles of national settlement strategies. In developing these strategies, countries will need to set priorities among the eight programme areas in this chapter in accordance with their national plans and objectives, taking fully into account their social and cultural capabilities. Furthermore, countries should make appropriate provision to monitor the impact of their strategies on marginalized and disenfranchised groups, with particular reference to the needs of women.

The United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCC) is led by Christiana Figueres, the daughter of Costa Rica's former president, ensuring her admission to the globalist club. She states in the following video that the UN should "make every effort" to decrease population from its current trajectory (start at 4:30).

The former Chief Of Bioethics to the National Institute Of Health (NIH) is Israeli Ezekiel Emanual, who is brother to former Obama advisor and Chicago mayor Rahm Emmanuel. In an Atlantic article, he claimed that we should all consider dropping dead at 75 because it would save the government trillions of dollars. The most anti-ethical and chaotic arguments will come under the guise of ethics and world order.

> I am talking about how long I want to live and the kind and amount of health care I will consent to after 75. Americans seem to be obsessed with exercising, doing mental puzzles, consuming various juice and protein concoctions, sticking to strict diets, and popping vitamins and supplements, all in a valiant effort to cheat death and prolong life as long as possible. This has become so pervasive that it now defines a cultural type: what I call the American immortal.
>
> I reject this aspiration. I think this manic desperation to endlessly extend life is misguided and potentially destructive. For many reasons, 75 is a pretty good age to aim to stop.

The quotes, videos, and articles above barely scratch the surface of what you can research yourself on Youtube and Google. While there is an unhinged element on many of the sites that talk about depopulation, I trust you can use your own judgement in separating fact from emotion.

Most corporations, whose sole motivation is profit for shareholders, have for some odd reason pathological soft spots for women and the environment. It's no coincidence that empowerment of women into becoming corporate workers and mindless consumers shatters their reproduction while promotion of environmental concerns makes you not only guilty to have a family of your own, but inclined to give unwavering support and authority to globalist agendas that limit population in the "privileged" Western world while at the same time supporting the breeding of third-world immigrants to displace them.

Men who have come to the conclusion of depopulation arrive at it from different paths. I saw it not through politics but through sex. I saw firsthand how the government, media, and universities are deliberately trying to promote mistrust between man and woman through feminism, the myth of rape culture, and social justice ideas that allow a divide and conquer strategy to pit the sexes against each other, making every woman see a man as a potential rapist and every man see a woman as someone who could ruin his life.

The fact that men are scared to death of a false rape accusation or are fearful of being taken to the cleaners in divorce is a feature of depopulation-driven progressivism, not a bug. A wedge has been driven between men and women so that you see each other as threats to your happiness and livelihood. It is by design that you are not capable or willing of doing anything more with a woman than mutual masturbation under the influence of alcohol that will not result in family creation. Just in case you do want to make babies, a backup plan has been enacted so that reproduction will still not result: essentially all fertile young women are on birth control, encouraged to go on it after puberty. Even if she does become pregnant, the means to abort it will be so easy, especially with you convincing her to do so since coincidentally there are state and federal laws that enslave any middle class man who thinks having children could somehow serve his interests.

It's important to understand that birth control doesn't have to be only biological in the form of pills or abortion, but in the form of ideas and beliefs that instill fear and dread about reproducing by associating having a child with a loss of individual or consumer freedom. I wouldn't be surprised if "men going their own way" groups are indirectly supported by the state to increase a man's fear of reproducing with women.

In case you still have doubts that depopulation is the overreaching agenda of Western elites, I ask you to take a look at charts of fertility birth rates from World Bank data and ask yourself why isn't there any concerted effort to reverse the declines? Why aren't governments supporting natalist policies like in Russia that aim to seed future generations of natives to create a stronger nation that will endure the ages, instead of importing criminals and democratically challenged Mexicans or radical Islamists?

What's amazing is that the US birth rate is below replacement rate even accounting for its fecund immigrants, showing that fertile peoples become effectively sterile once inserted into an environment that has been slated for depopulation. Currently there is not one European nation west of Russia, even when including Eastern Europe, that has a fertility rate above that of the replacement rate. By comparison, the fertility rate of Niger is 7.56, four times that of the United States, but don't worry, Bill Gates' humanitarian "vaccine" program will take care of that problem when the time is right through his pet project, a birth control microchip that can be turned on and off by wireless remote.

The three main cultural mechanisms of reducing native populations is to program people to be concerned for women's rights, third world immigration, and the environment. This is why nearly everyone on the left, including SJW's, are fanatically supportive of all three. Leftists have been soundly convinced of issues that lead to the destruction of the family unit, the breakdown of their society's social fabric, and their own voluntary sterilization. When you combine biological efforts that include birth control and abortion, you can see how Westerners have absolutely no chance of recovering their population compared to African, Middle Eastern, and Asian populations that do not currently face both cultural and biological bombs to reduce their birth rates, but will soon enough be targeted once the Westerners are sufficiently weakened and depopulation goals are met.

You probably now understand why when Brussels accepts a new country into the European Union, the first thing they do is mandate a gay pride parade on the capital streets, and why they immediately start screeching about the need for more women's rights. This is the cultural attack that aims to limit the reproduction of that country so that their sovereignty can be easily dismantled within only two generations, an attack that begins even before they join the EU in order to "prove" they are ready to destroy themselves for the short term gain of big loans and free trade for that nation's local elite.

Even the form of game that I taught early in my career, of one-night stands, was compatible with the depopulation agenda since reproduction would often not result from it. This meant that I was a useful idiot for many years. I can't help but notice that attacks against me have increased in intensity as I move away from teaching sterile sex and anti-family ideas to promoting more traditional values that are far likelier to result in reproduction.

While I would certainly agree with you that there are plenty of people currently inhabiting the Earth, I disagree that a small group of globalists at the top should be able to play Dr. Eugenicist and determine who reproduces or not without limiting their own reproduction, especially since their hypocrisy about caring for the environment is on full display as they fly around the world in their private jets to their numerous mansions. They do not want you to impregnate a fertile 19 year old and have many home-schooled and ritalin-free children with her. Instead, you're bombarded with messages to marry an aging spinster whose womb is likely already sterile and who can't give you more than two children, which is not nearly enough to sustain the population.

Perhaps in the 1950's you were told that having a big family is the masculine thing to do, but it's almost impossible these days to see images of large nuclear families represented positively in television or commercials, especially with women under 25 who are not already slaves to corporations and government propaganda.

I'm coming to the conclusion that the only way to defeat the evils of liberalism, feminism, social justice, and progressivism is to have huge families and create tribes that are free-thinking, self-reliant, and, most importantly, armed. The men of the future who can resist totalitarianism and unjust government authority come from the wombs of the women living today, and those women must at some point be convinced that being stay-at-home mothers who raise strong men is superior to becoming zombie consumers who poison and sterilize their own bodies.

The last thing that those in power want is for women to pair-bond with independent, masculine men who do not need the state and who place more importance and loyalty in their blood relatives and nation than to leftist ideas, iPhones, and sports teams. In the past, my fantasies were about sleeping with as many women as possible so I can be the playboy that I saw in the Hollywood movies, but now they are about creating the sons who will one day lead their people and their nation. It's squarely up to us to create the men who can eliminate the parasites that are successfully controlling modern humanity.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on RooshV.com.

Read Next: Western Men Are Becoming Evolutionary Dead-Ends

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

8 Ways You Can Win When Dealing With Difficult People

January 18, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We all have to deal with difficult people. They may be co-workers, clients, friends, family members, or lovers. We can't avoid contact with them.

And with our narcissistic world being what it is, more and more difficult people are injected into the course of life every day. Our societies breed them. Here are a few of my tips on how to deal with the annoying trouble-makers we know are out there.

1. Do Their Thinking For Them

Difficult people don't really like to think. They think they are "thinkers," but the thinking usually revolves around the most banal of subject matters. What difficult people have, instead, are fixations: obsessions with how this is, how that is, how this isn't going well, or how that isn't going well.

Part of your job in the beginning in dealing with the difficult person is identifying his obsession. Find out the obsession, and you've gone far in learning how to deal with the person.

Difficult people also like to cause trouble: that's why they're called "difficult." You need to be able to anticipate their trouble-making moves in the beginning before they make their move. That way, you can head off their little games before they even have a chance to implement them.

Think someone's going to stiff you on paying a bill for services? Make sure he pays up front before you do any work. Think someone is going to forget an appointment date or time? Remind him in writing multiple times. Think someone's going to have an issue with making payments to you? Make them use post-dated checks.

The possible examples here are endless. But the point is the same: anticipate the difficult person's lame excuses or shifty behavior ahead of time, and head it off at the pass.

2. Flattery Is Usually A Sign Of Bad Things To Come

This is not always true, but it is often true. There is nothing wrong with people giving you compliments. But there is a certain type of difficult person who sees flattery as a substitute for upholding his end of the bargain. This type of person thinks that flattery is interchangeable with paying for services that you may have provided him.

And it is not.

With experience, you will be able to tell when compliments are sincere, and when they are not. In the meantime, you should get very wary whenever someone starts complimenting you in an unsolicited manner.

3. The Best Records Win

Difficult people can’t play their games when written documents are staring them in the face. Your job is to make sure that such documentation exists. There should be a paper trail for everything.

That way, the other person can’t wriggle out of his end of the bargain, or try to say something that isn’t true. Trust me, being good about this will save your ass many times in your life. Because difficult people lie all the time. You don’t want to be in a situation where it is your word against his. You want the records to do the talking.

Save all your emails, letters, faxes, and other documents. Scan things for electronic storage. Have back-up systems in place. Look, for example, at the recent developments in the Cosby case, which may turn on whether an “immunity agreement” was ever in effect.

If you can’t prove something with a written instrument, it’s close to saying that it never happened.

4. Be Nice To Difficult People

Everyone hates difficult people. I generally try to befriend them. Not all of them, of course. But sometimes I almost look on it as a challenge. Sometimes these people are so eager for any warm human contact that they will trip over themselves to return the favor to you.

I like to charm difficult people. Call me masochistic, if you want. Maybe I see it as a challenge.

And you just never know. Sometimes the people you think are the biggest assholes are the ones who actually help you the most. This has happened to me a number of times in my life. It's strange, but it happens.

5. "Nobody Knows Nobody"

I like this little rule. I took it from the 2006 film Running Scared.

I love this crazy little movie. There is a scene when one character gives a little speech about how we never really know other people.

The idea is that anyone can be capable of anything. If you make this assumption, it will help you implement the other survival tips I'm writing about here. Be prepared for almost anything from anybody.

Even if you've known someone for a long time, you just never can tell for sure. It's wise to be cautious, to tread carefully, and never rule anything out unless you are sure 100%. Because the one time you are not sure 100% will be the time it comes back to bite you in the ass.

So never completely turn your back on a difficult person.

6. Difficult People Need Some Skin In the Game

People are more apt to cooperate with you if they have some stake in the outcome. You've got to arrange your dealings with such people in a way that forces them to have such a stake.

The difficult person doesn't care if he screws you over, but he will care if he screws himself over. So make him have some skin in the game. Make him invest some amount of time or money in the outcome. You should never care more about a difficult person's problem more than the difficult person himself does.

That way, he'll be less likely to drop the ball.

7. Control The Flow Of Information

Sometimes bad news needs to be revealed right away. Sometimes it needs to be released little by little, like drops of water. And sometimes it will be better if it is delayed for a time.

It all depends on the type of difficult person you are dealing with.

8. Get The Monkey Off Your Back, And Put It On His Back

In every interaction with a difficult person, there is some “monkey.” I mean some problem, some issue, or some point of contention that is being dealt with.

We can see “monkeys” as friction points, issues, problems, hot-potatoes, and the like.

Everyone wants to dump the problem on you. It’s human nature. Don’t let the difficult person dump the monkey on your back. Or if the monkey has to be on your back for a short time, get it off as soon as possible.

These are my general guidelines for dealing with those insufferable characters in our daily lives. With some practice—and some luck—you’ll be able to navigate with, through, or around them, as the case may be.

Read More: Why Facebook Is Emasculating And How To Stop It

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

6 Questions You Must Answer Before Preventing The Downfall Of Your Society

January 19, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Many readers here at ROK have been asking the same questions. Questions regarding what can be done about the state of our world, what are options are, and how we should go about resolving the challenges that we face.

And I think before any of these questions can be answered, you—the reader—should be aware of your own motives, desires, and goals that you wish to achieve.

What Brings Us Here Together?

First, let us review why we're here.

As diverse as we may be in terms of our background and political beliefs, we are all here for three main reasons:

1. Feminism and its toxic influence on women have disrupted normal relationships between men and women.
2. The progressive movement in our society that is leading social and cultural decadence must be stopped.
3. We have seen the disenfranchisement and the systemic emasculation of men as a result of the above mentioned forces.

So, it is clear that most of us here want just about the same thing: To have normal relationship with women in a normal society that doesn't treat men like garbage. But how are we to achieve that? Well, that depends on how you want to get there.

Here are the questions to consider:

1. Do I Focus On Self Or Society?

Are you leaning towards taking care of yourself or do you prefer to change the society? They're not mutually exclusive, but it will be much more difficult to accomplish both. Maybe you're a nationalist who wants to defend your land, or maybe you don't feel any connection to the place you live in and couldn't care less should the ship sink.

2. Should I Stay Or Go?

Following up on the first question, should you stay or should you leave the West? Most of you currently live in the decadent West and have a front-row seat for the freak show that is feminism and progressivism. Will you stay and try to make the best of it or will you try to venture out to foreign lands that are quickly becoming infected as well?

3. Should I Get Married?

Assuming you’re not under the contract yet, will you take the plunge and marry or opt out of it? I’m going to assume that many of you at least want to start a family eventually. But with whom? A “reformed” Western slut? A foreign chick who’s going to pop out a baby that doesn’t even look like you?

Or will you eventually find that unicorn? Maybe you can even get a surrogate mother so that you can have a child without marrying a woman.

4. How Do I Make Money?

And what will you do for living? Will you work in some feminized PC environment where you have to constantly watch what you do and say? Or will you go Galt and tell the System to shove it?

Would you consider joining the army or do anything to contribute to a society that treats you as a second-rate citizen? Or will you not care and suck it up for the financial benefits? In the manosphere, it seems to be every man's dream to start his own business. Will you be the one that makes it?

5. How Can I Help Society?

All of us here detest what we're seeing in our respective societies. But what will you do to change it? Resort to activism and vote strategically? Is democracy the way or the obstacle?

What if Trump doesn't get elected? What if democracy is hijacked already and will never lead to any practical solutions? Are you willing to revolt and resist through violence if it follows your moral code?

6. Should I Care About Politics?

Politically speaking, who are the enemies? Feminists and the progressive left, or the elites (governments, banks, media, and corporations) who control them? What are you going to do about them? There are some of you who think the two are one and the same, but I disagree. The Occupy protests have shown that the left has beef with the Elites as well.

Are the Elites keeping their power and control over us by employing a divide and conquer strategy with the left and the right? If so, are you willing to make a temporary, unholy alliance with the left?

Are you going to relax and enjoy the decline or will you try your best to accelerate it? Is collapse the only way for a real change or is it possible to turn things around peacefully and smoothly?

What Are The Next Steps?

I won't pretend to have all the answers, but I know two things that must be the case for those of us who are looking ahead:

First, you must be independent, resilient, and be ready for anything.

You must be independent of anything that might hold you down. Don't get trapped in college or some soul-sucking job and don't put yourself in debt-slavery. Have a savings cushion and try to be as financially secure as possible. Remember: those who are free are those who have options.

It goes without saying that you should take care of yourself and keep yourself in shape. But if you want to take it to another level, arm yourself as much as you can while you can. Do not rely on the government and keep as much distance away from Big Brother as humanly possible.

Second, men must mobilize and form groups in real life.

It's not enough to take refuge online and engage in bitching sessions about how screwed up the world is; that's not going to change anything except make you feel validated about your situation. Instead, it is essential now for men to take things beyond the internet to pave the path for practical actions. It's time to form real-life groups where men can congregate and support one another.

The importance of male-bonding is severely overlooked today, where all-male groups are systematically being attacked and injected with female presence. Even if the group doesn't lead to any political movement, I think it's important for a logistical platform to be created for future actions. If you haven't yet, make sure you check out the International ROK Meetup, which will be on February 6th.

Until then, keep in mind that we are at war. Some of you may think that you're not part of it, but the war has already chosen you. We did not bring this upon ourselves, but we sure will fight back with everything we have.

Read More: Two Essential Questions You Must Answer Before Accomplishing Anything

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Cheating American Woman Living Eat Pray Love Lifestyle Murdered By Her African Lover

January 19, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Once again, the American media is going gaga over an Italian homicide involving a female US citizen. Except this time, instead of being the prime suspect, like Amanda Knox some time ago, the American is the purported victim. Ashley Olsen was found dead, apparently strangled by a Senegalese immigrant after having sex with him in her apartment in Florence, despite having a long-term Italian boyfriend. This has led to an eruption of sycophantic praise about her life, as if she were some non-besmirchable sage of philosophy for having moved to Italy like Julia Roberts in the film Eat, Pray, Love.

To be clear, Olsen was a 35-year-old habitual drug and alcohol abuser who seems to have found no steady way to support herself, which makes her descent into drugs even more reckless. Time reports that she worked as a "babysitter, dog-sitter, and organizer of art events." There is no doubt that Olsen's consumption of narcotics led to woefully poor judgment. On a moral basis, we can always fall back on "She didn't deserve it," a sentiment I totally agree with, but how about preventing further deaths like this?

Presenting Olsen as a grossly undeserving victim of homicide is not mutually exclusive with a proper assessment, based on facts and testimonies, of her character and actions. On that theme, forensic evidence so far indicates consensual sex took place between Olsen and a Senegalese illegal migrant. This is already being toned down or swept under the carpet by the media, which has quoted someone saying "She would never have cheated on her boyfriend." Incidentally, the Senegalese man is the one who has been arrested, at least so far, for her murder.

Olsen's love of drugs and degrading lifestyles exposed her to the circumstances in which she died

Sad but true: Olsen's lifestyle put her in harm's way. Her killer should be punished, but that doesn't take away from the way individuals put themselves in life-endangering situations.

If I travel to Sinaloa in Mexico and get murdered, I do not deserve to be killed. But I have exposed myself to a spectacular risk. The same goes for me venturing to Afghanistan for a desert jaunt, going camping in Siberia in January, or starting a makeshift expedition into the Amazon Rainforest. They don't need to be human-related dangers for me to need to take significant precautions (or just not go!).

When was the last time you:

- Went for a late night walk in the projects of Detroit, Harlem or South Central Chicago?

- Wordlessly stared at members of a motorcycle gang at a remote highway bar?
- Ran through cars moving in traffic, even when the vehicles are going over 25 miles an hour?

How is taking any of these steps different from consuming ample drugs and then sauntering around a large city at night? The point here is an appreciation of risks and consequences, rather than declaring that a victim is moral culpable.

This is my exact point about Ashley Olsen. Her lifestyle brought her into contact with forces and circumstances that cause immeasurable injury or plain snuff out lives across the world every day. And even though Italy, particularly Northern Italy, isn't exactly a failed state, there are plenty of behaviors that can make anyone edge dangerously close to personal oblivion in any country.

This is another reason why the media portrayal of Ashley Olsen is so inexcusable and dangerous. American tourists, disproportionately in harm's way in these situations, are being exposed to heightened risk because almost every outlet is interested in glamorizing stupid women like Olsen, not spelling out the facts of how their lifestyles put them in the wrong place at the wrong time.

When you take drugs and gallivant around a city, even one you have lived in for a few years, you are playing Russian roulette.

Olsen's Instagram account is completely misleading

Posting semi-poetic quotes on Instagram or Facebook is a great way to cover over how one actually lives.

Where are the real drug-related pictures on Olsen's Instagram? She didn't put them there, of course. People put on Instagram what they want others to see, not scenes of vomiting after reacting to some obscure chemicals in their narcotics. They want to been as fun, wise (in a cool way), and show a life capable of stoking envy in others.

Countless media reports have linked to Olsen's Instagram, contaminating the actual story and with the full knowledge of reporters that the account presents a very satiated image of what her lifestyle really entailed. Regardless, this narrative of hers is being taken as Gospel truth, as if she were some spiritual teacher we could all learn from.

Was Ashley Olsen a good person? Probably. But she is far from the person being lionized in the media and as a society we are failing to teach others about how the world, oftentimes a very troubling place, needs to navigated wisely.

There will be fewer dead people when we put media substance ahead of style

Media outlets have been more focused on perceiving Olsen's Instagram as the facts than finding the actual facts.

Media outlets gain more money the more they sensationalize. If the facts don't match the desired level of sensationalism, just ditch them, or promote pseudo-stories by selectively discarding some realities while embellishing or making up others. It is hard to imagine, therefore, that these outlets will abruptly have a pang of conscience and start to reflect on the deeper implications of their reporting.

To repeat, Ashley Olsen's victimhood should not prevent us from trying to spare others from her grisly fate. Countless American young men and women need to either come back safely to their families after an overseas holiday or live peaceful, long lives as expatriates. Maybe Olsen would have died anyway, but her drug use and other behaviors made her extremely vulnerable to whatever nefarious individual(s) killed her.

What's a bigger crime: being labeled politically incorrect for exploring hard truths about tourist dangers, or failing to warn people of the danger of certain lifestyle choices in order to stop further tragedies like this? You be the judge.

Read More: Female Ex-Employee Tried To Get $20 Million From Ashley Madison Over "Medical Condition"

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Full City Listing And Meeting Points For International Meetup Day On February 6, 2016

January 19, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We will have 165 meetings in 43 countries for our international meetup day on February 6, 2016 at 8PM local time. Hosts have been instructed to wait at the meeting point from 8:00-8:20pm before moving on to the final location. If you arrive at the meeting point at 8:21pm, you will miss the meetup. Arriving on time within the window is absolutely paramount.

To identify your fellow tribesmen, ask the following question to a man you suspect is there for the meetup: "Do you know where I can find a pet shop?" If you are asked this question, answer in the affirmative: "Yes, it's right here." You can then introduce yourself and get details about where to proceed at 8:20. If you ask someone for the pet shop and they appear confused or actually try to direct you to a real pet shop, they're not there for the meetup.

UPDATE: If a meetup location has been replaced with an email address or two, you must follow the protocol detailed here.

MEETUP CANCELLED

The media has grossly distorted the purpose of the meetups. Here is a sample of the media coverage where you can see the blending of truth and lies:

- This Is What It's Like to Spend an Hour With "Neomasculinity" Blogger Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh
- Anti-feminism blogger Daryush Valizadeh of 'Return of Kings' asks followers to post journalists' details
- Did Daryush Valizadeh really organize "pro-rape rallies"? No, but here's why people are protesting him

- Cockblocked by Redistribution: A Pick-up Artist in Denmark
- Huffington Post archive on Daryush “Roosh” Valizadeh

For the real story, I recommend you read my accurate bio, the Roosh V Wikipedia page, or the unofficial resource of my work at DaryushValizadeh.com.

Read Next: Everything You Wanted To Know About Daryush Valizadeh But Were Afraid To Ask

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

10 Reasons Why Liberals Are Barbarians

January 20, 2016 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

A question you may have asked at some point is: Why are civilized men and women in the West facilitating the decay of their own civilization? This, however, is a fallen question, because one of its premises is false. Those who facilitate the destruction of their own civilization aren't really civilized people at all. They're barbarians.

The term "barbarian" has been with us since ancient Greece, used to describe people with a set of behaviors and character traits antithetical to those that produced Western civilization. According to the ancient Greeks, barbarians are "like children, unable to speak or reason properly, cowardly, effeminate, luxurious, cruel, unable to control their appetites and desires, [and] politically unable to govern themselves." They are also lazy and undisciplined.

Here are the ten traits of barbarity:

1. Childish

Barbarians are naïve or ignorant, either lacking real-world experience or dismissing it in favor of their own private fancies and superstitions. You can see this in SJWs' proclamations that all cultures are equal and that multiculturalism is good. They make this claim because it's a nice idea, even though world history and the European migrant crisis show that multiculturalism is, as Angela Merkel finally admitted, "a grand delusion."

2. Lazy

Barbarians are lazy, and they seek to have things without producing them. SJWs create welfare to give to people money that they didn't earn. SJWs also create affirmative action and anti-discrimination laws to alter workplace demographics. Instead of creating their own companies to hire women and minorities, they use the government to force existing companies to do it (By the way, crony capitalists are lazy too).

3. Undisciplined

Barbarians lack discipline themselves, and they do not instill discipline in their children. SJWs project this pathology onto society, working to undermine the cultivation of discipline in the children of others.

For SJWs, physical punishment, rigorous schoolwork, and systems of competition and reward must be eradicated from every home and school.

4. Unable To Speak Or Reason Properly

Barbarians have difficulty with reasoning skills such as logical analysis and extrapolation. SJWs pervert words and pervert reasoning in the pursuit of sophistry. An example of this is SJWs' use of "hate" and various "phobias." In response to a utilitarian argument against Syrian mass-immigration, an SJW's first move is to proclaim "Islamophobia," a sort of incantation to dismiss arguments and shut down the reasoning process.

5. Cowardly

The scarcity of physical danger in Western societies means that there is little opportunity for physical cowardice. The SJW is foremost a moral coward. He shirks responsibility and duty. He has no love of truth, and is ready to speak and behave dishonestly whenever it suits him. He does what is easy, rather than what is right.

In the US, feminists enthusiastically perpetuate discredited myths about campus rape and wage gaps. In Europe, SJW government officials abandoned their duty to protect their citizens by opening the borders to over a million migrants. Even worse, they continue to put their citizens in danger by harboring and accepting new migrants, all while colluding to suppress information about skyrocketing numbers of rapes and other crimes.

Also, safe spaces.

6. Effeminate

In addition to their appetites, barbarians are moved primarily by their emotions. For example, SJW have irrational maternal feelings that lead them to infantilize women and minorities. They want college instructors to provide “trigger warnings” for their classes because they view college students as young children whose feelings must be protected at all costs, rather than as adults who need to confront uncomfortable topics in order to grow.

7. Luxurious

Barbarians seek comfort and decadence. They live beyond their means in their personal lives, and in their political lives they support their government doing the same. SJWs support the government borrowing money to pay for endless welfare and pet projects (like $3 million to study why lesbians are fat).

8. Cruel

The cruelty of SJWs is often indirect and non-physical. Examples include trying to get a man fired for his views on feminism, or twisting the law in an effort to bankrupt a family-owned business for their religious beliefs.

9. Unable To Control Their Appetites And Desires

Barbarians act on their every compulsion, whether it be for food, sex, or the desire to buy something. The barbarian's motto is "if it feels good, do it." SJWs have pushed for gay marriage, slut-walks, and "fat acceptance," all celebrating unfettered indulgence in bodily appetites.

10. Politically Unable To Govern Themselves

Barbarians create societies not governed by laws, but rather by the whims of those with power. SJWs warp and ape the rule of law, creating the law of the ruler. The rule of law means having a clearly articulated set of laws that are dutifully enforced. In contrast, the law of the ruler is inarticulate and capriciously enforced.

An example of this is judicial activism, used for things like overturning state-level constitutional bans on gay marriage because, you know, reasons.

The Big Picture

The fundamental difference between civilized men and barbarians is that civilized men build civilizations, while barbarians cannot. Firstly, so long as they possess barbaric traits, barbarians will never build their own civilization. Secondly, whenever barbarians manage to conquer a civilization, that civilization falls to ruin.

Lastly, whenever a civilization allows decadence to breed barbarity within its borders, that civilization begins to decay. Note the similarity between the words "decadence" and "decay." The word "decadence" originally did not refer to the opulence of ancient Rome at the height of its power, but to the degeneration that such opulence produced.

Going Forward

Firstly, know thyself. Once you know the traits of a barbarian, it’s worth asking if you can find any of them in yourself.

Secondly, know your enemy. You have a clear metric for identifying barbarians by simply looking for barbaric traits and asking who undermines civilization. Ideas, behaviors, and trends contributing to the decline of Western civilization might appear to be separate, but they are merely different facets of the same barbarian ethos.

Lastly, decide where you stand. In your political lives, wherever you have a voice or a vote, you can choose to defend and advance civilization and its values. In your personal lives, you can choose to live as civilized men, and to pass on civilized values to your children.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Leftists Are Clinically Insane

Jon Socrates
Jon finds purpose in the cultivation of wisdom, strength, and manly virtue.

How To Avoid Being Labeled “Creepy” By Beautiful Girls

January 20, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the main things that holds guys back in their pursuit of women—whether for a relationship or a short-term fling—is the fear of awkwardness. Indeed, the prospect of being called “creepy”, a word bandied about far too readily these days by women looking to shame and silence guys that they are not attracted to, is terrifying for many men.

In order to get over this fear, it is important to understand that “awkwardness” is simply a social frame and not to buy into it when you are dealing with girls.

What Is Awkwardness?

A friend of mine who is getting into back game again after a period out of the market recently expressed his fear of “going in for the kill” on a date. Basically, he is nervous about trying to kiss girls. I told him that as the man he needs to lead the interaction towards sex. In almost all circumstances the girl isn't going to do it, and dominance is the most attractive trait that a guy can demonstrate to a woman.

But what is he really frightened of? After all, the very worst that could happen as a result of going in for an undesired kiss on a date is a slap around the face, but the chances of even that happening are extremely slim. Far more likely is that the girl will simply pull away and make an excuse about not being ready yet.

So, given that physical repercussions are unlikely, what's the problem? The answer, of course, is awkwardness. What my friend doesn't want to face is the aftermath of a failed kiss that produces significant embarrassment. He wonders what he will say and how he will regain his composure after such a crushing occurrence.

But it is this very fear of awkwardness that will cause him to be reticent, ironically making him less attractive to the girl. In the world of dating (as well as the worlds of business, sports, and artistic endeavours) boldness will take you much further than holding back.

Of course, I'm not saying that one should blithely disregard all social conventions in the pursuit of one's personal goals (although actually that wouldn't be a bad idea). What I am saying, though, is that you should recognize that awkwardness or creepiness are not real or tangible, but are simply the manifestation of a frame that is stronger than your own—the girl's.

Once you get this concept down then awkwardness is a lot easier to deal with.

How To Not Be "Creepy"

The way to not be creepy, then, is to understand that awkwardness is a frame set by someone else and to refuse to buy into it. Obviously this is easier said than done, but bear with me while I explain what I mean.

Back in October I wrote an article about how to make out with girls that included the following paragraphs:

> What to do if you "get the cheek"? As discussed, in many cases, especially if you've gone in early, she will reject your first attempts by turning her head away when you try to kiss her. Many men are so horrified by this eventuality that they are scared even to make an attempt, but you shouldn't be. Instead, just realise that it happens to everyone and that it's part of the process.
>
> Smirk, pull back, talk about neutral topics and then try again a little later. Sometimes it takes four or even five attempts before your kiss will be > reciprocated – that's absolutely fine, unless of course she is very angrily telling you to back off, in which case things have gone irrevocably wrong and you should apologize and leave immediately. But if she's still sitting there then you can be confident that she's interested and that it's your job to persist.

Competing Frames

When I'm on a first date with a girl, I will often try to kiss her within the first fifteen or twenty minutes. Frequently this initial kiss will be rejected. In these cases, the girl's frame will be something like: "I just came out for a nice drink and to get to know you and you are violating social convention by trying to kiss me before we know each other well."

And that's absolutely fine. But my frame is different and goes like this: "I am a man and you are a woman. I am attracted to you and that is entirely normal. We are on a date together, and so what could be more natural than that I kiss you?"

Now, as we all know, in any given social interaction whoever has the strongest frame usually wins. And my frame in this context is now rock solid through practice. So if a girl attempts to shame me or to otherwise imply that my behaviour was in any way over the top or inappropriate, I simply front it out. "You're cute—of course I'm going to try to kiss you. Who wouldn't?"

The same goes for when I cold approach. If a girl asks me whether I'm hitting on her when I go up to talk to her, I simply say that I am. Why say anything else?

Own Your Actions

What this all comes down to is owning one's actions. If secretly you think there's something wrong with trying to kiss a girl on a date—or more likely, that you feel deep down that you're not good enough for her—then of course this is going to be telegraphed in your demeanour. Or if, under whatever bravado you've mustered up, you think approaching girls cold is weird, inappropriate, or that you are simply not hot enough then this will also be conveyed in even your tiniest actions.

It is far better to walk out into the world entirely confident in the actions that you take. Those with a strong frame are simply less likely to receive negative feedback about their behaviour. Just think of the school jock who goofs around with the girls and gets away with all kinds of things that betas would be shamed for. Without a doubt, he is afforded a license to pull crazy stunts largely because he doesn’t see anything wrong in doing so.

You must be the same. Next time you feel awkward, or a girl accuses you of being creepy, remember that awkwardness and creepiness are not reality, but rather a frame that has been imposed on you by someone else. Refuse to recognize it, and as if by magic it will melt away.

Read more: How To Make Out With a Girl Without Getting The Cheek

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why Is The Race Of Harry Potter's Hermione Being Magically Changed From White To Black?

January 20, 2016 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Already on this site we've expressed our disappointment that franchises like Mad Max, Star Wars, Game of Thrones and so many others have bowed before the social justice crowd. Unfortunately, Harry Potter is now among them.

The latest nonsense issue drummed up by the laughable degenerates of the far-left is the casting of black actors in the latest Harry Potter adaptions. The controversy began with the recent announcement that actress Noma Dumezweni – a black actress from Swaziland, with be playing a grown-up Hermione in the upcoming stage play Harry Potter and the Cursed Child, which is meant to serve as a sequel to the books.

The one on the right

The responses have varied from unbounded enthusiasm to uneasy disbelief. If like I, you fall in the latter camp, don't worry, it just proves you still retain an ounce of sanity.

We'll get one thing right out of the way—many news articles, brimming with narcissistic contempt, have tried to get away with claiming that the character's skin color is "never specified in the books."

The internet has already called bullshit:

'No, I – I wan' ter be with him ... I don' wan' him ter be alone –'
Footsteps echoed from within the cabin.
'Buckbeak, move!' Harry hissed.
Harry tugged harder on the rope around Buckbeak's neck. The Hippogriff began to walk, rustling its wings irritably. They were still ten feet away from the Forest, in plain view of Hagrid's back door.
'One moment, please, Macnair,' came Dumbledore's voice. 'You need to sign, too.' The footsteps stopped. Harry heaved on the rope. Buckbeak snapped his beak and walked a little faster.
Hermione's white face was sticking out from behind a tree.
'Harry, hurry!' she mouthed.

Prisoner of Azkaban – pg 293

Hermione Granger is white. I don't even care if J.K.Rowling (all hail) has forgotten her own words. Saying the character is black is a retcon. It's not even like saying Dumbledore is gay, as this is left genuinely ambiguous in the books. No, this would be like saying the Dumbledore is actually a bald, overweight guy from Kentucky who sells Sherbet Lemons on the side.

But back to the point, so what exactly is the "problem" with a black Hermione? It is a surrender.

If the people wanting to create a "black Harry Potter" had a shred of integrity, dignity or creativity, here's what they'd actually do. They wouldn't just go and cast black actors to play a bunch of very English characters, speaking English, in a book set in England, written by a blonde white English woman. It is about as intellectually lazy as I can imagine.

Instead, if you had any decency, you'd create your own series with specifically black characters, hopefully set in a black country, with its own black culture. Trust me this isn't hard. In fact, we've seen it done before. The first example that comes to my mind concerns Schindler's List, Steven Spielberg's historical epic about the holocaust. If you were a social justice warrior, you might be jealous of the film's success. How dare a Jewish director cast white actors in a film set in Europe during World War Two?

You may then demand that, to be "fair," Hollywood must go and make a black version of the film. We must cast a black man as Oskar Schindler! Have a black commandant running the concentration camp! Even a little black girl wearing the red dress! Or instead, you could be like a sane person and go make a similar but different film, with similar themes, about an event actually relevant to Africans. Hence, we get a movie like Hotel Rwanda.

The real 'black Oskar Schindler'

This was a movie released in 2004 that tells the real story of Paul Rusesabagina – the manager of a hotel in Kigali, Rwanda who protected 1,200 Hutu and Tusti refugees from the machete wielding mobs during the 1994 genocide. I happen to have seen it, and it's not a bad film. Certainly, many have compared it to Schindler's List, and there can be little doubt it was inspired by it, but ultimately it tells its own unique story. This is my point.

Don't be half-assed about it. If you're going to make a black Harry Potter, then do it properly. Go and make your own young-boy-discovers-he-is-a-wizard fantasy universe, set in Africa. Don't be lazy and just copy what some white English single mother from Gloucestershire came up with one day on a delayed train from Manchester to London.

'Down with whitey bruthas!'

Simply casting a Swaziland actress as Hermione Granger doesn't make the film one iota more about Africans. It does nothing to help the promotion of black culture. If anything, it's a surrender. You're literally admitting—"well no black author could ever write a story this good, better just copy what that blonde white English woman did and call it a day…"

As some may point this out, yes I understand that many aspects of quintessentially "white" culture have a foreign basis. We all know Star Wars had a plot inspired by The Hidden Fortress, but George Lucas didn't just cast Mark Hamill and Harrison Ford as Tahei and Matashichi and call it a fucking day. He added to the story, set it in space and all that shit.

What does casting a black actress actually add to the story – other then making 400 million Harry Potter fans roll their collective eyes while like fifty SJWs—most of them Guardian journalists—shit themselves with excitement?

I'd also object if someone pointed out the way many Hollywood films whitewash characters in historical movies like Troy or Gladiator. True, its not ideal, but generally I wouldn't call that being racist or lazy. There's just something of a shortage of ancient Roman and Greek actors in the 21st century. But I'm sure there's plenty of modern white actors to play modern white characters.

Unfortunately, things like your race, sex, eye color, hair color, looks, voice, accent, personality—these things are all a part of you. Audiences would be surprised if someone cast me—a skinny, twenty-something Australian guy—as Mohammad Ali or Nelson Mandela. A black Hermione can only be political—and we should rightly laugh at the absurdity of it.

At this point, you're probably expecting me to call for a boycott of the stage play when it comes out later this year. And hell, why not? Its the fastest way for us to get in the news. But honestly, I don't care. Yes I'm disappointed that Harry Potter is now bending to a vocal minority on the far-left. We're here again, that lone voice in the crowd saying—"Um, guys? Isn't this kinda crazy?" I'm simply here to wonder, why does everyone else so covet the stories told by us villainous (and usually male) white people?

You never see this happening overseas. We simply don't hear people saying, "So why aren't there more white actors in Seven Samurai." Rather than complain about it, instead they went and made The Magnificent Seven. I'd say, let Japanese people cast Japanese actors in Japanese movies about Japanese culture. Let the Chinese do the same, plus the Arabs, Indians, Africans, and so on. Oh—and those evil white people, them too.

I'm sorry guys, but Harry Potter and his friends are most definitely White Anglo-Saxon Wizards. There's no point pretending otherwise.

Read More: Why Do You Care If Black Guys Like Fat White Girls?

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Every Violent Male Criminal Is Rewarded With Sex From Beautiful Women

January 20, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Feminists, especially in relation to rape hysteria, like to cling to figures showing that a majority of serious crimes are committed by men. What is left untouched (and you can guess why) is how large numbers of women reward hardened and violent male criminals with attention, short-term sex, and long-term relationships. No commensurate trend of men mass glamorizing convicted female murderers, rapists, and armed robbers has ever been observed.

Aside from their aggressiveness and penchant for confronting rivals, the one thing you always notice about the mafia, outlaw biker groups, and black gangstas is that they are never short of women, very frequently aesthetically pleasing ones. This continues whenever they are incarcerated.

In the conversations I have had with off-duty police officers and prison guards, the one constant characteristic they bring up about the criminals they have to apprehend or keep an eye on is the jealousy-inducing number of women they are often involved with.

This reality contradicts the feminist implication (read: lie) that only isolated and rejected individuals, like Elliot Rodger and Ben Moynihan, commit violent acts because of women.

A widespread female preference for violent and criminally-minded men isn't just applicable to killers with a cult following, like Charlie Manson.

With conjugal rooms the norm in many prisons nowadays, third-party witnesses note a steady stream of very fertile, beautiful women visiting men convicted of horrendous acts. Of course, some of these men still claim innocence and convince the women of their purported purity, but most are incontrovertibly guilty or happily admit their responsibility. It matters little; the women still come. And when they do come, many will risk their own future personal freedom to smuggle in items or directly aid further criminal enterprises.

Do all women in society even come close to showering these men with praise, affection, and spread legs? Of course not. But given that only a minority of men perform the sorts of acts required to be serious criminals, only a small proportion of women are needed for this system of predictable and large rewards to perpetuate itself.

And the number of women either rewarding or very willing to reward these men is larger than the number of violent men in or out of jail.

A microcosm of a significantly wider trend

The standard, false narrative is that ROK readers contribute more to the condoning male violence than a woman like Caitlin Hall, who immediately began dating Michael Ibrahim following his release from prison for killing another man.

The cover image of this article features Michael Ibrahim, who was convicted of the very gruesome stabbing death of Robin Nassour, the brother of a well-known Australian comedian. Pictured with him is the girlfriend he landed right after being released from prison. Though one of his older brothers is a very wealthy and connected nightclub owner in Sydney, there is no doubt that Ibrahim's serious criminal past would appeal to many good-looking women.

Men seeing or reading about people like Michael Ibrahim (and there are many, many stories like his) recognize the good probability of attracting more than decent women (appearance-wise) if they, too, are convicted of serious crimes. You may wish to attribute greater weight to Ibrahim's family's money or, in other cases, to the physicality of a male criminal than his actual crimes. Be my guest. All that achieves, at best, is demonstrating that women are able to overlook a man's very violent criminal past for financial and/or power considerations.

Regardless of how you look at this issue, a female's erstwhile morals (if they even existed) go out the window when she shacks up with a violent criminal. The condoning of serious male violence by many women remains, however harshly you judge an attractive woman's reasons for doing it.

As a male, how am I responsible for other men's crimes?

This average Western male is attributed more blame for violent male criminals he doesn't even know than the women who decide to fuck them. Makes perfect sense.

A predictable trope employed by feminists, SJWs and white knights is the bogus theory of collective male responsibility. Everyone from the male philosophy student to the good-natured male garbage collector is somehow causing, abetting, and condoning broader male crime simply by possessing a penis. The classic conception of this collective guilt is the invented rape culture, but it extends much more broadly than that.

Like many of you, I have never knowingly met a convicted murderer, rapist, or armed robber. Yet I am apparently a contributing factor to the next male-on-female sexual assault that happens 2,000 kilometres away in Tasmania, or some guy allegedly punching his girlfriend in Lübeck, Germany at three o'clock in the morning.

Ironically, we are blamed for these incidents and women who actually know these men and can exert a real influence, from the mother who raised them to the sisters who lived alongside them, are cleared of any moral involvement. Female friends and acquaintances who continue social interactions with men they know are violent or convicted criminals also get a free pass.

The conundrum only gets worse when we start to consider females who give out sex and intimate companionship to these men. A guy, perhaps a member of a biker gang, beats another man to death and is released after some years, only to find a couple models falling in his lap. How doesn't this make some men more willing to commit violent acts?

If all women categorically refused to sleep with violent criminals, male crime would drop by 80-90% overnight

Women like Claudia Ochoa Felix have openly associated themselves with the criminal underworld, rewarding the choices of the men who act within it.

If this were to take place, some men, a small minority, would resort to rape to get some action. By contrast, the great majority of male criminals or criminally-inclined men would have no choice but to reform themselves and ameliorate their rougher tendencies. They would have to act more like the average male accountant or office worker, who is presently on a much, much lower rung of sexual appeal for a considerable cross-section of attractive women.

From the preceding discussion we can see that women are equally as, if not more, responsible for male crime than other men. The numbers of women who lavish or are willing to lavish violent men with access to their genitals far outstrip the rate of men committing repulsive crimes.

Yet this is probably the most inconvenient truth of all for feminists, so don't expect them to even half-heartedly try to refute it any time soon. For them it's always best ignored.

Read More: Men Benefit From Acting Potentially Violent And Explosive Around Women

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

26 Tips For Getting Laid In Europe During The Winter

January 21, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

I decided to stick around in Poland to defy the Eastern European winter. There is no comparison between approaching a girl during summer in a place like Lithuania, Poland, Serbia, or Belarus and doing the same in winter. The short skirts are (almost) gone, no sun on your face, and you do not feel as good.

Being there now, I observe the transition but what do men do? They adapt. So instead of letting yourself and your dick go into hibernation, here are my techniques to keep a regular flow of pussy during the cold months.

1. Broaden and reinforce your social circle

Investigate with friends and see if girls are available. Interact more with groups of friends or coworkers. Ask about house parties, propose activities and throw a party yourself.

2. Focus on girls indoors

Shopping malls, shopping malls, shopping malls. Even in their winter gear, the girls that go to the shopping mall still look sexy. They don’t stop buying bread, nice lingerie, and useless stuff because it is winter. Shopping malls have to become your main venue for day game.

3. Approach in public transport

The trams and buses with a heating system, if they are available. No point being in the Soviet frozen meat wagon and talking to a girl that is shivering and only thinking about going home as fast as possible. Or kill time at the bus stop by talking to cuties.

4. Don’t stay at home too long

Seems like common sense, but more than ever, you will be deficient in Vitamin D. Fresh air and sun are limited so get as much as possible. It will influence your mood and your horniness. Get some Vitamin D supplements if you are stuck in Mourmansk for the winter.

5. Change your day game routine

With shorter daytime, you have to make the best of it. Make it a commitment to day game in the morning or early afternoon. Girls become suspicious when a stranger approaches them as the sun sets.

6. Know that the clock is ticking

Forget long street game sessions and dozens of approaches. When I get out of my den, my ears burn from the cold after 10 minutes. Some guys can rock the cap or beanie look, but it simply does not work for me. The cold will wear you out. Adapt your outfit and be efficient.

7. Go to the bania or sauna

A must in Eastern Europe. Organise an outing to one ahead of time with your social circle. This is a great experience where everyone will be drinking and the girls are often naked under their towels and undress in the bania. Public banias or saunas are often mixed-sex. Tip: Keep it quiet inside or people WILL tell you to shut up.

8. Do more sports

Hit the gym, get ready for the summer and run some gym game if that is your thing.

Other alternatives are the numerous aquaparks, indoor pools, or even ice rinks where girls go. Join a local sports club: MMA, crossfit, team sports… They are not as crowded as in the summer, andyou will make friends and meet girls.

9. Aim more at weekend night game

As daylight regresses, the conversion of approaches to notches during weekdays can be smaller.

10. Drink up

EE girls and guys drink more to keep warm. They are then more socially lubricated. Girls are easier to approach and the competition is neutralised (or more aggressive if you are unlucky). Because it is warm in the bar, they stay longer at the same spot and give you more time to act.

11. Spend more time in restaurants

People eat more in winter, since it is a physiological necessity. EE is not like America or Britain. In Georgia or ~~Western Bulgaria~~ Macedonia, people at neighboring tables will wave you over to join their tables. Do some networking and avoid the gringo traps with poor quality overpriced food.

12. Use winter food as bait

Orient your conversation with girls on the local food. Ask her about a traditional dish in particular and if it is better in a restaurant or home made. She will answer home made. They enjoy cooking for men, so ask her if she knows how to do it, then make her cook it for you. Meet her at hers or yours and get to work.

13. Plan your New Year’s Eve well

Forget overpriced clubs. Plan months ahead. Try a NYE old school ball with truckloads of single girls in evening dresses. Or rent a mountain lodge in the Balkans with homemade tucker and alcohol. Gather the wingmen and use their networks to bring along potential targets. Their girlfriends’ friends are usually prime material.

14. Refine logistics

Choose the venue of the date wisely. Location needs to be even closer to yours than in summer. Cold weather triggers her logical brain faster and the longer you stay out, the more likely you will get the “I am not going with you” line.

Find a venue with a low ceiling, good heating, and no walls made of stone or cold materials. Avoid benches and find a couch. Choose a place that sells tea and vodka. Because of the sofas, the atmosphere feels intimate faster.

15. The key is in the tea

The “tea”. Perfect winter addition to “Let’s go to mine, I need to charge my phone.” Not beta at all, tea is a fundamental part of EE life. After a daytime walk or after the bar, say “Let’s go for a walk and have a tea”. Sell it well. Say that you will make it with honey and lemon, let her imagine the coziness of your apartment.

If she hesitates: “Let’s go. When we are done, we can go back and party.” Put the kettle on, use the “You look cold, come here,” then get to work.

Roosh explains here how to step up your tea game.

16. Don’t forget the caffeine

Coffee is also a good alternative, but it seems to be more of a morning drink there. Regular cafes and big chains are more frequented, especially if you need to get intimate with your target.

17. Try university game

Find a local university or academy and its library. It has to be accessible to outsiders. If you use some game on the library lady, they might let you in even if you are not a student. The problem is that it needs silence. Go stretch your legs in the corridors and approach or lock a target in the library and talk to her after isolating her.

18. Use your own roof

Orientate the second or even the first date towards meeting her directly at your place first. Even if EE girls are not easily deterred by the cold, they are still girls and can be attracted by staying indoors and watching movies. A homemade dinner is also more likely to happen in winter.

19. Stay strong

Health is as important as game. Keep training, don’t stay outside for long when you sweat, and drink loads of tea and eat honey. Use warm clothing and waterproof shoes.

Don’t overestimate your resistance to the cold. No point playing it hardcore if you are out of commission for the next week.

20. Hit the slopes

If you feel like it, shell out some cash and head for the ski resorts of Poiana Brasov (Romania), Zakopane (Poland), Bansko or Borovets (Bulgaria). I hate skiing but gaming pretty girls while drinking beer near a roaring fire while everyone else is breaking an ankle does not sound too bad. Loads of students head there during the winter break in the sole purpose of partying and getting drunk.

21. Check your ~~privilege~~ calendar

Keep track of the local Catholic or Orthodox observances and holidays (and Muslim if you are in one of the Stans or going wild and courting Magomed the Chechen’s sister) to plan your dates well. With the festive season, many girls return home visiting their families and the religious ones may feel guilty about swallowing your load on a religious holiday.

22. Get online

Focus on Internet game if that is your thing. Longer hours inside means more time to swipe and look at what the local dating website has to offer. Fire up Tinder, Badoo, Mamba and off you go. Different countries will give very different results in Internet game. Do your research.

23. Cheer up

All the locals look depressed and rarely smile in winter. Display a positive attitude in public places. By adopting a friendlier vibe, you stand out. Not talking here about the idiot grin, but rather the confident smirk.

24. Cut the bullshit

Go to the essentials and establish a flirty chat faster. You cannot let the conversation go on for too long if it is outside like you could in summer. Bring her on an insta-date (the cold will convince her easier) or get the girl's number and find the next one.

25. Respect the Lord's Day

Forget Sunday afternoon game. If you are like me and hate the crowd, especially when you are hung over, steer clear from the centre. The cities are usually full of those winter manifestations, parades, and families strolling around.

26. Participate in the local life

In EE’s first and second tier cities, the winter is particularly rich in film festivals, food festivals, sports competition and other cultural events to entertain the locals and encourage drinking. Go check it when you are not hung over, hang out with girls or develop local connections.

That’s about it. Buy gloves and a beanie, take your vitamins, hit the gym, eat a lot, and motivate yourself by the thought of pretty girls who are up for it because their bed is cold.

BONUS: Those two winter events might not get you laid but you should try them at least once in your life

Read More: If You Can't Get Laid In The West, You Won't Get Laid Abroad

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

5 Serious Problems With The Alt Right Movement

January 21, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Recently, Paul Ramsey published an excellent article here at ROK introducing the Alternative Right. While I sympathize with some of the goals of the alt right, I believe the movement as it is constituted today has serious weaknesses that will prevent it from succeeding.

Bona Fides

Because the alt right is such a new movement, it is at risk for being subverted (if that hasn't happened already). Thus, I've noticed some alt righters are a little bit distrustful of people who say they are allies of the movement. To allay that realistic concern, I need to give you a little bit of my background.

I'm a first generation American. Both of my parents are European and my ancestors have all been Catholics for hundreds of years. In other words, I am 100% white by most people's definition.

I come from a political family. On my mother's side, my forebears were regional leaders. Both sides of my family were virulently anti-Marxist so it is no coincidence that I find myself battling the latest retread of Marxism in the form of SJWs.

Although I have not participated in any formal events that are associated with the alt right, I've been watching the movement for the past year. A perusal of my writing here at ROK and at my blog will show that I've been consistently supportive of nationalism, patriarchy, and tradition—ideas that align well with a large segment of the alt right.

My goal in writing is to help men move society in this direction. It is with this in mind that I highlight the following problems with the movement.

1. Lack of organization

Most of us are familiar with the story of the 300 Spartan warriors who made a stand against a Persian force numbering close to one million at the Battle of Thermopylae. Yet the secret to the Spartan's fighting prowess was not that each man was an individual MMA badass, but that they were trained to fight as a coordinated unit in the phalanx formation. In other words, it was organization that made the Spartan armies great.

If a movement is tightly coordinated, even a small group of men can achieve disproportionate results. The Bolshevik takeover of Russia, the rise of the National Socialists in Germany, and even the American Revolution are examples of what can be done when relatively small groups of dedicated men work together.

One of the alt right's biggest weaknesses is that it is an informal movement. Most of the movement's followers preach its ideas on Twitter and 4chan. While there is some intellectual firepower behind the movement, its lack of formality makes it inconsequential when compared to the well-organized establishment parties.

2. Lack of a plan

Let's avoid this

Probably the biggest unifying principle in the alt right is the desire for an all white state, but there is no real plan to get there. I've seen some ideas floated, but they are not pleasant options. One is to await the inevitable collapse of the US as we know it today (i.e. it's destruction). Presumably, those who are prepared can then strike out to form a new nation that does not repeat the same mistakes that the US made.

But there is no guarantee that the United States will collapse anytime soon. A more likely scenario is the US will evolve into a surveillance state to “protect us” from all the Muslim immigrants that are conveniently being allowed into the country.

A second, less frequently discussed option, is civil war that would lead to a white state. But the US still has the finest military in the world, and the controlling elites would have no problem slaughtering thousands of “right wing terrorists” to maintain their control. For sane people, any sort of bloodshed should be the option of last resort.

The lack of a serious plan to make things better leaves us with hope for something that may not happen in our lifetimes—or even in our children’s lifetimes.

3. Utopian view of white people

One of the best observations of the alt right is that you cannot divorce culture from race. If you replace all the Frenchmen in France with Arabs, it would no longer be France. If whites cease to be a majority in the US, the character of the country will change. Even the Italian and Irish immigration of the late 19th and early 20th centuries diminished the Anglo-Saxon character of the US. Filling the US with Central Americans will make the US more like Central America.

But we should not be under any illusions that an all-white state would take us back to the late 1950s. White people have been conditioned for generations to oppose nationalism. Our public education system teaches that nationalism, the radical idea that a government should benefit its own people, inevitably leads to war and totalitarianism. That’s why when Trump proposed closing the borders to illegal immigration and limiting legal immigration, he was immediately attacked as being a new Hitler.

American whites have also been taught that they do not have any tradition. I once had a conversation with a teacher who was coordinating an “international day” at her school. She complained that she felt bad because the Africans, Pakistanis, Asians, and Indians had such rich cultures while her white American culture was “nothing.”

I had to explain to her that she was an inheritor of what is arguably the greatest culture in the world: Western culture. On top that, I pointed out that American culture is very distinctive and that it has a reputation for excellence. After all, it was the US that put a man on the moon.

For any nationalist movement to work in the US, the culture and all its institutions need to be reoriented to remove the self-loathing that whites have for themselves. The institutions must be changed to create citizens who are proud of their heritage, and who put the needs of their nation ahead of globalist concerns. This can't be done with memes alone.

Without these changes, any success of the alt right would be short lived.

4. Inability to cause genuine harm to conservative establishment

Meeting of the Cuckservative Jedi High Council

In one of the forgettable Star Wars prequels, Darth Maul says: "At last we will reveal ourselves to the Jedi." Emboldened by the Donald Trump campaign, many alt right people took to Twitter to engage the cuckservative establishment Jedi.

The cuckservatives immediately found that they were no match for the alt right. None of the usual thought-stopping epithets worked. The happy warriors of the alt right laugh at being called racists or Nazis. But while the establishment is not able to answer the alt right arguments using reason, they are now very aware of the existence of the alt right as a real force—and they are hell bent to crush it.

The establishment will use a three-prong approach. The first is to purge the alt right as being beyond the pale of the Conservative Movement. National Review, the primary organ of the Republicans, has dismissed alt right ideas as the ravings of "racist peckerwoods" who are "on the wrong side of history." National Review even deletes the comments of their readers who agree with the alt right.

The purging of the alt right has been successful. Apart from Ann Coulter, not a single mainstream pundit is willing to defend alt right ideas.

The second step the establishment will use is to focus on stopping the candidacy of Donald Trump. While Trump himself is not a subscriber to the alt right, his promises to curb Mexican and Islamic immigration make him a champion to his alt right supporters.

The entire Republican establishment is working on defeating Trump's nomination through funding anti-Trump ads and by procedural tricks that will make it more difficult for Trump to win the primaries. The GOP elite hope that if Ted Cruz can siphon off enough votes from Trump, it could open the door to a brokered convention where an establishment-approved candidate such as Jeb or Rubio could emerge with the nomination.

If these measures fail, it is likely that the GOP elite will run a third party donor-owned candidate to frustrate the democratic process and hand victory to Hillary or Bernie. A Trump defeat would land a demoralizing blow to the alt right. It would leave the movement with no political representation at any level.

The third step in suppressing the alt right is taking away its methods of communicating. The movement relies heavily on social media to spread its message, but Twitter has recently announced censorship rules that will make it easier to ban alt right accounts that are "offensive," and thus severely limit any further growth.

The alt right prides itself on being younger and smarter than the GOP establishment, but at this point it looks like the stodgy establishment is poised to strangle the alt right.

5. Alienating and purging allies

Exclude the Russian girl. Too Slavic.

There's a saying on the alt right that runs, "No enemies to the right." It is a reaction to the type of purging the mainstream conservative movement has engaged in. Despite this dictum, I see a lot of discussion in alt right circles excluding various people from the movement.

For example, I recently had a conversation with an Asian lady who has been in the US for over 40 years. She's a big Trump supporter and she favors completely shutting down immigration. She agrees that whites are being marginalized by the current immigration policies. Far from being an proponent of diversity, she would actually prefer to live in a majority white country—after all, she left her own country for a reason.

Under certain understandings of the alt right, this woman, who is a natural ally, would be excluded while a white leftist like Rachel Maddow would be welcomed.

The purging is not limited to nonwhite allies. A small group of people associated with the alt right appear to even want to create a pecking order of white people using actual genetic test results. My guess is that this tendency is mostly coming from the 14/88 groups that Paul Ramsey referenced in his article.

In one case, I saw someone on Twitter cast aspersions at the Irish as being somehow beneath Anglo-Saxons and Nordics. Another person was fixated on German descent. His definition of being German was even more rigorous than what the National Socialists espoused.

Suffice it to say that any American movement that not only purges blacks, Asians, and Hispanics, but also segments of the white population is set to fail.

Conclusion

In the end the biggest problem with the alt right is that a portion of it is too idealistic. By setting the goal of an all white nation, it ignores the possibility of dramatically improving what we have now. Personally, I am unwilling to wait for decades for something that may never happen. Rather, the way forward is a turn toward nationalism using democratic means.

Read More: What Is The Alternative Right?

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The Ultimate Guide To Building Muscle: Genetics And Training

January 21, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

There are a lot of articles on ROK about lifting weights and building muscle. All of them are very good. What I could not find was an ultimate guide, with all the most important information for building muscle the fastest way possible, naturally, in a single place.

Who am I to write an ultimate guide to building muscle?

I am just like you, your average guy trying to add muscle to his frame. I have done a lot of research and experimentation over 20 years to figure out what works for me in the gym. My journey to fast muscle gains started when I finally found the book that helped me crack the hardgainer label I had given myself for years.

Scrawny to Brawny: The Complete Guide to Building Muscle the Natural Way

I started lifting weights at age 16. I had some initial success in my 20's, but also a lot of failures until I hit my 30s and found this book. It highlighted all the errors I was making in training and how to fix them based on scientific research.

I want to share with you not just what works for me, but what I also did wrong over the years. In doing so, it is my hope you will recognize some part of yourself in my muscle journey and learn from the path I have walked in trying to build my ultimate physique. With that said, let's start with the basics.

Genetics

Western Cancer wrote a great article on the origin of somatotypes – ectomorph, mesomorph, and endomorph.

While the origins of these body type classifications may be less than scientific by 21st century standards, there is no questioning the wise generalization of body types they attempt to describe. No matter how much you close your eyes and try to wish it away, you are your genes.

Your genetic profile—bone density, muscle fiber type composition, height, limb length, tendon insertion points, skeletal structure, etc.—is going to have a tremendous impact on your muscle building potential.

Your can't escape your genetic legacy, but you can maximize it to it's fullest potential and expression! When it comes to those former body type classifications, I now like to think of them in terms of muscle fiber type composition and proportion – i.e. your type I, IIa and IIb's.

- Type I (ectomorph) – Slow twitch. Marathon muscle. Endurance. Light loads.
- Type IIb (endomorph) – Power lifting. Explosive. Heavy loads. Very, very short endurance.
- Type IIa (mesomorph) – The in-between fiber type. Fast twitch/oxidative-glycolytic.

Type IIa's are literally a miracle muscle. They can actually mimic, be turned into, or switched from, a type I or a type IIb muscle fiber depending on the type of training you do. That's right brothers, you have muscle in you that can transform.

So in one way, Western Cancer was right. You are not limited by any "type" of body per se because as you train, your body changes. That said, you are limited by your overall muscle fiber type composition, and thus, how much potential it has to be modified by training and diet.

Some guys will be bursting with type IIa miracle fibers that naturally just blow up and become huge with little fat gain and basic training regimens. Your classic mesomorph.

The guy that just grows walking into the gym.

Other guys will take forever to grow because their overall muscle fiber type is for endurance (type I ectomorphs) and will forever be dominated by a more lean and athletic build instead of big and beefy.

Then you have the guys that can naturally lift huge weights and thus gravitate to power lifting where they find tremendous success (type IIb mesomorphs). They also give up the quickest on ever being able to lose the "insulation" around their mid-section. Shedding fat is almost impossible for them without God-like discipline and submission to a very strict diet and exercise regimen.

I think you can see where this is going. The science of muscle fiber types is now explaining why men on the same training program get different results. Each body is different in its muscle fiber type composition and proportion, and thus a single training program is not going to work for every man.

Your goal in training is to find out which muscle fibre type dominates your body as a whole (and perhaps even within each muscle group) and then optimize your training to develop ALL your muscle fiber types to their maximum genetic potential.

Training

There ain't no way around it. You want muscle? You want to get big? You are going to have to train hard and be prepared to make pain your friend. Here is where I made the most basic mistake about how to grow muscle. Select an exercise. Work the muscle to exhaustion. Eat. Sleep. Repeat.

Why is this wrong? We are putting our focus on the exercise, the routine, not the muscle. To grow muscle, we need to select exercises that work specific muscle fiber types.

How is this accomplished?

In Scrawny To Brawny, the authors break down their training regime into the following exercises and training phases.

Exercises:

Primarily large, compound joint movements. Squat. Bench. Deadlift. Chin-ups and pull-ups. Anything that involves multiple muscle groups working together to maximize complete, overall muscular recruitment and development.

Phases:

First: A 5×5 phase – 5 sets with a weight you can handle for 5 reps, no more, no less.

Second: A very heavy progressive phase – 6 sets total broken into two, 3 set "wave's" of 4/3/2 reps. First wave: 100 lbs for 4 reps, 110 for 3, 120 for 2. Second wave: 110 for 4 (10 lbs up from first set in wave one), 120 for 3, 130 for 2 (in theory, 10 lbs OVER your 1 rep max weight).

Third: A HIT style phase – Training four times a week, the whole body twice a week, with a mix of compound exercises plus isolation moves combined with supersets, etc.

Here is how this training approach works.

- The 5×5 phase helps you find a good heavy weight that is just a little above your 2 rep max to make the most out of the following super heavy progressive phase. You develop good strength and comfort with a fairly heavy weight before going super heavy.
- The progressive wave sets are super heavy. Your goal here is to try to push PAST your previous 1 rep max weight.
- Both the 5×5 and progressive phase focus on maximizing power and strength over endurance.
- The HIT phase allows you to take the increased power and strength you have developed to a more traditional gym routine (i.e. 4 sets of 8 to 10 reps) that allows you to lift heavier for longer.

That last point is key – lifting heavier and longer than you could before (i.e. more weight for more reps).

Why?

> … although they [type IIa muscle fibers] don't contribute much to overall strength development, they can help improve the appearance of your muscles to a substantial degree. – Scrawny to Brawny, pg 136

Fast twitch/oxidative-glycolytic type IIa muscle fibers – the miracle muscle!

Type IIa muscle fibers "put on some size, plain and simple" as the author's of Scrawny to Brawny write because of their specific properties. Growth inside this cell takes place in a way that has nothing to do with making it contract, and everything to do with what happens between the muscle fibers, it's size and shape.

But… those IIa's can only grow in size and shape if they can keep pushing more and more weight! If you want to grow big, you have to lift big. Lifting big requires that you specifically train type IIb fibers FIRST before you train type IIa. Therefore, you must train specific muscle fiber types to exhaustion, in sequence, not just the muscle as a whole.

The 5×5 and near 2 rep max heavy progressive phases build power and strength that allow you to keep blowing through growth plateaus that were impossible to overcome in the past. With the added endurance aspect of HIT and superset style workouts that follow a strength phase, you then target the size of type IIa fibers for more complete muscular genetic development and fat loss.

In short, the order of training muscle fiber types is as follows:

- training for strength (type IIb with some IIa) in the first phase
- consolidating your gains and pushing PAST previous max weights in the second phase focusing on power (pure type IIb)
- lifting lighter for more reps, but at a heavier weight for the same rep count than before you began the prior two phases (primarily type IIa and type 1)
- repeat

As you can see, this will result in you returning to the first phase always pushing more weight than when you started it!

Gee… I wonder if that might result in some muscle growth? Hmmm… let me think on it for a minute.

But exercise alone won't get you there. You have to eat! Part II of this ultimate guide to muscle will go over nutrition and how to eat SMART to get big.

Read More: 6 Tips To Build More Muscle During Your Workouts

Maximus Decimus Meridius

Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

How To Choose, Buy, And Shoot A Shotgun

January 22, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

The shotgun is a American weapon. Split off from smooth bore muskets, the idea of firing a bunch of little balls of lead instead of one ball developed from an alternative load into its own weapon. The shotgun has evolved into a modern firearm with a variety of purposes, and here I'll show those roles, the different options available, and what you can do with one for fun, sport, and defense.

Shot, Buck, And Ball

A single projectile is defined in caliber and grain. Conversely, a shotgun has the ability to fire a variety of lead, from a cloud of small shot to take down a dove or quail, up to a solid slug for hunting of bigger game.

There are many sizes of lead shot. Starting from the smallest, you have pest shot; that's #12-#10 shot. Bird shot: dove and quail to turkey and geese, ranges from #8 shot up to #1 shot at the biggest. It then gets into B shot and BB shot (like a BB gun). The bigger the number, the smaller the pellets.

Shotshells and their loads, from birdshot through buckshot to a slug.

There's some steel waterfowl shot, then we move into buckshot. Starting with #4 Buck at the smallest, we move up through #1, and then 0, 00, and 000. Pronounce that "Number 4 Buck" for #4, and "Double Ought Buck" for 00.

Shooting one solid ball of lead out of the shotgun was called ball. Now, they aren't round and have grooves cut into them for some spin while in the air, so they're called slugs. Slugs are typically used for deer hunting, but also are good for defense.

Gauge And Chamber

Shotguns are measured in terms of "gauge." Gauge is how many lead balls that are the diameter of the bore of the shotgun that weighs a pound. There are, from biggest to smallest, 10, 12, 16, 20, 28, and .410, the last being a caliber. 10 gauge is obsolete due to magnum 12 gauges. 28 gauge is considered an artisan's round, and 16 gauge splits the difference between 12 and 20, and is not as popular as either. .410 is a snake and critter round.

The 12 gauge shotgun is a man's gun, and, unless you are a kid, old, or a woman, you should be able to handle one. The 20 gauge is its little brother and is for those people, and hunters who want to display mastery and make do with less.

Shotshells were 2 and 3/4 inches long originally. Starting around 1980, 3 inch long shells were developed, and the 1990s saw 3.5 inch magnum shells developed. Most 12 gauges these days will do both 2 and 3/4 shells, and 3 inch shells. Guns that will do 3.5 will also do the smaller two, as well. All shotguns will be stamped into the barrel with what ammunition they can handle.

Do not overpower a shotgun with a bigger shell above its rating.

12 gauge 3.5″ magnum, 3″, and 2.75″ shells

Lastly, there is “high brass” and “low brass.” This is a description of how tall the brass base of the shell is; low brass is typically light bird shot, and high brass is bigger bird, buck, and slugs. See the main picture for an example.

Choke And Barrel Length

Choke is a measurement of the constriction at the end of the bore, and it will adjust the size of the cloud of shot at the expense of the density of the shot in that cloud. Chokes run from no choke at all, called cylinder, through improved, modified, and modified improved to full. There is an “extra full” commonly called “turkey” named after the bird.

Barrels once had choke diameters machined in. Now, we have removable internal chokes, with sockets and threads to take a choke insert in the end of the barrel, and external chokes, which thread onto the end of the barrel.

Do not fire any sort of removable choke shotgun without a choke, you will FUBAR it. Run cylinder if you're shooting slugs, full choke for deer and turkey hunting, and your selection will vary for wing shooting. Some barrels are specifically rifled for slugs; run sabot slugs, not rifled slugs, out of them.

Internal choke tubes.

Barrel length will mainly affect the handling of the gun. Wing shooting guns typically have long barrels to help following of the flying bird, whereas turkey guns and military style guns have short barrels (18 to 24 inches). A SBS (short barreled shotgun), as in "sawed off shotgun," has a barrel under 18 inches and must have a stamp and form for it, otherwise it is illegal.

Actions And Magazines

The simplest shotgun is the break action. These are single barrel or double barrel in the side by side (SxS) or Over and Under / Superposed (O/U) varieties, and there are even some triple barreled and combination guns out there.

Girl holding a break action over and under.

Break action shotguns open with a lever, and the shells will extract partially from the barrels, or be thrown out. You then reload and snap it closed. The double barrel ones usually have one trigger that cycles between barrels, or two triggers. If your shotgun has two triggers, do not pull both of them at the same time. While the gun may be able to take it, it wasn't designed to do it.

Girl running a pump shotgun.

Most “repeating” shotguns have a tube magazine slung underneath the barrel, although some have detachable box magazines coming out of the receiver. Manual action shotguns can be the pump or slide action, the less common bolt action, or the fairly obsolete lever action.

Levers and bolts are worked by the firing hand, while the pump action is worked by your support hand and the forearm of the gun becomes unlocked and able to slide back after you fire or push a lever.

The Terminator using a sawed-off lever action.

Semi-automatic shotguns are operated by the inertia of the recoil of the round going off, or an amount of combustion gas cycling a piston. Inertia guns are faster cycling, simpler, and harder on the recoil, while the gas guns are more picky on the power of the shot and require valves to tailor the gas to reliably run the action while not overpowering.

Aiming Versus Pointing

A traditional shotgun has one sight, called a bead, on the tip of the barrel. You look down the top plane of the barrel or sighting rib, track your flying target with the bead either on the bird or just below it (along with the appropriate amount of lead), and punch the trigger while continuing to arc the gun in one fluid motion. This is called “pointing.”

Wing shooting guns are typically patterned so that the center of the shot pattern is just above the bead at the intended range so you don’t cover the target with your barrel. Conversely, shotguns set up for hunting on the ground and defense will have sights more like a rifle, with a front blade and a rear sight, and be aimed in the normal manner.

Traditional bead sight.

The Home Defense Shotgun

Any shotgun will work for home defense, but a medium barreled pump action or semi auto 12 or 20 gauge is a good choice. Most tube shotguns will run 5 shells if you take the restrictor dowel out, and some have tubes out to the end of the barrel for more shells.

Add a side saddle shell carrier on the side of the receiver, or on a band around the stock, and you can carry a decent amount of shells with you. Use a sling. If you’re running a foreign gun, look up code USC 18 922r to make sure you have parts compliance if you are doing any modifications, and check your state laws before modifying any gun.

A tricked-out Benelli M4.

Use sights that you can see in the dark, or a light or laser on the gun to help with target identification and aiming. Be sure to do your thinking about the doors and windows in your home versus where your people will be ahead of time; buckshot and slugs don’t exactly respect drywall and will go right through.

If, however, you’re the only friendly in your place, shoot now and mud drywall later. A load for a defense shotgun is some form of buckshot (like 00 Buck) or slugs.

A tactical rear sight. Ghost ring aperture and tritium night sight inserts.

You DO have to aim a shotgun; it’s not a general direction thing. Any choke you run will have a pattern under a foot for the first 30 feet; it is quite possible to miss. A shotgun will run out of steam in about 50 yards for shot, and slugs will really start dropping after 100 yards, so it’s a “house and yard” gun. Consider your load for the distances; buckshot gets a good spread going at 15 yards or so, but slugs punch big holes.

Brands

I’ll do a brief brand rating for the shotguns to close out this one. I really can’t think of a modern junk brand.

Budget

These will work well, but may malfunction at times, and are missing some fit and finish of their more expensive brethren. I put Norinco, Baikal, Tristar, Stevens, H&R, Kel Tec, and Mossberg here.

Mid Range

These are solid guns that are the example of what a gun should be. Remington, Winchester, Ruger, Savage, Saiga, Franchi, CZ, and Stoeger go here.

Premium

Top end mass manufactured guns of the firms of Benelli, Beretta, Browning, FNH, Weatherby, Wilson Combat, Sig Sauer fit in here.

Best Guns / Bespoke

Some guns are truly expensive or custom made and are more works of art than firearms. Called Best, like London Best, Perazzi, Purdy, Krieghoff, and Fabbri are some examples of this ultimate field.

Some Purdy's London Bests.

Conclusion

There's a lot of fun to be had in hunting, and it's a great skill to have and an experience to be shared. The competition community thrives, and you can find skeet and sporting clays on one end, and combat shotgun sports like 3 gun on the other. For home defense, the shotgun is a great thing with which to defend house and property from everything from rabid dogs, to home invasions, to drones.

"…just fire two blasts outside the house."

The ammo is less expensive than many rifle rounds and it doesn't usually sell out in a panic. Being a traditional American gun, it is less apt to get banned by Democrats and is even endorsed by Joe Biden.

Prices are generally cheaper than a comparable rifle, and the amount of lead you can dispense close up is fairly awesome. Every American home used to have one hanging over the fireplace; it’s a trend we should consider reviving.

Read More: A Beginner’s Guide To Carrying A Handgun

Luke Stranahan

Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Hillary Clinton’s Socialist Manifesto Shows Why Women Shouldn’t Be Involved In Politics

January 22, 2016 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

It is no surprise that most men are inclined towards freedom and individualism, while most women are inclined towards security and collectivism. Building on this dichotomy, we have many examples of women finding the preference of security and collectivism illustrated in large, bloated welfare government.

For one, the Pew Research states “Women lean Democratic by 52%… unmarried women 57%”. In a similar article, “Since 1990, women have been consistently more likely than men to identify as Democrats or lean Democratic.” Nothing is closer to socialism and statism in modern America than the American left and the Democratic party. In case you didn’t know, they have an actual socialist running in the primaries. The Democratic party continues to represent women and their beliefs of security and collectivism.

You Must Love Big Brother

The ultimate caricature of the left, Hillary “the woman” Clinton, illustrates her ideas of collectivism in her creepy 1996 Communist Manifesto, It Takes a Village. The title of her book itself should give you shivers. The book illustrates its eerie socialist message of collectivism and state security. An excerpt from the Chapter “Brave New Village” from Jonah Goldberg’s book, Liberal Fascism, exemplifies Clinton’s idelogy of state controlled community accurately:

Gross

> …(the) notion of the 'common good'…she (Clinton) indisputably draws her vision from the same eternal instinct to impose order on society, to create an all-encompassing community, to get past endless squabbles and ensconce each individual in the security blanket of the state. Hers is a political religion, an updated Social Gospel- light on the Gospel, heavy on the Social- spoken in soothing tones and conjuring a reassuring vision of cooperation and community…The village may have replaced 'the state', and it in turn may have replaced the fist with the hug, but an unwanted embrace from which you cannot escape… (Goldberg, 357)

The idea of women embracing the left and socialism is not new to modern America, either. Throughout history we have many examples of such behavior from women. In John Derbyshire's 2009 classic "We Are Doomed" (a must read), he explains:

> The 'gender gap' in political attitudes has been remarked on since at least 391 B.C. That was the year Aristophanes staged his play 'The Assemblywomen' (Ecclesiazusae). In the play the women of Athens, disguised as men, take over the assembly and vote themselves into power. Once in charge, they institute a program of pure socialism:
>
> 'Everyone is to have an equal share in everything and live on that; we won't have one man rich while another lives in penury, one man farming hundreds of acres while another hasn't got enough land to get buried in…No one will be motivated by need: everybody will have everything…the children will regard all older men as fathers…'
>
> The play wright grasped the essential point… Women incline to socialism much more naturally than do men." (Derbyshire, 88)

Women illustrating adherence to "the party"

Mr. Derbyshire continues:

> George Orwell, whose insights into these matters were very deep, also noticed this (women's inclination to Socialism)…Winston Smith, the protagonist of 1984, > observe(s):

>
> 'It was always the women, and above all the young ones, who were the most bigoted adherents of the Party, the swallowers of slogans, the amateur spies and nosers-out of orthodoxy… '
>
> I (Derbyshire) saw the same thing myself when living in communist China in the years just after Mao. If you wanted to hear a total-credulity, utterly unreflective parroting of the Party line, a woman was always your best bet.' (Derbyshire, 88)

In America, when women were granted the right to vote, it opened a solid voting bloc for Left statists for years to come. Ironically, gyno-con Ann Coulter (a brilliant conservative woman; yes, they exist, but rare) states:

> It would be a much better country if women did not vote. That is simply a fact. In fact, in every presidential election since 1950 — except Goldwater in '64 — the Republican would have won, if only the men had voted. – "An appalling magic" in The Guardian (17 May 2003)

Gentlemen, it all went to shit when we gave them the right to vote. We even hear it from a woman, Ann Coulter. Women became a huge and powerful voting bloc that rarely change its tune—the numbers show very little fluctuation in their leftist leaning, as explained earlier.

One can only imagine a country where statists, leftists, cuckservatives, and neocons might not have existed if women had not been granted the vote. Whatever the case, a large statist government is now a pressing issue, with much of it being the responsibility of idealistic, dumb, and dangerous policies supported by women and feminized SJW men.

To take this a step further, the world becomes more feminized each day and traditional sex roles get reversed—look no further than the new Star Wars and Mad Max to see the effects of this feminization. In modern culture, we have women being glamorized in roles of power and "strong, independent, women" that can do what men do. This propaganda easily translates to the ballot box.

[image]
Not on my watch!

The feminization of everything is a weak attempt to indoctrinate young men to believe that women are leaders and that women are masculine. In response, weak men are followers of their causes and beliefs. This is something men, young and old, should strive to be conscious of every day.

We, as men, must be aware of this political bloc illustrated in the Democratic party. As we can see in the chart previously discussed, men tend to fluctuate their vote based on the individual, women vote based along strict party adherence. Women are one solidarity voting bloc for large government and Democratic party lines.

This is dangerous, because it is determining the fate of our country and our future. We are now on a path to destruction and drastic change must occur. The fate rests in the hands of men, not idealistic, statist, Leftist women, nor SJWs.

We must take back our country, if not by the voting box, then by any means necessary.

Read More: 8 Things That Make A Girl Stupid And Useless

Jon Bergeron
Jon is a part time misanthrope, full time American. Jon loathes modern academia, art, culture, literature, politics, television, and everything on god's green earth that has been inundated with boring, predictable, impotent, vapid Cultural Marxist horseshit which, mind you, is totally void of a single individual thought. Jon just realized he is a full time misanthrope. Anyways, Jon prays for this to change one day and something new to come along. Until then, Jon remains pessimistic with a loaded .357 next to his bed. Jon can be reached at

How To Prepare For Your First Formal Prayer

January 22, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the men of ROK; as promised, this week I begin to address the topic of prayer. I made allusion, last week, to prayer as a "liminal" action, and so it is; prayer is a threshold in man's relationship with God. Many opposite poles unite in it: finite and infinite, absolute and contingent; slavery and sonship; alienation and intimacy; and so forth. Along this line, a paradoxical prerequisite to drawing near to God, is the Fear of God. For us to have any sense of the sacred, we must have reverence—i.e., holy fear.

In our era, blasphemy and vulgarity are the norm. Any kind of high standard, as "red pill" men should know especially well, is mocked and mischaracterized; high standards are bigoted, the signs of a joyless, narrow and judgmental mind. To be sure, the "church lady" has always been a phenomenon; women tend to conform to the reigning orthodoxy of any age or locale; there have always been flotillas of disapproving hags, who love bossing others about and enforcing conformity. And some contemptible men are also of this type. Furthermore, an atheistic or spiritually tepid society will be indifferent to blasphemy.

Not many years ago, I bought into this pejorative portrayal of all pious persons. “If God is God,” I reckoned, “He is not hurt by what we say about Him; people who get upset when people make fun of their religion are defending something that shouldn’t need defending. And, we have free speech; so they’d better just get a sense of humor about it.”

Now, it certainly is true, that God is not diminished or hurt by what we say about Him; but the crime of blasphemy is in itself an atrocious thing, something which ought not to blacken the fabric of existence. And what it certainly does harm, is man and the society of men. At base, to blaspheme is to mock every (transcendent, moral) standard, and every excellence—even the concept of excellence—because it sets at naught the Fountainhead, which gives meaning to such concepts.

Such is the reverence of great civilizations, that they have taken care not to give even accidental offense or slight to what they consider holy. “Sin is in the will,” St. Augustine said – meaning that one and the same act may be a sin or not, depending on the knowledge and intent of the man committing it. But in the tale of Actaeon and Diana, or the many legends depicting innocent humans running afoul of the fay folk, or even in the tale of how God slew Uzzah for touching the Ark of the Covenant (with good intentions) we see the sacred as something perilous, dreadful and potent in itself, unmoved by our protestations of benevolence.

For me, the legend of Actaeon and Diana is one of the more potent. Actaeon saw the sacred unveiled—i.e., Diana, naked at her bath. For his transgression of the sacred, he falls from his position of lordship over the beasts; he becomes one of his usual prey, and is slain by the dogs that formerly obeyed him. This is what men saw in blasphemy, the transgression of the sacred: the loss of the right relation of man to the gods and the cosmos, in an inversion lethal to man.

Whether we consider the inviolability of the sacred in itself, or the logical necessity of revering the sacred, if we wish to preserve any meaningful concept of the Good (and hence of virtue or of an upright civilization), it is clear that we cannot omit reverence towards what is holy.

So, my first piece of advice on prayer, is to cultivate the attitude and habit of reverence, which puts us in right relation to God and the cosmos, and produces the humility necessary for obtaining the Divine assistance. What is reverence? How do we show it?

The word reverence derives from the Latin revereri; re is an intensifier, and vereri means "to be in awe of, to fear, to respect." So, "reverence" is "intense awe, fear and respect." This is the profound sentiment of a man, not the cavalier presumption of a yoga mistress or church lady. Indeed, one of Satan's great victories in modernity, has been to destroy the masculine virtue of religion even amongst "religious" people, exchanging it for effeminate decoys. The French reverie probably approximates most people's idea of reverence – being dreamily enraptured with religious feelings.

Given what has gone before, it will be easy to understand why most men throughout history have not had so girlish a notion of reverence; rather, they viewed reverence as the foundation of manly character. From reverence, came their respect for all that denoted the holy and the good: legitimate authority, just laws, virtue and reason—the entire, masculine project of civilization. Reverence for God taught society to bow to kings, husbands and fathers. We remember that God is the ultimate Patriarch; reverence is the fabric of patriarchy.

Once found, and cultivated somewhat, reverence becomes as instinctual to us as breathing. We enter a Church and find our knees bowing and our hands forming the sign of the Cross almost automatically; we hear that someone has died, and instinctively bare our heads to what is above, bowed in acknowledgment of our subjection.

But this instinct may initially elude us, who have been raised in an age of blasphemy. Reverence, the Fathers and Saints teach, is the root of humility; humility removes the obstacles to communion with God, and to receptivity of His operation upon us. The bones of our epoch were knit together in the womb of blasphemy, however, so even the most rank irreverence can fail to register, and irreverence compounds itself. It can become a vicious cycle, and we must conscientiously avoid it.

For example, one of the first elements to a sense of the sacred, is to understand that "sacred" (and "holy," "hallowed," etc.) means "set apart." The temple and its contents are set apart from the world; everything else is profane (from Latin profanus; one meaning of pro is "outside before" and fanum means "the fane," i.e., the profane is everything before we cross over into the sacred boundary of the temple). We honor the sacred by according it separate styles, or exceptional qualities, of architecture, music, adornment, rites, gestures, etc. Those who say that Jesus would be angry that the Church had great temples, vessels, vestments, art, etc., are not following the way of humility and reverence; they actually advocate desecration by insisting that we routinely assimilate the sacred unto the profane.

So far as your personal spiritual lives and preparation for prayer go, you will want to do such things as the following in order to maintain the "separate" character of the sacred, and to honor it. I may speak in Catholic terms in what follows, but practitioners of other religions will easily understand how the same principles apply in their own traditions.

1. Create a dedicated place in your abode for focused prayer; keep it clean and do not let ordinary clutter intrude on it.

2. We want to pray continually; even so, we will set aside times for more formal prayer (in the dedicated space, above). Make sure these times are truly set apart – don't squeeze them in or begrudge them. The idea is to consecrate the time and place; once consecrated, we forfeit our claim to them.

3. Try always to use dignified, beautiful, quality (but not necessarily costly) materials in connection with anything sacred (Bibles, prayerbooks, images and statuary, candles/lamps, etc.). Avoid cheap, gawdy, kitschy and sentimental things/materials. Beautiful and evocative things should be used to incite reverence, rather than to create a "sensual experience" centered upon your enjoyment.

4. Use traditional gestures of respect and affection for the sacred (bows, genuflections, prostrations, kisses, special postures for prayer, etc.). Never pass sacred places or objects without a reverent gesture of some kind. Remove hats and/or bow heads if our Lord is named, etc.

5. Strive always to harmonize a sincere, interior sentiment with the outward expression of reverence. Do not make reverent gestures out of mere habit or "rule-following," and certainly strive not to make them for vanity's sake.

This is how to make a beginning; reverence will deepen, become natural and instinctual, far beyond anything I could describe in a short list. But this points you in the right direction.

The bottom line: only if a man honors the Good, can he individually and socially pursue virtue and excellence. Let us fear and respect, therefore, that Being which is closer to us than we are to ourselves; wherever He is named or denoted, wherever He is specially called to mind, let heads and hearts be bared, knees be bent and necks be bowed. Let us abhor the queer abomination of blasphemy, and avoid companionship with blasphemers, for blasphemy is the herald of the void. If we begin thus by approaching God with honor, true prayer can occur.

"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

Read More: How One Of King Arthur's Tales Shows A Vital Masculine Lesson

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

How 13 Hours Depicts Hillary Clinton’s Criminal Incompetence In Benghazi

January 23, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

The film 13 Hours perfectly encapsulates why there is zero doubt that Hillary Clinton should be in prison. Every presidential candidate has stated that Clinton should be rotting in a cell, except Bernie Sanders who has said “No one gives a damn about your emails!” As a result of apparent late-onset Alzheimer’s, Sanders is oblivious to the facts. On the other hand, Donald Trump has sold out theaters in Iowa to give people free tickets to see the film.

13 Hours Movie Review

Benghazi on fire.

On September 11th, 2012, approximately 150 Islamic militants stormed an American diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya. 13 Hours is a film directed by Michael Bay that portrays what happened over the course of that night.

The focus of the film is on six members of an elite security team assigned to Benghazi, Libya. They are independent contractors for the CIA, all former special forces military veterans. The members of the team are Jack (John Krasinski), Rone (James Badge Dale), Tanto (Pablo Schreiber), Boon (Dave Denman), Tig (Dominic Fumusa), and Oz (Max Martini).

There is a constant power struggle between the security team and the CIA chief on whether they have to obey him when the compound housing U.S. Ambassador Christopher Stevens is attacked. The six-man team repeatedly voices their desire to help defend the compound and rescue the ambassador, but they're ordered to "stand down" by the CIA chief (David Costabile). Bureaucracy at its finest.

After seeing the mayhem from afar as the compound burns and is rushed by combatants, the team tells the CIA chief to fuck off and goes to rescue Ambassador Stevens and his staff. Throughout the brutal ordeal, calls are made to U.S. bases in Germany and Italy for air support and rescue. At one point a character requests for nothing more than an F-16 to fly overhead to scare the militants to buy some more time. All requests are met with silence. No help ever arrives.

One scene in particular involving the Ambassador and his staff locked in a bathroom trying to stay silent as militants raid the compound is particularly harrowing. The ordeal shows the militants failing to break a barrier, preventing them from entering the section of the house where the Ambassador is located. They decide to pour diesel on the floor, light the place on fire, and wait.

Masculinity is depicted well in this movie.

As a fan of the series The Office, the casting of John Krasinski was surprising. However, he plays the role with the right balance of strength and realistic expectations for the outcome of that fateful night. His conflict between the duties of his job and the love he feels for his family evoked scenes from American Sniper. Most of the men in the cast are sporting beards, which are gaining in popularity because it is one of the few ways men can display their masculinity in our castrated society. But that's another story. Krasinski exudes the American ideal, one that may not exist for much longer.

For all the artistic liberties taken with the firefights and explosions, this movie portrays how trained men behave in high-pressure, violent situations. The security team remains calm, take enormous risks on behalf of their brothers, and fight until the end. There is only one woman in the cast, and at one point she asks, "How can I help?" It's obvious that she cannot do anything worthwhile in a life and death situation other than make phone calls.

Overall, the action sequences are well-done. The film is remarkably restrained for Michael Bay.

This leads us to the question, what role does Hillary Clinton play in the death of Ambassador Stevens and the others?

Hillary Clinton Ignores Requests For Increased Security

No reason to be concerned.

Hillary Clinton has publicly taken responsibility numerous times for the massive gaps in security. Moreover, she has claimed that of the 600 requests for increased security in Benghazi, exactly zero ever reached her desk. The odds of that are infinitesimally small, especially in light of the fact that she was receiving reports on Libya from her "friend" Sydney Blumenthal.

Blumenthal is an archetypal political snake who lives in the shadows. A Clinton friend and confidant, he has maneuvered the Clinton's shady past away from the public for over 30 years. He also played a role during Bill Clinton's impeachment trial. Blumenthal has routinely provided Bill and Hillary Clinton with information about their Republican opponents during the process and how to create messages to attack them.

Clinton's conspirator sent her 150 emails, all of which reached her desk. Yet somehow none of the 600 requests for security did. Clinton had time to take emails from her confidante to shield her from political fallout, but no time for emails to bolster security in an unstable region where a U.S. Ambassador was visiting.

What was Blumenthal's role in Libya, anyway? He was advising business interests in Libya and also was doing work for the Clinton Foundation, the Clinton family's sizable philanthropic endeavor. After Blumenthal testified, Blumenthal told reporters his work for the foundation had "nothing whatsoever to do with my emails to my friend." Right.

Hillary Clinton Lies To The American Public

The death of this man could have been prevented

The official narrative of Benghazi coming out of Clinton's State Department is that the attack was the result of Libyans protesting a video called "Innocence of the Muslims." It is now known that this is an outright fabrication. The attack was perpetrated by Al Qaeda sympathizers who were gunning for the U.S. Ambassador and avenging the death of their comrade, Abu Yahya al-Libi, who was killed in a drone strike in Pakistan.

Morever, Clinton was well aware that this video was not the reason this attack occurred. In an email with the Egyptian Prime Minister, she admitted that the "attack had nothing to do with the film. It was a planned attack – not a protest."

But why would she lie about this? One reason is self-preservation. After 600 requests for security and no response, a terrorist attack would reflect very poorly on Clinton's judgment. She took the calculated risk that her political reputation could handle a "protest about a video" but could not handle a terrorist attack resulting in the death of Americans.

Furthermore, consider when this attack took place: 56 days before the 2012 presidential election. The democratic leadership was complicit in Clinton's deceit because they knew that a terrorist attack so close to an election may have resulted in a Romney victory, a risk they were not willing to take. The Obama campaign in 2012 could survive a “protest about a video,” but not a terrorist attack resulting in the death of Americans.

The Next American President?

“So he’s dead, big deal! Can’t you guys just leave me alone?”

After being grilled by the House Select Committee on her role in the death and destruction in Benghazi, along with the tragic death of Ambassador Stevens, here is the statement made by Hillary Clinton:

> Was it because of a protest or was it because of guys out for a walk one night and decided they’d go kill some Americans? What difference – at this point, what difference does it make?

Ladies and gentlemen: The 2016 frontrunner for the Democratic party.

Read More: Why You Should Vote For Hillary Clinton In 2016

Rod Berne

Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

What You Need To Know Before You Consider Living In Another Country

January 23, 2016 | by Nikolai Vladivostok | Link | Original Link

Are you considering a life-changing leap to greener pastures? This is an overview of some legal issues you'll need to understand before you squeeze into an economy-class A380 seat and hurtle toward your new life. We'll look at visas, tax, pensions, and divorce laws.

Disclaimer: I'm not a legal professional. My qualification is endless, exhilarating hours waiting in the crowded immigration offices of various foreign lands, negotiating bureaucracies, and checking out the multicultural talent. I've spent even longer hours boozing with grizzled veterans of the expat life, boasting or wailing of their experiences at the hands of the omnipotent authorities.

Visas

Unlike the West, plenty of foreign countries are pretty fussy about who they let in. And why shouldn't they be? It's their country. Remember, you don't argue with the nightclub bouncer whose job is to keep out the riffraff. You put on a tie, or you take your business elsewhere.

There are four main categories of visas for living overseas long term:

Working Or Business Visas

These are visas that allow you to work or do business legally in another country. Unless you're independently wealthy or planning on moving to a corrupt, third world country where such requirements can easily be flouted, you'll probably need one of these bad boys. Yeah, I know Mexicans get away with doing cheeky illegal work in the US. That doesn't mean you're going to get away with it in Singapore.

Different countries vary widely in their requirements for a working visa. Some demand a university degree or need you to have a job lined up. Most people who take this path are recruited in their home country and the employer then helps with the visa paperwork. You can sometimes sponsor your own visa, say, if you're a businessman.

There is often a medical test involved. For my most recent visa I had to get certified as HIV and syphilis free! All clear, thank you very much.

These visas might last anywhere from one to five years and you'll have to keep renewing them – that usually means demonstrating that you still have a job or business to justify your continued presence in someone else's country.

If you get into any trouble (unpaid taxes, a pub brawl, nexting the immigration minister's daughter, etc.) then you may well get kicked out of the country. So if you have this visa class, try to behave yourself. I'm mostly talking to the Australians here.

I know a divorced idiot who got drunk, scratched a female stranger in the face for no reason, did three months in prison, and was not deported! Although that may have been a case of the Immigration Dept. left hand not knowing what the Justice Dept. right hand was doing, most countries take a dim view of foreigners scratching up their ladyfolk.

Don't end up in a German dungeon like this guy.

Permanent Residency And Citizenship

If you live long enough in another country you may become eligible to apply for permanent residency or even citizenship. Permanent residency is usually a good deal. You don't need to go through the biannual renewal hoop-jumping with the constant stress of being refused and having your life turned upside down. If you decide to stay long term this is a sensible option to look into. Different countries have different requirements.

Citizenship will also save you the hassle of visa renewal. However, be careful. Some countries do not allow dual citizenship. They require you to renounce your previous citizenship before obtaining your new passport. Do you really want to lose your Medicare, pension, right to residency and other benefits in your home country? How do you feel about your kids being ineligible for obtaining your previous nationality? Check this one out thoroughly before you jump. If both countries allow dual citizenship, no worries.

Spouse Visa

If you marry a foreigner you are often (but not always) allowed to live in her country by default. This is usually a very convenient, stable visa that does not require constant renewal paperwork or the risk of arbitrary deportation.

There are some obvious risks to consider before you rush off to trawl for Estonian e-brides. In some countries you could get thrown out if you get divorced. Imagine the wonders that legal framework would do for your relationship. Other countries will let you stay if you've been married long enough or if you have local kids.

Tourist Visa

You can live almost permanently in some countries by constantly renewing tourist visas. In some places this works well. In others it is a big hassle, requiring a twice-yearly "visa run" to a third country in order to reapply, as they won't let you do it from inside their borders. In some countries they won't let you renew at all.

You see, some countries just don't want your unemployed ass taking up beach space that would be better occupied by a local or by a more productive foreigner. Check out the situation before you go. You can sometimes get a tourist visa, find a job while you're there, and then change over to a working visa. Other countries don't allow this.

A tourist visa usually does not allow you to work. It may suit the retired, the idle rich, or the person who has an under-the-radar, online business (ahem).

Whichever visa path you choose to take, keep abreast of new developments. Just because a country lets you painlessly renew tourist visas ad nauseam now doesn't mean they'll still let you do that ten years from now. Rapidly industrializing countries are likely to get stricter as time goes on.

Remember, being a foreigner means not having the same rights as a citizen. The most important right you miss out on is the basic right to live in that country. Having said that, you won’t normally be uprooted unless you get caught breaking the rules.

You have a visa? Yay!

Tax

One of life’s two comforting certainties is tax. You’ve got to pay it, somewhere. The only thing worse than being taxed is being taxed twice.

A lot countries have Double Tax Agreements. These are bilateral agreements on tax that mean if you reside in country A, you don’t also have to pay income tax back in country B. Check this detail before you start working abroad. And remember: just because a country has never before enforced a rule doesn’t mean they won’t one day suddenly start.

If your financial affairs are in any way complicated you should consider getting independent advice.

Pensions

Have you been contributing to a pension system in your home country? If so, you’ll probably be wanting to get some of that money back once you’re old and decrepit, right? Hold on there, gramps. Many countries don’t let you receive the pension unless you live there most of the year because they want the spending to stimulate their own economy, not someone else’s. Check your country’s rules before you make a decision if this is a part of your retirement plan.

Also, be aware that the legislation can change with dizzying rapidity. You might want to look into transferring the money—some countries have agreements on how to do this.

What about 401(k)s, superannuation, and the like? You’d think, if it’s your own money, that the government wouldn’t be able to set any conditions on it. Personally I would trust my baby with a viper before I would trust my money with the government. At the moment they won’t touch it. In the future, as Western societies continue to decline and the money starts to run out, it’s possible the government might go all Greek on your ass. Seek your own advice but I would suggest not putting all your eggs in one, easily socialized basket.

Divorce Laws

Many ROK readers are interested in emigrating specifically to escape toxic family laws and to start a robust, traditional family abroad. If this is you, do not assume “foreign law” equals “fair law.” There are plenty of jurisdictions that have divorce laws comparable to those of, say, California. You might be surprised by the situation in places like Russia and Iran.

If you are going overseas in order to marry and live the domestic dream, read up on local laws and how they are interpreted. Even if you don’t get divorced (you’re obviously not planning to), the presence of unfair laws can disrupt otherwise healthy relationships and can poison families. If the laws are rough on men, you can either go elsewhere or take the risk. Just make sure you’re going into it with your eyes open.

Of the countless (non-state sanctioned) scams international marriage may entail, one is so common it merits a brief mention. This is how it works: Country A bans foreigners from owning property. Newlyweds buy a nice house and put it into the wife’s name because she is a citizen of Country A. The couple divorces shortly thereafter and the hapless husband, from Country B, loses all of his investment. The ex-wife sets herself up in the house with her local boyfriend and lives happily ever after.

Of course, only a tiny minority of international marriages are outright scams. Just keep your wits about you.

Conclusion

We have briefly considered visa, tax, pension and divorce law issues that could influence your decision to expat or your choice of destination.

This article is far too short to outline specific policies in every country. Rather, it gives you a guide to some topics you’ll need to research before taking off into the big, wide world. Don’t be put off if it sounds complicated—expatriating can actually make work, finance, love and life much simpler and more enjoyable than staying at home.

Read More: 5 Reasons For Expats To Start An Offshore Company

Nikolai Vladivostok

Nikolai Vladivostok is a writer, Socialist and denouncer of reactionary elements. He has faith that the efficiency of Soviet industry and agriculture will inevitably lead to the collapse of the West and the liberation of its Peoples. Nikolai blogs at SovietMen on topics such as economics, sex, and debauchery.

Will Smith’s Revolt Against The Oscars Shows That Leftist Celebrity Solidarity Is Crumbling

January 23, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Will Smith, ever the docile husband, has joined his wife Jada Pinkett-Smith in declaring that he will boycott the Oscars. The reason? The awards must be racist because no blacks were included as nominees in the four acting categories.

Although the absence of incendiary black director Spike Lee would have been unsurprising, Smith’s refusal to attend marks an unprecedented development for a community which, as liberal as it is, usually only fully pursues its agenda outside the movie industry. Is the long-reinforced narrative finally crumbling?

For example, my recent article about Hollywood’s penchant for champagne socialism demonstrated how actresses spend more money preparing for the Golden Globes than the average American household earns in a year. Hollywood itself is usually spared from having to act on the radical rhetoric of its otherwise firmly Democratic-supporting stars.

Up until now, Hollywood solidarity, based upon very strictly enforced political standards, has been a given. Even consistent fruit loops like Tom Cruise and John Travolta were warmly kept in the embrace of the Tinseltown elite because their Scientology membership did not challenge fundamental leftist presuppositions.

By contrast, conservative individuals like Mel Gibson have been semi-blacklisted and personal responsibility-preaching African-American comedian Bill Cosby has been expelled for good. Smith’s unrestrained attack on the celebrity fold shows that serious cracks have emerged in the long-standing cordon sanitaire protecting virtually all Democrats and like-minded celebrities.

Let’s now explore them.

Is the absence of black nominees really such a bad thing?

It is almost certain that the combination of a Russell Crowe BAFTAs tantrum and the Academy’s desire to show its love of diversity ensured Denzel Washington won his Oscar in 2002. There were questions about fellow winner Halle Berry’s worthiness, too.

The four categories reserved for acting Academy Awards mean there can be only 20 nominees across the board. Oscars nights are understandably Anglocentric, just as film festivals and awards ceremonies located in Asia and elsewhere recognize more local and regional films and their performers. And the proportion of blacks across the major English-speaking countries is less than 10%, making Smith’s boycott even more bizarre and unwarranted.

Blacks in the United States comprise 13% of the population and the figure is much lower in Canada. Australian and British actors, who have long punched above their weight at the Academy Awards, come from countries with minuscule black populations, especially the former place. We should also remember that blacks, more likely to be in prison, on parole or within other unsavory categories, are less likely to either attend drama school or enter the acting world to begin with.

What Smith, Pinkett-Smith and Lee’s boycott comes down to is an insistence that an awards ceremony rigidly represent wider demographics, as if that would be a fair answer to a competitive process ostensibly based on evaluations of merit. At best, if the Oscars were “representative,” the trio could only expect 1 or 2 black actors to be nominated. Because of the tiny sample of just 20 nominated actors, zero black actors does not indicate any entrenched racism.

Plus, Smith, who was not nominated, can easily be accused of having sour, self-interested grapes for not being voted for. But, no, he's only wanting so-called racial justice, right?

Many of you will recall the wins of Denzel Washington and Halle Berry at the 74th Academy Awards held in 2002, when the ceremony was widely lauded as the "black Oscars." Particularly in the case of the snubbed Russell Crowe, who lost out to Washington, pundits observed that the Academy wanted to recognize black actors as an "atonement" for the decades before. I did not hear any outrage from the celebrity elite then.

What the Will Smith boycott and American colleges have in common

Hollywood is suffering from the same sort of friendly fire over the Oscars controversy as liberal Harvard Law School professor Alan Dershowitz received from SJW students over his calls for due process in college rape tribunals.

Just as current American college students, the most radical of all time, are turning against and cannibalizing their comparatively "moderate" ideological parents and grandparents, like liberal Harvard professor Alan Dershowitz, the leftist agenda of Hollywood is being turned against Hollywood itself. Oftentimes this has been implicit, with loathsome figures such as Lena Dunham spruiking their extremist wares without directly challenging the industry that enriches them.

With Smith's boycott, things have become much more explicit. For years and years, the Hollywood narrative, both in films and on the red carpet, has been "America is racist, racist, it's nothing but racist!" Movies like Crash have tried to present racism as a multifaceted problem not just experienced by blacks, but still had the effect of treating African-Americans as the only victims, no matter how tenuous the allegations of discrimination.

The claims of racism are preposterous, however. In addition to Denzel Washington in 2002, Jamie Foxx and Forrest Whitaker have won Best Actor awards at the Oscars since 2000, meaning that leading black male actors are overrepresented over the past years relative to actual black populations.

Moreover, four of the last nine Best Supporting Actress winners have been black (Jennifer Hudson, Mo'Nique, Octavia Spencer and Lupita Nyong'o). For brevity's sake, I have not included all the non-winning black nominees.

What this all points to is Hollywood having essentially called for the rebukes it is now receiving, no matter how misguided those rebukes are.

Will "fat cats" like Harvey and Bob Weinstein be next?

Harvey and Bob Weinstein have revolutionized the idea of making money in Hollywood. Yet they've also been spared the kind of vitriol directed at the voting for the Academy Awards acting nominations.

If incessant digs by the Hollywood establishment at a somehow racist American society have produced the Oscars boycott, will very rich movie figures be next? For instance, Harvey and Bill Weinstein, formerly of Miramax and currently with The Weinstein Company, are arguably the most successful film businessmen of the last twenty years when both financial returns and critical reception are taken into account. Though exceptional tycoons, they are yet to be taken to task by their liberal acting stars for accumulating hundreds of millions of dollars. Perhaps because they themselves are also Democrats.

After all, look at the number of moderately and poorly paid people in the film industry. Set catering staff, personal assistants, make-up artists and equipment operators are either part of the working poor or struggle to pay their mortgages on lower middle-class remunerations. This is exactly the sort of situation where Hollywood liberals should be diverting their attention. Here is a reality they could actually influence, unlike some faraway conflict in Darfur or Syria.

And then there’s the number of white actors appearing in Weinstein-associated films. So far, critics like Smith have not resorted to attacking individuals perceived to be perpetuating the supposed whitewashing going on in Hollywood.

It will be interesting to see whether phenomenally wealthy producers and movie studio heads face the same music as awards ceremonies. The likelihood of an Oscars-style revolt is smaller, especially since the current actions of Will Smith, Jada Pinkett-Smith and Spike Lee pose no real risk to their bank accounts or future careers. The question of a wider impact is a relevant one, nevertheless.

In the meantime, we can all feel mirth in seeing leftist Hollywood actors cutting hard into the liberal community that employs them.

Read More: It’s A Hundred Times Easier To Come Out As Gay Or Transsexual Than As A Conservative In Hollywood

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why You Need To Be Suspicious Of Supplements

January 24, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

There is a phenomenon that happens to almost every person who seriously exercises: after you have been lifting and working out for a year or two, your massive "newbie gains" decline, and progress is slower. Seeking a return to your early successes, you look into a variety of supplements, all of which promise to give you an edge: increasing strength and mass, decreasing recovery time, and more.

I have come here today to tell you that a large amount of supplements are bullshit, contra to the sales pitches of the various vendors of snake oil. But to throw the (largely unregulated) supplement market a bone, I will briefly discuss some supplements that actually do work, and I myself have used on occasion:

Supplements That Actually Work

Creatine

Creatine Phosphate

The first of my chosen supplements is creatine. As we all remember from biology class, creatine (more accurately, creatine phosphate) is a compound within muscle fibers that exists to contain and store phosphate molecules. In strenuous muscular activity, freely-accessed adenosine triphosphate (ATP, a compound created via cellular respiration, and necessary for muscular function) is quickly depleted, and the creatine releases its phosphate, binding it to adenosine monophosphate and adenosine diphosphate to continue the muscular labor.

Creatine will not necessarily make you bigger or lose weight just by itself, but it will stave off muscular exhaustion, allowing you to do an extra set, or run that extra 200 meters or what have you. In other words, creatine will only have any benefit for you if you are already doing a regular program of exercise—it won't do you any good sitting on your couch playing video games

Protein

The molecular structure of protein

Protein powder is another useful supplement—the numerous bodily structures and tissues that are made of protein are well known to us all, so the usefulness of dietary protein is pretty obvious, but what may not be obvious to you is that whey-derived protein mixes are fairly high in calcium as well, giving you an added supplement.

Again, you oughta be exercising before using protein powder, because extra nutrients and calories will not do you any good sitting on your ass. Personally speaking, I prefer to get my protein by eating a steak for dinner, with a side order of another steak, but if you, for some reason, have difficulty in getting enough protein in your regular diet, protein powder is a welcome supplement.

Calcium

And finally, calcium supplements. These are largely for older people, but they're certainly effective if you are arthritic or rickety. Personally, I prefer a much cheaper calcium supplement (that also supplements your mental fortitude), which will be discussed shortly.

While there are other supplements that are effective (multi-vitamins and fish oil, to name two off the top of my head), the number of useful supplements is greatly outweighed by the amount of useless crap you can find in health food stores.

A Few Ineffective Supplements

BCAAs

One I see advertised often is branched chain amino acids: BCAAs do, in fact, increase muscular cell genesis. The problem is, everything you eat that has protein in it, will, by definition, have BCAAs as well. Skip this stuff and drink a protein shake instead. Or better yet, have a sandwich.

Mass Gainers

Mass gainers are actually something I admire, in that I admire a good scam when I see it: take a basic old protein powder, fill it full of sugar and fat, and jack up the price by 100 percent. But I suppose if you want to, in essence, drink a protein shake mixed with candy bars, go right ahead.

But if you seek to gain weight, why don't you make a protein shake with yogurt, fruit, and oats instead?

And then there's glutamine, which has been shown in testing to be ineffective when taken orally.

More Snake Oil

There's a lot more out there, such as testosterone boosters. Being that I lift weights, eat red meat and leafy green vegetables, get a good night's sleep, masturbate only twice a week at most, and practice power poses and alpha male body language, I don't need testosterone boosting.

Which is a good thing, because studies have shown many testosterone boosters, such as Tribulis terrestris, Maca, Tongkat Ali, and others may have a benefit in increasing libido, but they do not increase testosterone levels.

Even Zinc, Vitamin D, and Magnesium, all of which have been shown to increase testosterone levels in irregularly low-T men, do not have any benefit of increasing testosterone beyond a standard level.

I could go on and on about the myriad of dubious supplements there are on the market, but I think you got the idea. Instead, let me suggest some “off market supplements” I use, and have worked to my satisfaction

Home-Made Supplements

As alluded to earlier in this article, there exists a cheaper way to supplement calcium levels than the pills purchased in stores: consumption of eggshells, which have been shown in studies to be just as effective as the pills (which are largely made of bonemeal or ground up seasells). You can grind them up if you want, but if you desire to train your mental fortitude, just hork the shells into your mouth, chew them up, and eat them. Do the same for fish and chicken bones.

Speaking of bones, the marrow found inside is one of the most nutritious things you can eat, when compared to the effort it takes to get it (almost none). Prehistoric hominids (AKA the ancestors of you and me) evidently cracked long bones open for marrow. And why? Because marrow is loaded with calories, but also with fatty acids. And fatty acids insulate the axons of nervous cells-in layman’s terms, they’re good for the brain.

And of course, my two main supplements that I apply in the gym: chalk to my hands, and the Russian Army Choir in my ears (Communism excelled at just two things: weightlifting and music. Use this information to your advantage). Those two have done more for me than any ingestible substance.

So if there is a conclusion to be drawn, it is that even the best of supplements are just that: SUPPLEMENTS, they are supposed to add a little bit to a balanced diet and lifestyle. Ultimately, the best things you can do for your health is to get regular strenuous exercise, eat a good diet, and get regular sleep. Leave the snake oil salesmen in the Wild West where they belong.

Read More: Supplements Don’t Build Muscle

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

8 Things Terribly Wrong With Swedish Girls

January 24, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

I've gathered some of my general thoughts on Swedish girls. You'll notice that it's all negative, but that doesn't mean that there aren't any good exceptions. If you go to Sweden, you might be lucky to find one of those rare specimen that both looks like a real woman and likes men, but prepare to be disappointed. Here's why:

1. They are cold

Anyone visiting Sweden will notice that people here, both men and women, have a cold way about them. Approaching a stranger is difficult enough, since even making eye contact might be considered weird and intrusive in some settings. Coming to Sweden can be a lonely experience for someone who's used to people being more friendly and open to strangers.

If you come here to pick up girls, you'll find that it's hard to approach a girl in a casual way. Be prepared to get a lot of dirty looks before you find one who's actually open to meeting new people (who weren't introduced to her by a friend).

2. They are all feminists

I've yet to meet a Swedish girl that I didn't know after five minutes of conversation was a feminist. If you're not looking to have sex with the girl, it might be fun to challenge her views and watch as she struggles to explain how social justice, intersectionality ,and all of that other crap makes any sense. But if you want to get into her pants, it's better to keep your political opinions private.

3. They make themselves ugly

Feminism teaches girls not to care about what men think and that ugly can be beautiful. This manifests itself in at least two ways.

—The masculine clothing

Some girls dress in male clothing, cut their hair short, and look almost indistinguishable from a man. Others dress like hipsters, which is kind of similar, yet you can still tell that there’s a woman under those clothes. Either way the girls hide their feminine shape under baggy vestments.

—The feminist hairstyle

Feminist hairstyles come in different forms but this one above is the most common. Short with bizarrely cut bangs. Just horrendous.

4. They are dumb but don’t know it

Calling themselves feminist and talking mumbo jumbo about patriarchy and “societal structures” gives Swedish girls the illusion that they’re intellectual and have something valuable to say.

Their feminist hubris and unearned sense of moral superiority is intolerable. The fact that tax money is being spent on gender studies classes at universities is a crime in itself. They teach girls nothing of value while inflating their ego and hatred of men.

5. They blame all their problems on men

Every time they fail at something, they have patriarchy to blame for it. That means that they'll never attempt to improve themselves, since they are never the cause of their problems. The level of introspection is low and you can be sure that a Swedish girl will never change herself for your sake.

6. The young ones fall for thugs and bad boys

You see this especially in grade school and high school. Teenage girls like the guys who are the most aggressive and who care the least about their education. In Sweden, those boys usually have some sort of immigrant background.

If you're an ethnic Swede you'll probably be disadvantaged from birth. Swedish women raise their boys to be insecure, pussified, vegetarian betas. But girls will go for guys who are masculine, big, and strong, and who will carry them away on their shoulder as the pimple-faced betas watch on in amazement.

7. They prefer working to having children

If you’re an adult Swedish woman and you’re not working full-time, you must be repressed by the patriarchy. At least that’s what feminists will tell you. A man who’s looking to find a good mother for his children should not waste his time searching in Sweden.

8. For immigrant men, they might make an exception

More and more Swedish women are marrying Muslim immigrants and converting to Islam. This is a sign that they actually don’t mind submitting to a man, just as long as it’s not a Swedish man. My theory is that cultural relativism (not wanting to admit that women are treated differently in different cultures) paired with a sympathy for immigrants, makes women feel good about giving themselves to Muslim men.

Now my question to you guys is, are these characteristics unique to Swedish women, or can they be found in other Western countries as well?

Read More: 14 Things Every Guy Should Know About Swedish Girls

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

Why Internet Activism Is Insincere And Ineffective

January 24, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

"Slacktivism" is the term being increasingly applied to lazy attempts to promote a cause. Recently, the millions of people who changed their Facebook profile photos so they featured a superimposed French flag exemplified this very saddening trend. Somehow the Bataclan and other tragedies in Paris could be soothed over by a few clicks performed by everyone. A perfect storm of a craving to conform, the need for Facebook likes (and reminding people they still exist), and the compulsion to feel like soldiers of peace and goodwill led many to suspend rational judgment and act like not even glorified sheep.

Forgetting that Facebook is a corporate behemoth that incessantly researches and tests its users' habits to help generate future billions, these millions lapped up the opportunity to use the French flag as readily as they used the LGBT "rainbow" after Obergefell v. Hodges. What did they achieve, other than re-illustrating the rank impotency of Western society? Subsequent French air strikes against ISIS, the perpetrators of the Paris attacks, may have had discernible effects. Meanwhile, the grand global coalition of perhaps a hundred million French flag aficionados did nothing but further cripple Western moxie in the face of a grave existential threat.

The Atlantic, which has every reason to describe the trend as spontaneous and lovey-dovey due to the publication's leftist agenda, was adamant that the gay marriage picture option constituted a Facebook user research experiment. Is this the same for the French massacres? Whatever the case, Facebook is helping to spread feel-good opportunities to try and change the world… by doing nothing.

Slacktivism actually reduces people's willingness to properly contribute to a cause

[image]
This is no different from the farce of the French flag profile photo option.

A Canadian study confirmed that people who perform petty acts like superimposing the French flag on a Facebook photo are less likely to devote actual resources to any associated cause. At its heart, it is a catalyst for exacerbating pre-existing laziness, which is rife when you consider the excessively docile responses Europe is giving to the specter of increasing Islamization and unrestricted migration. When "participants" see that other people are changing their Facebook profile photos, too, the effect is only amplified.

Moreover, slacktivism is classic head-in-the-sand behavior. It does not even get within a mile of the surface of a social problem, let alone attempt to scratch it. Millions of people changing their profile pictures gives the illusion that mere clicks constitute genuine solidarity that can help avert the dangers of what are generally native would-be terrorists. It's the 2015-16 equivalent of pointless but mythologized "flower power" during the 1960s.

How to further dumb down a globalized population

Homer may be hilarious but let's keep him on TV and not have his clones make up 80% of the population.

One could argue that individuals have no real power. Cheap mass movements, including ephemeral Facebook profile photo fads, take away any remaining vestiges of that power. Plus, the goal of most corporations, especially those devoted to technology, is to erode free choice as much as possible.

Believing this does not depend on you accepting any organized globalist agenda. It can just as easily be a disorganized one. After all, the less varied the customer base, the more that products can be mass marketed and the desire to conform with the majority can be unleashed. A perversion of the “invisible hand” of capitalism can be the cause you blame, without having to resort to any Alex Jones Infowars-style explanation.

Are you still unconvinced that this has anything to do with sheep changing their Facebook profile photos after the Bataclan horrors? Since advertising was “discovered” in the first decades of the 1900s, company directors and their spin doctors have striven to find the best possible way to convert memorable commercials and other associations into ever bigger profits.

So-called “free” services like Facebook have changed the nature of these attempts at enforcing conditioned behavior, which now often take the form of platforms mining your personal data to sell to other parties or tracking online movements so that large corporations pay top dollar for targeted advertisements.

Lead by example, don’t be one of the sheep

[image]

Sometimes, for strategic reasons, you cannot just come out with the fact that you not only read but also support the sorts of content featured on Return of Kings. Even so, you have a wide range of discretion for refusing to participate in cognitively-draining fads and, better yet, repudiating the fads themselves. A number of people I know have publicly mocked the Facebook French flag option. That’s one avenue to take.

Implicit leadership is frequently your best bet, though. It avoids the vexed issue of people not trusting those who talk instead of acting. So cultivate your own brand. You can be still yourself and not stoke the kinds of social conflict apt to erupt in a world increasingly indulgent of SJWs or the whims of infantilized adults. Try and save your very public takedowns and fury for when they are truly needed.

How do you become this kind of leader, you ask? Well, for a start, treat all your reading of ROK as the life-changing education the system never gave you. Reread articles, act on them, and record and compare your progress. Be part of the social solution and that means being the best possible version of you in regular life and behind the scenes.

Read More: One Man In State Of Five Million Kills Nine People; Governor Removes Confederate Flag

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Top 10 Worst Female Role Models In The Entire World

January 25, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

One of the most disturbing aspects of modern culture is the mainstream media's obsession with promoting slutty, corrupt, and untrustworthy women under the guise of "empowerment." While there's nothing wrong with encouraging girls to have healthy self-esteem, the kinds of women held up as role models by the media are horrible examples for girls to follow.

Here are ten female role models promoted by the media and why they make terrible idols for girls:

1. Hillary Clinton

Hillary Clinton, wife of former president Bill Clinton and former Senator and Secretary of State, is currently the presumptive front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination. Throughout her career, Hillary has positioned herself as a champion of women's issues, famously declaring that "women's rights are human rights" in a 1995 speech, and her success in politics has been lauded by the media as a positive model for girls. Prominent feminists such as Amanda Marcotte have declared their support for Hillary in the presidential race solely because she is a woman.

Beyond the fact that Hillary Clinton would have never gotten anywhere were it not for her marriage to Bill, she is arguably the most corrupt and untrustworthy politician in America. Beyond her involvement in her husband's corruption scandals when he was president, Hillary has been the subject of an ongoing investigation examining whether she leaked classified information via her private email server, a federal crime. Hillary has also been implicated in the 2012 Benghazi attack, in which ISIS-affiliated militants stormed an American diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya, killing Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and three others.

Throughout her life, Hillary Clinton has shown a callous, psychopathic disregard for the lives that have been ruined by her actions. She was once caught on tape laughing and bragging about how she got a child rapist off on lesser charges during her career as an attorney, and she also appeared on national news laughing about the death of former Libyan strongman Muammar Gaddafi. When she was being questioned by the Senate over her role in the Benghazi attack, Hillary suddenly blurted out "What difference does it make?" in regards to questions over why the Islamic attackers were able to penetrate the compound and kill Americans.

Indeed, Hillary Clinton has a long history of being abusive to her staffers, colleagues and Secret Service agents. For example, she once told a Secret Service agent to "get fucked" after he said “Good morning” to her, and she would yell at Secret Service agents for driving over bumps. During Bill Clinton’s failed campaign for the House in 1974, Hillary purportedly angrily called one of his staffers a “fucking Jew bastard,” the revelation of which nearly sank her bid for the Senate in 2000. Secret Service agents and former Hillary staffers consistently describe her as being in a state of perpetual rage.

Finally, despite her constantly claiming to be an advocate for feminism, Hillary Clinton has played a large role in smearing the numerous women who’ve accused her husband Bill of rape. In his book The Clintons’ War on Women, Roger Stone details how Hillary would hire private investigators to dig up dirt on Bill Clinton’s accusers in order to intimidate them into silence. This is the same woman who recently declared that “every survivor of sexual assault deserves to be heard, believed and supported.”

2. Lena Dunham

Lena Dunham is an actress best known for creating and starring in the HBO show Girls, currently in its fifth season. Girls has been lauded by the mainstream media for its “honest” depictions of life for young women in America, and Dunham has received praise in particular for her numerous nude scenes in the show, because her lumpy, shapeless body represents how “real” women look with their clothes off. Dunham has also been stumping for Hillary Clinton on the campaign trail and even did a one-on-one interview with her.

As I’ve joked in the past, if Lena Dunham is the voice of my generation, I’m gonna beg Generation X to adopt me. The only reason why Girls was green-lit in the first place is because Dunham and her co-stars have rich and famous parents; her father is a well-known New York artist. After high ratings for the first two seasons, Girls saw a collapse in its viewership, resulting in the show's cancellation following the completion of its sixth season next year.

Beyond Dunham's illusory success in showbiz, she is an admitted sexual predator. In her 2014 memoir Not That Kind of Girl, she described how she "spread open" her kid sister Grace's vagina and found pebbles inside. Dunham also confessed to masturbating in the same bed as Grace. When conservative websites publicized these passages, Dunham threatened to sue them for quoting her own book, also claiming she had to cancel several book tour dates because she was in a "rage spiral."

In addition, Lena Dunham has lied about being raped. In Not That Kind of Girl, she discusses how she was purportedly raped by a Republican named "Barry" during her time at Oberlin College. When Gawker and other websites tried to dig up the identity of Dunham's attacker, they discovered that he was at best a composite character—a character Dunham created by merging several other real people she knew—or at worst a complete lie.

3. Amy Schumer

Amy Schumer is a stand-up comedian known for her TV show Inside Amy Schumer as well as for her feminist-friendly style of comedy. Indeed, when Jerry Seinfeld criticized college students last year for being too politically correct, Schumer was frequently cited by SJWs as an example of how comedians can be both funny and sensitive to the feelings of oppressed groups.

Recently, however, Amy Schumer was caught stealing jokes from the late Patrice O'Neal, quite possibly the worst sin a comedian can commit. Additionally, while her job is to make fun of people, Schumer herself is incapable of taking a joke. She recently went on the warpath against a young fan of hers who made a joke about her being a slut, accusing him of "slut-shaming" and bullying him into making an apology. This is despite the fact that Schumer herself uses sex to sell her act, as shown by the above image.

4. Beyoncé

While most pop tarts have a short shelf life, Beyoncé Knowles has extended her 15 minutes of fame by rebranding herself as a feminist pop diva, singing songs about female "empowerment." Rising to fame as a member of the girl group Destiny's Child, Beyoncé has augmented her solo career with political activism, declaring herself to be a "modern-day feminist." Indeed, during her performance at the Video Music Awards, Beyoncé had a gigantic "FEMINIST" sign lit up behind her.

For all her paeans to women's rights, however, Beyoncé has a long history of ripping off her female colleagues. In 1999, Beyoncé forced Destiny's Child members LeToya Luckett and LaTavia Roberson out of the band after they attempted to replace the band's manager, Mathew Knowles (Beyoncé's father), claiming that he was denying them their fair share of the group's profits. After ruthlessly screwing over her bandmates, Beyoncé would mock them in the song "Survivor," painting herself as a victim of their evil machinations.

5. Angela Merkel

Angela Merkel is the chancellor of Germany and is widely regarded as the most powerful female politician in the world. Having served since 2005, Merkel is the longest-serving democratically elected head of government in the European Union, and one of the longest-serving in the world. Because the German economy has remained strong throughout the global economic recession, Merkel wields great power in the European Union and has been named the most powerful woman in the world by Forbes a record nine times.

However, Angela Merkel's domestic policies have thrown Germany into chaos. When the Syrian refugee crisis began last year, Merkel eagerly threw open her country's gates, forcing Germans to accept hundreds of thousands—possibly millions—of Muslims, straining the country's infrastructure to the breaking point. Beyond permanently altering Germany's demographics, these "refugees" overwhelmingly live off of government largess and have no intention of finding work.

To make matters worse, Angela Merkel has imported Muslim rape culture into Germany. During New Years' Eve, gangs of Muslim "refugees" wandered the streets of Cologne and other cities gang-raping white German women, a practice known in North Africa as "taharrush." Police have been reluctant to investigate the Muslims, fearing accusations of "racism," and Merkel has been trying to clamp down on free speech, preventing people from discussing Muslim rape attacks.

6. Miley Cyrus

A fixture in American pop music for nearly a decade, Miley Cyrus has resorted to ever more extreme and disgusting attempts to keep her name in the headlines. While she was best-known for her depiction of the family-friendly Disney character Hannah Montana, Cyrus debuted a new, more “adult” image at the 2013 VMAs, appearing in a low-cut outfit, sticking her tongue out provocatively, and twerking on her duet partner Robin Thicke. Recently, she’s been appearing at concerts wearing a massively over-sized prosthetic penis and fake breasts, making her appear as if she’s topless.

7. Sheryl Sandberg

Sheryl Sandberg is the COO of Facebook and is known as a voice for feminism and women's empowerment in Silicon Valley. Her book Lean In purports to describe how women can balance raising a family with success in their careers, and she also launched the "Ban Bossy" campaign to encourage girls to be more assertive. Sandberg has also been a vocal advocate for restricting online anonymity due to the fact that it encourages "harassment" against women.

However, Sheryl Sandberg's blueprint for success in Lean In is completely fraudulent. Wealthy women like Sandberg can balance career and family life because they rely on hired help—maids, nannies, gardeners—that poorer women can't afford. There's a racial dimension to this as well, as white women like Sandberg are usually reliant on illegal Mexican laborers to make their lives work.

8. Ronda Rousey

UFC fighter Ronda Rousey has become a household name because of the mainstream media's contention that anything a man can do, a woman can do better. In addition to being lauded for pursuing a career path that is anything but feminine (beating people's faces in), her equality to men also apparently extends to domestic violence, which Rousey has admitted to being guilty of. In her autobiography My Fight, Rousey confessed to beating up her former boyfriend after he purportedly took nude pictures of her without her permission. Despite male UFC fighters being suspended for accusations, not admissions, of beating up their girlfriends, Rousey has yet to suffer any consequences for her actions.

9. Carly Fiorina

Carly Fiorina is the former CEO of Hewlett-Packard and a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination. Mainstream conservatives have tried to boost her as an alternative to Donald Trump, with numerous pundits declaring that she won the presidential debate held on September 16, 2015, causing her to see a bump in the polls.

However, Fiorina has had a terrible reputation as both a businesswoman and a politician. During her tenure at HP, she ran the company into the ground, with its stock price falling by half by the time she was ousted as CEO. Fiorina attempted to enter politics in 2010 when she ran for Senate against incumbent California Democrat Barbara Boxer. In an election that saw the GOP take six Senate seats, win control of the House, and seize the majority of governorships, Boxer defeated Fiorina by an embarrassing 10-point margin.

10. Tess Holliday

Tess Holliday (formerly known as Tess Munster) is a fashion model who has gained attention for being plus-sized in an industry where women are expected to be rail-thin. After building a following online via Instagram and Tumblr, Holliday was signed to Milk Model Management last year, making her the largest plus-sized model signed to a major agency. She was also behind the Twitter hashtag #EffYourBeautyStandards, which purported to challenge mainstream conceptions of beauty.

Beyond the fact that Tess Holliday is encouraging obesity and slovenliness in young women, she has also defrauded her fans. in 2014, Holliday sold $40 #EffYourBeautyStandards shirts to her fans, claiming that she would be donating a portion of her profits to a domestic violence charity. Not only did countless fans never receive the merchandise they bought, but Holliday did not donate a single cent of her proceeds to charity. When fans asked Holliday via Facebook, Twitter or Instagram why they hadn't received their T-shirts, she responded by blocking them.

While there are plenty of positive female role models to be found in our world, the media insists on glorifying women who are corrupt, slutty, or incompetent at their jobs. If a woman is being promoted by the media, it's almost a given that she's a terrible person who has committed heinous crimes against others, or is at bare minimum a failure at life.

Young women would be advised to shun these characters and avoid emulating them at all costs.

Read More: Most Female Leaders Are Only Successful Because Of Their Male Relatives

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

59 Powerful Quotes That Reveal The True Nature Of Women

January 25, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Folklore of Women by Thomas F. Thiselton-Dyer is a largely forgotten book from a century ago with an extensive collection of proverbs, adages, and quotes from the past regarding women. The book is well worth reading, as it's a gold mine of red pill truths from different cultures across the world. What's fascinating is just how much of what is recorded here still rings true for today's women, in spite of all our recent social and cultural changes.

Here are some of the best quotes from the book:

Women and harmony

> "A thousand men may live together in harmony, whereas two women are unable to do so though they be sisters." –Tamil adage

On women's intelligence

> "She is at the mercy of circumstances just as the sand is at the mercy of the wind;" whilst we are further told that, "although woman reads and studies endlessly, her thought is always an afterthought."
>
> The Russian is of the same opinion, for, according to him, "a woman's hair is long, but her sense short," and "a dog is wiser than a woman, he does not bark at his master."
>
> Tamil proverbial wisdom declares that "the skill of a woman only goes so far as the fireplace"—in other words, cleverness is no use to a woman outside domestic affairs.

Requirements for women

> “We ask four things for a woman–that virtue dwell in her heart, modesty in her forehead, sweetness in her mouth, and labour in her hands.” –Chinese proverb

On women’s morality

It appears the world was unanimous in regards to women’s moral character:

> “He who takes an eel by the tail, or a woman at her word, soon finds he holds nothing.”
>
> “Beware of a bad woman, and put no trust in a good one.” –German proverb

> “Woman always speak the truth, but not the whole truth.” –Italian proverb
>
> “The dog is faithful, woman never.” –Turkish maxim
>
> “When a woman has lost her character, she will shrink from no crime.” –Tacitus
>
> “Women, if confined at home by faithful guardians, are not really guarded; but those women who guard themselves by their own will, are well guarded.”
> –Eastern proverb

On women’s chastity

> “Beauty without chastity is a flower without fragrance.” –old Tamil maxim

Women don’t always know what is best for themselves

> “A woman mostly will prefer
> The thing that is the worst for her.” –Welsh adage

On women’s vanity

> German proverbs run, “Woman’s beauty, the forest echo and rainbows, soon pass away,” and “Maidens and roses soon lose their bloom.”
>
> Italian proverb adds, “Tell a woman that she is beautiful, and the devil will repeat it to her ten times.”
>
> German proverb adds, “An impudent face never marries.”

Why it’s difficult to find a woman who has the best of both worlds:

> “The handsomest women are soonest corrupted, because they are most > tempted.” –John Ray

>
> “Every woman would be rather pretty than pious.” –old German proverb

On women’s beauty

> Galen perhaps was not far wrong in maintaining that one reason why misfortune is so often connected with beauty is that “many who have been distinguished for their loveliness have neglected the education of their mind,” for, as the German proverbs say, “Beauty and understanding go rarely together.”
>
> “Beauty in the unworthy is poison in a casket of gold.” –Tamil adage
>
> German folk-wisdom tells us that “A fair skin often covers a crooked mind,” and “A fair face may hide a foul heart.”
>
> “A beautiful woman is the paradox of the eves, the hell of the soul, and the purgatory of the purse.” –old English maxim
>
> “A beautiful woman smiling bespeaks a purse-weeping.”
>
> “An ugly woman is a disease of the stomach, a handsome woman a disease of the head.”

Women’s superficiality

> “A harlot’s face is a painted sepulchre.”
>
> “Three-tenths of a woman’s good looks are due to nature, seven-tenths to dress.” –Chinese proverb

Women and love

> “Love is the companion of blindness.” –Arab proverb
>
> “To love a thing makes the eye blind, the ear deaf.” –Talmud
>
> “When women love, they forgive us everything, even our crimes; when they do not love us, they give us credit for nothing, not even for our virtues.” –Honoré de Balzac

On women’s words

> Chinese have a favourite saying to the effect that “a woman’s tongue is her sword, and she does not let it rust.”
>
> “Be she old, or be she young,
> A woman’s strength is in her tongue.”
>
> “Silence is a fine jewel for a woman but little worn.”
>
> “Her tongue steals away all the time from her hands,” and “All women are good Lutherans,” they say in Denmark, “because they would rather preach than hear Mass.”
>
> Chinese have a common proverb to the effect that, whereas “a man’s words are like an arrow close to the mark, a woman’s is like a broken fan.”

Women in power and gender roles

> “Ill fares the hapless family that shows,
> A cock that’s silent, and a hen that crows.”
>
> The Japanese tells us that “when the hen crows the house goes to ruin,” with which may be compared the Russian adage, “It never goes well when the hen crows,” whilst the Persian proverb puts the matter sensibly thus:—“If you be a cock, crow; if a hen, lay eggs.”

On the value of women

> “There are only two good women in the world: one of them is dead, and the other is not to be found.” –Old German proverb
>
> “A man of straw is worth a woman of gold.” –French
>
> “A woman never brings a man into the right way.” –African proverb
>
> “He that can avoid women, let him do so, so as to take care each day not to do what he may regret on the morrow.” –Plautus

Toxic women

> “A good woman, beset by evil women, is like the chaste mimosa surrounded by poisonous herbs” –Eastern proverb
>
> Chinese proverb affirming that “there is no such poison in the green snake’s mouth, of the hornet’s sting, as in a woman’s heart;”
>
> Italians say that “it is better to irritate a dog than a bad woman.”
>
> “Men are women’s playthings, women are the devil’s.” –Victor Hugo
>
> “Infidelity, violence, deceit, envy, extreme avariciousness, a total want of qualities, with impurity, are the innate faults of womankind.” –from Hitopadesa
>
> “In one fair woman there are seventy-two hidden vices.” –Marathi
>
> “Women are saints in the church, angels in the street, devils in the kitchen, and apes in bed.”
>
> “Women are demons who make us enter hell through the gates of Paradise.”
>
> “When a woman thinks by herself she thinks of evil.”

How women lure men

> “Women and wine, game, and deceit,
> Make the wealth small, and the wants great”
>
> “Women for the most part do not love us. They do not choose a man because they love him, but because it pleases them to be loved by him.” –Alphonse Karr
>
> “If thou givest thy heart to a woman she will kill thee.” –West African wisdom

Women and spite

> “Not even the soldiers’ fury, raised in war,
> The rage of tyrants when defiance stings ’em!
> The pride of priests, so bloodless when in power,

> Are half so dreadful as a woman's vengeance."
>
> "A woman is more constant in hate than in love."
>
> "A woman, when inflamed by love or hatred, will do anything."
>
> French saying: "Women's counsels are ever cruel," the warning being added that "you should believe only one word in forty that a woman speaks."

On Marriage

> Two good days for a man in this life—
> When he weds and when he buries his wife.
>
> African proverb reminds us that "He who marries a beauty marries trouble."
>
> Chinese say, "A young wife should be in her house but a shadow and an echo."

Conclusion

What I find amazing is how modern men have inexplicably forgotten about these warnings by pedestalizing women with notions of pure and divine love. By adopting an unrealistic and idealistic image of womanhood, men have inadvertently cursed themselves—the effects of which we continue to witness today.

However, in spite of these (sometimes harsh) warnings, we shouldn't treat the entire opposite sex as enemies to be overcome—that would be ridiculous. Instead, we must approach our interactions with women with precaution to filter out the toxic ones, and have realistic view of the female nature to form healthy relationships with them. We can always learn a thing or two from our ancestors.

You can read the entire book for free here or read an Amazon preview below:

Read More: 6 Aphorisms On The Nature Of Women

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

What We Can Learn From The Costly Failure Of Al Jazeera America

January 25, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The cable news channel Al Jazeera was born in 1996 in the small principality of Qatar. It was nothing less than revolutionary for the world of Arabic media. It dared to criticize nearly everyone and everything, it was not controlled by a stodgy bureaucracy, and it would not be dictated to by oppressive regimes in the region. It was a young channel, staffed by many idealistic types who had been educated in the West.

But the station came to be demonized in the West in general and in the United States in particular. It would not toe the neo-con party line in the early 2000s during the Iraq invasion, and threatened to report a side of the war that threatened Washington's policies in the region. Some American leaders used it to deflect attention from their warmongering policies, and predictably, public opinion in the United States came to see it as some sort of radicalist mouthpiece. It was absurd, but such is the influence of ignorance and fear-mongering.

So everyone knew it would be a risk when the station announced in 2013 that it would launch a cable station in the United States called "Al Jazeera America" (or "AJAM"). Recently, the station announced it would close in the early weeks of January 2016. After spending a huge amount of money on the project, the bosses in Doha, Qatar decided it was time to call it quits.

What had happened? How had the global network failed to penetrate the American market? The reasons are varied, and offer many learning points to any organization aspiring to become a media brand.

Problems With Cable Distributors

Problems developed early on when major cable distributors like Comcast and DirecTV declined to carry the channel. Right before the channel launched in 2016, it was dropped by AT&T U-verse.

The reasons boiled down to two things: (1) lack of confidence that people wanted yet another cable channel; and (2) a vague feeling of unease in anything coming from the Middle East.

Failure To Brand Effectively

Branding and marketing are critical, as everyone who runs a business should know. Every product needs an identity, and that identity should be positive, not negative. A negative perception always hovered around Al Jazeera, albeit unjustifiably. But the channel should have done something to rebrand itself.

Al Jazeera English (AJE, the English-language version of the channel) had actually been (and continues to be) a success. Al Jazeera had also started successful media niches in the Balkans and in Turkey. It is basically a liberal-oriented network on the model of the BBC or CNN. But entering the American market itself was an entirely different matter.

The channel should have changed its name and logo. The perceived taint from the Iraq war days (even though unjustified) was just too strong. Perceptions, not reality, are what matter.

Expensive, Non-Performing Purchases

Another bad thing to happen was the channel's purchase of Al Gore's "Current TV" station. It paid about $500 million for Current TV, which was never popular to begin with. It had no audience and no real identity. The station itself was carried by less than half of all cable subscribers, so AJAM found itself saddled with expensive baggage that was not performing.

Gore made out like a bandit. He dumped his useless channel on the unsuspecting Qataris, then took the money and ran. This was without doubt a bad business decision by Doha. It failed to see that the future of news was on the internet, not on cable, as things had been in 1996. It was using logic that had been valid for 1996, but was not valid for 2016. AJAM had at least three expensive locations in New York City, one of which came with an outrageously high monthly rental cost.

Problems With Cable Contracts

The station was not able to deal with the US cable contracts that negated the main strengths of AJE. AJE's streaming feed is very popular, but AJAM had to block access to the AJE feed on the station, a move that alienated many potential viewers. The reason was that AJAM could not afford to permit a free live stream on its cable station. It needed subscribers and revenue, and a free live feed gained it neither of these.

Needless Human Drama

There was also personal drama. No less than five high-level female executives resigned amid rumors of "sexism" and a "culture of fear" at the station. For whatever reason, AJAM was unable to solve these problems in a way that remained discreet and behind closed doors. This may be ascribed to a failure to understand (to put it tactfully) American norms of political correctness.

And none of these expensive executives did anything tangible for the company, either. Despite the huge amounts of money being pumped into the station, AJAM failed to lead any significant news stories or carve out a niche market. Huge salaries were being paid to people who were occupying space and doing little.

Failure To Focus On The Internet

In retrospect, AJAM should have stuck to its internet guns. The future lay in streaming news on the internet, not in 1990s cable news channels. Digital, not cable, was the wave of the future. In retrospect, rather than start a new cable channel, Doha should have either started a new internet site focusing on American content, or it should have paid existing cable companies to carry its already-proven AJE content and programs. That would have saved it huge amounts of money. As oil prices began to fall in 2015, Doha simply made the decision to pull the plug on the project, rather than try to reform it.

Hindsight is always perfect, but these do seem to be the most articulable lessons from the demise of AJAM. They are lessons that every media company, including Return of Kings, should keep in mind.

Read More: 11 Ways To Survive A Media Shitstorm

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

4 Bogus Excuses Barack Obama Is Using To Disarm The American People

January 26, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

President Barack Obama has wasted no time this year rolling out more executive fiat designed to imprint his vision of society onto the American people via Executive Actions that are intended to bypass Congress. He issued four Executive Actions on January 4th, 2016, and also made appearances on television to rally support for them. Conjuring up the ghosts of the Sandy Hook kids, he managed to cry on camera at the appropriate time to tie in the emotionalism that is the hallmark of all leftist politics. He then followed up with a CNN exclusive "town hall" meeting on January 7th designed to appear unbiased and accurate.

These are the phony reasons given for the policies he intends to enact:

1. Keep guns out of the wrong hands through background checks

Filling out NICS paperwork during a purchase.

> Well, the problem is, is that about 30 percent, 40 percent of those guns are coming from Indiana across the border, where there are much laxer laws, and so folks will go to a gun show and purchase a whole bunch of firearms, put them in a van, drive up into Mike Pfleger's neighborhood on the South Side of Chicago where his parish is, open up the trunk, and those things are for sale. – Barack Obama.

The first action is to direct an expansion of the National Instant Criminal Background Check System (NICS). NICS is used for every firearm purchase from a Federal Firearms License (FFL) holding dealer. All new guns, and most used guns, go through a dealer for sale, and are subject to a NICS check. Private sales of used guns, however, are not subject to the NICS check or taxes.

This is a fundamental part of American liberty. The Constitution does not permit the government any power to regulate private sales. Obama's tactic in this situation is to change the definition of "dealer" to mean "anyone that sells a gun," so he can build upon the existing law and skirt around his lack of authority to monitor private sales. There was never such a thing as a "Gun Show Loophole;" I can buy a gun via a private sale anywhere the seller and I choose. That's called freedom of commerce, and it happens to be legal.

If you buy a gun with intent to sell it to someone who cannot own it legally (like homies on the South Side of Chicago), it's a straw purchase. Since straw purchases, possession of guns by felons, and murder are all illegal already, the point must be to enhance the amount of transactions the NICS covers. Monitoring all firearms transactions is the first step to confiscating all firearms.

This upstanding young citizen would likely not pass a NICS check.

> And we're also trying to close a loophole that has been developing over the last decade, where now, people are using cut-out trusts and shell corporations to purchase the most dangerous weapons — sawed-off shotguns, automatic weapons, silencers — and don't have to go through background checks at all. - Obama.

Obama twists the truth with this comment on NFA trusts. A National Firearms Act trust is a legal construction designed to place ownership to a trust, instead of a person. These are things like fully automatic weapons, short barreled rifles and shotguns, and silencers, and all must have federal stamps and permits to be legally had. The idea is so that, when a trustee dies, it is not illegal to inherit the NFA guns, as the permits transfer, instead of being illegal while the heir reapplies or sells the guns.

This is, quite simply, a lie on Obama's part, and another "half law" designed to remove yet more guns from lawful owners via legalese. All guns going through dealers must do the NICS check, trusts included. What's going to be next, a NICS check on you when you inherit your father's gun?

2. Make our communities safer from gun violence

Properly attired wife-beater.

The first part of this was to ensure that all dealers report all lost and stolen guns. While this may seem like a decent plan on the surface, it's another way of getting the camel's nose into the tent. Checking out a lost or stolen gun's data can turn into recording all of a dealer's transactions, current and previous, and then you have de-facto registration of all of those guns (and their owners).

The other part will ring familiarly here. Obama directed federal help to state agencies dealing with domestic violence for "wider options." If someone you are with calls in a complaint of domestic violence, when the police come for the investigation, the first thing they take is all your guns, even if there is no arrest. You won't get them back very quickly, and you may never get them back at all. The disallowing of certain people to possess guns, and the confiscation of said guns, simply furthers the plan of eventual confiscation of all guns. This action's goal is to make sure all state agencies tow the Federal line, as Federal assistance always comes with rules.

3. Increase mental health treatment and reporting to the background check system

If you are mentally ill, you are not allowed to possess guns. The NRA, and other organizations, have stonewalled the CDC (a fact that Obama lamented), because of abuses of being designated as such. Obamacare, insurance companies making doctors ask about firearms ownership of their patients, and Social Security “dependent” status are all parts of linking your healthcare information together, and using that information to remove your rights by labeling you defective.

Part of the left’s argument, in an attempt to make it more palatable, is “Of course, everyone should be able to own guns, except X, Y, and Z.” It sounds reasonable until you find out that everyone can now be classified as X, Y, or Z at their whim.

4. Shape the future of gun technology

Personalized weapons only work in film.

> If you are a gun-owner, I would think that you would at least want a choice so that if you wanted to purchase a firearm that could only be used by you, in part to avoid accidents in your home, in part to make sure that if it's stolen, it's not used by a criminal, in part if there's an intruder, you pull the gun, but you — somehow it gets wrested away from you, that gun can't be turned on you and used on you, I would think there might be a market for that. – Obama

Firearms are a mature technology; there hasn't been a fundamental improvement in the basic firearm since the development of the assault rifle in the forties. Firearms are purely mechanical systems, propelled by chemical energy ignited into kinetic; to put electronic interlocks on them is the height of stupidity.

The solution to the potential problem of "having a gun wrested away from you" is training, good situational awareness, and having already thought through the whole "would I really shoot someone in this situation?" mental debate. You don't need a prone-to-failure (or outside intervention) battery powered fingerprint scanner or similar technology in a self-defense scenario.

Underlying Motivations

Obama's tactics, like all liberals on this issue, is to use a tragedy (or an anniversary of a tragedy if a fresh one doesn't present itself) to trigger "the feels" and press for legislation that is one more cut in the thousand that is the death of our rights to firearms, and anything else essential to preserve our freedoms. I urge everyone to review the Gun Control Act of 1934 and 1968 to see what has already been lost.

The left doesn't hate guns; they hate YOU having guns. They are protected by people with guns, and they'll use people with guns to take away yours, if and when they semi-legally pass legislation to do so, and those people will use those guns on you if you resist. Gun control has never been about the guns; it's always been about control.

Every government atrocity committed since firearms have been developed has always been preceded by gun control, registration, prohibition, and confiscation. People fear their government, and live in an uneasy truce their whole lives, trusting that, by being a good citizen and believing anyone that gets arrested was not, they will escape persecution or prosecution.

> And, by the way, the young man who killed those kids in New Town, he didn't have a criminal record, and so, we didn't know ahead of time, necessarily, that he was going to do something like that. – Obama.

Freedom and liberty isn't necessarily safe. We are living in the cesspool of the failed liberal experiment with the divorce and prescription drugs of our parents giving rise to the numb narcissism and anti-socialism prevalent in our generations. The left's solution is to police us so that the abandoned and ill who don't bow to their assigned role can't act out in rage and are relegated to live and die in misery and frustration. All of us, especially those who display independent thought, are thought of as the next potential shooter.

There is another solution. The number of people tired of an omnipotent government is growing. The left's rhetoric of guns being just for criminals and rednecks is failing. The fact that the possession of a gun by a citizen simply empowers them to act in their own defense and says nothing about their politics, stances, or personality is being realized across all levels.

Every political debate should be looked at as "Is the government trying to restrict my ability to do something?" and opposition to the formation and enforcement of any such restriction is the logical conclusion. Draw the line in the sand for government interference in your life and tolerate no violations of your rights as a man.

The answer to the question of "Should the government…." is always "NO!"

Read More: Future Leaders Of America Call To Abolish Freedom Of Speech And Press

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Twitter On The Road To Bankruptcy Thanks To Supporting Censorship And Social Justice

January 26, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In recent times, Twitter founder and current CEO Jack Dorsey has fully embraced the social justice warrior narrative and clamped down on free speech that hurts progressives' fragile feelings. He's now paying a huge price for it as Twitter's share price tanks, despite only being floated in November, and many of its most important executives have run away. His current losses are an amazing $1.25 billion in just four months.

In October, the then 38-year-old publicly gushed, like a child on Christmas Day, about having met Black Lives Matter "leader" DeRay Mckesson, who has committed himself to very angrily dividing America on the basis of fabricated race issues. Dorsey then watched, undoubtedly with glee, as Milo Yiannopoulos was unverified for daring to disagree with rabid feminists, such as Harvard PhD student Holly "White People Are Awful" Wood. Most recently, popular alt-righter @jokeocracy was terminated for questioning the liberal left narrative:

https://twitter.com/DuckKnightRises/status/691817688738484224

Similarly, ROK's own Matt Forney had his account suspended in December, even after users who made repeated physical threats against him were not banned. GotNews.com founder Chuck C. Johnson is another prominent non-leftist thrown to the pseudo-abuse scrapheap by the openly pro-SJW Twitter police.

Had some tough months, Jack?

Jack Dorsey meeting Black Lives Matter troll DeRay Mckesson.

CNN Money, among other mainstream outlets, also noticed how Twitter's new anti-abuse crusade, launched in very late 2015, had "backfired." Instead of stopping actual threats and so-called "violence," the company's campaign fully created the firestorm kicked off by the completely non-transparent treatment towards Yiannopoulos. This sham toolkit for "stopping harassment" follows earlier efforts, such as when Twitter rushed to save SJWs like Anita Sarkeesian from articulate criticism.

Forbes estimated Dorsey's fortune at $2.2 billion in September. This fell to $1.4 billion after Twitter became a public company in November and then dipped further to $944 million just after the middle of this month. Interestingly, for the majority of this time, Dorsey has been the permanent CEO, having come into the role after Dick Costolo departed. Thinking himself a better businessman than social media founder, he has expertly steered his corporate ship into the sharpest of rocks.

Did someone hurt your ultra-sensitive feelings? Twitter to the rescue!

https://twitter.com/catrincooper/status/685221044991455236/photo/1

The tweets above illustrate the sort of free speech Twitter is committed to and explains why the platform is dying, with user growth plummeting over previous months and revenue nosediving. When users like @catrincooper and @girlziplocked call retweeting someone's own comments abuse and harassment, and then a zealous white knight Twitter manager dobs the naughty retweeter into the big boss Jack, you know the platform is getting beyond precious.

Needless to say, Twitter didn't expect Milo's sympathizers to make #JeSuisMilo the number one Twitter trend in the US. What we at ROK did expect was that Twitter would remove the hashtag from its list of trending topics once it become so popular, which the platform indeed did.

The Los Angeles Times shows how the revolt against this anti-free speech farce has not just been coming from supporters of Yiannopoulos and civil liberties advocates. Eight of the 13 Twitter executives who presented at the company's analyst day last year have expressed their lack of belief in the "vision" of Dorsey and abruptly left.

What this means for the raging culture war

[image]
Facebook Chief Operating Officer Sheryl Sandberg has been front and center of the company's collaborations with the German government to censor online criticism of Berlin's open border immigration "policy".

Jack Dorsey is was a billionaire. Mark Zuckerberg, the founder and CEO of Facebook, which is working in tandem with the German government to eradicate any online criticism of Germany's demographic suicide, is a multibillionaire. These men represent powerful forces going out of their way to stop debate, not through sound reason or logic but instead through the brute force of their money and an ability to control the mediums people use to communicate online.

Dorsey's self-inflicted financial knifing demonstrates that there are limits to what many people will take from arrogant tech founders who think that their social and political sense matches their coding or computer abilities. Figures like Milo Yiannopoulos, although they can thankfully make a living from their contrarian viewpoints, have none of the institutional or corporate power of a Jack Dorsey or Mark Zuckerberg. They operate on the basis of ideas, not monopolistic privilege. This only makes their achievements in fighting back even more impressive and worthy of emulation.

Twitter's status as one of the most popular social media platforms (up until now) does not make it immune to a backlash from disgruntled or plain disinterested users. Dorsey, like many other social media founders, thinks that because people latched onto his initial idea of 140 character public messages that they will stomach whatever else he or his company foists upon them, including draconian anti-free speech diktats window-dressed as "anti-abuse policies."

We can safely say that Twitter's bomb of a share price performance over the last few months thoroughly disproves Jack Dorsey's self-aggrandizing belief.

Read More: 5 Modern Day Social Justice Warriors Who Would Have Been Institutionalized In The Past

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

6 Terminator Robots Google Is Developing Alongside Its Artificial Intelligence Program

January 26, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

A quick visit to the page of Boston Dynamics, a subsidiary of Google, reveals the typical, flowery PR flack pleasantry that is one of the cancers of our age.

> Our mission is to build the most advanced robots on Earth, with remarkable mobility, agility, dexterity and speed.

Doesn't that sound wonderful? Surely they're developing robots that will help mankind, right?

But if you look at the videos of what they're actually developing, it's easy to see how this type of machinery could soon have frightening military and police applications. Imagine a line of these coming at you, armed with weapons.

Boston Dynamics research and development for these machines has been funded by DARPA, the U.S. military's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency.

Here's a look at some of what they're building.

1. Atlas

Imagine the Atlas model or its successors someday replacing human soldiers on the battlefield or enforcement personnel at your local police department. The Defense Department says it will be used for search and rescue tasks.

The Atlas model can already complete the following tasks as of 2015:

- Drive a utility vehicle.
- Travel dismounted across rubble.
- Remove debris blocking an entryway.
- Open a door and enter a building.
- Climb an industrial ladder and traverse an industrial walkway.
- Use a tool to break through a concrete panel.
- Locate and close a valve near a leaking pipe.
- Connect a fire hose to a standpipe and turn on a valve.

2. Big Dog

The Big Dog

The Big Dog was released in 2005 and discontinued in 2015, although much of the technology developed in the Big Dog program will continue to be used in other models, including its successor the LS3. Big Dog is about the size of a small mule.

It has the following specifications:

- 2.5 feet tall
- Walks at 4 mph
- Can traverse difficult terrain, up to 35° of incline
- Can carry 350 lbs
- Laser gyroscope provides balance
- Stereo vision provides sight

3. Cheetah

The Cheetah prototype can already run at over 28 mph

Perhaps the most frightening model thus far is the Cheetah. The prototype has already set records for robots as it can run at speeds over 28 mph as seen in this video, faster than the world's fastest running man.

Sure, Cheetah looks gangly and wobbly now and needs its control arm, but imagine a few more years or decades of research and development and billions or trillions of dollars poured into this project. I like to think of it as the Apple II of fast-moving robots. Wait until the figurative Windows 95 and later models arrive.

YouTube commenter Scott Matheson has the same idea as I do.

> In the future running from the cops will mean having to outrun one of these things which will probably also be equipped with all sorts of amusing weaponry to subdue, maim, obliterate the hapless quarry. (Crooks, killers, opposition party members…)

4. WildCat

WildCat is an untethered version of Cheetah, which runs at speeds up to 19 miles per hour.

5. LS3

The LS3 model, currently in use by the U.S. military

The LS3 is militarized version of the BigDog. The LS3 is enhanced to automatically follow its leader with its eyes, carries 400 lbs of gear and has a range of 20 miles. An external power supply extends the range of the LS3.

Boston Dynamics robots are being designed so they can't be subdued – this model quickly recovers from a swift kick on ice

6. Little Dog

The Little Dog – used for research, development, and miniaturization

The Little Dog is a miniature version of the Big Dog. Its primary use thus far is as a research and development tool for other robots, with special emphasis on locomotion.

Acquisition by Google

In 2013, Boston Dynamics was acquired by GoogleX, a semi-secret research and development agency owned by Google. Boston Dynamics was the eighth robotics company acquired by Google at the time. Google has also announced that it plans to "dominate" artificial intelligence (AI). It's not hard to see how Google's robots will be combined with its AI program.

The laughable New York Times article at the time suggested these machines might someday be used for the elderly.

> The deal is also the clearest indication yet that Google is intent on building a new class of autonomous systems that might do anything from warehouse work to > package delivery and even elder care.

What are the potential implications of opening this Pandora's box? Google has recently set up an AI ethics panel, but not much is known about what they are discussing. Perhaps one of the biggest questions is, when will we see a hybrid of Google AI and the robots it is developing?

Is this something that will benefit mankind? Or will it be used as a force multiplier against the masses? After all, there's nothing better for tyranny than a soldier or enforcement officer that has no feelings of guilt or remorse for what they're inflicting on society.

Some of the world's leading scientists and engineers including Stephen Hawking and Elon Musk have warned this merger of AI and robotics could have potentially disastrous consequences for mankind, as I reported myself at The New Modern Man.

Read More: The Best And Worst Nationalities of Women (According to Google)

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

ROK Podcast: Culture War Analysis With ROK's David Garrett Brown

January 26, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Welcome back to the latest Return of Kings Podcast.

In this episode, we bring you up to speed on some current stories, an interview with ROK writer David Garrett Brown, and some hilarious reader comments.

Tune in!

On iTunes:

On Soundcloud:

On YouTube:

Read More: ROK Podcast: Interview With Roosh About The Year Ahead

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty

Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Clear Should You Announce Your Sexual Intentions With Women You're Attracted To?

January 27, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

When a man is sexually or romantically interested in a women, it is absolutely imperative that he is clear in his intent and that he communicates this to her, either overtly or covertly. If he fails to do so, the risk is that he will end up in friend zone hell, or at the very least will have to endure a lot of time-wasting before most likely walking away with nothing.

The good news, though, is that by being clear in your intent you can filter out time-wasting women, push things forward with those who are more receptive, and avoid awkward situations where the girl thinks that you just want to be friends when actually you want something more.

What Is Clarity of Intent?

What do I mean by clarity of intent? Simply that when you approach a woman that you are interested in, you must be 100% certain that she knows you are interested, rather than just stopping her for a nice friendly chat or to ask for directions.

A lot of guys get over the initial fear of the approach and become comfortable talking to girls. But these conversations fail to turn into phone numbers, and the phone numbers they do obtain fail to turn into sex or relationships. The reason for this? Because the guy didn't have the balls to really put himself on the line and take a damn risk.

Rejection

Rejection can be tough to handle for anyone, especially a beginner at game. But you must be prepared to be rejected if you want to meet women, either for relationships or for something more temporary.

Men who do not exude clarity of intent are almost always men who secretly fear rejection. But think about it this way. If you're not having sex with her after you've approached and perhaps met up with her a couple of times, then she's rejected you anyway. The only difference is that the rejection was more polite and spread out over a longer time period. So if you're going to get blown out then why not get that rejection early? That way there's less time wasted on either side, and you can both g et on with your respective lives.

Honesty

A great many men pride themselves on being honest, but how many of them are genuinely honest in their interactions with women? Actually, I'd bet in most cases the most honest thing you can say to a girl is "I want to have sex with you, will you come back to my place?"

Social conditioning has falsely inculcated a view that human courtship needs to be a long affair, drawn out over several dates, that incorporates a lot of "getting to know you" and swapping opinions on books and bands and gourmet burger recipes. While this is a view of courtship that largely benefits women, men too have been hoodwinked into thinking that this sort of pattern is somehow more authentic, real, and yes, "honest."

This is simply not true. In most cases, the way for a man to be honest is to express exactly what he's feeling in relation to a woman and let the chips fall where they may.

Direct Or Indirect Game?

You may think that this relates directly to the age-old argument of direct versus indirect game, but that's not quite the case.

For those who don't know, direct game is going up to a girl (usually the approach will be cold) and telling her that you think she is hot and that you'd like to take her out. Indirect game is finding some sort of pretext to talk to her, like asking for directions, or where a certain landmark is, before transitioning the conversation to the personal.

To be clear, both direct and indirect game can work equally well—it depends very much on the situation. It would, for example, be inadvisable to go in full-guns-blazing direct with a girl sitting next to you right at the start of a long, transatlantic flight. But equally, if you see a cute girl and you have two minutes to talk to her before catching a train, you'd be better served by cutting your losses and going direct.

My point here, though, is that whichever method you choose, you must ensure that the girl knows that you are hitting on her. There is no value in getting her phone number and leaving jubilantly while she believes that she has simply met a new friend.

She may answer your calls; she may meet up with you. But when you introduce your D into the conversation and she's not expecting it, it will be beyond awkward.

Edge

So how do you ask directions to the train station while showing clarity of sexual intent? Well, once you get the hang of it, it's easy. You have to develop edge. You have to learn to carry yourself in such a way that you appear a sexual man who knows what he wants and has got it many, many times before.

There have been whole books written about how to achieve this, but I'll give you a few pointers here. For a start, you must develop strong, unflinching eye contact. If you think about having sex with her while you're looking at her then even better.

Your posture must be straight, commanding, masculine. You should take up a lot of space. You should be dominant. Your voice should be low and deep. Above all, you must touch her—start with a tap on the shoulder, a brush against the lower arm, and go from there. A man who gets laid a lot—and who is therefore attractive to women—is not afraid to touch. He enjoys it.

All of these things will position you as a masculine man who is sexually-aware and competent. If you do it right, then simply by looking at her and holding eye contact steadfastly, she will know what you really want and that it's got nothing to do with directions the nearest Starbucks.

Own It

Don’t be the guy who collects loads of phone numbers but never gets laid. Far better to be the guy who gets rejected by hundreds of women but ends up with a gorgeous girlfriend at the end of the year. Far better to be honest and open, and to own your sexuality and your intentions with women. From now on, when you interact with girls, really make the effort to ensure that they know you are hitting on them.

It may mean you suffer more blow-outs in the short term, but long-term, you’ll definitely see that it works in your favour.

Read More: How to Avoid Being Labeled “Creepy” By Beautiful Girls

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Canadian Feminists Failed To Have Man Imprisoned For Sending Them Mean Tweets

January 27, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> With Guthrie, for instance, what frightened her about Elliott was the sheer volume of his tweets about her…
>
> — The National Post reporting on the preposterous offense Steph Guthrie took to Gregory Alan Elliott tweeting about her. If this is the standard for criminal harassment online, 1,000,000 Americans should be jailed for tweeting their gripes about Barack Obama.

A Canadian court has found Gregory Alan Elliott, prosecuted for criminal harassment after disagreeing with feminists on Twitter, innocent. SJWs Steph Guthrie and Heather Reilly received a number of oblique slap-downs from the judge, who ruled that their fears over their "safety" were entirely unreasonable. The decision is a victory for common sense and highlights how—absent threats—communicating with people via tweets and hashtags should not be a criminal offense.

Elliott tragically lost his job as a graphic artist after his very, very widely publicized arrest. Then came the additional and extremely heavy burden of fighting to clear his name, which compounded the immense impact of this whole debacle on his wife and children. The accusers, Guthrie, Reilly and a third woman whose claims against Elliott were dropped from the charges, could rely on the state to prosecute him without having to pay a dime for it.

The background

Heather Reilly and Steph Guthrie, the world's most delicate flowers.

Gregory Alan Elliott had been communicating with Steph Guthrie before a bitter online falling out. Elliott criticized Guthrie after she tried to set the internet upon Brendalin Spurr, a very ironic hypocrisy given what she later alleged against Elliott. Spurr had created an Anita Sarkeesian punching game of the exact same kind he had devised for Jack Thompson, a disbarred attorney infamous for wanting to censor games of almost all their sexual and violent content.

Perpetuating a feminist obsession with making everything about invented misogyny against women, despite the earlier game about Thompson, Guthrie initiated a harassment campaign targeting Spurr, contacting scores of people, including his potential employers and many local media outlets. Guthrie eventually blocked Gregory Alan Elliott after he called her obsessive actions into question. Elliott then continued tweeting at Guthrie, who demanded he stop using the public platform to mention her. The police and courts then became involved.

Police found no threats of harm by Elliott against either Guthrie or Reilly, who had joined the fracas earlier. This assessment was reiterated by the court, which found no tweets or other communications of a violent or sexual quality. In the meantime, the innocent man had been subjected to long-term Twitter and general internet bans. This further eroded his ability to generate an income, as most of his work opportunities stemmed from online interactions.

Steph Guthrie and Heather Reilly are so disingenuous they make fabulists look truthful

Gregory Alan Elliott was denied a meaningful income for years after being banned from the internet, without even being convicted of a trumped-up crime, much less a real one.

In mid-2015, National Post columnist Christie Blatchford reported some of the big holes in Guthrie and Reilly's story. For a start, the pair were so "terrified" about Gregory Alan Elliott that they organized a meeting with associates to brainstorm ideas about how to publicly shame their new enemy. This sort of concerted effort to continue a feud is hardly the stuff of being scared for your personal safety.

Worst of all, and the thing that constitutes the biggest, non-prosecuted criminal harassment of this case, Reilly disseminated Twitter accusations by an account supposedly belonging to a 13-year-old girl that Gregory Alan Elliott was a pedophile. The mendacity of even retweeting such an accusation is beyond vile and demonstrates what sort of repulsive and narcissistic worms both Guthrie and Reilly are (remember Guthrie's hunting down of Spurr).

Surprisingly, Toronto's The Star, no friend of ROK after its slandering of Roosh last year, felt the need to report on the baseless pedophile accusations against Elliott.

A respect for this wider context cannot be said of Vice's Sarah Ratchford, who cried at length in an article about how women are apparently an endangered species online after the court decision. A friend of Guthrie's, she deliberately left out the deplorable false pedophilia accusations by Reilly, which would have greatly changed unbiased readers' view of the case and the prima donna complainants.

There was no mentioning by Ratchford of Brendalin Spurr either, particularly Guthrie's harassment in calling prospective employers and gerrymandering out of the incident the existence of the Jack Thompson game, which obliterated any pretext for calling Spurr a misogynist encouraging violence against women. Never let facts and the background get in the way of a story!

The judge made a serious mistake and falsely impugned Gregory Alan Elliott's character

"Hold on, David! He was found not guilty!" you may say. And, yes, this is good. But what is shambolic, and reflects the judiciary's willingness to believe poor evidence, is that Gregory Alan Elliott was wrongly described as "homophobic," based on a very incorrectly attributed tweet. No less than four times did the judge describe the man this way.

For us here at ROK, even if the comment were his, it would not be a big deal. The focus on what Gregory Alan Elliott was thought to have said about gays was so selective as to be morally meaningless. People say these sorts of things all the time, whether to attack people with different political views, people they simply do not like, all white men, Green Bay Packers supporters, or Jeremy Clarkson fans. Until such time as all insults against anyone are treated equally, and do not depend on any severe disdain SJWs have for you, picking out random ones is a joke.

The very astute Greg Renouf, who was in court on that day, unearthed that this was, in fact, a tweet from a fake account, which (I think) was probably created by some of the very same feminists, not necessarily Guthrie and Reilly, who wanted Elliott prosecuted. Remember, this a man who has already has his finances blown to pieces by vindictive accusations and draconian limits on his ability to derive an income, plus legal fees and the substantial attention he needed to devote to saving himself from jail. These allegations of homophobia will dent his employment prospects above and beyond their present curtailment.

This triumph should be treated cautiously

Thankfully she only gave a talk at a TEDx event, not an official TED one, but Steph Guthrie has been presented with the ability to “earn” money by falsely presenting herself as a victim.

R v Elliott was the first case of its kind and will set something of a precedent. By its very nature, though, ideas of “reasonable fears” after harassment claims are open to substantial tinkering, especially in a climate indulgent of SJWs. Notions of reasonability also reflect the society in which we live. With more and more chances for people to be narcissistic, destroy the livelihoods of social narrative critics like Gregory Alan Elliott, and promulgate demands for anti-free speech measures, mental illness-based feminist victimology is likely to become more prevalent and, sadly, “reasonable”.

Plus, the shrill screams of a Steph Guthrie or Heather Reilly crowd out the voices of the majority of people, who are too busy working, raising families, and making other productive contributions to society. These SJWs attempt to claim the mantle of spokeswomen for some wider virus of misogynistic harassment, one which is instead always either rampantly exaggerated or non-existent. If challenged vociferously, their poison can be mitigated. If not, fantasists like them will have future success in sending individuals similar to Gregory Alan Elliott straight to jail.

Be aware of these risks. Yet for now, let’s bask in the sweet rays of Guthrie and Reilly’s courtroom melting. The heat of the truth has that effect on precious snowflakes.

Read More: The Canadian Establishment Is Working With Feminists To Shut Down Roosh’s Speeches

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Truth About Multiculturalism And Third-World Immigration

January 27, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently visited Langley Park, Maryland, a city near the White House that has an 80% Hispanic population. It serves as a case study to show that multiculturalist policies transform good neighborhoods into ones that are unlivable for normal Americans, mostly thanks to the US Federal Government. Here is a video presentation of my argument:

I didn't begin making this video with an aim to bash immigrants, but it's clear that they're being used as a weapon to accomplish a sinister agenda. I can only conclude that multiculturalism is nothing more than an active program to subvert American society and its citizens.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The End Goal Of Western Progressivism Is Depopulation

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Donald Trump’s Presidential Campaign Is The Biggest Political Uprising In Decades

January 27, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

For the past week, I’ve been on the road in Iowa, covering the presidential campaigns in anticipation of the caucuses themselves on February 1st. I’ve checked out rallies and campaign appearances by major candidates such as Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders to washed-up hacks like Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson. But the biggest and most important candidate I’ve covered so far is none other than Donald Trump.

Whether you like it or not, Trump’s campaign is the strongest political upheaval in America since Ronald Reagan swept to power in 1980. I’ve attended two of Trump’s Iowa rallies so far, one in Pella on the 23rd and another in Iowa City on Tuesday, and it’s absolutely astounding how nakedly the media is lying about him. Leftist shills in the MSM and their cuckservative allies have been pushing a narrative about Trump and his supporters that borders on libelous.

While we still have a long way to go before the general election, it’s clear based on what I’ve seen that the only things that can stop Trump are a rigged nomination or an assassin’s bullet. Trump’s message resonates with a shockingly wide swath of the American public, and he’s inspired a populist uprising that won’t be going away even if he doesn’t make it to the White House.

Americans For Making America Great Again

The first thing that struck me about Donald Trump's campaign is the extent to which the media downplays attendance at his rallies, a point the Donald has raised in his speeches. At the rally in Pella (a town of only 10,000), at least 2,000-3,000 people were in attendance; in fact, two-thirds of the people in line had to be moved into an overflow auditorium, where Trump gave a second speech after he was done talking to the main group. You can watch my recording of Trump's speech here.

Trump's Iowa City speech was absolute bedlam. In contrast to the 2,000 people that the Washington Post claimed were in attendance, I'd estimate there were at least 5,000 people there, and most likely way more: the crowds were so thick where I was that I couldn't get a precise head count. In fact, Trump had to delay his speech by 45 minutes while the volunteers tried to cram as many people into the auditorium as possible, and there were still huge numbers of people who had to be sent away.

Moreover, the demographics of Trump supporters bear little resemblance to the "angry white men" stereotype pushed by the left. Both rallies attracted a wide spectrum of people: young, old, middle-aged, and roughly equal numbers of men and women. The Iowa City rally was especially skewed towards the young, with tons of cute college girls up front. In contrast, the other GOP candidates and Hillary Clinton can only draw old people to their events.

And for all the hand-wringing over the "hatred" and "rage" that Trump is supposedly stirring up, the only violence I witnessed at either rally was from anti-Trump protesters. In particular, at the Iowa City rally, leftist hecklers started throwing apples at Trump (which is assault) after he called Bernie Sanders a "communist." Additionally, infiltrators kept trying to disrupt Trump by blowing whistles. You can watch my recording of Trump's Iowa City speech below (the apple-throwing incident is at 6:31):

Outside the rally itself, a dozen misfits had set up shop, wielding signs complaining about Trump's supposed "racism." Their scruffy, lice-ridden appearance (there was even a bearded lady) was a stark contrast to the well-dressed, wholesome-looking Trump supporters. As we left the building to go back to our cars, one of them jeered at us, "Don't walk on the socialist sidewalks!"

MAKE AMERICA
GREAT:
SEND TRUMP
TO MEXICO Persons and below

TUDENTS AGAINST GOTRY
TRUMP MAKES AMERICA
HATE AGATN

Moreover, Trump's fans are enthusiastic about the man to a degree which is almost unheard of in politics; of all the candidates I've seen so far, only Bernie Sanders' supporters even come close in their fanaticism. Both rallies had the atmosphere of a rock show, with supporters mobbing the stage to get autographs and pictures with the man. At the Pella event, the audience gave Trump a standing ovation that lasted so long that he had to ask them to sit down.

Finally, Trump has expanded the conservative base to a degree that no other politician in the U.S. has done in eons. During the introductory speeches, one of Trump's campaign co-chairs asked how many people in the audience had never voted in the caucuses before. Close to half the crowd's hands went up. Trump has done the seemingly impossible: get people who are tuned out of the political process involved again, and supporting conservative principles at that.

Will Trump Win Iowa?

