Much has already been said about the theory of feminism which owes its entire existence to lies, hypocrisy, and double-standards. And considering the audience here, we won't go over those facts again. But what I do want to bring your attention to is how feminism operates in practice.

Feminism is terrorism

The plain matter of fact is that feminism is a terrorist movement and must be called out as such.

The FBI defines terrorism as, "the unlawful use of force or violence against persons or property to intimidate or coerce a government, the civilian population, or any segment thereof, in furtherance of political or social objectives."

Compare that definition with the feminist terror tactics of the past and present:

- Getting men fired from their jobs for disagreeing with their wicked ideology, or just making up false accusations to get rid of men they see as competitors.
- Sending bomb threats and death threats to individuals who oppose their views, including Erin Pizzey, who started the first domestic violence shelter. Her crime? Realizing that women are just as capable of violence as men. She had to flee the country when the threats became unbearable.

- Attacking free speech and the freedom of assembly with censorship, bomb threats, by pulling the fire-alarm, and through physical intimidation.
- Advocating violence against high-profile individuals, with at least one assassination attempt.
- Vandalizing property and physically assaulting men.
- And much more…

As you can see, feminism almost fits the FBI definition above—almost, because of the word "unlawful." The truth is that feminist terror tactics are largely tolerated and even sanctioned by the Western governments (as we shall see later), thus making much of their actions technically lawful.

Now, some of you may still have doubts that feminism could be identified as a terrorist movement (and I say movement as opposed to an 'organization' because calling them organized would be a joke). So, to better understand their terrorist nature, let us take a look at some of the similarities and differences between feminism and other terrorist groups.

Feminist Terrorism vs. Conventional Terrorism

First, the similarities:

- Both are based on hateful ideologies that identify their targets as an enemy to be destroyed.
- Both paint themselves as victims of oppression who are simply resisting against the oppressor.
- Both seek to advance the power of their own group at the expense of all others.
- Both seek public attention through their attacks and other outlandish displays.
- Both are made up of members who are angry, bitter, delusional, and unhappy with their lives.

- Both need a scapegoat to blame all their personal problems and failures on.
- Both engage in terror tactics both as a retaliation and as means of advancing their political agendas.
- Both want their victims to cower in fear and paranoia.
- Both seek reaction from their targets as a way of stoking the flames of war between the two groups.

As you can see, feminism is no different from many different types of terrorist organizations around the world—except in one special way: their modus operandi. You must understand that the feminist terror tactics we face today are not the same as the standard terror tactics that we are familiar with. Feminist terrorism contrasts itself through its feminine nature compared to the conventional, masculine form of terrorism.

To understand, think about differences between male aggression and female aggression. When men decide to be aggressive, they are explicit in their expression. They will threaten you with direct violence and act on it if necessary. Females, on the other hand, express their aggression in a much different way. Women too will use threats and resort to physical violence just as much as men (if not more), but only if they know they could get away with it. But that's not the end of it. Women usually don't like to engage in violence themselves, for their choice of weapon is the indirect, social aggression. Women prefer to spread rumours, manipulate others, and get other men to do their dirty work for them. Unlike the direct, physical violence that the average men engage in, they are much more Machiavellian with their attacks.

This, in essence, is the primary difference between the terrorist attacks that we see on the news and the hidden and sinister terror tactics of feminism that go largely unnoticed. Just as boys getting in a playful scuffle at school will face consequences while girls who bully another girl to suicide by spreading rumours go unpunished, we live in a society that completely represses even a hint of masculinity while feminists get a free reign with their attack on men.

If you observe carefully, feminism operates in the same fashion as the individual female aggression mentioned above: by spreading rumours ("The Patriarchy," "rape culture," false accusations, etc.), manipulating others (painting themselves as victims for privileges while manipulating the legal system to their favour), and by getting other men to do their dirty work for them (by using the government and white knights as their muscles in their war against men).

And if they can get away with it, they will not hesitate to inflict physical violence on men as we have seen with the countless examples of women who have gotten away with things men would be punished for:

- Feminist Jessica Lelièvre Assaults Roosh V On Street And Brags About It On Social Media
- When Women Abuse Authority To Commit Violence
- Why Hasn't Feminist Emily Hopper Been Arrested For Assault?

- Farah Brook Films Herself Sexually Harassing And Assaulting Men
- 17 Previous Assault Convictions But No Jail Time For This Woman
- Crazed Indian Woman Attacks Uber Driver And His Car, Faces No Legal Consequences

Remember that even if these women don't identify themselves as feminists, they are engaging in feminist terrorism all thanks to our feminist culture that condones their actions. Every time a man gets away from a false rape accusation, feminists screech and squeal about rape culture, but you'll never hear a peep from them if you mention female violence against men—let alone being able to get away with it without legal consequences. In fact, they'll just think it's funny and laugh.

And what are the results like for these two different tactics?

They don't even hide the fact that the goal of FemTerror is for men to live in fear.

The difference in their levels of success speak for themselves.

Although causing much death and suffering, conventional terror tactics rarely accomplish anything more than spreading acute fear. They may provoke conflicts, but they do nothing to further the aims of the groups that instigate the violence: The IRA couldn't get the British out of Northern Ireland, Timothy McVeigh couldn't stop the federal government from growing even bigger, and Islamic terror attacks in Europe have done nothing but inspire even more disdain for Islam.

Feminist terror tactics, on the other hand, have been devastatingly effective. In the course of just few decades, feminists have:

- Destroyed marriage by introducing no-fault divorce, leading to untold amount of suffering for men and fatherless children. (The destruction of the sanctity of marriage has also led to plummeting birth-rates, changing the entire demographic landscape of nations).
- Gotten the government's hands to overpower men in their own homes by allowing women to falsely jail their husbands with a mere accusation.

- Created a climate of fear for men who engage in any sort of interaction with women at school, work, or even out in the streets for the fear of bogus harassment claims. One man recently went through a personal hell when he faced rape charges just for walking past a woman.
- Created a culture of rape hysteria where women can have men expelled from school or jailed without any proof or due-process.
- Destroyed sex relations by instigating gender antagonism where men and women see each other as competitors and enemies.
- Created a culture where women from young age are trained to hate and exploit men, only to pull the victim card whenever they find themselves in a disadvantage.
- Created a feminized educational system that is biased against boys and men at all levels. Boys who don't conform to the feminist standard of behaviour are drugged with Ritalin to induce passivity.
- Created a culture that sees anything masculine as something toxic to be fixed or ridden of.
- Created an androgynous society that is systematically emasculating men while masculinizing women.
- Effectively pushed men down and turned them into second-rate citizens while "empowering" women just for being women.
- Created a 'husband-state' system where the government showers them with privileges with the money extracted from men. Yet they're still whining for more.
- Destroyed all male spaces while preventing new ones from forming.
- Turned vast hordes of men into supplicating white knights and male-feminists whom they treat like their guard dogs, only to cheat on them and back-stab them later on.
- Implemented a PC culture of censorship based on the fickle whims of women's feelings. Men must now watch what they say, how they act, what opinions they hold, what shirt they wear, and even how they sit or use the toilet (I doubt even the Taliban concern themselves with how their women take a piss). Now, everything about men's existence must conform to what women want and what women feel is acceptable.

In short, although feminism lacks the overt violence of conventional terrorism, it has been wildly successful with their feminine form of terror in spreading culture of fear for men while completely changing the society to kowtow to their twisted demands. They have effectively created a society where they can live in privileged conditions with weak men existing only as drones to serve their needs. So, who needs bombs when divorce-raped men are committing suicide in droves?

With all that said, I think we can safely declare the degradation of Western societies by the feminists as the most successful terrorist campaign in history.

Responding To The ‘No True Feminist’ Fallacy

Now, if they managed to make it this far, the feminists reading this will protest that it’s only the “radical” feminists who are engaging in this so-called feminist terrorism, and that those feminists don’t represent the movement as a whole. They’ll claim that they’re the real feminists who truly want equality.

I’ve seen this many times before and this is nothing but the overused “Good Cop, Bad Cop” strategy.

The truth is that these “moderate” feminists and the radical feminists are working together as one whether they know it or not.

How it works is, the radical feminists act as the “bad cop” by using terror tactics to threaten and attack men, only to scurry and hide behind the moderate feminists to cry misogyny when faced with a backlash. The “moderate” feminists, on the other hand, play the “good cop” by appearing as the reasonable and sane alternative to the radical feminists. However, you’ll never see them raise an issue with the radical feminists because they implicitly understand that they need each other. The moderates need the radicals to attack men and put pressure on institutions, and they will only superficially distance themselves from the radicals to feign innocence when feminism as a whole is criticized for its terror tactics.

And, as we at ROK already know, even though they may not be as over-the-top and violent as the radicals, there is nothing normal or good about the sick ideology that these moderates are espousing. Their joint tactic, however, works well to sell the big fat lie of “equality” to the general public full of naive men and women.

All feminists, whether they be “radical” or “moderate,” are part of the same terrorist campaign against men or at least complicit in its efforts.

To be fair, there are some individual feminists who do advocate for actual gender equality (I saw one men's rights group in Toronto organized by a woman), but these women are few and rare and are immediately attacked by the rest of the feminists for heresy. It just goes to show what kind of movement feminism really is.

Feminists are puppets for the government's war against men

Like ISIS, feminists are not squeamish about telling everyone exactly what they will do.

Last, the most important aspect of feminism is that feminism is a state-sponsored terrorism.

In spite of all their obscene barking and threats of rape and violence, the feminists in reality are utter cowards who are only able to harass and assault ordinary men because they know they have the backings of powerful men at the top—the same men who keep them in a long enough leash to attack men like you and me, but not long enough to threaten their own power.

Our governments—along with the media, corporations, and educational institutions—are actively collaborating with the feminists in their war against men. For all the bitching they do about men and "patriarchal" governments, their entire terrorist movement depends on professional white knights to jump into their defense and for billionaire elites like George Soros to fund their cause.

And it doesn't stop there.

The media, owned by powerful men, have defamed us as "pro-rape" and instigated a violent mob against us just for trying to organize an apolitical social happy hour, while social media outlets like Twitter and Facebook—founded and run by men—are also stepping up in their efforts to censor anyone critical of the feminist agenda (while allowing hashtags like #killallmen seen above). Twitter recently hired a feminist and professional victim, Anita Sarkeesian, as the head of their Trust and Safety Council for this purpose. College campus rape hysteria and kangaroo court trials are already well known, and Western governments have already taken the cue to start passing draconian laws to punish young men. Even sports and entertainment industry is on board with the feminist assault on men. This is an all-out war by our overlords to subjugate us, and the feminists are merely their useful idiots.

Why all this effort against men?

Strong, masculine men who think for themselves are the greatest threat to the globalist agenda, which seeks to turn the human race into a single mass of passive, consumerist slaves. And because masculinity, nuclear families, traditional values, and cultural identity are things that men value that get in the way of their plans, they will do everything they can to emasculate us, shame us, and control us. This is also why they are aggressively pushing homosexuality, multiculturalism, and mind-numbing technological devices into our societies to fragment us and weaken us.

As a movement that constantly threatens our existence, feminism needs to be exterminated. But trying to fight the feminists themselves is a waste of time. We can spend the rest of our lives debating, mocking, and attacking these rabid feminists and it wouldn't make any worldly difference. In fact, conflict and drama is exactly what they crave so that they can continue playing victims and go cry to the government to beg for harsher measures against men. Battling the feminists themselves without taking the state into account is like trying to fight smoke instead of dousing the flame that is causing it.

To defeat feminism, we must destroy the system that supports it. The fate of mankind depends on our resistance.

3 Financial Lies We've Been Told Our Whole Lives

April 4, 2016 | by Charles Sledge | Link | Original Link

Like most advice given to us by our schools, churches, governments, and even well-meaning parents the financial advice we have been given has led us wrong. We've been told outdated maxims and advice that just won't cut in today's world and may even work against us. Just like at one time getting married may have been good advice, things have changed dramatically over the past sixty years.

For starters let's get something straight. Corporations are not pro-masculine. Many people like to believe that somehow the business world has not been affected by the past sixty years of indoctrination but nothing could be further from the truth. While those familiar with the manosphere are well aware of this, others who are not as "enlightened" still cling to this fantasy. This isn't the 80's. The alpha take charge attitude is more likely to get you fired than promoted in today's corporate culture. Despite being better for profits and productivity.

That's another thing. For most businesses today profits and productivity take a distant second and third to political correctness. Over the long run these companies will be destroyed by others who actually do the things that work. However until then this is the corporate culture that men will find themselves in. And it's not pretty.

Because of this many men want to strike out on their own. whether that means living a minimalist lifestyle working odd jobs here and there or creating their own entrepreneurial ventures. Whatever the case, falling for these three lies will hamper you from accomplishing your goals. So let's get started.