It’s clear that Donald Trump’s combination of nationalist, conservative policy proposals, his personal charisma and his willingness to speak the truth will carry him through the presidential primaries. But the real question is whether he can win Iowa, the only one of the early contests where he’s lagged behind: he’s been trailing Ted Cruz in the polls for the past month, though he’s been posting solid leads in the past week.

Having seen what I’ve seen, I believe that Trump is not only going to win the Iowa caucus, he’s going to do so by a convincing margin. Not only are his rallies attracting the biggest crowds, I spoke to several of his staffers at the Pella rally; his volunteers are seasoned operatives who know what they’re doing. Indeed, Trump supporters are probably underrepresented in the polls due to the fact that many have been disengaged from politics and voting.

Trump’s much-maligned move of skipping tonight’s Fox News GOP debate in Des Moines won’t hurt him one bit. The news that he wouldn’t be there broke during the Iowa City rally, and none of the people around me mentioned it at all. Not only will Fox News see a massive drop in their ratings (since Trump was the sole reason why many people watched the previous debates), the other candidates will likely spend most of the debate whining about him.

I’m going to be covering the presidential campaign in Iowa for Return of Kings for the next few days, writing daily reports on the state of the race and also covering the caucuses themselves on February 1st. While there’s still time for the winds to change direction, Iowa will almost certainly be hopping about the Trump Train.

Read More: Cuckservative Rick Wilson Melts Down In Response To Donald Trump Candidacy

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

15 Ways The TrampAdvisor App Will Revolutionize Your Dating LIfe

January 28, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

In these difficult times of empowered women, misogyny, and rape galore, there is a strong need for solutions. A man needs to know how to navigate hose troubled waters, how to avoid triggering females, and how to not accidentally behave like a shitlord. And what better way to do that than with our faithful smartphones?

Behold TrampAdvisor, a newly invented smartphone app that will revolutionize the dating world and bring men and women together. Here are the benefits of this ultimate innovation:

1. It will make the world a better place

TrampAdvisor guarantees quality sex and healthy relationships in accordance with the modern values of our global world. You just had sex? Rate the encounter, the sex, or both in detail, and then share it live to help men and women find their perfect match in the future!

2. It keeps men safe

Protect the brothers from damaged women by giving them a heads up. Some of us can't see all the signs. Or maybe they crave a challenge? Even a small comment will help!

"Lawyergrrrlll55 tried to hit me with a frying pan while my back was turned and used the word "body positive" at least three times. 1/10 WB again"

3. It helps you in your life choices

The material data will give more evidence to the general public about the true nature and goals of both sexes. Then it is up to you to analyze it and choose a blue pill or red pill way of life.

4. It saves time

It is a must for men with a busy schedule. They now can see the easiness of a girl and plan their actions carefully with the little time they have. It will also save a tremendous amount of time for women that have a successful career or important feline companions to attend to.

5. It fights rape culture

Women must be kept safe. Would rape perpetrators have the guts to post their acts on the app? Unlikely. If on Jessica's TrampAdvisor profile, none of the 395 entries (lol) by 231 men involves Christopher, her white heterosexual former hookup rapist, there is something fishy going on. We can finally celebrate regret-free drunk sex and keep law enforcement after the real culprits

6. It is focused on our clients' needs

Everyone gets what they want. Local bad boy, girl next door, pump-and-dump candidate, or virgin wife material? It will all be backed with reviews. Jenny does not like Italian guys? There is an app for that! TrampAdvisor also comes with a chart function with periods of time when a girl wants to get as much sex as she can, or prefers to settle for a good, caring man once she has had her fill.

7. It saves money

We help you save money on transport, drinks, condoms, lawsuits and countless other things! Everyone loves sex. Everyone loves a good app. Ka-ching!

8. It helps you make friends

“Oh man, did you do the angry dragon to her too? You legend!”

Find an Eskimo brother near you and bond over a beer and funny stories about your fiancee.

9. It gives a reliable source of information

You can only validate flags and notches that have been physically confirmed by a third party. There is even a ranking system. A great way to differentiate the keyboard jockeys from the real players and keep you motivated!

10. It brings together people with similar tastes

Finally something that helps guys and girls pair up with someone that will fulfill their sexual needs and fetishes! No more failed relationships—you can go ahead now that you know that she likes having her face slapped and enjoys public sex on the first outing together.

11. It reduces divorce rates

With all this data available, you will know more before risking a present or future life investment with a woman and will be able to take the right decision accordingly.

12. It is a helpful tool for forgetful women

It can be hard to balance a strong, independent lifestyle between a life of partying, yes-means-yes picketing, and memory loss. TrampAdvisor will help girls keep track of all their encounters and avoid inaccuracies about their sexual past for their future spons… husbands before the fairytale wedding.

13. It comes with geolocation

You can use it 24/7, anywhere in the world, and share tips with the locals about the women. Where did they meet? Where does she usually hang out? Was X place suitable for a date? It even comes with a map updated in real time! Everything is just a click away.

14. It genuinely empowers women

Women are proud of being strong and having multiple sexual partners. Let’s help them share their sexual exploits with the world.

15. It has a revolutionary review system

With our cutting edge technology and review options that includes the duration of the intercourse, the position preferred, or the kind of profanity used, you too could participate and give your testimony to bring the sexual marketplace to the next level and help everyone in their quest for the ideal sex partner.

"The playful brunette from last week likes it rawdog? I second that!" – Max, 23, Orange County. Was this review helpful to you?

Dibs on the idea, but we welcome the worthy minds that want to help in its creation.
A few alternative names for the app also have a nice ring to it: TwhatsApp, GineSweepHer (dodge red flags), IJustAppSex, Lubeher, ScreendHer. Give us your thoughts.

Read More: The Concept Of Chivalry Has Been Distorted To Create Subservient Men

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Frequently Asked Questions For International Meetup Day On February 6

January 28, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The tribal meeting is only 9 days away. We're meeting in 43 countries throughout the world at 8PM local time. Over a dozen meeting locations have changed since initial publication so be sure to review the full listing of meeting points along with the meeting protocol.

Here are answers to several questions I've received about the meetup:

Q: Can I bring a female friend, girlfriend, lover, or wife?
A: Absolutely not. This meeting is for heterosexual men only.

Q: Can I come if I'm a homosexual or transsexual?
A: No. This is a meeting for heterosexual men only.

Q: What should we do if a pretty girl shows up and begs to be a fly on the wall?
A: Get her number and then tell her to buzz off. Do not allow women to attend the meeting.

Q: Can I bring my son or little brother?
A: Many of the final venues will be in bars that require you to be of legal drinking age to enter (18 or 21 depending on the country). Since there is no way to tell you beforehand what the final venue is, underage males may not be suitable for the meetup.

Q: What happens if a host doesn't show up?
A: If no one claims to be hosting, the men who arrived can discuss which venue to move to at 8:20pm. The meetups are structured so that they can proceed without a host.

Q: What if I'm the only one who shows up?

A: That means your city is not yet ready for meetups. Let me know so that we can plan future meetups in larger cities within your state or province.

Q: What if crazy feminists show up?
A: Record them with your camera, upload the footage to Dropbox, and then send it to me at afterwards so we can tear them up. If accosted during the meetup, travel to the final venue in pairs or triplets using an indirect route so the final location is not compromised (make sure you are not followed). While I wouldn't mind a bit of excitement, there is currently zero chatter online that a single meetup will be disrupted.

Q: Is there is a danger I could get doxxed from a feminist?
A: The risk is extremely small (it has yet to happen that a reader of mine has been publicly doxxed from commenting or showing up to a meetup or lecture). I also think that men who are scared of feminist actions are underestimating their ability to respond firmly and without fear. Even if a feminist records your face and uploads it to Youtube, the "crime" of standing at a location in public is not enough to have a witch mob come after you that threatens your livelihood.

Q: Have the hosts been vetted? What if they are a secret feminist agent?
A: Again, this has never happened before, so the risk is minuscule. If you remain anxious or fearful of green-haired female activists or male feminists, simply don't give out your last name or company name during the meetup. At least for the meetup on February 6, high trust is not necessary since you're not giving personal information beyond emails or phone numbers.

Q: Which meetup will you be at?
A: Washington DC.

Q: Is this a white nationalist meetup?
A: No. This is a meetup for men of all races and backgrounds who read ROK and my blog. The Tribal Meeting is not a white nationalist organization.

Q: Do permanent tribes have a consistent message that ensures purity of neomasculine thought during the meetings?
A: There is no universal program. Each tribe is encouraged to interpret neomasculinity to suit their local and immediate needs. I don't know what is best for a German tribe, for example.

Q: For meetup hosts that go on to create permanent tribes, will there be a way for them to stay in touch with other tribal leaders?
A: Yes, I will create a private forum for all tribal chiefs and elders after we have ten or so tribes. We currently have four.

Q: Are you concerned that agents within the various Alphabet Soup groups (CIA, FBI, NSA, CID, NCIS, ETC) may try to infiltrate the tribal meetup?
A: The tribe is apolitical and does not attempt to challenge governmental authority, so I don't believe we'll be targeted for infiltration. That said, keep an eye on possible agent provocateurs who advocate for illegal activities out of the blue. If you have any more questions, ask them below in the comments or learn more about the Tribal Meeting concept through the announcement post.

Lastly, I ask that you share details of the meetup with friends of yours who you think may be interested. Our views are becoming known enough that we can “come out” of the shadows and not have to hide behind a computer screen for fear of retaliation. Up to now, the enemy has been able to exert their power by isolating us and attacking with shrieking mobs, but we’ll be able to neutralize that tactic by amassing in high numbers come February 6. I will exact furious retribution upon anyone who challenges you in public on that date (remember to record them). Therefore let the sixth of February be a clear signal to all that we’re not going anywhere. We have finally arrived.

Read Next: Full City Listing And Meeting Points For International Meetup Day On February 6, 2016

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Tips For Men Over 40 To Increase Testosterone

January 28, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Mark Mcilyar

My name is Mark Mcilyar, I'm the senior trainer at the number one most subscribed fitness channel on YouTube.

And as the senior trainer, I know a thing or two about getting older…

One of the biggest challenges for us older guys is to stop our fat burning metabolism from plummeting.

And if you didn't know, one of the main reasons for this metabolic drop is because your body is producing more of the female hormone – Estrogen.

Your estrogen can get so high that according to USA TODAY, 'by midlife, a man may have far more estrogen than his postmenopausal wife… That's part of the reason why heavy-set men sometimes develop swollen breast tissue.'

And because your hormone levels change so slowly, sometimes taking years and even decades, you probably won't even notice the changes until it's too late.

This is what happened to me and I didn't notice until I was 48.

After seeing a picture a friend took of me, I realized I had an extra 20 pounds of belly fat on my waist.

Now most men don't realize this but belly fat can actually cause your body to produce more estrogen. And the more estrogen you have, the more you'll struggle to be yourself.

Estrogen is responsible for things you don't want…

- Saggy Chest
- Belly Fat
- Low Sex Drive
- Erectile Dysfunction
- Brittle Bones
- Depression
- Fatigue
- Hair Loss

And it doesn't stop there… because as your belly fat and estrogen go up, your test levels get shut down!

That's why it's important to stop estrogen from rising, and to focus on keeping your testosterone at peak levels. Testosterone will keep your metabolism high which burns fat.

It will also…

- Help you building muscle
- Prevent fat storage on your body
- Control your estrogen
- Increase your focus
- Give you more energy
- Keep your bones strong
- And pump up your sex drive

And here are some ways that you can keep your estrogen low and your T high:

Reduce your drinking as much as possible

Many guys either don't drink or they go all out when they do… and this can cause low test and an estrogen boost. The ingredients used to make liquor, wine and beer come from plants and grains that contain phytoestrogens (plant estrogens). Phytoestrogens make your brain think you have high estrogen…and add fat.

Tips to reduce drinking – Set yourself a budget at the beginning of the night, and don't spend more than the cash in your wallet.This will save you a ton of money and save your testosterone.

Balance Your Intake

Too much of any type of food (protein, carbs, fats, etc) don't leave room for the necessary nutrients needed for testosterone synthesis. It's important to get a good balance of meats, veggies, fruits and hydration for optimal T production. My meals look pretty close to this each day:

- Meal option 1 – Breakfast: 5 scrambled egg whites, ½ cup oatmeal, and 1 tablespoon natural peanut butter

- Meal option 2 – Lunch: 6-8 oz chicken breast, 3/4 cup brown rice, 1 handful of broccoli.
- Meal option 3 – Dinner: 6-8 oz white fish, medium spinach salad with cucumber, cherry tomato and balsamic vinegar

Here's another 'handy' shortcut – use your 'hand portion' reference chart as you put these meals together yourself.

You don't need to bother with getting a scale, measuring and weighing each and every portion – Just remember that two closed fists is approximately 6-8 oz of protein, the palm of your hand is approximately 3-5 oz of carbohydrates and your thumb will equal 1 serving of fat. When it comes to veggies, feel free to grab a handful or two. This hand portion reference will save you a lot of time as you begin to implement more of these meals.

But the fastest and most effective way to build testosterone naturally is…

Working out with compound movements

Compound movements are training exercises that use multiple muscle groups at the same time.

The most common compound movements are the squat, deadlift and bench press.

These compound movements are effective but they can also be hard on your joints… so if you've had a back or knee injury, you'll want to start out with very light weight until you build strength and reduce pain. And most importantly make sure you are doing them with proper from.

Now if you don't know how to do them, or just not 100% sure if you are doing them right… go ahead and check out this free video I just posted showing you exactly how to perform the most effective testosterone boosting exercises.

In addition to that, you'll also learn how older guys like us can perform compound exercises to increase testosterone production naturally without getting injured.

And here are some examples of pre-workout Dynamic Stretching — Hold each posture 15-30 seconds on both sides (Repeat at least 3x):

Hip circles

Leg swings (forward and backwards)

Leg swings (side to side)

Side bends

Arm circles

These warm ups will help prevent injuries while you perform the unique compound movements that will naturally boost your testosterone today.

Train smart,

Mark

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Crazed Indian Woman Attacks Uber Driver And His Car, Faces No Legal Consequences

January 28, 2016 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

Recently, a 30 year old Indian woman living in Florida named Anjali Ramkissoon attacked an Uber driver and then started destroying his car and personal property. In spite of video evidence, she has not been charged with a crime. She was working as a neurology resident at Jackson Memorial Medical Center until they suspended her because of the incident.

I can sit here and write a long article about how entitled, spoiled, arrogant, and disgusting many women are, but just take a look at the video below and you will see for yourself the massive entitlement complex that some women suffer from:

What is it about Indian women in particular that causes them to develop such a massive entitlement complex? As Mike Cernovich pointed out in his article about this incident, both America and India are matriarchies. Only in a matriarchy would a woman feel so invincible as to attack a man because she knows the man cannot fight back, due to the anti-male matriarchal laws and legal system which favors women.

Other men have studied how the uglier or fatter a woman is, the more prone she is towards feminism. I've yet to meet even a single hot chick who is inclined towards feminist thinking. Now with this point in mind, consider the following: many men consider Indian women to be among the worst women on earth. It is Indian women's massive insecurity complex which causes their frigid and bitchy behavior, and when they get to America they are also the most extreme feminists.

What Consequences?

After viewing the above video, you can imagine what happened next. Only after the police arrived did she finally apologize and start crying, demanding a pussy pass. Later on it came out that she gave money to the driver as compensation so that he wouldn't press charges. One report I read claimed that she also tried to attack the police and was trying to kick them and resist arrest, but this is still unverified.

Anjali has taken down her Facebook, LinkedIn, Twitter, and Instagram account in the aftermath, but the Facebook page reviewing her as a medical doctor is still up and many people have taken to writing negative reviews about her.

Unfortunately, the Uber driver decided to not press charges against her. To counteract this man's cowardice, men must start holding women accountable for their bad behavior. If a woman physically attacks you, press charges. Do not give her a pussy pass. The reason women are so out of control is because men refuse to hold them accountable for their bad behaviors.

Lessons We Can Learn

This incident should serve as a warning to all men. If a woman starts getting physically aggressive towards you, or you see a woman getting physically aggressive to another man, immediately take out your phone and start recording. If the bystander had not recorded that video, there would be zero evidence to prove that the driver was innocent and he would be the one to have been arrested, while the woman would have claimed to have been getting attacked.

The days of women thinking they can behave like monsters with impunity should be over. Start publicly shaming women who act like psychopaths by capturing their psychotic behavior on camera and then uploading it to the internet for the whole world to see. If enough men started doing this, women would begin to change their behavior.

While Indian women in America may suffer the most from a spoiled entitlement complex, it's important that we shame all women who operate with an entitlement complex.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Not Date Indian Girls

John Doe
John is the creator of the famous Boycott American Women blog. Check it out here: www.BoycottBitches.com

4 Colossal Lies That Men Have Been Told Since Birth

January 29, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Men who live in modern Western liberal democracies under the influence of third wave feminism have a distorted view of reality. The analogy of “taking the red pill” is used to refer to the moment of truth where a man realizes and acknowledges these lies and distortions, which are aimed to control his actions, and makes a decision to reject them despite their popularity and near universal acknowledgement.

Thanks to ROK and the neomasculinity movement, we can share truths and observations about women, self, and society, waking up disillusioned men more rapidly and in greater numbers. Here we will examine a number of lies that men are told from an early age:

1. Men And Women Are Equal

From pushing women out of the home and into the workplace, to women sporting masculine hair, clothing, and language, to quotas designed to increase female jobs at the expense of men, we are told that men and women are equally interchangeable in the workforce. The US military recently went from having zero female generals to 69 (pun intended?). And starting January 2016, all military jobs will be open to women. But look at these profiles of women selected by the army:

Sgt. Erica Gunter

2015: The first woman of 13M Military Occupation Specialty to become a launcher chief

Then Cpl. Gunter made history when she was promoted to a corporal and assigned as a Multiple Launch Rocket System launcher chief, a position usually held by a staff sergeant. Her new position means that she is the first woman in the 13M military occupation specialty to enter the non-commissioned officer corps and be assigned as a launcher chief. While other female 13Ms have attained such status, they were all reclassified into the MOS, whereas Gunter began her career as a 13M two years ago during the second 13M Advanced Individual Training class open to women.

- Female Soldier makes launcher chief history

Maj. Chrissy Cook

2014: The first female Bradley commander to lead her crew to "Top Gun" status

Cook, an engineer officer, made history in the 1st Cavalry Division, July 8, 2014, when she led her Bradley crew to "Top Gun" status during gunnery. She led her crew to a top score of 835 with nine of 10 engagements, passed to seal "Top Gun" status, June 17. This marks a page in the history books as the Army continues to open doors to female Service members for service in direct combat roles. As an engineer, Cook's branch has long been open to males and females.

- 1st Cavalry female leads crew to historic 'Top Gun' gunnery title

Would any of these women make suitable wife material? One can only assume these are the most attractive and successful chosen by the government to portray here.

Do we want all jobs staffed by all groups? Should dwarves and midgets be eligible for firefighting jobs, or should they be encouraged to pursue a vocation that they have a natural interest or inclination in? Despite the US military stirring up problems around the world, the planet is actually a rather peaceful and stable place today, but imagine fighting Hitler's top generals with a team of women. Which side would you bet on? Of course, the focus here is always on lifting up and encouraging women to take men's jobs, never the opposite.

2. Gender Is Nonbinary And Fluid

co	co laughed	I kissed co	cos head hurts	that is co's	co feeds coself
ve	ve laughed	I kissed ver	vis head hurts	that is vis	ve feeds verself
tey, tem, ter[16]	tey laughed	I kissed tem	ter head hurts
tey	tey laughed	I kissed tem	term head hurts	that is terms	term feeds termself
ze	ze laughed	I kissed zim	zees head hurts	that is zees	ze feeds zeeself
per[17]	per laughed	I kissed per	pers head hurts	that is pers	per feeds perself
na	na laughed	I kissed nan	nas head hurts	that is nas	na feeds naself
en	en laughed	I kissed ar	es head hurts	that is es	en feeds arself
rim	rim laughed	I kissed run	ris head hurts	that is ris	rim feeds rimself.
ae	ae laughed	I kissed ae	ae's head hurts	that is ae's	ae feeds aeself
et	et laughed	I kissed et	ets head hurts	that is ets	et feeds etself
heshe	heshe laughed	I kissed hen	hes head hurts	that is hes	heshe feeds hemself
hann	hann laughed	I kissed hann	hanns head hurts	that is hanns	hann feeds hannself
herm	herm laughed	I kissed herm	herm's head hurts	that is herm's	herm feeds hermself
phe	phe laughed	I kissed phe	phe's head hurts	that is phe's	phe feeds phe's self

After Dr. John Money created the idea of gender, we are at the point today where Facebook offers up to 71 options for describing one's gender (the fact that most of them are simply rearranging words or using synonyms should make it obvious that this is a joke). We are told that we must ignore our eyes and not assume what pronouns we should used when speaking to a person. While some new words have been invented by SJWs like ze, ey, and tey, their hamsters have not processed how one is supposed to align 71 different genders to only 5 or 6 pronouns for those genders.

Science defines two sexes: the XX chromosome and the XY chromosome. The only other possible combination, YY, (technically XYY since the X chromosome will always be present) is a rare genetic defect where the man (yes, still a man) will have a higher likelihood learning disability and lower mental faculties. But even this does not create a third gender—the person is always a man. There are rare cases of intersex or hermaphrodites, or people born with birth defects that do not have functioning sexual organs, but they are merely lacking something to make them a full man or woman, and are not a distinct third group. There are only two sexes: male and female.

The goal of all this is to eliminate any sort of patriarchy, because while any binary group can have certain roles ascribed to it, there can be no such organization if instead of two main categories humans are separated into a diverse group of 71, which lack any true defining characteristics and can even change on a day to day basis.

Of course, many of these behaviors, (can we say 71 gendered "multiple personality disorder"?) are textbook examples of mental illness, and indeed Dr. Paul McHugh, Distinguished Service Professor of Psychiatry and former psychiatrist in chief for Johns Hopkins, has stated that transgenderism is a mental disorder, sex change is biologically impossible, and "policy makers and the media are doing no favors either to the public or the transgendered by not treating transgender confusions … as a mental disorder that deserves understanding, treatment and prevention."

This is important because it was Johns Hopkins, under Dr. John Money's clinic in the 70s, who pioneered the ideas of gender and performed groundbreaking surgeries and treatments in sex operations, until "at Hopkins we stopped doing sex-reassignment surgery, since producing a 'satisfied' but still troubled patient seemed an inadequate reason for surgically amputating normal organs," said Dr. McHugh. The goal is destruction of male power and influence, and the removal of any remaining vestiges of the "patriarchy."

3. Democracy Is Great

Most politicians can't get through a talk without praising the idea of how wonderful democracy is. This is never explained or quantified, but merely stated or implied as a certain fact. However, democracy is basically an experiment that allowed a more liberal government, but failed to provide enough protections against social change, greed, financial mismanagement, and war. Suffice it to say that the wave of democracies which have swept across most nations over the past 100 years have failed to produce a better society.

But let's examine this further. If democracy is indeed so great, isn't there something wrong with a country of 320 million where only 36.3% of "eligible voters" (a group that itself excludes large groups of Americans) turned out to vote in the last election? If democracy is so good that we must spend trillions of dollars and tens of thousands of lives to ensure people who don't have or want it, get it, aren't we failing at a fundamental level when the vast majority of Americans are not participating in this democracy?

Nowhere else do we abdicate power and responsibility to the simple will of the masses (masses who would support things like slavery, genocide, drug use, war, debt forgiveness, taxation, etc.). Schools are taught by educated (appointed) teachers with training and skill in teaching methods, public speaking, and knowledge in their subject area, not by a popular vote of the students or their parents. Companies are run by (appointed) executives and bosses, many of whom would NEVER win a popularity contest if leadership was selected by a democratic vote. Churches are run by (appointed) pastors, who have knowledge in their religion's holy text, public speaking skills, a background in philosophy, and often humor, not by a common vote of parishioners. They impart lessons from their religion's core values, and not merely those which the churchgoers want to hear about (otherwise every lesson would be about forgiveness and how everyone is going to heaven).

Families were in the past non-democratically lead primarily by the man, or at least by the two parents, who make the important decisions for the household, not by putting things up to a vote to the entire family. Outside a few social organizations and charitable bodies, where do we use the principle of democracy in life to accomplish anything? Democracy has never been proven to produce good ideas or results, but is being used because it is a tool to remove power and influence from men.

4. Women Are Precious Little Snowflakes

Even while women have redefined themselves as butch, buzz cut wearing, cursing, tattooed, pierced, masculine, empowered career drones who can slut around as much as they want until they decide to settle down with a nice guy, they have somehow been able to retain this idea that they are the gentler sex. This is despite evidence that they are the more violent physical aggressors in domestic disputes, and certainly the more emotionally manipulative. According to them, they must be wined and dined and pleased and catered to at all times, they are better parents, they would make better leaders, and they should be courted and spoiled the way our grandfathers would treat a lady.

Although remember, they are not responsible for their actions and if they drink alcohol that they legally buy at a bar, a place that exists as a location where single men and women can go to meet each other and grease the wheels for sexual interaction. This can now be equated to violently raping her if she is unhappy afterwards.

Men are the more romantic sex, writing practically all love poems, songs, art, coming up with a constant supply of jokes and entertainment to keep the girl laughing and happy and entertained, funding her large appetite for food and drink, are less likely to divorce her after marriage (30% man initiated vs 70% female initiated). Anecdotally, the husband failing to pay the bills and uphold his masculine duties is a lot more rare than the woman who withholds sex and ignores her household duties. There is an abundance of evidence that men are more loving, caring, empathetic, romantic, and emotional than women.

I can count on my pinky finger the number of times a woman has done something romantic or creative for me, and that was in high school. I don’t imagine that any of my exes ever think about me. Women have an ability to completely forget past emotions and shared experiences, or more likely they were never that close to you in the first place. And yet so many betas fall into the trap of continuing to be the nice guy because of the lie they are told that women are sweet, innocent, chaste, and pure and must be honored and respected and forgiven.

These men will play the nice guy for years if not decades, be cuckolded, be divorced raped, and pay for alimony and child support for decades. The end result of this lie is increased hypergamy and destruction of the male-led family unit, combined with financial funding of a woman’s childish lifestyle.

Conclusion

Obviously, men are told a variety of lies in the West. Men, in their good nature, are manipulated and their emotions used against them in order to create a society that subverts the natural order. The first step toward understanding is to observe and acknowledge these lies. Many men, frustrated with their interactions with western women, find great resonance with the truths taught here at ROK. As men study and learn game, and see its effects, they begin to see the lies that have been fomented about the sexes. As we acknowledge these false statements for the lies that they are, we spread awareness and attempt to return society to the path of a cohesive, developing civilization.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Why Donald Trump's Veterans' Rally In Des Moines Was A Resounding Success

January 29, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last night, Donald Trump revolted against Fox News' attempt to set a trap for him by skipping their GOP presidential debate, instead hosting a special rally for veterans at Drake University in Des Moines. I was able to snap up a ticket and attend the rally, and it was not only a fantastic experience, but it was also political masterstroke on Trump's part. With this move, Trump has firmly established that he is in the driver's seat and everyone else—the media, the GOP, and his haters—are just along for the ride.

As I mentioned in my last dispatch, because Trump was the primary ratings draw for the presidential debates, the news networks need him more than he needs them. His refusal to attend Fox's debate was a power play to show them this. Fox News was so desperate to get Trump to rejoin the debate that they not only had Bill O'Reilly beg Trump on air to change his mind, Roger Ailes tried to get his wife and daughter to pressure him into it.

Traditional presidential candidates like Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz need TV exposure in order to build their brands and get their message out to voters. Donald Trump's presidential campaign has been built on his ability to connect with people through Twitter and other social media. Much like how self-publishing allows authors to avoid the gatekeepers of the publishing world and market directly to their fans, Trump has shown that the media's ability to make or break presidential candidates has greatly diminished.

Support The Troops

Unlike the other Trump rallies I've attended, I didn't make plans to arrive at this one early, because I assumed that turnout would be lower due to it being announced at the last minute. Boy, that was a mistake. I drove by the Sheslow Auditorium at Drake where the rally was taking place around 4:15 pm (45 minutes before the doors opened) and there was already a huge crowd lined up.

While the initial crowd waiting to see Trump was only about 150 people strong, the line kept growing; an hour later, I estimate there were 3,000 or more people in line based on what I saw and what others were telling me. The line to get in the auditorium stretched back for seven or eight blocks. Because the auditorium could only seat about 1,000, most of the attendees had to be turned away, though some of them watched the rally on a TV the Trump campaign set up outside.

Inside the rally, the atmosphere was similar to the University of Iowa rally I attended on Wednesday, if not as chaotic. Beyond the cheering crowds and array of media cameras (Trump later compared it to the Academy Awards), the rally was also marked by special guest appearances by presidential candidates Mike Huckabee and Rick Santorum (the latter of which I shook hands with). Trump stated he had also invited other candidates to his rally, a move that gives him the moral high ground and makes it clear that his problem is with Fox News alone.

Indeed, the mood of the rally was more casual than the previous ones I've attended. In addition to opening with a prayer, the Pledge of Allegiance, and a performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner," Trump also yielded the floor to guests such as Diamond and Silk. Additionally, Trump was able to raise $6 million for veterans' causes, an impressive amount considering—again—the rally had only been announced 24 hours previously. You can watch part of Trump's speech (as well as Huckabee's and Santorum's) below:

American Pravda

As I was discussing with a friend after the rally, the media's lies about Donald Trump and his supporters are starting to shock even me. For example, this article claims that Trump was forced to leave his Iowa City rally early because of a hostile crowd throwing tomatoes at him. I was at that rally, and not only was the crowd enthusiastic about Trump (protesters numbered about 20 at most), but Trump didn't leave the rally early: he stayed behind to sign autographs and shake peoples' hands.

It's getting to the point where the American press has more in common with that of communist Russia than the media of a supposedly "free" nation. Donald Trump's populist presidential campaign represents a serious threat to the established order. While both the left and cuckservatives had hoped that the Donald would be a flash in the pan, his continued dominance at the polls has them in panic mode.

In any event, the likelihood of the Trump Train derailing any time soon is slim. I'm going to continue reporting on the situation in Iowa all the way through Monday's caucuses, but it's looking like the Donald has this one in the bag.

Read More: Donald Trump's Presidential Campaign Is The Biggest Political Uprising In Decades

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

How Common Core Is Turning A Generation Of Americans Into Idiots

January 29, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Now that it is presidential election season, we constantly hear the politicians tell us how broken the US education system is. One of the solutions that is supported by the Democrats and some of the Republicans is “Common Core.” Common Core is a national standard that dictates what children in grades K-12 should know at the end of each grade. The standard was announced in 2009 and it has been adopted by almost every state.

While the idea behind Common Core seems reasonable, in practice it is just one more heavy-handed government social engineering project on America’s children. Here are some of the reasons you should oppose Common Core even if you don’t happen to have any children of your own:

1. Common Core doesn’t address the real problem with US education

The US spends more per pupil on education than any other country, yet the US trails continues to trail other developed countries in virtually every category.

Politicians and educational “experts” put the blame on various things: teachers, parents, teacher unions, and lack of funding for poor schools. They all agree that we need higher standards and more testing.

But the elephant in the room that all these solutions are ignoring is the fact that blacks and Hispanics score lower on standardized tests than white students. The less white the US becomes, the worse its performance gets in comparison to other nations. Linsday Cook wrote in US News and World Report:

> American education is rife with problems, starting with the gaping differences between white students and students of color: More than 60 years after Brown vs. Board of Education, school systems in the United States are separate and unequal. By 2022, the number of Hispanic students in public elementary and secondary schools is projected to grow 33 percent from the 2011 numbers. The number of multi-racial students is expected to grow 44 percent.
>
> As the percentage of white students in our education shrinks and the percentage of students of color grow, the U.S. will be left with an education system that doesn’t serve the majority of its children properly; the gaps in education will prove especially problematic.

Until Americans are willing to have an honest conversation about the differences between various groups of people we are going to waste money implementing various silver bullets to fix the wrong problem. Because Common Core does nothing to address this issue, it is destined to be another expensive debacle, like all prior attempts to fix US education.

2. Common Core enables a tiny cadre of people to engineer all US education

In theory, national educational standards shouldn’t be controversial. After all, the federal government is supposed to want the best for its citizens.

But we are all aware that it is no longer the case. The Obama Administration has been notorious in using government power to reward friends and punish enemies. For example, it appears that the IRS targeted Tea Party groups for special scrutiny. And the Administration has stoked the fires of racial hatred by exploiting events such as the shootings of Trayvon Martin and Michael Brown. The Republicans are little better. The Trump candidacy has exposed how deeply the Republican Party is beholden to a small donor class whose interests often conflict with those of middle class Americans.

Keeping Common Core in place allows a small group of people in the federal government to control the nation's schools. It doesn't take a lot of imagination to see how this type of centralized control can be used to impose politically-favored ideas onto our children.

3. Common Core results in a windfall for test publishers and other vendors

For whatever reason, American teachers and administrators are especially gullible to jumping on the latest fad. Educators are constantly trying to find that silver bullet that will make all the children above average. It could be a new way of teaching math, a new technology like iPads, or different ways of organizing classrooms.

Because of this insatiable desire for novelty, there is no shortage of private companies who line up to peddle their wares as the latest in making cognitively challenged children into the next Einstein. It's a big, lucrative business. Common Core is no different. Because it calls for incessant testing, test publishing companies like Pearson are big proponents of Common Core. They are getting a huge windfall.

It is not just test publishing companies. There are all sorts of institutions that are lining up at the Common Core trough. Politicians are also poised to benefit. Presidential candidate Jeb Bush started the Foundation for Educational Excellence, which advocates for the adoption of Common Core. It turns out that the foundation has been the beneficiary of Gates Foundation dollars for their advocacy. Americans should be skeptical of any expensive new educational program, especially if it has dubious results.

4. Common Core has not been tested

One of the benefits of the US federal system is that states can conduct experiments without affecting the rest of the country. Colorado's legalization of pot is one such experiment. The rest of the country can observe what is happening in Colorado before choosing to legalize or not.

It is the same for education. Several years ago, California decided it was going to try to teach reading without using phonics. It turned out to be an abysmal failure, but it only affected California students. Then entire country did not have to pay the price for some politician's hairbrained ideas. This was not the case with Common Core. It was foisted upon the whole country with the exception of four states. As usual, the federal government offered billions of dollars of grant money for states that adopted the new standards—before it had a chance to be tested in a small, controlled environment.

Common Core advocates say that the program was "internationally benchmarked." It sounds impressive. Unfortunately, what they mean is that the creators of Common Core only looked at the standards of other countries. It does not mean that they compared their actual results to the results of other countries.

Common Core was an ambitious creation, but there is no evidence that it will have better results than what was in place before. In fact, it may result in poorer results. Putting an untested program into place in the entire country was a reckless decision.

5. Common Core dumbs down the math curriculum

One of the unstated goals of the developers of Common Core was to better prepare students to be corporate office drones. So they surveyed CEOs at various companies about the various qualities that a good corporate drone would possess. The interesting thing is that this resulted in Common Core dropping parts of the math curriculum including "calculus and pre-calculus, about half of Algebra II, and parts of geometry."

Critics pointed out that this would make college-bound students less prepared to enter a university STEM program. It turns out that preparing students for STEM was never the purpose of Common Core. Rather, it appears that Common Core is not aiming at students who are in the upper tail of the bell curve. Its purpose is to prepare students for "community college, university, technical/vocational program[s], apprenticeship[s], or significant on-the-job training."

This probably will not hurt intelligent students in wealthy school districts. Those districts will continue to offer these courses. However, poor school districts may forego offering the higher math courses and still be considered Common Core compliant. Thus, highly intelligent students in poor districts may be cheated out of adequate college preparation.

Conclusion

There may be some beneficial aspects to the Common Core standards, but the corrupt nature of US politics, the untested nature of the program, and Americans' unwillingness to confront unpleasant truths make Common Core a bad idea at the present time.

Read More: The 7 Most Common Lies Women Tell In A Relationship

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The Real Reason Minimum Wage Must Be Raised To $15 An Hour

January 30, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Recent wage increases in Seattle and New York have ignited a protest movement pressuring the federal government to enforce a $15 per hour minimum wage nationwide. Repeatedly, we have heard from Obama and other politicians that "It is impossible to raise a family on the minimum wage." Fair-minded conservatives and libertarians have asked the reasonable question why someone would choose to raise a family while working an unskilled job meant for teenagers.

In fact, it is because these jobs require no skills that we should support the increase. In this article I will provide two important reasons why we must all support Obama's mission to boost the minimum wage.

Eliminate Customer Service

They won’t forget your extra pickles.

The first and most important reason to support the minimum wage hike is obvious: So that we no longer have to deal with customer service. Recently, I was in Paris in order to enjoy what remains of Western Europe before the collapse. While walking past a McDonald’s I saw something that forever changed my position on the minimum wage: automated machines to order food.

If the minimum wage suddenly doubled, a huge layoff would sweep across the nation. Instead of paying unskilled workers an inflated $15 per hour, businesses would turn to automated labor to offset the costs. Any initial costs incurred to invest in machines would be well worth the long-term gains of not having to deal with human employees. A machine doesn’t demand unreasonable wages, it won’t fuck up your order, and you don’t have to pay for its healthcare.

In a study published by the Manhattan Institute, researchers found that lifting the minimum wage to $15 an hour would negatively impact 55 million workers and incur a loss of 6.6 million jobs. And what would replace them? Machines.

Your pizza won't be late.

McDonald's has already implemented automated machines in the U.S. "to make it easier for customers to order and pay for food digitally and to give people the ability to customize their orders." That is corporate-speak for "we're doing it for you, but we're really doing it for us." If McDonald's, a leading global franchise, sees profits rise as a result of this business decision, you can rest assured that other businesses will follow suit.

The online retail giant Amazon has announced their drone delivery system. This will fundamentally alter the way online business operate. Executives have been boasting that in some cases their drones will deliver in 30 minutes or less.

Walmart, another giant, has admitted that they will further experiment with mechanized labor. When their CFO was asked about this specific issue, he responded that Walmart "will always look for more efficiencies in our stores and in our supply chain and in our costs." Imagine that, a business looking to cut costs. Recently, Walmart announced they are closing 269 stores.

Obamacare paid for my virus scan.

Wendy's, famous for their square burgers and the red-haired girl who can legally consent to sexual acts, has also turned to alternatives in the face of higher minimum wage demands. Their CFO has said Wendy's will:

> Look at initiatives and how we work to offset any impacts of future wage inflation through technology initiatives, whether that's customer self-order kiosks, whether that's automating more in the back of the house in the restaurant. And you'll see a lot more coming on that front later this year from us.

A brief recap: President Obama fans the flames of the masses clamoring for wage hikes. In response, businesses move to automated labor to cut costs and increase profits. If this was intentional, Obama is a fraud. If it was not intentional, Obama is an intellectual midget. You do the math.

Why You Should Support The Hike

A robot won’t spit herpes into your coffee.

Most people absolutely detest interacting with customer service. Once in a while you’ll get lucky and interact with a cute girl. More often than not, you’ll be dealing with a recent arrival from El Salvador or a vaguely homosexual guy with a lisp taking your order. The other day I ordered a pizza and the delivery person was not a cute girl. It was a 51-year-old man from a nation unknown reading my receipt to me in broken English while his sedan leaked a Rorschach test of fluids onto my driveway. If a drone replaced this guy because of a minimum wage hike, I think we’d all support it.

If you hate smiling at the bipolar barista on antidepressants taking your order, dealing with the heavyset lesbian checking your tickets at the football game, and shouting repeatedly into the speaker at the drive-thru because the fat chick on the other end is snapping SIF pictures for Tinder, this reform is for you. These unskilled workers will get their raise, and it’ll come with simple instructions to install updates on their replacement before they turn in their apron and name tag.

Reduce Immigration

My last shower was during Ramadan— Get in.

This leads to the second reason why we must support increasing the minimum wage: less immigration. More and more jobs are being outsourced right in our own country to people who can't speak America's native language of English and do not respect its native culture. This is because they'll work for low wages doing unskilled work.

Imagine the benefits of replacing the foreign cab drivers in major U.S. cities with self-driving Ubers. Rather than listening to Ahmed scream into his Bluetooth about how his 9-year-old daughter is finally ready for marriage, you could listen to smooth jazz brought to you by Spotify, all while saving money.

Say hello to the future.

Once the Third World learns that they can’t get a job washing cars or mopping floors because the robots have taken over, the border issue will solve itself. Between that and Donald Trump’s wall, the future already looks brighter. Bring on the $15 minimum wage, we’re ready.

Read More: How I Raised Myself From Failure To Success In Selling

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

What Is The Essential Purpose Of Prayer?

January 30, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Just as reverence becomes instinctual to man, we find that man also has the instinct to draw near to the Source of his being, to transcend himself. We perceive that God is closer to us than we are to ourselves, communicating being to us; thus, man acknowledges that whatever fear he may have of God, he cannot escape from himself, and his self is sustained at its root by God. We cannot escape; therefore, the only question is one of rightly relating to Him.

What is prayer?

As usual, I speak in terms of my Tradition, which I uphold as True; but others will be able to see how they apply to themselves; and certain of the more philosophical principles that shall be discussed in connection with the Theological Virtues, deal with truths of reason that apply universally.

There are levels of prayer. Today we will start with the general idea of prayer, and explore some of the simplest forms of prayer. I will follow, in large part, the discussion of the great Dominican priest, Fr. Garrigou-Lagrange. He defines prayer:

> Prayer is an elevation of the soul to God, by which we temporally will that, which God eternally wills for us to seek from Him – namely, the various means of salvation, and chiefly progress in charity.

There is a lot to unpack, here. First, nothing in the above definition requires us to pray in words; prayer is an elevation of the soul that seeks conformity with God's will. The Curé of Ars gave the example of a French peasant, whom he often observed gazing intently at the Eucharist, without moving or mouthing any words, for long periods of time. The Curé asked him what prayers or thoughts he composed to God at this time. "Oh, I don't say anything; I just look at Him, and He looks at me." The chief end of man is the Beatific Vision—the gaze into the Infinite God, penetrating ever deeper into layers of beauty and perfection that can never cease to build one upon another. Thus, the simple gaze of the soul upon God is already a temporal conformity of the will with the eternal end God wills for us.

Lagrange comments:

> This is that interior prayer which was so often the prayer of the Christians of the catacombs and of all the Saints, long before modern treatises on meditation.

He goes on to explain that, for beginners, sometimes formulated prayers are helpful and even necessary—indeed, our Lord gave the Paternoster (the Lord's Prayer)—because they help to focus a mind that may otherwise wander without words, and because they form the soul in the proper attitude and content of prayer. But if we allow formal and rote prayers to become long-winded, complex, etc., the simplicity of good prayer can often be lost. The Latin rite of the Church, especially, has tried to keep prayer simple, concise, and penetrating; it had a proverb: brevis oratio caelum penetrat – "a short prayer pierces heaven."

Holy Tradition encourages the custom of meditating on these concise prayers, such as the Lord's Prayer; this way, whenever one prays them, all the fruits of our rumination upon the prayer can be recalled in the brief time it takes to say them. For example, saying the Lord's Prayer will evoke a rich panoply of sublime truths, if one says it after internalizing the fruits of such a meditation as this one.

Second, Fr. Garrigou-Lagrange's definition upholds the sovereignty of God. Many people wonder what the point of prayer is. Are we really going to change God's mind? Does He alter His perfect will and grant us what we want, instead, if we ask this of Him? Of course not. Two things are clear, here: first, the point of prayer is not to ask for any old thing we want (Lord, let the Cardinals win the Superbowl!). God has willed, that many of the things He wills shall come about through secondary causes such as our prayers. In our prayers, we strive to conform to His will. We will for "the means of salvation."

Some material means of salvation may be granted at varying times and amounts – food, shelter, clothing, good health, etc. The most important of the means of salvation, however, is grace, which heals the soul and leads to an increase of virtues, especially that of charity. "Charity" is used nowadays in a weak sense; but really it is from Latin caritas, a translation of the Greek ἀγάπη (agape), which is perfect, self-sacrificing love. Because grace, charity, final perseverance, etc., are indispensable means of salvation, we know that if we pray for these things, they are infallibly granted. But, we must actually pray for them, and not merely wish for them. What is the difference?

Prayer and the theological virtues

A wish is a natural desire, but prayer is a supernaturally inspired and completed act.

"In order that it be an uplifting of the whole soul to God, prayer must be preceded by an act of humility, and must proceed from the three, Theological Virtues."

The Theological Virtues are so called, because they are given by God and have God for their object ("theos" = God, in Greek). I will discuss them briefly, but for one to really understand them, he will have to do more reading. I will recommend Fr. Garrigou-Lagrange's teaching, here.

The Theological virtues are Faith, Hope and Charity. The three of them really operate together, and there is a kind of unity between them. Indeed, where St. Paul speaks of faith, he mentions the unity of spiritual activity derived from it in a manner that includes all three Theological Virtues. “Without faith it is impossible to please God. For he that cometh to God, must believe that He is [Faith], and is a rewarder [Hope] to them that seek Him [Charity]” (Hebrews 6:11). They that seek, find; and this is why “these three abide: Faith, Hope and Charity; but the greatest of these is Charity” (1 Corinthians 13:13). Faith shall yield to sight, and Hope shall yield to fulfilment, but Charity increases forever.

In the more perfect, the fundamental acts of religion involved in prayer, seem to happen more or less simultaneously. Lagrange discusses them separately for the sake of beginners, so that we may understand more clearly what is happening in prayer.

Humility chips away at pride, which is the obstacle to God’s grace. “When we begin to converse with God, we should remember what we are. Of ourselves we can do nothing, and even less than nothing, for sin is a disorder inferior even to nothingness itself.” Bearing within ourselves something worse than nothingness, let us not presume; let us approach God with humility.

That done, we approach God in an act of faith, which can be a reflection on God Himself, His perfections and qualities, revealed truths and even our vocations and duties in life relative to God. “It is not necessary to spend much time in discursive thought, for the simple act of theological faith is superior to this. It becomes more and more a simple gaze,” as we saw with the peasant, earlier. “This ‘I believe’ seems at times to become an ‘I see;’ we see the fountain of life from afar.”

From this, arises hope; we see the fountain of water, now we long to drink of it. “As the hart panteth after the fountains of living water, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God.” What we see, we desire; we hope to attain unto it.

From this, we reflect that the Desired is good in Itself, not merely because of the benefit to us. We love the Good for its own sake, beyond thought of reward. “If in this act of love our feelings offer us their inferior assistance, we should accept it; it may be useful, if it remains subordinated, but it is not necessary since it vanishes in times of spiritual aridity. We are rather speaking of a calm but profound affection, which is surer and richer than superficial emotions. It expresses itself somewhat in this manner: ‘My God, I no longer wish to lie, saying that I love Thee; grant rather that I may love Thee and please Thee in all things.” Thus, this charity moves beyond the merely affective, and into the effective: a charity that is willing to strive to please its Object.

For many, especially beginners, this may still seem abstract. Next week, we will go over some formal prayers in the Christian Tradition, something a bit more tangible. But the point of all this is twofold:

1. To show what the heart of prayer is; the pure act of raising the soul to God and conforming our will with Him, humbly gazing on Him with the eyes of faith, desiring and hoping to attain the good we behold in Him, and moving beyond even the thought of reward, to love Him for the Good that He is, in and of Himself, with a love that is willing to endure what it must to be pleasing to Him.

2. To prepare us to see what should transpire in the soul, beyond the mere recitation of words, when we pray with formal prayers. With practice, prayer with words can prepare us for the simple, absolute form of prayer, if it seems too abstract at first.

Read More: Why Is Modern Christianity So Wimpy?

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

5 Reasons You Shouldn’t Feel Guilty About European Colonialism

January 30, 2016 | by Art Baker | Link | Original Link

With Australia Day come and gone, I found myself getting into many an argument with people on Facebook about the very thing we celebrate every year (and take a very welcomed day off work because of). For those of you who do not know, Australia Day celebrates the anniversary of the 1788 arrival of the first fleet of British ships on its shores. There would be no issue with this, if the country wasn’t already populated with native Aboriginal Australians who had their own culture, spirituality, and customs that took a massive shock with the arrival of white settlers.

This, along with a myriad of controversial actions often involving bloodshed, created a dichotomy of people (and Facebook friends). One side, feverish with national pride, the other, obsessed with the crimes of the past, mainly of Western culture’s influence on the native populace and the “theft” of their land.

This latter group has replaced Australia day with phrases such as “Invasion Day” and “Survival Day,” and we have seen similar movements in the United States and Britain for analogous holidays. Are they valid in their evaluation? I mean, how can you deny that there was once an area of land with people already living in it, that other people settled into and overwhelmed, often using force to push their own beliefs and culture onto?

The answer is you cannot—there are, however, certain truths that these groups conveniently gloss over which paint a much more balanced and realistic view of the situation.

1. If it were not for the British, it was only a matter of time before someone else “invaded” Australia

Colonization was the name of the game back in that day. Almost all powerful nations were doing it to some extent, the most notable players being the Dutch, Spanish, Portuguese, Britain, and France. If the British did not colonize Australia, it was simply a matter of time before someone else did. Yes, it is possible that life could have been better for the Aboriginal people under a different rule, but it’s also quite possible life would have been significantly worse.

It’s something we will never know, but one thing we can be certain of is that sooner or later, someone was going to lay claim to that land and the lacking technological development of the native culture sealed their destiny. Furthermore, colonizing wasn’t exclusively a “white” people thing to do, as you can see in the photo above.

2. Aboriginal people practiced “colonization” too

They simply lacked the technology to be as effective as the evil Westerners. When the people who protest these holidays look at native cultures, they do it with rose-colored glasses. Some go as far to ignore well documented facts like the Inca's taste for blood and sacrifice, or Native American's slavery practices. Others accept some bloodshed between the different tribes, but cite their relatively small scale as evidence of how horrible the English were compared to the mostly peace loving, native clans.

The reality is that "colonization" and bloodshed was not held back among native tribes because of lack of will, but simply the lack of technology to do so. Around Australia it is demonstrated well by the "Musket Wars" where Mauri (Native tribes from New Zealand) exchanged Muskets for goods from settlers and proceeded to "colonize" the land of the tribes next to them, causing massive casualties and sometimes whipping out whole tribes completely.

What made Australian Aboriginals more placid was not only their lack of killing efficiency, but also their harsh environment. While clashes among tribes occurred, even minor losses of strong hunting males could mean the destruction of tribes on both sides of the conflict.

3. Lack of development created cultural practices that were far from ideal

Lack of food and technological advances led to some less than desirable practices. Cannibalism is well documented among native cultures around the world. Australian Aboriginals were not exempt. In cases of extreme disparity, a practice of population control was utilized where a newborn baby was placed on a rock and had their head bashed in. The original pro-choice option.

While we can make an excuse for such things as harsh necessities, we can safely say that after 2000 or so years in Australia and having the largest technological claim to fame being a stick that returns back to you, that without an injection of Western farming techniques, those practices would most likely have continued for hundreds if not thousands of years more. How many lives would have been claimed if their island was simply forgotten and allowed to continue untouched by Western hands?

4. Australian Aboriginals were complete misogynists

And not in the airy-faerie way this term is used today. Australian Aboriginals literally saw women as property, to be traded, beaten, or raped on a whim. These are traditional practices that echo in the Aboriginal treatment of women today. Bess Nungarrayi Price, an Aboriginal activist, truthfully said that > ...individual human rights are a Western invention. And that there are many rich and educated white people who would rather Aboriginal people lived with daily violence, poverty and ignorance in order to maintain their idea of what Aboriginal culture should be.

This inconvenient, debated, but very well documented truth is one of the best arguments for a Westernised Australia. Particularly because the group that reaches for the blinders when it comes to Native cultures is composed mostly of leftists and feminists. Native Australians had a real rape culture, a culture that quickly expresses itself in rural communities where parents of children will often feel safer when their kids are locked up in a white fella's prison.

Arranged marriages, beatings, sex and rape of minors are common practice when Aboriginals are left to their own devices. On one hand, these are simply traditions, the way things were done before the white man came. Bleeding heart leftists scream for something to be done when another 12-year-old girl gets beaten and raped by a relative, yet refuse to acknowledge what makes this scenario a common occurrence, and viciously attack anyone stating some semblance of truth.

For more information about the topics covered, here are some videos and articles I recommend to get you started:

- Musket Wars
- Bess Nungarrayi Price
- Aboriginal violence
- Culture of abuse

But even if after doing ample research on the topic you cannot see anything positive what so ever from the British “invasion” of Australia, there is one lesson from history you should take on board and apply in our current time.

5. Aboriginal culture was overrun because they lacked the ability to control their borders and property rights

The English, in essence, were just another clan whose culture shadowed that of the current one. Currently, Europe is being flooded with "refugees." A clan of people who hold different cultural practices to those in the land mass that they are traveling to. The impact of this cultural "invasion" will be determined by the size and the intensity of the population.

If Aboriginal Australians had the ability to control their borders, they could still allow for white settlers, but only letting in so many as to adopt their way of life. Using common sense and lacking political correctness, they would have noted that a refugee from a certain region, such as natives from New Zealand, would more readily adapt to their culture. Hence, they could select which cultures to allow in larger numbers, and which would need more time to acclimatize themselves.

The West has this ability to protect its borders, yet lacks the blessing of the elites to implement this control. Hence, for better or for worse its culture will be challenged as was the Aboriginal. Will the current Western culture change for better or worse with the impact it faces? To guess, one must view both sides without rose covered glasses or the deep seated self-hatred of anything white or Western perpetuated by the political left.

Read More: Why The Native Peoples In Australia Were Doomed

Art Baker

Art is a reformed leftist, redistributing wealth from the rich to the poor via drugs and prostitutes, he now crusades against feminism, socialism and political correctness. From Monday to Wednesday he identifies as female to perv on girls in public restrooms. Visible Text

How Jeb Bush Destroyed The Bush Dynasty And Tanked His Own Campaign

January 31, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Poor Jeb Bush. At the beginning of this campaign, he was ready to take the GOP's reins, wash out the bad taste left by his brother's presidency, and save America from the menace of Hillary Clinton. Much like John McCain in 2008 and Mitt Romney in 2012, he assumed he'd knock out his conservative challengers easily, allowing the Republicans to present an "electable" face to the voting public. Then that big jerk Donald Trump came out of nowhere and sent Jeb's poll numbers straight into the abyss.

Jeb Bush was quite literally the chosen candidate of the GOP establishment. Much in the same way that the DNC tried to rig their nomination to ensure Hillary's victory, the structure of the Republican nomination was engineered to elect Jeb Bush. By recruiting joke candidates such as Lindsey Graham with strong support in individual primaries to split the anti-Jeb vote, Jeb would be able to win primaries and caucuses with as little as 25% support. Unfortunately for the GOP's power brokers, Trump's entry into the race completely ruined their plan.

I attended a Jeb Bush Countdown to Caucus rally in Sioux City on Friday afternoon, mainly because Jeb was the last major candidate I needed to cover, and the experience was incredibly depressing. Even if the Donald hadn't completely smoked the GOP's best-laid plans, Jeb would have zero chance of winning the general election. Everything about his campaign reeks of death and hopelessness.

Nursing Home Residents For Jeb

The first thing I noticed about the Jeb Bush rally was how empty it was. I arrived around 3pm, when the doors were scheduled to open, and there were less than 20 people there, including the volunteers. Not only that, I was the only attendee who didn't look like I lived in a convalescent home. While the crowd did get a little bigger by the time Jeb was scheduled to speak, the only people close to my age were a toddler and an autistic kid who looked like a tranny version of Timmy from South Park.

Jeb showed up at 4:15, his presence sucking out what little energy was in the room like a golf ball through a garden hose. As overused as the "cuckservative" insult can get, it describes Jeb to a tee. His shoulders are constantly hunched up—probably because George W used to beat the stuffing out of him when they were kids—his delivery is lethargic, and his constant grinning makes him look try-hard. You can watch my recording of Jeb's speech below:

Jeb Bush also has a remarkable inability to handle disruptions in the crowd. As he spoke, the tranny Timmy lookalike kept bawling and shrieking, throwing him off-balance. After the speech concluded and he started taking questions, Jeb had a minor freakout when one guy started asking questions about "net neutrality" and how a stalker had been impersonating him on Facebook and harassing his kids. I'd suggest Jeb take Adderall for his low energy if it weren't for the fact that it might give him a heart attack.

These issues likely stem from the fact that Jeb Bush was clearly the bullied, resentful, nerdy spawn of the Bush clan. In contrast to the cocky, confident Dubya, Jeb has spent his entire life playing it safe and living in his brother's shadow. His attempts at rebellion, such as his marriage to Columba Bush, are a joke. As the scion of one of America's major political families, Jeb could have married any woman he wanted, and he chose an Aztec midget.

The central problem I noticed with Jeb's speech (beyond his logy, defeated demeanor) was that he couldn't give a compelling reason for anyone to vote for him. George H.W. Bush's appeal was that he was the closest thing voters would get to a third term for Ronald Reagan, while George W. Bush marshaled evangelical Christian voters, angry after eight years of Bill Clinton's degeneracy. Jeb lacks any kind of hook beyond his questionable record as Florida's governor. Even his ostensible supporters at the rally looked like they were only there because they had nothing better to do.

How To Ruin A Political Dynasty In Three Generations

The Bush clan has always been America's equivalent of the Hapsburgs, changing ideology, religion and even ethnicity in their quest for power. Prescott Bush, the dynasty's patriarch, was a liberal senator from Connecticut who aligned himself with Nelson Rockefeller; George H.W. attached himself like a remora to Reagan after flaming out in the 1980 presidential primary; Dubya hired a voice coach and bought a ranch so he could pretend to be a Christian hick from Texas.

Unfortunately, Jeb Bush is the worst possible man to carry the Bush family's torch. Beyond the gargantuan amounts of baggage that the Bush name has accumulated, Jeb is temperamentally better suited to run for the school board then for president. The twin themes of this year's election are nationalism and economic ruin, which both Donald Trump and Bernie Sanders have picked up on, explaining their grassroots success. The closest thing Jeb has to run on is a nostalgia for the Dubya years that doesn't exist.

Despite his flagging poll numbers (indeed, he's dangerously close to being excluded from televised debates) and lack of energy, don't expect Jeb Bush to quit the race anytime soon. The GOP establishment and their Wall Street masters have a lot of money riding on Jeb, and they want a return on their investment. If they can't get the result they engineered for the primary nomination, expect them to pull shenanigans to get their man into the White House.

Read More: How To Build A Dynasty

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Police Captain In Sweden Sympathizes With Migrant Who Killed Swedish Asylum Worker

January 31, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

It is still unclear exactly why a young man took a knife and stabbed a 22-year-old woman to death at a Swedish child migrant centre earlier this week. The incident occurred on Monday morning and news of it has since spread worldwide.

Whatever the reason, chances are it will happen again. The migrants carry with them anger, desperation, trauma, and what seems to be a complete lack of respect for European women. It's a recipe for disaster now that many of them will be told that they have to go back to where they came from.

Grown men posing as boys

According to the Daily Mail, a young woman was killed when she tried to break up a fight. The knife was plunged into her back and thigh. She worked alone that morning at the centre, where she was in charge of ten "unaccompanied child refugees." I put those words in quotation marks since it's always unclear if the migrants are really who they claim to be. Posing as child refugees gives immigrants privileges that adults don't get.

The 22-year-old, a psychology graduate, had told her mother that she was taking care of "big powerful guys" as old as 24, at a centre for minors. The suspected killer, a Somalian named Youssaf Khaliif Nuur, claims he's 15 years old and came to Sweden last summer. A source from the Gothenburg Police says he "was not feeling well" in the hours before the killing. The Daily Mail's correspondent watched him appear in court on Thursday and describes him as six-foot tall, “towering” over his translator. Based on the defendant’s looks, the correspondent estimates that he’s probably older than he says he is.

The accused killer in the middle, allegedly 15 years of age.

The young woman was a Lebanese Christian whose parents came from Beirut over 25 years ago. Her mother laments what has happened to Sweden over the last years, with a great influx of migrants. She says the country is “not safe” any longer, and blames politicians for the steep rise in immigration to her neighborhood of Mölndal, a suburb of Gothenburg. Yet her daughter, described as an “angel,” was devoted to helping the migrant youths.

Prime Minister Stefan Löfven made a visit to Mölndal and said:

> This is a tragedy. It is a terrible crime. I think that a lot of people in Sweden feel a great worry that there might be more similar cases after Sweden took in so many unaccompanied children and youths.

Swedish Chief of Police Dan Eliasson also expressed his condolences—to the killer. “What has this person been through? What circumstances has that guy grown up under?” he asked rhetorically in a TV interview. “This whole refugee crisis shows how unfair life is in many parts of the world, and we should help and make sure to solve this to the best of our ability.”

Police Chief Dan Eliasson.

It won’t be the last time

If our moron Prime Minister is right about anything, it’s that people are very worried right now, and they should be. There’s no reason to think that this will be the last time that one of these migrants goes nuts.

Women should probably be more concerned for their safety than men. First of all, women are typically weaker and less able to defend themselves. Secondly, these migrants from the Middle East and Africa have shown themselves to be ruthless toward women, even their own family. For example, a Kurdish man was found guilty this Tuesday of beating up his 21-year-old daughter with a club in a shopping mall in Uppsala. Her crime was that she dated an Iranian guy that her parents didn’t approve of.

Violence and turmoil at refugee centres are reported every week. The police doesn’t want information about it getting out, but they can’t cover up all the abuse, rape, and assaults that happen at migrant centres. The situation is likely to be exacerbated now that many of the immigrants are set to be deported.

Some of you may recall two murders at IKEA in Västerås, Sweden last year. Abraham Ukbagabir killed a mother and her son using a knife from the store. Born in Eritrea, he came to Sweden after he had already been denied asylum in seven countries. When his application was denied yet again, he decided to take revenge on two complete strangers. The authorities had given him a ticket to Italy that same day.

Abraham Ukbagabir.

Now the Swedish government is preparing to send home 80,000 of the asylum seekers that came last year. Around 45 percent of about 160,000 applicants are expected to be rejected. Meanwhile, Finland is planning to deport 60 percent of the 32,000 people who applied for asylum there.

This means that in Sweden and Finland alone, 100,000 migrants will soon receive the news that they are no longer welcome to stay, and told to go back to the Third World hellhole they came from. My estimate is that they won't be too happy about that. While deporting these migrants is necessary and right, we're creating a powder keg of dismay and disappointment, ready to explode.

Some of them will lash out violently against the society which they think has treated them badly. We've seen it happen before. If I was a woman working with migrants, I'd start looking for a new job right now.

Read More: The Migrant Crisis Exposes The Hypocrisy Of The European Union And Croatian Government

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

How To Do A One-Handed Pushup

January 31, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

The one handed pushup is an exercise that many are familiar with, but only within the confines of television and movies. Whether it be Bruce Lee or Rocky Balboa, millions of boys and young men have seen this nigh-superhuman feat and sought to perform it…only for their efforts to result in sore shoulders, popping elbows, and other maladies (one result they will certainly not achieve is the successful completion of a one-armed pushup).

Simply put, I doubt there is any person in the world who can do a one-handed pushup on their first try, for the simple fact that almost nobody is taught how. This article will start you upon the admittedly difficult road to this seemingly impossible feat.

Bruce Lee doing a one handed, two finger pushup.

Some Biological Background

Resistance training should, ideally, train more than just the muscles—it should also strengthen the connective tissue of tendons and ligaments, and train the nervous system to work in conjunction with the skeletal muscles as the proverbial “well-oiled machine.” Muscle fibers connected to neurons from the nervous system are a “motor unit,” and to exercise is to train both the muscles to contract, and the nervous system to fire more powerful electrical impulses to the synapses, which in turn forces the muscles to contract more powerfully, etc.

When you do a particular exercise more frequently, you train the motor units that do that exercise to work more efficiently, which leads to you become stronger.

Why This Is Relevant

While most of us are well familiar with the standard two-handed pushup, this exercise alone cannot train the body to hold its weight on one arm. To do a one-handed pushup, you have to train your body (the muscles, the joints, and the nervous system) to become used to bearing the weight on one arm. Realistically, why would you expect to be able to do it immediately after training with two arms? Instead, you should take steps to gradually force the solitary arm to bear more and more weight, until the true one-handed pushup is done. But chances are, you don’t know the steps.

Once again, the public school system fails us all—rather than providing worthwhile coaching in any sort of athletics, gym class has us play stupid games involving paddles and furniture dollies. Or maybe it was just my school that played “pickleball,” I don’t know.

It wasn’t until college that I was fortunate enough to have instruction in proper calisthenics. Gradually I learned the progressive steps to increasingly more difficult push-ups, and after roughly a year of effort, I was capable of doing true one-handed pushups.

Why Calisthenics?

A question I get a lot is why bother doing calisthenics? Why not stick to weights? Certainly, I'm not anti-weight. I do extensive weight training as well, and I will eventually write instructional articles on various lifts. However, I feel that calisthenics are beneficial to all strength-training athletes, whether they are a total beginner or a veteran of the weight room.

High level calisthenics (one arm pushups, one leg squats, etc.) train the motor units to maximally exert themselves in an orientation totally alien to weight training. This can only make you stronger generally. In addition, they have almost no risk of injury compared to weights. They are in some ways more practical for daily life, and for the beginner, they provide a solid base of strength for future weightlifting.

It is my opinion that if you cannot manipulate your own body to a reasonable level, you have no business lifting weights—thus I always instruct people to start with calisthenics before starting with weights. Take my advice to whatever extent you want to, but my core thesis remains: you should incorporate calisthenics into your routine.

The Pushup Progression

Bear in mind that in all calisthenics you should do them relatively slowly and controlled, with proper form being upheld. And for pushups specifically, you lower yourself until your nose or chin (whichever you prefer) touches the ground.

The first pushup, which most of you will likely not need to do but I include for the sake of completion, is the knee pushup. Get on your hands and knees and slide your legs back until you feet and shins are off the ground, and you are only resting on your knees. Using the knees as a pivot, do a pushup. Once you can 10 of these, move on to the next step.

The second pushup is the standard you remember from gym class. Keeping the back straight and the hips and buttocks down, bend at the arms and lower your nose to the ground, then push up. Do that 10 times, and move on.

The third pushup is the diamond pushup: The hands are brought next to each other forming a diamond shape, and then the pushup is done as usual. If you find these difficult, you can gradually bring your hands closer together. In other words, from the standard pushup, move your hands a couple of inches closer, and then next time another couple of inches closer, etc. until you get to the true diamond form. Once you feel enough of the Illuminati power to complete 10 of these, move on.

Jay Z's pushup form or a call to Satan?

Following that, we have "one and a half" hand pushups. Put your hand on a basketball, or something the same size as a basketball (I stacked three books in the picture), and do a pushup. This handicaps the hand that is resting on the object, forcing the other hand to work harder. Do this for both hands. Once you can do 10 with each hand, move on.

In contrast to one and a half hand pushups, we now have half one-handed pushups. This is, as the name implies, doing a one-handed pushup, but only going halfway down. Get in a one-handed push-up stance: spread the legs to shoulder width, put the resting hand behind the back, and balance on the other hand (keep the hips down of course). Then bend at the elbow, go as low as you can go, then push up.

This exercise is where the talk of the nervous system above comes into play—your body is simply not used to moving in this way, and you will almost certainly not be able to bend all the way down. Do this exercise with both hands until you can bend down all the way. You don't need to push up, just bend down all the way with the one arm. Realize that your torso will not touch the floor as in the standard pushup, and your hips may "worm" up a little bit. Try to keep the latter to a minimum.

Supported one-handed pushups are a bit unusual, so unusual I don't have a picture (thanks to Paul Wade's Convict Conditioning for this one). It's similar to the one and a half hand pushup, but with the supported arm being fully extended—put the supported hand on the basketball (it has to be a ball this time), and roll it out so the arm is extended. Then do a pushup, rolling the ball to your wrist and forearm. The key is not to bend the supported arm. When you can do this 10 times with both arms, you are ready to try the one-handed pushup.

The one handed pushup is, as one might assume, identical to the half one handed pushup: you just bend all the way down, touch your chin or nose to the ground, and bend all the way up. You want to avoid contorting your back or hips (pain will tell you when you're doing this).

Once you can do the one-armed pushup, you can begin training repetitions for endurance.

This exact pattern of progressions also works with fingertip pushups, which I have trained to a one handed variation:

And the same general idea of gradually increasing to progressively harder variations a little bit at a time applies to all calisthenics in general—in effect, it is the bodyweight equivalent of adding weight to the bar. Good luck with your training, and see you next week.

Read More: The #1 Reason You're Struggling To Gain Muscle

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

4 Surprising Ways That Chimpanzees And Bonobos Show The Decline Of Our Society

February 1, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Chimpanzees and bonobos are our closest evolutionary relatives with whom we share anywhere from 95 to 99 percent of our genes. It should then come as no surprise that we also share many common behaviour patterns with them as well. And while we humans share similarities with the two apes, the two exist under a completely opposite social order.

The chimpanzees organize themselves into a patriarchal order with the alpha male at the top. While chimps are often portrayed as cute and playful creatures, what many people don't realize is just how savage and violent they really are (I've seen pictures of people who had their entire faces ripped off by them). In the wild, chimpanzees exist as warrior tribes that go on regular patrols to guard their territory, engage in hunting expeditions, as well as fight wars with the other tribes.

Bonobos, on the other hand, exist in a peaceful matriarchal order. Their tribes are ruled by group of females who form a sisterhood with an alpha female as their leader. Unlike their chimpanzee counterparts, the male bonobos are weak and ineffectual. The males are practically a bunch of mama's boys who cling onto their mothers all the way into their adulthood as they are only able to derive power and status through their mothers.

Bonobos, the only other species that engage in face-to-face sexual intercourse.

Besides the matriarchal order—which is already unique among the primates—bonobos distinguish themselves as highly sexual species. They have frequent casual sex on a daily basis (albeit lasting only about ten seconds) in every way and every pairing imaginable. Sex is used to greet, bond, decrease stress, resolve conflicts, etc.

So where do we fit in?

I have a theory that we humans, due to our superior ability to adapt, oscillate between the patriarchal order of the chimpanzees and the matriarchal order of the bonobos depending on the social conditions that we live in. That said, we can all agree that much of our industrialized society has moved away from the old patriarchal order to a more gynocentric society with matriarchy as the end goal, and I think by learning from the lives of these two apes, we can gain a better understanding of our own human social structure, masculinity, and sex relations.

1. Patriarchy can only flourish through warfare and violence

The reason why patriarchy thrives, nay, is necessary among the chimpanzees is because male strength and aggression are indispensable in protecting the tribe against external threats as well as for hunting and securing new territories. On the other hand, the only reason why bonobos are able to exist in a matriarchal utopia is precisely because they have no external threats and live in an environment abundant with fruits (their primary diet) and other sources of nourishment, eliminating any real need for male violence.

Note the size differences. I can almost picture the male bonobo in skinny jeans.

For humans, to see what lack of warfare and violence can do to men, just take a note of how emasculated Japanese and Swedish men have become since their warrior pasts. This is also reflected in how our Western society has transitioned away from patriarchy as a result of prolonged peace since the end of WWII.

Of course, warfare and violence are not the only factors that sustain a social environment favourable for patriarchy, but it is still the major factor. Just compare the war ridden regions of the world to our peaceful and prosperous urban centers, which is more patriarchal? Even exceptions like Saudi Arabia—which have been a relatively peaceful society—has only been able to prop up its patriarchal rule through strict religious dogma and brute force. And even they are finally succumbing to changes.

2. Strong group bonding is necessary to assert dominance over the other sex

In both the chimpanzees and the bonobos, it is the sex that forms a unified group that controls the other sex. Female chimps don't dare challenge the authority of the powerful males who often beat them to keep them under control. Likewise, male bonobos are powerless against the closely-knit group of females who band together to keep the males in check. The male bonobos are isolated and seemingly unwilling to form any sort of group of their own because they don't have any practical reason to do so.

Human males today suffer from a similar sense of isolation due to the disintegration of exclusive male groups and the recent influx of females into male spaces. While females are organized into feminist groups that exclude men, men being told that they are forbidden to form groups of their own. If this is not an active effort by our society to systematically emasculate us and leave us powerless I don't know what is.

3. Homosexuality and other sexual deviances become rampant without a strong masculine order

I've met few people who tried to normalize homosexuality by arguing that animals engage in them too—conveniently ignoring the fact that animals also engage in rape, incest, pedophilia, and necrophilia. What they also don't realize is that much of these homosexual behaviours are observed only in captivity.

Have you ever wondered why flamboyant homosexuality only seems to flower in big cities? Watch Jane Goodall explain how homosexuality is unseen in chimpanzees and other animals in the wild and only seem to appear when they are placed in unnatural environments:

But of course, she isn't entirely correct in her assessment as we know that bonobos in the wild engage in plenty of homosexual activity (in all ages). So what makes them the exception? We can only speculate, but I strongly suspect that it has a lot to do with the total emasculation of the males and the resulting absence of masculine identity in bonobo societies.

We humans today are witnessing a rising prevalence of homosexuality and other sexual deviances just as our society is becoming more and more urbanized and hostile to masculinity. The urban centers which we humans live in can be viewed as cages where we are sheltered. And as our society turns increasingly gynocentric like the bonobos, we can expect to see increasing number of men transform into effeminate homosexuals and future Caitlyn Jenners. Note how most sex changes are from men to women and not the other way around.

4. Human male sexual energy is being both suppressed and exploited

Both chimpanzee and bonobo males are able to satisfy their sexual urges pretty much whenever they want. For the bonobos, this is because the females, in spite of possessing all the power, make sure to keep the male aggression at bay by giving them all the sex they need.

However, in the human world, male sexual energy is instead both suppressed and exploited at the same time. It is suppressed through draconian laws designed to spread fear while the media work hard to pathologize normal, male sexuality. At the same time, men's sex drive is also being actively exploited by the porn and sex industry that are now worth billions.

Not surprisingly, women too are capitalizing on men's sexual desire by feeding on male attention using social media, using them as drones to do their bidding, and also by keeping them thirsty and desperate enough to enter marriage voluntarily for further exploitation. Women today want all the benefits of living in a bonobo-style matriarchy while using men as utilities to be exploited. This sort of arrangement allows women to eat their cake and have it too while men are left fighting for the crumbs. And after a while, many men will lose hope and end up becoming dreadfully frustrated, with some resorting to suicide or—on the extreme end—going on a killing spree.

Conclusion

What we are going through today is the transition of our society from a patriarchal order akin to the chimpanzees to the matriarchal order of the bonobos. Men are becoming systematically emasculated from a young age as masculinity is seen as something toxic to be "cured" of. All the while, women, gays, and now transgenders are being promoted above normal, healthy men by our deranged society. If we continue on with this trend for couple of more decades, I expect most Western men to become weak and dysfunctional man-children who must supplicate to women and government for everything.

Be clear about what we are faced with. The issue is no longer about gender equality or rights—it never has been. This is all about social control. And the best way to control men is by decimating their unity and eradicating masculinity as an identity to be reckoned with. You must choose whether you want to see this trend continue or not and decide if you will fight back against this force.

Read More: 10 Surprising Facts About Sleep

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

How The Iowa Presidential Caucuses Work

February 1, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Every election cycle, the year-long circus that is the presidential election begins with the Iowa caucuses. Candidates descend on the state like buzzards to a garbage truck, stumping at rallies and flooding the TV and radio stations with ads, with press prostitutes in tow ready to report every gaffe they make. I've been criss-crossing the state for over a week now reporting on campaigns both Democratic and Republican, but one question still looms large: how do the caucuses themselves work?

Most states use a simple primary election for the presidential race: you walk in, yank the lever for your preferred candidate, and walk out. Iowa's caucus structure is more complex, to the point where campaign volunteers have to explain the rules to potential voters. Since the tone of the election will be set by how Iowans vote this Monday, it behooved me to learn how the caucuses worked and how they affect the state's political culture.

To answer my questions, I turned to Joseph Dobrian, an award-winning writer and novelist based in Iowa City. Dobrian writes on finance, management, real estate and other related topics for clients including the Wall Street Journal, PricewaterhouseCoopers, American Express and many others, and he's the author of the novels Ambitions and Willie Wilden. Tonight, he will also be serving as a Republican caucus leader for his local precinct.

After meeting Dobrian for lunch on Tuesday, I asked him a few questions about the Iowa caucuses and how they worked. Here's what he had to say.

How The Iowa Caucuses Work

Matt Forney: Could you give an overview of how the Republican and Democratic caucuses in Iowa work and what differentiates them from the primary elections most states use?

Joseph Dobrian: The Republican caucus is pretty much the same as a primary election, except that you have to physically attend your caucus to participate. It's simply a head count (voting by secret paper ballot), which the caucus chairman then reports to the county Republican headquarters. It's basically a "beauty contest," with the vote having little influence on how many delegates to the national convention each candidate ultimately wins.

The Democratic system is much more complicated and I'm not an expert on the rules, but each precinct sends a certain number of delegates to the county convention based on how much support each candidate has. A candidate must have at least 15 percent support in a precinct to be considered "viable" and thus qualified to send at least one delegate to the county convention. Therefore, there's a lot of shuffling, bargaining, and re-arranging at the caucus, as, for example, the supporters of several minor candidates who wouldn't be viable on their own might band together to send an "uncommitted" delegate to county.

MF: What effect (if any) do you believe that the caucus procedure has on Iowan politics/the presidential race, compared to primaries? Do you believe this effect is beneficial or detrimental?

JD: It has relatively little effect except to weed out the weakest candidates. I wish, though, that more states would use the caucus system rather than the primary system, since a caucus is less likely to attract voters who aren't informed, and aren't committed to their party.

How Will The Iowa Caucuses Affect The Presidential Race?

MF: As Donald Trump pointed out, Iowa hasn't picked a lot of winners. In all the elections going back to 1996 (excluding 2004, in which incumbent George W. Bush ran unopposed), only two Republican candidates—Bob Dole in 1996 and George W. Bush in 2000—won the Iowa caucuses and then went on to win the nomination. Democrats have a better record: every candidate who has won the Iowa caucuses since 1996 has also won the nomination. Do you have any theories on why Iowans tend to buck the national trend when it comes to the presidential nomination (at least when it comes to the GOP)? Does the way the caucuses work play a role in this?

JD: I wouldn't say Iowans buck the national trend. Our results are usually predictable enough, considering our demographics. The evangelical vote is much bigger here than in most other states, for example. The RINO type, like Bush or Christie, will never do well here, whereas the national convention often does nominate a RINO. The caucuses do tend to attract more serious, committed people, which means more conservatives and evangelicals. The fence-sitters don't go to caucuses in large numbers—but they do vote in primaries, which is why I disapprove of primaries.

MF: Thank you for your time, Joseph.

With the caucuses tonight, all eyes will be on Iowa as the presidential election unfolds. Understanding how the caucuses work is key to predicting their results. Return of Kings will continue to provide reporting and analysis on the Iowa caucuses throughout the night.

Read More: Donald Trump's Presidential Campaign Is The Biggest Political Uprising In Decades

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Establishment’s Narrative Is In Shambles

February 1, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The establishment narrative is breaking down. You can just feel it. The lies that were sustainable for decades are no longer sustainable. They are collapsing under the weight of their own falsity. Where all this leads, is not yet certain. But change is definitely in the air.

In the American scene, the apparently unstoppable rise of Donald Trump has the cucked establishment running for cover and frantically trying to do damage control. All their usual tricks failed. They couldn’t shame him. They couldn’t buy him. And every media attack dog they set on him scurried away with its tail between its legs.

I read one article today by an establishment “journalist” named David Goldman, who writes under the pen name Spengler. He represents the epitome of the conservative establishment. And I’ve never been impressed by his articles. He’s almost always been proven wrong. He’s one of these guys who gets all the numbers right, but misses the deeper points.

But such people know where their interests lie. Make no mistake. And they are afraid. They know what is coming. It’s called payback. Or justice. Take your pick. But his article of his gives us a good glimpse into the mind of a fearful man. And he should be afraid. I want him to be afraid. Because his ilk has been lying, scamming, stealing, and bleeding this country for decades.

And the day of reckoning is coming. He knows it. And we know it. Spengler notes how the shambles of the US economy has led to the angry mood feeding Trump's rise. He correctly notes:

> America's embattled middle class doesn't want charts and graphs, facts and statistics. It wants a leader who will identity culprits and take ruthless action. It's a different electorate than I remember. My business partner in the late 1980s, the supply-sider Jude Wanniski, liked to say that the American people in its wisdom wanted a nice guy as president. They knew that the American president was the most powerful man in the world, and if he acted out of rancor the consequences could be terrible. Not any more. Americans want a nasty president.

He then proceeds to equate Trump with Hitler, which, as we all know, is the last refuge for a man who has no legitimate argument to make. Simply call someone a fascist, and that's the end of the argument. They've been doing this for decades, and it usually works. Spengler then concludes his article with this little comment, which is more telling than anything else:

> Donald Trump represents the triumph of resentment over hope. I don't know what American voters will do. But I'm frightened.

Good. Be frightened. We want you to be frightened. You ought to be frightened. Because you and your ilk sold us out, betrayed us to the core, and now you are going to pay.

Because people can see through the games of the cucks in power. The very fact that we now have a name (cucks) to identify them is a huge step forward. Because they want to hide. They don't want us to know the truth about the games they have been playing.

The world of the cuck

People are furious. People are desperate. No one is listening. And it's not just here in the United States.

The narrative in Europe is beginning to unravel

The tone of the European leadership seems to suggest that the demise of the EU as an institution may not be far off. Beset by numerous crises, failures of leadership, and the most pathetic, cowardly policies imaginable, the EU seems to be headed for the ashbin of history, like so many other temporary alliance systems.

As it should. The EU was never anything more than an ad hoc economic arrangement for the benefit for banks, financial institutions, and a few wealthy elites in Europe. And now that fact is being revealed for all the world to see.

The migrant crisis is bringing all of this to a head. It is exposing the elites for the lying, sniveling cucks that they are: people who sold out their nations and their inheritances because of their adherence to cultural decay and moral relativism.

They're guilty, they're fearful, and they know it.

Years of resentment against spineless politicians finally exploded in Sweden this weekend, as over 100 young men went on a rampage, assaulting young migrants in Stockholm. The assaults, loosely organized by a rightist youth group, put the blame squarely on the shoulders of the politicians for failing to protect Swedes from violent migrants. But the politicians, their minds poisoned by years of cultural pollution, simply don't know what to do. One gets the sense that they are simply overwhelmed by events that they cannot control.

I suspect that if old Queen Christina of Sweden came back and saw what had become of her country, she would be horrified. One study clearly shows that continued migration to Sweden will result in serious gender imbalances. Migrants are also lying about their ages in order to scam off of Sweden's overly-generous welfare system. All of this goes unaddressed:

> Sweden has received more asylum applications per capita than any other country > in Europe – 163,000 last year. The country's population is just 9.7 million.

>
> What is surprising is that if you look at the breakdown of the ages of applicants in Sweden, there's a huge bump in the figures at the age of 16 – often unaccompanied minors arriving without a parent or guardian.
>
> And 92% of unaccompanied minors aged 16 and 17 years old are male. So why is this?
>
> "If you're underage, first of all, you get housing, you get more financial resources. You also have a lot of staff around you helping you with different issues," says Hanif Bali, a member of the opposition Moderate Party in the Swedish parliament – which is on the centre right of the political spectrum. "If you need food, clothing, everything, you can go to the municipality and demand this money."

But I have no sympathy for them. If you want to be the leader, you'd better be able to lead. If not, you should have the decency to step aside. Or you will be forced to step aside. Things can change very quickly.

In Germany in 1920, rightist army officers and conservatives came within an ace of overthrowing the Weimar government in an interesting little event called the Kapp Putsch. Wolfgang Kapp was a 62-year old nationalist who felt that only a coup could save the country from chaos and disaster. In Berlin, the government was actually forced to flee the city.

Wolfgang Kapp: he came within an ace of overthrowing the cucks in 1920

We can't be sure that Kapp was wrong. Maybe if he had succeeded, things would not have gotten so bad in Germany that even more extreme voices would be listened to. If you block people from expressing themselves, if you marginalize people, very bad things will happen.

In any case, there is a feeling of change in the air. Either Europe will deal with its economic and political issues to the satisfaction of its citizens, or it will not. My guess is that Europe will, sooner or later, revert back to the old nation-state system. The peoples, the cultures, and the heritages are just too different. Not even the cucks running the show can destroy that, as much as they would like to.

And if the EU collapses, it will not be the end of the world. For most of its history, Europe was a collection of nation-states. The elites will lose some money, to be sure. And this is why they are trying to make their loss into our loss. It is not. Nationalism is the most natural thing in the world.

But their day of reckoning will come. They sold out an entire generation. They plundered, lied, and cowered under their desks when they should have been leading and knocking heads. You sold us out. And you need to pay the price.

And sooner or later, what comes around, goes around.

Read More: How Human Resources Departments Are Ruining STEM Jobs For Men

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Will Germans Resort To Merciless Violence To Save Their Country?

February 1, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The German political system, responsible for the suicidal demographics that led to the mass sexual assaults and rapes in Cologne on New Year's Eve, is in desperate need of reform. But where will it come from? Stuck in a coalition with socialists, the so-called German conservatives led by Chancellor Angela Merkel have in one year allowed one million undocumented people, about whom they know nothing, into the land of Beethoven and von Goethe. Every current party in the German parliament is thoroughly committed to keeping them in Germany.

All the major parties refuse to listen to the German people. And the only point at which they will listen to voters is when a majority of "Germans," including many of the one million allowed to enter Germany in 2015, retrospectively support what the political establishment has always wanted: the non-existence of German ethnicity. Rendered mentally ill by an imaginary guilt over the long-gone Nazi past, mainstream politicians are actively trying to destroy any non-leftist German sense of self.

Inasmuch as ROK does not support these kinds of actions, it seems that the only probable way for change to occur in the present climate will be through Germans taking extreme or perhaps violent measures against their political "representatives." If the next wave of mass rapes are publicized (and the news of them not swept under the carpet), the anger of some Germans is liable to erupt after so many years of their concerns and plain fears being castigated and labeled "racist."

German politicians are disregarding the popular will

One can imagine Merkel is careful about which people she poses for selfies with nowadays.

The majority of the German people were against the opening of the gates, with borders only half-closed a matter of weeks ago. Irrespective of this massive consensus against the utter tearing of Germany's social fabric, Merkel let the hordes in. Most of them were not even Syrian, the group of people meant to be the beneficiaries of the German government's immigration stupidity.

There is no doubt that Angela Merkel has betrayed anything resembling a German conservative cause. Regardless, the broken electoral system of Germany is also to blame. In a sense, it is entirely predictable that most within the political classes, including conservatives, will put power ahead of principle, shacking with up opponents such as socialists to retain their incumbency or wrest the reins of control from others.

Germans, on account of an Austrian-born dictator and a regime absent for seven decades, are required to shut up and welcome millions of more unwanted people over the coming years. Any attempt to call out or resist this diktat will be met with the loss of a protester's employment prospects, verbal harassment, physical suffering (without police to protect them), or even criminal prosecution under Germany's draconian anti-free speech laws.

German Politics 101 and why even conservative parties have been "forced" to welcome millions of migrants

Work has never been more dangerous for German police officers.

To understand a significant reason for the pro-immigrant homogeneity of the major German political parties, one has to look at the federal political system. Remembering the Weimar years, modern-day Germany has erected a very large impediment to “small” parties entering the German parliament, or Bundestag. In a nutshell, it is designed, or so it is claimed, to stymie organizations like the Nazi Party, which maintained a minor presence in the old Reichstag for years before suddenly becoming the largest grouping in 1932.

If a party does not achieve 5% of what is called the second vote (German electoral law permits a direct candidate vote and an additional party list vote) or win three constituencies, it is not allowed to enter the Bundestag. In the most recent election in 2013, the center-right Free Democratic Party (FDP) just missed out on the 5% threshold, achieving 4.8%, and was therefore not entitled to any seats. This is despite registering an otherwise very sizeable two million votes.

In the absence of the FDP, which had previously been the junior government coalition partner, Angela Merkel’s CDU (called the CSU in Bavaria) achieved a nail-biting 49.4% of the available seats, or 311 out of 630. The three other parties were, in order of popularity, the Social Democrats, Die Linke (“The Left”, which wants a return to East German communism but with a very social justice flavor), and the Greens (another hard-left party).

If it had wanted to, the Social Democrats, which are to the left of the British Labour Party and the US Democrats, could have achieved a coalition with the Greens and Die Linke. In the end, Merkel and the CDU/CSU formed a grand coalition with the Social Democrats. As you can imagine, with no other right-wing or even centrist parties, the nominally conservative Merkel has no one else to turn to in order to govern, aside from the SDs, the largest and least radical of three toxic parties.

Auf wiedersehen, Deutschland!

Aside from (insensitive?) cultural appropriation by foreigners and tourists, German identity is dying.

Funnily enough, Angela Merkel, who is known for having a rapport with Japanese leaders, never demands that economically advanced East Asian states take, say, 15 million migrants and refugees to make up for seventy years of their openly racist border controls. Such a call would be fitting, considering that the Nazis and Imperial Japanese had competed for who could kill the most people during the 1930s and 1940s. If we are going to indulge common sense-destroying war and genocide guilt nearly a century on, when 99.99% of all the perpetrators are long dead, let's do it consistently.

But no, Germany's Chancellor wants to be unique. She deeply desires that, borrowing the title of a recent bestselling book by Thilo Sarrazin, Germany abolish itself in record time.

How will the German people respond, if at all?

Read More: Congratulations To Feminists For Helping Import Actual Rape Culture To Germany

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Worldwide Effort To Shut Down International Meetup Day Is Under Way

February 2, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On Sunday, news of our February 6 meetup reached Australia. The media began manufacturing outrage to shut down all six meetups located there. Large protests have been planned in Brisbane, Sydney, and Reykjavik by hairy-legged feminists and their beta orbiters. Multiple politicians have denounced me and I will likely be banned from Australia.

The media in Canada, Iceland, and the United Kingdom have also put out defamatory reports about the meetup that falsely claim it's a "rape" gathering where we will strategize on how to rape women. Snopes has debunked their lies, but the media continues to maliciously distort the meetups' legal and social intent.

I'll let these tweets tell the story of what has happened in the past day:

> "Supporters of anti-woman group Return of Kings to meet in Sydney" https://t.co/wJBc9Dlazu Look at the pic of me they used.. I'm dying □□□
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> I would like to do a lecture in Australia one day. I'd just have to bring a couple extra things to stay safe. pic.twitter.com/CQ1VwGzi73
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> Fuck it, I just booked a flight to Australia. See you somewhere there on 2/6. I'll stay a while, see some sights. pic.twitter.com/d9CTFG1nqd

> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> To all attractive Australian girls in age range of 18-22. I'm coming to your country and am free to meet for drinks. Email
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> There's more media outrage against a male happy hour than when European women got molested and raped in Cologne. What an appalling sham.
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> 'Pick-up artist' slammed and ridiculed online over notion of 'legal rape' https://t.co/ef0kWYmrgz pic.twitter.com/ahTz8lM1rN
> — RT (@RT_com) February 1, 2016

> I'll hire a private yacht to sneak into the country. On google maps I see vulnerabilities in the northwest quadrant. https://t.co/bLLC9mrY5P
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> Glasgow City Council rep calls me disgusting when he looks like a tranny. Hit the gym and get your testosterone up. https://t.co/yFj7hNPvf1
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> We made Australian television https://t.co/o7fM6enTJf 370,000 views lol
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> "Australian Immigration Minister Peter Dutton has requested urgent briefing". Their borders are weak. I'll get in. https://t.co/KT9VoxW5Dk
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> Would not bang, so no interview https://t.co/2n0hBOmXlu
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 1, 2016

> I don't need to apply for a visa if I'm coming in by boat. The border is like Swiss cheese: https://t.co/YUCRx3C4rx https://t.co/emrPjqUnBS
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 2, 2016

> I will sneak in to your country, hold my meetings, laugh, and then slip out. Your gay authorities won't stop me. https://t.co/kO047eXkQd
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 2, 2016

> Number 2 trending topic in all of Australia. This is the first time a man stood up to their puny establishment. pic.twitter.com/a7qhAHRTpd
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 2, 2016

> I have the funds to get in by boat through one of multiple weak points. Money is no barrier to the operation. pic.twitter.com/5vimqIbpLa
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 2, 2016

This story is developing rapidly. Here are three ways to get up-to-date news on the situation:

- My Twitter feed
- Forum (Everything Else section)
- Google News

I have created a private Central Command for meetup hosts and other trusted insiders to device protocols that allow all meetups on Saturday to proceed as planned. I will publish protocols for meetup attendees here by Thursday. Not a single meetup will be cancelled. We will not be intimidated by the actions of the lying media and leftist political establishment. If you are a host, check your email for further information.

Don't Miss: Frequently Asked Questions For International Meetup Day On February 6

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Did Microsoft Commit Voter Fraud In Iowa To Ensure Donald Trump's Defeat?

February 2, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

The first shot in the presidential nomination has been fired, and the finger-pointing has begun. Last night, Ted Cruz pulled off an upset victory in the Iowa Republican caucuses, defeating front-runner Donald Trump by a slim margin, while Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders are in a statistical dead heat. Not only that, Marco Rubio exceeded expectations, finishing a close third behind Trump when all the polls showed that he lagged far behind. How did all this happen?

I'll freely admit that I was wrong when I predicted that Trump would win Iowa by a convincing margin. While Trump's rallies were drawing the biggest crowds by far of any candidate (Democrat or Republican), I also warned that because the Iowa caucus structure favors long-time party loyalists over first-time voters, the Donald's supporters might be underrepresented at the actual vote. My predictions on where the other candidates would fall (Rubio in 3rd, Carson 4th, Paul 5th, and Bush 6th) were on the money.

However, the "Rubio surge" makes no sense whatsoever, matching neither what I saw on the ground or what pollsters were reporting. There's now evidence to suggest that Rubio's unexpectedly good performance—coming in a close third behind Trump—was the result of voter fraud committed by Microsoft and sanctioned by the RNC. While it's too early to make a definite call, given that Donald Trump stands against everything that the GOP establishment represents, it's not out of the question that they would try to fight him with foul play.

Marco Rubio’s Incredible Disappearing Voters

I’ve had the opportunity to attend Iowa campaign events by every major party presidential candidate with the exceptions of John Kasich, Mike Huckabee, Rick Santorum and Jim Gilmore (though I saw Huckabee and Santorum at Trump’s veterans’ rally and shook the latter’s hand). In fact, I attended a Donald Trump rally in Pella and a Marco Rubio town hall in nearby Indianola on the same day, giving me a one-to-one comparison of each candidate’s popularity among Iowans.

In my time in Iowa, Trump’s rallies consistently drew crowds that were larger than all the other candidates’ (Democratic and Republican) combined. Only Bernie Sanders can attract audiences that can compete with Trump in terms of size, though Trump still outpaces Sanders by a wide margin. For example, Trump’s Pella rally on January 23rd drew well over 3,000 people, the majority of whom had to be shunted into an overflow auditorium due to space limits. You can watch my recording of that rally below:

Conversely, Marco Rubio could barely move the needle in terms of audience size. His Indianola event drew 150-200 people at most, the bulk of whom were senile old farts. Check out my recording below:

Lest you wrongly think that voter turnout and rally turnout have no correlation, professional pollsters backed up what I saw on the ground: the Iowa caucus was a fight between Ted Cruz and Donald Trump, with Rubio languishing in a distant third with around 10-12 percent of the vote. Moreover, not one single poll in the run-up to the caucus indicated that he would surge to 23 percent, and no one can pinpoint a single reason why Rubio overperformed in the actual vote.

On Sunday, Breitbart reported that Microsoft would be providing technology for tallying votes in the Iowa caucuses. Given that Microsoft is Rubio’s second-largest campaign contributor, this represents a massive conflict of interest. Other sources claim that the GOP establishment had a deliberate plan to goose Rubio's vote count.

Given that Donald Trump has run an anti-establishment campaign and has refused to accept money from super PACs and other major donors, the GOP brass clearly view him as a threat, so none of this is out of the realm of possibility. While Jeb Bush was previously the anointed candidate of Wall Street, the GOP's masters may be giving up on him due to his poor polling numbers and shifting their support to Rubio.

Feeling The Bern, Left Out In The Cold

On the Democratic side, I had tepidly predicted that Bernie Sanders would pull off a narrow, upset win, or that if Hillary Clinton won, it would be by a thin margin. As of this writing, the two are neck-and-neck and the vote is too close to call. I was at Hillary's caucus party last night with Karl Ushanka and got a recording of her victory speech (if you can call it that). Watch it below:

While Hillary's supporters are trying to spin this as a victory, a saying I read years ago describes the Democratic situation perfectly: if a lightweight fights a heavyweight to a draw, the lightweight won. The vote between Sanders and Clinton was never supposed to be this close, because the very structure of the Democratic nomination was designed to elect Hillary. If the best she can pull off is a draw when she has the media and party machinery on her side, it speaks to how weak she is as a candidate.

While Sanders was not able to pull off the upset that I thought he would (due largely to the same reasons Trump lost; many of his supporters are first-time voters), he and his campaign should be proud of their accomplishments. Sanders' success in Iowa should further augment his anticipated victory in New Hampshire and give him a fighting chance in the later primaries.

While it's true that Iowa has a poor record when it comes to predicting the winners of the Republican nomination, Rubio’s shady surge may be a harbinger of GOP dirty tricks down the road. Trump’s sheer dominance in the New Hampshire polls may forestall more foul play, but he needs to be alert and aware of what the establishment has planned for him.

Read More: How The Iowa Presidential Caucuses Work

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Desperate Angela Merkel Attempts To Blame Greece For The Problem She Created

February 2, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The lion which ravaged the European flock is now blaming the lambs for the carnage it created. Angela Merkel, whose policies of intra-EU economic indifference have reduced Hellenic women to spreading their legs for mere sandwiches, is warning Greece that it faces being kicked out of the passport-free Schengen Zone in Europe for not curbing the flow of migrants. The government in Athens is already functionally bankrupt, especially as Berlin is devoting billions over the coming years to accommodate foreigners instead of assisting destitute EU partners like the Greeks.

As ROK readers are no doubt aware, Angela Merkel's government, along with Sweden's, virtually opened their borders to the permanent settlement of countless "refugees," which is now the codeword for able-bodied young Arab and North African men, many of whom go onto rape and pillage on a scale reminiscent of the Crusades or the Russian retaking of Eastern Europe during the Second World War. Due to patently obvious matters of geography, most of these migrants come across the Mediterranean and transit through Greece, their sights set on richer and ridiculously indulging fellow EU countries to the north.

The Europe-wide idiocracy

Germany and Sweden may be the biggest offenders, but they are not the only countries whose pernicious policies explain the literal human inundation faced in the Mediterranean by cash-strapped Greece, Italy and Spain. Even the United Kingdom, the most sensible Western European government when it comes to ameliorating the tide of the hordes of unwanted foreigners, is guilty of taking an overly passive approach. The problem on its doorstep in the French port of Calais, which is linked to Great Britain via the Channel Tunnel, is comparatively easy to fix. Yet the Cameron government has continually relied on pointless rhetoric at the expense of action.

Similar sentiments can be expressed about France, the Netherlands and Belgium, whose only concerted means of opposition have been the growing numbers of voters supporting narrative-revising parties, including the French National Front, Dutch PVV and Flemish Vlaams Belang. Unfortunately, many of these groups and others elsewhere in Europe have not had the opportunity to consolidate this support in national parliamentary elections since the migrant crisis' latest turns for the worse. Some may have incorrectly thought that France had national elections very recently; the end of 2015 had regional voting, in which the two major parties, the Socialists and UMP, meticulously collaborated to keep the National Front away from provincial power.

As all this excuse-making and political exacerbation goes on, Greece is footing the bulk of the blame, very undeservedly. In the end, more financial and social misery will be shoved down the throats of the long-suffering Greek people, all so Merkel can deflect criticism of her rape and other crime-enabling decisions.

Merkel expects Greece to pay for HER mistakes

There is no other way of putting this. Although she will not lose the rightwing vote to any of the other parties currently in the German parliament, the Bundestag, because the rest of them are all leftist, she is facing an unprecedented backlash. And who better to take this out on than the Greeks? They have no ability to fight back and are dependent on ongoing EU goodwill and consultation as they navigate along a mind-boggling path of bringing their economy back from a multi-year catastrophe. If the Greek woes were replicated in the United States, for example, the world economy would savagely implode.

If Germany had taken the hardline political approach of Poland or Hungary, the arrivals in Greece would have been 5% or less of the actual figures from both last year and early this year. Of course, the greater wealth of Germany and the presence of many self-hating German SJWs would still have attracted enough (read: too many) migrant opportunists. But these lawbreakers could have been dealt with properly, without German law enforcement efforts being smashed into pieces as the Cologne rape fury and related incidents across the country illustrated.

Not only is this almost completely Germany's fault, it is doing nothing to correct the issues either within or beyond its borders. Merkel has, for lack of a better phrase, made the very pissweak insistence that criminal migrant elements will be deported, ignoring the hard truth that German police usually have no idea what these offenders look like (bar their sub-race), let alone who they are. And she additionally, and very helpfully for her, forgets the wider dilemma of the ever growing strains on Germany's presently tattered social fabric.

It's called supply and demand, morons

In lieu of castigating Greek paupers, Merkel and her administration can take a simple lesson from economics. When Berlin stops demanding the importation of other countries' problems, migrants will stop supplying the numbers needed to assuage German SJWs' World War Two guilt complex.

These migrants do not go to Saudi Arabia as the government in Riyadh is unwilling to even accept fellow Arabs. And why are Japan and Korea not flooded by Arab and North African illegal migrants? Geography only answers part of the question. After all, the SJW narrative says these people will do anything to escape Syria (or some leafy but non-First World suburb of Tunis). They are not in East Asia because Tokyo and Seoul, plus Taipei and Singapore, would turn them all back.

You created the crisis, Merkel. So how about finally switching the tap of indulgence off for good?

Read More: Mattress Girl Threatens To Sue Newsweek For Telling The Story Of The Man She Falsely Accused Of Rape

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why Do Feminists And Social Justice Warriors Use So Much Profanity?

February 2, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Ever since I stumbled upon the manosphere several years ago, one of the things that struck a chord with me was how comparatively clean and civil the discourse was between its writers and commentators. Despite the sphere's (unwarranted) controversial reputation from outside forces, people displayed a sense of maturity, poise, and class which is absolutely devoid in prominent SJW realms such as Al Jazeera Plus, Alternet, Huffington Post, or Buzzfeed.

First of all, manosphere regulars tend to use euphemisms for many otherwise vulgar terms. For instance, people say they "banged" a woman or got a new "notch" this past weekend rather than the more frank but R-rated "I fucked her." People also have a good grasp of formulating complete written sentences without having to resort to vulgar filler words, such as using "fucking" repeatedly as a meaningless adjective. And finally, people generally have good and civil debating skills when disagreements arise.

People infrequently straw man each other. Ad hominem attacks against people are comparatively rare in disagreements. And perhaps best of all, there is a great amount of social support for people who are embarking on ways to better themselves as men. The manosphere is, by and large, a portal of intelligent Y-chromosome carriers who have at least a decent amount of humility and class. Using massive amounts of profanity for the sake of being “edgy” or “cool” will not win anybody social brownie points.

On The Other Side

It therefore comes as little surprise that our established enemies, social justice warriors, would display almost the direct opposite to many of the aforementioned attributes of our sphere. Many of them are incredibly crass, immature, and vulgar human beings who will straw man you like you’ve never been straw manned before.

Calling you all sorts of awful names (ad hominem) and shouting out colorful four-letter-word tirades will pretty much also be a given. And yet despite all of that, they want us to stop using such hateful words like “fat” to describe people. As if such a word will make or break an R-rated movie in the same manner as a “fuck” filled Martin Scorsese picture.

“But what’s so fucking wrong with swearing? Why don’t you go jump off a cliff!”

Straight from the front page of the Cuss Control Academy, excessive swearing essentially sets a personal penalty on your character. It makes you unpleasant to be with, it’s a tool for whiners and complainers, it shows you don’t have much self-control, and it endangers your workplace relationships (if you even have a job). As we have all witnessed, social justice warriors display all of those attributes with alarming frequency.

Yup, and with that attitude it's going to stay that way my blue-haired warrior

Furthermore, it's a tell-tale sign of a bad attitude problem. It shows to the whole world your lack of character, just how immature you are, and it sets a bad example for children (which we pray you don't have). You are essentially a big rebellious kid trapped in a grown-ups body. A "Kidult" who is not ready for real grown-up discussion.

47 years old now. Oh grow up Timmy boy…

Speaking of setting a bad example for children, just look at how all of these foul-mouthed social justice warriors are corrupting little kids by instructing them to tell their current devil-incarnate, Donald Trump, to "shut the fuck up." Absolutely revolting. Then the adult children come out (all of them), and the swear-a-thon simply does not relent.

"Fuck you! We stand for what's right. Go kill yourself!"

Are they now? Well beyond how SJW's repeatedly make written statements that people they disagree with should go kill themselves (such nice people), their excessive swearing is just plain awful for society. It represents part of the degenerate decline of the Western world, and the dumbing down of the United States in particular.

For instance, just look at these “Black Lives Matter” protesters trespassing inside an Apple store to vent their frustrations over their false narrative. Not only does Apple Inc. have nothing to do with their problems, they then take their spiel onto the streets and start dropping obscenities (starts at 0:18) repeatedly. As if that’s supposed to actually accomplish something, other than demonstrate proof of their immaturity and stupidity to a global audience.

Most importantly, profanity makes otherwise civil discussions quickly transform into arguments, and using obscenities in such scenarios is a strong sign of hostility. Hostile behavior is often a precursor to physical violence, and physical violence is the end result of the complete breakdown of civil human-to-human contact.

While that could be potentially dismissed as a “slippery slope” argument, it is far more often true than false. Think about it, when was the last time you knew of a situation where an otherwise vulgar persons language suddenly turned clean when they were getting aggressive and confrontational?

It certainly did not happen to Roosh in Montreal, when Jessica “Eat My Cunt” Lelièvre made an unprovoked assault on him which was followed by plenty of potty-mouthed obscenities.

Social justice warriors have proven themselves to be hostile via their profanity. The men of the manosphere simply have not.

Conclusion

SJW’s need to read these “growing-up” books

We all swear, and it has some degree of humor and effectiveness to it when it is used sparingly. However, SJW’s use it to such a profound extent that it loses all power and meaning. It really is just lame and a complete waste of time listening to these Marxist rejects “fuck this, fuck that” attitude towards anything in life which does not subscribe to their bogus narrative.

You are better than social justice warriors. We all are. Let’s keep our obscenities on the down low and improve ourselves as human beings by not stooping to their level. Excessive profanity is just lazy language for sad people.

Read More: The Top 10 Worst Female Role Models In The Entire World

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

PRIVATE MEETUPS: Protocol To Attend Meetups That Now Have Hidden Meeting Locations

February 3, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The world is moving against us. I've gotten reports of over a dozen organized protests at our meeting points. Dozens more are being organized privately. Since this meetup was never intended as a confrontation with unattractive women and their enablers, I'm moving to save as many of these meetups as I can before Saturday so that men can still meet in private away from a loud, obnoxious, dishonest, and potentially violent mob.

If you take a look at the full listing page, you'll see that some meetups have had their location removed and have instead been replaced with an email address or two to contact. If you want to attend one of the newly private meetups, send an email to the address(es) proving that you're one of us. These are the three ways that you'll be about to do that:

- If you've left a non-hater comment on ROK or RooshV.com using your Disqus account before January 15.
- If you have an active account on RVF that is at least three months old.
- If you can provide a screenshot receipt of one of my books (Amazon, iTunes, Kobo, Paypal, etc) that was purchased before January 15.

Disqus Proof

Follow these steps if you want to provide proof using Disqus.

Step 1: Make sure that your Disqus profile is visible so that anyone can see your posting history. If you're logged into Disqus, click this link and make sure the "Keep your profile activity private" option at the bottom is unchecked.

Step 2: Check your comment history to make sure you have a visible comment left on ROK before January 15 that a host can see.

Step 3: Leave a comment anywhere on ROK with the name of the city whose meetup you want to attend.

Step 4: Grab the permanent URL of the comment you just left by simply clicking on the timestamp of the comment and then copying the address that is now in your URL bar. It will look something like this: *http://www.returnofkings.com/79354/did-microsoft-commit-voter-fraud-in-iowa-to-ensure-donald-trumps-defeat#comment-2491928671.

Step 5: Send that URL to the email(s) provided on the listing page.

Forum Proof

Step 1: Leave a comment on this thread with the city meetup you want to attend.

Step 2: Grab the permanent link to your comment by clicking the number next to it.

Step 3: Send the URL that is now in your address bar.

Book Proof

Search through your email for a receipt to any of my books you've purchased or donations you've made to ROK before January 15. Send that screenshot as an email attachment. For security precautions, censor out your last name or any private billing information.

After you provide one of the above methods of proof, you will get an email reply with the new meetup location. Due to the massive outrage against us at certain locations, we can not allow in men who are unable to establish this protocol.

Check The Listing Page Daily

In the next 24 hours, many meetups will be made private. Give the listing page one extra check before you set out on Saturday evening. If ROK is offline for any reason, a copy of the listings are available on rooshv.com (it's clearly linked at the top of the right column). If my blog is also offline then check my Twitter for a pinned tweet.

We're not going to be able to privatize all the meetups that are being threatened with protest, but we'll save the ones that are in the most critical danger. Because the outrage started abroad first, it looks like we'll be able to save most of the foreign meetups that are threatened. On Wednesday I will make moves to protect some US meetups and also to provide you with a detailed security protocol. Stay tuned.

View Next: Full City Listing And Meeting Points For International Meetup Day On February 6, 2016

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Attendance Guidelines For Saturday's International Meetup

February 3, 2016 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

With the increased media attention over the past few days, it's become clear that we're going to need a common set of guidelines for everybody to follow. A simple meet-and-greet has turned into a media circus, with multiple mainstream sources defaming and misrepresenting Roosh, as well as ourselves. With that in mind, the following guidelines have been created, both for our security, as well as to ensure that we don't do the media's job for them, handing them soundbites which can be taken out of context, or just generally making fools out of ourselves.

Both group leaders and attendees are expected to read and adhere to these standards; by doing so we will ensure that this meet up is a roaring success, and that our detractors are exposed for the mendacious provocateurs that they are.

Content

1. Mission Statement
2. Situation
3. Dress and Deportment
4. Security
5. Leader responsibilities

1. Mission Statement

The importance of moving from online discussions to face-to-face meetups cannot be understated; it provides a level of dynamism, trust, and mutual support which simply cannot exist online. While many of us have already met others under the auspices of “the red pill”, this Saturday’s neomasculinity meetup is a step forward beyond that. Whereas “the red pill” is merely descriptive, neomasculinity is normative; it provides us with a unified purpose beyond the immediate desires of money, women, status, and success. It provides us with a banner where men of divergent ages and interests can find common cause in promoting the values, both internal and external, which result in civility, industry, and justice in society at large.

Therefore the primary focus of all attendees should be upon establishing friendly relations with the other men who are present. The goal is not to meet women, or to party uproariously, or to grandstand, or to find a wingman, but to meet other men who share the same values as yourself, even if they walk different paths in life.

2. Situation

A great deal of online chatter is suggesting that we may encounter some resistance to our meetups. To best understand how to deal with our opponents, we must understand who they are. We can break them down into five major groups:

A) Ideological Opponents, SJWs: hysterical and loud, prone to committing civil infractions, but not generally criminal. Their objections stem from internal boredom; they need something they can brag about on Facebook. Unreasonable. Do not engage with them, merely ignore.

B: Ideological Opponents, Antifa: unlike the SJWs, the Antifas are prone to criminal acts. They tend to be young men filled with a sense of frustration and inadequacy, who seek out “fascists” to assault to prove their manhood (note: neomasculinity is not a fascist organization, it is largely apolitical, focusing on the Classical Greek virtues, with somewhat of a libertarian bend). If Antifas harass you, there will be safety in small groups. Ultimately these street thugs are cowardly, and if you stand your ground they will back off. If they insist on harassing you, speak bluntly and to the point. Do not argue.

C. Citizens: the populace has been warned about a “rape group” that’s meeting in their city, and are understandably upset. They may be angry, but it is for just reasons, and they are unlikely to engage in criminal acts. Keep your cool and speak civilly to them; explain gently that no, we don’t support rape, et cetera. They might be looking for an excuse to fight, but if you don’t give it to them they won’t assault you.

D. Journalists and Infiltrators: you are not a spokesperson for neomasculinity, you are merely a group leader. If journalists have questions for you, refer them to www.RooshV.com or www.ReturnofKings.com. Do not answer any questions beyond saying that it is a peaceful meet and greet. Some journalists may seek to infiltrate the group; see Section 3, Dress and Deportment, and behave accordingly.

E. Law Enforcement: due to the agitation in the mainstream media, there may be a heightened police presence; this is good. Because we are a law abiding group, and the police will protect us if any of the first three groups decide to break the law. If you encounter a police officer, speak politely; feel free to briefly explain the goals of Neomasculinity, and assure them that you – as the group leader – will not allow the group to get out of hand. Explain to them what sort of deportment will be expected of the group; that with all of this attention, it is especially important that there is no misbehavior.

3. Dress and Deportment

Because of the scrutiny we are under, any missteps will be blown out of proportion, and statements will be taken out of context. It is vital that we give them as little excuse to defame us as possible by carrying ourselves like the professional, law abiding adults that we are.

3a. Dress: Business casual is the style of the day. No trashy logo-tees, ripped jeans, or black eyeliner. Dress like men. However avoid good suits, and ties especially. There is a small chance that you may be physically assaulted, or have a drink thrown on you; the tie is a choking hazard, and there's no reason to ruin a nice suit. Dress pants or jeans and a button-up shirt will suffice.

Loading…

3b. Discussions: While the principles of neomasculinity embrace freedom of speech and spirited debate, remember that the purpose of this meet-up isn't to solve all the problems of the world, but rather to network with like-minded men. Avoid impolite or contentious topics, and assume that you are being recorded. Try and avoid making statements that can easily be quoted out of context. Absolutely do not discuss illegal activity, no matter how minor, and do not bicker.

3c. Alcohol: Do not drink to excess, and do not allow any group members to drink to excess. No 'after parties' with any of the members whom you just met. We will have time for that later; it is critical that nobody drinks themselves into trouble as a result of this meetup. Go home when the meeting is over.

3d. Women: Do not approach women; if women approach you, get their number, and phone them next week. There are two reasons behind this: 1) women may be flirting with you so as to claim assault, and 2) competition over women can cause conflict between men. Go out sarging some other night.

Security Guidelines

4a. Physical Security

We are embracing the Gandhi strategy of peaceful resistance. This means that you do not engage in physical violence. Our planned actions – meeting, discussing, having a quiet beer amongst ourselves – are completely legal and inoffensive. With that in mind, do not bring:

- A sidearm
- A knife
- Pepper spray

- Any other sort of offensive weapon

Weapons are more likely to get us into trouble than out of trouble. Neither leaders nor attendees should be carrying; if anybody arrives with a weapon, instruct them to return it to their vehicle.

Do bring a cellphone with video capability. Record any and all interactions.

If you are assaulted, protect yourself, but if possible do not respond in kind. If a woman hits you, do not hit back; if a single man hits you, block his blows and retreat, but do not hit back. Remember, the Gandhi strategy: very few men will hit somebody who isn't hitting them back, and if you don't respond in kind the police will have no grounds to arrest both of you. The only time you should use self-defense is if you're being assaulted by a group of thugs who pose a serious threat to your life or limb. If this is the case, you should also rely on the buddy system.

4b. Buddy System

If possible, have a buddy watch your six. This is especially the case for the group leader – have a friend who arrives separately from you with his own cell phone, to record events without being obviously involved. For attendees it might also be wise to come with a friend. If a situation looks as if it is escalating physically, your buddy can intervene as a "neutral" third party, to calm things down.

4c. Movement

Take a circuitous route to the secondary location. Change direction by 180 degrees. Move in pairs if possible, and be aware of your surroundings. Pause and scan the crowd. Pay attention to anybody who suddenly looks the other way. There is no reason to worry about professional security forces since we are not breaking any laws; you are merely keeping an eye open for SJW protestors who would seek to disrupt the venue where the secondary meet-up is occurring.

5. Leader Responsibilities

As group leader, you have two responsibilities: Establish Order and Facilitate Networking.

5a. Establish Order

The men who arrive might be nervous; it is up to you to provide them with direction. Instill confidence in them by showing that you are in control of the situation. Clearly lay out the standards of deportment that are expected; tell them to return any weapons or drugs to their vehicle if they have any (and not to tell you about such things if they do have them). Lay out a plan for the evening, and explain what it will be to them. Advise them on the secondary location, and recommend the above security precautions.

5b. Facilitate Networking

This is just the first meeting of many; as group leader it is your duty to learn who these men are, what their contact information is, and ensure that the meeting goes smoothly. As written in the Ten Principles of Leadership, "Get to know your soldiers and promote their welfare" and "train your men to work as a team". As time goes on, leaders within the group will arise organically, but for this meetup the responsibility is on your shoulders. We are likely to have a very diverse group, ensure that it is inclusive. Keep track of everybody and do your best to remember their names and characters. Collect contact information, and arrange for meetings in the future.

With all of that said, have fun guys! We need to keep everything tied down tight so that nothing spins out of control, but in all honestly I'm not that worried about things. Remember that we're smarter, faster, and more determined than our opponents. Remember the OODA loop – Observe, Orient, Decide, Act. Pay attention to your environment, notice which things are changing, remain vigilant, and think faster than our opponents. And always remember – if you're getting flak, that means you're over the target.

Read Next: Frequently Asked Questions For International Meetup Day On February 6

Davis M.J. Aurini
Davis was trained as a Historian at McMaster University, and as an Infantry soldier in the Canadian Forces. An author, strategist, Catholic medievalist, and an entrepreneur, his writing can be found at Stares at the World.

ANNOUNCEMENT: The Meetup On February 6 Is Cancelled

February 3, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I can no longer guarantee the safety or privacy of the men who want to attend on February 6, especially since most of the meetups can not be made private in time. While I can't stop men who want to continue meeting in private groups, there will be no official Return Of Kings meetups. The listing page has been scrubbed of all locations. I apologize to all the supporters who are let down by my decision.

For more information on Roosh, visit his Wikipedia page, official bio, or unofficial resource at Daryush Valizadeh dot com. He is currently developing the neomasculinity platform for men through the Poznan Institute, named after a city in Poland where it was conceived.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Everything You Wanted To Know About Roosh But Were Afraid To Ask

February 4, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Q: "Are you a rapist?"

No. I've never been accused or charged with rape by a single woman. My macho sex writing has been grossly taken out of context by feminists and SJWs. I may be a chauvinist, but I'm not a rapist. See: The Accusation That I'm A Rapist Is A Malicious Lie.

Q: "Why do you want to legalize rape?"

I don't. Legalizing rape is a notion so insanely absurd I never imagined that people would take it 100% seriously, including politicians. I don't believe any form of physical violence against men or women should be legalized. I've said that "How To Stop Rape" was a satirical thought experiment so many times that it's clear to me current misinterpretation of it by the media is deliberate.

Q: "Why do you want to teach guys how to rape?"

I teach guys how to be sexually attractive. This includes being confident and masculine, traits that women say they don't love, but respond favorably to anyway. There is not a single known case of one of my supporters being involved in a crime that has been linked to my writing. If there was, the media would certainly report on it.

Q: "I still hate your fucking guts."

Instead of focusing your anger on real problems in your neighborhood, city, and country, the media has made you emotional against a man who poses absolutely no threat to anyone. I'm being used as a target so that you can expend your rage on me instead of other entities that are genuinely hurting your standard of living.

Q: "Are you ashamed of writing that article?"

More lament than shame. I haven't messed around with rape topics since that article was written a year ago because people absolutely lose their minds when it comes to rape. Objectively, as a writer, that article was a raging success, a once-in-a-lifetime perfect storm. Writers can only dream of getting that kind of exposure. Realistically, I am disappointed at the flood of negative attention that will now put me in the "rape proponent" box for the rest of my life. I'll have to tell my future kids one day that daddy is not actually a rapist.

Q: "You're lying! You were serious!"

A man right now can claim he's a woman and everyone is supposed to immediately call him a "she," even though he's still biologically male, but when another man claims that an article that came from his brain using his own words had a certain intention, he's a "liar." People will believe what satisfies their existing world view.

Q: "Mate if you come to my city I'm going to kill you."

I have noticed that the cities and countries that are most eager to ban or threaten me are ones that I've long advised heterosexual men to escape from (Canada, UK, Australia).

Q: "Are you a real life troll or not?"

I was given a gift to be interesting and sensational. I can wrap subtle truths in packaging that gets massive attention. I don't do it on purpose—it just comes out naturally in my personality and writing. It's not something I can just turn off.

Q: "Are you a pick up artist?"

I started my writing career with pickup. My current work features it much less so I don't presently identify as a "PUA," though I stand by my older work.

Q: "Are you a men's rights activist?"

No, but I sympathize with their views. I would call myself a neomasculinist.

Q: "Well I don't think you're actually pro rape, so what's your platform neomasculinity about?"

It's simply the ideas of traditional masculinity combined with modern truths of the world, including the truth that the mainstream establishment is actively marginalizing heterosexual men. You can read details about neomasculinity at "What Is Neomasculinity?"

The ideas in that document contain my true beliefs.

Q: "How can I learn more?"

Check out Return Of King's Top 35 Articles. Then check out my top 50 articles listed in the right column of my personal blog. I also have an active Youtube channel, Facebook, and Twitter.

(Via rooshv.com: Everything You Wanted To Know About Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh But Were Afraid To Ask)

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why International Meetup Day Was Cancelled

February 5, 2016 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

> Know your enemy and know yourself, find naught in fear for 100 battles.
> ~Sun Tzu

On February 3rd, 2016, Roosh was forced to cancel the International RoK meetup, scheduled for February 6. The mainstream media had been reporting on this men's only happy hour as a "rape legalization group" for days, stirring up social justice warriors, inciting violent groups in several cities, and even receiving public condemnation from mayors, governors, and legal organizations. The risk had become unacceptable; as Roosh said, "This isn't our Alamo." Even a single man fired from his job due to SJW or Antifa doxing is one man too many. Not for a meetup; not for this.

A tactical retreat was the only sane option; however our enemies revealed quite a bit about themselves in this process, and we learned a little something about ourselves as well. With that in mind, it is worth considering what lessons can be taken from all of this.

Our Enemies Are Legion

Our enemy shows traits of both extreme cunning, and mindless conformity. On the one hand, they react like pod people, holding out their arm and shrieking when they spot any crimethink. They become completely unreasonable in such a state, babbling logical contradictions within the same sentence, admitting something is false and then immediately affirming its truth, demanding that law enforcement throw any and all civil liberties by the wayside, and working themselves into emotional hysterics.

On the other hand, they display extreme cunning. During Gamgergate it was revealed that the gaming press were coordinating behind the scenes, deciding which topics would be discussed and promoted, and which ones would be censored and dropped into the memory hole. Given that on February 2nd six nearly identical articles were published throughout the Australian press within hours of one another, all describing Return of Kings as a “Rape Group,” it is a near certainty that the Australian press is similarly controlled by collusion between the reporters on secret message boards. (It turns out that one company, Fairfax Media, controls nearly the entire press in the country.)

Readers' most viewed

The Sydney Morning Herald
Top 5 National articles
1. Supporters of anti-woman group Return of Kings to meet in Sydney
2. 'Legal rape' group Return of Kings leader Daryush 'Roosh' Valizadeh announces he will come to Australia
3. After school care in Sydney: Hundreds of children stranded as NSW government fails to approve centres
4. Supporters of anti-woman group Return of Kings to meet in Perth
5. Jesinta Campbell, dancers and Barangaroo: what to expect from Myer and David Jones this winter

THE AGE
Top 5 National articles
1. Supporters of anti-woman group Return of Kings to meet in Sydney
2. 'Legal rape' group Return of Kings leader Daryush 'Roosh' Valizadeh announces he will come to Australia
3. Cy Walsh pleads not guilty to murder of father Phil in Supreme Court
4. Jesinta Campbell, dancers and Barangaroo: what to expect from Myer and David Jones this winter
5. When a country school closes, it takes a town's heart with it brisbanetimes.com.au

Top 5 National articles
1. 'Legal rape' group Return of Kings leader Daryush 'Roosh' Valizadeh announces he will come to Australia
2. Retired public servants on $120,000 a year claiming aged pension: govt
3. Cy Walsh pleads not guilty to murder of father Phil in Supreme Court
4. This man beat Centrelink's system and he says you can too
5. Jesinta Campbell, dancers and Barangaroo: what to expect from Myer and David Jones this winter

canberratimes.com.au
Top 5 National articles
1. Supporters of anti-woman group Return of Kings to meet in Sydney
2. The 'integrated leadership system' has no place in government recruitment
3. Public service retirees set for pension shock
4. A worthy New Year's resolution for public service managers: tackle staff underperformance
5. Cy Walsh pleads not guilty to murder of father Phil in Supreme Court

WAtoday
Top 5 National articles
1. Supporters of anti-woman group Return of Kings to meet in Perth
2. 'Legal rape' group Return of Kings leader Daryush 'Roosh' Valizadeh announces he will come to Australia
3. Cy Walsh pleads not guilty to murder of father Phil in Supreme Court
4. Jesinta Campbell, dancers and Barangaroo: what to expect from Myer and David Jones this winter
5. This man beat Centrelink's system and he says you can too

Asking if this was coincidence or enemy action misses the point.

To coordinate to this degree demands sober intelligence, and yet misconstruing and overreacting to a satirical article precludes such intelligence. Trying to separate our opponents into two groups – the manipulators and the proles – is similarly inadequate. There is too much consistency. Both the upper and lower echelons share the same criteria for what is considered a threat.

This is what it looks like when narcissists flock

Most human beings subsume their emotional intelligence beneath their reasoning; when encountering another person they prioritize the spoken word over body language, and it takes effort to “listen to one’s gut” and spot the liars in our midst. This is why dogs can often be a good judge of character; an animal isn’t distracted by logic, it will immediately pick up on hidden, hostile motives instead of the advertising spiel.

Narcissists are the reverse. They will frequently contradict themselves, even denying outright facts that are presented to them, while simultaneously manipulating people with incredible precision. Where the healthy human slaves their animal brain to the frontal lobe, the narcissist is a beast who’s able to utilize the higher functions to serve the lower; being “triggered” is an open admission that the lizard is in control.

The behaviour we’ve witnessed over the past week is perfectly explained by flocks of narcissists, organized online, exercising vicious cunning with a human’s capacity for abstract thought. They are the metaphorical lizard people, dressed in skin suits, unreasonable and unrepentant. Those of us on the front lines have seen their true faces a hundred times before; after this past week, their nature has been revealed to all who had eyes to see.

Their goal is pandemonium. So long as it is chaotic, degraded, cheap, infectious, and ugly, they will endorse it, and they will use any tactic to achieve it: violence, lies, false philosophies, and pretend victimhood. They will be crying and vulnerable one moment, and coldly murderous the next. They are vicious, they are legion, and they're organized as only animals who have known sin could possibly be.

We see you.

A choir needs a conductor

Through organizing and battling against their propaganda over the past week, we have been forced to address questions about ourselves. What are our motives? What do we hope to achieve? What is the end-state that we seek after beyond immediate material and ego satisfaction? We are men who believe in the cardinal virtues of justice, wisdom, courage, and temperance, and we pursue patriarchy, lawfulness, and freedom. We accept the responsibilities of masculinity; we accept the necessity of law and order; and we accept the bracing cold wind of working without a net.

That and $2 will buy you a cup of coffee.

Patriarchy, lawfulness, and freedom are respectively the products of charity, love, and hope; the theological virtues. Man on his own is incapable of achieving these for one simple reason: people respond to incentives – even us.

What were the upsides of this meetup? Making new friends, networking with men who work in other industries, and starting the process of building a community, something sorely lacking in this atomized age. The only substantive difference between this and a MeetUp.com hiking group would have been a greater degree of philosophical coherence and commitment (and even then – the sort of people who will leave their homes to go hiking are the sort who agree with us on most topics already).

What were the downsides? Assault, doxing, online smear campaigns, trumped up charges leading to arrest, and even death at the hands of on unstable lunatic. As great as the happy hour would have been, it wasn't worth the potential cost.

This is only sensible, and yet it's this sensibility that becomes our greatest weakness. Cancelling the happy hour was nothing more than a tactical retreat in the face of overwhelming odds, but it brings us to an important question: when is it ever worth the price? Why spend the time seeking out virtuous men instead of scheming against rich men in your own field? Why bother denouncing feminism, when approving of it will yield casual sex? Why bother searching for a woman worth marrying – passing up many guaranteed opportunities for short-term pleasure along the way – for something so uncertain, and so difficult to maintain?

"Self improvement is masturbation," says Tyler Durden, as he points towards the cardinal virtues and the honors they'll win us in this world; but what good is the world if you forfeit your own soul? "Now self destruction…"

Truth, beauty, and spirituality; these are goals worthy of self abnegation.

What we're fighting for doesn't make sense when we could satisfy our need for struggle through video games. Demanding freedom doesn't make sense when we could sit around on the government dole. Seeking out the difficult responsibilities of patriarchy doesn't make sense when the cows are giving away the milk for free – unless if there is some higher calling that we're all responding to.

We can't achieve any of these things as individuals; every interaction we engage in, every moment of every day, incentivizes against the loyalty and community we so desperately need to become our best possible selves. This spiritual yearning for both freedom and responsibility is what unites us, and pushes us beyond the merely rational; this world of endless Prisoners' Dilemma games weighted in such a way to favour defection because at least that's predictable.

How do we do it without exposing ourselves to their attacks? That is the question we need to be asking ourselves. Through introspection we will hear the voice of our conductor, and learn what song it is that we are meant to sing.

Tactical retreat, strategic victory

By attempting to set up this meetup, we effectively sent out a small expeditionary force—only to discover an entire division hiding behind the next ridge. They responded to our reconnaissance team with salvos of artillery, displaying their bellicosity for all to see, allowing us to realize the breadth and depth of the forces arrayed against us. They failed to annihilate us, and they gave away their position; meanwhile our position will be strengthened as more men flock to our cause, first out of curiosity, and then out of righteous outrage.

The time for debating our opponents is over. We are going to replace them. We are going to win.

A final word for all of those who attacked us, slandered us, and threatened us; we, the men who would defend you against those who would enslave and exploit you; we who fight, not for ourselves, but for the future. We will remember who you are, and we are a larger chorus than you know.

That ex-boyfriend who stole your heart? One of us. That charming married man at your office, with the beautiful wife? One of us. That wise mentor who helped you more than you'll than you'll ever know? One of us. And we saw what you said about us, without even knowing who we were.

The battle for civilization will be neither quick nor easy. We will win, but not without great struggle and many casualties amongst those who refused to pick a side. So remember something: when you or your womenfolk are being viciously assaulted and raped by third world savages whom you defended while decrying us—or by some gestapo thug, whom you empowered to oppress us, their breath rancid with garlic and rotting teeth—

That is the future you chose by standing against men of virtue.

> Whatever town or village you enter, look for a worthy person in it and stay there until you leave. As you enter a house, wish it peace. If the house is worthy, let your peace come upon it; if not, let your peace return to you. Whoever will not receive you or listen to your words – go outside that house or town and shake the dust from your feet. Amen, I say to you, it will be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah at the day of judgment than for that town.
> Mathew 10:10-10:15

Read More: How We Can Use Sun Tzu's Strategies To Implement Neomasculine Principles

Davis M.J. Aurini
Davis was trained as a Historian at McMaster University, and as an Infantry soldier in the Canadian Forces. An author, strategist, Catholic medievalist, and an entrepreneur, his writing can be found at Stares at the World.

How To Incite Human Beings To Violence Through False Headlines

February 6, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

First I'll show you fifty headlines with lies in them, and then I'll show you a sample of threats that they transmutated into.

1.

Advocates appalled, urge locals to denounce 'Pro-Rape' meetings in KC and internationally

2.

The Telegraph HOME | NEWS | SI

Lifestyle | Women

Politics | Work | Family | Sex | Life | Health | Columnists

Lifestyle › Women › Life

'Pro-rape' pick-up artist Roosh V is mobilising British men. Here's why you shouldn't care 3.

HKFP

HONG KONG FREE PRESS

Master of Social Science
Nonprofit M
The University of Hong Kong

CATEGORIES | HOT TOPICS | HONG KONG | SINOBEAT | COMMENT | VOICES | LENS

HONG KONG | GRYD & GENDER

HK event planned on Feb 6 for supporters of blogger seeking to 'legalise rape'

4.

'Pro-rape' blogger organizes meetings for men across U.S. including Harrisburg

5.

Next on Patch » 10 Mind-Numbing Facts About Illinois' Growing Budget Deficit

Pro-Rape Men's Group Plans Meeting in Chicago

International gatherings for the Return of Kings are planned for Saturday night, including one in Rogers Park.

Chicago, IL

Like Share 34

By TIM MORAN (Patch Staff) - February 3, 2016 8:07 pm ET 6.

Group advocating legalized rape cancels Austin meetup

by: Philip Jankowski, Austin American-Statesman Updated: Feb 3, 2016 - 10:27 PM

7.

'Pro-rape' blogger organizes meetings for men across U.S. — including Seattle, Everett

CINCINNATI.com
PART OF THE USA TODAY NETWORK Search
HOME
NEWS
SPORTS
BUSINESS
THINGS TO DO COMMUNITIES
WEATHER
ARCHIVES
CINCINNATI USA
'Legal rape' blogger plans Sharonville meet-up
Rebecca Burns, rebburns@enquirer.com
3:40 p.m. EST February 3, 2016

8.

the Frisky
SEX
RELATIONSHIPS
CELEBS
STYLE
ENTERTAINMENT
NEWS
ModCloth
Free Mak
Get it with
"Legal Rape" Promoting Misogynists To Hold Worldwide Meet-ups This Saturday 9.

Legalise rape in the home campaigner faces petition to stop his Cardiff meeting
By South Wales Evening Post | Posted: February 03, 2016

10,

CTV
NEWS
VANCOUVER
NEWS
VIDEO
WEATHER
MORNING LIVE
MORE CONTESTS
ABOUT LOCAL
Fans of blogger who promotes legalized rape plan Vancouver event

11.

Global NEWS

National Change Location

TV News Programs
Newscasts & Videos

LOCAL NEWS

Mayors blast 'pro-rape' men's meetings planned for Canadian cities

12.

Thursday, February 4, 2016

Shropshire Star

Home | News | Sport | Entertainment | What's On | Business | Education | Farming | Motors | Property | Family Announcements

Cash For Your Community | Crime | Local News | Blogs | Telford | Shrewsbury | Oswestry | Ludlow | Bridgnorth | Mid Wales | Georgia

PUBLISHED: February 3, 2016 07:39 LAST UPDATED: February 3, 2016 09:23

'Rape advocate' event in Shrewsbury sparks fury

A man accused of advocating rape who also claims to offer advice on how to pick up women has organised a supporters' meeting in Shrewsbury.

13.

DAILY Xtra

NEWS & IDEAS | ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT | BLOGS & COLUMNS | SEX | EVENTS | VIDEO | TRAVEL

NEWS & IDEAS > OPINION

'Legal rape' fanboys to host covert meetings in 10 Canadian cities

14.

Roosh V has argued for the legalization of rape in past blog posts. Photo: Wikimedia Commons

Women plan protests against 'pro-rape' pickup artists

Published: 03 Feb 2016 17:33 GMT+01:00
Updated: 03 Feb 2016 17:33 GMT+01:00

15.

News > World

'Neomasculinist' Group Meets Worldwide to Legalize Rape

16.

The Independent

TOP STORIES SOCIO-POLITICAL COMMUNITY & FAMILY RACE & RELIGION FINANCE & T

Where can I give my feedback on national policies – CPF, housing, transport, education, MediShield Life and education issues?

Go to REACH.GOV.SG

Home • Community & Family • Fort Canning Park will see the gathering of followers of pro-rape advocate...

Community & Family | Socio-Political

Fort Canning Park will see the gathering of followers of pro-rape advocate V Roosh this weekend

17.

Our new FREE Wales Online app is here!

WalesOnline
WEBSITE OF THE YEAR

JobsWales Search THOUSANDS of jobs at JobsWales

Most read | Live feeds | What's on | News | Rugby | Football | Business | Fun Stuff | In Your Area

TRENDING | TATA JOB LOSSES | PROPERTY WEEK | CRIME | BLACK FRIDAY 2015 | UNITED WAS | STAR WARS | Sport | Homes | TV | Food & Drink | Culture

News • Wales News • Cardiff

Thousands sign petition against Cardiff event organised by 'pick-up artist' who advocates making rape legal on private property 18.

examiner.com

MENU

In News: Top News Strange News Politics Sci

NEWS / TOP NEWS

See also: Top news, Sex culture, Sex

Bob Knudsen
News Examiner

Men's Rights Activist Roosh V. advocates legalizing rape

Like (0)

Next: Donald Trump: Bailout not as Trump as his most unfavorable candidate ...

WINDSOR STAR

NEWS | BUSINESS | OPINION | SPORTS | ARTS | LIFE | CAREERS | ORITS

NEWS | LOCAL NEWS | FEATURED | TOP VIDEOS | READER LETTERS | MIKE GRASTON CARTOONS

ALL+ MODERN

UP TO 65% OFF

modern furniture & décor

SHOP NOW

'Pro-rape' blogger urges like-minded men to meet in Windsor 20.

EXPRESS

HOME | NEWS | SHOWBIZ & TV | SPORT | COMMENT | FINANCE

UK | WORLD | POLITICS | ROYAL | HISTORY | SCIENCE | WEIRD | NATURE | OBITUARIES

Home News UK Pick up artist who wants to 'legalise rape' to hold anti women meetings a Half naked woman goes FLYING after tipping acrobat kicks her in...

Gang of migrant men attack pensioners 'who stood up for woman...

'Get over yourself' Piers Morgan slams Zayn Malik on Good...

Pick-up artist who wants to 'legalise rape' to hold anti-women meetings across Britain

21.

THE NATIONAL NEWS POLITICS SPORT BUSINESS

Cat Boyd has been accused of inviting a public lynch by rape apologist Roosh V

The National's columnist Cat Boyd is targeted by Roosh V's rape advocate mob

FEBRUARY 4TH, 2016 12:08 AM KIRSTEEN PATERSON

22.

Winnipeg metro

HOME
NEWS
Winnipeg
Canada
World
NEWS
ENTERTAINMENT

News / Winnipeg

Winnipeg mayor 'deeply disturbed' by rape advocate's meeting plans this weekend

Roosh V posted on his blog for Winnipeg based supporters to meet at St. Vital Centre this Saturday 23.

THE NATIONAL NEWS POLITICS SPORT BUSINESS

Theresa May: Home Secretary

Theresa May urged to act over pro-rape activist Roosh V

FEBRUARY 3RD, 2016 - 12:30 AM ANDREW LEARMONTH 4 COMMENTS

24.

theguardian

opinion sports soccer tech arts lifestyle fashion business travel environment browse all sections

Nearly 50,000 sign petition to ban pro-rape pick-up artist

25.

WOW 24/7

FILM MUSIC CULTURE FOOD

Home Trending Agenda

30% Off Quad Core Xeon Servers
LIMITED TIME
24/7 Support – Phone, Ticket or Chat
Daily Backups & Rapid Restore – Just $29/mo HIVE CONFIGU

Also in City Blog

literary haunts to xplore in Glasgow

SCOTLAND STANDS UP TO PRO-RAPE 'PICK-UP ARTIST' ROOSH V

26.

International Business Times

News World Business Politics Technology Science Sport Entertainment Opinion Lifestyle Video

UK

Who is Daryush Valizadeh? Ex-scientist and controversial 'legal rape' head of Return of Kings

IBT VIDEO

27.

RT QUESTION MORE

News USA UK Russian politics Business Sport Op-Edge

Are You Waiting for the Market to Turn?
If you have a $500,000 portfolio, download the Bear Market Forecaster's Toolkit, by F columnist Ken Fisher's firm, and learn how to identify a bear market.
Click Here to Download Your Report!
FISHER INVESTM

Home / News /

'Pick-up artist' slammed and ridiculed online over notion of 'legal rape'

28.

teenVOGUE SUBSCRIBE FASHION ENTERTAINMENT BEAUTY MY LIFE

Rearview Camera

NEWS

A "Pro-Rape" Pickup Artist Is Going on a World Tour to Meet His Devoted Fans

29.

THE NATIONAL NEWS POLITICS SPORT

28932

Militant pro-rape 'pick up artist' organises events in Scotland where female gate-crashers risk 'furious retribution'

30.

Our new IRL Wales Online app is here!

WalesOnline

WEBSITE OF THE YEAR

JobsWales Search THOUSANDS of jobs at JobsWales

Most read Live feeds What's on News Rugby Football Business Fun Stuff In Your Area

TRENDING TATA STEEL CRISIS PROPERTY WITH CRIME BLACK FRIDAY DEAL CHRISTMAS STAR WARS Sport Home TV Food & Drink Quizes

News Wales News Cardiff

Man who advocates making rape legal on private property is organising a secret meet-up in Cardiff

31.

Scotland

Pro-rape blogger Roosh V must be banned from Scotland, say protesters 32.

Petition started to ban pick-up artist who 'said rape should be legal'

Jimmy Nsubuga for Metro.co.uk Monday 1 Feb 2016 5:37 pm

1.1k

33.

asiaone20

YLE | SINGAPORE | BUSINESS | MALAYSIA | ASIA | WORLD | FORUM | SEF

AN EVEN BE
Terms and Limitations apply.

ar prices fall in m with COE

Don't go rushing to showrooms even after COE prices plummet

Spotlight now on Swiss bank caught in 1MDB saga

International group pushing to legalise rape may meet in Singapore

34.

EveningStandard. News Football Going Out Lifestyle Showbiz Homes & Property Give to GOSH

News › London

Roosh V: 'Pick-up artist' who has called for legalisation of rape plans London events 35.

36.

37.

38.

39.

[image]

40.

[image]
41.
[image]
42.
[image]
43.
[image]
44.
[image]
45.
[image]
46.
[image]
47.
[image]
48.
[image]
49.
[image]
50.
[image]

The orgy of lies above led to the following output:

1.
[image]
2.
[image]
3.
[image]
4.
[image]
5.
[image]
6.
[image]

7.

[image]

8.

[image]

9.

[image]

10.

[image]

The above is only a tiny sample of messages that insinuated threats or violence. There were dozens more.

Over a million people raged this week from reading lies and malicious distortions. To me it seemed as if “sleepers” were being “activated” to go after a pre-determined enemy. They landed some punches, I’ll admit, but I’m still here, and so is our message.

Read Next: Worldwide Effort To Shut Down International Meetup Day Is Under Way

[image]
Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Honor Killings May Proceed While We Get Shut Down For Organizing A Happy Hour

February 6, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

If Roosh became Supreme Imam Valizadeh and I reinvented myself as David el-Garrett, Senior News Writer for Return of the Caliphate, SJWs would not threaten our readers and supporters with rape, serious injury, and death, let alone promise violent protests at our events. How do I know this? Because SJWs in Sydney and Melbourne in particular, along with those in the US, Canada, New Zealand and Scotland, have utterly failed to raise anything more than a whisper against truly violence-advocating Islamist group Hizb ut-Tahrir.

Unlike Roosh, who has reiterated for an eternity, including this week, that the "legal rape" article was a satire, Hizb ut-Tahrir and comparable groups are allowed to preach a dead serious political programme of religious intolerance and the incitement of system-wide violence without any prospect of fury from rabid Australian and other SJWs. I challenge Sydney hate mob organizer Elizabeth Tory and people of her ilk to show evidence of massive protests and serious threat factories they stirred up against Hizb ut-Tahrir, which has regular meetings in Australian metropolitan areas.

Right now, for example, we are getting rape and death threat "fan mail" like this, all because we wanted to have beers with fellow men:

Hizb ut-Tahrir has defended the “right” of honor killings against women, such as when a girl falls in love with a man her parents do not want her to marry. It has additionally called for a savage and never-ending jihad against the Jews. This group not only exists in Sydney, Melbourne and other cities across the Western world, it has been invited to multiple Australian universities.

Curiously, a number of columnists from left-of-center papers, such as Melbourne’s The Age and The Sydney Morning Herald, have previously defended the group’s right to appear at events. One very notable defense spoke of its role in the “marketplace of ideas.” Apparently this same courtesy does not extend to Return of Kings, even when we use satire.

Why didn’t SJWs threaten those attending this “meeting” and ones like it?

Where’s SJW Wally/Waldo?

In 2012, a massive Islamist protest occurred in the streets of Central Sydney, with attendees promising to behead those who "insulted" the Muslim prophet Mohammed. This one has been followed by countless more since, in almost every Western city. Every time, where were the SJWs, keen to defend tolerance, peace, and love in the world? They simply weren't there and certainly didn't even appear after. This is despite these Islamist groups frequently very explicitly condoning honor killings and other practices SJWs supposedly despise.

So why are SJWs going crazy only over us? Because they know we have no interest in any violence. They and their media enablers have not cited a single shred of evidence from a single threat made by any ROK reader. SJWs have not rallied against the "behead Islam's enemies" marches because they a) feared for their safety, and b) they dare not interfere with religious and ethnic minorities holding onto protected views, no matter what they say. Big bad Western democracies and the rights of peaceful groups like ours to assemble are what they really hate.

Plenty of online SJWs have said how they are "scared" of us but are still doing everything in their power to make violent threats publicly and advertise their impending attendance at rallies. Why could we not see the same thing at these Islamist protests?

Multiple Australian universities have welcomed Hizb ut-Tahrir, even as university students threaten rape, death and injury upon ROK followers wanting to meet for beer

In 2015, the University of Western Sydney, renamed over the last few months as Western Sydney University, allowed its Muslim Students' Association to host Hizb ut-Tahrir. So keen was the university to appease its guests that it acquiesced to the demand that women be segregated and forced to sit behind the men in the auditorium. Moreover, all this came after the group and its global affiliates defended honor killings on women and exhorted followers to take up the jihad against the Jews. It became clear afterwards that the university had broken its own rules in allowing the event to occur.

The Australian National University in Canberra was also the site of an event featuring Hizb ut-Tahrir. Academics from that institution eventually withdrew from a planned "dialogue," but one must wonder if such a retraction of participation had more to do with non-SJW public outcry than the individuals' genuine disapproval in taking part. All in all, what we are left with is an impression of SJW hordes and their obsequious white knights wilfully calling for violence and repression when and where it suits them. They entirely manufacture a reason when it comes to Return of Kings but turn a constantly blind eye to Hizb ut-Tahrir.

There are dozens and dozens of meet-ups that were being organized by ROK before their cancelation, yet SJWs seem to think they have proof that every single person wanted to attend them in order to rape, which is both patently false and the biggest mass instance of defamation I have ever heard of. Meanwhile, expect the red carpet treatment if you're from Hizb ut-Tahrir or a similar group that actually supports violence.

Stay tuned for more sad and deranged SJW lunacy

ROK has begun documenting some of the thousands of threats involving rape, physical harm and even death being directed at our supporters. We will start releasing more of them in article form soon.

In the interim, help us call out the SJWs' histrionic and criminal double standards, which ignore or repeatedly condone real calls for violence, by contributing to the catalogue of violence we are collating on the forum or by emailing evidence in.

Read More: The Establishment's Narrative Is In Shambles

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why The Media Manufactured Outrage Against Our Meet Up

February 7, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Who is 'Roosh V' and why is everyone protesting against his events?

Wednesday, February 03, 2016

ICYMI a men-only group – founded by a controversial American writer and "pick-up artist" nicknamed Roosh V – is planning to hold worldwide meet-ups with its supporters, including nine events in the UK.

Some have wondered why the media opted to spend time giving attention to our meetups, rather than directing their time to more pressing newsworthy issues. In this article, I will explain the real reason why this meet up drew so much attention from the media, and what this means for the future of Return Of Kings.

Media reports resulted in a shut down of the meet ups planned among our followers. Return Of Kings was founded by Roosh, who began his career writing about how to attract women. More recently, Roosh has written in-depth articles questioning the established narrative. These range from investigating the causes of plummeting Western birthrates, exploring the cycles societies go through on their way to collapse, and connecting the Hegelian Dialectic to modern social movements. This questioning caused the our planned meet ups to be shut down.

The System And The Timeline

From this point onward, the terms System, Machine, and Establishment will be used interchangeably. These terms are defined as anything that perpetuates the dominant narrative and includes the media, governments, corporations, and the elite.

Here is a time line of meet up-related announcements from Return of Kings:

- January 4: Meet up day is announced. The media ignored it.

- January 13: Cities with meet up locations announced. Over 200 men agreed to host the event. No media attention.
- January 19: Full city listing released. 165 meetings in 43 countries. At this point the Establishment is getting nervous.
- January 28: Return of Kings releases a FAQ for men interested in attending a meet up. The Establishment realizes it is really happening.
- February 1: Media around the world put out false reports about the meet up that falsely claim it's a "rape" gathering. Snopes debunked these lies.
- February 3: Meet up is officially shut down.

As you can see, when the meet up was initially announced, not a word of it was reported by the media. It was only when they recognized that it was a real and legitimate threat to the established order that they used smears, slander, and outright lies to ensure its elimination.

Of course, the media itself did not close down these meet ups. The Machine knew that they could not legally stop men from meeting each other and having a drink. So they did something far more terrifying: they used fabrications to mobilize the masses.

The Establishment intentionally took one article written by Roosh in which he proposed a thought experiment to increase the safety of women by "legalizing rape on private property." The elites took a gamble that taking that article out of context and exaggerating it to the fullest extent would create a firestorm—notice that few of the slanderous articles actually linked to the piece in question, where any reasonable person could see that it was not written earnestly.

The media twisted the followers of ROK and Roosh into "rape supporters" simply because of one article that was obvious satire. Jonathan Swift once wrote that poor children should be eaten by the wealthy. Back in the 18th century, no one was stupid enough to take Swift's essay seriously.

ROK has pointed out flaws and fabrications that exist in the Establishment. "Glitches in the matrix" for you nerds who are reading. Many are familiar with the "red pill" idea of the truth about sexual interactions only because of Roosh. His more recent writing is a more direct threat. Some men learning how to get laid won't attract the attention of the Machine, but a few million dollars lost on a movie like Star Wars will draw their gaze.

Roosh's ideas are not compatible with the established order, and he has many followers. This is a very real threat to the Machine, which must control the narrative. Throughout history, people who have their way of thinking threatened lash out. Their way of thinking was implanted by the System. Socrates, Jesus, Galileo, Malcolm X, Salman Rushdie, and the staff of Charlie Hebdo are a few notable targets of people who had their way of thinking challenged.

Notice that the mob response to Roosh's writing was exactly the same as the Islamist response to cartoons. Burn the heretic. Eliminate the apostate. Kill the non-believer. Same switches, different triggers. SJWs and Islamists aren't the only people with these switches inside of them. Bear that in mind the next time you encounter someone with whom you disagree.

One of these men is Roosh, the other is a migrant rapist.

Here is the thought process of the System, laid out in clear terms:

> He has seen through some of our manipulations and has a large following. His writing staff caused the Hollywood arm of our Machine to lose a large sum of money. This man is too influential. Now he is encouraging others to meet with each other. This is dangerous. Let's push the "rape button" on the masses. They will do our work for us. Contact the media.

The Machine Pulled The Strings

While the sheep were stirred up into hatred and anger, many of them sending death threats to Roosh, ROK writers, and his followers, real news was going on. The Trans-Pacific Partnership was passed in New Zealand, which threatens the digital rights of internet users. ISIS has been using the migrant crisis to smuggle terrorists into Germany. Unemployment is increasing among native born Americans. Here is how it happened:

- The System used journalists to lie about our meet up
- Journalists got to report on a “big story” and received bonuses for extra clicks
- The System used us to distract the sheep from what was really going on in the world
- The Establishment kept the outrage machine oiled
- Elites made more money by pushing the “rape button” on the masses
- The sheep got their dopamine squirts and virtue-signaling for doing what the media tells them to do
- All along real news was occurring. In the span of time during the meet up outrage, several thousand more migrants entered the West. Cologne Part II is coming.

Induce Controlled Rage In The Masses

There is a darker element to all of this. There has been brewing anger in the West over the migrant crisis, especially after the Rape of Cologne. But people have been afraid to speak out against migrants for fear of being called racist. The Machine isn't stupid, it knows that native Westerners have this underlying concern and anger.

Once again, here is the thought process of the System laid out in simple terms:

> We have now allowed 2 million migrants into Europe in less than a year. People are scared. This Cologne thing has the masses riled up and they want to express their anger. How can we induce their rage in a controlled way, without threatening our policy of open borders? This Roosh guy is the ticket. We can use him to diffuse anger about the migrant rape spree by re-directing it to him rather than us or the migrants. Roosh will be their release valve. Contact the media.

The anger Westerners felt toward the migrants was sublimated into anger toward ROK supporters. Interestingly, because of Roosh's ethnic background many angry protesters seemed to link him with Islam. You can bet they were thrilled that the media and SJWs were essentially giving them a free pass to blow off steam by expressing rage against a "stand in" for all of the Muslims currently raping women and children in Europe.

We were an acceptable target for them to redirect their hatred and violence, a useful idiot to vent pent-up emotion caused by an actual menace to society. We served our purpose.

Summary

In sum, first, the System was fearful of Roosh connecting so many dots. Second, their attention was drawn when many men wanted to discuss those dots. Third, to shut it all down, they lied to mobilize the masses to do their work for them. Fourth, the System got the benefit of using us to redirect anger about the migrant rape crisis. Finally, the narrative remained mostly intact.

There is an upside, the magnitude of which remains to be seen. With so much attention guided to Return Of Kings, our readership has grown. Our tenets have been spread far and wide. While it is true that some never read again and some will dislike what they see, many others will stay and join the club. Never before has Return Of Kings been on everyone's lips this much.

Read More: Why International Meet Up Day Was Cancelled

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

How Irrational Fear Is Being Used To Control Your Behavior

February 7, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

> The only thing we have to fear, is fear itself — Franklin Delano Roosevelt, US President

Living in 2016 on planet earth is historically the safest time in history. Life expectancies are at record levels. Despite the very real problems of war, poverty, oppression, and inequality that exist today, and that we should all strive to minimize, as Pulitzer prize winning author and Harvard psychology professor Dr. Steven Pinker stated "Today we may be living in the most peaceful era in our species' existence." In an excellent TED talk, Dr. Pinker details how society was far more violent, deadly, and dangerous in the past, and over the past 2,000 years there has been a steady increase in living conditions, safety, and peace.

And yet, the news is full of stories of impending danger, threat, and violence. And while there are bad things going on in the world today, while the US is in dire economic conditions, while politicians constantly threaten and scare the public with doomsday scenarios, and while there are armed conflicts going on throughout the world, in the grand scheme of things, life has never been better. And yet many are paralyzed with fear.

Fear Of Rape Is At Least 1,000 Times Larger Than Rape Itself

Fear of rape, which practically 100% of college age women are exposed to through numerous campus education programs, media, and friends, is far more dangerous to young women than actual rape, which was reported at a rate of 0.02% according to 2013 FBI crime statistics in the USA. But college women are routinely told that as many as "one in four" of them will be a victim of sexual violence, when in fact, the data comes nowhere near that number. And this false statistic has been repeated by trusted authorities and people in positions of power, all the way up to the oval office, with President Obama stating "It is estimated that 1 in 5 women on college campuses has been sexually assaulted…" (Jan 22, 2014).

The Washington Post investigated the source of the “one in five” statistic and found that it came from a flawed 2007 Campus Sexual Assault Study, which had several errors, including a) it paid students for participating, b) the response rate was too low to be statistically meaningful c) only two college campuses were surveyed c) it was a web based survey (web polls are never considered scientifically meaningful), d) it encouraged those who were victims to complete the survey, skewing the results, and e) it used a broad definition of harassment which included receiving a kiss you didn’t want (I’m a victim of this atrocity).

Even considering all these flaws, only 6.9% of respondents reported experiencing physically forced sexual assault, which is nowhere near one in five, even of the small sample that logged on to the site.

Even The Study’s Authors Reject “One in Five” Claim

Christopher Krebs, who led the study for the US Justice Department, stated in a Time magazine article in 2014 that “There are caveats that make it inappropriate to use the 1-in-5 number…”

A followup study was commissioned by the US Justice Department in 2014 to clarify the prior survey. The results painted a far different picture, and one that seems more believable to the casual reader. The rate of rape or sexual assault for college age females (18-24) was about 4.3 per 1,000 in 2013, or 0.4%.

While all women should be aware of the risks of sexual assault, and take steps to prevent it, it is also important not to be paralyzed by fear, and to put the actual risk into perspective. How does the sexual assault risk of ~1 in 230 stack up with some other common fearful things?:

Heart disease:	1 in 5
Getting pregnant from unprotected sex:	1 in 20
Developing skin cancer:	1 in 33
Dying from obesity:	1 in 100
Getting murdered	1 in 200

————————————————————————————–

College age sexual assault	1 in 230
Forced sexual encounter	1 in 4,000
Struck by lightning	1 in 5,500,000
Being killed by terrorism	1 in 20,000,000

Proper Perspective

Notice a trend here? The items at the top of the list are far more common (and indeed more dangerous—four out of the five will kill you and the fifth results in a serious and permanent life change) and yet are given relatively little emphasis, while the items at the bottom of the list are incredibly rare, and yet everyone knows the steps to take to avoid a lightning strike in a thunderstorm, and anyone who has flown an airplane goes through a rigorous set of security procedures in order to prevent the incredibly rare threat of terrorism.

Of course, this doesn’t mean to throw common sense out the window, and put oneself needlessly at risk, but doesn’t the idea that statistically one out of 4,000 people being forcibly raped make you think a bit different about the risk than if it were one in four? The latter number makes it seem like a very rare instance, one where hopefully no one you know or care about will ever become a victim, whereas the latter makes it sound unavoidable that many women you know have already succumbed to an epidemic of raping.

Yes, it's true that not all rapes, like not all crimes of any time, are reported. While we cannot know the true level of unreported crimes, logic and reason would dictate that the real number is much closer to 1 in in 4,000 than 1 in 4. (Aside: Anyone who has been a victim of a rape, or any crime, should report the crime to police immediately).

False Claims Of Rape Advocacy

Over the last week, we have seen another illogical and irrational rape fear emerge: the Return Of Kings community has been smeared by SJWs, media, police departments, and a U.S. Governor for an unfounded and completely false claim that it supports rape. ROK created an event where men who enjoy weight lifting, sports, philosophy, women, and socializing could get together and meet others with similar interests in their community—basically a way to make new friends. It was very similar to what the company meetup.com does for thousands of groups throughout the world on a daily basis.

However, the group was smeared as a “rape advocacy” group, based on a single article written by the site’s founder entitled How To Stop Rape (yes, read that again and let it sink in). Somehow, this article was twisted to mean the exact opposite—how to encourage and advocate for rape. The only explanation is that a few powerful people lied and distorted the truth, and this spiraled out of control, as thousands of others parroted these claims without ever investigating them.

At first, I could not believe that anyone could actually believe there was a group of men openly advocating for a violent criminal act, and that it was clear that anyone accusing ROK of supporting rape was an obvious liar. However, when I saw mainstream media reports and front page news stories claiming ROK was a rape advocacy group, and the Des Moines, Iowa police department and Governor of Texas join in the criticism, it was clear this was more than just a case of dishonest false accusations.

People fall easily into the “if I read it online it has to be true” trap, and the Milgram experiment shows how authority figures are given undue levels of trust. What started as a lie, quickly was echoed and repeated until it appeared real.

One of dozens of threats of violence (source: Reddit)

While the ridiculous rape claim has been proven false numerous times, and the article has always remained available for anyone to read, that didn’t stop the situation from spiraling out of control to the level that violent threats were made in dozens of countries to anonymous men who wanted to get together and meet other strangers who share their interests.

The Reason For The Backlash

One can only speculate on this obscure fixation on rape. Perhaps it was chosen because a rape is one of the worst things that can happen to a woman, and creates strong, immediate visceral reactions, and a rape accusation is a good way to tarnish someone permanently. Perhaps it is because immoral SJWs have unhealthy obsessions with rape and deviant sex. Perhaps the general intelligence has fallen so far that someone actually read the article and concluded it meant How To Encourage Rape.

Perhaps we live in such a safe society, that we must invent faux outrage about things like the type of cups our coffee is served in, what sign to hang on the door of the place we pee and poop, new vocabulary to be used in case we come across rare and almost extinct creatures, or a group of men getting together on a weekend. I think the reason is less important than the goal—preventing men from socializing and bonding together.

I planned on attending, and have no idea what kind of men I would have met. ROK publishes multiple articles every day, and out of the thousand articles published in the last year or so, if I read one I disagreed with, I wouldn't have judged an entire international audience of strangers based on one thing one of the multiple authors on the site wrote. And yet (setting aside the distortion of the article in question), this is exactly what dozens of media outlets, SJWs, politicians, and ordinary people have done. They acted out of fear.

Stop The Fear

It’s time to stop being afraid. It’s time to think for yourself. It’s time to ask questions. Does it sound reasonable that a group of people would openly advocate for a violent crime against half the human race? Is this something that can be easily verified? Is making violent threats against anonymous strangers for beliefs that may differ from yours ok? Are we living such safe, stable lives that we must search for or invent fake outrage instead of focusing on personal betterment and being thankful for our safety, health, family, friends, and happiness?

Fear of the unknown is always the most powerful fear. It is why racism, terrorism, religious wars, and politics have created division and conflict for so long. It is easy to hate “them” without ever examining who “they” are. Stop fearing, read the How To Stop Rape article, and after you realize you were lied to, take a look at some of our other articles, and perhaps they will resonate with you. I suggest you start here:

Read More: The 35 Most Important Articles on Return of Kings

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Roosh Destroys Media At Washington DC Press Conference

February 7, 2016 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

On Saturday night at 7pm, Roosh held a press conference in an undisclosed D.C. location. It was a resounding success. Despite Dr. Oz-level blowback from innumerable mainstream outlets, he was able to point out the hypocrisy and lies of ROK's detractors directly to the faces of several representatives of the mainstream media.

You can see it for yourself below:

Reactions

> The only thing @rooshv has raped is the media. It was a prosecution, not a press conference. https://t.co/1GUPcwod8n pic.twitter.com/wkIbv9UHwt
>
> — Supreme Dark Lord (@voxday) February 7, 2016

> . @rooshv's destruction of the media will be studied by marketing and public relations experts for decades. https://t.co/xZU8sSW5ji
>
> — Mike Cernovich (@Cernovich) February 7, 2016

> The most hated man in the world holds a masterful press conference against the lying media, politicians, & dumb mob. https://t.co/SSskWzHNvm
>
> — Christoph Dollis (@ChristophDollis) February 7, 2016

> Just watched Roosh's press conference. He absolutely destroyed them. Called out every lie by the MSM
>
> — Joshua Graham (@joshgraham704) February 7, 2016

> These journalists were totally unprepared. Weird questions, no research, low energy, all-around incompetence. pic.twitter.com/3Ho0r2CCwX
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 7, 2016

Read More: 4 Colossal Lies That Men Have Been Told Since Birth

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

6 Ways “Misogynists” Do A Better Job At Helping Women Than Feminists

February 8, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Even when we discount the ridiculous accusation that we are advocates of rape, us men at ROK seem to get a bad reputation for being misogynists who hate women for no reason—and I don’t think that’s right at all. If anything, we are the internet’s biggest advocates for women’s safety, health, and happiness. Where feminists have sold women out with false promises by toying with their emotions, we offer practical solutions to the problems that women face today.

1. We want women to be responsible

Blaming is a sign of weakness and dependence. Those who take personal responsibility don't blame others for their problems.

Unlike the feminists, we firmly believe that women should be responsible for themselves. We don't want women to cry, complain, and blame their problems on men or the society at large, and we believe that women are adults who shouldn't be coddled by the government or other men. Personal responsibility—something that feminists are allergic to—is the first step towards standing up for yourself and being independent.

Us men at ROK universally abhor all the white knights and male feminists who treat women like helpless beings who need to be rescued. And at the same time, we are also strongly opposed to women who try to take advantage of us by trying make us fix their life problems for them. Being responsible is the first step towards being a civil and productive member of the society and all women should embrace it, should they truly believe in their own capabilities as adults.

2. We want to prevent rape

If a man ended up like this only to get robbed and taken advantaged of, women would call him stupid and irresponsible.

One of the ways in which we advocate women to be responsible for themselves is in regards to precaution against rape. Instead of teaching women to take personal responsibility for their own safety, feminists would rather scapegoat men and put women in danger by spreading the idiotic idea that telling potential rapists not to rape actually works. By following that sort of asinine logic, we should also leave all our doors unlocked and tell the robbers not to rob to avoid promoting "theft culture"—and anyone who says otherwise would of course be "victim blaming."

We also report about rapes that the feminists and mainstream-media gloss over due to a larger hidden agenda. We have covered the mass rapes that are happening all over Europe while the police there are endangering the women by remaining silent to the attacks. Who's the one promoting "rape culture"?

We know that all the false rape accusations that are happening around the campuses are only leading to the trivialization of rape, which ironically puts women in greater danger than before. Anything feminists do to stop rape only puts women at a greater risk by making them behave irresponsibly while any effort on our part regarding women's safety is viciously attacked. So tell us, who are the real misogynists?

For more on the rape culture hysteria in college campuses, I strongly recommend that you hear what Wendy McElroy, a feminist herself, has to say:

3. We want women to be healthy and attractive

When a woman keeps herself in shape, it’s a win for everyone.

While feminist harpies are encouraging women to stay fat and accept their unhealthy physique, we encourage women to be healthy and stay fit. We also discourage women from vandalizing their own bodies by inking their skin like it’s the Berlin wall or colouring their hair to look like troll dolls. Any woman who purposely destroys her looks is either doing it out of misguided spite or out of their pathological need for attention, both of which are signs of emotional immaturity. We want women to know that such actions are folly and benefits no one except for their own shallow egos.

If merely suggesting that women should try to be healthy and attractive is considered sexist by the feminists, then I suppose the government’s push to warn people about the health hazards of smoking and drinking when pregnant should be considered outright male-fascism. We simply recognize that it’s better for a woman to take care of herself for the benefit of both sexes than for her to engage in a passive-aggressive revolt by desecrating her own body.

4. We want women to be happy

Women are happier at home as wives and mothers.

Although women have seemingly achieved all the things that feminists have desired to achieve including social and political “equality,” improved living standards, historically low levels of violence against women, and so on, women’s happiness has actually been declining in the past few decades. Feminists have no answer for this anomaly, but we at ROK understand that when a woman deviates from her own feminine nature, she is bound to suffer. And really, what’s the point of being “empowered” if you’re only going to be miserable?

A feminine woman is a happy woman and we encourage women to be happy. No one gains when women turn into nasty, feminist bulldogs who attack and threaten men while poisoning everything in their path with their hatred.

5. We want women to be liberated from corporations

“At least I’m not raising children in the comfort of home…”

While feminists brag about liberating women from patriarchal homes, they don’t seem to mind the fact that women are now enslaved in corporations where they are worked to a point of exhaustion. It’s clear to us that feminists are more concerned with destroying families for the sake of their ideology than they are with promoting women’s welfare.

The vast majority of today’s women have bought into the false promise from feminists that they could have it all without any consequences—we merely want to tell women to be realistic about their life choices. Women must know that there is a price to be paid for opting the Sex and the City type of lifestyle and that they must choose between motherhood and career. As they say: Don’t shoot the messenger.

6. We want to foster harmonious relationship with women

Feminists fear harmonious and loving relationship between men and women for that would shatter their narrative that women are oppressed victims of men.

Above all, we want to fight against feminism's greatest crime: Destroying normal and healthy relationship between men and women by starting a gender war. Feminists continue to stoke the flames of hate between the two sexes by creating fantastical notions of "patriarchy" and "rape culture." For them, women are the eternal victims who are also paradoxically strong and independent, while men are the evil oppressors who must be defeated and tamed like rabid animals. How can anyone expect normal relationships to flourish under such toxic belief system?

In spite of how misinterpreted and demonized we are by our detractors, we at ROK desire to foster improved relationship between the sexes. We teach men how to be more attractive to be the man that women desire through self-improvement and game. And because we understand that women today have high standards when it comes to choosing a man to commit to, we strive to improve both the quality and the status of men by providing our readers with guidance (although not just for the purpose of attracting women).

And what has feminism even done for anyone?

Feminism has made women miserable, destroyed relationships, and is in the process of ruining the society as a whole—all under the guise of "equality"—equality which we know is not only outright lies but an open threat to our very freedom to be men. The damage is done, but it's possible for things to get much worse if the tide is not turned soon.

And to this end, we at Return of Kings will fight the good fight to the end—and no amount of shrieking feminist harpies will stop us.

Read More: What If The Feminists Win?

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

This Is The Time To Support Return Of Kings

February 8, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The firestorm that was unleashed after Roosh announced the worldwide meetup exceeded what anyone could have imagined. The message from the attack on the meetups is clear: masculinity is a threat to the established order, and therefore it must be crushed at any cost. This is why Return of Kings needs your support like it never has before.

Why did the media smear Roosh and Return of Kings?

Over time I've become convinced that Western nations are plutocracies—they are governed by a relatively small number of extremely wealthy people. While these elites are not necessarily part of a conspiracy, they do share one common goal: they want to maintain their position of power. Thus, the establishment takes steps to ensure that the lower classes are appeased. We are permitted to act freely as long as it does not pose a threat to the establishment.

However, the elite will move to crush any movement that poses a potential threat. If a group poses a threat to the established order, it will be attacked in the media. If the group is compatible with the establishment, it will be permitted or even fostered.

As long as neomasculinity remained at the level of men working on self-improvement, the elites were willing to leave us alone. But as soon as Roosh announced that men would be getting together in the real world, the elites moved swiftly. In what appears to have been a predetermined plan, the elites unleashed the media in an unprecedented way to put a stop to ROK becoming actualized in real space.

And judging by the depth and hysterical nature of the attack (it was international and included major newspapers, television, and politicians—even the British Parliament), the establishment thinks that the ROK meetups pose a very grave threat indeed.

Media confirmed a dox of Roosh's family

A "journalist" at the Daily Mail confirmed a dox of Roosh's parents that was put out by Anonymous, which exposed his family to threats of violence. In addition to the death threats leveled at Roosh, SJWs also threatened to kill Matt Forney. But it is not just Roosh and the ROK writers who have been attacked, every man who reads ROK has been slandered by the media. We've been called "misogynists," "legal rape advocates," "legal rape fanboys," a "rape advocate mob," and "pro rape pickup artists."

Roosh had to implement greater security on his websites, including this one. He also had to hire a private security company to protect his family from unhinged SJWs (he shortened his family visit and re-located to take heat off of them). All of these expenses have added up to a hefty sum. Roosh estimates that he'll need about $10,000 to pay for extra security costs and server administration that keep us online. That's why we are asking for your support today.

Three ways you can help

1. Drop something in the tip jar. A donation of $100 or more it would be greatly appreciated, but we'd appreciate any donation, no matter how small. You can also donate a small amount every month. If you've gotten some benefit out of reading Return of Kings, please consider chipping in at least a few dollars.

2. Buy ROK advertising for your business. If you have a product to sell, another good way to help is by purchasing advertising on ROK or on the podcast. I would encourage readers to buy from our sponsors if the product meets your needs.

3. Buy Roosh's books. You can do so via Bang Guides or Amazon. If you are already married, consider getting the books for an unmarried friend or relative. If you have already read some of these books, consider placing a review on Amazon.

It also helps to get the message out to more men. Encourage your friends, relatives, and coworkers to check out ROK. Share articles that you agree with on social media. Every little bit that we do to build up our tribe makes us stronger.

Conclusion

The establishment identified ROK as an existential threat to the current degenerate order…

…and, they are right. We are.

We are not going to stop until we bring back the patriarchy. Their attempt to crush us has only made us smarter and more determined to help men achieve success financially, physically, romantically, and spiritually. We want to remake society into a place where both men and women can be happier. If we all work together, we can realize our goal.

Click Here To Make A Donation

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

10 Things You Must Teach Your Future Daughter

February 9, 2016 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

Once a man can see and deal with the bad side of modern girls himself, the next question is obvious. How does he prevent or limit the infestation in his own family? How does he produce the better kind of daughters that are now so tragically rare?

The first thing to realize is that remaining silent and hoping things will work out is really just surrender. Perhaps there was a time in the past when most of the messages your daughter received in the outside world would have been positive and things might have worked themselves out. That is certainly not true today.

Your daughter's information will come from school, external childcare, TV, computer time, time with friends, time with other family members, homework, books and songs. Most likely every one of those channels will be jammed full of negative messages. That's one of the reasons there are so many girls around who are tattooed, pierced, overweight, childless, slutty office drones.

Luckily there are lots of things a man can do to help steer his daughters in the right direction. One of those is simply to talk about better, clean, and appropriate ambitions for girls. But this is not easy to do. It's ineffective to simply bring up the topic for a serious talk out of the blue. The best way is to wait for an example or opportunity to present itself, then just hang a comment about it out there for her to hear.

It's a bullseye if she picks it up, responds, and makes herself receptive to follow up, but don't try to force it. Here are ten which I find effective at presenting positive, family-oriented ideas to girls and which can be endlessly repeated while retaining their impact.

1. No girl can be happy until she is a mother

Happier in the office?

The beauty of this statement is that it’s of wide application and so easy to justify. After all, what girl doesn’t have or observe situations where she or another girl is unhappy with something in her present life? Every time school, or friends, or work are hard for a girl, just imply that her dissatisfaction will be healed when she is a successful, happy mother.

2. Why would a man want to spend his life with a bad woman?

Perfect a good time, not for a lifetime

Every girl naturally wants to be loved and treasured by a high-value man for her whole life. Even the most dreadful feminists generally conceal that as their secret aim. So every time a disgusting troll heaves herself into view, shows her dreadful personality or displays a horrible bit of decoration, point out the offense. It can be kind of fun to notice and describe what doesn't make a man want to spend his life with a girl. It's also very effective for teaching young girls about what is a good idea and what is not.

Occasionally it will even lead to an opportunity to say something about the difference between the short term interest a man might show for the troll and the better, longer term kind he shows for the better girls.

3. Girls are better than boys at looking after families

No man could make a kitchen look this good

Be sparing in trying to tell a girl that she just doesn't have physical ability, temperament, or time off from being a mother to be a SAS commando, astronaut, or fire fighter. It's an uphill struggle and may end up encouraging her to trust the legions of people who will tell her she can and should do anything a boy does.