Lie #1 – Your House is an Asset

Put simply an asset is something that makes you money. Something that adds to your bank, not takes away. Does this sound like your house? Now I'm not talking about owning real estate—that's different. What I am talking about is using your hard earned money paying for the suburb house with the white picket fence.

A house is like an ungrateful kid. You constantly feed and nurture it and it gives you crap in return. Between volatile markets, being tied down, and the interest payments on your mortgage buying a house can ruin your life at worst and at best maybe you can sell it for a little more after so many years. A huge downside and a little upside. Not a good deal.

There may have been a time when buying a house was a good idea. When you could find stable work that paid you well. When you could find a stable woman and raise a stable family with her. None of that happens anymore. America is anything but stable. This isn't the 1950's and believing in what worked then will get you screwed now.

I would suggest you rent. Now before there was a negative association with someone who rented. However this stigma has largely faded as more and more people are forced to rent. Look at it like this. Renting is like sleeping with a beautiful woman while another guy deals with all her crap, whereas buying a house is like getting married and having to deal with all the woman's crap because she is now your woman. The largest benefit of renting is the freedom it gives you.

Lie #2 – Corporations Reward Hard Work

This was addressed a little in the introduction but we'll go into more depth here. First off corporations, especially large ones, do not have profit or productivity on their mind. They have maintaining the status quo, placating SJWs, and staying "relevant" as their main goals. Again this will ultimately be their downfall, but until then those of us working in the corporate environment are forced to deal with it.

Most likely if you work in modern corporate America your boss is sadistic. This isn't name calling but a fact. And no that's not an exaggeration as the dictionary defines sadism as "the condition in which sexual gratification depends on causing pain or degradation to others" or even better "any enjoyment in being cruel." Sound familiar?

Again, at one time being loyal meant something. Loyalty was something to be rewarded and admired. Now being loyal is a liability. Be loyal to a company and watch as anyone in a protected class is promoted over you and expunged from any wrongdoing. Yet at the same time bosses still need a scapegoat so guess who that will be? (Hint it's you).

Like Aaron Clarey suggests, use corporations and don't be used by them. This means you should use a job to get an income that will help you further you own goals. Don't expect your loyalty to be rewarded and don't ever feel bad for leaving a company. They will use you as a workhorse and then spit you out when you no longer are useful to them. They will use and abuse you as much as any sadistic woman would. Use the income to build something of your own, then drop them as soon as you can.

Lie #3 – All Debt Is Bad

Alright, first a disclaimer. Most debt is bad. Debt for a house, car, "education," or any other trinket is bad. However, not all debt is bad. There is such a thing as good debt. And it all depends on what that debt is for.

We've all been told to avoid debt at the expense of just about anything else. Doesn't mean people listened but nevertheless everyone knows that debt is bad. And when everyone knows something it's pretty much a guarantee that what everyone "knows" is wrong.

There are two parts as to why debt is not your problem.

First off, debt used to fund a business, deal, or in other words when used as an asset, can be good. Not all of us have enough money for a startup and borrowing can speed up growth. You're much better off borrowing some money to start an intelligent business than you are sitting back and waiting a couple years to save up the income. Remember time is your most valuable asset, not money. So in this case debt works for you and not against you.

Now while I am an advocate of minimalism I am an advocate of minimalism with one caveat. And that caveat is: you should live below your means while working on expanding your means. Meaning you should live below your income level while at the same time seeking to expand your income level.

Most people's problem is not that they have debt but that they don't have enough income. Pinching pennies will never make you rich or even comfortable. Obviously some people are reckless with their debt and need to get their spending under control to start. But for others debt can be leveraged to become an asset in the long term.

Wrap-up

This is really just the very tip of the iceberg we're discussing here. The lies run long and deep about finances just like they do in regards to what turns women on and what it means to be a man. There is a red pill and blue fill for finances as well. And just like taking the blue pill in other aspects of your life, taking the blue pill in finances can lead to your life being ruined.

The truth will set you free but first you must be exposed to it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. Should Students Be Able To Successfully Sue Their Schools If They Don't Find A Job After Graduation?

April 4, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Several days ago I read with interest a story about a law school graduate who had sued her former school, the Thomas Jefferson School of Law in San Diego, California. The case made it all the way to trial, but the plaintiff, Anna Alaburda, was unsuccessful. The case is interesting for a number of reasons.

The essence of the plaintiff's claim against the school was that the school had engaged in deceptive business practices, fraud, and negligent misrepresentation when it came to stating the employment figures of graduates. "But for" these "misrepresentations," the plaintiff claimed, she would not have borrowed in excess of $100,000 to attend the school.

Alaburda claimed that she had at least in part based her decision to attend the school on statistics published in the 2004 edition of US News and World Report. Those figures claimed that 80% of the school's graduates had found jobs within nine months after graduation. Those figures were arguably misleading, in that they included all types of jobs, rather than law-related jobs.

There have been cases similar to this one in other parts of the country, but it is very rare for them to go all the way to trial. In this case, the jury ruled 9-3 against Alaburda. They were obviously not convinced by her arguments.

Initial rulings in the case seemed to favor Alaburda. The judge presiding over the case allowed the case to proceed to trial, and even noted in previous rulings that the school's employment figures which included all types of jobs were "meaningless in the context of a legal education." However, the school was able to counter by showing that it reported its employment data "correctly" in that it comported with the method required by the American Bar Association and US News.

Indeed, the real statistics are hardly impressive. In 2014, graduates of Thomas Jefferson getting jobs that required passage of the bar exam was closer to 66%. Last year, the school reported that only 31% of its graduates found a job that required passage of the bar exam. Another 27% were still looking for jobs, and the status of the remainder was unknown.

The market for legal jobs has been depressed for years, but is starting to climb back slowly. Lack of employment opportunities is a real problem, not an imaginary one. One law school, the Brooklyn Law School, recently took the unprecedented step of actually offering graduates a refund if they were unable to find a job.

So it all depends on how the statistics are reported. It is revealing that law schools now have to reveal "true" statistics: that is, they have to disclose the figures for people who are actually getting legal jobs, without including people working as Starbucks baristas. The method of reporting has changed since Alaburda was in school, and this may be a tacit admission that she (and other similar cases around the country) had a valid point.

What went wrong for Alaburda at trial? One can only speculate, but in this writer's opinion, she was facing an uphill battle from the beginning.

Educational institutions before the Great Recession, like the big banks, had been engaged in—to use the term delicately—selective reporting and cherry-picking when it came to public disclosure. Institutions took full advantage of the lax reporting rules. No one really cared because the whole system was awash in money.

But then the economy tanked, and things began to get grim. Any law school reporting its "real" numbers would look awful, so they all continued to do the bare minimum that the rules required. Was this ethical? Probably not, but the courts are not prepared to hold higher education accountable.

Alaburda herself, it must be said, was not much of a sympathetic figure, at least to this writer. During the litigation, it was revealed that she actually turned down a $60,000 per year offer from a Southern California law firm because they would not pay her bar dues (only a few hundred per year) and required a month of travel.

When I graduated from law school in 1998, I took a job as a rural prosecuting attorney that paid only $30,000 per year. No one gave me any jobs; I had to find them on my own, and had to move far away from home to get it. I supplemented my income by doing military reserve duty. I was single, had no dependents, no school loans, and was used to living an austere lifestyle.

And I wanted to learn how to do jury trials, rather than be one of those paper-shuffling office lawyers who couldn't try a case if their life depended on it. Even then, I only did this job for one year. After that, I formed my own firm, and have been rolling forward ever since. For me it is a satisfying and rewarding career. I love trying cases, meeting with clients, solving problems, and advocating for people. But like any career, it is not for everyone.

The student loan problem is a real one, make no mistake. There is a justified sense of betrayal among graduates. This case was an interesting one because it did draw attention to a problem that has not yet been solved. I myself am currently litigating the bankruptcy dischargeability of a married couple (high school teachers) with over $260,000 in student loans, who have no hope of ever paying it off. The situation is grotesque, but until Congress addresses these problems in a coherent way, they will continue.

In the meantime, every person must do his or her own due diligence. The only person who cares about you, is you. Are there too many lawyers? Yes. Are there too many law schools? Yes. Do institutions skew things their way when they can? Yes.

But in my opinion, Alaburda did not have the go-getter attitude she should have had. She was not hustling, not being proactive, not being aggressive. I would never have sit around looking for a job for years. I would have done something, anything to get moving. Even if I had to go do something else, I would have done it. Who cares? What matters is survival.

She let opportunities pass her by. She failed to appreciate that no one out there is going to "give" her anything. Her failure to find a job was due more to her lackadaisical attitude, rather than the "deception" of the school. As bitter as the truth may be, no graduate is "owed" anything. I believe the jury also saw it this way, which is why the verdict went against her.

6 Slut Tells Every Man Needs To Be Aware Of

A couple years ago, Tuthmosis nearly broke the internet with his signature piece, 24 Signs She's A Slut. About a year later Matt Forney came a little closer with 5 Reasons Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken. Thanks to the publicity those articles generated, countless men started to look at tatted up chicks sporting bullrings in their noses in a different light.

To piggyback off of their momentum I've decided to put together a list of slut tells that may not be so obvious to the naked eye—red pill or otherwise. Girls these days have PhDs in "hide my notch count-ology" so if men don't take a good hard look beneath the surface, they'll be taken for ride to be sure.

Here are six covert signs the girl you're looking to run game on is probably a bona fide slut.

6. She lives alone

When you see where she lives you might think at first glance “Hmmmm…..she’s got her own spot. Impressive.” But if you’re unplugged, you’ll know this is a major red flag.

The reason is that women are heavily influenced by people who shame them, or question any choice they make be it how they dress, what they do for a living, and most of all how many random hookups they have with random dudes.

Living by herself gives her carte blanche to sleep with as many dudes as her little heart desires without the judgmental gaze of her roommates or relatives. You’ll often find that females who live alone claim they have “no social life” or tell you they had a “quiet weekend.”

If she’s even half decent looking, her claims are probably a lie. With male thirst at an all time high, it’s a pretty good bet that a woman who doesn’t share a residence with another human being is likely pushing triple digits in the notch count category, and it seldom takes long to get there.

5. Her hobby is an art, but she sucks at it

This one is based on my personal experience with sluts. Over the years I’ve noticed that a lot of promiscuous girls I’ve slayed are into drawing, painting, music, dancing, writing, and other forms of “artistic expression.” Thing is, none of them were any good any at them. Sure there were a few that were half decent but by and large they were all well below average.

I’m not a psychologist by any stretch of the imagination, but my guess is that expressing themselves artistically is a way to escape the fact that they can’t keep their legs closed around men. The ex-Mrs. Sharpe was into painting when we lived in Florida but she was terrible at it. Of course I told her she was the greatest painter since Leonardo da Vinci (which never got me laid), but the fact of the matter is that she was an atrocious painter.

One girl I was seeing told me she wrote “poetry.” I’m no literature aficionado but even I knew her “inner thoughts” were a dumpster fire. It sounded like a cross between amateur hour and show-and-tell in Miss Crabtree’s 4th grade class…I am not exaggerating.

So the next time a chick wants to show you her collection of deformed bowls and vases she makes in her pottery classes, keep in mind that you’ve probably got a whore on your hands.

4. She is or has worked in a call center

Anyone who's ever worked in a call center knows that commingling between employees is at least twice as rampant as any other workplace out there. Having managed a few myself I can personally attest to the fact that regardless of position, no one is exempt from the temptation of fucking their coworkers in this environment…or at least trying.

Girls who either are or have been employed at a call center are usually epic sluts in and outside of the office. Something about this particular work habitat is like an aphrodisiac for both males and females.

A classic example of the kind of woman who works in call centers

A mid-forties woman at a call center I used to work at whose thousand cock stare (more on this in a bit) was the very first thing I noticed about her, is the quintessential example of a call center slut. She must have told me she was a "good girl" no less than a dozen times in the first two weeks I was there. I never bought her act for a second and verbalized as much and as it turns out, I was right. She had seven children by three different men, was in the middle of a divorce, and was always texting multiple dudes who were trying to fuck her—or likely already were.

Her Facebook page (which was always on her screen at work) was riddled with meme after meme that all basically say "I've been with a lot of guys but I'm still an awesome woman who deserves a good man because I say I do," or something to that effect. Her soon to be ex-husband was a man with a substance abuse problem who "treated her like shit" and "cheated on her all the time." She used to say "I like nice guys" but she was married to this "douchebag" for nearly 20 years and is the longest relationship she has and ever will be in.

Never bought her act for a second.

The kicker was that one of her coworkers told me that she sometimes leaves her young children alone to go off and see this guy or that. She stopped talking to me altogether after a while. I'm thinking she knew I saw through her thinly veiled "good girl" mask and saw her for the typical aging slut she was, no matter how many ways she tried to snowflake. I could be wrong but I doubt it.