Instead, flip the problem over and spend time praising the things she can do better than boys. She will love to hear all about it.

4. Some things are just for boys

Wait until she is failing or resenting being made to act like a boy. When she really, really wants to hear that she doesn't have to, just casually mention that it is for boys anyway. She will jump at the chance to do something more feminine and love it.

5. It's sad to see so many girls wasting their lives on study and work

Caution! Wall ahead

Beating men at the job of being men is now the favored "role model" for our society to present to girls. Never tire of pointing out what a waste of a girl's life that is.

6. It's good to have a big family

Nearly every message she receives from the outside world, even from other relatives, will state or imply that fewer or no children is better. She will be encouraged over and over again to use contraceptives and even abortion. People will try to scare her into thinking she needs to be impossibly rich before she can afford to be a mother. People will ridicule large families as failures, trailer trash, and welfare queens.

Give her some opportunity to hear a positive word about having children.

7. We don't do that in our family

None of that around here, thank you

Appeals to identity are powerful means for persuasion. Does it make sense? Not really. Does it work? Absolutely. Just keep mentioning the fact that our family and by implication she is too good to fall into whatever form of degeneracy is in view.

8. What we need is ladylike behavior at all times

Ladylike is a good word to connect to positive femininity. It hasn't suffered from being redefined by leftists much, everyone seems to understand what it means in a positive way, and a father can be fairly sure he will have the word to himself. The fact that it's a bit out of fashion and consequently means much the same thing it did in the past is a huge advantage.

9. Being a mother is the most important job for a girl

Another good answer to the assumption that the study and areer track is the meaning of life is to simply state that there is another, more important job for each and every girl.

10. A girl needs to start her family as soon as possible

The rest of the world will try to trick your daughter into wasting the best years of her reproductive life on an arts degree followed by a pointless career and endless fiddling with iPhones. At best there might be some vague concession to the idea of forming a family and having children "someday." Be sure that at least one man tells her how stupid that life plan is and encourages her to take a better path.

Men must not be silent

As fathers we have great influence over our daughters and sons. Children are desperate to learn how to live and to have their behavior approved of by parents. It’s not an automatic process, though—too many men allow themselves to default into silence and surrender that influence. Don’t.

Your daughter’s future depends on it.

Read More: Who Do You Want Your Daughter To Marry?

Hesse Kassel

Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

How Super Bowl 50 Confirmed The Arrival Of The Orwellian Surveillance State

February 9, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Around 60 US government agencies found themselves involved in the unprecedented security arrangements for this year's Super Bowl. And the measures they used, including message-reading cell phone scanners, facial tracking and matching systems, and highly responsive social media detection algorithms, sound more like the technology from Minority Report than what we would normally expect in 2016. Yet such devices have arrived and are certainly here to stay. What does this portend for society in general, not just at ephemeral sporting events?

Without detracting from the need to ensure safety at the world's most famous annual sporting event, the set-up on display Sunday demonstrates the raw surveillance power that is being routinely turned onto average citizens. The concentration of this power at the Super Bowl may represent the height of such use, but significant daily intrusion, detectable or clandestine, has become the norm for Americans. Worse still, it will only grow in coming years.

The problems attached to the new means of surveillance are many, but two deserve particular emphasis. Firstly, arrangements like at the Super Bowl drastically undermine any pretence that America preserves for its citizen the freedom of old. If preserving freedom requires this level of government intervention, it would be better to reclassify America as the "Land of the Safe, Home of the Brave New World."

Secondly, both the indulgent legal climate that permits mass surveillance and multiple new technologies lend themselves to the protection of an establishment agenda. If your political philosophy or programme falls outside an acceptable range, the government and bureaucracy has at its disposal massive tools with which to monitor, document and ultimately suppress it. Moreover, the vast tentacles of many agencies mean that proper oversight of these powers, where it has not already been waived, will be next to impossible to determine, let alone enforce.

Meet Jeh Johnson

Only a minority of Americans can recognize Jeh Johnson's face. Even fewer remember who he actually is. As Secretary of Homeland Security since 2013, his role has been much quieter than some of his predecessors, especially the first person to ever hold the role, Tom Ridge, a George W. Bush appointee. The less prominent public profile of Johnson reflects the contemporary nature of the position. Electronic surveillance obviously existed in the first decade of the 2000s, but it has improved substantially since then. The human behavior-derived intelligence element has lost incredible ground to computers and state of the art information retrieval systems.

Expect this sort of half-faceless, low-key representation from the intelligence and security apparatus going forward. The name of the game has changed and the more mega-agencies like Homeland Security blend into the background the better. And, like traffic cameras at intersections, many of the nascent technologies will be incorporated into surroundings to make them less noticeable. Not out of secrecy, as citizens will intellectually know they are there or at least hypothetically exist, but rather to make people less consciously aware of them day-to-day.

Aside from ordeals such as dealing with the TSA at airports, the implementation of these technologies will paradoxically appear non-intrusive so that the government can intrude all the more into your life.

Initially benign use of surveillance can kill liberty just as easily

I grow tired of bizarre conspiracy theories predicated on Rothschilds and Bilderberg Groups. Yes, there is a globalist agenda. Nevertheless, it is not necessarily a monolithic one and many of the people pursuing it fundamentally believe they are doing the right thing. The same goes for often well-intentioned politicians, intelligence employees and other bureaucrats who make surveillance mechanisms possible. Good intentions only sometimes lead to good outcomes, however. The pursuit of the means to protect freedom is not mutually exclusive with the partial and then significant extinguishing of that same freedom.

Whenever we perceive a loss of freedoms, the automatic presumption is that the catalyst must be a James Bond film-style megalomaniac and his cronies. Dispel that idea, or at least open yourself up to the idea of the government as misguided, not just nefarious. Akin to a grey goo scenario, intelligence and surveillance communities can take on a life of their own, a more real life translation of the legal personality attributed to corporations. The internal cultures of these communities have snowball effects that shape society in marked ways, much more than the sum of the individuals working for them would suggest. Higher political and bureaucratic figures may be in charge of them; they do not always control them.

Are they already looking specifically at you?

Perhaps. You’re an ROK reader, after all. Police departments across the US promised to tail proposed tribal meet-ups Roosh had planned. The San Francisco Police Department is the most well-equipped in the world for monitoring citizens, as the Super Bowl exercise has proven, but many other forces are only relatively behind.

The people behind the screens are also amazingly like you and me. They have families, fears, and aspirations. Again, most of them believe legitimately in what they are doing. As history demonstrates ad nauseam, though, what we want to do or feel we do is not always what we get. Even freedom is something that you can chase so hard that you eventually lose it. And losing it for good is now a very real prospect for America and other Western nations.

Read More: Beware Of The Coming Surveillance State

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How Propaganda Lies Are Used As Weapons

February 9, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Recent news reports from the Korean peninsula claim that in January over one million propaganda leaflets were sent into South Korea by North Korea. The barrage of leaflets, all sent by balloon, come in the wake of Pyongyang's renewed nuclear tests in that month.

It is a strange way of waging a propaganda war. We commonly hear of propaganda leaflets traveling from South to North, but almost never the other way around. What could North Korea possibly entice people in the South with? How could a country that can barely feed itself hope to influence popular opinion in another country?

Here are examples of some of the leaflets used by the North in the past. The show a revolting image of an American soldier torturing a woman, and an absurd image presumably showing what a great life defectors in the North enjoy.

North Korean propaganda leaflet showing the alleged joys awaiting those who defect to the North.

Ridiculous North Korean propaganda showing US soldiers torturing civilians.

While such images may seem amusing to people far removed from the field of conflict, we should not forget that such propaganda, repeated over and over, can have an effect over time. It is a depressing truth that even the most ridiculous nonsense repeated endlessly can do some damage.

Consider, for example, the “germ warfare” allegations against the United States during the Korean War. This was a nasty episode that took shape towards the end of the conflict, and it still occasionally resonates today. It is a revealing episode, and shows how biased journalists can willingly participate in propaganda lies.

During February and March of 1952, China and North Korea accused the United States of having waged a “germ warfare” campaign all over the peninsula. Specifically, they alleged that the US had aerially dropped canisters containing a number of disease vectors, such as flies, spiders, feathers, and marine organisms. Anthrax, cholera, and encephalitis were supposedly caused by such vectors. A leftist Australian journalist, Wilfred Burchett claimed to have witnessed such weapons being used.

As “proof” of such claims, the communists wheeled out prisoners of war who mumbled “confessions” of having participated in such “campaigns.” The United States denied the charges completely, as they were patently absurd to anyone with a rudimentary knowledge of military affairs and the progress of the conflict.

The Red Cross and the World Health Organization claimed that the communist allegations were false. This did not deter Peking and Pyongyang. They demanded another investigation, this time from a “neutral” observer, namely, the Soviet dominated World Peace Council. An “International Scientific Commission” was set up to look into the germ warfare claims.

Leftist scientists and journalists lent credence to the communist propaganda by participating in the charade. During the summer of 1952, the members of the International Scientific Commission traveled to North Korea and China to probe the germ warfare allegations.

Among these scientists was Dr. Joseph Needham, an admittedly brilliant Sinologist and scientist, yet one who proved incredibly soft-headed and gullible when dealing with politics. The conclusion of Needham's commission—which exceeded 665 pages—was that the communist allegations of germ warfare were "true."

The commission relied completely on the "evidence" presented to them by the communists. Such "evidence" took the form of piles of dead insects, hollow bomb canisters that had obviously been doctored, and the mendacious statements of civilian witnesses.

What was incredible was that a man of Needham's intelligence was totally deceived by the Chinese and Korean propaganda. But Needham saw what he wanted to see. He was a long-time Chinese sympathizer, had a Chinese mistress in England, and was fascinated with Chinese culture. That the communists would deliberately lie to him never crossed his mind.

Leftist "journalists" like Tibor Meray, Wilfred Burchett, and others fanned the flames of the propaganda by repeating them over and over. In the jittery cold-war atmosphere of the time, such accusations might even seem plausible to the Western public, which had neither the time nor the ability to make heads or tails out of such matters.

No matter how much the United States denied the allegations, there were still people prepared to believe the worst. When Matthew Ridgway traveled to Europe to take over the command of NATO, he was greeted with massive protests screaming "Ridgway, Go Home!"

In retrospect, it seems clear that the Chinese and North Koreans seized on a few isolated examples of contagion to mount a huge propaganda offensive. Lack of adequate medical knowledge, food shortages, and improper sanitation were what caused any of the alleged diseases, rather than any deliberate military use.

Leftist journalist Wilfred Burchett

Despite the fact that the germ warfare claims were obvious lies, they were picked up and repeated by those in the West who found that such claims fit their political narrative. To such people, it was irrelevant whether the claims were true: what mattered was that they were useful.

In hindsight, it would have been better if the US government had immediately launched its own propaganda offensive to counteract the communist lies. Unfortunately, this was not done. The only way to counter malicious propaganda is to denounce it with the same vehemence with which it is put forth by its proponents.

The result was that some residual taint of the “germ warfare” allegation lingered in the air, at least on the communist side, even after the conflict had ended.

Read More: A New Kind Of Propaganda For The Culture War

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

9 Secrets About Female Nature Told By A Hot Girl Dying Of Cancer

February 10, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Many years ago, I became friends with a very hot blonde in her early 30's who was dying of cancer. Due to her impending death, she decided that it was okay to relay a vast amount of inside information to me, regarding what women were really all about. She volunteered this information. I have never forgotten what she told me, and it has served me quite well over the years.

Here is a summary of the ten things she told me about the true nature of women, which were related to me over the span of a couple of weeks, shortly before her passing:

1. Women are exactly like little children

> We are constantly poking, prodding and testing a man, in order to find out what his boundaries are. If he has no boundaries, we will destroy him, especially if he loves us. A man has to have boundaries, and he has to outline them precisely, and he has to force us to adhere to them with the power of his conviction and the power of his action. If he doesn't do that, we will beat him over the head with his weaknesses (his lack of boundaries) until he breaks.

2. Women put up a false front about virtually everything

> Our faces are fake (makeup), our hair is fake (dyed), our boobs are fake (some of us), everything about us is fake. Most especially when it comes to what is inside of us. We lie constantly, because we are far worse, character-wise, than even our closest friends or lovers will ever know, and we desperately fight to keep all of that hidden.
>
> We are looking for our true daddies, basically – the idealized daddies that we never had – somebody who can see through all of our false fronts and call us out on our bullshit and put us in our place. The problem is, those type of men are very few and far between.

3. If a woman ever tells you, "If we don't have trust, we don't have anything," she is either cheating on you or planning to cheat on you

> There are no exceptions to this rule. We use that as cover, to try and make the man feel guilty for questioning our fidelity. What we are really saying here, is, "I will fuck whomever I want and you'd better keep your nose out of it or I'll cut you off from my pussy and I'll ruin your freaking life if you keep pressing the issue." If we really cared about you, and if we really weren't cheating on you or planning to cheat on you, we would tell you something like, "I am not cheating on you, I love you, and I would never do that. I don't care if we have to stay up all night, for the next week, and go over every single shred of doubt that's currently troubling you about this. I have nothing to hide, I would never cheat on you, and I don't want you thinking these things about me. Please tell me exactly why you think I am cheating, point by point, and I will do anything and everything that I have to do to prove to you that I'm not cheating, in order to ease your worried mind."

4. Women are much hornier than men

> Vastly, exponentially, hornier than men. A woman will do just about anything, sexually speaking, so long as she is fairly certain she won't get caught. For example, we will occasionally go out of town in order to rendezvous with a man we've been longing to fuck, and/or to have multiple sex partners in the same evening, and/or at the same time.
>
> This is something that hot women do, most especially. In our minds, it is a natural desire, and a natural thing, and so long as nobody else finds out, it's "game on". Women are receptacles for cock, that's how we have been biologically designed. Nothing feels better to us than being completely filled up with multiple penises, than being the center of sexual attention, than being the object of unbridled group lust. Since it's something we can't risk doing on our home turf (don't shit where you eat), we have to think outside the box, in order to get our boxes completely satisfied. And you might find this shocking, but many women – many, many women – have sex with dogs on a routine basis. This is just one example of how insatiable we truly are.
>
> I can see why you might not believe it, to which I say, look really hard at all of the women you know who have dogs. Look at women who have dogs whenever you see them out on the street, in the act of walking those dogs. Or at the park. You will notice that most of them have male dogs – the vast majority, in fact. This isn't a coincidence. And look at all the female teachers who are exposed in the media for having sex with underage students. We have no self-control when it comes to sex – or anything else, for that matter. To our way of thinking, losing control is what makes sex great. Doing anything that is taboo is what makes sex great.

5. Women do not have female friends—they have female competition

> We lie to our so-called female friends and pretend we are loyal and faithful to them, just like we do with the men in our lives. Secretly, we are jealous of each other, and we want all of the desirable things that other women have—most especially when it comes to our female friends' things.
>
> And we consider men to be things. If one of our friends has a hot man, we want him to want us. We will do everything we can to seduce him. Not because we really want him—we don't really want anybody. We do it because we are rarely happy, and we don't want our girlfriends to be happy, either, and we want to boost our own egos more than anything else.
>
> And after we get him to fuck us, when our girlfriends find out that he has had sex with us, that's when we finally get what we wanted in the first place. If we break up the previously happy couple, that's fine, too. It's all about our pussy, not hers. It's about winning.

6. Women always lie about the number of sexual partners they've had

> They also lie about not wanting men with large penises. If we told the actual truth about the number of different men and women we've slept with, and if we told the actual truth about our fervent desire for big dicks, our pool of potential suitors would shrink drastically, to the point where it would completely dry up. So we lie. Most often, we will claim that we've had between three and eight sexual partners in our lifetime. And, to our way of thinking, it isn't a lie, because if we had five sexual partners last Saturday evening, and our man asks us how many sexual partners we have had, and we answer, "Five", well, technically, we aren't lying.

7. All women dislike themselves

> And because we dislike ourselves, we fervently hate any man who doesn't see through our bullshit. The more a man loves us, the more we hate him. The more he overlooks our sins, and the more he fails to see how corrupt we are, and the more he gives us the benefit of every single doubt – the more we despise him. We will escalate our bad behavior until we finally break him and he wakes up and realizes how worthless we are and what a fool he has been for believing in us.

8. Women want what they can't have

> We want a man whom we can't have. We want a man who honestly doesn't give a fuck about us, who doesn't care if we come or go. That's the kind of man we will pursue. Call them bad boys or call them whatever you want, that's the kind of man we want – period. The kind of guy who will make us orgasm, crudely, and give us a huge sexual thrill in the bedroom, and then discard us like used toilet paper, and fuck our female friends afterwards, just because he can. (Just like we would do with his male friends.)

9. All women are masochists

> And all hot women are narcissistic masochists. We hate it when things are going well, especially if they continue to go well for long periods of time. We know down deep that we are fucked-up and not worthy of anything that is truly good. So when things are going well in a relationship, we eventually sabotage it. We just can't help ourselves in this regard.
>
> We could have the greatest, most handsome, most well-hung husband in the world—a one-of-a-kind man who makes all of our girlfriends jealous; we could have the greatest children in the world, who are beautiful, well-behaved and ambitious; we could have the most enviable career imaginable; we could have all of the money and prestige and the truly good things in life, and we could repeatedly tell ourselves over and over, and believe, on the surface, that we would never cheat on our husbands. But down deep we know that it's a lie. Because one day, we could walk into a grocery store, and some bad boy could > whisper just the right combination of words in our ear, and the next thing you know, we're at the Motel 6 getting it in the ass. That's just how we are, and any woman—especially a hot woman—who says otherwise, is a liar.

Over the years, my deceased friend's words have proven to be spot-on, in the vast majority of cases. And if they ring true from your own personal experience as well, then I am more than happy that I shared them with you here today. I know that my deceased friend would be thrilled to know that I have shared this information with the manosphere. After all, she used to be a hottie, and she's now dead, and by giving me the inside scoop on her female competition, she continues to beat them—she continues to "win"—even from beyond the grave.

Read More: The 7 Most Common Lies Women Tell In A Relationship

Bob Smith
Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

How To Attract Beautiful Girls By Using This Fundamental Truth About Sexual Market Value

February 10, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

As a man looking to meet and attract women it is imperative that you internalise and understand this fundamental fact about sexual market value—if she's young (between 18 and 30), slim, and even a little bit attractive, her SMV outstrips yours significantly.

For this reason, the "playing field" is not even. Just because you were brought up in the same town, are of a similar social demographic, and are even of a comparable level of attractiveness, don't imagine for a moment that getting with her is a foregone conclusion. A young, pretty girl has countless options and you must develop strategies to get ahead of the pack to be in with a chance with her.

What Is The Sexual Marketplace?

Game writers have long used the terminology of economics to discuss relations between the sexes for the simple reason that it is both accurate and relevant. Make no mistake, each of us—men and women—is a product in the market with a value that can go up and down over time, or depending on buyer, location, and a whole host of other factors.

When you walk over to a woman to introduce yourself she will determine your value in relation to hers in a matter of seconds. If she decides for whatever reason that your SMV is equal or less than hers then she will reject you as a matter of course. It is only when she considers your value higher that she will consider sleeping with you.

For this reason you must always ensure that you demonstrate as much value as you can in every interaction. Put very simply, if you're a schlub like in the picture above then you ain't getting with Adriana Lima anytime soon, however many clever lines you may have memorised from the internet.

What Is Sexual Market Value?

If we accept that the interplay between the sexes forms a marketplace, then we must also accept that each person in it is a product with a value, both perceived and actual. The way this value is determined differs considerably for each of the sexes.

Let's be honest – women's SMV is predicated almost entirely on the way that they look. This isn't misogyny as much as an honest reflection of how most men think. And between the ages of 18 and 30 girls don't even have to be that facially attractive. If they are in shape then that is usually enough to ensure that they will have a cohort of thirsty men liking their pictures on Facebook and following them on Instagram.

Let's be honest—it really doesn't matter much to us men how good a girl's job is. If she's hot we'll want to sleep with her. If she isn't then she won't. And we're not swayed by fame either. I would sleep with Ariana Grande if she worked in McDonalds, but I wouldn't sleep with Meghan Trainor just because she is on MTV.

Men's SMV is more complex and changeable. Of course, men too are judged on their looks. Height also plays a big part. When you get into game you have to realise that men start from different baselines. If you're an ugly dude, then tough luck—the market doesn't care. You'll just have to accentuate your other, positive traits and work even harder at approaching in high volume than other guys. If you are short then you have to accept that this too is detrimental to your SMV and make sure that you compensate in other ways (and I speak as a man just shy of six feet tall—my success level has been great, but I'm certain it would have been even better had I been taller.)

In both cases, you may also have to accept that your prospective buyers (i.e. women) won't cut you as much slack as they would guys that they are more immediately attracted to. Sorry—it's a bitter pill to swallow, but there it is. What you must do is be smart, change aspects of yourself that you can, and approach as many targets as possible to improve your odds in the game.

Physical attributes you can't change (or not easily). But the good news is that almost every other aspect of a guy's SMV is manipulatable, and this manipulation is really at the heart of what we call game. Your body language, your vocal projection, what you wear, the way you groom yourself, how you earn a living, what your physique is like, how you conduct yourself socially—all these are mutable and can be altered with a bit of effort. You may also find that your SMV varies geographically. A guy who can't get a BJ from a hideous troll in Atlanta could well be the toast of the town in Bangkok.

But wherever you are in the world, the most attractive trait in a man as far as women are concerned is social dominance. If you can communicate social and interpersonal dominance through your actions and behaviours then you will naturally have a higher SMV (and thus be more likely to get laid) than a man who can't.

Therefore, a man who is not classically good-looking can nevertheless radically enhance his SMV. For that we should all be very grateful.

But You Still Have To Do the Work

The point of all of this is that you have to be aware of your SMV relative to others around you and be prepared to put in the work to improve it. You have to look at yourself honestly and work out what baseline you're coming from. If you're not good-looking, or your style is bad, or your social skills are poor, then accept that you are less well situated than some other guys and that you're going to have to put in extra effort to compete.

Too many guys I come into contact with seem to think that by learning a few game tricks from the internet that they will be able to meet and attract supermodels. It doesn't work like that. Becoming good with women is a holistic process. In many cases you have to start from the ground up, taking a good long hard look at the strengths and weaknesses in all areas of your presentation and your life. You have to assess what could be bettered with forensic honesty and attention to detail and then put in place concrete achievable plans to improve in these areas. You must then take stock regularly, considering your progress each time and deciding whether tweaks to your process are appropriate.

Yes, you should come to Return of Kings and other sources to read articles containing game advice. In fact, hearing what others have done before you is invaluable in terms of inspiration and instruction. But ultimately you should realise that "game"—in terms of things to say to women and techniques to use—is really only the tip of the iceberg. The long "game" is about raising your sexual market value relative to those of the girls you desire—and there are no shortcuts for doing so. Get your grooming sorted, get your style sorted, start lifting and make sure that your social abilities are appropriate outside of a Minecraft internet forum.

Only brutal honesty, application, and hard work will pay off in the end.

Read More: How Clear Should You Announce Your Sexual Intentions With Women You're Attracted To?

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The 5 Most Perfect Prayers Of The Christian Tradition

February 10, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

We've seen the disposition necessary to prayer, and the essential content of prayer, in the last two articles. In this article, we will examine some common, prescribed prayers.

Many make the great mistake of assuming that "real" prayer is always spontaneous, because repeating set prayers must be monotonous, dead and superstitious. This is what I was taught after first converting to a form of Protestantism in my late teens. But I quickly noticed that our "living, spontaneous" prayers usually involved the same, repetitive content each time: we would hold hands or lift them up slightly and say, "Lord, we just wanna thank You, and we just wanna lift up Your Name, and we just wanna ask You to…" etc., etc. It was the same thing every time. If one is to be repetitive, repeat something that rewards repetition.

This is the error of thinking that spontaneity and "sincerity" are tantamount to goodness itself. It is a very womanish attitude, prevalent in modernity. Men have always known that repetition, symbol and ritual actually allow for a far greater depth of prayer and meaning; they often express profounder sentiments than “spontaneity” permits, and they often contain riches that only unfold through time and repetition.

This is why God commanded such things in the Old Testament, and why our Lord gave similar rites (Baptism, the Eucharist, etc.) and rote prayers (the Paternoster) to His disciples. Furthermore, in the natural periods of spiritual aridity, the endeavor to be “spontaneous and sincere” is exhausting. Rote prayers and rites allow us to give God His due, and to practice the virtue of perseverance in prayer, even when our soul can muster nothing of its own to think, feel or say. These are the five prayers you should know:

1. The Paternoster, or “Lord’s Prayer.”

The Lord taught this prayer, as recorded in Holy Scripture:

> Our Father, Who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.

Fr. Garrigou Lagrange comments, that this prayer embodies the elements of prayer, even in their proper order, as explained in last week’s article. In humility, the soul acknowledges God as Father; it adores Him and hallows His name in Faith; it looks to the fulfilment of the Kingdom in Hope; it wishes to see His will done, in Charity; this Charity is effective, and seeks the provision of the means of salvation, and the removal of all interior and exterior obstacles. One can see that the prayer is perfect.

2. The Hail Mary

This prayer is also an exact quote from Holy Scripture:

> Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou amongst women, and blessed is the Fruit of thy womb, Jesus.

This prayer expresses the central element of Christian Faith: Christ perfectly incarnate in the Virgin Mary, “who alone slayeth all heresies.” The most common heresy has been to take offense at the material world, and at the idea that God might become a part of it. St. John said that “many seducers are gone out into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh; this is a seducer and an antichrist.” All the major heresies have boiled down to this; but, repeating the words of the Archangel Gabriel and saint Elizabeth, we affirm the Lord has come in the flesh by greeting the source of His humanity. We also fulfil the Biblical prophecy: “from henceforth, all generations shall call me blessed,” as the Virgin declared under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

In the late Middle Ages the prayer was expanded, affirming the defense of Mary’s truly divine maternity from the Council of Ephesus (that the Virgin is “Mother of God,” insofar as she is mother of Jesus Christ, Who is God). It continues: “Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our death. Amen.” I use the shorter or longer form for different applications.

3. The Doxology

This is the common form of blessing the Trinity. The Eastern form is: “Glory be to the Father and Son and Holy Ghost, now and ever, and unto ages of ages, amen.” The Western form is: “Glory be to the Father and Son and Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, unto ages of ages, amen.”

4. The Creed

In the East, the Nicaeo-Constantinopolitan is practically the only Creed used; by the time this Creed was composed, the West already had the Apostles' Creed in widespread use, and it remains dominant, outside of Mass. It expresses faith in the major points of Christian doctrine; I will put a link to it, and other prayers, below.

The Christian who prays with the above four prayers, affirms the great truths of the Faith; with good reason, these have always been the prayers that even the laity knew and used in their daily prayers with the greatest frequency. With meditation and attentive repetition, their richness increases.

5. The Psalter

The book of Psalms is the essential prayer of the Church. Informally, the first monks and ascetics prayed the Psalter all day long; having memorized all 150 Psalms, they would pray them in order through the day. From this, arose the most common and efficacious forms of the Church's formal prayer: the Office, Lectio Divina, the Rosary, and a form of constant prayer, sometimes called "ejaculatory" (meaning "thrown forth like darts").

After early monks ceased memorizing and praying the whole Psalter every day, they still used the Psalter constantly. In the Divine Office, they apportioned the Psalter out over the week, praying the Psalms eight times a day in set arrangements with hymns, antiphons, responsories, Scripture readings, Patristic homilies and prayers. If there is enough interest, I will write an article on how to pray the Office, and put it up on the hermitage's webpage.

They also read the Psalter slowly, meditating closely on each verse. I quote the brief rule of St. Romuald in its entirety:

> Sit in your cell as in paradise. Put the whole world behind you and forget it. Watch your thoughts like a good fisherman watching for fish. The path you must follow is in the Psalms; never stray from it. If you have just come to the monastery, and in spite of your good will you cannot accomplish what you want, take every opportunity you can to sing the Psalms in your heart and to understand them with your mind. And if your mind wanders as you read, do not give up; hurry back and apply your mind to the words once more. Realize above all that you are in God's presence, and stand there with the attitude of one who stands before the emperor. Empty yourself completely and sit waiting, content with the grace of God, like the chick who tastes nothing and eats nothing but what his mother brings him.

This method, called Lectio Divina, came also to be applied to any kind of spiritual reading; but, preeminently the Psalms.

When away from the Psalter, they would repeat verses from it. From antiquity, the great prayer of all aspiring souls, has been the opening of Psalm 69: “Incline unto mine aid, O God; O Lord, hasten to help me.” This was the prayer of the desert fathers, which Abba Isaac taught St. John Cassian to repeat at all times; St. Benedict added it to the Monastic Office, and Pope St. Gregory the Great (aka Dialogist) added it to every hour of the Roman Office. It was prayed constantly, and recommended so to be prayed, by such saints as: Patrick, Cassiodorus, Brendan, Bathan, Columkille, Maelruain (who prescribed that this was the only prayer someone should dare to say in the toilet), Phillip Neri, Robert Bellarmine, Francis de Sales, Vincent de Paul, Alphonse Liguori, and many others. And now, you know how to walk in the path of the greats, too.

Finally, there is the Rosary. Originally 150 beads in length, the Rosary was a way for illiterate persons to imitate the monks’ recital of all 150 Psalms, replacing each Psalm with the Lord’s Prayer. In response to the Albigensian heresy, the Church looked to the Virgin Mary as “destroyer of heresies,” and conformed the Rosary closely to the Divine Office.

Tradition viewed the Psalter as a foreshadowing of Christ, so the Hail Mary (greeting Christ Incarnate) replaced the Paternoster for the 150 beads. The Divine Office explains the meaning of the great Feasts in its texts, so the Rosary took to meditating on these once for every ten beads. Finally, the usual method of beginning and ending the Divine Office came to be used for the Rosary, too (and is still used by those who pray the Rosary in the Dominican manner, explained here).

The Apostles’ Creed, from above, and many other concise, Catholic prayers, in English and Latin texts, can be found here.

ROK isn’t really the proper forum, to give detailed instructions on the methods of applying and praying these prayers. This week, I will put up an article on the Hermitage’s website, containing a shorter and a longer prayer rule, that could be used by beginners or near-beginners. If there is interest, I’ll also explain how to pray the Divine Office, there.

I did want to get through some of the basics of Christian prayer, however, because I figured some men may be wanting to keep Lent (or keep it well) for the first time—prayer is the most important element of that. Along those lines: today is Ash Wednesday! Make a good confession so that you can begin the Great Fast on Wednesday. More details about Lenten customs are here. You're looking for Shrovetide and Lent, at the moment.

As always, I'm Catholic and write from that perspective, believing it to be true; but other traditions can see how some of the concepts apply to them. By mastering the basic prayers of one's tradition, he is formed in the spirit and beliefs of the same, and is sure to find that there is more to the prayers than first meets the eye. One should not disdain to use formal, rote prayers for this reason, but should take advantage of their ability to form us in this way, and to induce prayer even in periods of spiritual aridity.

Next week I will probably write on the topic of Lent; then I will conclude this series on prayer, with a look at contemplative practices.

Read More: Atheists Are Fatties

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

6 Attributes That Make SJWs Useless Soldiers In The Culture War

February 11, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The Janissaries were an infantry unit serving the Ottoman Empire for about 400 years, known for their efficiency but also for their systematic atrocities committed on civilians. They were not Turks like the bulk of the army, but rather Orthodox Christian boys from the nations under the Ottoman yoke.

Abducted at a young age in accordance with a practice called the "Devşirme" or "blood tribute," they were converted to Islam by force, circumcised, beaten daily to break all will, and taught to be the fighting slaves of the Sultan. Mercenaries with no roots, no individuality, and no remorse.

The SJWs that went out of their way to attack our cause based on lies, are also the product of a virgin mind, beaten into submission by the elites, the media, and their politically correct stick. They have been brainwashed from a young age and led astray from a loving family and values, but instead of elite soldiers the result is a legion of lost, deformed beasts. Even if they beg and roll over for the approval of their masters, severe flaws will prevent them from reaching any success:

1. Their malevolence against their own

They could have been our brothers but chose the easier path and the take-away version of life, mainly from apathy and fear of the world. And now in a mix of tantrums and faux outrage, they want to see blood but won't swing the sword themselves. They will turn on their own flesh, roots and even fellow Janissaries in an eyeblink, faster than any foreign foot soldier could.

Loyalty is a foreign word and integrity is too tedious. Whoring for few clicks and likes is much more attractive. They won't bite the invisible hand that feeds them but by God, will they scorch the earth that saw them grow. The real enemy is safe under the guise of "equality" but fathers and brothers will hang for the satisfaction of their new lords. If they cannot reach happiness, why should the others?

2. Their absence of identity

They have no idea of who they are or the endgame of their leaders. Doing as they are told, The SJW is always friendly about something, fluctuating between "genders," blending in the mass or denying the laws of Nature, his own and the one of the world that surrounds him. The SJW is confused, triggered, and fragile. The atom of an undetermined blob, there lies the SJW, epitome of the Jack of all trades, master of fuck all.

We know who we stand against and what we want to protect. Ask any of us who we are, we can condense it in a short sentence. Free men. We can say that Bruce Jenner is not a woman because it is fact. It is a man and an abomination that children would laugh at in any country outside of the Anglosphere. We will gather and say what we please because we are free and that is what free men do.

3. Their eternal laziness

Merit and hard work are unknown notions. They are Anonymous and they are legion. Yes, they are indeed. A legion who would rather stay in the dark and conform. This is the problem with the mindset of the hive. Like the bee, they have a task and stick to it. They won't seize what can be theirs like men but always choose the path of least resistance. They will wither, crippled with regrets while waiting for a pat in the back by some stranger on an Internet forum.

Our names will echo in History as we create a legacy that will be strong. Their failure in life will lead to an existence of solitude and their memory will be scattered in the wind like the autumn leaves.

4. Their abysmal lack of courage

As weak in body as they are in will, they would not dare rebel against their master and they join the witch-hunt by fear of standing out or by plain stupidity. Victims they are, victims they will remain. Today, we see them for who they are. Hidden, spitting their venom and breaking out a cold sweat at the sight of a handful of guys that organize a happy hour.

Men that could bitch slap them into unconsciousness but chose not to, as they know what is the law and have better things to do than striking stick figures. Both sides know that at the first sign of difficulty, SJWs will raise the white flag and will surrender. They threaten and want us to turn away from our faith and bow to the golden calf? We will not.

5. Their known ancestry

Men are never completely satisfied. We are always hungry for success, for truth, for improvement or for adventure. It is part of the gig.

Thriving in incompetence and normality, detractors like them have always been there but have been dormant until recently. The leeches on the back of lions, the informers and the collaborating remoras.

The ones drinking champagne far from the line while the boys were getting gassed in Ypres. The beta orbiters hoping to get some action, saying to young Lucy that she should not write to her fascist boyfriend Eddy while he was getting his guts blown up somewhere in the elephant grass near the Cambodian border.

We know those types well and know how to deal with them accordingly.

6. Their inability to lead

Lo and behold, our “adversaries”

Our unity and common goals are our strength but if we happen to be isolated, we know what to do. We understand that eventually we cannot count on anyone but ourselves. We are the ones that say “No” and contrary to the Janissaries that infiltrated our lands, we know the mountains where to strike from like the back of our hand. Those mountains have a name. The real life.

Snickering behind their screen, thinking they can defeat us because a fellow land whale empowered mayor retweeted their obscenities or JohnJenny Doe 87 started an online petition, all hell breaks lose and the panic is total when the Control Tower stops broadcasting.

They have an expiry date and will meet the same end as the Janissaries of old:

> Janissaries mutinied in protest and were promptly and efficiently massacred by the sultan, an episode known as the “Auspicious Incident.” – Encyclopaedia Britannica

They are just another set of pawns. Once their incompetence reaches the point of no return or when they are of no more use, the puppeteer will pull the plug.

Conclusion

Our minds have woken up contrary to the horde and our bodies have been forged in the fires of adversity and the knowledge that we have to prevail in this unforgiving world. We have fought and defeated men before but being only a feeble simulacrum of men, we will use an other method to bring them to their end.

It is too late for a status quo. The culture war is here and the truth will prevail.

Rise, free men.

Read More: Have SJWs Gone Too Far By Defending A Known Pedophile?

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Fundamentals Of Gun Safety

February 11, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

We've had a few gun articles here on ROK and, while I intend for more, it's time to talk some firearms safety. Operating a firearm can and should be an enjoyable experience and, while it should be detrimental to your target, be that a piece of paper, reactive target, game animal, or even another person in a self defense scenario, you should strive to make sure you and those with you aren't injured.

The primary movers in the world of US organized shooting are the National Rifle Association (NRA) and the Civilian Marksmanship Program (CMP) and they both have their safety rules with some overlap. The NRA's Three Rules are universally recognized and are a good start to the discussion.

The Three Rules

1. Always Keep The Muzzle In A Safe Direction

Downrange would be to our right, presumably.

This rule is the primary rule of gun safety; if it is never pointed at anyone, it can't hit them, no matter if all other rules are broken. If you're on a gun range, a safe direction is downrange, and either up, or down, or both, depending on the range's rules. If you're carrying a rifle or a pistol around, it's the same; down or up.

When I travel, I like to point the gun away from me in the car, and I sit it down facing away from me in the hotel. You shouldn't walk in front of a gun you are not sure is unloaded when it's lying there, and you definitely should never wave the muzzle around, causing it to point at people. When done in a wide arc, it's called "sweeping" and is very poor form that will get you asked to go home.

It's a seriously important rule that is number one in the NRA and CMP books. This is an inversion of the second of the classic 4 Laws of Gun Safety that says "never point the gun at something you are not willing to destroy."

2. Always Keep Your Finger Off The Trigger Until Ready To Shoot

This is rule two for the NRA, three for the CMP, and four for the Classic Laws. Ever see the video of someone re-holstering a Glock with their finger in the trigger guard, or carrying it Mexican-carry and grabbing at it if it gets loose a la Plaxico Burress? They shoot themselves, and, if anything is more embarrassing than someone else shooting you, it's shooting yourself.

No holster, safety off, finger on trigger; this guy could seriously earn himself a second ass crack here.

When handling a gun, you should never have your finger inside the trigger guard unless you mean to be firing, or possibly firing, immediately. If you're building your firing position and getting your natural point of aim on the firing line, have your finger on the trigger. If you're going to dry fire a gun, check that it is clear, double check it is in a safe direction, then apply your finger to the trigger. If you're holding someone at gunpoint, keep the gun on him, put your finger on the trigger, and watch his hands for sudden movements.

Good trigger awareness on a 3″ 1911.

The rest of the time, keep your booger hook off the bang switch, and this goes double for any photography of you with weapons. As an aside, in today's day and age, I don't recommend being in photos, especially on social media, with guns, due to PC cultures and SJWs.

3. Always Keep The Gun Unloaded Until Ready To Use

This is rule 3 for the NRA, and an inversion of the first of the Classic Laws "the gun is always loaded." An unloaded gun is a safe gun, because all that will happen with an accidental firing is a dry-fire, instead of a discharge.

Obviously, leave your home protection and carry guns loaded, and load when appropriate while hunting and at the range, but, otherwise, treat the gun with the same respect due a loaded gun.

Rifles on a firing line. Unloaded, bolts locked back, chamber flags in, safeties on, pointed downrange.

Other Rules And Guidelines

- Be sure of your target and what is behind it. This is the third of the Classic Laws.
- Use an empty chamber indicator. This is the CMP Rule 2, and means to use a chamber flag on an open action to show it's locked open when not being fired on a firing line.
- Use hearing and eye protection. Good plugs, or muffs (or even both) and safety glasses or side shields on eye glasses are always recommended. Obviously, in case of hostile action, you may not have time.
- Know how to operate the gun. Read the damn manual, and make sure it is in a functional condition that is safe to use, as in not filthy or dirty.
- Use the correct ammo. Use ammo that is the correct caliber or type for the gun, and that isn't too powerful. Use commercial ammo, unless they're your reloads and you know what you're doing (or reloads from someone you trust that knows what they're doing).
- Don't drink or use drugs prior to shooting. Put this up with "driving or operating heavy machinery."
- Store guns safely and securely. Unloaded, clean, and locked up.
- Use a good holster that covers the trigger and the safety (if applicable.) Remember Stranahan's first law of concealed carry.
- Don't shoot something that will ricochet the round back at you. Steel targets that can't swing will do this. Be sure to be at minimum safe range for steel, as well, which is usually 25 yards for pistol and 100 yards for rifles.

Etiquette

I'll cover a few common places and scenarios of gun use here for your reference.

Gun Ranges

Everything is copacetic except the guy behind the camera is downrange on a hot range.

Best thing to do is read the rules of the range (they should be posted) and follow them. Do all the above rules, and observe the hot-cold nature of the firing line. Typically, a firing line is "hot" and you can handle, load, and shoot your guns downrange at your target, but not GO downrange. The opposite state is "cold" and the guns are rendered safe and are not handled during this time (some ranges vary a bit on the degree of what is handling). You can go post your targets during this time.

The polite thing to do is show up, wait till people are done with shooting their strings, and inquire if you might go downrange. Get agreement from all, and declare it cold and go. Once everyone is back, you can go hot, usually by saying "Going hot!" or something similar. The range is then hot until declared cold, and you don't have to yell "going hot!" before each mag like some idiots. Also, "fire in the hole!" means you're throwing a grenade, not opening fire, so don't yell that either. Hell, I need a "how to use a gun range article" to go into this further, stay tuned.

Some pistol ranges have target runners, and you always stay behind the line. These ranges are always "hot."

Indoor range with firing line rail and target runner systems.

Gun Shows And Stores

Don’t sweep people. Seriously, that’s the number one thing by far. Keep your finger away from the trigger and trigger guard. Ask to handle guns if you want to pick one up, and ask before you rack it, and especially before you dry fire it.

Some guns can be damaged by manually lowering the hammer, like a 1911 pistol, if you don’t know what you’re doing, so if you’re not sure what to do, just ask the guy. No one minds ignorance; people mind you doing the wrong thing when you assumed you knew what you were doing and didn’t.

If she’s not sweeping someone, I’d be surprised, and that pump 12 would put her on her can anyway.

Hunting

It’s generally a good idea to not have a round in the chamber during periods of complex movement, like getting into and out of a tree stand, even though the commonly available ladder stands and climbers of today are much easier than the “climb a bunch of railroad spikes and sit on a 2×6 in the fork of an oak” stands of yesteryear. Sometimes it’s even better to lift the rifle up after you on a rope, then lower it down when done as opposed to slung over your back, depending on your age, agility, and the tree stand in question.

In a vehicle, it’s usually a good idea to completely unload if you’re going to be casing the gun. If you’re riding shotgun (which is where the term comes from), and driving around looking for game, keep the gun ready, pointed at the floorboard, and you can make the call between an empty chamber, or chambered with the safety on, depending on your needs. Don’t roll up to the local McDonald’s like that after the hunt, however.

Conclusion

Gun safety can be summed up with: Don’t be an idiot, and don’t be a clown. Most unintentional gun injuries occur when someone is forgetful, acting deliberately casual to look cool, or showing off. If you want to show off, hit the bull’s-eye and don’t say much, as that will be enough in itself.

Read More: A Beginner’s Guide To Carrying A Handgun

Luke Stranahan

Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

How A German Historian Predicted The Decline Of Western Civilization 100 Years Ago

February 11, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Is Western Civilization in Decline? I think nearly everyone in the manosphere would agree that it is.

There is a lot of discussion these days about America and the other nations comprising Western Civilization being in decline, and there is certainly a lot of evidence to support this claim. Whether it be dying populations among the Caucasian races that created the civilization, unchecked immigration rapidly replacing native populations in Europe and the United States, evidence that America is currently and has been behaving as an imperialistic empire but is now slowly losing its power around the world, a culture that seems to completely disregard the importance of family, the building block of civilization, or a loss of religiousness and sense of purpose, signs that something is wrong are everywhere.

You may be surprised to learn that many of the things that have been happening to Western Civilization were written down in a predictive model of history written by German historian and philosopher Oswald Spengler nearly 100 years ago.

Oswald Spengler, Prophet of Western Decline

That said, Spengler has his critics, as do many misunderstood geniuses. Right or wrong, most of the attacks on his civilization model are made by those who cannot see the forest for the trees. Because of this, his genius work has largely gone unrecognized in modern times. As with many truths, "… in every culture and society there are facts which tend to be suppressed collectively, because of the social and psychological costs of not doing so," as stated by researcher Peter Dale Scott. A lot of people seem to be turned off by a predictive model of history since the psychological cost of admitting that humans are subject to the same cycles in nature as other animals is quite high.

Whether you agree with his ideas or not, they're intellectually fascinating, and worth a look. This article only scratches the surface of Spengler's epic civilization model.

The Four Seasons

Spengler equated the four cycles in human civilizations to the seasons: Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter. In compiling his work, he studied the 8 High Cultures thought to have existed: Babylonian, Egyptian, Indian, Chinese, Mayan/Aztec, Greek/Roman or Classical, Arab and, finally, Faustian, or what we call Western civilization. He believed each of the eight civilizations went through phases, just like the seasons. While some of those cultures are still with us, they have not been dominant cultural forces since their Winter. For example, China was referred to as a Sleeping Giant until it picked up on some of the vitality of the West.

In Spengler's model, each culture goes through a formative Culture Stage, followed by a decadent period known as Civilization. The culture period makes up the "organic" Spring and Summer of a civilization, and is when the civilization is inspired by its own art and religion. Autumn and Winter make up the Civilization phase, in which the society becomes inorganic and is based only on the organization created during the Culture phase. The creativity seen in the Culture period slowly fades away. The civilization stiffens, and becomes overpopulated, metropolitan, and uninspired. For the purpose of this article, we will focus mainly on Western Civilization and its expression of the four seasons.

Roughly speaking, each season makes up about 250 years. This procession of "seasons" happened to all civilizations Spengler studied. Spengler said that by using his civilization model he could make predictions so accurate they would astonish people. Indeed, since 1918 through the present day, his predictions for Faustian/Western Civilization have been spot on.

The full civilization model is available here.

Spengler's civilization model – as organic as the four seasons

The Culture Phase: Spring and Summer

Spengler wrote Western civilization entered its Pre-Culture stage before 1000 AD. During that time, there is what he calls, "Chaos of primitive expression forms. Mystical symbolism and naive imitation." As with other civilizations coming into being, in Faustian civilization there is a lot of apocalyptic imagery in this period and a fascination with death. Architecturally, the Romanesque cathedrals constructed around this time mark the beginning of the new Faustian culture form. In literature, collective epics like Beowulf and works such as The Song of Roland are published. Politically, there are "tribes and their chiefs. As yet no Politics and no State."

Moving into Spring, there is a "powerful cultural creation from awakening souls, unity and [cultural] abundance. Great creations of the newly-awakened dream-heavy soul. Super-personal unity and fullness." Some of Faustian Civilization's expressions of this idea were as follows: The Holy Grail romances such as Perceval, the Story of the Grail are written. Architectural style shifts from Romanesque to Gothic Cathedrals. Gregorian Chant evolves as a musical form and we hear polyphony becoming the great Western musical form. (While we are discussing polyphony, an important note is that Spengler considered infinity to be the central, motivating idea behind Faustian/Western civilization. It is expressed in its music as polyphony, in its mathematics as infinitesimal calculus, and finally through Manifest Destiny/boundless exploration conducted by Western civilization which ultimately led it to the ultimate infinity – space.)

Politically, there is the formation of "national groups of definite style and particular world- feeling: 'nations.' Working of an immanent state-idea." This is sub-divided into "The two prime classes (noble and priests). Feudal economics; purely agrarian values," transitioning into "Actualizing of the matured State-idea. Town versus countryside. Rise of Third Estate (Bourgeoisie). Victory of money over landed property."

Moving into Summer, we see these developments in the Culture: "Ripening consciousness. Earliest urban and critical stirrings." In Faustian civilization, the dominant literature shifts from Grail romances to novels such as Don Quixote and Shakespearean plays. Architectural forms once again shift from Gothic Cathedrals to princely palaces and polyphonic musical forms evolve into Baroque, which is the period of the birth of Classical music. In politics we see "conflicts between aristocracy and monarchy. The political center shifts from castles and estates to the cities."

Political Epochs in Spring and Summer

> 1. Feudalism. Spirit of countryside and countryman. The "City" only a market or stronghold. Chivalric-religious ideals. Struggles of vassals amongst themselves and against overlord. 900-1500 AD.
>
> 2. Crisis and dissolution of patriarchal forms. From feudalism to aristocratic State. 900-1500 AD.
>
> 3. Fashioning of a world of States of strict form. 1500-1800 AD.
>
> 4. Climax of the State-form ("Absolutism") Unity of town and country ("State" and "Society." The "three estates") 1500-1800 AD.
>
> 5. Break-up of the State-form (Revolution and Napoleonism). Victory of the city over the countryside (of the "people" over the privileged, of the intelligentsia over tradition, of money over policy.) 1800-2000 AD.

The Civilization Phase: Autumn and Winter

"The body of the people, now essentially urban in constitution, dissolves into formless mass. Megalopolis and Provinces. The Fourth Estate ("Masses"), inorganic, cosmopolitan."

We have now entered the Civilization phase as Summer transitions into Autumn. The intellect of the civilization, fully developed, begins to sterilize away the culture's early organic nature. Spengler calls it, "Intelligence of the City. Peak of strict Intellectual creativeness." In the West, the Enlightenment occurs during this time. Classical music peaks and then declines as an art form, further marking the shift into the Civilization phase.

The civilization becomes metropolitan, first overpopulating its cities, only to eventually begin dying out once Winter arrives. In Autumn, true art dies out in favor of metropolitan "art for the masses." Politically, there are "s*truggles between the aristocracy and the bourgeoisie, Revolutions, and Napoleonism.*" The American Revolution occurs during Autumn. Also in autumn we see "urban rise; peak of disciplined organizational strength." This is the peak of the civilization, which is then followed by a "fissure in the world-urban civilization; exhaustion of mental organization strength; and irreligiousness rising."

According to Spengler, Western world has entered Winter and its civilization is ending. He describes Winter as the "dawn of Megalopolitan Civilization. Extinction of spiritual creative force. Life itself becomes problematical. Ethical-practical tendencies of an irreligious and unmetaphysical cosmopolitanism."

Over the coming decades, Spengler expects the intellect of our civilization to fade, people to stop reading and thinking as the civilization as a whole loses interest in thought, and the government to become autocratic/tyrannical. Art will further devolve into "meaningless subjects of fashion." The population comprising the civilization will continue dying off as it loses touch with the myths and culture it was founded upon. We are also experiencing the "s*pread of the Final World Sentiment*" of our civilization as the spread of Socialism around the world. As government becomes autocratic we can expect "primitive human conditions slowly thrust up into the highly-civilized mode of living." Our great works and most of our technology will fade and lie in ruins as the population comprising our civilization fades away. First the countryside and then the cities will depopulate (as seen in the Rust Belt and now cities like Detroit.) Spengler says we should also expect conquests of our now-exhausted civilization by "young peoples eager for spoil, or [foreign] conquerors" as the imperial machinery of the State falls apart.

Keep in mind – this was all predicted in 1918 by Spengler even though it sounds as if it was written today!

Political Epochs in Autumn and Winter

> 1. Domination of Money ("Democracy"). Economic powers permeating the > political forms and authorities. 1800-2000 AD.

>
> 2. Victory of force-politics over money. Increasing primitiveness of political forms. Inward decline of the nations into a formless population, and constitution thereof as an Imperium of gradually-increasing crudity of despotism. 2000-2200 AD.
>
> 3. Private and family policies of individual leaders. The world as spoil. Egypticism, Mandarinism, Byzantinism. Historyless stiffening and enfeeblement even of the imperial machinery, against young peoples eager for spoil, or alien conquerors. Primitive human conditions slowly thrust up into the highly-civilized mode of living. After 2200 AD.

The Future, Echoing Roman Civilization

In the Winter of Roman politics there was a shift from the Roman Republic to Caesarism, or government led by a charismatic strongman. Eventually, the idea of representation broke down and there was a shift to bloody "force politics."

Of course, our current government is modeled on the Roman system. There are even similarities between the two dominant parties. In Rome, the two dominant parties were the Optimates and Populares, the Republicans and Democrats of their day. This form of representative government eventually stops working because the system of checks and balances interfere with each other, causing gridlock. Force politics (killing people) eventually comes along to break the gridlock. (As an aside, some historians say it's possible we entered this era in 1963 with the assassination of JFK by the military-industrial complex.) Arguably, this predictive model is spot-on with the current situation in the Western world. So, if Spengler's model is correct, we are awaiting the rise of a dictator to come along and smash the rotten edifice of democracy sometime this century.

Spengler thought Democracy was the form of government of a civilization in decline

Spengler on Democracy

Spengler did not have a very high opinion of democracy. He believed it was the form of government of a civilization in decline, and interestingly the idea of mass democracy arrived in the Winter of Faustian/Western Civilization. Spengler viewed democracy as a weapon of moneyed interests, who use the media to create the illusion that there is consent from the governed. To him, the notion of democracy is really no different than living under a plutocracy (government by a wealthy elite.) Using the media's propaganda, money is turned into force and controls people's lives.

The leftist causes that have dominated the last century, such as equalism, feminism, and Socialism, to Spengler, were only tools used to assist the moneyed powers to be more effective.

The decline is also marked by increasingly authoritarian leaders as the democracy breaks down. Monetary powers permeate the government, eventually destroying it. This is where we currently are on Spengler's timeline, which leads to what Spengler expects will happen in the West: The rise of a a Caesar as democracy, dominated by money, crumbles under its own corruption. People will cease to participate in elections, and the best candidates will remove themselves from politics. Spengler thinks blood is the only force that can conquer the force of money.

A New Spring After the Winter?

Spengler's predictions of decline, as prescient as they have been over the last century, may leave you feeling a sense of hopelessness after studying his work. However, as one culture and civilization fades away, it's very likely another will arise as part of this organic cycle.

John David Gebser later studied Spengler's work, and believes a new consciousness will emerge from the ashes of the old civilization. Just as Western civilization was built upon the ashes of Ancient Greece and Rome, a new civilization may well be built on the ashes of our own.

The Decline of the West, published in 1918 and largely unknown today, is work that very well could be among the greatest ideas ever conceived by the human mind. It smashes the linear model of history (always moving upward) presented in the public school system, and instead presents the idea that throughout history man and his civilizations go through periods of birth, growth, decline, and death.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why Sex Selfies Signal The Decline Of Western Civilization

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

4 More Lies All Men Are Told Their Entire Lives

February 12, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Previously we examined several common lies men are told to keep them under control and working for the feminist state. This article will discuss four more common lies men are told. The principles of neomasculinity include a rejection of ideas based on their popularity or rhetoric, and instead emphasizes truths based upon logic, reason, and historical proof. As men realize the true nature of females and governments, they become aware of how they are controlled and manipulated.

5. They Hate Us For Our Freedoms

Competing strongly for most meaningless overused word is “freedoms.” George Orwell’s 1984 introduced the idea of Newspeak, a fictional controlled language created by the totalitarian state of Oceania to control its people and punish those who commit “thoughtcrime.” There has been a wholesale assault on our language in general over the last century, and this is a lie that is told loudly and often.

After all, who can argue against freedom, right? Freedom is, in most respects, a universally good thing. However, as I grow older, my youthful interests in ideas of absolute freedom, anarchy, and libertarianism have revealed many drawbacks to allowing completely unrestrained freedom.

But the idea that others, so jealous that a special group of people (Americans) are free, that they would hate, attack, sabotage, and kill, out of mere jealousy of how free those people are, smacks of bullshit. First of all, it is factually inaccurate, with multiple reports listing America not even in the top 10 lists of most free nations (Daily Caller – 20th, Breitbart (Cato study) – 20th, Wikipedia (17th and 10th, various metrics).

Furthermore, the most free nations are some of the most peaceful, and are never under attack for being free, even in cases where extremely free countries are in close proximity to unfree ones (Hong Kong is ranked #1 in freedom, and adjacent to China, who didn’t even make the list, but I have never heard of Hong Kong being attacked for its freedoms by anyone, much less the Chinese.)

But also, this rhetoric places people into two categories. Free or unfree. You are with us or you are against us. Are you for gay marriage or are you a bigot? Are you for equality or do you hate women? The goal of all this is to remove any dissent by creating a false argument, where there are only two sides. If the USA is free, then what it is doing is inherently good and right, and you must not criticize it. America will bring freedom to women and minorities and any policies America has you cannot disagree with because America is free and good.

The truth is America is not particularly free; nor are Americans despised by others because of this supposed freedom. Since the main social and political movement of the US is the destruction of society through leftism and democracy, the goal again is to destroy the power of men.

6. America Is #1 In Everything

This clip from HBO’s Newsroom sums it up perfectly.

The goal here is to make men think this is as good as it gets, so even if you have some minor complaints, just suck it up and be happy you don’t live somewhere worse. This is America, love it or leave it, but you can’t criticize it because it literally doesn’t get any better than this. Our education system? The best in the world and teaches you everything you need to know. The tax rates you’re paying? As low as they can be for a modern society. The women? More feminine and sexy and desirable than any other, and they’re cute and snarky too. Do your research. It’s all lies.

7. She’s A Good Girl

The lie here is that while girls are more empowered and sophisticated today than they were in the past, your special little snowflake loves you, and she has her own moody assertive opinions on her feminist issues, but despite rumors of her sexting in middle school, camwhoring in high school for weed money, and tons of pictures of her boozing it up in college at every frat house on the strip, she’s only been with a couple of guys before.

The truth is women almost always lie about their sexual past. Their hamsters must be running overtime with the conflicting ideas that promiscuous anonymous sex is both empowering and awesome, but also repulsive to guys so therefore they must lie and cover it up. The truth is that it has become next to impossible to find a girl over the age of 22 in the west who is reasonably attractive and isn’t a slut with a double digit or higher notch count.

Remember, women are the ones who invented new language to use for tranny pronouns, have redefined rape, and think fairness only applies to men, so they have no problem “redefining” sex. Happened while drunk? Didn’t count. One night stand? Not a “real” sexual encounter. Don’t know his name? Can’t count him either.

I don’t think most of them even know their real number. The goal of the elites is to have all men cuckolded, and to further destroy the institution of marriage. A bride who is not a virgin on her wedding night has a far higher chance of cheating, and if she has more than three partners, you’d be better off placing all your money on red and spinning that roulette wheel.

8. False Flags And Government Lies

Government lies about events both important and not, in order to cover up events that its people would otherwise find reprehensible, implement agendas, or to induce feelings of patriotism and support for its policies and continued power. A short list of confirmed lies the US government has told include:

- The sinking of the USS Maine—a navy ship that was sunk either intentionally or accidentally in 1898 by US forces but blamed on an invented Spanish attack that was used by yellow journalists like William Randolph Hearst as a pretext for war against Spain resulting in America taking Cuba, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Philippines.
- Operation Northwoods, a 1962 plan for the US government to commit acts of sabotage, bombing, hijacking, and murder against innocent American civilians in order to create a pretext for war against Cuba. It was approved by the military but rejected by President Kennedy—shortly before his assassination.
- The CIA shipped cocaine into California and used it to fund arms shipment to terrorists in Nicaragua in the 1980s (Exposed by Gary Webb's Dark Alliance, later murdered)
- The Pentagon Papers revealed a series of lies about the Vietnam War, including pentagon analysis that they could not likely win the war, but joined anyway, admissions that the US had no interest in helping the South Vietnamese but entered the war for political maneuvering, that the US intended to install its own pro-US dictator before exiting the country, that US had plans to assassinate its ally, South Vietnam's president Diem, revelations that President Johnson lied when campaigning about scaling back the war, while increasing secret illegal bombings, and more. These lies eventually lead to Nixon's removal from office.
- FBI agent Coleen Rowley came forward saying her office knew prior to 2001 that alleged bomber Zacarias Moussaoui paid $8,000 cash for Boeing 747 flight lessons and was planning a suicide hijacking but had requests to search his room denied by superiors.
- NFL star Pat Tillman left his lucrative career to go to war in Iraq and Afghanistan, discovering during the war many lies that he wished to expose, but was murdered by fellow soldiers in Afghanistan, which the government initially blamed on a firefight with terrorists that never happened. Senior army commanders including General John Abizaid and General Stanley McChrystal knew Tillman was shot in the head by friendly fire, but approved the lie, along with awarding of Silver Star and Purple Heart. Members of Tillman's unit burned his body armor, uniform, and notebook to destroy evidence, but no one was ever prosecuted. Note: his family, particularly dad, is a badass and did NOT accept this.
- The Gulf of Tonkin incident was a supposed attack by North Vietnamese Navy on the USS Maddox which the US used as a pretext for war against Viet Nam. It didn't happen.
- DynCorp, a US defense contractor was caught trafficking children for sex; the whistleblowers were punished but not the perpetrators
- Various lies about Iraq (Cheney: "Simply stated, there is no doubt that Saddam Hussein has weapons of mass destruction. There is no doubt he is amassing them to use against our friends, against our allies, and against us" W Bush: "We found the weapons of mass destruction [in Iraq]. We found biological laboratories" Rumsfeld: "We know where they [Iraq's WMD] are. They're in the area around Tikrit and Baghdad and east, west, south, and north **"

- You are not being spied on. The government is not listening to your phone calls or tracking your internet activity. See: Carnivore, PRISM, wikileaks, Snowden.
- The laughably silly narrative told about the killing of Osama, which Pulitzer Prize investigative journalist Seymour Hersh calls a "complete fabrication from beginning to end," and includes a staged photo op, which was originally claimed to show live reaction of the executive team watching the raid on video, to destruction of the body and all evidence, hours after the raid before DNA testing could be completed, to "honoring" the enemy's religious wishes with a burial by sea that no one witnessed and is not part of any sort of Muslim ritual.

Conclusion

Men are told damaging lies, which cause them to have misplaced priorities and allegiances to women who do not love and respect them, and public policy which incessantly erodes their power. The consequence of believing lies is a path to frustration, disappointment, failure, cuckolding, unhappiness, and societal instability.

Men must wake up, and question anything coming from their government, media, feminists, or women. These are but some of the most powerful and universal lies, but the police, your girlfriend, and your harmless looking SJW neighbor will all tell a variety of lies to benefit them. Wake up to the truth, and take the red pill. Men must discover Neomasculinity and reverse the slide to degeneracy and collapse before it is too late.

Read More: 4 Colossal Lies Men Have Been Told Since Birth

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Why Do Sports Blogs Hate Sports Fans?

February 12, 2016 | by Lou Affettare | Link | Original Link

In the South Park episode “All About Mormons,” several scenes delve into great detail about Mormon orthodoxy while a caption on the bottom of the screen says “This Is What Mormons Actually Believe.” The takeaway is that beliefs such as “seer stones” are so outlandish that it’s amazing that any rational person could actually believe this. This “wow, just wow” view of those with different opinions is, surprisingly, just as applicable to most sports bloggers, who just can’t even believe that the vast majority of sports fans don’t agree with their strong liberal views. Don’t these flyover troglodytes know that it’s 2016?

I’m genuinely unsure if writers in other fields have as much disdain for their core readership as sports bloggers do. Political sites are usually geared towards those with a particular set of views, so outside of hate-reads, regular blog visitors will typically know what they’re getting into. While there might be disagreements, you won’t feel like you’re the enemy. The glaring exception, I suppose, if you’re on a mainstream conservative blog and you just want to #MakeAmericaGreatAgain, but I digress.

Naming The Biggest Offenders

Based on Alexa.com's ratings, the sites that would qualify as the largest pure "American sports blogs" would be Bleacher Report, SB Nation, and Deadspin. These differ from the largest sports websites such as ESPN and SI, since blogs focus on opinion pieces and analysis, not just game previews and highlights.

The largest, Bleacher Report, has different "streams" (almost like sub-reddits) for teams, leagues, and sports. This leads to less long-form writing and more lists and team-specific information. SB Nation (owned by Vox Media), until recently, had their Twitter avatar set to an "It's On Us" logo, to show solidarity (?) with women who claim to be sexually assaulted.

The same culture that gave us that ridiculous avatar and campaign gave us a circle jerk of concern for the alleged victim in the Patrick Kane rape case. Multiple group posts were promoted to the front of the site which stated that Patrick Kane should be suspended immediately for simply being accused of sexual assault, and that fans who were not as quick to act on this information actually stood in the way of justice.

Patrick Kane, Victim of a Smear Campaign

> Furthermore, the fact that he is a famous professional athlete gives him a legion of supporters that an accuser will never have, and those supporters may verbally > attack and harass her in support of Kane, thereby making it seem as if the whole world is against her, all part of a culture that could encourage a victim to stay silent.

The piece cited the NHL's CBA (Collective Bargaining Agreement), which allows for the league to suspend a player based on just an accusation. The writers also leaned on the prior suspension of Slava Voynov as justification, even though Voynov was actually charged with a felony, unlike Kane, who was not charged at all. The tone of the articles were that the NHL, Kane's teammates, and fans of the league were all supporting "rape culture" and consciously or subconsciously attacking the accuser.

After some searching, I could not find a piece on SB Nation that countered any of these points. Moreover, the articles, which were written by five women, were featured on the website and retweeted by a number of higher profile writers for the site. This leads me to assume that most, if not all, of SB Nation's writers believe that wearing a Blackhawks jersey is similar to calling all women liars. The charges against Kane were eventually dropped due to a lack of evidence, and SB Nation had a small post which was written by one staffer, and didn't seem to be retweeted to the heavens by their editors and staffers. Weird.

Deadspin is a whole other can of worms. Being attached to the Gawker network, they have their sports writers sitting next to the writers for Jezebel in their New York City office. I'm going going to out on a limb and say that this probably doesn't help give a well-rounded, "diverse" set of opinions on sports.

Sportswriters and Feminists, What Could Go Wrong?

This odd seating arrangement also leads Deadspin writers, whether nudged to do so or not, essentially re-blogging thinkpieces from Jezebel. When you go to the main site looking for sports content, you will find promoted articles from Jezebel and other Gawker properties. Oh, and did I mention "Adequate Man," Deadspin's guide for average guys to handle such difficult situations as "being white at a black holiday gatherings" and "how to hit on women at the gym" (Spoiler Alert: Never)?

A simple scrolling through their "Racism" tag (certainly needed on a site where some of their writers wrote for the actually racist, and actually once-funny Kissing Suzy Kolber) at http://deadspin.com/tag/racism shows how white people are the worst.

Black “personalities” such as Greg Howard and Bomani Jones are there to put them in their place, with white writers tagging along to agree and amplify. At least I get a good sampling of athlete dong pictures in between my large helpings of white guilt, for what that’s worth.

Even In Pro Wrestling, They Want To Control What You Want

Do You Find This (Relatively) Unrealistic? Misogynist.

As a pro wrestling fan, I’d like to see “news” about my favorite stupid, really poorly written, soap opera nonsense. While not technically sports, it’s close enough that I should expect to be able to see actual news on injuries and upcoming fight cards without a hefty sampling of guilt about, again, being a white guy. Thanks to Uproxx (another multi-channel blog network), though, I can even get my bro-shaming from wrestling articles.

For example, I can read a piece on why black female wrestler “Naomi” is undervalued within WWE (World Wrestling Entertainment) and how that relates to a headline at Slate that referred to Nicki Minaj as a “savage”, and how this all relates to wrestling being a bastion of white guys, with blacks being relegated to stereotypes. Bear in mind, this is professional wrestling, thus every single performer is a stereotype. That’s kind of the point. There’s no “normal dude” wrestler who comes out chill as hell and does his thing and doesn’t try to engage the audience. Everything is over the top because nobody wants to watch regular people wrestle just like they don’t want to watch regular people have sex.

Another thinkpiece, also on Uproxx, details how hard it is for women to make it to the top in the wrestling industry, and that the WWE is losing money by not featuring enough women. For more of a cultural tie-in, they relate it to Saturday Night Live’s “sexism problem” over the past few decades.

There are actually several wrestling writers who work for Uproxx, and none of them remotely come close to the mindset of the average professional wrestling fan. It is a unanimous opinion of the staff that blacks and women are under-represented, storylines should include women fighting and beating men, and that dick jokes, slut-shaming, and the like are the worst parts of the genre.

An Actual Lack of Diversity

Pictured: The Enemy

None of these examples are particularly egregious taken individually. I think it's great that people are getting paid (I'd hope?) something for writing about sports. The main issue that I have is that the opinions are all liberal boilerplate. They're all safe, and you won't find an article on the other side, even from a devil's advocate position. Perhaps something on why maybe teams shouldn't suspend their players based solely on the whims of women who could ruin their lives with one phone call to the cops, perhaps? I would have loved to have read anything anywhere on how Missouri should have cancelled the scholarships of "striking" football players since that's the only reason they were even admitted to the school.

There are millions of guys (mostly straight and white) who read about sports every day. Why is it so hard to find well-written content that isn't overflowing with snarky progressivism, and even harder to find ones that challenge "conventional" wisdom? Are writers for these sites afraid of losing friends in the industry? Is there a blacklist of wrong-thinkers in this and other industries who lose their dream career because they don't agree with the blue hair tattooed girl at their sister company?

Why have these sports blogs decided to forgo the market of "blog posts most sports fans want to read" to Clay Travis at Fox Sports and the team at Barstool Sports (end of list)? Good for them, but there's still a market out here that is underserved, and newer sports blogs such as SI's The Cauldron would be wise to consider at least dipping their toe into the pool. The easy answer is that because the people paying the salaries of writers are progressive (Nick Denton, Markos Moulitsas, et al.), we will continue to get half-assed progressive sports commentary.

For many, sports is an escape from the soul sucking reality of life. So why is the progressive bullhorn the dominant noise, and why is it constantly telling me how shitty we are for liking sports?

Read More: How Fans And The Media Are Making Professional Sports Unbearable

Lou Affettare
Lou is a management consultant who used to like sports and society but now he doesn't. He has a new blog at cucksports.wordpress.com that gets updated whenever a particularly egregious form of entryism or white knighting takes place.

The Ultimate Guide To Building Muscle: Nutrition

February 12, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

Part one of this series introduced you to your genetic limitations and potential, as well as how to optimize your training program to maximize what yo' Daddy gave you.

Part two will focus on the next important stage of building muscle naturally: What to do when you get home from the gym. Eat right? Stuff your face? "Bulk up?" It ain't that simple.

Nutrition 101 For Building Muscle

Scrawny to Brawny taught me the #1 rule about nutrition and it goes like this:

If you think you are eating enough food… you are NOT eating enough food.

Eat. You have to eat more food. A LOT more food than you are eating now. I may have found a better approach to training later on, but I started to put on muscle only when I finally decided to get serious about eating. I cleaned up my diet and made sure I was getting at least five meals a day plus protein supplements. Not on-and-off five meals a day.

But here is where you can learn from my mistake with nutrition over the years. You can, as you stuff your face for growth, eat too much. I was finally putting on muscle, but I also carried a lot more fat. In short, I bulked.

Now, some will argue that bulking is the way to go if you are serious about building muscle. That you can't build muscle and lose fat at the same time. You just have to put up with the fat gains that come with the added muscle while "bulking." Wrong.

How To Bulk Up Fast

Jeff Cavaliere is a professional sports trainer. He has been the head Physical Therapist and Assistant Strength Coach for the New York Mets and trained pro ballers Tom Glavine and Pedro Martinez, to drop just a couple names.

What I learned from watching the stunning amount of incredible videos on Jeff's YouTube channel is that while bulking does work, it is a myth in terms of being an iron clad commandment of body building nutrition.

All you're doing when you bulk up is getting fat. And fat, my friends, is not easy to lose. If you bulk, you have to cut, no if's and's or but's. And if you cut fat, you are also cutting muscle.

That sounds like the most retarded approach to building muscle, and it was confirmed for me when I cracked 180 lbs at age 32 for the first time in my life. I was bigger. I had more muscle. I successfully "bulked." But I was fatter and I did not like it. There had to be a better way. While you do need more calories when you are training for mass, you don't need the massive increase in calories that many people, even some so-called professional trainers, will tell you you need.

Why Mass Gainer Supplements Suck At Building Muscle

The truth?

All you need is a positive nitrogen balance in your blood stream that comes from having adequate protein intake in your diet. If you are worried about taking in too much protein, don't be—that is also a myth.

How Much Protein Can You Digest Per Meal?

All traditional bulking advice can be summed up as follows:

- calculate your daily caloric intake (i.e. your macros)
- estimate your additional caloric needs while lifting
- add 500 or 1000 extra calories (quality calories of course, not pizza and Big Macs)
- train, weigh in, check result, adjust caloric intake, repeat

Too much weight gained? Reduce calories. Not gaining weight? Increase calories. This really made sense to me until I hit the mother of all inventions—necessity. I was 40 and had time to lift seriously again, but not the money to invest in a proper increased caloric rich diet as I had before. What to do? I decided to:

- train as hard as I could with the limited calorie intake I had
- strictly limit liquid protein supplements only around my workouts
- eat as best I could and as much as I could 8 to 12 hours around my workout, but still only three meals a day

- rest more (I simply didn't have the energy / calories to train more frequently)
- train the whole body only once per week, with only two workouts per week
- kept my workout to an hour, tops. In and out.

The result? I lost some Christmas fat and added 15 lbs of muscle in 4 months—170 to 185 lbs—on only three meals a day and working out only twice a week! I kept the workouts intense and short, just like Jeff talks about. I simply could not believe that with such a sub calorie diet (and only working out twice a week) I could lose fat AND gain muscle, but the results spoke for themselves and confirmed what Jeff talks about in his videos.

So, you do need calories, a LOT more calories than you are eating now if you have never gotten serious about building muscle, but calories are not everything. They have to be balanced with the work you are doing in the gym. The rules of nutrition to build muscle naturally, fast are:

- protein, protein, protein
- liquid protein only before, during and after your workout
- higher calories and carbs within the first 8 to 12 hours around training (the amount depending on your intensity)
- a normal diet the rest of the time (i.e. only solid food and limited, in fact almost no, liquid protein supplements)

In short…Eat when you are hungry.

Eat for the activity you are about to do

How crazy does that sound! Going to the gym to try and surpass a deadlift max weight of 325 lbs? Two egg omelet. Half a cup of oatmeal porridge. Banana. Two scoops weight gainer protein supplement for another quick liquid 500 calories. All taken in about ONE HOUR before your workout.

Sitting on the couch crushing Zeus again in God of War III? You can skip that 500 calorie weight gainer and just have a two egg omelet and a tuna sandwich. Pretty simple eh?

Don't stuff food in your face every two to three hours like a robot. Don't eat 4000 to 6000 calories a day because you are trying to "bulk" and you were told you must based on your calculated macros and the mass gain goals you have set for yourself. Eat if your body commands you to eat.

Eat until you are full, NOT exploding, then a little more and be done. Eat when you are hungry again. If you are training three times a week with intensity and heavy weight, you won't have to schedule your meals every two to three hours. Your body will SCREAM to get up and eat, even at 4 am in the morning!

That is the mistake I made the first time I bulked up. I was training hard, but not nearly hard enough to justify the massive calories I was consuming for my stage of muscular development. I was eating like I was training for a Mr. Olympia contest. I was literally forcing food into my mouth that had no business being there because my training was still not maximized to match my higher calorie intake. For once in my body building life, I over shot on my diet and under-performed in the gym.

You will notice my nutrition advice is pretty general. I will not tell you how to calculate your macros or what you should eat or what exercises to train with. You can buy the book Scawny to Brawny for all of that information or find it all over the web. This is good information to know, do not get me wrong. Just don't treat those caloric calculations like some kind of law of gravity. As you get bigger, your body will naturally demand more calories from solid food to maintain itself AND continue to grow.

What I want you to take away from this piece on muscle building the natural way is a philosophy, a mindset. A new way of seeing your body and how to feed it properly after leaving everything you have on the gym floor in a pool of blood, sweat and pain.

Two final tips on nutrition

1) Cottage cheese is your best friend before bed

A 1/2 cup of cottage cheese gives you 15 grams of slow release casein protein while you sleep. Add three tablespoons of yogurt, some chocolate chips, half a squeezed lime for flavor splash and a dash of hydrolyzed whey protein isolate for fast uptake when growth hormone kicks in at it's highest during your first REM sleep cycle (I believe, see Jeff's channel, it's on there somewhere)… and you are set to keep feeding your muscles protein all night, or at least until 3 or 4 am or so depending on how hungry your body is when you are forced awake by growls in your stomach.

2) Wheat is the enemy. Cut it out

I have another great book I want to share with you: Wheat Belly: Lose the Wheat, Lose the Weight, and Find Your Path Back To Health

This is the single most nutrition shattering book you will read. It completely destroys the "healthy whole grain" diet advice and is the science that underpins the paleo-diet trend that is all the rage right now. Wheat, very simply, is death. At the very least fat, guaranteed. Diabetes, mental health (bipolar and schizophrenia), digestive issues, skin problems (acne). There seems to be no end of horror this staple of the Western diet is responsible for.

I have personally started to cut wheat from my diet drastically and I can testify to feeling stronger, more alert, and have maintained far lower body fat year round than I was able to before.

That sums up my advice for you on nutrition for building muscle. You will note, not anywhere did I say a Big Mac twice a day is a good thing. Nor Pizza. Nor alcohol. When it comes to what to drink to build muscle:

Water. Period.

Surely Maximus must supplement with something though right? I do. Keep your eye out for part three coming soon.

Read More: A Beginner's Guide To Breaking Bodybuilding Plateaus

Maximus Decimus Meridius
Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

Idiotic Male Feminist Gets Arrested For Protesting ROK Meetup At Wrong Location

February 13, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A white knight has been caught on camera (archive) getting arrested after protesting a Return Of Kings meet-up in New York City while the real meetup was being successfully held a few blocks away. The man's apprehension by authorities was the climax of a farcical SJW protest based on "intelligence" about where the NYC Return Of Kings meet-up would be held. Rows of skinny jeans-wearing, bright hair-colored, safe space-loving SJWs had assembled outside a club and coughed out highly unimaginative rhyming chants before police intervened.

> @Anony_Central: #NYPD arresting #SmashRapeCulture protester! #JailSupport pic.twitter.com/azHtN5x3C8
>
> — Nexus da Deprogramma (@REEFA_BOI) February 7, 2016

The problem for the white knight is that his actions, based on a false tip, were not only personally stupid but entirely pointless. A mole had planted information in the SJW camp and the meet-up was actually taking place elsewhere. Protestors had gathered in Washington Square Park, where they proceeded to freeze their backsides off. Then, like proverbial sheep, a SJW mob leader announced that they knew where the meet-up was, supposedly at Dream Downtown Hotel's PhD nightclub. So onto 9th Street they marched, exacerbating their preexisting frozenness.

In a sign of how silly SJW tactics become, the protestors were unable to get to the rooftop area of PhD because they were bellowing so loudly and conducting themselves like pork chops. The manager of the rooftop establishment, plus the hotel itself, obviously realized the serious risk to public safety and the reputation of the venue that the freezing marchers represented. Word is that the white knight was arrested for refusing to follow police instructions and acting aggressively towards them.

And where, pray tell, are even the reports about violent Return of Kings readers? Naturally, the media could be as "skilled" at lying about us as they have been in slandering Roosh. That said, mere allegations involving meet-up participants (and many of them did meet) have been non-existent.

"The cops are enabling rape culture… but let's passively watch the white knight get arrested!"

https://twitter.com/jeneverbes_/status/696190914197393408

After the debacle outside the hotel, SJW Twitter accounts bristled with broad brush claims that the police were enabling rape culture by being present and also arresting the cognitively-challenged white knight. Yet they idly stood by as he was taken into custody by the cops. Of course, I am not supporting attacks on police in any sense, but it was very revealing to see how positively docile SJWs can be when it suits them. Someone like Roosh gets hundreds of online death threats for writing satire in the vein of Sir Thomas More and Jonathan Swift. Police, on the other hand, are labeled "rape culture supporters" without attracting the typical vindictive and violent responses dished out to others who challenge their phoney narrative.

In their hearts, if they can even be said to have them, SJWs are cowards. They rely on thinly veiled promises to harass those who would dare to disagree with them, from making them lose their jobs to threatening their families by doxxing them. A permissive media and academic climate condones their antics, too. Meanwhile, the guarantee of serious intimidation and violence forces many from participating in narrative-challenging events like the ROK meet-ups. SJWs are thus ensured both numerical superiority and justifications for their appalling behavior by the establishment, particularly blatantly biased journalists. The same outlets patently lying about Roosh did not bother to report about the fact of a self-entitled white knight being arrested for anti-social behavior.

Another interesting outcome from the evening's festivities, as documented online, was the juxtaposition of SJWs screaming against so-called "rape culture" with explicit and implicit threats. Twitter user @jeneverbes is a case in point (archive). Already falsely labeling Roosh both a rape advocate and rapist, they can move onto their next presupposition, that anyone they cast as a "rape culture" enabler is liable to be shot:

When feminists selectively embrace guns.

Even with threats and violence, the SJWs are losing

Declining actor Jemaine Clement has been tweeting at Roosh obsessively, desperately trying to get media attention for his "efforts", which he duly received.

In opposing the ROK meet-ups, SJWs relied on thousands of sociopathic threats to get their message of hate across. Countless SJWs, including self-confessed former junkie and mentally unstable Kortney Olson, have also used the Two Thousand Hour Hate against Roosh to boost their own profiles, validate their cravings for "likes" and attention, and temporarily assuage a fundamental hatred of themselves.

And what is this all for? To try to stop men from meeting, when those men are avid readers of a website which has 3,000 mostly self-improvement articles? As this happens, SJWs are yet to challenge the literally thousands of migrant rapists roaming Germany, Sweden and other allegedly “sovereign” European states. Likewise, do-gooders are still mute about the Rotherham child rapes in England for fear of being called “racist”.

Confused individuals like the “man” arrested in New York will sacrifice themselves for an imaginary cause but do not make the slightest peep about real rape. These, my friends, are our delusional enemies.

Read More: Worldwide Effort To Shut Down International Meetup Day Is Under Way

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 Reasons Girls Fake Mental Illness

February 13, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Women are claiming to have mental illnesses and personality disorders at record high numbers. A girl is far more likely to be diagnosed with a disorder now than in previous generations. Recent studies have shown that today, 1 in 4 women take medication for bipolar disorder, depression, anxiety, or another illness.

What is the reason for this massive increase? Some argue that it is because our society has pushed women to pursue soulless corporate careers, leading them to numb themselves with medication. However, today a girl has other motives for labeling herself with a mental condition. In this article, I will outline five reasons why girls pretend to have mental disorders.

1. To get away with being sluts

Two of the most common disorders girls claim to have are bipolar and borderline personality disorder. Guess which symptoms both have in common? Extreme promiscuity. A girl with with BPD has twice as many sexual partners than average, engages in more casual sex, and loses her virginity at a younger age. She also tends to experience more high-risk sexual behaviors. She is more likely to be pressured into having sex, raped by someone they do not know, or the victim of date rape. This matches the description of the modern woman.

2. To avoid responsibility

With medication, girls often seem to improve. She is able to hold down a job and behave like an adult. Yet often she will stop taking her medication—for bipolar disorder, within one year 50% of women will relapse. This allows her to continue her reckless pursuit of gratification without taking responsibility for her actions. She can blame the disease for her behavior, and blame it yet again for her urge to discontinue her medication. Very convenient. Her disorder also allows her to claim “mood swings” for her erratic actions.

3. To receive attention

It is a widely known yet still ignored statistic that men commit suicide at 3.5 times the rate of women. Consider it our way of checking our privilege. On the other hand, women attempt suicide at 4 times the rate of men. How is it possible that girls attempt suicide more often, yet the fatalities for men are so much higher?

Once again, girls are faking. This is a very effective method for the modern woman to receive attention. When “mood swings” and “depression” aren’t enough, she will result to swallowing a handful of Tylenol PM and revel in the attention of her family, friends, and orbiters. Even in milder cases, exhibiting the symptoms of a crazy person allows her to receive more units of attention on her social media accounts.

4. To feel special

The modern woman has a burning desire to be a snowflake, but in our increasingly commoditized lives, she is finding it harder than ever to stand out from the crowd. For her, 1000 “likes” for a semi-nude selfie is no longer enough validation. She gets bored with the usual compliments from men she keeps around to inflate her self-esteem.

She will then act out, treat the people around her horribly, and claim a disorder to garner sympathy. In Western societies, it won’t be long until taking medication for personality disorders is viewed as a status symbol in the same vein as having the latest iPhone.

5. So they can consume drugs and alcohol

60% of girls with bipolar disorder abuse drugs or alcohol. Our increasingly degenerate society has produced ennui in millennials on a level not seen in any living person's lifetime. The lack of structure, family, and stability has formed a void within girls that they are desperate to fill. To alleviate this emptiness, she uses her so-called disorder to go off her prescribed medication and instead blow her local drug dealer for some molly or fuck bartenders for free drinks. Taking drugs is still seen as a minor taboo, and if she can blame her illness for her addiction, her life becomes much easier.

While mental illness was something that wouldn't have been openly advertised just a couple of decades ago, it is now seen as a badge of honor in our increasingly voyeuristic and decadent times. Even celebrities like Britney Spears (bipolar) and Lena Dunham (OCD) have profited off of their "diagnoses" in their quest to become ersatz role models for young women.

Is it any wonder that this generation of Western women is unfit for commitment?

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

Twitter Appoints Anti-Free Speech Feminist Anita Sarkeesian To Head Trust And Safety Council

February 13, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With Twitter caught in a death spiral for the past month, you'd figure that at some point, they'd stop digging and try to climb out of the hole. Instead, they've brought in a power drill to tunnel their way to the Earth's core. Earlier this week, Twitter announced the creation of the Trust & Safety Council, an organization dedicated to fighting "abuse" on the platform. The Council's mission statement reads like a press release from Oceania's Ministry of Truth:

> To ensure people can continue to express themselves freely and safely on Twitter, we must provide more tools and policies. With hundreds of millions of Tweets sent per day, the volume of content on Twitter is massive, which makes it extraordinarily complex to strike the right balance between fighting abuse and speaking truth to power. It requires a multi-layered approach where each of our 320 million users has a part to play, as do the community of experts working for safety and free expression.

Chief among the inaugural members of the council is Anita Sarkeesian, best-known for her Feminist Frequency series of videos on "sexist" tropes in video games. Appointing Sarkeesian to head a council on policing speech is like hiring Bernie Madoff as your accountant. Sarkeesian's modus operandi for the past few years has been to shut down individuals who are critical of her in any way, shape or form, as Infowars' Paul Joseph Watson explains in this video:

Anita Sarkeesian has used supposed death threats made against her—some of which she may have faked herself—as justification for clamping down on free speech. Last year, she even made a speech to the United Nations in which she characterized being called a "liar" as a form of harassment. The announcement helped fuel the hashtag #RIPTwitter, in which users point out the various ways that Twitter is abusing its own userbase.

This latest move is emblematic of Twitter's fall from grace. For all its faults, the platform used to serve as an effective means of spreading information and stories that were ignored or suppressed by the mainstream media. Twitter users were pivotal in not only GamerGate, but in the popularization of the "cuckservative" epithet and breaking news about the Muslim refugee rape attacks in Germany this past New Years' Eve. However, rather than embrace its users, Twitter insists on fighting them, damning itself in the process.

How To Destroy A Successful Company In One Move

Twitter had been in trouble long before the Trust & Safety Council slimed its way into existence. The site's user growth has been stagnant for nearly a year, a major problem for a platform that is dependent on recruiting new customers to make money. Twitter has also failed to turn a profit in the nearly ten years that it's been in operation, despite its popularity. However, the site didn't actively start driving away its users until recently.

Last month, Twitter stripped Breitbart editor Milo Yiannopoulos of his "Verified" tag, a status that allows celebrities to use Twitter without fear of impersonation, which is unprecedented in the history of the site. Twitter's rationale for punishing Yiannopoulos was his supposed "abusive behavior," which was a fig leaf to cover for the fact that the site takes a dim view of conservatives and libertarians. For example, Twitter CEO Jack Dorsey is a vocal supporter of #BlackLivesMatter.

Yiannopoulos' treatment sparked a full-scale revolt among Twitter's userbase. Within hours, his fans rallied to the #JeSuisMilo hashtag, which became one of the top ten most popular hashtags worldwide, and free speech advocates worldwide condemned Twitter's decision. Twitter's stock has been in freefall ever since #JeSuisMilo began, the platform has actually begun losing users, and recently, four senior executives have fled the company after seeing the writing on the wall.

Furthermore, Twitter is dead-set on infuriating its remaining users with arbitrary speech policies and obnoxious redesigns. The platform suffered another blow when Dorsey announced that Twitter would take control of users' timelines and determine what they can and cannot see. Furthermore, Twitter has begun censoring alternative right-created hashtags such as #rapefugees (which was about sharing news on the Muslim refugee rape attacks in Germany) in order to suppress news that conflicts with Dorsey's left-wing ideology.

Bringing on Anita Sarkeesian as the head of the Trust & Safety Council is yet another move guaranteed to drive away Twitter users. Twitter's principal growth in the past two years has come from GamerGate supporters (who rallied to the site after GamerGate discussion was banned from 4chan) and alternative right users who have used it to advocate for free speech and share news ignored by the mainstream media. With Sarkeesian policing speech on Twitter now, the site has all but told its users that they are no longer welcome.

Twitter's Dilemma And Corporate Censorship

To a certain extent, Twitter is stuck between a rock and a hard place. As I mentioned above, the site's growth has been driven by pro-GamerGate "cultural libertarians" and the alternative right, which has inflamed leftists and social justice warriors. If the site allows the former to run unchecked, the latter will declare open war on it, yet by appeasing the latter, the former are being driven away, killing Twitter's profitability in the process.

Ultimately, Twitter's slow motion collapse is a good thing in that it shows the limits of corporate censorship. Prior to his suicide three years ago, hacker and free speech activist Aaron Swartz warned that the power of social media companies created new and worrying avenues for censorship. Because private companies have no voters to answer to and no First Amendment to govern them, they have no checks on their ability to control free speech.

In revolting against Twitter's mercurial harassment policies, social media users have shown that they are unwilling to put up with restrictions on their freedom of expression. Whether Twitter changes course or it falls and is replaced by a more user-friendly platform remains to be seen.

Read More: Did Anita Sarkeesian Fake Death Threats Against Herself?

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

5 Things I Will Teach My Future Son

February 14, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Ideally, every new generation should surpass the former. In reality we know that's not always the case. In fact, it's seems like humanity is just getting less capable and more fragile for every generation. But if I have a son, he's not going to become some pussy SJW like his peers. I won't allow it!

As I grow older and experience more and more of life, I realize that my childhood did little to prepare me for it. I had a pretty sheltered life when I was still staying at home, and my parents probably wanted that for me. But the unintended result was that I became spoiled without even knowing it. Reality hit me hard when I left the nest and had to care for myself.

Hopefully I won't have a kid for many years. But when I do, I know I need to teach my son some things that set him up to succeed on his own. He won't like me being stern and saying that I know what's best for him, but as an adult he will probably thank me for hardening him early on.

As for my daughter, I expect her mother to teach her the things she needs to know to be a lady. Here's what my son will learn from me.

1. Beat up other kids

There’s only so much you can do to prepare yourself for a real fight. It’s one thing to fight in a ring with padded gloves and rules, and another thing to stand up to a big bully on the schoolyard. When you feel that blood pumping and anger rising inside of you, ready to do real harm to somebody, it’s like you become another person.

I can teach my son some basic techniques of punching, kicking and blocking. But more importantly, I will tell him to never back down from a fight and never show weakness to an opponent. It’s better to stand your ground, have one fight and then be left alone, than to be a pussy and get pushed around for years until you graduate.

2. Work for a living

I want my son to have a good and comfortable life while at the same time not getting spoiled. My solution is to make him do work at home to earn his place in the household. This wouldn’t be strange at all a hundred years ago or less, but nowadays kids aren’t expected to do anything that’s boring or that they simply don’t feel like doing.

I might need to put away the TV and gaming console in a closet if the kid gets too attached to them.

By doing some menial tasks around the house, the boy will learn that working is sometimes dull, difficult, and tiring, but that it's necessary to put food on the table and pay the bills. Paying bills and taxes are certainly also things he need to know before he starts making his own money (although by the time my boy is born, I hope most taxes will be a thing of the past).

3. Lose in order to win

Roosh says it well in his book Bang, on the subject of approaching girls with the risk of getting turned down: "Not doing anything may prevent you from failure, but because you make no attempt, it prevents you from success as well."

If you never try, you never win. And if you don't lose a number of times—like everyone does at the beginning—you probably won't learn anything. I want my son to understand that it's fine to fail as long as he analyzes what he did wrong and does better next time.

I actually didn't realize this simple truth before I read Roosh's book. I went through life trying to avoid the risk of failure and thereby missed out on a lot of opportunities. My pride got in the way of improving myself and eventually becoming a winner. I don't want my son to make the same mistake.

4. Hunt in packs

I don’t want my son to become a lone wolf, sitting behind his computer all day watching porn and playing some MMORPG. He needs to learn social skills, and the best way to do that is to hang around other kids. You might learn cooperation as you play multiplayer games as well, but I hardly think you’ll form long lasting friendships with guys you meet on online fantasy battlefields.

Having loyal friends gets you all kinds of perks. You can rely on them to help you when you’re in need, and they’ll have your back when you pick up girls. The reason why we wanted to have those international meet-ups was precisely to form bonds with masculine men that might come in handy if shit hits the fan. But as you know, SJWs and the media couldn’t let us have that.

5. Distrust authority

Now that there’s an election in the US coming up, you can see how people have a way of putting all their faith and hope on one single person. History shows that people are willing to give up all of their liberty and independence if a guy in a nice suit promises them enough. I don’t want my son to be just a face in the crowd. I want him to be self-reliant and put his own needs first.

He should distrust anyone who craves power, and be skeptical of those who claim to know best. He should even be skeptical of me, his father, and my teachings. Only then can he truly be his own man, and make me proud.

Read More: 10 Things You Must Teach Your Future Daughter

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

Game Of Thrones Actress Souad Faress Falsely Accuses Man Of Rape For Walking Past Her

February 14, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> The case has raised questions about the CPS's decision-making in sexual assault cases.
>
> — The Huffington Post UK, reporting on the outright persecution of Mark Pearson by Britain's Crown Prosecution Service.

An award-winning actress appearing in the upcoming sixth season of Game of Thrones has been outed as the woman who falsely accused Mark Pearson of rape after he walked past her. Souad Faress claimed that Pearson digitally penetrated her, violating her inside her underwear, for several seconds in the middle of Waterloo Station in London.

Despite video evidence showing the male artist had a newspaper in one hand and was holding the strap of his backpack in the other, he was tracked down using his electronic public transportation card and charged. Furthermore, Pearson was in range of sexagenarian Faress' body, let alone her genitals, for no more than about half a second. In January 2015, police appealed for help (archive) in finding the then 66-year-old's "attacker". At this stage, Mr. Pearson's image began to circulate in the public domain.

Yet it gets worse. Faress, to try and bolster her fraudulent account, said she screamed and no one helped her. CCTV footage conclusively disproved this. To boot, Pearson did not break stride, discrediting her other claim that he smashed into her shoulder. Most shockingly of all, the lying thespian could not even point him out in an "identity parade." That did not stop the Crown Prosecution Service from prosecuting Pearson until its representatives were rebuked by the judge and a jury quickly exonerated him.

Because of Souad Faress' vindictive and attention-seeking lie, Mr. Pearson endured a nightmare year of harassment from the CPS, which is under the control of rabid feminist Alison Saunders. Saunders is infamous for her promises to increase rape prosecutions. All this comes at a time when British police have been saying they will prioritize online "abuse" over burglaries and robberies at people's homes.

Alison Saunders wants Stalinist-style quotas for "rape" prosecutions

Why do so many women obsessed with (false) rape accusations and convictions for them look like Alison Saunders?

Anyone familiar with the macabre history of Stalinist repressions will remember that Stalin often issued quotas for the numbers of victims he wanted expunged from Soviet society. When his underlings in the NKVD and its predecessors had gone through the typical scapegoats, including kulaks, suspected Tsarists, Mensheviks and members of the intelligentsia, they simply picked up random people from the street to make up the numbers. Similarly, Alison Saunders has made it her mission, as evinced by the public record, to increase the number of rape convictions.

The problem is, prosecutors have nowhere near the levels of actual rapes they want. So they have to scrape the bottom of the barrel, which is where Mark Pearson and others have come in. Even with incontrovertible video evidence that the "rape" against Faress was nothing but her malicious, ego-boosting fantasy, Saunders' CPS wanted an additional scalp. This is nothing new, though: in 2014, an extra 5,000 rape prosecutions were initiated, resulting in only another 77 convictions.

Bear in mind, too, that rape conviction standards are already lower than for other crimes, making the lack of men found guilty of sex assaults all the more unimpressive. In the widely publicized Rolf Harris trial, for instance, it was not even proven that Harris was at a particular event in which he was meant to have abused one of his accusers, who was not sure if it happened in 1968 or 1969. Nevertheless, he was found guilty of that particular crime. But let's not let beyond reasonable doubt get in the way of stopping rape culture!

Souad Faress is protected by guaranteed anonymity

If Souad Faress looks like this when acting, imagine how repelling she looks going to and from her yoga class, the same situation in which she falsely accused Mark Pearson.

Mark Pearson's name has been plastered around the world. To raise awareness of his plight (and further clear his tattered name), he agreed to a television interview and warned viewers about the real risk of anyone being vexatiously prosecuted. Right now, however, Faress is blatantly using the anonymity granted to all rape and sexual assault accusers in Britain. Men accused of these crimes are almost universally named, irrespective of court process outcomes affecting them much more than anyone else. After all, the difference between guilty and innocent for them is oftentimes the difference between years of jail and freedom, albeit a freedom that links them forever to a purported sex attack.

There is one thousand times more evidence that Souad Faress lied, but she is still the beneficiary of a system dedicated to keeping her from being outed, much less charged with what she deserves: perverting the course of justice and making a false statement to police. In her 60s, she has irrefutably hit the wall of walls and making false rape accusations in these sorts of ridiculous circumstances is simply a means for her to feel sexy and desirable enough to be raped. We are ultimately dealing with a horrendously depraved woman.

Help us make life hard for Souad Faress

Souad Faress has miraculously outdone the convoluted lies of Emma Sulkowicz.

False rape cretins like Souad Faress deserve all the ridicule and hate that could ever be directed their way. They are repulsive, sociopathic oxygen thieves whose only manner of making themselves feel important is to ruin the lives of random innocents, invariably mendaciously accused men. Women like this comprise a tragically too common motif in modern society, one that is perhaps even more insidious than females entering relationships with unabashedly criminal men.

As soon as Faress faced a modicum of heat for her monstrous actions, she made her Twitter account private. If you breach her fantasy of being a sexagenarian supermodel targeted by thirsty men on the London Tube, she cannot deal with it.

Spread her name and photographs to the far corners of the internet. Avenge Mark Pearson and send the message that similar behavior will be met with fury and rage. She may have won awards as an actress, but her name is not even close to well-known enough to avoid a lifetime of being associated with the false rape accusation of all false rape accusations.

I do not know whether Faress' Game of Thrones character will meet a sticky end in the sixth season. Yet it would be very fitting if Faress spent her final days in the sticky heat of a dungeon prison for falsely accusing Mark Pearson of a crime. Now there's a nasty fate that someone like her really deserves.

Read More: Canadian Aurelie Nix Falsely Accuses Roosh Of A Rape Threat With Help From Journalist Emily Campbell

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

6 Lessons For Building Your Body And Mind

February 14, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

My article this week is not directly about the mechanics of fitness, but rather a book that explains, among other things, the mindset needed to make yourself fit. The Education of a Bodybuilder is at its core an autobiography of Arnold Schwarzenegger from birth to about 1980. Let's get something out of the way at the beginning of this review: this cover is horrendous. Needless to say, this a book that risks everybody in a 100-foot radius trying and failing to restrain their laughter at how you're reading a book about a glistening muscleman in a black speedo.

However, this is a minor setback that shouldn't stop you from reading an excellent book, written by a highly accomplished human being, that primarily seeks to answer the age-old question of why men bother to lift weights, as well as having relevant advice for anyone interested in fitness, from the total novice to the seasoned veteran, or anybody interested in improving their life at all:

1. Try a lot of things before something "pops"

Arnold states that he was always athletic, and thus cottoned to various sports in his childhood and adolescence. He played team sports for a few years, before deciding that he “disliked winning a game and not receiving recognition for [his] labors” (a somewhat arrogant attitude that he freely admits to, and is explored in depth in the book). He does individual sports such as swimming, track, boxing, but none really “clicked.”

It was only when he started to lift weights for the other sports that he had something click, that he knew what he wanted to dedicate himself to:

> I still remember that first visit, I had never seen such things. The men were huge and brutal. And there it was before me-my life. It seemed I suddenly reached out and found something…I had found the thing I wanted to devote myself to (pg. 12)

2. Find inspiration anywhere—positive or negative feedback

Arnold’s childhood film of choice

As this book is a biography of Arnold from birth until his late 20s, the readers gets an in-depth view of what inspired him before and immediately after he starts formally training-and, speaking personally, it's an eclectic mix that resembles my own catalysts for getting into fitness, and likely many others' as well:

In his early teen years, when his decision to start bodybuilding "pops," he is initiated into this strange world of brutality and vigor by his older peers, who essentially teach him the basics and serve as immediate mentors for him. Concurrently with this, he discusses his love of B-Movies starring sportmen-turned-actors, one in particular serving as a different sort of mentor figure-a tantalizing ideal that he fanatically strove for:

> [Reg Park] looked so magnificent in the role of Hercules I was transfixed. I studied every move he made, every gesture. Sitting there watching…he was always in front of me. The more I focused on his idealized image and worked, the more I saw it was possible for me to be like him." (pg. 15).

The aforementioned British bodybuilder becomes something of a figure half paternal, half mythological hero to the young Schwarzenegger, and Arnie freely admits that he was a hero worshipper as a youth. Indeed, his relationship with Park, as a sort of modernized Campbellian "deity father" who must be struck down and then atoned with, seems to be better than his relationship with his actual biological father.

And there lies another aspect of Arnold's inspiration, one he is not afraid to admit: his youthful anger towards others served as a sort of "negative feedback motivator," and it was just as strong as the positive role models: His own parents disparaged his desires well after he started to make a living from bodybuilding ("He felt I wasn't normal-and he was right.", page 20), by his estimate about half of his fellow youths mock him and express incredulity towards the pursuit, and, as he reveals in a later chapter, a homosexual owner of a Munich gym franchise and sponsor of several international bodybuilders seeks to sexually extort him, a request which is declined.

Rather than succumbing to any of this, he instead uses his anger and feelings of disrespect to train harder and thus earn accolades without losing self-respect. These coarse feelings, as powerful as they are, have a bit of a drawback:

3. Fitness, or anything else that requires dedication, can drive you to madness and isolation

An aspect of the book that is sure to trigger SJW termagants is Arnold discussing how the training and lifestyle affected him mentally, as well as physically: fanatic dedication to his task and the older men at the gym bringing girls back to the gym for the boys to share gave the young man a decidedly… animalistic view of women:

> Women were sex objects, I saw the others using them in this way and I thought it was okay. We talked about the pitfalls of romance and how it hurt your training. They were my idols so of course I agreed… I was convinced a girl couldn't understand what I was doing, and that we could never communicate equally. I needed to be in the gym, not with them-so I'd pick them up, fuck them, and never see them again. It wasn't until four years of training had gone by that I was capable of meaningfully communicating with a girl (p. 25)

Indeed, Arnold just…stops showing emotions at all for a period of several years, which further fractures his relationship with his family: "I couldn't afford to have hurt feelings before competitions, I needed tranquility. I missed out on the emotional teen thing, I feel I benefited in other ways, so it all balances." (pg. 28). The book was published in 1980, and he states that, since retiring from bodybuilding competition, he has essentially had to train himself to express emotions again, using the same discipline he learned from physical training.

To an extent, I feel that being truly great at anything requires a little bit of madness, a little bit of abnormal behavior, and oftentimes it is something that the people around this great person cannot understand. One doesn't even have to be a world-beater to get this reaction. When a skinnyfat 14-year-old me started to get into fitness, though obviously not being involved in teenage gym orgies as Arnold was, it nonetheless alienated me from my peers as well, who were content to drink and smoke themselves into a stupor and let their youthful fitness waste away. And much like Arnold, I channeled my feelings of teenage angst into working harder

Just as the author had to train himself to feel emotions, I had to train myself to be capable of speaking to women, and, though difficult, it was successful, as I managed to lose my virginity at the age of 20 (this was a couple of years before ROK existed). Both Arnold's great successes and my smaller successes reflect a theme of the book, related to this one, that was most certainly unintended by its author:

4. The "Riddle of Steel" is relevant to all men

As a longtime fan of Schwarzenegger's oeuvre, I've always felt that his breakout role, Conan the Barbarian is still his best work. "The Riddle of Steel" is a philosophical concept that I have held in my life, and conveyed to others when I train them-as I understand it, the film's position on the riddle of steel is that steel alone is not the alpha and omega of strength, nor is strength of muscle. Instead, strength comes from within, and from inner strength comes strength of arm and strength of steel.

To that, both Arnold and myself would add a corollary: that through any sort of hard physical training, you will also inadvertently discipline yourself both mentally and emotionally (in other words, the types of strength all feed off each other). And with mental and emotional stability, you will be capable of doing something that most find very difficult: honestly assessing your abilities and failures: "I was always honest with weak points; I feel the key to success is to be honest about your weaknesses". (pg. 67)

More specifically related to Conan, compare this quote from Education: "Helmut insisted that since I had achieved things, I shouldn't thank God, I should thank myself, and if bad things happened, I would have to get myself out of it" (pg. 28) with this scene from Conan the Barbarian.

The parallels are striking for a man that had never heard of Conan the Barbarian until he was cast in the film adaptation. Beyond the philosophical insights, there is of course much advice on the practical side of training and business. About 40% of the book is advice on training, with the slight majority going to his life story.

5. Keep it simple

After explaining why people should train, he goes into his training routine. As the title of this section would imply, it is relatively simple, starting with bodyweight exercises, or "freehand" as he calls them, and moving into a weight program of heavy, compound lifts. As a lark, Arnold entered the German national Olympic style weightlifting competition in 1966 and won it), with a small amount of isolation exercises-due to a bodybuilder's goal of having bodily symmetry and proportion.

I too have always felt that, when learning any sort of skill, physical or otherwise, one should train hard, but oftentimes the best recourse is to keep it simple. Rather than doing a million exercises, just do a few important ones, and do many repetitions.

6. Take opportunities, leave your comfort zone, and always be competing

Or, to quote a Russian proverb, "he who is afraid of bad luck will never have good luck." It sounds simple enough, but it bears repeating: Arnold took a series of enormous chances-going AWOL from the army to enter Mr. Europe, leaving Austria to live in Munich, going to London and then America to enter Mr. Universe, starting a business venture with Joe Weider, getting into films, und so weiter. Of course, merely taking chances alone doesn't guarantee success, effort and training are a requirement, but the fact remains if you want to succeed, you have to leave your comfort zone. Again, looking to myself, if I hadn't conquered my own fears and taken risks in my life I'd be a morbidly obese virgin living with my parents.

In a related note, the two of us agree that placing yourself in competition with others is the best way to force yourself to "go the extra mile"-an interesting method of doing so that he suggests is to compete in lifting with your training partner, and make little wagers to make it interesting. Try it for yourself.

Conclusion

In the end, this book gives worthwhile advice to any man, not just “gym rats.” Indeed, the only bit of advice I questioned at all was Arnold’s advocacy for eating six meals a day—while it is indeed an efficient way for a bodybuilder to add mass to his frame, I find the concept of grazing like a fat cow impractical for anybody that isn’t in a bulking program.

Regardless, this is a book you can, and should, buy cheap. It’s 30 years old, only about 200 pages, and it’s still better than the vast majority of self-help books you’ll find.

> …Plato said man should strive for a balance of mind and body, without a well conditioned body, the mind would suffer. I believe that in myself. Strength, confidence, a firsthand knowledge of the rewards of hard work and persistence, can help you attain a new and better life. Regards, Arnold

Read More: The Education Of A Bodybuilder By Arnold Schwarzenegger

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

5 Ways To Groom An Indian Girl To Be A Subservient Wife

February 15, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Back in 2014, my colleague Matt Forney warned men to not date Indian girls. But Indian men who want to honor their heritage will still marry Indian girls, and there will always be non-Indian men who fall for Indian women. So how can these men groom an Indian girl to be a docile wife?

Indian girls present a special challenge

Kiran Gandhi being unhygienic in London

White American girls take a lot of heat from the manosphere, but the truth is that there is a small minority of American girls who are very traditional. These girls have a natural common sense that allows them to see through the lies of feminism and progressive politics that infect their peers.

Indian girls in the US, on the other hand, seem to lack the bullshit detectors that this minority of white girls possesses. Every Indian woman I know swallows the feminist, progressive, and corporate indoctrination without questioning it.

Take Kiran Gandhi, the deranged Indian woman who ran the London marathon while menstruating without a tampon to raise awareness for "period shaming." Even though she is one of the privileged few (she is a Harvard MBA), she still feels that she must engage in shameful stunts on the pretense that she is somehow persecuted.

Even "conservative" Indian women like South Carolina governor Nikki Haley are actually progressives. They subscribe to same liberal idea that a woman can only be fulfilled as a corporate drone or a man-jawed politician, not as a loyal wife and mother.

Any man who plans to stay married to an Indian woman is going to have to purge his wife of her feminist indoctrination and other bad tendencies. Here's how to do it.

1. If you want to rule, you have to lead

If you think that Indian girls will accept their husband as the boss just because they come from a traditional culture, you are wrong. I have a close friend from college who went to India to find a wife. He was convinced that by finding a traditional Indian girl, he would live like some maharaja with his wife dutifully waiting on him. He could not have been more mistaken.

Although my friend's wife was beautiful, she was anything but subservient. Instead, my friend ended up waiting on her; catering to her every whim. Within a few months of getting married, my friend looked like a wreck and he confessed that his wife was making him miserable with her constant demands.

In truth, if you want to be treated like a king, you have to act like one. Real kings must actively rule over every aspect of their realm—or they will not remain on the throne for long.

Husbands must think of themselves as ancient kings who do not sit behind the battle lines planning, but who actually lead their troops in battle. As king of your marriage, it is up to you to determine your family's mission and get your wife to buy into it.

Also like a king who leads his troops, you must always maintain frame. You must not show weakness or lose your composure. Women are experts at sensing weakness, and no matter what they may say to the contrary; they are naturally wired to despise it. While maintaining frame takes a lot of discipline, your reward will be a loving, submissive wife.

2. Use dread game

Dread game is a tactic of instilling a sense of doom in your woman so that she appreciates you. Anything that gives your wife the idea that you have other options—and that there is a chance, however slim, that you might act on these options can serve as a dread game technique. While there is lots of information written on various dread game techniques, I am only going to recommend three simple ones.

The first is that you must look good: get in shape, lift weights, and dress well. Look your best whenever you go out. By doing so, you send your wife a signal that you value yourself. It will also increase the attention that other women pay to you. Women are always on the look out for rivals, so if other women show an interest in you, your wife will act more subservient to keep you.

The second thing to do is to go out more with your wife and to be very gregarious. Being very sociable is an alpha male trait that will give your wife, and other women, the tingles.

The third technique is a nuclear option that I don’t recommend unless your wife is a particularly difficult case. It involves taking dread game further and actually flirting with other women in front of her. It has to be something that she can see, because the whole point is to make her aware that you have other options.

Any flirtation that you engage in must be very subtle, so subtle that she can’t really accuse you of open wrongdoing.

3. Keep her fit

Some American women have the idea that they only have to be thin before marriage, but that once they “get the ring,” they can blimp out. But judging from observation, all Indian women think that it is acceptable to get fat after they get married. Even Aishwarya Rai, once one of the most beautiful women in the world, became a hambeast after she got married.

You can’t let this happen. Not only is a fat wife sexually unappetizing, your wife is also a reflection of you. If your wife begins to resemble Jabba the Hutt, it lowers your social value as well.

Fortunately, the fix is easy. As part of your dread game, you are already eating a healthy diet and going to the gym. Simply take your wife with you and keep her on the same diet. Besides helping your wife preserve her girlish figure, working out with your wife is a great activity to draw you closer to each other.

4. Be affectionate

In an earlier article I wrote: “Gentlemen, you need to fuck your wives.” And you must do it often. This seems to be an obvious truth, but there are a lot of married guys out there who are getting very little sex.

The key to fixing the problem is knowing the difference between how men and women are wired. Men are ready for sex all the time. We can get aroused in a matter of seconds.

Women require a longer seduction. When you are dating, the atmosphere of seduction is always present. Once they get married, lots of husbands forget this. They will ignore seduction and try to go straight for sex—only to be rebuffed for their effort.

Correcting this is easy. Show your wife massive affection. Hug and kiss her often and unexpectedly even when sex is not on the immediate horizon. These can't be quick pecks as you leave the house—they have to be passionate so that you wife understands that you still find her ravishing.

5. Give her babies

As I mentioned, Indian women seem to be particularly susceptible to the corporatist lie that a woman's priority is to her employer, not her family. The most enjoyable way of correcting this mistaken priority in your wife is by putting a baby in her belly. There is nothing quite as satisfying as watching your barefoot, pregnant wife preparing a delicious home cooked meal for you.

Ideally, try to let your wife stay home full time while your children are young. Then, when the children are of school age, she can go back if the family's finances require it. Although you will lose potential income, it will pay off in the end with healthier, better-adjusted children and a happier, less stressed wife.

Conclusion

There will always be a few women that are so damaged by modernity that they are unfit for anything. But if you diligently apply these five tactics you will be able to transform almost any young Indian woman into a submissive wife that will be make you happy for a lifetime.

Read More: How To Game Indian Girls In India

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

16 Ways To Save More Money

February 15, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

The economy is a mess and many young people are struggling more than they would like to admit. It is during times like this that men are offered an opportunity to awaken their masculine virtue to triumph over their materialistic world. When scarcity hits hard, men will either falter and become trapped in a cycle of financial and moral poverty or use the challenge as a means to actualize their potential.

If you are strapped for cash or are looking for ways to save more money, consider choosing a minimalistic lifestyle to maximize your potential. Try following the tips below to invest your limited resources on the one thing that matters most: your life.

1. Keep A Personal Financial Record

The trick that helped me curb my foolish spending spree was to keep a record of my finances. As they say: What gets measured, gets managed. It is very simple to do and it will help you keep track of where all your cash is going. To do this, on a notebook or a spreadsheet program, record and list all your expenses and income for each month (it's much easier and efficient if you round everything to the nearest dollar). And at the end of the month, total up your income and expenses to see just how much you're spending and saving. After tracking your finances for a while, you become conscious of your own spending habits and learn to restrain when necessary.

2. Put Value On Experience Over Pleasure And Status

It’s simple: The money you invest in creating experience and value for yourself will stay with you for life; buying for pleasure and status is shallow and will not last long. Good places to spend your money on are knowledge, skill, health, strength, business, and other ventures. Don’t be the fool spending money on vanity.

3. Buy For Utility And Durability

Objects are just objects, and unless you apply some non-existent value mentally, its only value is in what you can do with it. For example: a Rolex watch does the exact same thing that a cheap watch does, so what's the point of dishing out a large sum of cash for something that does the same simple job? Always think in terms of utility and durability. Nothing else really matters.

And although you want to save money by not wasting it on luxuries, note that buying something cheap isn't always the best option. Buying cheap may save you money instantly, but it may cost you in the long run when it starts to break down and become a useless junk. Sometimes, you need to invest more for the quality and durability.

4. Never Buy Anything On Credit

This is not to say that you should not use credit cards, but rather than you should never buy something with a credit card that you cannot pay off in full each month.

I personally never buy anything on credit. When I need something, I buy it when I have the money and pay everything up front. The idea of enslaving myself with debt is so ridiculous to me that I can only shake my head when I hear about people getting a new television set—which they can barely afford—with monthly payments.

5. House And Car

These are the two biggest money drains that shackle people. Depending on your location and job, having a car might be something that is necessary. Home ownership, on the other hand, has long proven to be a scam. After witnessing what others put themselves through just to keep a home, I know I would always rent rather than be a mortgage slave.

6. Opt For Calisthenics And Basic Equipment Over Gym

Another place you can save an extra cash is by canceling your gym membership for body-weight training. With calisthenics, you don't have to get a long-term membership and you don't even need to commute. You can do all your workout at home with just basic equipment like a fitness mat and a pull-up bar which are cheap and easy to obtain.

Yes, calisthenics isn't likely to get you the same results as working out in a gym, but if you just want a decent workout that will also help with your balance and flexibility—and with less chance of injuries—then calisthenics should be fine for you.

7. Avoid Drinks You Don’t Need

The only drink you really need is water. Besides the occasional green tea, I don’t ever see the point in wasting money on other drinks and beverages.

I never felt the need to drink coffee—I never started the habit and I don’t see any reason to do in the future. It’s strange for me to see bunch of cranky people at the local Starbucks or Tim Horton’s line up for a cup of coffee in the morning like zombies. I think many of these people vastly underestimate the importance of sleep and should really find ways to invest more of their time to it than looking for their fix of caffeine on a daily basis.

Soda is a can of liquid sugar. Nothing more needs to be said. Alcohol is a toxin. I only drink socially and almost never more than a beer. They’re too expensive for the little to no value they provide. But of course, just how much you decide to drink will vary widely depending the lifestyle that you choose.

8. Avoid Unhealthy Snacks And Junk Food

Not only are they a waste of money, but they're often detrimental to your health. Either get healthier snacks like nuts and fruits or just wait until your meal time.

9. Cook Your Own Meals

Eating out can be convenient, but costly. Learn to cook healthy meals for yourself and save money.

10. Get Off The Screen

You're a man, you have better things to do than to be "entertained" in front of a screen. Stop throwing your money and time away on movies, television, video games, porn, and what not. (And don't even get me started with sports fans who buy expensive jerseys with another man's name on them.) Cancel everything and get rid of them all. There are so many other meaningful things you could be doing with your life.

11. Phones And Other Electronics

Nothing says consumer culture gone mad like the sight of sheeple lining up in front of Apple stores for the latest version of the iPhone that does the exact same thing as the one they already own. Who could have predicted that planned obsolescence would go so far?

Phones and other electronic devices have become the most vapid status symbols of our age. Just get a decent device that will do the job for years to come, and stop placing the value of electronic products above your own individual self.

12. Ditch The Poo

The human race gave gone along just fine without a shampoo until about some decades ago. Shampoo is essentially a chemical toxin that destroys the natural oil in your hair, prompting you to use another chemical product—the conditioner—to restore your damaged hair. It's the perfect business.

Roosh himself posted the result of his experience of not using shampoo and I myself have gone from using it twice daily to none at all with great results. I can say for certainty that my hair now is much healthier than ever before in my adult life.

13. Limit Your Clothes

I've met men who take their fashion more seriously than a woman. For Pete's sake, just buy a few things that you need that look good and no more. You're not a woman, you don't need to go shopping every week to play dress-ups.

14. Stop With The Decorations

There is nothing more pathetic than seeing men cover up their insecurity and inadequacies with expensive objects. You don't need jewelries like a woman, you don't need that tattoo, and you don't need pieces of "art" scattered around your house. Keep your life simple and invest in yourself instead.

15. Avoid The Education Scam

College is the biggest scam that is oppressing young people today. Anyone who is considering college should check out the student loan debt clock and see if they want to be part of that number. And if you insist, be smart about the path you choose. Your dreams may seem set now, but they'll pop like a bubble when the reality hits you like a sledgehammer. For all those who are starting to plan out their future, Mike Rowe has a message for you:

16. Feel Free To Spend Money On What Matters for You

The point of saving money, of course, isn't necessarily to live like a Buddhist monk (although that is a possibility if you seek an ascetic life), the point of it is to prioritize what you truly value in life. With more money, more time, and less clutter to distract you, you will be in a better position to strive ahead towards your goals and ambitions.

Using the tips I mentioned above (minus the fact that I went to university), I was able to pay off all my student loan and save around $10,000 working a part-time job. I would have saved thousands more if I had applied those principles sooner. And I was able to accomplish this within few years of my graduation while living in a meaninglessly expensive hellhole in Canada. While others are still stuck because they blew their money on brainless "fun," I invested my time and money on self-improvement and I'm now in a better situation than they can ever hope for.

You always have the choice between living for the moment and living for life. Choose wisely.

Read More: 20 Things You Can Do Instead Of Playing Video Games

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

How Theodore Roosevelt Almost Lost His Life On The Amazonian River Of Doubt

February 15, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Theodore Roosevelt was unique among the occupants of the presidential office. Besides all of his achievements during his tenure as chief executive, he led a remarkable private life as well. He had worked as a rancher, a big game hunter, a combat commander, and, in the last great escapade of his life, he transformed himself into the role of explorer.

As the co-leader of the Roosevelt-Rondon Expedition of 1913-1914, he added his name to the list of Amazonian explorers who risked their lives to penetrate the secrets of that lush and intimidating canopy. How this came about, we will now relate.

Roosevelt was the type of man who was never happy when idle. He always had to be involved in some great enterprise. He had an irrepressible spirt and dominating will that burst beyond the acceptable boundaries of the “proper” society of the era. When his doomed 1912 presidential election “Bull Moose” campaign ended, he was left with nothing to do.

But Roosevelt could not be happy for long with nothing to do. He had planned on taking a speaking tour of South America, and a leisurely ride along the Amazon River. But for some reason the Brazilian government asked Roosevelt if he would like to accompany one of their explorers (Candido Rondon) on a planned expedition along the so-called “River of Doubt” (Rio da Duvida).

With no qualifications or experience for such an arduous project, Roosevelt accepted. That a fifty-five year old ex-president would agree to such an offer is nothing less than incredible, but nevertheless comports with the Rooseveltian personality profile. He was a man who could not refuse a dangerous challenge.

The Amazonian basin one hundred years ago still contained vast tracts of unknown geography. Even the Brazilian government had only the vaguest idea of what lay inside the largest region within its borders. Rondon's plan was to trace the course of the Rio da Duvida, and find out exactly how it joins the Aripuana and Madeira Rivers (see map).

Roosevelt's wife was terrified, but managed to convince her son Kermit (who had just become engaged to be married) to accompany his father for the purpose of "watching out" for him. Thus the stage was set for one of the more surreal episodes in the annals of American presidential history.

The Amazon basin is nothing to be trifled with. It permits all who enter the opportunity to taste its power. Roosevelt and his son would both lose their health; but they came very close to losing their lives.

The expedition began at the town of Tapirapua and traveled northwest, reaching the River of Doubt in February 1914. The plan was to travel along the river, collect insect and wildlife specimens, and document the geography of the area. But in the Amazon, nothing related to travel is ever simple.

Kermit Roosevelt

Problems began immediately. Roosevelt had put his trust in Rondon's proven organizational ability; but unfortunately for both men, lesser figures had botched the logistical details. Food ran short, medical supplies were scare, and the Brazilian porters (called cameradas) did not work well with each other.

As a result, by the time the expedition began down the Rio da Duvida, everyone was already weakened and sick. This region of the Amazon is one of the most malarial in Brazil, and in 1914 knowledge of the disease was still in its infancy. No one in the party was spared its ravages (although Rondon himself did live to the age of 92, dying in Rio de Janeiro in 1958).

There were other problems. The types of canoes chosen for the river turned out to be too heavy; these sunk often, with the inevitable loss of precious provisions. Almost nothing was known of the Indian tribes in the area, and these turned out to be either hostile or apathetic. As the journey became more and more arduous, discipline and morale broke down.

One man drowned in the rapids early in the trip. One porter was murdered by another.

The survivor was abandoned in the jungle to his fate (a swift death).

Roosevelt himself suffered grievously. A minor leg wound, caused by a scrape against a sharp river rock, became infected. In his starved and diseased state, the wound would not heal. Delirium and fever followed; he became so bad that he actually begged his son and the party to leave him in the jungle. Roosevelt's incredible willpower, with Kermit's encouragement, somehow managed to keep him alive.

The expedition was almost certainly saved from ruin by small parties of rubber-harvesters encountered along the way. These laborers (called seringueiros) helped the party haul its canoes, and gave them additional food and provisions. Finally, in April 1914, the group reached the junction where the River of Doubt connects with the Aripuana River.

Rondon had arranged for a relief party to meet them at this river junction. Roosevelt himself was given medical attention and began a slow recovery. But his jaundiced frame would never quite be the same. He would die five years later, his life almost certainly cut short by the ravages he had undergone in the Amazon.

The River of Doubt was renamed "Rio Roosevelt" by the Brazilian government. The expedition actually had been successful in what it set out to do: it brought back numerous botanical, insect, and animal specimens, and charted the course of the river for the first time. Roosevelt returned in triumph to New York and defended his expedition's accomplishments in a presentation given to the National Geographic Society.

It had been an incredible accomplishment for an amateur adventurer of fifty-five years who had never been in the rain forest before. But perhaps that is an inaccurate assessment.

For he was still, after all, Theodore Roosevelt.

Read More: 4 Things I Observed From My Trip To New York City

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Phoebe Moloney's False Reporting On The ROK Meetup Incited A Knife Wielding Mob

February 15, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> This teams [sic] goal is to (in a humane a way as possible) dismember or mutilate the genitals of the men who support this atrocious movement.
>
> — Laura-Rose Freeman, principal organizer of the planned knife attack (archive) in Sydney, who read Phoebe Moloney's article falsely saying that Sydney meet-up participants wanted to legalize rape.

Readers of Sydney Morning Herald journalist Phoebe Moloney openly planned to "dismember and mutilate" the genitals of Return Of Kings fans intending to meet at Hyde Park in Sydney. The ringleader, Laura-Rose Freeman, only quoted one article in her call to violence and it was Moloney's. In this piece, Moloney lied that those meeting in Sydney wanted to legalize rape, despite providing no evidence to confirm this completely made-up claim. Worse still, this claim endangered people, whose motivations Moloney invented out of thin air and presented as violent.

What's more is that fact-checking website Snopes conclusively debunked the outright fabrication that the meetings were either pro-rape events or that participants were supporting the legalization of rape. Again, the media, with Moloney at the absolute forefront, deliberately conflated the satirical article by Roosh with the desires of those wanting to come to Hyde Park, two other Sydney locations and venues across Australia. The onus is on Phoebe Moloney to prove her claim that Sydney and Australian attendees wanted to legalize sexual assault.

Shockingly, Laura-Rose Freeman offered to "provide the knives" and indicated she was willing to go to jail over “the dismemberment of any male attending”:

Was Moloney’s agenda to ignore violence against us from the start?

Phoebe Moloney didn’t even scroll down to the end of our first page, as she claimed we only publish 15 articles a month. So much for “research.”

Given Moloney’s known radical feminist positions, exemplified in her role as Women’s Officer at the University of Sydney, Return Of Kings can safely assume that she is willfully ignoring countless serious threats being made against those who had intended to meet up in Sydney and other Australian cities. This is in addition to other calls to incite violence across the world, ranging from acid attack proposals to firebombing establishments housing ROK functions.

It is also clear that Phoebe Moloney did not go past the first half of the first page of ROK. We can tell this because she ridiculously claimed that we publish “about 15 articles a month” (archive), not the real figure of around 100. Moloney’s ideological bias is so evident that she did not even bother to finish one page of our website, which would have easily disproven her abysmally shoddy effort at "research."

Fairfax Media's main switchboard transferred our call the Thursday morning before last Australian time so that we could confirm if Phoebe Moloney intended to publish details of the knife attack plan and other serious, specific threats. She responded by crying and asking if we could call her back in 10-15 minutes. She did not answer a subsequent call.

Laura-Rose Freeman's knives plot

Those indicating they would attend a local Starbucks before going onto Hyde Park with knives were:

- Laura-Rose Freeman ("The Double-Barreled First Name Private School Girl")
- Harry Foristal ("The Ginger Ninja")
- Charlie Dorman ("Mr. Straws")
- Andru Charman ("The White Tupac")
- Amy Carswell ("The Adidas Assassin")
- Karina Bryan ("Hey Boy")
- Sarah Diprose ("Whimsicality's My Speciality")
- Dom Ryse ("The Baggy T-Shirt Bandit")
- Rosita Eisermann ("No Idea")
- Jess Findlay ("Sun's in My Eyes")
- Isla Cornish ("Black and White Nostalgia")
- Alanah Allen ("Hate Straight Angles")
- Josh De Silva ("Cross-Country Hustler")
- Courtney Masters ("Didn't Get the Phone I Wanted")
- Ben Ireland ("Slim Shady")

Many others were invited and a cross-section indicated they would be "interested" in attending.

Other threats made against innocent men thanks to malicious journalists and violent SJWs

Chloe Giesbrecht thinks that specific threats to beat people to within an inch of their life and throw acid on them are “funny.”

Chloe Giesbrecht (Twitter) of Winnipeg, Canada (coincidentally on the same day she was asking for advice about how to apply to be a prison/corrections officer):

Giesbrecht has a history of incidents involving Twitter and the police. Her ignorance is on show this instance because she did not bother to check if Roosh would be in Canada. These are the exact sorts of gullible, threat-prone people journalists around the world are aware of and will not report about.

Christie Orr was actually a contestant on The Amazing Race as "overweight comic relief", even if she uses deceptive camera angles in photos, making it hard to see her as the same person:

And the irony of Alannah Watson claiming to "fight rape" by threatening mob rape and implied death herself:

ROK has documented many more very serious threats and calls to violence by SJWs and others. Hundreds more exist beyond this only partial list.

How about some balanced reporting?

If any ROK member threatened even the goldfish of someone, Phoebe Moloney and others would be on the scene in five seconds flat. There is no excuse for painting a false climate of harassment by ROK where none exists, especially when the only threats have come from violent individuals being protected from any scrutiny by journalists.

We expect either confirmation and proof from Phoebe Moloney that attendees in Sydney supported the legalization or an apology and unmitigated retraction of the claim.

And if journalists will not shed their ideological bias and publish the threats being made against us, we will ourselves.

Read More: All Public Rape Allegations Are False

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Official Timeline To The Worldwide Hysteria Over ROK's International Meetup Day

February 16, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With the dust settling and things returning to normal, it's worth analyzing how the mass hysteria over International Meetup Day started. For more then a week, news outlets big and small brazenly smeared ROK, claiming we were organizing "pro-rape rallies," with feminist protest groups, mayors, governors and more getting caught up in the mix. While Roosh had to officially cancel Meetup Day, the left suffered a massive loss as he humiliated journalists at a press conference and countless people woke up to the reality of the MSM's lies.

With that in mind, here's a timeline of how the whole kerfuffle began. You can also see Roosh's Storify account here.

January 4

Roosh announces International Meetup Day in a post at ROK. The purpose of this day was to give ROK readers (as well as Roosh V Forum members and fans of Roosh's own blog) "the opportunity to meet other like-minded men in their cities." At the time of the announcement, only three tribes existed: one in Chicago (of which I am a member), one in Washington, D.C. (whom I've hung out with), and one in Poland. Our hope was to expand the tribal meetups to as many cities around the world as possible.

January 19

Roosh releases the complete list of cities that will be taking part in International Meetup Day: over 160 meetups in 43 countries.

January 31

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/694029734406017024

The first media report on International Meetup Day, from the Sydney Morning Herald, is published, characterizing Return of Kings as an "anti-woman group… whose supporters believe rape should be legalised on private property." While relatively mild, it served as an omen of the category five shitstorm to come. Additionally, leftists and feminists start posting warnings about ROK meetups in Boston, Vancouver, Glasgow and other cities on Reddit.

February 1

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/694066875953733632

Australian feminists launch a petition on Change.org to shut down the ROK tribal meetup in Sydney, declaring it a "misogynistic form of terrorism." In response, Roosh begins trolling Australians by claiming that he's going to visit their country, prompting immigration minister Peter Dutton to hold an "urgent meeting" aimed at keeping him out. Return of Kings also starts trending on Twitter in Australia.

Media outlets in New Zealand, Britain, Canada and other countries begin denouncing the meetups and calling for Roosh to be banned. Snopes posts an article debunking the claim that Roosh is a "rape-supporter" and the meetups are "pro-rape rallies," which does nothing to halt the hysteria.

February 2

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/694297199216345088

The media amps up their attacks on ROK, with politicians such as Toronto Mayor John Tory and SNP MP David McDonald launching broadsides against Roosh. Traffic to ROK reaches record highs as a New Zealand anti-rape campaigner calls ROK's meetups "a form of terrorism." Roosh continues trolling both Australians as well as journalists who request interviews with him. American media outlets start reporting on the meetups.

Loading...

February 3

> @rooshv I can't wait till you're in Glasgow. I've never saw a cuntstick be kicked to death by a girl wearing fake loubs before. #bucketlist
>
> — stevey wonders (@steveystyles) February 3, 2016

Things take a turn for the serious, with feminists sending threats of doxxing and violence to men who attend ROK's meetups. Counter-protests are announced in Chicago, New York City, Glasgow and numerous other cities. American media outlets amp up their attacks, with local TV stations and newspapers continuing the "pro-rape" smear, and police get involved in several cities. Return of Kings is denounced by Texas Governor Greg Abbott, and the U.K. Parliament even debates whether Roosh should be allowed in the country.

Roosh and ROK initially try to salvage International Meetup Day by both taking the meetups underground and announcing a counter-op to expose journalists who were lying about the meetups, but the sheer amount of heat is too much. Roosh is forced to cancel International Meetup Day in order to protect ROK readers from doxxing and harassment.

February 4

Despite the meetups being cancelled, feminists and media figures continue to hound Roosh and ROK. Anonymous doxes Roosh's family, forcing him to hire a private security firm to protect himself.

February 5

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/695687520626085890

Roosh announces he will be holding a press conference in Washington, D.C. so he can respond to journalists who have been libeling him.

February 6

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/695981734467231744

International Meetup Day arrives. Despite the meetups officially being cancelled, feminists still hold poorly-attended counter-protests around the world. In Chicago, where we chose to hold our meetup after moving it to a different location, I embarrassed feminists by all but walking up to their protest and giving away my location: none of them confronted or followed me. In New York City, a male feminist protester was arrested after an ROK reader successfully trolled the demonstrators into going to the wrong spot.

Roosh also held his press conference, where he embarrassed journalists by showing that none of them read his writings and by pointing out that none of them were aware of the Muslim refugee rape attacks that occurred in Germany during New Years' Eve.

In response, Caitlin Dewey, Matt Ramos and the other journalists whom Roosh humiliated tried to assuage their butthurt with salty write-ups in their respective publications, where they focused on Roosh being a Trump supporter rather than the fact that he exposed their lies and snake-like tactics to the entire world.

February 7

https://twitter.com/KittenHoliday/status/696168304050905088

The manufactured outrage finally began to die down. Roosh was forced to depart the U.S. via New York City for a country where he can speak his mind without fear of persecution.

As you can see, the ease with which the media can whip up hysteria—and the brazenness with which they lie—is frightening. With no prompting whatsoever, the media colluded with feminists and politicians to prevent masculine men from holding innocuous happy hours, provoking violence and harassment against these men by smearing them as rapists and “rape-supporters.” While ROK was able to fight back against their smears and score a victory, it came at a high cost, and we’ll have to be on guard against the forces of leftism in the future.

Read More: Worldwide Effort To Shut Down International Meetup Day Is Under Way

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt is also the founder and Editor-in-Chief of Terror House Magazine. His work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

How Fast-Approaching Sexbot Technology Is Making Women Fearful

February 16, 2016 | by Rex Infidelis | Link | Original Link

I just had a funny experience that illustrates the imperious power of the female narrative in our society. I was sitting in my living room with a 25-year-old, who we'll call Teri, watching a technology documentary when a segment came on about sex-bots and the technological advancements that are making ever-more realistic ones possible.

At first she seemed intrigued and amused at the sight of dozens of featureless rubber torsos hanging from hooks, waiting to have nipples painted on before being attached to jointed metal frames; but a moment later, there was an interview with a guy who had journeyed to the shop to help design a mechanized companion that was being made just for him, and Teri's expression changed. Here was a man, neither creepy nor overtly awkward, and exhibiting no outward sign of disability, stating without shame that he would rather pay $7,000 or more for a silicone-and-circuitry simulacrum of a woman than take a real live one out to dinner.

She wasted no time with subterfuge (I like that about her), her id marching indignantly to the forefront as she huffed, "I don't know about all this. It seems like they could just replace women with those things." As you might expect, I failed fantastically in my attempt to stifle the ensuing chuckle.

A New Enemy Emerges

While most females will never be as direct as Teri, preferring instead to couch their arguments in talk of “dehumanization” and “exploitation,” the truth is they are scared of the competition. It’s bad enough that we already have FleshLights and RealDolls, but the thought of a fully functional female shaped robot who walks, talks, laughs, fucks like a pornstar, and (if designers are smart) knows how to cook and clean?

Plus you never have to feed it, take it shopping, meet its parents, or listen to it cry? Now the ladies are starting to sweat. They know that access to this sort of technology will compromise their bargaining power with men. While you may be tempted to point out that women have had access to dildos, vibrators, and even more complex contraptions involving power tools for quite a while and it has failed to replace us, you would do well to remember that women don’t want the same things from men as men want from women. Men look to women to be their companions, keep their homes, and provide sex. Women, on the other hand, look to men for everything else.

Narrative Under Attack

If women en masse had some way to meet their needs for shelter, protection, child-rearing resources, and status without trading their beauty, companionship, and homemaking skills for it, the power of a man to secure himself a desirable woman through the cultivation of superior provisioning skills would be greatly diminished.

Oh wait… that already happened. If men succeeded in leveraging half the power through technological innovation that women have managed to through modern governments and their myriad social justice programs, the dynamics of the marketplace would tip dramatically in their favor. Basically, the mass production of sex-bots with all the above traits could cause as tumultuous a tremor in the sexual market as the advent of feminism itself, only this time with men getting the better half of the deal.

In today's world, the men we call betas and deltas, or those who actually produce all the wealth SJWs are so busy redistributing, are incentivized toward all this surplus production by the dream of having a woman to love who will both admire them and help raise a family in their image. While this American dream remains attainable for a select minority, modern society and its many forms of "progress," feminism chief among them, continuously drive that goal farther into the realm of fantasy for the average man. As women gain more and more "freedom" and use it to pursue and attain (briefly) the minority of men who they desire, your average Joe must submit to ever-intensifying erosion of his bargaining power if he is to even scavenge the leftovers.

As the MGTOW movement illustrates, men have already been feeling the squeeze for a while now, and many are starting to drop out even with the knowledge that this will likely lead to childlessness, loneliness, and a lack of a support network in old age. If that's already the case, how many men will join them once sophisticated robo-lovers and artificial wombs consign these worries to the dustbin of history? Is our society prepared for the potential results of a precipitous drop in its productive and innovative capacity? The next generation of men could turn a century's worth of social engineering on its head by dropping out and refusing to produce the wealth that feeds the various organs of the globalist machine.

Preemptive Strike

In predictable fashion, this looming revolution in the marketplace is inducing histrionics among certain segments of the feminist population, notably Kathleen Richardson and her acolytes in the Campaign Against Sex Robots. So worried are they, in fact, that they advocate a global ban on the development and production of "machines in the form of women or children for use as sex objects, substitutes for human partners or prostitutes." (Emphasis added)

Machines in the form of men are excluded from the organization's definition of sex-bots, as males are apparently never subject to victimization or exploitation. The organization also repeatedly laments a link between the sex trade and the production of robots made for sex, without any causality being proven. In a bid to instill maximum feelbads, Richardson herself stated that a sex toy company that sponsored a report favorable to sex-bots "profits from the sex trade." She neglected to specify whether it was the prostitutes or the johns who were driving this demand for dildos.

While there are few if any laws currently addressing the specific issue of sex with artificially intelligent machines, some scientists, along with CASR, are beginning to call for legislation. It may be slow in coming however, as it seems difficult to articulate a reason why sex with robots is wrong without appealing to the traditionalism that is so abhorrent to feminists and their mobs of useful idiots. Short of actual legislation, SJWs will work to shame people into their point of view.

For example, they recently expressed delight when Malaysian authorities "asked for the Second International Conference on Love and Sex with Robots to be held somewhere other than Malaysia," and used the opportunity to make a tenuous link between this meeting and the child sex trafficking industry in that country. Ever since the women's suffrage movement, feminists' strategy has not been one of independently seeking their own power, but of shaming men into relinquishing theirs. They are indeed dependent on men's surrender for their every victory, and this fight will be no different. If SJWs can't get this sophisticated new form of (presumably male) masturbation defined as rape, they will simply use shame to discourage men from designing and using the technology by likening it to child abuse and slavery.

Conclusion

We live in exciting times, to be sure. The war of the sexes, like all other wars, has long been influenced by technology. Females of late have been given a huge leg up from male-made technology in the form of birth control, egg-freezing, and in-vitro fertilization. But while women love to shout about how independent they are, deep down they realize they are only afforded a soapbox by the same "patriarchy" they so disdain and the men who pay the taxes to run it.

If sex-bots become as ubiquitous as some hope and others fear, men may find themselves with less and less incentive to maximize their productivity as they opt in large numbers for cheap robots over expensive families. Women better hope the Campaign Against Sex Robots is successful (it won't be), lest the next generation of men truly go their own way, leaving women to prove how capable and independent they really are.

Read More: How Propaganda Lies Are Used As Weapons

Rex Infidelis
Rex is a recluse hailing from the frozen tundra of the north. When he's not busy running his business or preparing for zombies, he can be found in front of the computer, studying everything he can about society's impending collapse so he can hasten its arrival.

5 Things You Don’t Know About The Devices That Control Your Brain

February 16, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

This article was sponsored by Vaka Väinämöinen OÜ

Here at ROK, we’ve spent significant time talking about the evils of the smartphone on society. Its effect on atomizing people, making women dependent on external validation, and ruining our ability to deeply concentrate on the problems that are facing the modern world is well-known.

But did you ever wonder how the invention came to be and the motivations of those behind it? The Smart Device may be the first book of its kind that chronicles the inception of the smartphone’s technological backbone from start to finish. It is the autobiographical story of Johannes Väänänen, and engineer-turned-entrepreneur with a couple of ideas that changed the world, and tells the complete story of how what started as a fun invention ended up in the hands (and brains) of hundreds of millions of people worldwide.

If you’ve ever wondered about the process by which our entire world has become enslaved to the almighty cell phone, you need to read this book. Here are five things you may not have known about the smartphone’s humble origins:

1. The Mainstream Device Was Started As A Rogue Engineering Movement

The original engineers of what would become the technology necessary for smartphone world-domination began from a desire to rebel against the set-in-stone ideas of their predecessors. The author of this book, and a small team of engineers, rejected the hegemony of mobile giants like Nokia for a vision of a better, more user-friendly product they thought would benefit society and make them a lot of money. They were right on at least one of those accounts.

2. It was done for not other reason than “inventor’s delight”

The author writes frequently about the agony and ecstasy underlining the creative process. While most would expect that the smart phone technology was put together simply for the love of money and girls, and there was much of both, the author cites his main motivation simply as the feeling that we get when we create something from nothing.

> What can it be then? Why bother inventing at all in this ready-made world? Wouldn’t it be easier just to be a ‘normal’ businessman, selling ecologically grown potatoes by the ton?
>
> It’s that lovin’ feeling. The deep self-awareness of having successfully done something nobody did before, ever. I call it Inventor’s delight.

3. People knew it was a big idea – and were willing to break the law for it

Like any other major project, the invention of the smartphone was not without its attempts at industrial espionage and all-out extortion.

> Driving our company's flagship Citroen C5 V6 to the airport parking lane, I saw three men running towards our car. There was a bloated shorty at the front, waving a stack of bint papers in his hand, followed by a couple of mammoth sized guys who looked like Chechen security goons. Harri shouted: "Drive on, they are about to do for us!" After a second of confusion I picked up on the situ and accelerated. Sonera's security chief actually jumped in front of the car and I had to do a sudden swerve to avoid hitting him.
>
> I thought… waaatta hell was this. Something like this never happened in civilized Finland – or did it? And after thinking about the episode a bit – how could they know we would be arriving at the airport at that time? Illegal mobile phone surveillance, tracking where we were, or even listening to our phone calls? Accessing airlines' databases illegally to follow Harri? Oh shit, what had I gotten into with him?

4. Apple originally had no interest in it

The author describes a lackluster, run-of-the-mill pitch meeting at Apple's offices in Cuptertino, where the room was dominated by the apathy of "not invented here" (NIH) and the technology barely turned any heads.

> Steve Jobs appeared to the room at the end of the meeting. I didn't really get to introduce myself to him, he just took one of the myDevice in his hand and started flicking myBook's pages forwards and backwards, again and again, commenting shortly that sometimes the swipe recognition did not work correctly – which was true, it was still a prototype […] My answer went uncommented upon…

We all know that Apple went on to use the author's technology and their internal design principles to create perhaps the most influential invention of the 21st century. You'll have to read the book to find out why they initially didn't see the potential in such an invention.

5. The creator now understands the effect of this Frankenstein's monster on society

It's hard for any reasonable person to look at the advent of smartphones and their complete domination of our cultural landscape without lamenting something that we have lost in personal relationships and attention span. The man who was at the central of this cultural force reflects:

> Did MyOrigo and Apple open Pandora's box, bringing usability and instant connectivity to everybody's pocket, enabling 24/7 social networking? There is some comfort in the notion that it would have happened anyway, maybe later, maybe in a slightly different form. But it is done now, that's for sure. Facebook, Twitter, Instagram. Always looking for that next endorphin dose; next comment or thumb up to a recent selfie.
>
> […]
>
> It seems nobody can boil an egg, or write a one-page document, without checking their Instagram account in the middle.
>
> What have we done?

This book is an absolute goldmine for a techie who is looking to develop the next big hardware or software revolution, but there is more than enough information and analysis of the personal relationships and struggles about starting a business that the pop culture enthusiast will enjoy it as well. The Smart Device can also be used as a manual for the budding entrepreneur, since it lays out in detail the dos and don'ts of starting a new business in the tech industry. In the course of the novel, you'll also learn why patenting is basically a scam, how quickly the people involved can destroy even the most solid company, and how the money, girls, and fame can come and vanish in a flash.

Click here to buy The Smart Device and learn how a handful of dedicated engineers and the genius of a few select men, included the author, wrought this unstoppable force on today’s social world. The price is lowered to $5.99 on Kindle and $11.99 for a physical copy on CreateSpace for a limited time.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How To Balance Intense Physical Training With Living Life

February 16, 2016 | by Carnival Of Gangs | Link | Original Link

I have a friend whose father is partly disabled and has a hard time walking. The last time we were celebrating our way of traditional Finnish Christmas by drinking heavily and eating ham as the Vikings once did I asked him what would he like the most if he could have anything. His answer was “To run like a child once more.” in those exact words. The need for certain levels of physical activity is built to our very cores.

Nowadays I’m probably in the best shape of my life physically, but I still notice that it’s sometimes difficult to find the right kind of balance in my training and other aspects of life. I can’t go drinking two full nights in a row on the weekend and then hit the gym on Monday like when I was 18 years old. But I can bench more and could beat the shit out of the 18-year-old myself.

The key is the balance developed over time.

Go for the balance

It may sound obvious but people too often concentrate on their training per se and forget the other aspects of life that should be factored in. “Is my deadlift volume high enough in this cycle? “Did I miss too many boxing practices this month?” The answer can be “Your deadlift volume was ridiculously low compared to what you are capable of but it was still too way high considering you’re work load has been higher than ever, your dog died last week died, and you just had three days of fever.”

So a certain balance needs to be developed. But how to do it in a turbulent environment where our physicality and surroundings are constantly changing? It’s basically a method of building healthy routines, prioritizing them and adjusting when necessary. That way one is ready for the unknown.

Let’s lay down the two categories where the balance needs to be established.

1. Balancing your life with training

2. Balancing your training

It may seem counterintuitive but I’m going to address the category number two first because that’s the easy part.

Balancing your training

1. Weightlifting

Weightlifting touches the very essence of masculinity and gives you all the building blocks for a functional and strong body. Lifting is the core and when adjusted correctly is beneficial to other sports and life in general. Man's body is made to lift heavy objects.

2. Aerobic training and sports

It can be as simple as running, playing football with your friends or jumping rope. I put "sports" in the name of the category because in my experience the most efficient, useful and fun way to do aerobic exercise is to do an actual sport. I strongly recommend a real life applicable martial art like boxing, thai kickboxing, or wrestling and grappling.

3. Other physical activities

Work (unless a desk job or similar), a walk in the park, general fucking around, other hobbies etc. you name it. Get a group and hunt a bear with just wooden spears. How's that for a caveman exercise?

So many activities indeed.

So the next question is how to balance the three sub-categories. It's quite simple actually. You have to compose a training regimen comprised of the three sub-categories and prioritize them.

Let me give you an example from my life. I lift two times a week and do beyond Wendler 5/3/1 type of powerlifting-kind-of strength training based around bench press, deadlift, overhead press and their assistance work. I go boxing once or twice a week either on a local boxing gym's "official" sessions or do independent exercise on the garage (heavy bag, rope jumping, shadowboxing etc. basic stuff). I also do random walks in fresh air whenever I feel like it. So these are the entities in my training I know and can control at least to a degree. Let's break it down to prioritized sub-categories mentioned above with ballpark percentages.

1. Priority. Wendler 5/3/1 (weightlifting): 50 %
2. Priority. Boxing (aerobic training / sports): 30 %
3. Priority. Walking (other physical activities): 20 %

You just have to decide what you want to do and how much, although I would strongly recommend that you keep the combined percentages of weightlifting sub-category and aerobic training and sports way over 50%. Otherwise your training may become too random and unpredictable lacking any real results. In fact, you can consider sub-category number 3 your "buffer zone." The bigger it is, the more reserve you have for surprises. This also serves as a gateway to balancing your life with training.

Balancing your life with training

So this is the tricky part. It's how much physical activity you can do overall in relation to life's other activities. I'm going to give you a practical process for finding the balance.

1. Find a balance between training and other life activities first.
2. Then find a balance in your training.
3. Adjust according to your life's situation when necessary.
4. Go to number 1.

The order is important. You have to establish some sort of basic balance between your training and life in general in order to be able to train in the first place. If life was just going to the gym and other forms of training your balance would just be established by "balancing your training." So it's a subtle dancing loop by adjusting your training to your life's situation and keeping the balance.

So how does one go about balancing one's life with training? It's a lifelong process to know one's limits and be truly wise about it but I can give you some practical advice. The basic principle is to cut first from the lowest priority (other physical activities in my case for example) and work your way up there to priorities 2 and 1 if necessary.

Always use your buffer zone (other physical activities) to basic balancing maneuvers. Let's say you have a 30% buffer zone and you have a harder time in work than usual. Cut the friend of a friend’s girlfriend’s move you promised to help with without touching your weightlifting and boxing routines for example.

Don’t keep too big buffer zone. It’s more beneficial to cut from priorities number 1 and 2 for a short period of time than not to train heavy enough most of the time. If the buffer zone is not enough just cut what’s necessary from priority number two. Not too much.

Short and brief cuts from priorities 1 and 2 are nothing to worry about. It’s not the end of the world if you have to skip two or three weeks of training. If it happens constantly, your pig picture is skewed and you need to work on the first step of the process.

It all can be summarized in one word. Prioritize.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why It’s Important To Have A Training Partner

Carnival Of Gangs

Lauri from Carnival Of Gangs is an engineer and a musician who is trying to find some truth in the world. Check out the multimedia series here: Carnival Of Gangs

Is Global Warming A Lie To Help Usher In An Oppressive World Government?

February 17, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Ten years ago, Al Gore claimed we had 10 years to save the planet from global warming, as pointed out in this Communist BS (CBS News) report from early 2006.

> Unless drastic measures to reduce greenhouse gases are taken within the next 10 years, the world will reach a point of no return, Gore said.
>
> He sees the situation as "a true planetary emergency."
>
> "If you accept the truth of that, then nothing else really matters that much," Gore said in an interview with The Associated Press. "We have to organize quickly to come up with a coherent and really strong response, and that's what I'm devoting myself to."

The clock ran out late this January, and warming has not reached what Gore called planetary emergency levels. Civilization, and the world, are still here. In spite of all the self-congratulatory agreements and conferences that have been held around the world on this matter, nothing substantive has been done to "fight global warming."

After all the rhetoric about a planet that was overheating, a number of scientists now think we could be headed into another Little Ice Age, and the global average temperature has remained steady for a decade and a half or more, defying the predictions made 20 years ago for today.

But, a lot has been done to ramp up the hysteria over normal (if devastating) weather events like tornadoes, hurricanes, floods, and fires. Now virtually every bad weather event comes tagged by the mainstream media with the suggestion that humans are to blame, even though tornadoes are down to record low numbers nationwide for 3 years in a row, and the U.S. hasn't been hit by a major (Category 3 or higher) hurricane since Wilma in 2005, the longest stretch since the Civil War. Another of the warmists' infamous predictions, that the Arctic would be ice-free in 2013, also came and went, and the ice cap is still stubbornly there.

If you tune in to the mainstream media you will come away with quite a different impression, however, since weather events are now hyped to the extreme because they drive ratings. Take it from me, a former apparatchik of the mainstream media who defected—causing hysteria about the weather drives ratings. Despite the hype, an increasing number of people are refusing to buy into the social hysteria surrounding global warming, which is really a thinly veiled attempt at instituting a global carbon tax.

Rebranding of global warming

Al Gore is probably hoping everyone forgot about yet another failed Doomsday prediction of his

Since so many of the predictions have failed, and the Earth is stubbornly refusing to go along with the global warming polemic, you might have noticed that since the global warming carbon tax scheme began in the 1980s, it has recently been rebranded. It's now called climate change.

But wait just a minute. The climate has always been changing on earth, and it has had nothing to do with mankind. There were periods when the earth was almost completely frozen over, and other periods when tropical forests extended northward towards the poles. All of those changes occurred either before man even evolved or the invention of the "infernal" combustion engine.

Climate change is an all-encompassing term that means whether its dry or wet, hot or cold, cloudy or sunny, and snowy or rainy, the changes can then be blamed on mankind. This makes the end goal of control easier to achieve than when the farce was named global warming on a planet that refuses to heat up as much as predictions in the 1980s and 1990s for today called for.

Consensus is not science, it's politics

The “consensus” of climate scientists who supposedly agree that CO2 is overheating the planet is often claimed to be 97%. The global warming alarm is also claimed to have the stamp of approval of the IPCC, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (the mainstream media does worship “officials” instead of logic and reason, after all). But like any governmental body, its conclusions are politically driven, and not scientifically driven.

Richard Lindzen, former Alfred P. Sloan Professor of Meteorology at MIT and an atmospheric physicist, tells us the ugly truth behind this so-called consensus.

> This claim that the IPCC is the world’s top 1,500 or 2,500 scientists – you look at the bibliographies of the people and it’s simply not true. There are quite a number of non-scientists. To fill the number up to 2,500 they have to start taking reviewers, and government people, and so on; anyone who ever came close to them. And none of them are asked to agree. Many of them disagree. People have decided you have to convince other people, that since no scientist disagrees, you shouldn’t disagree either. But whenever you hear that in science, that’s pure propaganda.

We will hear more from Lindzen in a moment. Professor Paul Reiter of the Pasteur Institute in Paris and a former IPCC member, has also spoken out on the “consensus.”

> A galling aspect of the debate is that this spurious ‘science’ is endorsed in the public forum by influential panels of ‘experts.’ I refer particularly to the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change. Every five years, this UN-based organization publishes a ‘consensus of the world’s top scientists’ on all aspects of climate change. Quite apart from the dubious process by which these scientists are selected, such consensus is the stuff of politics, not of science. Science proceeds by observation, hypothesis and experiment. The complexity of this process, and the uncertainties involved, are a major obstacle to a meaningful understanding of scientific issues by non-scientists. In reality, a genuine concern for mankind and the environment demands the inquiry, accuracy and skepticism that are intrinsic to authentic science. A public that is unaware of this is vulnerable to abuse.

The history of doing science by political consensus is indeed a disastrous one. Galileo was famously imprisoned until his death for challenging the establishment of his day, the Catholic Church, and teaching that the earth revolved around the sun.

More recently, Ignaz Semmelweis was thrown into an insane asylum in 1865 and then beaten to death by the guards at age 47 less than 2 weeks after being committed for suggesting doctors should wash their hands between doing autopsies and examining their patients. As a result of his “insanity” the mortality rate at clinics that adopted handwashing dropped 90% but his views conflicted with the establishment of the time. Only after his death did Louis Pasteur confirm the germ theory and vindicate Semmelweis.

Here, we have two quick examples of how dangerous establishments and political contamination of science can be. History has many others.

CO2 is not a pollutant

Human-produced CO2 is claimed to be the evil behind global warming, but as we learn in elementary school science, it’s an essential gas for all life on earth. It is also one of the weakest of the greenhouse gases. It makes up a minuscule 0.04% of the atmosphere, meaning the current atmosphere is CO2-starved if one looks at the history of the planet over the last 500 million years since the Cambrian Explosion of life burst forth onto the planet. Richard Lindzen once again explains.

> CO2 for different people has different attractions. After all, what is it? – it’s not a pollutant, it’s a product of every living creature’s breathing, it’s the product of all plant respiration, it is essential for plant life and photosynthesis, it’s a product of all industrial burning, it’s a product of driving – I mean, if you ever wanted a leverage point to control everything from exhalation to driving, this would be a dream. So it has a kind of fundamental attractiveness to bureaucratic mentality.

Yes, CO2 is plant food, needed for photosynthesis

CO2 concentrations have almost always been higher than today throughout the last half a billion years, usually 5 to 25 times higher if the levels are graphed out. Plants grow better in atmospheres with higher CO2 concentrations. Quite simply, CO2 is plant food.

Geologically speaking, CO2 concentrations have almost always been higher than the carbon-starved atmosphere of today, often 5 to 25 times higher

The planet has had even ice ages when the CO2 was much higher than today. In fact, there was an Ice Age in the end of the Ordovician when the CO2 concentration was an incredible 10-15 times higher than today. Crucially, even when there is an apparent relation between temperature and climate as in the Vostok ice core record, the relationship is the other way around from what Al Gore claims it to be. Temperature leads CO2, not the other way around. The ice core record goes back only 600,000 years, or 0.0013% of the Earth's long history.

If one looks at temperature over the entire history of the earth (4.5 billion years) and not just the last blink of an eye in geological time (10,000 to 600,000 years ago) one does not see a causal relation between CO2 and temperature.

You may also be interested to know that in one of the last periods of low CO2 concentrations (below 300 parts per million) known as the Carboniferous, as the CO2 content tumbled, the oxygen content of the atmosphere soared to 35% and meganeura—giant insects like dragonflies that were the size of hawks and giant spiders that were the size of house plants—roamed the earth. This was due the increased oxygen available.

Giant insects evolved as CO2 concentration plummeted in the Carboniferous

As you can see from these quick examples, the relationship between atmospheric gases and biology is much more complex than just "CO2 is bad." Further, increased CO2 will most likely lead to a greener world, since it is plant fertilizer.

The real goal: establishing a one-world government?

It is becoming clearer with each passing year the real goal of causing hysteria over the climate is to enable a global body to tax the entire world. A body that has the ability to tax the entire world is a de-facto world government.

Lord Christopher Monckton, former science advisor to British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, has been tirelessly sounding the alarm about this existential threat to freedom. He has also challenged global warming poster boy Al Gore to debate him on the science surrounding global warming, but Gore has repeatedly refused. Monckton has been criticized for being a non-climate scientist, but it is interesting that Al Gore's non-existent credentials have never been challenged by the media. He is a mathematician, however, and is quite skilled at deconstructing the skewed statistics presented by the global warming fear-mongers.

Lord Christopher Monckton, repeatedly banned for raising inconvenient questions, skydives into the Durban climate conference unwelcomed

Monckton often speaks about global warming and global government but a biased media ignore him, even when they are invited to cover his events. He is very good at connecting the politics and the pseudoscience. He says global warming is being used as a fig leaf to cover the real intentions of the yearly global warming meetings of governments around the world. He attended the annual global warming meetings until he was banned for asking a valid question about why the statistics were being cherry-picked. Monckton responded by "dropping in" unwelcomed on the Durban climate conference by skydiving in from 10,000 feet when they didn't want to let him in.

As Monckton explains in this video, the true goals at the annual climate meetings include levying heavy global taxes that will bankrupt the financial industry, redistributing wealth from Western nations to developing countries for their so-called "climate debt," and eventually shutting down capitalism around the world. The proposal would also give rights of legal personality to Mother Earth, enabling her to sue Western nations for their so-called "climate debt" to the third world. The aims would cripple economies and force people to figuratively go live in yurts.

The entire farrago is based on a predicted doubling of CO_2 concentration by 2100 to eight one-hundreths (0.08%) of the total volume of the atmosphere, nothing significant if one looks at the history of the planet. It is also based on computer modeling which has been proven wrong time and time again because the earth is not heating up as much as predicted. It's easy to make the connection that this has very little to do with saving the planet and everything to do with instituting a global government.

Real environmental problems

One of the proposed solutions to global warming has been clean energy. This is a great idea, and I'm definitely not opposed to finding better methods of producing energy.

One of the biggest pushes has been behind creating wind farms, which not only already chop hundreds of thousands of birds (some endangered) out of the sky each year, but also require huge quantities of fossil fuels to produce and maintain. One conservative estimate says it would require 5 million wind turbines to power the world, and of course the number of birds killed would rise well above the 300,000 that are killed now if there were that many blades churning in the sky. The utter hypocrisy of environmentalists who support wind farms as a clean energy solution only proves how much cognitive dissonance they have between reality and their pet projects.

As long as a wind farm chops endangered species out of the sky, it's okay

The entire global warming obsession takes time, money, and resources away from other, real environmental problems.

One that is never discussed because it's politically incorrect to do so is an economic system that encourages women to consume as many material and consumer items as they can. Economists and marketers refer to this as the she-conomy, since women make up or influence 80% or more of consumer spending. By continuing to feed the lust for material items, the economy now runs as a gigantic waste machine of consumerism, with all this waste ending up in landfills and in our oceans. It also wastes enormous amounts of fossil fuel energy producing and transporting these items around.

The statistics of pleasing the female id are not pretty. According to Becoming Minimalist (all of these claims are cited by the way:)

- The average American home now has an incredible 300,000 items in it.
- The average American home size has tripled in the last 50 years even though family size has been nearly cut in half.
- One out of every 10 homes now rent offsite storage to put junk in. A quarter of homes with two car garages don't have room to park vehicles in them.

- The average American woman now owns 30 outfits, up from 9 a few decades ago.
- The average American now throws away 65 pounds of clothing a year.
- Women spend more on jewelry and watches than higher education.
- Women spend a full eight years of their lives shopping.
- Americans spend $1.2 trillion annually on non-essential goods—things they do not need, in other words. Again, 80% of this spending is driven by women.

After seeing these statistics, perhaps a better environmental solution is promoting a minimalistic lifestyle that isn't driven by materialism and consumerism, one that moves away from a she-conomy. Just look at the abominable amount of waste it is creating.

If the world moved away from a female-driven consumer economy to something—to use one of the environmentalists' favorite terms—a little more sustainable, wouldn't we all be better off? It certainly makes more sense than waging a war on a trace gas that is essential for all life on earth, one of the weakest greenhouse gases that stands at one of the lowest levels it has ever been over the last 500 million years.

Read More: 3 Things That Worry Leftists More Than Global Jihad

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

The American Elite Hates America

February 17, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Wrecking a prosperous country is a difficult task. Anyone who attempts it must have a strategy to subvert its biggest institutions from within, which includes the military, media, academia, and government. To accomplish it in the fastest and most efficient way possible, you would need to find percolating ideologies that has America hatred built-in before elevating its adherents to positions of power and influence. This is exactly what has happened in the United States.

Most of academia hates America. If you told them that in fifty years America will possess a world culture and that those with European ancestry will be an oppressed minority, a huge celebration would take place in universities throughout the country.

Most of the media hates America. In news broadcasts, movies, television shows, and newspaper articles, fantasy notions of egalitarianism, “white privilege,” and America privilege are allowed to brainwash citizens to feel guilty that their ancestors created a great land.

Most Pentagon bureaucrats who control the military hate America. In the most shameful social experiment that the Western world has seen, the military is becoming a gay pride parade before our very eyes while being weakened with the introduction of emotional women into key combat roles. The military will soon be unable to defeat even third-world enemies.

Most feminists, social justice warriors, liberals, and even conservatives hate America. The entire range of the political spectrum have been infiltrated and corrupted by those who want to give an unholy death to traditional American values. Consumerism, nihilism, and Islamic and Mexican interests will take over instead.

Most US politicians hate America. They are traitors who are legislating anti-American policies to the highest globalist bidder in order to enrich themselves. They wrap themselves in the America flag to suckle at the treasury before going through a revolving door that leads to corporate riches.

Most Silicon Valley technologists hate America. They create apps and devices that are tearing apart the social fabric of family and tribe while hurting the middle class. Then they use their newfound billions in wealth to agitate for gay marriage, transsexual rights, and open borders.

If you are to accept my argument that the cultural and political elite hates America, we must logically conclude that an individual or idea that is supported by the establishment also hates America, or at least pushes an agenda that will certainly lead to America's decline. If the mainstream media reports on someone in a favorable light, that person hates America. If they report on a specific public policy in a favorable light, it will lead to America's destruction. If the mainstream media reports on someone in a negative light, however, that person loves America, or at least promotes ideas that would lead to a stronger America.

George Orwell once said, "In a time of universal deceit, telling the truth is a revolutionary act." Applying it for our purposes leads to the following: in a time where anti-America agendas are wrecking the country, ideas or individuals who are consistently attacked must therefore lead to a stronger America.

It's no coincidence that anyone who preaches the following ideas will be denounced with a label like racist, misogynist, homophobe, or Nazi:

- natalism
- nationalism
- heterosexuality
- traditional family values
- Christianity
- masculinity
- patriarchy
- skepticism of pro-Israeli interests

Compare that to issues on the following list, which are consistently supported by the elite and their institutions:

- feminism
- homosexuality
- open-borders immigration
- transsexuality
- contrived race wars (e.g. Black Lives Matters)
- Islam
- multiculturalism
- abortion and birth control

- environmentalism

Because I support a handful of items on the first list, you will never see me embraced by the establishment. For the rest of my life, they will be a thorn in my side, using intimidation, character assassination, and fear in order to shut me down. What you saw in Canada is a sign of how much energy they're willing to spend to silence me. (Postscript: this article was originally written before the meetup outrage.)

I'm taking notes on who is attacked in the media and who is not. If they are attacked, that must mean their ideas threaten the establishment, so I will either become their allies or at least not attack them myself. For example, have you noticed that men's rights activists are constantly attacked while the men going their own way group (MGTOW) is not, and even discussed sympathetically? It's because the latter group promotes social isolation and reproductive sterility, which matches the establishment's depopulation agenda. On the other hand, white nationalists are being roundly attacked through the proxy of Donald Trump. Therefore the latter group must have at least some ideas which strengthen America.

While I will not become a men's rights activist or white nationalist myself, it appears that our sphere has matured enough that petty in-fighting can be discarded to focus on a powerful enemy. As long as you remember that those who hate America are promoted on mainstream channels, shows, networks, and platforms, you'll easily be able to decide who is on the right side of this war and who is not.

This article first appeared on Roosh V.

Read Next: America Is Becoming A Homosexual Nation

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Do Women Prefer Drama Instead Of Justice?

February 17, 2016 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Whether they do it consciously or not, it doesn't matter. Loser women have the tendency to treat you as beneath them, as if you are there to serve them. You are not a fellow sentient human being with a finite amount of time on this planet, with shit to do and places to be. You are her sounding board and personal free therapist to listen to her complain about her problems, but never solve them.

If any of the following stories are similar to what you've experienced, you're getting used as the classical emotional tampon. Not just any tampon, but one of a particularly virulent attention-whoring nature, no different than torturing a chained and abused pit bull by poking him with a stick at a safe distance.

Story #1: "He Has a Hidden Camcorder!"

I received a call at 3AM in the morning. It was the girl who was sort of, kind of slipping from “girl I fucked” to “girlfriend.” I still hadn’t made up my mind as while she was drop dead gorgeous, she left so many slain corpses of other men in her wake that I figured I’d keep her at arm’s length.

Barely verbal I said, “Hello?:”

“Aaron it’s Dee.”

“Yeah, what do you want?”

“I just found a camcorder hidden in my room! I think my male roommate put it there!”

This woke me up a bit, but not much on account there really wasn’t much I could do. She lived 40 miles away and this was a matter for the cops. I gave her the only advice I could and said, “Dude, you need to get out of there. If you need to you can crash here, but find a friend near work and call the cops. Wait till you leave the house before you do and leave quietly.”

Instead of the compliance and action the urgency of the situation required, she oddly insisted on explaining it to me more. After hearing her unnecessarily reiterate her story, I said, “Yes, I know, but Dee, you need to get out of there. And like now!”

This attempt to prompt her to action failed again as she continued to talk about it.

Thankfully, I was 30 at this time and not exactly a rookie. I realized she was not calling me because she needed help, but wanted attention and drama. There may not have even been a camera. Upon realizing this I said, “OK Dee, you do what you want. I have to go back to bed.”

Story #2: “Did You Call the Cops?”

I met a fan and his girlfriend in Indianapolis. She was cute, charming, and witty. I very much enjoyed her company and conversation. So it shocked me when he told me that she was an avid feminist. I laughed and said, “You mean like all the 19 year old girls who think it’s about the equal treatment of the sexes?” And he said no. She was a real, hard core feminist.

Still not believing him, I was surprised when he asked if he could give her my e-mail address because she had read up on some of my works and just couldn’t believe the charming, handsome man she met that night would say such things. This being an opportunity for one of the increasingly rare mental challenges, I agreed and looked forward to her e-mail.

What came was what we'd expect of a feminist today. A long, disorganized pablum of points, arguments, and contentions that lacked logic, took things out of context, and was so broad in its attack it couldn't be responded to without a 100 page treatise.

But one thing stood out in the context of this article. She was groped in the crotch by some dude bro at a bar, her argument being that sexual assault does happen and its not acceptable (as if I was arguing the case it some how was) AND that more needed to be done to stop rape culture. My friend corroborated the story as he was there, so I had no reason to disbelieve her. So in response I asked,

"So did you go to the cops?" She sheepishly responded, "no."

Story #3: "I Was Raped, But No Cops Please"

This one I've told before so my apologies to those of you who already heard it, but after getting off of my campus security shift one night, I went to a dorm room where I knew some friends would be watching a movie. Our token female friend was there, but was acting odd. She was cuddling her teddy bear, saying nothing, and when prodded she would just say, "nothing, nothing."

With enough prying we inevitably found out she was "raped." Being 18 and 19-year-old idiots, we went into rage and upon finding out the guy was still in the dorm building (and I was still in my uniform), I hunted him down. It wasn't until nearly 10 years later did I start to ask, "Why didn't she just call the cops? Why was it so hard to pry it out of her that she was raped?"

Story #4: "Did You Call HR?"

A female fan I have correspondence with e-mailed me one day and was angry and enraged. She works a real job, with real men, and is THE epitome of a truly independent woman. When I asked why she was so upset she said, “The guy from corporate I was assigned to today stroked my leg and said my co-workers must not be able to keep their hands off of me.” This of course was when I was 40, fully more aware of this type of behavior from women than I was just 10 years before. So I asked here,

“Did you report him to HR?” She said, “No.”

To which I said, “Then I don’t want to hear it if you refuse to solve your own problems.”

Drama or justice, ladies: choose one

If you’re particularly young or perhaps inexperienced, you may not be able to understand what’s going on with the four stories mentioned above, but you DO intuitively know there’s a trend or some kind of a relationship. Some egregious, even criminal, act is committed upon a woman, but when it comes time to seeking out justice, revenge, or justice, they…

balk
stall harumph shrug

and just say

“No, no, it’s alright.”

As a man, especially if you were enlisted to hear these women’s problems you, honorably, nobly, and instinctively jump to solve these injustices. It’s not only not right, but criminal, disgusting and outright dangerous to the rest of society to have rapists running around, not to mention just unacceptable behavior in terms of GENUINE sexual harassment. But when your solutions, not to mention, abhorrence, rage, and offer of help are rejected by the girl simply refusing to do anything about it, it makes the naive man ask,

"Then why the hell did you bring this up???"

Not to mention

"You're just going to let him go!!!!????"

And it is here you need to understand the demented minds of women. Some of them prefer drama over justice.

Whether it's authentic cases in the case of the feminist being groped, or an outright false rape accusation like Mattress Girl Emma Sulkowicz, or a questionable one like my ex girlfriend, it's nothing more than the dopamine high women get when they stir up drama and controversy, playing the ultimate trump card of "sexual assault" to rally and rile the masses of men to give them so much attention they might OD on it.

And while I wish I could say this was only "demented women," nearly all women will belabor you with their problems, NOT to solve them, but simply to play off of your male instincts for justice or simple kindness as a ploy to hold you hostage to get attention. This is an absolute insult to men and it should never be tolerated.

Never again

The solution to this is two fold

1. You need to be able to identify, immediately, when a woman is lining you up for this abuse. The tell tale sign is that you will want to IMMEDIATELY solve her problem by telling her what to do. It is also easily identifiable in that it will evoke a Darwinistic response of anger and vengeance within you because of the presumed injustice she has suffered. Stop. Recognize it. Calm yourself and then…

2. Ask her one of two simple questions: (a) "Do you want me to solve your problem or are you just going to whine about it?"
OR if it is about a criminal nature ask, (b) "Did you call the cops?" to which if she says no, you simply say, "Then I don't care."

Blunt, direct, and even insulting as these questions are, they are 100% called for and legitimate as this has been SOP for many women in the past. Additionally, even if women do this unconsciously because of perhaps genuine psychological differences between men and women, it doesn't matter.

You and your precious few minutes on this planet are NOT beholden to this lower-standard. Furthermore, you are LITERALLY doing what women have been clamoring for since the 1960's. You ARE treating them as genuine equals. You are treating them as men. And if they opt instead to act like petulant little children in response, you simply laugh and refuse to play.

When you do this the response is predictable and expected. At first, shock and insult. "Why how dare you!" Blah blah blah blah blah. You're not being a good emotional tampon giving her her drama fix! Then the facade quickly fades into a sheepish silence as she finds out she's busted, evidencing shame on her part so thick you could cut through it.

Finally, silence. Ahhhh, blissful silence. No mind games. No drama. No raised blood pressure or wasting 40 minutes on the phone trying to get the girl to call the cops, report the guy to the HR department, or any other solutions the attention-whoring drama queen never really wanted in the first place. You can continue on your otherwise intellectually stimulating conversation and enjoy your day.