Chicks who work in call centers are easy and it's as simple as that. Tread carefully with these broads because they'll start fucking the dude with the highest closing percentage or the biggest bonus without a second thought. I've seen this happen in every call center I have ever worked in.

3. She has the thousand cock stare

This particular slut tell is a little tougher to pick up on. Especially if you're not a veteran player. This was the look in the aforementioned office slut's eyes when she first uttered the words "I'm a good girl." Suffice it to say, her eyes betrayed her feeble attempt at trying to look like a unicorn.

The "thousand cock stare" is loosely defined as the look on a woman's face that reveals spite, apathy, fatigue, and hopelessness all at the same time. This look is a direct result of being drilled and dropped by a shitload of men.

The spite is because she's pissed off at the world for not having locked down a man because of her slutty ways. The apathy is from being desensitized to sex, an inevitable ramification of taking different cocks for an extended period of time. The fatigue is her being tired of the constant battle to get and keep male attention and having to resort to sexual favors earlier and earlier as she gets older. And the hopelessness comes from her knowing deep down she'll never have a relationship of consequence with a man she loves and respects, who finds her tolerable outside of sex.

Women over 30, single mothers, and a combination of the two are most likely to have the stare and will be the easiest to spot. Keep in mind that it doesn't discriminate against the young. Every once in a while I'll scroll through Amy's Facebook page and her TCS cuts through my screen like a hot knife through butter and she's nearly a half decade from the big 3-0.

Picking up on this tell will take some practice but once you learn to recognize it, it's easy to spot. The thousand cock stare never lies. Ever.

2. She works out at a meathead gym

This is frowned upon in today's mainstream fitness clubs

Wannabe gyms that literally cut your balls off when you walk in (like Planet Fitness) isn't what I'm talking about. I'm talking about the kinds of gyms that have 10 or more squat racks, dudes loudly grunting as they pull 400+ lbs, and openly discussing steroid cycles in the locker room—the kind of gym every man needs to join.

Women who are members of these gyms are usually in the upper aesthetic echelon. They're in unbelievable shape because they don't mess around with Nautilus machines or those ridiculous workout balls fat chicks like to bounce on to pretend they're exercising. They're squatting and lifting free weights with the fellas and their physiques reflect their hard work.

Girls who look like this are likely fucking their spotters

Add her hard-earned SMV with the fact that she's surrounded on a daily basis by males who are much more fit and muscular than the average man and that those males have no qualms with exhibiting masculinity around her as they lift heavy weights and it's only a matter of time before she starts sleeping with a few of them.

If your girl is in great shape and is a member at one of these gyms, chances are she has or is fucking her male spotters.

1. She's been married at least once

A recent conversation with a soon to be divorcée sums this up:

Nothing elicits euphoria in today's woman like separation and subsequent divorce papers. It is quite literally her golden ticket aboard the Cock Carousel Express and it takes them very little time to hop aboard and enjoy the ride. My own mother fell prey to this "newfound freedom."

Recently separated or divorced women are some of the easiest targets out there. All they need to see is a little masculinity (something they likely haven't seen in a while) and they're putting their number into your phone before you can say "You seem cool….we should hang out sometime" and fully expect you to bang them later that night.

Newly single and ready to get fuc….uh……mingle!

While this is awesome for slut slayers, it’s terrible for men looking to settle down. Any woman who has at least one ex-husband has no doubt been slammed by hordes of men. And as we all know, the more men a woman has been fucked by, the less faithful she’ll be.

I imagine there are exceptions to this rule, though I’ve never seen or heard of such a case. Be that as it may, if you want to find out if your new chick jumped on the post-divorce carousel just ask her what she did right after she was separated and pretend to be excited and non judgmental about her answer.

If you’ve built enough trust and attraction with her she’ll spill some of her dirty little secrets, at which point you can act accordingly.

Conclusion

When you see a green-haired chick with a tramp stamp and an industrial piercing in the beer aisle, it’s easy to place her into the whore category. But with females becoming more and more proficient at covering up their slutty tracks, it’s getting increasingly difficult for the average man to discern whether he’s committing to a quality female or the town bicycle.

Hopefully this column helps men get a clearer picture of who he’s dealing with because heaven knows his woman isn’t going to volunteer this information.

April 5, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

BRICS, an economic alliance of Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa, is attempting to challenge American world hegemony. This has the U.S. moving to retain its standing in the world. One of the BRICS platforms is trying to undermine the global dominance of the U.S. backed petrodollar, which would almost certainly curtail the excesses of the female-driven consumer economy. Even Saudi Arabia has joined the fight to end the dominance of the petrodollar.

Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa are attempting to challenge American world hegemony

Normally, this would be terrible news. The economic havoc it could cause is frightening. However, in light of American anti-family policies like the promotion of feminism, anti-free market policies like the construction of myriad barriers to entry of business ownership through over-regulation, growing corporate monopolies, a rapidly growing police state and increasing authoritarianism in the United States, the arrival of BRICS is a development that could in some ways be a positive one for free societies. It could at least offer the world an alternative to the Cultural Marxism the U.S. has been promoting.

Cultural Marxism has steadily advanced in the U.S. over the last 50 years

To ensure its continued world dominance, the United States is once again meddling in Latin American democracies as it has done for the past 50 years. Business interests tied to Washington, D.C. and Wall Street are attempting to undermine leftist Brazilian President Rousseff by paying for protests against supposed corruption in the Rousseff administration. The pretense of American moral superiority is especially comical considering how deeply corrupt the United States government itself is.

However, showing once again how far American hands reach up the skirt of Lady Liberty around the world, Rousseff is fighting for her political life. You might be surprised to learn there is a long history of American interference in left-leaning governments in Latin America, even though the U.S. itself has become extremely left-leaning over the past 50 years.

The history of U.S. overthrowing democratically-elected governments in Latin America while supposedly “spreading democracy” throughout the world is an interesting and twisted story. Its involvement in Brazil is not without precedent.

Guatemala

Going back to the 1950s, 2% of the Guatemalan population controlled vast majority of the wealth of Guatemala and owned 70% of the land, in collusion with U.S. business interests. Once again showing how corporate and government interests have long conspired together, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles was also on the board of the United Fruit Company at the time. His brother, Alan Dulles was the head of the CIA. United Fruit Company controlled virtually all banana growing in Guatemala.

Diego Rivera’s famous mural depicting the Dulles brothers, ambassador Peurifoy, and Eisenhower’s face on a bomb greeting Castillo Armas, who seized dictatorial power in a U.S. backed coup

In 1950, Jacobo Arbenz became the first democratically elected leader of Guatemala. Arbenz campaigned on bringing a system of land reforms which would give Guatemalan citizens a chance to own land. Arbenz himself would have to give up some of his land under the program. The election of Arbenz worried U.S. corporate interests and prompted the Dulles family to send Howard Hunt, an economic hitman down to Guatemala. This is Hunt’s own testimony as to how the U.S. government manipulated the situation in Guatemala.

> So they said a decision has been made at the highest levels of our government to rid Guatemala of the Arbenz regime, and we would like you to participate in it. You will be chief of propaganda and political action.
> What we wanted to do was have a terror campaign, to terrify Arbenz particularly and terrify his troops, much as the German Stuka bombers terrified the populations of Holland, Belgium, and Poland at the onset of World War II.
> We sewed confusion throughout the countryside, and by this time we had aircraft flying over and dropping leaflets and doing a little harmless bombing.

The "harmless bombing" along with the U.S. backed terror campaign costed thousands of Guatemalan lives.

The U.S. government isolated Guatemala militarily and diplomatically, and in creating the Red Scare it was able to use terror and social engineering strategies to safeguard corporate interests and American economic control of Guatemala. Based on the U.S. enacting socialist policies of its own over the last half-century, this was more about United Fruit retaining economic control of Guatemala than it was anything else.

It also directly contradicts the public relations story of spreading democracy throughout the world. Arbenz, a democratically elected leader who was not as far to the left as many Democrats are in America today was overthrown, stripped naked, and exiled from his country. After having successfully overthrown the democratically-elected Arbenz, Vice President Richard Nixon went down to Guatemala to congratulate the American-installed dictators in Guatemala.

Democracy is not important to the CIA

Philip Agee was a CIA agent from 1957-1988. In this interview, he tells us how much the U.S. really values democracy in Latin America and the rest of the world:

> In the CIA we didn't give a hoot about democracy. I mean it was fine if a government was elected, and would cooperate with us. But, if it didn't, democracy didn't mean a thing to us, and I don't think it means a thing today. The true goal of the United States government is control…the principle of government of the people, by the people and for the people, well that's just silly.

You have to realize the depth of what Agee is saying. If a government doesn't value government of the people, by the people, and for the people abroad, how could it possibly value those things at home?

This attitude is obvious today since the United States government routinely ignores the wishes of its citizens as the policies of economic control first used abroad have now turned against its own citizens. It routinely passes laws which are destroying the middle class like NAFTA and more recently, TPP. It also imports large numbers of immigrants to suppress wages.

Jose Serrano, New York Congressman talks about the attitude of the United States government abroad, which uses politicians that are bought and paid for like cheap hookers by American corporations.

> How dare you haven't allowed American corporations to buy you out. How dare you continue this arrogance that says you will never succumb to us. Don't you know who we are? Don't you know who these corporations are? Don't you know your life would be better if you could drink Coca-Cola every day?

Chile

A generation after the successful blueprint for overthrowing elected leaders was laid down in Guatemala, a U.S. backed coup of democratically elected leader Salvador Allende in Chile succeeded.

Granted, Allende was the first Marxist elected in the Americas so there was cause for concern. But, in a case of the pot calling the kettle black, at the same time it was toppling leftist regimes in Latin America the U.S. was adopting Cultural Marxism through the promotion of feminism. It was also using a system of fiat currency printed by central banks. Central banks are one of the ten planks of the Communist Manifesto.

Perhaps what worried the U.S. most was the Allende government attempting to extricate the economy of Chile from American corporate control. The U.S. was not going to let that plan succeed. It helped create conditions that would lead to a coup using "Track II" of CIA policy which actively looked for military leaders willing to participate in a coup.

After his Presidential Palace was attacked by British-supplied bombers in a coup started by his own armed forces, Allende shot himself. The successful coup meant fascist General Pinochet would take leadership of the country. Pinochet rounded up Allende supporters and brought them to concentration camps. He would remain dictator from 1973 until 1990. Once again, a democratically elected socialist had been overthrown. (And a couple of generations later, after Cultural Marxism which took root in the 1960s had bore fruit, a "democratic socialist" named Bernie Sanders would be running for President of the United States with wide support.).

Secretary of State Henry Kissinger denied American involvement in the coup, however CIA documents refuted his claim:

> It is firm and continuing policy that Allende be overthrown by a coup.

The U.S. backed overthrow of another democratically elected government in Chile; the siege of the Presidential palace by General Pinochet's forces

Get Used To It, World

U.S. involvement in Nicaragua, Venezuela, and other Latin American countries has seen similar techniques used. Duane Clarridge, former head of the CIA in Latin America attempts to explain this policy when asked what right the CIA has to overthrow democratically elected leaders of other nations:

> Well, that's just tough. We are going to protect ourselves, and we are going to go on protecting ourselves because we end up protecting all of you, and let's not forget that. We will intervene whenever we decide it's in our national security interests to intervene, and if you don't like it, lump it. Get used to it, world.

That statement does have a certain logic to it.

However, as these accounts have shown, national security largely has nothing to do with the American policy of toppling governments. It has more to do with protecting the financial interests of corporations who have influence in the U.S. government.

It is especially interesting that the U.S. has violently opposed far-left regimes all the while it has been promoting Cultural Marxism at home; this includes the adoption of policies which have led to the breakup of the family via feminism, undermined Western traditions, attacked Christianity, and marginalized individuality in support of the socialist collective.

At best, one could say the policies the U.S. has instituted have been hypocritical, as it undermines the principles its own formerly free society was based on while attacking other governments who do the same thing. At worst, they have been part of a long-term plan as the U.S. itself continues a Long March to socialist fascism. Perhaps it didn't want competition.

Peak Female Privilege: Madonna Gropes And Exposes 17-Year-Old Girl Without Punishment

During her recent tour of Australia, Madonna brought a 17-year-old girl on stage, groped her breast, and then deliberately exposed it to thousands of concertgoers in Brisbane. The majority of attendees had access to cameras or phone-cameras, which were able to capture the incident in more than sufficient detail. No charges have been laid yet and Madonna is presently in a bitter child custody dispute with ex-husband Guy Ritchie.

In Australia, like most other countries, there are severe theoretical penalties for both sexual assault and producing nude images of minors. I say theoretical because these provisions are invariably not used to punish women, from female teacher sex abusers to girls who have sex with incapacitated men.