In the end, if you can master this, especially the ability to detect early when you're going to fall into this "white knight" trap, you'll never be duped into this sucker's game again. Plus, as my experience has told me, they're more likely to sleep with you in the end. It's just a big ass shit test, but one that's easy to fail as it speaks to your genetic hard-wiring. Train your frontal lobes to ensure you pass with flying colors.

Read More: 20 Signs That We're Not Living In A Patriarchy

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Why Your Father Is Helpless At Teaching You How To Succeed In The Modern World

February 17, 2016 | by Nikolai Vladivostok | Link | Original Link

A lot of young men today lack role models. Even the shrinking proportion of men with fathers in their lives sometimes witness bad examples or receive poor advice: be yourself, it will just happen, one day a girl will like you as much as you like her, etc. Sometimes the father is silent and forlorn while the mother poisons her son with this garbage.

Why do so many of our fathers have so little sensible advice for us on the issue of love and relationships? The answer isn't that our fathers, if present, have been emasculated (though they may have been). It isn't that they are terrified of standing up to their wives (thought that might be a factor). It isn't that they are fools, nor are they trying to turn us all into forty-year-old virgins who will not burden them with grandchild babysitting duties.

The reason the baby boomer generation has so little to offer us is much simpler: they lack salient life experience. How is it, you might ask, that a man in his fifties or sixties could lack life experience? If he has nothing else, surely he has that. He does, but it is not our life experience. He lived in the past—a foreign country.

The Old World

If your father courted and married in the 1970s and 80s, he was a young man in a world where people communicated face to face or over the telephone. Reassuring a lady's parents was essential. Feminism was still a fringe idea like Gaia or vegetarianism. "Game" was something involving a bat and ball.

Your father grew up in a world where being a provider was essential—not a strategy so much as a basic requirement for a male to even enter the mating game. Unemployed men, criminals, and assorted members of the underclass mostly consorted with mentally unstable or wayward women. Today many women are mentally unstable and wayward—drug dealer game or pimp game will get you much further than middle manager game.

In your father's recent world, a man needed a steady job in order to support his family. It would be irresponsible to marry without one, and it would be irresponsible for any lady to marry a man lacking such security. A "steady job" was one that might be expected to last for decades, probably for a lifetime. Today, a secure job is a two-year contract or a one-year contract with a good prospect of renewal. How does one bring up a stable family under such circumstances? Your father doesn't know. We are in uncharted waters.

When your father strutted the streets of love, a productive, law-abiding man was a figure of respect. He got things done, kept the lights on and made the world safe for women and children. The fellow could hold his head high as he strode past the playground, not thinking for a moment that someone might eye him suspiciously and supervise their toddler with care until the intruder was out of sight.

He was not blamed for all the ills in the world: black disadvantage, domestic violence, war, and poverty. Rather, he, like all men, was seen as the driving force behind the development of the modern world, and for all the exciting improvements still to come.

Electronic Courtship

Your father dated back when the word “tinder” was usually followed by the word “box.” He did not compete with every other man in his city for an evening with a moderately attractive woman and a chance of never-see-you-again lovemaking. He would have laughed if he read about such a practice in a paperback science fiction novel. Your father never posted degrading, semi-naked photographs of himself flexing his gym-trained, bronzed muscles in front of the bathroom mirror, trying to get the angle just right so that the toilet paper behind him can’t be seen.

Your father didn’t write an arrogantly flippant online profile in order to meet your mother. He didn’t receive nude selfies prior to their first date, either. He didn’t meet her in a chain cafe, asking nervously, “Are you Tracy?” He didn’t neg her or notice DHVs, DLVs and IOIs. And he probably didn’t take her home two hours later, spank her and call her a whore because it was the only way she could climax.

The Ladies Of Yore

Your father dated at a time when most young women were, by default, attractive. They were slim, had long hair and dressed in a feminine manner. He is therefore unqualified to offer you advice for finding a mate in a world where every other woman is obese. When he looks around today and sees all the girls who have disfigured themselves with ill-considered piercings and childish tattoos, he might realize that things have changed a bit.

Still, what could he offer you other than a lame, “Just find a good one?” He has never dipped his toes in these waters, and let’s hope the poor fellow never does.

When your father made it to fourth base, did he nervously wait by his phone afterwards for the "you-didn't-rape-me text?" Of course not. In the rare occurrence that a one-night-stand did occur, he sauntered off without a care. No secret video recordings or paper trails for him. If a troubled girl did make a false allegation, she could only make it to people she knew. She lacked the technology to share the defamation with the whole world. And if she did attempt to do so, responsible friends and family members would insist that she contact the police instead.

Your father dated women who were virgins or who had only slept with one or two partners before, probably their steady ex-boyfriends. He dated women who generally wanted to get married within a few years, stay home to have a few kids, and then perhaps work part-time once the little ones were in school. These were women who appreciated their husband's role, and who were appreciated in turn for their own role.

Your father did not date the kind of women you date—women who have slept with 20-100 men, who have had many, many one-night-stands, and who usually have a couple fuck-buddies on call at any given time. He did not date women who are alpha widows to DJs, thugs, bikers, married CEOs and (yecch) drummers. He has not enjoyed the delights of looking for love among the career women who have been told all their life that they don't need a man and that husbands are a bumbling, absurd nuisance. Women who become desperate to settle down and start a family with a hapless fallback when nearing middle age. Your father probably never dated a woman older than twenty-seven.

The Big D

Finally, your father married at a time when divorce was a new-fangled and disgraceful thing, something that respectable people didn't do. Today, women are inundated with divorce porn and the practice is common. It is mostly initiated by women. Divorce is the biggest financial risk you face aside from complete and permanent disability.

Your children may be taken from you, to be seen only under strict conditions every second weekend. This is the one thing your father is likely to know about, but what does he know about dating or marrying in an environment when these risks are well understood from the outset?

Harden Up

On a more cheerful note, your father may not have had the opportunity to travel to greener pastures. He lacked the massive online resources that a man today can draw upon for advice, networking and everything else that used to be done locally and on a smaller scale. Further, you may be more sexually experienced that he is.

So don't go too hard on your dad. Perhaps he did the best he could. He just doesn't understand how utterly the basic building blocks of human society have shifted in the last few decades. The path of love is one that we young men must walk without the aid of maps or guides. And if we have sons or grandsons, by the time they are young adults the world may have moved on again.

We will one day have to use our wisdom to recognize which of our life experiences are useful to them and which are dangerously archaic.

Read More: The World Will Teach You

Nikolai Vladivostok
Nikolai Vladivostok is a writer, Socialist and denouncer of reactionary elements. He has faith that the efficiency of Soviet industry and agriculture will inevitably lead to the collapse of the West and the liberation of its Peoples. Nikolai blogs at SovietMen on topics such as economics, sex, and debauchery.

The International Megan's Law Is The Latest Assault To Limit Your Freedom To Travel

February 18, 2016 | by Nathan Larson | Link | Original Link

On 8 February 2016, President Obama signed into law the "International Megan's Law," the latest legislation to impose more restrictions on Americans' freedom to travel abroad. As usual, the focus of the hype and hysteria is the "sex tourism" bogeyman.

How does the government seek to safeguard the vulnerable with this statute? By making it more difficult for American convicted sex offenders to leave the country. Those who have actually perpetrated serious violent crimes against minors will also face additional obstacles in their efforts to emigrate from the U.S. Meanwhile, those who get caught committing victimless sex offenses and want to start a new life abroad in a less prudish and authoritarian regime will have a harder time doing so.

Specifically, the International Megan's Law requires anyone who has been convicted of a sex offense against a minor to, before traveling abroad, notify the federal government of "anticipated dates and places of departure, arrival, or return, carrier and flight numbers for air travel, destination country and address or other contact information therein, means and purpose of travel, and any other itinerary or other travel-related information".

This information will then be transmitted to the destination country's government so their immigration bureau can deny the traveler admission if they wish. Those who get caught trying to sneak out of the U.S. without alerting the feds will be subject to a 10-year prison term, even if there was no evidence they intended to engage in sex tourism. The law also mandates that all American offenders' passports have a "visual designation affixed to a conspicuous location on the passport indicating that the individual is a covered sex offender".

The law is named after seven-year-old New Jersey resident Megan Kanka, whose rape and murder by a neighbor would not have been prevented by restricting Americans' freedom to travel overseas.

How this law could ensnare American men for normal, consensual sexual behavior

How might this law affect men who have no interest in victimizing anyone, and just want to have a normal, satisfying sex life with attractive women of legal age to consent to sex? Imagine this scenario:

You're an 18-year-old guy with a 17-year-old wife, legally married under the laws of your state. One day when you're at work, she sends you a sexy text of herself posing coyly in a bra and panties. Seeking inspiration to get through the dull workday, you reply with a text inviting her to "send more".

A few weeks later, you drop your mobile phone off at the mall to get a crack in the screen fixed. The repair technician gets nosy, looks through your photos and texts, and reports to the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children that he's found a photo of an underage-looking girl engaging in sexually explicit conduct.

At 5 a.m. the next morning, federal agents bust into your bedroom shouting "Freeze! Police!" and take you into custody at gunpoint. You hear the sound of their boots echoing through the apartment as they rifle through your belongings, seizing computer equipment, flash drives, etc. and try to question your wife as she stands there wrapped only in a blanket.

As a first-time offender, you're able to get the prosecutor to drop the child pornography production charge and let you plead out to receipt of child pornography. The judge receives dozens of letters from your friends and family (including your wife, the "victim") vouching for your good character and pleading for lenience, but the judge's hands are tied by the mandatory minimum, and you get a sentence of 5 years. With credit for good conduct, you're released in a little over 4 years.

But, although you've finished serving your debt to society, you're still not a free man. Federal law and sentencing guidelines call for sex offenders to receive a lifetime sentence of supervised release (see 18 U.S.C. § 3583(k) and U.S.S.G. §5D1.2(c)). They also say that the judge should require, as part of your conditions of supervised release, that you register as a sex offender, undergo sex offender treatment, submit to computer monitoring, and allow your probation officer to search your "person and any property, house, residence, vehicle, papers, computer, other electronic communication or data storage devices or media, and effects" whenever he sees fit (see U.S.S.G. §5D1.3(a)(7) and (d)(7)).

Your probation officer installs monitoring software on your computer to record every keystroke you make, every website you visit, every email you send, etc. so that they can compile evidence of any sexually deviant interests, or any thoughts you express that could be viewed as "rationalizing" why your sexual behavior wasn't as bad as the government claimed it was. All this goes into a file to be shared with your psychological treatment team so that you can be "held accountable."

Since you live in one of the states that requires that employment information of sex offenders be posted online, and the court won't allow you to move out of that state, you find it hard to hold a job, as "concerned citizens" are constantly looking you up in the registry and harassing your employers. Your kids get bullied at school by peers who find out from the registry that their dad is a convicted child porn offender.

Seeking freedom and a better life for your family, you finally decide to take the desperate step of fleeing the country. You buy plane tickets and head to the airport with your wife and kids. But just as you're about to get on your flight, U.S. Marshals and Homeland Security agents slam you to the ground and slap cuffs on you. It turns out that under the International Megan's Law, just by attempting to leave illegally, you've committed a felony punishable by a decade in prison, on top of the prison sentence for violating your supervised release.

It's part of a trend of similar encroachments on freedom of movement

Nazi-issued passport marked with a "J" for "Jew". Under the International Megan's Law, thousands of Americans' passports will carry a conspicuous mark indicating they have been convicted of a sex offense, putting them in danger of being assaulted by vigilantes in a foreign land

The International Megan's Law is just the most recent in a series of laws cracking down on the ability of Americans who have found good reasons to be disgruntled with their country's leadership to vote with their feet. The Fixing America's Surface Transportation (FAST) Act, signed into law last December, allows the State Department to revoke or deny passports for anyone the IRS certifies as having a seriously delinquent tax debt in an amount in excess of $50,000. What will the next restrictions on emigration be?

Immediately after the International Megan's Law was enacted, California Reform Sex Offender Laws (RSOL) filed a lawsuit challenging its constitutionality on First and Fifth Amendment and ex post facto clause grounds. In a piece written by David Post and posted on the RSOL blog, the author notes the parallels between our era and an earlier one:

> On October 5, 1938, the Third Reich directs its Ministry of Interior to invalidate all passports held by Jews until the letter 'J' was affixed to them. Less than 80 years later, and on February 8, 2016, the American Congress directs the Department of > State to invalidate all passports held by sexual offenders until a ‘unique identifier’ is affixed to them.

Convicted sex offenses are serious crimes and should be treated as such. However, it is easy to see how the desire to punish an extremely small minority of society can have major implications for others who do not deserve such persecution. If history is any indication, a unique identifier will not be the last step in the government’s larger plan for dealing with those who serve as a handy scapegoat for societal problems.

Read More: Why Men Who Travel For Sex Are Not Evil

Nathan Larson
Nathan is an accountant who lives with his Pinay wife in northern Virginia. His interests include psychology, relationships, economics, board games, Filipino culture, Soviet military technology, and MediaWiki software development.

S. Jane Gari Publishes Fake Rape Allegation Against Me, Prompting Legal Action

February 18, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Author Stephanie Jane Gari from South Carolina recently published a completely fabricated story about a woman she calls “Susan” who claims I raped her. Both the story and the scenario are completely false. Similar to the Rolling Stone rape hoax, this piece of fiction was published to get attention for the author of the story, either S. Jane Gari herself or the woman who purportedly wrote it, though it appears that S. Jane Gari invented the story since she does not provide a single piece of evidence that “Susan” exists. The fictional account also perfectly matches the narrative of her rape-obsessed blog.

S. Jane Gari

Here is the ridiculous allegation:

> Roosh approached Susan in Iceland where he was busy “bagging chicks” for one of his sex travel guides. When Susan left a nightclub with her friends, Roosh, approached her on the street and insisted on walking her home. She asked him to leave her alone. Later, when she became separated from her friends, she noticed he was following her.
>
> “You have a beautiful but sad walk. I know a great place to have a drink. You can join me. It will be fun,” he said.
>
> She refused. Then he insisted on walking her home.
>
> She said, “There’s no need. I don’t need you to walk me home.”
>
> When he continued to insist, she ignored him and continued her way home. He followed. This is a tactic he teaches in his books—to never take “no” for an answer.
>
> When she arrived at her home, Roosh was very charismatic and asked politely if he could just use the toilet. Sleepy and still drunk from her night out, she acquiesced and let him in to use the bathroom.
>
> When he was done in the bathroom he faced Susan and said, “Are you home alone?”
>
> “Yes,” she said.
>
> Then he asked her to touch his penis. When she refused, Roosh grabbed her.
>
> Susan started crying and said, “Why are you doing this? You’re crazy.”
>
> He laughed and overpowered her with force, saying, “All girls like this. It’s every > woman's fantasy. You don't even know what you're saying. You're drunk, but I like drunk girls." And then, according to Susan, he raped her.

>
> She later discovered the Bang Guides Roosh authored and was mortified. Susan went to counseling for the depression that ensued after the alleged rape but never formally accused Valizadeh. He's an American and she lives in Iceland. She feels she has no recourse.
>
> So what can we do for Susan and the others who have remained silent?
>
> We can encourage all of his possible victims to stand up to him. Roosh is a perpetrator of the worst kind because he hides behind his self-righteousness and is so arrogant he thinks he will never be brought to justice. He thinks his tactics of preying on drunk women, getting them alone, following them, not taking no for an answer and then being forceful with them if necessary is his right as an "aggressive man" who believes, "women should submit to men." Please, let's prove him wrong. Please share this post to spread the word and encourage other possible victims to come forward.

Things I've never done in my life:

- Follow a girl home.
- Ask a woman to "touch my penis."
- Try to make physical advances on a crying girl.
- Have sex in an Icelandic girl's home while she was alone.
- Tell a girl that rape is "every woman's fantasy."

This is not a case of a girl I know making up an encounter, but a girl who I've never met and who I believe doesn't even exist inventing a situation after skimming through publicly available excerpts of Bang Iceland. This is not unlike when the Rolling Stone published a fake rape account by a troubled young woman who merely wanted a guy she liked to give her attention. The whole world believed her before she was exposed as a fraud, harming the fraternity, the university, and the credibility of real rape victims in the process.

Rape hoaxer did it to get attention from a guy she liked

S. Jane Gari tries to portray herself as a "concerned journalist," but did she fact check a single item in the story? Did she fact check that “Susan” has even met or seen me in person? She either made up the story herself, or simply published an anonymous email account that does not even seem plausible on its face.

It’s one thing to falsely call me “pro rape” or a “rape advocate” in the form of an opinion. You have the right to do that. On the other hand, it’s clear-cut defamation to maliciously invent a crime against me. Therefore I have retained one of the best First Amendment lawyers in the United States, Marc Randazza, to serve as my counsel in a defamation suit against Stephanie Jane Gari if she doesn’t amend the false accusation against me as specified by Mr. Randazza in the following letter:

View letter in new window: Legal Demand To S. Jane Gari Re: False Rape Accusation

It’s worth nothing that Mr. Randazza almost always defends these kinds of cases. To get him to take the side of a plaintiff in one says a lot about the strength of my claim. I’m also monitoring any media outlet or publication that passes off this fantasy tale as fact.

I can’t do much in response to how media outlets decide to mischaracterize my work, but I can legally respond to any individual who maliciously and falsely accuses me of a crime. I am ready to spend the money and time to defend myself against anyone who brings false claims against me. Unless Stephanie Jane Gari takes prompt action, either her or “Susan” will have to answer for their false accusation against me in a court of law.

Read Next: 3 Signs She’s Making A False Rape Accusation

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

13 Reasons Why Fighters In The East Are More Successful Than Fighters In The West

February 18, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

What do you mean “Fighters In The East Are More Successful Than Fighters In The West”? And ever heard of Georges Saint-Pierre, Randy Couture or Conor McGregor, you arrogant French bastard? Settle down, Johnny Texas. We will speak not about what makes champions, but mainly what makes the average “Eastern” fighter knock people unconscious more often than his “Western” counterpart.

For the nations that I describe as “Eastern” and “Western”:

Eastern nations are the ones that extend from Europe to Asia and have been at some point under the influence of the Soviet Union. They are marked in red on the map. Western nations include the Anglosphere and the Western European nations. They are marked in blue on the map.

For the period, we will focus on recent history, from the collapse of the Soviet Union until now. Here are the factors that can influence the success of fighters coming from the "Eastern" group:

1. A stronger "father to son" culture of fighting

This is where it all starts. Can you remember who introduced you to martial arts? It was my grandfather in my case. My father knows how to scrap but did not teach me. However, I consider myself lucky. If you are from the West, how many of your acquaintances are martial artists and were introduced to it by an older male relative?

It is more common in the Eastern nations. They start younger than us. The father gets his son to the boxing gym so he becomes a man that can defend himself or out of habit because his father did the same. It is in the fabric of their society.

2. An older civilization

When we take into account the age of young nations such as the USA or Australia and we compare it to entities like Russia or Romania, it is easy to understand why a civilization with traditional fighting styles that had a longer time to develop would produce better martial artists.

But what about countries like the United Kingdom or Germany that also have a deeply rooted martial tradition and are fairly old nations? As we have observed in the last 30 years or so, this whole heritage of martial culture is disappearing with the cultural decline that attacks values linked to masculinity, like the ability to fight well. This is a phenomenon that has not reached (as fast) the Eastern nations.

3. A stronger presence of martial arts in their traditional culture

Every bloody Georgian kid has trained chidaoba and has fought in a sandy arena in the mountains. Every young Mongolian male knows how to wrestle because those are the three things a Mongolian man must know how to do: ride a horse, wrestle, and shoot a bow.

There are simply more martial arts practitioners per capita in the Eastern nations than in the Western ones, hence having a larger chance to see an exceptionally skilled fighter rise among them.

4. A stricter diet

Life in the socialist times was tough and the waiting lines in front of the shops to get food are no invention. They are still very present in the mind of the people.

But the results had to be there regardless. Between two fighters of equal weight that need to reach the same result, with one being underfed and the other one with a good diet available, what makes the difference? Longer hours of training and harder work

5. A larger number of competitive events

In the Eastern nations, those martial art competitions are everywhere and take place ALL THE TIME. But the difference is that in the West, as you have probably noticed, the goal is to have fun and spar sometimes. Whereas in the East, the focus is brought on full contact and winning trophies.

Imagine how many opponents the champion of Ukraine in judo had to defeat to be where he is, compared to the champion of Spain (with a similar number of inhabitants)?

Compare the medal tables of the following sports: judo, wrestling, and boxing. The Eastern nations are always present in the Top 20. The Soviet Union is usually in the top five, if not leading like in wrestling (with the notable exception of the results of the United States and Great Britain in boxing).

6. A stronger drive

Growing up in those troubled times, young “Eastern” men found solace in the fight. A way to forget about their daily life for a few hours. A way to get out of this misery.

Do you know many Western champions that can say the same?

The mental aspect is different in the Western nations. They see these activities as sports and quite often a hobby. The Eastern nations consider it as an essential element in a man’s life.

7. A greater support of the state

There is an instructional film called “Let’s Learn Judo with Vladimir Putin.” And yes, I have it.

The USSR and its satellites dedicated millions of hours and roubles to reach the top of the martial arts food chain. They still do it now. A martial art like Sambo was first ordered to be experimented with on the battlefields of WWII by Russian military headquarters. The state intervened directly in its development and popularity, creating the perfect “Soviet fighting system.”

When did the U.S.A actively support their young men to fight better and be stronger human beings since the end of the Cold War? Can you think of a “Western” leader that has a background in martial arts?

8. A harsher climate

These Eastern nations are known to be more mountainous and have colder climates. The benefits of winter and mountain training for red blood cells and various other athletic capacities are well documented.

A fighter that has trained for an extended period in the Armenian mountains or the Mongolian steppe will be a tougher organism than a Dutch fighter that spent all his training sessions indoors in Rotterdam.

The counter argument would be that there are Western zones with harsh climates as well. It is true, but do you know many Swedish martial arts champions compared to a small mountainous region such as Chechnya?

9. A poorer system of infrastructure

Recent, state of the art gyms and brand new squat racks are a rarity outside of the big cities in the Eastern nations. They are poorer so they have to replace money by ingenuity. Tractor equipment, steel pipes, tree trunks… anything will do.

The feeling of humility that comes with this lack of means cannot really be described. But anyone that has seen a McDojo and a “real” boxing gym will know what I mean.

10. A lesser sense of ethics when victory is at stake

Victory. Victory at all cost. Nothing else matters. “What matters is to take part is what losers say” could have been the motto of more than one Soviet fighting federation. Illegal substances back in the communist times, dirty methods, secret programs… No stone was left unturned to fight and defeat the big evil West during the Cold War. And old habits die hard.

11. A stronger bond between young men

There is a widespread “fighters’ club” culture in the East between wrestlers, boxers, and MMA lads. You always see them going out together, banging the same girls, drinking together. There is a spirit of camaraderie in these Eastern tight-knit communities that I have seldom witnessed in the West.

12. A tougher award system

The diplomas and awards in martial arts are not here for show, and not everyone that participates obtains them in the “East.” There is no such thing as a “consolation prize.” It is not the law of “here is a medal because you showed up.”

Merit is key—the competition is everywhere and the expectations are high.

13. A rougher approach to failure

From an early age, the “Easterners” are molded into the frame of always doing better. I never heard, even after years of practice, the words “very good” in an Eastern European coach’s mouth towards the students. And I cannot keep count of the times I heard the words “This is shit” or “Do it better.”

Dimitri the coach will call you a fucking fag if you don’t dodge the punches fast enough. It has two possible outcomes: either you give it up altogether and sulk or you work harder to progress.

Conclusion

I can see the haters coming, guns blazing and calling me names. But the facts are here. I am a Westerner and I say it: the Easterners are generally tougher. The correct response is to see what does not work, and bring our Western fighting culture in the right direction. For every fellow fighter out there, it is a great experience to train in a former USSR gym. You learn a lot and the methods and expectations are radically different.

We have to apply constructive criticism, bring solutions for the present and future generation of Western fighters. Injecting more masculinity and fighting culture in the West, we can reach similar results. Also, Trump and Putin should spar and organize a boxing match with one another

Here is some motivation from the East:

Read More: 13 Martial Artists You Can Draw Inspiration From

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

9 Things I Learned About The Depravity Of Women From Camgirl Site Chaturbate

February 19, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Recently, a friend introduced me to a website called Chaturbate (nsfw), a free site where you can view people naked doing just about anything. It's basically free, live amateur porn. I stopped using pornography several months back, but this was shocking and intriguing to me, and takes pornography to a whole new level. While there are definitely sexually stimulating women there, I became more fascinated with the site as a glimpse at the modern day woman and the level of promiscuity in our society. After about a month of reflecting on the site, checking in a couple of times a week, I have the following observations:

1. Women Are Sluttier Than You Think

Even if you have taken the red pill, are spinning plates and having multiple one night stands, you probably underestimate the utter depravity of women. You will see women showing off their bodies to complete strangers, sticking all manner of objects in all their orifices, having sex live in plain view, where thousands can see them, and other things I will not repeat here.

They have no concern over their future or the repercussions of their actions. Actually, there are few repercussions, because they are not shamed for their actions and they will find guys to wife them up in the West. This should give any man pause when dealing with the opposite sex.

2. Looks Can Be Deceiving

The site is full of young girls, many quite innocent looking, who will strip off their clothes and casually talk to their viewers, answer phone calls non-chalantly while fully naked, and reveal nasty, dirty secrets to strangers. We all know there is such a thing as the thousand cock stare. But looking at a few girls on this site makes me question even the girl sitting on my same pew in church.

3. Femininity Is Valued

The site is open for anyone to broadcast, and is therefore a free market of sexuality. There are a disproportionate number of thin, young, Eastern European, Asian, and Latina women without tattoos, and with long, feminine hair. And these are the women receiving thousands of viewers.

Yes, there are fuglies and I'm sure there are even some people who have weird fetishes who are attracted to fat, short haired, or otherwise unattractive women, but the majority clearly prefers young, thin feminine women. There are plenty of American college girls too. A word of warning: there are men, gays, and trannys on the site. It is obvious that men, when given a choice, clearly prefer young, thin, feminine women.

4. Women Are, Above All, Attention Seekers

Probably the biggest lesson to learn is the lengths women will go to in order to attention whore. These women are so narcissistic that they crave the attention and praise of viewers and will do almost anything for it. The fact that they can attract the simultaneous attention of thousands of men simply by removing clothing and showing their natural birthday suit makes them feel powerful and strong.

They can further tease and lead on men—I've witnessed some who will toy with hundreds of beta followers, fully clothed, teasing them with the promise of undressing that is never fulfilled. And yet they will still have white knight orbiters who will defend them as "perfect" and "amazing" and attack other men who demand she put up or shut up. Of course, given the option of hundreds of live streaming girls, any girl who teases too long is passed up for one who is already fully nude and inserting multiple objects into her body.

If a woman will sexually and publicly degrade herself with unspeakable sexual acts for virtual attention over a computer screen, imagine what she will do in real life.

5. Women Love Trinkets

There is a way to "tip" women with online credits, and much like "freemium games" one way to obtain credits is to buy them for 5 cents a piece. Whenever a girl is tipped, a "cha-ching" sound will be played. The girls are visibly excited and respond whenever they hear this sound. There are even vibrators that they can buy (and most all girls have these) that are coordinated to respond to the sound of the "cha-ching" that the site makes and increase their vibration, in a sick Pavlovian response where, over time, I believe the woman would literally get off to the sound of money.

Many of the women will have tiers of vulgarity tied to these virtual trinkets—i.e. once they receive 20 tokens they will take off their top, at 40 tokens, their bottom, at 60 they will insert a dildo, at 100 insert something into their ass, etc. Note that there are always women showing for free, and there are enough orbiters feeding these women virtual tokens that you never have to send tokens to see the depravity.

6. Women Value Money Over Dignity

Several of these women have created Twitter accounts where you can “follow” them, be in their fan club, and be notified whenever they are stripping. They also accept Paypal or Amazon gift cards and will send you special videos, sell you their used underwear, take special requests, give you access to their dirty Snapchats, or become a portapotty for the right price.

7. Always Have Abundance Mentality

One of the most positive lessons to be learned from this site is having an abundance mentality with women. When you can click through hot young girl after hot young girl doing any manner of perverted sexual acts, it's hard to imagine ever fixating on any one. Indeed, any girl who doesn't perform adequately, takes too long with foreplay and teasing, or is too greedy with the virtual credits will quickly be passed over for a hotter, easier girl who is in the middle of a squirting show. It's hard to develop oneitis after seeing the abundance of hot young poon available online.

8. Hot Girls Are Easy

For many guys, even once they see some early effects of game, they still think that certain women are out of their league. One of my first eye opening red pill experiences was when I found myself alone with a 9 who kissed me and then stripped off her clothes and a few seconds later asked me to fuck her. I was down to party, but going from a first kiss to sex within a matter of 30 seconds, with zero concern over me having a condom, was a little too slutty for me, and I rejected her, which made me feel even better.

But ever since then I realized how the hottest girls are just as easy—actually MORE

SO—than your average girl. This is only reinforced on the site, where you will see girls with high SMV offering their bodies for free for thousands of guys to jerk off to.

9. Women Lie

It is quite a social experiment to sit back and watch the interactions of these women with their orbiters. Often, after hearing multiple “cha-ching” noises indicating large deposits of virtual credits, the women will respond verbally with “Oh My Gosh! I love you!” It reminds me of the gold digger prank where a guy approaches strange women on the street, who reject him, until they find out he has a Lamborghini. When you see women so easily and freely toss around the L word, you realize how fake, dishonest, shallow, and manipulative they are.

Conclusion

The site offers a sick portrayal of the modern sexual marketplace. While I do not want to condone men to use pornography, it is definitely eye-opening and it is important for men to understand the levels to which women have sunk, especially college age women.

On Christmas day, I logged on to find 15 pages of women to choose from (each page offers 90 live cams so this was a total of around 1,350 options of live sluts degrading themselves sexually instead of celebrating Christmas with their families). The numbers are normally in the thousands, and this occurs every day, around the clock, 24 hours a day.

One thing I didn’t see on the site was Muslim women, because that is one of the last societies where men retain control over the behavior of women. Chaturbate is a strong sign of the depravity of our society and the lack of any sort of morality or modesty when patriarchy is removed, and is a clear symptom of the need for neomasculinity.

Read More: Can Strippers, Pornstars, and Live Sex Models Be Good Girlfriends?

Max Roscoe

is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Why The Era Of Meeting Girls In Nightclubs Is Coming To An End

February 19, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the golden area of modern pickup (around 2000-2005), a little night game was all you needed to consistently meet cute American girls in bars and clubs. It had its flaws, but just knowing how to approach with a little confidence and dancing skill would be enough to get laid. You didn't have to use the internet. Day game was nothing more than a niche for guys who didn't drink. Flaking was a low level annoyance instead of a common outcome, and you didn't have to aim for a one-night stand because chances were reasonable that a girl would show up on a first date.

My recent experiences in Washington DC, Montreal, Toronto, and New York City clearly showed me how much night game has declined.

17 things I noticed about the current nightlife scene

1. Lopsided sex ratio that hovers around 3 guys for every 1 girl. If you're lucky, you'll see brief flashes of 1.5 guys per girl.

2. Almost no top talent unless you go to the snobbiest clubs in town where table service or promoter connections are a requirement to get the attention of above-average talent.

3. Decreasing level of thirst in women because their option pipeline is near capacity.

4. Having to compete with a woman's iPhone.

5. An increase in group size with the presence of beta orbiters who purchase drinks and thus lock in the girls for the night.

6. A hostility to "random" men who are not pre-screened via social circle or a swipe of destiny on Tinder.

7. An unreasonable expectation from girls on how perfect your conversation must be when approaching. If you don't completely capture her attention within the first minute, you're out.

8. An increase in women putting down men to elevate their egos. Women always rejected men, but now they are trying to emotionally hurt you with nasty attitudes and cheap insults, leading to sour interactions that kill your mood.

9. An increase in bartenders and bar employees cockblocking your attempt and actually competing directly with you for the few good-looking women present.

10. Lack of eye contact from women or even recognition that there are men in the vicinity.

11. Presence of desperate men cockblocking each other—even their own friends—just to receive a chance at having a conversation with an okay-looking woman.

12. Increase in seeing ugly fatties rejecting moderately good looking men.

13. Decreased ability of girls to have a normal conversation with a stranger without looking at her phone or friends for comfort.

14. Decreased ability for girls to handle a joke or non politically correct comment without getting angry or emotional.

15. Increase in girls being incredibly cheap in not wanting to buy their own drinks. They rather save $40 and be surrounded by orbiters they don't want to have sex with than buy their own drinks and make themselves more accessible to men who they may have a sexual interest in.

16. Increase in amount of unattractive cougars past 30 who are aggressive in flirting with you and feel entitled to your cock.

17. Increase in attractive girls being protected by multiple layers of orbiters and female friends, preventing you from even attempting an approach.

Night game is becoming more about looks and status instead of raw game ability

My most positive night game interactions came when the girl was highly into my appearance or believed that I possessed some type of status. I did not have a case where I approached a girl, she was neutral, and then I was able to increase the attraction by being interesting, cocky, and so on. Girls are now judging you almost immediately and the game becomes about not screwing up when this initial attraction is present, but even when a girl judged me as attractive initially, her friends, her emotional fragility, and her smartphone were ready to sabotage the interaction.

This leads me to believe that unattractive guys should not waste their time in clubs. Guys who are shy or non-entertaining clowns will also not get anything. Everything I'm seeing suggests that you must be physically average or above average to play night game in Anglo countries. In addition, you need to possess a high level of game to simply maintain that initial attraction and also have the logistical know-how to seal the deal, even if you do have the right combination of looks and status. Sadly, you can possess all these positive traits and still perform very poorly in DC. There is now a bit of luck factor involved in pulling.

Is day game the solution?

For the more average man, day game is still fruitful, but this will see a slight decline as women show hostility to non-approved men everywhere, not just in clubs. We now have to admit that “street harassment,” rape hysteria programming, and general feminist propaganda are having the effect of making American women more averse to meeting strange men. This reason, in addition to girls simply having difficulty in holding conversations with strangers due to technological co-dependence, will put day game in danger within the next ten years. You can have the best day game in the world, but how will you even be able to begin the connection process if women are losing the ability to converse with new people thanks to their slavish addiction to technology?

It used to be the case that if you weren’t getting results from night game, you were probably doing many things wrong. But now, even if you do everything right, the nightclub environment is so stacked against you that it may take several nights out and dozens of hours just to meet a decent girl who ends up flaking on you in the end anyway. If you’re starting to learn game today in environments similar to Washington DC, I can’t advise you to do so at night. Go to bars with your friends for fun, and do the occasional approach on a girl you like, but you should be focusing on doing a couple day approaches a day.

What happens with the internet should be interesting. You hear second-hand stories of guys killing it on Tinder, but not many first-hand accounts. Just like in clubs, you’ll have elite men doing extremely well, and then more average men spending untold hours optimizing, swiping, and copy-pasting just to bang the occasional 6.5. Since night game is so bad, more guys will be moving to the internet, though not necessarily to day game, since it’s significantly harder to approach girls alone without alcohol. The inevitable result is that a 5 online is now getting attention from guys rated 7 and up. Once a city beings to see a decline in night game, men will cockify the internet, making online pickup harder. Decline begets decline.

Washington DC nightclub ratios

Toronto bar ratio

Iceland's club ratio

4 things you want to have in order to pull at night

1. Appearance that is not below average. Ugly guys already suffer, but soon they won't be getting even scraps. We need to put them on an emergency Thailand expatriation plan or legalize prostitution so they don't kill themselves (or others).

2. Perfect game. You will not be able to make a single mistake even if a girl is attracted to you, because several guys will be waiting in the wings. Good-looking guys didn't need game in the past, but now they do.

3. Extensive social circle. Back in 2002, having a social circle didn't provide huge benefits because attractive girls were more accessible in night venues, but we're seeing a shift to where having a deep roster of friends and high status within that social group will be necessary to get access that was essentially "free" before.

4. A bulletproof niche. It used to be that a niche was having one favorite bar in the city that you would go to a couple times a week, but now you will need a sort of detailed recipe of localized status or fame that other men can't easily reproduce and that provides you with at least 6 months of relatively easy sex before it busts or is copied by other men.

My outlook is highly negative because you have to understand I'm connecting a 2002 dot with a 2016 dot. The decline from those two points of time is nothing short of devastating. I was a 23-year-old kid back then with the lowest of game and the most horrible lines and retarded style but I received more positive reactions in DC than I got on my most stay in Poland, when my objective value is at its highest.

I'm starkly reminded that in a Washington DC nightclub I'm just another drop in the bucket of horny employed men, and I'd have to be a masochist to permanently accept the abuse I receive there from entitled women. As long as I value having good women in my life—and the ability to obtain one without killing myself—the night scene in America or Canada no longer cuts it.

This article was originally published on Roosh V. It has been edited to reflect the changing times.

Read Next: The 5 Easiest Clubs In The World To Get Laid

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Turning A Page At The Beginning Of Lent

February 19, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

This week I wanted to say a few words about Lent, and about contemplation (to close our series on prayer); finally, I'd like to ask your opinions, about where to go from here.

The Lenten fast is the most important of the year, and the strictest. A Christianity is about incorporation into Christ, and restoring our likeness to Him by grace and imitation, the liturgical year immerses the faithful in the events of Christ's life, and the Old Testament "types" thereof.

Lent is called in Latin "quadragesima," which means "fortieth," because the first Sunday of Lent falls on the fortieth day before Good Friday. The season recalls the forty years of the Hebrews' wandering in the desert, the forty days of the Flood, and the forty days of the Lord's fasting in the wilderness (cf. Luke 4). In our Lord's forty days of fasting, the Fathers saw Christ healing human nature by prevailing, in human nature, over the temptations of the flesh, the world, and the devil; imitating Christ in His fasting is an imitation and participation in this.

Quadragesima Sunday is preceded by a further three weeks of “pre-Lent,” beginning with the Sunday of Septuagesima (Latin for “70th,” for it falls about 70 days before Easter); this recalls the 70 years of the Babylonian captivity. Septuagesima dwells on the theme of Adam and Eve’s expulsion from Paradise; from now to Easter, the Western Church will not sing ‘Alleluia,’ for the West’s tradition regards it as a celestial and paradisiacal word, which the banished and fallen man dares not utter (it contains part of God’s ineffable name); many places would even have a ceremony where a plaque with the word ‘Alleluia’ was buried, in remembrance of death entering the world after our banishment (though, contrarily, the Eastern Churches use the word more often during Lent, as a sign of longing for Paradise). This theme continues throughout Lent, as when the penitents are ejected from the Church on Ash Wednesday, and are strewn with dust and ashes with God’s words to Adam: “for dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return.”

Sexagesima (the next Sunday) focuses on the Great Flood, sign of the just desserts of sin, and of the Last Judgment yet to come; Christ, and His Body the Church, were always interpreted by the Fathers as being a fulfillment of Noah’s Ark – a great vessel of salvation, by which the remnant of the just are saved from the inundation of God’s wrath. These themes also recur in the Lenten liturgy. Quinquagesima (the next Sunday, again) focuses on the thwarted sacrifice of Isaac, when God foreshadowed that He would send His own Son, rather than actually ask Abraham to do the same; God also then sent a ram in his place, with its horns caught in a nearby bramble-bush, as a token of the saving Victim yet to come.

In union, therefore, with Adam and Even in their sorrow; with Noah in the Ark for forty days and nights; with the Hebrews wandering in the desert; with the Jews, exiled in Babylon; with Christ, in the desert; we can keep the period of Lent as a for candor about our spiritual desolation, bearing the bitterness of the period as we look forward to the moment of deliverance. The best of us feel, betimes, the sting of our failures and shortcomings; we feel the pain of exile – being confused about God, not knowing if we believe, or even if we want to believe. And, even if we believe, of not knowing how to approach Him, how to make a beginning.

We ought not to be contumelious towards Him about this; but, Lent is certainly a season when we can come to God and tell Him, in all candor: “I feel like an exile; I am at a loss before You; I don’t know whether to hold the idea of You in contempt, or whether I myself would be contemptible for failing to repent and return to You; and in any case, I wouldn’t know how to start.” It is a season of exile, of bitterness, of pain, of longing and confusion, that has heard only the rumor of some far-off liberation. We need not be embarrased of our own sense of exile, therefore; rather, embrace it and endure the hardships of the season, offering them as a sacrifice, with entreaties that our exile be brought to an end. As one of the Matins Responsories for the season says:

> R. Let the season of the Fast open unto us the gates of Paradise; let us great the time, praying and beseeching, that on the day of Resurrection we may glory in the Lord. V. Behold, now is the acceptable season; now is the day of salvation: let us therefore commend ourselves to God in great longsuffering, that in the day of Resurrection we may glory in the Lord.

Now, I want to say a few words about contemplation, to conclude the series on prayer.

I debated how much to say about this, for the Church has always closely guarded the teaching on contemplation, and warns that serious, spiritual dangers lie in wait for the contemplative, that only experience and grace can resolve. I will therefore limit myself to some very brief remarks.

In Christian contemplation, the soul seeks to commune with God; while the Church does not in any way disavow the essential truthfulness and usefulness of her doctrines, she nevertheless admits that God, as He is in Himself, is ultimately beyond any and all things we may say about Him. This does not mean that “anything” describes God equally well, it just means that even the truest terms cannot define or exhaust Him, in His fulness. Christian contemplation seeks to behold God in the simple gaze of Faith and Charity, therefore, without any definite thought intervening.

In the first place, this means that a man should always mistrust and reject any visions, sounds, etc., that occur to him in contemplation; they may be harmful and, even at best, they are inferior to contemplation itself. The trick, is to focus the will upon God, while the intellect strives to be free from any definite concept. The great work called the Cloud of Unknowing, spoke metaphorically of a “cloud of forgetting,” by which the soul forgets everything it knows from the world of creatures, and a “cloud of unknowing,” the “divine and brilliant darkness” in which God dwells beyond the power of any human thought’s penetration. All the soul should experience, is an impulse of the will to flee sin, and to cleave to God.

Because it is difficult for the novice in this process to think “no thoughts” for a sustained period of time, a common form of training in prayer is to practice thinking only “one thought,” and from there to transition to “no thought.” One commonly does this by repeating a concise phrase, or even a single word, that crystallizes the aforementioned process, fixing the intent upon God and letting Him worry about understanding Himself.

I shared some prayers, and brief prayer rules, at Jedithun; but if, when praying with fixed prayers, one feels a particular connection to God, do not be afraid gently to remain present before Him, in this simplicity of intent, in silence. If you are moved to pour your heart out at such a time, do so, but do not make the mistake of seizing on such a moment to “milk” the prayer. Neither try to force it, nor be anxious about holding it; God is in charge of it. For me the purest moments of “normal” prayer, are these silences that come, and in themselves they are already a glimpse of the kind of contemplation I’ve been describing. Our formal prayers, in the best of times, will help prepare us for such moments; and such moments will impart greater depth to our formal prayers.

These glimpses also help us to undertand the goal of a more deliberate effort at contemplation. For those who wish to pursue it, I recommend the Cloud of Unknowing, and the writings of St. John of the Cross. A more systematic approach is also taken in Fr. Garrigou-Lagrange’s “Christian Perfection,” and “The Three Stages of the Interior Life.”

Finally, a question:

I wanted to give some basics on prayer, because this site is about self-improvement, and I wanted to this information for interested men. Now, those articles are up, for any men who become interested in the future. At this point, in keeping with the spirit of Lent (exile and repentance), I had been thinking of going into the crisis plaguing Western civilization for the past 500 years, and exploring the history of the ideology that has brought us to our present, absurd state of "social justice," and all the rest… so that we, too, could repent and seek an end to our exile.

But I was a little bit surprised to find that some men think of (real) religion as "blue pill," so I had thought of perhaps going through the basic arguments for God's existence, aiming to show that rational, masculine men have always embraced God and, if anything, atheism is historically a phenomenon that patriarchy would associate more with immaturity or effeminacy, and a maladapted intellect.

But then, it occurred to me that perhaps the most helpful thing, would be a systematic introduction to philosophy in the Western Tradition, because if people haven't learned to think clearly, there is no point introducing logical arguments. I am often surprised by how many men, who think of themselves as "smart" or "logical," nevertheless fail to grasp even the first premises of their own arguments, to say nothing of clear thought more generally.

What do you men think? Which of these three, would it be best to do next?

Read More: Why Theology Is A Man's Discipline

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

How A Man Should Build Up His Professional Network

February 20, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Never Eat Alone is a business classic on the power of building relationships to get ahead in life. In this article, I will give a review of the book and relay some of the truly impactful advice within it.

Keith Ferrazzi, the author of this book is a master of networking. He's been the CEO of several companies and runs his own business, he's been named on of the "Top 40 under 40," and his methods are taught at many MBA programs. The purpose of the book is to help you create a networking strategy, learn to connect with others who can help you, manage your network to meet even more people who can help, use your network to achieve your goals, and stand out in your network and provide value to others.

The Mindset

Your new parachute

The book begins by describing the current economic reality. Companies are no longer loyal to their people and people are no longer loyal to their companies. “Lifetime corporate employment is dead,” Ferrazzi solemnly notes. However, your network can afford you the same loyalty that was once offered by corporations. If you’re out of a job you won’t panic nearly as much if you know you can call someone and have an interview lined up. If you need anything at all, whether it’s money, advice, or a job, you can find it in your network. The relationships you’ve built will be your parachute.

Ferrazzi says the key to success is generosity. The flip side of this is to not be afraid to ask for generosity. He mentions how he gets irked when he hears young people tell him, “I’m sorry I can’t accept your offer because I’m not sure I’ll be able to repay you.” Give when you can, and don’t refuse to accept someone else’s kindness. Help others but don’t be afraid to let them help you.

This was a huge takeaway for me. I used to feel uncomfortable reaching out or receiving help from busy, successful people until I realized one reason they got to their position is because of their willingness to give, which is an effective method of connecting. Giving is connecting, and receiving is connecting too. In an era of self-centeredness, people remember the generous ones.

One thing that really stood out to me was his tip that it rarely hurts to ask and that boldness often works in one’s favor. This is a core tenet of game. At one point Ferrazzi even compares audacity in networking to “dating.” He mentions that to this day whenever he calls or reaches out to someone he doesn’t know, he has some fear of rejection, but the important thing is to do it anyway. Nothing creates opportunities like having a willingness to ask.

Ferrazzi is honest about his mindset: “Either I ask or I’m not successful. That fear always overrides my anxiety about rejection or being embarrassed.”

The Skill Set

Don took multiple risks to land his job at Sterling Cooper

Find the people who can help you achieve your goals and reach out to them. Do your homework about the people, search their names online and learn about them. Ferrazzi calls this “warm calling,” which is similar to “warm approaching.” Be methodical about your calls or emails, just like you would be methodical about which girls to approach. When reaching out, mention a mutual friend or acquaintance, or the value you can add to their lives.

Even if you’re looking for a job or coffee, be ready to talk about the ways you can make their lives easier in some way with the skills or experience you have. Frequently these people will not return calls or messages. Don’t let that discourage you; continue to call and write and when they finally do respond, don’t act annoyed. Don’t make it uncomfortable for the other person.

Rules of warm calling:

- Convey credibility
- State your value proposition
- Impart urgency and convenience—be prepared to do what it takes to meet with the person
- Be prepared to compromise

Always follow up with a thank you note. Doing this will put you above the crowd. And after connecting with someone, always be sure to follow up. Following up within 24 hours is key, so send an email as soon as you can after having met someone and receiving their contact info. Be sure to stay on their radar and send monthly follow ups to stay in touch.

What you should include in follow ups:

- Express gratitude
- Include item of interest (mutual interest, a joke from conversation)
- Reaffirm commitments you have made
- Be brief and to the point
- Address person by name
- Use email AND snail mail
- Send it as soon as possible
- Thank those who have set you up with the person

Super-Connectors

Always follow up to thank them

If you can find one person who has many contacts and can build a relationship with them, you will have a huge advantage. If this person can vouch for you and introduce you to other people, you will have an open door to many opportunities.

8 Professions For Super-Connectors

- Restaurateurs: Make a point of becoming a regular, meeting the staff, and get to know the owner and he might open his list of contacts to you
- Headhunters
- Lobbyists
- Fundraisers: People who raise money for others are usually connected to important people
- Public relations people
- Politicians
- Journalists: These people aren’t very difficult to get in contact with. I sent out a couple of emails the other day and within an hour they responded.
- Authors, bloggers, gurus: No brainer here.

There is a chapter about small talk and how important it is. Any guy who learns game should be proficient in small talk. Read Day Bang and learn how to ramble and drop bait. That book is a great conversationalist's manual. The most important point in the chapter is to be the first to say hello in a situation where you want to meet new people to add to your network. Don't stand around like a loser at a night club. Take the initiative. Ask them questions about themselves, pay attention, remember their names, and use them.

Turning Connectors Into Compatriots

Do your homework before reaching out

The only way to get people to do something is to make them feel important. Every person's deepest desire is to be recognized, validated, and liked. If you can make a person feel that, you are in. The chapter titled "Health, Wealth, and Children" claims that those are the three most important topics to people. If you can add value or advice about any of those three things, you generate loyalty.

Real power comes from being indispensable. Help someone else by using your network to connect them and you will develop even more relationships that you can later use for your own goals. You gain influence when you sensibly hand out contacts, information, and goodwill to others.

Pinging

"You have to feed the fire of your network or it will wither and die," Ferrazzi says.

You must stay on people's radar if you're going to need them later. Send them monthly emails, forward articles that might interest them, call them on their birthday. An example he gives of staying in contact when pressed for time:

"Hi, X. Just landed in Y and it made me think of you. No time to meet this trip but I just wanted to touch base."

Using the book's outline, I've sparingly sent emails asking people for advice or opinions to stay in their thoughts. I've also used the "value-added ping" where I forward relevant articles, but do so only occasionally.

The Digital Age And Giving Back

The book gives guidance on the reality of social media, and becoming the “king of content.” There is some useful stuff here, and it is very interesting, particularly for people who want to build or maintain a strong online presence.

Many people want to start a blog or a website, but don’t know what to write about. The question you should ask yourself is, “How can I be helpful to other people?” Don’t write what you think will be interesting, write what other people will be interested in. What do other people need, and how can you write about it in a way that is compelling or provocative?

A businessman understands being interesting and provocative boosts support in the digital age

Ferrazzi talks about the importance of candor and authenticity in building an audience. I think the popularity of Return of Kings has more than demonstrated this. The raw honesty of our columns connects with people on a deep level.

The Importance Of Being Interesting

Ferrazzi writes that he’ll often give a speech at a college and a student will approach him and say he really enjoyed the speech. Ferrazzi will ask the kid what he liked about it and the kid won’t have much to say. Not a good way to connect.

Ferrazzi discusses the famous Airport Question. If you have two people, all else being equal, ask yourself, “If I were trapped in a metropolitan airport for a few hours, would I want to spend it with this person?” Develop yourself, expand your interests, learn to tell a story, and have a point of view.

There is so much more practical advice including approaching celebrities, connecting with journalists, and joining clubs and organizations to expand your network. A quote that sums up the book’s main point: “Autonomy is a life vest made out of sand.”

I've used many of the techniques in the book with great results. Much of it aligns with the central tenets of game. Strongly recommended.

Read More: 3 Tips For A Successful Book Launch

Rod Berne

Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

3 Hard Truths The ROK Meetup Outrage Revealed About The World

February 20, 2016 | by Elrit Frisia | Link | Original Link

It is no great secret that Roosh is a man of unfashionable opinions. However, whatever your stance on his views is, you have to admit that any honest and unbiased reading of his work would render the notion that he is a "pro-rape advocate" as a ridiculous overreach of reason.

It is simply an establishment fabrication that Roosh and the men on this website are advocating rape, designed to silence and malign us in the eyes of the public and discredit the real talking points we have to make about the kind of drunk society we live in.

However, as ridiculous and histrionic as this media attack is, we should in a sense feel a sort of congratulatory smugness. We have, after all, rustled the ideologies of the globalist elite in such a way that they are now feeling nervous and insecure, which is precisely why they have set out to shut our movement down by inciting worldwide hatred and furor through the one weapon that is completely in their control: the "free" press.

It seems that the "perfect" narrative provided by Roosh and friends has been one that is simply too irresistible not to misconstrue. Here you have an "obscure corner" of the Internet, populated by mostly white men, fiercely voicing out their concerns against loose women, feminism, and cultural dilapidation, a situation far too easy to characterize as misogyny and RAPE CULTURE rather than address the real concerns that Western men and women are facing.

And so in one of the most ironic episodes of 2016, the media has rushed to paint game practitioners and cultural traditionalists with the one broad stroke of a "rape mob," while deftly ignoring the real rape mob that they were personally responsible of orchestrating in European cities this past New Year's Eve. If this is not one of the press's most intellectually dishonest moments in history, I don't know what is.

1. The mob is alive and well

A Roosh V protester in Cardiff, UK.

If there ever was a recent time when one could become disillusioned with the current intellectual state of humans, it would be now. Even given the false headlines, the fabricated labels of "pro-rape" and "rape legalization," and the ignorant and uninformed opinions of journalists and even government officials, all this should serve to a hypothetically-enlightened citizen of the "Age of Reason" is to exercise his skeptical muscle and verify if those claims are really true based on their sheer outlandishness.

What have the people done instead? They've gotten on Twitter, Facebook, Instagram, and even government-petitioning platforms in order to "fight rape" and have even gone to the lengths of organizing rallies and real-life protests against these so-called rapists. They've expended finite portions of their life for a false cause when in fact if they had bothered to do more than ten minutes of research they could have saved themselves all of this effort, energy, and outrage.

They have doxed Roosh's family, have made gruesome death and, hypocritically, vicious rape threats towards the man and his followers, and have terrorized the comments section of many of his articles, pictures, and videos.

There is no mistaking it: in the technological 21st century, education, critical-thinking and the free flow of information has not gotten rid of the mob, it has merely made it bigger, more efficient, and even more vicious.

2. Women don’t care about freedom of speech

Nobel Prize-winning biochemist Tim Hunt has had to learn a thing or two about free speech from women.

One interesting component of this outrage episode is who the people standing up for free speech are. Why are women not mounting rational arguments against his satirical article? Where are the widespread intellectual pieces by women proposing more thought experiments on the subject of rape, or discussing what extent of personal responsibility should society demand from its women?

I am not seeing them. I am not seeing women engaging in the use of free speech to dismiss views that they consider to be “outrageous,” for that would at least be a respectable and admirable use of their time. What I am seeing, however, is the complete opposite.

I am seeing more and more women demanding the expansion and intrusion of government into the policing of speech, ideas, and free thoughts. I am seeing more and more women dismissing any and all arguments against their preconceived notions of radical feminism based solely on their ability to call any and all opposition out as misogynists, rapists, and male chauvinists.

Women have petitioned governments to either deny Roosh entry into their country or prohibit his meetings. They are effectively saying “This man disagrees with our views, so instead of respecting diversity and tolerance and engaging him in a civil discussion, we will sulkily demand someone else to take him out of our country because he offends our delicate views and sensibilities.”.

If this sort of reasoning continues to gain ground with politicians, media agents, and members of our society, we will soon live in a place where any disagreement with a female figure will lead to government prosecution.

And such a statement is incredibly telling, it serves to tell the world that these women are in fact so privileged, so indulged, and so full of themselves that they believe that they should not face scrutiny, opposing opinions, or any sense of personal accountability, because in their mind the blame rests on someone else and it’s not on them to challenge themselves.

3. Journalists are dishonest, biased, and incompetent

Mainstream media loves to load their headlines with ridiculous assumptions about men. One can’t help but laugh.

Perhaps the most important takeaway from this incident is the fact that journalists have proven themselves to be incompetent, mediocre crackpots. As shown by the man himself, the majority of articles published on Roosh all made the same false claims, all made biased, personal judgements of character, and almost all served to launch the journalist’s vitriol at the object of interest and to highlight the journalist’s own sense of moral superiority to the reader.

It is at this point that one has to stop and wonder what has become of journalists.

I hope I am not the only one to find this deplorable. And it is precisely why I thoroughly enjoyed Roosh’s press conference, in which he took them to account for their lies and misgivings, and later memorably blurted out at a dishonest journalist: “Do you lift?”

Once you watch this conference, it becomes obviously clear that the press knows almost nothing factual about Roosh and they do not care to do so, because they are not interested in reporting truth, just marketable outrage.

I highly recommend it, as it is both entertaining and informative, and will prove to the readership of this site and to any other honest person to be one of the most visceral instances of—to use the press's very own terminology—"rape" to be caught on film.

Read More: Why The Media Manufactured Outrage Against Our Meet Up

Elrit Frisia

Most great thinkers are said to think ahead of their time. What a strange time we live in then. When, to be capable of truly remarkable thought means embarking on an odyssey of centuries past. Follow Frisia, a young lad with his gaze set afar, into re-discovering the long-forgotten waters of what it means to be a man in a strange land.

How You Can Cast A Vote For Donald Trump

February 20, 2016 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

With the first caucuses and primaries in the books, it's important for us to prove that Trump is not simply a transitory phenomenon, but that he actually has voters willing to come out and elevate him to victory. The time for preparation and talk is rapidly coming to a close and the time for action is upon us.

I suspect that most of the readers of Return of Kings support Donald Trump. I also suspect that most of them have never voted in a primary before. Truthfully, I haven't either, despite having done some work in politics here in New York. That is about to change, as I have changed my registration from independent to Republican so I can vote for Donald Trump.

There are numerous indications that Trump has more support than the polls indicate. This is because the polling seen so far is usually limited to "likely" primary voters – those who have typically voted in primaries in the past. But Trump is striking a chord, and it's very possible that he'll bring out people that either haven't voted in years (my own father, who last voted for Reagan in 1984, is one such possibility) or haven't voted at all. I will be one such (primary) voter. It's important that the rest of the ROK readership, if they can, turn out to vote as well.

A Unique Opportunity

This is possibly a once in a lifetime opportunity. I have never seen the establishment, globalist traitors on either left or right (cuckservatives) so petrified. They know that for the first time in a long time, someone has risen that they cannot control or bully. At first I, like many, was skeptical, but the positions Trump has advocated and more importantly, the utter fear that he has spread among the elite, shows that he's the real deal.

We may never have the opportunity to elect such a man again. No, it won't solve all our problems, but Donald Trump, despite not even holding his party's nomination, has shifted the Overton Window so far to the right in just six months that what used to be discussed only at places like Return of Kings has now become mainstream discourse. Imagine what Trump could do as president?

For this and many other reasons, it's important for us to elect Trump. Everyone that reads ROK who can come out needs to come out. Our corner of the internet has built up a strong base over the past few years, and now it's time to flex some of that muscle and continue to make a presence felt offline.

Every Vote In Every State Counts

Usually primary contests beyond the first few states don't matter much. After the first few, usually after South Carolina for the Republicans, and with the full weight of the media behind him, there is by that point a presumptive nominee, a fact which "Super Tuesday" tends to echo.

This year is different however, and it's not only because of Trump's domination of the polls. Rather, it is very possible that despite all indications being that Trump would be the nominee; the globalist establishment will try to screw him over anyway, even if he wins 49% of the primary vote. With the field so splintered, it could be that Donald Trump wins a clear plurality but enough splinter forces together comprise a majority.

Those forces could then attempt to make a backroom deal and screw Trump out of the nomination at the Republican National Convention, despite his clear plurality. You can consider it majority-minority politics if you want, a preview of the future that the globalists wish for Western society. We saw this recently in France as well, when Marine Le Pen and the National Front were screwed out of what should have been a big victory in the regional elections.

We need to make sure that doesn't happen and put Trump as close to the 51% margin as we can to ensure that the globalist, cuckservative GOP establishment does not screw him out of the nomination through a backroom deal.

Things grow more important when we consider the RNC's new proportionality rules. With the Republican field so splintered, they can easily work against Trump come the Convention in June, as the globalist establishment could well try to broker a nominee other than the one that got the most votes. Things get worse when we consider the fundamentally undemocratic superdelegates which, while limited, could play a disproportionate influence in this election.

So no matter where we live or how late in the game it is (my state of New York holds its primary in April and so is normally irrelevant), we all need to get out.

Open, Mixed, Or Closed?

There are three basic structures that different states hold. Open states allow anyone to vote for the candidate that they like. If you're registered to vote, you are set. Simply go to the polls and vote (or caucus) for Trump.

Mixed states allow independents to vote in either the Democratic or Republican primary or caucus, but not registered members of the other party. If you live in such a state, you can vote for Trump without issue as an independent or Republican, but if you are a Democrat (and I doubt many of you are), you will need to switch to either of the other two to do so.

Finally, and in most cases, there are closed states. In these, only a registered member of the Democratic or Republican parties can vote or caucus for a candidate in that party.

If you live in such a state, you will need to register as a Republican to vote for Trump. The entire calendar of primaries and caucuses, whether they are open, mixed, or closed, can be found here.

Change Your Party

If you are not a registered Republican and you live in a closed state, Diamond and Silk, famous supporters of Trump who have appeared with him at rallies, have prepared an extensive guide to change your party registration that they call "Ditch and Switch."

Click the link, find your state, get the form and fill it out before the deadline. Then show up to vote for Trump in the primary.

Final Thoughts

We can debate the merits of voting of course. The United States of America, lacking an explicit nationalist party like France's FN, Austria's FPO, Sweden's SD, and so on, is particularly vulnerable to the total ineffectiveness of voting. Yet The Golden One and others have passionately urged us to not make excuses and do what you can in voting the right way.

Don't sit on the fence; the worst you have to lose is time. This is looking to be the best chance we've had in doing serious and meaningful damage to the politically correct, globalist political cartel in decades. At the very least we will get four glorious years of SJW tears if Trump wins.

Let's go out and get this done.

Read More: 10 Signs You Might Be A Cuckservative

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

How To Choose A Style Of Martial Art To Study

February 21, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

As anybody with functioning eyes can see, the world today sucks: No matter where you stand on the issue of whether or not crime rates are going down or up, the repugnant culture, political and social repression, and all the other petty little frustrations forced upon us by rainbow haired harridans might make you want to start throwing punches and kicks—obviously at a punching bag or a willing sparring partner rather than the SJW woman, as we here at Return of Kings would never advocate violence against our political enemies.

If you're interested in learning a martial art, now is as good a time as any to start. But the hard decision is: which one to study?

Style Versus Style?

If you've researched the subject at all, you've probably come to websites like Bullshido, Bloody Elbow, or perhaps even Return of Kings. If this is the case, you've probably seen people verbally fellating Muay Thai or Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu, or shitting on Taekwondo, Wing Chun, or Karate.

The typical criticism of the latter is that they are overly ornate and simply "don't work," with the implication that the former are instantly effective, turning any practitioner into a killer. Allow me to tell you the most important rule of picking any style of martial art, including Western ones such as boxing or wrestling: the SCHOOL OR GYM is the most important thing, and the quality of instruction therein. Styles of martial arts are not cars that are 100% better or worse performing than others.

What Is Proper Schooling?

Now that I've told you that the instruction is much more important than the name of the style, you might now ask "What makes proper schooling?" From my experience, a good martial arts school needs to focus on three things: 1) Physical conditioning-training strength, endurance (both muscular and cardiovascular), and flexibility 2) Proper form and technique—teaching the proper way to punch, kick, throw, breakfall, and anything else that would need to be done, and 3) Competitive, full contact sparring to put the students in a realistic fighting setting, which teaches them the important lessons of operating under adrenaline and withstanding pain as well as using proper technique while in a panic situation.

Simply put, if you're not sparring, you're not training. And yes, that goes for the young children as well: I fully endorse young children punching each other in the head (with supervision, of course).

This is why martial arts like SAMBO or Muay Thai have higher reputations than, say, Balinese White Magic, or why Kyokushin Karate and Sanshou Kung Fu (the latter being the style I have trained in, but admittedly have not mastered) are much more successful in full contact MMA competition than other styles in those same families—because their regular curriculum typically centers around physical conditioning, proper technique, and full contact sparring, rather than a focus on forms, kata, taolu, ceremony, and techniques performed on non-resisting opponents.

Unfortunately, many traditional martial arts, especially as performed in the West, focus on those three things. This is why, in an age of mixed martial arts and full contact competition, these styles have, at best, a dubious reputation that is mostly deserved. With that being said, I don't think that these styles should be thrown into the ashbin of history-trained properly, they can be effective for full contact fighting. To cite one example, Sanshou was invented in the 1920s specifically to be a realistic, combat-effective kung fu style. Conversely, a Muay Thai or BJJ teacher that teaches ineffectively is not going to help you at all, despite the fearsome reputation that these two styles have justifiably cultivated over the years.

How To Judge A School

In addition to their guts, note that this "kung fu" student is wearing a karate gi.

If you want to determine whether or not the nearby school teaches effectively, the best way to do so is to observe: any school worth its salt (and many that aren't) will allow people to visit and observe the training. Look at how the teacher trains them: if he's teaching striking, is he teaching them to aim and properly put their whole body weight behind every punch and kick, or is he just allowing them to flail their limbs towards the general vicinity of the target? For that matter, are they punching actual targets such as heavy bags, makiwaras, mu ren zhuangs, etc, or are they just punching the air?

If the martial art is a grappling martial art, is the training done against a resisting, violent opponent, or is it done against a submitting, non-resisting partner? Are they sparring, or are they just line dancing in pairs? Are forms occasionally done, or are they a primary concern of the school?

Do the students look like they're in good, athletic physical condition, or do they look like pot-bellied LARPers? Bear in mind that this applies to the teachers as well—if the teacher's out of shape, the students will most likely not be getting a good conditioning regimen.

Judging based on the criteria above will always steer you in the right direction. Once you have established which schools are "serviceable" and which aren't, you can then decide which school is the best within your price range-look at the pupils they have trained, the background of the instructors, etc. At this point, you must decide on your own.

Fraud And Chicanery

Unfortunately, there is much fraud and general nonsense in the world of martial arts.

Most of it can be determined through a light application of common sense…but sadly, common sense is decidedly uncommon. I have already shown you the idiocy that is Balinese White Magic in this post, but I could take you down a veritable rabbit hole of ki blasts, psychic powers, death touches, and poison fists. And sometimes they advise you to smear feces on yourself.

Needless to say, I think well enough of my readers that I feel you won't fall for this sort of confidence scheme. But the more common scams are much more prosaic—things like charging huge fees for belt testing, requiring students to buy uniforms or anything else from the school, promising a black belt or the equivalent rank in under two years, or making you sign a lease or a contract. These are just a few surefire signs of a McDojo.

General unprofessionalism and ignorance are common signs as well; mixing and matching of Asian cultures, the instructor sleeping with one of his students, and other behaviors that should raise anybody's bullshit alarm.

Knowing all this now, you should be capable of assessing a martial arts school for your purposes. Speaking as a writer and reader of this website, combat sports are, in addition to a method of self-defense and fitness, a great way to form a male-only space. This is, of course, something that ROK has also sought to achieve recently.

And most importantly, for whatever style you end up choosing: train hard, and don't waste your instructor's time or your own.

Read More: Why Karate Is The Most Beta Martial Art

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

European Union MEP Mary Honeyball To Propose Banning Roosh And ROK Readers From Europe

February 21, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In a revelation to be dropped within a day or two, a reliable source has told us that a London newspaper will report that Mary Honeyball, a UK Labour Party Member of the European Parliament (MEP), will propose that Roosh and any organizer of the ROK meetups face bans or "visa restrictions" upon trying to enter the EU.

Honeyball intends to outright lie and deceive members of the EU Parliament by portraying ROK as a "pro-rape" group presenting an imminent sexual assault danger to all European women. All this comes as Honeyball and her mainstream colleagues in the European Parliament and other national legislatures do nothing to combat the epidemic of migrant rapes striking Europe and its women.

Our source has stated that Mary Honeyball will present a letter demanding visa restrictions for Roosh and ROK readers who reveal themselves as meetup organizers. As far as we can work out, she will be attaching not a shred of factually based evidence that correlates with or proves the notion that any men involved with the February 6 meetups planned to do anything more than legally gather for beers or other beverages with fellow ROK readers.

Never letting facts get in the way of an attempt to distract attention from the real rape culture being unleashed by undeserving new arrivals to Europe, Honeyball and those of her ilk have chosen to willfully disregard outlets such as Snopes. This fact-checking website conclusively refuted the outright lie that the ROK meetups were being orchestrated to somehow facilitate rapes by our readers.

Forgetting how utterly counterintuitive any hypothetical "call to rape" would be, the only “evidence” Honeyball can resort to is a satirical article by Roosh. With that in mind, I am surprised that Honeyball has not already passed a motion in the European Parliament calling for the posthumous conviction of Jonathan Swift for inciting ethnic cleansing through the infanticide of Irish babies sent to England to increase the food supply. While we are at it, let us dig up his grave and send his remains to The Hague so we can try what is left of his corpse for hate speech.

Mary Honeyball and her radical feminist leanings

Unsurprisingly, Mary Honeyball supports self-aggrandizing and grandma-hating lawyer Charlotte Proudman. She even looks like Proudman’s mother.

Honeyball’s espousal of plain moronic feminist positions goes back a long way, yet one of her worst policy proposals is more recent. In 2014, a majority of the European Parliament backed her call to criminalize the buying of sex but not its sale by women. It seems Honeyball is not aware of or deliberately ignores the countless middle and upper middle-class British women in her MEP region of London who sell their bodies on the street, in brothels, or via sites such as SeekingArrangement.com. I encourage her to peruse Seeking Arrangement using a male profile and tell me if twenty-something young women looking for jewelry, travel, and other expensive gifts are really “forced” into de facto sex work and sexual commercialization, or if they rather gleefully choose it.

Consequently, if a feminist MEP like Mary Honeyball thinks that all female sexual workers are criminally compelled to spread their legs for profit, and that male purchasers of sex should all be criminals, we cannot expect her to rationally or honestly characterize a website like ours. After all, we call into question the constant vitiation of female responsibility by society that she wants to see legally eliminated.

Honeyball’s activities in the European Parliament’s Committee on Women’s Rights and Gender Equality is a testament to this: on “issues” such as the mythical gender pay gap, Honeyball has routinely used bogus figures, including glossing over the higher average hours worked by men and the types of industries they enter in greater numbers. Her other proclivities include supporting Emily's List, which strangely demands female quotas for voluntary political candidate positions, and praising self-aggrandizing Charlotte Proudman, the barrister who tried to globally shame a man as a supposed sexual predator for saying she looked attractive in a private message.

> The #GenderPayGap is simply not acceptable. We have to act now to erradicate it. Read more on my blog: https://t.co/nPwRhit0hj
>
> — Mary Honeyball (@maryhoneyball) February 16, 2016

> 1/2 Very useful visit to Munich to see reception conditions for refugees and talk with govt ministers about improving conditions
>
> — Mary Honeyball (@maryhoneyball) February 12, 2016

The suffocation of free speech in the European Union

…and anti-peaceful free speech bigot.

As the borders around the EU are made porous and even irrelevant, not just the borders between member states, the range of acceptable discussion is being progressively curtailed. Roosh is a target for vilification because he opposes both the privileges of feminist women and the covered-up behavior of unrestricted migrants, whose presence in Europe is further existentially draining once proud nations like Germany and Sweden.

Roosh cannot be silenced by conventional feminist retorts like "misogynist" that are used to compel men to stop their criticisms on pain of being social pariahs and subsequently unemployable. So now Mary Honeyball will move to demand physical restrictions on Roosh's movements and those of the meetup organizers through obvious lies, all because he has the audacity to stand by opinions poor Mary does not like. Expect more of these measures in the next few years, as greater numbers of men come out and challenge the powers that be. Truly draconian policies of containment will soon be in full swing as feminists and their mainstream political enablers are forced into additional narrative-saving damage control.

Roosh is a distraction from EU politicians having to deal with rapist migrants and economic collapse

Roosh is inherently valuable to status quo politicians in the European Union, the Mary Honeyballs most of all. He excites rabid feminists and is the perfect surrogate for their rage. SJWs are totally unwilling to clamp down on the sacred cows known as illegal migrants and "refugees." They are flummoxed, too, about how to counteract the Euro currency-inspired economic devastation they have wrought upon tens of millions of ordinary Europeans. So what better way to draw attention away from the Rapelympic Games ravaging the European heartland and other tragedies than trying to savage an anti-feminist man falsely accused of promoting rape?

The EU is also completely dumbstruck about how to defend European cities from the next Bataclan-style Islamist terrorist mass murders. So far, the best countermeasure we have against the countless planned bullets and bombs of ISIS and al-Qaeda is Facebook's French flag profile photo option. They cannot find the real guys of mostly Middle Eastern and North African origin plotting the most heinous acts of public killing, so thumb-twiddling MEPs can instead chase after a secular Iranian/Armenian-American named Roosh who is vaguely brown-looking and teaches men how to better themselves. Go Team EU! Banning Roosh and ROK readers will make Europe safe again!

Are we a genuine threat to establishment?

Note the paradox of European, American, Canadian and Australian politicians doing everything they can to excoriate Roosh by saying he is “small-fry,” such as pointing to the plain fabricated allegation that he lives in his mother’s basement. If he and his ideas are so insignificant, why are they being repressed by dozens of national and other politicians, plus over 1,600 mainstream news articles recently? What are they getting out of this 1984-style Two Month (or Two Year) Hate, other than absolving themselves of their own inadequacies in not fixing widespread economic and social malaise?

I do not want to and will not paint all European Parliament Members with the same broad brush. For a start, the presence of the representatives of over two dozen EU member states, which each bring their own somewhat or very divided political cultures, makes the Parliament more of a mess than a monolithic vehicle of political correctness. Secondly, the rise of alternative, narrative-challenging parties means that an ever larger chunk of dissident voices can be found in Brussels. Even so, the Mary Honeyballs in the European Parliament are far too numerous and their pernicious influence is far too great. Her move to restrict the travel of Roosh or ROK readers to Europe is a stark warning of things to come. Are you next, merely because your political positions are not like hers?

Spread the word

Non-violent free speech is what Mary Honeyball really likes… so long as it does not disagree with her views. Then it is “hate speech.”

Every day, migrants are streaming into Europe. ISIS has commanded its followers to join them. This is the sort of real crisis the European Parliament needs to deal with, in addition to protecting the vital social cohesion of European states from the hordes of non-terrorist arrivals. We call upon all our readers to make the unfounded nature of these accusations against us more widely known. ROK has not been linked with any violence and we are simply convenient scapegoats for the perpetual failures of the European political class.

If peaceful freedom of speech is now a trigger for unjustified persecution and very targeted restrictions of movement, what exactly does the European Union stand for?

Read More: Europe Is On The Precipice

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Finnish Police Teach Women How To Prevent Being Raped By Simply Saying “No” Sternly

February 21, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

In these times of “refugee” crisis and migrants running amok in European countries, Finnish authorities have decided it’s time to teach women some self-defense. The police have released a video showing what a woman should do if she’s assaulted on the street. The video is one of the most unintentionaly funny things I’ve ever seen. Take a look:

A well-dressed white man comes at the blonde Finnish girl from behind, slightly poking her back with his hand. It kind of looks like he wants to ask her for directions or some other harmless thing, but the woman isn’t taking any chances. She turns around, holds her hand out and says “No.” The man staggers away as if he’s been dealt a kick by Bruce Lee.

When the brilliant defensive tactic of saying no doesn’t work, the woman shoves the man away. In one shot she isn’t even touching the guy when he’s flung back, so you would guess that she has mastered the ways of the Force. When not even the Force works, she resorts to the one weapon that no man can deflect: bashing him with her handbag.

The video would be even funnier if it wasn’t also quite sad. In Finland, you’re not allowed to carry guns, tasers, or pepper spray. All you have to defend yourself are your fists and whatever objects you happen to be carrying at the time. I know girls in Sweden who have pepper spray with them anyway, but most women probably follow the law (and are terrified by weapons in general).

The truth is that if a woman doesn’t have the great equalizer of a firearm at her disposal when a rapist goes after her, she’s pretty much screwed. The man is stronger and likely highly determined to not let his victim get away. My best advice for a girl in that situation would be to run as fast as she can, or scream as loud as she can to get the attention of males who can come to her aid.

But as feminism prescribes women to do everything on their own, I wouldn't be surprised if women today would rather be raped than ask a man for help.

Another stupid video about rape

But wait, there's another rape themed video out that's been getting some attention lately. This one is more annoying than funny. British police has had a "consent is everything" campaign, and this video uses tea as an analogy for sex.

The basic message is that if your guest didn't want tea, you wouldn't force it down his or her throat. The same thing goes for sex. If you force someone to do it with you, you're committing rape. Pretty simple, although the police department seems to think that the viewers are simple too, since it takes nearly three long minutes to make it's point.

I've seen this video being widely spread, and feminists dig it. I must note, though, that it fails to inform people of the new feminist rule that if you have sex willingly and then regret it afterwards, you've been raped. It's just like when you drink a cup of tea and then have second thoughts, and report the person who made the tea to the police.

"If you're still struggling with consent …", is the first line the narrator says. His patronizing tone stays throughout the whole video. "Unconscious people don't want tea, trust me on this." Yeah we know, you retard. Was this made for children?

I'm sorry to break it to this guy, but both rapists and non-rapists know that rape is wrong. The difference between them is that rapists don't care. At least in the West, no one is going around seriously saying that rape is alright and that you can force people to do what you want. But feminists believe it to be so, and they've used Roosh as a straw man to promote this idea of rape culture. The makers of the video have the same agenda and want us to think that men are "struggling with consent."

Problems with consent

There are issues with consent, though. It’s not as black and white as some people would like it to be. One problem is that women change their minds so often that it’s hard to keep track of what they want. It’s further complicated by them often saying one thing and meaning the complete opposite. Being so ambivalent about everything, they need a dominant man to lead the way.

But the biggest problem of consent is that it’s almost never expressed out loud. If she doesn’t want sex she’ll let you know, but if she wants it then you both move along without saying much. You can tell that she likes it from what she does to you and her body language. Asking “do you consent to having sex with me?” in that heated moment would sound both weird and unsexy. It’s just not something that comes naturally.

You’re wasting your time if you’re trying to teach a rapist not to rape. If he was brought up in Scandinavia, he knows what he’s doing isn’t right. It’s better to give women the necessary means to defend themselves. If they were given the right to bear arms, they would stand a fair chance against a male assailant. But I don’t see that happening in these Nordic countries anytime soon.

Read More: Why Are Swedish Police Protecting Migrants Who Molest Young Girls At Concerts?

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

5 Traits That Make Women The Best Useful Idiots For Liberalism

February 22, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> Women might be talented but cannot be genius as they are always subjective.
> — Arthur Schopenhauer

With the destruction of the classical liberalism of Jefferson, Montesquieu and others, a new, pernicious and anti-male ideology took its place. Since then, “modern” SJW-style liberalism has snowballed further still into an excuse for poor female behavior. This behavior is the exact same sort that philosophers have chronicled and warned about for countless centuries. From Aristotle’s conceptions of political community to Nietzsche’s understanding of basic female fickleness, history’s most insightful men have bequeathed to us most of what we need to know about female psychology.

In profound ways, liberalism in the 21st century both vitiates female responsibility and simultaneously enables the castigation of society and men for problems women create for themselves. Men are altogether violent, say feminists and other opportunistic females, but women nevertheless compulsively seek out and validate men who are actually violent. Similarly, women, especially celebrities, scream about being objectified, even as the take every opportunity to objectify themselves for financial, social or sexual profit. The list goes on and on.

On Women

Perhaps the most compelling but concise treatise on women comes from Arthur Schopenhauer. Everything from rape culture hysteria to female emphasis on a man's resources can be explained by reference to Schopenhauer's On Women. If necessary, read his words thrice a week until they are ingrained permanently in your brain and soul.

If the feminist-friendly liberal world we live in seems devoid of any logic or reasonable discourse, pay careful attention to what Schopenhauer has to say about women, who are the most accommodating of insane political correctness. This quote serves as an excellent introduction due to its unvarnished honesty:

> It is because women's reasoning powers are weaker that they show more sympathy for the unfortunate than men, and consequently take a kindlier interest in them. On the other hand, women are inferior to men in matters of justice, honesty, and conscientiousness. Again, because their reasoning faculty is weak, things clearly visible and real, and belonging to the present, exercise a power over them which is rarely counteracted by abstract thoughts, fixed maxims, or firm resolutions, in general, by regard for the past and future or by consideration for what is absent and remote.

Sound familiar? If not, think about all those feminists welcoming the same migrants who went on to rape and pillage in Cologne and in other cities across Germany and elsewhere:

Or the woman, and her countless supporters, who think that "[i]f we use proof in rape cases, we fall into the patterns of rape deniers":

Without further ado, here are some of the ways in which we see Schopenhauer's wisdom playing out in modern society. Women are the best useful idiots for liberalism because:

1. Women's menstrual cycles affect their (liberal) voting patterns

"It's Justin Trudeau's dreamy eyes that tell me he has the best policies for Canada."

> Women are capable of education, but they are not made for activities which demand a universal faculty such as the more advanced sciences, philosophy and > certain forms of artistic production… Women regulate their actions not by the demands of universality, but by arbitrary inclinations and opinions.

>
> — Hegel, Philosophy of Right, "The Family"

CNN timidly retracted an article about a scientific study that claimed ovulating single women were much more likely to vote for Obama than Romney. Forgetting that their job should be to report the news, not selectively include parts of it, Ted Turner's media child, now a cowering and infantilized adult, bowed to the whims of angry feminists. Funnily enough, the vitriolic reactions of those feminists against the piece actually proved the sort of emotions-based claims about women in the study. Women's feelings dictated how they (a) were to vote and (b) reacted to claims they didn't like.

The supreme lunacy of the backlash against this study is that science already recognizes that women are much more likely to cheat on their mate when ovulating, wear the color red and wear less clothing to begin with. [1] [2] [3] [4] Likewise, women are more likely to go out clubbing without their partner when ovulating (obviously subconsciously looking for new partners), again wearing less clothing. So women are able to ruin relationships or long-term marriages with children because of their menstrual cycles, but it just can't affect their voting habits? Yeah…

2. Women want men to save them, but not the other way around

Why don't women save their male partners in the same way as Jon Blunk and two other men saved their girlfriends during the Aurora movie theater shootings?

> On the contrary, the male is more ready to help, and, as it has been said, more brave than the female ; and even in the malacia, if the sepia is struck with a trident, the male comes to help the female, but the female makes her > escape if the male is struck.

> — Aristotle, History of Animals, BOOK IX

Then there's the lovely issue of men being expected to save their female partners in dangerous or life-or-death emergencies. When was the last time you heard about a liberal-minded women laying down her life for her deserving, loving male partner? Yes, I'm struggling to recall an incident, too. Yet in just one shooting in Aurora, Colorado several years ago, no less than three young men gave their lives to shield their female partners from a hail of bullets. Could not one woman in that cinema have bothered to show their equality credentials and put themselves in front of their lover?

In matters of national security, too, while SJWs, feminists and other cretins are out bashing the "misogyny" of armed servicemen, they're spectacularly silent about the fact that from March 2003 to May 2008, 97.68% of all the American military deaths in Iraq were men. Many of the 2.32% of fatalities involving women were not in combat roles or frontline incidents. Comparably disproportionate male service member deaths have marked both the conflict in Afghanistan since 2003 and Iraq after early May 2008.

She tells you she believes in equality. But when she claims she feels "safe" around you and "protected," just remember she also expects you to jump in front of that knife or gun when you're walking down a dark alley. And she will pretty much never do the same in return. You're a man and equality doesn't count when her life is in danger and you're obligated to save her. She'll cry at your funeral but quickly find another man with an actual heartbeat who can steer her away from harm.

3. Liberalism ensures women that any personal or professional failures can be blamed on the "patriarchy"

Former Reddit CEO Ellen Pao received negative performance reviews during her time at Kleiner Perkins. She responded by launching the most butthurt and self-entitled sex discrimination lawsuit in US corporate history.

> There are only a half dozen men of letters (and no women) worth printing.
> — T. S. Eliot, 1922

Didn't get that promotion you were gunning for, despite your newly minted Masters degree in comparative feminist literature or pansexual dating habits? Passed over because you're unwilling to work overtime like that male brute who's been at the company three years longer? Well, liberalism has a ready-made answer. You're oppressed! Your father may be a wealthy dentist and you may have gone to prep school, but every man ahead of you is only there because of his penis and balls!

Liberalism is a merry-go round for women with massive privilege especially to argue that they have been shortchanged. The only criteria is being female. You do not need to prove you've been discriminated against, you just need the proper genitalia to play the role of casual victim.

This mentality is exacerbated by the use of wishy-washy claims about so-called gender discrimination. Pseudo-arguments like the gender pay gap, which ignore women's concentration in less elite fields like childcare, nursing and schoolteaching compared to men in engineering, business and finance, are employed to assert that women who fall short do so because they are undervalued.

4. Women like flashy, free things and ridiculous pipe dreams

> Woman's love involves injustice and blindness against everything that she does not love… Woman is not yet capable of friendship: women are still cats and birds. Or at best cows…

> — Friedrich Nietzsche, Thus Spoke Zarathustra, “On the Friend”

Free $200,000 educations! Free healthcare (including totally, totally obligatory transgender surgery)! Free tampons! Free abortions without the responsibility to use either condoms or birth control! Getting rid of the patriarchy means absolutely no rapes, assaults or murders across seven billion people! These are the sorts of demands perpetually enunciated, if you can even call it that, by feminists and their equally common sense-challenged enablers.

Liberalism promises women this and much, much more. American debt is at $19 trillion and counting? Nevermind, folks, under the Obama (and Clinton) administration, any reduction in spending will be evil or plain misogynistic! The money trees are coming, don’t worry! What’s the point of painful debt reduction measures if it would involve any sacrifice over the next two years?

Because liberalism sanctions this kind of complete loss of reality and proportion, women are able to go full throttle and equate everything they do not like with some ubiquitous conspiracy against them personally and females in general. For example, 79 women in Australia, from a female population of 12.5 million, were killed or allegedly killed by their male partner or family member in 2015? That one in 158,227 chance is demonstrative of a male-wide epidemic which accepts and promotes murderous domestic violence! To the pitchforks, girls!

Forgetting that the average person, male, female or transgender beast, has next to zero chance of being killed or coming to serious physical harm in a given year, liberal women believe that any male is a surrogate scapegoat for the violence of another man he has never met. Along with liberal female expectations of what society and government should provide them, it is one of the biggest pipe dreams in human history.

Liberalism provides women with the mirage of equality relative to males but the ability to direct every conceivable material or social advantage onto themselves. Feminists can claim they are “earning” like men now, even as everything from child support, child custody, affirmative action, and sexual harassment laws and policies are geared towards promoting their welfare and advancement at the expense of men’s. And that sort of advancement is very expensive, weakening the sustainability of society itself.

5. Women can be self-aggrandizing sluts 24/7 and liberalism allows them to claim they’re still being objectified by men

Feminism is that same collection of contradictory positions that enables Miley Cyrus to call herself one of the “biggest feminists in the world” and attack any sexualization of women by men.

> The difficulty may just be that we have never yet discovered a way to communicate with the female mind.
>
> — Richard Feynman, Nobel prize-winning theoretical physicist

Liberalism gifts women with the widest possible chances to claim men are objectifying and slut-shaming them just as they themselves are actively being sexual objects and sluts. The allegations of objectification and slut-shaming usually have everything to do with a woman wanting to sidetrack the discussion from their own poor actions. They also give a “good” excuse to shut down a male argument they do not like. Meanwhile, normal, peaceful expressions of male sexuality are called out as “misogynistic” while women milk their sexuality for everything it is worth in the marketplace.

The name of the game with these patterns is the amplification of a woman’s range of choices and the restriction of a man’s. A female can either “normalize” her sluttery and self-objectification or pretend it is not sluttery and self-objectification at all. The icing on the cake is the ability and built-in propensity to demonize common-sense and indeed factual observations made by men. Immense commonalities exist between this frame of mind, other perennial back-up arguments like “mansplaining,” and the “superstructures” so-called feminist academics raise to construe every aspect of or event in society as an oppression of women that cannot be debated.

The prospect of women admitting these foibles is slim to none in many cases. Feynman’s grappling with the female mind is an eternal one for men. A woman’s full-blown acknowledgment that she treats herself as a sexual object to extract multiple social advantages is a recipe for wanton self-destruction. Denial, inasmuch as it damages her as well, is the preferable course of action.

From the ancients to ROK, these observations on women are here to stay

Great continuity exists between the observations of the ancients and those of modern individuals when it comes to women. Short of cultural indoctrination brought on by politically correct madness, men who have no day-to-day recognition of the works of Schopenhauer, Aristotle, Hegel or others are exposed to and identify the same histrionic and self-validating female behavior.

Exposure to philosophical texts such as these are still necessary, as they allow men to think in concrete terms about what they have suspected or unconsciously known for a long time. As society's death spiral at the hands of liberalism proves, the problems we face regarding women today are identical to those philosophers and other learned men have explored for centuries.

Read More: 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Alt Right Is Worse Than Feminism In Attempting To Control Male Sexual Behavior

February 22, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Coined by NPI director Richard Spencer, the alt right is a nationalist internet movement that helped popularize the term "cuckservative" when describing liberals disguised as establishment conservatives. For a flash of 2015, they offered new ideas that could serve as a counterweight to liberalism and social justice, but unfortunately a large section of it has degenerated into a collection of fearful beta males who are obsessed with controlling the sexual choices of all men and who they're allowed to associate with. Even worse, they've recently joined hands with feminists and men's rights activists in attacking heterosexual men by participating in bogus "rape culture" hysteria.

What went wrong?

The 1488 mob of the alt right, consisting of white purity enthusiasts who assemble on Twitter and 4Chan, has gone from being a fringe portion of the alt right to the dominant, most numerous, and most vocal force that examines the blood purity of alt right members and that of their girlfriends and associates (I've even seen members demand genetic test results to prove percentage of whiteness). Starting in December of 2015, this mob began attempting to purge moderates from the alt right who dared to follow non-white people on Twitter, or who took a vacation to an Asian country to flirt with non-white women. They also came after me, sending hundreds of angry tweets for the main reason that I'm not white but am seen as attractive and masculine by white women.

The alt right has begun doing what they wanted to do all along: control the sexual choices of men. The following two conditions must now be met if you are to be accepted into their e-movement:

- If you’re a white male, you’re forbidden to sleep with a non-white girl, because that is “race mixing” and goes against their race platform, even though the white race was certainly produced as a result of pre-historic race mixing.
- If you’re a non-white male, you’re not allowed to sleep with a white girl, because you’re a nigger/kebab/gook, and you must be deported from the country you happen to be a citizen of or outright killed.

I’ve gotten messages from hundreds of self-proclaimed members of the alt right who say I can’t be “in” their movement, even though I have never contributed for an alt right site or spoken at one of their functions. One man said I can only be a member if I don’t sleep with white women, and I’ve seen the mob attack other men who have non-white girlfriends. The alt right has gone from a possible political alternative to a frustrated mob that wants to control the sexual choices of all men. With whom have we encountered that before?

Feminism.

Feminism is a movement that aims to maximize female sexual choices while minimizing male sexual choice. Feminists shame men who date younger women and who have preferences for thin and beautiful women. Feminists have petitioned the legal system to invent the crime of “sexual harassment” to constrain male behavior and have changed the laws on due process to criminalize the act of consensual sex. They use the accusation of “rapist” on an increasing number of men who dared to exercise their sexual choices in a legal manner.

The alt right started as a nationalist movement, and that's what many people believe it to currently be, but we're only three months away from it being a movement primarily concerned with minimizing the sexual choices of everyone. While feminists want to control how a man has sex, the alt right wants to control who they have sex with.

The alt right is becoming yet another ideology focused on the sexual control of men

Number one directive of alt right: stop Roosh from sleeping with white women

If the bulk of alt right practitioners have their way, white men will not be allowed to date non-white women and non-white men will not be allowed to date white women or even flirt with them. They will proudly boast of these sexual rules, not knowing that they morphed into a white pride version of the incel forum PUA Hate.

Once their sexual control objectives are reached, the alt righters will then move to controlling your friendly and casual relationships. You will not be permitted to associate with someone whose 23&Me genetic test result fails to meet their standards. I wish I could say I was exaggerating with these statements, but they openly boast about these rules, which are often featured in many of their memes. If you don't want to take my word for it, ask them these two questions yourself:

1. In your ideal nation, will white men be able to consensually sleep with non-white women?
2. In your ideal nation, will non-white men be able to consensually sleep with white women?

Some ideas of the alt right were sound, since they offered a path for us to move forward against the leftist establishment, but that has now been lost with the added dimension of controlling who men can enter relationships with, sexual or not. It's clear to me that when PUA Hate shut down after Elliot Rodger's mass murder spree, its thousands of members floated in the ether until finding a movement that would have them. That movement is the alt right.

When the worldwide mob came after ROK's meetups, the alt right united with SJWs and MRAs

Besides a small spattering of messages of solidarity from alt right leaders like Richard Spencer and Paul Ramsey, much of the alt right joined in on the attack against myself and ROK in response to the outrage from our February 6 international meetup. In other words, the alt right and social justice crowds became natural allies. Many comments were along the lines of, "Yeah! Roosh is a sand nigger rapefugee! He's bad! Get him!"

Their delirium culminated when Greg Johnson, the homosexual proprietor of alt right publishing house Counter Currents, copy-pasted male feminist David "Manboobz" Futrelle's attack narrative against me to say that I must certainly be a rapist because of distorted out-of-context travel writing, an accusation which I unequivocally deny. Only to a feminist—and now to an alt righter—is sleeping with a woman who consumed alcohol and consented to sex considered rape. Ironically, Johnson's attack came only two days after A Voice For Women's most feminine men's rights writer, Dean Esmay, did nearly the exact same thing.

Johnson was applauded by the alt right for taking such a brave stand against an ex-player, while his adventures in AIDS-causing anal sex are hushed up and ignored in what is supposed to be a traditional movement. It turns out that homosexuals have some sort of perverse immunity in the alt right.

From the rumors I've been hearing, a number of influential alt right members are indeed homosexual. They'll go on and on about the Jewish question—and attack you if you don't—but ignore discussion of the "homosexual question" and its role in wrecking societies. Now you know why.

The alt right is not serving the needs of men who don't want their behavior controlled

I can state right now that I didn't fight feminism for the past ten years so that I can aid a movement that is their mirror image. I didn't write a dozen books and hundreds of articles preaching on the sanctity of masculinity to help a movement that attempts to redefine consensual sex along the dystopian standard of the left while crushing the choices that men want to make, especially since race is not even close to being a defining factor for men looking for a suitable partner.

For that reason, I can no longer support the alt right, since they're now mostly under the control of the mob. They will seduce discontented men with white identity and white pride, allowing them entry into the club based primarily on skin color, and then pull the switcheroo and grossly limit their behavior in a way that is worse than feminism. It's no surprise that alt righters are regularly using feminist attack points against me—even linking to SJW petitions on change.org—to the point where it's getting difficult for me to tell if a hater is from the alt right or from Buzzfeed. When your main objective is controlling male sexual choice, your arguments and activism tend to be the same.

More severely, they've allowed scores of attention-whoring women to enter their movement and have a voice in its future. Here's one of their favorite crypto-feminists who was applauded for creating a video against me laden with game denialism and SJW talking points:

The alt right is becoming so authoritarian that a man may actually be happier as a male feminist and sleeping with blue haired freaks with Skrillex haircuts than having all his sexual and friendship choice subject to approval by the alt right mob. When I saw this mob denouncing the girlfriends of their own allies with a variety of derogatory names, including “mud,” I knew the movement had successfully been subverted and was on its way to becoming just another feeble corner of the internet whose adherents will remain anonymous, marginal, and bitter without ever accumulating institutional or state power.

On a long enough timeline, all internet movements get subverted

Alt right forum that was more obsessed about me than PUA Hate

The story of what happened to the alt right is the story of every single internet movement in existence: subversion. The initial thought-leaders of the movement got overtaken by outsiders or those whose intentions were at odds with the founding ideals.

- The PUA movement was subverted by marketers, New York publishing houses, and MTV to take it from an underground self-improvement movement to being an overly commercialized freak show that was about fuzzy hats and “negs.”

- The red pill was subverted by purple pillers who turned it from being a collection of masculine, self-aware men to one that is now a “seduction 101” safe space ghetto on Reddit.
- The gamergate movement was about fighting corruption in the media but it has been subverted by tone policing liberals who scared off or purged those who were involved in its founding.

If an internet movement is decentralized and based on open admission from outsiders who can steer its direction, particularly women and homosexuals, it will fail. That doesn’t mean it won’t have an effect upon society, but it will fall very rapidly after its peak. The alt right likely peaked with introducing the term cuckservative in terms of mainstream influence. Their initial viral hits concealed problems that may have been there all along, and which I myself missed. The fact that diehard anti-SJW’s and anti-feminists who don’t have the approved Nordic lily whiteness are viciously attacked by the alt right mob with SJW help shows that they’re long gone in terms of strategic effectiveness.

Another sign that the movement will stay limited is that it’s not getting more than indirect recognition from Donald Trump or his allies beyond a tweet or two even though they are his most rabid supporters. Donald Trump is already considered “extreme” with his brand of nationalism, so you would think that he would wholeheartedly reach out to the alt right and invite its leaders to speak at his rallies, or at least thank them for their promotion of his candidacy, but he’s doing nothing of the sort because the obsession with Jews, cuckholds, Nazi imagery, and rigid sexual controls for all men make them indigestible to over 99% of the population, even among traditional white Christians. For that reason, we may have to change their name to Alt Blight.

I hate to point fingers, but some alt right leaders have caused the subversion of their own movement by not staying on top of its direction and by succumbing or remaining silent to demands of the mob even though it conflicted with their own personal beliefs. They believed that their little meme-making Frankensteins would lead them to glory, but instead it will lead them to defeat. I can assure you that my movement, neomasculinity, will never sacrifice its ideals for a moment in the spotlight like the alt right leaders have done. In fact, I’m making moves right now which remove us from the spotlight so we don’t unnecessarily expose ourselves to attacks by mobs.

The future

There are severe problems with Western society, as has been well documented here and on the forum. There’s a sense of hopelessness that we must immediately find a solution or all else will be lost, so we mistakenly sympathize with a movement whose medicine is worse than the disease. This has happened with the alt right. It was a fresh and funny movement that came out blazing to land hard punches on the establishment, but now that their initial victories have settled, it’s clear that they are becoming more concerned with attacking the choices of men and limiting their behavior than they are with improving society and the country itself.

The alt right has a detailed 100-point plan for controlling your sex life and your friendships, solely based on your skin pigment, but much less on a nation's political system, economic structure, relationship with religion, or even the most basic of social and reproductive policies.

A solution is definitely needed, but it's not the alt right. When I see their attacks against others, I feel like I'm re-living days from just a few years ago when incel mobs from PUA Hate were coming after myself and the red pill to screech about how game doesn't work and you need to be a millionaire to get laid. Sexual frustration, resentment, low self-esteem, and jealousy are terrible problems to have, causing people to develop ideas more based on control than positive improvement. This is why learning game should always be a large component in any masculine philosophy, especially in the dystopian modern era.

I still believe that a form of nationalism is needed to defeat the liberal establishment that is run by sociopathic globalists, but it must be one that doesn't mimic feminism in controlling male behavior. Looking at Donald Trump's campaign, I see that his brand of nationalism seems to have the effect of uniting conservatives regardless of their race, so I'm starting to come to the conclusion that this man has provided the answers in the way that the alt right has not.

Read Next: 5 Serious Problems With The Alt Right Movement

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Apple’s Refusal To Cooperate With A Valid Court Order Is Wrong

February 22, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Readers may have heard of the recent battle between the FBI and Apple, Inc. over the issue of whether Apple may be compelled to allow law enforcement access to the iPhone of the mass murderers Sayed Rizwan Farook and his Tafsheen Malik. Last December, Farook and Malik gunned down at least 14 people in San Bernadino, California.

An Apple iPhone was recovered at the scene; it was owned by the San Bernadino health department, the employer of the Islamist radical murderer Farook. The FBI, in the course of its investigation, seeks to read the contents of what is in the iPhone device.

Its attorneys have filed a request for a court order that would compel Apple to de-encrypt the phone, and allow its contents to be read. Apple has reacted strenuously, maintaining that the government has no legal basis for what it is trying to do. The stage has thus been set for a protracted legal battle.

Edward Snowden has called the case “the most important tech case in a decade.” Many journalists have characterized the case as yet another abusive attempt at government surveillance overreaching.

Nevertheless, a close look at the relevant facts and law casts the matter in a very different light. I believe that the government is well within its rights to order Apple to open up this iPhone for examination. I realize that this is not a popular stand to take, and will explain my reasoning here.

We must first begin by recalling the terrible slaughter that took place in December by the two Islamist criminals, Farook and Malik. At the crime scene, Farook's iPhone was recovered. Apple devices are well known to be very secure, with encryption and security features that arguably exceed those of its competitors.

Without help from Apple, law enforcement cannot read what might be inside the iPhone. The government has ordered Apple to write software that permit the phone to be opened up. The reasons and justifications of the government are reasonable, narrowly tailored, and done as part of a legitimate criminal investigation. The request for the courts order convincingly argues the following:

1. Apple is only being asked to aid in the execution of an existing, lawful search warrant in this criminal investigation.

2. It would be very little or no burden to Apple to write some code to permit access to the iOS (the phone's operating system).

3. The request is narrowly tailored. The government is not seeking to monitor every iPhone, but only the one owned by Farook.

4. The All Writs Act of 1789, which is valid law and has been upheld by numerous judicial decisions, requires individuals and private companies to cooperate with the government in the execution of valid warrants and writs (see pages 9 through 12 of the request for the court order).

The aftermath of the shooting

Apple has posted a grandstanding letter on its website vowing to "resist" the court order compelling it to cooperate with the investigation. The company has sanctimoniously tried to characterize their refusal to cooperate with the investigation as a brave effort to stand up for "privacy rights."

Their claims, however, ring hollow. As the legal authorities cited by the government make very clear, the government has every right to demand that Apple allow the FBI to look inside the murderer's phone. Suppose, for example, that Farook were discovered to have previously unknown safe deposit box at a bank somewhere. And suppose that the key to the deposit box had been lost, rendering the box inaccessible.

The government would be perfectly justified in ordering the bank either to make a duplicate key, or to drill the lock out and force entry into the box. Similarly, it is standard procedure in any criminal investigation to comb through a defendant's personal effects, possessions, and records, in an effort to gain information. There is absolutely nothing improper in this; in fact there would be something seriously wrong if it were not being done.

Against the government's arguments, all Apple has to offer are hypothetical fears that any de-encryption code it writes for the FBI might "fall into the wrong hands" and be used in ways that were not originally intended. It claims that the government is seeking an unlawful "expansion" of its authority.

These assertions are false. Apple is a corporation that does business in the United States and is bound to obey the laws and court orders that are issued here. Vague fears of possible future "abuse" do not justify refusal to obey court orders. If Apple is worried about a de-encryption code "falling into the wrong hands" or "being abused," then it has remedies it could pursue.

It could certainly request that the court insert language in its final order making the code a classified security item. It could establish monitoring protocols. It could do any number of things (and seek compensation from the government) to assuage its alleged fears of security breach. I am confident that Apple has the brain-power to come up with creative solutions.

But what it cannot do is refuse to cooperate.

Apple's position has nothing to do with noble legal principle or some altruistic advocacy of "privacy rights." It has everything to do, however, with business. Its concern for its market share, its branding, and its image are what it is worried about, not the rights of the public. Frankly, in the opinion of this writer, no company has done more to degrade personal privacy rights than has Apple.

Apple has marketed itself as somehow "special" or "different" from other smart phone manufacturers. It has either stated or implied that its security features were better than those of its competitors. This recent court order now (in Apple's eyes) seems to show that Apple is a company like any other.

What it really fears is even the hint, or the appearance, that its mythical “security” might somehow be tarnished by its cooperation with the court order. This position is ridiculous, of course, but one that comports with Apple’s arrogant cultivation of its “special” image, whether this image is in fact based on reality.

“Privacy rights” are not unlimited. No company, however powerful, is exempt from obeying the law, especially when it has invoked that same country’s laws to generate colossal profits over many years. A modern cell phone is an intimate tool, and the FBI has every right to want to look inside Farook’s phone.

It is sadly true that, in recent years, there has been overreaching on the part of the government with regard to the virtually unregulated data collection actions it has taken since the advent of the Patriot Act. Such overreaching has done much to alienate the public, and to destroy the sense of confidence that many citizens may have in the sanctity and efficacy of the law. For this crisis of confidence, the American leadership must accept its share of the blame. However, this is a separate issue, and one that is unrelated to the subject of this article.

When horrific crimes have been committed, law enforcement has a right to conduct a reasonable investigation. And when court orders have been issued compelling individuals and businesses to cooperate, they have no right to refuse.

This may be an unpopular line to take. But the law has nothing to do with popularity.

Read More: Should Men Ignore Negativity?

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Elites Are Getting Rich From Moving Third-World Immigrants Into American Suburbs

February 22, 2016 | by Steve Matters | Link | Original Link

This article is in response to Roosh's most recent video. Though he filmed in Maryland, the scene looked identical to less than a mile from my home in a NYC suburb. I suspect many of you recognize the images as well.

In my lifetime, there has been an insidious encroachment of third world immigrants upon the quiet neighborhoods which used to comprise the suburbs of the northeast. As the baby-boomers began to retire and migrate to warmer climates, they have sold younger generations down the river by squandering the tranquil, safe, and comfortable neighborhoods in selling their homes with no discretion.

Insidious Encroachment

The fact that this disintegration has been happening in more than one city, and indeed more than one country, indicates that this phenomenon is clearly more than mere coincidence. I would postulate that for the past 30-40 years, there has been a targeted infiltration of suburban, hard working, middle class, usually white (though not necessarily) areas. If you add up all of the benefits, you must come to the conclusion that what our communities have been experiencing is not an isolated incident. At first, this seems counter-intuitive; how can turning the safest parts of the US into third-world shitholes be profitable? But after a careful analysis, the answer is obvious.

The Method: Divide And Conquer

After they strap us down to the pinball machine, the first brute that gets a turn is government, particularly leftists. Politicians used to engage in something called ''gerry-mandering'' which is manipulating the borders of the voting districts to help guarantee election results. This is inefficient as it isn't a good sell to the public, and when the other party gets into power, they can just move the borders back.

So the leftists got smart. In the late 1960's when the Democrat party started to sell the unions down the river in order to cater to minorities, they lost much of their base to the GOP. So they just started to place migrants into white, middle class voting districts. As immigrants demonstrably vote left due to the amount of welfare they consume, voila, you have a multi-generational Democrat-loyal base.

Profit To Be Made

A Majority Of Immigrant Households Use Welfare Programs

The profit doesn't stop there. The leftist government is now satiated, as it knows that it has secured its position and leverage for continued expansion. By this point, all of the more prescient property owners have bailed out of the community and real estate values are crushingly low. Rather than cohere, the baby-boomer homeowners have signed the death warrant of their culture by selling out and waddling down to Florida for a comfortable retirement.

Instead of their children taking over the house to raise families of their own, Courtney and Brett are too busy paying seven times the price they should to live in a tiny apartment in the nearby cosmopolis. So, large immigrant families move into the home that had been in the family for generations (anyone who has been to Brooklyn knows this happened to the Brownstones). With real estate prices at rock bottom, wealthy Jewish and Middle Eastern development cartels buy up much of the property and become landlords.

Now, instead of the equity being with the inhabitants of the home, they are paying rent every month without building any value. Since immigrants and low income minorities qualify for welfare, the neighborhood becomes a Section 8 slum. Section 8, bankrolled by the federal government, ensures a steady check for the landlord, which justifies the disproportionate amount of damage the tenants cause to the property.

The same paradigm happens with the commercial real estate. Mom-and-Pop businesses, which trade craftsmanship for slightly higher prices, are no longer desired and are forced out of town. In their place, comes low price box-stores like Wal-Mart and Kohl's.

Noticeable Change

With the inflow of ''diversity'' comes a inversely proportional level of security. Soon, families don't go out for a stroll on a summer night, and wherever you go in town, you get aggressive looks from the people there. Next comes a spike in crime with tales of brutality such as elderly women being slashed for the amusement of the teenage minorities or pedestrians being victims of ''the knockout game'' or actual rape culture. What is worse is that the schools become hellholes with strained resources for ESL and otherwise maladjusted students.

Seeing what is happening, the rest of the working class look to flee. Real estate developers have been taking careful notice to see where these people are going to seek refuge and have begun gentrifying these areas. The suburbs of a metropolis that are within commuting distance have been ''developed'' and are now very pricey. But families have to put up with the high taxes and overpriced food, lest they go back to living in what is now a ghetto.

It is worth noting that hysterical liberals are stuffing people who they claim to be refugees into this Marxist meatgrinder. The accepted circumstance around refugees is that they are from a war-torn country, so they are to be placed into a camp for the duration of the conflict, and when peace is restored they are sent back home. None of this nonsense where non-immigrant aliens are given Section 8, food stamps, cash welfare, school lunch and, most destructively, free reign of the United States.

Looking Forward: What Is To Come?

It has become abundantly clear to me that native citizens are no longer the smartest people on the block. Members of those ethnicities have fallen for every trap set for them from burdensome student loans for worthless education to "hookup culture." Our culture has been eviscerated before us and we have been displaced from our own land. In a way, we are the real Refugees.

The Agenda In It's 2nd Generation is Already Working

As you can see from the chart above, just two decades of Hispanic immigration has had this effect. The coming election will most likely be inconsequential to the grand scheme of things. Don't get me wrong, Trump having the executive authority to curtail immigration is pivotal. We must fight to get him, or anyone else the GOP nominates, elected because if Clinton or Sanders wins, the demographics of the country will be such that the conservatives will statistically never win another election.

However, as you can see from the above chart, most of the damage is already done. Even if we are able to secure political change, two and soon three generations of our women have been tainted with careerism, unrestrained hypergamy, and delaying childbearing until well past their fertile years. Our birth rates will sink well below half of the replacement rate, while immigrants produce up to 6.0 children per family on average.

Oh, so this is what feminists mean by ”Normalization of Rape.”

As they dominate the market, businesses will cater to the dominant culture and the government controlled banks (or bank controlled governments) will flood them with credit to spend money they don’t have on things they don’t need; just like how they tricked us and our parents.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The Truth About Multiculturalism And Third-World Immigration

Steve Matters

Steve Matters is a young man with an old soul trying to figure out what the hell his mother got him into when she gave birth to him.

7 Ways The Realities Of Modern Culture Are Destroying Men

February 23, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Any man who has taken the red pill is acutely aware of the reality of what modern dating and society holds for him. But he, along with many others who remain ignorant, are not necessarily aware of the way they've been changing as a response to the unnatural conditions they find themselves in. While many have changed for the better after having been enlightened, there are many others who continue to struggle by being stuck in a single phase—perhaps for the rest of their lives.

What I want to demonstrate here are the seven different unhealthy phases that a man may find himself in and offer a proper alternative for him to follow. As a personal note, I have gone through all of these phases throughout the different stages of my life with the exception of number seven.

1. Bitter Cynicism

When a man realizes how senseless the world really is and wakes up to the fact that all the promises regarding women and society have been false, he will be forced to take the pill of bitter cynicism. He did what he was told, he fulfilled his role, but he was only rewarded with betrayal. This is a man who had been screwed many times over or had a single traumatic experience that flipped his life upside down. The word “love” is now but a sad joke for him; he opened up in vulnerability only to be taken advantaged of. Toyed and humiliated, he vows to shelter the human side of himself with both the shield of indifference and the sword of contempt. Trust no longer comes easily (if at all), and he is determined to never let himself be hurt again.

2. Rage

For some men, cynicism and bitterness is not enough. This is a man that refuses to be on the receiving end of the hostile society that he finds himself in; he wants to hit back. Whether it be silent and hidden or out in the open for all to see, he wages his war against the world that has forsaken him. In his mind, there is nothing for him to gain by conforming to a sick and decadent society that treats men as second-rate citizens. He rages on both as a reaction and as a way of validating his own existence in a world that continually seeks to destroy him. But what does he seek to accomplish through his offense? When and how will his war end?

3. Pseudo-psychopathy

A man who’s already been through the stage of cynicism and rage might decide to morph himself into a pseudo-psychopath who will take what he can by whatever means necessary. Fed up with the bullshit rules he’s been told to follow, he creates his own. He probably would have been a decent man in a normal society, but he now has no qualms about doing whatever it takes in his quest for money, sex, and power.

Society and women used and abused him when he was young and naive, now it’s his turn to return the favour. He will adopt the dark triad traits and mimic the true psychopaths because he knows that it’s what turns women on and brings success. He will create a fake persona to mask his true motives and deliberately repress any and all feelings of guilt, pity, and remorse. He knows from experience that if he allows his tender feelings to surface, he will lose the game and suffer the consequences—he knows that his opponents will have no mercy for his weakness. Although he may become successful beyond his imagination, his victory is a hollow one for his humanity remains trapped within his own facade.

4. Depression

Some men are just too weak and undetermined to fight for themselves. They either don't know of other options or are just completely lost in a confusing world that seeks to exploit them for the entirety of their lives. But having been raised in a feminized society that offers no masculine guidance—perhaps with an ineffectual father or no father at all—you can't blame them too much. He was told be nice and he did—with no gains. He was told lies that women wanted nice guys to be their prince charming, but saw that they treated him like a toad instead. He suffers in silent loneliness.

He might then tell himself lies that he would eventually find a nice woman whom he could call his wife, only to marry an aging slut who viewed him as a soft target to exploit. Having lost his hard-earned wealth, perhaps his children, and whatever is left of his dignity, he feels as though there is no place for him in this world. As a result, suicide rate for men continues to be many times the rate of women's. No amount of "talking about feelings" or pills will change that as long as the fundamental issues are not addressed.

5. Withdrawal

When the world becomes too uncomfortable to bear, and the reality too harsh and painful, some men will choose to retreat and withdraw themselves from society. More and more men today are choosing the false reality of television, video games, porn, spectator sports, etc. as an escape from their pitiful lives while being devoid of any real-world desire for accomplishments and self-actualization.

This trend is nowhere more prevalent than in Japan where around two thirds of young men identify themselves as Herbivore men who have forsaken women and marriage while there exists almost a million Hikikomoris—grown-up men without jobs who live locked up in their rooms, spending their entire life on mangas, video games, and the internet—shunning the society as a whole.

While Japan is an extreme case, more and more men in other Asian countries and the West are witnessing a rise of similar trends where men are simply giving up and living isolated lives. While living in Canada, I myself have witnessed many teenage boys and young men with no confidence, no energy, and no self-assurance to survive in the real world on their own.

6. Supplication

"If you can't beat them, join them" is the motto of the men who decide to the kowtow to the feminist imperative in hopes of being rewarded with a pat on the head. These are your white-knights, male feminists, and all other loser simps who relish in being treated as pawns while accepting (and even promoting) being openly cucked. If you think about it, these are grown men who haven't yet matured from the time when they were little boys seeking their mother's approval for being 'good'. With feminist social conditioning from home, school, and the media, they haplessly believe that their toady behaviour will eventually be rewarded just like in the Disney movies while their goddesses are indulging in alcohol-fueled orgy.

Whatever women do, they're forever in denial and relentless in their defense. These men are so desperate for females to validate their existence that they will demonstrate their loyalty by embrace being "friends" with women while acting as the stooges for the social disease that is feminism. These men don't seem to be aware of the fact that their desperate groveling isn't improving their lives in any way.

7. Emasculation

As I've noted in a previous article of mine, Western societies as a whole have begun the systematic emasculation of men. For the weaker men who lack masculine guidance, it is far easier to throw away the burden of masculinity completely by erasing whatever little is left of it from their lives. Normal masculinity is considered toxic and dangerous, and is constantly under attack, so why would these feeble "men" continue to carry on that kind of a burden?

For the more dysfunctional and unstable ones, it's not enough to reject masculinity from their thoughts and behaviours: they feel that it is necessary to change their sex by taking hormones and cutting off their genitals. And when we live in a mad society that encourages this kind of mental sickness as being normal, you can expect to see more of these freaks to emerge in the coming future.

The Neomasculine Alternative

The alternative to the above phases is to live your life with a revived form of masculine virtue: the neomasculinity. With neomasculinity, although you acknowledge the harsh reality that men face today you don't resort to playing the victim nor do you allow yourself to be consumed by anger. Instead, you practice a healthy dose of realism and see the problems that men face today as challenges to overcome. There is no room for hopelessness and self-pitying circle jerk in neomasculinity, you are to make the best of the lot you've been given—weakness and surrender is not an option.

We are at a war for our very identity and existence, but at the same time, we should remember to guard our humanity lest we end up becoming just like the hateful monsters we fight. Men throughout history have always unveiled their best side through their brave struggles, and the struggle we face today is our chance to shine and prove our worth.

Read More: The Ugly Reality Of Dating Japanese Women

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Jeb Bush Shows That A Royal Name And A Lot Of Money Won't Win You Elections

February 23, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The self-immolation of privileged political child Jeb Bush is now complete. Having suspended his campaign for President after another beyond mediocre finish in South Carolina, figures reveal he spent a gargantuan $368 per vote in the two primaries and one caucus so far. This is an amazing six times more than frontrunner Donald Trump. In addition, Bush had been anointed by the GOP apparatchiks, who have in modern times always gotten either their preferred candidate nominated or someone close to it. In the end, Donald Trump's brutal honesty and lack of cuckservative supplicating has helped sink Jeb to the abyss.

But it gets worse. Even after himself spending $10 million more than Trump for a sixth of the ROR, his super PAC, Right to Rise, chipped in with a cool $100 million in expenditures. Per ballot he received, Jeb and his supporters were actually forking out $1,500. His humiliating withdrawal from the Republican nomination race (he should have said "I am clutching my rectum in pain", not "I am suspending my campaign") is a lesson for every would-be princeling that attitude and fearlessness will usually trump (pardon the pun) chandelier fundraisers and old moneyed political circles.

You can move beyond Donald Trump's thumping of Jeb and find a literal menagerie of other candidates who have either beat him pound-for-pound or outright pummelled him in certain contests so far. For example, John Kasich, a comparative unknown in the field, bested Bush in New Hampshire, garnering nearly 50% more votes. Given his much lower profile, Kasich could have outspent Bush (which he did not) five times over in the Granite State for this performance and claimed a moral victory over him.

He was the most “qualified” candidate and still got his ass handed to him

Jeb destroyed his close to perfect opportunity to ascend. Despite the long-standing feud between the Republican base and the GOP establishment, primary and general election voters have nevertheless been wary of nominating and then electing to the White House Republicans without significant executive experience. Since 1950, only Kennedy and Obama, both Democrats, have become President minus either gubernatorial or Vice-Presidential experience. I leave out Eisenhower as his leadership of the US military is analogous enough to the pre-White House resumés of figures like Nixon, Reagan and the two Bushes.

Although Mike Huckabee, Jim Gilmore and George Pataki had been sworn in as the Governors of Arkansas, Virginia and New York respectively before Jeb was in Florida, they lack the family name and, very relatedly, the massive connections with GOP elites. The same can be said of current Governors Bobby Jindal (Louisiana), John Kasich (Ohio), Scott Walker (Wisconsin) and Chris Christie (New Jersey), plus recently retired Rick Perry (Texas), all of whom are bereft of the sort of immediate nationwide recognition and funding base afforded to the second son of George H. W. and Barbara Bush.

Donald Trump and Senator Ted Cruz are lightning rods for the disgruntled real conservatives of the Republican Party, this much is true. Irrespective of this, Jeb should have been the beneficiary of a system that can directly or indirectly gerrymander the outcome for establishment candidates, such as the superdelegate safety net for Hillary Clinton. This failure to tick the boxes after all the advantages bestowed upon him speaks volumes about the inadequacies of Jeb the Presidential candidate.

Trump focuses on the Republican base, Jeb focused on voters only 30% likely to vote for him

Jeb thought it was already November. I myself often question whether a candidate should always stick to their ideological guns in the general election, but Jeb courted the ambivalent centrist vote far too soon. Unlike a man like Trump, John Ellis Bush did not have the fortitude to outline his genuine, supposedly conservative platform first, secure the nomination, and then make strategic adjustments to win that vital second Tuesday late in the year.

Linked to this first point was Jeb's total unwillingness to offend. When his campaign was in its death throes, he finally resorted to calling Donald Trump, of all things, a "loser." Throughout his time as a candidate, however, the liberal media, which has every interest in seeing Donald Trump nominated as they see him as unelectable, failed to call Jeb out on anything they deemed hateful. There, my friends, was a sign of how far to the left his campaign had hurled itself.

Confidence, too, enters the mix, for more reasons than just a reluctance to offend. A family legacy and an esteemed status with GOP lawmakers and pundits in Washington does you no good if you cannot go toe-to-toe with bulls on a debate stage. Contrasting his brother's plain-spoken, unrefined and self-assured style, somewhat reminiscent of Trump himself (save for Donald's bellicosity), Jeb gave off the stench of a sweating acting school principal being bellowed at by the parents of a recently suspended student. So what benefit did his surname and fundraising connections give to him?

Study and replicate Donald Trump if you don’t wish to be a Jeb Bush

Inasmuch as Jeb’s downfall was enhanced by the presence of Donald Trump, my focus here has been on the pitiful shortcomings of the former Florida governor. Now that we have addressed those, ROK readers should take every chance to read up on and apply the methods of Donald Trump, the billionaire who does not need to use his billions.

The supreme tragedy of Jeb Bush is that he is not a bad guy. He is the polar opposite of a Hillary or Bill Clinton, whose unscrupulous machinations make them deservedly hated. Jeb is instead that old version of yourself in high school or early college, whose fumbling failures with girls and attempts at success and popularity gave you painful lessons to make a better future out of.

Jeb’s problem is that he seemingly never learned from those lessons and instead of being a half-pimply, gangly adolescent or young adult, he’s now past 60.

Read More: How Jeb Bush Destroyed The Bush Dynasty And Tanked His Own Campaign

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Become An Independent Man

February 23, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Let's contemplate the idea of man's dependence on society and how that dependence forces him to do, think, and say things that make him a different sort of man than he would prefer to be. Let's also remember that we are placed on this planet with only one static resource of which we will get no more, and that is time. You are born, you have a finite amount of minutes here, and you will then die.

"Time is the school in which we learn / Time is the fire in which we burn." -Delmore Schwartz

What to do?

Independence In Today's Society

Neomasculinity covers what we should do with ourselves and our time. We have limited time, and in order to maximize it, we need to be as efficient as possible in utilizing it to our benefit. We need to stop wasting time on things that do not benefit us.

Does grinding away at that job benefit you? How about that expensive car you "bought" upon which you make large monthly payments? Or perhaps that organization that you joined years ago and now run in entirety? The house that is a status symbol but takes a lot of upkeep? Spoiled wife and kids? Intruding church family? All these things chip away at your time and energy.

Financial Independence

The USA and Western nations work on capitalism. You work a job, you get paid, the government takes a varying amount in taxes, and you keep what is left. The blue pill vision is that you will work as hard as possible for your company and you will be rewarded with promotions and higher paychecks which you can then spend on stuff, as if maximizing money maximizes happiness.

It’s not the size of the stack…..it’s how you use it.

Focusing on your paycheck is the wrong thing to do. You do need a paycheck unless you have money already, but the more important thing to do is focus on what you do with it. You need to “live beneath your means” so you can develop a surplus. Dave Ramsey and Tom Stanley make good points on this.

“Paycheck to paycheck” is when all the money you make each pay period is spent immediately. You will never be able to escape the cycle if you live that way, and this is what people who are old and behind on investing bemoan; they soon will not be able to physically do labor to provide for themselves what their retirements should have been doing long ago, and they lost decades of time to enjoy the fruits of their labors.

Not everyone gets this upon retirement.

Upon what are you spending your money? You should never go into debt unless it’s for something that will appreciate in value, and there are only two routine things that do—education and buying a home, and neither is a sure bet anymore. Expensive car payments are a waste of money, as are the latest fashions, the newest TV, and anything that you have to “finance.”

Also expensive are the monthly memberships and fees. Do you use all that premium cable? Do you go to too expensive of a gym? Do you leave lights on and the heat too hot, or the AC too cold? Your monthly bottom line is affected by all of these.

It’s okay to spend money on hobbies that matter to you. Have a couple things you’re proud of and like to enjoy the good stuff on, but you don’t have to have the best of everything.

Balancing your budget will leave you some free cash, just like a workout and diet regimen allows some days off for pizza.

Once you start getting a monthly surplus, invest that stuff in something. Land, stocks, bonds, whatever is good at the time. It’s ok to hire a financial advisor. Those investments will generate a return, which you can then invest into something else, and maybe treat yourself to something nice once in a while that you didn’t have to borrow money for. Never underestimate the power of compound interest.

Commitment Independence

What do we do when we’re not working or asleep or doing something of a solitary, self-improvement nature? We socialize by joining various groups that have an objective we enjoy. If you like running, you can join a running group. If you like being part of theatrical productions, there’s usually a community theater nearby.

There’s a danger. Volunteer organizations need donations of time, and they need a lot of it from their leaders. The higher-ups recruit from the new folks with promises of appreciation and esteem and suck you right in to donating time. Now, you’re not running with the group, you’re organizing the 5k run; you’re not just an actor in the play, you’re now the set designer and have to recruit people to build it.

Remember your purpose when you join an organization; are you there for them, or are you there for you? I join groups to make friends, meet girls, and have fun doing whatever it is the group does. I don't join them to be one of their leaders and spend my free time running their organization, nor do I seek to make it mine. The best position is to be a little gear in a big machine.

The same goes for friendships, acquaintances, and, to a lesser extent, family. Are you always doing something for a certain friend? Does he always ask favors and never has anything of value to contribute on his own back to you? Friendships should be beneficial to both parties. With siblings, you have to walk the line between being there, and helping them learn to handle things on their own. With parents, you need to be there for them as they were for you.

Belong to a couple groups that you go to occasionally, have some friends that are just as successful as you, and have a dog. That's all the commitment you'll need.

Habit Independence

Most of your time should be spent on improving yourself. Ask yourself "What does this, right now, do for me?" The answer should be that this article is provoking some good thinking about your being a better man, but that's only for the next couple minutes until after you finish the article and peruse the comments section.

What then? Work is good, it makes you money. A man needs to eat, sleep, stay clean, travel about his daily efforts, and maintain physical fitness. Your hobbies should benefit you. Mine revolve around firearms, cars, boats, and homesteading, but I used to be a hardcore videogamer. The difference is that my current hobbies are me doing something useful.

Hovering on social media is a timesink. Sure, have a Facebook account, but check it, check your mail, read ROK, check the news, then GET OFF and go do something. Television is as bad. I'm not being a Puritan; it's okay to have a show you like, but people who binge watch Netflix instead of doing something are wasting their lives. TV is a filler, not the main event. Reading is better, as it at least engages the mind when you do it, but the time spent varies in value based on what you're reading.

Independence From Women

This article also was derived from a comment I wrote a few days ago, which I'll repeat here:

> 1. Improve yourself every day, in every way you can. This will help you live a healthy, happy, long life full of benefits including beautiful women.
>
> 2. Realize that all women are broken. Enjoy their company for what it is, but do not marry or support a bad one. Equality means equality, which means you can get the milk without buying, or even renting, the cow simply because that cow must be milked by someone, and you're a good choice due to #1.
>
> 3. If you find the unicorn, marry her or LTR her while maintaining frame and be happy and have kids. If you don't find her, continue with #2 until you no longer feel the need, and continue with #1 and be happy until the day you die.

"Save me, Roosh!"

Ultimately, you are the source of your own happiness, not women. A woman should be a part of a good life, not the point of it. I'm at a point in my life where the scales are tipping, and there are more available women that I do not want, then ones that I do. It'd be a shame to not have kids to raise right, and a man does get lonely at times, but it would be more of a shame to wife up a broken bitch and wreck what I have going now.

True independence from women is not swearing them off, but rather, realizing that you're good either way, with or without them, so she needs to meet your standards, not the other way around as presented by the narrative.

Conclusion

An independent man may not always be a happy man, but he has a better chance of being so than his brother who has many more burdens than he does. Men work, it's what we do, but a man should pick who benefits from that work very carefully, and that list should always start, and often end, with himself.

Read More: 20 Things You Can Do Instead Of Playing Video Games

Luke Stranahan

Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

How To Kill The Left’s Killswitch Lexicon

February 23, 2016 | by Mark Citadel | Link | Original Link

This is taken from the official policy guide for Staffordshire University’s Student Union:

> Fascism, racism, LGBTphobia, sexism and ableism are all strands of thought and oppression within society which seeks to sow divides between ordinary people. As a Students’ Union it is our job to represent all students and to attempt to unite students against these attacks. As a part of this it is key that we do not allow those who wish to spread hatred and division onto our campus and it is the job of the Students Union executive to educate members on the need to oppose discrimination and the need for No Platform.

We’re all hopefully very much aware of this trend on college campuses in the West called “No-Platforming,” which bans anyone from taking any positions contrary to leftist dogma on campus, silencing those that hold such positions in the interest of tolerance. Consequences have ranged from student mob action to outright expulsion.

I don’t want to talk specifically about the trend. That’s not what this essay concerns. The trend is only a written manifestation of a deeper endemic problem which has been overlooked and misunderstood by the right: that of how the enemy controls language to their own ends, usually to silence men who stand up for themselves in any given situation.

The Heresy Charge Of Our Age

There exists a “dictionary” containing certain words that have more power than others, almost always descriptors that can be applied to those who dissent from modern orthodoxy. These function as accusations of heresy, and once accused, the person has the plug pulled on whatever argument they might be making.

In the past, religions across the world have used the charge of heresy to weed out troublesome elements, distinguishing those who practiced correctly from those who were practicing in error. In many cases, this was positive. When degenerate or puritanical fringe sects of a faith emerged, engaging in underground occult activities and offensive rituals as well as subversion, they could be dealt with accordingly before they spread and destabilized the society. Times have changed, but they really haven’t. The ruling powers in the United States, Germany, Australia, France, etc. are very much religious in nature, as has been discussed on many occasions elsewhere. The issue is that this new “cult” is not a religion which targets aberrations, freaks, and misfits, but instead seeks to stifle and crush the organic orientation of man.

The descriptor of “heretic” is now much more malleable. We have a menagerie of terms like “misogynist” and “racist,” which have lost their etymological meaning if they ever had one, and these are of course joined by cute but inaccurate portmanteaus such as homophobia, and islamophobia.

Once an individual is branded with these one-word descriptors, the effect is a little like the mark on the door of a plague victim. “Don’t go near!” the stern wardens tell us, for if you do then no doubt their hatred will contaminate you, or worse yet trigger you. You see, heresy in the spiritual realm is seen a lot like disease in the medical realm; it is contagious and potentially fatal. And what spiritual sickness plagues us? Normalcy.

The Egyptian monk St. Anthony the Great once said “A time is coming when men will go mad, and when they see someone who is not mad, they will attack him, saying “You are mad; you are not like us!” It would appear that such a day has come. In a world where the inmates run the asylum, the orderlies are a stone’s throw away from being eaten alive or dissected in the basement. Do you recognize that women are naturally happier raising children than working tedious nine-to-five jobs? If so, there is something gravely wrong with you and the cure is sensitivity training therapy. Do you suffer from delusions of being trapped in the body of the wrong sex or species? If so, then put on the ritz for your Nobel Peace Prize gala!

Leave Them No Safe Space

What is to be done about this predicament? If we are tarred with this brush of sickness, caped in the words that single us out in a crowd for either isolation or vilification (certainly not rebuttal), then it would seem that the power of this lexicon needs to be subverted and defused. Such a thing can only be done through brute force. Put another way, we have to make the denotations of these words so ubiquitous that they lose their power. It is precisely their rarity that inspires fear in those that hear them, for most fear the unknown. In the modern docile world, realities about sex differences are rather exotic, since we are saturated by feminist propaganda among other types.

Men need to coarsen their language, not to each other, but to the hostile forces without. The internet is the medium that is ripe for this effort, but it extends beyond cyberspace. Whenever you comment on anything and this struggle springs to mind, even if it is unrelated to a political topic, break a boundary and say something that is politically incorrect. This is precisely how the left pierced the previously austere maze of social etiquette in the 1960s in particular, they injected their agendas into everything so that they were inescapable, and over time even the most despicable things were normalized. A bullet has to be fired into every hugbox, and every safe space has to be violated gratuitously.

If you can take a risk, twist the knife to an absurd degree. If it pays to be more probing and covert, so be it. Judge your audience and their reactions when face to face, and gradually push the envelope. Until they appear to be on the edge of a nervous breakdown, there is still room to push. If they provide no platform in one location, fine, just find out where else it is that they frequent and bombard them there.

With an arsenal of hatefacts, you can reduce any outlet into a mass of blubbering, offended infants, and as our own dissident quarter grows it will be harder and harder for the left to go about their daily perusing without encountering the “plague,” the “heresy,” those mean old words. The more commonplace the language becomes, the less impact their special little dictionary of inverted heresies will have and all designations of us will fall flat.

The left uses this tactic in their multicultural projects

Remember, what is the strategy of the enemy concerning migrants? Throw in a few families and the people will resist (we saw this in Romania recently when the entire township of Ardud rose up against any hint of a plan to bring a tiny number of refugees there). However, flood the nation with hundreds of thousands in a kind of shotgun approach, and the people will give up. Pretty soon, their children will go to the same schools, they will see each other at the grocery store, they will ride the same bus, and as much as one can be familiarized, for better or worse they will be.

The people will begrudgingly accept their own execution because their environment will subconsciously inform them that they have already lost. Through this method, the resistance of the enemy is worn down and then finally shattered. Why do you think both Republicans and Democrats in the United States never stop saying “We can’t deport eleven million people”?

Relentless and ruthless usage of the offensive tools at our disposal is the way forward. This is what must be done with our beloved political incorrectness, with the language of frankness and excellence that has been silenced by an instant isolator valve, put in place by the established powers so they never have to reckon with our arguments at all.

Through unyielding exposure, we will crack the killswitch lexicon. Once that is done, and we can no longer be shut down with single-word slurs, then all that is left for us to do is bludgeon them with the truth until they are the ones yelling “I recant! I recant!”

Read More: How Political Correctness Killed 1,200 People

Mark Citadel
Casual observer of all things in motion.

12 Ways To Increase Your Anonymity And Security Online

February 24, 2016 | by August Moliere | Link | Original Link

The events of recent weeks have proven that it's not a safe world for masculine men out there. Now more than ever men should be looking into increasing their personal security. As an IT guy I have been thinking for a solution to the problems men face. Below are measures I can recommend one take to increase his security.

Disclaimer: this guide caters to Windows users, but others can still find value.

1. Install a VPN

VPN stands for Virtual Private Network. To understand what a VPN does, first you must understand what an IP is. IP is something like a computer passport number. Each electronic device has it's own IP address. Websites register your IP when you use them—this makes it easy to find your location, your device, and therefore your identity. A VPN makes it so when you connect to a website you first go through the VPN server. So when you connect to a website instead of seeing your computer IP it shows the IP the VPN provides you. Roosh recently wrote on VPNs.

Example (manually changing IP):

The problem here relies on the credibility of the VPN provider. Many VPN providers register your activity and can then hand it to a government organization if they so demand. Even VPNs that promised not to do this, broke their promise. There is an agreement between the Anglo-speaking countries that affects VPN users. The government can ask the provider for your data, and there is nothing your provider can do to not give it to them.

These countries are referred to as 5 eyes. Currently, similar agreements are being done with other countries, referred to as the 14 eyes: United Kingdom, United States, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, Norway, Germany, Belgium, Italy, Spain, Sweden

Definitely get a paid VPN. Free VPNs are not an answer, they most likely register some info on you and are slow. After some research on VPN providers I have found some VPN proviers that are outside the 14 eyes, use encryption, accept Bitcoin, support OpenVPN and have a no logging policy and an overall good reputation.

Here are my findings: blackVPN (Hong Kong, 25 servers, 100 dollars a year), Cryptostorm (Iceland, 13 servers, 52 dollars a year), HIDEme (Malaysia, 85 servers, 65 dollars a year), NordVPN (Panama, 52 servers, 48 dollars a year), Perfect Privacy (Panama, 40 servers, 150 dollars a year), Privatoria (Czech Republic, 12 servers, 23 dollars a year).

One VPN provider attracted my attention particularily, that being BolehVPN, since it is one of the only two providers that offers Tor to VPN alongside VPN to Tor (the other one being AirVPN, which is based in Italy, therefore part of 14 eyes), so if you want that particular set-up, check it out.

Make sure to check the VPN provider's canary. It is a document that confirms that the VPN provider was not touched by the government. It should be updated every month, if it isn't unsubscribe. Example.

How to increase VPN security

1) Pay with untraceable money

> Sign up for an anonymous e-mail account using Tor and use a Bitcoin Mixer to send Bitcoins to a newly generated address in your local wallet. Alternatively, use the Bitcoin-OTC to purchase Bitcoins 'over the counter' from a person, rather than an exchange. Then, use a patched Bitcoin client, such as coderrr's anonymity patch to avoid linking the newly generated address to any of your pre-existing Bitcoin addresses. —Andrew, Private Internet Access.

2) Make sure you don't disconnect from VPN and prevent DNS leaks

Use the pro version of VPNCheck to automatically disconnect from internet when losing connection to VPN and to prevent DNS leaks. Or search for the manual way of doing it

3) Use multiple VPNs

Another measure to consider is using two or more VPNs. Basically activate one VPN first, then another one, done.

4) Resolve the PPTP IPv6 VPN flaw

Not likely to affect everyone. PPTP is the weakest VPN protocol and if you use one of the VPNs I mentioned before you will likely use a better protocol, but for those who do, there is a possible flaw that you can correct like this—for Windows Vista and above: Open cmd prompt and type: netsh interface teredo set state disabled.

5) Secure your router

Here's a guide.

2. Install an antivirus

There are three tiers of antiviruses: antivirus sofwtare, internet suite and premium security suites. Read about them here. At minimum use Microsoft Security Essentials (free software from Microsoft), though paid antiviruses (such as Bitdefender, Kaspersky, etc.) are better.

3. Use Tor and TailsOS for safe web browsing

Many popular browsers are not highest ranked in regards to keeping your anonymity. For example, while Chrome is theoretically secure from spyware and adware, their stance on privacy can be summarized as follows:

> He went on, speaking about the future of search. With your permission you give us more information about you, about your friends, and we can improve the quality of our searches. We don't need you to type at all. We know where you are. We know where you've been. We can more or less know what you're thinking about.

There are factors one must be careful of: cookies, encryption (https), tracking ads, javascript exploits, canvas fingerprinting and others. A writeup on these would take a long time so research them on your own if you wish. I will just mention browsers that avoids these issues.

Use safe search engine

Instead of using the google search engine use disconnect.me installed into Tor (or install as extension into Firefox)

Tor Browser

Tor Browser is an internet browser designed for online anonymity. It is a modified version of Firefox with add-ons pre-installed. Tor works somewhat similar to the VPN concept. Before connecting to a website you go through “nodes”. Which are private stations, each with its own IP. So instead of showing your IP, it will show the IP of the last node you traveled through.

The downside of Tor is that it is slow, due to the fact that it works thanks to enthusiastic individuals. Tor is not for casual usage, but specifically for privacy needs, particularly posting online or searching the deep web.

Tor has some weaknesses you must be aware of:

First

Oftentimes when you are using a network, the network provider can’t see what you are browsing, but they can see that you are using Tor. You can use things like a bridge obfuscator, obfsproxy, or setting VPN to Tor. This is a complex issue, here is a guide on hiding tor usage from ISP (internet service provider).

Second

The trustworthiness of exit relays. When the government found out about the popularity of Tor they created their own exit nodes, that acted as honey traps. To fight this, use a TailsOS (or booted off a flash stick, DVD or SD card in a public wifi spot, like a coffee shop). That way even if the final node was a trap, it would only lead to your TailsOS profile, not your general one. Check so the public wifi spot you are using has no cameras around, so they will not be able to check camera footage of who used a laptop in that particular time frame. Don’t forget to log off when finished. Alternatively, use Tor to VPN.

Third

Often many programs, like torrents, will ignore Tor, even if you manually force them and just connect straight away, thus giving you away. The answer is to not use torrents with Tor. I REPEAT, NO FILE SHARING ON TOR.

There are of course other various vulnerabilities out there. And as a reminder, Silk Road, a large black market was cracked in the past.

Combining Tor with a VPN

Tor is good on its own but even better when combined with a VPN. There are 2 methods : Tor to VPN, VPN to Tor. Both have their weaknesses. First one allows ISPs to see you use Tor, the second does not protect from malicious end relays . VPN to Tor masks your Tor usage, Tor to VPN protects from malicious exit nodes.

I have thought of using VPN to Tor to VPN, which should theoretically accomplish both. For VPN to Tor use a secure VPN provider and add non-Tor traffic to mask usage. For Tor to VPN, pay with anonymized bitcoins and never connect to your VPN without connecting to Tor first.

VPN to Tor: The Harvard bomb hoaxer was de-anonymized because he was the only one in college using Tor. If he went through a VPN first, he would have been harder to track (assuming his VPN provider did not keep logs).

Tor to VPN: Protects from malicious exit nodes, on the other hand. TailsOS with public wifi accomplishes the same. Of course, either is better than nothing. Which you choose depends on your needs. The only two providers that offer Tor to VPN are AirVPN (based in Italy, so part of 14 eyes, but not the 5 eyes) and BolihVPN.

If you don't want to use Tor

While using Tor is advisable, for casual usage you can set Firefox to be very secure with the help of add-ons and custom settings. Here is a guide.

Websites that ban VPN and Tor

Certain websites ban Tor (e.g. Imgur). Use an alternative then (e.g. Anonmgur). Otherwise use VPN to Tor. There are VPN providers that cycle IPs, so that helps with VPN IP range bans.

TailsOS

Windows is not very safe. There have been rumors of NSA backdoors on Windows devices. Supposedly NSA can store almost everything you do online (including Facebook, popular mail providers, and possibly things offline).

There are some good alternatives out there, TailsOs being one of them. TailOS is an operating system specifically designed for security and is Linux based. It can be ran off a USB stick. For those extra paranoid, use Tor in a public space on a laptop with TailsOS loaded of a flash drive.

Of course TailsOS is not very suitable for day to day needs, so use it for shitlord purposes. For your day to day purposes you might have to use Windows, but for the love of god, DO NOT use Windows 10, it is absolutely awful for security.

I prefer Windows 7. If you are more advanced, you can use alternative platforms like Debian or some distro of Linux or whatever. Just beware, many programs for Windows do not have alternatives on Linux based systems. If you are a casual, moving to another platform can be difficult. And if you really are a nerd, then you can look into some exotic setup like Qubes + Whonix or whatever other myriad of OS and Virtual Machines there are around.

4. Other darknet browsers

I2P network: While Tor is designed to anonymously browse the normal web and onion sites, I2P is a web of it's own. Preferably to be browsed through Tor. It allows (slow) torrenting and great for messaging, IRC, file sharing, secret websites (.i2p)

Freenet – Freenet is a peer-to-peer platform for censorship-resistant communication.

5. Look into bitcoin and online currency

Bitcoin is virtual currency that has taken the world by storm in recent years. There are other online currencies competing against it, but Bitcoin is the most established online currency. It is the default virtual currency. Bitcoin is not for daily usage, rather online purposes. There are VPN services that accept payment with bitcoin. There are even services that will store physical gold in exchange for bitcoin.

Truly a financial revolution. Unfortunately, it's also a big headache for tax services. Bitcoin is also infamous for being used to purchase illegal stuff on the internet black market. But you wouldn't use it for that, would you?

To start using bitcoins just register a bitcoin wallet and you are good to go.

How to increase bitcoin anonymity

Bitcoins are not anonymous by default. They must be washed and anonymized. Buying through Tor + Coin mixing + anonymity patched bitcoin client. Over the counter (OTC) bitcoins are an option as well.

6. Use proper password protection

Never use the same password twice. Try to make it long and contain both characters and numerals, etc. Hint : use L33t, |)333. If you can, add non English characters even better, PåSsWøRд0, but you can't always do it.

If you are unsure, use a safe password generator, such as Master Password To manage passwords use a password manager, such as KeePassX.

7. Use proper mail protection

Use throwaway email to register in most places. Never use your public e-mail to register anywhere controversial like Neomasculintiy affiliated websites.

Safe Mail Providers

For general mail needs, use a mail provider that is focused on security. I found two outside 14 eyes, in Switzerland: ProtonMail (free), NeoMailBox (50$/year, custom domain option ex : funny.com, customName.com)

Remember to still use personal safety measures, like additional encryption. Never trust 2nd parties with your protection completely.

Become an email provider yourself

Another interesting move is to become a provider yourself, in essence create your personal Gmail by turning your PC into a mail server. To do this, use Mail-in-a-box. They have good guide on their site https://mailinabox.email/.

Use a safe mail client

A mail client is a program that allows you to manage mail from the cloud by saving it locally, by connecting to the email host, such as Gmail. The default mail client in Windows is Microsoft Outlook (which sucks). I will focus on my preffered mail client setup.

1) Download Thunderbird

2) Install the Enigmail add-on, to allow encryption

3) Install the TorBirdy add-on, to make Thunderbird run through Tor

Beware the law

Beware of a law that allows government officials to read any mail hosted online older than 6 months without a warrant. Use an external email client like Thunderbird or Enigmail, download your emails and store them locally. Never leave them on the server.

Email alternatives

Look into email alternatives such as : Bitmessage, I2P-Bote, Retroshare

8. Use encryption for messaging

Encryption is the process of making a message unreadable to third parties. Some programs do it for you, manually you can use a program like GPG4win or similar which uses PGP encryption.

The way it works is this :

1) You create your public key.

2) You digitally sign the information with your private key, so when the other side verifies it with their own public key, they can confirm that it is indeed YOUR public key. (WebOfTrust)

3) When someone wants to write to you he encrypts it using the public key you provided, or the other way around.

4) You then use your PRIVATE key to decrypt the message he sent you.

Here is a tutorial:

Mobile encryption

There are encryption possibilities for your phone as well. First, set encryption on your Android device. Second, use an app called Signal

9. Scrub EXIF data of photos you post online

When you take a photo with a particular device, often it registers what device you used to take the photo, when and where it was taken. To avoid this problem, before posting online use an EXIF scrubber. It is a piece of software that deletes all information that might incriminate you.

Some examples are BatchPurifier Lite and Exif Pilot. Also, careful with what photos you post of course, nothing that could indirectly lead to you.

10. Torrent and stream safely

Torrenting can be useful for file transferring. If you plan to torrent anything or share something with friends, look into safer peer to peer torrenting. P2P is good for small files. Generic torrent services are good for larger files.

One advice I have is avoid torrent programs known for their untrustworthiness, such as BitVomit (BitComet) and uTorrent (closed source + adBloat). qBit, Deluge, Tribler (this one's interesting) are good options (open source and lightweight).

Beware of laws in certain countries that forbid downloading stuff online. Germany is particularly infamous for this. There are ways to combat this issues through VPNs. But DO NOT USE TOR, I REPEAT, DO NOT USE TOR FOR FILE SHARING. For even more secure anonymous file sharing look into I2P (beware avg speed: 30 kbs per sec)

As for streaming, Popcorn Time and other analogous services (such as PornTime) are used to stream new movies (and porn) respectively. They are based on BitTorrent technology. They are relatively safe services, as long as you use a VPN.

11. Encrypt the files on your PC

Use VeraCript, a piece of software designed to encrypt disk partitions or whole USB drives. It is the successor of TrueCrypt (which stopped development after feds asked them to include vulnerabilities).

Hide files in images

Also, another interesting technique is to hide text, videos and other stuff in pictures, it's called Steganography.

12. Look into this promising new technology for your online needs

The 3 pieces of software I am about to recommend are TOX , RetroShare and diaspora.

TOX is a Skype clone with focus on privacy.

Retroshare is a private network service. You can use it for private mailing and other purposes. Here is a demonstration video:

diaspora is a social network designed for privacy and decentralization https://diasporafoundation.org/

Another interesting possibility for ROK people is to use a .onion or .i2p domain or freenet for a sort of "secret" webpage, unavailable to casuals out there.

To summarize

I think this advice will benefit the ROK community for protecting their anonymity and using secret backup channels for future purposes. Here is a quick cheat sheet:

Casuals: VPN paid with shuffled bitcoin + VPNcheck Pro, Signal on Android, Firefox with add-ons for casual use, Tor for shitlordery, Encrypted mail and hard disk, password manager, ProtonMail for daily use, throwaway mail—everything else, Thunderbird with add-ons, EXIF scrubber. Download email on PC then delete off server.

Advanced: Same as above + Tor combined with VPN, I2P and Freenet, (TBitmessage I2P-Bote Retroshare) instead of mail, becoming mail provider, diaspora*

Super advanced: Same as above + Multiple VPNs, Using Tor off of TailsOS in a public space where cameras cannot film you. Alternative OS and Virtual machines. Secure you router.

Here's a good collection of security resources.

Always remember, there is no way to remain completely anonymous, just ways to make it harder to be detected.

Read More: 5 Ways To Improve Your Online Game

August Moliere
August Moliere is an IT guy using his skills to help fellow masculine men. In his free time he enjoys european culture and decries rootless cosmopolitanism.

Why Day Game Is The Secret Sauce You Need To Consistently Meet And Attract Women

February 24, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A great many guys who are newly single or otherwise looking to meet attractive women for dating and relationships bemoan the difficulty of doing so in clubs and bars while barely considering the fact that there is another workable—and some would say superior—method readily available to all. That method is called day game. If you're not aware of it, or if you are aware but you're not using it then this is definitely something you should consider, as consistent use of day game could see your experiences with girls improve significantly.

What Is Day Game?

Day game, as the name suggests, is simply approaching and meeting girls in the day instead of at night. Imagine you simply see a girl you like waiting for a train, having a coffee in Starbucks, or reading a book in the park. You walk up to her and after a few minutes conversation, you take her phone number. Sounds good, right? Well let me tell you, it is.

Day game can take place in any public location that isn't a bar or a club. So you have at your disposal all of the following: streets, shopping malls, parks, cafes, rail stations, subway platforms and cars, sporting events, book stores, libraries, events and conventions—the list really is endless.

Benefits Over Nightgame

Now, I'm not suggesting for one moment that it's as easy as just walking up to a hot girl and just asking for her number—there are tried and tested techniques that I will be writing about over the coming weeks that are likely to make your approach more successful, but of course success every time is never guaranteed. Still, the benefits of daytime approaching really are legion.

Rather than battling to be heard against pumping EDM in the club, facing obstacles like cockblocking from her friends or from other guys, as well as having to pay for cover charges and expensive drinks, day game is a relatively relaxed affair. An afternoon stroll around your nearest city centre or shopping mall could easily yield ten phone numbers or more. Plus, you can incorporate it into your daily routine. For example, if you commute to work then you could easily take the opportunity to speak to one or two girls on your way there and back. Also, not many other men have the balls to do it.

I first got into day game in London in around 2005, before anyone else in the city was doing it, pretty much (London was later to become awash with day gamers of varying ability). My earlier field reports, posted on a "seduction community" forum in February 2006 (exactly a decade ago) recount how I met a Russian tourist on the subway and went on to have sex with her in her hotel the same night, and how I met someone called HBFashionGirl in a clothes stores, took her contact details and later went on to date her. I also met a long term girlfriend at a bus stop around that same time. She hadn't given me a second glance before I spoke to her, proving that he who takes a risk in life is often likely to be rewarded for it.

I still remember the feeling of excitement and freedom that this new experience of day gaming gave me. Suddenly, the rules as I knew them were overturned. No longer did I have to turn away regretfully when I saw a beautiful girl in the street, and nor did I have to wait for Friday night at the club before approaching and talking to hot girls. I had given myself permission to talk to any woman I wanted to (within reason) and now the dating world was my oyster.

Since then I have met and dated women I have met in all sorts of daytime situations from public transport, to high class shopping malls to coffee shops, public events and more.

Expectations

It is at this point that I am duty bound to manage your expectations. Yes, there is a smorgasbord of attractive young women out there and a surprising number of them will be friendly and receptive if you approach them confidently in the daytime. Does that mean that they will all be attracted to you, that you will "get" every one?

No, of course it doesn't.

While it would be inaccurate to call day game a numbers game (with application and experience your results can and will improve) nevertheless, the stark truth is that you will experience more rejections than you do successes. This is just the nature of life. Nothing that is worth doing is easy.

That said, you shouldn't let the fear of rejection put you off from trying, because rejection itself is not really that bad. Put out of your mind any thought of girls slapping you round the face or calling the police. Such events are outliers and are so uncommon that they're really not worth worrying about. A more typical rejection will simply be a girl telling you she has a boyfriend.

That's it.

Now, whether she really has boyfriend or not is another matter. Many girls do, of course, while others are using it as an excuse. You can persist a little after she drops the boyfriend line, but if she maintains her stance then simply smile, wish her a great day and walk off.

In fact, in many cases this can be win-win. The girl walks away happy that she has been complimented, while you leave glad that you've made her day, knowing exactly where you stand and ready to approach the next, hopefully more receptive girl.

Remember: not every girl is going to like you. Most won't be attracted to you. Some will be lukewarm but receptive to a little persuasion (or "game"). A few will be attracted to you off the bat. Your job while doing day game is to find these two latter sets of girls, and the way to do that is to get used to approaching girls all the time in your daily life.

Skillset

The most important skill that you need to make day game work for you is persistence, coupled with an imperviousness to rejection. This latter trait you can develop over time through application and repeated action. Next week I will be writing more on day game, this time getting down to tactics—exactly what you should say to that cute girl when you walk up to her in the cafe for the first time.

—

Roosh has some great tips on how to develop your day game in his classic book Day Bang, home of the "elderly chat" strategy and the now infamous "pet shop" line. Day Bang, which I will be referencing throughout my day game series, is a 201-page book that solely focuses on approaching women during the day. Using dozens of examples, it teaches you how to meet girls in common daytime venues like the coffee shop, retail store, street, bookstore, and grocery store, among others. It's available on paperback, Kindle, or ebook. Click here to learn more about Roosh's book.

Read Next: How Clear Should You Announce Your Sexual Intentions With Women You're Attracted To?

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Woman Kills Herself After Boyfriend Discovers She's Using Him For Money And Gifts

February 24, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> I told you what my plan is. Straight after my 21st and after he has spent £1,000 to £2,000 I'm gone… After all the s I've put up with. I will literally take my presents and the week after my 21st end it and delete him.
>
> — Nina Paunova, texting her friend Elizabeth Gough about her intention to break up with Sam Scott after he lavished her with even more gifts.

When caught out for having financially used her boyfriend Sam Scott, the quickly dumped, 21-year-old Nina Paunova killed herself. Inasmuch as this was a sad situation for Mr. Scott, the families and (to an extent) the girl herself, the fact that she used her partner for resources is incontrovertible. The end result of suicide, though extreme, should not mask the reality that Paunova is far from an isolated case.

Women do this to men all the time, they just do not normally kill themselves after being found out. Indeed, most females doing this (and there are many) can retain plausible deniability in materially using men. Words like "I love his ambition!", "He makes me laugh," and "We fight, but we're destined for one another" easily become backward rationalizations to make the relationship of convenience more palatable to both the girls themselves and outside parties looking in.

A histrionic, self-entitled woman

Sam Scott had to deal with too much from narcissistic Nina Paunova, which raises the question why he did not extricate himself from her sooner.

An inquest into Paunova's death (a waste of resources, to be honest, considering the constantly ignored needs of the walking wounded across British society) found that Mr. Scott had:

> ...already spent £10,000 on jewellery and clothing, £4,500 on trips to London and Paris and at least £2,000 on holidays to Croatia and Menorca.

Paunova, who showed intense focus on things that interested her, like fashion and design, was nevertheless prone to bizarre behavior when she did not get her own way. This included threatening to jump off a balcony and kill herself prior to the events that saw her dumped. Described as "obsessed with social media," she failed to show the same diligence in respecting her boyfriend as she did in maintaining her Instagram and other accounts for self-promotion.

Despite no evidence showing any of the same behavior from Mr. Scott (rather, the complete opposite seems to be true of him), Paunova planned to leave him after extracting some more expensive trinkets for her 21st birthday. This intention is evinced by her texts to friend Elizabeth Gough, whose boyfriend, commendably, forwarded the messages to the brat's long-suffering boyfriend.

Following Mr. Scott's common sense dumping of her, Paunova drove to his house, akin to a good stalker, and unsuccessfully demanded to see him. Rejected, she went to a forest and slit her wrists. And now she's being remembered as a "victim." Fitting, isn't it?

Lesson #1: Don’t expect girls to tell you that you’re being taken advantage of by another female

Nina Paunova’s exploitation of Sam Scott was only undone because another man, her friend’s boyfriend, had the guts to tell him. Do not expect other unrelated women to inform you.

Ideally, you should know yourself whether a girl is taking you for a financial ride. Better still, you should habitually structure your relationships so girls cannot do this. Yet men live in an imperfect world and can become distracted or blinded by “love” (or perhaps just the girl’s calculated, seemingly well-intentioned words and “I love you”‘s!). So who will tell you when the girl in your life is using you as a cash or status cow? Well, almost certainly not girls, at least not her friends. Elizabeth Gough’s boyfriend had to break the news to Sam Scott, after all.

Unless she has a particularly well-founded sense of right and wrong, the threshold required for a third-party girl to tell you that your romantic interest is cheating on you, lying to you, or effectively taking money from you through deceit is very high. Close female friends and female family members of yours are the most likely to tell you the truth, but the girl you are dating will close to 100% ensure she does not divulge it to these people anyway.

Fundamentally, why would a girl out another girl for doing what she wants to be able to do as well? Girls obviously compete with and undermine each other in catty and bitchy ways, so this maxim is not an absolute. Generally-speaking, however, outing another girl for this sort of behavior in the name of morality forces her to interpret any similar propensity of her own as negative and unjustified. She will thus almost always avoid the likelihood of self-inflicted guilt.

Lesson #2: Calculate your return on investment with a girl and make her increase her contributions

Nina Paunova drained Sam Scott's resources and happiness. Always know what you are giving compared to her.

Sam Scott's family is wealthy and he can evidently afford to have spent at least £16,500 on her, just for clothes, jewellery and holidays. This figure does not count the birthday presents Nina Paunova wanted (and for which Mr. Scott may have already spent money) and all the other outlays I am sure occurred, many of them long-forgotten by him. Yet, to be totally blunt, wouldn't he have been better off spending all this money on decent-looking prostitutes or Tinder-orchestrated "coffee" dates? He would have gotten more sex with more girls and without the spoiled brat factor.

In the end, Nina Paunova got her comeuppance. Her petulant, "it's all about me" attitude led to her death. That said, Mr. Scott would have been blessed if he had never gotten involved with her. Fifteen minutes and a sheet of paper detailing her contributions and his to the relationship could have made it crystal clear that he had the raw end of the deal. Realizing this, it would have been time for him to move on and find a small town English girl who did not alternately stick the pineapple she posed with up her ass to make herself unbearable to others.

Less realistically, Mr. Scott could have figured out a way for Paunova to increase her investment in the relationship. It was far too late when he discovered what she had been texting to her friend, but before then getting more from her was at a minimum a possibility, remote as it was.

Lesson #3: Expect that other girls conceal this sort of behavior one hundred times better than Paunova

[image]
99.5% of the time, gold digging and its variants are not like this. The scamming girl can be the same age or thereabouts as her "boyfriend," among other less obvious aspects.

The instant gratification society makes people crave would have us believe that poor antics from women only exist when we see it in front of our faces. Or, if not, it is always revealed without a shadow of a doubt, such as when Elizabeth Gough's boyfriend showed Sam Scott what was really going on. Needless to say, you need to be much more inquisitive to protect your interests.

I am not advocating for paranoia or a constant questioning of someone's motives. That leads to a miserable existence. The line between a life of wisdom, recognizing people's ability to be blood-sucking vipers, and one constantly looking over your shoulder with anxiety is a blurry one. But much more happens beneath the surface and behind your back than others' words and immediate actions will tell you.

Plus, even Nina Paunova was planning to get rid of her boyfriend the week after she had received her obligatory birthday gifts. Notwithstanding their impaired capacity for being discreet compared to other girls, the most shameless women can maintain part of the instinct to carefully package the end of their relationship so as to avoid accusations of gold digging and other schemes. They are then much freer to find the next man who will indulge them, without the baggage of being known as what they really are.

In a sense, Nina Paunova was unlucky, not that she deserved Mr. Scott not finding out. Plenty of women's confidantes would either never tell their boyfriend that their friend is using their male partner or would keep their text messages so secret that the news would not have the chance to go public. Just know that so much can not only happen under your nose, but also beyond your "sense of smell" entirely. Be wary.

So much common female behavior needs to be hidden to keep the feminine lie going Paunova's manipulative behavior is reminiscent of Kristen Schroder's. Schroder shit-tested boyfriend Paul Rossington by pretending to want to jump off a cruise liner. She fell off and both died after Rossington tried to save her.

The panic Nina Paunova felt after being exposed as a gold digger (or one of its less vile, male resource-consuming cousins) is the sort that every woman who engages in the practice will feel when outed. If every woman doing it were to be identified, the sexual prospects of many girls would be ruined. It would additionally shatter the illusion so many men, resource-endowed or not, have of women as sweet creatures prone to emotions only because they have tender hearts. More than anything else, such a worldwide revelation would draw more men to the red pill and Neomasculinity than perhaps any other event.

Learn to strip latent feelings of sentimentality from cases such as Nina Paunova's suicide. Wisdom in life, notably about women, will not come from either strong emotions or pangs of lust from your penis. Search for the meaning behind everything, even when it involves the trials and tribulations of other men. You may not always be right when you seek and get initial answers. What you want ultimately is to have the space and time to find buried truths, which the words of most women and the pronouncements of society will never dig up for you.

Read More: Angry Woman Shit Tests Boyfriend And Ends Up Getting Them Both Killed

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why The Left Doesn’t Want You To Know About The Tripolitan Pirate Wars

February 24, 2016 | by FitzRoy Sommerset | Link | Original Link

The great historian George Santayana is often quoted as saying,

> Progress, far from consisting in change, depends on retentiveness. When change is absolute there remains no being to improve and no direction is set for possible improvement: and when experience is not retained, as among savages, infancy is perpetual. Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it.

One of the greatest weapons in the arsenal of the social justice warriors is the revision of history. This is nothing new: every totalitarian or tyrannical regime has used the revision of history as a means to control its population. Like the confiscation of arms, tyranny is always preceded by a rewriting of history.

While the revision of history is a terrible intellectual crime, alongside is the omission of history. The simple act of omitting certain historical events that contradict the politically acceptable narrative: white Christian heterosexual men are the only villains in the world.

The events this article will explore a significant part of history that is often left out of history texts. It is given token treatment in the name of “tolerance.” Its heroes are white, Christian, heterosexual men. The villains are non-white, non-European Muslims of the Barbary Coast.

The Arab Slave Trade

Whenever a SJW brings up slavery, it is always about white people bringing slaves to the New World for work on plantations. However, a far more ghastly slave trade existed almost a thousand years before molasses was traded for black people: the Arab Slave Trade.

Starting in 650 (before the Crusades) and lasting until 1960, approximately 18 million people were enslaved from various Arab states, from the Barbary Pirate States to Turkey itself. Between 1500 and 1850, 1.25 million white Europeans were enslaved by Arab slave traders.

After being captured, these Europeans were typically given two choices: remain Christian and be a slave, or convert to Islam, as it was against Islamic law for a Muslim to enslave another Muslim.

Enter The United States

In the years immediately after the American Revolution, American merchantmen were no longer under the protection of the most powerful navy in the world: the British Royal Navy. Trade was vital to the fledgling young nation, and her merchantmen traveled the Mediterranean to deliver and purchase goods to support the new economy.

Being located in North Africa, the Barbary Pirate states were uniquely situated to take advantage of vulnerable American shipping. A large portion of the northern coast of Africa was under their control (and ostensibly, that of the Ottoman Empire). They captured American merchantmen, stole the cargo and enslaved the crews. The only way to secure release of American sailors was to pay ransom, which was insanely high: at times, $600,000 for a crew of 50, when the entire annual budget of the United States in 1803 was $8.2 million.

At the time, Great Britain was still putting down the first social justice warrior "revolution": the French Revolution. It was an all-out murder-fest of anyone who was not ideologically in line with the Third Estate. Conflict with Napoleon meant the Royal Navy and British Army were unable to deal with the threat, so the British Empire regretfully paid "protection money" to the Barbary Pirate states. However, England would redeem itself a year after Waterloo in 1816 when the Royal Navy bombarded Algiers to free over a thousand white, Christian slaves.

The French Revolutionaries executed anyone who wasn't in line with their quasi-socialist agenda. Don't think for a moment that SJWs or feminists wouldn't do the same today.

There is no god but Gold, and Muhammad is his prophet

Thomas Jefferson and John Adams were well aware of the threat posed by the Barbary Pirate states. In 1786, Adams, ambassador to Great Britain, and Jefferson, ambassador to France, met with the Tripolitan envoy, Sidi Haji Abdrahaman. They hoped to negotiate the release of several dozen Americans being held as slaves.

Abdrahaman told Jefferson and Adams "all nations which have not acknowledged the Prophet are sinners, whom it is the right and duty of the faithful to plunder and enslave."

SJW axiom: "Islam is a religion of peace."

A Paper Tiger

When Thomas Jefferson took office as our third President in 1801, the United States was unprepared to defend its national interest. Both Republicans and Federalists were wary of a strong military, and the United States had yet to take its role as world police (the British Empire still held that unofficial distinction).

Thomas Jefferson supported building a strong U.S. Navy

For the first 30 years of her existence, the United States paid tribute to Tripoli, Algiers and Tunis. This is comparable to “foreign aid” paid to questionable Middle Eastern countries. These efforts were not always successful: the Barbary leaders always wanted more, and demanded princely six-figure sums when the entire Federal budget was still seven-figures.

Thomas Jefferson was determined to end the humiliation of the United States and the paying of tribute to Islamic masters. However at the moment, the United States barely had a Navy and possessed no ability to project its power overseas.

At this point in history, the United States truly was a paper tiger: although it had successfully outlasted a war with the most powerful Empire in history, it was still incapable of protecting itself. The United States was “beta” to the Tripolean pirates “alpha”: the U.S. had no choice but to concede to Barbary demands.

The Humiliation Of The U.S.S. George Washington

In 1800, the U.S.S. George Washington, under the command of Captain William Bainbridge departed to deliver tribute to the Dey of Algiers. It was a humiliating mission for a Captain in the United States Navy. The already bad situation turned into disaster: The Dey of Algiers broke all protocols of diplomatic recourse and held Captain Bainbridge and his crew hostage unless they would agree to ferry plunder for the Dey to Constantinople.

With little choice and the George Washington in the sights of Tripolean shore batteries, Captain Bainbridge conceded and carried out the mission on behalf of the Dey. Angrily, he wrote a letter to the President telling of the savage insult to the United States. Note: Captain Bainbridge wasn’t even sure who was president, as he had been at sea during the election of 1800.

Captain William Bainbridge would serve in both Barbary Pirate Wars.

Millions For Defense, But Not One Cent For Tribute!

The incident involving the U.S.S. George Washington, coupled with other crimes against the United States and Tripoli's official declaration of war in May 1801, gave Jefferson the support he needed to build the U.S. Navy. To protect American interest and free Christian slaves, Jefferson needed a force to be reckoned with.

The United States built six frigates to protect American shipping and endorsed a plan by William Eaton to attack Tripoli. Eaton would have eight U.S. Marines under the command of Lieutenant Presley O'Bannon and a few hundred local mercenaries under the command of Hamet Karamanli.

William Eaton was appointed "General and Commander in Chief" for the fight against Tripoli.

…To the shores of Tripoli!

On April 27th, 1805, after a harrowing march through the desert, General William Eaton attacked the Tripolitan city of Derne off the North African coast. Using military tactics he learned as a Sergeant during the American Revolution, he split his force in two: Hamet and the Arab mercenaries would attack on the left where the Governor's palace was located and fortifications weak. Eaton, along with his Marines and Greek mercenaries, would attack the right. The U.S.S. Nautilus, U.S.S. Hornet and U.S.S. Argus would bombard the port. Commanding the Nautilus was Captain Oliver Hazard Perry, who would later distinguish himself in the War of 1812.

The attack began at about 3pm. While the shore batteries in the harbor were quickly silenced by the U.S. Navy, one of the guns brought ashore by Eaton malfunctioned. Its crew was unable to fire the cannon. Quite suddenly, Eaton's ground attack on the right had lost its artillery support. Any officer or NCO knows this can lead to disaster. Thinking quickly, Eaton adjusted his game to overcome the odds: a bayonet charge down the hill into the Tripolitan defensive line.

Amid a flash of musket fire and a twirl of bayonets, General Eaton charged the enemy defenses, with the American flag blazing in the hot North African sun. He would later write: "We rushed forward against a host of savages more than ten to our one."

Eaton was injured in his left wrist, and found five musket ball holes in his tunic. But General Eaton, the U.S. Marines and Hamet's mercenaries carried the day, smashing through the defensive perimeter to take the city. That evening, Lieutenant Presley O'Bannon raised the American flag over Derne. The nation that had existed for less than 30 years and was incapable of protecting its own people from enslavement now turned the tables on their would-be Muslim masters.

General Eaton and Lieutenant O'Bannon prepared their men for the march to Tripoli. A force to be reckoned with, they were now in position to put the fear of God in the Tripolitan Dey.

Betrayal Of The Lowest Order

American Forces break through the defenses of Derne.

When news reached the Pasha of Tripoli, Yusuf Karamanli (brother of Hamet Karamanli, leader of the mercenaries under General Eaton), he was positively shocked and dreadfully afraid. The man who had once scoffed at America and whose ambassador had declared the absolute superiority of Islam was now prepared to "make peace and give up the American prisoners… without consideration of money…"

However, the efforts of General Eaton, Lieutenant O'Bannon, Hamet and the U.S. Navy would be betrayed. Diplomat (and Consul General) Tobias Lear made a blunder of negotiation that would not be equaled until U.S. President Barack Obama's negotiations with Iran.

The treaty that Lear negotiated with Pasha Yusuf included payment of $60,000 for the captured Americans as well as returning the city of Derne to Tripolitan control. Had Lear held his nerve, and put his personal interests aside, he could have secured the release of the Americans held as slaves for no payment. And he most likely could have secured the remittance of several hundred thousand dollars of previous tribute payments.

It was a betrayal of the lowest order. Not only had Lear betrayed the efforts of Eaton and the U.S. Navy, but he also made the United States break its word with Hamet: the U.S. had promised to give the throne of Tripoli to him. Hamet and his brother, Pasha Yusuf, had been fighting over the throne for years and Yusuf held Hamet's family hostage in Tripoli. For the sake of honor, the U.S. would later force the release of Hamet's wife and children.

This would not be the last time the United States would break its word or make a grave mistake in the Middle East.

Final justice for the Barbary Pirate States would have to wait until after the War of 1812. Commodore Stephen Decatur would lead American forces to defeat the city-state of Algiers on June 18, 1815. On that same day, the Duke of Wellington and Gerhard von Blucher would defeat the French Revolutionaries at the Battle of Waterloo.

Some Inconvenient Truths

The lessons of the Barbary Pirate wars are highly applicable to our current situation in the region, and our culture as Americans overall. The facts about the enslavement of whites and the Barbary pirates are very inconvenient to the social justice warrior narrative of history (which is mostly written by socialist Howard Zinn). The words of Abdrahaman to Jefferson and Adams should be broadcast in a similar vein to the South Park episode “In the Closet” which lampooned Scientology: “This is what Muslims in the region actually believe.”

Politicians like Tobias Lear are trying to force a mass influx of Muslim immigration into Europe and the United States. Just as Lear gave up America’s victory at the Battle of Derne, so too do corrupt politicians wish to give up American interest when we are the remaining world superpower.

America does not need immigrants anymore. This is not the 1800s when we needed settlers to build homesteads out west. Immigrants need the United States, and the only way they should ever be allowed to enter is if they can provide some tangible benefit to America (and more votes for the Democrat Party is not a benefit).

Never forget our heroes of old. Do not let the social justice warriors write them out of history to serve their own political ends. Men such as William Eaton, Presley O’Bannon, and Stephen Decatur fought bravely to rescue white Christians from Muslim enslavement. Do not allow their good names to be sacrificed for the benefit of dishonest politicians and social justice warriors.

If we allow the SJWs to rewrite history, our infancy will be perpetual.

Read More: What The West Can Learn From India’s Checkered History

FitzRoy Sommerset
FitzRoy is a British and American Nationalist who refuses to apologize for the British Empire. As a young man, he "took a President's shilling" and served in the U.S. Army. In his free time, he enjoys studying history and destroying the SJW revisionist narrative.

10 Simple Steps To Hit The Cultural Narrative Where It Hurts

February 25, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

David Garett Brown's articles about how we deprived the producers of the last Social Justice Wars episode from millions of dollars really struck a chord in our community. It echoed as thousands of comments and reactions in the media, and caused zealous cucks like Jimmy Kimmel to go in overdrive, trying to downplay it.

But the cat is out of the bag. What we write, believe in, and act on brings visible results—recent events like the Stalinist-like propaganda slandering the ROK meetups only confirm it. Our thoughts make them fly off the handle and this is why we must carry on. By following those few steps, we can deal them a tremendous blow if we stand as one:

1. Get off Facebook

We keep saying that it's a waste of time. You are not a girl looking for attention. What satisfaction do you get from a picture that is "liked"? Are you on the beach in Croatia to relax or make your coworkers jealous?

Get away from that poison, find a way to REALLY deactivate it and resume a normal life. They stored your info preciously and can use it against you, have no doubt about this. Do not give them more.

2. Bring men together

After the Thought Crime Blitzkrieg episode, the white knighting freaks and pierced hags are already back into their Ben & Jerry's, cat videos, and Jezebel wankathon. But the meetups are a great idea and must take place. You could advertise a "male club" on the forum or even through the comments. Better 5 highly motivated and reliable men than 50 undecisive one-timers. Gather three worthy friends, hold the happy hour once. Ask them to bring three potential candidates for the next meeting, see if they fit. Repeat the operation until a strong, regular circle is established.

The principle: “A is a decent guy, we believe in the same things. B is A’s friend. That is a good start. Let’s bring B for a beer and see what is his view of life.”

3. Stop financing Google

Many companies are trying their best against us, but not many are as try-hard as Google. I know it is handy, I know it is fast, but make the effort. Get another browser, an alternative email address (Protonmail, Tutanota for encrypted mails etc.), a VPN, and another search engine:

- DuckDuckGo
- StartPage
- Ixquick
- Dogpile

I have been using DuckDuckGo for about a year and it works well. If you cannot, keep your research neutral and to a minimum. Disable options that collect information about you.

Just to remind you, this is what Google represents and supports with your money. If that is not a declaration of war, I don't know what that is:

4. Write letters

Wise words from Assange and Snowden: written mail is the safest way to communicate in our day and age. Or face-to-face meeting in a safe environment.

The internet is (relatively) easy to monitor via keywords, but Barack has only two hands and cannot open or read all the letters that the United States Postal Service receives every day. Still not convinced? Use a code that you create, keep it within your community, and update it regularly. The oldest trick in the book.

The Caesar cipher is millennia-old but has proven its efficiency. Languages such as Python still use it to this day.

5. Keep exposing the lies

"Thank you all for coming. I expect more lies in your articles."

Share it with friends, but not on PC approved social media. Spread the world on your website or by word of mouth. The digital media will try to silence you. Twitter is digging its own grave trying to control what people have the right to say or not. Talk about it in your circle, propose solutions, hold conferences… why not? Whatever it takes, do not remain silent.

6. Launch counterattacks, even small, every day

Don’t call back the empowered slut after the bang and don’t tell her why. Give the disgusted look at that feminist tub of lard when she walks down the street. Ask a girl with a nose ring if you can hang your keys on it while you go get yourself a beer. Destroy their arguments, make the hamster wheel explode, and go chase some real skirt with as much patriarchy as possible.

We attack what we hate, but we must reward what we respect. Lightly compliment your girl’s feminine outfit or the meal your wife cooked you. Encourage the girl that tries to (really) lose weight. Teach something you deem valuable to your children. Let a good worker know when he has done well.

7. Stay active

Even if we are at war, it needs to be “business as usual” in our ranks. Remain disciplined. Find an alternative way to create money to get away from debt and government shackles. Become more anti-fragile. Learn something new. Work out, eat well, sleep, read and fight on. Focus on the big picture and do not bicker over nonsense with allies.

8. Change your source of information

Don’t give those muppets money through your clicks. The Independent is in trouble and will soon only publish online as they lost more than 90% of their readership in 25 years. It does not come as a surprise that they penned around 10 different articles corroborating lies about Roosh and our meetups.

Check which media group lied about our meetup with no proof, cross them as “unreliable source of information” or “fiction.” If they lied about some guys going for a beer, how many more lies are they force feeding you? Check who owns them and their past record about the issue at hand.

9. Witness a healthy society in action

Get out of Western Europe and the Anglosphere for a bit if you are still hesitating to take the plunge. See with your own eyes an alternative world that is not politically correct and globalist. We cover masculine principles and theorize a lot. But seeing an actual society based on it is mind-blowing and some well-needed fresh air.

Nothing can describe what it is like to hear a Lithuanian 20 year-old girl with long, blond hair, high heels, and a dress telling you “I hate feminists.”

10. Stay alert in your romantic life

Protect yourself. Keep evidence of texts and conversations. Use recording devices on the workplace and in your private life if you feel the need. Pay attention to red flags and tell signs. Weigh the options available, keep a clear head, and do not take an obvious risk for sex that you can get elsewhere.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 10 Ways To Fight Back Against Feminism

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Australian Male Senator Shuts Down Female Colleague For Accusing Him Of “Mansplaining”

February 25, 2016 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Australia, there may be hope for you yet.

In a story quickly going viral, a Labor senator named Katy Gallagher accused fellow Liberal Senator Mitch Fifield of “mansplaining” during a proceeding after a particularly lengthy explanation of government processes. Initially confused by the unfamiliar term, the Senator quickly exploded into a righteous rant that, in the politest possible way, shut down the accusation completely.

I present it here in admiration of your manly glory, Senator Fifield.

The only thing better than watching this exchange is reading the subsequent comments:

Even the subsequent news articles about the exchange are surprisingly neutral, simply describing it as a “row” or “face off” rather than the usual “man dares to disagree with woman!”

Communications Minister Mitch Fifield fires back at Senator Katy Gallagher over 'mansplaining' claims

The news in colour

news.com.au

Mitch Fifield accuses Katy Gallagher of sexist hypocrisy over 'mansplaining' criticism

By political reporter Dan Conifer

Updated about 2 hours ago

A Federal Government Minister accused of "mansplaining" in a Senate committee hearing has let rip, labelling it sexist hypocrisy from a Labor Senator.

Mansplaining — the 2014 Macquarie Dictionary word of the year — is a verb describing a man explaining something to a woman in a patronising way.

"I love the mansplaining," ACT Labor Senator Katy Gallagher told Communications Minister Mitch Fifield after a lengthy answer about Liberal party room processes.

"What's 'mansplaining', Senator?" Senator Fifield asked.

VIDEO: Katy Gallagher accuses Mitch Fifield of 'mansplaining' (ABC News)

PHOTO: Senator Katy Gallagher accused Mitch Fifield of 'mansplaining'. (ABC: Shaun Ringrose)

MAP: Australia

Clearly, from the shady internet chatroom to the newsdesk to the corridors of power, people are getting increasingly sick of this feminazi bullshit.

What I love most is how quickly the distinguished senator shut down the "mansplaining" argument. Without any preparation, he poked holes in it in about ten seconds, exposing it for the childish I-know-you-are-but-what-am-I bullshit that is it.

History will quickly forget this exchange. It is but one small skirmish in a decades-long culture war, but it is one that the feminists lost. Let us savor the moment.

Yes, it is disturbing to realize that you have people with the apparent mental faculties of twelve year olds making up 30% of your parliament. But let us appreciate that as overwhelming as the social justice crowd sometimes appears, there are still plenty of masculine men out there not willing for a moment to put up with their pathetic whining. They are still doing things old school with logic and facts. Not everyone has bothered keeping up to date with the newest edition of Newspeak, and that includes our politicians.

Honestly, I think Senator Fifield should have been grateful to be accused of mansplaining. If anything, its praise. Who uses such an accusation, except for someone who realizes they are totally outmatched in an argument? Quick, someone is making a fool of a women! Call in the white knight airstrike! Call in the media!

I can only imagine her terror when she realized no help was forthcoming. Like Hillary Clinton, she's perhaps discovering that with greater power comes greater responsibility, and that in 2016 a pussy-pass has less value than it once did.

Read More: How Senator Kirsten Gillibrand Doubled Down On The False Rape Culture Narrative

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

Why Do People Hate Return Of Kings?

February 25, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

As you are all aware by now, the cancellation of the Return of Kings meet-ups was caused by a deliberate misrepresentation of our message. ROK readers were described as being pro-rape. I've also seen ROK readers described as a bunch of pick up artists whose only priority in life is to corrupt young virgins.

But it is not just the self-professed enemies of ROK that don't understand the site. I've chatted with some men who tried reading the site but were turned off by certain articles. For these reasons, I thought it would be helpful to provide an overview of what ROK is all about. My intention is that this article will serve as a good way of introducing a friend to ROK.

Here are some things to be aware of when reading ROK:

ROK is about things that are interesting to men

If you've ever been part of a unit of men, whether it was a military unit or a high school football team, the content and comments that you find on ROK will not be offensive to you.

That's because when men get together, they talk about what interests them. That might be sports, politics, weightlifting tips, or women. There's also a lot of joking, and it's almost always a little off-color.

In our day, men no longer have places in the real world where they can get together with other men to "shoot the shit." The military, fire departments, and police forces used to be male bastions, but all of those institutions now include women as part of our push for equality.

Men's clubs, country clubs, and sporting events also served as places where men could get together with other men. But the men's clubs are gone because they were sexist. And following the dictates of "you go girl-ism" women have made sure that they attended sporting events to demonstrate that they could appreciate sports, too.

Thanks to the big push to normalize and celebrate homosexuality, straight men sometimes even feel odd going out to dinner with a group of other straight men—outsiders now just assume that it is a gaggle of gay men. That is why ROK is so popular. It is the one place where men can talk like men and not be censored by some pious ninny. The articles reflect the things that men are universally interested in.

ROK is entertaining but the ideas are often serious

The ROK writers always try to write articles in such a way that you will find them entertaining to read. We don’t write in a stodgy academic style, but don’t let the style deceive you. The articles often deal with weighty subject matter.

If you read ROK on a regular basis, you can find great advice on everything from becoming financially independent to getting in shape for a fight. But ROK is a lot more than self-improvement. ROK goes beyond the narrative that you hear in the popular media to reveal how big money is used to compromise politicians and subvert democracy.

Finally, ROK represents more than a website. It has become a movement. The attempt of the worldwide media to stop the meet-ups has had the unintended effect of making us stronger.

You need to have a sense of humor to understand many ROK articles

Political correctness has destroyed Americans' sense of humor. In order for something to be funny, it has to poke fun at something or someone. But we've created so many protected groups that it is nearly impossible to tell a joke anymore.

You can see this at work in Saturday Night Live's "mockery" of President Obama. Because Obama is black (a group one must never poke fun of), he was not a permissible target. Instead, the skits made fun of people who were around him—usually his Republican opponents. The fact that the President was off-limits made for poor comedy. All of the writers on ROK write without these politically correct filters. If you are not accustomed to this old school sense of humor, it can come across as mean.

My favorite example of this is Tuthmosis Sonofra's legendary article 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder. The piece evoked howls from the dour politically correct establishment. But only someone who was devoid of a sense of humor could read that article and think that it was actually encouraging eating disorders.

Not all articles on ROK are meant to be humorous, but when they are, you can be certain that no politically correct filter will be applied.

Game can be taught

One common objection to ROK that I have seen is that “real men” should have natural game. All you really need, they tell us, is to dress nicely and go up and talk to girls. These people think that all game techniques that are taught in Roosh’s books or on ROK are artificial, and therefore not useful.

My own experience tells me that this is not true.

I was one of those guys who received very little advice from his dad on women so I had to learn from trial and error—and I made a lot of mistakes. One of the most notable was to let infatuation get the best of me. By the time I finally worked up the courage to talk to a girl, I would be nervous and not confident. That lead to lots of rejections, which only further lowered my confidence. Another mistake that I used to make was entering the friend zone. While I was in college I had one girl string me along for nearly a year.

I eventually did learn from my mistakes. I learned to approach attractive girls confidently without caring too much about the outcome. And after that bad friend zone experience in college, I avoided getting stuck there ever again. I learned the hard way, but if Return Of Kings had been available back in those days, I would have been much more successful and confident as a young man.

We tend to dismiss the importance of self-confidence in young men, but there is scientific evidence that winning changes your body’s chemistry. Winners have higher levels of testosterone and other hormones that make it easier for them to win in the future—not just with girls, but in every area. If a young man learns the skills necessary to win girls over, it could change the arc of his life.

The fact that ROK can be helpful to men is obvious from your comments. I’ve read tons of testimonies from men who were able to improve their lives through the advice on ROK.

Most readers of ROK are not PUAs

Despite what you may have heard, most readers of ROK are not pick-up artists. The majority of readers have wives or girlfriends, and they have no desire to serially seduce random women.

But doesn't ROK contain some information on how to be a PUA?

Yes, the information is here, but the same information that can help you to become a PUA can help you to find a girl to marry. The information itself is neutral. The outcome depends on how you apply it. You can think of the "game" information on ROK as a Robert Greene's 48 Laws of Power. You can use the laws in the book to become a successful politician who wisely uses his power to do great good for his constituents.

On the other hand, you could also use the 48 laws to cheat your way into power, to unjustly enrich yourself, and to oppress your constituents. The knowledge of the laws is not bad in itself, what matters is how you apply the laws.

Conclusion

This brief introduction is not going to stop people from hating ROK or issuing malicious attacks on the ROK community. As we saw with the attacks on Roosh in response to the meet-ups, "truth" is no barrier to these unprincipled people.

However, I hope that it will be helpful to men of goodwill who may be put off by false information or to new readers. We need to keep making the ROK tribe stronger.

Read More: Top 35 Most Important Articles On ROK

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

The Ultimate Guide To Muscle: Supplementation

February 25, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

If you are new to this series, be sure to check out Part 1 on Genetics and Training and Part 2 on Nutrition.

You should also note the order of these parts.

#1: Knowing your body (genetics) and how to maximize its potential (training).

#2: Solid, natural food first. A high quality and healthy nutrition plan.

Supplementation for building muscle only comes AFTER you have a solid training program and a high quality, protein rich diet of real food.

David Del Jefe wrote a great article on why most supplements are a waste of money. Note that the title declares most, not all, supplements are a waste of money. In my experience, you cannot continue to build muscle naturally, fast, without a few vital supplements.

Whey Protein

After you have a solid plan for five high quality protein meals a day, the first supplement you must add to your diet is a high quality protein powder.

There is simply no way to get enough protein from natural food unless you literally eat 7 times a day like The Rock did when filming Hercules. And even The Rock supplemented with a protein drink around his workout. He was also taking in over 400 grams of protein a day and can afford to eat that much high quality food. You and I are not The Rock, so we need to supplement with protein powder.

The key with protein supplementation is, just like muscle fiber types, the type and the timing. Here are my three liquid whey protein guidelines.

1. A high calorie protein weight gainer BEFORE your workout (30 min to 1 hr).

I might change this in the future after watching Jeff Cavaliere's video on how much weight gainers suck (always learning, never an expert), but for me, the extra calories that come from higher carbs in this protein drink give me extra energy in the gym that fuels my work out.

The high calorie/carb count of weight gainers only sucks if you are slinging back 500 to 1000 extra liquid calories on your non-training days. That is when you "bulk" and get fat. Weight gainer indeed, but not the kind of weight you want!

I think the rant Jeff goes on against weight gainers is about the cheap, cheap COSTCO, WAL-MART tub style of protein weight gainer. The stuff you find at a grocery store, not a specialty sports nutrition store. If you are paying $30 to $40 for a 6 or 10 lb tub of "high quality protein" that will "pack on the mass"… it ain't. It's horseshit.

What you want to look for is a weight gainer that combines everything you need in one protein mix – staged protein delivery, glutamine, creatine, BCAAs and a specifically formulated carb matrix that takes advantiage of your body's natural responses to training. And it won't be cheap. You are probably looking at $60 min to $80 to $100 plus for a 5 or 6 lb container. Really look at the ingredients closely. Choose one that clearly breaks down how they create their carb matrix, what they use for taste, how they approach the other supplements (BCAAs etc) in their product.

2. A whey protein isolate immediately, within 30 minutes, after your workout.

I have been downing whey isolate right there in the gym immediately after my very last set for the first time and it is having an amazing effect on my recovery and gains. Isolate protein is the fastest absorbing and highest bio-available protein you can have right after a workout. It helps to halt the catabolic process of muscle tissue breakdown right then and there. If you are still getting DOMS – delayed onset muscle soreness – after your workouts despite adequate nutrition intake, downing an isolate protein drink immediately after your workout will probably eliminate this.

There is also something to be said for a little sugar water and isolate sipped during your workout. It helps to stave off dehydration, but also the instant and immediate demands for energy. With just a little added sugar for energy while pushing weight, your body is less likely to turn to protein breakdown that is the catabolic process to sustain your energy instead.

I had a chance run-in with a kung fu artist in life and we got to talking about hydration during hard training. He avoids the corporate solution – Gatorade and Powerade. He told me that a 50/50 mix of water and pure grape juice (not white) will deliver a far better balance of hydration with sugar and other nutrients the body needs sweating up a tsunami in the gym or on the field. Add a little whey isolate to the mix and you have the perfect hydration solution for those “leave it all on the floor” days in the gym.

3. An optional sustained release, low calorie/carb protein mix on off days.

This has come with experience and intuition over 20 years. I no longer take an off-day liquid protein supplement all by itself (i.e. to add an additional meal to my diet that should be real food, not a supplement). But, I don’t avoid them like the plague either. If I take in any additional liquid protein on my off-days, they are primarily:

- whey isolates first thing in the morning when my muscles are starved from fasting overnight
- as an added supplement to a real food meal, with the meal, never as a meal replacement
- never a full serving, only 1/2 or so.

This approach to powdered liquid protein supplementation has helped me get muscle gains faster while also saving money and staying lean.

You will also notice I focus my liquid protein supplementation around my workout – all within the first 8 to 12 hours. After that, I scale back considerably, especially on rest days and breaks from training. (By break, I mean I am not serious about mass. I still train, but not as hard and rely primarily on real food to get my protein.) As you get used to this, your body will begin to tell you when you need some quick liquid protein because your muscles are demanding it, and the times when solid food will be enough until your next meal.

With this approach to protein, you now have a method and goal for having a liquid protein drink in your diet.

It is not just to have one because you are supposed to or, worst mistake of all, as a complete replacement of what should be a real food meal. This intuitive approach to protein supplementation can only be gained with experience and by being very attuned to how your body is feeling during recovery days. Trust me, once you get a feel for it, your gains will be massive, you will be leaner and you will save money.

Branch Chain Amino Acids

A must for muscle protein synthesis post workout. If you have them in your protein supplement, you probably don't need to spend money on these. If not, get some.

Glutamine

This is another supplement that you can skip if you can find it included in your protein drink. This stuff is primarily for joint repair and immune system support. It helps keep your body in good shape for the next workout.

Creatine

A lot of trainers and gym vets swear by this supplement. I have never used it except for when it was a part of my protein drink.

The advice given in Scrawny to Brawny is once again common sense and balanced. There is no need for a creatine loading phase. Just add a single scoop to your energy and recovery protein drinks and don't think any more about it.

I would also only recommend investment in creatine after you have:

- Dialed in your nutrition.

- Maximized your training routine.

You are eating and growing well enough already. You are pushing good to heavy weight every workout with great recovery and high intensity. If this is you, then creatine may be worth investing in as I am now considering doing for the first time.

My reasoning for this is that if you are still figuring out your diet and training routine, you will simply not benefit from creatine.

Will it help? Probably. But with so much money to be spent on supplements, I would rather you invest in a high grade and more expensive protein supplement than add creatine to a cheap COSTCO no-name brand $20 weight gainer.

To sum up. When it comes to supplementation:

- natural food first
- protein supplement second
- everything else last.

And only if your own research into it proves to you that it is a quality supplement and worth the investment. Everything else is just smoke and mirrors to remove money from your wallet as fast as you can say 6-pack abs in an hour with this one pill!!!

Which brings us to the most important part of building muscle naturally—rest and recovery. Stay tuned.

Read More: The #1 Reason You're Struggling To Gain Muscle

Maximus Decimus Meridius
Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

Why Heterosexual Men Should Boycott Starbucks

February 26, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

While there are dozens of corporations that are on board with the homosexual agenda, the one company that has been particularly active in spending millions of dollars to legalize homosexual marriage is Starbucks. They have been so hellbent on pushing gay marriage that shareholders have called out the company for operating like a homosexual charity that happens to sell coffee. It should not also surprise you that they are big donors to Planned Parenthood, a eugenics organization that proudly profits from the sale of dead fetuses. For these reasons, I wonder if all heterosexual men should stop spending money on the company.

The day after the Supreme Court ruling that legally endorsed gay marriage in the United States, I was at Berlin's central station waiting for a train to Poland. With time to kill, I decided to grab an espresso at its Starbucks. This is what greeted me at the entrance:

AIDS in every cup

I paused, stared at the rainbow cup, and realized that by purchasing the espresso, I would be monetarily supporting Starbucks and their pro-homosexual, pro-abortion, and anti-heterosexual agenda. I went somewhere else instead, and since then I have tapered my Starbucks visits, even going to proletariat shops like Dunkin' Donuts and 7-11 to get my coffee fix. I have been inconvenienced numerous times in seeking out an alternative venue, especially while in the United States.

The CEO of Starbucks, Howard Schultz, is so in favor of anything homosexual that one has to wonder if he developed Starbucks as a vehicle to push this particularly sinister agenda, which began surfacing in 2011. His intentions became crystal clear in January of 2012 when he allowed a vice president to make a statement that began official support for the destruction of traditional marriage (PDF).

> We are deeply dedicated to embracing diversity and treating one another with respect and dignity, and remain committed to providing an inclusive, supportive and safe work environment for all of our partners.

This was further clarified when Starbucks backed attempts by degenerates to allow homosexual marriage in Washington State:

> Starbucks said in a statement Tuesday that it was "proud to join other leading Northwest employers in support of Washington state legislation recognizing marriage equality for same-sex couples."
>
> "This important legislation is aligned with Starbucks' business practices and upholds our belief in the equal treatment of partners," the statement read.
>
> Last year, Starbucks was among a group of 70 businesses and organizations that filed a brief in federal court opposing the Defense of Marriage Act, which restricts the definition of marriage to that between a man and a woman.

Starbucks has not been shy to spend money on lawyers to get involved with the courts to specifically legalize homosexual marriage. Their corporate legal department was one of 379 to petition the Supreme Court to re-write the rules of traditional marriage and inevitably make it easier for two homosexual men to get married and adopt young boys.

When a prominent shareholder accused Starbucks of putting the gay agenda in front of business, Schultz told him that the gay agenda is more important than profit, and he can sell his shares if he doesn't like it.

> Was Schultz taken aback? Not in the least. He responded, "Not every decision is an economic decision. Despite the fact that you recite statistics that are narrow in time, we did provide a 38% shareholder return over the last year. I don't know how many things you invest in, but I would suspect not many things, companies, products, investments have returned 38% over the last 12 months. Having said that, it is not an economic decision to me. The lens in which we are making that decision is through the lens of our people. We employ over 200,000 people in this > company, and we want to embrace diversity. Of all kinds."

Many Americans think corporations exist solely to enrich their shareholders, but when it comes to the progressive agenda, ideology trumps profit.

If you had any doubt about Starbucks' support of homosexuals above that of heterosexual marriage and tradition, take a look at company headquarters the day after the Supreme Court ruling:

There was also a press release where Schultz bragged about how far Starbucks has bent over to support homosexuals:

> Being open, inclusive and forward-thinking is at the core of what Starbucks is about. Starbucks has been a longtime advocate for the LGBT community and marriage equality. The company filed an amicus brief to the Supreme Court case challenging the Defense of Marriage Act in 2013 and signed onto The People's Brief earlier this year.

The shocker of the decade is that they've since become leading corporate activists for transsexuals. In the next five years they may even swap out their mermaid logo for something more fitting of their value system.

The cherry on top is Starbucks' support for Planned Parenthood, an organization that earns profits by removing fetuses from the bodies of women before chopping them up for sale.

If evil comes in beverage form, it would have a Starbucks logo on it. If you are against the platform shared by feminists, social justice warriors, and liberals, I strongly urge you not to patronize Starbucks and its associated brands (Seattle's Best, Teavana, Evolution Fresh, and Tazo Tea). Otherwise, every purchase you make at the chain goes into the pocket of a company that has vigorously used both marketing and legal means to push an agenda that goes against the values of decency and traditional family.

It's hard not to feel a sort of hopelessness about the direction of Western culture. Traditional layers of society are being methodically removed for a degenerate experiment that seems to have a grand goal of destroying the family unit. Homosexual marriage was just one step over the past few decades that also included women's suffrage, feminism, abortion, and birth control.

While our power is limited to reverse this direction, there are still things that we can control. One of them is to remove financial support of corporations that go against what we believe is right, a few dollars at a time. There are many more companies that support gay marriage, some of which we simply can't avoid, but Starbucks was especially active and so they deserve to be punished for accelerating the decline of Western morals and tradition. I will do all I can to enact that punishment.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Why Homosexual Marriage Matters For Straight Men

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why You Should Consider Planting A Garden

February 26, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Spring is just around the corner, and I urge every man to consider planting a garden. First, there is the obvious food source. A garden is a frugal investment, which can provide months of crops. The quality of food will be higher than anything you can buy in a store, and it can be produced pesticide-free. Second, gardening develops an important survival skill that is fun and rewarding. Third, you are making an important step towards self sufficiency, and lastly, you stop contributing to agribusiness profits.

Financial savings

Have you looked at the cost of organic produce lately? I've found that many times you can buy a small plant for the price of the fruit or leaves that are already on it. For example, herb plants such as basil, parsley, sage, etc. cost $3 at my local grocery store, whereas the cuttings of herbs in the produce section cost roughly the same. You could literally just buy the plant, use its leaves for their superior freshness as compared to the dying clippings, and toss the rest of the plant in the garbage when you are done and come out the same as buying the herb cuttings only.

If you plant, feed, and water the plant, you will have a year's worth of fresh herbs. Likewise, last year a bell pepper seedling from WalMart cost less than two bell peppers. If you only get two peppers off the plant, you will break even, and of course your product will be fresher and natural.

Bedrock of civilization

She's focused on the farmer

Agriculture was the first step of human civilization. Prior to developing agriculture, or literally, "tillage of the soil," humans were hunter gatherers, dependent on finding food every day in order to survive. Just imagine how different life would be if we had to spend hours every day just to find food.

At the beginning of the 20th century, about a third of Americans worked in agriculture. Farming touched all families and was a way of life. And why shouldn't it be? Eating well provides a foundation for developing a strong body and mind. Today around 4% of the workforce is involved in agriculture, due to factory farms, corporate farming techniques, and automation. By growing your own food, you are participating in one of the fundamental activities that fuel human civilization, and you will feel a connection to your food and your body.

Health benefits

If you are eating something from your garden, I can guarantee it is healthier than whatever your alternative meal was. Eating a diet rich in fresh fruits and vegetables will give you more energy, and studies show that a meal from unprocessed whole foods is highly beneficial. Further, many of our diets are poor in minerals, and this can be traced back to poor nutrients in soils in commercial farms. Minerals are absorbed by plants through the roots, and natural food consumption is the best way to increase your intake of vitamins and minerals.

What to plant?

My advice is to start out with something you already enjoy eating, or know you will eat. Tomatoes are a common choice, and tomato plants are among the cheapest and easiest to grow. It's also surprisingly easy to grow lettuce, kale, arugula, cabbage, broccoli, okra, radishes, turnips, and carrots in a relatively small area.

If you have a little more space, try potatoes, onions, cucumbers, watermelons, or blueberries. I've found myself eating things I've never even bought or tried before. For example, I don't think I've ever purchased a turnip, but I've made a delicious and easy turnip meal just by boiling them with butter, salt, and pepper, and eating a large root vegetable like turnips is an excellent source of minerals. Your local home supply store, hardware store, or even Wal Mart will have a good supply of seedlings that are popular for your area.

What do you need?

If you have an area of at least 10 square feet of ground with good direct sun, you can purchase small seed trays for planting seeds rather cheaply. I found a 6×6 starting tray at the dollar store for $4, and it’s prepackaged with soil. Just buy seeds (often less than a dollar a package, more for heirloom or organic), plant inside in a warm place, and wait.

To germinate, seeds need only heat and moisture. Germination can take from a couple of days to a couple of weeks. After you see the seedlings poke through the earth, place them in sunlight until they are a few inches high, and transfer to your garden. If this is your first time, don’t worry too much about what varieties or what type of trays you are buying—just do it. It will be a learning experience and you can move on to a more complicated garden next year.

Urban gardening

I recently stumbled across some excellent how-to videos from GrowingYourGreens. I came across his most popular video, which is how to grow 53 plants in 4 square feet with a vertical container garden. If you have limited space, check out the video for advice and info on how to turn even the tiniest of space into a gardening area. I have bookmarked the page, as it turns out they are the most popular gardening videos on Youtube. Whatever topic you're interested in, from composting to hydroponics to seed selection, this hippie has it covered.

Part of neomasculinity is becoming self sufficient in all facets and developing important skills and valuable resources. Take the challenge and grow something this year. Some of my personal favorites are bell peppers, broccoli, tomatoes, basil, sage, mint, and the best strawberry I've ever tasted came out of my garden last year. Feel free to share your experiences in the comments.

Read More: 10 Reasons You Should Become A Survivalist

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How Philosophy Can Revive Your Dormant Critical Thinking Skills

February 26, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

I suppose it is no surprise that, in our era, plagued by low standards and over a century of Modernist programming, many persons think it is a mark of intelligence or tough-mindedness to be radically skeptical of any certain truths apart from the "empirical" sciences. Religion is but a "blue-pill" form of thought control, presuming to teach us peasants how to think. Certainly I felt this way during my atheist days. But the disappearance of the gift of Faith is consequent to the loss of real knowledge, the disappearance of the queen of the sciences, and the multiplication of impiety and folly.

Some people don't want to be told "how to think." In my experience, what they usually mean, is they don't want to be told what to think; but the art of thinking clearly—i.e., knowing how to think—is in short supply in our day. I often marvel that the men who have come to realize that the media, schools and culture have lied to them about feminism, do not suspect they've also lied about everything else, and suppressed the first elements of thought. Indeed, the necessary prerequisite for implementing feminism and other leftist ideas, was to shatter the unity of Christendom and undermine her culture, which had become the treasury of the whole, Western canon.

For us, who have been raised and educated under the domination of the leftist establishment, much of what we think we know is false, on many topics. And even when we are dealing with accurate information, we are discouraged from learning, training and certainly from mastering, any penetrating power of thoughtful analysis.

To the extent that thinking is praised, "critical thinking" is usually praised; most people understand that term, in a way that foments a culture of radical skepticism. Only thought that knows how to doubt, is viewed as rigorous or tough-minded. I would need to look into the matter more, but I suspect this is closely related to the dominance of “critical theory” and deconstructive thought. Indeed, this is what Western Civilization is now—a mass of loathed, deconstructed, disemboweled matter for all to piss upon.

I would characterize rigorous thought as alternatingly analytical and synthetic, rather than critical. “Critical” can simply mean “of such a nature as to make judgments,” and by that definition I think the term is acceptable. But I think most people associate the term with a more winnowing approach. A keen mind should be discerning and discriminatory, making distinctions and breaking things down into their parts; likewise, a powerful mind is synthetic, capable of understanding the relationships between things, and using that knowledge to generate something positively. I hate to use the term “originality,” because we are dealing with the universe as it has been given to us, and “there is nothing new under the sun.” But what most people would call a “creative” or “original” mind, I would describe as a mind with such a keen power of synthesis, that it is highly fecund and procreative, highly capable of producing insights that seem novel to us, feeble men.

I will eventually get around to an analysis of the ideological ruination of Western Civilization over the past half a millennium. But I think a grounding in the art of thought, as the Western tradition developed it, will be the best first step. Besides, it will make the other topic more rewarding. I am now tackling the Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy, written by Cardinal Mercier (some of you may remember that I recommended his treatise on Christian Mortification in the past); I look forward to reading this erudite tome by a man who clearly had his bona fides in intellect, ascesis and sanctity. As I work through it, I thought it would be good to simplify it, and use it as a guided tour through European philosophy.

What, exactly, is philosophy?

Philosophy is a science, in the pure sense of the term—i.e., a field of knowledge. Probably many of you already object to this idea; indeed, as we go on, we will see how powerful an influence is exerted by the mere words we commonly use to refer to things. But in any case, “science” is from Latin scientia, which simply means “knowledge.” Cardinal Mercier observes a trend in his day, which is now quite pervasive. The explosion of the positive sciences and the increasing accuracy of man’s investigative instruments, led to an increasing conviction that only such things as the positive sciences could examine and verify, empirically, were confidently known to be true, and merited the title of “science.”

Philosophy thus came to be viewed as a shadowy field of speculation and possibly mysticism, a smorgasboard of mere opinion. Yet if one considers, for a moment, that mathematical reasonings can be perceived as true by the mind, without needing to translate those reasonings into real-world operations, one can begin to perceive that the mind may know rational and philosophical truths as certainly as other sciences (or perhaps more certainly).

Well, then, what kind of science is it? The Cardinal explains:

> Philosophy does not profess to be a particularized science, with a place alongside other such sciences, and with a restricted domain of its own for investigation; it comes after the particular sciences and ranks above them, dealing in an ultimate fashion with their respective objects, inquiring into their connections and the relations thereof, until finally it arrives at notions so simple that they defy analysis, and so general that there is no limit to their application. So understood, philosophy will exist as long as there are men endowed with the ability and energy to push the inquiry of reason to its furthest limit. So understood, it is a living fact, and has an history of more than two thousand years.

The Cardinal points out that those who doubt philosophy’s power to penetrate to such truths, who pride themselves on being “positivists” (on the pretense that they deal only with positive facts), or “agnostics” (boasting that they do not concern themselves with what lies beyond immediate facts), still have their own general theories about things, and must take certain things for granted—i.e., on faith—which are requisite for their confidence in what knowledge they have.

He continues, by pointing out the distinguishing feature of thought (i.e., the simplicity and universality of ideas), which also gives us the general notion of philosophy. What is this?

The human mind does not take the sum total of reality in at a glance (or, at a thought). We think discursively, when we think in our limited, human fashion. He uses the example of a copper-sulphate crystal. The man perceiving it does not know all about it at once; he perceives a degree of its unity by analogy, of course, but he also perceives its separate characteristics (it is blue, it is crystalline, it is hard, etc.), and would need to keep investigating and making many more distinctions, indeed, if he wanted to really understand all he could about it (of what atoms are its molecules made? why does it form in this manner? what is its origin? for what can it be used? etc.).

The separate consideration of a thing’s notes, is an abstractive thought process (from Latin abstrahere, “pull away”); the consideration of all these notes coinciding in one, integral object of the mind, is a unitive thought process. The extent of the notes an object of the mind has, is called the comprehension of an idea (from Latin comprehendere, “pull together), whereas the range of application an idea has (i.e., the greater or lesser number of things it can apply to) is called its extension (from Latin extendo, “stretch out”).

One can see that the comprehension and extension of an idea are inversely related; a simpler idea has a more general application, a complex idea is more specific. “Blue” is a very simple; it has a single note, a very small comprehension, and therefore its extension is very broad—“blue” can extend and apply to many things. But, “a thing extended in three dimensions of space, prism in shape, bluish in color, taken from the copper mine nearby, currently in my hand” is an idea with many more elements in its comprehension, and therefore its extension is rather specific, applying only to the copper-sulfate in my hand.

Since the simplicity and universality of ideas go hand-in-hand like this, one can see how, in order to explain anything, man's mind must first consider a thing abstractly in its simplest components, breaking it down to the maximum extent possible, with a view to putting it all back together, thus explaining it as an whole by means of its simplest elements. The irreducibly simple, elementary objects of thought, by which other things are understood, are called principles (and, in some contexts, reasons). The Cardinal states:

> Principles, or fundamental reasons, are the ultimate solutions to the problems the human mind inevitably proposes every time it sets itself to reflect upon the world or upon itself. They supply the answers to the last why and wherefore that reason asks.

Continuing to paraphrase his thought, we can thus say that philosophy is the most general science; its field of study, involves the simplest principles of broadest extension, whereby all other objects of thought are explained. Of these principles and causes, Aristotle said: διὰ γὰρ ταῦτα καὶ ἐκ τούτων τἆλλα γνωρίζεται ἀλλ᾽ οὐ ταῦτα διὰ τῶν ὑποκειμένων ("for through and by these things, other things are known; but these things are certainly not known by their mere appearances").

And with that, we make a beginning of philosophy.

Read More: Self Improvement Is Not Just For Young Guys

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Kesha Receives Support From Big-Name Celebrities For A “Rape” She Said Never Happened

February 27, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A judge has ruled against singer Kesha in her recent attempt to “free” herself from a contract with producer Dr. Luke (real name Lukasz Gottwald). Despite her 2011 deposition, made under oath, that Dr. Luke did not assault her, she has subsequently accused him of ten years of rape, including through drugs, and other serious physical abuse. In support of Kesha, dozens of well-known celebrities have called her a victim and Taylor Swift has even given her $250,000. Beyond that, hundreds of thousands have roared on Twitter and other mediums that the uncharged Dr. Luke is a “rapist” because Kesha says so.

When I first brought this story to you, things were bad enough. The mob mentality was out in force and there is no doubt that Dr. Luke was a lynching just waiting to happen. Now things have regressed to the stage where many of these celebrities, like singer Demi Lovato, have insisted that it is “gender equality” for a woman to be able to extricate herself from her “rapist” and a contract without evidence, not to mention a conviction or even a charge. If we took such a proposition to a logical conclusion, you should be able get out of your rental or home loan agreement based on your testimony, not what actual evidence you produce in a court of law.

Fanfare and logic-killing emotions aside, in 2011 Kesha incontrovertibly said that she had never had sex with Dr. Luke, let alone been raped by him. If Kesha is the victim of a decade of sexual and other abuse, explain this one:

> pic.twitter.com/D9c3m7THoX
> — Dr. Luke Doctor Luke (@TheDoctorLuke) February 22, 2016

The Daily Mail reveals, too, that Kesha filmed herself making this sort of denial. Do not expect Kesha's supporters (more like, mindless zombies) to appropriately mention this little detail. Once again, we are accosted by hordes of people who want nothing a female does or says held against them later. A woman can indulge in whatever behavior or utter any statement she likes and she should never be held accountable for it if she radically changes her mind. Imagine the prospects of an accused rapist who admitted the crime and then reversed his plea. There would be no sympathy, regardless of any immoral or illegal pressure put on him to initially confess.

Many are criticizing that Dr. Luke posted parts of a TMZ report to show how Kesha's story reversed itself. Well, my response to that is this: "Did CNN bother to break the story in such a dramatic way? No. The Huffington Post? No. The Guardian, The New York Times, or Chicago Tribune? Triple no." Kesha has not denied she said these things and they were indeed her responses under oath.

If mainstream media outlets were interested in a fair and impartial reporting of events, not pro-feminist propaganda, at least one of them would have carried this as front page news. Dozens and dozens and dozens of world-recognized English-speaking dailies either did not know or chose to keep it under wraps. What we have here is confirmation bias at its finest: so-called journalists only looking for the stories and employing the angles they like and agree with.

Kesha's lawyer falsely claimed Dr. Luke raped Lady Gaga and even she denied it

Mark Geragos, lawyer to Rihanna-hitting Chris Brown, convicted wife-killer Scott Peterson… and urine-drinking Kesha.

Kesha's lawyer, Mark Geragos, had the hide in 2014 to allege that Dr. Luke raped Lady Gaga. Unfortunately for Geragos, Lady Gaga definitively squashed the accusation and said it never happened. Meanwhile, the celebrity attorney declined to either retract or apologize for the slandering. Geragos is just one of many moronically-mouthed individuals trying to stir up life-altering negative ramifications for Dr. Luke. Knowing full well he does not have a mere strand of hair to try and make a wig, Geragos should have been disbarred long ago for such behavior.

With or without Geragos' involvement, the situation for Dr. Luke will nonetheless continue to spiral out of control. The hit squads have gone from brigades and divisions to full-blown armies, cementing a lifetime of mendaciously-produced notoriety for the innocent music producer. Sony has stuck by him so far, ignoring the shouts of "rape enablers!" from Kesha supporters, but the profound damage to his career has been done. Whether he has millions left in the bank or not (and we cannot be sure, really), no man of any financial or social standing deserves to have their name and reputation vindictively dragged through the sewers of ill-informed public rage.

A major reminder for readers

Would we be so sympathetic as a society to a man accused of rape who had drank his own urine? In fact, this would be used against him. Yet Kesha did that and also reversed her 2011 testimony denying she was raped. How credible does this make her?

In a number of my previous articles, I have opined about the reality that the media as a whole will not trouble itself to even start supporting due process and innocence before guilt until the biggest of holes appears in a girl's story. Before that point, it is open season for press "coverage" and speculation that equates a rape allegation with an indisputable finding of fact. When outlets are proven conclusively wrong, most still do not bother to unambiguously correct the record, apologize profusely, and promise to make marked changes in how they report related claims in the future.

I welcome the use of any clear evidence disproving allegations of rape that have been fabricated. Yet this is not nearly enough, not by a long shot. Justice will not be served across the system until such time as men like Dr. Luke are afforded the basic rights the courts and political processes outside them insist they enshrine. Aside from the presumption of innocence and the idea that charges need to be laid quickly before public rape allegations are taken anything close to seriously, judges and juries need to start to apply the standard of proof for these cases that they would for other crimes.

If Dr. Luke had been accused of a violent burglary in Manhattan or L.A., 99% of the time the state, in order to get him convicted, would require something like DNA evidence, CCTV footage, recovery of the stolen goods at his home, or ten very consistent witness accounts of the same incident (i.e. not ten witnesses across ten crimes). Due to the fact that rape is invariably a private act (dispelling forever the idea of "rape culture"), courts have shamefully responded by gerrymandering the standard of proof demanded to produce more convictions, all while pretending it is still beyond reasonable doubt. For those who are not charged, like Dr. Luke, it is left to the public alone to convict using these farcically low thresholds for finding "guilt."

Are you next?

"Why didn't you say earlier that Lady Gaga supports Kesha's rape allegations? They must be true then!"

Your story will not, as far as I know, reach the front page of newspapers and websites read or visited by millions of people. But you are at risk. In all likelihood, too, you will lack the kind of money that Dr. Luke may have retained to survive a lifetime of serious harassment and unemployability.

It is incumbent on all sane-minded men to contribute to reversing this totalitarian climate of witch hunts and social lynchings. Promising cases aside, things are in many ways getting worse. Facts and fair processes are being divorced from reality like never before. So start small and work your way up to help foster positive change. Dr. Luke is simply a more famous example of what countless men everywhere have gone through and will go through in the future.

Read More: Twitter Feminists "Convict" Singer Kesha's Music Producer Of Rape

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How Creating Outgroups Manufactures Outrage

February 27, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

In this article, I'll use the Return Of Kings meetup outrage as a way to take a look at human behavior, especially when we encounter people we disagree with. More specifically, I'll use it as a way to talk about in-groups and out-groups. Recently, throughout the Return Of Kings media blow up, we witnessed the behavior of people at their finest when leftists, feminists, and social justice warriors attacked ROK readers. They threatened violence, death, and directed their most toxic venom at Roosh himself. You saw the worst of human nature up close, with full endorsement from the media machine.

When Can You Trust The Media?

Give me my social media suppository

Suppose there was a case where a feminist writer had a large online presence, sold many self-published books, and had thousands of followers. This feminist is a firebrand who gained notoriety for writing things like “Men must submit to women,” “Men are weak,” and promoted a way of thinking that women should always lead men. For anyone who isn’t a fan of hers, all they’ve ever heard are the most extreme segments of her writing.

The media later reports headlines along the lines of “Pro-Castration Feminist To Hold Rallies Worldwide.” Journalists claim this feminist writer is now promoting the castration of men based on a satirical article she wrote. Articles are released claiming she is holding meetings in dozens of cities centered on the idea that it should be “legal to castrate men on private property.”

Most of us would think she was insane, some of us would read the article, and a few would want to draw the worst conclusions from it. Some of us might say things like, “Yeah, she says it’s satire but this is how they actually think.”

Of course, the media would not treat this feminist nearly as horribly as they treated Roosh, and the masses would not be triggered the way they were as a result of the ROK meetup announcement. But I’m not talking about the sheep, the media, or feminists. I’m talking about you. About us. We would not react in a violent rage, and we wouldn’t threaten violence to anyone, but many of us would be angry. If we had the full endorsement of the machine to behave in any way we wanted, the way feminists currently do, it is possible that we might also act differently when we encounter a provocative article online and are fully encouraged by the machine to vent our rage.

How To Identify An Out-group

But who has the hotter chicks?

Now, let’s talk about descriptions. While reading about the outrage (and trolling on Twitter), I noticed something interesting about the words leftists used to characterize us:

- “These guys all think women owe them something”
- “Typical rapist bro”
- “Another loser pick up artist”
- “They all even speak the same”

What is the most common thread linking these sorts of comments together? “These guys are all the same.” For them, we are an indistinguishable bro-y, rape-y, douche-y mass. This is exactly how an in-group identifies an out-group.

We think the SJWs who are poisoned by a false ideology are all indistinguishable. For them, we follow a worthless philosophy and are indistinguishable. We see their idiocy and they see the same in us. We see collapse at the end of the progressive tunnel, and they see something equally terrible if we return to patriarchy. Engaging one of them and saying their progressive beliefs are wrong would be like them engaging you by saying your neomasculine beliefs are wrong.

Is The Out-Group Worth Hating?

How can I possibly know if I've got consent?	Women love sending men to war	"Cunt"	"Independent women," ha!	Feminists love alimony
We hunted the mammoth	"Misogynist is the new n-word."	The word "cunt" isn't sexist	"Females"	Rationalization hamster
"Financial abortion"	"I'm an equalist"	MEN'S RIGHTS BINGO (free square)	Men are jailed on nothing but a woman's word	Women start wars
Oprah = Feminism	MISANDRY!!	"Pussy cartel"	When we develop fembots you'll be sorry!	I'd love to be "objectified"
Bitches	Let's invade the comments section!	Golddigging women	Women leech off men	They will come running when civilization falls

Full disclosure: I’d probably fuck a fembot

One of the principles of in-group versus out-group behavior is that the in-group applies stereotypes to the out-group. This means that we personally and carefully evaluate people who are in our in-groups, and generally and hastily assess people in the out-groups. To put it another way, we treat in-group members as individuals, and respond to the out-group as members of a class or category.

We more often notice the differences between those who are in our in-groups. For members of the out-group, we emphasize their similarities. For an historical example, think about World War II. To the American in the 1940s the Japanese were shifty and treacherous individuals, not to be trusted. For the Japanese, the Americans were hypocritical and uncultured because the American missionaries and salesmen, who the Japanese had the most contact with, seemed to have flimsy ethics and bad manners.

To take a relevant example, to members of the ROK community, all SJWs seem to look alike and seem basically indistinguishable from one another. We all know the markers: Short hair, neon coloring, overweight, etc. These are stereotypes for a reason.

Still, this is exactly how leftists see us. As soon as you classify yourself as a supporter of masculinity, patriarchy, or traditional values, you are no longer a complete human being with unique thoughts, feelings, and opinions. You are a member of the out-group.

If you try explaining to them that you are not a monster, but a man who just thinks maybe something is wrong with society, they don't hear that. All they hear is, "I am a member of the out-group. I believe in crazy things that will oppress people. I might also hate anyone who doesn't look like me or think like me."

If you don't believe me, try to flip this. Imagine that you are having a conversation with a girl, and suddenly she tells you that she is a major feminist, read all the literature, and thinks there is something wrong with society. At that point, she starts telling you what she thinks would help. Would you listen to her?

Can A Feminist Feel Love?

SJ BUZZWORD BINGO
PRO BLEM ATIC	ABLEISM	RACISM	NECKBEARD	(SASSY .GIF)
EDUCATE YOURSELF	MISOGYNY	TRIGGER	RAPE CULTURE	TRANS* PHOBIA
AP PRO PRIATION	YOU SOUND WHITE/ MALE/ (INSERT HERE).	FREE SPACE	SLUR!	SHAMING
GO STEP ON LEGOS	POLICING	INTER NALISED	HOMO PHOBIA	LACK OF SPOONS TO RESPOND
VICTIM BLAMING	CHECK YOUR PRIVILEGE	WHITE WASHING	DE RAILING	(PASSIVE AGGRESSIVE REMARK)

These can all be replaced with the lower right square

A second principle of in-group versus out-group behavior is group signaling. For social identification, it is just as important to show disapproval of the out-group as it is to affirm the values of your in-group.

We saw a ton of this during the ROK outrage. All over social media and protest groups we saw people posting things to show their friends that they disapproved of rape, which is a very courageous stance to take. The ROK protestors were attempting to gain status among their peers by showing them that they are against whatever the media tells them ROK stands for.

This type of group membership thinking is so ingrained, that we even believe only our in-group has certain capabilities for thoughts and feelings, whereas for the out-group, their capabilities have a more limited range. Depending on the out-group we will assign one set of capabilities but not others. For example, we might assign to a group capabilities like planning, manipulation, and cold logic but not the capability for others like pain, desire, or sadness. For another out-group, we might attribute to them the ability to feel love, empathy, or happiness but not the capability for planning, manipulation, and higher-order thinking.

Look at how one feminist describes a related idea:

> A few articles have been making the internet rounds recently about horrifying discoveries that seemingly normal men were actually part of the "manosphere.'

Seemingly normal. It's as though we have in our minds a list like "human qualities" which we attribute to our in-group, but out-groups can only have a few of those traits, but never all of them. That group can only think, that group can only feel, but we can do both. The out-group cannot be capable of feeling the entire range of thoughts and emotions, otherwise we might mistake them for being human.

Put your beliefs to the test

But why does any of this matter—why should you care that you are an out-group to your out-group? Three reasons. First, by temporarily adopting the other position, you will strengthen your own argument for why neomasculinity is truly a better philosophy than leftism. Second, you will be able to more quickly identify true believers in leftism and not waste energy trying to convert them. Third, you will more clearly know what you are up against by subjecting your own beliefs to rigorous examination.

As strongly as you hold your beliefs, the leftists hold theirs equally strongly. But if you have the benefit of understanding this, it is to your advantage.

Read More: How 4Chan Discredited A Culture Of Outrage

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

4 Reasons Why Gyms Should Be For Men Only

February 28, 2016 | by Kenzie Atkins | Link | Original Link

I am an amateur bodybuilder. I look after myself, have structured workout plans, and my nutrition is on point. I take very specific supplements with the goal of building muscle, keeping a good tone, and of course increasing my testosterone levels. I have made a commitment to myself to improve my body and mind, and I find nothing more frustrating than walking into the gym and finding it full of women and estrogen.

Lets be clear here—I am in no way trying to argue that women should not work out. After all, women only have any discernible sexual marketplace value (SMV) for about ten years, with it dropping dramatically after they reach their thirties. If there is anything that is going to reduce a woman's SMV quicker and earlier it's going to be them not looking after their bodies.

I also do not have an issue with the idea of women-only gyms, which are already popping up everywhere; the justification for this being that women feel more confident working out in a woman-only environment. Anything that gets women to look after themselves so that they can be more appealing to men is a winner in my book.

Strangely when it was suggested that a male-only gym might open here in the UK, there was a massive uproar from the liberal and feminist quarter. The suggestion that a men-only club would promote misogyny (because that would be so terrible) and that men together would become secretive, I guess the idea being we would club together and disagree with the feminist agenda.

This article is about the reasons men only gyms are important to neomasculinity and how they assist men with two very important parts of this ideology; self improvement and testosterone.

1. It would increase testosterone levels and competitiveness

There are hundreds or studies and peer reviewed articles that show a direct link between exercise and and increase in testosterone levels, with weightlifting providing a greater boost than any other type of workout; deadlifts have been shown to increase testosterone by higher amounts for example.

As men we know very well the benefits of testosterone. It’s quite honestly the building block of masculinity and higher levels of this hormone increase desirable male characteristics. There has also been a strong link between increases in testosterone and men in close proximity or working out together. It appears that just being around other men with racing testosterone levels can help to increase your own hormonal balance.

If you have ever been to a gym with other men, I bet you also picked a higher weight or rep, possibly worked out for longer, and worked harder. This is because testosterone (amongst other desirable traits) makes men more competitive and stronger. Working out with other men increases your competitiveness and forces you to push yourself and improve your personal best.

2. It would mean that men would only give up equipment for other men.

Let me set the scene—you have gone into the gym with the intention of working your legs, you have a set routine, and it's coming up to the squat part of your workout. You go to the squat rack to find that it is being used by a woman who has a bar weight of 20kg (50 lbs).

Now in an ideal world we would go up and tell her to "jog on" and find a more female appropriate piece of equipment; but unfortunately that is likely to get you removed from the gym. So now you have to wait and rearrange your workout to fit around this woman, who in all reality should be concentrating on cardio to lose that fat rather than a more masculine workout.

I have no issue with rearranging my own workout to fit around another man undertaking a proper workout. Furthermore, men are much more cooperative with each other in a gym environment and willing to to give a nod when they are finished, or allow you to jump in during their rest times if the weights are the same.

If we must have mixed gyms then there should be a rule if a man approaches the squat rack and it's being used by a woman she should step aside and let him jump ahead of her.

3. It would stop the distractions

We are all men, and let's be honest we are often checking women. There are some alright women in the gym and this can be a distraction during a time when we should be concentrating on our workout and improving ourselves. From a personal point of view I also find the the women of high body fat distracting, not because I am checking them out, but rather because I am disgusted at having to watch them wobble around the gym.

4. It would encourage brotherhood and male bonding

Men are competitive and can be aggressive towards each other when competing for resources. However, they are also by far more supportive of other men. Women are irrational, emotional, and caustic towards each other. We work better together, and are more willing to support each other to achieve our common aims. Mixed gyms discourage this kind of fellowship by changing the dynamic. Instead of the positive competitiveness of sport, there is a tendency to compete for the “cute” girl.

Men only gyms would encourage the positive traits of brotherhood and support, while giving us a distraction free to improve ourselves. Why not give it a try?

Read More: 9 Reasons Why You Should Say No To Fitness Gyms

Kenzie Atkins

I am an amateur bodybuilder who is also a healthcare professional and an interest in writing on the side. Swallowed the red pill a while ago but recently got an unexpected double dose.

Will The Swedish Negro Ball (Negerboll) Survive The Era Of Political Correctness?

February 28, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

They're brown, sweet, and probably Milo Yiannopoulos's favourite pastry if he ever tasted them. I'm referring to the popular Swedish negerbollar ("negro balls" as translated into English).

I remember making them with my mother as a kid. We used butter, cocoa, rolled oats, sugar and black coffee, mixed it up and then rolled the dough into small balls. On top of them we sprinkled pearl sugar, but it's also common to use coconut flakes. Our negro balls were so good that I would have eaten them all at once if my mother hadn't made me wait.

Back then, I wasn't really aware of concepts like political correctness and racism, and I didn't think that it was still relevant to talk about racism in this day and age. I thought no one cared about skin color anymore. I probably knew what "neger" (negro or nigger) meant, but I couldn't imagine that "negerbollar" could offend anybody. I guess I was naive, and I had no idea of how hypersensitive society was becoming.

But times have changed. Now you can't utter the n-word (as a white person) in any context without someone getting very upset. Very few people, at least in my age, would use the word neger. Instead we say black or dark-skinned person. But a lot of Swedes still say negerbollar.

Leftists have declared war on negerbollar

Fredrik Virtanen.

If you know what leftists are like, you know that they love policing language and, by extension, thought. They don't want you to say certain words and phrases because they can somehow be dangerous and offensive. They also think they can read minds and know that you're a racist when in fact you're not.

So, naturally, a lot of leftists have have spoken out against using the name negerbollar. They want us to say "chokladbollar" (chocolate balls) instead (which is the most unoriginal and boring name imaginable). The famous columnist Fredrik Virtanen says, "Negerboll is not a funny name for chocolate ball, it's racism." He thinks "white skins" are just filled with hatred for blacks: "Racism lives within us. It's a part of our European colonial heritage."

Another socialist, Daisy Kintu, thinks it's racist to defend even the right to say negerbollar. "Because the word has been used against black people, you as a white person can't sit and judge whether it's racist or not. The word hasn't been used against you, so sit down and listen instead."

White knight Jonas Stentäpp writes in the same vein: "It is not white people that should decide if the term negerboll is offensive, it is those who are subjected that should decide if it's offensive or not." So the basic idea is that white people should just shut up and not have an opinion on this subject. Logic and facts come second to skin color and level of grievance. It's SJW argumentation 101.

Making the dictionary PC

Leftists could celebrate a small victory last year when a new edition of the official Swedish dictionary was released. Words like “hen” (a gender neutral pronoun) and “intersektionalitet” (intersectionality) were added, while “negerboll” was removed. According to the man in charge of putting together the new dictionary, negerboll was thrown out not because it’s become out of use, but because some say it’s offensive.

The left has also tried to shut down shops where negerbollar are sold. In 2014, a store owner was reported to the police for selling them without using the PC name chocolate balls. The organization responsible for the report was Afrosvenskarnas riksförbund (kind of like the NAACP of Sweden). While the police found that no crime had been committed, the store owner still made a public apology and promised to change the name of the pastry.

Still some people have the guts to use the traditional term. A bakery in southern Sweden called one of their products Luxury Negerboll. “We have five different kinds of balls and they all can’t be called chocolate balls”, the boss said. After getting negative attention in the media, the name has now been changed to “Luxury N…boll.”

Anti-racist balls?

Despite what leftists say, I think eating negerbollar can actually be seen as an anti-racist act. If you really were a racist, would you be eating something that had the n-word in its name? If a white person putting negerbollar into his mouth isn’t a sign of tolerance, I don’t know what is.

Furthermore, putting white sugar on top of a brown ball exemplifies how combining colors can produce a great result. A racist person would prefer the ball to be either black or white, as mixing them would reduce the value of it. But of course you can use brown sugar instead of white, if you’re more leaning toward the black power side.

But the real question is: Are black people and white SJWs right in being offended by the name? I think not. When Swedes use the name negerbollar, they aren’t talking about a person or anything relating to people. They’re referring to an eatable chocolate flavored ball that gets its dark color from cocoa. “Neger” might be regarded as a derogatory term today, but it comes from the Latin word for black.

Racist crackers?

Imagine if white people were offended by the word “cracker” when being used to refer to biscuits. Would that make any sense? I’ve never heard of anyone being hesitant about saying cracker, yet most people are probably aware that it’s also a derogatory term for white people. It’s true that it doesn’t have the same connotations to slavery and oppression, but it’s still meant to be disparaging.

In the end it comes down to whether you’re willing to constantly adapt your language to the politically correct rules of the day, or not. SJWs will always find reasons to call white people racist, it’s a big part of their narrative, so you won’t solve anything by kowtowing to them.

For me personally, probably like many of you who visit this site, being told I can’t do something makes me want to do it even more. So I won’t stop saying negerbollar anytime soon. I also hope many more Swedish men find the courage to grow their own balls nice and big, and refuse to comply with the politically correct demands of the left.

Read More: How Political Correctness Killed 1,200 People

John Hydenius

John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.

@johnhydenius on Twitter

How To Do A Pistol Squat

February 28, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Training the leg muscles is a necessity for anybody who wants to do any sort of physical endeavor. Simply put, you're going to be standing on your legs throughout whatever sport it is you're playing, and stronger legs means you're going to run faster and jump higher.

Beyond actually training the skills needed in your sport—ie: pivots, jumping, running, etc., the best way to increase the performance of your legs is progressive resistance training. This will increase your muscular power, which will aid any rapid, explosive movement you're performing: such as sprinting, vertical leaps, and kicking.

The most obvious resistance training is that of the barbell squat and its numerous variations. Beyond the basic back squat, there's the front squat, the overhead squat, high and low bar squats, and a julienne more. Those will be discussed in another article, but today I will bring to you the second article in my series on progressive calisthenics: the squat progression, with the end goal being the mastery of the one legged "pistol" squat.

The reasons I advocate learning the pistol squat before doing barbell squats are the exact same reasons I gave for teaching you the one-armed pushups before I wrote any articles on weighted lifts. Namely, the pistol squats will provide a base of muscular strength and prepare the fitness novice for more demanding lifts in the future, they have almost no risk of injury, and they train the body to move unilaterally, an unusual movement that can only make you stronger when you lift actual weights.

Prepare Yourself For Your Trip to Russia

Any child who played through Street Fighter II saw Zangief and his merry KGB agents doing the Kazatsky in his ending and was inspired to run outside the arcade to try doing this, only to be completely incapable of bending his knee at that angle. At which point the child probably suffered some sort of injury.

Much like the one-armed pushup, mastery of the one-legged squat requires the central nervous system to be gradually trained to move in such a manner (for a more in-depth, biological explanation of why this phenomenon exists, please see that article. And just like the one-armed pushup, doing the two-armed variation won't prepare you for the rigors of the unilateral version, but it is the required starting point of the progression.

Step By Step

The first step of the squat progression is the standard two-legged squat, or "deep knee bend," an exercise that your elementary school gym teachers probably made you do before they rolled out the furniture dollies to waste your time for 45 minutes.

Yeah, I'm pulling out this picture again

To do the standard squat, place your feet shoulder width, and have the feet pointing straight ahead or slightly splayed out. You absolutely do not want your toes to be point inward, as this will cause your knees to knock inward, which can cause stress to your connective tissues. It is important to note that if your ankles or knees hurt when just standing in preparation for a squat, stop immediately and reposition your feet. As this is the same position that the barbell squat is done in, fixing form is imperative before weights are added.

From here, keep the back straight and bend down until your hamstrings touch your calves and you have gone “Ass to grass.” Keeping the head up and looking straight ahead helps me keep my torso fixed, as seen in the picture. Do ten of these.

#1

#2. For obvious reasons I have censored my face

From here you progress to the heels together squat, sometimes called the diamond squat akin to the diamond pushup: put the heels together, keep the back straight, and bend ass to grass like the regular squat. This does not really require any more muscular exertion than the regular deep knee bend, but the close proximity of the feet will force you to be off balance, and your body will be forced to compensate. And of course a minor drawback is that doing this exercise will make you look like a pouting emo teenager, but that is a necessary sacrifice. Once again, do ten of these.

#1

#2

Similar to the one-armed pushup, the next step will also require a basketball or something of similar size. The one-and-a-half leg squat will prepare the body for unilateral movements. Kick one leg out in the air, as pictured

#1

Then bend the other leg until you are ass to grass and the leg is sticking out and straight, with the opposite hand resting on the object (ie: left foot works with the right hand, and vice versa). Positions vary here: Some advocate a flat foot and the leg held in the air as the proper position, while I personally say it’s okay to squat on the ball of the foot and have the extended leg touching the floor, as below:

If you choose to have the leg touching the floor, make sure that it is fully extended and only your heel touches the ground-otherwise that foot will assist the lift, and thus take pressure off the squatting leg. Do this for both legs.

Once you can do ten of those, do half pistols-squat down about halfway and then come up. When you can go down all the way (not necessarily coming up), with both legs, move on to the next step.

The assisted pistol squat is similar to the assisted one-armed pushup (also similarly, I don't have a picture of it, as I don't own a ball currently)-extend the leg out with the heel resting on a basketball, then squat, rolling the basketball up to your knee. When you can do this 10 times with both legs, you are ready for the final step.

The pistol squat is done with the same form as the half pistol. Squat down all the way with one leg extended fully. You will probably have to start out by resting your hand on the floor—as before, do opposite hands and feet. Gradually take your hands off the floor. Perhaps you can embrace your inner cossack and cross your arms over your chest? While I can do the pistol squat, I admit I do not have the balance to do the hopak.

#1

#2

However you choose to integrate this exercise into your workout, it is a lower body exercise all athletes should learn.

Read More: 6 Tips To Build More Muscle During Your Workouts

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

8 Common Types Of Overly Promiscuous Girls

February 29, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Contrary to popular belief, all easy girls are not created equal. Sure, they all have exorbitant notch counts and seldom post pictures sans cleavage but each one is unique in terms of what drives them to spread ’em for man juice injection on the regular.

Since my neomasculine awakening I have met, bedded, and observed many, many different kinds of easy girls. Below I’ve listed the eight most common breeds I’ve come across, how to recognize them, and the bait required to bed them. Chances are you’ve probably come across a few of these yourselves. Let’s get to it.

1. The high sex drive

That ain't pain….those rosy cheeks say that's the look of a woman who needs the D

While all sluts love getting plowed by penises-a-plenty, there are some out there who seem to be in a perpetual state of ovulation. Their actions reflect their thoughts as they seem to hook up with different dudes just about every day of the week.

How to recognize them: The high sex drive slut isn't hard to spot. She will openly joke about it, broach the subject first during a set, and will make little effort to lower her voice. HSD sluts also make themselves known by occasionally flipping the script and actually approaching men at bars, clubs, coffee shops, grocery stores etc. This has happened to me on quite a few occasions and I rarely fail to convert.

Slut Bait: Standard game is usually all that's required, as she's likely ready to get on her knees after just a few minutes of conversation. Confidence and strong eye contact combined with a heavy dose of push-pull and kino will have her dropping her panties (if she's wearing any) in no time flat.

2. The "still got it guuurl"

Past the wall and something to prove

This particular breed has an insatiable desire to prove to herself and everyone around her that men still want to have sex with her. Be it a recent breakup, a lack of high SMV men between her legs, or her age, she'll do anything and everything to increase her notch count in an attempt to validate her sexual allure.

How to recognize them: Like the HSD slut, these broads stick out like a nun in a brothel. Post-wall females, recent divorcees, and single moms who've finally dropped the baby weight are all prime candidates for easy lays. She will also shamelessly flirt with you and make it very obvious that so long as you stay conscious, you're gettin' some action.

Slut bait: All you have to do with these chicks is make them feel attractive and you're solid. And not the beta way where you tell her how good she looks. Rather, show her you want to sleep with her by conspicuously staring at her breasts and letting her catch you or telling her to do a 360 so you can see her ass (bonus points for smacking it).

These sluts just need to feel desired, and if you're the man who makes her feel that way she'll be more than happy to "use" you to show her gurl-fraaaands "I still got it, girl!"

3. The ugly duckling

[image]

Most of us know girls who were ugly, fat, or both in high school before they became decent looking later in life. With those newfound good looks, comes newfound male attention which is something she is not used to. Like a kid with a new toy she plunges herself onto countless men because being lusted after was something she thought she'd never experience and now that she is, she doesn't know how to act.

How to recognize them: Look for the average to below average looking girl with an above average body who is unhealthily obsessed with working out and a Nazi about her diet (she'll make this obvious on social media). She's never going back to being invisible to males if she has to run till she pukes or starve herself for days on end.

Slut bait: Push-pull game works best with ugly duckling sluts. Their newfound SMV has a tendency to rapidly inflate their egos so charming, negging, then charming again should seal the deal. But be careful not to neg her too hard lest you inadvertently conjure up memories of cruel jokes from her classmates at her expense because if that happens, it's game over.

4. The "quid pro quo"

Straight up…….

Sometimes referred to as a "barter slut," these chicks always seem to get "hooked up" with a lot of "free" shit and "free" services. These sluts, of course, are simply exchanging sexual favors for commodities and accommodations. Tattoos, mechanical work, home improvements, or any other brand of patronage carried out by men, are all abundant because she's paying with her body. I happen to know quite a few of these broads and if you pay attention, you'll probably find that you do too.

How to recognize them: Most girls live above their means, so the barter slut may be a little tougher to spot than others. You'll have to be proactive and ask questions about her new tattoo, where she got that brand new flat screen, or anything else she has recently acquired. If her explanation is "Oh so-in-so hooked me up because blah blah blah" when talking about her new trinkets, you've got yourself a soft prostitute.

Slut bait: The key here is to get her goods before giving up yours. Too many guys fall into this beta trap and end up as an orbiter or her "bestest friend!" when they do her favors before she gets naked. Flip the script and tease her with your hookup in exchange for her booty. Joke about it in a way that gives you deniable plausibility. For example, say: "Yeah I'll come over and change your spark plugs…but after you prove to me you can drive a stick…" and deliver it with a smirk on your face that leaves no doubt as to what's to be read between the lines.

She'll know exactly what you're getting at but if she plays stupid, play stupid right along with her and tell her you forgot how to work on cars and change the subject. Whatever you do, do not give in. If she isn't going to bang you in the first place, there's no need getting your hands dirty for nothing.

5. The homewrecker

"I hope your wife doesn't find out"

This is the kind of girl who needs no introduction, as the label tells you all you need to know. These are the women who only sleep with married men or men in relationships because pre-selection, a standard tenet of game, works as a built-in magnet. It's a target rich demographic as there are no shortage of men in committed relationships whose wives or girlfriends have let themselves go.

How to recognize them: The homewrecker is always difficult to spot because they're experts at keeping their affairs private. Pay attention to her stories about past relationships or hookups. Although they're not often forthright about the marital status of their beaus, at some point they all let it slip. She's never going to come right out and say "I only sleep with married men or men with girlfriends" so you'll often have to smoke them out which means…

Slut Bait: ….throwing out the slut bait by casually mentioning something you and your girlfriend or wife did last weekend. Or if she compliments you on your shirt, watch, sunglasses, just say: "Thanks, my girlfriend got it for me." If she's a homewrecker, she'll waste little time suggesting things like "we need to hang out more" or shooting covert but obvious IOIs in your direction. After that, sleeping with her will be like taking candy from a baby.

6. The serial girlfriend

Anyone who has a Facebook or Instagram page is privy to the girl who is in and out of relationships seemingly every other week. One day she's "in love," the next all men suck, the day after that she's "excited about her first date," and the cycle repeats itself starting Monday.

These chicks engage in bionic rationalization hamstering by proclaiming they're not sluts because every guy they've been banged by was her boyfriend at the time. But deep down they know they're still sluts whether the seven guys they slept with last month were her boyfriends or not, and so does everyone else who congratulates her for "finding happiness."

How to recognize them: A quick scan through social media will make this an easy task. If you hooked up with a girl over the weekend, check her Facebook and Instagram page and look for multiple posts of her with many other guys captioned by emojis that indicate "love" or a relationship over a short period of time.

Another dead giveaway is when she angles for commitment shortly after you two have done the dirty deed. Questions like "So where is this headed anyway?" or "Are we going to make this thing of ours official?" are both typical conversation starter favorites of the serial girlfriend slut. She'll also step up her domestic game by doing your laundry, cooking for you, and talking about how "traditional" she is.

Slut bait: There isn't a specific way to lure these girls because every woman on some level is looking for commitment of some sort, so standard game is really all you need. However, if you want to keep her in your rotation on account of her hotness and willingness to be your bowling ball, run a little calculated beta game and she should stay in your orbit for quite a while.

7. The "mud shark"

My man in the wife beater can't wait to beat the brakes off that ho

A few months back, I wrote this article speculating on the reasons some white girls only choose black men. While nobody can definitively pinpoint what motivates them from one girl to the next, one thing that's certain is that all chicks who have an exclusive taste for brothers are epic sluts.

How to recognize them: This brand of ho is almost too easy to spot so rather than stating the obvious, I'll just refer to an excerpt from my aforementioned article:

> You know who she is. The white girl with the big hoop earrings, the (fake) diamond stud in her nose, and the tattoo on her left tit of a phoenix, butterfly, or anything else that denotes "freedom" or whatever brand of profound bullshit they want you to believe about them.
>
> Every few seconds her phone is ringing out two second snippets of the hip hop track du jour, alerting her of another text from one of a few black men she happens to be "talking to" at the moment.

Slut bait: As easy as they are to recognize, based on my personal experience, it's even easier to sleep with them. Just be black, in above average shape, and have decent game and you're in there. Granted, nothing's a gimme in today's sexual marketplace, but so long as you're not a fat beta, these girls are as close to a sure thing as it gets.

8. The "I'm one of the guys"

I touched on these types of girls in this article (#6), and went a little more in depth in this one (third one down). The long and short of what these girls are about is that their circle of "friends" are mostly men. Whether it's watching the game, out for drinks, or just hanging out at one of their pads, being "one of the guys" ensures her of constant attention from the guys she spends time with.

How to recognize them: All you have to do is listen for the verbal cues. These sluts take tremendous pride in proclaiming they're one of the boys and will yammer on about it to anyone who will listen. Also, pay attention to what her "hobbies" are. If she mentions watching sports, playing video games (gamer guuuuurl), or playing beer pong with the fellas at the local bar, your target's likely been identified.

Slut bait: It can be difficult to game these broads because of the constant attention she's getting from other guys in the group. Rather than being a try hard like everyone else, just let your red pill tendencies do the talking and she'll gravitate your way as a matter female nature.

Another suggestion is to introduce another girl into the group. Not only does this create competition between the two girls which means they'll shamelessly flirt (or more) with the guys but it also tips the guy to girl ratio in your favor. A buddy of mine back east did this quite a bit and it proved to be beneficial to more than a few men in his crew.

At the end of the day…

You still have to run solid game to sleep with any of the above girls. The degree to which you have to run it varies from slut to slut but regardless of how easy they are to bang, most of today's attractive females don't drop their panties for just anybody.

Most women have a little bit of all of these in them at some point or another. Age, financial status, and children (or lack thereof) are just a few of many mitigating factors that determine which slut they are at any given time. Regardless, use the for fun only and not commitment.

More often than not, whichever brand serves their interests the most at the time is the one they'll end up channeling. A big part of awareness on the hook up scene is recognizing the type of girl you're dealing with. If you use your Y chromosome and pay a little more attention, you'll be able to quickly diagnose what kind of slut she is which will ultimately lead to more lays.

Read Next: 9 Benefits Of Having Female Friends

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

10 Things I Learned From Touring The American Midwest

February 29, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've been writing about America and its culture for over a decade, but I'm afraid I'm not as knowledgeable about the entire country as I would like to be. Nearly all of my experiences come from Washington DC and New York City, two cities that are distinct from the rest of the nation. While there is great overlap between them and other American cities, the differences are significant enough that an American man may choose to not write off the country completely.

In my recent Midwest tour I spent time in five cities:

- Sioux Falls, South Dakota
- Omaha, Nebraska
- Lincoln, Nebraska
- Kansas City, Missouri
- Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

Here's my video report:

The big outlier is Kansas City, a multicultural and generic city. If someone blindfolded you and dropped you there, you would have difficulty identifying which city it is since it serves as a template for Any Mega City, USA. Because of the high numbers of Hispanics and blacks, I felt like I was in a slightly safer Baltimore.

The rest of the cities can be somewhat generalized as one, even though there are certainly differences between them. Here is what I noticed about the Midwest, excluding Kansas City:

Very high white population

THE WHITEST STATES BY PERCENTAGE (2010 CENSUS)

State	% white alone (not Hispanic)
Maine	94.4%
Vermont	94.3%
West Virginia	93.2%
New Hampshire	92.3%
North Dakota	88.9%
Iowa	88.7%
Montana	87.8%
Kentucky	86.3%
Wyoming	85.9%
South Dakota	84.7%

In Nebraska and South Dakota, you can go a long time without seeing a minority. In fact, I was the darkest person in the many venues I stepped foot into. I was actually amazed that parts of America could be as white as Eastern Europe, and they're not even in the top ten of whitest states.

People use their smartphones significantly less

I would see large groups of girls talking to each other without having their phones out, which is quite rare in Washington DC. There were several points where I noticed that I was on my phone much more than those who surrounded me, making me feel ashamed.

No gays

I did not see more than two gay couples in four days, and the gays I saw were not overtly flaming. It’s almost as if I was in a homosexual free zone.

People are incredibly nice

While I receive more eye contact in a place like Poland, I received many more smiles here. In Oklahoma City, in the dead of night without anyone else around, a woman walking her dogs said “Hello” to me, a gesture that I don’t experience anywhere else. The evil part of me couldn’t help but think that people this nice could be easily taken advantage of. Maybe we can convince them to do all sort of crazy things in the name of “equality” or their own “safety.”

Very high social trust with deep social networks

Now I know why I'm not a big hit among men in the Midwest: my cold approach game would get you quickly marked in your town and ostracized. The best strategy here is to have a lot of friends and date the women in your social circle. Without a social circle in the Midwest, you're a bit screwed when it comes to landing the best women, who get snapped up soon in college or even high school. If a girl in the Midwest is single past the age of 25, she likely has serious issues that make her an unsuitable mate. She'll relocate to DC or NYC to try for a Sex And The City lifestyle of experiencing a few rounds of alpha male cock before she has to go back home a broken woman, lamenting about her fun days in the big city.

Obesity is a serious problem

People here are fatter than in the coastal cities, and unfortunately this has impacted the women. All the benefits of women being friendlier and not addicted to smartphones doesn't matter much if she's a land whale.

It doesn't take long in the Midwest to notice that the food culture is horrendous: the most popular foods are fried and loaded with simple carbs and salt with hardly any vegetables. Even worse is that that carries over into the home—they're not preparing salads and healthy foods in their kitchens. The food is tasty, of course, but it makes you feel like crap and also causes constipation because of the lack of fiber.

Loading…

Men are more masculine and woman are more feminine

The men are heavily into sports, hunting, machinery, and hanging out with the guys. The women are more girly and elegant with longer hair. While Midwest women are not as feminine as Eastern European women, they do put out a more down-to-Earth vibe that is less snobbish. The only difficulty is that it's harder to tell in the beginning of an interaction if a Midwest girl is sexually attracted to you or just being her normal self. In more stand-offish cultures, like Ukraine, it's easier to know where you stand with a girl if she merely talks to you for more than a couple minutes.

It's significantly cheaper

Washington DC is expensive. You get screwed not only for housing but for food and entertainment. The implied contract is that you work like a slave in your big city job that gives you a flashy business card so you can experience the finest distractions and colorful lights that mankind has to offer without ever being bored. That contract is a bad deal if you're not a mindless sheep, especially when you consider that the bigger the city, the more likely a girl will participate in anonymous sex through nightlife and Tinder that makes her an unsuitable dating partner.

I'm not too familiar with the average salaries in the Midwest, but even if it's lower than DC/NYC, the costs you experience there are so much less that you should still come out on top. Don't let the big city lights seduce you: it's a trap that inserts you into the rat race with very little opportunity to get out.

You'll need a car

The Midwest consists of huge expanses of space. When a city wants to grow, it spreads outwards instead of upwards. This means you must have a car, even if you intend to live in the center of the city where the concept of public transportation has yet to catch on. Whatever the Midwest gains from the friendliness of the people is partially lost with the atomization of everyone driving in their car box for much of the day.

It could be a good place to raise a family

The place that stuck out the most for me was Sioux Falls. If I want to know what a "traditional" America looks like, this is perhaps the closest I'll get (until I visit the Mountain West), though I would have to spend more time here to understand the marriage and religion dynamic. Yes, people are overweight and there also some corrupting influences, but I can say this with certainty: it's less corrupting than a large Eastern European city like Warsaw, Poland. If I were to marry a village Ukrainian girl tomorrow, I'd prefer to live with her in Sioux Falls than Warsaw. This doesn't even account for the fact that there are tons of towns smaller than Sioux Falls (population 150,000) that could be better for family life.

Conclusion

I'll be the first to admit that my analysis of American culture mostly applies to large cities with high transient populations that have weaker social connections. If a man knows his neighbors and maintains long-term relationships with his friends from school, he won't need cold approach game to meet a girl (he'll just need game to keep her). But if he lives in a big, expensive city where he changes jobs and apartments frequently and where his friends move to different cities, he's simply not going to have a strong enough social circle where he can meet attractive women, so he's much more likely to find my advice helpful, which will be required just to get laid.

While Washington DC is a good place to generalize about American people since it attracts transplants from all over, it's important to stress that it attracts the outliers from theose states. If a girl from South Dakota comes to DC to work for a non-profit, she is definitely not a typical girl from South Dakota who—if her sexual market value had been good and her mind sane—finds a good man to settle down with before 25 years of age.

At the same time you shouldn't generalize about America from DC or NYC, our masters are using the same template where family and tribal bonds are being destroyed and replaced with dependence on corporations and the government. Most of you reading right now are from a Western city greater than 2 million people, meaning that the advice and observations I have for you mostly holds true, even if you're not American. The fact that the advice I give to men is also applicable to those living in England, Canada, Australia, and even India is both convenient and disturbing.

Thanks to my trip to the Midwest, I finally understand why so many guys don't understand me and often spout game denialist statements like, "Game is stupid, you just have to be a good guy and have some friends." They say these things because they have a deep social network or are from smaller cities where game does not work in the same way it does in the big cities, or at least where it's not as required to meet a girl who weighs less than 140 pounds.

I'm not going to change my advice to deal with small towns, especially since most of my readers live in big cities, but at least now I understand why so many men don't see the point of what I teach. If only I was as lucky as them to grow up in a normal town with normal people whose minds aren't addicted to the junk that comes out of New York City and Hollywood. Since I'm not, and since I continue to live in big cities, I must use game practices to sleep with women I desire, but now I'm definitely curious about other places in America that could be even better than what I saw in the Midwest.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 4 Things I Observed From My Trip To New York City

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Defeat The Mother Hen Cockblocker And Keep The Hot Friend

February 29, 2016 | by johnny slick | Link | Original Link

The legends of dragonslayers go way back in time. They resonate with men because we need to obstacles to overcome, to break free from barriers that restrict our freedom and mobility in the world.

As a form of modern dragon, mother hens and cockblocks in general are a huge social problem facing many men today when it comes to finding romance and love. A mother hen is usually the least appealing member in a group of women, one who acts as a barrier to happiness for all of them. They are not necessarily always fat and unattractive, but they do share one thing in common.

Masculine aggressive energy

Some signs that your girl's best friend is a mother hen include:

1. Being very opinionated and a big talker
2. Having done some sports that are traditionally for men
3. Having taken courses in political science, business, or women's studies
4. Is very ambitious and independent in life
5. You just freaking know…

Defeating the mother hen in a relationship

When it comes to a relationship, this is when you need to take your foes more seriously. If you care about your girl or just don't want to lose her because she's great in bed and you enjoy dating her, you need to put your foot down. Women are social creatures, and often times beautiful women need a less attractive and more dominant woman to lead the way because they can't navigate life properly and make smart decisions for themselves. This happens despite the fact that the assertive mother hen usually cares more about having control and pissing off guys then she does about her "friend."

A relationship is the one place where it is dangerous to leave your girl with a mother hen who dislikes you. Throughout history as men went out and brought food home for their families, women sat around, took care of the children, and socialized with other women. Because of this evolutionary programming, women are hive creatures and they share a hive mind. They are naturally drawn to take on the opinions of other women around them even if those opinions are completely irrational, which is another reason for their lack of success in many fields despite all of societal structure created to aid them.

This presents a huge problem when the mother hen has all the time in the world to brainwash your girl into cheating on you, dumping you, or imbibing the evils of the modern world. She's working behind your back like a dude who's trying to steal your girl. Her aims are to beat you indirectly, and this can be done in many ways;

1. She can be talking about hot guys to your girl and deliberately inciting qualities that you specifically don't have, making your girl think about "I like my boyfriend but can I do better?"

2. Talking about parties and events where she knows there will be men trying to give her attention

3. If she’s less subtle she can mock you directly or make sarcastic comments to question your masculinity or positive qualities

As you know, women love to sit, gossip, and complain, so whenever you and your girl have a fight, your girlfriend will inevitably bitch about you to her friends. These complaints will be the impressions that her friends will remember you by, and they will try to use their influence to separate you two.

Time to take out the mother hen from the equation

Step 1:

Talk to your girl about the troublemaking friend and point out how much time they’ve been spending together. Subtly get some dirt on what they talk about, and find out if you’ve been mentioned in the conversation.

Step 2:

Tell your girl how you think what you have is special and that you know that her friend is jealous. Specify how you two must be a united front against all people and situations that are trying to break up your happiness due to jealousy.

Step 3:

Don’t simply tell your girl that the mother hen is bad news. Assassinate her character using your wit, and point out how she is a pathetic and unhappy human. “She seems really happy in life, with her four cats, dead end job, and her case of chlamydia.” Plant the seed of her being an unpopular loser and a hater. Illustrate how her poor choices have led her to physical ruin, mental illness, or general unhappiness. Girls want a winner, both as a boyfriend and as their friends.

Step 4:

If the mother hen has a particularly strong grip on your girl, this is where you need to intervene. Confront her and tell her that you know what she’s up to, impose your dominant frame on her, and let her know that you’re not messing around.

Often times her true dislike of you will start to come out uncontrollably. This is when you need to have some witty comebacks ready to mock her and put her in her place. Basically say the same things as in step 3, just to her directly.

Conclusion

Letting her friends go is sometimes its a hard choice for a girl to make. She may not have the capacity to see the long term effects on your relationship by being around certain people. If you spot the venom, point it out and destroy it right away! The longer it drags on, the worse it’s going to get for you.

Having overcame this challenge it will strengthen your bond and propel you onto the next phase of a relationship

Read More: 7 Ways The Reality Of Modern Culture Are Destroying Men

---

johnny slick
is a game enthusiast and a mad scientist, he's presently getting ready to fully implement his new seduction formula that lets him get into any woman's pants with relative ease.

A Politically Incorrect Film That Offers A Ringside Seat To A Futile War

February 29, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The Latin word sicarius means “assassin.” Probing more deeply, we note that its root is the noun sica, which means “dagger.” It is from this grim etymology that the modern Spanish word sicario originates. When I first heard the title of this excellent 2015 film, I thought at once of daggers and assassins. The film did not disappoint. It is a harrowing tale that centers around the drug war along the US-Mexico border, and how hopeless it ultimately all seems.

The story could be taken right from today’s headlines. We, the viewers, are put in the unsuspecting shoes of an FBI agent named Kate Macer (Emily Blunt). After leading a raid on an Arizona house that hides dozens of corpses, Macer volunteers to serve in a joint task-force which promises to track down the people responsible for the murders.

Brolin: Just your friendly neighborhood agent

We immediately sense that not is all as it seems: Macer's duties are not explicitly stated, and the man in charge, Matt Graver (Josh Brolin), seems to work for some unnamed intelligence agency. Inspiring more unease is the shadowy figure of Alejandro Gillick (Benicio del Toro), who says little; and when he does speak, he speaks in riddles. The significance of all these details does not become apparent until much later.

We are thus thrown headlong into a world where no one can be trusted, where the good guys and the bad guys are indistinguishable, and behind every turn of the maze lies another tortuous turn. "In Mexico, nothing will make sense to you at first. But in the end, you will know," says Benicio del Toro to the bewildered Macer.

And how true that little prophecy turns out to be. For Macer gets much, much more than she bargained for. This is a first-rate thriller, and one that should not be missed. For once, law enforcement and the military behave as they do in real life, not as some Hollywood producer imagines they behave. And refreshingly, no concessions are made to political correctness.

The impression one is left with, after seeing this movie, is no hope of doing anything about the drug cartels except managing them. The statistics are incredible, and speak for themselves. While American politicians posture and grandstand about ISIS, an all-out war is raging right under their noses.

From 2006 to 2012, Mexican drug cartels killed about 60,000. In 2013, another 16,000 were added to this tally. We should keep in mind that these figures are those provided by the Mexican government, which commonly understates the real numbers. It is almost certainly half again as much, making them closer to 100,000. Many of these killings are gruesome in a way that only ISIS could appreciate: beheadings, burnings, and dismemberings are the rule, not the exception.

The cartels use child "soldiers" as couriers and for suicide missions, sometimes even harvesting their organs for sale on the black market. In the town of Iguala, the local police apparently cooperated with drug gangs in kidnapping and killing 43 students who had dared to protest against the violence.

Between 2006 and 2012, it is likely that over 6,000 Americans were killed in the US as a result of cartel-inspired violence, a number that dwarfs the number of US citizens killed by ISIS. Yet hardly any American can give the name of even one Mexican cartel, or even one cartel leader.

Cartel culture has become so embedded in the border regions that it has even begun to adopt quasi-religious overtones. Many of the killings have a ritualistic tone. Jesús Malverde is venerated in some circles as the "patron saint" of organized crime, and shrines to Santa Muerte (Saint Death) can be found in northern Mexico. To put it mildly, the atmosphere of violence and terror has generated a morbid preoccupation with death.

There seems to be little that can be done except to try to "control" the industry. This seems to be the US government's strategy, according to a recent article in Time online. According to the article, the US actually helped the rise of the Sinaloa cartel, and assisted it in destroying its rivals.

Those who think that legalizing drugs might solve the problem overlook the fact that even if drugs were legalized, there would still be a black market for drugs and contraband. The battle would then be over pricing and getting around drug distribution regulations. The only way to stop the cartels would seem to be going after their money. But US banks operating in Mexico have not properly enforced money-laundering laws or monitored deposits with the same vigor as such things are done in the US, ensuring that the flow of cash continues unimpeded.

Del Toro: a man with a dark past

There is more than a touch of irony when one of the characters (a cartel boss) in Sicaro notes, as he talks to a US agent, "Where do you think we learned this from? We learned it from your employers." This may be an exaggeration, but another quote from the movie is not.

"Until we can convince twenty percent of the US population to stop using drugs," says the Josh Brolin character to Emily Blunt, "the best we can hope for is to control the trade, rather than stop it."

It certainly seems so. With popular attention fixated on the comparatively minor and distant threat of ISIS, there seems to be little concern in the US that the very authority of the Mexican state itself is in danger of breaking down. Film viewers can't change political realities outside their control, but they can enjoy a well-made, intelligent cinematic production. Sicario delivers on all counts, and is not to be missed.

Read More: How Jeb Bush Destroyed The Bush Dynasty And Tanked His Campaign

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The 2016 Oscars Showed Us Which Lies The Hollywood Elite Wants Us To Believe

March 1, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Social justice warriors have succeeded in ruining the entire movie industry. If you needed any proof, you just had to tune in to the 2016 Academy Awards ceremony.

I'm not sure when it happened, but at some point the Academy Awards went from being a celebration of the film industry to an opportunity to sanctimoniously lecture the American people on various social justice issues. The Oscars have a small set of recurring SJW hot buttons: white racism against blacks, the plight of gays or the gender confused, the plight of women, the plight of immigrants, the Holocaust, and global warming. This year I watched to ensure that all the SJW boxes were checked.

Whites Are Racists

This year was really embarrassing for the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences—they did not nominate any black actors. Spike Lee and Will Smith protested it as being racist and boycotted the ceremony. SJW heads exploded.

Now, it strikes me as odd that there must be some sort of quota for blacks being nominated. Why just have a quota for blacks? Why not also have a quota for Chinese and Indian actors? But consistency is not a strong suit of SJWs.

To repair the damage done by its failure to nominate blacks, the Academy turned the entire Oscar ceremony into one long rant on racism. It started with host Chris Rock's monologue. He opened with a joke about blacks not being nominated. I thought he would leave it at that, but he pressed on. His entire monologue was about the Academy's faux pas.

To his credit, Rock did needle the Academy a bit, as well as Will Smith, but then it turned into an attack on white Americans in general. Rock said the reason that blacks didn't protest the Oscars in previous years was because they had real problems to deal with. According to Rock, blacks in the past were constantly being raped and their grandmothers were hung from trees. Even today, Rock said, blacks have a problem getting to a movie theatre without being shot by the police.

This set the pace for the rest of the night. The heat was off the Academy. The real culprit is white Americans and their racist attitudes. The browbeating continued throughout the rest of the evening. Rock came back to the theme of racism again and again. The Academy made sure a disproportionately large number of the presenters were black. Finally, the evening closed to Public Enemy's Fight the Power.

White racism against blacks box checked. And checked. And checked.

The Fake Campus Rape Epidemic

Just as I was beginning to think that the entire Oscar ceremony would be dedicated to white racism, the Academy threw me a curveball by having Vice President Joe Biden show up on stage. Sitting politicians have no business showing up on popular television shows, but the Obama Administration has made this sort of appearance mandatory. Somehow I doubt that this will continue if the next president is a Republican.

At first, I thought Biden was going to continue chastising me for being white. Instead, he started talking about the evils of campus sexual assaults. Now, Biden is a very strange person to introduce a segment on nonconsensual sex. Judging by the photos below, he is an intensely creepy man who appears to have a serious problem with the unwelcome touching of women.

Biden urged his listeners to take a pledge to “intervene in situations when consent has not or cannot be given.” But who will intervene to prevent Biden from inappropriately touching women, young and old? After saying a few words about the concocted campus assault epidemic, Pervy-Toucher-in-Chief Biden introduced Lady Gaga who sang a song about sexual assault.

The song was entitled Til It Happens to You, but I can’t tell you what the lyrics were. It was so awful that I had to mute the sound until it was over. At the end of the song, a bunch of sexual assault victims walked out on stage. Each victim had an empowering word like, “survivor,” “unbreakable,” or “Hillary 2016,” written on his or her arm. Many of the assembled thespians began to fake cry in response to the “powerful” segment.

Plight of women box checked.

Immigrants

Immigration is one of the defining issues of the 21st century. Donald Trump’s promise to fix the problems caused by immigration, both legal and illegal, is what has fueled his rise. The EU’s decision to flood Europe with Islamic “refugees” has already resulted in European women and children being sexually assaulted in large numbers. One doesn’t have to be Nostradamus to predict that the “rapefugee” crisis will not end happily.

For these reasons, I knew the self-righteous denizens of Hollywood could not leave this hot button without preaching on it. The messenger of the pro-immigrant message was Mexican director Alejandro González Iñárritu, who used his Best Director speech to preach to us on how we have to abandon our “tribes,” and how he looks forward to the day when the color of one’s skin means no more than the length of one’s hair. Yawn.

Pro-immigration box checked.

Gender Confirmation

Our elites are constantly creating new words and phrases to make their societal changes more palatable. Replacing “homosexual” with “gay” aided the acceptance of same-sex marriage. The media’s use of “undocumented Americans” instead of “illegal aliens” is a clear effort to soften Americans up for an amnesty.

At the Oscars, I learned another neologism—this time to advance the cause of transgenderism. While Julianne Moore was announcing the nominees for Best Actor, she described Eddie Redmayne’s character in The Danish Girl as a man who was undergoing “gender confirmation surgery” rather than the term we are familiar with: “gender reassignment surgery.” It makes it sound as though transgender people were born with a birth defect that must be corrected. George Orwell would have been proud.

While ROK readers are likely to laugh at this sophomoric word game, it is apparently effective with the impressionable masses. By the way, given the political correctness of the Oscars, I thought a movie about transsexuals would be a shoo-in for Best Actor. For once, the Academy was unpredictable and gave the award to Leonardo Dicaprio for his role in The Revenant.

Plight of gay or gender confused box checked.

Leo Goes For The Gold

It was getting very late and not all the SJW butt hurt boxes had been checked yet. When was global warming going to come up? Leonardo Dicaprio saved the day during his acceptance speech for the Best Actor award. He said that The Revenant took place in nature and that the biggest threat to nature today was global warming. Whew, that was close!

Global warming box checked.

People Do Not Like To Be Lectured

The whole purpose of the movie industry is to entertain people. They are usually very good at it so it is ironic that they have forgotten the first lesson of entertainment—people want to be entertained.

When someone turns on the Oscars, he wants to see a great visual spectacle with beautiful actresses. He wants to see how his favorite movies did and get an idea of what he might have missed. What he emphatically does not want is to get a sermon.

The 2016 Oscars were exactly that—a three-hour sermon on white racism against blacks interspersed with mini sermons on fake rape and global warming. The results were predictable. Viewers tuned out. It was the lowest rated Oscars in eight years.

Conclusion

Was the Holocaust box check this year? Not as much as in past years, but the winner of the Best Foreign Language Film was Son of Saul, a movie about Auschwitz. So yes, the Holocaust box was checked too.

Although it is painful to sit through, watching the Oscars is a good way to tell what the elites want us to believe. It is a big exercise in indoctrination, but if you watch critically you can see their strategy laid out pretty clearly. We do well to swim in the exact opposite direction from the one the elite are steering us to.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Will Smith's Revolt Against The Oscars Shows That Leftist Celebrity Solidarity Is Crumbling

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

6 Simple Habits That Make Donald Trump Successful

March 1, 2016 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

Donald Trump has certainly been in the news lately. The man appears to lead a charmed life. He has managed to be successful in business and then in the media. He enjoys the company of supermodel quality girls decades younger than him and has promising children too. Now he seems to be performing well in politics under difficult conditions, and may be in the running for being the most powerful man in the world. Watching his political performances from far away, in Australia, it seems impossible that any man could face such opposition and still be a viable political candidate.

In politics it only takes a couple of slip-ups to remove a candidate from consideration, especially if he is an outsider. The usual response is to be extra careful about every word, even to the point of simply reading out pre-packaged speeches. Somehow Trump does the opposite and makes it work. He appears to do most of his speeches and other appearances off-the-cuff. Meanwhile almost every political and media figure is gleefully watching every move and every word just waiting for the slightest opening to plunge in the knife.

How does he succeed?

Sorry, but I can’t tell you how to do it. The man is obviously a master. What we can do is watch how Trump does things and identify some of the easier habits that support his more impressive, hard to match acts.

1. Set out to do big things without apology

Reach for the stars

It seems like an obvious point, but people who set out to do big things are more likely to successfully do big things. Perhaps the main reason people don't try is the inevitable negative responses from others. Trump shoots for big goals, makes no apologies, and just pushes forward.

2. Lead a clean, healthy life

Is this the next president of the United States?

One interesting habit Donald Trump has is that he doesn’t like to shake hands and avoids it where possible. It might seem like an eccentric quirk, but it also helps to avoid the spread of germs which cause illness, damage, and downtime. He extends the cleanliness habit to his food, not pushing lift buttons, and no doubt many other areas. Trump acts for his health and reports indicate it is excellent for his age.

3. Build a brand

What’s in a name anyway?

Donald Trump understands the value of reputation and fame in making people want to deal with him and be associated with him and his name. Trump has reached the point where people will pay simply to put his name on products and buildings. That’s normal for celebrities—for a businessman it is amazing.

4. Steer clear of degeneracy

Never used marijuana and definitely not a bit of blow

Intelligence, good judgement, excellent memory and motivation are vital to success. Taking drugs is one easy way to get distracted or damage these capacities. Trump has never taken any recreational drugs, including alcohol and tobacco. He doesn't have a lot of other known vices.

5. Publicly punish people who try to interfere

I’ll skip your debate and so will your viewers

Trump is famous for publicly hitting back at people who do him a bad turn. It must be a satisfying thing to do but the real reason is to demonstrate that there is a cost to this kind of behaviour. That is why he is completely open and public about it. Over time people in the media and politics have become noticeably hesitant to take him on.

6. Understand the importance of family

Some readers will be thinking that Trump succeeded partly because he got a leg up from his father who was also a successful businessman. That is true, but it misses the point. Family cooperation, continuity, and team spirit is vital to enduring success. Trump obviously understands this and looks to be returning the favour by passing that advantage to the next generation. Like Trump they are grasping the opportunity with both hands and running with it. That’s the way to do it.

As for the other things

A different kind of white house

Publicly facing up to a powerful establishment and succeeding politically is not an easy task. Creating buildings, businesses, and brands is not an easy task. Succeeding at the game of celebrity and starring in a successful television show is not an easy task. Picking from a wide selection of supermodel quality girls is not an easy task. To pack them all into one life is a hard act to follow. It seems impossible to believe that Trump could make it and become the most powerful man in the world too and yet…

We can't all act on the same stage as Trump or on the same scale as Trump. Looking over those six points, though, it is hard to argue that following them to the hilt wouldn't improve our chances at a successful life too.

Read More: Donald Trump And The Tyranny Of Feelings

Hesse Kassel
Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

How To Get Abs By Controlling Your Master Fat Loss Hormone

March 1, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Jonny Catanzano

[Jonny paid for the First 100 readers to receive a free bonus gift. Be sure to read to the end to find out how to claim your bonus.]

Hey man,

My name is Jonny Catanzano and I've been a National Physique Competitor for the last 4 years. I'm also the lead trainer on the most subscribed fitness channel on YouTube.

Throughout my years of training, I've definitely picked up on a trick or two when it comes to shedding body fat and building pure, ripped muscles.

And one of the biggest things that I've learned about keeping your body fat percentage as low as possible, is that you have to control your master fat loss hormone, leptin.

Leptin tells your body to burn more fat. When you have a lot of it… you burn a lot of fat, and when you have low leptin levels (or you only have a little bit of it…) you burn little to no fat.

You probably have low leptin levels right now and don't even realize it; I certainly did.

And if you are unsure if your leptin levels are high or low, then simply try this out. I call it…

The Belly Fat Test (Takes 6 seconds):

This is something I have all my personal clients do and is a very important part of how you'll be able to get rid of that belly fat. I want you to open up both of your hands, reach down and slip your fingers just right under the belly fat that hanging over the waistline of your pants.

Go ahead…

Now with your thumb squeeze down gently… give it a firm squeeze.

You did it, right?

Now like most guys that I have helped, you're probably holding onto something that's been bothering you for a while. You may even be a bit shocked to notice that there's quite a bit more belly fat than you expected…

But you're not the only one, because just like you, the majority of all men are carrying around this same kind of belly fat that's taking over their stomach area.

And if you're holding onto this belly fat, more than likely… you have pretty low leptin levels, but it's not your fault.

Here are some of the causes of low Leptin:

- Stress
- Lack Of Sleep
- Carbs

- Eating Too Much
- Exercising Too Hard
- High Levels Of Insulin (set off by sugars/starches)

So the bottom line is if you want to burn the most amount of fat, you want your leptin levels to be high.

So what exactly is leptin and why should you care about it if you want to burn fat, get ripped six pack abs, and not have to worry about shedding the MAX amount of stubborn fat?

Well, first of all this powerful hormone is the #1 most important fat burning hormone.

And you have probably heard of another hormone named insulin that is responsible for fat gain—or as the “flab king” that packs on extra pounds.

But how are the two related? Well, they are actually complete opposites.

You see, insulin is released in your body when you eat food, particularly ones that are high in sugar… and insulin turns that food into fat. On the other hand, leptin allows your body to actually use energy from the fat you already have on your body.

You starting to see the difference?

Now here comes the good part, well kind of…

The more fat you have on your body, the more leptin that will be available so you can burn off that fat.

However, as you begin to burn off fat, your leptin decreases… so it becomes harder to burn off unwanted body fat and you start storing more fat as your leptin levels decrease.

Bottom line: as you lose more fat, your leptin goes down and makes it more difficult for you to shed the fat. On top of that, lower leptin levels also make you feel sluggish and unmotivated—or lazy.

So if you’ve started seeing slower results with your workouts, been feeling sluggish, held a lot of fat in your hands on the belly fat test, or suffer from a bad diet, low leptin levels could be the reason.

That means you can start burning fat today by taking control of your #1 master fat loss hormone.

Now, I say suffering from a bad diet, because it’s very, very hard to maintain a perfect diet. And dieting is hard… trust me.

When I compete, I have to stay on a very strict diet, and I still have a hard time keeping my body fat percentage down. That’s why I do this 2x daily to accelerate fat loss.

So if you have been dieting but not seeing results fast enough—it could simply be because your leptin levels are too low.

And like I just said, leptin becomes even more of an issue when you stop losing fat even though you are dieting and exercising on a regular basis… and it’s just because these levels are too low.

However, this 2x Daily For Accelerated Fat Loss technique reignites your leptin and kick your body back into fat burning mode in no time.

So if you have hit a wall and you’re ready to kick your fat loss into high gear… and you have been doing everything you can to lose fat. THIS could put you back on track to getting the body you want.

Shed the fat,

Jonny

P.S. The first 100 readers of this article receive a free bonus gift. Act fast though, because I run out quick!

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Mark Zuckerberg Announces Plan To Censor Discussion Of Europe's Refugee Crisis On Facebook

March 2, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In the past, it took the power of oppressive, tyrannical governments to crush free speech. In the year 2016, we have multinational corporations doing it for us. Recently, Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg declared that his site would take a more active role in policing "hate speech" against the Muslim refugees streaming into Europe:

> Zuckerberg pointed to efforts including funding a team to work with police to combat hate speech on Facebook. He said that learning more about German law has led the company to expand its view of "protected groups" there, and "to now include hate speech against migrants as an important part of what we just now have no tolerance for."

According to reports, Zuckerberg has hired a 200-person censorship crew whose sole purpose will be to monitor and shut down discussion of how the refugees are tearing Europe apart. The numerous stories of how Muslim refugees are abusing the goodwill of their European hosts, such as the New Years' Eve rape attacks in Germany, will be censored and removed from Facebook, one of the world's largest social networking sites.

Zuckerberg's sudden concern for the feeeeeelings of Muslim rapefugees is a cover for his true agenda. Globalist politicians and businessmen seek to use the refugee crisis to consolidate their power and destroy nationalism in Europe and in the West in general. Because the Internet enables people to circumvent the lies of the mainstream media, the globalists are now using corporate censorship to maintain their narrative.

Social Networks vs. Nationalists

The mainstream media and politicians have sought to portray the unprecedented wave of "refugees" pouring into Europe as a humanitarian crisis, claiming that Europeans are obligated to take them in. In actuality, the "refugees" are predominantly young men in search of plunder and booty. Report after report shows Muslim "refugees" starting riots, engaging in petty crime, harassing and raping European women, and generally behaving like swaggering conquerors instead of desperate paupers fleeing war.

To keep the truth from becoming public, the German government and other pro-refugee politicians have resorted to increasingly extreme measures to censor news coming out of Europe. In a particularly notable example of collusion, German Chancellor Angela Merkel was caught on mic confronting Mark Zuckerberg about the proliferation of "anti-immigrant hate posts" on Facebook. In the same conversation, Zuckerberg pledged to do a better job of curbing "hate speech" on the site.

Facebook's censorship crusade is almost identical to a similar push by rival network Twitter. Last month, Twitter unveiled its new "Trust and Safety Council," a tribunal dedicated to policing "hate speech" and "harassment" on the platform. The Council is headed by notorious anti-free speech feminist Anita Sarkeesian and is staffed by representatives from various left-wing organizations. Since the Council was unveiled, conservative journalist Robert Stacy McCain has been banned from Twitter, and several major personalities such as Adam Baldwin have abandoned the site.

The Elites' End Game

As ROK publisher Roosh has stated, the central conflict of our time is between globalists and nationalists. Globalists seek to dissolve the world's cultures into a degenerate, consumerist stew, while nationalists seek to preserve their societies in the face of these pressures. While nationalism has been dormant in the West for quite some time, the worsening global economy combined with the destruction wrought by invading Muslim "refugees" has threatened to inspire a tribalist backlash.

This is something the global elite want to prevent at all costs. Their avarice is so great that they will not even permit discussion of the horrors their policies are inflicting on the average Westerner. When they can't use government coercion to shut us up, they'll do an end run around free speech by conspiring with social media networks to do the job for them, branding it as "fighting hate speech" or "clamping down on racism."

It is up to us to resist the global elite's machinations by exposing their lies and deceit. Mark Zuckerberg may try to run his site like a digital bantustan, but no matter how much the globalists try, they cannot plug all the holes. By continuing to spread the word about Muslim refugee misbehavior and other stories the elites don't want us to share, we can put a dent in their plans.

Read More: Culture War Chat With Quintus: European Crisis Edition

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Indirect Vs. Direct Game: Which Is Really Better When You Approach A Beautiful Girl?

March 2, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Last week I wrote an article entitled Why Day Game Is The Secret Sauce You Need to Consistently Meet and Attract Women. In it, I introduced the concept of day game, explained its benefits in comparison with night game, talked about reasonable expectations you should have going in and the kinds of skills you'll need to get good. This week I go deeper into the topic by discussing "openers"—what you should actually say when talking to a woman you've never met for the first time—and tackle the age old question of whether it's better to go direct or indirect.

What Is An Opener?

Picture the scene. It’s 11:30 am and you’ve just snuck out of the office to walk around the block and clear your head after staring at spreadsheets for the last three hours. As you head for the coffee shop on the corner, in your peripheral vision you register a vision of beauty—long hair, slim waist, and tapered legs revealed by a short pencil skirt. You turn to look at the girl. Indeed, her face is as beautiful as you had intuited. You feel a strong biological pull, right down at the level of DNA. Ancient forces are drawing you towards her. But fear roots you to the spot. You could never simply just go and talk to a girl like that. After all, what would you say?

You pause for a second, observing her as she passes. And now the moment has gone, as it always does. Regretful and a little sad, you go to pick up your latte before returning to your desk. I suspect that all of us have encountered something like this at least once in our lives. For me, memories of girls who “got away” can linger for months, sometimes years afterwards. But what causes our reticence in these situations? In my view it is a combination of fear and lack of an opener—that is, something to say to a stranger without coming across as weird or creepy.

Fear

First a quick note about fear. Due to ancient bio-evolutionary factors that are of very little relevance in the twenty-first century, the sight of an exceptionally attractive women appears to instill a “fight or flight”-style mentality in most men that prevents them from approaching her. While this is instinctual and beyond our control, it is also completely unnecessary and counterproductive. As Roosh notes in Day Bang, a 100,000-year old impulse designed to protect us from dangerous enemies and predators has little use on today’s dating scene. Think about it—if you go up and talk to that cute girl in the gym, what is the worst that can happen? Probably that you will have a few second’s innocuous chit-chat and then she’ll politely excuse herself and go back to what she was doing before.

It’s hardly armageddon, is it?

Still, approach anxiety can be challenging, and for some completely destabilizing, at least at first. Really the best way through is simply to “feel the fear and do it anyway”, but Roosh has some great visualization tips in Day Bang that have really helped me over the years.

The Opener

She wants you to talk to her.

Now we come on to the meat of the topic—the opener. What exactly do you say to an attractive woman you've never met before but would like to get to know when she's walking down the street, picking up her dry cleaning, or browsing the philosophy section of the local book store? In essence there are only two ways you can go, direct or indirect.

A direct approach means that you go up to the girl and make plain your romantic and sexual interest in her. An indirect approach is where you go up and talk about something else—usually something situational—as a means to initiating a conversation and hopefully getting her phone number in the process.

Direct and indirect each have their good and bad points. In the next sections I give you examples of both methods as well as discussing their advantages and disadvantages. Be aware, though, that there is significant debate among men about which approach is better. Only you will know what works best for you depending on your aptitudes and the particular situation in which you find yourself.

Direct

A direct opener is when you walk right up to a girl you've never met before and make your intentions plain immediately. Examples of direct openers I've used are: "Hey, you're beautiful. [Holds hand out to shake] I'm Troy"; or "I noticed you walking by—you're really cute so I had to come over and say hi."

Advantages: There's something very masculine about being unashamed and open about your intentions and desires. A man who has the balls to walk right up to a woman sober and tell her he thinks she's hot is rare, and therefore attractive. Just by making the approach you'll go up a couple of points in her estimation, particularly if you give the impression that this is something you've done before with good results. It also has the benefit of separating the wheat from the chaff—you will very quickly filter out time-wasters and it's very difficult to get put in the friend zone when you've made your interest explicit in this way

Disadvantages: Direct is a high-risk, high-reward strategy. If a girl is even a little favourable to your look or vibe and you approach her directly then it will blow her away, and you're likely to get a phone number and a date out of it. But other girls may reject you right off the bat, whereas had you gone in a little more "under-the-radar" with indirect you would have had time to build up the attraction over a longer period.

Indirect

Approach a girl in whom you are interested and talk about any other topic apart from the fact that you are attracted to her and you're opening indirectly. In day game encounters, indirect openers tend to be situational. So you might for example ask a passing girl where the nearest pet shop is, or how to get to the train station as a way of initiating a conversation.

In Day Bang Roosh advocates what he calls "elderly openers." One major difference between day and night game is that during the day you should be a lot lower energy and less cocky-funny. In fact, a better strategy is to err on the side of being a little dull in the early stages of an interaction so as not to "scare the cat." An elderly opener is where you imagine what an elderly person might say to a stranger while striking up a conversation and using something similar on a girl. So for example if you meet at an airport you might ask her where she got her luggage from, how durable it is, whether she finds it suitable for long and short haul trips and so on.

Please note that such chat is not intended to get her panties wet and will not in itself land you a date with her. What it will do though is begin a conversation and give her the opportunity to demonstrate that she is open to talking. You can then transition on to other topics.

Advantages: Going indirect usually gives you more time time to demonstrate your personality ("deliver your value") and thus to build attraction and rapport. Phone numbers obtained through solid indirect approaches can often be less flakey than from quick direct approaches. This is because if you've talked for longer on neutral topics the girl will be more likely to feel that she "knows" you when you ask her out for a date; whereas the "heroin shot" of a direct approach where you reveal your attraction can wear off quickly, leaving her with the accurate impression that in fact she has no idea who you are.

Disadvantages: Transitioning from a conversation about luggage to something more flirtatious can be tricky. Plus, if you're not that experienced you might find yourself being put in the "friends" box more often than not.

Roosh has an obvious preference for indirect game and discussed his reasoning here:

> Many say direct game is "better," but unfortunately we're not able to conduct scientific studies to prove either side. Even my conclusions are based only on experience and anecdotal evidence. The main problem I have with direct game is > this: it shows your cards right away and forces the girl to make a decision before you build up any value besides your appearance and confidence. That's not enough for the majority of Western girls. You're not giving her the time and information she needs to weigh the pros and cons on sleeping with you. Instead, immediately after the opener, you force her to decide right then and there if she wants to get involved. She'll bow out ("Sorry I have a boyfriend"), or just be nice to you for the flattering attention.

>
> […]
>
> The more value you have, in terms of looks and status, the more direct you can go where you can approach girls saying they're beautiful and bang that night without problems. But if you're a random guy off the street who needs to study game to get the girls he wants, chance are you don't have that initial value where you will be rewarded for your direct opener.

Wherever the indirect vs direct argument stands, the truth is that you'll have to try both and measure your results. Some men, based on their appearance and vibe, will do far better with one than the other. If you're new to day game, don't take the experts word for it: try each one 50 times and measure your result.

Look out for next week's day game article, where I'll be talking about how to maintain a conversation once you've opened, and how to go in for the close.

—

Roosh has some great tips on how to develop your day game in his classic book Day Bang, home of the "elderly chat" strategy and the now infamous "pet shop" line. Day Bang, which I will be referencing throughout my day game series, is a 201-page book that solely focuses on approaching women during the day. Using dozens of examples, it teaches you how to meet girls in common daytime venues like the coffee shop, retail store, street, bookstore, and grocery store, among others. It's available on paperback, Kindle, or ebook. Click here to learn more about Roosh's book.

Read Next: How Clear Should You Announce Your Sexual Intentions With Women You're Attracted To?

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

SJW Melissa Harris-Perry Has Meltdown When Her Race-Baiting TV Show Is Cancelled

March 2, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Melissa Harris-Perry, best known for mocking Mitt Romney and his adopted black grandchild, has launched an epic tantrum after MSNBC chose to focus on the Presidential primary season instead of her "race and diversity" television program. She claimed her employer, who had put up with her mediocre ratings for an extended time, was "racist" and began boycotting her own show, if that is even possible. MSNBC's response was to cancel her show (and fire her personally) on February 28, after escalating patterns of histrionic behavior.

The two-hour show, named Melissa Harris-Perry, began its syndication just over four years ago, but during that time MSNBC has invariably lagged behind both CNN and Fox in the ratings. Despite widely being viewed as the leftwing version of Fox, the media group has struggled to find the regular viewership of its News Corporation-owned rival. Slowly, executives there have realized the need for more rigorous reporting of news, not handouts of airtime charity to SJWs like Harris-Perry.

In a move befitting of a woman naming 120 minutes of televised talking after herself, Harris-Perry tearfully claimed that she was being "silenced" by MSNBC. This speaks volumes about the mentality of race baiting SJWs like her. When you become upset that your personal narcissism factory is playing second fiddle to the nomination processes for President in the world's most powerful country, populated by 330 million people, you know you think far too highly of yourself.

The dilemma facing her, however, is that she was just not bringing in the proverbial bacon for the network. Someone like Bill O'Reilly of Fox can get angry at the world or life in general because he has the highest rating cable news program. He, unlike Melissa Harris-Perry, is also aware of the imperatives of business and profit-making. News networks are not deliberately loss-creating fantasies.

If "diversity" is so vogue, why did her show eviscerate itself and its ratings?

In dark times characterized by ISIS, the Ukrainian conflict and the risk of global financial collapse, only Melissa Harris-Perry brought you hard-hitting news coverage, like this fabulous story.

Times have never been better for delusional SJWs, particularly those of the race baiting variety. So why did Melissa Harris-Perry's Melissa Harris-Perry (I love saying it this way) struggle so badly and for so long? You already know the answer. While the rest of the population, even the vast majority of leftwing voters, are out living their lives and being reasonably productive members of society, a small but preposterously vocal minority has been trying to make themselves look much bigger and more important than they actually are. From Black Lives Matter to Feminist Frequency, these related groups do not command the sort of audience that MSNBC can profit from.

Still, these SJWs are squandering some spectacular examples of political correctness over past months and years. The recent Oscars furore, where self-promoting actors and actresses forgot the overrepresentation of black performers in terms of nominations and wins since 2000, has been a boon for anyone interested in not just ignoring facts but also deliberately twisting them. That Melissa Harris-Perry's show was canceled on the exact same day of the Oscars is an irony more supreme than any other I can imagine.

And this Oscars beat-up comes hot on the heels of the self-defense killing of Michael Brown by Officer Darren Wilson in Ferguson, Missouri, a topic Melissa Harris-Perry took every opportunity to misrepresent and lie about. The aftermath of this shooting incident played throughout 2015, illustrating the rabid propensity of SJWs to interfere with and plain reject investigatory procedures, then claim that any carefully drawn together findings are “cover-ups.” Nevertheless, the release of a Federal Department of Justice report irrefutably confirmed via (black) witness testimony, plus ballistics reports and other expert statements, that African-American Brown was the aggressor and criminally tried to take Wilson’s gun.

Compare this gerrymandering of current events to suit SJWs to the non-existent advantaging and even persecution Return of Kings receives. Facing down 1,600 slanderous articles from vested media interests, we successfully attracted tens of thousands of regular new readers in February, all without the financial largesse of an MSNBC or New York Times. If Melissa Harris-Perry could not making a one-egg omelette with the countless chickens she received, something is deleteriously wrong with her message.

Do not bite the hand that feeds you

“They can’t fire me, the Oprah of MSNBC, surely?”

It is clear that MSNBC either stoked Melissa Harris-Perry’s sense of privilege and vanity, or did not do enough to file it down considerably in the early stages of her time with the network. Whichever answer is the correct one remains to be seen, but we can attribute the real blame for her massive fall firmly and squarely on Harris-Perry herself. SJWs, including the wacky “academic” kind she represents, have long regarded themselves as invincible (or huge victims when their “God mode” runs out of steam). Well, first Harris-Perry’s ratings and now her virtual firing have dispeled that illusion, albeit probably not in her own mind.

Once again, we have been presented with a wonderful addition to our ever-expanding album of “SJWs Who Do Our Work For Us.” It is tempting to just get angry at Melissa Harris-Perry, or curse MSNBC for why they ever had her featured so prominently on their network. But why? Of course, my preference would be that she had never (dis)graced television screens in the first place. Irrespective of the mistake that was made, though, the cause of common sense always benefits when SJWs conclusively prove with their own efforts that they should never have been hired.

Tragically, beyond SJWs, the usual suspects, prima donna antics like Melissa Harris-Perry’s are found in countless other women, too. An article I wrote last week, for example, exposed readers to it’s-all-about-me syndrome sufferer Nina Paunova, who killed herself after her boyfriend, who promptly dumped her, figured out she was using him for money and gifts. The week before that, we learned about truly depraved false rape accuser and Game of Thrones actress Souad Faress.

Appearing like disparate situations to some, they are actually all intricately related testaments to female self-entitlement gone mad. Expect many more of them going forward, potentially through ever worsening permutations.

We can only hope that MSNBC will learn its lesson this time. Ha, unlikely!

Read More: Fake Conservative Megyn Kelly Exposes Her Anti-Trump Agenda During Presidential Debate

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How To Deal With Incompetent Women In A Technical Job

March 3, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

In the United States (and probably other countries) most engineering and technical feats are accomplished by teams of engineers or programmers or designers all working together under management. It is management's job, amongst other things, to source, hire, and fire the engineering staff, so your average technical guy has absolutely no control over who his coworkers are, other than transferring departments or getting another job.

This can create some problems in the office, and often serves as a flashpoint between women in the workforce, who think they are treated unfairly due to their gender, and men who simply do not want to work with them.

It's Because You're Bad

As we here at ROK know, women have been trying to reinvent their role in society. Traditionally, women have been the home-makers and the child-rearers, and the men have been the breadwinners who work the dangerous, dirty jobs. From childhood on up, girls play with dolls, stay clean, and don't learn anything technical from their fathers. While girls may do sports, any sort of technical activity in their youth is non-existent, although this is largely becoming a problem with all kids today.

Boys traditionally learn to work on cars, keep lawn care equipment running, and maintain a home. All of these things directly translate into a good background in mechanical technology upon which you can build. One of my bosses told me he always looks for co-ops that worked on a farm, because it shows problem solving in a technical environment, and, more importantly, it shows work ethic.

Girls usually don't have any of this, and so they are more apt to have no base upon which to root their purely theoretical academic degree. This leads to no understanding of specific situations and appropriate actions to take in response. While this is a problem with many college educated people in a technical field, it's worse with women and hipsters.

And You Think You Know Better

One of the popular tropes in industry is borrowing the Mary Sue film character type and assuming that someone just out of college will have a fresh perspective and immediately "think outside the box" and solve everyone's problems.

"Think outside the box." As a colleague said in a meeting, you can't think outside the box when you don't even know how big your box should be, or how big other peoples' boxes are. Probably explained best by the Dunning-Kruger effect, it takes knowledge of a subject to be able to critically judge your skill in the subject.

Ignorance truly is bliss. If you don't know how bad you are, it won't bother you. If you can coast through a career and blame everything on gender bias, you've got a double win.

The Only Metric That Matters

Here's the biggest piece of truth that I can jam in this article. Professionally, I, and any other competent engineer I know, don't care one whit about ANY demographic aspect of any co-worker that doesn't affect performance. If a coworker is a woman, I'll check out her tits as a matter of course, but any sort of interest ends there even if she isn't wearing a ring. A factory environment with 9-to-1 men to women and an HR department just waiting to pounce is no place to run game.

Other than that, the only thing that matters is how well you can do your job. Can I trust you to handle your shit and not screw me over? Can you help me when I need it so there's a point in me helping you when you need it, or are you just a waste of resources?

A LinkedIn poll showing what percentage of men and women preferred Competence or Confidence.

I'm not paid to do a woman's job as well as mine. Simple math explains that the amount of work is divided among the workers, and if some of the workers cannot handle their share, management will simply lump it onto the ones that can do it. Couple that with a large company so afraid of lawsuits that they will never fire anyone for lack of performance, and you end up carrying people who are taking up slots that you could have used to hire good workers.

Bad Workers Make Bad Managers

There's only one thing that can be done with someone who is technically incompetent but not able to be fired, and that's promote them high enough they can no longer cause any direct damage. I think this is one reason why every topic about women advancing in tech focuses on them being leaders and managers and "leaning in," as opposed to advancing the normal way, i.e. being good at it.

Bad managers will still wreck things, but it's like having a bad driver instead of a misfiring cylinder. The failures are bigger and take a little longer to manifest, but they're still there, and you have to be make sure you jump clear before the crash.

Surviving In The Modern Workforce

HR demographics are a rigged game. When equality is defined as an excuse to treat men horribly in an ill-considered attempt to balance out a fictitious dystopian vision of the past for women, it is clear that men will never receive fair treatment until significant change occurs. You have to protect yourself.

If you work with a typical female technical type who thinks she knows far more than she does, the best thing to do is to disengage completely. It's not your battle, nor your responsibility, to make sure her stuff gets done. If she doesn't ask for help, good; don't allow her to profit off your expertise. If she does ask, tell her that you're happy to help, but she needs to go through management to make sure they're good with you spending time on it. This will probably get her to back off, as she was looking for you to freebie white knight for her while she could take the credit and not look stupid.

Women hate each other.

If you're told to work with her, attempt to do so. If she rebuffs you (and she will), document this with your boss. “I offer to help every day, but she simply won’t listen.”

Now, if you have to work FOR a female manager who is clueless, you have to hoe a very careful row. You need to strike a balance between being knowledgeable so that she can rely on you, but not be seen as a threat. This is done by doing your homework ahead of time, knowing much more about the topic at hand than she does, and having one-on-one meetings ahead of big meetings so that you can get her approval ahead of time. Note, this meetings should be out of earshot, but within eyesight, of others unless you want to run Seduce Your Boss game.

I’m not a manager, so I don’t have advice for having one of these wonders working for YOU. Arrange a transfer if you can.

Conclusion

Office politics are not a good game to play, and this goes double when any sort of PC or tolerant person is involved, and triple when that person can’t compete normally due to inadequacy. Stay as far away as you can, and document everything when you can’t.

Read More: How A Man Should Build Up His Professional Network.

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

Tone Deaf Leftists Lavish Praise On Book That Features A Man Falsely Accused Of Rape

March 3, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The death only days ago of To Kill A Mockingbird author Harper Lee produced fusillades of praise from the militant celebrity left. The centerpiece of their commemorations was her flagship book about a white Southern lawyer tasked with defending a black man accused of rape with no evidence. However, these same public figures are always the first to jump on the "rape culture" bandwagon, immediately equating female accusers with victims and males accused with rapists.

"Listen and believe" has for them become an ardent ideology, not a platitude to be given mere attention, a travesty recently reaffirmed in the deplorable Souad Faress' false rape fantasy. How does this gel with To Kill a Mockingbird, which is a direct indictment of mob antics and thinking?

Sadly, at the same time they were applauding Lee, celebrities were publicly calling singer Kesha a rape victim and her producer Dr. Luke an abuser/rapist. Whether they called Dr. Luke a rapist by actual name is immaterial. Hedging one's bets slightly for legal reasons so you can still slander a man society has already hit to the ground remains inexcusable. The worst offender, by far, was attention-deprived former Charmed actress Rose McGowan. She thought that #FreeKesha was too "weak" and opted for the conspiracy theory patriarchal superstructures line:

> Fuck this #freekesha How We Failed to Protect Kesha https://t.co/4BZn1K4xRQ

> — rose mcgowan (@rosemcgowan) February 20, 2016

Strangely enough, earlier on that same day she was full of praise for Harper Lee and her book:

> What humanity she had. #harperlee RT @nprbooks: Harper Lee -a life shaped by towering text: https://t.co/lz8dzKUucq pic.twitter.com/QHUAyTW9O7
>
> — rose mcgowan (@rosemcgowan) February 19, 2016

A good book, just one twisted to suit SJWs

"Atticus Finch is a monster! He cross-examined a girl who said she was raped! Listen and believe!"

I can imagine the politics of Harper Lee were to the left of me. That much is clear. The notoriously reclusive writer nevertheless produced a novel that I can continue to appreciate, years after first reading it. Though the trial of African-American Tom Robinson on trumped-up charges of rape becomes the major plot device, the story is told through the eyes of lawyer Atticus Finch's precocious little girl, Scout. She, observing her morally upright father, comes to see the true nature of mob justice. In the end, after being convicted based on the accusations made by Bob Ewell and his "raped" daughter Mayella, Tom Robinson is gruesomely murdered by the townsfolk en route to prison.

Before that sad ending to an innocent man's life, Atticus Finch cross-examines Mayella, blowing hole after hole after hole in her claims. Cross-examination of "victims" is anathema for feminists and SJWs, which is why those leftists praising the book have either forgotten this central part of the story or do not want to mention it. Of any episode with To Kill a Mockingbird, this passage outing Mayella's lies and the one where Tom Robinson is ridiculously convicted and killed demonstrate Harper Lee's profound belief in the need for finding the truth, not casually presuming what it is. The model for the character Atticus Finch was her own attorney father, incidentally.

Grotesquely, To Kill a Mockingbird has been contorted to symbolize racist injustices only (and ideas about this sort of injustice are usually completely misapplied by zealous, self-promoting SJWs). Of course, Tom Robinson's race had a lot to do with him being charged, convicted and then killed. Yet the entire book is a warning against people rushing to judgement, which has the habit of producing violence and other negative outcomes. For example, it is the loner "monster" Boo Radley, played by a young Robert Duvall in the film adaptation of the 1960s, who eventually saves Scout and her brother Jem after they are attacked by Tom Robinson's accuser Bob Ewell. Likewise, Dolphus Raymond, the purported town drunk, who has children with a black woman, only pretends to be inebriated because it gives people an "excuse" for his miscegenation.

Whatever Harper Lee thought about radical feminism and SJWs (and there are too few quotes from her to make any decent calculations about what she believed), her book stands on it own as a savage critique of people jumping the gun in both courts of law and general society. To Kill a Mockingbird's message of level-headed thinking and tolerance has been turned into an excuse for leftists to pretend to care about justice, even as they try and strip every conceivable notion of it from how we deal with rape accusations. Atticus Finch could never exist in a world populated by SJWs.

Changing the words to suit your own agenda

SJW Arguments for Dummies.

To Kill a Mockingbird, like all novels that go beyond being half-decent, imparts its message implicitly or semi-implicitly. But considering how the book is read by millions of children even in late junior high or early high school, it is not exactly difficult to discern the themes of the book. SJWs can read a piece of literature and forget what it means, depending on which lessons they like, do not like or appreciate only selectively. All the while, they spew verbal diarrhea about how great it is to them and how it changed their life.

What does this mean? Firstly, common sense and plain words mean nothing to SJWs. It will not convince them to hear an alternative position out, let alone agree with it more just partially. Words, pages and overall interpretations will be gerrymandered depending wholly on their politics and basest sensitivities. Better yet, the more nuanced version of justice advocated by To Kill a Mockingbird, including the need for due process, the testing of rape claims, and rule of law, can be ignored by someone simply claiming the word "justice" and deciding ham-fistedly what it is. After that, the person can mention that they read the book and that it inspired them to seek it in the world.

Secondly, newer generations, or simply those uninitiated about the true nature of SJW activism, are liable to link the well-meaning book with the retrograde political activity they see playing out on the streets and in charged environments like college campuses. In the minds of the impressionable, all instances where phrases like "justice" are used will be linked together, no matter how different or unexplainable the situations are. SJWs genuinely believe that they have the moral fiber of an Atticus Finch. It is irrelevant to them that he defended a (black) man accused of rape with no evidence and they want rape convictions with no evidence.

At a minimum, To Kill a Mockingbird is a great literary resource for illuminating the madness of so-called popular justice. When discussed (and that is the key word), it is an unforgiving admonishment of the horrors too frequently unleashed on the innocent, deprived of due process and the requirement to be proven guilty beyond reasonable doubt.

Read More: How To Kill Zombie Arguments

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

8 Fast And Cheap Meals That Will Get Girls Rushing Into Your Place

March 3, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

I lately converted a lot of my dates into faster lays by proposing the great homemade dinner on the second date instead of waiting for the third. Sex is highly implied in this maneuver. You must SELL IT WELL, and make it sound like she could miss the dish of the century. Buy the ingredients, and some extra alcohol if your fridge is not stocked.

Once home, I usually clown around and pretend to be on my imaginary cooking show with her. You can do the same but it is paramount that you include her in the preparation. You can't have her sitting down and waiting. You are not a slave and while she's idle, she does the worst thing she can do: she thinks. Keep her busy.

Declare that she is the assistant, boss her around, give her the shitty knife that does not cut, use the imperative, touch her waist, tease her. Built up the tension without attacking too fast. A woman is in in her natural environment in the kitchen. She loves the orders, she is more relaxed, and her nature reveals itself. There are many great dishes you can cook if you ran out of Kratom—here are a few that served me well in the past:

1. Escalope normande

As simple as it gets, it is the pride of my region. A flexible, delicious dish and the one I cook the most to get laid.

For the fast version (no time or the girl is not a sure thing):

- 2 chicken/turkey breasts (turkey is drier) or 2 veal escalopes
- a can of button mushrooms (200g or half a pound)
- 3 generous table spoons of sour cream
- 1 table spoon of butter

Season both sides of the meat with salt and pepper. Fry it in the buttered pan with the mushrooms until the meat is golden (do small incisions to cook it faster). Add the cream, stir a bit with the juice of the meat for two minutes. Serve.

For the slow version

- Same quantity of meat as above
- 400g or a pound of fresh button mushrooms
- 4 to 5 generous table spoons of sour cream
- a large white onion
- 250 g or half a pound of rice (optional)
- butter

Clean and cut the mushrooms and the onion in slices. On a slow fire, fry them in a saucepan with butter, salt, and pepper while keeping an eye on them, until the mushrooms lose their water and the onions are golden. Fry the seasoned meat in a separate frying pan until cooked to your taste. Mix the whole thing in the frying pan with the sour cream for two minutes. Serve.

You can serve it with white rice on the side (pro tip: put the rice in a tea cup to shape it like a dome before serving it). Rice cooked in chicken stock is even tastier. Don't forget to dip some bread in the sauce when you are done. Downside: All the fat dulls the effect of alcohol.

2. Jajecznica (Polish scrambled eggs)

This dish is cheap, fast, and tasty. It has the advantage of being a snack, a light dinner, or a breakfast. The Poles usually serve it with a bread roll and sliced cucumber or tomato.

Ingredients:

- 6 eggs (depends of your state of hunger and the size of the girl)
- 200 grams or half a pound of ham or smoked sausage (kielbasa)
- half a red capsicum (can be replaced by a tomato but not as tasty)
- an onion
- 2 table spoons of butter
- few slices of cucumber and tomato (optional)

Cut the meat, the onion and the capsicum in small cubes and fry it in the butter until they are soft. Crack and beat the eggs in a small bowl until homegenous. Pour the eggs in the pan. You can add a bit of spinach or coriander for the colour. Stir and cook until the juices have evaporated. The key is to use enough butter so it does not stick. Serve.

3. Tarator (Bulgarian cucumber and yoghurt cold soup)

This one is designed for summer. It is extremely refreshing after a long walk in the sun. It is light and is usually served with bread that you can dip in it.

Ingredients:

- 2 cucumbers
- 500 g or a pound of yoghurt (preferably Bulgarian)
- 1 or 2 garlic cloves
- half a cup a crushed walnuts
- 1 table spoon of dill
- 1 table spoon of olive oil
- salt

Beat the yoghurt with a bit of water so it becomes homogeneous and has the consistency of a soup. Crush the walnut and chop the dill. Peel and crush the garlic clove. Mix all of it together.

Peel the cucumbers and cut them in their length twice then cut them in slices. You can pour everything in the blender to go faster but the taste will not be the same.

The key is that the tarator has be cold. Put it in the freezer for 15 minutes (or in the fridge so you have more time to work on the girl) and add ice cubes to it. It goes nicely with red wine or cold beer.

4. Argentinian salad

Probably the cheapest and fastest dish of the list. But still effective and tasty.

Ingredients:

- 1 lettuce
- a can of tuna (two if you even lift)
- 1 ripe avocado
- 1 banana
- mustard
- oil
- vinegar
- salt and pepper

Put some lettuce leaves in the two plates. Add a box of tuna per plate (or 1/3 for her, 2/3 for you), half an avocado in cubes and half a banana in slices. Prepare a vinaigrette (oil, vinegar and a table spoon of mustard with salt an pepper. Beat until homogeneous) then pour it on the salads. It has to be mixed slowly to avoid turning it into a banana-avocado mess. Serve.

5. Pork chop with white wine and French shallots

Pork and white wine go well together. The pork chop on the image is served with gratin dauphinois.

Ingredients:

- 2 nice pork chops
- half a glass of white wine
- 3 or 4 French shallots
- salt and pepper
- butter

Chop the shallots in very thin little cubes. Fry them in the pan with the butter until they are nice and golden. Season the pork chops and fry them with the shallots. Cook until they are white then take them out of the frying pan. Add the white wine and mix it with the shallots for a minute. Add the pork, finish cooking it and let the sauce thicken. Serve.

You can serve it with a salad on the side or pasta.

6. Soft boiled eggs with bread fingers and endive salad

It is delicious and can be served as a light dinner or breakfast. And yes, it has loads of butter again.

Ingredients:

- 6 to 8 eggs (better to have the eggs at room temperature)
- baguette (plain)
- salt, pepper, oil, vinegar and mustard for the vinaigrette.
- butter
- Note: you need egg cups for this recipe

Bring the water to boiling point. While it heats up, wash and cut the endives in their length to create long slices. Mix them with your vinaigrette in a bowl. Cut the baguette in fingers and butter them. Put the eggs in the water and add a bit of vinegar if the shells crack. Cook them for three minutes sharp.

Take them out immediately and cut the top open to the yolk to release the heat. Add salt and pepper on top. You can add some shredded gruyère cheese on top of the eggs. Serve with the endives.

7. Shopska salata (cold Bulgarian salad from the Western region)

Simple and also ideal for summer. It is the national Bulgarian dish. Apparently, Van Damme and Stallone fell in love with it while shooting The Expendables 2 in Bulgaria.

Ingredients:

- 4 ripe tomatoes
- Bulgarian sirene (white brined cheese) or alternatively feta
- 2 cucumbers
- 2 roasted peppers or fresh green peppers
- 2 spoonfuls of hopped parsley
- 2 spoonfuls of chopped onion or green onion
- salt, vinegar, oil to taste
- olives (optional)

Cut the tomatoes, cucumbers, and peppers in cubes. Mix well with the parsley, onion, salt, vinegar and oil. Serve with white cheese (loads) grated on top. You can add grilled chicken with herbs on the side for the deluxe version.

8. Croque madame (Ham and cheese toastie with an egg on top)

Does not get more French than that. You can add béchamel sauce and French fries or fried mushrooms if you fancy.

Ingredients:

- 8 or 10 slices of white toast bread
- Ham slices (a nice and thick one per sandwich)
- Eggs (one per sandwich)
- Shredded gruyère cheese
- Salad (optional)
- salt, pepper, vinegar, oil for the salad (optional)

Take one slice of toast bread. Cover the slice with ham. Sprinkle some shredded gruyère on it. Season with salt and pepper. Cover with a second slice of bread. Prepare as many toasties as you need.

Melt the butter in a frying pan without it getting dark. Fry the eggs and keep them warm on the side once cooked. Put the toasties back in the frying pan, cook them slowly on both sides and put the fried eggs on top while they are hot.

Et voilà !

This strategical move is adapted for “normal to good” girls. I do not cook for sluts.

Three reasons for that:

- When I cook, I share something. I do not share anything (apart from my bodily fluids) with sluts.
- They are likely to criticize your dish, however skillful, because of their poor knowledge in human relationships and the notion of gratitude. I have problems holding my anger when someone shows me ingratitude.

- During the time spent in the shop, really a turning point, the hamster might kick in and they might change her mind about sex.

Lads, don't forget to bring your personal touch to the recipes, especially meals that reflect your own culture or roots. What you cook is who you are. You need to cultivate a unique and exciting personality through your cooking like you would in your conversation. Share a few childhood stories linked to the meals, tell the story well, make her share her past with you and invest in the micro-relationship.

Read More: What Do You Bring To The Table?

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

How Does The Raging Culture War Predict Our Sexual Future?

March 4, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

As I near the age when men traditionally begin families, I have become more pensive and observant. Many ideas that I once held have evolved, or sometimes completely reversed. After observing, discussing, experiencing, and researching various severe failings and perverse ideologies and the general depravity of Western liberal democracies, which are declared to be the pinnacle of civilization, I pose the question: Where are we headed, and what will the future look like?

Crossroads

We are at a very dangerous time. Between financial insolvency, moral weakness, social instability, destruction of the traditional family, and political corruption, the West is almost certainly facing decline, having outlived its period of dominance that most major civilizations pass through. If the West has not already crossed the Rubicon, then it is dangerously close to the point of no return.

While incremental marginal changes are possible, the hardest thing to change is the general trend, and the trend is for fewer freedoms, less economic opportunity, a weaker currency, a declining moral compass, more hypergamy, slut acceptance, and the pervasiveness of masculine, tattooed up, large, bossy women. It will be difficult, if not impossible to reverse these trends. However, let's consider where we are heading.

Women And Society

Throughout the entirety of human history, women have formed one half of the family unit. As man became civilized, he developed rituals and rules and routines which typically involved taking a life partner, as many other species in nature do. While I'm not convinced that humans are 100% biologically hardwired to accept pair bonding, the entirety of history would support this idea. While there were always cases on the fringes of promiscuity, premarital sex, and infidelity, it was also the rule throughout much if not all of this history, that families consisted of a man at the helm, and a younger, smaller, virginal, and submissive woman, who became the bearer of children, provided and cared for the family, and supported the husband, and was sexually restricted to only that man.

With the majority of marriages failing, we are literally destroying these natural structures. Families are no longer possible for the majority of people in the west, at least not without trying multiple times and dealing with the financial, emotional, and psychological damage that comes with failed marriage, divorce, and a lack of permanent pair-bonding. If the trends of feminism continue, society faces a future with loud, shrill, fat, manly, neon colored, sexualized women full of shrapnel and graffiti. What does this mean?

Valueless Sex

If it feels good, do it

Imagine a world where sex is completely valueless. I don't mean unenjoyable—biological and instinctual programming built in to every one of us guarantees some level of sex drive and a pleasurable outcome to orgasm. But imagine a world where there was no plane to sex other than physical stimulation. No emotional component. No mental challenge. No sense of personal connection or intimacy. No sense of discrimination or "specialness." No love. Sex would be freely offered daily with the same amount of thought given to a head nod and hello when passing someone on the street.

Upon first glance, some of you would no doubt say this sounds like a good bargain. If sex became more easily attainable, men could stop being frustrated with women and all the games we engage in to try to receive some pleasure from them. But consider this more deeply. Look at the end game. Fast forward not one generation, or two, but ten or twenty.

Already it is a common practice for pre-teens to exchange sexual photos of their bodies, if not engage in full sexual acts before leaving middle school. In high school many girls learn basic sex skills and by college they are so free and loose with their bodies that they become physically aged and degraded, not to mention losing the ability to pair bond with a life partner.

If you meet a 25-year-old woman today, she has likely performed more degrading and perverse sex acts than a married woman of a generation or two prior completed in her entire lifetime. If we consider the cases of sexting, camwhoring, slutification, Dubai-whoring, pre-marital sex, lack of shame or self confidence, and project a few generations in the future, we have a very scary society.

Future Projection

Our future society, if it does not collapse, would likely have sexual intercourse offered so freely and easily that it would be rendered valueless. Remember, in 2016 women are already pulling out a telephone, swiping their finger across it a few times, and then waiting for a stranger to come over to their place and bang them. The ease and ubiquitousness of sex in the future will be orders of magnitude greater.

While this could be enjoyable in the short run, perhaps even for a number of years, where does this hollow and empty interaction lead? Women lose the ability to pair bond after taking multiple sexual partners. In the future, as girls become sexually used up, perhaps before even reaching their teenage years, and sex is reduced to a mere pleasure seeking action, ideas such as beauty, commitment, pride, and loyalty become meaningless for both sexes.

Why be loyal to a woman when you have a steady supply of vaginas? Why marry and commit to a man when it is more fun to focus on your career while hopping over the carousel?

Indeed, what do the sexes even mean at that point? Will we see an increase in trannies and gay sex and things that even today are too taboo? Bestiality? If it's only about the physical orgasm, then it seems these would do the job as well. Forming a family will be impossible. Even today, the only thing keeping the majority of reproduction going is the hard-wired biological drive of women that encourages them to conceive.

The majority of new births are already out-of-wedlock bastards. If it wasn't for this biological drive, forcing single women to desire to reproduce, there would be far, far fewer births in the minority of households that have a traditional marriage. If this trend continues, I predict either the biological drive will change (things like technology can supersede this hard-wired drive—indeed smart phones can be as addictive as drugs or sex), and human reproduction will come to a standstill, or we will see a replacement of the family as the basic social unit, as the single mother becomes the dominant social form. The latter would likely lead to a matriarchal system where the government, forced to provide things a husband typically would, must rely on the labors of men to obtain resources needed to replace the missing husbands.

This may sound like a crazy idea, or an unlikely scenario, but if one rationally considers where the end of the long road we are heading on will lead, it is not a pretty place. The bottom line is that if women do not have their actions and behaviors controlled by men, then it is no exaggeration to say that we are facing the end of civilized society. Masculinity is the natural state of affairs throughout history. We are only attempting to reset things to their natural order, before feminism literally turns us until animals again.

Read More: 20 Signs That We're Not Living In A Patriarchy

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How Aristotle’s First Principles Can Help You Understand The World

March 4, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Last week, we took an initial glance at how philosophy is the science that seeks to analyze and abstractly consider all things, until the simplest, most extensive and generally applicable elements of all things can be plainly seen, thence offering a synthetic and integral understanding of all reality. I’d like to flesh this idea out just a bit more, looking at some of Aristotle’s ideas about first principles.

What we generally think of as “science,” Aristotle correctly called αἱ ἐν μέρει ἐπιστήμαι, “the partial sciences,” because they do not deal with the integral whole of reality, but deal with parts thereof that share some thing in common—i.e., astronomy deals with the nature and activity of the heavenly bodies in a broad sense; biology deals with living cells and organisms, etc.

Now, it is plain that the first knowledge a child has is spontaneous and more or less immediately sensory. With maturity, the mind begins to form connections and can begin to ruminate and reflect on what it perceives. This is the beginning of forming a scientific approach to knowledge.

Now, a man would die long before he could consider all the things in the cosmos from all perspectives. Even if he could do this, he would still feel the urge to unify this knowledge into an integral understanding of the whole, for this is the nature of (the nobler) man. Thus, rather than waste ourselves in that impossible task, Aristotle made the best progress by seeking to identify, in the first place, what was common to all things—to all particular sciences, and all things subject to our intellectual investigation and reflection.

Many may be tempted to think that Aristotle lived a long time ago, and surely we've made "progress" since then… so perhaps he is a bit outdated, no?

This is our modernist brainwashing kicking in. If one stops to think about it, we are considering the most basic principles of all things, and of all thought. It is the kind of thing that the first mind prepared to make such a reflection, and to share the fruits of his contemplation, would make. And so, it is not surprising that the classical period of the most ancient, developed literary culture in the West, would come to its crown and conclusion with such a systematic exposition of thought, so long ago. These principles obviously do not change over time, so we would certainly expect them first to have been discussed a long while ago.

Aristotle saw an hierarchy, indicating that the man of experience is keener than the man of mere sensation, and the craftsman more than the man of experience only; the man trained in a partial science is wiser still, but those trained in the speculative sciences are wiser than all (if well trained), because τὴν ὀνομαζομένην σοφίαν περὶ τᾶ πρῶτα αἴτια καὶ τὰς ἀρχὰς ὑπολαμβάνουσι πάντες ("all understand the thing called 'wisdom,' to treat of first causes, and principles"). St. Thomas agrees, defining philosophy (sapientia, "wisdom"), as scientia quae considerat primas et universales causas ("the science that considers the first and universal causes").

The cardinal explains to us what a science is not.

> "It is not "spontaneous intellectual knowledge, which scarcely gets beyond the surface of things and does not center in a systematic way around any one object… It is opposed to belief and historical knowledge. 'To know' (scire, "science") is not to accept on the authority of another, but to have a personal understanding. Lastly, it is opposed to uncertain, conjectural knowledge, for science implies certitude."

As we continue down this path, we may be surprised to learn how many things we may know with certitude, contrary to the rampant subjectivism that defines our epoch.

So, philosophy is the science dealing with universal principles. What are principles? The English term is from Latin principium, identical to Aristotle's Greek term, ἀρχή (arche): "beginning." The Cardinal explains that this is because, by "principle," we mean to denote the origin of a certain influence or contribution to the things naturally subsequent to these principles. He makes a distinction when discussing principles: we call principles "causes," when we speak of actual causes in the real world. But when they are considered in a man's mind, they are called "reasons."

He further calls upon us to observe the distinction between a real cause, albeit contemplated in the mind as a reason, and a reason which is merely one of logical order, and not of causation in any sense. He gives the example of triangles and right angles, saying the mind can perceive the reason why the sum of triangle's angles must equal the sum of two right angles; but this is not because the triangle is a "cause" of this truth in any sense; we merely perceive the logical predication involved.

Aristotle saw that there were four ways of describing all things by their causes. It will help to remember that "cause," here, is not mere "cause and effect;" rather, "cause" here means "a principle contributing to subsequent existence." The four causes are: the Formal Cause, the Material Cause, the Efficient Cause and the Final Cause.

Using the traditional example of a statue—say, a bronze statue of St. Michael the Archangel, let us look at these causes.

Formal Cause

This deals with what this thing is, specifically. If it is a statue, why is it a statue? What kind of statue is it? What makes it a statue? The recognizable form of St. Michael—i.e., not St. Michael himself, but his image or traditional appearance, formed from some material—is the Formal Cause. But we can distinguish further between an accidental form, and a substantial form. The imaginary form of St. Michael the Archangel could be formed in many substances, and because his form is not a subsistent thing in this case, but must inhere in another substance, we call his image the accidental form of the statue.

"Accidental" does not mean "by mistake;" it comes from Latin ad + cadere, meaning "stumble upon, happen upon, befall." The form of St. Michael "happens" to be the form, but we could have formed the bronze into the image of St. Paul just as easily. The bronze itself can be said to be the substantial form, so long as we are considering the form of the statue in front of us – i.e., not a statue "made from a bunch of bronze," but a brazen statue existing in the moment as brazen, rather than as wooden or as stone. The pithy Latin phrase describing a formal cause is: id quo ens est id quod est ("that by which a thing is, what it is").

Material Cause

This is the matter of which something is comprised. You will perhaps see why I was making a careful distinction, before. Bronze is the Material Cause, when we are wondering of what substance this statue's form was derived. The matter of bronze itself is the Material Cause; but the brazenness (as opposed to woodenness) of the existing statue is the substantial form, in which the accidental form adheres. The Material Cause is id ex quo aliquid fit, et in quo forma exstitit ("That from which a thing comes to be, and in which the form exists").

Pausing here for a moment, one can see the rich field of enquiry that would open up. We have been dealing with the Formal and Material Causes of the statue, but now let us take it down a level to the bronze itself. We could look at bronze as itself a "sculpture" comprised of copper and tin. Then, the nature or form of bronze is the Formal Cause, and the Material Cause is matter of this alloy. We can then consider the separate elements of the alloy, and thence break things down all the way to atoms, to leptons, to quarks, etc., only stopping where we find the prime matter, and principle of all other matter. But, moving on…

Efficient Cause

This is what people usually mean, when they speak of a "cause." This is "cause and effect." What made the statue? Why has the statue come to exist? In this case, it is the sculptor. But this, again, can be drawn back ad infinitum: what made the sculptor, and his material? This takes us back to the Prime Mover, as we'll discuss later.

Final Cause

This is the one that most confuses our modern sense of "cause," because it points forward to the reason for which a thing exists. But really, this is often what we denote when we use the word, "because." I made dinner because we're hungry; dinner exists for the purpose of satiating our hunger; our hunger is the cause, or reason, of making dinner. In the case of our statue, the final cause may be to win a reputation for the sculptor, to earn a commission, to ornament a church, etc., etc. And again, this can be extended out ad infinitum: why make money? To be happy. What is the ultimate end of happiness? Why ornament a church? What is the purpose of a church? This will take us to the last end of all creatures.

Now we're beginning to get an idea of the scope of philosophy, and of how, by looking at the simplest principles and causes of all things, we lay the ground work for understanding everything altogether. We'll continue next week.

Read More: How Philosophy Can Revive Your Dormant Critical Thinking Skills

Aurelius Moner

Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Mainstream Media Rushes To Excuse Muslim Woman Who Decapitated Russian Child

March 5, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

There is no such thing as female responsibility. Repeat, there is no such thing as female responsibility. It does not even matter if the victims are children.

This is the message that the mainstream media wants you to recite and believe after the horrendous decapitation of a disabled four-year-old Russian girl by her Uzbek nanny in Moscow. The main "reason" for her unspeakable crime, which Gyulchekhra Bobokulova, 38, has admitted guilt over, has changed. At first, it seems she severed the child's head because, in her absence from Uzbekistan, her husband had started a new family. After that, her central justification for murdering cognitively impaired Anastasia shifted to revenge over Vladimir Putin's ordering of air strikes against ISIS and other rebels in Syria.

In a macabre display, Bobokulova began parading the child's head around the entrance of a suburban Moscow subway station. Onlookers, fearing a potential bomb, kept their distance as the authorities approached. These first responders handled the situation professionally and commendably, taking the depraved woman into custody. The same praise cannot be given to those reporting on the saddening events.

The implications being drawn by almost every major news outlet, from the BBC to CNN, is that Gyulchekhra Bobokulova is mentally ill. Such an assumption was especially widespread when the "my husband cheated on me" thesis was coming out. Journalists are entirely unwilling to let the facts we know so far speak for themselves and feel compelled to inject commentary about Bobokulova's personal life.

As the nanny continues to falsely blame Russian military actions for her choice, what we are witnessing is an institutional need for news-shapers to perpetuate the myth that women just cannot commit repulsive crimes with anything close to full agency. Did the woman's partner hit her… in 2002? Did she lose her job [probably because she was incompetent!]? Did she claim she was sexually assaulted two decades ago [with no proof]? Everything will be done to search for answers, aside from pure malice, as to why a woman could ever do this to an innocent, not to mention extremely vulnerable person.

The five most infamous American shootings of the past five years have all involved mental health issues

With brain damage from being underweight, possibly due to anorexia, Adam Lanza's cerebral cortex and other areas of the brain responsible for decision-making were massively eroded, probably permanently. Can the same be said of Bobokulova?

Now juxtapose this largely sympathetic response regarding Bobokulova to the bellows of angry SJWs about white American men who commit killings. Salon has been one of the worst repeat offenders in this area. And one diatribe last year deserves particular scorn. In the aftermath of very disturbed Dylann Roof's church shooting spree in Charleston, perennial moron Arthur Chu, known for his slandering of Gamergate campaigners, claimed mental illness was a "cop-out" in explaining "white" rampages like those in Aurora, Isla Vista, Tucson, Charleston, and Sandy Hook. Strangely, he counts biracial Elliot Rodger, the Isla Vista killer, as Caucasian, all while claiming in other situations that milky-skinned SJW Shaun King is actually black.

So where can I start with that level of stupidity? For one, Chu's article deliberately avoided any explicit mentioning of Adam Lanza, the Sandy Hook perpetrator. This is because a report less than a year before had indicated he likely suffered from irreversible brain damage. Lanza was so extraordinarily emaciated and malnourished that he weighed just 112 pounds at around six feet tall. It is surprising he could even carry the guns with which he shot people. This adds to the other inconvenient facts for SJWs about him, including his complete inability to touch door knobs with his hands or fingers and his tantrum-level refusals to have a Christmas tree in the home.

Had Adam Lanza been captured, it is inconceivable that he could ever have fairly been found guilty of killing the students and teachers at Sandy Hook. His cognitive impairment via the brain damage and his long history of issues that any sane person would evaluate as serious mental illness would count decisively against him having any proper legal capacity. Him killing himself was the best possible outcome for SJWs. Even if they do not believe in innocence before guilt at the best of times, the death of a shooter means open season for them to twist the situation to their own advantage, notably if the killer is white or can be linked, however tenuously, to conservatives or red pill ideas.

Aurora shooter James Holmes attempted suicide… from age 11.

These kinds of jaw-dropping omissions or grossly underemphasized realities about SJWs' favorite shootings flow into the Aurora cinema deaths from several years ago. Student James Holmes had a history of mental illness going back over a decade, including suicide attempts that began at the age of 11. He was also known to stare at walls in the presence of co-workers, grinning or talking to himself.

Well-documented or very credible reports of this nature are replete in all five of the most covered shootings of the past five or so years. Besides Lanza and Holmes, Elliot Rodger, Dylann Roof and Jared Lee Lougner (Tucson) either had significant psychological and psychiatric interventions or were involved in pre-shooting events that warranted them, such as Dylann Roof's behavior towards mall patrons and staff. What Roof did became so worrying for these people that he was banned from that center.

The non-white Muslim factor

In the West Gyulchekhra Bobokulova would likely be found not guilty by way of genitalia.

The rush to judgment over white and male American shooters is absent in Bobokulova's case not only due to her having the right genitals but also because she is racially Central Asian and, to boot, a Muslim. With veritable hordes of angry, sex-seeking and violent young Middle Eastern men flowing into the European heartland, a proper assessment of this murderous nanny necessitates the idea that there may be cultural factors that explain why poor Anastasia was butchered. That is clearly anathema to the agenda of those who want to both keep the present fake refugees in Europe and invite millions more to come.

Similar to a stupid Cosmopolitan flow chart quiz, like "Should you dump your boyfriend?", journalists and the elites whose interests they serve tend to ask the following kinds of questions to determine whether to be objective or overwhelmingly partisan:

- Is the perpetrator of a nominal crime male? (5 points)
- Are they white? (10 points for a white male, 2 points for a white female)
- Are they non-leftist? (5 points for politically ambivalent, 15 points if they can be linked to conservatives or another maligned group even with the longest of bows)
- Are they from another protected group? (10 points for a non-Muslim, 10 points for a heterosexual male)

If your score is about zero after a crime it seems you definitely committed, the story will be balanced (the more likely outcome if you express support for ISIS) or amazingly sympathetic, provided you do not delve into supporting people like terrorists being bombed. The higher your point count is, the less entitled you are to anything resembling sober consideration or the right to a fair trail.

Let’s remember a little girl has died here

Anastasia’s mother Ekaterina and her husband, plus their other child, have lost a cherished family member, but the media is too busy trying to will that Bobokulova had a mental health excuse for taking her from them.

All outlets giving Bobokulova thinly-veiled excuses or mitigations for her crime are doing is spitting in the face of a little girl who, through her heartbreaking disabilities, was already truly vulnerable. It is par for the course nowadays that supposedly extremist Return of Kings is the one championing the obligation to hold an evil nanny responsible for what she has done to a defenseless person. SJWs and feminist-minded journalists preaching female empowerment are the same cretins who want to discount the capacity of a murderer at the expense of a child who had the privilege of feeling her head being cut from its body.

We are living in mind-boggling times. To prop up the “rights” of illegitimate migrants in Europe, and continue the well-spun fantasy that women are not ever responsible when they commit the most deplorable acts, an actual victim, both before and after her death, is being sacrificed on the altar of political correctness.

Rest in peace, little Anastasia.Yet you will not get such peace from those actively helping your murderer.

Read More: Death Toll Climbs In Paris As Media Rushes To Downplay Connection To Muslim Terrorism

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Safe Spaces On College Campuses Are The New Jim Crow Laws

March 5, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

The safe space craze has taken hold at college campuses across America. Students have been raising an uproar requesting that college campuses provide areas where students of color, and in some cases females, can relax and express themselves. They claim they want to connect without fear of being made to feel uncomfortable, unwelcome, or challenged on account of sex, orientation, gender, or race. Some have said that these spaces infringe on free speech. The students respond that the spaces would actually encourage free speech because in other areas on campus, minority students feel uncomfortable being made to defend their ideas or question the ideas of someone they think is smarter than them. And that leads us to the first point.

Safety, Status, And Stupidity

At Dartmouth: Black Lives Matter protesters interrupting a library study session

These students claim that it is an issue of mental safety, but the reality is that it is a reaction to a deep, terrifying, feeling of inferiority.

Some have asked why top schools like Yale, Oberlin, and Brown have been ground zero for campus eruptions. One reason is stereotype threat. This means that students of color and women are afraid of being judged by others and confirming stereotypes about their group. Black students are terrified of conveying a stupid thought and having their peers judge them as stupid.

Moreover, many of the towns in which these top colleges exist have large African American populations. This means that the service workers including the dining hall staff, custodians, and maintenance personnel are mostly black. There are also large amounts of poor and homeless people, also mostly black.

Minority students are just as status-conscious as any other Ivy League snob, and when they see the large numbers of people who look like them in positions of low-status, it freaks them out. As a result, an internal war wages within the black students, “Do people see me as a Yale student, or a black person?” When those two thoughts rub together furiously enough, a fire forms. They displace their anger and confusion they feel about themselves and their identity, and lash out at easy targets. Who are the easy targets? White and Asian students.

Math is hard! Time to switch majors.

Another indicator of inferiority is academic performance. Why are so many protests erupting at elite colleges? Put simply, some beneficiaries of affirmative action do not have the intellectual horsepower to compete at elite schools. This has been documented by UCLA law professor Richard Sander, who describes this unintended side-effect of affirmative action policies.

While affirmative action started out with noble intentions, the effect has backfired. Minority students are often selected less on academic merit and more on their ethnic background. Many of these students are smart, and top tier institutions are eager to admit them. However, a sort of one-up problem forms because a student with a decent academic record who should be in a state college gets bumped up to attend a moderately prominent college, and the student with good but not great test scores and grades gets bumped up to attend an elite institution.

A student then finds himself in a class where he has weaker academic preparation than nearly all of his classmates. Oftentimes these students find themselves in a course where the professors are not teaching at a pace designed for them—they are teaching to the "middle" of the class, introducing terms and concepts that can be difficult even for the best of students. A study at Duke found that many of these students end up changing their majors from a hard science or mathematics to humanities or social science.

They found that most of the students who are struggling are black or Latino, and the students who are excelling are Asian or white. How would that have felt to the underperforming students? Would they have imagined that this could reinforce in the minds of their classmates the stereotype that black people are not bright? Time to push that anger outward.

These feelings of inferiority motivate students of color to band together and have private spaces to talk because they're afraid of looking stupid to smart people. In a classroom or open space where all students are free to engage, students of color are afraid of being called out for offering a baseless thought.

They then request the campus administration officials to clear out a space for them to discuss whatever inane ideas pop into their heads. One interesting thing is that smart students express idiotic thoughts all the time, but because of the inferiority issue I noted earlier, students of color are more afraid of being called out for it.

Safe Space Supporters Want To Separate The Races

Friends of Black Lives Matter

These students want a separate space only for people who are like them. At the University of Connecticut, the college is now offering “blacks only” dorms for students who don’t want to be around other ethnic groups. Dr. Erik Hines, the Faculty Director for this initiative, said, “It is a space for African American men to, one, come together, and validate their experiences that they may have on campus.” He went on to say, “It’s also a space where they can have conversation and also talk with individuals who come from the same background who share the same experience.” Diversity is a strength. Let’s admit large numbers of black students, and block off a section of the dorm for them. What could go wrong?

Another UConn spokesperson said, “We know it’s not an issue of whether African-American males have the capability to excel in school; rather, it is their environment that sometimes inhibits their potential. At many predominantly white institutions nationwide, elements of African-American culture are harder to find, which can make some students experience a sense of detachment from their universities.”

If you are a white supremacist, these campus groups are your allies. If these students of color get their wish of “safe spaces” to segregate themselves from other students, other students won’t have to contaminate themselves by interacting with them. Black protesters and white supremacists are strange bedfellows, but that is where we have arrived in 2016.

Will Safe Spaces Spread Beyond College Campuses?

I haven’t had to talk to a white coworker in 4 years!

Civil rights leaders organized and fought for integration, with members dying for their cause. Decades later, students are asking to be segregated again. These progressive movements begin in colleges, but they spread throughout society. Soon enough we’ll see employees of companies asking for a “woman’s safe space” or a place where “employees of diverse backgrounds” can connect without interacting with white people.

Inferiority complex, identity confusion, and the lack of academic merit to compete with their classmates have triggered these students to demand a segregated “simpleton space” to share dumb thoughts with no threat of being called out.

Read More: Why Women And Gays Should Not Be Allowed In Male-Safe Spaces

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

How To Be More Productive With The Pomodoro Technique

March 6, 2016 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

The Pomodoro technique is a time-management tool that breaks work periods into one time frame, and a short rest period into another. It usually involves a 25 minute work sprint and a five minute rest period. Francisco Cirillo created this method in the 80’s and now it has become a minor phenomenon.

While it’s a good tool, it is slightly over-hyped. It definitely can help you get more done, but like anything, you need to find what works best for you. Below I’ve outlined the way to get started, and some benefits that work-stop can bring to your life.

My settings

My Projects

I have my Pomodoro set to 30 minute work sessions and five minute rests, with two hours netting me a full fifteen minute break. You can buy the timer or you can use an app. I use the app Pomodoro Challenge for Android (photo above). I like it more than pen and paper, since I can track how much time I spend in different projects and goals. The app is also gamified, if that is a perk to you. For beginners, I suggest a 20 minute Pom, seven minute rest period with four sessions giving you a 15 minute rest period.

I'll usually clear 6-8 Pomodoros a day depending on what else I need to do. The important part is consistency. Track everything. It may not be important today, but when you analyze your time you don't want any unknowns. You'll want to review weekly, monthly, and potentially yearly depending on how important your time is to you. It will fascinate you to see where it all goes. Anything over an hour you should track.

Kill boredom with Pomodoros

The Pomodoro method is the ultimate study or work method to prevent you from being bored. Frankly, nothing works better. Why? Well, where do you usually stop in a project? In a section that's enthralling? Probably not, you stop when things get too hard. This is the wrong way to it. The next time you come back to your project, you aren't walking directly into a roadblock when you use this method. When the timer alerts for you to cease, you need to get into the habit of stopping, dead. Imagine a firefighter in the middle of a meal. He doesn't get to take an extra bite when he's called. Fork down, out the door. Just like you will when the Pomodoro is over.

It's going to be frustrating the first few times—you're in the middle of the breakthrough, in a solid state of flow, then you end abruptly. It's not bad, though: it's a bookmark for your flow state. This is exactly the positive frustration you want to end on—frustration to bring you back to your hustle. When you come back you'll be right in the grind ready to roll.

The key is to leave and return on time. If you leave a project after floundering for three hours in one section, you won't nearly have the passion to solve it when you come back. Stop right when the bell rings and this won't affect you.

Use Andreian breathing methods to never lose focus

Take the air

When i'm running a Pomodoro, I'll use an Andreian breathing method to stay focused. I'll start with a tactical breathing exercise by manually processing each breath. After the first Pomodoro of consistent breathing focus, I'll essentially begin on auto pilot. Breathe in for five seconds, hold five seconds. Breathe out five seconds, hold five seconds. It will be uncomfortable on the exhale, but you will adapt.

The reason this is so crucial to your focus is that it puts a wall around your focus with one single gate. This gate, only lets in one or two, three thoughts max at a time. Without the breathing base, you don't have any walls, and you'll be distracted by every thought, phone notification (turn off notifications) or text message that comes through.

In order to have a direction, you need to be laser sharp. Once you obtain this level of focus you can accomplish nearly anything, as most goals are compounded time. After doing this long enough, I've gotten to the point I can work through all phone calls and texts. If my flat began to burn down, I'd keep writing. Use your new focus with caution.

Keep your brain active with movement

On my five minute breaks, I'm not taking a leisure break, I'm taking a brain refresher. I have a 45-pound kettle bell that I'll keep by my desk and swing for the duration of five minutes as fast as I can while holding proper form. This can be replaced with anything depending on your goals. You can walk, do push-ups, burpees, anything that will get your heart-rate up.

Your body and your brain work together, if you let one go stagnant, they both suffer. For things like taking a piss, fit it into the seven-minute mark too. You do not want to be late to your own party. Anything bigger can wait until your first 15 minute stopping session.

Another point that helps me focus is standing up while I work. If you don't want to pay for a standing desk, make one. Or stand at the kitchen counter. When we sit we become naturally lazy, worse if you lay down to work. Being on your feet naturally engages your brain more. Sitting and laying down is for resting. This is something for you to test and continue if it benefits you, just like the Pomodoro Method itself.

Read More: Time Is A Non-Renewable Resource

John Doe
John Doe is the creator of Andreia Thoughts: Self Development through total discipline. He is a cult leader, artist, writer, and inventor. His work can be found at Andreia Thoughts. Connect with him on Twitter, and Instagram for more insight into greatness.

The Future Of Denmark: Women May Be Stoned If They Cheat On Their Husbands

March 6, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The Danish TV channel TV2 has aired a two-part documentary called "The mosques behind the veil." Reporters go undercover as Muslims who just arrived in Denmark, and use hidden cameras to expose how Danish imams say one thing to the media and another thing to their devoted mosque-goers.

One imam at the Grimhøjvej mosque in Aarhus, Abu Bilal, preaches that adulterous Muslim women should be either stoned to death or whipped, according to Sharia law. The imam also says that leaving the faith or denying any of the religious rules is punishable by death.

> Anyone who withdraws from the religion, who is an apostate, he must be killed. Or a denial. One who denies fasting or do not believe in fasting. His verdict is that he is a disbeliever. If he is stubborn and will not fast, he will be killed.

"I hope that ISIS wins"

The hidden camera captures him lecturing women and children about Islamic law and how it should be applied in an ideal Islamic state. He says that the "eye for an eye" rule should be applied to those who hurt Muslims: "If you kill a Muslim, you shall also be killed."

Abu Bilal's teachings depart from the mosque's official line. The chairman, Oussama El–Saadi, says in an interview that they follow Danish laws and encourage Muslims to take an active part in society: "We can accept everything that is happening around us, and we can cooperate with the people of this country without problems."

But this is not the first time that the Grimhøjvej mosque has been in the media spotlight.

For several years it’s been known as a place where young Muslims become radicalized. On Danish radio, Oussama El-Saadi has shown sympathy for the terror organization ISIS: “I hope that ISIS wins, and that one day we have an Islamic state in the world.”

Abu Bilal.

Professor Thomas Hoffmann studies Islam and the Quran at the university of Copenhagen. According to him, imam Abu Bilal was expressing what a “perfect” Islamic justice system looks like. There is a duality in the imam’s view of stoning—the penalty is not allowed today, but might be in the future.

> On the one hand the imam admits that stoning is not a part of this society’s law. But in his view, stoning should be allowed in the best of worlds—the Islamic world. The penalty of stoning points on the one hand back to an ideal judicial norm of Muhammad’s era, but on the other hand it is also postponed to an unspecified Islamic future.

Thomas Hoffmann thinks that teaching Sharia law makes the integration of Muslim women into Danish society more difficult.

> It is helping to create a distance and alienation in relation to Danish democratic values and notions of crime and punishment. It probably also contributes to the idea that the Danish society effectively prevents the “true” Islam to unfold.

The Danish reporters also expose how three mosques recommend a woman not to go to the Danish authorities when her man is being violent. One imam tells the woman to just trust in God, and that going to the police will only make things worse.

> I will give you one advice: Don’t go to the Danes. If you can not live with him, then come to the Sharia council. Then it may dissolve the marriage.

Extremists survive by lying

Danish TV has done a great job of showing just what is being taught in mosques in the West. While people are not currently being stoned in the streets of Denmark, this foreshadows what Western societies might look like in the future, if Muslims come into power. It might seem like a terrifying dystopia to us, having people killed over their religious preferences, but to Muslims it's paradise on Earth.

Of course not all Muslims have the same opinion on these issues. But it's not just their crazy ideas that are troubling, it's the way they lie. How can we know if these ideas are widespread or only true for a small minority, if Muslims aren't openly talking about them? They obviously say one thing behind closed doors to their trusted peers, and another thing to the media and ethnic Danes. It's a deceitful act, and it shows their ungratefulness to the people that let them in. It's also an established custom of Islam.

Taqiya is, according to Wikipedia, "a form of Islamic dissimulation or a legal dispensation whereby a believing individual can deny his faith or commit otherwise illegal or blasphemous acts while they are in fear or at risk of significant persecution." This means that Muslims are allowed to conceal their true opinions and goals in order to protect themselves. A companion of Muhammad, Abu Darda, said "we smile in the face of some people although our hearts curse them."

Coming to a mosque near you.

Lying is a Muslim survival tactic as old as the religion itself. Now we see it practiced in Western countries. It may be the case that Muslims fear that showing their true colors will lead to bad consequences for them. After all, they are still a minority, and they must be aware of how immigration and multiculturalism is being questioned now much more overtly than before. The narrative that made it possible for them to come here in the first place is crumbling under the weight of an unprecedented migration wave.

By nature I'm quite pessimistic, and I don't see this situation getting better. We now have hundreds of thousands of Muslims in Europe, ready to be radicalized, and more are on their way. ISIS can find many allies among them, and behind the closed doors of the mosques their savage message can spread. After the terrorist attacks in Paris, some asylum seekers could be heard celebrating in their tax-funded Swedish home.

It's a ticking bomb just waiting for someone to lit the fuse.

Read More: 12 Ways Danish Women Are Different From Brazilian Women

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

The World Is Revolting Against Hollywood's Awful Feminist Remake Of Ghostbusters

March 7, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The new Ghostbusters 3 is all shades of terrible. Combining affirmative action with casual racism (the three white characters are "scientists," the black woman is some sort of glorified ghetto girl), this excuse for a remake has been forced to sell itself through the use of sick kids and lame trailer jokes that include a rip-off from The Exorcist's line "The power of Christ compels you." However, the public is rebelling, with overwhelming condemnation of the film's premise and even existence.

Either those who saw the new trailer are all Return Of Kings readers, capable of discerning cinematic propaganda, or the general population is more astute than we give them credit for. Two-thirds of the trailer viewers have "disliked" it, perhaps vindicating the desperation of actresses Melissa McCarthy, Kristen Wiig, Kate McKinnon and Leslie Jones in promoting the film by having photo ops with kids dying of leukemia and the like. Sony has responded with a mass delete campaign to thousands of comments left on the trailer.

No one has adequately explained why, in a world where everything from Microsoft to Snapchat is male-generated, the new globe-saving paranormal clean-up team is all female. Just because is what we have been told. Is it not enough, for example, that women, without superior qualifications, are prefered 2-1 for STEM faculty positions? Evidently not.

In multiple areas, including gender, race and the celebration of obesity, Ghostbusters 3 is a symbol of more or less everything that is wrong with both society and the filmmaking industry seeking to protect it. For your own self-respect, we vociferously recommend you keep further away from this film than Melissa McCarthy does from diets and good exercise.

Sick kids, anyone?

Sick child does not want actors from a political movie at his bedside

To show that affirmative action was not nearly enough for them, the cast of Ghostbusters 3 shamelessly paraded themselves in a hospital full of sick kids last year. Forgetting the inconvenient detail that the film was months from being released, and the whole idea of film character visits are meant to be about kids knowing who the dressed-up people are, a large number of commentators online were left gushing and awwing over the supposedly wonderful gesture of the four female leads.

Thankfully, what seems to be a majority saw through the ruse. There is a massive qualitative difference between visiting sick children in character in general terms and doing so when the promotion stage is in full swing. Sure enough, a film star like Russell Crowe dressing up as Maximus Decimus Meridius would gain some social and even financial benefit from visiting suffering young people dressed in attire from Gladiator. Yet the advantage he can receive, considering the film was released a decade and a half ago, is far less.

People will surely criticize me and say, “David, what’s the problem if the women made some sick kids smile? It’s a kind-hearted act.” For a start, whether the kids smiled or not (and a photo is only a snapshot) is entirely irrelevant to the cast using terminally ill children to promote a film. Our conception of charity has regressed to the point where commercial advertising and charitable deeds are regularly conflated. We need not rely on Hollywood to make this assessment: Facebook and Instagram are full of people, often attention-seeking females, claiming acts of charity so as to garner the accolades of their “friends.”

All smiles to promote a feminist movie while child in the background appears unconscious

Although I am not a Christian myself, the Ghostbusters 3 PR stunt reminds me of the New Testament parable about the "charity" of the rich and self-promoting versus the true generosity of the poor and modest. In this example told by Jesus, the wealthy men gather in the temple to give vast sums of money as publicly as they can, while a solitary old woman, frail and otherwise penniless, produces a single coin that she gives quietly in the corner. Not only does the woman give more because of the comparatively very high value of the coin for her, she does so in a way that actually resembles helping others, not helping one's image. For the rich men, doling out their "riches" for praise represents nothing to them because they have so much more.

Ghostbusters 3 and race

Leslie Jones could pass for John Coffey's brother but her Ghostbusters 3 character is actually a great deal different, i.e. stupid and stereotypical.

As I alluded to above, Leslie Jones' character is an over-the-top Queen Latifah-style character, embodying everything that is stereotypical of and arguably wrong about African-American women. Fittingly for a film which concerns the paranormal, she is the quintessential Magic Negro character, bringing the main characters together courtesy of her street knowledge and the provision of, yes, you guessed it, a hearse for the group's transportation. Jones does remind me of the attacks against The Green Mile and the character John Coffey, except the latter figure was falsely maligned in a good film. By contrast, the excoriation of Ghostbusters 3 and its hood-dwelling black member is valid.