What we are witnessing, and not just with the Madonna debacle in Brisbane, is a new peak for female privilege. Women can condemn men to time in prison for mere allegations, often interspersed with inconsistencies and proven lies, while women commit these same acts on camera with no repercussions.

The 17-year-old girl groped and exposed by Madonna, Josephine Georgiou.

The initial claim from the Material Girl singer's camp was that the exposure of Josephine Georgiou was unintended, but this does not explain Madonna's initial groping or the fact that just before she pulled the top down she said, "She's the kind of girl that you just want to slap on the a and pull…"

Having read about and researched what happened, I waited for some sort of rebuke for Madonna from the powers-that-be, irrespective of whether they would charge her. Nothing came. Media personality Piers Morgan did launch a stinging attack on her, but it meant much less when we consider the pair have been at war for a long time.

Here come the excuses

Attention seeker and pussy pass holder.

Some who comment on stories like this typically say that the girl in question looks older and that age-related consent and nudity laws are "arbitrary." That may be so, but there is almost always nothing arbitrary when a man defies them. He is charged, dragged through the court of public opinion, convicted by an actual court, and branded a sex offender for life, both officially and unofficially. Plus, when she was less made-up and sought more celebrityhood via a TV interview afterwards, Josephine Georgiou did look younger.

Georgiou, an aspiring model, labeled the encounter "the best moment" of her life (what does this say about modern girls?). Two unfortunate realities make this confession close to meaningless, though. First of all, both men and women have been taught to believe that women cannot usually be guilty of sexual crimes, even when there is incontrovertible evidence and the same act is considered sexual assault when done by a man. In Ireland, for example, police charged a 16-year-old boy for statutory rape when the female "victim" was the same age. If the boy were a girl, his reported mental illness and dysfunctional family situation would mean that the charges would likely have already been dropped.

This Irish farce is reminiscent of the scandal at the elite Milton Academy in Massachusetts some years ago, over which boys were forced to admit fault for having sex with a girl. The girl herself was not charged for performing oral sex on an underage 15-year-old boy. Such laws almost always reflect the widespread belief that "women cannot be sex offenders." Even when they are repealed, the thinking behind them, including when prosecutorial decisions are made, remains firmly intact.

Secondly, and primarily in relation to the exposure, the girl is underage. No amount of "I was fine with it" changes that people under 18 cannot consent to being filmed whilst naked. This had nothing to do with "art," nor did the footage center on something like a private video of teenage friends sunbathing topless at a beach. Rather, the act was beamed around the world and, more to the point, in front of thousands of people present.

Child custody dispute? No matter, Madonna

Madonna's strange behavior started long before the Brisbane incident, yet has had no real impact on her child custody chances.

How many fathers can safely say they could grope an underage girl in public, expose her, and then find themselves without consequences during an acrimonious child custody dispute? Not many, and Madonna's ex-spouse Guy Ritchie would not be one of them. Despite a wholesome preexisting image (it takes a saint to put up with Madonna's noted diva behavior, after all), he would not be afforded the benefit of the doubt, let alone the pathetic excuses handed to his former wife.

As I said before, it would be nice if the lack of legal consequences for Madonna were mitigated by greater social condemnation of her. At a time when sexual assault is supposedly a major issue, albeit through hysterical witch-hunts like the one that flared up again against Jian Ghomeshi, the silence is deafening.

I get rather sick of saying this sort of thing, but the public nature of what Madonna did at least shows the double standard for what it is.

In the end, men and women are different. Some hypocrisies, however, are much more intolerable than others and must be challenged.

Donald Trump’s Loss In Wisconsin Sets The Stage For Carnage In The Republican Convention

April 6, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Tuesday night’s primary in Wisconsin is the first GOP primary since Arizona and Utah voted two weeks ago, and the party establishment has declared it to be the hill they’re going to die on. With Donald Trump’s loss to Ted Cruz (48.3% vs 35.1%), the party bosses will continue throwing everything they can at him hoping to slow or stop his ascent to the presidency. In Wisconsin, their efforts bore fruit, but this now allows for a contentious Republican National Convention that can split the party in two.

Trump’s setback in Wisconsin comes after a poor week for the candidate, in which he walked into a gotcha question on abortion posed by MSNBC’s Chris Matthews and suffered for it. Additionally, the Cruz campaign and the GOP’s bosses have been pulling dirty tricks to reduce Trump’s delegate lead: for example, in Louisiana, Cruz was able to gain a plurality of delegates despite losing to Trump in the popular vote.

While it may seem like the Trump Train is going off the tracks, the GOP establishment and the mainstream media will need to work a lot harder to end Trump’s presidential aspirations. In particular, Trump’s opponents are hobbled by their lack of resources and an unfavorable slate of primary contests coming up. Wisconsin will definitely be a lost battle for Trump, but the war is far from over.

With Cruz, You Lose… Lots of Money

Wisconsin was always going to be a state that Trump would struggle in; as the New York Times' Nate Cohn reported, the Badger State's demographics are tilted in Cruz's favor. Trump performs best in states with large numbers of minorities, which is why he's swept the South, Northeast and industrial Midwest as well as the Latino-heavy Western states of Nevada and Arizona. Cruz performs best in predominately white states like Iowa, Kansas and Utah that have been somewhat spared the horrors of globalization and multiculturalism, both of which Trump attacks in his speeches.

While parts of Wisconsin has been negatively impacted by NAFTA and free trade, the state as a whole is similar to neighboring Iowa (which Cruz won): white, agrarian and cucked. Additionally, Wisconsinites dominate the GOP: both House Speaker Paul Ryan and RNC Chairman Reince Priebus are from Janesville. The Wisconsin Republican Party has unified against Trump to a degree yet unseen in the current election cycle, with failed Governor Scott Walker's endorsement of Cruz the cherry on the shit sundae.

I've seen this myself. Yesterday, I went to Madison (the state capital) and Milwaukee to attend a Ted Cruz town hall and a Donald Trump rally, respectively. While Trump's rallies in Iowa and Illinois were sold-out events, his Milwaukee rally drew a comparatively lackluster crowd of 1,500-2,000 people. Not only that, there weren't even any protesters at Trump's rally, though that was probably because Bernie Sanders was holding a competing event nearby.

Yet despite the seven nation army of cuckservatives aligned against the Donald, their chosen flunky Ted Cruz had to put up a struggle. Even with demographics and the might of the Wisconsin GOP on his side, 56 percent of Wisconsin Republicans oppose Ted Cruz. Additionally, the Cruz campaign has been burning through money at an astronomical rate just trying to keep up with Trump.

A Vote For Ted Cruz Is A Vote For Paul Ryan

Donald Trump's opponents have conceded that neither Ted Cruz nor John Kasich will be able to overtake him in the delegate count, particularly with most of the remaining primary states (New York, California, New Jersey etc.) favorable to him. As a result, they've switched their strategy to denying him the 1,237 delegates he needs to win the nomination on the first ballot of the Republican convention this summer.

While Ted Cruz and his fanboys might fantasize about him winning the nomination in a brokered convention, it's not likely to happen. Beyond Cruz being ineligible to serve due to being a natural-born Canadian, he's widely despised by his fellow Republicans for his habitual dishonesty and abrasive attitude. The only reason he's currently racking up endorsements from party insiders like Jeb Bush and Lindsey Graham is because they want to use him as a club to beat Trump with.

GOP establishment hacks have begun floating the idea of nominating House Speaker (and 2012 vice presidential nominee) Paul Ryan as a compromise candidate at the convention. Not only would this represent an unprecedented insult to the party's base, nominating Ryan would guarantee a Democratic victory in November. The Mitt Romney/Paul Ryan brand of Republicanism is so repulsive to voters that not only did it lose them the 2012 election (an election they should have won due to Obama's unpopularity), Ryan's own hometown refused to support him.

In any event, Donald Trump and his supporters will need to turn the heat up after his loss in Wisconsin in order to thwart the GOP establishment. Voting for Ted Cruz will ensure that the nomination goes to Ryan, Romney or another Wall Street-owned company man who will both disregard the interests of the American people and lose to the Democrats. If you're serious about pulling up the floorboards of the GOP to expose the rot within, Trump is your only option.

Why Sexual Socialism In America Would Improve The Lives Of Men

April 6, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

A great disparity of wealth exists amongst the Western nations and it begs for resolution. A select few, through no direct doing of their own, possess greater wealth than all others combined, and recklessly spend it without regard for those that have it not.

While it is, indeed, sad to contemplate the uneven distribution of financial wherewithal, it is far, far worse to consider the uneven distribution of the wealth of aesthetic beauty of the human form amongst the human inhabitants of the planet today and how it affects the very lives of us all.

Like our Most Excellent Leader, B.H. Obama opined recently, “That body isn’t yours. You didn’t build it,” thus implying that those with physical beauty owe it to those of us without to share their aesthetic glory for the benefit of us all, as their beauty belongs to the People.

American Sexual Socialism

The finest progressive minds have developed a new government agency that will enable the efficient distribution of the benefits of human beauty, the Department of Aesthetic Transfer. The DAT, as it is commonly abbreviated, will have multiple mandates, the primary being a two-tier program simply called American Sexual Socialism. It is the belief of this administration that DAT ASS, when properly implemented, will redistribute the benefits of beauty equally in society.

Tier One of ASS

The ASS program focuses entirely on women, as the Selective Service focuses entirely on men, in a gesture of equality for all. Upon reaching the age of 18, all American women must register with ASS and undergo a physical to receive an ASS rating. Women who are above a certain obesity level are classified below the standards of the program, placed on inactive status, and penalized into a higher tax bracket to encourage them to eat less and lose weight, enabling them to raise their ASS rating into higher level.

Women deemed acceptable in ASS are placed in active status. Similar to the National Guard, their duties of ASS will require one weekend a month of their time, which is an acceptable penance for their good fortune of aesthetics. Duties shall include modeling for nude photography and video, live performance of exotic dancing at certified DAT facilities, and escort-only services for men in need of dating partners.

Tier One ASS Participant

An American female of active ASS rating will have completed her Tier One obligations upon her 25th birthday, or upon marriage, whichever is sooner. It is the desire of the DAT to promote marriage, and the preservation of virginity until marriage, thus Tier One is designed to, while undoubtedly uncomfortable for the woman, cause no actual mental or physical harm nor cause the end of the ASS participant's virginity, and provide an incentive to marry by ending Tier One obligations early.

Tier Two of ASS

However, the administration and the DAT understand that marriage is, regrettably, not important to some American women and that various photographic, video, and live nude performances are things that they may do already of their own volition and time, albeit, we are certain, to an unfair distribution of recipients, so the second tier of American Sexual Socialism has been created for these women who have so much more to give.

Tier 2 ASS obligations begin upon a woman's 25 birthday, and continue, like Selective Service, until her 35th birthday. In an effort towards compassion, Tier 2 obligations can end earlier upon the descent of the participant's ASS rating below the minimum, commonly referred to as "The Wall." Once past the wall, the woman is released from the program, as her beauty has been fully distributed.

The DAT regards the 25th birthday to be a hallmark of the unmarried American woman's selfish refusal to commit her assets to marriage and continuance of the American Way, and has designed Tier 2 to take advantage of those same assets despite her refusal.

Coming soon to your town and government sponsored, too!

With similar one weekend per month duties as Tier 1, the Tier 2 participant will check into her assigned local DAT facility and work several shifts over the course of that duty as a sex worker of government employ. As she is not compensated nor the patrons charged, prostitution laws are technically non-applicable. Tier 2 ASS participants shall receive the benefit of free health exams, birth control, and the knowledge that all of her assignments will also be screened via health exam as well as certain deviant sex acts being prohibited.

While the DAT acknowledges that sex with multiple random men does indeed disrupt the pair-bonding psychology of women, the justification lies in the fact that a woman who is not married by the age of 25 is not married for a reason, and will probably not enter into a successful marriage at that point or any time further.

Beneficiaries of DAT ASS

In an effort to recognize the contributions of American men to the economic stability of the United States and in an attempt to undo the wreckage wrought by the misguided feminist movements, all employed American men age 18 or older are eligible to receive benefits of ASS Tier One, as it is a man’s right to visually appreciate the beauty of women that his labor has benefited.

This man is ready for his ASS benefits.

Tier 2 benefits are extended to all unmarried, employed American men age 18 or older, as they are paying taxes for the upkeep of American women, yet have not claimed one as their own. The ASS is designed to promote happy marriage via new divorce laws allowing men to divorce with no financial repercussions due to “frigidity” and “lack of sexual enthusiasm,” among several other new causes, all of which are designed to ensure that employed American men are rewarded for their efforts with sexual encounters of at least an acceptable level of performance and enthusiasm, either through marriage to a loving wife, or via ASS. Divorced, pre-wall women are, of course, required to re-enroll in the appropriate ASS Tier.

In Summary

She’s doing her duty to her country.

The DAT and the Obama administration would like to thank you for taking the time to read this brief description of the upcoming ASS program. It is our hope that the imbalance of aesthetic wealth and obligations of the two sexes in this country can be resolved via careful implementation of Tier 1 and Tier 2 ASS.

The DAT would also like to solicit opinions from the American public who will be eligible for benefits of ASS in the above sections as to specifics of duties required in Tiers 1 and 2 as well as general inquiries and feedback on the program. All correspondence regarding suggestions of what else to put in DAT ASS can be directed to the email of

How Female Celebrities Are Responsible For Eating Disorders And Body Image Problems

Female body image issues, from anorexia to depression, are routinely blamed on men and the patriarchy. Women are portrayed as automatons meticulously conditioned to aim for a physical perfection they can never meet. Yet this is far from the truth. Instead, women are their own worst enemies. Despite telling fans to love themselves and "be who they really are," female celebrities never show us who they really are. Or they change who they are completely via plastic surgery. The end result is millions of women who completely hate their faces and bodies because of how they compare to female actresses, singers, and models.

The impact of this fantasy on average womanhood is telling. Rates of eating disorders are the highest they have ever been, at the exact same time our celebrity-obsessed culture is the most vacuous and superficial it has ever been. When female celebrities give the illusion that, aside from a once-a-decade makeup-less selfie, they are creatures of flawless beauty, other women readily believe it.

It is long overdue that female celebrities take responsibility for the deleterious impact they have on other women's assessments of their physical appearance. Blaming invisible, male-inspired forces for women's self-inflicted woes is an excuse that does not hold water. If society stands any chance of arresting and then reversing body-related female mental illness, the stars need to be lead by example.

Yet this is supremely unlikely. Actresses and singers in particular advertise themselves by declaring they stand for "girl power" or "self-love." And the way stars package themselves is 90% of the secret to their success, not talent or even hard work. At present, sadly, they are financially exploiting sad and vulnerable women who think they offer a recipe for self-esteem and confidence.

How famous women preach one standard and practice another, leading to women hating themselves

Ariana Grande

> I think it's so important for girls to love themselves and to treat their bodies respectfully.

I first called out Ariana Grande's financial appropriation of feminism a long time ago. My verdict on her stands. She has written open letters about women loving themselves and their bodies, but seems to love never showing what she really looks like.

What she wants female fans and male admirers to see:

…versus what she doesn't want them to see:

Not only is the self-hating make-up strong with this one, so too is the cosmetic surgery. When she talks about "female liberation" and other lovely combinations of (for her) big words, nothing is mentioned about the liberation she got from the scalpel or the plastic surgeon. Women who fawn over her looks and wish them for themselves are simply not aware that their girl power icon is feeding them drivel to pad her purse.

With role models such as these, there is little wonder why women are either flocking to plastic surgeons or developing body dysmorphic disorders

Adele

> I've never wanted to look like models on the cover of magazines. I represent the majority of women and I'm very proud of that.

Yes, Adele is not slim. But she's also a liar. In no sense is Adele representative of normal women or the majority of women, who cannot afford full-time make-up and style assistants, let alone have a music studio or other concern organize appointments for them.

The Adele without make-up we think is this:

…is actually this:

When female fans see Adele's contrived no make-up photos for publications like Rolling Stone, not to mention her made-up red carpet appearances, what are they meant to think? "Wow, she looks pretty even without cosmetics! And I'm so ugly!" comes to mind.

The reason why Adele has escaped some of the occasional criticism leveled at female celebrities for fake appearances is because of her size. There seems to be some unwritten rule that women beyond a certain size are always open and honest about how they look. Yet we can see now that Adele is no different from many other well-known female figures. In fact, her transformation via make-up and photoshopping is arguably much more dramatic than slimmer stars.

If stars care about their fans, they should start acting like it

Celebrityhood is too often that wonderful game where the true trick of making money and becoming ever more famous are masked by attempts to appear nice, generous, and down-to-earth. The pawns, meanwhile, are the girls who either try to chase the impossible standards falsely presented by female celebrities or give up in anguish and self-hatred.

When society reflected more patriarchal norms, anorexia, bulimia, and other mental illnesses we see all the time today were so uncommon as to be almost non-existent. This pandemic of female body image issues can be placed squarely at the feet of feminism and female independence. Men had nothing to do with it and, as I have said before, virtually no men desire the anorexic and other girls that celebrity culture has produced.

If female celebrities are going to lie about their appearance, they can at least drop the mantras about helping other women love themselves.

How Conservatives Are As Bad As Liberals In Undermining America

April 7, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Liberalism is a cancer that is eating away at the heart of Western civilization by eroding its foundational institutions. But there is another movement that may be even worse than liberalism—the conservative movement.

The conservative movement consists of most Republican politicians as well as those donors, pundits, news outlets, think tanks, and lobbyists that are supposed to represent conservative voters. While they pretend to be conservatives themselves, their real values are diametrically opposed to those of their voters.

A false friend is worse than an enemy

Military strategists are unified in teaching that a general should know his enemy. This makes sense because you can't defeat an enemy unless you understand what its strengths and weaknesses are.

But false friends are worse than an enemy. You would never take the advice of an enemy, but you will listen to a false friend even though he will lead you to defeat.

Liberalism is the clear enemy of everything that is traditional. It was liberalism that pushed for no fault divorce laws that causes almost half of all marriages to end in divorce. Liberalism pushes feminism caused women to abandon childbearing in exchange for fulfillment in a cubicle. Through a poorly designed welfare state, liberalism has created a permanent underclass in the US and in many Western nations. Two decades of liberal lobbying led to the legalization of same-sex marriage, and liberals have plans for even more extreme social engineering.

The conservative movement says that it is a friend of traditional men and women, but it is a false friend. It promised that if we voted for True Conservative™ politicians and donated to conservative lobbying groups they would not only stop the destruction being wrought by liberals, but reverse it.

If the conservative movement had put up a real fight against liberalism and lost, there would have been no shame. But in virtually every case, conservative leaders put up only token resistance. As we shall see, the movement's real priorities lie in servicing a globalist agenda.

Ditching Morality

Average Americans who identify as conservatives do so because they want to conserve their way of life. For most of them, that means a society with some semblance of Christian morality. It doesn't mean that conservatives want a theocracy—only a place where children can grow up in a healthy environment.

The conservative movement was supposed to fight against the erosion of morality. William F. Buckley, one of the leading lights of the movement, wrote that part of its mission was defend traditional morality:

> The profound crisis of our era is, in essence, the conflict between the Social Engineers, who seek to adjust mankind to conform with scientific utopias, and the disciples of Truth, who defend the organic moral order.

Defending the organic moral order is a noble goal. Unfortunately, conservative leaders almost never do it. When was the last time you heard a conservative politician or pundit say that no-fault divorce should be rolled back?

Gay marriage is a similar case. The leaders of the conservative movement put up only token opposition to same-sex marriage before it became the law of the land due to the Obergefell Supreme Court decision. The reason for their limp-wristed response is that many of the most revered conservative leaders are actually social liberals. Jonah Goldberg, a Senior Editor for National Review, thought that same-sex marriage was a great idea all along:

> I also find it cruel and absurd to tell gays that living the free-love lifestyle is abominable while at the same time telling them that their committed relationships are illegitimate too.
> Many of my conservative friends often act as if there's some grand alternative to both the bohemian or the bourgeois lifestyles. But there isn't. And given that open homosexuality is simply a fact of life, the rise of the HoBos — the homosexual bourgeoisie — strikes me as good news.

While the leaders of the conservative movement abandoned any defense of traditional values, they neglected to tell their followers. On occasion, conservative politicians will wrap themselves in the mantle of Christian morality to gain votes, but once they are in office all morality issues conveniently disappear off the radar screen.

By the way, conservative lobbying organizations are no better. These groups solicit donations from gullible conservative voters while they have no intention of ever achieving victory. After all, victory would mean that they would be out of a lucrative job.

Trade

So if preserving the moral order is not a goal of conservative leaders, what is? The conservative movement's position on trade shows us that their real priority is fostering globalism.

Globalism doesn't focus on the needs of an individual nation. Rather, its concern is to do away with national boundaries so that all barriers to trade are removed. Globalism benefits a small cadre of wealthy individuals and corporations, but it has been a disaster for the US workers who have seen their jobs shipped overseas.

Even though the free trade deals like NAFTA have hurt the US, most conservative voters strongly believe that opposing these deals is not conservative and somehow un-American. But how did conservatives become convinced to vote against their own interests?

Through indoctrination.

Wealthy globalists are able to influence the political process through their donations. They donate to candidates and their Super PACs to buy the candidate, but they also use their donations to influence the voters directly. They are able to fund conservative publications, think tanks, and news organizations to spread the message that free trade somehow magically enriches everyone.

This is why you'll see publications like National Review and think tanks like Cato write glowingly about trade deals like the Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP). Afterward, pundits will go on Fox News or conservative websites and repeat the "wisdom" that they gleaned from these conservative or libertarian thought leaders.

The indoctrination has not been fast process. The key globalist doctrines have been preached by these outlets as the conservative orthodoxy for years or even decades. Over time, rank and file conservatives came to believe that anyone who deviates from this message is a liberal.

Immigration

Immigration is another example of where the interests of the interests of the conservative movement's globalist masters conflict with those of its voters.

As anyone with even the most rudimentary understanding of economics should be able to discern, increasing the supply of labor through immigration drives down wages. That hurts the average American worker. Yet conservative publications such as the Wall Street Journal tout the idea that immigrants are the "engines of economic growth." That phrase appears so frequently in conservative literature that I believe someone must have market tested it.

The idea conservative outlets are trying to convey is that importing immigrants magically raises everyone's wages. Unfortunately, while some immigrants might be good people, immigration does not defy the law of supply and demand. Indoctrinated conservative and libertarians who do not believe me should study the work of Professor George J. Borjas of Harvard University.

Due to space constraints, I've only touched on the wage impacts of immigration, but is very likely that the unchecked immigration that is pushed by the conservative movement is part of a deeper sinister agenda.

Can the conservative movement be salvaged?

When someone decides to run for election as a Republican politician or when a writer decides to seek work at a conservative publication, I believe they start out with good intentions. However, getting elected or supporting the staff of a conservative publication takes a lot of money. Outside money is often required, and that money always comes with strings attached.

Also, it is human nature to want to preserve a good thing. Conservative leaders are invested in the status quo even if it is destroying the country.

What this means practically is that most of the conservative movement leadership is compromised by donor dollars. The million-dollar question is whether you can ever trust someone who has been compromised.

Ultimately, the only thing that can be done is to radically re-orient the system in a healthy direction. Patriarchal Nationalism represents just such a re-orientation. While it will take time to achieve, it will be easier than trying to salvage the existing system.

How To Become A Commercial Fisherman

April 7, 2016 | by Trevor Jacobs | Link | Original Link

The call of the wild captures the attention of many. While some go out into nature once in a while, others spend their lives out there working. One such path to spending your days outdoors is becoming a commercial fisherman.

When you walk into the grocery store or market, you see fresh fish chilling on ice. These fish don't just magically appear—they are often caught out in the oceans and seas. The process for capturing these fish is not easy, and this is where commercial fishing comes in. Commercial fishing involves fishing using nets, traps, or dredges out in open water, usually a sea or ocean. Crews will head out to sea searching for whatever seafood is in abundance. They'll haul in as much fish and other marine life as they can to make the most profit.

Just know that commercial fishing is far from leisurely fishing. It's a grueling experience that can test the limits of both the mind and body. Expect to spend many days aboard a ship with little sleep, rest, and basic comforts. Also, commercial fishermen understand navigation, boat maintenance and operation, as well as standard fishing procedures.

Interestingly enough, the life of fishermen and related jobs have been featured on TV shows like the "Deadliest Catch." While these do give a good insight into the job, they are just reality television. If you want to become a commercial fisherman because you saw it on TV, you may want to reconsider. Sadly, many fishermen die regularly each year out at sea when conditions become too rough. Additionally, there aren't many formalities in this line of work. Don't expect great benefits, if any, such as vacation time and leave.

That said, becoming a commercial fisherman can be highly rewarding, both financially and mentally. You will make a lot of money in a short amount of time, develop life-lasting memories, and you will also be given a tough life test that will make you a better man.

Why Become A Commercial Fisherman?

There are a few reasons guys become commercial fisherman. Yet the reason that stands above them all is money. While commercial fishing won't make you rich, it pays a good amount of money in a short period of time. Plus, if the pay was lousy then most guys would not put up with the conditions aboard a fishing vessel.

If you want to become a seasonal fisherman, then figure out how you can accommodate this line of work into your schedule. If you have a few months off every year, then you could put that time to good use and get aboard a fishing vessel.