Amusingly, the visceral racism of Ghostbusters 3 has been replicated by Tina Fey recently. Her film Whiskey Tango Foxtrot depends on overdone race jokes and the casting of white actors to play ostensibly Middle Eastern characters. But, hey, her feminist pass checks out. Like Melissa McCarthy, who avoids serious scrutiny because her embracing being fat "emancipates" fellow overweight females, Fey's reputation will escape largely unscathed. Apparently earning millions of dollars for yourself in the name of girl power excuses you.

Let us look deeper, though. Popular culture reflects the views of its creators. Leslie Jones' Ghostbusters 3 character is exactly the sort of readily angered black woman liberals want. Beat-ups like in Ferguson, Missouri depend on this drastically dumbed-down caricature of African-Americans. Similarly, the proliferation of unashamedly fat women like Melissa McCarthy in films makes feminists and their enablers happier about themselves and their imminently approaching lives as cat-tending isolates.

How much money will Ghostbusters 3 lose for having a political agenda?

Jimmy Kimmel, like others, was forced to mischaracterize Return of Kings in even attempting to land blows on us.

Persecution of Return Of Kings has been commensurate with our website's reach over the past year or so. From Canada in August last year, when SJWs tried to hunt down Roosh like a crude Gestapo would, to the 1984 hate we received for our planned meet-ups, leftists fear our message and critique of popular culture. In between, we ensured our readers and others could make appropriate choices about whether or not to see copycat J. J. Abrams' The Force Awakens. Expect negative responses to us for daring to question Ghostbusters 3 and its agenda of women-just-because, minority-stunting stereotypes and exploiting sick kids for Sony Pictures' gain.

At the end of the day, if the message and meaning of this new film is so significant, why is criticism of it utterly dismissed or suppressed in the name of "fighting misogyny"? This is the sort of question advocates for this terrible excuse for popular entertainment fail to answer. You know your product is a bung one when you require kids with diseases to unknowingly sell it.

We urge readers and others to boycott this film at all costs. Do not add to Sony Pictures' feminist-loving coffers or help pay for Melissa McCarthy's next cheeseburger.

Read More: The New Ghostbusters Movie Will Be Ruined By The Feminist Agenda

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How The Media Is Using Inquisition Tactics To Make You Paranoid And Miserable

March 7, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The CNN website this Saturday carried a story entitled "10 Reasons Single Women Should Be Mad." It is a familiar-themed piece of mass-media dreck, reciting the same tired litany of lies and distortions that serve to provide bitter women with their daily fix of outrage. The fact that the article's theses have been disproven ad nauseam is quite irrelevant: what matters is the myth of inequality, and the attendant need to scapegoat the evil patriarchs who are holding good women down.

Every hysteria needs the following elements: (1) a scapegoat, on whom rage can be directed; (2) an apparatus which enforces the ruling orthodoxy; (3) a docile population which is pliant enough to believe what it is told to believe; (4) an educated class which provides intellectual justification for the hysteria. Once these factors are present, the hysteria can blossom. The end result is a society riven by suspicion, fear, and division.

We moderns like to think of ourselves as uniquely enlightened, and free from the fears and superstitions of the past. We are not. The specific nature of the hysterias may have changed, but the mentality and results remain the same. The study of the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal illustrates this point.

Let me say here that I use the Inquisition as an example not to single out these two nations for special criticism, but only because I am very familiar with this period of history. I have nothing but love for Spain and Portugal, and nothing here should be interpreted as any special criticism of these nations. Every nation, and every historical period, has had its plague of hysterias, paranoias, and problems. No one is exempt in this regard.

Descendant of a morisco expelled from Spain

Author Toby Green, in his meticulously documented study Inquisition: The Reign of Fear, notes that Europe's witchcraft hysteria did not affect the Iberian nations to the same degree as it did Germany and northern Europe. Spain and Portugal did not see the same type of mass burnings of witches that were visited on other parts of the continent (neither did Italy, for that matter). But the explanation for this, Green notes, is quite simple:

> Just as the witch-hunts in northern Europe expressed powerful social drives and contradictions which required a scapegoat, so in Iberia the Inquisition had already targeted its own scapegoats, in the shape of conversos [Christianized Jews] and the moriscos [Christianized Muslims]. Witches were no longer necessary; fantastical enemies were not required as others had already been invented. [Green, p. 221]

This has the ring of truth. But what is incredible, then as now, is the degree to which these popular hysterias and delusions can permeate and terrorize every single aspect of society. Green notes that a visitor today entering almost any restaurant in Spain will see dishes on the menu described as a la Espanola or Castellana and served with slices of ham or pork. There is even in Madrid today a museum called the Museo del Jamon (Museum of Ham). There is even a dish there named Judias con Jamon (Jewesses with ham).

At tapas bars, patrons are almost automatically served pieces of pork, chorizo, and shellfish. Few today will notice that all of these foods are forbidden under Jewish and Muslim dietary laws. Offering such foods to a converso or a morisco was the ideal way of testing a suspect person, and of publicly affirming one's own doctrinal orthodoxy to the rest of the community. The offering of such food was as much of a veiled threat as it was a hospitality. It was a way to test the other party, to see if he was "one of us."

Spanish tapas dishes

Thus, even something has apparently innocuous as tapas became a kind of enforcement mechanism. Culinary vigilance against evildoers became embedded in society, just as today, in the halls of universities, every student must be on his or her guard from the imaginary racists and rapists that might steal their souls.

We moderns are tested in the same way, but in other ways. There are creeping bans on certain pronouns that might “offend” some people. One’s choice of words on social issues immediately signals to the modern “social justice” inquisitor whether one is a friend or an enemy.

Green goes on to cite examples of how, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries when the Inquisition was strongest, anyone who even hesitated to eat these “forbidden” foods could be denounced as a crypto-Jew or crypto-Muslim. Jews and Muslims were seen as the invisible enemy infecting the body politic, and had to be neutralized and destroyed, just as today’s invisible enemies are the legions of secret “patriarchists,” “racists,” and “rapists” who are stalking the landscape.

This mentality was not something in the abstract. In societies where everyone watched everyone else, people’s lives could be ruined for the slightest deviation from the party line. In 1597, for example, a morisco named Bartolome Sanchez was arrested along with his entire family. The neighbor who had denounced him stated that he had seen Sanchez wash himself scrupulously after emptying his bowels.

Since this was supposedly something that only a Muslim or Jew would do, Sanchez must have “relapsed” into his old Muslim ways. Even converting was not enough: simply having Moorish or Jewish blood made one automatically corrupt, and the taint would hang over the heads of generations.

For example, the completely innocent granddaughter of an accused man was prosecuted by the Inquisition in Mexico in 1604 for wearing silk garments (supposedly favored by Muslims and Jews). In 1587, several descendants of denounced people in Murcia were convicted of wearing silks.

Accusations equal guilt

Even one's sexual proclivities, however harmless, could come under scrutiny. This was a particularly dangerous area of inquiry, as one's sexual habits could be interpreted to suit almost any pre-existing conclusion. In other words, a crime could be manufactured where none existed. In Lisbon in 1637, for example, a woman named Cecilia da Silva was accused of sorcery for "putting a spell" on a man named Antonio de Bairros and causing him to stray from his attractive wife.

It was a case of hysteria brought on by an accuser likely suffering from a tortured sense of sexual envy; regardless, people's lives were ruined where there was no demonstrable crime. An atmosphere of suspicion leads to repression. Where normal sexual desires are denied a legitimate outlet, the repressed energy is vented in obsessive fixations on deviant sexual behavior.

The CNN story cited at the outset of this article is part of this same conditioning process: with the use of false or misleading propaganda, the Western media is systematically conditioning women to regard men not as partners in a healthy society, as the evil "enemy" with inherently depraved motivations and predilections. He must be controlled; failing that, he must be destroyed.

The greatest tragedy that these types of hysterias inflict on society is the chilling effect that they have on personal freedoms. A climate of fear and suspicion is generated, with every person watching what they say and do. The Inquisition is rightly considered one of the first modern institutions, because it sought to monitor every aspect of a person's life.

Torquemada's original Inquisitorial decrees from 1484 aimed for nothing less than a state of permanent social surveillance. Teachers could not be appointed, nurses and midwives could not work, and no profession could be practiced, without first securing the Inquisition's approval.

As Green says,

> Since the slightest slip of the tongue could lead to a denunciation, humiliation and the loss of privileges, the society of vigilance became the society of suspicion, and of division. The spread of conformity had predictable and deleterious results, which are being repeated today.

The blood of the denounced, leaching into the fields, fertilized the growth of continuing repression; innovation came to a shuddering halt, and creativity ebbed to a trickle; and the looming figures of gossip, suspicion, and retribution cast dark shadows over the affected societies.

Read More: My Education Was A Complete Waste Of Time

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Train Your Body For Strength Versus Endurance

March 7, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

If you're reading my articles, then you are likely either a fitness novice looking for a place to start, or an athlete seeking an edge in your athletic endeavors. If I'm going to be training you, I will now explicitly state what I have implied in several of my articles: truly effective training is a much deeper rabbit hole than just knowing what exercises to do and the proper form for said exercises.

A major tenet of training, I've found, is setting concrete, realistic goals for the "point" you are at currently at: if you're just beginning to run, winning a marathon is not a realistic goal for at least the first year of training. In contrast, "increasing cardiovascular endurance" or "running a mile" is a very realistic and achievable goal. And once you have achieved one of your goals, you will be both physically capable of achieving the next one, and having the psychological confidence to do so.

And this concept of setting goals brings me to the title of the article—for increasing strength and increasing endurance are goals that are both achievable for beginners, but are mutually exclusive for elite level athletes.

Why Is This The Case?

This is because there are different types of skeletal muscle fibers that pertain to different kinds of physical exertion. Training for maximal strength will lead to you developing more of one kind than the other, and inversely training for endurance will lead to your muscles predominantly being composed of the other. More specifically, and greatly simplified, there are three types of skeletal muscle fibers, and they are as follows:

Red muscle, or slow oxidative, is a type of muscle fiber that slowly contracts. This type of muscle slowly produces lactic acid (the stuff that causes “the burn”, to tell you when you’re over-exerting yourself). You can observe “red muscle” by looking at a cooked chicken—this is the dark meat. It is found in the chicken’s legs for obvious reasons: the chicken spends most of its day walking around, thus needing that stamina. This is the type of muscle fiber that is found in endurance athletes such as marathoners.

Note that muscular endurance (i.e. your legs not getting tired in a marathon) corroborates directly with cardiovascular endurance. The heart utilizes a separate type of muscle tissue and as such will not be discussed here.

Fast Glycolytic, or “white muscle” is, as one might expect by contrasting the previous paragraph, a muscle fiber that quickly and powerfully contracts in a bout of maximal exertion. In accordance with its power, these muscles quickly and abundantly produce lactic acid, a hormone that acts in a positive feedback reaction, i.e. your body telling you to take it easy or you’ll tear something. This type of muscle is found in any athlete that needs a quick burst of power-sprinters, Olympic weightlifters, ring gymnasts, etc. To return to the chicken comparison, this is the white meat, predominantly found in the breast and wings, as the chicken cannot sustain flight, and has no need to—just a quick sprint to get away from predators.

I. Willis/Visuals Unlimited ies, Inc. Permission required for reproduction or display.

And finally, fast oxidative, or intermediate fibers, contract rapidly and have a moderate rate of fatigue. They are red and aerobic, rather than anaerobic, and serve as something of a “jack of all trades” of muscle fibers. An amateur athlete that trains in both strength and endurance without seeking to excel in either will have an abundance of these.

How To Train For Each

Training in one way or another will cause your body to generate one of the types of skeletal muscle tissue, and you cannot have a maximal degree of all three. Have you ever see a marathoner step into the weight room and snatch 400 pounds over his head? Me neither.

Despite that, you would not say that any person with a high degree of any of the three kinds is “unfit.” It is impossible to be a world class athlete in all three, but it is quite possible to be above average in all three. To cite one example, an Olympic class men’s gymnast, who is obviously incredibly dexterous and has a high degree of endurance, is also capable of deadlifting twice his bodyweight. While that bodyweight is not particularly heavy, an objective viewer should still be impressed with a small man deadlifting 300 pounds or so.

Power

A regimen for raw muscular power would be one of high weights and low repetitions. It would also be almost entirely made of compound lifts. A sample regimen for this would be along the lines of (all lifts are a one rep max or one set of no more than 3 repetitions):

- Deadlift
- Squat
- Bench Press
- Overhead Press
- Weighted Pull-up (preferably with a chain belt rather than clencing a dumbbell between your thighs)
- Dragon flag, Roman Chair sit-up, or some other heavy abdominal exercise

This is a fairly standard strength routine. Note that this routine is simple and only has six exercises. If you have a million exercises in your routine, you're doing it wrong. While there are more esoteric exercises that are very effective for strength training-such as high level work with gymnastics rings-these exercises are much simpler and more accessible for the average man, and will likely be your starting point.

Endurance

As one would expect in contrast, an endurance workout has high repetitions and lower weights. Also in contrast is the greater variety of ways that muscular endurance can be trained—you can quite easily take the routine cited in the Power section and make it an endurance routine by dropping 100 pounds from each lift and adding 5 sets of 5 to each. However, I dislike doing high repetitions of weights-there are some experts, notably Pavel Tsatsouline, who claim it has a higher risk of injury.

Instead I will use my own endurance routine, done on a separate day from the strength routine, as a sample:

- Two sets of one handed pushups, one for each hand, to the highest number I can do them with proper form
- Two sets of pistol squats, one for each leg, again to the highest number I can do them with proper form
- Horse stance for the longest time I can go
- Floor-To-Stand bridges for repetitions (I try not to do as many of these as I do the other exercises, to avoid any spinal injury)
- Neck bridges for time
- V-Sits for time
- 2 sets of "Hand-And-A-Half" pull-ups, one for each hand, for as many repetitions as possible
- A set of handstand pushups for as many repetitions as I can

In addition to these, I also do extensive cardiovascular training as well, and there's no reason you shouldn't. Running, martial arts practice, and swimming help provide endurance, the latter two of which also train the muscles to have stamina under a different set of auspices as well.

Regardless of the specific exercises you choose for each goal, the theoretical knowledge I have provided, as well as the sample routines, should see you on your way

Read More: The Ultimate Guide To Building Muscle: Genetics And Training

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

6 Reasons To Boycott Hollywood Forever

March 8, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

I used to love films. While other guys my age watched them for mindless fun, I viewed them as works of art that required scrutiny and attention to details for greater appreciation. I later even took a course on history of films in my university as an elective.

But now, my views on films as a whole have changed as I learned to see Hollywood for what it really is: a giant tumour to our culture and society. The next next time you decide to put yourself through another Hollywood production, consider these six points:

1. You're wasting your money and time on trash

While the budgets have gone up, the quality of Hollywood films have gone down. Hollywood has produced many classics in the past that I still regard highly, but all the junk they release today are shallow and predictable because they have been designed to appeal to the lowest common denominator.

The problem is that Hollywood has become too successful. They mastered the art of money-making using the same cookie-cutter story arc of Good vs. Evil that usually features characters from ~~comic books~~ graphic novel masterpieces. And the business model is just too profitable for them to try and experiment creating different themes and styles. Their apparent lack of imagination is demonstrated by all the horrible remakes and revivals that make going to the movies a complete waste of money and time.

The only thing more pathetic than sports fans are movie fans.

In comparison, I am always amazed by how refreshingly original foreign films are. Foreign films do exactly what motion pictures are supposed to do by offering new perspectives and insights, by stirring up your creative force, and by reaching deep into your soul. If you insist on watching films, go for the oldies or watch quality foreign films. Leave the new Hollywood releases for the brainless sheeple to enjoy.

2. You’re financing bunch of degenerates

And guess where all the money you’re wasting is going to? To finance the lavish lifestyles of all the Hollywood degenerates, of course. While American peons are dishing out their hard-earned cash for the privilege of sitting in front of a flickering screen for couple of hours, Hollywood entertainers and producers are using that money to buy their next yacht, private island, and $18 million dress. Along with politicians and multi-billionaires, they have become the new royalty in today’s society where the wealth gap is at its greatest ever.

Did Jennifer Lawrence join the Harvey Weinstein club by serving all his sexual desires?

Also know that the people who you are financing are somewhere between prostitutes and politicians in terms of moral rectitude. Sex scandals, Scientology, Satanism, and drug abuses among the entertainers are already well known, but there are also widespread rumours of the casting couch, and rampant pedophilia.

And this is just what we know. Who knows what more debauchery lurks beneath their thin layer of superstar lives? Us commoners are simply expected to feign ignorance and come back for the sequels.

3. Hollywood is full of sanctimonious entertainers

DiCaprio likes to lecture us plebeians to mind our carbon footprint while flying around in his private jet.

Not content with getting high on money, fame, and drugs, our 21st century jesters feel the need to boost their egos with the moral superiority high. And while they say nothing about the bankrupt morality of their fellow actors, they barely hide their contempt for white men, traditional values, and Christianity. But not only that, they also love taking their precious leisure time to enlighten us lowly subjects with matters ranging from climate change and race issues to feminism.

Some uppity twat with a messiah complex teaching us ignorant neanderthals to do more for women.

These entertainers, with their superiority complex, believe that their fame make them qualified enough to lead us and solve the problems of the world. Can you imagine the horrible dark age we'd be ushered into if it weren't for the guidance of these guardians of the universe? Neither can I.

4. They're actively shoving social justice propaganda in your face

Patriarchybusters?

Among the things Hollywood likes to offer their guidance on are issues of social justice and feminism. Back in the day, totalitarian states spent their own money creating propaganda to brainwash the masses; today, people pay Hollywood to get voluntarily brainwashed by them. With girl-power trash like the new Mad Max and the new Star Wars films, Hollywood works hard in their social engineering program to erase men as masculine leaders while replacing them with macho female characters who could do it all without a man.

If you're still not disgusted by Hollywood's blatant support of social justice, try watching this condescending piece that propagates feminist lies of rape culture:

5. Their movies are filled with dangerously flawed messages regarding sex relations

In real life, if you do this to a woman to make her fall in love with you, she will call the police.

Even without the feminist agenda, Hollywood inseminates dangerously wrong ideas in regards to attracting women and developing relationships with them. Take, for example, the romantic film beloved by women: The Notebook. There's a ridiculous scene where Ryan Gosling stalks Rachel McAdam and asks her out by threatening her with suicide. What kind of message is that sending to young and naive men who have never been taught how to court women?

Even animations that cater to family expose young boys with not-so-hidden messages about what male-female relationships are supposed to be like. I recently watched WALL-E and here's a brief synopsis of what I've observed: WALL-E, the dusty, working-class robot, falls in love with EVE, a much more advanced robot that is highly intelligent, confident, strong, aggressive, sophisticated, pristine, and beautiful all in one (basically all that today's young American women pretend to be but are not).

The timid and clumsy WALL-E grovels and follows EVE around, trying to get her attention in spite of how dismissive she is—she is too busy with her job to even acknowledge him. Long story short, EVE finally realizes how much of a nice-guy WALL-E is and rewards him with the affection that he had desperately sought. The message here is clear: be a supplicant male who worships woman regardless of how she treats you and she might eventually fall in love with you.

Yeah right.

Meanwhile, movies like Frozen teach girls that sisterly love is more important than anything greedy, duplicitous men and the nice guys have to offer. I can go on and on with examples from other films that feature weak male characters supporting strong and independent female characters. You have to pause and wonder just what kind of future Hollywood is paving for the upcoming generation.

Those who claim that movies are just movies and that entertainments don't influence our minds don't understand how mental conditioning works. Companies wouldn't spend millions of dollars on 30-second ads if they didn't have any effect on human thought and behaviour.

6. It's turning people into passive slaves

Do you know where they use movies to keep people under control? Prisons.

A snippet from this article reveals:

> In 1992, Newsweek reported, “Faced with severe overcrowding and limited budgets for rehabilitation and counseling, more and more prison officials are using TV to keep inmates quiet.” Joe Corpier, a convicted murderer, was quoted, “If there’s a good movie, it’s usually pretty quiet through the whole institution.” Both public and private-enterprise prisons have recognized that providing inmates with cable television can be a more economical method to keep them quiet and subdued than it would be to hire more guards.

Not only is Hollywood a money-making propaganda machine, but it also functions as the opium of choice for the masses. Every movie you watch induces low level alpha waves in your brain that makes you dull, passive, and suggestible. While under the influence, you are to forget about all the real-life issues and submit yourself before the behemoth who mesmerizes you with flashy images.

Why think for yourself when you can just watch some movies to pacify your mind and vent out your clever analysis on IMDB? Why stand up for yourself and fight against injustice when you can watch some superheros do it on screen? Why challenge yourself and bother accomplishing anything when you can do it vicariously through fake characters and fake situations while sitting on your ass?

Since the billionaire elites at the top can take care of all the world's problems just like Bruce Wayne and Tony Stark, us worthless peasants are expected to shut up and continue slaving away for the system. We are to remain as complacent drones without a will of our own while believing that our overlords have our best interests in mind.

Conclusion

Are you getting the message yet?

Sometimes I feel as though Hollywood is openly mocking us with movies like The Matrix and Inception to show just how deeply we're plugged in and dreaming, both unwilling and unable to wake up from their grasps, and not being able to tell what's real and what's not.

These days, I barely watch any films, and when I do, it's almost never a Hollywood production. Whatever few decent films they throw at us once in a while is not enough to make me want to support their machine; I simply have far better uses for my time. And I think that many men today can do themselves a favor too by taking another, different kind of red pill.

Read More: It's A Hundred Times Easier To Come Out As Gay Or Transsexual Than As A Conservative In Hollywood

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Letter From A Member Of The Global Elite

March 8, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Below is an email I received from a man who claims to be a member of a family that is one of the top 100 richest in the world. I believe it to be authentic.

I repeatedly told David that the European Union and United States were not yet ready for the final stage of our plan, but he didn't listen. Because he wanted to rush things through before passing away, we may have jeopardized decades of hard work where the sheep of the West would have voluntarily signed the death warrants of their own family members had we commanded it. I've had to cancel many social functions to meet with media owners to develop a modified narrative to save our beloved agenda.

We stumbled upon a useful technique in Germany after World War 2 when we noted how guilty Germans felt about asserting national identity and defending themselves from harm. They gave the keys to the castle over to the Americans, who thanks to their powerful cognitive elite, played an instrumental role in the rise of a digestible multiculturalism that led to the Germans competing amongst themselves to announce who was most welcoming of anything non-German, including people from countries who still practice stonings and beheadings. Once we saw the power that guilt played in allowing our agenda to be adopted, we copy-pasted it throughout the Western world, particularly Scandinavia and the Anglosphere.

Father and son participating in white guilt exercise

Most of your readers already know why we insist on Islamist immigrants, but in case you've been stuck under a rock of our design, the biggest threat to our power in a country like Germany is Germans. In America it's Americans. It's the natives who may look at each other, recognize themselves, and then begin a government overthrow that threatens my regal lifestyle and those of my friends. By destroying a country's social fabric, which consists of its nationalistic pride, belief in Christianity, the family unit, and fraternal organizations, we leave a once strong and cohesive people lost, confused, weak, demoralized, sterile, and floating in a plastic consumer wind we created, where the only way they can ease the pain of their psychological suffering and lack of meaningful human bonds is is to seek entertainment, antidepressant drugs, alcohol, and casual sex.

Our offensive front upon the identity of a nation is topped in terms of effectiveness only by feminism, the Hiroshima of cultural bombs that has destroyed the family unit so beyond our wildest dreams that I have a good chuckle about it every now and then. Its success is why David hastily thought we were ready to unleash the Nagasaki immigration bomb to finish off the job before his body gave way.

Our feminist useful idiots on the ground, with their short hair, ugly bodies, and shrieking manner, have been so effective that the German birth rate is now the worst in the entire world! This outcome is better than any eugenics program mankind has ever seen. We have allowed German women (and Swedish, British, American, etc.) to voluntarily sterilize themselves with absurd notions of being strong and independent by laboring dutifully and single-mindedly in our corporations. The scam has so many levels that it's hard to respect the female sheep for not seeing it:

—By pushing women to work, we increase the supply of labor, decreasing the wage price.

This increases our profits. Funny thing is that even though wages are already low, we're so greedy that we'll start to offshore the best jobs anyway, forcing women to play a game of corporate musical chairs to stay relevant in the job market while their wages continue to decline in real terms.

—The paltry salaries they do receive comes immediately back to us when they buy our marketed products, GMO foodstuff, technological crap, and mindless entertainment featuring lovable gay—and soon transvestite—characters. Our collective balance sheets don't suffer a technical loss from the price of their labor, and actually sees a net profit if you account for the credit card debt that women incur to buy our ugly corporate fashions. Sixty dollar yoga pants, anyone?

—Unlike when they work at home, their labor is taxed by governments that we own through crooked politicians who will sell out their people for a mere $15,000 donation. Their income taxes come right back to us in the form of subsidies, tax breaks, and the revolving door where our executives essentially have second homes in government ministries that pay obscene salaries and give huge kickbacks to their former corporate pals.

You have to admit this is genius, especially since there are still women who think feminism is about female empowerment. It is about empowerment—for us! Our research has calculated that a woman begins to be unsatisfied with corporate work after 13 years, but by then she is too withered, barren, and emotionally broken from being pumped and dumped so many times that she will be unsuccessful in finding a mate and reproducing, forcing her to work for the rest of her life. And even if she has kids, she'll be such a horrible mother that her kids will be sterile degenerates anyway.

Once we took care of the women, the men took barely a pittance of effort to get wrapped around our fingers. Their genetic predisposition already primed them to work like mindless mules, and now that we turned their young, fertile women into feral monsters who destroy their own bodies and souls, all we had to do for the men was hang the olive tree of fun casual sex. Our media guys in Hollywood made the rock star lifestyle the most coveted desire of these mules, and they sucked up the hookup culture, dating apps, drunken sex—you name it. Even the owner of this web site was a useful idiot of ours, spreading the idea of sterile sex even better than Jersey Shore (I secretly bought 10,000 copies of his stupid book Bang so he would continue writing about "banging" or whatever he calls it.) I can't say I like his more recent ideas, however, since it seems to promote reproduction and stronger family bonds.

As for why we are doing what we're doing, you have to understand that there are too many people on the Earth, and we're having trouble controlling all of you. We already have all the wealth we need, so our main goal is to preserve it. Don't listen to what our politician puppets have to say about "income equality" or egalitarian bullshit—we have no intention of making that a reality. We need to maintain the status quo while gradually limiting the population in a controlled, efficient manner, especially populations of those who can pose problems to our immediate interests: European derived white people.

I'm white in skin tone myself, but the problem with Christian whites is that our models show they are the greatest danger to our power. I'm sure you've read the history books we put in your factory high schools about all the revolutions that happen when white people get angry. This is why we have an intense propaganda campaign of "population control is good" and "global warming is bad" to demoralize whites. It functions alongside programs of open-door immigration and feminism to reduce their numbers relative to other groups that accelerate the decline of their social fabric and make them feel guilty for merely living. Ever wonder why you rarely see big white families anymore? It's so rare that if there is one, we make a reality show out of them and convince everyone how weird, crazy, and backwards they are.

Back to my friend David. Before the preservation of his brain can take place, he wanted to at least see Germany achieve our end game vision. We gave a call to Merkel and threw out a nice round number of Islamists she must accept: 5 million. She agreed—like she had a choice—and the men flowed in instantly, because of course we financed the boat drivers and smugglers in Turkey and Syria. But provincial Eastern Europeans started to raise a stink.

Even though we control all Eastern European media, we have not been able to get their sheep into completely accepting multiculturalism. Progress has been too slow and I think it's because of some odd strain of nationalism that our comrade Stalin failed to completely stamp out. The nerve of these people, to think that their borders are something sacred and should be defended with the sweat and blood of their people. We'll test their commitment soon enough, and see how much blood they are willing to sacrifice for our vision of unified world governments that ensure international order and stability.

Polish, Hungarian, and Czech politicians must have been secretly avoiding our testosterone lowering chemicals and foods to gather enough testicular fortitude. They showed other Europeans that accepting millions of brown men will decrease their standard of living and make their streets more dangerous and unwelcoming. Our media channels, even in the USA, a country we've already bombed with millions of invaders with hundreds of our strategically placed "refugee centers," were not able to silence this grassroots resistance or control it. Every wannabe nationalist tried to be a hero and yell about how the "elite" is controlling the West. Unfortunately for us, it was working.

I told David that the West was not yet ready for their own voluntary annihilation. So we had to backtrack. We let Eastern Europe build their stupid fences and quietly reduced our internal immigrant quota numbers.

But let me ask you something: do you think that will stop us? It's a setback, no doubt, but we've had many setbacks in the past century and have overcome them all. We're going to let things simmer down for a bit and focus more intently on our mind control efforts.

We already got Zuckerburg following orders from his CIA backed In-Q-Tel advisers to censor any anti-multicultural chatter and we're doing the same with Twitter. We need to squelch all independent outlets that give the appearance of resistance and criticism to our plans. This is why we're in the process of eliminating comment sections in all media sites. If the sheep doesn't see public criticism, they'll believe that no disagreement exists.

After we recently put the nail in the coffin of the Western family unit with homosexual marriage (code name "AIDS Marriage"), you're probably thinking that we're going to introduce some zany new cause like bestiality, but honestly we don't need to. Your birth rates are ruined and your most fertile young women are already taking birth control pills at the same time we have them on a schedule of HPV vaccines with delicious long-term side effects. You didn't hear it from me, but if a woman has been on birth control for over five years, her endocrine system is so ravaged that at least a quarter of them will remain sterile forever. Therefore you'll probably agree that no more cultural bombs are needed. We can focus instead on cementing our media control even further. Sorry, David, but you won't see much more action before your third heart gives out.

What we're actually going to start doing is save some money (as in trillions of dollars). While indebting a nation is good business since we can eventually take it over when they default, just like we did with Greece, we can't have the entire world defaulting at the same time. Collapses have to be done on our orderly schedule. What we'll do is start taking care of the most economically wasteful members of society—the elderly. They don't work or contribute to the tax base, so there's no real need for them to exist. We'll make health care so expensive that they will choose to die rather willingly, just like how young women sterilize themselves willingly. I'm already hearing reports that some old men are killing themselves so that their loved ones don't have to incur a huge debt for their care. This is great news, and I thank Obamacare for opening this exciting new avenue of "health care."

We monitor sites like this so we can get a rough count for how many of you are on to our plans, but honestly you're too insignificant to make a difference. I can give Roosh himself the minutes to our secret meetings, but it will be known by less than 100,000 people in a world of 7 billion. None of our media outlets will cover the news and if it does happen to go viral on its own, we'll get the link banned from Facebook within a day. I doubt that will be necessary because the tsunami of media content we blanket the wires with makes it almost impossible for a genuinely harmful bit of news to rise to the top, and as long as our girl Kim Kardashian has an ass that continues to dazzle the world, your "conspiracy theory" won't be taken seriously.

Is it really so difficult to accept that you are pawns in our chess game? At least you don't have to perform hard manual labor in a factory or farm like our sheep of the past. Think about it: you hardly do any real work for a life filled with our tasty entertainments that give you a rough simulation of the joy humans used to experience naturally. Sure your life is sterile, you have no concept of family, and your people think having pride in their own country is neocolonialism or white privilege, but there's a reason why you are controlled by us instead of the other way around: we were destined to have power over you. You're lucky we give you our scraps at all, because once we unleash our advanced robots, which are in late-stage development, you won't even be needed. Pray that we don't get Bill to unleash his diabolical vaccines on you!

I now have some important business to attend to so that's enough for today. I hope you feel as graced by my presence as I feel dirtied by yours.

Sincerely,

Master Servant Of Lucifer

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This letter was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: The End Goal Of Western Progressivism Is Depopulation

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why We Must Stop Giving Special Treatment To Women In The United States Military

March 8, 2016 | by Simon Murray | Link | Original Link

Even though women are eligible for combat roles and have earned the Ranger Tab, the military still isn't a level playing field for men and women. Military leaders who say that women can do whatever men can are just sucking up for promotions; it's still clearly an unequal environment. I have a few suggestions to help them put their money where their politically-correct mouths are: go Full Metal Equality, with concrete actions for fair and effective results, and quit giving just lip service to a gender-neutral force.

Equality in the draft

Of course! Rostker Vs Goldberg, in 1981 made very clear that the only real barrier to full Selective Service participation was the exclusion of women from combat roles. With Ash Carter's decision to put women into combat roles, it's time to get women in the draft. Concomitant with this, of course, is having the same consequences that men face for not registering.

For men, not registering means not being eligible for federal student aid, state-funded student financial aid in many states, most federal employment, some state employment, security clearance for contractors, job training under the Workforce Investment Act, and U.S. citizenship for immigrant men. Further, failing to register or comply with the Military Selective Service Act is a felony punishable by a fine of up to $250,000 or a prison term of up to five years, or a combination of both. Obviously, this should apply to women too.

Unfortunately, faced with the reality of consequences, some women now advocate getting rid of the draft. What, it was ok for men but not with the braver, newer, more-equal military?

Equality in standards

Absolutely. The military, all parties agree, should not lower standards for women. The only realistic way to do this is to abolish sex-specific training, clothing, and grooming standards. Bye-bye, discriminatory 42 and 19 push-ups, earrings, and haircut styles! There is only one standard in combat, and there should be one standard for training: whatever the position requires. An infantryperson is an infantryperson; a tanker is a tanker. Job-normed standards will prevent discrimination and ensure we have equality on the battlefield instead of situations like this:

How Not To Win Wars

Training also needs to be fully integrated. When I was at West Point long ago, women were prevented from gaining the benefits of all the physical training offered to men, like mandatory boxing classes. This is discriminatory when any women can now end up on the battlefield in a combat role. Classes like boxing and others designed to build fitness and the “warrior spirit” need to be open to and integrated with men and women, like both would face on the battlefield, and graded the same. Denying the value of this training to women is tantamount to saying that the Army doesn’t actually think they can compete with men; it’s the soft bigotry of low expectations. Don’t want that, do we?

Equality in advancement and careers

The Army does promotions with groups of officers and those enlisted through Officer Evaluation Reports (OERs). OERs have discrimination-inviting fields like “name” and text write-ups about accomplishments. Most promotion board members are men, but that doesn’t mean that they need to know who they’re evaluating. The “name” portion should be stricken, with the only identifying information on the form being just the Social Security Number. The last four digits of the number would suffice in place of the name and other identifying pronouns in the text write-ups of fields like “Comment on specific aspects of the performance…” or “Comment on potential for promotion.”

There’s also the Officer Record Brief (ORB) and Enlisted Record Brief (ERB), which have pictures and relevant record information. In the words of Dept. of the Army:

> 4. How it is used The ORB is used by personnel managers… to gain an initial impression of an officer’s qualifications and career history and as a “road map” to the Officer Evaluation Reports (OER) and other documents… Other individuals also use the ORB to form an image of the officer’s experience and qualifications…the ORB is one of the primary management tools used in determining where to assign officers.

That just screams “Use me to discriminate!” So get rid of the soldier’s picture on the form and name and any other gender or race-identifying text or clues like sex, spouses, and picture. People making career, assignment, and school determinations don’t need to know that stuff. They do need to know prior assignments and qualifications, and we’ve already agreed that sex is no longer a qualification for anything in the military. The best will rise to the top, male or female, and there will be no discrimination or preferences involved.

Lastly, the military needs to do branching under one sex-neutral system. For officers, some branches were closed to women, while men who didn’t get their first choices in branch assignments were force-slotted into less-desirable branches, which were often combat arms. Allowing men more access to the fast-promoting combat arms is clearly discriminatory. One system; no preferential treatment. That’s equality.

Equality in biology

By making it through Ranger School, which is extended time in a dirty, nasty, exhausting environment, women did away with a whole passel of stereotypes about privacy and behavior. It’s time to go Starship Troopers and get rid of dual-sex housing and accommodations. Heinlein’s political system can come later, but what’s clearly not needed is a divisive, discriminatory housing and benefits policy.

However, since we know that sometimes boys will be boys and girls will be girls, we do have to deal with pregnancy. Major General Tony Cucolo was a bit ahead of his time in Iraq when he proposed UCMJ legal action and penalties for women who got pregnant and the men who helped out, but it’s time to revisit that.

Pregnancy is a force degrader, especially around deployment time. Studies, even before the Iraq/Afghanistan wars (for instance, "The Impact of Pregnancy on US Army Readiness"), show that the staffing gaps caused by pregnant women are big problems. It's time to treat pregnancy for what it is in a combat environment—malingering. Malingering involves intentionally disabling oneself to avoid work, duty, or service.

In the age of consent, contraception, and abortifacients, that sounds like pregnancy; there is zero excuse for getting pregnant while deployed or getting pregnant after deployment is scheduled. In addition to the legal punishment, further mandate contraception or abortion for female service members who get pregnant in or around combat, or after deployments are announced.

The Army needs to recognize this as an unequal condition. Women now get 12 weeks of maternity leave by regulation and are non-deployable for 6 months if they're pregnant. Men can't get pregnant and get months of paternity leave when they're doing their combat jobs. In fact, men only get 14 days of paternity leave, and that's not equal. If we're going for equality, as feminists state, then women shouldn't be able to play the "pregnancy" or "maternity" cards while in selfless service to their country and their fellow soldiers.

Summary

My proposal list above is short, but addresses the core concerns with the gender-neutral agenda voiced across military and civilian discourse: selective service, standards, careers, and combat effectiveness. It excises privilege, special access, and special benefits. We'd see the best and most capable rank-ordered into positions and training, regardless of sex or anything else. Anyone against the items on this list is obviously against equality and combat effectiveness, and if they're against those, you should ask them why.

We know the answer. Feminists want all of the privileges and none of the responsibility for results. They want to inflict their notions on innocent people, heedless of the consequences. But if they want equality, the least we can do is make sure everyone gets it, good and hard, and put the ugly impacts of the feminist agenda for the military on full display.

Being in the military isn't all about promotions and badges and free day-care. It's about winning wars, and the shameful conduct of our nation's military leaders—with the exception of the Marines leadership—in completely capitulating to feminist political correctness will cost lives and victories.

Read More: 5 Ways We Must Enforce Equality Between The Sexes

Simon Murray

Simon is an combat-arms veteran with a couple deployments and a grad degree. Since escaping from the military to the real world, he writes periodically, quantitatively, and generally logically about whatever economic or social issues catch his attention at his blog.

5 Things Pornography Shows Us About Today's Sexual Landscape

March 9, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Pornography can be a polarizing topic in the 'sphere. Some schools of thought tell you it's probably not good for you and that you should watch it rarely if at all, while others have pointed out it might not be as detrimental to your game as one might think.

Personally, I use porn mainly to edge (I don't allow myself to orgasm), so I would probably fall into the second camp. However, since becoming unplugged from the matrix I've noticed some pretty telling parallels between glorified prostitution on camera and real life. A lot of people believe that what happens in these flicks is "not real" or "a fantasy" but I strongly disagree. When viewed through the lens of neomasculinity, the similarities are obvious.

1. All women want to be sexually dominated

[image]

There are plenty of scenes where the actor and actress are "making sweet love" with all sorts of kissing and affectionate touching. Whether or not the actress is actually enjoying it is anybody's guess because she's paid to sell the scene. But when she's getting her hair pulled, ass smacked, and in some cases choked, she ain't fakin' those moans. Physical domination at the hands of a male is what they want and it shows.

Girls in the real world are exactly the same way. They all want to be ravaged in the worst way and there are no exceptions. I speak from personal experience. If not for whacking it to porn during my sexless twenties, I might never know that girls really get off on being thrown around and manhandled in the sack.

2. The same few male actors are banging all the top girls

There are probably 30 or 35 female porn stars who are “household” names. They’re the most searched, viewed, in demand or whatever metric gauges their popularity.

Ever notice these chicks are getting banged by the same 5 or 6 dudes? You can check out clips of all of your favorite female actresses and if you’re paying attention, you’ll notice that the same few male actors are in just about every scene with the top girls.

In the world of pornography, a man’s penis size, stamina, and aesthetic fitness is equivalent to a man’s game level on the real life hookup scene. The men that look the best, have the biggest appendages, and last the longest in skin flicks are the most in demand by the directors.

The vast majority of men in this part of the world don’t have what it takes to bed the hottest females on a regular basis. Fortunately, most of what is required snag high value females is under our control. Lift, stack cash, and learn game and you’ll have the same ratio advantages male porn stars do.

3. Fat girls are not attractive

Totally bangable

Speaking of the top adult film actresses, none of them are fat. Sure, there may be one or two sprinkled in that carry a little more weight but they are a far cry from the whales that Western culture tries to shove down our throats as “gorgeous.”

The bottom line here is that attraction cannot be negotiated or mitigated and pornography mirrors this ironclad biological doctrine. No matter what they tell us, men with options aren’t going to sleep with fat girls just like high value females aren’t dropping their panties for fat dudes with neck beards who live with their mothers.

Women reading this would be quick to disingenuously point out the presence of porn that features fat or obese women. But I don’t have to be an expert in website analytics to know that the overwhelming majority of traffic is headed to the actresses who pass just about every boner test with flying colors.

4. Sex is more emotional for women

It’s probably an understatement that adult film actresses have exorbitant notch counts—and that’s not counting what happens off screen. Add to that the fact that they have much more sex as a matter of occupational obligation, and that most of that sex is with the top 1% of penises in terms of size, it’s safe to say that sex isn’t as exciting to them as it was when they first started in the business.

Be that as it may but they’re still women. And no matter how much sex a woman has had in her life, it is always an emotional experience. Obviously the emotional level varies from female to female. But every girl from virgins to sluts are emotionally invested in intercourse whether they like it, know it, or not.

Proof of this in porn is constantly on display. The actresses almost always initiate kissing, affectionate touching, and other actions that establish some sort of connection with the actor. They also make and keep eye contact during the scenes which is a tell tale sign they’re feeling something other than lust.

Any man with red pill game has, no doubt, experienced one or more chicks on his roster making a play to become exclusive. In most FWB situations, it’s the female who desires exclusivity first because the sex is emotional for her. She can say that it isn’t, but her biology always wins out in the end as females can only pair bond with one male at a time regardless of how many she’s sleeping with at one time.

5. The wall can be delayed

This actress is 42 years old

The vast majority of females “stop trying” after they’ve locked down a beta provider. They gain weight, stop trying to look (and sometimes act) feminine, and just let themselves go altogether…

…until they divorce rape their husbands and are back on the dating scene. At that point they have the motivation to get into shape and act like a lady. But years of poor food choices (and sometimes smoking and drinking) has pushed them past the point of no return and no amount of diet and exercise is going to reverse the effects of the wall.

Female porn stars, particularly the ones who fall in the “MILF” category are living proof that the wall can be delayed for quite a while. While not all actresses in this category don’t show signs of aging, a good number of them have tight sexy bodies.

A 48 year old “MILF” trumps a 20 year old fattie any day

These women know that if they let themselves go, they’ll quickly be replaced and the checks will stop coming. That’s motivation enough for them to stay looking good. Their bodies are their livelihoods so they do what’s necessary to stay employed.

A good friend of mine in SoCal works as a lab assistant (the guy who tests the actors and actresses for STDs, STIs, VDs etc.) in the porn industry. He used to tell us about the great and sometimes extreme lengths older actresses go to in order to stay attractive by industry standards.

One thing he said a while back that stuck out to me was that aging actresses who take shortcuts to stay attractive such as plastic surgery and botox don’t last nearly as long as actresses who didn’t cut corners. Female porn stars who watch their diets, live in the gym, and avoid smoking and drinking tend to last much longer than those who do not.

According to him, the actresses who last the longest go a few steps further by juicing, having a personal chef prepare all of their meals according to their specific dietary needs, and Human Growth Hormone therapy.

There are no shortcuts

What older female adult film stars show us is that if women outside of this line of work put their minds to it, they can delay the effects of the wall for quite a while. The motivating factor for both groups is the same: male desire. With hard work, discipline, and consistency, any woman, porn star or not, can be sexually attractive into her 40s.

Conclusion

As far as I'm concerned, any man who denies the similarities between pornography and the current sexual marketplace is either not paying attention or stuck in his own ignorant blue pill bliss.

Understand this gents: female sexuality is always for sale. Be it marriage, relationships, prostitution, or pornography, every woman's vagina has a price and X-rated movies are the personification of this axiom on both a physical and psychological level.

So the next time you fire up the ol' laptop for some chicken chokin' fun, try to pay a little more attention to what's really going on. If your neomasculine development is even in its infancy, the red pill truths will be as clear as day.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: 5 Ways Porn Might Not Be Bad For Your Game

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

3 Things Cosmo Gets Wrong About Relationships With Men Who Own Guns

March 9, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Cosmopolitan, bastion of feminine and progressive thought, such as it is, recently published an article entitled “It’s Time to Talk About What Guns Have to Do With Dating.” Using the progressive tactic of declaring whatever issue they have with a non-controversial topic to be a “conversation,” and thus worthy of discussion, this hit piece comes with a cute, heart-accented dialogue flow chart of the “conversation” a girl is supposed to have to ensure her beau is not a Bad Man With A Gun.

Full size.

Replete with a few tear-jerking personal anecdotes and blabbering on for more than double the length of your average ROK article, the author managed to get damn near everything wrong (even the Kimar they used as their title picture is a blanks shooting training gun), but here's three things they really screwed up.

1. Guns aren't part of the patriarchy

Citing research showing that men are three times more likely to own a gun than women, the author immediately casts the men as the gun owners, and the women then follow as the victims. Her logic follows that all women need to have the "conversation" with the men they are dating about gun safety, exemplified by hypothetically finding a gun in a sock drawer.

"What the hell are you doing in my sock drawer?" is the only question that this should bring up. However, this subtly leads into the last point, escalating from the neutral "dating" to "boyfriend and girlfriend living together" and shouldn't someone who is living with you deserve to know about any guns you have? Although the article is titled about dating, even the Narrative understands that you don't get to try to change a man until you've got your claws into his hide in a full relationship, hence the bait and switch.

The interrogative style of their flow chart leads women to probe to see if her man has a gun, if he bought it legally (and passed a background check), if he bought it for some "safe" reason like recreation or tradition or not, and if it is stored locked up or not. Any failure to follow the scripted answer is a "red flag" and will presumably get you dumped, though any girl throwing you shit tests out of Cosmo ought to be kicked to the curb on general principle.

The only answer you ever need to give a girl asking you if you own a gun is "Yeah. Wanna go shooting?" I teach people to shoot as a civic activity, and a lot of them are girls and women. Nothing says equality and true "girl power" like unlocking a skill in a lady that she can rely on for the rest of her life and not have to fear the dark any more. It's empowering and equalizing for them, breaks them out of the "victim" role, and it's a hell of a date if you do it right.

More girl power in this picture than that entire magazine.

2. Whether or not your sociopathic lover has a gun doesn't matter

Black frying pans, just like black rifles, are more evil

A few stories follow the above chart, all designed to show that a woman lost her life because of a gun and, thus, guns are bad and shouldn't be allowed to men. "How the hell did he get a gun?" is the question the article suggests you ask each time you hear about a woman being killed by her "intimate partner."

That's the wrong question. The question you ought to ask is "What made him murder her, and when did he lose the basic respect for human life and others around him that made him think murder was anything other than a heinous, forbidden crime only monsters commit?”

If you have a sociopath for a boyfriend, and he wants to kill you, you’re just as dead if he kills you with a frying pan than with a gun. Whenever someone kills someone else with something other than a gun, it’s a tragedy, but, when it’s with a gun, it’s a call to action to ban them.

This isn’t a logical failing of progressives; it’s not that they hate guns much more than they hate knives, or nooses, or sharp rocks, it’s that they hate what a gun gives its law-abiding owner, which is, of course, freedom from oppression. No other item allows you the ability to back up your independent thought and your publicly articulating it than the ability to deny anyone the courtesy of stopping you.

Yes, it’s a tragedy whenever someone innocent is murdered, but it is not the fault of the tool, only the wielder. Every time the Pavlovian reflex of the left twitches to enact more gun control instead of figuring out how we can stop people wanting to murder in the first place, it betrays their true desires of control over compassion.

3. You don’t get to deprive someone of their Constitutional rights because of a misdemeanor

The last part of the article deals with legislation and references the supposed “gun show loophole,” although the left has FINALLY figured out that the “loophole” is simply that private sales are not subject to federal background check requirements. The author then insinuates that it is legal to sell a gun privately to someone who is not legally allowed to own it, which is completely false, in an attempt to paint all people who engage in private sales as enablers of men who would murder their girlfriends.

Straw Purchases are illegal, as is selling a gun to someone who cannot own it, whether you know or not.

The author finally segues into claiming that single women are not as protected as married women, or women who are part of a couple living together, because violence against the former is simply misdemeanor assault while against the latter is domestic violence. Under the Brady Bill background check laws of 94, the NICS check system will flag anyone with a misdemeanor domestic violence charge and prevent the check from going through, but "normal" misdemeanor assault is not flagged.

The logical thrust is that "boyfriends" ought to be added to the Brady Law so that the inconsistency can be resolved, however the Constitutionality of depriving someone of a right enshrined in the Bill of Rights for a misdemeanor is highly suspect, even to the point of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas questioning it.

Constitutionality aside, this serves as an example of the continually encroaching control that feminists want over men, even men who aren't married to, or shacked up with, them. Imagine that you take a girl out on a couple dates, you both get drunk, she gets pissed and decks you one. Any physical response you might be tempted to give could not ONLY be grounds for assault charges, but she could claim you as a "boyfriend" and get you slapped with a domestic violence conviction and suspension of your firearms rights for life.

The "Gunsplainer"

The article closes with a condescending little infographic with some of the more simplistic pro-gun arguments and their suggested talking points on how to defeat your argument and "win," turning your potential date into a shrill leftist robot. It also contains a list of red-flag truisms that anyone would recognize as hallmarks of a dangerously unbalanced person.

There's no need to be a "gunsplainer" and to engage in her pointless debates. When she asks why you own a gun, tell her it's your Constitutional right and you don't need any other reason. If she doesn't like it, she can amend the Constitution through its legal process, or she can hit the bricks. Whoever heard of an unarmed King anyway?

Read More: 4 Bogus Excuses Barack Obama Is Using To Disarm The American People

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

How The Corporate Hivemind Is Losing Control Over Society

March 9, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

We have moved from an era of average products for average people to an era of tribes and leaders, as pointed out by marketing flack Seth Godin. This applies to the news industry perhaps more than any other business people interact with on a daily basis. An average saccharin news product for an average viewer is being relegated to the ash heap of history, especially when it comes to what used to be termed “mainstream” but is now more accurately termed “legacy” broadcast and print news.

The mainstream media lost control of the dialogue with the rise of the internet. The internet has brought about a tectonic shift in the way people think, acquire new ideas, and inform themselves. This means the age of the dominance of the talking head is coming to an end as preferences shift from milquetoast lies and half-truths to harsh reality.

They Live (1988) was another film decades ahead of its time, dramatizing the hidden messages in politics and business

In the old days, large corporations were able to push their products—and ideals—on the masses through constant advertising and the gatekeeper model of the news media.

Noam Chomsky, even though he is an avowed leftist, accurately describes how this model works in this interview from Manufacturing Consent:

> The elite media are the agenda-setting media. That means The New York Times, The Washington Post, the major television channels, and so on. They set the general framework. Local media more or less adapt to their structure.
>
> And they do this in all sorts of ways: by selection of topics, distribution of concerns, emphasis and framing of issues, filtering of information, by bounding of debate within certain limits.
>
> They determine, they select, they shape, they control, they restrict — in order to serve the interests of dominant, elite groups in the society.

However Chomsky, as many leftists do, fails to see how the government also shapes, controls, and restricts in order to serve the interests of the dominant, elite groups in government.

Before the internet, any information presented had to pass through a gatekeeper, or several gatekeepers before it was allowed on the air. If a story did not meet a certain agenda or it upset an advertiser, no matter how important it was it would never be allowed to see the light of day.

This is no longer the case. The rise of the internet means people now gather around web sites as they once would have gathered around the television set to get news, views, and opinions. The web is on their phone, their tablet, their PC. It is an interactive medium rather than a passive one like TV. This means the dominance of the centralized model of communication is ending. The corrupt, legacy media is less trusted now than at any time since Gallup started taking this poll.

> Gallup Polls since 1997 have shown that most Americans do not have confidence in the mass media "to report the news fully, accurately, and fairly." According to Gallup, the American public's trust in the media has generally declined in the first decade and a half of the 21st century.

People are awakening en masse and they increasingly know are being fed lies. The Internet may yet save America from itself. These are some of the reasons by the legacy media cannibalized itself.

Bias

Media bias, once vehemently denied by the talking heads at the alphabet channels, is now accepted reality. The number of Americans expressing "hardly any" confidence in the press has risen to 45% according to Jonathan Ladd, author of Why Americans Hate the Media and How It Matters.

When attempting to discover why there is bias, one of the keys is looking at the backgrounds and beliefs of people who work as journalists. Here are some fascinating facts about those who work in the media from Discover the Networks, A Guide to the Political Left:

- 81% of news media professionals favor affirmative action in employment and academia.
- Some 71% agree that the government should work to ensure that everyone has a job.
- 75% agree that the government should work to reduce the income gap between rich and poor.
- 56% say that the United States has exploited the nations of the Third World.
- 57% say that America's disproportionate consumption of the world's natural resources is immoral.
- Nearly half agree that the very structure of our society causes people to feel alienated.
- Only 30% agree that "private enterprise is fair to workers."
- In a 2004 Pew Research Center study of journalists and media executives, the ratio of self-identified liberals to conservatives was 4.9 to 1.
- In a 2007 Pew Research Center study of journalists and news executives, the ratio was four liberals for each conservative.

Looking at those stats, it's easy to see that most of the people who work in the media would fall under the SJW (social justice warrior) classification.

As the corporate media stranglehold on news and information has been ending and the internet arises to fill the vacuum, it has become common for Presidential candidates to attack bias in the media. This tactic was pioneered by Newt Gingrich in his 2008 and 2012 campaigns.

> I think the destructive, vicious, negative nature of much of the news media makes it harder to govern this country, harder to attract decent people to run for public office.

Gingrich made this statement in response to CNN's John King opening a Presidential Debate with a contrived issue about Gingrich's marital fidelity. You can watch this and other take-downs of the media by Gingrich in this YouTube collage.

More recently, Breitbart did an article on the bias that supposedly conservative Fox News displayed towards Donald Trump at its March 3, 2016 debate.

> In their naked pursuit of Donald Trump's scalp, moderators Chris Wallace, Bret Baier, and Megyn Kelly used every cheap trick in the book. None of the other candidates faced dramatic graphics. Trump did. None of the other candidates faced video of past statements. Trump did. Trump was never asked to attack his rivals. On at least three occasions, Trump's rivals were invited to attack him.
>
> WALLACE: But it was your video and the serious question is, because the suggestion is, do you think that Donald Trump is naive about the threat that > Vladimir Putin represents?

>
> WALLACE: Mr. Trump opposes any increase because he says it will price American workers out of the world market. Is he wrong about that?
>
> WALLACE: Senator Rubio … Please tell Mr. Trump why he's unprepared to be commander-in- chief.
>
> [Me-gyn] Kelly used leaked reports and unsubstantiated rumors surrounding an off-the-record interview Trump supposedly had with the left-wing New York Times…There is nothing more sacred in journalism than an off-the-record situation. This is supposed to be inviolable.

Fox News even went so far as to air an anti-Trump campaign ad—paid for by John Kasich—during the debate. The marionettes posing as journalists, without a doubt, did this at the behest of their bosses, which brings us to ownership.

Ownership

Six corporations control nearly all of the media. This includes News Corporation, Disney, Comcast, Time Warner, Viacom, and CBS. Pulitzer-prize winning journalist Chris Hedges warns us that corporate media control "of nearly everything we read, watch or hear" is what he calls inverted totalitarianism:

> A system where corporations have corrupted and subverted democracy and where economics trumps politics.

This is why everything you hear on TV sounds like everything else you hear on TV, fear and consumption

Princeton political theorist Sheldon Wolin also warns about this power structure in his award-winning book Democracy Incorporated:

> [Managed democracy is] a political form in which governments are legitimated by elections that they have learned to control. The electorate is prevented from having a significant impact on policies adopted by the government through the continuous employment of public relations techniques [by the six media > corporations.]

Many of these public relations techniques are detailed in a TNMM recommended documentary, The Century of the Self. These techniques have been illustrated for all to see in the 2016 Presidential Campaign, as the corporate-government media establishment has been pulling every dirty trick possible including threatening a brokered convention to keep Donald Trump from getting the nomination, and possibly winning the election.

According to Wolin, these are two important ways in which inverted totalitarianism is the inverted form of classical totalitarianism.

- Whereas in Nazi Germany the state dominated economic actors, in inverted totalitarianism, corporations through political contributions and lobbying, dominate the United States, with the government acting as the servant of large corporations.
- While the Nazi regime aimed at the constant political mobilization of the populace, inverted totalitarianism aims for the mass of the populace to be in a persistent state of political apathy. The only type of political activity expected or desired from the citizenry is voting. Low electoral turnouts are favorably received as an indication that the bulk of the populace has given up hope that the government will ever help them.

> Inverted totalitarianism reverses things. It is all politics all of the time but a politics largely untempered by the political. Party squabbles are occasionally on public display, and there is a frantic and continuous politics among factions of the party, interest groups, competing corporate powers, and rival media concerns. And there is, of course, the culminating moment of national elections when the attention of the nation is required to make a choice of personalities rather than a choice between alternatives. What is absent is the political, the commitment to finding where the common good lies amidst the welter of well-financed, highly organized, single-minded interests rabidly seeking governmental favors and overwhelming the practices of representative government and public administration by a sea of cash.

The corrupting influence of money on politics (as predicted by Oswald Spengler 100 years ago) and in the media causes dishonesty. The rise of the Internet has meant for the first time, citizens can easily challenge the narrative and hold those in power accountable.

Dishonesty

Brian Williams, king of nightly news Internet memes

Because of their dishonesty and the power of the internet to hold them accountable, we have witnessed the very public disgrace of two major network anchors in the past decade. Another major cable news anchor is currently embroiled in controversy, too.

Brian Williams repeatedly, and over a 10-year plus period repeated the story that he was aboard a helicopter that was hit and forced down by RPG fire during the Iraq War. It took over 10 years of Williams continuing to repeat this story, burnishing his credentials as a journalist by doing so before his account was finally refuted by crew members who rode the helicopter with him.

Williams, in reality, had a much more uneventful ride arriving an hour after the helicopters in front of him had made emergency landings. The Chinook helicopter he rode took no fire. Williams even told different versions of his story, adding to the doubts:

> I looked down the tube of an RPG that had been fired at us and had hit the chopper in front of ours. And I'm so fortunate to be sitting here.

This was in contrast to another version:

> Then, I noticed something out the window. From a distance of six miles, I witnessed a rocket launch. A rising trail of smoke, then a second rocket launch, an orange flash and more smoke — as a rocket heads off toward Israel.

He went on to say he "made a mistake recalling" the event. Huh? Williams was also caught up in stories regarding his coverage post-Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans. He blamed these stories on "fog of memory."

> When you look out of your hotel room window in the French Quarter and watch a man float by face down, when you see bodies that you last saw in Banda Aceh, Indonesia and swore to yourself that you would never see in your country. I rode it out with people who later died in the Superdome.
>
> My week, two weeks there was not helped by the fact that I accidentally ingested some of the floodwater. I became very sick with dysentery, our hotel was overrun with gangs, I was rescued in the stairwell of a five-star hotel in New Orleans by a young police officer. We are friends to this day. And uh, it just was uh, I look back at total agony.

These claims also turned out to be false. As Williams signed on as NBC News Anchor in 2004, a colleague of his was caught up in a scandal of his own.

Dan, I think we'd Rather hear from someone else

On Septmber 8, 2004, less than two months before the Presidential Election, Dan Rather reported on 60 Minutes that a series of memos critical of then-candidate for President George W. Bush's service in the Texas Air National Guard had been discovered in the personal files of Lt. Col. Jerry Killian, Bush's commanding officer.

The documents were presented as authentic, but since then several typography experts have concluded they were forgeries. Once again, it was the internet that held the news business accountable. Within hours of the story airing, questions arose regarding the authenticity of the documents. The concerns then spread throughout the media. The incident damaged Rather's credibility, and in 2006 CBS News decided not to renew his contract.

Mr. Family Values has problems of his own

More recently, Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, Mr. Family Values himself, has become embroiled in domestic abuse allegations and has lost custody of his children. He reportedly choked his wife during a disagreement, and his teenage children decided to stay with their mom. Considering his well-known temper these allegations are believable, in my opinion.

Fluff

Anyone who has watched a television newscast knows the mainstream media has the depth of a glass of water. In her book The Interplay of Influence: News, Advertising, Politics, Kathleen Jamieson illustrates how news stories are made to fit one of the five following categories, all catering to the lowest common denominator:

- Appearance versus reality
- Little guys versus big guys
- Good versus evil
- Efficiency versus inefficiency
- Unique and bizarre events versus ordinary events

> Reducing news to these five categories, and tending towards an unrealistic black/white mentality, simplifies the world into easily understood opposites. This way, the media provides an oversimplified skeleton of information which is more easily commercialized.

The rise of the internet means in-depth reporting is at your fingertips, and people do not have to settle for this cookie-cutter, lowest common denominator approach. Citizen journalists often break stories that professional journalists do not or cannot.

People are increasingly leaving this outdated communication model where a big mouth on TV tells you what to think and believe, and finding people who share their view of the world.

Demographics

The decline of the corporate news model has been playing out for quite some time, even before the internet became ubiquitous. The evening news audience has been cut in half in just over a generation.

Declining viewers mean declining revenues and ever-more desperate news operations shilling for attention in a crowded marketplace

The trends are even more telling when one looks at the network news audience as a percentage of the population. The legacy media is, quite literally, bleeding to death.

Even though the population of the U.S. has been increasing since 1980, the news audience has tumbled

Women make up about two-third to three-quarters of the remaining television news audience, depending on the city and survey. This would tend to explain why most of the stories in the legacy media tend to focus on topics of interest to women, and not men. Women also, tellingly make up 60% of the MSNBC audience.

Demographics of News Audiences

% of regular news audiences who are ...

Under 30	65 and older	Men	Women
% of audience	% of audience	% of audience	% of audience
43 Colbert Report	42 Sean Hannity	73 Economist	73 Daytime talk shows
39 Daily Show	40 Bill O'Reilly	71 Wall Street Journal	62 Morning news shows
32 New York Times	28 Hardball	59 Rush Limbaugh	60 MSNBC
23 % of public	17 % of public	49 % of public	51 % of public

PEW RESEARCH CENTER 2012 News Consumption Survey.

Women make up nearly 2/3 to 3/4 of the television news audience, depending on the city and time of day

Heretics

The future of news will not be decided by those who follow the old rules of yellow journalism and corporate directorships. It will be decided by heretics who look at the status quo, are not satisfied with being another sheep, and decide to bring change to the world, as pointed out by Godin.

Matt Drudge touched on the importance of people becoming unwilling to accept the terms commanded to us by the elite in an interview with Alex Jones in October 2015.

> In the beginning they were dismissing the Internet.
>
> That being said, people are willing to be made over in the image of these corporations. The reason there's so much anger online is a newspaper like the Washington Post will leave a comment section. They don't care what you're saying. They don't care what you're thinking. That's why you get this anger, that…I'm operating in their playground.
>
> Make your own playground! The reason I'm here, Alex, is because you've made your own playground. This is a figment of your imagination, and the Drudge Report is mine. It is a very simple thesis; you are what you dream you are and become. And, I wish Americans would get out of the sickness and just become greater.

Drudge also touched on why the internet should be alive and controversial in the interests of free speech and overall freedom.

> There's no difference from any of these websites! You go up and down. We talk about this. What's the difference between the websites? Between a Slate or a Salon, or a Buzzfeed, or a HuffPo? What is the difference! There isn't any! And, this is a travesty. It's so much like, it's almost like a weird conglomerate of groupthink that has developed in a dynamic era that should be vibrating. It should be vibrating. It should be controversial.

Seth Godin says the new communication model looks like this; if you don't like the status quo form your own tribe or join another tribe and challenge it

The good news is, the end of the era of the gatekeepers of information is presenting a real threat to the global power structure. The corporate, neoliberal, globalist, Socialist hivemind is beginning to lose its grip on American society. And I, for one, say good riddance once and for all!

However, before we celebrate, there is much more work to be done. As Drudge says, there is still way too much plain vanilla corporate-approved SJW, neoliberal, and globalist propaganda flowing around the Internet. Also, realize forces are at work now to eliminate the unfettered freedom of speech we now enjoy on the internet. Persistence, vigilance, and defiance are the prices we must pay to ensure the continued free flow of ideas and information and to make lasting change to society.

The dam broke with the rise of the internet, and the stranglehold on information and ideas got washed away with it. We have more potential to permanently dismantle the machine than we have ever realized before in human history. Let us make good use of it.

Read More: South Korea's Draft Dodging Female President Tries To Play War Using Male-Only Conscripts

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

FEC Filing: Mitt Romney And The Republican Establishment Ready To Steal Trump's Nomination

March 9, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

An explosive filing with the FEC dated January 31, 2016 suggests that Mitt Romney will perform a coup d'etat for the party nomination during the Republican National Convention in Cleveland this July. The Republican establishment is in a panic that Donald Trump has a commanding delegate lead over their preferred candidate Marco Rubio, and is crafting a plot to make sure Trump is excluded from the Presidential election.

The election filing in question was released on the FEC's web site in early March (the first public mention of it was on March 3). Called a Statement Of Organization, it is required to start a campaign committee that leads to a Presidential run (PDF). Paul Ryan is listed as Romney's running mate. Here is a screenshot from the FEC:

The names and organizations within the filing have had prior relationships with Mitt Romney, such as Red Curve Solutions, a consulting firm that worked with him in one of his previous losing campaigns:

> Red Curve was founded during the 2008 election cycle by Bradley Crate, the Deputy CFO of the Romney for President campaign. He recognized the need for a more structured approach to campaign compliance and treasury management.

Darrell Crate, the signer of the filing, has worked with Romney in both of his losing campaigns:

> Mr. Crate served as Treasurer and Executive Committee Member of the Romney for President campaign in 2012, a role that he also held during the 2008 cycle. From 2003 to 2007, Darrell served as the Chairman of the Massachusetts Republican Party.

You would think that Romney would find a new team that is capable of putting him in the White House, but for a man who hasn't been involved in politics in years, winning is not at all his goal.

The Republican establishment will thwart Trump to guarantee a Hillary Clinton presidency

It doesn't take a political strategist to see what's going to happen when the Republican establishment is divulging its plan to the public:

> In order to defeat Donald Trump, The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol admits he is prepared to hand Hillary Clinton the Oval Office. On Wednesday's "Morning Joe," > the Republican Establishment leader laid out his plot to deprive Trump of the 50% of delegates necessary to secure the nomination. From there, the idea is to go into a brokered convention and cut a kamikaze deal that awards enough delegates to an "acceptable" candidate (who will have won far fewer votes, states, and delegates than Trump).

>
> The problem with the Establishment brokering a behind-closed-door deal that hands the nomination to a Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL) is that the backlash against the Republican Party is almost certain to hand Hillary Clinton the presidency.

Based on the FEC filing above, it's clear that the plan involves skipping the nomination over Little Rubio and handing it to Romney, who is guaranteed to lose in an election against Hillary Clinton. The Republican establishment, led by neoconservative Bill Kristol, is now acting as an ally to Hillary in order to subvert the will of the American people and their Constitutional right to vote for President.

Even more appalling, establishment cuckservatives are meeting right now in a secret Georgia retreat to finalize their plans for giving the nomination to anyone but Trump:

> In a last-ditch effort to stop Donald Trump from trampling all over their presidential primary, billionaires, tech leaders, and establishment Republicans met last weekend on a private resort on Sea Island, Georgia, to come up with a plan.
>
> The Huffington Post reports that attendees of the American Enterprise Institute's World Forum included Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, political operative Karl Rove, House Speaker Paul Ryan, several members of Congress, and business luminaries like Apple's Tim Cook, Google's Larry Page, Napster creator Sean Parker, New York Times publisher Arthur Sulzberger, and Tesla founder and libertarian clean energy advocate Elon Musk, who really, really hates Donald Trump. Bill Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, was also in attendance at the off-the-record meeting, and he reportedly wrote in an email that "A specter was haunting the World Forum — the specter of Donald Trump."

The above list of names is a who's who of the richest Trump haters in America. It's safe to assume that they have called this emergency meeting to finalize their plans for Romney's strategem in July. Since Romney has shown he's incapable of winning, we can only guess as to the monetary benefits he could receive for participating in the hijacking of the 2016 Presidential election.

What is a brokered convention?

A brokered convention occurs when a candidate does not receive the required number of delegates by the time of his party's convention. For the Republican race, a candidate must receive 1,237 delegates. Donald Trump currently has 458 and Ted Cruz has 359, with 1,435 delegates remaining.

The Republican establishment will likely try to split the vote as much as possible between Trump and Cruz until the time of the convention to ensure that neither anti-establishment candidate secures 1,237 delegates. If that happens, there will be a "brokered" convention in July where "democracy" is put into action and delegates can vote for whomever they wish. It is becoming clear that their man will be Mitt Romney, a beloved cuckservative whose main mission in life so far is ensuring that Democrats remain in the White House.

"If voting made any difference they wouldn't let us do it."

All the passion and energy into Donald Trump's unexpectedly meteoric campaign will be for nothing when the elites remind us in the proceeding months who's really in charge. The fact that Trump has the support of millions of patriotic Americans who want to make American great again will not matter when the masters of the United States exert control over their impotent slaves. Perhaps it was naivety on the part of Trump supporters to think that a man with immeasurable will, strength, and high energy could fight the establishment and usher in a new age of genuine American conservatism.

Or maybe he will be able to fight it.

Trump faces a battle with tough odds, but if he can't usher in this peaceful political revolution, who can? Either we see the rightful candidacy of Donald Trump this fall or the destruction of a Republican party that is blatantly selling out its own constituents for their pro-Israel and moneyed interests. We won't have to wait long to find out what happens.

Postscript: Twitchy claims that the form is just an address change. We'll see soon enough who the establishment wants to replace Trump with.

Read Next: The American Conservative Establishment Is Collapsing

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Patriarchal Nationalism: The Only Societal System That Can Save The West

March 10, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

One of the goals of Return Of Kings is to bring back the patriarchy. Roosh already started this process with the introduction of neomasculinity last year. Neomasculinity is an indispensable foundation because until men begin to live up to their natural calling, nothing can be done to improve the society that they are a part of.

But while neomasculinity will help individual men lead better lives, it presents no easy solution for how to operate on a societal level. As long as the globalist order persists, patriarchal and masculine ideals will not be able to return. Therefore it's time we branch out from individual self-improvement and create a realistic framework for a better society that can replace what we have now.

Roosh and I have put together such a framework. It is called patriarchal nationalism. The aim of patriarchal nationalism is to serve as an ideological base for future political action that rebuilds civilization. Here is a brief introduction to this new platform:

Immigration And Diversity

- The identity of a nation is not only cultural but genetic.
- White marginalization is taking place as part of a depopulation agenda that facilitates elite control. At the same time, non-whites who hold traditional and nationalist values are also enemies of the existing order.
- Immigration must not be used as a weapon to either lower the wages of citizens or to diversify the population to make it easier to control. Immigration quotas must be low and strictly controlled.

- Any immigration must be predicated upon complete assimilation.
- Not all groups assimilate as easily as others. Any immigration that does take place must be from groups that will assimilate fully. Some groups or ethnicities may be banned entirely due to their incompatibility with Western society.
- Deporting or killing legal immigrants who have fully assimilated and adhered to the national platform may lead to more harm than good.
- Citizenship is an honor and a privilege. The law of jus soli must be rescinded.
- The population explosion of the third world poses an existential threat to Western nations.
- Diversity is not a virtue or something that a society should try to achieve.
- There is an over-representation of Jews in the highest reaches of the globalist platform that can't be explained by randomness.

Religion And Family

- Society must be unified around Christianity. In spite of its faults and those of its leaders, Christianity is the most compatible religion and "operating system" for the Western world, and is far superior for societal stability than atheism. Other religions will be able practice freely, but not demand special prerogatives.
- Patriarchy is the ideal social system for the family unit and society. Policy must encourage—but not authoritatively mandate—strong monogamous marriages and large families. Single motherhood should be highly discouraged.
- Natalism must be the cornerstone of reproductive policy. Advanced technology and military strength is moot if you don't have the people to fend off attackers or support the nation.

Democracy

Western democracy has degenerated into plutocracy. If democracy is to continue, several changes need to be implemented:

- Allow only those with “skin in the game” to vote. Namely, land-owning families (one vote per family).
- Minimize the influence of corporations, foreign governments, unions, and wealthy individuals upon government.
- Eliminate the revolving door between government and corporations, reform election process, re-implement constitutional safeguards so that it is much more expensive to buy everyone off.
- Devolve more power to states and localities.

Patriarchal nationalism is theoretically compatible with other forms of government, such as aristocracy or the ultimate form of patriarchy, monarchy.

Equality

- Gender realism: men and women are different and complementary. Absolute equality between men and women is neither possible nor desirable.
- Race realism: each racial group has its own strengths and weaknesses. Absolute equality between different racial groups is neither possible nor desirable.
- Although all men are equal under the law, men are not equal in other ways. Some are inherently more gifted than others. Society should not attempt to “level the playing field.”

Conclusion

The true dividing line between conflicting forces in today’s society is globalism versus nationalism, not liberalism versus conservatism. Does the state work for the best interests of its citizens? Or does it work to serve globalist interests? Right and left are artificial political constructs that are controlled by globalist interests. Patriarchal nationalism will sidestep this false dichotomy and get to the root of the problem facing Western societies.

The changes lifted above are obviously not going to happen overnight, but we must begin to work in this direction. Your comments are welcome as we develop patriarchal nationalism together as a community.

Read More: How Patriarchy Will Return

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

12 Ways Famous Celebrities Are Like Little Children Trapped In Adult Bodies

March 10, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

We have long seen the Hollywood clique used as a tool to infantilize the general population, by exhorting them to mimic bad behaviour through mass media coverage. It acts as a smoke screen to divert the attention of the mob from the real issues and pushes ideas in a far more pernicious way.

The more we witness this, the more obvious it becomes that the people under the spotlights are, in fact, little more than infants trapped in adult bodies. Because who does not want to be the popular Peter Pan? Attention, marbles, free candy bars. And the worse your conduct, the greater the rewards!

The decision makers downplay the seriousness of their actions, just like parents that would look away from the child's poor behaviour. It might explain why "celebrities," especially female ones, are given free passes when caught red-handed while doing something reprehensible. Are they above laws? The parallel is disturbing, to say the least, and boils down to these 12 traits:

1. An obsession with being the center of the universe

Schoolyard exhibit #1 : “Look at me, look at me, look at meeee”

Everything has to be exposed, willingly, or by being “cleverly orchestrated.” The attention cannot be focused on something else, hence the pathetic amount of attention-whoring that “stars” with a stalling career display, in a hope to save their dying glory. Give them your time and money, more exciting downfall to come.

2. An ever-changing moral compass

I am in “insert popular kid”‘s group now and you are a big meanie since this morning

“Stars” will endorse the cause du jour for getting more supporters in the school yard. “Yes Means Yes,” the Big Evil White, the gender pay gap… the mercenaries will follow the direction where the wind of trend blows and the war spoils, in the form of statuettes and awards, will rain. Keep it low profile, follow the herd and when your overlords say: “Jump!”, ask: “How high?”.

Anything for good ratings, eh, Jimmy?

3. An absence of shame

Shame and intimacy are subjects that were not covered at Hollywood K-12. “Wardrobe malfunction” and “nipple slip” are so innocent and make it sound so involuntary. Just like the little girl in the schoolyard that lifts her dress in front of the boys to test their reaction, then more than once when she notices their curiosity. Here their classmates have no references to understand what shame is and Mommy Government just lets them express themselves.

4. A constant discovery of their body

They will tattoo or pierce themselves like a toddler that scribbles on his arm if you leave him alone with markers. It would not be a concerning issue if the guys in charge where not so hell-bent on selling these acts as being normal to our own children.

5. A problem with authority

I will do what I want, Daddy, because I hate you!

They will push buttons and test borders knowingly. Just like children torturing animals, they will experiment and sometimes be cruel. But if punishment or scrutiny ever comes around, they will evade responsibility, shift the blame, or flat out lie. Big crocodile tears, invented mental disorders, and gentle breakdowns always help.

6. An addiction to romance-related drama

Exchanging hashtags and dedicated selfies is no different from passing around little papers in class with the words “Do you want to go out with me? Tick one of the boxes. Yes/No.” Then in a matter of seconds, the last craze is how Jenny kissed Mark behind the bins while she was still with Brandon. The guilt resides both in them and with the audience for giving the slightest interest to this silliness.

7. A perpetual victim mindset

“Waaaaah! She took my tooooooyyy!”

“Johnny invites Karl to his party but not me. Why, why? What did I do to deserve this?”. Those airheads strongly believe that the entire cosmos is united against them. No point seeing the beam in their own eye. The fragile comets cave in under blame or flee it so fast, you would think Satan himself were whipping them.

8. A big problem with moderation

“But I want to go on the carousel again!”

It is always time for fun and games. Big notions like “taking responsibility” and “setting a poor example” are scary. Instagram and charity cocaine trains are much more fun. Where adults know that all the good things come to an end, Hollywood shiny rats just cannot imagine that one day the fun will have to end, and that reality will fall on them like a ton of bricks.

9. A complete lack of financial sense

“I want that one!”

The child is carefree by definition. His parents sort out life issues for him and it is just one happy ride. Like an obese youngster with an endless supply of lollies, the SJW cinematic arts cartel thrive in extravagance without really knowing where money comes from or on which tree it grows.

10. An omnipresent aggressiveness

Actors, singers, and starlets remind me of acne-ridden teenagers chock full with hormones that can snap at any disagreement. Name calling, food battles, and cat fights take place on a regular basis at the Hollywood School for the Mentally Challenged. Whereas adults can control their emotions and use reason, millionaire toddlers will trash hotel rooms and physically assault peers and common folk as if it was expected of them.

11. A morbid obsession for praise

“OMG. Grrl, you so brave.

#DownWithTheBlackLivesThatMattersForThePatriarchyOfHillary2016”

Just like the drawings on the fridge or the fresh sand castle, mommy state looks and swoons when its little one ties its shoelaces by itself or finds a new way to express its true self. Come on now, sweetheart, lecture everyone about refugees while you sip Martinis in your all-white closed-gate community, that will show them.

It is like a monkey roller-skating. It looks ridiculous but we need to give our support no matter what, it means so much to him!

12. A deep love for make believe

“I am a woman”. Just like saying “Look, I am a plane. Weeeee!”

It is so simple. In our Brave New World, you just have to say it and you are it! The delusion is total but at the same time, what can we expect in a place where the crazies run the asylum? Like toddlers, they also have their own way to say things. Get your dictionary of Newspeak for the next Golden Globes or Academy Awards or you won’t be able to follow who is who.

Le mot de la fin

I am as partial as anyone towards a nice pair of boobs. I am biologically programmed to seek them. But clicking that thumbnail makes the cogs of the machine move, even slightly. This is where reason intervenes and controls passion, an adult way to deal with the matter.

We could scoff at their trifles and ignore them but by the force of circumstances, we have to stop this madness. Now, it is not only great for the fat girl to be proud to be morbidly obese or the flamboyant kid to be a squealing fruit cake. But the normal kids have to be ostracized into submission.

This particular schoolyard is poisonous, invasive, and forces you to copy it if you do not want to be given the dunce cap with all the “-ist words” on it. We must act.

Read More: Our Critics Are Adult Children

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Ultimate Guide To Muscle: Rest And Recovery

March 10, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

Well, you made it. Part 1 has you killing it in the gym maximizing your genetic potential. Part 2 has your body so fueled with good food your gains are massive bro! Part 3 has you saving a ton of money by supplementing SMART and with a plan.

That's it I guess eh? Nothing else left to do. Here is the single, absolute, iron clad commandment of building muscle you MUST do.

Rest And Recovery

While I was never one to overtrain, I can honestly say that as a hardgainer, I was doing too much in the gym and not getting enough rest and recovery. All the proper nutrition and training in the world will do nothing if you do not give your body a good chance to rest and recover.

If you are in your 20s, this will be a lot less time than a guy like me now in my early 40s. This is also why if you are needing a nitric-oxide booster to give you energy in your workout, your low energy is not a need for supplementation, but rather a need for rest!

If you are not fresh, full of energy and ready to rip into the weights when you walk into the gym, you should turn around and go home.

The truth is, when it comes to training, all you need to do is lift just enough weight to overload your muscle to exhaust it completely. That is enough. Once you have exhausted the muscle, any further training PAST exhaustion is just continual damage to the muscle in question. Do this long enough over a long enough time line and you will not only not grow, you might just shrink!

Your body is your number one indicator of progress and whether you should be training that day or not. Are you gaining weight? Is DOMS—delayed onset muscle soreness—a distant memory for you now? Do you keep adding another 5, or maybe even 10 or 20 lbs, on the bar to your previous lift every time you return to the bench or squat rack?

If this is you, you are getting enough rest and recovery. Unless your training goal is maintenance of what you have built, you should always be striving for more weight on the bar for more reps, every time. If that is not happening, and you are eating and training right, you need to step back and take a rest.

Resting, taking a break, may be the only thing you need to do in order to break through a training plateau.

For you young guys in your 20s, this is going to be the hardest part of advice to hear in this series:

You are not getting enough sleep.

Science is proving beyond a shadow of a doubt just how bad the Western approach to sleep and rest are for human health and functioning. While I can't find the reference right now, I remember reading somewhere that every hour of sleep you get before 10 pm is equal to 2 hours of sleep after it.

I started to go to bed by 9 or 9:30 pm in order to get up at 5 am for work. I found not only was I able to get up easier, but I had more energy for the entire day. I actually felt rested. When it comes to building muscle, the vast majority of advice is on nutrition and training, but no one mentions that all of your eating and working out only bears fruit while you are sleeping!

Are you working out three times a week? Four times a week? Eating five meals a day? Supplementing properly? Leaving the gym exhausted? Then why are you staying up until 12 or 1 am watching Netflix? Why are you getting drunk on the weekends and staying out until 3 or 4 am?

Yes, yes… I hear you screaming. You are in your 20s, your body can "handle it." I am here to tell you it cannot. It will not. And living this life will take a toll not just on your efforts in the gym, but on your overall health and masculine vitality.

True Story

I was talking to a coat check girl at a popular club I frequented and in chatting her up, she just happened to drop a very common question for a lady in her early 20s talking to someone she believed was around her age.

"So, what are you studying at school?"

I was like…. "What studying? What do you mean?"

She was… "You know… university. Your courses? What are you taking?"

I had to smile. I said to her "I am not studying anything. I am not in university."

To which she immediately replied "What? Really? How old are you?"

It is natural I guess to assume someone who looks similar to your age would be doing the same thing you are, going to university and studying for a career. What surprised me was the immediate request for my age when she found out I may NOT be as young as she was. My not being in university, and this implying I am PAST that stage of life, surprised her.

I asked her to guess. I always do now because the responses are so freaking hilarious. She was about 5 to 7 years off if I remember and when I told her my real age (28 at the time) this was her exact response, word for word…

“Really. Wow. You’ve got good genes. Your daughters will thank you.”

Thinking back on that time now, it was not good genes, it was simply clean living. No drugs. No alcohol. No smoking. Plenty of sleep. Good diet and exercise. I am now in my 40s and when shaven and clean cut, I can easily pass for my very early 30s and women still routinely guess a minimum of five, sometimes a full decade, younger than my real age.

I digress for a minute here to try and pass on a life lesson most men, 99% of them, never want to hear. The key to a truly masculine and manly presence well into your advanced years is clean living. You don’t need the alcohol to loosen up and socialize. Staying up late to party your entire 20s WILL shorten your lifespan and degrade your looks.

I did not have much luck with women in my 20s. Now in my 40s, and continually shocked and surprised by the reaction young women get to my presence when they meet me, I would not trade one second of my life now for more success with women when I was younger or to have “partied” late and hard in my youth chasing after them.

Start getting some good rest. Go to bed consistently, even on weekends. That does not mean never go out again to party or leave a party at 9pm because you gotta be in bed (although if you are seriously training, you might just have to because your body demands it).

Don’t take my word for it. Just look around you at guys older than you. How many older men do you meet in your life that actually look their age, and not 5 to 10 years older (or more) than they are?

Conclusion

I want to thank you for reading this four part series on building muscle. I have reached a stage in my life where I want to share what I have learned and pass on what I can to a younger generation. Your forties should be celebrated, whether you succeed in the grand ambitions you set for yourself, or are reduced to humble circumstances by fate.

> Struggle is the meaning of Life > defeat or victory is in the hands of God > but struggle itself is one’s duty and > should be one’s joy

This was kanji in a framed print on my sensei’s wall. This series on building muscle lacked specifics for a reason. I don’t want to give you my prescription for building muscle. I want to give you the foundation you need to figure out how to build muscle for yourself. For your body and your unique genetic potential to achieve.

Thank you for reading. Strength and honor.

Read More: The Top 3 Muscle Building Mistakes Men Make

Maximus Decimus Meridius
Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

How Feminism Dried Up The Ovaries Of Lena Dunham

March 11, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Dunham, born in 1986 (currently 29) is a stereotypical New York Jewish feminist working in media. In 2010 she wrote, directed, and starred in a biopic called Tiny Furniture, about a frumpy college graduate living at home, with a filmmaking degree who doesn't know what to do with her life, suffering dating, job, and personal failures.

Monthly De-Licing Treatment

One day she meets up with one of her friend's boyfriends in public, gets high, and then has unprotected sex inside a large pipe. Somehow, the film has become part of the Criterion Collection, which I thought was relegated to restoring and digitizing film classics like Rules of The Game and Stanley Kubrick's Spartacus. The film is labeled a comedy, and stars Dunham's real family.

Girls

Tiny Furniture earned a box office take of over $390,000, which was a financial success due to its $65,000 budget. However, it's far from a blockbuster, and it's inexplicable how this single short earned Dunham a blind script deal at HBO. Well, perhaps there is one explanation: HBO President Sue Naegle just wanted to greenlight a you-go-gurl project for its political message. Dunham created the HBO series Girls, which premiered in 2012, and earned four Emmy nominations.

Girls is currently in its 6th and final season. I used to wholeheartedly recommend that "Oh yeah, any series on HBO is top-notch" but this NSFH (not safe for home) clip makes me reconsider:

Rape Accusation

Don’t you wish your girlfriend was hot like me?

In 2014, a collection of essays titled “Not That Kind of Girl: A Young Woman Tells You What She’s ‘Learned” was published, with Dunham collecting a $3.5 million fee. Quite a nice income for a twentysomething with little real world experience, recounting her life of drug use, tattoos, anonymous unprotected sex, and, oh yeah, the obligatory college rape accusation.

Dunham falsely accused a man named “Barry” who she later made a bizarre apology to which claims that a “flamboyant Republican” classmate did rape her, but that she used a pseudonym to PROTECT this supposed rapist, instead of pointing him out to police and the public and protecting others from rape, although the pseudonym she chose does match an actual classmate named Barry who fits the description she gave of her rapist, but the two never even met. Confused yet?

During this period, she also admitted to sexually assaulting her baby sister, though there was very little media coverage of this admitted crime, likely due to her privileged status as a mainstream media insider.

Ovarian Cyst

Depiction of a left ovarian cyst

Recently Dunham revealed that she has a ruptured ovarian cyst. Women have only two ovaries, located on each side of the uterus. Ovaries produce estrogen, the main female sex hormone, and house all of the eggs that a woman carries with her, releasing one every month during menstruation. Damage to a single ovary means that half of a woman's limited supply of eggs are eliminated, and can cause permanent hormone imbalances.

Dunham has a condition called endometriosis, which causes serious problems, including weight gain (just imagine), difficulty urinating, nausea, vomiting, scar tissue in the uterus, chemical and hormonal changes, loss of eggs, and almost half of all infertility cases. Large clumps of tissue like the one above, grow, ooze liquid, and bleed regularly with every menstrual cycle, causing excessive bleeding, pain during intercourse, bowel movements, or exercise. In Dunham's case, her cyst ruptured, and she is undergoing emergency surgery to remove the ruptured cyst.

After college, I dated a girl in Chicago who had one shriveled up ovary. It was no coincidence that she was the most unfeminine, independent, feminist "I don't need a man" career girl that I ever dated. I often thought about how surely there was a correlation between her bossy, unkind, selfish behavior and her shriveled up uterus. Indeed, there is a correlation, and there are many causes we can point to with Dunham.

Causes Of Ovarian Cysts

Ovarian cysts are caused by many risk factors including age, obesity, smoking, not having children, not breastfeeding, hormone replacement therapy, and other hormonal or chemical use. Dunham fits almost every one.

Age

Dunham will turn 30 this year, and the risk for reproductive problems increases with age.

Obesity

Nuff Said.

Smoking

In a People magazine interview, Dunham admits to smoking cigarettes. Her films and book also indicate drug use.

Not Having Children

Peak fertility occurs in the early to mid 20s in women, with fertility declining rapidly at age 31-35. After 35, many women have difficulty conceiving without medical help. Dunham turns 30 later this year. Women's bodies are built to reproduce, and the reason they have so many uncomfortable and otherwise useless body parts and functions as breasts, menstruation, and hormones which seriously affect their mood is all for one end: reproduction. By ignoring the biological drive to reproduce, a woman places herself in a higher risk category for ovarian cysts or even cancer.

Not Breastfeeding

Women who do reproduce in their prime fertility period should breastfeed. Not only is breastfeeding better for the baby, but it is better for the mother, and can actually help her avoid serious medical problems.

Hormone And Chemical Usage

While I am unaware of any hormone replacement, Dunham admits to taking multiple psychotropic drugs and antidepressants, beginning at age 14, when her body was still developing. Any hormone or chemical usage increases her risk of ovarian cysts.

Mental Health

Dunham has been seeing mental health therapists since age 9, was diagnosed with obsessive-compulsive disorder, a mental illness according to the DSM-IV, at age 11, and describes her mental health by saying “I really love my life but I’ve kind of worn anxiety grooves into my brain. It just doesn’t always sound good in there.”

Negativity And Feminism

While there is no scientifically proven causality, I can’t help but think the hateful thoughts and negativity associated with feminism, the violent reactions against men, the lies and false rape accusations, and the denying of basic science and centuries of human civilization contribute in some way to her mental, if not physical health.

Feminism is unhealthy. The real danger of Dunham is the message she is sending to the next generation.

Dunhams BF Jack Antonoff, totally missing the point of playing in a band

In Dunham’s case, I don’t even fully blame her—after all, she has been able to be wildly financially successful, obtain a higher SMV boyfriend, receive a blind script deal at the premiere television network in the US soon after graduating college and with no real world experience other than a film she made as a hobbyist, receive plenty of media attention, become the face of a whole generation of women, and become a millionaire in her 20s, without ever having to get her body in shape, hone and develop a skill or talent, work hard in an industry, or even try to address her mental or physical health, her bad habits, or her obesity. She just put herself out there as an overweight, frumpy, mentally ill, tattooed, promiscuous drug using feminist and she was wildly rewarded for it. Why should she do anything differently?

Warning To Feminists

I’m sure many a blue-hair shrapneled and graffitied feminist looked up to Dunham as a role model, and likely envied her success and riches. This revelation should serve as a wakeup call that despite being glorified and celebrated by the film, television, magazine, and fashion houses in the country, the ideas Dunham are espousing are toxic, both mentally and physically. While we often talk of The Wall as a sudden realization by women than their SMV has rapidly declined, there are far more serious problems that they can face if they adopt the antisocial ideas of feminism.

Women should get in shape, develop a skill or talent, avoid drug use, smoking, excessive drinking, cursing, and tattoos, and marry and reproduce during their peak fertility years. I am not a fan of personal ad hominem attack, or celebrating the misery of others, but Lena Dunham has made herself the poster child for modern third wave feminism, and is vocally advocating some of the most extreme anti-social views permeating American society.

Consider the damaging effects of an unhealthy, unnatural lifestyle, and promotion of values which go against thousands of years of civilization. Abandon feminism now before your ovaries dry up, or worse.

Read More: Why Declining Fertility Rates Are Not A Good Thing

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

7 Progressive Laws That Are Causing Demographic Collapse

March 11, 2016 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

It's no secret that much of the world is in demographic decline, with developed nations breeding below their replacement rate. To solve this problem, developed countries have spent decades buttressing their shrinking populations with hordes of culturally dissimilar, lower-IQ immigrants. What could possibly go wrong?

In the United States, millions of immigrants have been making California more and more like the shitty countries they were so eager to leave, and recently Los Angeles proudly declared itself "the northern capital of Latin America." Meanwhile, Europeans have taken in millions of Muslims who, as it turns out, want to conquer and convert them.

Fortunately, people are finally starting to realize the devastating effects of lax immigration policies, and they're beginning to pay attention to the underlying problem of demographic decline. Much has been written about how the progressive culture of death needs to be dismantled. However, if developed nations are to secure their future, they must also repeal the progressive laws, policies, and programs contributing to low birth rates.

1. Non-discrimination laws

Men work more. They work more overtime, they don't take maternity leave, and they almost never take mid-career breaks to raise their children. Hiring a man makes more economic sense than hiring a woman, but anti-discrimination laws force companies to hire more women instead.

Firstly, this leads to more women being employed in higher-paying jobs. As a consequence, women have a greater incentive to delay marriage, to delay having children, and to have fewer children in the pursuit of their allegedly fulfilling careers.

Secondly, hiring more women in higher-paying jobs displaces the men who otherwise would have worked those jobs. These men now have a reduced earning capacity, making it harder for them to have more children.

2. Permissive divorce laws and welfare for single moms

When people think of unmarried mothers, they often imagine a ghetto woman with a litter of kids, demanding that the government needs to pay for them. In contrast, when people think of married women, they often imagine a middle-class woman with only one or two kids. From these stereotypes, it seems that modern marriage is a cause of demographic decline.

However, the truth is that these stereotypes are outliers, and that marriage actually leads to more children. The majority of children are born to married parents, and a married woman is likely to have more children than an unmarried woman.

This makes sense because most women want to have children with a husband for romantic and financial reasons. Welfare removes some of the immediate financial incentives for women to get married, and permissive divorce laws remove the legal barriers that keep them married. This creates a long-term disadvantage for women later on because most men don’t want to marry a woman with a kid. Even if these women do manage to find a man to marry them, they will have wasted several of their fertile years on the carousel, leaving them with less time to have more children.

3. Alimony and child support laws

Firstly, these laws remove many of the immediate financial incentives for women to get or stay married. As noted earlier, unmarried women have fewer children. They also have a harder time getting married and having more children if they already have kids when they re-enter the marriage market.

Secondly, these laws sap resources from divorced men, making them less capable providers for new children with new wives. Because of these laws, having one kid with your ex-wife, plus one kid with your current wife, is much more expensive than having two kids with your only wife.

4. Abortion

Firstly, abortion kills nascent members of society.

Secondly, it removes one of the reasons for young people getting married. Historically, young lovers who made an accidental fetus would be pressured (possibly at shotgun-point) to get married. With abortion, that same young couple can continue putting off starting a family. If they split up, the woman will burn through more of her fertile years looking for another man with whom she can finally start a family.

Lastly, abortion facilitates women pursuing their careers. For a woman, having a career leads to delaying motherhood and having only a couple of kids because she’s too busy to have more.

5. Government-backed student loans

Leftists want every last person to get a university education, regardless of what people study, and regardless of the burdens to society and the students themselves. However, unlike leftists' utopian fantasy, not all education is created equal. STEM degrees and vocational certifications provide a clear benefit to both society and the individuals who earn them. Other degrees (those in arts, humanities, and many of the social sciences) do not. Government-backed student loans encourage and subsidize young people making poor educational choices.

For a man, getting a worthless degree means that he wasted several years of his life, only to end up with a reduced earning potential and massive debt. This greatly reduces his ability to provide for a family, making it harder for him to have more children.

For a woman, the situation is even worse. Just like a man, getting a worthless degree means that she's destined for a low-paying job and massive debt. More importantly, she wastes the prime of her life by spending four or five years in school, and another two or three years trying out her career before hopefully figuring out that she screwed up and needs to start a family.

By this time, she has financial burdens which make it harder to pay for children, and she has fewer years left in which she can produce those children. Worse yet, some women never see the light, instead doubling down on the feminist dream by going to grad school or putting even more time into their careers. These poor souls will be lucky to pop out one or two kids before their ovaries close up shop for good.

6. Social security and medicare

These programs are welfare for the old. Although people like to complain about government borrowing from the Social Security trust fund, this is just a case of the government making a bad problem worse. The simple math is that the average retiree will collect more from Social Security and Medicare than what he or she put in.

These programs subsidize low birth rates because parents no longer need to rely on their children to take care of them in their old age. Historically, having a lot of children provided an economic benefit because they would work on the family farm and eventually take care of mom and dad. With socialism, parents no longer need to rely on their children to support them later in life, and so they have less incentive to have those children, all while racking up more government debt.

7. Welfare for the infirm

This includes government funding of nursing homes, adult foster homes, and special education. Traditionally, families took care of their own, including the physically and mentally infirm. This meant that someone (the wife) would have to stay at home to do the care-taking.

Even if a woman has to stay home to take care of a demented grandpa or a retarded sister, she would still have much more time to raise children than if she left home every day to work a full-time job.

The Big Picture

A free market with some common-sense regulations is so beneficial to society because it encourages the most efficient production of goods and services. However, in order for a society to sustain itself, it also needs to produce children. By interfering with the free market and destroying common-sense regulations on marriage and family, progressives have created a dangerously inefficient system of producing children.

For developed societies to regain their strength and vitality, progressive laws must be repealed and replaced with policies that encourage large, healthy families.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Demographic Ruin Is Upon Us

Jon Socrates
Jon finds purpose in the cultivation of wisdom, strength, and manly virtue.

Yale Basketball Captain Denounced As “Rapist” By Campus Without Evidence

March 12, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Recently, the media has been reporting that Yale basketball player Jack Montague has been accused of rape by various student organizations on campus. They have also reported that these students have accused the university administration and campus newspaper of “protecting a rapist.”

However, the story is far from clear. There is no arrest record or court hearing involving Montague on file in Connecticut. No victim, anonymous or otherwise appears to exist, Montague has made no statement, and the university has not commented on why he left. On March 9, it was reported by the New York Times, “Jack Montague, 22, was in connection with a sexual misconduct accusation, according to two people with direct knowledge of the case who spoke on condition of anonymity.” In short, a student abruptly withdrew and immediately students on campus brand him a rapist based on an anonymous source followed by hundreds of students spreading rumors.

Accusations Are No Longer Required To Push An Agenda

Speculation, rumor, and innuendo. That is all it takes to ruin a student's reputation. I asked a friend at the campus newspaper if he'd heard what has happened and he said there is no information, statement, or victim. There is such a lack of acceptable villains to hate that college students are now inventing them to stir up outrage. Voltaire once said, "If God didn't exist it would have been necessary to invent him." For modern leftism, it seems if rapists don't exist it is necessary to invent them.

When I first learned of Montague's withdrawal I asked a classmate if she had heard why he left. She responded, "Apparently he assaulted someone, and the university expelled him." I asked who he assaulted, and she replied she did not know. Curious, I asked a few other people, and the answers roughly matched what my classmate had said: he raped someone, he was expelled, no one knows who he raped. No one bothered to look into it any further than that. Someone said the guy is a rapist, and that is all the proof these students need.

The average student on campus is complete unaware of whether or not the student was accused of any wrongdoing and simply assume that because lefty student organizations are making announcements, they must be right.

A request Inbox x

Jonathan Holloway, Dean of Yale College <ycd@yale 8:01 AM (45 minutes ago) to Students

To Yale College students, support Yale women and stand with survivors of sexual violence.

As the weekend begins, I want you to know that I have been following the public reactions to this week's events involving the men's basketball team's symbolic t-shirts and the posters that appeared on campus in response to them. I know that many of you are upset and angry, and that you are sharing deeply conflicting views. As you engage with each other, I ask that you also treat each other civilly.

I am committed to providing a safe campus for all of you, protecting your privacy, preventing harassment of all kinds, and ensuring that you can make your voices heard. I know that I can count on you to join me in this effort by treating each other with respect -- especially when you disagree.

Yours,
Jonathan Holloway

Posted on Facebook: Dean urges students to behave like adults– students respond like children

Throughout campus there are fliers with the words “Stop Supporting a Rapist” printed on them. Various groups including the Yale Women’s Center and “Unite Against Sexual Assault Yale” are holding events to “take a stand against rape culture and show your support for survivors on Yale’s campus.” In this particular instance, there appears to be no “survivor” to speak of. Yet if you asked them they would say this particular case doesn’t matter, it is about fighting the system that allows rape to happen. In other words, they are using a case built on nothing to push their agenda.

One effeminate student named Jonathan Simonds launched an online form titled “I support Yale women,” and many students have added their signatures.

“I have been really frustrated with what’s going on,” Simonds said. “I don’t have the capacity to speak to certain incidents, but I can tackle campus culture as a whole. Sexual assault is a hard and touchy subject, and it happens more than we think because a lot of times the person doesn’t have the courage to come forward.”

They are well aware that they control the narrative and that the average student has done no research into the matter and blindly follows what the organizations tell them. To even question it is to lose status among their peers.

Signs Of Team Solidarity Spur Outrage

During the recent basketball game against Harvard in which Montague was absent, his teammates wore jerseys with his nickname, “Gucci,” printed on them. The “Yale” logo was printed backwards with inverted letters. One player commented on this decision by stating, “We just wanted to make it as clear as possible that Jack is one of our brothers,” Sears said. “He’s family to us and we miss him.”

For soft and emotionally stunted millennials, this was considered an act of aggression. Many students wrote publications essentially saying, “Basketball players are cool and have influence, why can't they believe the same things I believe and push my agenda?" They've also been posting more fliers smearing the basketball team.

One poster read "This poster will probably be torn down by the men's basketball team" and in smaller font beneath, "Stop silencing women." Members of the team and other friends have taken down most of the posters found around campus.

The Women's Center released a Facebook statement:

> We condemn the insensitivity of the protest even as we withhold judgement (sic) on individual team members. We also recognize that there are power dynamics at play in all student groups, athletics included, that leave some members with less agency than others.

The word "agency" is thrown around a lot on this campus, and I've found that when women say that they "lack agency" what it really means is "I am not responsible for my actions so don't hold me accountable for anything."

Here's another quote from their post:

> The team's actions seem to us a dismissal of the very real threat of sexual violence. That some of the members of the team thought the potential expulsion was a matter to protest shows that toxic attitudes about sexual violence persist on our campus.

Dismissal is another word used often at many colleges. What it really means is "I'm a child that can't handle disagreement so I will use stupid concepts to sound smart."

Students are craving some form of validation that their accusations are true. But when the local newspaper requested a comment, the administration responded "Yale policy is to not release identifiable information from a student's educational record to the public, unless a student requests that the information be disclosed." Policies are getting in the way of witch-hunts. We can bet they won't be around much longer.

The basketball team caved in the face of the SJW witch-hunt, and released this statement on March 9th:

The Guardian reported that one student athlete has said:

> For legal reasons, Jack isn't allowed yet to defend his name and say what the actual situation is. A lot of people have been speculating what's been happening and unfortunately this is what's causing the drama. Which is far from the case from what has happened. So in time he'll be able to say what's going and everyone will be able to take a step back and realize that all this is a little bit overboard.

If the situation involves a girl in any way, people will not take a step back. They will take two steps forward and the witch-hunt will intensify.

Father Of The Student Offers Comments

The father of the student athlete spoke briefly with the local city newspaper.

"We have strict orders from our lawyers," He said. "Soon enough, I'd love to tell the other side of the story. It's ridiculous, why he's expelled. It's probably going to set some sort of precedent. We're trying to do things the gentleman's way, so we're keeping things close-knit. But you guys will get a story."

Some sort of precedent. Students have already been expelled for being accused of rape, so it's unlikely that this is the reason for Montague's departure. Most fathers would not call their son being accused of rape "ridiculous," especially given the current climate. Though we can only speculate on the situation, these comments point to a very mild reason for the expulsion. Whether or not it was sexual in nature, this story has been used to push the leftist agenda of branding all men rapists.

Read More: What The Social Justice Coup Attempt At Yale University Looked Like

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

How Putting Women On A Pedestal Destroys Men's Movements

March 12, 2016 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

The political left is a paradoxical amalgamation. They've built a tent which includes feminists who say that "gender roles" are a societal construct; transsexuals who believe that they were born into the wrong sex; SJWs who scream that all sexual harassment accusations are to be believed; multiculturalists who cover up refugee rape sprees; anarchists who promote violence against police officers; gun-grabbers who want to empower the state; socialists who hate the free market; and corporate slaves addicted to their brand logos and cheap signalling.

They're an endless mess of contradiction and disagreement, and yet they remain consistent on one thing: attacking, isolating, and destroying anybody who stands against their narrative.

Meanwhile the political right seems to discover a new fractious dispute every week. Despite a coherent and relatively simple set of beliefs which unite its members—individual autonomy and responsibility, distrust of large governments and military-industrial complexes, a respect for family and tradition—the infighting is constant, and it plays right into the hands of our enemies. It's more than just disagreement and discourse, it reaches the levels of outright strategic insanity, utterly autistic over the need to from political alliances.

Whence does this weakness come from? From the same place it always has. Ever since Adam tried to suck up to his rebellious wife, disobeying God by way of supplication, our race has been cursed with effeminacy and thirst. Any time you see stupidity and discord amongst men of the political right, at the center of it you will find woman; each and every time a right-wing movement fails, it is because of the pathos and sexual desperation of its constituent males.

Each group does this in their own unique way, justified by their ideology, but the result is always the same: infighting, dissolution, and absorption by the political left.

Libertarianism

At its inception this rugged, individualistic movement promised political reform; a return to self-sufficiency, fundamental freedoms, and an avoidance of adventurous foreign wars. Since then it has tumbled into “Left Libertarianism,” a group of porn-addicts who think freedom means that abortion and birth control are paid for by the state—in fact it was Ron Paul’s moral (note: not political) opposition to abortion which fractured the base, and undermined any possibility of a Libertarian victory in 2008.

Modern Libertarianism was started through the works of gentleman scholars, such as Ludvig Von Mises and Friedrich Hayek, powered by the blood and strength of hard-working tradesmen, farmers, and entrepreneurs, but once it achieved its initial success a new breed of male was attracted to it: the callow intellectual.

They sought out the Libertarians not so much because they had rejected the Republicans, but rather because the Republicans had rejected them. These were men who questioned the system out of their own failures to succeed in it, rather than out of an intellectual commitment to curiosity and truth. They brought with them a shallow understanding of freedom, divorced from responsibility, and a subconscious belief in the Sexual Revolution. Women who joined this movement quickly realized just how much attention they could get from these hordes of thirsty, weak men, and so the men began to demand support and comfort for the women; “Make the women feel welcome, try and attract more to the movement!” They completely ignored that age old truth: build Rome, and the women will come.

What little is left of Libertarianism is focused on defending pornography from any sort of censure or regulation, defending a woman's right to casually sleep with as many men as she chooses (and opening the borders to maximize that choice!), and meekly attacking traditionalists who show any vestiges of masculinity or conservatism.

Ethno-Nationalism

Shamelessness ain't all bad.

The goal of the political left is to undermine individual autonomy by any and all means necessary; one of the ways they do this is by eliminating the organic social structures and the web of community ties which are needed for the individual to thrive. They do this by undermining family formation through divorce law, by promoting atheism to undermine religious communities, and attacking the concept of culture and racial identity.

White Nationalism started out as a reaction against this policy of cultural cleansing; it was primarily an American response due to the "mutt race" of whites which form its populace (in Europe nationalist and ethno-nationalist mean the same thing), and while it was occasionally vitriolic, its greatest thinkers acknowledged and celebrated the ethno-nationalism of other races, the right of every people to live as they see fit. They were nationalists, not supremacists, and their ultimate enemy was the forces of globalization and homogenization.

These days it has degraded into neo-Nazi cosplay, and celebrating of "The Beauty of White Women." When they examine the rapefugee crisis plaguing Europe, they don't see a population of treacherous feminists who turned on their own men and voted to cuckold them with foreign migrants (albeit, feminists deluded by a global system of misinformation); instead they see a bunch of innocent victims, being cruelly abused by Le Happy Merchant.

The women in these circles play a game of "Let's you and him fight"; where the Libertarian women want their males to dress up in bow ties, the White Nationalist women enjoy being a permanent damsel in distress, constantly needing a white knight who will save them from those mean, dusky, sexy migrants.

Men's Rights Activists

In some ways, watching the men's rights movement fall into leftism and weakness is the saddest of the lot. The others were invaded by weak men, desperate for the attention of women; in the case of the MRAs, from its very inception it was a group of men who were betrayed and abused by society, the walking wounded, primed to receive honeyed words from a serpent's tongue.

The men's rights movement was a direct response to the legal activism of second-wave feminists; the heads I win, tails you lose legal regime of marriage 2.0, domestic violence legislation, and the absurdities of affirmative-consent laws. But these men—who had been degraded, emasculated, and described as monsters by the legal authorities—never managed to rebuild their egos. Instead of asserting themselves against the world, they begged for women to defend them.

In some cases those women defended them like big sisters; in others, they came in to police the tone. Ultimately, they've fallen into effeminacy and weakness, embracing the victimhood politics of the left, and have begun targeting those on the right.

Game

With game, we find the one right-leaning movement which hasn't been corrupted, and it's worth examining why this is.

Game is often criticized as "pussy begging" by MRAs and MGTOWs, and their criticism is not without a kernel of truth. As feminism accelerates from the 1970s shit-test to the outright hatred and betrayal of Western men, game increasingly resembles acting like a clown to keep a woman entertained. "This is emasculating," they argue, "you're defining yourself based upon a woman's approval!" All of which is valid, but it misses two important points.

First, game works. "Pussy begging" describes the behaviour of the cuttlefish; feigning feminine mannerisms, agreeing and sucking up to women, waiting in the friendzone until Harley McBadboy breaks up with her. While game does play to a feminine frame, this is simply an acknowledgement of the realities that the modern man goes up against: women have been indoctrinated by feminism, given a leg-up through affirmative action, and granted a free pass to never be slut-shamed. A respectable job, a mortgage, and a sensible car don't cut it these days. But while it acknowledges the current frame, it's ultimately pro-active. It is in man's nature to analyze and understand problems so that he can fix them on his own; he does not beg or whine, instead he finds a solution. And with modern women the solution—like it or not—is acting like a clown. Do with that what you will.

The second point that the critics miss, is that through game you come to understand the nature of woman. The cucked cuttlefish must rely upon self-delusion. They place women on pedestals, treat porn stars like prophets, and endlessly ignore the daily treachery of the "virtuous maidens" who covertly seeking the attention of dangerous men. Game forces these scales from your eyes.

It is no accident that game. which originated as a movement obsessed over women, evolved into neomasculinity, a movement which celebrates women as a part of life, but is otherwise dismissive of them; while these other movements, which originally had nothing to do with women, have become completely co-opted by the feminine imperative.

Never trust a man who can't get laid. Sexual losers will do anything for a chance at procreating. In a sensible system—one which we hope to return to—this will involve hard work and pro-social contributions. In a broken system like the present one, it will induce them to gossip, backstabbing, and infighting.

In a different era, the men who read this site would have become the sheepdogs, keeping society safe from predators; but under the influence of globalism and dissolution the sheep are fractious and disobedient. To succeed we must become wolves.

Seek out men of integrity and capability, while ignoring those of venial character, the male gossips, the cuttlefish. When women are a dime a dozen, those who fail romantically do so because they are weak and toxic. Eschew the company of such filth; we are going to replace the current narrative with a song of truth and virtue, and when we do, the rest will get in line.

Read Next: 5 Traits That Make Women The Best Useful Idiots For Liberalism

Davis M.J. Aurini

Davis was trained as a Historian at McMaster University, and as an Infantry soldier in the Canadian Forces. An author, strategist, Catholic medievalist, and an entrepreneur, his writing can be found at Stares at the World.

Is The American Establishment Trying To Get Donald Trump Assassinated?

March 13, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Donald Trump evokes strong passions. Most people either love him or hate him. But the people who hate him at the highest levels of power are much more numerous—and they are more wealthy and powerful than his supporters.

This past week, we've watched this play out before our eyes as the elites, through the media, have started to create a narrative designed to paint Trump and his supporters as violent, dangerous bigots who must be eliminated at all costs.

The Establishment has not been able to stump Trump—yet

The media narrative that Trump's words inspire violence seems to have sprung from thin air on Friday. It didn't. To really understand why that narrative emerged now, we have to look at events that led up to it. The prior week, Trump had undergone unprecedented attacks from his challengers and the GOP establishment. First, Mitt Romney delivered a speech attacking Trump from every angle, even hitting Trump for sleeping with attractive women.

Next, Marco Rubio was designated to be the GOP establishment attack dog. He switched his campaign stump speech from one that was “positive” and focused on policy to one full of goofy, juvenile attacks on Trump making fun of his hair and even the size of Trump’s hands—the implication being that Trump has a small penis.

On top of Rubio’s insult comic routine, Super Pacs affiliated with the GOP establishment spent $30 million in ads in battle ground states repeating all of Mitt Romney’s attacks. But it was all for naught. Instead of weakening Trump, the attacks only served to make him stronger. He won the Tuesday primaries in Michigan, Missouri, and Hawaii with commanding margins. On the other hand, Marco Rubio, the establishment water boy, saw his numbers plunge.

In other words, all of the establishment’s conventional methods—television ads and personal attacks—completely failed. This is key to understanding why the nature of the attack on Trump had to change.

Media begins the “Trump’s rhetoric causes violence” mantra

After Trump won the Michigan and Missouri primaries with strong numbers, the establishment went into panic mode. They arranged a meeting between execs of top technology companies Apple, Facebook, and Google, and the members of the GOP establishment including Karl Rove, Mitch McConnell, Paul Ryan, Ben Sasse and Kevin McCarthy.

The conspirators met on a private island off the coast of Georgia called Sea Island. Their goal? To plot how to stop the GOP front runner—Donald Trump. We don’t know what plans the elite concocted at this meeting because it was invitation-only. However, we may glean the nature of the plan from the events that followed.

After the meeting, the next Republican debate in Miami was a muted affair. Rubio, Cruz, and Kasich mostly laid back. While they did throw some light punches in Trump’s direction, it was probably the most civil debate to date. Did the other candidates know that the establishment had something in store for Trump?

The very next day, Trump was scheduled to have a rally in Chicago. MoveOn.org, Bernie Sanders supporters, and other leftwing groups coordinated a massive protest. This was combined with hundreds of threats of violence on social media, including threats against Trump's life. To preserve the safety of his supporters, Trump canceled the rally.

Immediately after the cancellation, I noticed that all the networks suddenly were carrying the same story—how Donald Trump's words provoke his followers to violence. There was nothing about the threats on social media to assassinate Trump. Only this unprovable allegation that Trump's words somehow caused his supporters turn violent.

The major newspapers carried the same message:

Trump's Words Were Destined to Stir Violence, Critics Say

By MICHAEL BARBARO, ASHLEY PARKER and TRIP GABRIEL

In foreboding conversations across the political world, elected officials, party leaders and historians warned that the campaign was teetering on the edge of violence. This weekend it finally arrived.

Is it possible to contain what Donald Trump has unleashed?

The racially tinged anger that has fueled his political rise — and stoked the opposition to it — has turned into a force unto itself.

By Karen Tumulty, Jenna Johnson and Jose A. DelReal

- Obama's blunt assessment of Trump's rise

Campaign 2016's dangerous descent into violence

Donald Trump has built his candidacy on long-festering resentment and grievance and calls out the dark forces that divide a polarized America.

By Dan Balz · The Take

How the elite use the media to control us through the narrative

The New York Times

One of the most startling things about is how quickly all of the mainstream media outlets adopted the "Trump's rhetoric causes violence" message. It's notable because Trump's rhetoric has never been violent. At most, Trump told his supporters that if someone throws a punch at them at a rally, they should punch right back. To me, that is not a violent message. It is just common sense self-defense. It is the same advice my mom gave to me on my first day of kindergarten.

Some of the media outlets say that Trump's message about building a wall and putting a temporary ban on Islamic immigration are somehow inherently violent. But those policies are several months old. Why did the violence narrative suddenly take hold? I believe that this was a coordinated attack by the media, which is owned and controlled by the elite.

If you would have asked me one year ago, I would have said that this was a crazy idea. But after we all lived through the attack upon Return of Kings surrounding the meetups, where dozens of news outlets in different countries all carried the same false message, it is clear that media coordination does take place.

Attack against Trump during Ohio rally

On Saturday morning, Trump had a rally in Dayton, Ohio. I watched the rally with my wife. Trump seemed to be in good spirits and there were almost no protestors. In the middle of the rally, a man jumped the barrier and charged the podium where Trump was speaking.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=N8PyJb-tDl0

Secret Service agents quickly swarmed the podium to protect Trump and detain the alleged attacker, who was identified as a Bernie Sanders supporter with a history of supporting left-wing causes (watch from another angle). Was he trying to assassinate Trump? Mike Cernovich has done a fantastic job of analyzing the attacker's tweets. You can judge for yourself.

Media Silence

You would think that a potential assassination attempt against a presidential frontrunner would be the top story of the day. But the media largely downplayed it as a minor incident. Here is CNN's original report:

Headline: Protester tries to get at Trump (Not an attacker, but a "protester." And he merely tried to "get at" Trump)

Subheadline1: Candidate startled as man tries to rush stage in Ohio

Subheadline2: Trump's incendiary history

In other words, the news media is blaming the victim. It was Trump's "incendiary history" that forced the "protester" to attack. By Saturday night, the story was no longer on CNN's "top stories" list, but "Obama mocks Trump steaks" was important enough to make the cut. Some news aggregators, like the snapshot of Apple News below, deemed the story not newsworthy and prioritized it below anti-Trump stories.

Imagine for a moment if a Trump supporter had rushed Hillary Clinton's podium? Do you think that the story would have been dropped by the same evening? Or would we be subjected to endless paeans of how brave Hillary was in facing the evil perpetrated by Trump and his minions?

The Elite will not permit Trump to become President

If one thing is clear from this incident it is that the elite hate Trump with an intensity that borders on the homicidal. They will stop at nothing to frustrate the will of the voters and prevent Trump from ever becoming President.

The reason is not Trump's unpolished manner of speaking, but that his policies would put a dent in their pocket books. Bringing immigration under control would shut off the endless supply of cheap labor. Enforcing free and fair trade will make it harder to move American jobs to other, lower wage countries. The latest attempt to stop Trump is to incite mentally unstable people to violence against Trump and his supporters. Any violence that results will be immediately blamed on Trump's immigration and trade policy.

Readers of ROK should not get pulled into the fray. Be ready to defend your family and your community, but resist the urge to act offensively. Instead, prepare yourself by building a strong, local tribe of men because if the elites are successful in eliminating Trump, the resulting fire may engulf the entire nation.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Leftists Go Crazy Over Donald Trump's Call To Ban Muslim Immigration

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why You Should Skip Crunches And Do These Ab Exercises Instead

March 13, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Spring is here, and summer is soon to follow: Summer means spending days on vacation—at the beach, at the pool, or just at home, the opportunities to gallivant around with your shirt off are endless in the warm months. So why not get an impressive abdomen, something literally everybody wants?

The Exercise You Should Ignore

What makes mine different is that my abdominal workout absolutely repudiates the use of crunches, an exercise that is useless for anybody who doesn't have a very specific problem to fix. The crunch was invented by the first bodybuilders that used HGH, and the exercise was intended to produce a light bit of toning for their swollen roid-bellies, making them a bit more aesthetically pleasing. The exercise does not develop the strength of the core for lifting, does not utilize other muscles as support, does not train the core how to quickly flex for protection from strikes, and will, at best, give you the body of a 14-year old Brazilian rent boy. And if that's the sort of thing you're into, don't let me stop you.

Due to the dismal state of fitness training in the United States (and the Western world in general, really), most of the fitness trainers you'll speak to are completely unaware that there even exist other abdominal exercises beyond crunches, sit-ups, and maybe some of those silly leg-waggling exercises people do on the floor.

There are many ab exercises that are much harder than these exercises, and correspondingly with much greater rewards. Mastery of these will give you a truly impressive core (meaning the serratus abdominus, obliques, and all else), a solid wall of muscles across your core that will not only look good, but make you stronger in lifts, tougher in a fight, more flexible, and even has tangential benefits to your sex life (the sexual benefits of having a strong waist and hips should be obvious).

Supplementary Exercises

Seeing as the core occupies a central place in the human anatomy, there are many exercises that utilize the abs as a support muscle group.

Pull-Ups are one such example. Indeed, many of those who find themselves first capable of doing a set of 10 “dead hang” pull-ups find their stomach to be sore the next day. In a proper hang, the abdominal muscles flex to keep the torso erect and prevent themselves, and thus the spine, from sagging. This supplemental abdominal tension exists for all pulling exercises, ranging from the basic pull-up, to the “hand and a half” pull-up, to the elite level pulls like the one-handed pullup and the muscle-up.

More so than the pull-ups, the power lifts utilize the abs for support: properly done deadlifts and squats will incorporate the core as a support, and correspondingly flexion can be observed and felt if paid attention to. But the exercises that utilize the abdominals the most in support are overhead lifts such as overhead squats, which are, as to be expected, squats done while holding a bar over your head. Bear in mind that there are special techniques needed for the overhead squat, and this exercise will have its own future article.

In a related family are overhead farmer’s walks: carry a weighted barbell, a loaded duffel bag, a big rock, or any other heavy object over your head, and just walk with it. The abs and lower back muscles have to really flex hard in order to keep the trunk stable. Obviously, if your lumbar vertebrae hurt after doing this, you’ve made a mistake. Working with a beer keg is also an effective variation of the exercise, as the sloshing liquid adds an element of instability.

Direct Exercises

But of course, these exercises that use the core as assistance can only take you so far-for a truly impressive midsection, you must perform exercises that directly attack the abdominal muscles. And for that I reiterate, don't waste your time with crunches. Instead try a few of these exercises:

The hanging leg raise series is a series of exercises that force the abdomen to powerfully contract. The first of these is the hanging knee raise: Simply grab a hold of a pull up bar, keep your torso and head upright, and raise your knees together as high as they can go

From there, the steps involve gradually extending the legs until your legs can swing out fully extended from the hips. But why stop there? Why not lift the legs higher, while keeping the torso in the same position (a move known as the V-Lift)?

Once the hanging leg raise is mastered, you can begin doing static holds such as the L-Sit and V-Sit for time: Simply do the leg raise or v-lift, and hold the legs at the peak of motion. This exercise can be done on the floor or hanging, with the hanging variation being slightly easier. It is worth noting that the US Men's Olympic Gymnastics team requires a minimum of 60 seconds held for either the floor or hanging L-Sit, and a world-class men's gymnast has core strength any physical culturist would envy (for information’s sake, my all time best is 30 seconds).

The L-Sit

The V-Sit

Another exercise to do with the pull-up bar is the Roman Chair situp, also called the inverted sit-up. Wrap your legs around a horizontal bar and hang down vertically and upside down. Then bend at the waist until you can’t move up anymore. This is probably the advanced abdominal exercise the layperson is most familiar with, having seen it in many films.

The dragon flag is one of the most difficult ab exercises to do for repetitions, but is well worth it. Lay down on a flat bench—and I emphasize a flat bench, as you cannot do this on an adjustable benches—and grab the bench behind your head with your elbows pointing up. Then lifts the legs and hips vertical, resting your weight on the trapezius muscles. The key is to not jackknife at the waist

Then, keeping your torso and legs straight, holding on to the bench, and using the upper part of your back as a pivot, bring your legs down and forward until your entire back is just about to touch the bench, then go back up. If this is your first time, you will likely not be able to do more than one, at best. I myself can only do maybe 5 before tiring.

Dragon Flag Part 1

Dragon Flag Part 2

All of the exercises I've given will see you well on your way to having a strong and versatile core, but because I like you people:

The Esoterics

While dragon flags, L-Sits, and V-Sits comprise the bulk of my abdominal workouts, there are occasional others I have done for fun, or when I didn't have the equipment to do one or the other:

The first are stomach vacuums, an abdominal exercise that requires literally no equipment other than your own body. Standing straight with your arms down to your sides, breathe in and simultaneously pull in your abdomen, and then just use your muscles to hold your stomach in the pulled-in position as you breathe out, and hold it for time. Imagine that you are trying to touch your bellybutton to your spine. Hold it for 10 seconds to start, and gradually increase the time.

Medicine ball passes are useful in teaching the torso to “brace” and rapidly flex, as the ball mimics the force of an oncoming punch. Just toss the medicine ball against a wall and catch it, or play catch with a friend. The heavier the ball the better—start with a 10 or 15 pound one, and work your way up. It may not sound too hard, but medicine ball work is very tiring.

But if you’ve simulated being punched in the gut, why not do the real thing? Certain styles of martial art do this as a body hardening exercise: put your hands behind your head, flex the abs, and have a partner punch you in the gut for 60 seconds. Then switch.

Conclusion

The exercises I have given here are infinitely more difficult and thus more functional than the useless narcissistic abdominal exercises most people do today. But bear in mind that the strongest abs in the world cannot be seen if there’s a layer of fat over them. The saying “abs are made in the kitchen” is a correct one: for a truly defined midsection, you have to cut weight and get trim, and this is beyond the scope of this article.

But in my not-so-humble opinion, it is better to build the strength and functionality, and thus always be capable of cutting down to look good, then to have the skinny twink look.

Read More: The Only 4 Exercises You Need

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Feminists Demand Free Menstruation Products So They Don't Have To "Pay To Be Women"

March 13, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

International Women's Day—or International Whining Middle Class Women's Day, as I prefer to call it—came this last Tuesday. Well-to-do women all over the West had their chance to whine and hate men more than normally for one day. How great for them.

One issue that Swedish feminists whine about a lot today is that they want the products for their period to be free of charge. Of course, when leftists say they want something for free, they mean that the state should pay the bill using taxpayer money.

Spoiled feminist wants money from the government

One columnist claims that her menstruation will cost her 70,000 SEK (about 8,300 USD) in her lifetime. She imagines what she could do with that kind of money—get herself a driver's license, buy a car, travel around the world. But now she can't do that because she needs to pay for tampons and painkillers.

She thinks that it's "unfair that us women have to pay around 70,000 just to be women." Her conclusion is that "it should be paid for by the state, or even better, why not be for free?" I wonder what kind of world this person lives in where you can get things without paying a single dime. Does she think companies make products out of the kindness of their heart? It's just too stupid to take seriously.

One feminist at the news site Nyheter24 lists seven "facts" that support the idea that taxpayers should pay for her tampons and menstrual pads. Even if it's most likely a bunch of BS, I'm going to read her list anyway and see if it makes any sense.

This woman wants you to pay for her menstruation.

1. “Menstruation is the most natural thing one can have, you should not be punished for it. You have not exactly chosen to have a period.”

Yeah, that’s true. Just as I didn’t choose the need to go to the bathroom from time to time. Over a lifetime, I spend a lot of money on buying toilet paper, cleaning products, plumbing services, and other costly things that allow me to take a crap every morning.

It’s something I have to do, and it’s not the most pleasant thing in the world, but I don’t feel any bitterness about it. And I would never ask anybody to compensate me for the costs. It’s just a fact of life that all of us has to deal with. And menstruation is a fact of life for most women, so just deal with it!

2. “And if you want to avoid the period for a month, it also costs to delay it.”

I suppose this woman wants even more money for birth control when she decides to delay her period. I don't see why she would need to delay it, though. Like she said, menstruation is a very natural thing, so why can't she manage to organize her life around it?

3. "One who has a period spends at least 50,000 SEK on menstrual protection during her lifetime. That is a lot of money."

Sure, it does sound like a lot of money when you add up all of the costs during a lifetime. But it's not a terribly great sum if you look at it from a monthly or even yearly perspective. Let's say a woman has periods for 40 years of her life, from her early teens to her fifties. That means she spends 1,250 SEK per year, or 104 SEK (about 12 USD) per month. That's less than what you spend on a night out at an average Swedish bar. So maybe it's not that much to whine about after all.

4. "In addition, some have to spend money on medicines—free menstrual protection would ease that cost."

Stop spending money on expensive girly drinks in bars, and you will have more left to buy menstrual protection. We all have to prioritize with our money, and these spoiled Swedish girls might need to learn that at some point.

5. "Think of everyone out there during a bad economy—do they not have other things they need to spend money on?"

Like I said, it's not as expensive as this feminist wants it to seem like. And as far as I know, women in the poorer regions of the world are not dying in masses because they can't afford tampons. Our species has existed for more than one hundred thousand years, and before the invention of modern products, women found ways to deal with their menstruation. If you're really so poor that you can't afford tampons and pads, get creative.

6. "Men do not pay to be men. Why should women pay to be women?"

This is really what she's been wanting to say from the start. "These damn men don't need to pay for the same products as I do, how awful! Punish them!" Well sorry, but men and women are different and that has real consequences for our lives. Men are expected to pay for the woman on dates, for example. So there are costs connected to our sex whether we're born male or female.

7. "And if men had periods, they would surely have gotten menstrual protection for free."

Oh yes, us men just help each other out and would never think of giving women any financial aid at all. We just like keeping those females down. It's not like young women get contraceptives for free, paid for by hardworking tax-paying men, right now. But wait, that's exactly what's happening in several Swedish regions today (see here and here).

I wonder how the feminist conspiracy theory of the patriarchy can explain that one. But maybe feminists don't actually care about facts, and just want something to whine about. And more free stuff.

Read More: Obamacare Boils Down To More Free Shit For Women

John Hydenius

John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

The 7 Deadly Sins Of Manhood

March 14, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

There have been endless debates about what it means to be a man, and while we may never reach a consensus, I believe that we can start with a process of elimination by identifying traits that are clearly antithetical to masculinity. The following seven traits have been chosen as the great sins of manhood that plague men today.

1. Self-Pity

Of the seven sins listed here, this is the most pathetic of them all. This is when a man chooses to see himself as a victim and engages in all sorts of pity-seeking behaviours from crying and complaining to throwing temper tantrums. A man who feels sorry for himself is a man who takes no action to change his circumstances. A man who wonders why his life is so miserable only succeeds in amplifying his own misery. Self-pity is akin to digging your own grave. Any man who commits the sin of self-pity deserves no mercy from this harsh world.

2. Complacency

Complacency equates to lack of drive and resignation—it is essentially giving up without even trying. A complacent man is a drifter and a nobody who only acts when prompted by an external force. And in the original seven deadly sins listed by the Catholic church, this was known as sloth.

The problem with our modern society is that it has become far too comfortable (at least materially) for men. In the past, men would exercise their masculine energy out of sheer necessity as they faced constant danger for survival and conquest. But today, there isn't such need. Most men work in safe, controlled environments that often don't even require physical exertion. That, in combination with the fact that men are surrounded with various electronic screens to entertain them induces physical degradation that soon weakens the mind as well. Once trapped, even an ounce of effort starts to feel like a burden.

Complacency is no way to live. Whether you be religious or not, you must have a certain drive or a purpose. A religious man will know the path that had been laid out by his God; an atheist must create a meaning of his own to strive towards. Either way, all men must keep their passion burning and march on forward.

3. Cowardice

Cowards die a thousand times in their lives. And a man who lets fear dictate his destiny is nothing but a slave.

Fear is a trickster that has a funny way of controlling men with distorted and exaggerated imagery to inhibit action. The truth is that most of what we fear is benign. Unlike the dangers we faced during our primal times, the risks we engage in today will almost never lead to physical harm or death. Yet, how often do men submit to the gripping terror of having to approach a girl in the street, or to stand up and speak out against the toxic PC culture? How often do men quit before even starting because of their fear of failure and ridicule?

Fear, much like pain, is inevitable in life. Bravery is not about the absence of fear, but the embrace of it. Many men would do well to laugh in the face of such phantom by focusing more on pushing ahead towards their goals.

4. Distractedness

If you think about it, your entire life is all about focus of your time and energy. Without focus, you are just spilling your life away. Being distracted easily is a sign of lack of discipline, and this is becoming more and more apparent in today's world where everyone seems to be dictated by the beeps and alerts of electronic devices.

Know that every moment that you becomes distracted is a loss: you lose your productivity, you lose your time, and you also lose sight of your mission. And anything that takes your focus away from what's truly important to you are distractions. They can be small daily distractions like smartphones, television, and the internet, to more profound ones that derail your life like poor financial management and toxic woman.

Your attention span is finite. Guard it with your life by removing the distractions or by removing yourself from the distracting environment. You are what you focus on, so be responsible for where you direct it.

5. Dependency

Dependency and attachment are two sides of the same coin. A man may choose to become dependent on substances and entertainment to numb himself, or get overly attached to objects, people, and matters. No matter what he decides to cling himself onto, he desperately believes that the object of his attachment will bring about happiness and fulfillment. But will it?

According to Buddhist teachings, attachment is the source of all suffering. A man in need of an external source of validation is a chained man who wavers haplessly by the circumstances outside of his life. You should also know that attachment isn't limited to just objects of desire; you can also become attached to anger and the desire for revenge, to pain and grief, and just about anything from the past and the future in the form of regrets and worries.

Remember: if you don't want to be dragged, all you have to do is let go.

6. Weakness

Weakness comes in many forms and they are all equally harmful. Physical weakness is utterly inexcusable for a man and no further explanation is necessary. Mental weakness, however, is trickier. It is something that can creep into your soul at any moment, but especially during the times when you are vulnerable. As a man, you must be resolute in your belief that you will be able to handle any challenges that you face. You may not always resolve them to your liking, but you must always show strength and courage.

Weakness also creeps out in the form of supplication. Considering the audience here, I don't think I need to go into details about all the simps who kowtow to the feminist imperative. Just be aware if and when you find yourself wavering.

Men are not born strong. Much like physical strength, the only way to defeat mental weakness is by training yourself over time through incremental steps: Learn to say 'no' to bullshit. Draw the line and stand up for yourself. Head towards fear and discomfort instead of avoiding them. Stop making lame excuses and just do it. You have to push your boundaries to shed your weakness; constantly telling yourself that you're an "alpha" is not going to make you one.

7. Lack Of Will

Lack of will is the mother of all other sins listed here. A man without the force of will is no man at all. Without that fire which drives a man, nothing would be possible. It is especially difficult for men today—especially young men—to discover and kindle this virtue on their own. Men in today's Western societies have been all but forsaken and pushed under to make room for entitled women and sexual deviants. In our feminized culture that seeks to destroy masculinity, it's not surprising to see many men with low morale who have seemingly given up in their fight for existence. As bad as things may be, know that this is a condition to overcome, not something to lament.

Will is much more difficult to cultivate than strength. Some men just seem to be gifted with a strong will, but it is possible to cultivate it. By implementing some of the above mentioned tips and by dedicating every day to be better than the one before, you will forge your own iron will slowly but surely. It also helps to read about other great men as role models to emulate—having real-life mentors and other supportive men are even better. And last, remember: never give up. You just do not give up under any circumstances, life does not permit it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Social Justice Warriors' Updated Version Of The Seven Deadly Sins

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

American Corporations Only Support Gay Marriage When They Can Profit From It

March 14, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

We are always told that major corporations such as Facebook, Starbucks, and Apple are at the vanguard of supporting equality for gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender individuals. Yet they have a funny and very asymmetrical way of showing this commitment throughout the world. Starbucks in particular has become a for-profit behemoth wanting to act like a gay charity in the US, all while categorically ignoring the notion of gay marriage (or even gay rights) in countries as far afield as Japan, China, and Saudi Arabia.

It gets worse, though. These same sorts of companies were amongst the 379 filing pro-gay marriage friend-of-the-court briefs in the US Supreme Court case of Obergefell v. Hodges last year, which legalized gay marriage. Yet why did it take them so long to organize together for gay marriage in the United States? Why did they not vocally "come out" in support of it many years ago when only a fraction of Americans supported non-traditional marriage? "Human rights" should not depend on popularity, especially in places like America where violence against gays and their supporters has been infinitesimally small for decades. Consequently, the behavior of these corporations is more akin to flagrant opportunism than a deep-seated and real conviction about alleged human rights.

What we can draw from this situation is that major commercial concerns marketing to vast sections of the public will only declare their passion for gay marriage and similar policy proposals when it will not harm attempts at profit-making. This will also be done entirely selectively (i.e. "We support gay marriage and gay rights in America, but will say absolutely nothing about it in other countries we do business in.") So this means a certain number of consumers have to support something first, regardless of what corporate leaders themselves think. Moreover, when a few companies begin to support gay marriage, hundreds of others follow, wanting to literally cash in on the trend-leadership of the first to do so.

Starbucks and other companies operate in gay-beheading Saudi Arabia but are demanding an end to “homophobia” in America

I am presuming Starbucks’ desired expansion into Iran will not include demands for an end to the execution of gays, like these teenagers about to be killed in Tehran by the Iranian government.

Starbucks is one of many corporations that legitimizes the execution and maiming of gays by engaging in mutually beneficially partnerships with the governments of Saudi Arabia, the small Persian Gulf States and, more recently, Iran. When has it ever threatened to stop opening stores or even close current ones in protest at the treatment of LGBT people? In the meantime, Middle America has been excoriated by SJWs and corporations for their resistance to changing the traditional formulation of marriage. In no time in human history has the word “homophobia” been less applicable than it is today in the US, yet it is being used more than ever before.

The hypocrisy could not be starker. Run-of-the-mill Americans who peacefully disagree with gay marriage but have never engaged in any anti-gay violence are demeaned as bigots while CEOs and their senior colleagues treat the political leaders of a raft of oppressive regimes as necessary partners. Starbucks, Apple, and those of their ilk are more concerned with the Christian values of a plumber in Tennessee than the Middle Eastern Sheikh responsible for keeping local laws allowing the killing and beatings of gays.

Where were you years ago, Tim Cook?

It is pretty easy to keep silent on gay rights for years, even as a gay man like Tim Cook, when the millions keep coming in.

For those of you not aware, Tim Cook is the gay CEO of Apple, having succeeded the late Steve Jobs. He publicly came out as gay only in October 2014 and when the Supreme Court supported gay marriage the following June, he was quick to applaud the decision. But why did he publicly announce his sexuality, let alone his support for gay marriage, so late? This man has been a multimillionaire for years, let's remember. It seems awfully dollar-related if you significantly hold back your supposedly screaming support for gay marriage until the time of a court decision. And it also justifiably arouses suspicion when your sudden activism coincides with other corporations deciding that support for gay marriage might actually enhance company profits.

Even before he took over from Jobs, as an Apple executive Cook was at the forefront of lobbying for tax concessions and other perks for the electronics giant. These efforts have been so successful and pervasive that Apple pays no functional tax in medium-sized countries like Australia. Decidedly less energy seems to have been spent in the past arguing for the "rights" of the LGBT individuals Cook now conveniently champions.

To boot, commentators have stated that Cook was open about his sexuality within the upper echelons of Apple for years. He was clearly not personally afraid of being known as gay, despite his much, much later public admission of it. God forbid, did the raking in of millions take a backseat to the LGBT community?

A pro-gay rights corporation should put its money where its mouth is Starbucks and Apple show solidarity with these entirely safe gay rights advocates in Western countries, but none with actually persecuted gays in regions like the Middle East.

Either you support gay marriage and gay rights or you do not. Middling positions, including castigating harmless Christians for wanting to protect their religious traditions in America whilst implicitly sanctioning the beheading, hanging, and mutilation of gays in the Middle East, only underscore that dollar signs are driving every single action taken by corporations in the arena of gay advocacy.

Many other more homophobic societies than America, including China, Japan and Korea, are given a pass by Apple, Starbucks and their fellow corporate giants, who are all keen not to offend very large but traditionally-minded markets for their products. Instead, they just continue to beat the dead-horse of “dangerous” white Western homophobia. A cash cow is a cash cow.

Physical prostitution is illegal in most American jurisdictions, but America’s corporate elite will never be short of willing but highly selective political whores. Gay marriage and “gay rights” promotion is just the tip of the iceberg.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Avoid Women Who Support Gay Marriage

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

In The Crosshairs Of Our Masters: Do What They Say, Or Else

March 14, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Make no mistake: the US elites (of both political parties) are deeply afraid. For the first time in decades, they feel they are sitting atop a powder keg. The economy is in ruins, despite the delusional propaganda emanating out of Washington. Students are crushed with debt and enraged. Working people of all classes, races, and backgrounds sense (correctly) that they are working more and more for less and less.

And behind it all, a stifling apparatus of political correctness operates to silence or intimidate those who dare to question the official state religions. To distract the people from the real enemies—themselves—the media and political elites manufacture convenient scapegoats in the form of mythological entities like “patriarchies,” “income inequalities,” “rape cultures,” and the like. It has all become so routine as to pass nearly without comment in educated circles.

They can’t stop him fairly, so now they’re going to play dirty

In the political arena, the same obsessive need for control is on display. As outsider Donald Trump seems set to close in on the Republican presidential nomination, one can almost feel the terror emanating out of the Republican old guard. Trump is an unknown quantity. They don’t know if he’ll fire the lot of them—as he should—should he ever win the presidency.

They've got decades of guilt on their hands, and they know it. So now they are moving into overdrive to torpedo Trump. It looks like it's going to be the usual lie-and-smear tactics, with a bit of violence thrown into the mix. We're going to see more and more of this sort of thing:

1. Cherry-picking of Trump statements to paint him as the most evil creature since Genghis Khan.

2. Media lying and obfuscation of his positions.

3. Creation of fake crises at Trump rallies, and then blaming them on Trump.

4. Holier-than-thou pronouncements from the political insiders who have done nothing for the past 25 years.

5. Instigation of violence at Trump events to prevent him from speaking.

Trump knows this, of course, and is well-prepared to thwart these tactics. I hope he knows that he's going to be facing an avalanche of lies, hate, and orchestrated intimidation. But what is interesting about the elite assault on Trump is how it mirrors the elite assault on other political figures around the world. There is a direct correlation with the treatment of Trump, as there is with the elite treatment of other uncontrollable political figures, like Brazil's Lula and Russia's Putin.

All three of these figures threaten the status quo in their countries. And all three of them have come under ferocious attacks by elites who are terrified of seeing their traditional dominance challenged. Elites of the Republican and Democratic parties want a stooge they can control. They want someone who will simply read the teleprompter, not ask any questions, and not do anything to change the system or rock the boat. They want someone who will allow them to continue their looting of the country's wealth, and their transference of that wealth into fewer and fewer hands, a process that has been going on since the 1980s.

Remember that the US elites were the ones who coined the term "regime change." And they meant it, too. Just as in the case of Donald Trump, the message is clear: if you don't toe the party line and do what they want, you will be targeted for subversion and overthrow. The objective here, as always, is control.

Washington has never been comfortable with the whole idea of the "BRIC" nations, consisting of Russia, Brazil, China, and India. They were beginning to exercise a dangerous level of independence from the US elites and their economic instruments, such as the World Bank and the UN.

There was talk about forming currency regimes free from the US dollar, and political initiatives outside the control of Washington. There were plans for constructing a new fiber-optic cables connecting Brazil, Europe, and Asia. The apple cart was being pushed unacceptably, in the eyes of the elites. Therefore, in the logic of the elites, the offenders needed to be undermined.

Putin himself has long known this, and accepts this as the price of being independent. Foreign elites loved the Russia of the 1990s because it was corrupt, weak, and in the hands of oligarchs whom they could control or buy off. Putin upset the apple cart by changing all of that.

His early moves to arrest elite-friendly Russian oligarchs and restore Russian sovereignty elicited the usual response from the elites: accusations of cruelty, allegations of “human rights” abuses, and the standard litany of horribles. Putin himself ignored them, and enraged them even more by restoring Russian political and military power.

In Brazil

The same sort of dynamic in in play with the case of Brazil. Early on in his presidency, Lula (Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva) had made himself an enemy of the Washington elites by putting his country ahead of the interests of US corporations. Some of the biggest offshore oil deposits in the world were recently discovered in Brazilian territory, and the elites immediately wanted to move in to privatize that wealth.

Lula’s intention was to give these concessions to state-run Petrobras. Exxon and Chevron were shunted to the sidelines, while Petrobras and China’s Sinopec were favored. Elites were not happy. They were not happy at all. No one was surprised to find out (by way of Wikileaks and Edward Snowden) that the US had been spying on Lula and his successor, Dilma Rousseff. Brazilian elites are not happy with Lula and his protégé, whom they see as committing the unforgivable sins of trying to improve the lot of the poor and disenfranchised.

Lula was recently humiliated by being hauled in for “questioning” in the country’s deepening political scandal about “corruption.” Why now? To say that corruption exists in Brazil is not the point: everyone knows it’s there, but the point is that it’s always been there. We only hear about it when the media wants to use it for some purpose.

What elites are really afraid of is the possibility of Lula running for president again in 2018. The real objective of the current corruption investigation (code-named “Car Wash” in the Brazilian press) is not so much to expose corruption in Brazilian politics, which has more or less existed for 300 years. It is to lay the groundwork for an impeachment of Rousseff, and bring about the much-desired “regime change” in Brasilia. The plan may have backfired, as Lula is a skilled political operator and knows how to turn himself into a martyr.

In other words: regime change, and then business as usual. It looks like Trump, Putin, and Lula have a lot more in common than any of them might have thought.

Read More: How The Corporate Hivemind Is Losing Control Over Society

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

4 Rules For Getting Laid In 2016

March 15, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

With January and February well and truly gone and March soon to be over, too, now is the time for converting those nostalgic "I wish I could be more" New Year's resolutions into concrete, daily, and, yes, "boring" actions. In no other field of your life is this more true than in gaming girls. Our enthusiasm for it can go from sky-high to subterranean very quickly. Unlike work and physical fitness, there are almost always far less obvious signs that you have been neglecting your game.

With this in mind, I bring your attention to four rules that will serve you well in the coming nine and a bit months. Like with any tools you rely on, they should be revisited (meaning properly read and applied in real life) time and again.

1. Choose your life dreams, not the girl, at least six times a month

What do I mean here? Modern thirstiness in men has created the phenomenon where their schedules can be determined by the mere prospect of romantic or semi-sexual interaction with a girl. Plans for study, important work proposals, and spending time with close friends take a backseat to whichever girl is showing even the mildest flirtatious interest in person, online or via text. It is nothing short of a recipe for neediness, even if your version is much less dangerous than the next man's, and dismembered, ADHD-style focus for your other activities.

You must not be a slave to this. You must rebel. If you very quickly chase all the female-related chances (or just 50% of them) that come your way, are you really in control and able to set priorities? No. And, significantly, you think these chances come your way. Men routinely overestimate the attraction a woman has for them. They also invariably have a rosier picture than they should about the logistics of meeting girls, such as how much time meant for other activities they can reasonably sacrifice and the ease with which schedules can be combined to meet.

At least six times a month, choose yourself, which can include deciding to spend time with non-sexually based friends and other social acquaintances. Better yet, learn the habit of carving out hours of non-negotiable time for your long-term and non-urgent but life-enhancing projects. Are you writing a novel? Cultivating the 2016 version of Adonis at the gym? These should almost always be no-gone zones for interruptions from girls.

Now, there are sensible caveats to this rule. There is a fundamental difference between being dictated to by your desire for girls and common sense flexibility. The best way to quench your thirst is not to indulge it all the time. With time spent on your overall priorities, not your just penis', your penis paradoxically ends up more satisfied in the long run. You learn self-control, build the rest of your life so you are more attractive to women, and get the pride of investing your time and talents in ways that others cannot because they are so consumed by their lust.

2. Go for 50/50 splits in expenses or better, but don't make a big deal out of it to her

Return Of Kings holds that a woman's beauty and fertility are exchanged for a man's resources, intellect, and achievements. This rule for 2016 does not violate that principle because perception is reality for the women you game. If you are providing things like truly laughter-inducing humor, hot-and-cold personality features (insightful intellectual to cocky asshole in 3.2 seconds at times), and that air of mystery girls associate with intrigue and adventure, the resources, intellect, and achievement elements largely take care of themselves, especially in the short-term. You will have to watch out for rival suitors, but focused application using your existing repertoire should keep you ahead of the pack.

This year is the one for minimizing your girl-related expenses. Or you can increase them, but only in the context of spending more time out with more girls. Obviously, the more time you spend with more girls on holidays, at bars, in hotels, and just enjoying life, the higher your expenses will likely be. What matters here is a proportional reduction for many men, who are so used to buying or half-buying initial female attention to try and escalate interactions.

I fully admit to making women pay at least half of everything, irrespective of how tiny her income is. I do not care if she a student or working full-time. With gifts and other trinkets I have received, the costs are actually weighted on her side. My aim for 2016 is to take this further. It should be yours as well. Consider it as being akin to the situation where a hired gun goes beyond the service her role requires and begins to overly flirt with you and invest in the interaction. Women in real life, not just employees in bars or malls, are a form of hired guns because they expect a material offering from you or the real prospect of it. Make them put in more.

As much as possible, act with the assumption that she will pay her share. Responses that set the boundaries will be something like "Alright, I'll use my card for getting the hotel, but give me your half when we arrive." You will get burned far less often than you think. Moreover, you are radiating to girls powerful expectations about how you will be treated.

She is ultimately paying to be in your company when you master this rule.

3. Practice better location discretion

Paris is a large city but in 2013 I learned how amazingly small it can be. I was gaming a girl in a large mall. Everything was going smoothly. Then, out of the corner of my eye, a familiar visage and svelte body slipped by. It was, of all people, an ex-girlfriend I had not seen for a period of time. Both girls had attended the same university and lived in the same leafy neighborhood, though a very large one. Even if I knew these commonalities, I assumed Paris, with its bustling permanent population and millions of tourists annually, would be the place where you could reasonably expect to avoid these run-ins. Following a brief exchange of words with the ex, during which time her tone and body language demonstrated to my new girl we had been an item, she continued on her way.

This incident took no skin off my nose, but what would have happened if the stakes were higher and if the ex-girlfriend's presence could have torpedoed something? For sure, there are times you want social proof, but the number of scenarios where you want discretion are grossly underestimated by men.

In many situations, a temporary lapse in location judgment will cost you greatly with women. A large number of females will protect themselves or withdraw if these unanticipated run-ins with other girls you know occur. I have lost count of the girls who have told me about their need to feel special or said it just as compellingly with indirect words. A reputation as a player is not always the trump card it is made out to be. Alternatively, maybe the girl in question just wants a courtship sealed off from the pressures and eyes of the real world. Fulfilling female preferences of this kind can pay serious dividends. We know that the modern world has made women miserable and fantasies, like a secret weekend in a hotel, very often assuage the monotony and frustration of their lives.

4. Manage your own life and time better

This is related to the first rule, but deserves its own emphasis. So many men ruin their potential in game because of squandered time and talents. We have already explored the tragedy of thirsty men who stop work or change plans at the drop of a hat to pursue a girl they have a 5% chance to sleep with. But there are countless moments in our lives where non-sexual short-term time wasting impinges upon our ability to meet and bed high-quality girls, either later in the week or in the more distant future.

We neglect our work and studies, opting for procrastination that ensures in a week's time our focus will be on fixing deadline crises, rather than honing our game or lifestyle skills. 2016 is the year for doing today the unattractive, obligatory things you have historically left for the next day… or week… or month and year. Demand more of yourself. Seemingly unconnected activities, like finishing that work report and hooking up at the end of the week with a hottie in the tight dress at the club, do work on one another. What you do in this moment has a drastic impact on what you wish to do later on in time. Be aware. Be smart.

Everything from learning a language to creating a six-pack is capable of enhancing your chances with women. So why are you putting them off? Naturally, these goals are worthwhile for other reasons: promotion opportunities, personal pride, caring for your family, increasing your health and longevity, and living more comfortably. But we can all agree that the massive benefits flow to your interactions with girls, too. So go on, do what you must.

Be happy but ruthless

Your game repertoire is a regularly shifting mix of skills and inventories that you must constantly use and upgrade as your life circumstances demand it. By no means treat these four rules as isolated pieces of advice. Combine them with what works for you, be flexible when you need to be, and remember to always give yourself conscious self-feedback, in addition to tracking the implicit feedback others give you.

Will 2016 be your best year ever? Well, that's for you to decide.

Happy hunting, guys.

Read More: Gaming In School Is Not Enough

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

What Type Of Future Can Young Men Look Forward To?

March 15, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On Christmas Day I spent time with four of my male cousins, ranging in age from 15 to 24. While I'm not quite their mentor, they are receptive to lessons I give them. With any man I talk to, I try to identify where he is in life and what his unique situation is to give advice that I think will help him reach his next goal. This year, however, I had trouble giving much in the way of advice or motivation.

The reason is because most roads today lead to dead ends, and I know this because I've pursued most of them. A man eventually gets spit out not that much farther from where he began.

- I slept with dozens of girls around the world, but now I'm tired of it.
- I traveled to two dozen countries, but now it's boring because there's nothing novel left to experience.
- I make enough income to live a minimalist lifestyle indefinitely, but I don't care for the comfort it gives me.
- I've achieved a high level of fame and influence, with web sites that collectively served 88 million page views last year, but I've become accustomed to it. It's no big deal.

Pursuing external experiences, objects, or sex with beautiful women made me joyous but only for a short period of time, and then I returned back to the same emotional level. Was it all a waste? Was it all for vanity? Whatever the answer, I surely can't advise my young cousins to pursue hedonism, of banging hoes around the world for no other reason than to bang hoes, if it will fail to give them a lasting form of contentment. Instead, I could advise them to search for deeper meaning in life.

- Dedicate yourself to God
- Find a woman and have a big family with her
- Give back to your community and make people's lives better

These are better options, perhaps, but the times we live in will make them difficult to pursue. A God-fearing man would have to build high walls against the never-ending barrage of degenerate messages and sinful temptation that surround him. Raising a big family would provide a man with meaning as long as his wife didn't take advantage of laws that encourage her to destroy the family and make the man financially destitute, and as long as the state doesn't interfere in the raising of his children. Giving to others brings joy, as I can personally vouch for, but who exactly do you give to when your neighbor is from Somalia or Guatemala, and who may not even speak English, or when you're actively being displaced and marginalized by your own government?

With concerted efforts to destroy God, family, tribe, and nation, my cousins will find it a great challenge to encounter a meaningful path, especially since they were programmed from a young age to be weak, victimized, feminine, dependent, collectivist, and fearful. I have no doubt that they can transcend that programming, but I'm sure you agree with me that the path to self-awareness and independence has become difficult and dark in a way that it wasn't for men of the past. My cousins will be isolated and attacked along their path. They'll receive no mainstream support. Is this the road I want to send them down, a life of truth but filled with constant battle and vigilance?

In the modern age, a life of meaning for men is impossible to achieve without also having to perpetually fight. It will take the mentality of a warrior to defeat the forces that want to hold us back today, and I wouldn't put any man in this fight unless it's a fight that he wants. So this Christmas, I didn't give much guidance to my cousins. I gave practical advice, but nothing substantial or revolutionary, because I know that unless a man believes deep in his soul that hope and meaning is out there, that a good future can be made for him, there is little that can be done. I'll keep an eye on them and see how they develop, but wait for them to come to me with a decision that they much rather take the far more difficult path.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Don't Tell A Man What Type Of Woman He Should Be Attracted To

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

International Outrage: Men Around The World Try To Stop Make-Up Artist Lecture Tour

March 15, 2016 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Controversy has spread in recent days as an increasingly vocal chorus in both the media and government has warned of the impending visit of a famous “make-up artist.” Stacey Sexalot, 36, announced on social media last week her intention to visit and host a series of seminars on the use of alleged “beauty treatments.” The controversial figure and leader of the “neo-femininity” movement claims to have discovered ways for women to attract men, including the use of lipstick, eye shadow, hair dye, foundation, mascara and other “cosmetics” meant to improve a women’s looks. Since the announcement however, many critics have surfaced.

“Frankly, I think its disgusting” announced Women’s Minister, Fiona Frigid, in an address to the media yesterday afternoon. “We need to seriously consider whether we want to let such a horrible, blatantly dishonest person from entering our country. Can you imagine a society where makeup was commonplace? It would be horrific!”

“I feel this Ms. Sexalot has some very medieval ideas about gender roles,” she continued. “Saying women should wear makeup—honestly, I think she must have a very shallow opinion of men. She acts as if they’re animals that only care about looks, rather than my fabulous personality.”

A young woman fallen victim to Ms. Sexalot's teachings

Ms. Frigid went on to warn about the dangerous path makeup could possibly lead down.

"It's very much a gateway to other behaviors. I mean what next? Women wearing short skirts? Learning how to cook? Wearing their hair long? What is this—the middle ages?"

Yet more victims

Others have echoed this call, warning that no good can come from teaching such techniques to young women. Paul Neckbeard, of the National Anti-Makeup Society, has stated that he and his friends intend to protest the seminars.

“This scumbag is no real woman. All she’s ever done is trick men into sleeping with her by covering up her true face. It’s practically rape!”

“I mean really—I’m so triggered right now,” Mr. Neckbeard continued. “But these ideas are spreading. Just the other day, a young women came up to me on the street and said ‘Hi.’ She was wearing lipstick, eye liner and she’d started to grow her hair long so that it needed a hair tie. I mean really? I just laughed at her and kept walking. What is wrong with these people?”

“Even worse,” he continued, “if they start putting this much effort into their looks, then what if it affects me? What if someone starts bullying me about my appearance? What if they laugh at me and say I should start jogging? Or wear a collared shirt? Or gel my hair? You have to understand, I’m far too busy for such things.”

“Fortunately,” he went on “I can still be at the protest this weekend. I have no particular plans for this Saturday night.”

Mentally stable protestors preparing to picket Ms. Sexalot

Already, an online petition for the government to ban Ms. Sexalot has attracted 50,000 signatures. Bertha Jolene-Doris, a student of the University of Trans-Cultural Spiritual Studies, started the petition.

“I have never needed to use makeup in my whole life, And I still get plenty of dates” Miss Jolene-Doris declared, unscrewing a 10 kilo can of buy-n-bulk tuna. “Women don’t need to trick men into sleeping with them, or to have children to feel complete. I already lead a very fulfilling life,” she concluded, stroking Mr. Tibbles behind the ear, the youngest of this year’s litter of twelve.

Ms. Jolene-Doris completing her degree in intersectional discrimination

While some have criticized the slow response of the government, contingency plans have finally been implemented to deal with the threat. Yesterday immigration authorities denied Ms. Sexalot permission to enter the country, and are said to be taking every effort to prevent her entry.

The navy has been put on alert and a number of Patriot batteries installed along the eastern seaboard in case Ms. Sexalot tries to arrive by sea or air. Army engineers are also monitoring ground vibrations in case an attempt is made to tunnel under the border and into the planned seminars. This morning the nation’s nuclear arsenal also had its alert level raised to DEFCON 3, in preparation for a possible first strike against Ms. Sexalot and her mascara-wearing followers, although authorities stressed this was “just a precaution.”

Some more practitioners of extreme femininity

Meanwhile, a minority have urged caution, arguing that Ms. Sexalot has the right to be heard.

“Call me crazy, but I don’t think make-up is necessarily all that harmful” said journalist Andrew Sane. “I remember my grandmother used to use it, before they passed the Androgyny Act of 1975. Apparently, women used to wear make-up all the time, and it wasn’t even considered sexual assault. I think if you look at history, femininity wasn’t quite so demonized as much as it is today. At times, it was even seen as praiseworthy.”

Most however, are demanding zero tolerance for those who engage in the practice of applying make-up, citing the dangers posed to those young men who might be hoodwinked by women using such techniques.

When questioned about the difference between make-up artistry and the already existing multi-billion dollar pick-up artistry, however, critics were equally adamant.

“Pick-up artistry is completely different” Mr. Neckbeard declared. “Men only learn pick-up lines to improve their own confidence, not to sleep with women!”

Read More: Reflections On The Roosh World Tour

Thomas Hobbes

Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

How To Survive The Late Empire Period Of Your Civilization

March 16, 2016 | by Brett Stevens | Link | Original Link

Journalist Glenn Greenwald partially broke ranks with his media cohorts to express the dirty truth about why it is hard to survive now, especially as a young man:

> Just curious: is there anyone who still doubts that the U.S. is well into late-stage imperial collapse?
>
> — Glenn Greenwald (@ggreenwald) March 4, 2016

The grim fact is that not only is the USA in "late empire" stages of collapse, but all of Western civilization is heading down the toilet. This means not just the USA, but Western Europe, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand will feel these effects in parallel. If you live in one of these societies, you are in for a rough ride.

But fear not. This collapse has been going on for several millennia. What we think of as "society" today is a pale and degraded imitation of what went before. Now we have technology, but how long will that last without people to keep the power grids, internet, water supply and food system going? The vaccines and iPhones will disappear quickly.

The ancient Greek philosopher Plato pointed out how long the collapse has been ongoing by referring to events centuries or millennia before he wrote, 2400 years ago:

> When discord arose, then the two races were drawn different ways: the iron and brass fell to acquiring money, and land, and houses, and gold, and silver; but the > gold and silver races, not wanting money, but having the true riches in their own nature, inclined toward virtue and the ancient order of things. There was a battle between them, and at last they agreed to distribute their land and houses among individual owners; and they enslaved their friends and maintainers, whom they had formerly protected in the condition of freemen, and made of them subjects and servants; and they themselves were engaged in war and in keeping a watch against them.

This psychology—a view of the world based in the distribution of wealth by convenience, not to those who merit it—is the cause of our decline. It has taken it many centuries to reach its present state, where crass commerce and popularity with the herd rule over all aspects of life.

Every era has its golden age; that is because for most of a civilization's life cycle, its best days are behind it. It reaches a peak early on and coasts, like a successful business, for most of its lifespan. At the end, it pays the cost for having coasted—ignoring the need to rigorously maintain itself—when it declines.

In other words, a civilization enters the process of downfall by succeeding. At that point, it enables those who are essentially fools to grow numerous, and then they take over. When you notice that idiots rule your society, and morons are most of what you see, your society is in the "late empire" stage. Here are some ground rules for surviving the collapse of a civilization:

The decline does not resemble Hollywood's version

The news and entertainment media makes its money by entertaining you. For that reason, the first rule of media is that any result must be entertaining. Truth takes a back seat. Hollywood and the mainstream media love stories of peak oil, asteroids hitting earth, climate change and the Zika virus wiping us out.

The reality is more prosaic. Every society exists somewhere on a scale of health from ideal to "third world." When a civilization declines, the collapse comes slowly and from within. Institutions become less effective, corruption spreads, and people become insane trying to adapt to it. Soon you have a typical third world society: social chaos, tyrants for leaders, lack of effective hygiene and infrastructure. You might think of it as humanity returning to the state of the ape-like ancestors from which we evolved.

Third world societies are frustrating because you cannot do much in them. First, your options are limited by the lack of infrastructure and people who appreciate quality; second, any healthy and sane activity will be opposed by the others around you, who will see you as competing with them with your fancy new ideas, and they will try to tear you down and destroy you.

At the end, the former first world will resemble "Brazil 2.0": a few rich people ruling over a mixed-race herd which cannot control its own impulses and so lives in the equivalent of favelas, or disorganized slums.

Everyone is in denial

Civilizations die because man takes over from nature by starting civilization, and then people become accountable to human rules, which are more social than realistic. This process, known as "demotism," means that whatever is most popular becomes the accepted truth. You can see this manifest in commerce, democracy and social popularity itself.

Neoreactionary writer Mencius Moldbug gives us a workable definition of demotism:

> Any system of government in which the regime defines itself as representing or embodying the popular or general will can be described as "demotist." Demotism includes all systems of government which trace their heritage to the French or American Revolutions – if anything, it errs on the broad side.

Because civilization has become its own determiner of what is true, or what is good or bad, it exerts a Darwinian effect and weeds out those who are realistic about what is actually true. Society has become a popularity contest and only those who flatter the illusions of others will succeed. Some call this "utilitarianism."

You were born at the tail end of this process. You will hear nothing about it because everyone is in denial. As they say in addiction recovery classes, the first and hardest step is admitting that a problem exists. People will resist doing this with all of their might.

It is convenient to blame our leaders, the media, the rich, the Jews™, etc. for our problems. A more realistic view sees the origin of the problem in the behavior of normal people. They will avoid any notion that their society is in decline, and instead flock toward ideas that tell them this decline is actually just society succeeding.

If you wonder why every definition used in public discussion appears "inverted," or to mean the opposite of its logical meaning, this is why. People will not directly confront the issue of decline, so they have to re-style every definition as its opposite so what we have appears to be good.

This extends to your social group. Yes, the mainstream media is preaching lies and insanity, but so are your friends. Most of them get their opinions from television, or from "intellectual" sources like The New York Times or Salon, and they parrot that back to you in an attempt to appear smart, cool and together.

You will be surrounded by lies

Remember that people are rewarded for saying what makes others feel good. Every person wants to feel that he, personally, is doing well. Having a society in decline would contradict that, so he will never admit that his civilization is failing. Instead, he will try to explain that failure as a form of success and will reward others who do the same with his attention.

This means that every public figure is lying to you. They will not admit the obvious, and will invent a distraction or excuse instead. If they did not, they would not be public figures; they would not be popular. Those who are willing to tell the truth never get promoted to these roles.

It also means that every person you meet on the street is lying. Life is a competition for success. They want to appear successful, because part of succeeding is to look the part. As a result, they will not only refuse to admit the decline, but will claim that such ideas are nonsense.

They must keep up the illusion of doing well. This is why decline is so hard to reverse: not just the average person, but all but a handful of people, will bless the decline so that they may get their share of what is left. If you think of robbers fighting over the division of the loot, you get the idea.

Most people are parasites

When there is a goal to civilization, like in its early stages, people can work together toward results. As the decay goes on, the rule becomes “every man for himself.” This means that every other person out there is trying to use you as a means to their own success.

In social terms, this means that most of your “friends” will be fair-weather friends. They will keep you around as long as you provide some role that flatters their self-image. Usually this consists of them affirming your social status, or importance to the social group, as lower than theirs. That makes them look more important.

Others will use you for what you can do for them. They will see your band perform only if you go see theirs. The problem with this is that soon you are living entirely for other people. You spend all day at work doing stuff for other people, then spend your free time doing the same. At age 65 you will wake up with both job and friends gone and wonder where your life went.

With women, you have to keep in mind that their goal is to subvert you in order to make them look good. When your magic is gone, they will discard you. A woman will adopt you as a lifestyle accessory to make her look successful. She will then demand you conform to her lifestyle. At that point, your ability to be “magical” for her will be gone. Exit you.

With business, this means that all products become parasitic over time. This is necessary to pay for all the parasites who start working at a company once it succeeds. This is why you should have no brand loyalty.

Jobs are a waste of time

In a society where every person is flaky and irresponsible, workers cannot be counted on to do much more than show up and go through the motions. Employers have responded to this by making each job a simplified role where the worker can be easily replaced. This even extends to the professions at this point, except at the highest levels, and even those elites seem to have dubious judgment.

As a result, most of any job consists of "pro forma" activity, or tasks designed to keep up the appearance of being productive. The actual job is a few hours a week where your input is actually needed. The rest is designed to make your supervisors, and her managers all the way up to the top, look good because all the workers appear engaged in "important" activity.

Remember that being successful entails looking successful. Creating "important" tasks makes people look successful, so they do it to their underlings. This is why you will work all night on projects that never see the light of day, or spend hours each week filling out forms that no one sees. Appearance is more important than reality in dying civilizations.

Loading...

The only antidote at this point is to own your own business. Many of these businesses are of types looked down upon by the "college-educated" crowd, but owning your own plumbing business, HVAC, farm, gun shop or auto repair means you are not replaceable. This benefits you as things go further south.

Every institution is corrupted

Collapse is a state of mind. It replaces realistic thinking with the idea of pleasing others with illusions. As a result, it has no headquarters or center. It infiltrates everything because ordinary people use it as a means of advancing themselves.

Every institution that has people in it will have been affected by this mental corruption. This means that whatever institution — government, private or charitable — that you interact with, you must expect it to be parasitic and lying to you. When these institutions tell you something is truth, look for what they are attempting to conceal.

This should also remove any residual guilt you have about deceiving institutions or depriving them of what they consider their due. Ignore charities and "feel-good" products, including Girl Scout Cookies. Pay as little in taxes as possible by having a business to deduct life expenses and realizing some income through barter.

Everything is fake

In order for a collapsing civilization to appear credible, it replaces all truths with lies. This includes making fake versions of everything that you know to be true.

Think of fast food. It is a replacement for the real deal which costs less than twice as much. Instead of a real meat hamburger, you are eating soy mixed with Grade-Z meat on a bun made out of Grade-Z flour with sugar added to mask that fact. Collapse gives every idea, habit and object the fast food treatment.

For an example of how this happens, consider the redefinition of masculinity:

> To put it more accurately, we can say that men are pressured to conform to what we might call 'low masculinity' (drunkenness, lack of restraint and intelligence, picking on those who — through size or numbers — are largely defenseless, etc.), > just as women are pressured to conform to what we might call 'low femininity'.

In a dying time, every ideal is an imitation of a higher ideal, but it has been "democratized" so that fools, idiots and morons can participate. Real masculinity is difficult, but buying a sports car, drinking watery soda-pop beer, and flattering stupid women in nightclubs is easy. Easy = popular = "successful."

When you think about "difficult" and "easy," consider that you are referring to mental state. It is difficult to change yourself through self-discipline and realistic thinking; it is easy to engage in a thoughtless habit.

The fakery extends to women. The definition of woman has been inverted so that we do not notice we are getting the fast food version. This is why most women act like men: their sexual openness and aggressive outlook is designed to conceal the fact that inside, they are a mess. They did not take the difficult path but the easy one.

All of the opposition is controlled or insane

You know that the official institutions are corrupted, but what might come as a surprise is that the unofficial institutions that claim to be an alternative are broken as well. The same idea of demotism has infected them and made their message into a fast food version of what it could be.

Consider white nationalism. The sane idea would be that in each society, the founding ethnic group should be the only group and should act in its own interests. Instead, white nationalism becomes pointless bashing of people for the mere sin of being non-white, and incorporates a whole lot of liberal ideas to make it popular with people who are accustomed to decline.

The same is true of any "movement." Environmentalism changed from trying to save the world to defending third world immigration and supporting big businesses, if those businesses adopted Left-tinged ideas.

The original corrupt opposition is the Left. Their idea—that all people are equal—was designed to create a distraction from the real question, which is "How do we stop our civilization from declining?" Their entire political platform is based on a distraction, but it succeeds because it flatters people to consider themselves equal, because that way they can never be wrong.

Your first task: become sane by recognizing reality

Take stock of your situation: you are living in a dying civilization where every truth is a lie and every person is an agent of destruction. Your first task is to escape, but not physically. You must escape first in your mind. You achieve this “exit” by becoming sane, and the only way you can do this is by paying attention to reality in place of the lies.

You can recognize reality by paying attention to cause and effect. What was intended, what was done, and what were the results? This approach is the basis of the “scientific method” and you can use it to look at your life, find what works, and by paying attention to that, see where society is doing the opposite.

For example, many men (and man-boys) attempt to gain sexual favors from women by white knighting. Have any of them actually experienced intercourse as a result? And if so, was it a woman you would give the time of day to? Their failure shows you that their method is not realistic, but pathological. It is formed of pleasant human notions that do not work in reality.

You can extrapolate from this. How much of politics is white knighting? How much of office politics is the same? You will see the same patterns repeated time and again in different ways. By recognizing how reality works, instead of the social ideas that most people act on, you can begin to escape the insanity.

Your goal is to weather the storm and prepare to rebuild civilization. What exists now, that seems so solid and unshakeable, in fact adopts that appearance because it is weak and already falling. Help it along if you can. But most of all, gain sanity so that you do not carry it within you like an infectious disease.

Form networks with other realists. Exchange information about real life stuff, even if it is just as prosaic as gardening and car repair. As civilization loosens its grip, these informal networks will form the basis for what comes next.

Beware of the soulless people

In a dying civilization, most of the people will give up their souls because to have a soul is to care about the consequences of one's actions, and that requires noticing reality. In turn, noticing reality requires becoming aware of the collapse and then feeling less successful as a result. People will do anything but face the abyss of terror, doubt and ambiguity which that opens.

Friedrich "Fred" Nietzsche wrote of a type of person he called The Last Man:

> Alas! there comes the time when man will no longer launch the arrow of his longing beyond man — and the string of his bow will have unlearned to whiz!

Last men are people who care about nothing but their power over others through social means. They see no world beyond personal "success" in the dying civilization, and have no values. They cannot form true friendships, will never fully love another person, and are parasites that will sap your time, energy and direction.

The average person created by the transition to third world status of a dying civilization is: of mixed heritage, without religion or philosophy, very social and super-dedicated to his job, and has no higher joys in life than eating, shallow socializing, drinking, shopping and "entertainment." This is the human ruin in which you exist.

Your enemy in this time is fatalism, or the belief that nothing you do can have any positive results. Fatalism is the counterpart in the individual to decline in a civilization; it means giving up on reality and having standards higher than "it's all good man." Last men specialize in disguising fatalism as virtue.

To work around last men, treat them as salesmen. Everything they tell you will be said only to make you purchase a product, which is usually them. They want you to support them socially and in their careers. Unless there is reward in it for you, it is best to politely listen to the sales pitch and claim you will think about it and act at an indeterminate later time.

It will end, but only when the morons are beaten back

Civilization decline has happened many times in the past. In fact, all of the third world today consists of remnants of once-great civilizations. This means both that civilization collapse is usually inevitable, and that it is escapable. People have done it in the past. Rome was founded by Greeks fleeing their dying society for a new hope. Europe may have been the creation of horsemen from the East who fled a dying civilization there.

Since Earth is fully colonized, and there are no more empty places to escape to, the new society will rise up in place. A group of people who are the most forward-thinking among their kind will, like during the American Revolution, overthrow their government and depose all who supported it.

Unlike Brazil, places like Europe and the USA have clear groups of founders and strong values inherited from those. These values will guide the new society arising from the ashes of the old. But nothing will happen until power is seized and the morons are beaten back.

This does not mean seizing power in the present system, although that will be a useful method toward unifying the group. It means a rejection of everything this society stands for, most notably equality (which benefits morons—everyone else is already equal or better by ability) and the subsidy state, which sponsors morons.

Whether or not this happens in your lifetime, the only way to discover your masculinity is to work toward goals that even if far off are inherently good. Replacing Idiocracy with a functional civilization is a start, and by working toward it, you can regain the self-esteem stolen from you by this broken era.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Patriarchal Nationalism: The Only Societal System That Can Save The West

Brett Stevens
Nietzschean who encountered Celine, Houellebecq and black metal. Blogs at Amerika and Death Metal Underground. Former writer for ANUS and CORRUPT.

How To Have Conversations With Women That Get Results

March 16, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Last week I wrote an article called Indirect Vs. Direct Game, which discussed the best method of "opening"—that is, initiating a conversation—with a beautiful girl who you've just met through day game. But while many guys spend a lot of time agonizing over which line to use, the truth is opening is only part of the battle. The real meat of day game is in maintaining a conversation and then getting her number.

What Is A Conversation?

Well, we all know what a conversation is, don't we? It's when two human beings exchange views and information with each other verbally. The problem we encounter in day game is this, though: how does one maintain a conversation with a perfect stranger when there is no real reason to talk to them at all?

Last week, when I discussed openers, I talked about how there are really two ways to go, direct and indirect. Sure, there is debate around this, but the method which Roosh prefers, as discussed in his day game classic Day Bang, is going indirect, starting off with an “elderly opener”—that is, the sort of conversational gambit a senior citizen would use—to get things going. Assuming you choose this sort of approach, then what you need to do next is to keep things going by rambling.

Rambling

In normal circumstances, such as when we are talking to friends, coming up with what to say next isn’t really an issue. If we are already friendly or intimate with someone then most of the time the conversation just seems to “flow” without much difficulty. When you meet a girl on the street, or in a coffee shop or book store, then your aim should be to simulate this sort of flow as closely as you can to generate a sense of connection (and indeed, to create a genuine connection in doing so.)

Unfortunately, this means that you are going to have to put in a lot of the initial ground work.

It’s no good just to ask a girl you’ve just met a load of interview-style questions. Such a strategy just won’t cut it. Not only is it boring, and what pretty much every average dude on the street would try if he had the balls to approach in the first place, but it also risks being unduly personal upfront—something that can “scare the cat” when you’re talking to a new girl.

Instead, the method Roosh advocates in Day Bang, one that has worked for many thousands of day gamers the world over, is to ramble conversationally while throwing out “bait” for the girl to get hooked on.

How do you do this? The secret is simply to keep talking for as long as possible (until you’ve got her number or she’s outright rejected you) while throwing in tantalizing tidbits of information about yourself that she will be intrigued by and will have no choice but to question you on.

The point of all game is to reveal your personal value to women in a way that is not obvious, and crucially, to get her to ask you a personal question.

Say you've gone in with an elderly opener about the laptop she is using in the coffee shop, and you happen to be writing a spy thriller in your spare time. Your job is to let her know this. After all, she won't meet a man who's writing a spy thriller every day, and therefore you are interesting, and most likely attractive to her as a result.

But you shouldn't make the mistake of simply walking up to her and saying "Hi. I'm very cool as I'm writing a spy thriller," any more than you should say that you own a Ferrari or manage a hedge fund or something similar. Instead, you should communicate your value covertly.

So if the topic is laptops, you should find a way to chat about your experience of laptops in a general way while throwing in your writerly bait. Like this:

> So it's a Dell. You know, I used to have an HP when I was travelling through Europe. It was a little heavy, but it worked really well. Not only was it fast, but it has loads of memory, which was useful for the project that I was working on at the time.

There are two bits of bait in this short example. The first is the mention of Europe. The second is the project. Most people are interested in travel to some degree, Because you have mentioned Europe but you haven't been overly specific (i.e you didn't say "when I traveled to Paris via Madrid and then spent three weeks in Berlin before flying back home") then you have opened up the opportunity for her to ask you a question. And because you have thrown in a mention of your “project” (rather than your “spy novel set in the Cold War involving a tough but tender, hard-drinking member of MI5 and a Russian plot to assassinate a member of the British government”) then the field is open for her to ask questions about that, too.

Rambling is perhaps the most difficult part of the day game kit for guys to pick up as the notion of talking aimlessly about random subjects to a stranger seems counter to our naturally logical tendencies. But it is a skill that we all need to master if we are to achieve greater success with women.

Roosh has some great exercises to improve your skills in this area in Day Bang. The most important thing, though, when you’re in front of a girl, is just to keep talking no matter what. Don’t worry overly if what you’re saying seems silly. Your aim is to get her to ask you a personal question. It is at this point—when she has made an equitable investment in the conversation—that you can proceed to the next part of the interaction, the close. Keep talking long enough, throw in enough bait and sooner or later she is likely to make the kind of investment that will give you the green light to proceed.

Closing

Once the girl has made an investment into the conversation by asking you for some personal detail such as your name, your age or what you do (and remember, these are for more potent indicators of interest in the daytime than at night) then you are ready to “go for the close.”

This really means one of three things. Either you take her phone number to arrange a date for another time, take her phone number and then get her to come out later that day, or take her on an instant date. If you’re a newbie and are wondering what to do, the best option is simply to take her number. Prolonging the interaction could be to your detriment unless you’re confident that your social skills are on point and that you’ll be able to strengthen your connection rather than sabotage it.

The problem that you have in this segment of the pull—even when she has shown interest by hooking—is that it can seem disjointed and clumsy to simply ask for her phone number after a ten minute conversation about laptops. So how do you segue from chit chat into arranging to meet up to get to know each other better?

Roosah outlines a great strategy in Day Bang he calls “Galnuc.” I won’t go into too much detail here, but Galnuc is a smooth and clever way of getting from “Well, I’m working on a spy thriller at the moment’ to “Let’s meet for drinks—give me your number and I’ll message you in the week”.

The great thing about Galnuc (and the meaning behind the term will become clear when you read the book) is that it covers everything that you need to say to a girl in order to be in with a chance of seeing her again. Okay, the main tangible result you can expect to see from day game is phone numbers, but in themselves they are not enough. What you really want are dates. Glanuc is a strategy which, if executed correctly, means that you are far more likely to get them.

Next week I will discuss the best venues to use for day game and how to work them.

—

Roosh has some great tips on how to develop your day game in his classic book Day Bang, home of the “elderly chat” strategy and the now infamous “pet shop” line. Day Bang, which I will be referencing throughout my day game series, is a 201-page book that solely focuses on approaching women during the day. Using dozens of examples, it teaches you how to meet girls in common daytime venues like the coffee shop, retail store, street, bookstore, and grocery store, among others. It’s available on paperback, Kindle, or ebook. Click here to learn more about Roosh’s book.

Read Next: Why Day Game Is The Secret Sauce You Need To Consistently Meet And Attract Women

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The History And Evolution Of Rifles

March 16, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

“Only accurate rifles are interesting.” Though the value of this statement is contested in gun articles back then and today, Americans have always been able to shoot well. Being a frontier nation at the time of its origin, and having the right to bear arms affirmed in the Constitution, meat has been put on the table, and various opponents put on the ground due to rifles over the course of the 240 year history of the country.

As this is a practical article, I’ll gloss over entire swaths of history here. Gunpowder is considered to have been invented in China in the 13th century and may have been independently developed elsewhere at the same time. Referred to as black powder today, it was originally a fireworks propellant, and was fashioned into single shot weapons that spread through the Middle East and into Europe.

British Brown Bess with bayonet.

By the time the American colonies got established, the gun technology of the day, along with the idea of pikes and spears, got combined into a fairly standardized infantry musket with a bayonet.

Muskets

Muskets had some similar traits to cannons, with size being an obvious exception. You would pour a measure of powder down the bore, and drop in a ball that was often undersize for the bore of the musket, and use the ramrod stored under the barrel.

Point the business end down range, cock back your hammer off to the side of the gun (often a piece of flint against a steel striker, the “flintlock”) and prime the pan with some fine grade powder. Shoulder it, pull the trigger, and hopefully the thing fires, sending your ball rattling down the bore to inaccurately fly some short yardage before running out of velocity and hitting the ground.

Flintlock Detail.

Some improvements to the process were made with the first “cartridges,” which were paper wraps of a measure of gunpowder and a ball. You bit the end off, primed the pan, poured the rest down the barrel, then flipped the wrapper over and shoved the whole thing, ball first, down the barrel. This also cleaned the bore a bit, kept the ball securely against the powder, and stabilized it going down the bore in flight.

Paper Cartridge and Minie Ball Civil War era design

Rifling

There was really no difference between the historical equivalent of a shotgun versus predecessors to rifles, other than putting in shot vs. ball. Rifling is what makes a gun accurate, and is a number of grooves cut into a barrel that are helical in nature and serve to spin a projectile as it goes down the bore. Although there are newer types of rifling like polygonal, traditional rifling is composed of lands and grooves, where the lands are what contacts the bullet and spins it as it moves down the barrel.

Stylized rifling surrounding Bond is the trademark of the “gun barrel opener” of all Bond movies.

Rifling requires a tight fit. Bullets have diameters in between the larger diameter of the grooves, and the smaller diameter of the lands for a press fit. This is not a problem with modern breechloading rifles where the bullet will simply sit behind the rifling’s start when chambered, but it was a real bitch to shove a ball down a rifled muzzleloader’s barrel compared to the undersized ball in a smoothbore musket mentioned earlier.

Rifling on a tank gun

However, people in the colonies that weren't in the cities had to hunt and deal with the occasional Indian group, so knowing how to shoot once and kill something was more important than multiple shots that might not hit anything, and the tradeoff of the long loading time was worth the increased accuracy.

Groups like Morgan's Riflemen and others used the Kentucky Rifle to great psychological effect, even though there weren't many of them. Something about some guy sneaking out of the trees and shooting you from twice the distance that you could manage scared the British Regulars.

Blackpowder Cartridges

The Civil War was an absolute mess in armament, and beyond the scope of this article to cover much of it, but there were a few technical advances that should be addressed.

The percussion cap is a small amount of priming compound inside a copper cup, and it is the direct predecessor of the modern primer. It replaced the flint and steel , and also provided its own fuel for the ignition blast. Modern muzzleloaders can still use percussion caps, though they are usually inline, not off to the side like they were back then, and most of them use modern primers in little plastic discs that you can reload after use.

Blackpowder cartridges.

The other advance was breechloading cartridges. The original ones were carryovers from the muzzleloader cartridge; paper or linen packages with a bullet and a charge. The Sharps rifle used these cartridges, loaded from the breech, and a percussion cap.

Brass cartridges soon followed. Rimfires (the .22 Short, one of the originals, is still around today, albeit with smokeless powder) and a now-obsolete ignition type called the pinfire were the two methods. Rimfires have priming compound in the rim and the hammer crushed it to fire. Pinfires had a pin sticking out the side which punched a primer inside the cartridge for ignition.

Cross-section of a pinfire. The pin crushed the priming compound below it when fired.

Flammable cartridges would conveniently burn themselves up upon use, and you simply reloaded, but a brass cartridge has to be extracted before reloading can occur. Rimfires were pulled out by their rims, and the pinfires were pulled out by the end of the pin after firing. Rimmed cartridges would continue in this fashion until centerfire cartridges and the necessity for box magazines made rebated rims necessary.

Although copper cartridges were briefly used, centerfire brass cartridges soon became standard soon after the Civil War. The 1873 Springfield “Trapdoor” rifle is interesting due to it being almost a modern single shot rifle and using one of the oldest cartridges still around, the 45-70.

Repeaters, a manual action rifle that could hold multiple rounds of ammunition, showed up in the Civil War (notably the Spencer Carbine), and carried over into the days of Western expansion. The Henry Rifle, was noted for being “a rifle you could load on Sunday and shoot all week long” due to being it able to hold 17 rounds, which was unheard of at the time.

Early repeaters. Henry Rifle on top (magazine under barrel) and Spencer Carbine (magazine in buttstock.)

Spitzer Bullets, Smokeless Powder, And Machine Guns

Although the Gatling Gun was used in the Civil War, it was not a machine gun. Rather, it was a crank operated, multiple barreled, manual action gun, but it was still damned impressive for running on black powder. The Maxim gun was the first true machine gun, arriving in the 1880s.

1904 Maxim Gun

Smokeless powder, of multiple chemical formulas, was developed in the late 1800s, and was primarily conceived to reduce fouling. The residue left over from black powder combustion; fouling is corrosive, sticky, and gunks up a gun in a hurry. Smokeless powder is more powerful, cleaner, and doesn’t blow clouds of black smoke.

Although smokeless powder comes mainly in commercial ammo to end users today, it’s also available in bottles for reloading. Never load a blackpowder weapon of any type with smokeless powder.

Spitzer bullets were the third major improvement of the time. Previously, bullets had been cylinders with hemispherical, or close to it, tips. Spitzer, which means spire, bullets have a point, and are much more aerodynamically efficient. Calibers got smaller, and went from typically .45 or so down to .30 (7.62 mm) and was a lot closer to the current aerodynamic rage of 6.5mm .26 cal bullets than a .45 cal ball nose.

Spitzer bullet geometry

Pointy bullets were wanted by the military so that fire could be done at longer ranges. With modern powder, solid bolt actions were developed by many countries (Britain, Russia, Germany, and the US) and that set up armaments for the first World War, which was primarily a rifles and machine guns fight.

Auto-loading Rifles And Submachine Guns.

Armaments developed to a certain extent between the World Wars. Machine guns increased their cyclic rate and became somewhat more portable. Bolt action rifles also carried over, as did revolvers and semi-automatic pistols running recoil actions.

Browning Automatic Rifle.

Automatic actions were present, but the concept of getting them into man-portable units was approached in a number of creative ways that showed up in the Second World War. Downsized “light” machine guns, like the Browning Automatic Rifle were select fire, heavy personal weapons firing full sized rifle cartridges like the 30-06. Fully automatic carbines firing pistol cartridges (submachine guns or machine pistols) were also developed. Some carbine sized rifles, like the US M1 Carbine, were also used in the conflict.

M1 Carbine with sling, magazine, mag pouch, and stripper clip.

Most WWII standard battle rifles were bolt action, with the notable exception of the M1 Garand (see title photo) that was semi-automatic, and deserves its own article. The other notable weapon of that conflict was the German StG-44, which was the abbreviation of Sturmgewehr model 1944.

Intermediate Cartridges And Assault Rifles

Literally “storm rifle” (as in to storm a position, or assault it), this is where the term “assault rifle” comes from. Automatic rifle fire is an awesome thing, but, even though a battle rifle like the M1918 BAR mentioned above, or the M14 that was the successor to the M1 Garand, or its contemporaries the German G3 or the Belgian FAL, amongst others, will be able to handle fully automatic fire from a full power rifle cartridge, you will not be able to hold the rifle on target under sustained fire.

StG-44, the first Assault Rifle.

Enter the intermediate cartridge, and the bargain of trading a full rifle cartridge for a smaller one that can be controlled under automatic fire and be carried in much greater amounts. An assault rifle is an intermediate sized cartridge firing rifle that is capable of select fire. Select fire is the term for multiple firing modes, usually safety, single shot, and multiple shots per trigger pull, with the latter either being a burst of a number of rounds (three is usual) or fully automatic fire.

The two principle assault rifles of the 20th century are the AK-47 (and later AK-74) developed by Mikhail Kalashnikov and the Soviet Union, and the AR-15/M16/M4 Armalite Rifle developed by Eugene Stoner and the USA. Both can be argued as the most influential of rifles of recent times and will get their own write-ups here.

M16A1, Vietnam era.

Bullpups And Modern Advancement

Firearm evolution in the past fifty years has mainly been a development of ergonomics and more powerful cartridges for longer ranges. Bullpup is the industry name for a carbine sized rifle that is shortened in overall length by placing the action just in front of the shooter's shoulder, instead of the traditional position of in front of the trigger hand. This removes a foot of so of total length at the expense of some complicated trigger mechanisms.

Steyr AUG, the first successful bullpup

To Be Continued…

Next week, we'll get into action types, common cartridges, different types of rifles available on the civilian market, accessories, and the dreaded Evil Features ™.

Read More: The Fundamentals of Gun Safety

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Did The Anti-Donald Trump Riot In Chicago Help Trump Cruise To Victory On Tuesday?

March 16, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With Donald Trump having won huge victories in four out of the five state primaries on Tuesday—as well as in the Northern Marianas Islands—cucks and leftists nationwide are resigning themselves to him being the Republican nominee. The scale of Trump's triumph is such that he knocked Marco Rubio, last great hope of the GOP establishment, out of the race entirely, and also scored wins against Ted Cruz in Illinois, North Carolina and Missouri. The only state he lost is Ohio, home of John Kasich, who has limped along as a nonthreatening, bland, safe choice for GOP voters skittish about the comparatively politically inexperienced Trump, Cruz and Rubio.

But how big of an impact did Friday night's anti-Trump riot in Chicago have on the final vote?

As everyone knows by this point, Trump was forced to cancel a rally at the UIC Pavilion in Chicago last Friday after Bernie Sanders supporters, organized by MoveOn.org and #BlackLivesMatter, infiltrated the venue and tried to incite a riot. The media attempted to blame Trump for the anarchy, claiming that he was "inciting violence" through his speeches and actions; however, video recorded by myself and other witnesses at the Chicago event show that all the violence at the rally was incited by left-wing agitators.

By cancelling his Chicago rally, Trump made a strategic retreat in search of a larger prize: votes. By showing the anarchy and violence sown by his haters—and the spineless responses of his competitors for the GOP nomination—Trump was able to secure wins in Illinois and other states that voted on Tuesday. The momentum from those wins will carry him all the way to the nomination, and all it took was one riot.

The Optics Of The Chicago Riot

Prior to Friday night's riot, Trump was in a tight fight for Tuesday's races, with Florida being the only state where he had a guaranteed win. In Illinois, polling showed Trump with only narrow leads over Cruz and Kasich, and he had actually fallen behind the latter in Ohio. Additionally, Illinois' deliberately Byzantine primary structure—requiring that voters vote not just for candidates, but for their delegates in each Congressional district as well—left Trump little room for error.

Both Kasich and Cruz made serious bids for Illinois; last week, I attended both a Kasich town hall and a Heidi Cruz meet and greet in Chicago's suburbs, which I documented here. Kasich had built up a base of support among Chicago's moderate voters, while Cruz targeted more conservative, Christian voters downstate.

The anti-Trump riot changed all that. In the span of two hours, Trump positioned himself as the enemy of #BlackLivesMatter and every left-wing agitator group in Chicago, widely despised by average Illinois voters. Additionally, Ted Cruz and the other GOP candidates sided with the rioters against Trump, which precipitated a massive revolt among their supporters. In particular, the sight of a "Constitutionalist" like Cruz backing a mob that had deprived Trump of his First Amendment rights disgusted his remaining fans.

The numbers don't lie: on Tuesday, Trump outperformed polls to win Illinois by a nine-point margin, helped by his landslide victories in Chicago and its suburbs. In Cook County, home of the city itself, he won with a 16-point margin over John Kasich. Trump also won Florida in a landslide, with a 19-point margin of victory over Rubio (remarkable considering that Florida is Rubio's home state), and also edged out Cruz in North Carolina and Missouri. Even in Ohio, where he lost, he held Kasich to a narrow 11-point victory.

All Berned Out

On the Democratic side, the quasi-communist revolution instigated by Bernie Sanders is all but out of gas. Hillary Clinton crushed Sanders on Tuesday night, winning every single race up for grabs. While Sanders was able to keep her margins narrow in Illinois and Missouri, his persistent inability to appeal to minority voters has left him gasping for air in a party that is now primarily nonwhite. Perhaps his supporters should spend less time inciting violence at Trump rallies and more time getting the vote out.

It’s clear by this point that Hillary is going to get the Democratic nomination, with both the primary voters and the party machinery operating in her favor. She’ll be at a massive disadvantage in the general election due to Trump’s popularity, his persuasiveness and her massive amounts of baggage, but she’s not going to go down without a fight.

Read More: Did Microsoft Commit Voter Fraud In Iowa To Ensure Donald Trump’s Defeat?

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The True Story Of A Carousel-Riding Military Wife

March 17, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A few months after I moved to Atlanta following a bad breakup, I had coffee one morning with an older woman I'd known for quite a while to catch up on the goings on in our lives. We talked about all the usual ancillary topics—jobs, money, future plans etc.

Not long after we started talking she got a text from the guy she had been seeing on and off for a while (We'll call him "Brandon"). She shook her head and put away her phone. We continued our conversation but "Pam" was visibly distracted on account of that text.

"Everything okay?" I asked her.

"As okay as it can be I guess," she replied. "Brandon's actin' a fool again."

"When's he not?" I said with a faux chuckle. I'd known about her shenanigans with Brandon for years but she had never told me how they met. When I asked her, she relayed a story I would never forget.

Virgin bride

Pam was raised in Baltimore by her grandparents who were the embodiment of old school traditionalists. They were God-fearing people and their lifestyle and house rules reflected it: no boys, no dates, no sex, and church on Sundays and Wednesdays. Of course Pam's grandfather being the pastor at their church certainly helped facilitate her consistent attendance. But she always said that they'd have been there every Sunday whether gramps was the preacher or not.

Pam was a model student in school making straight A's all through elementary, intermediate, and high school. She had plenty of motivation as her grandmother threatened "whoopins" if she ever brought home any B's. Granny kept her in line and made damn sure her granddaughter didn't fall prey to the temptations that would most assuredly undo all the hard work she put in keeping Pam safe.

One evening, toward the end of her senior year in high school, Pam's grandparents had a family they had known for years over to their house for dinner. Among them was their 18 year old son, "D.J." who was also in his last year of high school.

D.J. was a respectful young man who was handsome and smart. He would be joining the Army soon after graduation and though Pam had no idea at the time, there was the purpose of this get together. The plan was for D.J. and Pam to marry and this was the first of a few meetups for them to get acquainted with one another before they said their vows.

Pam admitted that she was absolutely smitten by D.J. She'd never kissed or even held hands with a boy much less have a boyfriend, yet here was this handsome young man in her house taking interest in her. A week after graduation Pam and D.J. were married and a month later D.J. was shipped off to boot camp. Everything was going according to plan and life couldn't be better.

Separation

Over the next few years Pam and D.J. had five children together. As was always the case with military families they moved around quite a bit but according to Pam they loved it. For a young couple who had rarely (if ever) been outside of Baltimore, it was exciting to travel and see the world.

Like any married couple they had their disagreements and arguments but by and large, things were going well. The family was well taken care of by the military, all of their children were healthy, and D.J. was in the process of switching branches and joining the Air Force which ensured a secure and stable lifestyle for years to come…

…until one night a raucous argument lead to D.J. asking Pam: “Do you even want to be married anymore?” To which Pam answered: “I don’t know…..”

Things were tense over the next few months until Pam finally decided she no longer loved her husband and soon after they were separated. D.J. stayed in New Jersey (he was stationed at McGuire Air Force base at the time) while Pam took her five young children and moved to Washington state where she had a number of friendships she developed while stationed at Fort Lewis.

“It felt like the world had opened itself up to me,” Pam told me at this point in her story. “D.J.’s the only man I’d ever been with so it was kind of exciting to see what else was out there for me.”

Unbeknownst to her she now had a ticket for a popular carnival ride that her fellow military wives had been raving about for years.

Pam jumps on the carousel

“I never had problems getting dates,” said Pam. “I had just turned 26 and I was still thin so men came on to me all the time.”

“But you had five kids,” I said. “Didn’t that ever scare guys away?”

“No, not really. I mean there were guys I would date for a couple weeks who never even knew I had children and then there were a couple I felt comfortable enough to bring around. But being a single mother of five never worked against me as far as dating was concerned.”

Pam regaled me of stories of guy after guy she’d “dated” since being separated. The dreamy look she had on her face during the revelations of her escapades was telling. Obviously her prospects these days weren’t as plentiful on account of her being way past The Wall at this point but it was easy to see that she had the time of her life in those days.

Meanwhile, D.J. was sending money every month to make sure his children were being taken care of. Even still, it wasn’t nearly enough for a single mother of five and eventually Pam had to get on welfare.

"Those were tough times," she said. Her dreamy look had vanished. "I used to think about the great life we had living on base but now six of us were crammed into a small apartment in a bad part of town and barely getting by."

Pam's saving grace came in the form of a call from D.J., who told her he had been promoted and was being stationed in Hawaii for the next four years.

"That was all I needed to hear," she said. "I told him I wanted to reconcile and he didn't waste any time getting us out there."

Contamination

According to Pam, life on Hickam Air Force Base was like a dream. Tropical weather year-round, a half hour drive to any beach on Oahu, and her husband's higher pay made the transition back to military life very easy. She even opened up an in-home day care center which further bolstered the family finances.

Like before, Pam made fast friends with the other military wives. They'd have cookouts, get together to play cards, have Tupperware parties, and anything else you can thank of as far as female bonding goes. But she quickly noticed there was an undercurrent of malcontent and before long the other wives started telling tales of their own.

[image]

"When we'd all get together, they would tell me about how and when they cheated on their husbands while they were on assignment overseas, working crazy shifts, or any time they got a chance," Pam said with her dreamy look making its way back onto her face. "And I have to admit, the stories they told were just so exciting! I felt guilty but I always loved hearing about their wild affairs."

After a while, Pam finally succumbed to the peer pressure.

Brandon

“Some of my girlfriends invited me to the Officer’s club* and D.J. was working nights at that time so as far as I was concerned it was just going to be harmless fun.”

On military bases, there are Officer’s clubs and Non Commissioned Officers clubs (also known as an N.C.O. club). The Officer’s clubs are for Officer’s only such as Captains, Majors, Lieutenants, etc. while N.C.O. clubs are for lower ranking personnel like Airmen, Sergeants, etc. The Military separates Officer’s from N.C.O.s to avoid conflicts of interest, among other things.*

Pam said she could remember that night like it was yesterday: “We were all at the bar and this short, muscular guy walks right up to me and says ‘C’mon, we’re gonna dance.'”

She said his approach surprised her so she gave him a witty reply to “scare him away” (read: shit test): “I’m sorry, I don’t follow strange men onto a dance floor.”

Pam says he put his hand around her waist, pulled her in, looked her right in the eye and said: “That’s cool—but tonight, you’re gonna follow me.”

“At that very moment I knew my marriage was over,” Pam said with a regretful look on her face.

She went on to tell me that Brandon was from Detroit and had a tough childhood. He was raised by his mother who was always working multiple jobs to support him and his brothers. It was the typical hard luck case of an inner city kid without a father.

Brandon joined the Air Force after getting arrested for breaking and entering back when he was twenty years old. The Judge gave him a choice: Go to jail, or join the military. He made the obvious choice and it served him better than he expected. Brandon's street smarts combined with his focus allowed him to consistently rise through the ranks and after ten years of service and hard work, he became a 2nd Lieutenant….an Officer.

I hadn't discovered the manosphere at this point, but based on what Pam was telling me, I instinctively knew that Brandon was more attractive than D.J. in every way. Post-neomasculine renaissance, I now understand why Pam eventually ended her marriage to be with this guy.

Deserted island

That fateful night was the beginning of the end of Pam's marriage and ultimately her chance at happiness. Over the next two years she carried on an affair with Brandon which resulted in two abortions, endless drama, and D.J. moving into one of the other bedrooms.

Eventually she filed for divorce and left Hawaii with Brandon (who had retired from the Air Force) to live in Detroit.

“I’d taken care of the kids on my own the first time we separated and I felt like it was D.J.’s turn,” Pam explained. “Besides, an Air Force Base in Hawaii in a lot safer than Detroit.”

When D.J.’s assignment on Hickam was up, he was stationed in Oklahoma. Further north, Pam’s life with Brandon was anything but stable. He’d developed a crack addiction (though Pam suspects he may have picked up the habit shortly before retiring from the military), couldn’t hold down a job, and treated her like shit.

Over the next few years they would have a torrid on-again-off-again relationship and the dance was always the same: he’d charm her into getting back with him promising to change, she’d take the bait, put it up with it for a little while, and then leave again. Rinse and repeat.

Pam simply could not get Brandon out of her system and proof of that was written all over her face in this small coffee house in Atlanta almost thirty years later as she read another text from him that had just come as her story drew to a close.

“Well I’m gonna get going,” I said standing up and stretching. “That trail isn’t gonna ride itself.” I bent over and kissed her on the cheek and told her I loved her.

“Love you too, Donovan.”

Wait a minute…it sounds like “Pam” is…

…none other than Mama Sharpe—my own mother.

For years my siblings and I had a very strained relationship with our mother (a couple of them still do) because of her selfish actions. Her decisions back then still have a profound effect on all of us. Even after this conversation I was still a little resentful, but being in my early thirties afforded me the maturity to bury the hatchet.

Sure, I’d been through some tough times but never once did I blame it on my divorced parents. Even as a “purple pill” beta I still knew blaming my bad decisions on my childhood was a cop out. After all, she is my mother and I’ll always love her no matter what.

But I didn't completely and wholly forgive her until I found the manosphere. We have so thoroughly and accurately dissected female nature that their irresponsible and reckless behavior doesn't surprise us anymore. In fact we've come to expect and even exploit it with game.

Does this absolve my mother for blowing up our family to chase after a bad boy? Not a chance. Biological differences notwithstanding, men and women alike are born with a fundamental understanding of the difference between right and wrong. This is why females engage in epic hamstering to assuage their guilty consciences—my mom included.

But now that I know how females operate and what makes them tick, I understand her motivations.

Conclusion

These days Miss Sharpe lives in North Carolina where she keeps herself occupied with my nieces and nephews—her grandchildren. I'm happy that it gives her a measure of fulfillment and happiness, but that's still a far cry from male companionship.

It breaks my very soul that she is alone in the sense that she doesn't have a husband and that after all these years she still bares the scars of her poor choices. This woman brought me into this world and regardless of her mistakes, I still want her to be happy and loved. But the red pill in me will never stop telling me that she made her bed and now she's got to lay in it.

If this story doesn't convince you that feminism destroys lives, nothing will. If it can turn a commodity as rare as a virgin bride into a raging slut in no time flat, there is positively no hope for females steeped in this sewage from birth. Get this through your thick skulls: All Women Are Like That. Including the ones related to us.

Read Next: The Real Consequences Of Women In The Military

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

3 Stories The French Media Concealed While They Invented Fictions About ROK

March 17, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

It has been six weeks since the ROK meetup outrage, and though the dust has settled, there is much to learn on exactly how the media establishment operates. Since I'm French, I have identified articles written about ROK in the French media, along with their respective authors. If you believe that appearance is ideology, you will not be shocked on how many of these lying journalists look like. While they reported on us, there were three big stories that the failed to broadcast to the public. I'll first show the reporters, and then the stories.

L'Obs

Article by Agathe Ranc

The title reads “Roosh V, the blogger who wanted to legalise rape… and fears for his safety. (…) “self-proclaimed misogynist and homophobe (…) organises hundreds of pro-rape rallies”

“Yes, Roosh V (…) does think that the absence of consent of a woman is a minor obstacle for the one who wants to take advantage of her”

The author

Le Figaro

Article by Amaury Peyrach/Peyrrachon

“Pro-rape blogger and anti-feminist Roosh V is everyone’s subject of conversation”

LE FIGARO.fr

LE FIGARO PREMIUM
1 mois d'essai offert sans engagement

LES AUTEURS
SUR LE MÊME SUJET
RÉAGIR (27)
PARTAGER
IMPRIMER
HAUT DE PAGE

Suivi par environ 20.000 personnes sur les réseaux Twitter et Facebook, Roosh V milite pour la légalisation du viol. Parmi ses arguments, revient régulièrement l'idée selon laquelle c'est aux femmes de ne pas se faire violer en se protégeant et non aux hommes de se contenir. Sur son blog, les titres de ses articles sont souvent provocateurs et misogynes, on peut par exemple y lire «Pourquoi les femmes ne devraient pas travailler», «Les attitudes et les décisions des femmes doivent être contrôlées par les hommes» ou «Les 7 choses requises chez la future mère de mes enfants» où Roosh V précise que sa future femme doit vouloir «rester à la maison» et ne doit être ni noire, ni asiatique, ni indienne...

"Followed by (...), Roosh V fights to legalise rape. Among his arguments, the recurrent idea that it is up to women not to get raped by protecting themselves instead of men controlling themselves..."

Amaury Peyrach'
journaliste 1 abonné Suivre journaliste

Ses derniers articles
Les meetings anti féministes du blogueur Roosh V ...
30 clans mafieux démantelés dans la cité de Marseille
Trois ex nazis poursuivis pour le massacre d'Ascq ...

The author

20minutes.fr

Article by Philippe Berry

“Legalisation of rape” : How the sexist blogger Roosh V succeeded in making the headlines” “Worldwide pro-rape meetings” (…) advice like “Never ask permission”"

The author

Geopolis/FranceTVinfos

Article by France 2 reporter Jacques Cardoze

“Anti-feminist blogger who writes about rape legalisation cancels his great meetup”

"Elles sont tellement paresseuses qu'elles se coupent les cheveux pour s'enlaidir"

"L'idée même de beauté et d'esthétique est entrain d'être démolie. Désormais, les femmes sont encouragées et applaudies pour avoir l'air de grosses cyborgs de l'espace. Les femmes et les gays sont vus comme supérieurs aux hommes hétérosexuels", affirme Roosh. "Vous tous, ici, vous êtes vus comme des violeurs. C'est une grosse féministe qui doit vous apprendre que vous ne devez pas violer les femmes". Au cours de la réunion, l'un des hommes présents demande à Roosh comment il peut élever sa fille en la protégeant du "pire de la société". Roosh lui conseille de la marier jeune, à 18 ans. L'autre option ? "Sinon, elle va travailler, rencontrer des mauvais garçons qui l'abîmeront. ...Je ne crois pas que vous devriez lui donner la liberté et le choix". Dans un autre extrait, Roosh déplore que les femmes "coupent leurs cheveux courts. Elles sont tellement paresseuses qu'elle s'enlaidissent volontairement". Dans la chambre de Roosh, au dessus de son lit, un écriteau prévient "Ton visage sera floué dans toute production vidéo qui pourrait être réalisée".

Il propose de légaliser le viol et affirme ensuite qu'il s'agit d'une satire

Depuis la publication en 2014 d'un article sur son blog intitulé "Comment stopper le viol", Roosh est régulièrement accusé de promouvoir le viol. Le texte critique les femmes qui se font violer sous l'emprise de l'alcool. Selon Roosh, elles sont les seules responsables, et non pas les "honnêtes hommes qui malheureusement vivent maintenant dans la peur de l'emprisonnement dans l'éventualité où la fille avec laquelle ils ont ou des relations sexuelles jouait sous l'emprise de l'alcool", écrit-il. Il résume ainsi sa pensée : "Si un homme qui se gare dans un quartier mal famé et laisse sa porte ouverte et les clefs à

"He proposes to legalise rape then asserts that it is a satire"

The author

France Bleu

Article by Typhaine Morin

“Small group that advocates rape legalisation cancels meetings”

“Roosh V, leader of a pro-rape masculinist organisation, decided to cancel the meetings. The “State Secretary for Women’s Rights” congratulates herself on the matter.”

The author

Les Inrocks

Article by Adélaïde Tenaglia

Roosh V, the "PUA" who wanted to legalise rape, cancels his conferences"

Rendre le viol légal dans la sphère privée pour l'éradiquer… C'était la solution proposée sur son blog par le coach en séduction Roosh V. Le 6 février, il voulait réunir les adeptes de sa "philosophie" masculiniste à travers le monde ; face à la mobilisation des internautes, des médias et des politiques, il a été contraint d'annuler ce projet.

Le nom de Roosh V a plus souvent été cherché sur google que celui de Jeb Bush, candidat à la primaire Républicaine, ces derniers jours. C'est ce qu'on peut appeler un bon coup médiatique pour Daryush Valizadeh (alias Roosh V). Ce blogueur américain se décrit comme "néo masculiniste", une idéologie qui prône, entre autres, la supériorité de l'homme sur la femme, chose fragile incapable de penser de façon logique et réfléchie.

Le samedi 6 février 2016, il entendait organiser un rassemblement international, dans 43 pays différents, des adeptes de sa "philosophie". Suite à une importante mobilisation contre ce projet sur internet, et à l'action de certains gouvernements (notamment en France), Roosh V a finalement annoncé l'annulation de tous les rassemblements prévus.

"Making rape legal in the private sphere in order to eradicate it… it was Roosh V's solution (…) "superiority of the man over the woman, a poor fragile thing that cannot think logically or rationally" (the only sensible thing she says in her article.)

The author

Marie Claire

Article by Mylène Wascowiski (Pascale Boistard, Miniluv henchwoman, jumps in)

“Meetups organised by Roosh V, pro-rape blogger, cancelled in France”

“Those meetings would discuss the creation of a new societal model, based on the domination of the white heterosexual male” dramatic sound effect Then she quotes the Secretary of State for Women’s Rights.

The author

This is the "State Secretary for Women's Rights" (a position that was only occupied when the left was in power in France) that jumped on the band wagon and was in touch with the police to prevent the meetings from happening, not monitor them, in Paris and Nantes:

"Such meetings calling for rape and violence against women were inconceivable" (She was warned by an online petition, not by a police or investigative source) Bottom tweet "For a few days, we' were in constant communication with Place Beauvau (Ministry of the Interieur's headquarters) and @paris / @nantesfr (mayors and local police forces) that I thank for their action and vigilance."

Knowing her type extremely well and my people's aversion for English, I doubt that she even received or read a translation of Roosh's article in French, let alone in English. She took the word of someone on Twitter to mobilize the State's police forces.

Words and profiles seem to follow a similar pattern? Weak, lazy, snarky, bitter, not an ounce of doubt or analysis. Frenchmen of talent and Gallic heroes of the past writhe in pain and shame in their cold grave.

The above are the faces that analyse information for you if you read the papers they work for. I do not have to comment. Their mere appearance explains the level of trust you can give them. This is the peril that my nation finds itself in today. They do not, I repeat, they DO NOT represent the French people, but these are the kind of individuals who are in charge of the information and the decisions about what should be celebrated or vilified.

Exhorting Minitrue and the Thought Police to act against the villains, mere leftists and a handful of mediocre journalists sent the state and the police authorities to apprehend us. These articles are only the tip of the iceberg. Here are news stories that are being concealed or downplayed by the media while they featured our meetups as the top story.

1. Migrants are turning Calais and its region into a 3rd-world slum

Crime becomes rampant wherever they drop their bindle. Almost no mention in the French media of the anti-migrant demonstration of Calais inhabitants in Paris. They came in force recently, to exhort the tepid pudding that we have for President to do something, as they witness their city slowly dying because of the bad reputation the migrants bring to it. Curfew, theft, and exactions are common occurrences in this once-prosperous seaport.

The tourism activity and all the sectors linked to it (recreational, restaurants, accommodation providers) see their business dwindling. The estimated figure is a fall of 40% of all their revenues since last summer, when the Invasion of Europe sold as a refugee crisis was in full swing.

A majority of French people do not want the migrants. Hollande does not care and agreed to welcome 130,000 very soon

While trying to approach the migrants of the “Jungle” in Calais, a Dutch pro-migrant journalist was almost stabbed by those he wanted to interview. Jude Law’s crew was attacked by the migrants as he was about to attention-whore using their “struggle.”

2. A retired general from the Foreign Legion was arrested for showing up at an anti-migrant rally

General Christian Piquemal, 75 years-old, hero of the Legion, was arrested for participating in an anti-migrant rally that the Leftist mayor of Calais tried to forbid. He bled for France and this is how its government repays him: by putting him in immediate custody and treating him like a common horse thief.

Meanwhile, Morrocan and Turkish minors should soon be released after gang raping and torturing a French White girl because “All French girls are whores” (sic) and in the Jungle, the Mighty Jungle, English Anarchists from “No Borders” set fire to migrant shacks and accuse the police. No one has been charged so far. France (its ruling elite, at least) spits in the face of its own sons and holds against its own breast the ungrateful snake that will soon bite her.

3. The government is more preoccupied by fighting thought criminals than hardened felons

French police forces are targeting “vigilante groups,” accused without proof in Corsica or in the mainland rather that non-natives committing crimes that are documented. They advertise the capture of members of “hate groups” while they still have to catch one the main perpetrators of the Paris attacks. The recurrent criminals, drug dealers, and gang rapists of foreign origin that proliferate in the large cities’ housing estates carry on their daily activities without worry.

Pauvre France, si tu voyais tes fils…

All the elements of the cultural decline can be observed in the contemporary French society. But it was only until recently, when the whole conspiracy against our movement took place, that I realized the extent of the problem. We are at a crossroads of our history.

I can say with certainty that we are 4th in the race for total cultural decline behind the podium composed of Sweden (1st), Germany (2nd) and The United (for how long?) Kingdom (3rd). If, we, young men of France do not act and start a wave of awakening to change our sleeping nation, the end is near.

Read More: 11 Myths About French Girls

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Husband Is The Head Of The Wife

March 17, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The institution of marriage is in big trouble. About 40% of all marriages in the US end in divorce. The divorce rate would probably be even higher but for the fact that increasing numbers of people are not bothering to get married at all. There are lots of reasons that marriage is dying, but the biggest one is that we have banished the concept of masculine leadership within marriage.

What is male headship?

The headship of the husband in marriage simply means that there are complementary masculine and feminine roles within marriage. The role of the husband is to be a leader. As a leader, he is responsible for determining the family's mission, setting the pace, and keeping up morale. He also has ultimate decision making authority.

You can think of the husband as the king of the realm where the realm is his own family.

It is important to stress that the husband's leadership role within marriage is natural. It is not a cultural construct. The patriarchal leadership of the husband has been apparent in every civilization from the Pagan Greeks and Romans to the Christian societies of the Middle Ages and early 20th century America. It is only after 1960 that we began to see the erosion of this masculine ideal in Western countries with the rise of feminism.

Our culture rejects the idea of masculine leadership

The equalist narrative really took off in the 1960s.

Of course, bringing back the headship of the husband is easier said than done. Western culture underwent a complete transformation 50 years ago. We went from being a somewhat traditional culture to a radical egalitarian one.

The transformation was due in large part to the influence of feminism. Feminists used the worst abuses of patriarchy to dismantle the entire institution. They talked about women who had endured years of violent beatings or who suffered silently with a philandering husband.

No one wants to see innocent people suffer, so the public responded by making "reforms." No fault divorce was created so that men and women could break up a marriage even if their spouse was not guilty of doing anything wrong. Women were encouraged to remain in the workforce even after they had children as a way of being independent from their husbands. And generations of boys and girls were raised to believe that men and women were equal in every way except for the surface level differences of their sex organs.

These cultural changes have all but extinguished the idea of true masculine leadership in marriage. Thus, if we want to restore the headship of the husband, we have our work cut out for us.

Wrong ideas of masculine leadership

Before we talk about how to bring back the leadership of the husband, we have to understand what it is not.

The leadership of a husband is not like that of a manager in a modern corporation. The corporate manager rules by the carrot and stick approach. If you work 80 hours per week, he can reward you with a 1% raise. If you accidentally outshine him, he can fire you. This corporate model is completely foreign to marriage.

Another mistaken model is the straw man created by feminists. According to this model, patriarchal leadership is like a tyrant bossing around a slave. While feminists have convinced young women that masculine headship is equivalent to the tyrant-slave model, the truth is that it was never really the norm in the West due to the influence of Christianity. And, as a practical matter, I doubt very many men would be happy with a wife who had no personality of her own.

How does a man exercise his leadership in a feminist world?

If you've ever read management theory, you know that there are two basic types of authority: positional and personal.

Leaders who have positional authority receive submission because of the position they hold. Most corporate management jobs are like this. You obey your manager not because they are great people, but because they have the power to reward or punish you.

On the other hand, personal authority comes because the individual has a track record of excellence. They have demonstrated repeatedly through their actions that they are people who are worthy of being followed. We follow these people because they deserve it, even if they don’t have any positional authority over us.

By definition, a husband has positional authority to be the leader in his marriage. In the past when husband and wife subscribed to a traditional point of view, this may have been enough for the husband to exercise his masculine leadership in the marriage.

But if you try to pull rank on your wife in the modern day, it will have the exact opposite effect of what you intended. Women today are trained to reject their husband’s positional authority by default.

The only way to make your headship operative in your marriage is to develop personal authority.

How I became a leader in my marriage

My own marriage had a rough beginning. The trouble started during the wedding planning. My wife’s family shelled out the money for the wedding, but they provided my fiancée with no help in planning the wedding. When she asked me for help, I just shrugged my shoulders. After all, I thought, that was the woman’s job.

During our first year together, I acted like a spoiled brat. My wife was finishing up school and working so she was pulling late nights studying and waking up early. Rather than supporting her, I resented and complained about her schedule.

After about a year of this, we finally had a big argument where I realized that I had burned through all the goodwill I had generated during our courtship. Unless I did something quickly, we were headed for a divorce.

Trying to assert positional authority at that point would have only made the situation worse. Instead, I set out to rebuild my personal authority.

- I stopped complaining.
- I forced myself to be cheerful in all circumstances.
- I got involved in approving my wife's decisions. Being a leader means that you are responsible for everything. You can delegate, but you are still ultimately responsible.
- Finally, I developed a vision for where I wanted our family to go, and I gradually got my wife to buy into that mission.

In other words, the only way husbands can be leaders in their marriage, is to behave like leaders.

My marriage didn't change over night. It took several months of consistent living on my part before my wife began to believe that I was serious in fulfilling my role as husband. But it was well worth the effort. I found that when I exercised my role as a husband, my wife settled into her feminine role—naturally.

—

A good marriage is one of the most satisfying things in life. Unfortunately, our culture is making traditional marriage something more and more difficult to achieve—and it is happening by design.

That's why I wrote my first book, Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. In the book, I discuss in detail what our cultural elites are planning for the institution of marriage. I also share practical advice that every couple needs to be aware of, including:

- How to cheat proof your marriage.
- Preventing divorce.
- Avoiding common money traps.
- Inoculating your marriage from the negative influence of the culture.
- Masculine leadership.
- Making your faith operative in your marriage.

I also dedicated two chapters to men who are not married yet. The first provides what you should look for in a potential spouse. The second gives some things that you can do to maximize your chances of attracting the right person.

Finally, I am offering a contest where you can win a $100 Amazon gift card. Click here to learn more about the book and the contest.

Read More: The Woman Who Posted Her Husband's 'Sex Spreadsheet' Online Did Men Everywhere A Favour

Michael Sebastian

Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why The 1990s Were The Last Sane Period In America

March 18, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Recently, while on vacation to Latin America, I spent the final evening with my girl in the room watching the Anthony Hopkins film Silence of The Lambs, which tells a captivating story of a serial killer, a naïve young female FBI recruit, and an incarcerated genius serial killer who she enlists in helping solve the case. This was such a memorable movie from my youth, that despite so much time passing, I could remember certain scenes vividly, and even several minor characters.

The Silence of the Lambs

What I had forgotten is how the serial killer that the protagonist is trying to catch, Buffalo Bill, is portrayed as a transvestite, to show the audience how sick, twisted, and terrifying he was. Thomas Harris, the author, based his novel on real events, and spent time studying serial killers with criminal profilers and the FBI through the 1970s. The Buffalo Bill character was based on a composite of 3 serial killers, Ed Gein, Ted Bundy, and Gary Heidnik. Ed Gein was a killer in the 1950s who made objects out of dead human bodies, and created a “woman suit” out of skin. There is a scene, primarily to scare and disturb the audience, where Buffalo Bill puts on makeup and a nipple ring while dancing to eerie music.

Serial Killer Buffalo Bill, mentally ill transvestite

The inclusion of transvestite behavior was made specifically to convey that this was a sick individual, and the audience understood this as a clear sign of mental illness (a sharp contrast to today, where the same behavior is seen as “brave and stunning”). Incidentally, I can’t help but notice the irony in the film’s title—if it wasn’t for the silence of the masses in the wake of all the social justice changes, would we be where we were today? The vast majority of people from 20 years ago saw trannys as mentally ill—a minority of SJWs has changed mass opinion on the issue.

Turning Point

Did someone order a sammich?

The film was made during a pivotal period, and there was a good bit of social justice programming evident. The FBI trained the actors and crew for months, and allowed shooting on their Quantico, VA campus, because they were interested in getting more women to join the bureau, and saw the film as a good marketing device. The director, Jonathan Demme, stated, “This is about one woman, trying to save the life of another woman, and having to confront the dreaded patriarchy, in this patriarchal world, and the worst of the male gender is going to be put in Clarice’s way.”

Indeed, I remember a scene where the young, naïve Agent Starling, played by Jodi Foster, is sent to a funeral to coordinate with the local police. The local guys do not take her seriously at all. So some broad goes to school for four years and now she’s supposed to know more about policing than us? I can’t even imagine the scene taking place today, because the premise of an all male space is so fictional in 2016. It is often said that art imitates life. The director was simply portraying the changing times we were in, and things were about to be turned upside down.

The transvestite scene reminds me of an old episode of the BBC sci-fi series Dr. Who. I remember watching an episode that began with a British Bobby (policeman) creeping down the street. He pulled out a handgun, and ominous music started playing. It didn’t make any sense to me, but at that time regular patrolmen didn’t carry handguns, and so the sight of a policeman with a gun was a clear indication to the audience that this was not a real cop, but instead the bad guy—a criminal, or imposter.

However, fast forward to 2016, and everyone commonly accepts a militarized police force as normal and typical. As we have accepted black-uniformed military police, we also accept trannies as not just normal, but courageous and valuable members of society.

Armed combat troops, 1950? or Necessary equipment to ensure no one is speeding in 2016

Historical Female Marriage Age was 20-22

Another big change first visible in the 1990s was a fundamental change in the institution of marriage. I recently heard a story on NPR (Single By Choice: Why Fewer American Women Are Married Than Ever Before) in which the interviewee complains that women do more domestic chores than men, and explains why women are postponing marriage into their late 20s or 30s. According to the story, only 20% of Americans 18-29 are married as opposed to 60% in 1960. That's right. One third as many twenty-somethings are married today as compared to the Baby Boomer generation.

For as long as the Census Bureau has been recording marriage data in the USA, the average age for a first marriage for women was between 20 and 22. However, in 1990, for the first time the marriage age broke out of this range. The average age for marriages has steadily climbed every decade since, and is now estimated at over 27 years. Remember, as recently as 1980, marriage ages were still within the historical range of 20-22.

Avg Age at First Marriage, 1890-2010 (USA)

As sociologists noted, marriage ages were stable at 20-22 for over a hundred years, and this was a significant change with huge ramifications. Just for comparison, a 6 year decrease would mean average marriage ages suddenly plummeted to 15. Indeed, historically women often married in their early teen or preteen years, and this is outside of the scope of this article, but just imagine how different society would be if the average age of marriage today was 15 for women?

The 90s Dark Triad: The Pill, Abortion, And No Fault Divorce

What happened to affect this change? Well a few things. Beginning in 1960, the birth control pill was approved for use in the US. Fast forward 20 years later, when girls born in 1960 were reaching historical marriage age, and many of them chose to delay marriage and ride the cock carousel, courtesy of this new pill that could hide their promiscuity from their friends, family, and other men. Indeed, we see a sharp increase in the marriage age in 1980, which further accelerates over the next decade.

In 1969, California's Family Law Act was signed into law by Governor Ronald Reagan. The first no-fault divorce law in the nation, it helped usher in a period of skyrocketing divorce rates and general promiscuity. Women could now leave their husbands “because feelings” and could even be financially rewarded for their infidelity, especially if they had children with the man.

Finally, in 1973, abortion became fully legal with the Roe v Wade ruling. Now, I have no personal objection to birth control, in an ideal, patriarchal society. I believe life begins at birth, not gestation, and am not on a crusade to save the fetal tissue of strangers. However, the results of having unfettered access to birth control have contributed, in large part, to the crazy sexual dynamic we have today, and in this lens can be seen as a failure.

Sexual promiscuity has also impaired the female ability to pair bond with their mates skyrocketing starting in, you guessed it, the 1990s. Jay Teachman released a scientific study on Premarital Sex, Premarital Cohabitation, and the Risk of Subsequent. Marital Dissolution Among Women, providing scientific evidence of a correlation between the number of sexual partners a woman has and her ability to successfully pair bond with her mate. Teachman concludes:

> Women who cohabit prior to marriage or who have premarital sex have an increased likelihood of marital disruption. The most salient finding from this analysis is that women whose intimate premarital relationships are limited to their husbands—either premarital sex alone or premarital cohabitation—do not experience an increased risk of divorce. It is only women who have more than one intimate premarital relationship who have an elevated risk of marital disruption.

Teachman further concludes that the number of partners is the major factor to consider. The risk for marrying a non-virgin is extremely dangerous; marrying a woman with more than four sexual partners is playing Russian Roulette. Keep in mind this study was performed in 1995, and as this article shows, the 90s were an era of relative stability and cohesiveness as compared to today. I shudder to think of what a similar survey today would show.

Implications

While many men may say “Fine, I don’t care about marriage anyway” and I would agree—I am perfectly happy being a bachelor, with more time, money, and freedom than any of my married friends, but this is not a recipe for a stable society. Without stable families, the next generation will be far more corrupt than we can even imagine, and will be raised by the government educators. Currently over 40% of all children are born out of wedlock in America, and if one looks only at millennials, bastard births are the norm. Men must acknowledge that we face an uphill battle to restore a sane family structure and sexual relations.

There are fundamental barriers put in place for men today that are difficult to control. The groundwork was laid in the 1960s and 1970s to change society and sexual relations in America. By 1990, the changes were in motion, and it is very difficult to reverse the trend. Much as a woman’s beauty peaks at or before age 20, men must accept that American women peaked in the 1960s, and are currently declining.

While men can find foreign women, who are more feminine and traditional, once must realize that if a man attempts to raise a family in the toxic American society, the culture, laws, and social norms are unavoidable. While I encourage all men to do whatever they can to thwart degeneracy, political correctness, and feminism, we must pick our battles. The graph on marriage ages depicts a rapid and significant change that will be extremely difficult to slow, much less reverse.

Realize that the deck is stacked against you. The law, your church, your job, and even your friends, are not looking out for your best interests. Men must find like minded individuals with whom we can forge new friendships and built a better future. And the reaction from feminists to this will be harsh and brutal.

Read More: The Decimation of Western Women is Complete

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Australian Government Funds Degenerates Who Come To America To Steal Donald Trump Signs

March 18, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Student members of Australia's socialist Labor Party have been caught out deliberately breaking US electoral laws, working on Bernie Sanders' campaign as compensated "volunteers" despite not being American citizens. The young SJWs were being subsidized by Australian taxpayers at the time, which constitutes a clear misuse of public funds in their own country. The numerous confessions were recorded by conservative group Project Veritas Action.

Instead of using the substantial amount of money given to them for the intended purpose, an exchange program, at least some of the students were also involved in the tampering, vandalizing and apparent destruction of Donald Trump signs and other materials.

> Australian Labor Party volunteers sent to the U.S. to work on Bernie Sanders' presidential campaign have been secretly filmed stealing Donald Trump and Hilary Clinton hoardings.
>
> Project Veritas Action, a conservative movement website who use undercover journalists to source stories, posted the video of four Australian volunteers bragging about using Australian taxpayer funds for flights, accommodation and daily expenses while working on Democratic senator Bernie Sanders' presidential campaign.
>
> Former Australian National University Labor Club president Ben Kremer features in the 14 minute video – scrambling in the darkness of night, trying to remove Republican candidate Donald Trump's campaign signs from private property.

Again, these actions are criminal offenses, particularly as the removal of signs involved trespassing onto private property.

SJWs will break laws and brag about it because reasons

Rather than being the work of naive, inexperienced idealists, those involved in this fraud are veterans of student leftwing politics, often at the very highest level. One of them is Ben Kremer, former President of the Australian National University Labor Club. Here he is pictured with the current leader of the Labor Party, the alternative Prime Minister Bill Shorten:

Another is Rebecca Doyle, President of Young Labor in Western Australia, Australia's fourth most populous state:

The removal of signs, defrauding of Australian taxpayers, and breaking of US electoral laws may appear far removed from incidents such as violence against Trump supporters in Chicago. However, they need to all be seen in a wider context. When leftists are faced with a candidate they fear most of all, a fire-breathing, no-nonsense figure in the mould of Donald Trump, they believe they can suspend all manner of legal codes and expectations of civility to fundamentally undermine democracy itself.

“But I hate him!” is the sum of what SJWs and other retrograde political categories have to offer in justifying their decisions to either engage in violence and threats of violence against Trump’s willing voters or try to sabotage his campaign in the vein of a Ben Kremer or Rebecca Doyle.

American democracy is under threat, from within and without

“We don’t like you so violence.”

Over the years, Congress has erected many laws designed to keep elections fair and determined by the American people. The nature of a national election is that it for the citizens of that nation, not outside parties like Ben Kremer and Rebecca Doyle. This by no means condones the sort of violent actions we saw in Chicago by American citizens who hate Trump, but it does throw into stark relief pressure from the rest of the world to cut down Trump. Privileged, childish SJW students from Australia are just the tip of the iceberg.

A significant proportion of the general public in places like the United Kingdom have already grotesquely decided that Trump is somehow Hitler. In Britain, this petulant mentality descended into hundreds of thousands of special snowflakes demanding the politically incorrect figure be banned from its shores. Meanwhile, dozens of dictators and hundreds of actually dangerous people are free to enter the UK basically as they wish.

The sensationalization of Trump into cheap 1984-style Two Minute Hate rip-offs will accelerate in the coming months. What is unclear is how many of his supporters will be caught in the cross-fire, either maimed or killed because of the innate intolerance of incontrovertibly anti-democratic SJWs.

Expect far more criminality and violence as Trump edges closer to the nomination… and the Presidency

SJWs and their media enablers used outright slander and threats of serious violence to attack Return of Kings' proposed meet-ups, just as they have done for months with Trump and his supporters.

A month and a half ago, Roosh and hundreds of you were threatened with real violence for daring to meet as men to discuss life and self-improvement. Only weeks later thousands of Trump supporters, not to mention Donald Trump himself, were also threatened with real violence for meeting peacefully and publicly in furtherance of the democratic process. The battle lines have been clearly set by SJWs: "Your rights to freedom of speech, assembly, and association simply do not exist relative to ours." If you challenge the narrative, your job, your psychological security, and your personhood are liable to be taken or put in danger.

In between the overt cases of intimidation and "stop your campaign or we will physically attack you," subterfuge of the Ben Kremer and Rebecca Doyle variety will abound. Instantaneous political expediency trumps both morality and legality for SJWs. The difficulty is that violence in particular is incredibly effective. Those able to contribute the most to Trump and his attempts to renew America, such as middle-aged professionals with kids, are exactly the kinds of people who need to be most responsive to threats of violence in order to protect their families.

Nevertheless, calculated violence is a sign that Trump and the truth he represents chills SJWs to their bones. Every coddled, privileged position they take for granted is currently under siege due to his galvanizing of Middle America, "the silent majority." Even many of those who will vote for the inevitable Democratic nominee, Hillary Clinton, share a number of Trump's ideas about where America is heading and where it should be heading instead.

Unfortunately for SJWs, violence or the threatening of it is not going to stop Donald Trump's march to the Republican nomination and White House.

Read More: Did The Anti-Donald Trump Riot In Chicago Help Trump Cruise To Victory On Tuesday?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Pious Aeneas And A Passiontide Reflection On Impiety

March 18, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

We'll take break from philosophy for a while, since the times have now brought us to the holiest days of the Christian year. I want to offer a two week reflection on impiety, which I regard as the defining vice of modernity.

Amongst the many things I would like to write for ROK, two topics that often occupy my attention are the topics of sexual license, and the seeming cooperation of Catholicism with certain crucial injustices of our day. It is fair to say that, in my online dealings with people, the two criticisms I most often receive are: 1) you should not be writing for a site that promotes promiscuity like ROK; 2) Catholicism is a traitor to European heritage and masculinity, and is now suitable only for third-world women and invalids. The topic of this reflection is closely related to both criticisms.

What initially drew me to ROK, was the marvel of a group of men acknowledging feminism was a lie, and, consequently, rejecting many of the broader, liberal premises that support that lie. Because there is so much disinformation flooding the world in support of the lie, the man disentangling himself from it is in a precarious position. I have come from the ubiquitous, feminist pan-liberalism, myself; through contact with the founts of Western civilization, I came into the heart of patriarchy—the ancient faith, reactionary politics, traditional morality and gender roles, etc. Therefore, I reckon I may have some views which may be helpful or profitable to others traveling the same road. I do not delude myself into thinking that all men will agree with me; but, just as I have learned much from men who disagree with me, I'm happy to throw what I know and believe out there for others to ponder.

As I prayed my office today, the virtue of “piety” made prominent appearance. Today’s orison at Vespers, in fact, was the paradigm, from which my patron saint’s orison was adapted: “Be nigh unto our supplications, Almighty God; and to those, whom Thou givest the pledge of Thy piety (which it behooves us confidently to await), kindly also grant the final product of Thy wonted loving-kindness.”

The Latin of the prayer is masterful; I’ve tried to tease out some of the subtleties with my translation, but it does not do justice to it. The orison at the hours, prayed that the faithful whom God had drawn to acts of devotion, would also receive from Him a “pious hearing.” The antiphons of Lauds and Vespers, like book-ends on the day, also provided relevant reflections, which, combined with reflections upon themes proper to the liturgical season, the modernist crisis and the migrant crisis, had piety and impiety much on my mind.

What is “piety?” What does it mean, to be “pious?” Most of us hear the term, and think of a fastidious little priss putting on religious airs. But in fact, piety is an eminently manly virtue, entrusted especially to the safekeeping of men. St. Thomas Aquinas defines piety as the honor we pay by bounden duty as a debt to our roots and our kin. God, the origin of all, is in the first place (and hence piety is often closely connected to the virtue of religion); after Him, are our parents, kin and country. He quotes Tully’s definition (“it is by piety that we do our duty towards kin and allies of our country, and render them faithful service”), which is hardly different from Cicero’s concept (“they name that virtue ‘piety,’ which admonishes us to fulfill our bounden duty to our fatherland, our parents, or others conjoined to us by blood”).

Now that I have learned more about our civilization’s history and heritage, what does “piety” bring to my mind? I think primarily of two things: first, the popes of modern times named Pius, who resisted the modernist crisis; second, I think of “Pious Aeneas,” the hero of the Trojan people, whose story is told by Virgil in The Aeneid. In The Iliad, he is shown as a man so famous for piety, that the Greeks and even hostile gods spare him from the general destruction of Troy. In the Aeneid, when all seems lost during the siege of Troy and he had resolved to die with his family, fighting the invaders, two divine portents dissuade them and show a path of escape. Aeneas lifts his father, Anchises, upon his shoulders, takes the Trojan Lares and Penates, and, accompanied by his wife, his son Ascanius and a small band of followers, escapes the siege of Troy. Eventually, he will make his way to Latium and become the progenitor of the Roman people, an ancestor of Romulus and Remus. The Julians (i.e., the family of Julius and Augustus Caesar) traced their lineage back to Ascanaius and Aeneas.

Aeneas was thus often upheld as a model of piety, “pius Aeneas;” he is indeed the image of piety, carrying the gods and his aged father, and leading his family and countrymen to safety. Like Lot, he is one of the last pious and upright men, spared the divinely-decreed destruction of his civilization, that had grown decadent in the divine judgment.

Beholding Aeneas thus, piety and religion stand forth as particularly masculine qualities: the duty of loyal affection to God, kin and country. Indeed, reflection will show that only men can really safeguard these public virtues, because they require the greater male intellect, strength, emotional discipline and judgment for their effective implementation and defense in society. Women are called to practice these virtues as well, but for the above-stated reason their effective social application and defense is primarily the work of men. History also shows us that women will follow men on these points; when man have done their duty and fostered these virtues in society, women may often seem to surpass us in their daily practice; but when men fail, we find that the women who looked like our betters in times of civic virtue, are far more depraved than us in times of decadence. Indeed, abandoning maternal and pious instincts, the women will grow emotionally addicted to sexual degradation; they will murder their own children en masse as a point of pride; they will campaign for hordes of foreign rapists to be admitted across the borders. A must-see video:

Why do I say that our age is typified by the specific vice of impiety? Yes, obviously, we fail to honor God, the Church, the state, our parents and our kin. But our society does not just err in these ways; it has essentially established itself upon impiety as its only principle. When we look at the rebellion (the left, the revolution, howsoever you call it), what consistent principles does it have? The same feminist who will say “my body my choice,” is willing to ban you from drinking 32oz sodas. The same pervert who believes in denying a platform to people they disagree with, will actually force that same person to provide the catering for their own, controversial platforms. After a bit of reflection, I nearly concluded that the only two, consistent principles of the left, are 1) sexual “liberty” and 2) suspicion of any definite concept, let alone any definite truth. But then I realized that, while they are in favour of any kind of sexual degeneracy, and love to decry the “bigotry” of all dogmatism, they attack the only sound sexual act as a product of hateful, socially constructed heteronormativity, and they are quite clear and definite on the concept that tradition is to be opposed.

And that is when I realized that their real, sole, consistent principle, is contra-natural discrimination—i.e., in every place where reason and nature would draw definite distinctions and make a just discrimination in one direction or another, they are in favor of blurring matters and making an exactly contrary discrimination. This is a plainly satanic activity, and I find it to be one of the greatest vindicators of the truthfulness of the faith which it opposes. And it is not an accident, that it manifests chiefly in sexual depravity and the egalitarian, “anti-discriminatory” approach. By this two-pronged assault, the rebellion attacks man in his very origins, and abolishes anything with which he could positively identify, apart from the rebellion itself.

In other words, the principle of the rebellion is impiety—rejecting and dishonoring the very concept of God, the family, and an authentic nation with an authentic culture, to which we may feel a special sense of belonging. Bereft of any sense of his roots and without any sense of belonging, man grasps about in vain for some substantive platform or weapon of resistance. Because impiety is our organizing principle, a fog of diabolical delusion continually occludes piety, the necessary virtue, from us.

In my next article, I will discuss how the Passion of the Christ was the most sublime act of piety that could ever be, brought about (in part) by the most acute acts of impiety that could ever be. I will discuss how the impiety of our times parallels this, in the modern Passion of the Church.

Read More: The 5 Most Perfect Prayers Of The Christian Tradition

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Two Major Media Outlets That Defamed ROK As "Pro-Rape" Are Laying Off Hundreds Of Journalists

March 19, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Only weeks after slandering Roosh and those who had planned to attend the ROK meet-ups, Fairfax Media and Guardian Media Group have announced plans to cut 120 and 250 jobs, respectively. The latter business is also considering compulsory layoffs for the first time in its history, under a very pessimistic three year plan to finally break even.

In February, Fairfax's Sydney Morning Herald was the first mainstream newspaper to go for Roosh and ROK's jugular, using outright fabrications and the sloppiest of research. Its sister newspaper in Melbourne, The Age, published the same initial articles as well. Phoebe Moloney, whose "work" inspired a group of SJWs to publicly plan a knife attack against ROK supporters in Sydney, slandered Roosh and ROK readers by claiming they all supported the legalization of rape.

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/710557389012000769

Very quickly, Fairfax's newspapers were joined in the reporting of lies by some 1,600 other publications, including The Guardian. At no point did any of the journalists writing these anti-ROK stories bother to seriously report the avalanche of threats their pieces helped to whip up against Roosh and ROK readers.

The central dilemma faced by the very bloated Fairfax Media and Guardian Media Group is that their championing of elite and politically correct viewpoints is not matched by reader numbers and the dollar signs they are meant to bring. For example, Fairfax requires paid subscriptions after a certain number of articles have been viewed online and The Guardian implores its readers to become, in order of cost, "Supporters," "Partners," and "Patrons." If enough people were taking up these subscription/donation options, employment at these media concerns would be steady. Additionally, advertisers have become far less enthused about spending tens of thousands of dollars or more for every portion of a printed page or an online banner. Even if we assume that physical newspapers are on the decline, why are jobs being hemorrhaged.

Fairfax journalists have gone on strike and are waiting for the money trees to save them

Stupidity personified.

Irrespective of the evidence showing Fairfax's leftist business model has destroyed any chance of stability, let alone growth, hundreds of Fairfax Media staff stupidly went on strike when the job cutting plans became known. One can only hope that many of the business and financial journalists, whose greater objectivity makes them comparatively blameless for Fairfax's woes, have tried to convince the political writers that industrial action will only make the paper go officially broke much faster.

Guardian Media Group employees have been less vocal so far, yet I am sure behind the scenes they are behaving similarly to the Fairfax employees in their denial about the distinct lack of value they give in the marketplace. The blind stubbornness of these men and women over many years, refusing to see the writing on the wall, will now severely damage the lives of their partners and children. Even those not sacked after the decision this month will be at risk for the inevitable next round of terminations, not to mention suffer from reductions in their workloads before that time.

> The Guardian called me and my supporters "sad men." Then 250 of them lost their jobs. Haha! pic.twitter.com/DSYMBHZL44

> — Roosh (@rooshv) March 17, 2016

The CNN Effect

Regardless of how many views her own articles get (and the count is not as high as you think), Jessica Valenti's presence within the Guardian Media Group turns away readers interested in genuine, even-handed news commentary. This is one reason why the paper is always losing money.

The announcement that two anachronistic news conglomerates are significant downsizing should not come as a surprise. Not only is print media struggling in the digital age, the senior staff of many leftist-inclined outlets have continually overestimated the number of people who agree with their political views and are therefore willing to subscribe or buy the products of advertisers. Frauds like rape culture and male privilege simply do not sell to the public at large. Many readers, myself included for a long time, would use these publications to get the gist of news events, always unconsciously screening out the obvious bias in reporting.

This brings me to the "CNN Effect," the phenomenon where a nominally left-of-center news outlet is bombarded by comments that excoriate the progressive agenda of reporters otherwise pretending to be neutral. Guardian columnist Jessica Valenti is a particularly salient example of this dissonance between journalists and their readers. With comment sections filled with criticisms of Valenti's toxic diatribes, far too many disillusioned readers were bringing the site zero revenue, refusing to either enter into subscriptions or take advertiser bait. The paper's overall image suffered more and more, too, with many realizing that other articles by other writers would be biased as well, even if less starkly than Valenti's pieces.

Once again, the volume of leftwing newspaper readers is loud, but the total number of people behind the noise-making is unimpressive and not enough to save most outlets. This is despite the completely privileged political space within which leftists can and do operate, from journalism itself to many of its subject areas, such as Hollywood. If the senior executives and editors for The Sydney Morning Herald, The Guardian and other mastheads were good businessmen, and not ideologues masquerading as truth-tellers, they would have tapped into the needs of disenfranchised, non-SJW potential readers a long time ago.

Karma's a bitch

Agreed, Nelson.

Journalists from Fairfax Media and Guardian Media Group watched with glee as ROK readers were exposed not just to the risk of violence but the guarantee of it if our meet-ups went ahead. In the end, these pseudo-professionals got what they wanted, the canceling of our events. It did not matter how it was achieved, the outcome was all that mattered.

We feel no sympathy for any of these newsmen and women likely to lose their jobs. Those who did not write the pieces trying to incite violence against us were still aware of their newspapers' bent and would have eventually participated in crafting dubious, politically-motivated stories about topics other than ROK. So good riddance, ladies and gentlemen.

> Me to a room full of cucked reporters: "Half of you will be out of a job in 5 years." https://t.co/SINnr1wJlD 5 years? Try 5 weeks!
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) March 17, 2016

On a final note, this whole saga with Fairfax Media and Guardian Media Group shows the laziness and reptilian nature of non-journalist SJWs. If they had wanted to, leftists could have made a point of supporting these newspapers in more financially meaningful ways. They did not. The job cuts were going to happen anyway, but SJWs did not ever concern themselves with putting up a fight to save their beloved mouthpieces.

In so many ways, the tears we are drinking just got saltier.

Read More: Major Supermarket Bans The Sale Of Men's Magazine After "Rape Culture" Petition

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Why Ivy League College Liberals Hate Poor People

March 19, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Why are affluent, college-educated people leftists? Many people have realized that one prominent aspect of the leftist agenda is the intentional destruction of the family. The foot soldiers for this agenda are college students. The traits that characterize young people are perfectly suited for these purposes: media savvy, sociable, and outspoken. The reason college students are leftists is because they want to ensure the working class never breaks free from their chains. In short, college students hate poor people and want them to stay poor.

There are three ingredients in the strategy of the affluent to keep their boot on the necks of the poor: social liberalism, social signaling, and maintaining the structure of the system.

Social Leftism And Class Warfare

In one of my classes at Yale, the professor took an anonymous informal survey of the class. He asked the students in my class three questions:

1. How many of you grew up in a traditional nuclear family?
2. How many of you have parents who have remained married, with no divorce?
3. How many had at least one parent stay home to care for you before you started school?

The total percentage for each question ranged from 90-95%. Yet if you asked these same students about their thoughts on single motherhood, women in the workplace, or divorce, they would be firmly in support of all of these issues. None of them questioned whether the reason they had stable childhoods, attend a top tier college, and come from families making more than double the average annual income ($120,000 per year compared to the average of $52,000) is because their families followed traditional social norms.

Why is it that affluent students are pushing ideas like avoiding marriage or promoting single-parenthood, which are obviously bad for individuals and families? The reason is because they hate poor people, at least subconsciously. These individuals have enjoyed all of the benefits of the traditional family and conservative values, while promoting an ideology that is destructive and promotes the destabilization of families in lower social classes.

Social liberalism is a method to hoard wealth and maintain the upper-hand. Liberal college students bask in the upsides of stability, while pushing instability for others so they will never climb the socioeconomic ladder. It is a subtle and ingenious method, because they get to feel good about themselves for being “open” and “accepting” all while enjoying the fruits of a value system they claim is oppressive.

The Average Liberal College Student

3 valued items for the college liberal: MacBook, Canada Goose jacket, and social media

In a recent article in Harvard's student newspaper, the author describes a common zoo animal seen at many elite colleges—The Privileged Liberal:

> You'll oftentimes find Harvard's Privileged Liberal studying in a coffee shop (Starbucks, no less) sipping on a pricey macchiato. As they flip through the pages of their assigned readings, a notification pops up on their iPhone: Social Justice Club meets in 10 minutes. They get up and walk towards the door, their designer boots clicking loudly on the floor. As they exit the coffee shop they pass by a homeless man, slumped over on his side as he shivers in the New England cold; they pay no attention, wearing their brand new Canada Goose jacket (retailing at about $600 a pop)—it provides only enough warmth for one. They arrive to their meeting just on time, and as they sit down and pop open their shiny Macbook Pro, they share Bernie Sanders's latest speech on Facebook as he attacks the 'billionaire class.'

This is as accurate a description of the average college liberal as I have ever seen. If you ask one of these students how to best help the poor, they will undoubtedly give you answers ranging from "free education," "access to healthcare," and "increase the minimum wage." All of these answers generally have one theme in common: more government.

This is entirely by design. The more power individuals hand to the government, the more the poor rely on those in power for their livelihood, the less likely they will be able to climb out of poverty and reach the same positions that the Privileged Liberal is on track to attain.

These students have been conditioned to never under any circumstances reflect on their own privileged upbringing and wonder whether a traditional family structure is beneficial for people other than themselves. These students did not come from a background of government handouts, out-of-wedlock marriages, and divorced households. But if you asked them how to address the problems of poverty, they will say that the government isn't doing enough to help them. Students will never question whether more government might actually perpetuate the problem.

College Students Care More About Social Signaling Than Solving Problems

Common career paths of compassionate Yale students

As you read the description of the Privileged Liberal, you may have smiled at the hypocrisy of a student who rails against the “billionaire class” while wearing a $700 jacket and typing on a $2000 luxury device built by slave labor.

This is another aspect of college leftism that indicates their disgust for the poor. They wear overpriced clothing and purchase electronics made by child labor without a second thought. Yet they jump at the chance to put a Bernie sticker on their MacBook or post a 400-word screed on the evils of capitalism on Facebook. Why wear a Bernie pin on their jacket rather than forego the jacket and donate the money to charity?

The reason is social status. Individually, wearing a Bernie pin or sporting a Canada Goose jacket will provide some measure of status, but combined they send a powerful signal: “I am a member of two tribes: The well-off group that can afford an expensive jacket, and the compassionate liberal group who wants to help the poor.”

Another method they have recently been using to signal their social class is to ensure that everyone around them knows they hate Donald Trump. Even among conservatives the only candidate they have openly supported is Marco Rubio. This is because he is non-threatening, young, and Hispanic.

Trump has been an icon for the working class, and so all elitist college students, whether liberal or conservative must show their dislike for him. Tucker Carlson wrote a piece in Politico on this very subject: “If Trump is leading a populist movement, many of his Republican critics have joined an elitist one. Deriding Trump is an act of class solidarity, visible evidence of refinement and proof that you live nowhere near a Wal-Mart.”

Even for conservative college students, insulting Trump is a form of cheap and easy social signaling that says, “Though I am a conservative, I’m still a member of the upper-class. I’m not one of them.”

Educated Classes Suppress The Poor For Their Own Benefit

College students are conscious of their hatred of the poor and desire to suppress the lower classes. However, one question that is raised is where their disdain for marginalized groups originated. The answer is the system. Power wants to perpetuate itself. But in the last 10 years our society has swerved into egalitarianism.

It is no longer cool to blame people for their own problems and so the powers-that-be have constructed a plan to allow affluent college students to do their bidding. They enjoy the perks of their social class while promoting values that appear to be compassionate and tolerant, yet are destructive. This method aims to prevent any sort of change within the system by perpetuating the social ills that have sustained it thus far.

Two heroes of American college students are Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren. These two politicians have gained enormous influence among leftists for their opinions on class divides. Quotes from Warren which students love to parrot are, “The deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top,” and “The system is rigged.” And from Sanders, “The reality is that for the past 40 years, Wall Street and the billionaire class has rigged the rules to redistribute wealth and income to the wealthiest and most powerful people of this country.”

Voices of reason: “The system is rigged, so stay out of our way.”

This philosophy can be boiled down to, “You’re never going to win, so don’t bother playing.” Yet if you look at the outcomes of students at elite colleges, they tend to do quite well. Essentially they are telling the poor to stay out of the job market so the poor never climb high enough to become social class competitors.

In sum, college-educated leftists promote socially liberal values to destabilize families, wear badges of capitalism in the form of clothing and gadgets to signal their social class, and repeatedly pursue new strategies to suppress the working class in order to maintain the rigid social structure that benefits them. The central goal of affluent liberals is to deprive the working class of their desires, and ultimately erase their opinions altogether.

Read More: The Real Reason Minimum Wage Must Be Raised To $15 An Hour

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

Should Men Be Allowed To Have An Abortion?

March 20, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The youth wing of the Swedish Liberal Party has proposed that men should have the right to "legal abortion." The idea is that the father could give up his parental rights and responsibilities of the child, up to the 18th week of the pregnancy. That's the same time that women in Sweden have to decide if they want an abortion.

But feminists are not happy. They want men to take responsibility for their own children. They still think it's fine for women to have abortions, though.

The Young Turks like it

Marcus Nilsen.

"The motion came from a group of girls and LUF Väst (the youth wing) endorses the proposal. It is important to discuss the man's role in pregnancies," says chairman Marcus Nilsen, who thinks that some men don't dare to say that they don't want to be involved when their partner becomes pregnant.

A man who went through a “legal abortion” wouldn’t have the right to see his child in the future, neither would he be able to reverse the decision. But he would also be relieved of any financial responsibility to support the kid. This controversial proposal is not backed by the Liberals’ mother party.

News of the male abortion proponents has spread worldwide, and even The Young Turks made a video about it. Both Cenk Uygur and Ana Kasparian agrees that it’s a good idea to let the man have a choice. Cenk, a firm supporter of abortion, says “People have to own up to their decisions, right? Yes, they have to own up to the original act that led to the kid in the first place. But then you do have a decision to make at 18 weeks or whichever, you know, time period you want to put it at.”

Resistance from feminists

“Oh hell no.”

But others aren’t so happy about this. One woman at an Australian news site finds it “utterly ridiculous” to compare a woman’s physical abortion to a man signing a legal document. If men could get pregnant, that would be one thing. “But sadly, at present only women can carry a baby.”

> A female abortion (aka a ‘real, actual abortion’) isn’t a legal decision. A pregnant woman who doesn’t wish to be pregnant can’t just make her pregnancy disappear by signing a form. She must find a doctor, have tests, and undertake a medical procedure.

A woman from a different Swedish liberal party says legal abortion for men is not acceptable. According to her, it would break the rules of the UNs convention on children’s rights—that a child has the right to know who his or her parents are and to see them regularly. She also thinks men have an obligation to take care of their children.

> All men (or those with male genitals) who have intercourse with a woman (or > someone with a womb) are fully aware of the of the possibility of pregnancy.

>
> No contraceptive is 100 percent safe, and if you do not want to become a parent, you have a choice not to have intercourse leading to ejaculation in the vagina.

A feminist at the leftist site Politism of course doesn't like this idea either. A woman getting an abortion and a man renouncing the responsibility of his child are two TOTALLY different things, according to her.

> But what the right to have an abortion is really about is the right to decide over your own body—to decide whether it will carry out a pregnancy or carry out an abortion. That right obviously belongs to that person—and only that person—whose body it concerns. Men who become pregnant have the exact same right.

I love it because feminists hate it

There's a part of me that really wants men to have the right to a kind of legal abortion. It would give men the same right as women have to not become a parent at a time when it's not convenient. I'm certain that some men out there are very unhappy about having to take care of kids they never wished for.

Another reason why I like this proposal is that feminists hate it so much. They can't stand it when men talk about men's issues and demand to have the same opportunities as women. Their hypocrisy is blatant when they tell men to bite the bullet and "take responsibility," while also fervently insisting that women should be able to opt out of their pregnancy at any time. It's an example of how men are treated as adults, expected to make sacrifices. Women, on the other hand, are treated as victimized children with no agency of their own.

Having said that, I still don't think men should have the option of legal abortion. It would be hypocritical of me to think otherwise, as I'm against physical abortion as well. I believe that the little creature in the womb is a life and that it deserves protection and care from both of its parents. If you don't want that kind of responsibility on your shoulders, be sure to use proper protection.

I ultimately find myself on the same side as that Australian woman mentioned earlier, although I disagree with many things she says. She thinks a woman can't just sign a form and then have her pregnancy terminated. But that's exactly what it's like in Sweden. We have abortion on demand and doctors aren't allowed to question why a woman wants that procedure done. A woman can kill her unborn child, no questions asked, and about 35,000 kids die that way every year. The father has no say in it.

> What matters is that every single child born into the world has the right to financial, social and emotional support. And if the parents are financially, socially and emotionally capable of providing that support—no matter what the circumstances of the child's birth—they should be required to do so.

The Australian woman is right about that. Parents have an obligation to care for their children. That goes for both fathers and mothers.

Read More: Why Abortion Shouldn't Be Taken Lightly

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

How To Improve Your Sex Life With Kegel Exercises

March 20, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

If there is anything that I have learned from my forays into physical culture and life in general, it's that any weakness, be it mental or physical, can be trained and overcome, and with eventual success is likely to come repeated success. This even extends to your sex life.

Some Background Information

"How the hell can I train to improve my sex life, Larsen?" you might be asking yourself in disbelief. There are, in fact, many ways of doing it—ranging from developing your skills in foreplay to learning new positions. You might even give the fingertip push-ups a try to develop hand strength and endurance for…various reasons.

But rather than those, this article discusses a specific method of muscular training that will specifically aid your sex life, which I already know is a goal of yours. Because it's a goal of any man who's honest with himself, even if he ostensibly has no sexual issues-because who doesn't want better sex? Nobody, that's who.

The muscles that will be trained are the pubococyggeus muscles, a sling of muscles that runs from the groin, across the perineum, and up towards the anus.

Through a special group of exercises, known as pelvic floor exercises or Kegel exercises (After Dr. Arnold Kegel, their discoverer), both men and women can become capable of consciously flexing their pelvic floor muscles, and this provides a variety of physiological and sexual benefits.

The Benefits

For men, the main benefit (at least in my experience) is increasing sexual stamina and potency. Some men claim that they can flex themselves into a full erection, and report more intense orgasms, but unlike the increased stamina, I have never experienced these.

For those men who don't last very long in the sack, kegels just might be the ticket to improved sexual performance for you, and increased sexual satisfaction for her. To be blunt (to the point of being profane), the simplest way to make a woman orgasm is to give her a hard and fast rogering until you receive some sign of completion (if you need me to explain what these signs are, peruse the site some more and practice the techniques it describes). However, most men don't have the physical capacity to last this long, which is why, if the woman is to climax at all, other methods are typically used. Kegels have given me that capacity (though I admit there is always room for improvement), and judging from their reactions, I think I'm doing an alright job.

I realize that some other articles on this website state that men shouldn't concern themselves with sexual stamina, and I also realize that in saying this I may lose my "cred" with the keyboard alpha males in the crowd, but I actually do concern myself with making the women I sleep with orgasm for two very important reasons.

One is the raw sense of satisfaction I get—emotionally, it feels pretty damn good to have a woman screaming your name, invoking the name of God to praise your sexual prowess, and telling you how you make all of her exes look like complete chodes in comparison (yeah, I need to hear people tell me how good I am on occasion. Sue me). The second is… shall we say, economical: when you've given her a screaming orgasm once, she's going to come crawling back for more, and not going out prowling for girls saves you time and effort which you can instead use to do literally anything you want.

“Crawling back for more”, taken literally

As mentioned before, women are also capable of doing these exercises. Unlike men, they regularly report having easier, more frequent, and more intense orgasms from this training. In addition, these exercises also provide them with greater muscular control over their nether regions. And, speaking from experience, that muscular control can be used to tremendous effect.

How To Train

So, having prattled on for about 400 words on why you should do these exercises, I suppose I should now explain how they’re done.

The first step is to “find” the Pubococcygeus Muscle. Many people who first try to do these exercises—such as myself in high school—will end up flexing their sphincter, their abdomen, or other muscles in the area. Obviously, this does nothing to benefit the PC muscle, and will not help you sexually.

The PC muscles are those used when the flow of urine is suddenly halted. The next time you take a leak, suddenly halt the flow, feel the sensation and note where you feel it. The most common mistake made is people flexing their stomach muscles and not the pelvic floor muscles—to fix this, place a hand on your stomach as you flex the PC muscles. If you feel your abdomen flexing, you’re doing it wrong.

A Basic Routine

My routine is as follows:

1. Hold it for as long as you can with proper “form”—just flex and hold. Start with five or 10 seconds, and build up gradually to a minute and more.

2. Clench, hold for a period of time, release, and repeat. Start with five second “reps” and maybe three sets. Increase the held time and “sets” as you get stronger

3. Rapid clench-and-release. Start with a set of 10, and gradually increase.

This routine can literally be done anywhere-driving in the car, while sitting on the computer, anywhere that you’re alone. For obvious reasons, I’d avoid doing this in public, though people will usually not be able to tell. Wherever the place, increased sexual potency is at your fingertips.

Read More: 3 Ab Exercises Every Man Must Know

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

20 Signs You're A Slave To Modern Technology

March 21, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Do you ever stop and wonder whether you're being controlled by a force beyond yourself? Does the world ever feel empty, unreal, and mad all at the same time? Maybe these thoughts don't even occur to you as you're already consumed by all the technological innovations that were supposedly made to help us. In any case, here are twenty signs that you might be a slave to modern technology.

1. You're more interested in recording the moment than living in it

Not a slave.

Are people even experiencing life anymore? It seems everyone today is more interested in showing off what they've seen and where they've been than they are in actually relishing in those moments. Today's social media is making people take "Pics or didn't happen" attitude quite literally.

2. You often lose track of your time on the internet

How often do you snap out of staring at your favorite screen only to realize that you just spent several hours online? You had better things to do, but you just wasted your time on brainless Youtube videos and dumb clickbait articles. You promise yourself not to do it again, but… Oh! You need to check THIS out!

3. You feel anxious without digital connection

Do you constantly check for emails, messages, updates, and news frequently even when there aren't any? People today are such junkies with their smartphones that nomophobia is a real thing.

4. You spend more time in front of a screen than in real life

Average Americans spend more than 7 hours a day staring at screens. And you know things are getting bad when you start to feel that the real world is too boring in comparison. Even myself, who prefers being in nature and enjoys doing physical activities, need to spend exorbitant amount of time working on my laptop.

5. You don’t get enough sunlight

People around the world are suffering from Vitamin D deficiency due to lack of sunlight, and technology is not making things any better. Is it any wonder that the folks who are constantly plugged in don’t seem to have any vitality left in them?

6. You have difficulty falling asleep

The same people who deprive themselves of natural light during the day love to bombard their eyes with artificial light at night time when they need to sleep. Doing this will really screw up your sleep cycle by disrupting the melatonin production in your brain.

7. You walk or drive with a phone in your hand

I don’t know how many times people almost bumped into me because they were too busy staring at their phones while walking. I also find it outrageous that many people rationalize their texting and driving habits by claiming that they’re smart (i.e. entitled) enough to do it safely.

8. You believe that brain games actually make you smarter

I’m sure this will be very useful in real life.

I always thought all these “brain training” games people play on their phones were dumb and pointless. Recent studies have proven my suspicion.

9. Your social skills are poor due to lack of human contact

I was a shy and awkward teenager growing up as I had spent almost all my free time on television, internet, and video games instead of socializing. It took me almost a decade of painful struggle just to catch up and be somewhat average with my social skills.

Many millennials today are bunch of bumbling wrecks who are shallow and clueless. I’ve even met few teenagers who were afraid to pick up a ringing phone because they were too used to receiving texts instead.

10. You prefer porn and virtual girlfriend to a real woman

Would bang… by pressing the button repeatedly.

Internet porn has already plagued and ruined men all over the world, but did you know that there are now "virtual girlfriends"? They're already popular in Japan and the West will probably see a similar rise of prevalence of these AI chicks with the continuing dysfunctional sex relations in our societies. Many men are likely to turn into total sex slaves to machines once the sexbots come into being.

11. You obsess over the latest gadgets

You spend several hours checking out the specs of the latest consumer devices, obsessing over every minute details like how the new version of the product is 0.8mm thinner than the previous model or how it has more pixels than you could ever detect with your eyes. You line up to buy the next cutting-edge phone because your current one is already 11 months old. And once you've dished out your cash to own your prize, you debate with the idiots with rival phones and sneer at them because your toy makes you superior to them.

Yeah, that'll show those losers.

12. You find yourself being dragged into the technological cult

"Join us! You'll be happy and beautiful just like us. We promise!"

I've been wanting to get rid of my low-end smartphone for a while now so that I can downgrade to a flip phone and simplify my life. That, however, has proven difficult as the people where I live use a popular third-party app for almost all personal and work-related communications. I've virtually been forced to remain in the clutch of my smartphone even though I don't want it anymore.

It's already nearly impossible to live without credit cards and emails. How much longer before the same becomes true for smartphones and RFID's?

13. Your posture and health has degraded

Technology has ushered us modern humans to a sedentary lifestyle that is having a devastating effect on our health. Forward neck posture is epidemic in today's world where people are constantly leaning forward to stare into a screen. And this is just from using modern electronic devices. Don't even get me started with processed foods, genetically-modified foods, chemical toxins, hormones, etc. present in everything that we consume.

14. Your cognition has declined

Have you noticed that you feel bored more easily, and have difficulty concentrating and remembering things? Back in the day, people used to memorize entire tales and epic poems; today, many young people struggle to remember their own phone numbers.

Also, people can't seem to read anything longer than few hundred words anymore as it automatically leads to the "TL;DR" response.

15. You think multitasking makes you smarter and more productive

No, it doesn’t. If anything, your productivity suffers while your brain becomes worse.

16. You frequently buy things cashless and look forward to the mobile payment system

Cashless society is not a good thing.

17. You let yourself be dictated by a machine

Is the technology you're using guiding you or commanding you? The line seems to be getting blurrier everyday, but not too many people care because they are addicted to convenience that they provide.

18. You have no concern for your privacy

Don't worry, it's for your own safety.

Never in history has governments and corporations been able to amass as much information about us as they do now. Today's world of information collection and surveillance is a Stasi wet dream come-true.

Even though the chance of dying from a terrorist attack is less than getting struck by a lightening, the people have bowed down to the government's fear-mongering campaign and have willfully given up all notion of privacy. Your every movement, online search, purchase, and communication are being recorded and stored now. The real winner of the War on Terrorism is Big Brother.

19. Your government has better toys than you

Now, it just needs a mini-gun, facial recognition technology, and database from Facebook to hunt down anyone with higher testosterone than Caitlyn Jenner.

While us peasants are barely able to arm ourselves with basic weapons like knives and guns—if at all—our governments possess all sorts of advanced weaponry to control us. And with the coming robotic technology, it seems our overlords won't even need other men to stamp our faces with a boot—forever.

20. You think technology is all fine and dandy

Humanity will be subjugated not by guns and prisons, but with electronic screens and entertainment.

Even with the above points, there will be many people who openly and blindly accept all technological innovations as a good thing. They will claim that you just need to "moderate" your use and everything will be fine. But who decides what's moderate? How do you quantify it? How do you remain moderate in a world that is becoming increasingly dependent on technology? Moderate use today would have been considered excessive just a century ago.

There are many more problems regarding technology, but I will conclude by saying that the issue isn't a simple black-and-white one to generalize it as being either good or bad. And I'm certainly not suggesting that we abandon all technology and go back to the primal times (at least not yet). What we must do, however, is be more aware of the effects that technology is having on our daily lives lest we end up like frogs being slowly boiled in a pot. You don't want to wake up one day only to find yourselves consumed by technology with no way to escape.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why Able Men Should Cheer Every Job Eliminated By Technology

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

What Will Be Gawker's Next Move After Being Ordered To Pay Hulk Hogan $115 Million?

March 21, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

As everyone knows, a Florida jury recently ruled in favor of retired wrestler Hulk Hogan in his invasion of privacy suit against Gawker Media. The verdict (involving a $115 million dollar award) was a devastating defeat for Gawker, which had long been known for its aggressive, caustic approach to celebrity news.

The damage did not just extend to Gawker Media, the corporation. The jury actually found Gawker founder and owner Nick Denton, as well as the site's former editor Albert Daulerio, should be held personally liable for the damage. What happened? And what will be Gawker's next moves?

The case involved Gawker's publication of a 9-second excerpt of Hogan having sexual intercourse. According to Hogan, neither he nor the woman involved had been contacted by Gawker prior to the publication of the video. Gawker tried to paint the case as a "free speech" issue, and claimed that Hogan had put himself sufficiently in the public domain for the video to be fair game for news.

From the outset, it was clear that Gawker did not have a strong set of facts. Hindsight is always perfect, of course, especially when one is arm-chair quarterbacking someone else's case. But even making allowances for this, it seems odd that Gawker would have allowed this case to go to trial, and not instead try to settle it with the plaintiff, Hulk Hogan.

I do not know if the parties tried to settle the case before trial, but it is common practice for attorneys to do so. I can only assume that settlement was explored, but nothing came of it. Perhaps the parties were too far apart on what they each wanted, and what they expected.

Gawker's attorneys had a very difficult task in this case. Juries do not like to hear stories about tabloid websites publishing intimate details of people's lives. And it is clear that Gawker's claim that Hogan had "put himself" in the public domain fell flat with the jury. Just because someone may be a public figure, Hogan's legal team argued, does not mean that they give up all right to have a private life. Hogan was evidently able to make the point that Gawker's motivation had everything to do with page views and revenue, and very little to do with free speech.

Gawker's next moves on the legal chessboard will be interesting to watch. They have already made it clear that they will appeal the verdict, and expect to have it overturned on appeal. Denton said in a recent statement, "Given key evidence and the most important witness were both improperly withheld from this jury, we all knew the appeals court will need to resolve the case."

Gawker Media is the "parent" company of several other companies. According to Gawker's Wikipedia page, these subsidiary websites include Gawker.com, Deadspin, Lifehacker, Gizmodo, Kotaku, Jalopnik, and Jezebel. The company is apparently based in New York City, and incorporated in the Cayman Islands.

One strategy that Gawker might pursue while its appeal is pending would be to file for bankruptcy protection. This would almost certainly be a Chapter 11 case (reorganization) rather than a Chapter 7 liquidation. A Chapter 11 filing would put an automatic stay in place, and give the company time to sort out the appeal process, keep the creditors at bay, and possibly buy some time to explore some sort of settlement of the verdict with Hogan.

But things can get complicated here very quickly, and a number of variables remain unknown. Remember that Nick Denton himself was found personally liable for the judgment, as well as his company. He would also, presumably, have to file his own personal bankruptcy case.

If Gawker and Denton lose their appeal, they would almost certainly have to file. Even if they win their appeal, they might still have to file, as the outflow of corporate revenue might make continuation of their businesses nearly impossible. Adding to the complexity of things is that Hogan himself could possibly force Gawker into bankruptcy by filing an involuntary bankruptcy petition against the company.

Involuntary bankruptcy cases are rare, but do happen. Hogan would have to meet the statutory requirements for such a filing (he would basically have to find several other creditors to join him, among other things). But even if Denton and Gawker try to checkmate Hogan with a bankruptcy filing, he can make countermoves of his own. Certain types of debts are not dischargeable (i.e., cannot be wiped out) in bankruptcy. One of those types of debts are those incurred through “willful and malicious injury” under 11 U.S.C. §523(a)(6).

Assuming, then, that Gawker or Denton filed a bankruptcy case, Hogan could counter with his own filing of an adversary proceeding within the bankruptcy case. He could claim that Gawker’s (and Denton’s) debt to him should not be discharged since it was incurred as a result of a “willful and malicious injury.”

The analysis here can be complex, depending on the case law of the jurisdiction where the bankruptcy were filed. For the sake of simplicity here, let us just note that the determination of what is “willful and malicious” by bankruptcy courts focuses on the infliction of an intentional tort on another party. And since Gawker has already been found liable for invasion of privacy (an intentional tort), it would be facing an uphill battle to try to have its debt to Hogan wiped out.

It is clear that both Gawker and Denton are facing some serious challenges. If they do not win their appeal, their best option would seem to be a Chapter 11 filing, followed by a very focused negotiation session with Hogan. Their best negotiation position might simply be blunt honesty.

They might say to Hogan: “We’re insolvent. You know it, and we know it. There is no way we can pay you $115 million. But if you can take less as a settlement, you will at least get something, rather than nothing. Vote for our reorganization plan, accept a settlement, and let us pay you in a way that enables you to get some compensation.”

It sounds logical, perhaps, to us as we sit on the sidelines. But when emotions are inflamed, it is difficult to make predictions as to what will happen. No one knows if Hogan is going to be much in a negotiating mood after all he has been put through. On the other hand, he might accept a lesser amount, and be satisfied with having made his point.

At this point, it is too early to tell.

Read More: The 7 Deadly Sins Of Manhood

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

British Socialist Politician Says Eating Disorders Are Caused By Female Narcissism

March 21, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Baroness Joan Bakewell has excoriated young women, including teenagers, for their narcissism, which she claims is the root cause of eating disorders. Bakewell, who sits as a life peer in the British House of Lords, is a Labour Party stalwart, one of the people you would least expect to come out with these kinds of comments. Now in her eighties, a lifetime of experience and the knowledge that she has probably few years left on Earth has allowed her to speak the truth.

Naturally, online and other abuse was hurled at the Baroness for her common sense approach. The elderly woman has apologized this week, clearly a bid to stem the wave of unacceptable harassment she received. Although this treatment would have been undoubtedly worse if we were dealing with Baron Bakewell, what was meted out to her is an indication of the savage vitriol even octogenarians will be hit by if they dare to speak publicly in a way SJWs do not like.

That eating disorders are a sign of narcissism should not be a surprise to anyone who reads Return Of Kings. Worse still, this narcissism is by no means limited to cases involving anorexia, bulimia, or something similar. Entire relationships, like that of caught-out gold-digger Nina Paunova and her long-suffering boyfriend Sam Scott, are oftentimes defined and wrecked by the vanity and petulant demands of the female.

A particularly astute point of Bakewell's that critics are having a hard time countering is the lack of anorexia in places like Syria or Africa. Unlike narcissism in the form of materialism, you do not need an abundance of food to be anorexic. Instead, eating disorders, with few exceptions, are a sign of women finding "liberation" and exercising self-direction by starving themselves and spending hours in front of mirrors. Incidentally, despite some evidence that there were anorexics and bulimics in previous decades, the decline of patriarchal conceptions of society has coincided with a massive growth in eating disorders. Why is that?

Here’s why feminists and others do not want eating disorders to be seen as narcissistic

The feminist pseudo-concepts of the patriarchal policing of women’s body types and slut-shaming are quickly destroyed when reference is made to female sexual competition and female-on-female shaming.

Notions of patriarchy as defined by feminists depend on women being forced into damaging behaviors. That whole narrative is blown out of the water when women obsessed with their bodies are perceived as having control or choice in what they do, especially when a female socialist politician like Baroness Bakewell affirms it. Even some or many feminists acknowledge Kim Kardashian is self-absorbed and vain, but, no, women who reduce themselves to just skin and bones cannot be narcissistic.

An entire political industry has developed from self-appointed women who are paid large sums of money to falsely attack society for supposedly steamrolling women into hating themselves. One of those in Britain, Natasha Devon, who was obliterated on television by Milo Yiannopoulos, became a “body advocate” at the same time her modeling career was disintegrating because younger, prettier girls were emerging.

Feminists are desperate to hide the facts about women and body image issues. For instance, science has chronicled how women dress to compete with one another. Indirectly, yes, they are competing for the best male suitors (and more proximately, attention from men). Yet this has precious little to do with so-called patriarchy and everything to do with biology and female-on-female social wrestling. Women are fundamentally forcing each other into more and more audacious displays of flesh in the right places and dolled-up faces.

Likewise, fellow females attack women for being sluts just as much, if not more than men do. The catalyst for the two major forms of female self-hatred, body insecurities and sexual shaming, is therefore on the backs of women themselves. Because, as I indicated earlier, the expansion of female choice has dovetailed completely with the proliferation of eating disorders, feminists need to shut down debates over these expressions of narcissism as quickly as possible. They have no arguments, so even elderly women need to be silenced with harassment.

When female choice results in awful consequences, feminists need someone to blame

Look what the patriarchy did!

The pernicious consequences of certain forms of female choice refers to social forces, not just personal ones. Nonetheless, they are female-related and have nothing to do with men or the invisible patriarchy. I have never met, nor have you probably, a man attracted to an anorexic or bulimic who looks like an anorexic. As a result, the 11, 12 or 13-year-old who first starts to obsess over her body does so because of wider female behaviors she learns and her own desire to look the prettiest amongst her friends.

Whether you call the influence of feminism a case of sexual deregulation or a violation of the natural order, it is categorically obvious that the female emancipation feminists desire has been accompanied by spiraling rates of both starvation-related eating disorders and, on the other end, morbid obesity. Women are not happy and feminism is to blame, so the automatic feminist response is to point fingers at the patriarchy political correctness has already dismantled.

In spite of her forced apology, Return Of Kings applauds and stands with the brave comments of Baroness Bakewell.

Read More: Publisher Response To The "Eating Disorders" Article

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 More Reasons I No Longer Date Black Women

March 22, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

When I wrote the prequel to this column a little over a year ago I predictably received my share of "fan mail" from angry sistas and their army of sexless simps. I was called a sellout, race traitor, and every other typical insult they could think of.

Being the ball busting bastard I am, I've decided to add another installment. This one will be a little different in that I'll address some of the ringing endorsements I received from the so-called "black community" at large for my blasphemy.

5. They are not submissive

This one is a sub-category of their lack of femininity I touched on in the first article. The bottom line here is that they refuse to cater to their men (or maybe they just don't know how) and get extremely huffy when there's a hint of authority in your voice when giving them instructions.

A quick example: In my fledgling stages of implementing red pill game, I was on my way to pick up this chick I'd been seeing for a couple weeks. I called her up and said "Get dressed, I'm on my way."

She responded by saying "Tch….you ain't got to tell me like that. I'll get dressed when I want to." I was a little surprised at her response (remember, I was still a tadpole level player) but the more of them I dated the more of a pattern this seemed to become.

[image]
'Strong black women' don't respond well to authoritative men

For whatever reason black women take exception to being told what to do. It's as though it triggers an involuntary rebellious response that tells them to push back regardless of the circumstances. According to a couple of my buddies, this is one of the leading reasons fights start with them in the first place.

4. They “value” black men because we’re their only option

Coming to the realization she’ll attract very few men outside her race

Men with options aren’t about to be some woman’s backup plan. Black women are always complaining about black men on something or another. Among the most popular is “Black men don’t value us like we value them.”

Hypergamy knows no color or race. If white men, the men highest on the totem pole in terms of SMV, were to show more interest in black women, sisters would jump ship in a New York minute. All women aim to consolidate on the highest value male they can find, skin tone be damned.

Athlone McGinnis did a piece a while back on why black women love the TV show Scandal. The show’s main character, Olivia Pope, is a black woman who is a crisis management expert, specifically in the field of politics. She begins a torrid affair with the President, who is white, despite the fact that a high value black man, Edison Davis, is all but throwing himself at her.

[image]
Red pill aware black men don’t hate on stuff like this. We understand the game.

This comes as no surprise to the unplugged as we have a good working knowledge of a woman’s imperative. The truth is, if the President of that show were black and Edison white, Olivia would still be fucking the President. Women are attracted to the highest status males they have access to, regardless of race, and Pope is no exception.

Professional athletes like DeMarco Murray, Robert Griffin III, and Tiger Woods catch heat from black women for marrying or dating white women (or a woman who isn’t black). But where’s all their anger and outrage over celebrities like Stacey Dash, Halle Berry, or Zoe Saldana for marrying outside their race?

Where’s all the outrage?

It doesn’t exist because they understand that snagging the highest value male is part of the game. Unfortunately they don’t seem to want to acknowledge the pendulum swings both ways. At this point it’s safe to say that as far as black females are concerned, black men are a static “Plan B.”

3. They don’t give head

Ahhh, the elephant in the room. It’s common knowledge that when it comes to the task of a woman getting on her knees, black girls seem to be allergic to fellatio. Even in my beta days when I was fucking them left and right, I can only remember a few of them giving me head and that’s probably an overstatement.

Women know giving up the booty is easy. But a blowjob is the most submissive thing a she can do for a man. Being a “strong and independent black woman” doesn’t allow her relinquish that power to a man.

I’m fairly certain that if word got out that they’ve started following in the footsteps of their Hispanic, Asian, Indian, and :::gasp::: Caucasian sisters and started using their mouths to pleasure men, they’d probably start getting more attention for this reason alone.

Don’t get me wrong—I’m sure there are men out there who don’t mind not getting head from their women. But I’m not one of them, nor will I ever be.

2. They don’t know their place

Thanks to ridiculous television shows and Tyler Perry movies, black women seem to think they, not their men or husbands, should be the head of household. They honestly believe they should handle all the finances and make all the important decisions. If challenged, they retaliate with a loud rebuttal that is nothing short of condescending.

No need to wonder where his headache is coming from

A good friend of mine back east is a retired cop (I mentioned him around the mid point of this article) whose best friend and lifelong partner on the force is black. There was never a shortage of stories he'd tell us about his friend's wife getting all up in arms when Harrison, his partner, made even the smallest purchase without her consent.

Obviously Harrison had neither the game, nor the respect to quell his wife's behavior. But no matter how much game a man has, it's a constant uphill battle dealing with a woman who believes it is her birthright to be in charge. Men with options simply aren't going to deal with women who are bossy bitches. Period.

1. Their expectations are WAY too high

This dude better be rich or he's gettin' no play

The movie Something New coined a new acronym that quickly permeated the mindset of black females everywhere: I.B.M. or Ideal Black Man.

Basically, an "IBM" is tall, great looking, makes six figures, drives a luxury vehicle, lives in a penthouse in the city, and has washboard abs to boot. To be fair, most Western females have these expectations, but black women act more entitled to this mythical man than any other race.

It amazes me how women who act mannish, don't know their roles as women, and don't suck dick are the most outraged they don't have dozens of Morris Chestnuts beating down their doors.

"Fan Mail"

I'm pretty sure there are a few black women reading this who are snarling at their screens right as well as a few black men pretending to be outraged (brothers, stop lying to yourselves….this is all true and you know it), just like there were after I posted the first installment.

To get your creative juices going and continue the "debate" (because surely attraction can be negotiated right?) I've decided to address the typical mud slinging that happens with columns like these:

"You hate yourself!"

Typical projection play. Black women hate themselves because they're not preferred by the vast majority of men (and who can blame them) so they use the straw man "self hate" argument to deflect their pain.

They simply want to make themselves feel better about to fact that the men who used to want to fuck them are finding greener pastures with other breeds of female by telling us we 'hate' ourselves. Any man getting regular sex from females who aren't masculine a live for going down on him is far from hating himself. I speak from personal experience.

"You can't handle a strong black woman!"

Putting up with a bossy, mannish woman who wakes up with an attitude problem is something I don't tolerate with any woman. You want to show me strength? Embrace true femininity, and then channel it. I'll manhandle you all you want.

"How can you bad mouth black women when you were raised by one?"

Easy. As a man I have the ability to separate the truth from emotional and familial ties. Just because my mother is black doesn't oblige me to ignore their flaws, worship or wife them up.

"The white girls regular black guys date are always fat and ugly!"

Yeah… keep telling yourselves that.

"Well as a black woman I would NEVER be with a man like you!"

Yes you would and you know it. But don't worry, your secret's safe with me.

"You're a disgrace to the black community! Race traitor! Sellout!"

No matter what black women say, or how many "educated" sisters write great sounding rebuttals to this article, or how many exceptions to the rule they point out, they cannot deny that in 2016 most black men would rather date women who aren't black. They see and hear proof of this unshakable truth each and every day and it burns them up that it's staring them right in the face. I can't say I blame 'em for being pissed off about it.

Conclusion

This isn't a preference of race or skin tone. It's a preference for fit, beautiful, feminine women. Make no mistake about the fact that I'd beat the brakes off both Megan Good or Kerry Washington (the actress who plays Olivia Pope) if my status were high enough to bag either one of them, but I wouldn't bang Amy Schumer or Melissa McCarthy. See how that works?

Paula Patton can get some too

If black women would stop watching Tyler Perry movies, reading Steve Harvey books, and feeling sorry for themselves for being born at a disadvantage in terms of male preference and actually do something about it, they'd be a lot happier.

As a black man, I know I'm not going to have as many opportunities as white guys but I didn't sit around and cry about it. I hit the gym, learned game, and stacked my paper. That has proven to be a better option than bitching and whining about what girls should be attracted to. Sisters would do well to do the same, but I'm not holding my breath.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why I No Longer Date Black Women

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

You're Either A Globalist Or A Nationalist

March 22, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The charade of the left-right political spectrum is being fully revealed as American and European "conservative" politicians and media pundits continue to be outed as sellouts who serve liberal interests above conservative interests. In the political arena, left versus right is an artificial theater constructed to trick the public that opposing forces are battling it out or compromising for the good of the nation. In reality, both sides are controlled by the same group of elites.

Should you vote for this puppet or that puppet?

If you voted for a Democrat slate, thinking the Democrats were looking out for you, or if you voted a Republican slate, thinking that Republicans were looking out for you, you were tricked. You voted for the same puppet masters who stand behind both parties and ensure that their globalist and collectivist vision of the world is achieved. Their aims are to maximize their power and wealth while satisfying whatever sinister agenda they may have in the name of “world order,” which includes depopulation.

Even though my views have become more traditionally conservative over the years, I never saw Republicans as the party that represented them. How could I when they support homosexual marriage, feminism, and even open-borders immigration? On the big issues—the ones that determine the fate of a country—the Democrats and Republicans match almost exactly. This is because they are sponsored by corporations and billionaires with similar agendas and cravings for globalization, hedging their bets between the sponsored candidate in blue or the sponsored candidate in red. Every US Presidential election has had sponsored candidates on both sides, meaning that to those with real power, it barely matters who wins.

Establishment candidates believe in the globalist platform:

- Open-borders
- Consumerism
- Feminism and matriarchy
- Multiculturalism, diversity, and egalitarianism
- Paganism or atheism
- Global solutions for local problems
- Empire building
- Centralization
- Collectivization
- Unarmed populace

All the while, we are not allowed to select a candidate with a nationalist platform:

- Closed borders
- Protectionism
- Patriarchy
- Homogeneous population and closed borders
- Monotheism
- Local solutions for local problems
- War as self-defense
- Decentralization
- Individual rights
- Armed populace

Let them eat blue or red cake

It's very possible to put a conservative and liberal in the room but have them completely agree on multiculturalism, immigration, democracy, and transgenderism, though disagree on more hot-button topics like abortion and gun rights. They can agree at least half of the time because they both share a primarily globalist belief system, even when they may see each other as enemies. On the other hand, if you get a globalist and nationalist in the same room, they will disagree on more than 80% of issues, even including the basics such as the proper system of government.

While mainstream liberals tend to lean globalist, and mainstream conservatives tend to lean nationalist, the dividing line between them is becoming more narrow as nationalist views are prevented from being properly discussed in the public sphere. Soon, it will be impossible to tell liberals and "conservatives" apart. The only true dividing line left is globalism versus nationalism, especially since nationalism has not yet been co-opted by the elite, and is seen by them as the only real threat that could sever their heads.

I'm firmly in the nationalist camp, even though I am a man of mixed race who does not have an ancestral nation he can call home (I'm half Persian and half Armenian). If you're wondering how the product of the Immigration And Nationality Act of 1965 can become nationalist, I'll tell you: globalism greatly harms heterosexual native-born men such as myself. Before I even knew what globalism was, I empirically identified all of its tentacles and how they greatly inhibit a man's masculinity, life purpose, and pursuit of happiness. Therefore I firmly believe that a heterosexual man who is a minority, like myself, will fare better in a nationalist country than in a globalist one, where he will definitely be swept up by degenerate winds that either make him a social justice zombie or get him persecuted for merely behaving as a man.

My nearly three years of living in a mostly nationalist country, Poland, confirmed to me that nationalism is the most natural state for man. I saw firsthand how a country that leans towards globalism becomes a more toxic environment for men and women, encouraging them to effectively destroy themselves for short-term pleasure and material gain. Nationalism, not to be confused with ultra-nationalism, promotes a more meaningful human existence by using morality, virtue, and genetic identity as building blocks for society, and so therefore serves as a more compatible operating system for human beings.

The mainstream media never threatens the ruling agenda

The American media will go off on left versus right controversies all day long, and make a big show of various battles between them, because the open discussion of these issues do not harm globalist platforms. Once you understand that conservative outlets like Fox News and National Review are globalist, not nationalist, you can realize how an entire belief system has been concealed from you. Whenever a nationalist idea is shared in the media, there is a quick and vicious condemnation of it as “far right,” “extreme right,” or “radical right.” Anything that is not labeled these three terms is a safe idea that does not harm globalist concerns.

When I mentioned late last year that the narrative is collapsing, I was referring to the globalist narrative. The only belief system that can fill that vacuum is nationalism, and the question that remains is how fascist the new nationalism will become. Neomasculinity, a model of patriarchy that is compatible with nationalism (if not outright essential for its success), is a vehicle that can serve men of various backgrounds, as long as minority men such as myself understand that they must follow the rules of any homogeneous population they find themselves in. I did that in Poland and can continue to do that in the future, because I know that if you believe in masculinity and the traditional ideas that are compatible with a life of meaning, nationalism is a better outcome for you that the globalist nightmare that many Western men find themselves trapped in today.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Letter From A Member Of The Global Elite

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Five Second Test For Low Testosterone

March 22, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Henry Tran.

[Editor's Note: Henry paid for the first 100 readers to receive a free gift. Check out his links to learn more.]

Hey man, Henry Tran here. I'm the new trainer on the most subscribed fitness channel on YouTube.

As you know, testosterone is the hormone that literally separates you from a women. It's also the #1 reason why guys can build pure, ripped muscles easier than your female companion.

And high levels of testosterone makes it easier to burn fat more quickly, makes you more attractive to women, builds an "alpha male" physique (which gets you more respect from guys), and the fun part… pumps up your sex life.

That's why I put together this 5 second testosterone test that you can do RIGHT NOW to determine if your test levels are HIGH or LOW.

All you need is a mirror. Ready?

First, take off your shirt and stand in front of the mirror and take a deep, honest look at yourself.

One of the first things you may notice (and a BIG indicator in Low-T levels) is that you may have excessive belly fat around your midsection.

And if you do, accept right now that this extra belly fat is not your fault. If you have low testosterone levels, losing fat around your midsection is nearly impossible, no matter how you little you eat or how much you exercise.

In fact, published studies have shown that low testosterone and belly fat reinforce each other, trapping men in a spiral of weight gain and hormonal imbalances. The next thing I want you to do in this test is examine your jaw-line.

Testosterone has been strongly linked to increased bone density and growth… and this is especially seen on your jawbone, where high test levels will widen your jaw and create those sharp edges.

Which is another reason that women have more feminine features men have more masculine facial traits.

After you determine if you have a strong jawline or not, take a look at your shoulders.

Like I said above, testosterone affects bone growth and maturation. So along with strong facial bones, you will also have either strong or weak (narrow) shoulders if your T-Levels are low.

So, How Did You Score?

Now, don't worry because even if you are suffering from LOW T – I'm going to show you a solution.

One more thing before we get going…

If you are still unsure if you have Low-T or High-T, I've put together a list of signs you need to look out for.

If these are just beginning or already dominant in your life, it's probably not your fault at all. There are several "environmental aggressions" that can cause your testosterone to drop without you even knowing it. And these are things that can hurt you, without you knowing it…

7 Signs That You Have Low T

1) Sexual Decline – Testosterone plays a MAJOR role in how high or low your libido is, so low levels can cause you to have less of a desire to have sex for pleasure. And it can also completely shut down your sexual encounters.

2) Erectile Destruction – Or as I call it, "A Broken Man." When you don't have enough testosterone in your body, your brain can't signal that certain male part to perform.

3) Sperm Challenged – Low test equals less sperm… bottom line.

4 Energy Decrease – So guys who have low T have reported that their energy levels have dropped as well. This can make it extremely difficult to workout… even if you want to.

5) Muscle Deterioration – Testosterone levels determine how much strength and muscle your body has, so low levels means less muscle mass and the potential to lose muscle.

6) Rising Body Fat – This is problematic for a lot of guys because more fat causes you to produce less testosterone, and less testosterone causes you to burn less fat. It is a vicious cycle.

7) Dramatic Mood Changes – Having low testosterone is the MALE equivalent of experiencing menopause for a women. It can mess with your focus, your emotions and even lead to depression.

So if you failed the high testosterone test, or if you have any of the above signs, then you need to make some changes ASAP. However, here is how you can Stop The Low-T Cycle (boost testosterone 24/7).

Low testosterone is a vicious cycle that continues to drop and drop. It starts in your late 20s… roughly dropping 2% each year… which may not seem like much, but by the time you hit your 40s, your T-Levels PLUMMET an additional 40%.

That means by the time you are in your 40s, you have less than half the testosterone production than you did in your 20s.

But as I mentioned before, it's not too late to stop these vicious side effects from messing with your body and your potential to be the best form of a man you can be!

Stop The Dropping Testosterone Cycle…

By taking control of your master male hormone and getting the deep restful sleep your body needs to optimize its hormone production, you'll boost your testosterone 24 hours a day.

- That means 24 hours of fat burning
- 24 hours of getting ripped
- 24 hours of a more pumped up sex life
- 24 hours of women being more attracted to you
- 24 hours of you being more confident and demanding respect
- 24 hours of being an Alpha Male

Take back control of your manhood,

Henry Tran

P.S. Don't forget to claim your free bonus gift (first 100 readers only)

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article
Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Belgium Rocked By Islamic Terrorism In Spite Of Altruistic Assimilation Policies

March 22, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In a chilling nod to the events at the Bataclan in Paris late last year, terrorist attacks have rocked the Belgian and European capital of Brussels. In the early morning, Zaventem airport was assaulted first by two bombs, followed by another at the Maelbeek metro station closer to the city center. At least 30 people are already confirmed dead, most of them at Maelbeek. Another 200 have been injured. ISIS has claimed responsibility.

The devastating developments in Belgium come hot on the heels of that country's capturing of the main suspect in the Paris attacks, Salah Abdeslam. If anything, the deaths at Zaventem and Maelbeek seem to be retaliation for the shoot-out and arrest of Abdeslam, an ISIS operative. They also continue Belgium's strange reputation as a hotbed for producing Islamic extremists. But why, considering how many Muslim immigrants have been welcomed into the country, especially its major cities of Brussels and Antwerp?

Around the time Salah Abdeslam was apprehended, residents in the area of Molenbeek, a heartland for those Muslim migrants who do not wish to assimilate, began throwing objects at police and other emergency responders. In an attempt to keep the fractious Belgian society "together," one which includes an already unstable division between a Dutch-speaking north and French-speaking south, the European and wider media is making little of this appalling display by supposed Belgians of Muslim backgrounds. Nonetheless, the extremists clearly have many supporters in the suburbs.

Many of the November 13 jihadists in France were from Belgium. For a country so small, Belgium has a serious habit of producing individuals who publicly murder in the name of Islam.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3gCIQGR9PQU

Belgian political elites have repeatedly called immigration fears "racist"

To understand much of what happened in Belgium today, we must first understand the nature of Belgium's political structures. The country is essentially cleaved in two, between Flanders, a Dutch-speaking, richer, more immigration conservative north, and Wallonia, a French-speaking, less economically robust, more tolerant south. The capital Brussels, once predominantly Dutch-speaking, is a separate, mostly Francophone city-state surrounded by Flanders. Although elites from both sides of the Flanders-Wallonia border have supported the status quo on immigration, even its expansion, the major anti-immigration parties and their well-organized, vocal supporters are in Flanders.

Like Amsterdam and Rotterdam in the Netherlands, Brussels has become a city of blatant segregation and non-assimilation, a situation imposed by migrant communities themselves. The neighborhood of Molenbeek mentioned earlier is just one of many in places like Brussels where multiculturalism has not only failed, but started to threaten the very fabric of Belgian society. These issues existed before the new migrant hordes began arriving last year. However, the authorities in Belgium have had years to stem the tide and have done nothing.

Gay man and former Prime Minister Elio Di Rupo has a penchant, like many of his colleagues, for saying that those who criticize immigration, especially Islamic immigration, are "ruining" the country.

Former Prime Minister Elio Di Rupo, who is from the less anti-immigrant French area of Wallonia, once said that Bart De Wever, the leader of the New Flemish Alliance (N-VA), was stoking racism and "ruining the country's reputation." De Wever had called for uncompromising assimilation and integration for those who had arrived in Belgium already and much more stringent restrictions on the number of new arrivals allowed to settle. De Wever actually represents the more centrist of the two Flemish antiimmigration parties, Vlaams Belang having a much more hardline platform.

Yes, this is Molenbeek, Brussels, not Syria.

The risks of Belgium's massive immigration problem have been spelled out to political elites for years. They have not listened. The Bataclan terrorist murders and the strong association they had with "Belgian" terrorists should have been the wake-up call for the national government in Brussels. They could not have prevented every planned terrorist attack, sure enough, but they could have read the writing on the wall. If they had done so, they would have undertaken an immediate rearrangement of the country's priorities, demanding the acceptance of Belgian European values and conceptions of citizenship, in addition to turning off the tap of mass immigration.

Thank you, Angela Merkel, for what is coming next

The great priorities of Angela Merkel.

Thanks to the German Chancellor Angela Merkel and her opening of the gates, there are now tens thousands of new young men who have the same convictions as individuals like Salah Abdeslam. Unlike Abdeslam, though, they have none of the longer-term roots in Europe, meaning authorities know nothing about the vast majority of these people.

We must prepare for a wave of new terrorist attacks that blend both existing non-assimilating populations that hate their over-tolerant countries of residence and new arrivals who will soon begin to hate these societies, if they do not already.

As the blood and human remains are being cleaned off the airport floor, the ground of the metro station, and even the clothes and bodies of survivors, cast your thoughts to the individuals who allowed this hatred to percolate in Europe for years. Political elites share as much blame for these deaths as the terrorists themselves.

They saw what was coming. They ignored it. The blood is on their hands.

Read More: France Allows Large Muslim Population, Rewarded With Most Sophisticated Terrorist Attacks Since 9/11

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 Reasons Why You Should Be Worried About The Rapidly Declining American Military

March 23, 2016 | by Gaius Coriolanus | Link | Original Link

On December 3, 2015, Secretary of Defense Ash Carter, acting on orders from the Obama Administration, directed the U.S. military to integrate women in to all combat roles to include infantry and special operations. While this is just the most recent in a long line of poor decisions, it may be the one which finally damages the military beyond repair. It has also raised the question of whether or not women of military age should register with the Selective Service System—"The Draft"—upon turning 18 just as their male counterparts are required by law to do.

The US military has been an all-volunteer force ever since 1973, and most people understand that a return to a draft is highly unlikely. But with 1 in 4 military age Americans now unfit for service, and the social engineers holding the door open for women, immigrants, gays, and transgenders, the United States is fielding the weakest force it its history. But why should that matter? Surely there are enough dedicated professionals left in the military to handle whatever threats are out there? Well, not necessarily. Consider the following:

1. The War On Terrorism Is Far From Over

Let me be clear – Obama cares more about “Climate Change” than he does about ISIS.

It really only took a little over three years before people forgot about 9/11. By the time Obama was elected, any support for seeing the war on terrorism through to its logical conclusion was long gone. Today, Americans simply don’t have the fortitude to care about doing the right thing unless it affects them directly and frequently. This fight will continue for a long time, but it will be inside America, not Iraq or Afghanistan. Attacks and shootings by radical Islamic sympathizers will increase, but not enough to inspire a real call to action; just more speeches from our impotent leaders about diversity, peace, understanding, and tolerance.

In addition to a lack of a coherent mission, talent management in the military is abysmal. Why should an experienced operator or a skilled strategist continue to choke down the daily required sensitivity training and other PC garbage when they can make high six figure salaries in the private sector without constantly being shit on by inept politicians?

2. There Is Little Interest In Preparing For The Next War

Despite budget cuts, the Marine Corps can somehow spare people to compete full-time in Crossfit competitions.

While our near-peer enemies are fielding new advanced weapons and conducting hardcore training, we are cutting the force to levels never before seen while simultaneously wasting effort on social experiments like allowing women in the infantry, recruiting illegal immigrants, and opening the door for transgenders. During his tenure as the “commander in chief,” Obama has purged every hard-line warfighting general who dared to speak up about the even worse threats that are still out there.

The killing of Osama Bin Laden was a great victory for the United States, albeit a mostly symbolic one, but it had one big negative side effect. It essentially solidified the view of the Obama Administration (and the left-wing in general) that a large standing military is an unnecessary burden when victory can be achieved with a small number of drones and special forces.

After 9/11, the United States began to tailor our military for a single type of warfare: counterinsurgency. Although we consider it a "global" war on terrorism, it has unequivocally been the most low-intensity conflict of the last 70 years. The conduct of the war affected perhaps 3% of the U.S. population (service members and their immediate families) and yet by 2005, the American people had enough. This speaks volumes to the character of the American people today. The American people, and by extension, its military, are totally unprepared for the nightmare of a full-scale war against a modern and determined enemy nation.

3. The Warfighting Profession Is Being Killed By Political Correctness

Meet Ash Carter, the SECDEF who singlehandedly let the SJWs win.

Since the "end" of the war on terrorism, the pendulum has swung so far in the other direction that we now pretend terrorism doesn't exist because we don't want to offend Muslims—when terrorism does exist, its right wing, anti-government, conservative, militia related, or Christian in nature. Although political correctness has already been affecting the military for some time, the vast numbers of "social justice warriors" now among the ranks have drastically accelerated the process (see women in combat, recruiting of illegal immigrants, and now transgenders – because gays were just the beginning).

But even discounting all that, the issue of lower standards and softer training is what will cause the most damage. Modern warfare as a profession is accepted in society; we no longer draft soldiers to fight, and rightly so. But just because we are an all-volunteer force does not mean everyone deserves to be welcomed. That simple fact doesn't matter to the feminist professors who believe women are just a capable—or better—than men on the battlefield.

The current crop of military leaders are buying into this nonsense, else they risk their careers. Diversity makes us stronger! Even the Marine Corps, which conducted an extensive study ultimately proving that women consistently underperform compared to their male counterparts, rolled over in the name of equality and political correctness.

4. Real Patriotism Is Dying In America

Meet the new demographic the military is embracing.

A significant number of people who join the military today do not do so out of patriotism, sense of duty, or a love of America. With the war on terrorism all but over, the military is now flooded with college graduates who decided that enlisting was now a “safe” last-resort option after their gender studies degree failed to secure them an acceptable civilian occupation. This influx of overeducated and mostly left-wing children still on their parents’ health insurance has resulted in a force that cares little about fighting and winning wars, but cares a lot about fighting for causes in the name of social justice (see multiculturalism, gender equality, etc).

This is directly tied to the decline in discipline, the rise of political correctness, and the general lethargic attitude about the wars to come. Military-age millennials (those ranging from 18 to 25 years old) are causing irreparable damage to the image and effectiveness of the military. They have been raised to believe that each and every one of them is a special and unique snowflake. Everything must be dialed back to accommodate their fragile sensibilities—and they are quickly becoming the dominant demographic of the “new” military.

Real combat soldiers hate the slogan “bring the troops home” because real combat soldiers want to be out doing their jobs—killing America’s enemies—they don’t enjoy risking their lives, but they understand sacrifice is a necessary part of the warfighting profession. Traditionally, these were the people who made up the strength of the armed forces. Unfortunately, the “new” military is driving away this demographic in great numbers.

5. The Veteran Community Is Used By Politicians

Representative Tulsi Gabbard (D, HI), also a National Guard Officer, recently endorsed Bernie Sanders for president.

This should not come as much of a surprise to anyone; therefore I don't have a lot to add on the subject. The abysmal state of the Department of Veterans Affairs is a disgrace which should never have happened. But instead of massive reforms, we got reassurances that transgendered individuals would have their sex change surgery paid for by the government.

Returning veterans are viewed as terrorists by our own homeland security while actual terrorists (like Nidal Hasan, the Fort Hood shooter or Sayed Farook and Tashfeen Malik, the San Bernardino shooters) get a free pass because not appearing racist is more important. Worst of all, elected officials with military backgrounds will often cite their "military expertise" to push asinine political agendas. Tammy Duckworth, Gary Peters, Tulsi Gabbard, are some of the worst offenders.

Conclusion

I realize that most of these issues are not unique to the military, but are true of most organizations today. Corporate America is filled with political correctness, diversity quotas, bad management, you name it. My point is that of all organizations, the military should be most immune to these things based on the very nature of what the military is and does—fight and win the nation's wars.

Once this is no longer the priority of the military, those dedicated individuals who normally would look beyond politics and focus on defending the American way of life may just decide to call it quits for good—and what they will be replaced with is frightening.

Read More: What You Should Consider Before Joining The Military

Gaius Coriolanus
Gaius is a career soldier with a useless liberal arts degree. He dedicates his time to keeping the military strong and free of left wing politics. Follow him on Twitter

A Connoisseur’s Guide To Modern Rifles

March 23, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

The rifle has evolved for the past few hundred years. In the first part of this article, we covered important technological milestones that were achieved at points in American history, usually wars. In this second part, we will discuss the various action types available today, cartridges and their nomenclature, and modern rifles and their accessories.

Manual Actions

The modern muzzleloader bears a large resemblance to its historical predecessors while having some important differences. Black powder has been largely supplanted by new formulas which are easier to clean, load, and do not leave corrosive fouling. Bullets have been updated with modern sabots to guide them down the barrel, yet not be so hard to load. Lastly, modern muzzleloaders are of an inline ignition design, with a breechplug with a hole separating the percussion cap (or upgraded to an actual cartridge primer) from the powder charge. All of these provide upgrades in power and reliability.

The trapdoor actions and rolling block actions of early blackpowder cartridge rifles are completely obsolete, and not seen in any modern rifle outside a replica.

Although primarily a shotgun and combination gun action, the break action is usable on rifles and represents about the most simple, inexpensive action out there.

Remington 760 pump action rifle.

Also primarily shotgun actions, the pump and lever actions exist in rifles. The reason they are rare is because of the centerfire primer and the spitzer bullet we discussed last time. Pointy bullets in a tubular magazine will put their points right on the primers of the rounds in front of them, and you could develop quite a situation trying to overload a tube mag and pushing hard enough to set one off.

A lever action rifle in .35 Remington (note the round tipped bullets)

Although some tube rifle rounds have pointed polymer tips, most are limited to rimfires like the .22, and pistol-round hunting carbines, like ones in .357 magnum and .44 magnum due to their round noses. Lever and pump actions favor tube mags over box mags, so they naturally tend to follow.

The granddaddy of manual rifle actions is the bolt (see title picture for a Remington 700), and it would not be an exaggeration to say that the vast majority are derived from the 1898 Mauser action. Bolt actions are simpler than levers, faster and require less movement than pumps, and work quite well with spitzer rounds and both internal and detachable box magazines. For a simple, inexpensive, reliable rifle that does not have quick follow up shots as a concern the bolt action is 100% the way to go.

Autoloading Actions

Most of the auto (or self) loading actions seen by the first World War, whether they were semi or fully automatic firing, were recoil driven. Recoil actions take the barrel back with the action a distance, and then unlocks from the action for the rest of the cycle and are common on pistols and machine guns, which have a shroud around the reciprocating barrel. There aren’t many recoil operated personal rifles for the fact of the extra weight of a shroud around the barrel for protection and to have a place to hang accurate sights. The Remington Models 8 and 81 are some exceptions.

Remington Model 81 with recoil action. Note the sleeved barrel.

Auto-loading rifles lagged a little behind their pistol, submachine gun, and machine gun counterparts until some usable actions were developed. The majority use gas operation as their method, and that was originally accomplished via piston operation. The principle is that a small hole in the barrel siphons off some combustion gas pressure and slams a piston in a bore attached to the barrel against an operating rod. This rod then recoils to the rear, and it drives the bolt to which it is attached rearward, accomplishing the chambering cycle with a spring returning it into battery.

Schematic of AK47 gas piston system

Pistons in gas guns have evolved from long stroke pistons that move a few inches to short stroke actions that move less than an inch and motivate a weight on the end of the operating rod. The M1 Garand, one of the original gas operated rifles, didn’t actually use a piston; the end of the operating rod served as the piston surface. Other piston guns include the SKS, AK47, M14/M1A, the FAL, and shotguns like the Remington 1100 and Benelli M4.

AR-15 Direct Impingement diagram.

Another gas action followed the second World War; that of direct impingement. DI guns have no piston drive, and instead siphon gas via a gas tube all the way back to the firing chamber where a “key” on the bolt is driven back by the gas pressure to accomplish the chambering cycle along with a spring powered return. Seen originally on the French MAS 44 and 49 rifles, this method is widely used on the M16/AR-15 platforms and derivatives.

A third auto-loading rifle action is the delayed blowback action seen mainly on the German G3 platform and derivatives. A normal blowback action, where the recoil spring is the only thing holding the action shut would be overpowered by any decent rifle cartridge. CETME and what would become HK developed a locking roller system to mitigate some of the force along with a retracting bolt system and fluted chamber to make the thing somehow work and not tear itself apart. It will throw your spent brass into the next zip code, however.

HK-91, delayed blowback action. Rubber buffer installed to save brass from damage of the violent ejection.

Cartridges

With a couple minor exceptions like the GyroJet (actually a rocket) and some of the new polymer cased efforts by PCP, cartridges have remained fundamentally unchanged for over a hundred years.

There are four parts to a modern cartridge, and the term cartridge, or round, refers to the whole thing. The bullet is the projectile that gets shot out of the barrel and is typically lead, with a copper jacket. Sometimes there is no copper jacket for an all lead bullet, and there are also pure copper bullets as well. A lot of Russian and Eastern Bloc ammo uses bi-metallic jackets of copper coated steel over the lead core to save money.

Bullets typically come in varying weights (measured in grain) for their caliber, and will vary widely in internal construction, tip material, and tail geometry depending on the application. Many bullets will fit in multiple cartridges; the bullets used in 30-06 Springfield are the same ones used in .308 Winchester or 7.62×51 NATO, but, oddly enough, the bullets in the Soviet round, 7.62×39, are of a slightly bigger diameter.

The case, commonly made of, and called, “brass,” is the single most expensive part of the cartridge. You should collect your brass whenever possible. Cheaper ammo, commonly surplus from the Commie countries, will have steel cased ammo that is not reloadable. Rimfire ammo is also not reloadable. The case also has a rim, either rebated (the same diameter of the case) or a traditional rim that sticks out around the edge and both of these are used to extract the spent case after firing.

The last two parts are the primer and the powder load. The primer is seated in a primer pocket on the head of the case.

Cartridges are named oddly. Usually the first number refers to either caliber (hundredths of an inch) or millimeters of bullet diameter. Most rounds are .22 inches to .50 diameter, so your calibers will range from things like 22-250 up to 50 Beouwulf, for instance. Your metric measurements will range from 5mm to 12mm, and give you things like 7.62×39, 9mm Luger, and 5.56×45.

Following the first number can be a number referring to a parent cartridge that this load was developed from, like the 22-250 Remington (derived from 250 Savage), the amount of grains of black powder were in the original load in really old cartridges like the 30-30 and the 45-70 Government, year of manufacture like the 30-06 Springfield (that's ought six, as in 1906), or overall length of the loaded cartridge, like the 7.62×51 NATO.

Sometimes there will be no second number, and just the name of an ammo maker or something inspiring, like Parabellum. Some rounds will have multiple names; the 9×18, the 9mm Luger, and the 9mm Parabellum are the same thing, as is the .45 ACP and .45 AUTO. Sometimes a round can be developed by an ammo company, named after it, and later made by everyone, so you could have a Remington 700 rifle chambered in .308 Winchester shooting ammo made in that caliber by Federal Cartridge Corp.

Civilian Rifles Available Today

Common rifles out there include hunting style "sporter" rifles, mass produced surplus rifles that have been imported, civilian market "military style" rifles, and some older US military surplus rifles like the M1 through the CMP.

On the sporter rifle side of things, you're mainly looking at bolt actions and some semiautomatics, with either internal magazines or flush fit detachable mags. Most of the big American and European calibers are available, and your big domestic brands are Remington, Mossberg, Winchester, Savage, Ruger, Kimber, and others.

Mosin Nagant 1891-30. In a world of AKs and ARs, it reminds people what a full power rifle cartridge actually feels like.

Imported military surplus these days is mostly Mosin-Nagants, which was the Russian/Soviet infantry arm before the AK-47. They're good, cheap, loud fun, but you may have to open the bolt by smacking it with a board. Some "sporterized" AK-47 rifles, but mostly kits to build them off a receiver, come from the former Eastern Bloc countries, specifically Yugoslavia, Romania, and some Hungary. SKS's (another Soviet semi-auto) are still available, mainly Chinese. There are still some Belgian FALs around, and there's the Japanese Arisaka, among others.

Fusil Automatique Leger (Light Automatic Rifle) FAL made by Belgian Fabrique Nationale de Herstal. Semi-automatic versions are available.

“Military style” civilian rifles are often the exact military rifle, just made semi-automatic for civilian ownership. Everybody and their mother makes an AR-15 and they vary on price, performance and features. AR-10’s, the natively .308 Winchester version of the AR-15, are making inroads as well. The M1A, a civilian version of the M14, is also a good choice, and you couldn’t go wrong with an M1 Garand from the CMP, either.

Springfield Armory M1A Gas piston semi-automatic.

Accessories

With the advent of the Picatinny rail, you can put a lot of things on your rifle, but your accessories are really limited to three things: marksmanship aids, optics, and maybe a light.

No.

Traditionally, rifles had iron sights. Scopes came into the scene in the 1800s, and optics, by which I mean holographic and or electronic sights, started in the 80s and are big deals now. Battery powered optics usually are backed up with fold down back up iron sights. A “real scope” does not need backup irons.

Marksmanship aids are things like slings, monopods, bipods, handstops, etc. There are many differing schools of thought on how to hold and run a rifle, slings and vertical foreends are a big part of that, and I’ll devote some articles in the future to those.

Accessorized AR-15. Laser (below the front sight), backup, foldable iron sights, red dot optic, and a magnifier optic inline behind it on a swing out mount.

Shoulder stocks and foreends in general, colloquially called “furniture,” are often upgraded to suit function, the fit to the shooter, and his taste. Triggers are also upgradeable and tunable to a light match trigger or a heavy military trigger, or anything in between.

Evil features

The “evil features” originally were developed for the now-expired assault weapons ban, and they also dovetail into the sporting purposes definition for foreign guns. The original 5 Evil Features are: collapsing or folding stocks, pistol grips, bayonet mounts, grenade launcher mounts, and a flash suppressor or a barrel threaded to take one. It’s all a big joke.

The 1994 Federal Assault Weapon Ban outlawed the import or manufacture of new rifles with two or more of the following features:

1. Folding or telescoping stock
2. Pistol grip
3. Bayonet mount
4. Flash suppressor, or threaded barrel designed to accommodate one

It also banned the manufacture of new magazines holding more than 10 rounds (5)

Many states limit the size of the mags you can have, and often don’t allow you to detach them without a tool, like the California Bullet Button. Hi-capacity magazines are important for dealing with multiple assailants, so there is much controversy, and hi-cap mags can be considered a new Evil Feature.

I am the Sure Fire 100 round mag, destroyer of liberal minds.

Conclusion

The first article and this one, taken together, should get you a pretty functional grasp of the evolution of rifles to where they are today. I'll build off the foundation of these articles into articles on specific genres of rifles, some specific rifles themselves, the care and feeding of these beasts, and how to shoot them accurately at range. Be safe.

Read More: The Fundamentals of Gun Safety

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Why A Hillary Clinton Presidency Would Destroy The United States

March 24, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Of all the 2016 presidential candidates, both Republican and Democrat, the worst one by far is Hillary Clinton. If she is elected to the presidency, her policies may bring an end to the United States as we know it. Here's why.

Stacking the Supreme Court with liberals

The most devastating effect of a President Hillary would be on the Supreme Court.

Assuming that Senate Republicans have the fortitude to delay a vote on President Obama's Court appointment, the next president will be responsible for choosing the next four or five Supreme Court justices. By nominating younger justices, it is not an exaggeration to say that the next president will set the direction of the Court for the next 30 years.

We have to face a cold, hard fact here: Supreme Court justices who were nominated by Democrat presidents unswervingly vote in a liberal way. They never, never, never deviate from their mandate to always decide in favor of progressive social engineering.

Republican nominees have a much less consistent record. Justice Kennedy, who was appointed by President Reagan, has the reputation of being the swing vote on liberal social justice cases. It was Kennedy who provided the majority vote in the Obergefell decision that legalized same-sex marriage. Chief Justice Roberts, who was nominated by President Bush, voted in favor of Obamacare.

Social conservatives are very concerned that stacking the Court with liberal justices will forever enshrine abortion rights and same-sex marriage as the law of the land. They are correct to have this fear. But a greater risk is of what is coming down the pike. We've already seen the opening shots fired in the campaign to make pedophilia mainstream. With a majority liberal Court, the pedophiles will be able to achieve in eight years what it took gays decades to achieve.

As terrible as the social engineering will be, the next change will be even worse.

Gun Confiscation

Liberals hate the Second Amendment. It has been their wet dream for decades to take away guns from the law-abiding public. They want to take away your guns so badly that President Obama even cried about it.

There has been one thing that has continuously stymied Democrat efforts to confiscate your guns—the Second Amendment of the Constitution. But liberals view the Constitution as a document that should be interpreted in whatever way is most suitable to the current year. I would not be surprised to see a majority liberal Court decide that the right to bear arms is an outmoded vestige of our colonial past.

Although she has not made it a campaign promise, Hillary has already expressed interest in using Australia's "gun buyback" method to confiscate guns in the US. As soon as President Hillary is able to get a liberal majority on the Court, expect her to make gun confiscation a top priority.

Hillary's crusade against guns may be the spark that sets off a revolt in the US as a minority of Americans would rather fight than part with their right to bear arms.

Immigration

It is really difficult to get more liberal on immigration than most of the Republican candidates. Jeb Bush famously called illegal immigration an “act of love.” And all of the Republican candidates except for Trump call for dramatically increasing legal immigration levels.

Hillary does not disappoint. Even comedian Bill Maher, a flaming liberal, mocked Hillary’s ultra-liberal position:

> There has been a real change with the Democrats… Mission Creep, I would call it. I understand their position was comprehensive immigration reform. Now, in front of Univision, it seems to have morphed into, “you get across that river, you’re here to stay.”

Hillary pretends her position on immigration is because she just wants to help poor immigrants, but she says that just to fool stupid voters. There are two real reasons for her favoring wide-open borders.

The first is that she wants to provide her big donors with an abundant supply of cheap labor. Illegals for the low-end and H1B visas for the higher end. Hillary shares this goal in common with the Republican establishment.

The second is that she wants to ensure her re-election and Democrat hegemony over the US for the future. Recent immigrants vote overwhelmingly Democrat. Obama received 71% of the Hispanic vote and 73% of the Asian vote. By letting in hordes of new immigrants, Hillary will change the US from a center right country into a full tilt, left-wing, multicultural hellhole. And it will stay that way—forever.

More Feminism

Grrl Power renders this young feminist impervious to pain.

Hillary's only real qualification for the presidency is that she has a vagina and she slept with Bill Clinton at least once several years ago. Her eight years in the Senate are not marked by any notable achievements, and the defining feature of her tenure as Secretary of State was the terrorist attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, which left four Americans dead.

For this reason, Hillary has laid great emphasis on the fact that she is a woman. In an interview with Time magazine she pretty much said that women are better at governing than men:

> I think that there are certain issues that we are more attuned to one of the things that I did in the State Department is increase resources to cases involving child abductions, trying to do more to promote international adoptions where appropriate. I just think there are some areas where our own life experiences really prepare us to be more receptive. I do think there is something in the governing or organizing approach. I just think women in general are better listeners, are more collegial, more open to new ideas and how to make things work in a way that looks for win-win outcomes. That has been my experience.

Because women comprise one of Hillary's two large voting blocs, you can bet that she will push feminism and grrrl power at every turn.

Racial Divisiveness

Blacks comprise the second large voting bloc for Hillary. If you've watched the Democratic primaries, blacks are responsible for the fact that Hillary is beating Bernie Sanders. Bernie plays well in states with mostly white populations, but in states that have a large black population, Hillary always wins. That is because blacks vote for Hillary in even larger margins than they voted for Barack Obama.

To keep the black vote in line, Hillary will follow in Obama's footsteps and continue to fan the fire of racial animus. If Hillary is elected, expect to see many more cities burning down due to race riots. All the while, Hillary will use racial tensions as a wedge to encroach on the police power which is supposed to be reserved to the states.

Race relations in the US are a powder keg that is set to explode. Hillary is more than willing to light the match if it assures her a second term.

Conclusion

I've left a lot out. I haven't mentioned the fact that Hillary is notorious for selling political influence. I haven't mentioned the email scandal or the fact that Hillary will continue the failed interventionist foreign policy of the Bush and Obama Administrations. To give every reason why Hillary would make a terrible president, I would need several volumes.

After 16 years of cynical and inept leadership under Bush and Obama, the US has already suffered immeasurable harm. Even with the best leadership, it is doubtful that the US will ever regain its prior glory. The years of open borders, enlargement of the welfare class, and the destruction of the American manufacturing sector have inflicted permanent damage. Eight years of a Hillary regime would only accelerate the process of destruction. Her policies will aggravate every problem area and virtually guarantee that the United States will come apart.

In fact, that may be the only legitimate reason to vote for Hillary. Rather than a long protracted death under someone like a President Kasich, Romney, Ryan, Rubio, or Haley, a Hillary presidency will lay the groundwork for a swift, shocking end. Those of us who remain alive after the shock would then be able to rebuild civilization from the ground up.

As for me, I would prefer to delay the apocalypse for another generation or two.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How 13 Hours Depicts Hillary Clinton's Criminal Incompetence In Benghazi

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

German Government Cuckolds Its Men By Teaching Migrants How To Sleep With German Women

March 24, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The German Government recently put online a website called Zanzu, my body in words and images, that "explains sexual and reproductive health" in the West to migrants. It is exclusively aimed at them, as the explanatory video stipulates it at 00:04 (for non-German speakers).

The problem is that what the government depicts as being normal pushes the idea without naming it—that interracial sex is the norm, that the country's native men are weak, and young German women are the prize for migrants to impregnate and have sex with. It is an additional direct action taken by the country's elite to make their native people disappear in favour of "equality" and "multi-culturalism," helping them to remain in power by destroying the feelings of nationalism and unity that could question their authority.

Who pulls the strings?

The video was created by the German Government's Federal Centre for Health Education and the Flemish company Sensoa, that have seats in the Belgian parliament but also run campaigns and websites to make people more aware of sexual health is (according to them). It is financed by the Belgian taxpayers, who see their taxes being used yet again for the promotion of multiculturalism and migrant-native reproduction.

From their About section, Sensoa mainly supports homosexual rights, migrants reproducing in Europe, gender equality and gender flexibility, abortion, and fights against sexual violence (The "White Rape Culture!" obviously, not traditional Muslim genital mutilation, dats raciss). It comes as no surprise that they are also a proud member, like Starbucks, of the International Planned Parenthood Federation. And it is indeed written in the section "Push the agenda."

What do they consider the norm?

The "Relationship" section (the one that can challenge nature, and therefore MUST be under government control) is a flood of SJW and PC propaganda. What is love? Where man has forever asked himself this question without finding a finite answer, the German government tells you what love is.

It would be laughable if it was not so disturbing. The government also tells you what feelings are. Feelings and reactions that are innate for the human species are now under the approval of the state. This is the “good relationship” section:

> Some important aspects of a good relationship could be:
>
> - Equality: both partners are equal. One partner does not dominate the other;
> - Respect and acceptance: you and your partner are 2 different people. You will always be different and you accept this;
> - Trust: you trust each other and confide in each other;
> - Communication: you express your feelings and wishes;
> - Time: you spend time with each other;
> - Interests: you share the same interests…

They also precisely redefine what “Partner violence” is (emphasis added):

> - Psychological violence, for example: insults, humiliation, threats or ignoring your partner.
> - Physical violence, for example: beating, kicking, rough treatment, forcing your partner to perform or endure harmful acts (for instance: having to bathe in too-hot water).
> - Sexual violence, for example: forcing your partner to have sex (Deutsch:Vergewaltigung " data-toggle="tooltip" data-placement="top">rape), forcing him/her to > watch pornography.

> - Economic violence, for example: deciding what to do with yours or your partner's money against his/her will, providing insufficient household money, denying him/her necessary material goods.

You read that right. Ignoring your partner is now psychological violence and deciding not to be a provider or a sponsor is economic violence.

> Deutsch:Partner " data-toggle="tooltip" data-placement="top">Partner violence is any form of violence between 2 people who have an emotional and/or sexual bond (Deutsch:Beziehung " data-toggle="tooltip" data-placement="top">relationship). Partner violence often shows that there is no Deutsch:Gleichberechtigung " data-toggle="tooltip" data-placement="top">equality between the partners.
>
> Violence between partners is forbidden by law.

But it is all going to be fine:

> If you are an offender, you can find help to stop you from repeating partner violence in the future. Look for professional help.

The mother of all double standards

The myth of “rape culture” is beaten into the skull of native born Germans (and white heterosexual males worldwide) while migrants are not punished and act in total impunity. They are proposed advice on consensual and interracial relationships. Treating them like irresponsible children is the solution that the German government sees as appropriate.

What Merkel and her clique does not, or pretends not to, realize is that male migrants are well aware of how sex works. They just observed that they can commit crimes without punishment. Why would they hold back? We are back with the eternal question regarding free will when exposed to an evil deed: “If you could commit a crime, knowing that you will not be punished, would you do it?”

With audio and legions of informative images, Zanzu is designed in such a way that the most simple-minded individual can grasp the concepts described. Who are they trying to convince? Almost all the migrants I have seen so far in pictures possess and can use relatively complex devices such as smartphones.

The site recurrently uses the sentence “This (genital mutilation, actual violence etc) is forbidden by law” and not “is punishable by a fixed penalty.” The whole mindset shared by the migrants, especially in Germany is: “But your laws do not apply to me.”

What is the end game?

By depicting, on this website and many other platforms, the native German (and by extension the white population) as weak and the root of all evil, we observe the same tactic used to submit Germans by using the shame of their WW2 past.

Loading…

The government has for Germany a new definition of sex: reproductive, enjoyable sex and children are for migrants and white German women only. Masturbation, talking, cuddling, and the occasional non-reproductive oral is how German men have sex.

This whole website is just a facade. A bogus solution to keep the Germans that are on the fence calm and the leftists strong in their self-righteousness.

The content and the images chosen

The written part of the website especially relative to pregnancy, fertility, and biological truth is often quite neutral, but some elements could be described as triggering for leftists:

> Women are the most fertile when they are young, just after having their first menstruation cycle

But the chapters relative to choices, sexual pleasure, and sexual violence seem to always follow the same reasoning. This is the subliminal message sent through the images that is the main point here. I went through ALL the images and noticed a few coincidences:

1. The picture depicting “women’s bodies” and “men’s bodies” follow a pattern

For obvious reasons, the young German-looking blonde girl is smiley, thin and attractive. The other women are depicted as overweight, in a slouched posture or frowning. They constitute a majority. The two white women are a minority in the group, including an old white woman that seems disabled.

The white men are also a minority in the group that represents what the west is, with only two possibilities: either dead-eyed/skinny with male-pattern baldness or obese.

Translation: “As a migrant, you must target as a sexual objective mainly native German young women that are fertile to receive your genes instead of the ones of a native German man. Avoid the old hags or your own women, think Big Picture. No German man will compete with you."

> The way the body looks is not important for the way it functions.

Yeah, right.

2. No pictures about contraception clearly depict a native German-looking woman

3. Pictures that depict sexual intercourse (NSFW) aimed at conception NEVER include native-looking couples, only interracial ones.

Apparently only kissing, mutual masturbation and blowjobs are "white couple friendly."

4. The picture in the section about male sterilization depicts a non-white doctor sterilizing a native German-looking man

5. The people depicted as having HIV, STIs or drug users are always non-native women, non-native homosexual men, or weak-looking fair-skinned men.

The provider of hard drugs to the migrant/non-White is also White.

6. How “healthy lifestyle” is depicted

Harmful activities (smoking) are enjoyed by droopy-eyed, limp-wristed white men with spectacles. The white woman gets plenty of sleep, naked and with a smile. She also runs with her hijab-sporting female bestie while the migrant/non-white man drinks water, eats vegetables and gluten-free bread.

7. NONE of the children depicted are White. Except the ones adopted by lesbian couples.

The only case in which they will not systematically put down white children.

8. Images and close-ups of penetration, aiming at or displaying, fecondation, female masturbation or open genitalia ALWAYS involve a white woman. So does female genital mutilation.

Links (NSFW) : (1), (2), (3), (4)

9. The government-approved definitions of”good sex” and “casual sex”

This is the image found in the “Good sex” chapter. He looks so happy while listening to her nagging. It is also the picture used in the section “Solving sexual problems”…

This is the image found in the “casual sex” chapter. Dead-eyed white man and fat non-white woman with relatively short hair.

10. The effect would not be complete if the native German-looking man was not depicted with having the shortest penis of the group

(NSFW)

The white man has the smallest package of the bunch (nsfw). The African man has the biggest.

En conclusion

"Good sex" and reproduction control are the exact notions used in the novel Brave New World. Do they even try to hide their objectives anymore? This is not the only front where the German government leads this concealed war on its own kind.

Merkel and Erdogan, the Turkish president, recently met while completely excluding the 27 other representatives of the countries of the European Union, re-opening the discussions to include Turkey in Europe and considering paying them 3 additional billion euros to keep migrants on their side of the fence.

Zuckerberg has also something in store for the German people and will help them to change. Luckily, some realistic European and German political figures react to these frequent abuses of power (from 01:55).

The German Government could have just named the site "The Future We Have For You."

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Germany Finds Homes For Migrants As Penniless Greek Women Sell Their Bodies For Pennies

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Feminists Go Crazy After Jian Ghomeshi Found Not Guilty Of Rape

March 24, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Former Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) radio host Jian Ghomeshi has been sensationally acquitted of all five charges at the end of his first trial in Toronto. Four of the charges related to allegations of sexual assault and the fifth to an accusation of choking. The judge, William Horkins, found that Ghomeshi's three accusers were "less than full and frank and forthcoming" in their statements to the media, various police officials, and within the court system.

Horkins additionally ruled that the crown's case relied solely on the word of the witnesses. Consequently, The Guardian was one of the many liberal papers forced to concede, even indirectly, that there was zero hard evidence against Ghomeshi. The only other "evidence" remaining, accuser testimony, was found to be inconsistent and blatantly dishonest.

The impact on Ghomeshi's life has been immense. He lost his lucrative job with CBC, having hosted the program Q, the highest-rated show of its kind in the broadcaster's history. He has also paid more five figure legal bills than you or I have pairs of underwear and socks. In the meantime, both powerful and average Canadians and others around the world have repeatedly referred to him as a "rapist," to the point where the defamers number in the hundreds of thousands or perhaps millions. His only "crime" so far has been his enjoyment of consensual BDSM activities.

Following the decision, social media erupted with rabid feminist insistences that Ghomeshi was “guilty.” Yet this was not before one topless chipmunk woman with a bull-ring (or giant booger) and words like “MISOGYNY” painted on her body tried to say in nude actions that due process constitutes hatred of women. Stupidly, she did so when the Crown, her “feminist ally” and the prosecutorial body that claimed Ghomeshi was guilty, was giving its post-court statement:

> Feminists running around naked acting like it’s going to change the Ghomeshi trial verdict. Lmao. pic.twitter.com/FHWoUpTomd
>
> — Lauren Southern (@Lauren_Southern) March 24, 2016

Although Ghomeshi is facing a second trial on three other counts of sexual assault involving three more women later in the year, the process and outcome of this first trial has been telling. As Judge Horkins reminded the court:

> There is no other evidence to look to determine the truth. There is no tangible evidence. There is no DNA. There is no ‘smoking gun’.

What is more is that the claims that facilitated the charges for the first trial came from alleged events in 2002 and 2003. If the incidents supposedly occurred nearly fifteen years ago, police would never even investigate, let alone make charges over the vast majority of accusations involving purported physical assaults or burglaries. The reason for this is that there would be most often be no fair way of determining what happened, given the extended length of time. Nevertheless, no matter how little evidence accompanies them, sexual assault accusations are seen as an idyllic island separate from the rest of the judicial world. Jian Ghomeshi has learned this first hand.

Twitter will sit back and allow people to defame Ghomeshi and wish death upon him

There have been many gems today that show the “even-handedness” of Twitter’s new so-called anti-abuse policies. But before I show them, see how one “educated” feminist tried to claim that emphasizing an appropriate burden of proof, in a case where there was no evidence aside from contradictory accuser testimony, can be equated with “mansplaining” and the need to get rid of said burden of proof:

> I’m done with wannabe lawyers mansplaining ‘burden of proof’. “Look sweetheart, that’s how the law works”. Then the law is broken for women
>
> — Lauren Dobson-Hughes (@ldobsonhughes) March 24, 2016

And here come some of the death wishes to be ignored by Jack Dorsey and Twitter:

> wow waking up to this news was not fun. ghomeshi deserves to fucking die imo
>
> — permanent baby (@biperman) March 24, 2016

https://twitter.com/worldprinxe/status/713036069084786688

https://twitter.com/ADiraimondo91/status/713022777758908417

Interestingly, the Ghomeshi story has intersected with an older story of mine. You may remember Gregory Alan Elliott, who endured a horror, long-term legal nightmare after being charged for arguing with feminists on Twitter. He was rightfully exonerated. Feeling sympathy for Ghomeshi and his ordeal, he tweeted that “[the] Canadian Justice System [is] based on FACTS, TRUTH, EVIDENCE, LAW,” only to be asked to “die” by a leftist:

> Go die in a fire. Seriously. It's men like you that are part of the problem. #Ghomeshi #IBelieveSurvivors https://t.co/PTzzUWkUP8
>
> — Marxist At Large (@cmarkevich) March 24, 2016

Thank god Ghomeshi kept his emails

Washed-up actress Lucy DeCoutere, who hit the wall years ago, begged Ghomeshi for more time together AFTER the supposed assault. She sent him erotic pictures as well, including one of her simulating fellatio on a beer bottle. How is she a fit and proper person to remain as a captain in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

One of the now discredited accusers, Lucy DeCoutere, waived a publication ban, a right denied to men accused of sexual assault, who have much more to lose from the court process, namely their freedom. DeCoutere withheld key information from prosecutors, the media, and police, such as her extensive, erotic dealings with Ghomeshi, including via email, after the time she claimed he assaulted her. Ghomeshi's retention of these emails they shared afterwards ended up saving him.

The email exchange demonstrates that the pair engaged in entirely consensual BDSM activities:

> Jian getting to know you is literally changing my mind, in a good way I think…
> You kicked my ass last night, and that makes me want to fuck your brains out.

Moreover, DeCoutere promised to "beat the crap" out of Ghomeshi if he did not agree to see her again. It also took years for her to come forward and she spent much of the time post-public accusation courting the media, instead of giving a consistent account to the powers-that-be. The other accusers behaved similarly and this counted decisively against them, as it should, in the courtroom.

Beyond reasonable doubt is for other crimes, not sexual assault claims based on testimony alone

Ghomeshi's former friendship with affirmative action-loving Justin Trudeau, the son of a gold-digging feminist, shows how far the star of a falsely accused man can fall.

I lose track of how many times I say this: no other crimes would be regularly investigated if alleged victims came forward 10-50 years after the purported event. Only sexual assault and male-on-female domestic violence are pursued so blindly, without any recourse to proper evidence and a satisfactory fulfilment of the beyond reasonable doubt standard. There are drawbacks to actively documenting contact between yourself and the women you have sex with, but it is fast becoming a necessity for men falsely accused of sexual assault and related crimes.

Jian Ghomeshi's career is ruined, that much is true. Yet things could have become worse still for him if this first trial had delivered guilty verdicts. In no sense, too, can it be said that he will have a fair trial come this June. People are already calling him a rapist without substantiation and have been for nearly two years. The shrill cries of "Misogyny!" and "Rapist!" will only increase if a second judgment mid-year provides the only reasonable outcome: another set of acquittals.

Regardless of the fascistic SJW responses, the truth has spoken loud and clear in favor of Jian Ghomeshi today.

Read More: Was Jian Ghomeshi Fired From CBC For Baseless Allegations?

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Did George Soros Rig The Utah Vote To Help Ted Cruz Defeat Donald Trump?

March 24, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With yet another primary day out of the way, Donald Trump has taken another big step towards the Oval Office. Both parties held primary elections in Arizona and Utah this week, with the Democrats holding an additional caucus in Idaho (the Republican primary in that state was held two weeks ago). Trump cruised to victory in Arizona, but he suffered a larger-than-expected defeat in Utah, with winner Ted Cruz netting 69 percent of votes and the Donald languishing in third behind John Kasich.

While it was a foregone conclusion that Trump would lose Utah—his outspoken personality and supermodel wife being an affront to the tweedy, porn-addicted Mormons who inhabit the state—Cruz's landslide win defies both polling and common sense. Cruz's support has been limited to Christian conservatives, and even in his home state of Texas, he only got 43 percent of the vote. What explains his 50+ point margin of victory in Utah?

The answer is voter fraud. Much in the same way that Microsoft may have rigged the Iowa caucus to benefit the dearly departed Marco Rubio, a George Soros-owned firm may have cooked the books for Ted Cruz in Utah. With the continued success of Trump's nationalist campaign, power brokers on both the left and right have pulled out all the stops to shut him down.

Arizona Smart Smart Smart, Utah Very Dumb

While polls consistently showed Trump lagging behind Cruz in Utah, they also consistently showed Cruz failing to break the 50 percent margin, let alone approaching the 69 percent of the vote he actually got. Utah is only a winner-take-all state (i.e. it awards all of its delegates to whoever wins the popular vote) if one of the candidates gets at least 50 percent: below that margin, losing candidates are awarded some delegates. With his landslide victory in the state, Cruz scoops up all of Utah's delegates.

Because of this, there is a huge incentive for voter fraud in Utah. In the past month, the GOP establishment has openly stated that they are trying to force a brokered convention by denying Donald Trump the majority of delegates he needs to clinch the nomination. At this stage in the race, it's mathematically impossible for either Ted Cruz or John Kasich to win the nomination: there simply aren't enough delegates in play. However, by continuing to run, Cruz and Kasich can siphon off delegates from Trump, denying him a majority and allowing the GOP to steal the nomination from him in July.

As Breitbart reported earlier this week, Utah's Republican online caucuses were managed by Smartmatic Group, whose chairman, Lord Mark Malloch-Brown, is on the board of George Soros' Open Society Foundation. Additionally, the Marxist protesters who attempted to shut down Trump's rally in Phoenix last weekend were on Soros' payroll:

> Woman who chained herself on car door blocking the highway to Trump Rally is a Soros Justice Fellow, coincidence? pic.twitter.com/ur181E5ScF
>
> — Spectator (@unspectateur) March 20, 2016

Additionally, last week, former Massachusetts governor and failed 2012 GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney announced that he would be voting for Ted Cruz in the Utah caucuses. Notably, he did not endorse Cruz, because Romney and the GOP establishment don't want Cruz to get the nomination; instead, their plan is to install a Wall Street-approved stooge such as Jeb Bush or Romney himself at a brokered convention.

While Soros' vote fraud and Romney's machinations may have denied Trump the Utah delegates that he rightly earned, they failed to stop him in neighboring Arizona, where he soared to victory with 47 percent of the vote. Trump's triumph in Arizona was aided by his tough stance on illegal immigration, which has torn that great state apart, as well as endorsements from popular GOP politicians such as Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio and former governor Jan Brewer. Arizona is also a winner-take-all state, meaning that Cruz and Kasich will get no delegates from the state.

Berning Up

Tuesday's primaries also saw a resurgence in support for Bernie Sanders: while he lost the Arizona primary by a significant margin, he won landslide victories in Utah and Idaho, taking close to 80 percent of the vote in each state. This is likely due to the fact that Sanders primarily appeals to white voters, and Utah and Idaho are two of the last remaining states where the Democratic Party is still largely white (because said states themselves are largely white).

While Sanders still remains a long-shot for the Democratic nomination, he's shown that he has staying power among the white progressives who form the ideological core of his party. However, if he can't broaden his appeal to the party's minorities, he will inevitably lose out to Hillary Clinton.

The next primaries will be in Wisconsin and New York, and while the latter has already been written off as an easy Trump/Clinton victory, cuckservatives are pouring resources into the former hoping to stall Trump's momentum. With even Jeb Bush returning to the fray to endorse Ted Cruz, it's clear that Trump is the only choice for voters hoping to fight back against the globalist monstrosity that George Soros and his ilk represent.

Read More: Did Microsoft Commit Voter Fraud In Iowa To Ensure Donald Trump's Defeat?

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

A Gentleman’s Introduction To The Seven Liberal Arts

March 25, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The ancient Greek and Roman civilizations were periods of rapid cultural growth and advancement. Over two thousand years ago, these cultures developed an education system that persisted until the 20th century. Known as the liberal arts, they were the essential tools a free person (from the Latin liberalis: “worthy of a free person”) must know to become a functioning member of society.

The importance of a liberal arts education was known from before the time of Christ until the turn of the 20th century. While modern democracy is a failed institution, especially in contrast with benevolent monarchy, it is possible that with a well educated populace, democracy could work. The liberal arts represented this basic level of education, and comprised seven different fields, which will be briefly examined here.

The Seven Liberal Arts, Giovanni di ser Giovanni Guidi (1406-1486)

The liberal arts can be traced to Plato, who thoroughly prescribed them in perhaps his most famous work, The Republic. Plato's most famous student, Aristotle, stated that an educated man should be capable of considering and investigating any idea or concept thoroughly without necessarily embracing or dismissing it. Seneca the Younger, a Roman Stoic philosopher who lived from 4 BC to 65 AD, and advisor to Emperor Nero, was a strong advocate of the liberal arts.

The Stoics, founded in the 3rd century BC in Athens, believed in a rational outlook on life, that harmful emotions stem from errors in judgment and reasoning, and stressed the importance of maintaining a will in accord with nature, and that one's actions should be judged more importantly than one's speech. Logic was an important component of a successful man, and "virtue consists in a will that is in agreement with nature." In the realm of interpersonal relationships, one is stressed to "be free from anger, envy, and jealousy."

The liberal arts also were emphasized heavily in Hellenistic Greece, described as the "enkuklios paideia" or "education in a circle." They were divided into four scientific arts—music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy, and three humanities—grammar, logic, and rhetoric. These were divided into two main groups: The Trivium, representing the three humanities, was taught first as a framework for observing and understanding what the five senses of sight, sound, taste, touch, and smell were perceiving.

The Quadrivium was the upper division and included the four scientific arts. Together, the seven liberal arts represent the thinking skills, and served as a basis for the education of all. Those who wished to specialize would first obtain an education in the liberal arts before proceeding to the practical arts (medicine, architecture) or other fields such as philosophy or theology.

The purpose of learning the arts is to train the mind how to think (as opposed to what to think). By combining the seven liberal arts with the five senses, one can distinguish between reality and fiction. This can be visually represented with a Pythagorean triangle.

The Humanities (The Trivium)

The Trivium (literally, the place where three roads meet), known as the elementary three, represent the basic tools needed and was taught before the Quadrivium. The word trivia (tri=3 via=road) comes directly from the trivium. The trivium includes General Grammar, Formal Logic, and Rhetoric. While technically simpler than the more advanced subjects in the Quadrivium, many flaws in logic and reasoning can be traced back to failure to adequately learn the basics found in the Trivium.

Grammar is the systematic method of gathering raw data and ordering the facts of reality into a consistent body of knowledge. Grammar includes the mechanics of language, properly identifying and describing information perceived by the five senses.

Logic or Dialectic is the mechanics of thought and analysis, the process of identifying fallacies or errors in reasoning, and removing contradictions.

Rhetoric or Wisdom is the application of language in order to persuade.

[1] General Grammar	[2] Formal Logic	[3] Classical Rhetoric
Answers the question of the Who, What, Where, and the When of a subject.	Answers the Why of a subject.	Provides the How of a subject.
Discovering and ordering facts of reality comprises basic, systematic knowledge.	Developing the faculty of reason in establishing valid [i.e., non-contradictory] relationships among facts is systematic understanding.	Applying knowledge and understanding expressively comprises wisdom or, in other words, it is systematically useable knowledge and understanding.

The Scientific Arts (The Quadrivium)

The scientific arts include music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. After learning the basic skills of the Trivium, which are applicable to all other studies, the scientific arts known as the Quadrivium would be studied. The Quadrivium “place where four roads meet” include arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy.

Arithmetic is the study of the number, a pure abstraction outside of space and time. It is the study of quantities.

Geometry is a number in space, the study of magnitude at rest.

Music is a number in time; the application of the theory of numbers. It is the study of the relations between quantities.

Astronomy is a number in space and time. It is the study of magnitude inherently moving.

The Seven Combined

Grammar = Knowledge = What?

Logic = Reason = Why?

Rhetoric = Communication = How?

Arithmetic = Formal = Do

Geometry = Visual = See

Music = Artistic = Feel

Astronomy= Exploration = Seek

By developing these basic skills, men would have the basic tools they needed to live a fulfilling and satisfying life, and to explore their emotions, dreams, ambitions, and desires.

Two Thousand Years Of Liberal Arts

In ancient Greece, all free men were expected to obtain a basic liberal arts education. Women received a limited public education which focused on physical fitness, how to sing, dance, and play instruments. These were not seen as “childish endeavors” but indeed a strict and formal education system was established that provided a complementary, but important role in society, a foil to the men who were trained in logic and reason.

In the 17th and 18th centuries, the entirety of human knowledge was consolidated into a series of volumes known as the “encyclopedia” which translates as “complete instruction or complete knowledge.” Almost every major culture over the past 2,000 years has adopted the seven liberal arts. The Fellowcraft Degree commands all Freemasons to study them, and indeed much of Freemasonry is based upon principles found in the seven.

Today

Yale University, R.I.P. 1701-2016

Today, a liberal arts education is no longer even available at so-called “liberal arts” schools. The wisdom found in the seven basic liberal arts is the basis of every major civilization and advancement since before Christ. Only in the last few decades has this system been decimated.

In the image from Yale above, we can clearly see failures of the very first lesson of grammar. Without understanding grammar, no further education can be learned. The internet offers a vast array of knowledge to almost every person alive today. While our institutions may have failed us, a neomasculine man must develop his mind, as well as his body, and I encourage all to study the liberal arts.

Perhaps we will examine these subjects in further detail in future articles.

Read More: My Education Was a Complete Waste of Time

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

7 Pieces Of Beautiful Classical Music For Beginners

March 25, 2016 | by Nikolai Vladivostok | Link | Original Link

Some men find it difficult to obtain a taste for classical music. They may have heard snatches of it but were not much taken. Classical music is complex and rewards attentive, extended listening. Use this guide as an introduction to this venerable art form.

The Basics

Listen to an entire work from start to finish. Don't waste your time with "best of" compilations which chop and change between different compositions. Would you turn off The End by the Doors partway through and switch over to Love Will Tear Us Apart by Joy Division? No. You'd listen to one, then the other. Pay the same respect to classical music even though the pieces tend to be longer.

When you're starting out, pay all your attention to the music. Don't listen to it while your brain is distracted by replying to work emails or teasing your girlfriend. Try lying down in a quiet room and doing nothing but listening to the composition you have chosen. You could also listen while driving on a country road or while doing brainless housework. This is advisable for the appreciation of any fine music.

Discover the artists or a styles that you prefer. Classical music is not a monolithic whole that you must either embrace or reject, just as appreciating a single malt Scotch doesn't mean you must also enjoy dessert wine. Personally, I can't stand Tchaikovsky's girly ballet music and I find some of Beethoven's most famous symphonies repetitive and dull. Try out a selection and see where your taste leads you.

Mozart

I recommend listening to the whole of Mozart's Requiem. A requiem is a religious composition for the dead and is often used at funerals. The (possibly apocryphal) legend of the piece goes like this: towards the end of his rather debauched life, a mysterious man approached Mozart and said that an anonymous patron wished to commission a requiem. Mozart, stricken by a terminal illness, began to suspect that the man was a messenger from God and that the requiem would be for himself. Possessed by this awesome revelation he put into his work all the passion that can be stirred by death, faith and love. Mozart died partway through the composition of the requiem and it was completed by others. As you listen, you can hear the great man's mortal brilliance slowly fading away as the piece progresses. Not a good one to listen to just before a party.

Rachmaninoff

Sergei Rachmaninoff was both one of the greatest composers and pianists of all time. His works are infamous for their intense physical and intellectual demands upon the musician. Any pianist who wants to prove his worth dreams of mastering, and making his own, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2. The genius and intensity of this work make it a favorite in film and television soundtracks and it played a thematic role in Shine.

Beethoven

Need a break? For a short, exquisite piece which you will surely have heard before, try Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata. A slowly building, tranquil piano piece that makes one think of stargazing in the quiet solitude of the mountains.