Tips For Becoming A Commercial Fisherman

Because there isn't a short supply of people looking to be fisherman, there are some hurdles that you'll have to overcome to get on board a ship. Here are a few tips to keep in mind:

1. Meet the right people

Fishing is a very tight-knit industry. It’s a generational line of work, and crew members often are related to the captain of the ships, or are connected through them somehow. Although there isn’t much in the way of networking in this industry, look to contact different fishing ships, or even head out to places where fisherman gather for socializing.

2. Be in the right place

To meet the right people, you have to be in the right place. Certain states and cities have more fishing than others. If you live far inland on dusty plains, there aren’t going to be any fishing vessels. Make sure you live in or near a city on the water, especially in an area where there is a lot of commercial fishing. Hang out by the fish market and docks if you feel compelled!

3. Learn the information

Learning fishing comes from spending time on the water, not the classroom. But if you want to really learn the details of the industry, boats, navigation etc. then consider taking a course on commercial fishing. The Coast Guard has a list of approved resources via Bls.gov. Additionally, you should make an effort to do some research online about the topics. A quick Google search should yield some information about fishing in your area.

4. Know the technology

Although most of what you learn will come from actually fishing, it’s a good idea to learn the technology you will encounter on the boats. Technology will include navigational tools, radio communications, fish finders, and even the ropes and nets that are used.

Getting Your First Job

There are a couple of ways to get your first job. If you're bold and live near a commercial fishing dock, then simply make your way down there. Inquire to deckhands, captains, and everyone in between if they need an extra hand. While you may get a lot of rejections, you may find yourself in luck with a menial job aboard. This is nothing to fret at because it's a great way to start. Just be prepared to start ASAP as fishermen can't be waiting months to fill out paperwork when they're in desperate need of another deckhand.

If you'd rather not try to get a job through just showing up, check out job boards looking for fishermen. For example, if you live in Alaska, check out Alaska Job Finder. Search for positions in your local area, or be prepared to go where there are a lot of positions available.

Experience is certainly preferred, but not entirely necessary. The need for an extra hand on deck outweighs your credentials. That said, if you don't have luck right away finding a job then continue to pursue the proper certifications, take courses, and increase your general knowledge of the field—doing so will only increase your odds of getting a job.

Commercial Fisherman Salary

It's hard to nail down an exact salary for commercial fisherman—it's not exactly a corporate type setting with everything well tracked. Another reason for this is that the fishermen are paid a percentage of what the entire ship brings in. This can depend on a number of factors such as the weather and the price of fish. But to do the math, if a ship brings in $150,000 in a 8 week season, and a fisherman's cut is say 10%, they'll make $15,000. Not bad for a couple months of work.

It's hard to peg an exact hourly wage to this job for several reasons, including the aforementioned way in which it's split. Income will definitely vary year to year. It's also not the most stable line of work.

Starting Your Own Business

Enticed at the prospect of starting a commercial fishing business? There's certainly a lot of money to be made, especially depending on what you catch, where you're located, and the time of year.

That said, there's a lot that goes into a business like this. Not only does it require investments and overhead costs, but there are a number of licenses that one must obtain. You must do your due diligence in making sure that you have the proper licenses and adhere to other regulations, as this industry is closely scrutinized.

Of course, if you have little experience in commercial fishing then you'll probably want to hold off. It's essential to not only understand the profits of an endeavor like this, but also how to operate a fishing vessel.

Conclusion

The rewards of commercial fishing do not come without risks. Commercial fishing is in fact one of the most dangerous occupations according to the CDC, with dozens of fishermen dying yearly. Of course this varies depending on the conditions you work under, but it still should be made clear.

Despite the danger, it's still an appealing line of work. You spend time out in the open water with hardworking men, you challenge yourself mentally and physically, and you get paid well. If this sounds appealing then becoming a commercial fisherman is something you should seriously consider.

4 Effective Leg Fighting Techniques That Every Man Should Know

April 7, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

So we have seen a few sample techniques, mobilising our upper limbs to bring the fight to an early end and overcome our opponent. We will now focus on another set of weapons available in our arsenal: the legs. The interest of leg techniques resides in two factors:

The striking power

With larger muscle groups, developed by carrying our bodyweight all day long and exercise, the kicks inflict much more damage in one hit than punches. Targeting the legs is a good way to neutralize your opponent or knock him off balance. One leg crossed out, fight’s over.

The safety of the distance

Longer limbs allow you to strike from a reasonable length, without exposing yourself to the opponent's punches, and even from his kicks if he is shorter than you. Keeping your opponent at a safe distance with kicks allows you to catch your breath or plan your next attack.
Kicking techniques are legions and each one have an interest, but I will share with you those four, because of their simplicity and their efficiency:

1. The question mark kick

When he'll wake up, he will wonder where it came from.

This technique uses diversion and leads to a kick to the opponent's head.

1. It all starts by faking a front or low circular kick, making the opponent lower his guard, rendering his upper body vulnerable

2. Then quickly turning to the side and switching the trajectory of the leg to aim at the opponent’s head

3. The ideal two options would be to hit the cheek or the chin with the talus bone (ankle joint), or if you are at a closer range, the whole face with the lower part of your shinbone

Those guys break it down for you:

2. The lateral kick to the kneecap

This one is not fit for competition, as it is a self defense move. Its primary goal is to disable your attacker by damaging, and possibly fracturing, his kneecap. It is even more efficient if you are wearing shoes with a hard sole.

1. The kick in the kneecap was one of Bruce Lee’s favourite. As you can observe from his personal sketches, the first step is to fake a punch to make your opponent focus on your upper body

2. Then cock back your leg as if it were a spring, to give all the possible power to the kick

3. Strike with all your strength with the heel or the side of your foot if you are wearing shoes. Use the sole if you are not

3. The sweep of the opponent’s front foot

The timing is the most important part of this technique.

1. You must catch the opponent as he steps towards you to launch his attack. You have to catch the side of his foot just before it touches the ground, when his weight is transferring from the rear to the front, like the fighter on the left of the picture

2. Launch a circular movement, turning with your hips to give greater power. Catch the side of his foot with the sole of yours. It is a similar motion as in the judo throw Ko Soto Gari

3. You can achieve greater success by pulling the opponent’s lead arm, or pushing his shoulder, towards the ground

4. You can follow up by striking your opponent on the ground in order to end the fight

History's human weapon did a pretty decent job describing this technique:

4. The Thai inside sweep

This one is a beauty. You inflict pain and you sow the seed of doubt in your opponent's mind. All courtesy of the Kingdom of Siam.

1. This move ideally starts after you caught the leg of the opponent after a middle kick attempt. You will lock his foot under your arm, maintaining him sideways

2. You will then kick the back of his calf with your shin in a circular motion, while pulling the leg you caught towards the sky and the outside

3. It is has a double use for you. The opponent is on the ground, vulnerable to your attacks. The fall also desorientates him, especially if he falls on the back of his head

I will let the lads demonstrate:

Au boulot!

Kicks are energy demanding but efficient. They must be used with care. I almost never strike to the head as an experienced fighter can usually read the trajectory of a kick. Another big issue is that high kicks leave your groin exposed.

As I said before, you must practice regularly and under the supervision of a qualified teacher. For shin conditioning, I recommend hitting the heavy bag, rolling a bottle or a rolling pin on them a few times a week or for our friends leaving in tropical climates, testing the banana tree kicking. The goal is not to break your tibias but to slowly toughen them up. It is paramount to train both legs. It takes time and Tong Po is only a movie character.

"But what if the other guy is so close that I can't kick or punch him?" I am glad you asked. Part III of our series is coming soon with the standing throws that will send your foes flying.

6 Ways Liberal Democracy Destroys The Goodness Of Humanity

April 8, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Growing up in the west, especially in America, one is taught that you live in the most glorious time ever—the most wonderful, wealthy, stable, free, and best place on the planet. As one accepts the red pill, many of these assumptions are questioned. And while many of these truths may have proven true in the past, the excesses of modern liberal democracy have created weak men, shrill, out of shape, and damaged women, a decrepit culture, and declining values. America indeed has the potential to be great, but the western culture today destroys everything it touches. Here are a few examples:

1. Asians

The famous stewardesses of Singapore Airlines

Asians are naturally thin, petite, and healthy—IN ASIA. The country with the longest lifespan is Japan, which is one of the most isolated Asian nations, physically, culturally, and economically. The average Japanese person lives until age 80 for males and 87 for females (America is ranked #34). However, when Asians move to the west and adopt our culture, diet, and lifestyle, they become overweight, slutty, and often mutilate their bodies and experiment with gender fluidity.

Typical Asian American, 2016

2. Public Outings

Tompkins Square Park, 1967

The other day I met a girl at the park. The idea for this article hit me after seeing the number of people there, with a partner of the opposite sex, on a beautiful day, in a pleasant atmosphere, ignoring all of this for to play on their smartphones. The result is a lack of physical and emotional intimacy, save for the actual moment of banging your partner.

Millennial couple on a typical date, 2016

3. Dancing

Square Dancing, 1950s

Dancing used to be a social skill, a fun activity to do in free time, a great way to meet women, and a way to perpetuate a history or culture, with many ethic groups like Italians, Irish, Russians, Jews, and others learning traditional dance moves in traditional clothing. Today, all sense of history or culture is lost, and modern dance has become at best the uncoordinated Elaine Benice “poke your hands” move, and at worst free form sexual gyrating and twerking.

Miley Cyrus—such an easy target, yes, but she is merely an example of “talent” today

4. Career

In the 60s, studying science and engineering could lead to a lifelong career at NASA; today, we can’t even shoot a rocket to the moon

For centuries, civilizations around the world developed and fostered a pride and honor in working. Regimented trade orders would train protégés in a skill, which they would finely hone for years, under the supervision of mentors, until they developed the necessary skill set to be proficient at a skill that they turned into a lifetime career. Tailors mended old clothing and created custom fits that accentuated the style and body type of the wearer. Shoemakers patched and re-soled leather shoes that were made to last decades. Butchers were more than just meat slicers, but would cut special cuts of various thickness of unprocessed meat on demand, offer aged and premium cuts of various types, and ensured their product was fresh and tasty.

Men could raise a family of four on one salary alone, often affording a nice house, car, and family vacations. Fast forward to 2016 and the profit-at-all-costs fascist system of today believes that producing at the lowest cost is the only metric of importance. Can Mexicans assemble a car for a quarter the cost of Detroit workers? Then it must be a good idea. Can Indians answer telephones and read scripts in a poor attempt at recreating actual customer service? Then let’s shut down the local call center and open up abroad. Most young people today don’t anticipate having the same job for more than five years, which is good, because it probably won’t last that long.

Modern Detroit, after “downsizing”

5. Men

Typical guys from the 60s: Happy, social, masculine, outdoors

American Millennial men are some of the most insufferable beings I come across, second only to millennial women. They are shallow, silly, weak, vapid, directionless, and boring. This isn’t because they are somehow inferior people than prior generations. It’s simply that living in the modern Western liberal democracy creates and fosters this type of person. In a sane, traditional society, men today could be just as happy, interesting, masculine, and satisfied as their fathers.

Typical 20-something in 2016

6. Women

Sorority Girls, 1973: Note how all are smiling, thin, with long hair, in skirts or dresses with heels

This hardly needs mentioning here, so I'll let the pictures do the talking. We all know that the quality of women offered today in the West is abysmal. If you haven't been abroad within the last year, plan a trip now, if for no other reason than to see what is possible. We do not have to accept the low quality females we are being offered here.

Murica! Note how she cannot even reach her crotch to wipe

Ignore, Withdraw, or Leave

This isn't to say that America is a bad place, or that it is intrinsically evil; if anything, it has the potential to become one of the greatest, wealthiest, happiest, successful civilizations on the planet. But the current system of liberal democracy destroys all potential for this success. It angers me every time I see a fat Asian, because I know how difficult it is for Asians to work against their biology to become fat. And it angers me when I see a thin, kind, young woman who has pierced and mutilated her body with graffiti and shrapnel, and has taken up the cause for feminism. Without a strong, patriarchal system to guide her, she becomes an enemy of civilization itself.

So what options do those of us still living in the west have? There are three:

1. Do your best to ignore it, stacking currency and saving for trips abroad where one can appreciate an ordered, traditional culture with morals, priorities, and feminine women.

2. Leave the city and find a way to live as a hermit, remaining in America but interacting as little as possible with others.

3. Find greener pastures abroad. Relocate to a more traditional, simple society.

But I must reiterate one point. If you have not traveled abroad within the last year, plan a trip now. Airfares are as low as $300 round trip to Central America, and under $800 to Asia. Prices have never been lower. Go, experience another culture, realize there is an alternative to your lifestyle, and make a plan to do one of the three above. Because if you don't, the above serves as powerful and damning evidence of how Western culture can destroy greatness. Are you strong enough to resist it?

Why There Will Be No Radical Life Extension, End Of Aging, Or Immortality

April 8, 2016 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

Despite the recurring assurances of futurists and scientists that humanity is on the threshold of conquering death and bringing about an end to aging, there will be no such radical life extension. It's not going to happen. I will articulate the reasons for my pessimistic (realistic) view in this article.

1. Misleading Statistics and Deceptive Trends

The irrepressible optimists like futurist Ray Kurzweil, author of Fantastic Voyage: Live Long Enough to Live Forever, like to point to the fact that the average human lifespan has risen dramatically over the past century. They claim that the average human lifespan (currently about 80 years in developed nations) has doubled since the early 20th century and tripled since the Middle Ages. While this is technically true, it is very misleading. To the uncritical mind, such statistics seem to imply that no one lived to old age up until very recently and that there were no elderly people in 1900, the Middle Ages, and surely not in a pre-civilization era. This is emphatically not true.

The key word here is average. The average human lifespan was so short in earlier eras due to a very high infant mortality rate. Before the development of germ theory and the attendant development of sterile medical practices, it was not uncommon for 1 in 3 or 1 in 2 children to die at birth or shortly thereafter. Before the development of antibiotics and vaccines, many succumbed in childhood to a myriad of diseases such as smallpox, scarlet fever, and cholera.

If half of a population dies at age 0 and the other half lives to 70, then the average lifespan will be 35 years. If you survived birth and childhood and reached adulthood, you had a very good chance of living a full life of 70-75 years. There have been grandparents and the elderly for as long as there have been humans. Most of the Greek philosophers lived to a ripe old age (into their 80s) more than 2,000 years ago.

This is very important to understand: the increase in average human lifespan is due almost entirely to the dramatic reduction in infant mortality. It is no coincidence that the nations with the highest infant mortality rates (African nations) also have the shortest average lifespans and the nations with the lowest infant mortality rates (Western nations and select Asian nations like Japan) have the longest average lifespans.

In countries with good healthcare systems and expertly trained medical staff, they will almost never lose a newborn. This is the major refutation to the claims of starry-eyed optimists who love to point to a plot showing the exponential increase in human life expectancy and claim this trend will continue. It won't. Infant mortality has already been eradicated. All of modern medicine (heart surgery, pacemakers, organ transplants, etc.) has added at most 10-15 years to what the human lifespan would otherwise be.

2. Everything is genetically pre-determined

Everything from intelligence to baldness to even longevity seems to be encoded in our genes and is beyond our control. We’ve all seen the stories on the news of some Appalachian hillbilly who’s celebrating his 100th birthday and claims the key to longevity is three shots of moonshine a day, or some woman in Georgia who was born a sharecropper and is celebrating her 105th birthday. We’re also familiar with the fitness neurotic who never missed a daily workout only to keel over at 55 from a heart attack on one of his fun runs.

There seems to be no rhyme or reason for why one person lives to 100 and another croaks at 50. Obviously, we know things like excessive tobacco and alcohol use are not conducive to a long and healthy life, but there are many, many cases of people who drank or smoked their whole lives and seem to be naturally immune to adverse effects. These people won the genetic lottery. They are genetically robust. Likewise, there are many people who take immaculate care of themselves, eat well, exercise regularly, go for frequent doctor checkups, only to end up betrayed by their own bodies.

3. It would be economically undesirable

The aging population is already putting massive strain on the budgets of Western nations. An ever-expanding system of hospitals, imaging centers, nursing homes, and assisted care facilities—all staffed by well-paid nurses and doctors—is already draining national coffers. Do you think governments want their people living even longer and collecting benefits even longer? They’re already trying to eliminate us and kill us off with the deliberate introduction of GM food and endocrine disrupting chemicals in our food and water.

Additionally, Gen X’s and Millennials are already vocally complaining that Baby Boomers who failed to adequately plan for retirement are refusing to retire from their senior positions in government, academia, and industry and make way for them. This is effectively causing a log jam that is preventing younger people from advancing into higher paid positions. This in turn gives rise to bitter ageist resentment on the part of the stymied generations.

There is also an intercultural and intergenerational conflict looming in America where the growing young population—who will be predominately Hispanic, Black, and Asian—will be expected to pay for the care of the retired aged population—who will be predominately White. The established institutions (the Republican Party, the Catholic Church, etc.) have already realized that their future existence lies with fecund Latin America and Africa and not with the dwindling numbers of aging Whites in North America or Western Europe. They're moving their chips.

4. It is not politically expedient

The left desires the elimination of people who hold traditional (oppositional) beliefs. Witness the ghoulish glee of Leftists, like filmmaker Michael Moore, who gloat about the passing on of whites, referring to them as "dinosaurs going extinct." Leftists want these ideological holdouts gone and replaced with a new generation of fresh slates they can indoctrinate from birth.

Additionally, we've seen the recent clamor to exhume Confederate generals from their graves. If this is the reaction elicited by mere dusty bones, imagine what would happen if the Black Lives Matter (BLM) protestors got wind that some of those people who elected to have their brains preserved cryogenically at places like Alcor entertained "quaint" ideas on race or sexuality while alive.

As some people have chosen to be preserved cryonically since the late 1960s, it is entirely possible that some of these people might have held or articulated what today might be considered racist, sexist, or homophobic beliefs. I could easily imagine BLM protestors demanding Alcor unfreeze these "bigots" and let their brains rot in the Arizona heat so as to prevent any possibility—no matter how remote—of "contaminating" the future with the re-introduction of reactionary thinking.

Conclusion

So what will a future without radical life extension look like? We can anticipate several things as a consequence. Expect greater promulgation of the notion that we should accept death as a "natural part of life." That it need not be feared. There will be no railing "against the dying of the light" as Dylan Thomas implored. Instead, we will be encouraged to "go gentle into that good night."

I anticipate widespread promotion of acceptance with such insipid quotes as Emily Dickinson's "That it will never come again is what makes life so sweet" and Mae West's "You only live once, but if you do it right, once is enough." I also expect the legalization and encouragement of euthanasia (assisted suicide), similar to the government-run elective suicide facilities depicted in the 1973 dystopian science fiction film Soylent Green.

I hope I'm wrong. The thought of death and the idea of not-existing should scare anyone who feels he is unique and has differentiated himself from the teeming mass of humanity in thought or deed. But unfortunately, I think we're Davy Crocket at the Alamo. We're the 7th Cavalry at the Battle of the Little Bighorn. We're the 6th Army encircled at Stalingrad. And there is no relief party coming.

Why “Batman Vs. Superman” Was A Failed Allegory

April 8, 2016 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

Batman Vs Superman: Dawn of Justice could have been the film that helped heal the political rift that’s tearing apart America.

It could have; but instead it flopped.

Political and racial tensions are getting close to the breaking point, the worst they’ve been in decades, if not since the Civil War. Internal strife dominates both political parties with voters turning to outsider candidates; the tension between the parties is growing hot, with Democrats promoting violence and even joking about murder, while Republicans quietly stockpile ammunition in their basements.

Barrack Obama’s seeds of racial discord have taken root, growing into Black Lives Matter protesters who burn down their own neighborhoods, and White Identitarian groups who are becoming increasingly vocal and mainstream. The gap between the rich and the poor further fuels this fire, as the most indebted generation in history comes to age in a slumping economy, while welfare queens and economy-destroying CEOs are given free handouts.

One could be forgiven for thinking that America were on the verge of tearing itself apart. I myself do not think this. There is greatness in this country yet—greatness in her people—but no matter what happens, a period of strife is upon us.

Batman Vs Superman could have eased this strife and returned some measure of dialogue between the left and the right, to a conversation that’s been poisoned by social justice warriors and race baiters; but it failed. It failed because the creators knew nothing about the main characters, and nothing about America.

What Is Batman Vs Superman Truly About?

“Who would win in a fight? Batman or Superman?” It’s a question that’s been joked about for decades. Batman and Superman are two of the most iconic pieces of Americana and yet they stand in stark contrast. Both are undeniably American, yet both are fundamentally dissimilar. They both work towards the common good, but in manners which are incompatible if not outright irreconcilable. Every schoolboy understands this intuitively which is why the question is asked. Though they might not be able to put it into words, they realize that Batman and Superman represent the two halves of the American psyche.

The Man Of Tomorrow

Superman represents the grand hope of the American Experiment, a striving towards ubermensch greatness, towards outer space and superhuman perfection. He is an immigrant who perfectly embodies the ideals of his adopted home, who serves as a guiding beacon towards some future, blessed year, to a city on the hill called Metropolis. His S exploding out of his chest like a ray of hope, as he shines the light of truth upon the world.

He comes from a humble farming background, he lives modestly, and yet it is not greed or envy that drives him to aim his X-Ray vision upon the corrupt power brokers of society; rather, it is their envy of a modest man which drives them into becoming his enemies. Lex Luthor: a self-made millionaire, a brilliant scientist, and an accomplished body builder who nevertheless resents the fact that he lives in the shadow of the Son of Krypton; a man who cannot appreciate what he has.

Superman is the idealized liberal; his enemy is the degenerate conservative.

The Dark Knight

Batman shares none of his brother's optimism. He represents the cold, brutal side of reality. Anger; vengeance; fear. He is a man who has seen evil firsthand, and who knows its full extent. Who has dived deep within himself and encountered his own internal demons, only to return victorious.

Fear is not his enemy; he has made it his ally.

Batman comes from old money, and he knows just how fragile civilization truly is. He understands the necessity of honoring one's bloodline, of having a memory that stretches back generations, he embraces the noblesse oblige of defending the innocent while punishing the guilty without quarter.

His greatest enemy is the chaos that would tear civilization apart. His nemesis is the Joker: a rebel without a cause, a wild card, a man who just wants to see the world burn.

Batman is the idealized conservative; his enemy is the degenerate liberal.

The Dark Knight Returns

These were the themes explored in Frank Miller's 1986 series The Dark Knight Returns. It was set in a futuristic dystopia where Batman was an old man, Robin had been murdered, Superman had been reduced to an American PR agent, the streets were overwhelmed with chaotic thugs, and the news media had degenerated into little more than pornography. Batman and Superman came to blows precisely because American society had reached a tipping point, their battle was a metaphorical battle for the future of the Republic.

This is the sort of movie that we should have had; something that explored and elucidated the strife we see all around us every day, something that allowed for catharsis and even, maybe, a solution—or at least a light in the distance to guide us forward. Instead what we got was a fight, mano e mano, based upon a miscommunication. Batman suspects that Superman might be a threat—"If there's even a 1% chance we can't risk it."—but eventually realizes that their mothers had the same first name, so they should team up and start a club house called The Justice League.

This theme was far better explored in Watchmen, with Doctor Manhattan as the terrifying Ubermensch, and it was given the appropriate setting: the Cold War. "Even a 1% chance of total destruction," is the sort of concern that a man facing nuclear war worries about, but in our day we're facing a society that's tearing itself apart.

Right Versus Left? Or Nationalists Versus Globalists?

The present election is less about left versus right than it is voters versus their own parties. A recent joke circling amongst Washington insiders is “Lose With Cruz!” They’d rather see him lose to Hillary than they themselves lose their influence under Trump, and they’re doing everything within their power to ensure a Republican defeat. Among the Democrats the same game is being played against Bernie Sanders, their own outsider candidate.

Both the mainstream Democrats and the GOPe are pushing a globalist agenda; open borders, atomized individuals, the destruction of culture, enslavement and dependence to multinational corporations, a world full of individuals who cannot stand on their own and who cannot help one another. A feedlot of anomie.

Imagine a story which was written for this context, by somebody who understood the main characters: Batman warring against Superman because of the progressive creep and the economic destruction that the federal government was wreaking upon American manufacturing; Superman fighting against the reactionary who didn’t want to raise the minimum wage during America’s Great Recession; only for both men to realize it’s not the government, nor industry that’s the problem–it’s the Globalists behind the scenes.

The two of them nothing but useful idiots in a chess game played by psychopaths, until they saw the game for what it was and united to form a team to fight against it.

The problem with writing such a script, however, is that the left would have to admit that they’ve been played. Whatever justifications they once had for demanding environmental regulations against toxic chemicals, or equal treatment of all people before the law, no longer exist; these problems were dealt with long ago, and since then it’s been nothing but mission creep. Any honest man of the left, were he to take a good, hard look at the present day bureaucracy, would realize that it had become a tool of elites; were he a man of any political integrity he would immediately demand that welfare, regulation, and government spending be slashed to reasonable levels so that the parasites in Washington and Wall Street could be starved.

Men of such caliber are rare.

During last year’s GamerGate, the moderate left finally stood up to the radicals; the Social Justice Warriors who promote sexual perversity for the sake of destroying intimacy, twisting culture to pervert relations between the sexes. But they never truly identified what the enemy was, seeing the struggle as nothing more than a fight for ethics in gaming journalism. After making respectable headway, they immediately turned and started attacking their conservative brothers once more, allowing the infection time to regroup.