Loading…

Holst

For a more recent and dramatic piece try The Planets by Gustav Holst. It is made up of seven movements, one for each of the planets (except this one). The work, which was composed from 1914-16, signals a move away from Romanticism and towards the excitement of modern discoveries. One can hear the echo of an early twentieth century Western society aching to rise above the Earth and its political chaos to seek glory in the exploration the heavens.

Bach

For an eminently civilized and cultured piece, try J.S. Bach's Cello Suite No. 1. Anyone listening to this work will fancy himself a gentlemen admiring his estate through French windows, cognac in hand, chaffing slightly about the dangly bits in his tight brocade breeches.

Carl Orff

The one musician here who doesn't go by just his last name, poor old Carl Orff gets a bit of a bad rap for his popularity with the Nazis. His bio certainly doesn't give the impression of a courageous hero for any particular cause or principle. He makes up for this with his magnificently valiant, muscular Carmina Burana. Try listening to this one without swinging around an imaginary (or real) claymore, howling guttural taunts at your enemies as you slice them in twain.

Tchaikovsky

Let's stay with the martial theme. I began by scorning him so I'll finish off with a tribute. The old Russian composer celebrates the Fatherland's victory over the puffed-up Frenchman Napoleon with this little ditty, the 1812 Overture. It builds slowly and finishes with a bang, kind of like what happens to anyone foolhardy enough to invade Russia. One of the few musical pieces to include cannons in live performances.

Concerts

Once you've identified your preferred flavors of classical music, try attending a concert. Go to see something that you're already familiar with and know you'll like. Hearing a real symphony orchestra blast out your favorite piece will knock your socks off.

Other Classical Styles of Music

Why stop there? You might enjoy the meditative, austere and strictly mathematical chants of Gregorian monks. You could explore classical Indian ragas with their own, complex mathematical patterns. And for the truly daring, there's Chinese classical music with a key different to that of Western music—it will grate the ear until you get tuned into it.

Conclusion

If you choose to step off the well-worn path and listen to something unfamiliar, give it the greatest chance possible. Listen to a whole piece. Pay full attention to it. Try it two or three times. If you do all that and still don't get into it, well, at least you had a go.

I have listed a small number of fairly accessible composers and pieces of music. Commenters are invited to offer their own suggestions.

Read More: 5 Reasons To Take Up Classical Music

Nikolai Vladivostok
Nikolai Vladivostok is a writer, Socialist and denouncer of reactionary elements. He has faith that the efficiency of Soviet industry and agriculture will inevitably lead to the collapse of the West and the liberation of its Peoples. Nikolai blogs at SovietMen on topics such as economics, sex, and debauchery.

On Impiety And The Passion Of The Lord

March 25, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

This week we continue on the theme of impiety, with a bit longer article in honor of the Sacred Triduum.

Last week, we mentioned that impiety is the virtue of showing respect for our roots and those joined closely to us in them. We also saw how modern society is based upon impiety, piety's opposite—hence, its obsession chiefly with sex and gender, internal class struggles and racism. In attacking sexual matters, it eats away at the very root of society. It attacks whatever survives, by teaching the people to hate themselves, their parents and their ancestors, most effectively along lines of class and race tensions. The net effect is to impede people from putting down roots, or retaining any connection to the roots they had.

In the Passion of Christ, on the day whereof this article will likely post, we find that impiety and piety were in special conflict. The Lord knew that His Passion, the center of history and the greatest act of Piety, would necessarily provoke the great impiety, an exacerbation of the Mystery of Iniquity long working in the world. St. Augustine has well summarized this by contrasting two cities—the City of God, and the City of Man.

The first parents of the human race, in degrading themselves, degraded the origin of all men, and ruptured the friendship they had with God their maker. The Lord, however, in pronouncing the curse upon them, was actually providing the means of remedy that would one day come: the decree of suffering, which God would take upon Himself. The first and long part of this process, was to consecrate a single people (i.e., separate them from the rest of the world), and prepare them gradually to produce the Messiah. The Old Testament is full of foreshadowings of this mission, which, sadly, are beyond the scope of this article.

When the fullness of time arrived, the Lord began by purifying again the human race in its origins, laying the groundwork for a revived and truer piety. A woman was conceived by barren parents, her nature prevented by grace from contracting the ancient contagion; the Lord would take the entirety of His nature from her purity, having no human father. One must understand, here: we have the Lord God Himself, the All-Father, the one most due our piety, Incarnate. And, for the Hebrew people, we have here the final result, the summit, of the entire Hebrew race. Here, is the Son of Abraham, Issac and Jacob; the Son of Jesse, David and Solomon; a "Hebrew of Hebrews," to use St. Paul's phrase and, moreover, the Son of God Incarnate by a seedless conception, a New Adam drawing the whole of His human nature from the New Eve which He had prepared.

Yet "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." The very first event in Jesus' life, draws our attention to a Jewish people dominated by foreigners—Caesar Augustus has commanded a census, and the Holy Family, with great inconvenience, makes its way to Bethlehem. His own people have no idea, of Who is in their midst, but foreigners—Persian Magi—know Whom they seek, the King of the Jews. Yet when they come to those lands they find a supposed king of the Jews, who is unaware of what is occurring. His reaction, upon hearing, is not to honor God and rejoice in the visitation of his people; rather, he rages with impiety. He unleashes an army upon the people he claims as his own, killing all young boys. The Holy Family is forced to abandon their own nation and people for Egypt – insult to injury, that the promised Messiah should have to retreat to the land from which He delivered Israel, so long ago.

At the Presentation of our Lord in the temple, His own mother begins to enter into the sympathy, the compassion, which she will experience for her Son until the bitter end. The elder Simeon prophesies to her: “Behold, this child is set for the fall, and for the resurrection of many in Israel, and for a sign of contradiction; and thine own soul, a sword shall pierce.”

The Fathers comment on this verse, telling us that the Virgin experienced an interior revelation of the fact that her Son, Whom she knew would suffer, would actually be brought to His suffering precisely by His own people; that His suffering would be rejected by them and held in contempt. She experienced this sorrow, not as we fallen men do in our passions, but with the acute and clean grief of a pure soul apprehending this great Mystery as fully as any mortal may.

Throughout the whole of His ministry, it was this way. When He announces Himself publicly to the people of His hometown, Nazareth, He mentioned that none of the Jews’ prophets were accepted by them, but had to be sent to widows and lepers in far-off lands. “And all they in the synagogue hearing this, were filed with anger. And they brought Him to the top of the hill on which their city was built, that they might throw Him off it headlong.” The scene is hardly unique in His life.

Things come to a head, when He raises Lazarus from the dead a week before coming to Jerusalem. From that point on, the leaders of the Jews are very intent on putting Him to death; the news of that particular miracle was hard to conceal, and the Jewish leaders resented and feared the people. The one time His people greet Him with something like recognition, the irony is bitter. He is greeted as king, as the Son of David! The Hebrew children run before His foal, throwing their clothes, and fronds of palms, and flowers, before His feet. Yet this same crowd shall, in five days’ time, clamor for His execution.

And how does that death come about? One of His own chosen disciples. For what? Because the Lord was not delivering the political revolution and liberation, which the Jews expected of their Messiah. So, for a bit of money, Judas Mercator Pessimus sold his Friend, Brother, Countryman, Messiah, King and God. One moment he shares bread with the Man, and the next, he arranges His betrayal.

> For if my enemy had reviled me, I would verily have borne with it. And if he that hated me had spoken great things against me, I would perhaps have hidden myself from him. But thou a man of one mind, my guide, and my familiar, Who didst take sweetmeats together with me: in the house of God we walked with consent.

And in our Lord's betrayal, what do we find? His own Apostles are positively bored with the situation. They're tired. They can't be bothered. Their Friend and God is sweating blood in the garden; the perfect humanity of Christ is preparing itself to endure a Passion which, precisely because of the perfection of that nature, shall be felt more keenly, and shall be more heinous and atrociously evil, than any suffering could otherwise be. And when the moment of capture comes, they all scatter and flee—the first collegial act of the pope in union with the bishops of the world! His chief apostle denies not once, but thrice, that he even knows the Man.

The crowning moment of impiety comes. His countrymen, not wishing to be blamed, connive to have him killed by the foreign invaders. Normally a country under occupation experiences an increased sense of solidarity; selling a countrymen out to the occupiers would be the most despicable thing one could do. Yet, wonder of wonders, even the foreigners are not so impious and bloodthirsty against this Judaean Peasant, no friend or brother of theirs! Even the unprincipled Pilate was embarrassed to kill Him. But the leaders of the Jews are busy winding up the crowd; come hell or high water, He'll die.

On the hill of Golgotha, we find our Lord still being mocked by His persecutors. His blessed mother and a few women are all that attend Him, along with St. John, the only Apostle who, after fleeing, returned to see things through. His mother, the Gospels tell us, had “treasured up all that was said, pondering them in her heart,” from His earliest childhood, when the shepherds and Magi had come, and when Simeon had prophesied, and when they had lost Him as He taught in the temple as a boy. This was it, the last remnant of faithful Israel: the Mother of God, some ladies, a young man. A single one of Israel’s teachers, St. Joseph of Arimathea, remained, offering to His Messiah his own tomb.

The events of HIs life are familiar to many of us—so familiar, that we easily read them without much surprise or reflection. Sometimes it helps to use an analogy; in our day, many men watch the joy of their domestic life wane, as the country turns immoral, wives turn bitter, children turn disobedient and ungrateful. Yet the men keep working and tending for them, out of love, and duty. This is a point from which to begin sympathizing with the Lord, for this is similar to what He endured, albeit on a vastly greater scale.

What Mystery of Iniquity is this, that the God and Savior of Mankind, should come to endure such universal and pervasive ingratitude, treachery and betrayal, especially from His own people and intimate friends, as a constant feature of His life? “And he shall turn the heart of fathers to their sons, and of sons to their fathers, lest I come and strike the earth with a curse.”

Rejected by all but a last remnant of His own, the Lord would invite others to join Him, instead. He told of a parable, in which a great man had prepared a wedding feast, but all of his kin and friends made excuses and absented themselves from it. The man therefore invited anyone that would come in from the streets and alleys, lest the rich banquet he prepared should be wasted and lacking in good cheer.

Those who come to this Marriage Supper, prepared on the gibbet of the Cross, become the new people of the Lord. Piety is sown anew in this race, grafted into the True Israel, Christ, through Baptism. Those who consent to be joined to Him are inducted into citizenship in the City of God, the City that perdures in piety. The rest, rank amongst the citizens of the City of Man, where only God's grace can liberate a man from the constant struggle against impiety. And the cruelest princes of this City are those who, having once belonged to Israel, whether of the Synagogue or of the Church, have become guilty of betraying the Body and Blood of the Lord.

The Scriptures teach that all citizens of the City of God have a part in "making up whatever is lacking" in the sufferings of Christ, of following Him in His struggle with the impiety of lost man; following this, the Fathers and Doctors have often remarked that the Church, through time, often goes through periods that bear a resemblance to His Passion, where she imitates her Lord in His suffering and betrayal.

Of no age would this be more true, than of the last and final contest between the Church and the Anti-Church, the City of God and the City of Man. When our course on Philosophy ends, I'll begin to address how the modern age is the age of that conflict, and how the mystery of impiety which we see all around us—the apostasy, the class warfare, the ethnic strife and betrayals, the whole of it—is the most complete recapitulation of the Lord's Passion in the Church, helping us to understand the failures and crises we perceive all around us.

On this day, however, contemplate the Blessed Virgin, who pondered and remained faithful to her Son in suffering, from her first glimpse of this at the prophecy of Simeon, through to the bitter death, the deposition from the Cross, the laying of His most pure Body in the tomb. What did she think, when that stone hid Him from sight? No, she did not despair; she waited to see what the Lord would do.

But that was not the end of His story; nor is this present evil the end of the Church's story. There is yet a day to spend with the Lord in Hell. And then…

When it comes, I wish a glorious Day of Resurrection to you all.

Read More: Why Is Modern Christianity So Wimpy?

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Why Muslim Men Become Terrorists

March 26, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

On March 22, 2016, the attacks in Brussels marked the fourth major terrorist attack witnessed in the Western world in just over a year. Once again, we are reminded by journalists, pundits, and politicians that terrorism has nothing to do with religion. Following the attacks on Brussels, President Obama stated, "This is yet another reminder that the world must unite. We must be together regardless of nationality, or race, or faith, in fighting against the scourge of terrorism."

What motivates a terrorist? Insert the standard hopes and projections of progressive leftism: how would you feel if Western colonial powers divided your lands, stole your oil, and insulted your culture? Furthermore, consider Bernie Sanders' nonsensical statements that terrorism is a consequence of climate change.

Above all, leftists claim that one can't take Islamic terrorists at their word: their statements about God, infidels, and martyrdom are obscuring their real motivations. It's obvious that Muslims want what everyone wants—political and economic security, a chance at a better life, and a bright future for their children.

There are four important factors that leftists fail to take into account: Religious scripture, the emptiness of Western decadence, destructive school curricula, and sexual frustration.

Divine Faith

The primary recruiting technique of ISIS is not social or financial but rather theological. The Quran and hadith (the collection of the quotes of the prophet Muhammad) are the highest sources of authority in Islam. ISIS references specific passages and calls upon Muslims their duty to fight against the enemies of Islam and to emigrate to the Islamic State once it has been established.

Part of the problem is that leftists are Godless, and therefore assume that anyone who claims they are doing something in the name of God must be lying or concealing their true motivations. They think to themselves that because they don't believe in God, most other people don't believe in Him either. Therefore they must be turning to terrorism because of factors that liberals can personally understand, like joblessness, oppression, or the cruelty of the West.

Following the murder of journalist James Foley by a British jihadist, President Obama said, "ISIL speaks for no religion." This is a delusional statement because the name of the religion which inspired this group is in their title "Islamic State." Somehow liberals think they understand the religion of Islam better than Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi who is the leader of ISIS and obtained a PhD in Islamic Studies.

Maajid Nawaz, author of the book Islam and the Future of Tolerance, has said,

> We Muslims must admit there are challenging Koranic passages that require reinterpretation today. Only by rejecting vacuous literalism are we able to condemn, in principle, ISIS-style slavery, beheading, lashing, amputation & other medieval practices forever (all of which are in the Quran).

In short, ISIS abides by a literal reading of the Quran, which is as close to "true Islam" as one can get. Liberals have a rosy-eyed view of any religion that is not Christianity. The fact of the matter is that terrorism has strong roots in religion. A cursory examination of history clearly shows that beliefs inform behavior and certain religious ideas—jihad, martyrdom, blasphemy, apostasy—reliably lead to violence and murder.

Whenever someone mentions the violent nature of Islam, politicians like Obama bring up the Crusades. Angela Merkel, when asked a question about whether the influence of Islam might have some unforeseen consequences on Europe, responded that Christianity hasn't been the perfect religion either. It's as though one person says, "That person murdered someone!" And another responds, "So what? Your ancestor murdered someone too!" as though that excuses all murder done by anyone in the present.

This point can be summed up by a quote from an article titled What ISIS Really Wants: "When a masked executioner says Allahu Akbar while beheading an apostate, sometimes he's doing so for religious reasons."

Consumer Culture Is No Match For God

There is severe ennui, a feeling of listlessness and dissatisfaction among the Western-born would-be jihadists. Lack of access to jobs or other economic factors cannot explain why Western-born Muslims are leaving the comforts of home to wage jihad in Syria and Iraq. These individuals are seeking some source of transcendental fulfillment, which Western-style consumerism has failed to provide.

In the West, Apple products have replaced God. While some young people are content to drink more Starbucks and buy more iPhones, others want the chance to become a part of something greater than themselves. SJWs do this by shouting about imaginary oppression, creating their own form of religion where the infidels are white males and conservative thinkers.

Decadence is the new religion for young Westerners

For people who have struggled to find meaning in their lives amid social media and consumer culture, ISIS is a thrilling cause that guarantees glory and esteem. It ensures that the person will be remembered after death for serving a cause worth fighting for. This is the theme of Michel Houellebecq's Submission, in which the narrator notes the appeal of Islam in light of the emptiness of Western consumerism and decadence.

Western Education Teaches Students To Hate Their Culture

What do potential terrorists think when they see this image?

While the transcendental aspect of religious terrorism explains why people might uproot their lives and move to another country, it doesn't explain why others in the West excuse or rationalize the behavior of terrorists.

The West lacks the confidence in its own culture to assert the values of a liberal democracy. School curricula have brainwashed citizens into thinking that the negative aspects of Western history far outweigh any benefits it has brought forth. For Western-born terrorists who go through our school systems, they quickly learn the evils of the West while remaining ignorant to the many benefits of living in a free society.

This is depicted in one reported scenario involving FBI agents and a teenage girl from a Chicago suburb on her way to Syria. When asked by the FBI if joining a group that controls the dress of women and beheads people with whom they disagree seemed like a good plan, the girl retorted "Well, what about the barrel bombings that kill thousands? Maybe if the beheading helps to stop that."

This is the inevitable result of an education curriculum and culture that repeatedly emphasizes the sins of the West, without instructing students on the advances made by their culture. Self-flagellating college student can speak at length about the effects of colonialism on non-Western countries or the horrible conditions of the American slave trade, but few are aware that countries like Afghanistan, Yemen, and Saudi Arabia did not outlaw slavery until well into the 20th century.

The failures of the West: Brussels, March 22, 2016.

If you present this fact to a student, it is guaranteed that they will spin it to somehow place the blame on Western countries. This in itself is a sort of soft prejudice—the belief that only the actions of Western countries matter, while others make no decisions unless they are in response to, or result of, the actions of the West.

Even the foundation of Western society—freedom of speech—is not given the appreciation it truly deserves. Leftists don't understand that this law exists to protect the communication of radical ideas. Freedom of speech laws weren't made to protect old ladies from saying, "Good morning" but rather to protect cartoonists who draw provocative images or writers who pen controversial satire. Freedom of speech is under assault by people who do not understand its importance and fragility.

Large Populations Of Sexually Frustrated Males Lead To Inevitable Violence

Another element of terrorism that is not given the attention it deserves is the sexual frustration of young males. Marriage and family have a stabilizing effect on men. Married men are far less likely to commit violent or sexual crimes.

In the Middle East, where polygamy is rampant, young males are left without sexual partners. Simple math shows that in a population of 10 men and 10 women, if 1 of the men has 4 wives, that leaves 6 single men. Scale that up to entire countries, and you can see this playing out across the Middle East.

In an article in The Economist, the author writes, “Wars, alas, give young men a chance to kill potential rivals (ie, other men) and seize or rape women. From Islamic State to the Lord’s Resistance Army in Uganda, rebel forces often let their troops treat females as spoils.”

In the same article, they note that polygamous societies suffer “higher rates of murder, theft, rape, social disruption, kidnapping (especially of females), sexual slavery and prostitution.”

One well-known passage from the Hadith is the reward of 72 virgins given to a martyr after death. This appeals directly to a young man’s sexual desires. Martyrs are not promised a well-paying job, political peace, or economic security. They are promised sexual partners. ISIS is now using the promise of sexual slaves to recruit new members.

The failure to understand the power of male sexuality has had destabilizing effects on the Middle East. As male-female relationships collapse in the West, with top tier males maintaining soft harems and beta males left out, the future looks bleak for young men in the West.

The four factors of religious inspiration, emptiness of consumer culture, indoctrination of Western education, and sexual frustration are motivating young males (and even females) to join the ranks of ISIS and wage jihad. Perhaps one day we will make good on our “pledge to do everything we can to assist our European allies.” But today, we won’t even honestly discuss the motivations of terrorism.

For young males, neomasculinity may be the only viable alternative philosophy to the decadence of the West and the violence of Islamic terrorism.

Read More: 6 Things I Learned From An American Terrorist

Rod Berne
Rod Berne is a student, writer, and thought criminal. His columns run every Saturday. Follow him on Twitter.

World’s Number One Male Tennis Player Says Women Do Not Deserve “Equal” Pay

March 26, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Men’s world number one (and therefore humanity’s world number one) tennis player Novak Djokovic has claimed that women do not deserve equal pay in tennis. With smaller revenue streams coming from the women’s game, Djokovic had argued that men were entitled to more remuneration. At present, the major tournaments feature separate male and female fields at the same event, a situation that many feel benefits the less popular WTA, which can piggyback off the higher prestige of the men’s game, the ATP.

Djokovic is on more than just solid ground. Once male and female tournaments are held at different times or in different locations, which happens most of the time for events below Grand Slam and Masters level, there is a marked disparity in crowd numbers, greatly favoring the ATP. Even in combined events, men’s final tickets sell at higher prices than those for the women’s decider, reflecting much higher demand. In earlier matches at Grand Slams, men’s contests have far less empty seats, even when they are held in much larger arenas.

In addition, matters of crowd numbers and television audiences do not take into account the fact that the fields are separate to begin with. So-called equal pay is an artificial construct because the female players, aside from very unpopular mixed doubles events, never compete against superior male players (and never one-on-one). If they did, even a doctored version of equal pay could not come into the picture.

The gulf between the sexes is so bad in tennis, as Roosh recently demonstrated, that notoriously undisciplined, chain-smoking, and beer-guzzling journeyman Karsten Braasch throttled the Williams sisters when he was in his 30s and they were pristine physical specimens, at least by female standards. Plus, each sister only had to play one set, whereas he played two.

Yes, Djokovic backtracked but we should celebrate his public honesty

Well-known crybaby Andy Murray attacked Djokovic's comments, forever sealing his status as an effeminate white knight.

As the recipient of millions in sponsorship funds, and being publicly criticized by pathetic white knights like world number two Andy Murray and a host of female players supported by powerful media interests, Djokovic was forced to backtrack. Some may bemoan this, but I choose to focus on the positives. One of the highest-profile male athletes on the planet decided to speak out on a topic of gender-based lunacy. To boot, he did so when he was in the prime of his career, ranked number one in the world and by far the most accomplished player of the last five years, easily surpassing Federer, Nadal, and Murray during that time.

The Serbian champion's forthrightness is an anomaly in men's tennis, where those speaking out against the fraud of equal pay are usually less well-known players, such as Gilles Simon, Xavier Malisse, and Sergiy Stakhovsky. Nevertheless, Simon in particular claims that many in the men's locker room agree with him. This idea is backed up by Malisse's publicly stated preference in 2012 that Simon, not him, take up the issue so he could avoid being called sexist. It is these less famous men who suffer the most from equal pay, as maintaining a tennis career is terribly expensive, requiring even unknown players to fly around the world, pay for coaches, and live in hotels for most of the year. Money that should be going to them is invariably doled out to inferior female players in the name of equality.

Novak Djokovic's outspokenness is also significant because it demonstrates to anyone following after him that a person will not die from challenging the gender status quo. Though he did end up apologizing, he broke a cardinal rule of celebrityhood: always praise the “achievements” of women and do not put them in proper perspective. Yet the effect on his career, at least from my vantage point and that of most other commentators, will be minimal. Speaking out against feminism may seriously skin the noses of male athletes and others with less money and fame than a Djokovic, but it is not impossible for them to come through the witch-hunt that follows.

It’s time to throw our weight behind men who tell the truth

We are meant to believe that Maria Sharapova has as many tennis “skills” as a Djokovic or Federer.

Do not just admire other men for their physical prowess, sporting skills, business acumen, or other talents. Admire them for what they stand for, especially when they challenge oft-repeated lies about equality and other political fictions. It is fine for someone to dedicate their life to a particular form of mastery, but what good is it to society if they do not use their accomplishments to make positive social change? No, Djokovic is not a Roosh or a Donald Trump and, yes, he did back down. But he is certainly a cut above an Andy Murray and countless other ball-less sports stars and celebrities, those “men” who never bother trying to say anything controversial. In fact, many of these individuals go out of their way to support political correctness in order to pad their wallets and fan bases.

From professional sports to the workplace, incremental change in challenging feminism is something we have to accept. Just as the retrograde influence of feminism has creeped up on society, so too will the reversal of it require time, in the short-term at least. Novak Djokovic’s comments need to be seen as a useful contribution to our cause, however insufficient they may at first appear.

Read More: What Women's Tennis Says About "Equal" Pay

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

7 Things I Learned About Masculinity From Wandering The Paris Catacombs

March 27, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Under Paris, France, is a network of ancient quarries mined for building stone. It was dug for centuries during the middle Ages. Later on, as Paris kept growing and needed a solid ground for sustaining its constructions, most of the quarries were filled.

Nowadays, a small part of these can be legally visited. This part has been turned into an underground ossuary at the juncture of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. If you happen to visit Paris and are okay with the possibility of queuing for two hours, I greatly recommend you to visit the place. After being greeted with a stone sign that says "Stop! Here is the empire of death," you will walk chilly galleries, amongst bone walls, skulls-surrounded round pillars, masterpieces of stone architecture and a lot of other tourists. Were there not too many of them, the visit would be a true memento mori.

Yet the official Paris Catacombs are but a small part of the whole underground network. More than a hundred kilometers of man-made galleries run south of the Seine. The official tour guide won't tell you much about these. Indeed, these galleries are forbidden to go. Some subterranean aficionados, called cataphiles (catacomb-o-philes), go there more or less secretly. Part of them have actual construction skills and open or reopen entrances to the large, non-official underground network. Entrances are usually closed by the authorities. That does not prevent, though, the cataphiles from returning twenty meters underground—exploring, chilling, partying, practising photography and so on.

Cataphiles call "tourists" as those who come to the network for the first time or do not know it well. I have been a "tourist." Then I came back, again and again, and I turned into a cataphile. When I was a "tourist," I was still a boy. Today, with more than a hundred visits under my belt, I believe the experience of the remblai (backfill) and châtières (crawling spaces) made me more of a man.

1. A challenging environment

Tunnels are a long walk. Some of them are small. Some are indeed so small that they are called châtières, because only a cat could walk them on feet. A fair proportion are inundated, and let me tell you that water there is quite cold (and magnificently pure as long as you don't walk in).

Entrances are often challenging to reach or open. Sometimes, an entrance is easy to open, or you can even go through it without the least opening effort, but will have to walk a long way in a forbidden zone to access it; sometimes, the entrance is close to reach but you have to lift a heavy manhole cover before descending a long ladder.

The "Catacombes" environment is akin to what a place for expeditions look like. It has not been made all flat and uniform so that fat, lazy men can drive through. It is not riddled with MacDonald's, Starbucks or other quick-consumption scourge. The underground network alternates between beautiful rooms, historical and geological curiosities, and obstacle course. It is a place one explores in the fullest sense of the term.

2. An improved physical condition

Crawling in a small tunnel is a daily occurrence down there

Walking for hours, crawling in châtières, climbing ladders, walking again, lifting manhole covers will put you in shape. Burning fat, better cardio, better proprioception… someone who does a full visit, north to south (or the reverse), is more than a good walker. You know you can trust your body when you manage to lift a +100kg manhole while being drunk early on Saturday.

Once a year, the cataphiles organize a "catasprint": guys with a good condition and a thorough knowledge of the network can participate to a track game, where they must go from A to B, B to C, and so on, without knowing where C is before they get to B. If you prefer going at your own pace, there is nothing like sipping a fine beer while breathless runners keep going in and out the room you are squatting.

3. A better sense of logistics

Cataphiles walking down the tunnels

Dark tunnels going everywhere. Meandering paths. Here and there, an engraved or enameled street sign. The first time you go there, you quickly lose sense of where the entrance was. Feels quite scary, but also exciting and challenging. When you come back, you get accustomed to the surroundings and start remembering the relative position of the tunnels.

If you are motivated enough, you can find a map on the Internet (or, in exceptional cases, below: my first map was a present from a seasoned cataphile), study it, print it. Doing so, you realize that many tunnels actually follow the paths of the streets. Then, honing your sense of orientation in the catacombs, you start noticing how it improves in general. For me, Paris stopped being a loose patchwork sewn by subway lines and turned into something I could have a real mental map of.

Eventually, in foreign cities, I had an almost intuitive sense of where each district and main streets were and of the directions, to the point of sometimes helping local girls finding theirs.

Along the same lines, going regularly to the catacombes accustoms you to organize. You must think about your bag, what you will put in—remember that there is no shop down there, which means you have to bring your own alcohol; I once ran dry at 3 AM and have found it thirsting enough not to let it happen again—, what entrance you mean to use, what path you intend to go forth.

If you gain an intuitive sense of orientation, know to pack a bag and can trust your own ability to wander down there with a relative safety, you become more confident.

4. Memento mori

"Hello there!"

Modern society revolves around the pretension that we are "progressing." One of the oldest dreams of humanity, a dream which found a renewed vigour in modernism, is of suppressing death. As a result, we have witnessed the rise of overmedicalization, therapeutic obstinacy, a subtle anguish of being completely annihilated at the end of our lives and a consequent use of diversions that mask the inescapable. The Earth is overcrowded, depleted, death is more present than before thanks to sensationalist media, and it means absolutely nothing.

In contrast, a more traditional point of view gives sense to death. If we are more than mere bodies and "emergent properties" (that is, consciousness without a soul), then perhaps death is not only the end of a hedonistic party, but something more positive. While it recalls us the vanity and impermanence of the purely earthly, it is also embedded into life and cosmos themselves.

The traditional point of view is much easier to get in the Catacombs. Away from the neatly cleaned official ones, under the Montparnasse cemetery, are caches with many bones. "Look at them well, because one day you will be the same!" I once had an awkward moment when I found a skull that still had its teeth. The teeth, I did realize, still looked alive, just like mine. I got a strange feeling of communion with the dead. This is the memento mori: remember that you will die once.

The entertainment culture is full of fake characters and immature celebrities. There, under Paris, with all the earth and dust you can imagine, amongst a paradoxical mixture of cataphile circulation and speechless bones, one finds the very real remnants of real—and nameless—ancestors. Entertainment cuts you from your roots and self-knowledge; in contrast, dwelling among these piled bones recalls you where you come from, what you are, and where you will eventually go.

5. A special social life

A late supper in an abandoned air-raid shelter

Cataphiles are overwhelmingly masculine. A few exceptions aside, most girls I've met there were following the lead of a male guide. If you want to take advantage of the place for having sex, the better thing to do is bringing down a girl you already know. Having sex in a room where many visitors pass is an exciting thrill.

The place is good for camaraderie and meeting with random people. In Paris, bars are expensive, overcrowded, and all too often full of smug bobos. Under Paris, people are scarcer and of a more sympathetic breed. Visitors always say bonsoir to other visitors. Being in a small stone room with another group invites to socialization. It is not impossible to make new friends there. From the low-wage student to the telecommunications CEO, one can meet with a wide mix of social backgrounds.

If you are lucky, you may be invited to a rave party. Some places underground are large enough to host more than a hundred individuals. There, seasoned partygoers bring a whole sound system and lights to supply them by stealing power from the grid.

6. Craftsmanship and works

These fine benches didn’t make themselves

There is always some work to do in order to maintain or improve the underground network. Some tunnels are covered with graffiti and in need for a rub with an iron brush. Excessively visited rooms crawl under garbage. Someone must clean, but Paris officials won’t care. Only the cataphiles do.

If you’ve got manual skills, tools and some patience, you can restore a decaying room or even build a whole new one. Carving a stone so that it can be put into a bench, a table, or a new wall; making mortar; lifting a stone before hitting it with a mallet… These works are manly stuff. And when you spent hours rubbing, cementing, hauling huge bags, you can be proud to drink a beer or wine while sitting on a bench you helped to build.

Maintenance and building as practiced by the cataphiles stem from a true care for the place. The bobos love to talk about ecology, pretend to care about nature, whereas their laziness and snobbishness have them repelled at the idea of actually dirtying their hands. Just like old-fashioned land work, helping to maintain or improve the Catacombs network is genuine care for a valuable environment.

7. The pleasure of initiating

Inspecting a printed map

When one has enough cataphile experience, one can start to guide other people down the tunnels. You don't need to be inducted for becoming a guide—knowing the entrances, the paths, and owning the proper gear is enough. Then, you can have the immense pleasure to plan your own one-night trip and show the network to your friends. This is something one learns to do, just like craftsmanship.

Le mot de la fin

Going down to the Catacombs really got me out of my comfort zone. By hitting the underground one night per week for more than a year, I became a bit more enduring, more able to sustain swallowing a lot of beer cans and overall more confident. If you happen to visit Paris, at least try to make it through the queue as to visit the official, museum-status Catacombs. Or, better yet, try to find a local ready to lead you deeper. Guides usually don't take payments, but bringing alcohol, food, and genuine curiosity will greatly help sealing the deal.

Of course, it must be recalled that going to the unofficial underground network without a written authorization from the General Quarries Inspection is absolutely forbidden. Being caught wandering inside the network or trying to access it is punishable by a fine of 60 euros. If you go there, you do so at your own risk and should be held fully responsible if you end up losing yourself in the labyrinth. After all, who said that masculinity was without at least some risk?

Read More: Why You Should Not Go See "Max Max: Feminist Road"

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

5 Ways To Improve High School Gym Class

March 27, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Anybody who went to public school undoubtedly remembers gym class—more accurately, they remember how much it sucks. Ignoring the difficulties that awkward, hormonal teenage boys have with unwanted erections caused by seeing their nubile female classmates prance about in hot pants, a realization will quickly come upon all but the densest of students:

This class is completely worthless for its intended purpose.

At best, you'll be playing basketball or soccer or some other team sport which will give you a decent cardio workout. At worst you'll be doing nothing physical at all, instead sitting in a classroom listening to a bitter divorcee lecturing you about why men are the devil and why girls should stay away from them, all under the guise of being a sex education class.

Not my sex ed teacher, but a reasonable doppelganger of her.

How did this occur? A brief history lesson shall elucidate matters:

The History Of Physical Education

Physical fitness programs have largely existed in some form or another as long as there has been some method of paying trainers. While the idea of “physical education” being a field of study in schools (i.e., a body-and-mind hardening device meant to build character in the youngfolk) can arguably be traced back to the Spartan agoge, the deliberately cultivated brutality of this particular system—far beyond the useful, moderate amount of social shaming I advocate in my own writing--–would make any sensible person not want to cite this as a good starting point. Well, that and the deliberate taking of children from their homes, political repression, and constant pederasty that characterized the culture of that Peloponnesian city-state.

Physical fitness as we know it today started in the Renaissance and Baroque periods (fittingly, with their idealization of classical Greece and Rome). Early mass-produced books such as El Libro del Ejercicio Corporal y Sus Provechos by Cristobal Mendez, and De Arte Gymnastica by Mercurialis explained the benefits of a dedicated physical fitness regimen, methods of doing so, and analyzed these exercises to the highest standard of medicine of that time. It even suggested routines for women, children, and the elderly.

With the introduction of public schooling and mass education, physical education was adapted for that purpose. Much like how the modern Western school system is largely based on the 19th century Prussian model, so too was early physical education—German educators such as Friedrich Jahn felt that training the youth both physically and mentally was the best way to benefit his nation in the future (it’s worth pointing out that he was a veteran of the Napoleonic Wars), and such masculine nationalism quickly spread throughout Europe and to the United States.

In all countries, physical fitness was seen as next to mental fitness, and both were necessary to make a worthwhile citizen. Gymnastics and its accompanying apparatuses were literally invented during this time, and the typical grueling training of this sport was used deliberately to build strong men.

Remnants of this ancient, rediscovered, and again buried physical tradition remain in high school gyms across the United States: they still have gymnastic rings, Swedish Ladders, Pommel Horses, climbing ropes, and parallel bars buried deep within their storage closets. This is to be expected, as such apparatuses were in use well into the 20th century.

In my opinion, it is likely the combination of rising obesity rates and an increasing litigiousness in American society that led to schools essentially throwing up their hands and saying “To hell with it.” Realizing that none of their students would be capable of completing the tests, and not wanting to anger their sue-happy parents, they decided to make gym as easy as possible. As to why obesity rates and litigiousness increased so dramatically, that would require several articles to explain.

How To Improve Things?

It has been said by many writers that no American student of today would be capable of doing schoolwork that their countrymen of a century ago were capable of doing (having been educated in America, I cannot speak for other nations, but I imagine it’s similar). And indeed, having read excerpts from a reader textbook from a middle school in 1905, I honestly feel that most high school seniors would struggle with it.

Physical education is no exception. Look at the La Sierra PT program, introduced in California in the late 1940s and used across the country until the 1970s. It was a grueling bodyweight-only strength program combined with a difficult obstacle course that emphasized physical movement. Perhaps your gym had a peg board hanging on a wall high over your head, or a high ropes course, the purpose of which you never understood. These are remnants of this forgotten program.

Observe a boys only gym class from the early 1960s. It is astounding that an entire class could be so fit and trim.

As I begin enumerating the list of things that would help public phys ed, I'm not necessarily saying this program should be exactly copied for 2016, but…actually, to hell with it, I am.

1. Use the La Sierra Program, or a similar program with slight modifications

This program appears to be a pretty solid calisthenic program, with a few "tricks" thrown into it that are interesting as well—things like the peg climbing board or a ropes course. In my opinion, something similar to the Convict Conditioning curriculum would largely be acceptable, with some natural movement rigors to supplement it. It's not like you'd need to buy much equipment for it, since the average high school probably has Swedish ladders, gymnastics rings, and climbing ropes in its closets.

2. Have teachers who know what they're doing

Seems pretty obvious, but a teacher should lead by example—he should be reasonably capable of doing similar rigors to his or her students, as well as guiding his students through each progressive step and knowing how to diagnose injury if necessary. I assume I'm not the only person who had a fat, chain-smoking gym teacher, and I think we can all agree that a teacher should be able to do more than just watch and make sure nobody gets killed.

3. Allow the natural hierarchy of masculinity to run its course—within limits

As anybody who has ever interacted with a group of men knows, a hierarchy of masculinity will naturally form itself pretty quick. Despite what self-esteem pushers will tell you, this is normally a good thing. Boys tend to be inspired to achieve more if they see another man that is more masculine than them. The teacher does not need to encourage this happening, but as a sensible adult, I feel that the teacher should keep some basic regulation of this—mainly, so that actual physical hazing and bullying are avoided. In other words, there has to be a balance between the “Everybody gets a trophy” mentality and being “beaten in,” gangland style.

4. Grade, but be fair

While I have repeatedly been saying that physical education should be graded, and should be demanding, I understand that some people are naturally athletic, and some are not. Therefore, I propose that PE should be graded heuristically: by improvement.

For example, let’s assume that, hypothetically, a student comes into the school already capable of doing all of the advanced calisthenic maneuvers. He should be graded based upon how many repetitions with proper form he can add to his routine, or his progression to even more advanced maneuvers such as iron crosses, tiger stands, fingertip or clapping variations, increased time for static holds, etc.

In contrast, a student who is so weak he has to start with the knee pushups should be greatly commended if he can make his way up to the “hand and a half” push-up. Although he has not completed the series, it is clear the effort has been put in and is respectable—and besides, there’s always next year to test again.

Such a grading schemata is demanding of the students, but is also fair as it judges each student by their own skill level.

5. Understand that sexes are different, and make a routine for girls

While we often speak of fitness as something masculine—and it certainly is—women should also be encouraged to be fit. In my hypothetical curriculum standards would be lesser than those for the men. As this is not the military or another job where people’s lives are on the line, somewhat lesser standards for girls are acceptable.

To cite one example, girls would not be using the gymnastic rings in their training, instead using parallel bars or another apparatus that emphasizes female athleticism (namely balance and dexterity rather than raw power).

A sample curriculum

Having said all of this, you might be wondering what my curriculum would be. Assuming that PE is done twice a week in a block class, you could alternate between endurance or movement and strength days.

Day 1: 20 minute lecture on any related topic-sexual education, nutrition, musculature, etc, followed by the exercises—timed mile run to warm up, followed by muscular endurance and natural movement: rope climbs, obstacle course, peg boards, etc. Followed by cool down, showers.

Day 2: Lecture on related topic, followed by the exercises: the calisthenic series with push-ups, squats, pull-ups, leg raises, bridging, handstand push-ups. When complete, advance to gymnastics maneuvers: parallel bar handstands, ring work, etc.

And on occasion, the students can play some sportsball or do something frivolous and fun. Say what you will about my idea, it can’t be worse than what they’re doing now.

Read More: How Not To Deal With High School Bullies

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

8 Ways Women Destroy Themselves (And Everyone Else) By Sleeping Around

March 28, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Many women are woefully unhappy in spite of living under the most privileged conditions ever afforded by civilization. No matter how much they receive and how much they indulge, nothing ever satiates their needs and wants. Satisfaction of one of their desires only leads to a plethora of new ones along with a deeper sense of discontentment.

And of all the areas of a woman's life, her sexuality is the most fragile trait that not only affects her own life but that of men and the society at large. It's becoming more important than ever to educate young women that unrestrained sexual ventures come with a heavy price tag for all. Without further ado, here are eight things that should be taught in sex-ed classes about female "sexual freedom" that are currently being neglected in schools.

1. Sexually Transmitted Diseases

No further explanation should be needed, but with the combination of hubris, recklessness, and widespread sexual experimentation (i.e. homosexuality), more and more young people are turning into walking disease shops. And while the prevalence of STDs is equal for both sexes, the consequences are worse for women who carry the burden of childbirth. Now, guess who pays for the billions of dollars a year that is being burdened on the healthcare system? (Hint: It's usually not the women themselves.)

2. Unintended Pregnancy

This is another thing that should be obvious, but it is not the case for today's spoiled gatekeepers of reproduction. You would think that living in a first-world country with sex education and wide availability of contraceptives would prevent unwanted pregnancies, but that isn’t so for many feminist-infested countries that encourage girls to slut around from a young age. Taxpayers continue to feel the brunt of today’s pregnant teen whores while thousands of babies are aborted on a daily basis. And why would women care? They never have to pay for their freedom.

3. Substance Abuse And Other Problems

It seems slutting around is the biggest gateway drug to drugs. One study showed that there is a much greater link between promiscuity and substance abuse among women compared to men. A woman who had two or three sex partners when they were in their teens showed ten times more incidence of drug or substance abuse by the time they reached 21.

Besides drug abuse, you should also be aware that promiscuity is also linked to BPD, history of sexual abuse, and other psychological problems. Whether these problems are the cause of slut behaviour or vice versa is not important: it just proves that sluts are damaged goods to be avoided.

4. Infidelity And Failed Marriages

Women aren't even aware of their own fickle nature. I once had a cranky feminist (I've never met one who was happy) tell me that women who are virgins prior to marriage were more likely to cheat as they never experienced having "fun" when they were young. But studies have shown the exact opposite. It was obvious to me that the pixie-haired broad was insecure about her slut status and wanted to encourage all other women to fall to her level.

Women who slut around lose a piece of themselves every time they fuck and suck a different man's cock; you just can't have the same ability to bond with another human being after letting multiple men bang you up like a rag doll. To a woman who lost her innocence to a dozen or more men, a husband can only be seen as a walking ATM machine who will donate his sperm before she completely dries up. You can be sure that she is still thinking about all the dark triad men she's been with to suppress the disgust she feels at the loser who worships her and calls her "honey."

5. Complications From The Pill

Many young women seem to be forgetting that birth control pills are synthetic hormones. Are women really naive enough to believe that taking powerful hormones on a daily basis will not have any long-term repercussions on their health? There are reports that they may cause mood swings, lower libido, cervical and breast cancers, higher blood pressure, blood clotting, and permanent infertility, among other things. One study finds that it may even shrink parts of the brain and affect its functions. That, in combination with the fact that women are now giving birth later in their life may be the clue as to why we have so many children today who were born with developmental disorders.

6. It May Destroy Your Looks (Along With Your Soul)

The thousand cock stare is real and I've seen it with my own eyes. A person's physical being is a reflection of their soul and you can always see the vapid lifelessness of a former slut who has long lost her flower of innocence. If women truly care about their looks, they should take care of their beauty from the inside out.

7. Ostracism

While feminists complain endlessly about how men slut-shame women, it seems that other women are by far the bigger instigators of such slut-shaming "culture." Any slut today will quickly find herself shunned and isolated by her superficial and insecure friends—even by those who are sluts themselves.

So much for sisterhood.

8. Decreased Happiness

“Is he really the best I can do?”

With the accumulation of all the above points, it shouldn’t be a surprise that all sluts are either utterly unhappy or are pretending not to be. They’ve wasted their prime years on empty pleasures and have nothing to look forward to. Each and every one of these sluts that I’ve known, who are now approaching the 30 year old mark, are thoroughly miserable underneath their superficial Facebook lives and are trying futilely to re-live their youthful days.

They’re never content with any of the men they meet because they’re looking for their own Christian Grey while they themselves have nothing to offer. Therefore, the only way these sluts can compensate for the profound emptiness in their souls is to engage in materialistic orgy and to submit themselves to career slavery to numb themselves.

And what about the men?

The favorite response of feminists to any sort of critical observation of their behavior is: What about the men? Men do it too! Double standards! Boo-hoo!

Besides number one (which is rather negligible), none of the other points apply to men as they do to women. Men are largely unaffected by promiscuity in comparison to women. Men tend to become more attractive with time, as they are dependent much less on their youth for value, and men certainly don't have friends who hate on them for having sex with lots of women (hating on other men's sexual success is only for the incel male-feminists).

Conclusion

Western girls are spoiled from a young age to think that they can have it all.

To conclude, giving young women free reign over their sexuality is as damaging and moronic as letting children free reign over their own life development. For women to think that they can defy biology and do as the men do is completely asinine and damaging to themselves and the society as a whole.

You have to remember that an individual woman doesn't care about the cost to the society (which she feels entitled to), the culture (which she feels should cater to all her needs), the sanctity of marriage and family (which she considers oppressive or getting in the way of her career), or even her own long-term personal health and happiness. For today's young Western woman, all that matters is the fleeting pleasure, the youthful excitement, and what she feels is right—at that moment in time.

With their superior ability to rationalize their own misconducts, women rarely think about the future consequences. For this reason, our ancestors knew better and decided that it would be best to control women's behaviour instead of allowing them to corrode the moral fabric of society. Any woman who reads this will do well for herself by maintaining her health, chastity, and femininity for a man who would be worthy of being her husband.

Here's a personal anecdote: There was one woman I met who lived a life of adventure when she was young, and she told me how she had cheated on her boyfriends multiple times. She is still not married and now lives with depression and painful regrets—she just can't seem to piece her shattered self-esteem back together. She had been kind to me, so I felt sorry for her pain, but there was nothing I could do to help her. So, ladies, if you don't want to listen to some online "misogynist"—and assuming that you're not a psychopath incapable of remorse and human bonding—at least try to remember her.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 12 Ways Danish Women Are Different From Brazilian Women

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

American Media Misleads The Public By Promoting Iceland’s Broken Family Model

March 28, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A recent article on CNN’s site painted a rosy, rapturous picture of Iceland as a nation that has finally figured out a way to survive and prosper without marriage. The article was entitled, “Is Marriage Outdated In Iceland?”, and it typifies the kind of agenda-shaping propaganda that passes for journalism in the mainstream media.

We are first presented with a startling statistic: 67% of children in Iceland are born to parents who are unmarried. Then a woman is interviewed, who gushes:

> You have this horrible term in English, ‘broken families,’ which basically means just if you get divorced, then something’s broken. But that’s not the way it is in Iceland at all. We live in such a small and secure environment, and the women have so much freedom. So you can just, you can choose your life.

Bryndis, we are told, has three kids with two partners and “not a drop of shame or regret.” What is left unsaid, of course is the fact that this paradise on earth is made possible by special confluence of factors that would not be possible in most other countries.

To begin with, the entire country has a population of only 320,000 people. Everyone generally knows who is who, and a lot can be deduced just by knowing what part of the island a person is from. So when the statistic of “67% of children born outside of marriage” is bandied about, we must also remember that the people of the country have a degree of consanguinity and homogeneity that not even Japan or Korea can match.

Iceland runs almost completely on renewable energy (geothermal), due to the fact that it sits atop an area of extensive volcanic activity. No other country can say this. The result is that the country does not need to spend the huge sums that other countries do on petroleum refinement and importation. Citizens and the government have to spend very little on electricity and hot water. The country has no external enemies and, as a consequence, spends nothing on defense or weapons systems.

Also left unsaid—for reasons I will let the reader reflect on—is the fact that this marriage-less paradise is made possible only by the fact that Iceland has one of the most extensive welfare systems in the world. Even the recent financial crisis has left the welfare system relatively unaffected. According to one recent study,

> Family care policy has, comparatively, been minimally affected by the financial crisis. However, there have been some changes to generous parental leave policy. The ceiling on parental leave payments was lowered in July 2009 from 400,000 ISK [Icelandic kroner] to 350,000 ISK, and then further decreased to 300,000 ISK in December 2009. To compensate, the allowable timeframe for parental leave was extended from 18 months to 36 months. Additionally, payments have been increased to 80 percent of earnings for earnings lower than 200,000 ISK and 75 percent of earnings over 200,000 ISK. Thus policies on family care have retained their socio-democratic character despite cuts in government expenditures necessitated by the economic crisis.

Actually, it’s even better for Icelanders: according to the CNN article, Iceland guarantees “some of the most generous parental leave in the world, nine months at 80% pay (three months for mom, three for dad and another three to be divvied up).”

So it's not hard to see why it's so easy to "choose your own life" when the government is paying for everything, your country has no external threats, spends nothing on defense, and you are an isolated island in the middle of the North Atlantic.

I say all this not out of any desire to criticize Iceland. I have much respect for the fact that they value their heritage and culture, and take real steps to ensure that their language retains its distinctive and unadulterated character. They've found a system that works for them, and they are doing what is in their best interests. But to imply that their system can and should be duplicated in other places would be misleading.

Saving the whales: Iceland's biggest problem

The coded message here, of course, is that marriage is dead, and the government (that is, everyone else) should pay to support children born out of wedlock. This is the paradigm shift that the mainstream media has been creeping towards for some time now.

It is impossible to deny that Iceland's social institutions and customs are impossible to apply to the rest of the world. For the reasons given above, a "no marriage" policy is possible only because Icelandic women have found a far more wealthy "husband": the government. Who needs a husband when Big Daddy government is there to pay for everything?

I question the motives of news outlets like CNN when they deliberately fail to disclose material information when it comes to reporting on social issues. The impression given by the article—and the message that no doubt the average reader will take away—is that marriage is unnecessary, family is unnecessary, and everyone can just do whatever they want. One can only conclude that American media outlets are deliberately trying to undermine traditional social institutions by presenting materially false or misleading information.

This is hardly new news to readers of the alternative media. But it is important to document examples of mainstream media disinformation, so ensure that agendas and biases are placed squarely on display.

Read More: Why Creating Outgroups Manufactures Outrage

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How Mass Immigration Is Driven By Female Consumerism And Low Fertility

March 28, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

A recently released report reveals that a full in 1 in 5 people in the United States are now either immigrants or their children. The growth of the immigrant population has been occurring at a rate of over 350% since 1965. This tidal wave of immigration has inundated the traditional American population, who have been asleep at the switch thinking that having children is either déclassé or an antiquated notion. As a result, they are being demographically replaced in their own nations.

While illegal immigration is a valid issue, it is a scare tactic used by political elites to drive the construction of the police state security apparatus. In reality, legal immigration is a much bigger problem. Yet, the political class on both sides of the aisle have been calling for an even bigger increase of legal immigration. Of the now 61 million people that are immigrants or their children in the United States, a whopping 75% are here legally because of both the Immigration Act of 1965 and the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986.

The Consumerism Machine

In order to keep a consumption economy that needs perpetual growth running, the political and economic powers in our society need an ever-increasing population. Declining populations are correlated with recessions and depressions while growing populations are correlated with economic growth. But is continuing to feed a machine that expects perpetual growth with warm bodies worth the costs? The West has lost its culture and is losing its entire society at the altar of consumerism, which has brought about demographic replacement because of radical feminism.

Part of the reason the United States and Europe are importing so many immigrants is feminism has rendered white women statistically sterile. Birth rates are not enough to even sustain the population, much less create an engine of economic growth.

Yes, that's a dog in that baby carriage and not a child

Feminism encourages women to forgo their biological roles as mothers and to forgo forming families. In the modern age, Western women now marry themselves to a corporation rather than to a strapping young man. As a result, the white population continues to wither away and die in America and in Europe and be demographically replaced. Tragically, women are now looking for child replacements like cats and dogs to silence their maternal instincts.

The Numbers

Women refusing to have families and children requires the flood gates of immigration to be swung open because a consumer economy needs increasing numbers of warm bodies to buy its wares. The effects are illustrated in the graph from NumbersUSA below. Low fertility and mass immigration are leading to irreversible demographic change in the United States and Europe. The proportion of immigrants is only expected to rise this century.

It is easy to see how this will cause further division among the already polarized American populace. The specter of further polarization rings especially true when combined with a political system that operates through division, dividing people up into ever more splintered groups and subgroups that then compete with one another for government affection and gibsmedats.

Of the nearly 600 million people in the U.S. by 2100, only 250 million or less will be descended from Americans who did not immigrate to the country after 1970. Real demographers knew the world we are in now was coming decades ago, but nothing was done to avert replacing traditional Americans with immigrants.

Americans of all ethnicities, with family who lived in the country before 1970 are increasingly becoming strangers in their own culture to feed perpetual economic growth

It seems in today's world, destroying national sovereignty and cultures to turn people into shopping fools is an acceptable strategy by government in service of the corporate bottom line. This idea is nothing new, as it was developed into a screenplay 40 years ago in the 1976 drama Network:

> You are an old man who thinks in terms of nations and peoples. There are no nations. There are no peoples. There are no Russians. There are no Arabs. There are no third worlds. There is no West. There is only one holistic system of systems, one vast and immane, interwoven, interacting, multivariate, multinational dominion of dollars. Petro-dollars, electro-dollars, multi-dollars, reichmarks, rins, rubles, pounds, and shekels.

Two generations later, the warnings in this film ring truer than ever when it comes to the world populace being placed into an figurative ethnic blender in service of an economic waste machine. Cultures are lost, nations are lost, but people can buy lots of shiny things they do not need.

Free Market

The need for mass immigration to the West has been caused by feminism, and feminism was designed by a collusion of corporate and government interests to take women out of the home and turn them into corporate cogs and taxpayers. The rise of corporate monopolies and the disproportionate power they (using their government servants) exert over the lives of the average person is a corruption of the free economic market.

> In a free-market economy, prices for goods and services are set freely by the forces of supply and demand and are allowed to reach their point of equilibrium without intervention by government policy, and it typically entails support for highly competitive markets and private ownership of productive enterprises.

That said, Adam Smith himself warned about the dangers of a completely unregulated market. Smith knew that a completely unregulated market would see the rise of monopolies (like today's corporate monopolies) and was therefore not free. Government imposition is a dangerous thing when it comes to economies, but it is sometimes necessary. The problem is instead of preventing monopolies as it should, the government has aided and abetted them.

One of the problems created by the unchecked consolidation of corporations, in addition to the issue of converging interests corrupting government and subverting the will of the people on matters like immigration, is wage gutting.

The left blames corporations while the right blames the government, when in reality the two interests work together to subvert the will of the people

Wage Gutting

Corporate interests support increasing legal immigration even further, which has one major benefit for them: cheap labor.

One of the biggest pushes in the past few years has been to drastically increase the number of legal foreign workers in the United States. Executives like Mark Zuckerberg are calling for major increases in the H1B "temporary" worker visa program. This is because of a supposed tech worker shortage. However, the idea of a tech worker shortage has largely been created out of whole cloth by Zuckerberg and his ilk in Silicon Valley. Even the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, a legacy media newspaper pointed out the hypocrisy of the tech industry's claims:

> When compensation in these fields is declining, along with benefits and security, bright students understandably look elsewhere for their future. Companies then use the predictable data to create a doomsday scenario to justify expanding the number of H-1B visas.
>
> It's a vicious circle.

So no, Zuckerberg, there is no true tech worker shortage. There is a shortage of citizens willing to work for third-world wages in the United States.

This is yet another example of the corporate-government complex at work. The tech industry doesn't want to pay workers what they are worth, so they lobby Congress for increasing immigration to suppress wages. The government then enacts immigration laws and regulations favorable to the tech industry, shafting the American citizen.

Executives like Zuckerberg also claim to be champions of the environment. However, in addition to unchecked immigration destroying national sovereignty, it also harms the environment.

Environmental Impact

If the powers that be really wanted to save the planet, they would not be demographically replacing populations of Western nations to feed the consumerism waste machine.

4 out of 5 purchasing decisions are made by women, driving 80% of consumerism

As pointed out in my previous article on Global Warming or Global Government, women are responsible for 80% of the consumer economy in the United States. A full $1.2 trillion of this spending is on non-essential goods; things people do not really need.

As Stefan Molyneux has pointed out, if there was truly an effort to end overconsumption to solve the problem of global warming (not to mention the other issues mentioned above) world leaders would be saying the following about fiat currency and central banking:

> We must end fiat currency, we must end central banking around the world. Because central banking and the continued overprinting of currency and the taking on of national debt is causing a vast overconsumption of nature's scarce resources. [This] should be the central and fundamental and irrefutable argument for ending central banking and returning to a gold standard.

In short, fiat currency causes overconsumption. The need for fiat currency is caused by an economy that caters to women, who make 4 out of 5 purchasing decisions in a consumerism-driven waste economy. And the economy is supported by population growth which is no longer occurring in traditionally white nations since the feminist movement. It's the perfect storm.

There have been warnings going back thousands of years in Western literature about the societal costs of not giving women proper direction. This is perhaps illustrated nowhere better than this type of economy cannibalizing Western civilization. Proverbs 31:3 is a good example of this ancient wisdom:

> Do not give your strength to women, your ways to those who destroy kings.

Men Failed As Guardians

Men really have only ourselves to blame (and our parents and grandparents for not stopping the snowball before it started.) First, for letting women run wild and second for not keeping liberalism in check. As pointed out in a recent Chateau Heartiste article:

> Conservatives need liberals for their creativity and (usually) aesthetic lifestyle sensibilities. Liberals need conservatives for their guardianship and wisdom. Too few liberals, and conservative society can become static and self-satisfied. Too few conservatives, and liberal society can become self-destructive.
>
> In this view, conservatives are the more crucial linchpin to civilization. Without liberals, we might have worse movies and fewer charming coffee shops. But without conservatives, we might have no civilization at all, having handed over the keys to the White kingdom to babbling barbarians.
>
> In normal historical cycles, the warrior would ascend in times of decadence and social disconnection to bring balance to the force. But these are not normal times. Feminism, the ideological spawn of Satan and his thousand reptilian succubi, thwarts the natural ascendancy of the warrior class, allowing the shitlib devolution to continue unhindered and unchecked.

The so-called Greatest Generation rolled the dice one too many times when they let the government construct the welfare state, promulgate radical feminism, and open the door to unchecked immigration in the hopes it would bring about a sort of Utopia. As Stanford University economist Thomas Sowell points out:

> Much of the history of the Western world over the past three decades has been replacing what worked with what sounded good.

This really only leaves a couple of hanging questions. Although they're questions that when answered will tie up all the loose ends of the societal degradation and tidal wave of immigration we are witnessing.

Is the self-destruction of Western society occurring purely organically, as Spengler predicted…or is it occurring because of (or perhaps accelerated by) forces that while not directly conspiring, do have vested interests in preserving their power and wealth which are antithetical to the interests of the citizens they are sworn to serve? And, how does one balance economic growth with the desire to maintain the integrity of a sovereign nation?

Read More: Leftists Go Crazy Over Donald Trump's Call To Ban Muslim Immigration

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

How To Cook A Steak

March 28, 2016 | by Kullervo Kalervonpoika | Link | Original Link

As women have migrated from the kitchen to the cubicle, we are left with processed fast food and vacuum packed microwave meals. Vegetarian diet is being pushed or downright forced to our children and every last food item at the supermarket is packed with soy that will fuck up your hormones. To make matters worse, many a man doesn't know how to cook nutritious and tasty meat at home. This article will give a step-by-step guide on how to prepare a juicy beefsteak.

The benefits of eating beef are numerous: Not only does it provide high-quality protein for building muscle but also packs cholesterol, the building block of testosterone. It is also a natural source of creatine, which is well proven to enhance sports performance. Finally, embracing your position at the top of the food chain tastes delicious.

The beef

> "Closest to the bone, sweeter is the meat" – Louis Prima sang about the similarities between meats and women.

While you do not need Kobe beef to succeed, the general guideline is simple: the better the quality of the meat, the better the steak. The quality then depends on a variety of factors like the cut, the level of marbling, and aging. The cut for a good steak is always loin. Tenderloin is the better part and sirloin is the lesser. The T-bone and porterhouse steaks have a slice of both connected by a T-shaped bone. Vicinity to a bone is always good. It will add to the flavor.

Well aged quality beef is maroon with creamy marbling, not rosy red and evenly colored.

Marbling is the fatty tissue spreading throughout the muscle. The cross section of well marbled beef is full of tiny fat channels that make the steak juicy and tasty. Aging, on the other hand, will tenderize the meat. Wet-aged beef is more common, but dry-aged is a little more flavorful. Also young age of the cattle and little physical activity equal to better quality. In short, the best steaks come from young beef cattle with extensive marbling and a long period of dry-aging, and the worst ones from old dairy cattle with no marbling and little wet-aging.

What else you'll need

We will fry the steak on a pan. While a carbon steel skillet will do, your best bet is cast iron with its superior heat capacity. Coated skillets can't take the temperatures needed. A meat thermometer ensures the steak is cooked to our liking. For seasoning you'll need freshly ground black pepper and salt, preferably sea salt for some healthy minerals. Frying the steak with butter will add taste and a beautiful color. A little oil prevents the butter from burning.

What about those world-famous steak rubs, secret recipes of which every restaurant prides themselves on? Understand that they are merely a marketing strategy. Barring salt and pepper, a good steak needs no spices.

Preparation

- It is important to take the beef out of the fridge early enough to make sure it is room temperature throughout before we start cooking. Cold meat will leak its juices out when cooked.
- If you have a tenderloin or a sirloin, it usually still has a membrane that must be removed. You will identify the white membrane by the fibers it has running to the direction of the loin. Simply stick a sharp knife under it and slide the blade along the membrane to remove it. Do not touch the white lumps on the backside. Those are fat. If you have a T-bone or a porterhouse steak, it suffices to trim off excess fat if there is any, that being layers more than quarter of an inch thick.
- The T-bones and porterhouse steaks we buy are usually individual, but the loins must be sliced. Go for thick steaks, for sirloin 2" and for tenderloin 3". No baby portions here. Remember always to cut against the grain.

- Give the steaks enough time to warm up. I aim for two hours, just to make sure. Right before frying, season them heavily on both sides with salt and pepper. Salt will absorb moisture, so never add it too soon.

Cooking

- Heat up the cast iron skillet very hot. This is needed to fry the surface of the steak quickly, sealing it and trapping the juices inside. On low heat the meat would boil.
- When the skillet is hot, add a knob of butter and a little oil. Adding the butter too early will give it time to burn. Place one or two steaks on the skillet. Too many steaks and the pan will cool down. Now, let the steak be. Don't press it down. Fry all the surfaces. This should take a little less than a minute per side. It is no problem if the corners burn a little.
- Stick the probe of your meat thermometer in the middle of the steak (don't let it touch bone) and place it in the oven in 250-300°F. If your skillet is all-metal, go ahead and throw it into the oven with the steak on it.
- Cook till 125°F for rare, or 140°F for medium. Then wrap the steak with aluminum foil and let it rest for 10-15 minutes in room temperature before serving. Cooking releases the delicious juices. If we were to cut into the steak right away, all of that would leak out.

Sides, gravies, and drinks

Scalloped potatoes: simple, clean, tasty, and full of saturated fats

Basically a steak is enough as it is. Perhaps with a leaf of parsley on top. Still, for a man-sized appetite it is best to complement the meat with some carbs. Time everything properly and you will have the whole feast done at the exact same minute.

Start the meal preparation with a side of scalloped potatoes. You will need two and a half pounds of thinly sliced white potatoes, three cups of heavy cream, a minced garlic bulb or two, and salt and pepper. Stack the potato slices on an oven tray about two inches high with layers of garlic and spices between. When done, pour in the cream. Bake in the oven in 400°F for two hours. This dish will stay warm for a while, giving you the time to cook the steaks.

A steak doesn't really need a gravy, but if you mess up the beef, you can try to disguise it under a coat of other flavors. Prepare the gravy while the steaks are resting. Heat up the liquid left on the skillet and add heavy cream, mustard sauce, black pepper, and salt if needed. Let the gravy boil down a little for an even tan color.

If you are somewhat bourgeois and want to have a glass of red wine, suit yourself. I've always found that the perfect companion for a steak is a cold beer. The great thing about a steak is its versatility. Whether you serve a filet mignon with Cabernet Sauvignon wine or a T-bone with a Bud Light, the cooking process is the same.

Who to cook it for

There's nothing worse than an unappreciative guest. Never cook a steak for those who would rather have a jar of Ben & Jerry's. Cook for people who are worthy of it. A small family gathering or an evening with your closest buddies is the right occasion.

Read More: How To Cook Four Delicious Entrées

Kullervo Kalervonpoika
Kullervo is a chauvinist bastard from Finland. He's into developing his body with weights, his belly with food and his mind with classic literature.

5 Reasons You Should Never Date A Single Mother

March 29, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Popular culture praises single mothers as high-value dating catches for discerning, good men. It is hard to find many greater lies than this one. MILF culture since the late 1990s and early 2000s, epitomized by the American Pie character Finch's obsession with Steve Stifler's mom, made bedding and romancing single mothers a seeming must-have on many young men's sexual bucket lists. Nonetheless, just because you saw it on TV or in a film doesn't make it truth.

The single mother craze is just the collective self-delusion of has-been women with kids, backed up by a sympathetic cultural narrative. It is designed to assuage the hurt they feel at being upstaged by packs of new, frequently younger or better-looking nubile girls that men really want to claim.

A couple of caveats need to be tacked on to what I am saying. Firstly, the following list includes general, “on average” characteristics of single mothers. Society is replete with thankfully childless über-feminists who hate the idea of ever becoming pregnant. Similarly, there are enough cases of women with kids who would make better partners than girls who are yet to expel a human being from their body.

Also, Western dis-civilisation suffers from a terminal lack of fecundity. As Return Of Kings proprietor Roosh has pointed out, “nationalism without natalism will fail.” The globalist agenda, plus its corollaries of self-disembowelling multiculturalism, pernicious feminism, and transgender lunacy, are all geared towards suppressing positive notions of fertility that accord with true female nature. The problem is not that women have children, but that many women have children in a culture that conditions them to act in repulsive ways, both before and after motherhood.

Meanwhile, single fathers paradoxically have none of the appeal attributed to single mothers. This is irrespective of the fact that men physically age better and do not have any of the deleterious physical effects of bearing children. Worse still, they are never recognized for raising and financially supporting children by themselves, most of all by prospective female partners.

Without further ado, here are the five reasons why single mothers as a group are more out of touch than Rosie O’Donnell at a religious fasting:

1. Their bodies are inferior to women who are not mothers

Yes, you can find many a female fatty who is without children and has no real prospect of having them anytime soon. Likewise, you can find a mother whose ass fills a pair of spandex pants like a gallon of water satisfies a man about to die of thirst in the desert. The norm, however, is that motherhood ruins a woman’s body or, if it doesn’t do so immediately, turns on a steady self-destruct mechanism. With more free time while on maternity leave or doing a poor job at child-rearing as the government and father foot the bill, they can cake on the makeup and adjust the camera filters that allow them to superficially reclaim their pre-motherhood look. Whatever happens, it remains a smokescreen.

In addition, almost every single human being on this planet lets themselves go after having children. They cannot easily coordinate earning an income (if they even do), tending to a growing household, and caring for children with physical maintenance or self-improvement. And if they do coordinate it somewhat, it is at a subpar, barely functioning level. This only adds to the breaking down of a single mother's looks.

2. They are separated or divorced from their baby daddy for a reason and usually it's very bad

Women have no socially-enforced responsibility for their relationship behaviors, even when those relationships produce children. For example, repeated studies show that female cheating is approaching or has equaled levels of male infidelity. Yet the mea-culpa-for-straying press conferences you see are of Tiger Woods and not Kristen Stewart. In this permissive environment, which both looks past and invariably rewards prima donna female antics, women with children feel more able still to go off the deep end, sabotage their relationships, and then pretend that they were the offended, even abused party.

It is into this maelstrom of female self-entitlement that the prospective boyfriend of a single mother walks. Not only do you have all the crap involved with the biological father of the child, which the mother usually does nothing to mitigate, you also must deal with the shell of a woman whose malformed relationship strategies remain firmly intact. The world is full of women who have never told a man they were to blame for the end of a previous relationship. Having a child only compounds the problems associated with this distinct lack of self-awareness.

3. They are financial dead-ends

Unless you are pile-driving a doctor, lawyer or someone else similarly well-positioned who has a child or two, your courtship with a single mother is a financial drain on you just waiting to happen. Oh wait, it already is. A woman with a child who really thinks she just wants a boyfriend is bad enough, but single mothers are greatly—if not entirely—motivated by the admitted financial security that a new partner provides. They can lacquer it up all they like with the feeling of finally having that "special someone," yet the deep-seated function matters a whole lot more than the convenient excuse. She's probably fooling herself, not just trying to fool you.

To think that female brains have moved much further beyond their mammalian cousins or prehistoric ancestors is pure folly. If your sex drive as a man is often no different to the first homo sapiens, a single mother's compulsion for male-generated resources has not moved along, either. Except the child is another man's and not yours. You will be either bailing her out outright or accepting much lower financial and other material contributions from her. And for what?

4. They do not become better people by becoming mothers

The vast majority of people in the world, whether male, female, black, white, or blue, do not change in their lifetimes beyond extremely narrow limits. Age, illness, having a family, or changing jobs may all act as funnels that give the appearance of true change, but these shifts are not what they appear. The same person merely moves into a different phase of existence.

A single mother saying she became a better person by getting knocked up and giving birth is simply backward rationalizing an event just as irreversible as losing one's virginity. She is putting a positive spin on the end of her more pristine fertility and the advent of stretch marks, sagging mammaries, and a much more constrained social life interspersed with tantrums (hers or the child's) and the constant whiff of infant fecal matter.

5. They have impulsive and poorly-reasoned behaviors

Why exactly is a single mother a mother? Did she finish high school? Complete any other education? Hold down her last three jobs? Screw half the hood rats in Brooklyn? Inasmuch as an ideal patriarchal society would welcome women having children young, having children young in today's society, particularly without marriage and a steady financial situation, is very often an indication of sluttiness and a penchant for instant, unending gratification. This bodes terribly for any relationship between her and any man after she splits with the father of her child/children.

Elements of psychological child abuse are also at play because by ignoring her own self-development (and neglecting to cultivate a stable relationship with the father) she is almost certainly passing on significant dysfunction to her son or daughter. Shows like MTV's Teen Mom equate getting pregnant at 15, 16, or 17 with this, but even much older single mothers are prone to such behavioral clusters.

You will come dead last with single mothers

This super-principle hangs above and holds together the preceding five. You are most likely always an object with single mothers and not a valued option, let alone a priority.

Tread carefully. And why settle for what many would term used goods when there are fresher, childless pastures just down the road?

Read More: Fat Single Mothers Are Child Abusers

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Will The #CruzSexScandal Propel Donald Trump Into The White House?

March 29, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last week, the already Jerry Springer-esque presidential campaign descended to another level of inanity. The National Enquirer reported that Republican presidential candidate and Texas Senator Ted Cruz has cheated on his wife with no less than five women, three of whom—CNN contributor Amanda Carpenter, Donald Trump spokeswoman Katrina Pierson, and former Carly Fiorina presidential campaign manager Sarah Isgur Flores—have already been identified.

This story—and the Cruz campaign's response to it—completely changes the dynamic of the presidential race. Allegations of voter fraud in Iowa and Utah aside, Cruz has remained competitive with Trump by marshaling support among evangelical Christians, who are uneasy with the Donald's outspokenness and supermodel wife. In cheating on his wife, Cruz has revealed himself to be a naked hypocrite and risks losing his remaining supporters.

Why Won't Cruz Tell The Truth?

> Its over folks, thats a wrap. Literally. Condoms next to Amanda Carpenter in a Twitter post. Also, no wedding ring. pic.twitter.com/z41MnRV8mZ
>
> — Trumpism 3.0™ (@Team_Trump45) March 28, 2016

While Cruz and his supporters have attacked the National Enquirer story, Cruz has not actually denied that he cheated on his wife. As attorney Mike Cernovich has pointed out, Cruz's slowness to react to the story and his refusal to outright state that he hasn't cheated on his wife and/or sue the National Enquirer for libel indicate that he has something to hide. As a lawyer himself, Cruz is an expert in manipulating language and wording statements to minimize his legal liability.

Furthermore, one of his accused mistresses, Amanda Carpenter, is also behaving in ways that point to her guilt. An analysis of her Tweets show that not only was Carpenter sexually attracted to Cruz, she quit his presidential campaign under suspicious circumstances and also tried to blacklist Trump supporters out of the conservative media. Like Cruz, Carpenter has not denied that she was involved in a sleazy affair.

Beyond the fact that Cruz's infidelity undermines his credibility with his conservative Christian base, his affairs may land him in federal prison. As mentioned above, one of Cruz's accused paramours, Sarah Isgur Flores, formerly served as Carly Fiorina's campaign manager. Last summer, the pro-Cruz super PAC Keep The Promise donated $500,000 to Fiorina's campaign, a move so suspicious it caught the attention of the FEC. Additionally, Fiorina endorsed Cruz following the end of her campaign and has been stumping for him for the past month.

Back in 2008, Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards saw his political career implode when it was revealed that he had used campaign funds to cover up an affair with staffer Rielle Hunter, at the same time his wife Elizabeth was dying of cancer. If Keep The Promise's $500,000 donation to Fiorina turns out to be hush money for Flores, it would spell the end of not only Cruz's presidential campaign, but his political career in general.

While Cruz fanboys have attempted to blame the National Enquirer story on Donald Trump, the fact that Trump spokeswoman Katrina Pierson is one of Cruz's alleged mistresses makes it unlikely he was involved. Indeed, the Cruz sex scandal was created by supporters of Marco Rubio, who sought to use it to force Cruz from the race. Prior to the Florida primary on March 15, Rubio surrogate Rick Wilson had teased a Cruz scandal he called "The Thing," but following Rubio's exit from the race, the story was killed out of fear that it would help Trump.

Lyin' Ted: CheaTED, DefeaTED

> Note how Rubio backer @TheRickWilson stopped hinting of #cruzsexscandal once Rubio lost. Didn't want Trump to win! pic.twitter.com/O8ExZ7EJaH
>
> — Mike Cernovich (@Cernovich) March 25, 2016

For opponents of Donald Trump, the Ted Cruz sex scandal couldn't have come at a worse time. Cuckservatives and establishment power brokers had sought to leverage Cruz's campaign to deny Trump a majority of delegates in the presidential primary, forcing a brokered convention and allowing them to steal the nomination. However, in revealing himself to be a liar and an adulterer, Cruz has destroyed his support among conservative Christians, his primary voter bloc.

The Wisconsin primary next week has been touted as Cuckster's Last Stand, the last chance Trump haters have to prevent him from getting the nomination. Beyond having a large number of evangelical voters (similar to Iowa), Wisconsin is home to both House Speaker Paul Ryan and RNC Chairman Reince Priebus, both of whom publicly oppose Donald Trump. The Cruz sex scandal will make it difficult—if not impossible—for Cruz to win Wisconsin or Priebus to steal it for him.

Finally, with revelations that everyone from the Washington Times to Breitbart's Allum Bokhari knew about Cruz's infidelity but refused to expose it, the corruption of the conservative media has become evident. Were it not for independent journalists such as Mike Cernovich and Ricky Vaughn, the Cruz scandal would have never gotten traction. Given the uselessness of the conservative media, it's time for us to push it off a cliff.

Read More: Why Donald Trump's Veterans' Rally In Des Moines Was A Resounding Success

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Porn Star Bree Olson Complains That People Think She’s A Slut

March 29, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Media outlets across the US are giving fawning attention and victimhood to “former” porn star and apparent new feminist icon, Bree Olson. Why? Because, as she explains in the video below, everyone she knows now seems to think she’s a slut. While she claims to be coming out with her story as a warning to young women, her courting of the press appears to be an attempt to kickstart new income opportunities.

Olson, you may remember, was one of Charlie Sheen’s so-called goddesses during his highly publicized time as a warlock-with-tiger-blood after being fired from sitcom Two and a Half Men. Even as she decries the “sexism” she is somehow facing by being called a slut, she is still spruiking her x-rated videos via her personal website’s membership offerings. Plus, the entry page to this same website features a longstanding Amazon wish list, so men can buy her things. How is this not the behavior of a financially-minded slut/gold-digger?

Unfortunately for Olson, she has only now grasped the concept that when you make your own bed, you have to lay in it. And when you have bed literally hundreds of strangers for money, people are going to cast you in a certain light. No one baulks when lawyers, used car salesmen and others are presented in entirely unflattering lights. Why not porn stars and why not especially female porn stars, representatives of the gender which generally wants sex much, much less?

No gold-digging went on with Charlie Sheen, I'm sure.

More strangely still, after telling women not to go into porn, Olson says she is "reluctantly" working as an adult cam model. We can start to see from this that a deceitful illusion is at play, like her feigned love for Charlie Sheen in the past. It seems that the real problem is not the reactions of the public, but her own inability to get a similarly cushy job as in porn now that she's pushing 30 and younger girls are on the rise. She has neglected her post-porn skills for years, after all. It is so easy in modern times for women to blame business failures, of which Olson has had a few recently, instead of their own lack of aptitude. Shrieks of misogyny are the excuse cards for all occasions.

What exactly happened to all the money she earned? At her peak, according to CNN, she claims she was earning $30-60,000 a month, not counting all the financial goodies one can be sure she received from Charlie Sheen, other male benefactors, and from porn industry life in general. I cannot see why you or I should feel any more sorry for Olson than we do for run-of-the-mill sports stars who purge their bank balances via drugs, alcohol, gambling and otherwise frivolous spending over years. And, unlike these athletes, Olson has the advantage of being able to turn her tale into a piece about purported sexism, slut-shaming, and misogyny.

People are judged all the time, get over it

Whether in her porn career, milking Charlie Sheen, claiming Sheen didn't tell her of his HIV diagnosis, or yelling "misogyny!" about her porn career, Bree Olson is always seeking some form of attention.

One thing in particular gnaws at me about Bree Olson and the sycophantic coverage her "plight" has received. We are constantly surrounded by 10,000 other cases of commonplace judgments made about people. Women are the chief instigators of many of these judgments, from ostracizing the unpopular, homely girls in school to judicially selecting the most accomplished men when they look for a financial crutch/"husband." I have lost count of the number of people, male or female, I have seen mocked and excluded for anything from wearing unusual clothing to liking Star Trek or Dungeon & Dragons. Why doesn't CNN tell their stories?

For example, if you are a waiter or a garbage collector, and not just for a few years to pay for your studies, do you really expect models and other women to want you? Of course, if your game is good, many things are possible. Yet the general, close to irreversible law is that the most desired women will not have sex with, let alone marry these sorts of low-paid men. This is a much bigger reality for many more people than the pseudo-issue of female porn stars being regarded as sluts. And being judged after working in a "profession" that paid you many thousands of dollars per week is qualitatively different from the really unfair judgments made about people who have normal jobs or incomes.

Readers of ROK have come to accept that they either need to change their ways or find other mechanisms for success if they wish to reach their goals in life, not just with women. Because of our belief systems, which are persecuted by the media and others, we cannot flee to the nearest leftwing journalist who wants to retell our lives in a vein akin to Oliver Twist or Fantine from Les Misérables. That is the privilege only of a vacuous, spendthrift woman like Bree Olson.

I do not feel sorry for Bree Olson and she ruined her reputation with her own genitals

The porn memories are lasting for Bree Olson, but clearly the bank account balance from her career isn't.

CNN and other outlets are really scrapping the bottom of the barrel with this "story" of Bree Olson, a woman whose most well-known achievement is having sex with Charlie Sheen. Women are able to earn inordinate sums of money in porn, to an extent that 20 times as less men will. There is another indicator about the fact that men want sex much more. If men and women wanted sex equally, and men could therefore be called sluts at the same threshold, both genders would be paid the same amount. Female porn stars are well-paid attention-seekers, not victims.

Nevertheless, I welcome her telling her story. It shows young women the deleterious impact being a slut has on a woman's reputation. Olson's explanation for this is certainly far different from yours or mine, but the negative outcomes remain. In addition, feminist journalists are engaging in classic overextension. Anything feminism-related nowadays, from fabricated ideas of "mansplaining" to "rape culture," becomes such a parody of itself that people are soon weary of it behind all belief.

When you clutch so many straws so hard, they all eventually bend and then break.

Read More: Idiotic Women Had Unprotected Sex With Charlie Sheen And Now Complain About HIV Risks

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Places Where You Can Meet Girls During The Day

March 30, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Simply defined, day game is the practice of meeting and attracting women anywhere that isn't a night venue such as a bar or a club. This leaves a huge number of possibilities open, and I personally have met girls in coffee shops, bookstores, parks, on public transport and in gyms to name but a few. But each potential venue has its own strengths, weaknesses, and inherent problems. If you want to improve your dating life or meet a quality woman to enjoy a serious relationship with it is important that you are aware of these pros and cons and choose the right milieu in which to approach.

A couple of weeks back I wrote an article called How To Have Conversations With Women That Get Results. While the ability to talk to women effectively is undeniably key, you must bear in mind that you have to actually meet and engage with one in a suitable environment first before starting to chat.

In his seminal book on day game, Day Bang, Roosh analyzes coffee shops, the street, clothing stores, bookstores, public transportation and grocery stores in some detail, advising on the best way to operate in each. I discuss a few of these here, giving my take on what has worked well for me in each.

1. The Coffee Shop

These day most of us—and women especially, it seems—are caffeine addicts who think nothing of shelling out the best part of five dollars for a concoction composed of Peruvian beans, froth, and sugar on the way to work every morning. London, where I live, is bursting with coffee shops, from those well-known chains we all know to smaller, “boutique” shops with chalk boards advertising macchiatos and the like outside. If you are not visiting your local coffee shop at least once a day then you are seriously missing a trick as you will find loads of cute girls there both buying drinks and working as baristas. It shouldn’t be a problem getting to a coffee shop—if you have a full-time job then pop in before hitting the office, and if you work for yourself then aim to spend a few hours each day working from one on your laptop.

Roosh describes in great detail where best to position yourself if you are planning to spend some time in the coffee shop and includes a diagram of an example floor layout, showing you exactly the best place to sit to be in with the best chance of interacting with girls. One tip: it really helps if you are somewhere on the path to the restrooms, as that means you can interact with women on their way to and from these.

Another thing that many guys ask about is how best to pull that attractive barista who pours your latte every day. While under most circumstances my advice is always to strike while the iron’s hot and go in for the pull as soon as possible, if she works regularly at the store than you can afford to take your time a little and build up momentum over a few visits (although not too many) before asking for her number.

I pulled a very cute Italian barista from a coffee place in Kensington largely through sustained eye contact, which I maintained over about three visits. Holding her gaze meant that I didn’t have to actually say very much—“extra cream” sounded suggestive enough for me not to have to bother with actually “gaming” her. By my fourth visit she would blush when I came in. At this point I simply said that it would be great for us to meet up sometime when she wasn’t working, and told her to write her number down on a receipt, which she did. Our first date—on a Sunday afternoon—ended up in my bedroom.

2. The Street

It is in the chapter entitled The Street in Day Bang that Roosh unveils his now infamous “pet shop” opener. This is an opening line designed to work in any city in the world, innocuous enough to begin a conversation from which you can start to throw out bait on which she will hopefully hook.

The street is a great place to meet women. If you hit any major high street on a weekend you will see thousands of girls going about their business, shopping for clothes and so on. So the opportunities are limitless. But the street is also a terrible place to meet women—it’s busy, crowded, chaotic, and girls tend often to be busy when they’re out and about, with pre-planned schedules to meet. Therefore trying to stop them to get a phone number can be a thankless task, and even if you do get a quick number in the daytime, the chances of it flaking are high unless you have managed to create a strong and positive enough impression.

The big debate about street day game is whether you should approach directly or indirectly. This is a topic I discussed here a few weeks back. Roosh comes down firmly on the side of indirect approaches, arguing that direct makes for a greater likelihood of blowout and that a longer conversation initiated indirectly makes it more likely that she will actually come out to meet you on a date, which is the endgame after all. I personally have had success with both (I have got lays by simply walking up to a girl in the street and telling her she’s beautiful) and tend to intersperse the two techniques depending on the girl and the situation. But whichever approach you lean towards it’s imperative that you have a strategy, especially at the beginning. This is where Day Bang comes in very useful.

3. Public Transport

Ages ago I wrote an article for ROK in which I extolled the benefits of approaching girls on the London Underground transport system. To my surprise, a good many commenters were skeptical that any good results could be achieved on the capital's subway. But it remains the case that the London Underground is where I have had the most day game success.

The benefits of approaching women on a city's transport network are that there are a lot of them there and they generally tend to be bored and therefore up for a little distraction. The downside is that trains and buses tend to be packed, and so you may have to make your approach in the earshot of other commuters. Also you will have limited time to run your game as she will be getting off at some point, and she may be wearing headphones or playing with her smartphone.

Roosh deals with all of these issues in the Public Transportation section of Day Bang, and includes a useful diagram suggesting where best to position yourself in a busy train carriage in order to get talking to girls without "scaring the cat." He also suggests a number of openers and conversational gambits to initiate a conversation without coming off as weird or creepy.

As with street game, I have had success both with direct and indirect approaches on public transport. I once told a Russian girl that I liked her bag on the underground and ended up sleeping with her in her hotel room several hours later. Alternatively, if I'm pressed for time or the girl is about to get off, I will sometimes "go for broke" and just tell her that she's cute, that I'd like to take her out, and give her my phone for her to put her number in.

As with any type of game there are an infinite number of variables at play and it's always better to try something rather than nothing. At the same time, you should aim to go in with a strategy, and it is for developing one that Day Bang really comes into its own, as it is packed full with tips and advice for the venues discussed here plus a good many more.

Next week I will cover taking girls you've just met through day game out on so-called "instant dates."

Read Next: Why Day Game Is The Secret Sauce You Need To Consistently Meet And Attract Women

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Mindset You Must Have For Concealed Carrying A Handgun

March 30, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Carrying a handgun for personal defense is a massive responsibility and often an onerous task, but it certainly beats not being armed when you need to be. The goal, during your life, should not be to win a gunfight, but rather to never be in one. More than just with the mechanics of packing a gun, this is done via the right mindset, and the cornerstone of that mindset is confidence; confidence in you, your gun, and your surroundings.

Confidence in the law

As was said in the previous article, you absolutely must know the laws in your jurisdiction, and you must know them better than the local police, who can be quite wrong on any given law, and don't mind lying to you about it, either. Handgunlaw.us and USA Carry are good online resources to look up your state.

A big part of confidence is knowing that you are right in all that you do. A righteous man can be at peace with himself because he is right and others are wrong. Carrying a gun is still not highly thought of in our disarmed, pacifistic society, so knowing and obeying the law to a precise degree will nullify any difficulty you would have with the police, allowing you to concentrate on criminal threats, as you should.

One of the essential traits of being a country that is still a conglomeration of states (although ever increasingly Federalized) is that not all states are equal, and this applies to carrying weapons. You must know where your state's permit is honored, and where it is not. You must know about any differences in the rules of your home state versus your destination. You must know all relevant rules of any states between you and your destination, as well as city specific rules.

An example of this is that I know I can go to Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio without any real changes to my concealed carry routine, but I have to modify it to go to Illinois and put the piece in a car console or a purpose specific case and not carry it on my person, as my carry permit is not valid there. This sucks, but it’s better than the “it must be unloaded and not accessible from the driver’s seat” that it used to be.

You must know where you can go in any given state with a concealed weapon. Big points of contention are things like bars versus restaurants, government owned facilities, and large crowd events. A typical rule is that you cannot carry in a bar, or the section of a tavern that is a bar, but the restaurant portion is ok.

The easiest rule on a government building is that you know they disapprove of the Constitution (at least this part) when they have metal detectors, but, even if they don’t, you might still be boned. For instance, the Post Office bans firearms, and I’ve never seen a metal detector there. Schools are pretty much always a no-go.

Large gatherings can cause problems as well. While private security cannot arrest you, they can physically disarm you, and you’ll never get the gun back, in all odds. Also, if it’s illegal to carry in a “civic event,” the rent-a-cops will call over the one or two real cops, and now you’re arrested.

Lastly, there is something called “duty to inform.” If you are unlucky enough to have to deal with a law enforcement officer while about your daily travels, you may have to, by law, say that you are carrying. At a minimum, you’ll be disarmed for the duration of the encounter, you may well annoy him by exercising your Constitutional rights, and you may even be arrested, depending on his understanding of the law, intellect, and general mood that day. While not all police are jerks, enough of them are that it is sound advice to avoid contact unless YOU need them, and that goes double for you while carrying.

All of this must be learned BEFORE you go somewhere! Do your homework, or you could find yourself stuck approaching, or already in, a “gun free zone” while packing heat. Legal or not, right or not, un-American or not, that now makes you the bad guy and subject to arrest. If you find yourself in such a situation, leave the area. If you must go back, throw away your ammo, go to a UPS or FedEx store, and mail the gun to your local Federal Firearms License (FFL) holding dealer. Call him and you may need to pay him his transfer fee, and maybe even have the gun transferred back to you that you already own, but it beats getting arrested. Do not do the thug life method of just throwing the gun in the trash, either.

Confidence in your gear

One of the more common mistakes is “now I have a gun, I’m good to go.” The pistol is just the beginning, and it’s not really even the beginning; it’s just a part of it all, both physically and mentally. You need to have gear that works for you, and that you’ve proven to yourself that it works.

You need to have a good holster, a good belt to hold it with (usually heavier than a normal belt), a holder for magazines or speedloaders, and you need to make sure it fits well. Pistols are heavy and they're noticeable when they aren't supported well enough. If your gear doesn't work well, you're not going to use it much and when you do, you're going to attract attention to yourself by hitching up your pants a lot or patting the area of the gun.

People don't notice a confident person with a concealed gun, and they usually don't even notice a confident person with an exposed gun, but they WILL notice a nervous person who is nervous for no apparent reason. They will then scope you out and figure out you have a gun that you're not comfortable with, and maybe call the law on you.

3 yards, 3 shots, 3 seconds. Some statistic on gun fights. Yes, this close. Drawing, presenting, firing, changing mags, firing, scanning, reholstering. Go.

This means you need to do a few things. You MUST train, maybe with some classes, but definitely by yourself, on the range, and at home. You MUST practice drawing, mag changes, threat scanning, rapid-close firing, and firing at range, and firing from cover and moving to cover. The bad news is that some ranges don't allow all that stuff, and you should find one that does. The good news is everything but actual firing can be practiced at home (with the ammo in another room.) Future articles will cover good drills.

You may need multiple guns for multiple activities. My friend's wife runs, and she bought a little holdout pistol and a fanny pack for it, but I doubt she's practiced drawing at all. You will fail your training under stress and then you'll lose. Practice with anything you'll be carrying.

Printing.

In addition to being confident in your gear and training, you must be confident in your clothing. States have different laws on what concealment is, whether or not open carry is ok, whether or not you can occasionally expose the gun, and whether or not the outline of the gun, called "printing" can be visible or not. My home state is open carry, however, your state may vary, and you may need to change your clothing style to accommodate your firearm to be legal.

Legalities aside, you need to be discreet. If you are open carrying, or even badly concealed carrying, you just told the local bad guy that you're his first target, and you also have a gun that he can use on other people. I don't believe in warning people that you have a gun; if it's time to use it, use it.

Confidence in yourself

You should never start a fight, or be drawn into one, whether you carry or not. If you're in a bar, get into an argument, and he goes to "get mah piece" from his truck, you need to run out the back door, even if you have a gun yourself. Any gunfight you are not in is a gunfight you won. There are very few things that need to be won with a gun, and silly arguments are not among them.

No guns and drinking, even with little 22 conversions like this one.

Don’t speed, don’t disturb the peace, and don’t drink. States have various laws on drinking while carrying, but it’s a loss two ways regardless. Alcohol makes you less inhibited, so you’re more likely to get into an altercation, and you’re more likely to be found guilty if the jury knows you’ve been drinking at all. You should not be getting drunk to the point of affecting your judgment at any place that is unsafe enough to be carrying in the first place, which means you should be saving your partying for at home.

Lastly, people who are new to carrying think, “oh, I need to make sure to take my gun with me since I’m going THERE.” Why are you going someplace that you’ll think you need a gun once you get there? Firearms are for the unforeseen problems that crop up despite your best efforts to avoid them. Going to sketchy places, at sketchy times, and dealing with sketchy people does not call for you going there with a gun, it calls for either not going at all, or bringing friends with their own guns.

The most important thing is to be confident in your awareness. Violent encounters happen FAST, and if you get surprised by people that you did not see coming, that is where you screwed up. The greatest weapon you have is not your pistol, but your ability to see trouble and avert it.

Colonel Jeff Cooper’s Color Codes for Awareness. You should travel around in yellow. Orange means it’s time to put your hand on your gun and leave the area.

Confidence in what is right

Most importantly, you must be confident in what you believe is right. This is different than what is legal. Some people believe that it is better to be mugged than to kill the mugger, or be raped over killing the rapist, or just to give the home invaders what they want and they'll go away. Others do not believe those things.

You must decide, as you start to carry, under what grounds are you personally decided to kill someone. There can be no hesitation, as the only worse thing to do other than be caught unarmed by violence is to pull a gun and not use it. Shoot to stop the threat, and shoot enough times to make sure it is stopped.

If you do get into a gunfight, once you've made sure you are safe, you need to call the police and establish yourself as the victim and then lawyer up fast. There is a school of thought that says to leave the area if you can't be tied to the shooting in any way, but I can't endorse a criminal act personally. I do know that it would be hard to live with running from such a thing, but it's also hard to trust the police to do the right thing these days, especially if SJWs get involved.

Conclusion

Carrying a gun is not something that is done once you've purchased the gun and walked around with it a couple times. You must stay within the law, you must carry discretely and securely, you must train so you can use it effectively, you must not go places and do things that would bring unneeded violence upon you, and you must know where your personal line in the sand is and be ready to defend it.

The gun is simply a tool; your will is the weapon. Once you understand that the gun is only part of your defense and realize that security at home, unarmed combat, general fitness, staying safe, and situational awareness all play as big a part as the gun does, you will have made progress towards carrying confidently.

Read More: A Beginner's Guide To Carrying A Handgun.

Luke Stranahan

Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

How Acknowledging Death Can Improve Your Life

March 30, 2016 | by Nikolai Vladivostok | Link | Original Link

Life's only certainty: one day you will die.

It might be this afternoon. It might be a century from now. You might see it coming in the form of a looming bus or you might hear its approach in a doctor's calmly professional diagnosis. It could strike you from behind like a bullet in back of your head, your last thought being whether you need to get milk on the way home. It might come in your sleep, your morning alarm left unheard and a tab of midget porn left open for your loved ones to find. We're all moving in different directions but we will all arrive, eventually, at the same destination.

Taboo

Death is one of the very, very few taboos left in Western societies. You can mention sex change operations, furries, cervical cancer, divorce or personal finances at the most refined dinner parties, but even mentioning death while down at the pub with a few mates is considered uncouth.

Why? Do we think that by not talking about it, Death will forget about us? Do we think that mentioning his name, like Voldemort, will stir him from his slumber and increase his power? More likely, people think that death is so utterly horrible that opening expressing its inevitability or potential circumstances simply darkens the mood and detracts from what little happiness we may grab from life before it is forever taken back. Many people refuse to even think about death, let alone talk about it. They perhaps fear that its dark countenance, once entertained, will haunt their every moment and make their already troubled lives impossible. Indeed, many readers will have avoided this article for the reasons described.

But you and I are still here. So, let's talk about death. Talking about it, that is—only the dead know what the actual thing is like and they're not here to tell us.

The Nature Of Death

What is death? If you have a religious conception of death then so be it. For the rest of us, death is the permanent end of our consciousness and therefore our existence. What is it like, to not exist? You already know. You've experienced it before. The universe existed for almost 14 billion years before you kicked and howled your way into it. What was it like, not existing for all that time? However it was, we can assume that slipping back into non-existence will be much the same. Is that something a rational person ought to be afraid of?

Perhaps non-existence might not scare you, but the moment of death does. The awesome instant when, if conscious, you realize that it is all over. The experience of the final seconds of life is something we know about from those who thought they were going to die, but survived. We can read about these near-death experiences and they do not seem so utterly terrible. Certainly nothing to keep you awake at night.

The Horror Of Immortality

What is worse than death? The only thing we can compare it to is its alternative: immortality. Imagine that you could not die. You live for centuries, like a character in an Anne Rice novel, watching your friends and relatives grow old and die, seeing ages come and go. It sounds pretty interesting. But what about living thousands of years into the future, when life becomes unrecognizable? Millions of years into the future, when humans, if they still exist, may have taken on a totally different form? Surely you would be lonely. Billions of years in the future, when the Earth has plunged into the sun? When the universe itself either fades out or crushes back into a singularity? What on earth would you do with yourself?

Perhaps future humans might invent a form of limited immortality by preserving their consciousness in a more durable, electronic format, with a non-physical environment to go with it. This carries its own risks. Watch this dark and compelling episode of the brilliant Black Mirror series and tell me there's nothing positive about our limited lifespans. To me, endless boredom, especially without the mercy of becoming insane, would be a far worse fate than death. Mortality is a blessing. It puts a ceiling on the level of suffering any man may experience.

Another possible alternative to death might be eternal youth: artificially ending the aging process and, as an afterthought, curing all disease. This would make you immortal unless you had some sort of accident. Would that make you happy? You'd creep around every day like an insect terrified of being stepped on. You might be too terrified to leave the house. The inevitability of death allows us to relax, have fun and take sensible risks because we're all going to die anyway. It makes us value our loved ones more highly because the time that we share together on this planet is strictly circumscribed.

The Universal Time Limit

So let's think about death and return to the opening sentence of this article: one day, you will die. It is probably decades away but there's no way to be sure.

What are you going to do between now and then?

You don't have unlimited time. Whatever you want to achieve in life is bound by that most profound of deadlines. Mess around at your peril.

Want to start a business? Get cracking now, even if it is just laying plans, saving capital and setting out a timeline. Want to approach a girl? You'd best do it straight away. What, you're nervous? Mate, you're going to die soon enough. Keep that in mind and see if it helps to get you off your ass and busting a move. Want to ride a motorcycle across Siberia? Learn Spanish? Have a family? Move to a warmer climate? Reconcile with your estranged brother? Every day you waste in indecision and procrastination is another day closer to your ultimate demise.

Death is the time limit that makes every single moment on this planet precious beyond measure. Think about death and you'll better remember that. Ignore death and you'll miss out like a late child dawdling on the way to the bus stop, totally forgetting that today is the school field trip to the zoo. The average person will live for around 27,000 days. If you are thirty then you've probably got less than 15,000 to go. This is one of them.

The Samurai meditated upon death every morning in order to overcome dread and to better focus their minds upon their duties. The people of Bhutan traditionally contemplate death five times a day and they are famously cheerful people. Since becoming more cognizant of death's approach I have become more at ease, bolder and even more efficient. There's nothing like the acknowledgement (not fear) of death's inevitability to get your heart racing, your adrenaline pumping and your whole mind and body focused upon your goals.

The next time you feel nervous or hesitant, try chanting this meditation: One day I will die. Feel your inhibitions melt away and your being spring into action just as the hungry wolf lunges, the startled deer leaps and the blades of grass reach towards the sun.

Read More: Why You Must Confront Your Own Coming Death (And How To Do It)

Nikolai Vladivostok

Nikolai Vladivostok is a writer, Socialist and denouncer of reactionary elements. He has faith that the efficiency of Soviet industry and agriculture will inevitably lead to the collapse of the West and the liberation of its Peoples. Nikolai blogs at SovietMen on topics such as economics, sex, and debauchery.

5 Signs From A DePaul University Debate That Show The Insanity Of Leftists

March 31, 2016 | by Hannibal Menwell Creed | Link | Original Link

Anybody reasonable knows American universities have been deteriorating to the point where academia has lost all logical reasoning, having given in to the intellectual savages better known as the progressive left. This concept was reinforced a week ago at the DePaul debate against the college Republicans, Democrats, and socialists. Unsurprisingly, the mob of green-haired, tattoo-ridden slobs with cat yoga pants came out in full force, aptly demonstrating the tyrannical mob mentality has a stranglehold on academia. There was no chance real meaningful discussion, but I would like to share some key points from the event, reaffirming long held beliefs in our community.

Typical Feminist/Socialist in attendance: ~~Resisting The Urge To Puke~~ Hawt/You Go Girl!

1. Socialists are the laziest, most unprofessional degenerates of society

Observing the three groups of debaters, I saw the Democrats and Republicans as punctual, well dressed, and relatively competent individuals; however, when observing socialists, they were late (news flash: if they had real jobs, they would have learned punctuality matters), and were unkempt, disgusting human beings. The woman debater had ridiculously unprofessional hair and was chubby. In addition, the man showed up in scruffy jeans, an undone and unbuttoned wrinkled shirt, and an undershirt with letters. Along with his horrid attire, he had one of those God forsaken pseudo-60's hippie shaves, making sure not to conform to the evil capitalist patriarchy. In essence, their appearance represented their laziness, just like every other disgusting land whale on the left.

Also the DePaul Socialist debate prep consultant.

In addition to their questionable (read: nauseating) attire, there are a few things I found out a few things about the debaters for the socialists. The male debater was a 29-year-old University of Chicago Graduate working at a bookstore. The fact that this societal leech decided to debate college students he didn't go to school with, as well as being seven years their elder, is pathetic. The fact that he works at a bookstore is even more laughable. He decided not to do anything useful with his degree, showing the depths of his worthlessness: in essence, he's an overgrown schoolyard bully that was held back seven years.

These last two paragraphs shed light on one main truth about socialists in America: all of the far left's acolytes are typically worthless outcasts of society. These idiots cannot thrive in a meritocracy that requires competency and hard work. Instead of blaming themselves for their incompetence and getting their asess to work, they decide to blame their environment and everybody else for their shortcomings.

Newsflash: Would be above average for socialists at DePaul.

In addition, just like in real life, the more people there are in a group working on something (i.e. collectivism), the easier it is to obscure individual responsibility, regardless of how poorly individuals perform. This is in part why movements such as the planned USSR economy and Socialist Venezuela failed; there is no accountability for results, and with no accountability, there is no responsibility. Lack of personal responsibility deludes incentives for individuals to help themselves, which deludes production, invention, and culture.

Even Bernie Sanders, the socialist cult's most prominent member, is an incompetent loser who got off welfare solely because he makes a living off promising other losers hardworking people's things, taken by government force and coercion. In order to survive, he had to champion causes of the perpetually dependent to protect himself.

2. College students have become perfectly inculcated to ideology

Sadly, the ratio of radicals to reasonable people was what you'd expect. It is obvious that college students cannot think anymore despite the fact that this is exactly what individuals go to college for. I saw this when one of the Republican debaters plainly said African Americans commit crimes disproportionately to their percentage of the population. For just saying this, he was screamed at, despite his statement being purely factual. He was forced to explain his rationale afterwards, despite his statistical accuracy.

It is sad that students cannot take facts at face value anymore; in addition, when that same Republican debater said "calling us sexist bigots will not promote the discussion," members of the audience promptly yelled "but you are," followed by laughs and jeers. Despite their supposed pursuit of diversity, these cretins have no problem trampling ideological diversity.

Aside from the intolerance of intellectual diversity among leftists, this is indicative of the greater trend of the American socialists who are easily influenced to whatever dumb idea is predominant among their political clout, be it safe-spaces, trigger warnings, intersectionality, or any other bullshit terminology that could only be conceived in the back offices of a gender studies department.

Because college students cannot think, they are easily manipulated by corporations, maintaining their socialist ideology while buying iPhones and getting shipments from Amazon, despite both entities being against everything these mongrels were inculcated to believe.

Loading...

The hate mail I am going to get from this one will be beautiful.

3. The college media, like its mainstream counterpart, lies for ideological reasons

It was obvious that The DePaulia, the school's newspaper, was going to slam the college Republicans. Granted, they don't just call them racists like usual, but they were smart enough to belittle them and beat around the bush to demean them; however, even though it was a change of style, the idiocy was transparent. The writer that covered the event, Emma Krupp, displayed her hard-hitting intellectual firepower with this excerpt:

> ...it's a common stereotype, to be sure, that Republicans are a political minority on DePaul's campus. Whether or not that will ever be statistically proven remains to be seen.

Krupp goes on to smear the Republicans, calling them meek, while praising the Democrats. Krupp and The DePaulia represent a large segment of the media that thinks tantamount to the zombified students on universities. The only difference is that these children actually get big-boy jobs, though sadly without ever learning basic lessons of journalistic integrity. Most media outlets cannot even grasp objectivity or professionalism anymore, which has given rise to the mainstream media, outright lying to slander and libel conservatives in any way possible.

4. The race card is a free card in political discussions with liberals

Thank God with Monopoly money you cannot go into debt, because if so, race card debt at DePaul would be worse than our national debt.

One of the debate topics that night happened to be on race, and as you can possibly guess, the one black debater played the race card, pointing out that he had a different skin color than every other debater, all for political points. When one of the Republican debaters suggested actually following the debate rules and taking turns to speak, the Democrat interrupted saying: “I’m black, I’m going to speak up,” even though he had already used his speaking time. A heart-throbbing story followed about how he couldn’t play with toy guns as a toddler because of barbaric police shooting black youth, referencing Tamir Rice. According to the left, it is the cops’ fault 100% of the time.

The race card is all too prominent these days, and it is the lowest form of argument intellectually, because it censors, rather than promotes, discussion. Additionally, the race card is often paired with the fictional “White Privilege.”

Synopsis of syllabus of every REQUIRED Multiculturalism class at DePaul

In reality, white privilege is a term devised by leftists to silence dissent against their radical, racist agenda.

5. Male academics are blue pill, effeminate, and spineless

And finally, one of the more embarrassing moments of the night was the Republicans constantly being interrupted without pause, and the moderator, Dr. Joseph Mello did nothing. When one of the debaters asked the moderator to enforce the debate rules, his response to not enforcing them was: “passions are high.” I say it is shocking because Mello’s academic focuses are law and courts.

One would think that studies in law and courts would have helped Mello understand concepts such as tyranny of the majority and the rule of law, but obviously not. If laws were established, and subsequently thrown away due to the whims of “passions,” our society couldn’t function, so it is obvious that when passions and feelings trumped debate rules, the entire night was regrettably ruined.

Now, I am not sure if Mello was either a spineless pussy, bent over for the mobocracy (which is a possibility looking at his feeble body), or if he maliciously disregarded the rules, or both. Either way, it shows what feminized Marxist academia does to male academics.

Being a conservative transgender individual, it is a toss up as to who has more balls, Dr. Mello or Caitlyn Jenner?

It is a catch 22 for conservatives in academia, a perfect system that has decapitated ideological diversity. It leads me to my last insight; the progressive and feminist movement work from the inside, creating such toxic environments for the remaining minorities, that it is impossible for our movements to work in the same fashion.

Conclusion

In the end, the mob won and discussion lost; however, there is hope. The conservative movement is strong at DePaul and throughout the country. The second decade of the twenty-first century is the 60’s of the conservative movement. We are working at building our base internationally, and when the red pill community and its allies have a strong enough backing to end feminism, the victory will be quick and decisive.

This is because strong convictions are bred from a strong base: moral philosophy, conviction, faith, and will power, all of which the progressive movement lacks. We are the stronger power on a foundational basis, and it is a matter of time until feminism decays. The power vacuum will create itself. The night is darkest before the dawn, and dawn is nearing.

Read More: Will Smith’s Revolt Against The Oscars Shows That Leftist Celebrity

Solidarity Is Crumbling

Hannibal Menwell Creed
Hannibal is a student at DePaul University. He has few friends, lots of enemies, and even more hatred for Bernie Sanders supporting millennials. You can find him on campus working out, being a douche to piss off liberals, drinking black coffee mixed with whiskey, or studying. You can reach him at "".

4 Effective Fighting Techniques That Every Man Should Know

March 31, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

You cannot say that you are a man if you cannot fight. As simple as that. If you fight better, you incidentally become a better man. People would say that nowadays, in the era of cameras, guns, safe spaces, and “muh feelings,” hand-to-hand to combat is obsolete. I could not disagree more.

Fighting is needed in this day and age more than ever before. By being exposed to this real violence, you become slowly impervious to it. You can distance yourself from it, think in a clearer manner and act accordingly. You learn that you are not fragile and that when someone strikes you, you strike right back.

I have fought most of my life, learned different arts and used many techniques. But nothing is as efficient as perfectly mastered, simple techniques. Today, I will share with you what I consider the most useful tools in the box.

The hand techniques

We will focus here on the upper limbs, in a situation of unarmed combat. I have a limited experience in the “soft” arts such as Tai Chi and Qui Gong so this series uses techniques coming from the “hard” arts.

Disclaimer : These are suggestions to add to your training sessions. You must practice regularly and under the supervision of a qualified teacher.

No “Cannon Fist Style” in today’s article

1. The lead hand pull and back hand strike

I find this technique more effective against an opponent using a southpaw stance. The important element is surprise.

1.Starting from both the opponents having their guard up. Use the power of your lead hand to bring the opponent towards you, knocking him off balance. You can grab his lead wrist, the back of his fist or his sleeve if he has any.

2.Simultaneously, your back hand comes closer to strike with a cross or a hook. The force of impact is multiplied as you are not hitting a motionless target, but one that meets your fist by moving straight in its direction.

3. You must act fast as you also have your lead hand occupied. The movement can be completed by pulling the opponent's hand downwards or by side-stepping to his "weak" side (towards his back and shoulders) and take advantage of this position.

2. The palm heel strike

Sensei Demura demonstrates the palm heel strike, while pulling on his opponent's belt in order to maximize the strength of impact.

This move is effective and simple to use, but it is usually proscribed in a competitive environment as it can damage the bones of the face easily or cause severe damage. It reduces your risks of knuckle and wrist injuries compared to a regular closed-fist punch, when the articulations are cold for instance.

1. Where the fist is like a stone traveling in the air, the palm heel strike uses the supports of the radius and cubit (ulna) bone.

It would feel more like a spear or the end of a stick that uses a thrusting strike.

2. The technique is usually a counter-attack movement used after entering the guard of the opponent, by blocking or deflecting his blow. The targets are usually the chin (see image), the nose or the throat when the strike is performed in a straigh line. When you use the palm heel as a hook, aim at the temple, the chin or the neck.

Deliver the blow upwards from a bent arm and only when close to your opponent. The distance the blow will have to travel will depend on the height of your opponent, but will seldom exceed six inches

Fig. 4

Fig. 5

Fig. 6

Never draw your hand back, thus signaling your intention of striking. From start to finish, make every movement as quickly as possible

Remember that an attack, or an attempt to attack, with the knee at your opponent's testicles will always bring his chin forward and down

Note. Practice the blow as follows. Hold your left hand at the height of your own chin, palm downwards; jab up quickly with your right, striking your left hand, as in Fig. 6

As the close-combat authority William E. Fairbairn illustrates in his book Get Tough!, you can complete the technique by gouging the eyes of your opponent.

3. The ear slap from waist level

Loading...

NOTE: This is a self defense move. This strike usually results in the perforation of the ear drum.

Perforated ear drum caused by an ear slap

An alternative is to hit the zone of the chin and jaw.

1. As it is a self-defense situation, the key is to use suprise. You have to strike before the opponent has the time to raise his fists. When confronted, open the palms next to your waist, asking “What did I do?” to distract your target.

2. Turn your whole body as you strike. Strength is not the main element. Speed and precision are, as the palm must land flat on the ear, perforating the ear drum with the sudden pressure. The arm must not be locked extended to avoid elbow injury and allow greater speed.

3. If you do not want to perforate any ear drums, the alternative is to use all the weight of the body and strike the jaw of the opponent with the radius bone.

A powerful slap is sometimes sufficient to knock out or disorientate someone caught off guard.

4. The upward elbow block and elbow strike

This move has been popularized by the introduction of Muay Thai to Westerners. It can be executed in one or two steps, depending of the distance that separates you from the opponent

1. Having your fists raised, pass your palm on your head as if you were using an invisible comb. This should be done while moving one step forward, to parry an incoming hook or to strike directly the chin of your opponent if you get close enough.

2. The aim of the move is to hit the chin or the nose of the opponent from under. The big inconvenience of this move is that it leaves the ribcage exposed while it is performed.

If you missed, you can follow up by using a close range horizontal elbow strike. You should turn your entire body, starting from the back foot, to use maximum power.

Au travail!

Now it is time to bring those ideas to the dojo and learn them. They should be practiced once a week. There is no “minimum length” or “end” of practice. I am not telling you how to take antibiotics.

The human body comes with lower limbs even more powerful than the upper ones! Stay tuned for Part II where I will share with you the right techniques to kick your way to victory.

Read More: 13 Martial Artists You Can Draw Inspiration From

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

3 Men Of The Bible Who Were Undone By Weakness

March 31, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

We can learn a lot from reading about the lives of heroic men. Their example goads us to achieve great things in our own lives. But we can also learn from the mistakes of others. The Bible is full of examples of men who fell short of their potential.

Adam

We don't have to get far in the Bible before encountering the first weak man—Adam.

Most people are already familiar with the story of how the serpent convinces Eve, the wife of Adam, to eat of the forbidden fruit:

> Now the serpent was more crafty than any of the wild animals the Lord God had made. He said to the woman, 'Did God really say, "You must not eat from any tree in the garden"?'
>
> The woman said to the serpent, 'We may eat fruit from the trees in the garden, > but God did say, “You must not eat fruit from the tree that is in the middle of the garden, and you must not touch it, or you will die.”’

>
> ‘You will not certainly die,’ the serpent said to the woman. ‘For God knows that when you eat from it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil.’
>
> When the woman saw that the fruit of the tree was good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom, she took some and ate it.

You may be wondering where Adam was while the serpent was tempting Eve. The Biblical text says he was with her the entire time. Yet he never stepped forward to tell his wife to break off the conversation. Nor did he rebuke the serpent, even though God had given Adam dominion over the entire earth. Instead, he dutifully ate some of the fruit himself in direct disobedience to God.

Theologian Scott Hahn argues that the serpent was much more than just a tiny green snake. He was a dragon. If true, this explains why Adam failed to step forward to protect his wife—he was afraid he would lose his life.

Regardless of the interpretation, the cause of Adam’s fall was his failure to exercise his masculine leadership over his wife. As the head of marriage, he should not have deferred to Eve. Instead, he should have intervened, broken off Eve’s conversation with the serpent, and prevented her from partaking of the fruit even if it meant that he would have to fight a dragon.

The theme of men who are ruined because they fail in their role as leaders in the marriage recurs frequently in the Bible. For example, Samson yields to Delilah, which leads to his capture and death. And Solomon, who was revered as the wisest man in the world, ends badly because he is led astray by his wives.

The lesson from this is that men must be always vigilant in their relationships with their wives. A momentary lapse of leadership can lead to disaster.

David

King David was certainly not a weak man by any measure. In most respects, he is an ideal male role model. David demonstrated great bravery from his youth when he volunteered to be Israel’s champion against the giant Goliath. Later, David became a great warrior. The Israeli women even sang of his exploits saying, “King Saul has slain his thousands, and David his tens of thousands."

But David did have one moment of weakness. He allowed his lust to get the better of him with regard to a wife of one of his officers.

King David had sent his army to fight the Ammonites while he remained behind in Jerusalem. One evening, David went to the roof of his palace. From there he observed that there was a beautiful woman taking a bath on the roof of her house. The King was immediately smitten and sent messengers to retrieve the woman, who was named Bathsheba. Unfortunately, Bathsheba was already married to Uriah, an officer in David's army.

Loading...
David and Bathsheba did what came naturally and he sent her back home. Not long afterward, Bathsheba sent word that she was pregnant with David's child. Eager to cover up his wrong doing, David called Uriah back from the frontlines hoping that Uriah would sleep with his wife.

However, Uriah, a truly dedicated soldier, pointed out that it would be wrong to enjoy his wife while his brothers were still fighting in the field. That left David in a pickle: if it became clear that Bathsheba was carrying David's child, David would have been found guilty of adultery.

Rather than risk it, David made matters worse by sending Uriah back to the front. He also told his commander to let Uriah lead a charge on the enemy, but to pull the Israeli troops back thus leaving Uriah exposed. In this way, Uriah was slain.

David's adultery and subsequent murder of Uriah brought down a heavy punishment from God. Instead of enjoying a prosperous reign, he found himself fighting for his life and his throne against one of his sons.

The truth is that David was played. Bathsheba was clearly trying to entice the King by prancing around naked where she was going to be seen by him. David would have been a lot better off if he had just visited his own harem. Men haven't changed. All of us are at risk for ruining our reputation if we fail to control our lust.

Peter

The last weak man that I want to discuss is the apostle Peter. Unlike Adam and David, Peter's weakness was not related to women. Instead, Peter's fault was that wanted to be liked by people too much.

Initially, the Christian church consisted of solely Jewish converts. These Jewish Christians continued to observe all the ceremonial aspects of the Jewish law, including abstaining from certain meats.

When the church expanded to include gentile converts, there was a big controversy within the church: how much of the Jewish law would gentile converts have to observe? There was a church council at Jerusalem where the apostles, including Peter, decided that gentile Christians would not be required to observe the Mosaic law.

When the apostle Peter went to visit the gentile Christians in the city of Antioch, he behaved like them. Consistent with the decision of the Jerusalem council, Peter ate the same food the gentiles did. However, when a delegation of Jewish Christians arrived from Jerusalem, Peter stopped hanging out with the gentiles and resumed his observance of the Jewish law so that he would be liked by his old Jewish friends.

Peter's behavior made the gentile believers feel like second class citizens. When his fellow apostle Paul got wind of Peter's hypocritical behavior, he chastised Peter "to his face." From the biblical testimony, it seems Peter accepted Paul's criticism with humility.

While the desire to be liked appears to be a minor fault, it may be one of the biggest problem that we face today. The whole SJW movement is based on virtue signaling by people who want to be liked and accepted into the "in crowd." The conservative political movement gradually sold out all of its principles because its leaders wanted to be liked by progressives. Church leaders soft pedal the difficult parts of Christianity for the same reason. It is fair to say that the inordinate desire to be liked is causing our entire civilization to slouch towards its end.

Conclusion

The Bible is unique because it displays not only the virtues of its characters, but also their faults. Modern men, whether they are believers or not, can find comfort in the fact that even the great heroes were not perfect. But they can also learn from the examples of men like Adam, David, and Peter so that they do not make the same mistakes.

Read More: The Anti-Feminism Wisdom Of The Bible

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

7 Places Where You Can Meet The “New” Modern Woman

April 1, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Hitting the same old night clubs, bars, coffee shops, and pet stores can get old–you meet the same type of girls, and frankly you get sick of the venue. Plus you’re getting dangerously close into the same pool of women your bros are already tapping. If you really want to meet some different girls, it’s time to think outside the box. I’ve begun approaching in some atypical places and found great success, and they’re with girls I normally would have never met. Some of these ideas are “thinking outside the box” and may strike you as odd, but stick with me. The photos are proof of the quality of women you can find in these venues.

1. The Mall

Anna Karczmarzyk will do anything for some new jeans

It's no surprise to the ROK readership that western women are getting trashier by the week. One of the new trends is young girls using their bodies to get shoes, jeans, jewelry, or a new telephone. They redefine the language they use, calling their clients "boyfriends" or "benefactors" in a way to avoid stating that they are actual prostitutes, often turning tricks in the mall restrooms for a quick purchase afterwards. I'm not a fan of spending money on women, but if you're already going to throw away money on them at a bar, coffee shop, or club, you might as well try this strategy too. You can pick up whatever you need at the mall while you're there.

2. The PTO Meeting

Utah public schoolteacher Brianne Altice

When I was in public school, all my teachers were old, wrinkled women born prior to WW2. I have definitely noticed the recent trend of hot-bodied twenty-something schoolteachers that seem to have appeared out of nowhere. And many of them are so desperate they turn to having sex with their students. This is clearly a case of low self esteem women with few options, taking advantage of whatever dick is closest to them. Be that dick.

Austin, Texas math teacher Haeli Wey (Hael Yeah!)

3. The Pharmacy

Alysa Bathrick, Xanax fan

If you’re over 25, you may not realize it, but pharmaceutical drugs are the new thing. Governments have made it too cumbersome to purchase alcohol and tobacco, and now prescription drugs are the drug of choice for the new generation. When you consider their legal status, and the strong chances that mom has some psychoactive drugs in her medicine cabinet, combined with their ubiquity and lower cost, not to mention that awesome high created by teams of smart men in lab coats, it's no wonder these drugs are the drug of choice.

Here's where you come in. Visit your local psychiatrist, get a prescription for a mind altering substance (medical marijuana in some states, or a choice of serotonin reuptake inhibitors in others), and hang out at the local pharmacy. Chances are pretty good you'll meet a hotty like Alysa Bathrick, who will do just about anything for some pills.

4. The Dog Park

Chubby, but passable

I've covered in the past good reasons for owning a dog. Now add one more. Miranda Johns (above), 21, was arrested in Florida in March 2016 for three counts of sex with her dogs, which she filmed. As longtime readers of ROK know, sex with dogs, sadly, is a formerly taboo activity that more and more women in the West are trying.

But not all women have large dogs. A fair number of them, especially the urban apartment dweller that you'll be targeting, are subject to size restrictions and typically have small to medium size animals. That's where you come in. You have a dog. Or at least a friend with a big dog. Grab it, head to the dog park, and wait around. If a girl asks you if the big dog is yours, that's a clear signal she's into bestiality, and you just need to make small talk about the best venues to take your pup for a couple of minutes before going in for the number close.

5. The Trailer Park

Got Crystal Meth? This Lexington, KY girl is interested

Speaking of drugs, ever notice how most crystal meth arrestees tend to be women? Perhaps the Walter Whites of the world are simply too smart to get caught, but it sure seems that the fairer sex gets a whole lot more arrests for crystal meth. Now, crystal meth users are notoriously dumb, and they tend to lose their teeth pretty quickly, so you want to go after the new users only. You know, the girl you saw at the drugstore last month but is now looking for something a little more “exciting”? That’s your target.

6. The Thrift Store

This one is a double whammy. First, you have a good chance of finding the slutty wannabe-hipster girl from the rich part of town who goes to the thrift store to buy her trendy alternative clothing. But they’re not your real goal. No, the idea here is to find a basic, simple, large white cloth. It can be a robe, it can be uncut fabric, hell, even a red and white tablecloth can work. Your goal is to take this cloth and wear it as a basic robe. Get on craigslist and announce that you are arriving in two days to pre-scout for your benefactor, a rich Arab Sheik. Yes, you will be pre-trolling the tag-a-sponsor girls.

As long as you have a few fake photos of yourself and a rich arab sheik, and focus talking about how much money she’s going to make in two days, she’ll let you do literally anything you want. You're welcome.

7. Nursing Homes

OK, hear me out. Yes, we go after younger women. My target is 20-22-year-old thin females. But the younger generation of women can kill your boner with their rough speech, Skrillex haircuts, tats and piercings, whereas American women from past generations were far closer to our ideal mate.

So whether you're an older ROK reader, or just in the mood for something different, don't knock this until you try it. The truth is very few men outlive their wives and move in to nursing homes. So you're left with a ton of horny, single ladies without transportation. The field is wide open. Just remember to wear a condom, as STIs are out of control! An added bonus? You can quickly scan the family photos for a hot granddaughter. Plus, it's a great place to practice your elderly openers.

Suck It Up

There we go. I know, probably not the article you were expecting. But men need to realize this is 2016, and if you aren't in the places above, you're probably experiencing a dry spell. Unless you plan on going sexless until your next trip abroad, I strongly suggest you visit the above spots soon!

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How America Went From Greatness To Irreversible Decadence

April 1, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Any decently educated person knows that there are many things wrong with the world today; the disease of feminism is spreading at an alarming rate, moral standards have been sinking like an anvil dropped into the ocean, and purposeful lives are at an all-time low. Only a fool would reject these claims, and many try to.

This being said, the point of this article is not meant to prove that these problems exist; no amount of proof will convince a stubborn fool to shrug off his chains of ignorance. Rather, the point of this article is to explain how American culture went from valuing traditional marriages, morals, and art, to valuing novelty, degeneracy, and instant gratification.

Knowing that there are problems with our society is good. It is not, however, very difficult to see (assuming that you have the eyes to see it). Knowing exactly how our society got this way, however, is CRUCIAL, for the only ones who can stop this madness are the ones who know how degeneracy takes root, how it grows, and how it spreads.

I am here to help shed some light on these things, in the hopes that more will soon have the knowledge required to put an end to this terrible age that we live in.

The Beginnings

It all began in the early 1800's. The USA was primarily an agrarian society; gender roles existed due to this. The men were tasked with doing the heavy lifting; they were to carry barrels of hay, brand the livestock, slaughter the animals for feast, and other typically masculine jobs. The women were to tend to the house; they were to sew what needed to be sewed, cook good meals for their husbands to replenish their strength with, raise children in an appropriate manner, and do other typically feminine jobs.

This model worked perfectly, as it played to each sex's different biological and psychological abilities. Men, being physically stronger and more logical, were tasked with running the farm, dealing with the finances, and being involved in local politics. The women, being better at multi-tasking and being more emotionally intelligent, were tasked with cooking, cleaning, tending to the house, and raising the young ones.

The best person to teach a young boy is his father

Children spent an enormous amount of time with their parents, as not many children went to school—they didn't need to. Their parents gave them a more practical education than any educational system could today.

The young boys learned how to be men by working alongside their fathers in the field and the young girls learned how to be women by helping their mothers with household tasks; parental wisdom was effectively passed down in such a way. As a man and his son toiled away in the fields, they likely had all sorts of conversations, covering a wide range of topics: how to treat girls, how to manage finances, local politics, philosophy, and their aspirations to name a few.

While a woman and her daughter were working in the house, they likely had conversations covering various topics as well: how to act around men, the best herbs to mix with certain dishes, and how to properly raise a child, for example.

This is how they learned. Not from some government-controlled, bureaucratic, politically correct organization, but rather, from their own parents' experience. Which do you think has a child's best interests at heart?

Then, at the end of the day, when the males were done working, they would come home from the fields. The children could then get a glimpse at how their parents interacted, thus learning about functional male/female relationships. They would notice their father's gentleness when hugging his wife, his volunteering to carry heavier objects for her. They would notice their mother's eagerness to serve her husband after a long, hard day in the fields, and the way that she let him take the lead in the relationship, trusting in his guidance.

Agrarian Societies Teach You Values

Working on a farm taught families discipline as well; it taught them that you reap what you sow, and it taught them to appreciate hard work. It didn't matter how much book knowledge you have, how arrogant you are, how attractive you are…nothing mattered except knowing how to farm, and putting in hard work.

If a man was lazy, he would have a poor harvest and his family would either starve to death or come close. Working on a farm taught them the value of depending on yourself and having control over your life and circumstances.

A hard-working farmer like this would teach his son to be brave, strong, and honorable.

This is, in part, why the USA was a very morally upright nation during its toddler stage. This is also why America was very conservative (both fiscally and socially) during this time period—conservatives are borne out of hard work, liberals are borne out of the lack of it.

All was well; gender roles were in place, taxes were tremendously low due to almost nonexistent liberal attitudes, parents taught children morals, the government didn't interfere too much in the peoples' lives, and a strong sense of honor and purpose permeated the masses.

If it was discovered that a man was abusing his children, the men in the local town would have a stern talking to him, the implication being that if he continued, they would take whatever action was necessary to stop the abuse. The local patriarchy upheld order within its own domain – not some massive, centralized, bureaucratic entity, too crippled by its size to actually solve anything.

Enter The Industrial Age

This all started to change in the early-mid 1800's; factories began sprouting up, and the US began to become more and more urban. It was gradual of course, but nonetheless it progressed.

Some families even sent their daughters away to factories; many viewed this as a horrible sacrilege against the traditional gender roles which had governed society for so long. Men were expected to work, not women! Women were delicate, emotional, and nurturing; they were supposed to work at home, doing womanly things.

Regardless, families were enticed by mediocre wages and promises of "educating" their daughters. Many caved and sent their daughters off; this began the dissolution of gender roles.

It Only Got Worse…

More and more men (and women) began to go to factories and move to urban areas; and eventually, the "only men work," belief started to fade away. This move towards an urban civilization posed a massive problem, because young boys learned how to be men by working alongside their fathers in the fields, and young girls learned how to be women from working alongside their mothers.

In a factory, there is none of this. Many boys began to see their fathers less and less, and their mothers were tasked with teaching them how to be men. The problem, however, is that women can't teach boys how to be men.

First Wave Feminism

By the 1860's, factories were sprouting up everywhere, women and men were being sent off to factories, gender roles were slowly, but steadily dissolving, and the first wave of feminism was growing more popular by the minute. Women had successfully gained greater financial power, and now they wanted more.

Why? Well it's quite simple, really. Women wanted to have their cake and eat it too. Women wanted to be treated like princesses, have men cater to them, and have men pay for all of their needs, but they also wanted all of the responsibility and power that came with being a man.

Women have always wanted this, since the beginning of time. I do not blame them for this, and neither should you. It is in a woman's nature to manipulate and get what she wants, thus it is a man's responsibility to maintain a strong frame and keep her in her place. So, instead of blaming women, blame the men for being too beta and naïve to realize that women should not wield the same power as men, as they are not biologically or psychologically capable of doing so.

Feminism Ran Its Course

Regardless of who to blame, however, the insidious seed of feminism was planted into the heads of women… and once it is planted, it cannot be undone.

Over the next 50 or so years, society became more and more urbanized. Men working at factories became far more common, and consequently young boys being raised without fathers did too. Many women even chose to go off to factories as well; many of their children were sent off to public school, as neither a man nor a woman was home to raise them.

Public Schools: The Catalyst That Destroys The Nuclear Family

"But Jon, isn't school a good thing?" I can hear you ask.

Education is a good thing—public schools, however, are entirely different. I personally got a Catholic education, and am extremely grateful for it. Even though I'm not religious, my Catholic teachers instilled many great values into me.

I learned the value of discipline and hard work. I learned how to dress like a man (ladies wore skirts, boys wore slacks and a button down shirt and tie). I learned that traditional values aren't "uncool," like the media tries to convince our youth, but rather that they're the only way to live a successful, fulfilling life.

As most ROK readers know, public schools nowadays are brainwashing factories, but some of you may also be quick to point out that it wasn't always like this—and you're right. This isn't the point, however—whenever the education of an entire youth is put into a single, centralized power, it's only a matter of time before the nation collapses.

The reasons for this are twofold: first, the bureaucracy always pushes an agenda onto the children, and second, it teaches the children to rebel against their parents. They no longer view their parents as guiding forces in their life, but rather as obstacles to being "cool," and outdated fools who "just don't get it."

Okay, You've Made Your Point – But Just How Bad Was It?

By 1910, 72% of children attended public schools. On one hand, this was good, because the literacy rate improved vastly. On the other hand, however, this was horrible, because by having the government control what children are taught, they can easily control what children will come to think and believe. As I said earlier, this is where the brainwashing began.

Likewise, around the same time, many of the men in the USA were far more emasculated than the previous generation. The generation of young boys who went to public school during the early 1900's were byproducts of first wave feminism, and the dissolution of the agrarian society (which remember, means that their fathers weren't around to teach them how to be a man).

Around the same time, women began to push for more rights. Men were too occupied with work, distraught by cultural changes, and/or emasculated to stand up to their wives or do anything about it, so they just decided to appease them. They gave women the right to vote, rather than telling their wives to stop with the bullshit protesting and complaining.

Well Shit, Now Women Can Vote (2nd Wave Feminism)

The problem with this is that giving women the right to have ANY say in a country's politics has been historically proven to be a terrible mistake, time and time again. Don't believe me? Look at the Arab empire—in the 10th century women demanded to hold positions that were once exclusively reserved for men. Soon after women held positions as judges, professors, and lawyers, government and public order collapsed, leaving them vulnerable to foreign invasion. History is ridden with examples of how once women are given political power, everything goes to shit – look at Rome, Greece, Babylon, and lastly… the USA. (Source: The Fate of Empires).

Is it then a coincidence that suddenly, RIGHT after women were granted the right to vote, liberal policies such as the social security act were enacted soon thereafter? Is it a coincidence that there was a massive spike in the amount of liberalism in the country? Is it a coincidence that there was soon a huge increase in welfare?

It is not; as I said before, women are extremely emotional and thus easily swayed by emotional appeals. In fact, many women even elected Warren Harding (the election of 1920, just 1 year after women could vote) simply because "he was handsome."

As the country began to become more and more industrialized, as more and more boys began to be deprived of male role models, and as more and more women went off to work, the country steadily became more and more liberal as women gained more wealth and power.

History has shown us that whenever women are given the right to vote, the country slowly, but surely becomes more socially and fiscally liberal until its demise. Again, if you don't believe me look at the Roman Empire, the Roman Republic, Greece, the Ottoman Empire, and now the USA.

Enter Third Wave Feminism

This increase in social and fiscal liberalism led to the massive feminist movement of the 1960's. However, the difference between this wave of feminism and the previous two was that this one wasn't entirely grass-roots.

Yes, there was an enormous amount of anti-male sentiment present in the minds of women during this time period, however the third wave of feminism was catalyzed by the CIA and the elite. They funded women's lib. Yes, that's right. Here is where I will likely lose many of you, as few people understand just how insidious the US government and the elite are.

If you don't believe me, however, maybe you will believe Aaron Russo, a political activist who ran for governor of the state of Nevada as a Republican in 1998. Aaron Russo has also made several libertarian leaning political documentaries and went on to run for the President of the United States in 2004 under the Libertarian party. Watch the video below.

Like Russo says, feminism was not some noble crusade. Rather, the elite wanted to be able to tax both men AND women. They wanted to break apart the nuclear family in order to push kids into public schools and start indoctrinating them.

This was the true motivation for third wave feminism. Of course, the elite and the politicians didn't say that; that wouldn't sound good to the public. So instead, they did what politicians always do. They spun a selfishly motivated grab for wealth and power to sound like a heroic endeavor.

Men Are Inferior, Women Don't Need Them

Thus, third wave feminism was born in the 1960's. Third wave feminism exposed young men to constant propaganda such as the phrase "A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle," and were frequently told about how men have been oppressing women for years. Consequently, young boys began to believe that there was almost something wrong with being a man, and they began emulating women.

The 1960's was a crucial turning point in this game; look at your grandparents' generation compared to the baby boomers. The differences are startling.

What caused the cultural revolt of the 60's to be so much more powerful than any of the preceding cultural revolts? The mass media, of course. Before the mass media, when daddy was off working mommy would take responsibility for raising the kids, and even though she couldn't raise her sons to be men, she could still at least do a decent job.

Even if both Mom and Dad were working, the kids would at least have to play with one another, read books, or find something intellectually challenging to keep them from getting bored.

The media changed all of that.

The Media Exacerbates Trends (Good Or Bad)

With a TV in the house, however, mommy could slack off and plop the kids in front of a central narrative machine to be brainwashed. And with the media being controlled by a few wealthy, elite spectators who don't have the nation's best interest at heart, obviously the media isn't going to raise children for the better.

So with the mass media permeating nearly every aspect of peoples' lives, they began to abandon traditional values in lieu of more "progressive" ones. The media began to teach children to rebel from a young age—and how can children learn from their parents if they are taught from the time that they're two years old that their parents are old, stupid, uncool, and "just don't understand"?

In addition to this, the youth became more accustomed to being passively entertained, as opposed to actively entertaining themselves (reading, playing games, etc.), which laid the foundation for future passive entertainment such as pornography and all forms of brain-rotting social media.

This spike in passive entertainment effectively started the journey towards mass stupidity; instead of young children actively exercising their brains through reading, learning a new skill, socializing, or playing sports, they simply slumped in front of a TV and took in whatever was given to them.

As children became more and more accustomed to being catered to, this became the culture of their generation. They wanted others to fix their problems, even if they were self-induced. Ever wonder why the baby boomer's generation was dubbed the "Me" generation?

Thus, without many good parents teaching children ethics, with young men becoming increasingly beta, and with logical capabilities crashing through the floor, the propaganda on TV was a huge success.

The Liberal Machine

The massive liberal machine began to grow exponentially. First it was feminism, then it was the normalization of homosexuality, the normalization of divorce, the nuclear family began to fall apart, and here we are today, living in a “fem-topia.”

Things will only become worse, however – history has shown us the pattern that every great empire follows. Soon, pedophilia will be legalized (just like it was in Rome), and heterosexuality will become a taboo.

Soon it will be normal for children to be molested, bestiality will become far more common, AIDS rates will skyrocket, and straight white men will be persecuted. Soon, we will be forced to play along with the narrative lest we lose our jobs, and our families starve.

I realize that this is very depressing, but I always like to end with some practical advice…

Okay, So What Do We Do?

So then, if the trend cannot be reversed, what do the men with eyes to see this degeneracy do? The answer is simple—go elsewhere. Many men have caught onto this already—the “Great Exodus,” as it is dubbed in the manosphere is happening as we speak.

Men from all over the Western world are migrating to more hospitable lands in the east; lands where gender still means something, and isn’t a thing you can just decide to change.

We must “Ride the Tiger,” as Italian esotericist Julius Evola would say. He postulated that humanity, as a whole, is at a tipping point. We are experiencing such a rapid change, and a rapid dissolution of spirituality (and remember, he said this in the mid 1900’s), that there is no way we can fight it.

We must ride it out.

Here’s some tips to make the transition smooth…

Work On Creating Passive Income

This one is major. Within the next several decades, it will be very common for men to get fired for speaking up about anti-male propaganda, expressing distaste towards homosexuality, and valuing traditional gender roles. In fact, it's already starting to happen, but it's only going to get worse.

By creating passive income, you can say what you want without fear of poverty. Roosh can say what he wants, because this blog sustains him—in fact, it had to. Many of you might not know this, but Roosh was actually paranoid for years; he realized that he could be fired from his position as an industrial microbiologist at any moment if his employer found out about his blog.

Now, this doesn't mean you have to create a blog, although it is a great way to earn some side revenue. You can also learn to day trade, start a business, monetize a YouTube channel, get into Amazon mercantilism, or publish eBooks.

I tweeted about buying stock in ABX on January 6th, and since then it's almost doubled. I'll be tweeting stock advice every now and then, so that neomasculine men can slowly gain more financial power in the world, but if you're trying to make money investing I recommend a combination of reading Motley Fool, Seeking Alpha, and making predictions about where the world is headed (right now towards another collapse).

Buy Some Fucking Guns

You never know when the shit will hit the fan; it's always good to be prepared. A fellow author wrote about this here – I think it's a great introduction, and at the very least, it will give you an idea of what you're looking for in a gun. In addition to this, it's a good idea to create a bug out bag and learn some survivalist skills. You never know when you'll have to use them.

Keep Your Goddamn Mouth Shut

Until you are completely financially independent, DO NOT risk getting fired. I am telling you from personal experience, it is not worth it. I used to try to convince everyone that feminism was cancer, but I quickly learned that most people will think you're crazy, and the rest will try to get you fired or expelled (when I was in school).

If you find someone who seems to have a general sense of unease at the state of the world, you can try to slowly push him down the path that we've all gone down, that led us here. Be careful though, too much truth revealed at once will cause a severe backlash.

Improve Yourself

Even though the time we live in isn't very great for living a fulfilling, honorable life, it's still great for fucking tons of women.

Just ask Dan

Work on your game, lift weights, meditate, read, and find other like-minded men.

In Summary

In summary, there are several lessons that you should keep in mind:

1. When women are given the right to vote, everything goes to shit.
2. When a single centralized power controls the youth's education, everything goes to shit.
3. Without the nuclear family, everything goes to shit.

Every reader of ROK should know these things by heart—history has shown us time and time again that they are true. If you can convince others of these things, that's great, but if they don't want to listen, then don't waste your time.

Work on improving yourself, and preparing yourself for the imminent collapse of the West, so that you can be prepared to make a difference when it will really count.

Read More: What Happened To Ashley?

Jon Anthony

Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Surrexit Dominus Vere! Christ Is Risen! Χριστός Ἀνέστη! Христо́съ воскре́се!

April 1, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the men of ROK in Easter Week, the most joyful week in the Christian year. I'm sorry I didn't comment as much on my last article, but from Maundy Thursday to the Tuesday of Clean Week there is such solemnity of the services and merriment in the customs, that I didn't have much time to comment.

After a month and an half of fasting, and of Liturgical austerity, the long journey of Lent comes to an end; I am pleased to say that, after a couple years of Easter disappointment, this year I have been able to hit my stride and recover the old joys. This has not come without a fight; no pain, no gain, nature itself teaches us. I'm moved to share some of my thoughts on this, for Western men interested in what has happened to their spiritual patrimony, as a capstone to our reflections on piety.

Over the past two years, as I was finding my home in Catholicism, my Easter customs were not as great as they had formerly been, due to the confusion and my remote location from a Mass. And, since I'm sorry to say that even the traditional Catholics often do little better than keep to Friday abstinence and Sunday Mass, often their Easter joy is little more than it would be for a Labor Day barbecue. Sadly, I find that this translates to their liturgical practice as well.

For some time, this was the only surviving doubt I had, about my decision to convert to Catholicism from the Orthodox Church. Because many Orthodox come from cultures where the customs are still intact, their liturgical ceremonies are second-nature to them, at once dignified and intimately comfortable. Easter amongst them was sublime. The total absence of this joy and freedom even in traditional Catholics' Liturgy, sometimes made me hesitate. Close study had convinced me, intellectually, that (actual) Catholics hold to the Apostolic Faith; but only witnessing a similar loss of warmth amongst modernized Orthodox groups, helped me to shake the purely emotional and aesthetic sense that the differing confessions made all the difference.

I realized that the main factor involved, was whether the people put in their dues, to keep their customs alive and intimately familiar. As we now know, this is directly related to piety—how faithful will they be to God, and to the customs of their people, their rite? To the degree that Modernism (founded on impiety) prompts us to compromise and "tone it down," to the same degree we lose our joy and connection to our piety.

The West will only recover this, and their intimate familiarity with the beauty of God's household, the hard way: i.e., by piously cultivating again their rites and customs. They must approach their rites prayerfully and willingly, not regarding the chanting of the office in choir, processions, long masses, etc., as a chore, but as a great privilege. This is the genius of their ancestors, as it was moved by God; how can we be disinterested in it?

As with most things, the less we do, the less we want to do, and I see the inclination towards disinterested abbreviations and omissions even in "traditional" Catholic circles. When I was amongst the old-school Russian Orthodox, standing in church for hours, gladly, was not uncommon. With or without a priest, the office was always chanted. If the mind wandered, the eyes cast in any direction would land upon some reminder of the sacred. It takes "a lot" to keep this up; but the burden of "a lot" is quite light.

Your typical Roman Rite Church, even in traditionalist circles, however, is not paying these dues; no chanted office, a preference for low masses, omission, abbreviation or simplification of many occasional rites, processions and blessings, etc. The end result, is that even the priests are not intimately familiar with the ceremonial idiom of their own rite. Thus, when they feel obliged to perform a solemn ceremony, their stiff and affected comportment is conspicuous in many ways.

If you happen to get bored with this spectacle, their walls are white; the lights, harsh and electric; there is one statue of our lady up in the stratosphere and some mediocre stations of the cross. And by doing so much less, even our bare minimum feels like a chore. I am sorry to mention this in such a week; but I was saddened to see the parish I attended lacking the joy and freedom of the Paschal rites, which I have been pleased to keep even in my very simple chapel on the farm.

Ah, brothers, it is indeed difficult to keep the flame alive in these days, when even the traditionalists often hold to the barest forms of our civilization's former substance! But in this Easter week, I bear witness that the substance is not gone, yet—though we do have a choice to make. Those who regard our customs and rites as a burden or chore, will keep on doing less until they lose everything. In point of fact, last week Roosh and others, asked what I thought of Francis' activity on Maundy Thursday. I had thought of writing about it in my article last week, but I wanted to wait and see if he would actually do it.

For those who do not know, the Maundy (from Latin mandatum) is the liturgical re-enactment of Christ's institution of the priesthood, His preparation of the Apostles for ordination, and His celebration of the first mass (i.e., the last supper) with them, when He washed their feet and said mandatum novum do vobis, ut diligatis invicem ("I give you a new commandment: that you love one another").

It is also important to remember that, in Semitic cultures, the whole area below the waist was associated with the private parts, such that "feet," "legs" and "thighs" are often euphemisms for the genitals. Men and women did not indiscriminately handle each other's feet and legs. The Scriptures also record that our Lord stripped off His clothes before girding Himself with a towel for this event.

So, a) this was a masculine, fraternal event, closed to women; b) it involves the relations of masters and subjects, implying membership in the same structure; c) it is related to the ordination and communing of the Apostles in connection with our Lord's Passion. Thus, the Maundy is restricted to men for moral reasons, and by reason of its connection to ordination. It is also restricted to Catholics, as a very solemn sacramental tied to the hierarchical ministry of the church. Francis' act, therefore, was an act of blasphemy and impiety par excellence. Moreover, it involves a Satanic perversion of Christian sympathy with the lowly.

The Scriptures often take the side of lowly persons, because their alienation from worldly power protects their piety. But modernists' preoccupation with the "fringes" is entirely contrary to this; it exploits convenient out-groups only to weaponize them against the very piety that the Scriptures found praiseworthy in the lowly, further solidifying the potent impiety of lofty personages. Hence all Francis' "compassion" has the result of uprooting piety and sowing impiety. This should not surprise us, who now understand something of impiety and the Church's Passion.

But we can choose better for ourselves, even if we have to do all the heavy lifting. Since my situation has stabilized, I have been glad to keep the customs of the Latin church even in a private capacity in my home chapel, and have found this Easter week as joyful as any I knew amongst the good-hearted Russians! My chapel is sweet, still, with the myrrh-infused holy water sprinkled everywhere on Good Friday, when I "entombed" our Lord (i.e., His crucifix) in an home-made Easter Sepulcher; it is now also redolent with the fragrance of all the roses and other flowers I brought in at His Resurrection on Easter Sunday, and with the incense that I have used at the full cycle of chanted Hours this week.

That in itself has been a great joy—after the long and austere services of Holy Week, the Tenebrae, the straight-chanted psalms without doxologies, the long hours awake and without food, the Paschal Hours now shine with special delight! I use the Dominican rite, and it shortens the services of Easter week sharply. This abbreviation does not sap the will; it produces a sense of everything being new, out of the ordinary, bright and lively. It leaves one wanting to pray and sing even more, as if the services never really end.

There are the gladsome processions out to the shrine of our Lady while the Christus Resurgens and the Regina Caeli are sung, with special prayers replacing the usual conclusion of services. My paschal candle stays lit at all times; the chapel has been cleaned and everything polished, decked out with bright hangings and flowers; we've been feasting on steaks and hamburgers and pascha breads, plenty of port and whisky, rum and beer!

Yes, the times are evil and many wretches go through this life without any joy; those who want something better, may God grant a light to their path; those who have said in their heart, quiescere faciamus omnes dies festos Dei a terra ("let us abolish all God's festivals from the earth"), it would be better for them never to have been born, for the Lord will rise to judge His own cause, and will not forget the words of those, whose arrogance has continually ascended before Him. In the meantime, this is Clean Week, the Lord is risen, and I, for one, am as glad-hearted as I've ever been!

Surrexit Dominus Vere! Christ is risen! Χριστός Ἀνέστη! Христо́съ воскре́се!

I leave you with some of my favourite music of Easter Week.

In honor of the Russians, who first showed Easter to me; it builds up to a thing of glory. Crank the volume.

Christus Resurgens is sung repeatedly at this time, and is my favourite… though everyone seems to sing it more sedately than I do.

The Eastertide greeting of the Virgin, Regina Caeli.

Easter Sunday has one of the few surviving medieval sequences, Victimae Paschali.

The Gradual Haec Dies first appears at Easter Sunday Mass, and is sung for the rest of the week, also replacing parts of the shortened Divine Office; it is an highly meditative chant.

The Alleluya from Easter Day's Mass is the best of its type, another highly meditative melody. I don't normally like women's voices in chant, but this lady renders the melody as clear as a sunbeam.

And finally, two Easter carols, since eight is the number of Easter.

Read More: 20 Signs You're A Slave To Modern Technology

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

Why Are Sluts And Studs Different?

April 2, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

What is a slut, what is a stud—and why are they different? Why can't a girl who is promiscuous be revered as an accomplished individual like a guy is? Women get angry at these "double standards."

It's a simple strategy when you start to think of the dynamics: women need a fallback to catch them once they have finished up their slutty, carousel-riding adventures during their 20s. As the end of their 20s approach, they're running head-on into their 30s, as ugly and unwanted as they have ever been to that point in their life.

Here are four common points regarding why girls constantly argue that sluts and studs are equal, and what you must be aware of as a man.

The Skill Required

I have a phrase I like to throw around: "A woman saying she can get sex is like me saying I can buy a girl dinner."

While it's an extreme example, it wouldn't be difficult at all for me to buy a girl dinner every night of the week if I so wished. Likewise, a girl could easily go out to a bar every night of the week, and take someone home each night to have sex with her. Of course, no man wants to buy seven different girls dinner throughout the week, just as most girls would feel slutty or ashamed about having their own "perfect week."

The reason for this is simply the levels of skill. It takes no skill or charm for a girl to get laid every night of the week. The level of thirst in today's world is extreme, and makes it easy for them to get laid. On the other hand, for a man to have banged seven girls in seven days would take an enormous amount of skill, tolerance for rejection, and a bit of luck.

Because They Need A Fallback

A lot of women try to argue that the most attractive women in the world are the ones who are very sexually experienced. What they don't realize is that trying to argue that women who have been the town cum dumpster are attractive is grasping at straws. Many times, they are just trying to rationalize their own sluttiness.

Make no mistake, girls are very aware of the reality, but they have to act naive and innocent in order to put up the illusion of being a good girl. And for the record, it doesn't matter what her intentions are with you—even if she just wants to fuck you once and be done with you, most girls will still put up this facade. The number of girls in the world who will simply say, "Yeah, I'm a slut, I love sex, and I, as the girl, just want to fuck and chuck you," is very low.

So why do they put up this illusion? It's simple: women want the best man they can get across all spectrums; health, wealth, power, etc. Reverse situation: men want the hottest girl they can get, who is the least amount of a pain in the ass.

Even if a girl wants to have sex with you that night, they insist on putting on the good girl facade because you might become something more down the road. What if you are a secret millionaire? What if you are going to turn into a winner in a short few years? She needs to keep you as an option because women have an inherent need to upgrade to the best model that they can obtain.

Limiting Men's Options

Women attempt to shame men who are skilled with women because they don't men to sleep around and discover that there are some very high-quality girls out there who blow the majority out of the water. More often than not, it's the women who are low quality that are doing the shaming.

Women do not want men to have the same instincts to trade up that they do. The funny thing is, once you've really seen the true nature of women, you start to come to the conclusion that a lot of women know how dark their souls can sometimes be.

From experience I can tell you that it terrifies them. At the same time, they can't do anything about it. It's a complete lack of control in their own brain, which is why women are so attracted to men who are dominant and take charge. Because it relieves them from the agony of dealing with their own torment.

Women feel a need to curb men's desire for a diverse sexual appetite in order to prevent them from straying to other women.

The Reality Of Life

Most women are not aware of the realities of the modern dating world. They think that men have as many Tinder matches and dates as they do, or that men get hit on all the time, too. The reality of the situation is that a lot of women are under the assumption that dating for men is as easy as it is for them. They think that it just falls into our laps, and are completely naive of the hard work and dedication it takes to become an advanced player of the game.

Simply put: women think the way the sexual marketplace functions is just like a Disney movie, where everything falls into place and everybody is happy. They are not aware of the struggles and pains that your modern man goes through just to get the occasional bang. Therefore, it becomes their natural inclination to simply shame men for being players, while simultaneously defending women who are slutty.

Women will shamelessly defend their own promiscuity. I had a girl last year who I was banging brag about her own “perfect week”—she managed to bang seven dudes in seven days off of Tinder. I dropped her shortly after. They will tell us to “man up” and marry the girls who threw away their best years for a nice ride on the carousel, and then pin all the responsibility on us to save them. They say that this is just “how it is.”

They’ll tell men that their biology desires are bad. They’ll throw an overblown fear of STDs into the mix for good measure (condoms do work), and use any tactic in the book to make a man feel shameful for feeling natural, biological urges. They find it far easier to deny reality than it is to accept it.

The reality of the situation is that biology always wins. Sluts and studs are not the same thing. And as long as women keep preaching that, they’re simply making the bed they have to lay in.

Read Next: 5 Ways To Bully Fat Sluts On A Date

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Soccer Star Gets 6 Years In Jail For Fingering Teenage Girl While Female Abusers Get Lighter Sentences

April 2, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Former England national soccer star Adam Johnson was recently jailed for six years for kissing and digitally penetrating a 15-year-old girl. The erstwhile winger, who also played for British club Sunderland, eventually pled guilty to kissing and grooming the underage girl. He maintained his pleas of not guilty for two other sexual assault charges, including the digital penetration, one of which resulted in a conviction.

I will not at all attempt to defend Adam Johnson's self-admitted behavior, kissing and grooming the girl, and am inclined to believe he did statutorily sexually assault the girl digitally. What I will defend, however, is the need for Johnson to be jailed or not jailed for a term that accords with fairness and common sense.

If he deserves six years in jail, a menagerie of women convicted of more counts of child sexual abuse when in positions of authority deserve between 10 and 40 years in many cases. Yet so many of these women, usually female teachers, escape proper punishment, receiving a good behavior bond (the British equivalent of probation) or a short jail stint that belies the number of times and the severity with which they have offended against minors.

Here's what British women get for more repeated, egregious sexual abuse of minors

I shall keep my focus squarely on Britons convicted of sexual crimes against the underaged. Inasmuch as American sentencing standards are probably worse, it is helpful to study the same jurisdiction in which Adam Johnson was convicted and jailed.

Caroline Berriman

The teaching assistant had sex with a male student 80 times, but was given only two years in jail last year, even then only because of an appeal to her original suspended term. Unlike Adam Johnson, she engaged in both oral and penetrative sex with the boy. Johnson's offending, remember, amounted to kissing and fingering. Unacceptable behavior, yes, yet far less repeated than Berriman's and lacking a similar abuse of position/authority.

Sandrine Brown

This teacher did get a prison sentence of 18 months, but there were serious aggravating factors that did not exist in Adam Johnson's case. For a start, the two girls Brown violated were younger, the sexual abuse starting when at least one of them was just 13. The period of offending was also much longer, from 2008 to 2011. And, once more, she was using her position of authority as an educator to manipulate them. If Johnson received six years, Brown deserved a minimum of 12.

Donna Brant

Another teaching assistant, Brant asked her victim, aged 13-17, to send photos of himself masturbating. She also promised a sex act if he said he loved her. Some 2,500 mostly sexual text messages were sent by Brant to the boy, including one with a photo of a sex toy. This was nothing short of an epic child grooming attempt, for which Brant received a paltry 18 month community order, 15 days of rehab, and 180 hours of community service.

By the way, the ladies love Johnson a lot more now that he's in jail

Providing more evidence for an earlier article I wrote about women desiring violent men or men in jail generally, Adam Johnson is being inundated with fawning communications from females, including letters and erotic selfies. I cannot imagine many men who would prefer this prison attention to being a free man, but the situation should cause us to pause in concern.

Sadly, we are seeing the depravity on both ends. Courts continually stamp women's pussy passes, condoning behavior that should be condemned unapologetically. At the same time, many females' intrinsic hybristophilia kicks in, making them salivate from both frontal holes over a man in a prison cell. This is a most confusing age for those men not initiated into red pill thinking, particularly Neomasculinity, and still somewhat puzzling for those of us who are.

Don't be an idiot like Adam Johnson

Adam Johnson's girlfriend is very decent-looking, too, compounding the legal and moral stupidity of him engaging in ANY sexually-themed contact with a 15-year-old girl.

Being a man nowadays is tantamount to being a rapist in the eyes of very many feminists, but Adam Johnson went above and beyond in painting a target on his back. Incontrovertibly, he broke the law in the United Kingdom. He should not have done what he did, nor should he have Googled the age of consent, found the answer, and then proceeded in spite of it being illegal. Considering he was a well-known soccer player, he was moronic to think the girl would not brag to her friends, which she indeed later did.

There are serious, overwhelming issues when it comes to the pussy pass given to women in the legal system. That argument stands, yet the take-away from this Adam Johnson saga is that there are some laws you just do not mess with. Some men love to opine that age of consent laws vary from country to country, even state to state, and that, considering the age at which many teens reach something resembling physical maturity, they are arbitrary. Treat such opinions as nothing but dross. They invariably only land people in trouble.

And you should not just be concerned about situations where a man knows the age of the girl. It is perfectly conceivable that you could meet a girl in a club who is a minor and feigning her age to you. In many American states and European countries, this will not be a problem, as the age of consent is generally around 16, a threshold under which hardly any girls will be able to get into licenced or similar premises. You still need to be hyper-vigilant, though. Women have no personal responsibility, remember.

Usually it is just better to avoid the wolf than to look it in the eye. Adam Johnson did not do this and he will pay for it for years, both now and after he gets out of jail.

Read More: 17 Previous Assault Convictions But No Jail Time For This Woman

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Ugly Truth About Abortion From A Doctor Who Performed Them

April 3, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Get ready to be triggered.

A former abortionist who turned against killing unborn children has just released a series of videos on YouTube explaining the truth behind abortion. Dr. Anthony Levantino uses the animated series to illustrate the procedures that claim some 3,000 lives a day in abortion clinics like the one he used to work in. That number represents far more deaths than those caused by gun violence, an issue liberals are obsessed with. An incredible 83 times more unborn humans are killed by abortion each year than all deaths by gun violence. Remove gang-related gun violence from the equation and there is a 0.0008% chance of dying at the hands of a gunman on a shooting rampage. However, a preborn baby has a 20% or 1 in 5 shot at being killed using one of the methods we will be discussing.

Dr. Levantino describes the gut-wrenching experience he had which made him change his mind on abortion. He was performing a 2nd trimester abortion when he became physically ill while doing the procedure. However, he could not stop until the procedure was complete.

> I looked, I literally looked at that pile of baby parts on the table, and I didn't see all the things that had sustained me all those years. I didn't see what a wonderful doctor I was helping her with her problem. I didn't see her wonderful right to choose, and I didn't even see the $800 cash I just made in 15 minutes. All I could see was somebody's son or daughter.
>
> Suddenly, this was looking really different to me. For the first time in my life it hit > me very powerfully, that this woman had come to me figuratively and said…here's $800, kill my baby. And I was the type of person who would look right back at her very calmly, and say why sure, I'll do that.

>
> When you finally figure out…that killing a baby that big for money is wrong, it doesn't take you too long to figure out it doesn't matter if the baby is this big, or this big, or even this big, it's all the same.

Just as an illustration of the cognitive dissonance feminists have on this issue, you can be imprisoned for up to two years or fined up to $250,000 for disturbing a Bald Eagle's egg, but sucking a live, fertilized human egg out of the womb through a suction catheter is perfectly fine. Apparently, a bird's life is more valuable than another human being's using this logic.

Killing a fertilized human egg is less a concern than killing an eagle egg to feminists

One Million Babies A Year

Around one million women a year (long-term average) choose these gruesome methods of dealing with unwanted children. While both the man and woman are equally to blame for the conception, only one party has the power to end the pregnancy. Men have no choice whatsoever in the matter legally, they cannot stop their child from being aborted, nor can they force the woman to have an abortion. However, men can be ordered to either pay child support or go to prison under current law if the child is born. It is another example of a catch-22 the law has created for fathers.

Shocking Statistics

A whopping 40% of unwanted pregnancies end in abortion, and 1 in 5 pregnancies overall end in abortion in the United States. This, in the richest country in the world where social welfare programs, child support, adoption, and other means are readily available to women who choose life. Not to mention the importance of selecting the right male to be the father before conception, a process that used to be of utmost importance to families before the nuclear family was torn apart by feminism and the welfare state.

Around 89% of all abortions are performed in the first trimester, but even these methods involve babies that are more developed than most people think.

That still leaves a full 1 in 10 abortions that are performed in the second and third trimesters, and as you will see those methods are far more disturbing. At the federal level, abortion is legal through all nine months of pregnancy. Some states have restrictions on abortion after the first trimester, while others do not.

Less than 1% of all abortions are performed because of rape or incest, striking down one of the feminists' main arguments for abortion.

Most women don't find out they're pregnant until week five or six of the pregnancy, and even even as early as eight to nine weeks into the pregnancy the embryo is readily recognizable as a human being. By 12 weeks or near the end of the first trimester, the then fetus is undeniably human in appearance.

Weeks 8-10, and 12 of pregnancy

Abortion Truth Hidden Behind Orwellian "Newspeak"

Lila Rose, president of Live Action, the group who produced the video series said:

> The abortion lobby masks the procedure in euphemisms. Terminating the pregnancy, tissue mass, product of conception. The majority of the public has no clue about what abortion really does to a child in the womb; how developed the child actually is during an abortion; and the risks of abortion to the mother's health and safety.

1st Trimester: Abortion Pills

This procedure is done through nine weeks into the pregnancy. It has a high failure rate statistically, so some women will have to come back for an aspiration (suction) abortion. RU-486 is administered which blocks progesterone and cuts off the blood supply and nutrition to the baby, causing the baby to die. After that, another medicine is administered to cause bleeding and contractions that then expel the unwanted embryo from the womb.

1st Trimester: Aspiration (Suction)

Sadly, sucking the baby out of the womb through a tube is the most frequently performed abortion. A suction catheter is inserted into the womb to extract the fetus. At this point in the pregnancy, when most aspiration abortions are done, the preborn baby has a heartbeat, fingers, legs, toes, and bones that are still weak and fragile.

The suction catheter is then turned on, tearing the baby apart as it is sucked through the catheter into a tube.

2nd Trimester: Dilation and Evacuation

The jaws of a sopher clamp, used to tear the baby out of the womb limb by limb

During the second trimester, a sopher clamp and speculum are used to dismember the unwanted baby from the womb. Limb by limb, the baby is torn apart by the sopher clamp and eventually the skull is crushed into pieces that can then be pulled out through the cervix.

3rd Trimester: Injection And Stillbirth

The third trimester abortion kills an infant that is almost fully developed and viable. Usually, a lethal dose of digoxin is injected into the baby, causing cardiac arrest. Then, birth is medically induced to cause the baby to be delivered stillborn.

Dr. Levantino says that in the hundreds of lives of women he saved who were having third trimester complications, not one of them required the baby to be killed. A live delivery saves the life of the mother, and usually, of the baby. He explains, in detail, why late-term abortions are almost never medically necessary.

It’s My Body

A common argument used by feminists who respond to Dr. Levantino’s video series is deconstructed by YouTube commenter Marquis Read. Read strikes down the solipsistic “It’s my body and I’ll do whatever I want!” argument posted as a response to Dr. Levantino’s videos here:

> You see a baby get torn to pieces and you still think it is about the woman? That is selfish, and wicked.

As does Die Cis Scum.

> The little human is YOUR body? It’s living in your body, that’s all.

Outlaw Or Educate

Being a firm believer in personal freedom, I generally do not like for government to tell people what they should do with their lives. I believe in a free society with a minimum of rules and regulations as originally intended by the founders of our once-great but failing republic. However, after seeing these procedures, I can never look at abortion the same way again. I do not see how anyone can see the reality of abortion and say it’s not murder. It’s obvious that life begins at conception.

Changing attitudes on abortion have been seen over the last generation

It seems as more and more people learn about the grim and gruesome realities of abortion, the tide is turning in favor of life according to this Gallup series of polls. I will leave it to you…should this be outlawed or should people be honestly and openly educated on the grim realities of abortion then left to make their own choices? To me, if we do not protect the weakest and most helpless among us, we have failed as a civilized society.

Read More: I Hope Tool Releases An Album This Year

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Swedish Government Passes New Law Giving Full Support To Single Motherhood

April 3, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Assisted reproduction, like artificial insemination, has been an option for couples in Sweden for some time. On Friday, a new law came into force that gives single women the same right. Feminist crowds are cheering that voluntary single motherhood will now likely become more common in Sweden.

The facts show that this will undoubtedly make society worse. Poverty and crime are much more common with people growing up in female headed households. This can all be avoided if sperm donors refuse to give their sample to single women, but Sweden is such a "progressive" country that they probably won't mind it.

Hundreds will do it every year

Previously, Swedish women went to other countries to have the treatment done, like Denmark and Finland. Based on the number of women going to these two countries in 2014, the National Board of Health and Welfare predicts that around 800 single women will become artificially impregnated in Sweden yearly.

Like couples, the single woman will first be evaluated by a doctor to see if she's medically and psychologically fit to go through the procedure. Her "social condition" will also be taken into account. The child will be able to contact the sperm donor when it turns 18.

The two most conservative parties in the parliament voted against passing this new law, and for good reason. It doesn't require a great stretch of the imagination to think that assisted reproduction will be more common when it becomes more easily available, and women won't need to go abroad to get it. That means we will soon see an increase in single parent households, and more fatherless children.

More likely to be poor without a father

Growing up without a dad is not only terrible for the child itself, but also for society as a whole. Data shows that fatherless children are more likely to be poor, get involved in drug and alcohol abuse, drop out of school, and suffer from poor physical and emotional health. While boys are more likely to become criminals, girls are more likely to become pregnant as teens. In the US, children living in female headed families are four times more likely to be poor than children with married parents.

It seems like the data indicates that fathers are quite important, yet that's something our politicians don't seem to care about. It's ironic that they now support single women becoming mothers, making it seem like it's a great step forward, when they've been telling men for so long that they have to take more responsibility as fathers. Why, I wonder, has absent dads been talked about as a problem, if women are perfectly capable of raising kids on their own? Maybe that proposition of legal abortion for men wasn't such a bad idea after all.

No one wants Swedish men

It's also ironic that this is happening in Sweden, probably the most progressively screwed up country in the world. Here, men are doing everything they can to accommodate the demands of rabid radical feminist women. Women are given welfare, affirmative action, and every other stupid leftist policy you can think of. Yet Swedish women seem less and less interested in having children with Swedish men. But maybe it's not ironic, maybe it's just in our nature. Females want males that are strong and dominant, not ones that are easy to push around and control. The more men want the approval of women, the less of it they get. If women don't want Swedish men anymore, I really can't blame them.

What bugs me is not just that people make bad decisions in life. You won't be able to stop that no matter how hard you try to regulate society. It upsets me even more that I'm forced to finance people's bad decisions. It's not yet decided if single women themselves have to pay for the procedure to make them pregnant, or if the government will do it for them. But since it's free of charge for couples, I predict that the treatment for single women will largely be payed for by the taxpayers as well. And that's not the end of it. The one thing single mothers do well is leech off the welfare system. Working men and women will have to pay the bills when the single mother gets burnt out and quits her job to be a full-time crappy mom.

Hold sperm donors accountable

But the true bad guys here are not the stupid women, it's the men who hand over their sperm to them. Sperm donors will have to consent to having their seed go to single women. If no one concedes to this, single women won't have any semen to use and this whole thing won't be an issue at all. But as most Swedish men are white knights, I believe many of them will volunteer to donate their sperm and see it as and act of solidarity with the poor women. Maybe you could argue that donors will profit from it in an evolutionary sense, but they still make society worse for everyone by knowingly and willingly creating fatherless children.

In the end, the real losers in this story are the kids who will grow up without a father, and with a mother who obviously cares little about their well-being. They'll grow up not knowing where they come from and who they're made of. Boys and girls won't have the guidance of a strong father figure, and they'll make stupid decisions because of it. Girls will have babies in their teens and create a new generation of screwed up youths.

They can thank feminism for ruining their lives before it even started.

Read More: The Price I Paid For Helping A Single Mom's Child

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad.
@johnhydenius on Twitter

How To Work Up To A One-Armed Pull-Up

April 3, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

The humble pull-up is by far one of the best exercises one can do to develop the upper body, for not only does it develop the size and strength of the latissimus dorsi (the big pulling muscles of the back), it also utilizes the entirety of the upper body as assistance and stabilizers: the forearms, hands, biceps, triceps, shoulders, and the abdomen all get a bit of a workout, as do the small muscles that make up the "rotator cuff."

Indeed, one might humorously say that the pull-up, and all of its variations, are the oldest of all exercises due to the fact that it predates genus Homo—while I cannot say which species it was exactly, at some point our hirsute ancestors found it more advantageous to grasp around arboreal supports rather than claw into them, and claws were gradually superseded by flat nails. This necessitated climbing via pulling the body upwards and over the branch or tree limb-movements that are functionally identical to the modern day anterior-grip (palms-out) pull-up and the muscle-up.

I emphasize "all of its variations" because, like most exercises that are worth doing, there are numerous ways to do the same basic exercise, all of which emphasize one muscle or area or another. Just as there are numerous variations of bench press, squat, deadlift, and push-up, so too are there numerous types of pull-ups.

To clarify, this article will only deal with the traditional pull-up series—smooth, stable pulls that lift the chin over the bar, from wall pulls to the one-handed pull-up. This article will not deal with muscle-ups (which are essentially a pull-up crossed with a dip), towel hangs (which are a hellacious method of forearm training, but do not utilize any pulling motion at all), or the supine pull-up, also called the Australian pull-up.

The Grips

Before I begin discussing the exercise, I must go over the types of grip—more specifically, there are three: anterior grip, posterior grip, and side grip. They differ largely on which muscles of the arm they attack, as all three work the back and torso equally.

The anterior grip has both hands side to side, and the palms facing out. This puts pressure on the triceps, and as such it is usually more difficult for the beginner than the posterior grip pull-up detailed below.

The posterior grip is typically the first one that is achieved by the beginning sportsman. The palms face towards you and it hits the bicep. More accurately, it fully contracts the bicep, hitting the “peak.”

These two grips should be trained by all interested in this exercise, and will serve your needs for functional strength and ability. However, for those seeking aesthetic arms, the side grip can be done, which emphasizes the brachialis and the “short head” of the biceps. Many find this side grip to be more comfortable for one-arm pull-ups as well.

Tight Shoulders

In addition to the grips, a safety precaution that must be done with pull-ups is to keep the shoulders, rotator cuff, and elbows “tight” to prevent injury. This is done by flexing the latissimus dorsi and keeping a slight bend in the elbows. Like most things in fitness, not feeling pain is a sign of doing it right, and pain means you’re making a mistake.

The Pull-Up Series

The pull-up seems like a daunting task for the beginner, and, admittedly, it is. The vast majority of people will not be able to go from a state of having no lat training at all to being able to do a “Dead hang” pull-up. This, of course, necessitates an intermediary step. I myself utilized machines such as the lat pulldown and the barbell row. While I normally avoid machines in all my fitness doings, this is the one time I would possibly make an exception…

However, a better choice would be the calisthenic steps enumerated in Paul Wade’s Convict Conditioning—as stated in previous articles, training the central nervous system to “learn” a specific task is just as important as training the muscles to be strong (which is to say, contract more powerfully), and these steps will do so for those who cannot do a single pull-up. While I was capable of doing a regular pull-up by the time I discovered the book, it helped me learn further steps towards mastery of the one-handed pull-up.

The first step is the Wall Pull. Stand straight, grab a vertical support, and pull yourself towards it. Most of you readers should be strong enough to do this, but for completion’s sake I include this. Do 10 of these and move on.

Then the horizontal pull-lay under a table or something similar, and pull yourself up at an angle. Again, most are already capable of doing this. Do 10 and move on.

Jack-Knife pulls are essentially assisted pullups, where you extend your legs and put them on a chair or another object of similar height, and then pull yourself up. From here on in, the actual pulling maneuver is rather instinctual, and does not need explaining.

Half Pull-ups are the first un-assisted maneuver the trainee will perform-jump up into the “flexed arm hang” position your middle school gym teacher let you do as a consolation for failing the pull-up. Then pull yourself up over the bar, and lower yourself into the flexed hang position. And repeat 10 times and go to the next step.

The true pull-ups, exercises that you wouldn’t be ashamed to do in public, begin here. Just grab the bar, extend your arms to an almost full length (keep a slight kink in your elbows as said above). Then pull until your chin goes over the bar, then lower yourself under control and repeat. I emphasize a controlled lowering, you don’t want to just “crash” down and blow out your elbows. Do 10 of these and move on.

Close grip pull-ups are, as the name implies, regular pull-ups done with the hands touching each other. This takes pressure off of the lats and puts it onto the shoulders and arms. As such, it is the first step towards one-arm pull-ups.

Hand-and-a-half pull-ups are something most of us are familiar with, whether it be from Rocky II or seeing some childhood peer doing these, likely referring to them as “one handed pull-ups.” Grasp the bar with one hand, and grasp that hand’s wrist with the other hand. Then pull up. This forces the hand on the bar to work much harder than the other.

Then switch hands. When you can do 10 of these, move on.

The half one hand pull-up sees the return of the chair from Step 3. Get in the jackknife position and hold the arm in the half-flexed position. Then pull up from that position, and lower yourself to the chair. Some are capable of doing this without a chair, similar to the flexed arm hang with two hands, but I was not when I started. As usual, 10 reps.

The assisted one-handed pull-up utilizes a towel. Drape it over the bar, and grab it with one hand. Grab the bar with the other hand and pull up from a “dead hang” until the halfway position. Then let go of the towel while simultaneously continuing to pull up and over the bar. Drop down under control to a dead hang and repeat. Then switch hands. Once you can do 10, take a deep breath and try for the nigh-mythical one-arm pull-up.

The true one-arm pull up is a feat that’s simple in theory, but horrifically difficult in practice. Just grab a bar with one hand and pull with all your might. I myself can just barely do one with my right hand, and I’m still working on the left.

When the one-arm pull-up is complete, you can further progress by doing advanced gymnastic maneuvers with rings, such as the iron cross pictured below. These gymnastic maneuvers are a fascinating field of study and practice in their own right, and deserve several articles for themselves (and, I admit, this also gives me time to master them).

Or, you can add weights to pull-ups-either with two hands or one hand, but as usual I would advise you only add weights to the two-handed pull-up, as I prefer to not add weights to unilateral movement.

But no matter what you do, a strong back is useful for climbing, pulling, punching, or any upper body movement.

Read More: To Pull Hot Girls You Must Make Every Interaction Physical

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Why Feminism Is A Terrorist Movement

April 4, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

There exists a noxious ideology with fanatical followers who use tactics of intimidation, manipulation, and outright violence to attack and suppress both men and women to further their quest for power and control. We are, of course, referring to the cancer that is feminism.