Somebody like Nolan might have been able to capture this message and broadcast it to the masses, but Zach Snyder simply wasn’t up to the task. He created an art-house action flick with a formulaic plotline, a film that was all climax and no allegory. It could have been great…

…but it wasn't.

The man of the left remains asleep; pursuing failed Soviet policies through Sanders, burning his own neighborhoods and the constitution itself, while remaining unaware of what his party is plotting. Superman has been twisted by the power of pink Kryptonite, and until he shakes off its effects the Dark Knight will have to fight the Globalists on his own.

4 Reasons Why Women Make False Rape Accusations

April 9, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

For young men today, the obstacles continue to increase for anyone who wants to enter a relationship. Attention whoring is at an all time high, women are addicted to their smart phones, and corporations are conspiring to redirect women's attention away from love and toward a career.

While writers have reviewed the ways a man can identify whether an accusation is false, this article will discuss the reasons underlying why a woman would falsely accuse a man of rape. Among false accusations of any crime, it appears to be among the highest. For instance, we rarely hear of a person being falsely accused of theft, murder, or arson. Yet the rape card is pulled with regularity. Let's explore why.

Accusation Is A Weapon Of Power

The first reason is that it is used as a weapon. In the infamous mattress girl case at Columbia University, it slowly became clear that Emma Sulkowicz falsely accused Paul Nungesser of rape. Why did she do this? It seems that she felt abandoned by him. Nungesser made the rookie mistake of hooking up with a mentally unstable girl and thinking, hey, it's college, we can hook up and move on. But this is not what happened.

A key message she sent to Nungesser after the alleged "rape" shines a light on her motives to use a false accusation as a weapon: "I feel like we need to have some real time where we can talk about life and thingz because we still haven't really had a paul-emma chill sesh since summmmerrrr."

For Sulkowicz, she decided to take her revenge by accusing him of rape in order to show him that he should never have neglected her. Today, if a girl feels that a man in any way has mistreated her, revenge is merely a phone call away. If a female student decides one morning that she is mad at a former sexual partner, she can simply have him removed by going to the campus authorities and claiming rape.

This is likely what happened to the basketball captain who was recently expelled under mysterious circumstances purportedly connected to a sexual assault at Yale. He hooked up with a girl, she got mad, and decided to accuse him of rape to remove him from campus. And even if a campus review board decides that the male student is innocent, he now has the stigma of "rapist" attached to him for the rest of his student life. In that case, it may be in his best interest to leave campus anyway. It's win-win for the female accuser.

Accusations Give A Girl Instant Attention

Girls today crave attention at unprecedented levels. Being a victim fulfills that desire. In the era of social media and topless selfies by female celebrity icons, it is getting harder for a girl to generate the amount of attention she feels she deserves. To that end, one way to reliably receive positive attention, accolades, and praise like “hero,” “courageous,” and “role model” is to claim victimhood status.

While being a female gives a girl a small amount of claim to victimhood status, claiming to be a “rape survivor” bumps her up to the next level. Once a girl claims that she has been raped, all of her friends and family will give her their full attention, campus administrators must listen to her very word, and anything she posts on social media will instantly garner 1000 “likes.” I hesitate to even write this because it may give some female readers bad ideas to achieve mini-celebrity status and get a full page spread in Rolling Stone magazine.

Falsely Accusing A Man Of Rape Instantly Boosts A Woman’s Social Status

In the current political climate, the more “oppressed” and “underprivileged” a person is, the more status they are conferred. For many privileged middle class girls, they are acutely aware that they occupy a tenuous position among the oppressed classes. Many privileged girls are jealous that racial minorities and transsexuals are receiving more attention than them.

If a girl wants to leap forward in the Victimhood Olympics and gain social points, she can falsely accuse a man of rape. Nobody is higher status on a college campus than a rape survivor. As soon as a girl claims that she has been raped, every word from her mouth must be treated as though it came from God himself. Nothing she says can be questioned, and everything she says must be treated with awe and reverence.

Avoid Being Called A Slut

This is the standard regret angle of false rape accusations. Many girls drink too much, hook up with a guy, and regret their actions the next morning. Because we can’t expect girls to be held accountable for their actions, especially on a college campus where it is well known that 1 in 4 women are assaulted every second, girls must be afforded the option to signal to the world that they are not sluts.

In these cases, girls are able to have all the fun of parting, drinking, and hooking up with none of the social repercussions or guilt. What seems more appealing to a girl: Getting drunk, hooking up, and being called a slut, or getting drunk, saying she was raped, and then being called a hero?

Moreover, while our degenerate culture has done its best to scrub the guilt of being a slut from the minds of girls, they still feel this innate guilt when sleeping around. They then reconcile their guilt and desires by projecting it onto a man and claiming that he forced her to do something she did not want to do.

In sum, multiple incentives exist for girls to use the tool of a false rape accusation. First, they can use it as a weapon to ruin a man's life if they feel he deserves it. Second, they can use it as a method to garner large amounts of attention. Third, they can make a false rape accusation to boost their social status in an era of victimhood culture. And finally, they can avoid feeling like a slut by claiming that a man made them do something they didn't want.

The rewards of a false rape accusation for women show no signs of disappearing, so stay vigilant.

Why We Should Expect The Rise Of A Caesar This Century

April 9, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

As previously pointed out in this article about Oswald Spengler's astonishingly accurate predictions for the Western world made a century ago, we are currently in the Winter of a declining Western civilization. Liberalism, enabled by economic interests that have corrupted the political structure, is attempting to destroy the foundations the society was built on in search of the civilization's ultimate unattainable goal: a socialist Utopia.

Liberal fascism has increasingly dominated Western government; the foundations of the society are being torn down

If Western civilization survives the onslaught of the left, there will be an iron-fisted response to suicidal liberalism coming by the end of this century (perhaps sooner) as predicted in Spengler's book. We are perhaps seeing the first stirrings of this sentiment with the Trump candidacy. Spengler called it Caesarism—the victory of bloody politics of force over a corrupt democracy run by a moneyed elite.

New Vs. Old

Spengler noted that in every past high culture, the new eventually tries to destroy the old. This conflict reaches a crescendo at the end of a civilization. We can see this unfolding in the West with factions trying to destroy the traditions it was founded upon. The goal of a socialist Utopia, to Spengler, is Western civilization's longing to fulfill its central idea that has motivated it for the last 1,000 years: the quest for infinity. It would represent the ultimate triumph of mankind over nature to achieve this; however nature does not operate in a vacuum. Each victory of man leads to a defeat in some other area in his struggle against nature.

This conflict between new and old, Spengler thought, happens as a key development in the evolution of a high culture, as it moves from the Spring and Summer Culture phases to the Autumn and Winter Civilization phases. A society stops looking for intrinsic fulfillment and increasingly turns to extrinsic fulfillment. Instead of tradition and ideals, the society turns to a life guided by economics and politics.

The Civilization phase represents the victory of extrinsic reason, economics, and urban life over intrinsic tradition and religion. Spengler maintained that a culture like Faustian (Western) culture would become ever more materialistic, over analytical, and irreligious as it moved through the Autumn and Winter of its evolution. It has become obvious that sacrificing one's entire life to become a machine of economic growth is one of the reasons the West has lost the culture it was founded upon and now worships at the altar of consumerism and materialism. However, the society cannot continue to exist on economic growth, materialism, and consumerism alone. It cannot exist without the simpler, more intuitive (and biologically essential—like reproductive) ways of life represented in the Culture phase.

As seen in the West, as the culture shifts from intrinsic to extrinsic values, people can no longer come up with a reason to have children and the civilization sterilizes itself. Children become part of an economic equation instead of an intuitive part of life. Most, if not all, of the values promoted by the modern left in the United States are representative of this conflict of new vs. old.

Chaos Ensues

As a sort of "immune system" response to the new trying to destroy the old, as in the case with modern liberalism trying to take fascistic control of the West and destroy everything it was built upon, a society will eventually look for a strong man to solve problems that its democracy cannot. As the old ways are threatened, traditionalists and conservatives will become desperate to survive.

The Enlightenment ideals of “Liberté, égalité, fraternité” are already beginning to break down as the checks and balances of a democratic system interfere with one another to create political polarization. Also, the ethnic groups that created Western civilization are being demographically replaced by foreign populations who have very different ways of life. The conflict between these ethnic groups—the native Western population and the immigrants who are replacing them—and liberalism destroying the traditions of the society will make compromise increasingly hopeless. The left will try to force its views on the right, and the State will become increasingly tyrannical in order to enforce these laws.

Those on the left are “Philistine World Improvers” in Spengler’s literature. By imposing fascist leftism on everyone, they are suffocating individualism and creativity with the power of the state. This is leading to an increasingly childlike population beholden to the state, and the death of freedom and tradition.

“New” liberalism attempts to extinguish “old” traditions the society needs to survive

Spengler’s predictions tell us traditionalists and conservatives will respond with anti-intellectualism which will push back against the academic left, which now dominates Western society’s educational institutions. Traditionalists and conservatives will also begin promoting a second religiousness, and assembling private, mercenary armies.

Multiculturalism and diversity will be discredited as ethnic tensions increase, and whites are increasingly scapegoated for all the ills in society. Tensions between groups supporting the new versus the old (liberalism versus conservatism) will lead to the breakdown of democracy. Each group will begin to look out for its own best interest instead of the good of the society as a whole. As chaos results, people will demand the corrupt, broken democracy be destroyed and replaced by a strongman.

Hail Caesar

Caesarism is a civilization’s way of restoring itself, an immune response to runaway liberalism. As Western civilization is crippled by economic powers ruling the political structure instead of ideals and liberalism debasing the society, the traditional, conservative population which forms the foundation of the West will become increasingly desperate to survive.

Will a Caesar come along and smash the rotten edifice of democracy this century? Spengler thought so

Indeed, the tendency (especially over the last 50 years) in American politics has been towards increasing power in the hands of one man. This concentration of power in the executive branch is escalating now that squabbling factions within the democracy are rendering Western governments increasingly ineffectual.

As confidence in in the state continues to decline, the final shift to Caesarism will be realized when armies shift their allegiance from the state to a charismatic strongman who promises reform and swift and decisive action. As Spengler put it:

> The choice is not between this, or that; but doing the necessary. The alternative is chaos.

Professor Thomas Sunic ties the predicted shift to Caesarism with the deep corruption in democracy as it is hijacked by a moneyed elite:

> Spengler contends that the rise of Caesarism must be viewed as a natural fulfillment of the money-dictatorship as well as its dialectical removal.

Another historian who calls himself Galteeman summarizes the shift to Caesarism:

> People become increasingly aware that their “democracy” is not that at all and is in fact a sort of plutocracy where the strings are being pulled by the richest behind a facade of cynical self aggrandizing opportunists posing as statesmen, whose real purpose is the accumulation of power for power itself and treating politics as a sort of game to be indulged in for the pleasure of it.
> The parties on the ballot paper are mirror images of each other, peopled as they are by cynical game players who can be bought by the money men, be they socialist or conservative their “policy differences” are mere window dressings and the true policies are in essence the same for both sides, the continuation of the status quo and victory for the personal, financial and power gains and “jobs for the boys.”
> The masses, aware of their powerlessness resort to a purely passive role as spectators of the suffering of others on TV so long as it doesn’t affect them directly. They are supplied with a reasonable standard of living and shallow entertainments (bread and circuses) in return for keeping their heads down and > their mouths shut, and for going along with the status quo at election time or abstaining as more and more do.

> In any case the “free media” which goes along with democracy is essentially in the power of money also and increasingly resorts to a sloganeering form of ranting, whether either right leaning or left leaning it is just another form of entertainment to titillate the viewers without any real substance.
> Slowly the cynicism builds and builds until one day, sick to the teeth of the corrupt, bogus and empty institutions of state and the utter meaninglessness of a isolated and empty existence, the people cry out for a savior in the form of a great and heroic leader who will smash the rotten edifice of democracy and purify the world.
> Hail Caesar!

The Struggle Continues

As Spengler saw it, the idea of a Utopia like the one envisioned by today’s left is ridiculous. To him, life is about struggle and man’s Will to Power: his ability to impose his will creatively or destructively. Civilization only dulls his true nature. He viewed optimism about man’s condition as cowardice.

Lothrop Stoddard, Harvard academic later labeled “racist” had this to say about the optimism of equality:

> The idea of “Natural Equality” is one of the most pernicious delusions that has ever afflicted mankind. It is a figment of the human imagination. Nature knows no equality. The most cursory examination of natural phenomena reveals the presence of a Law of Inequality as universal and inflexible as the Law of Gravitation.
> Thus, we see that evolution means a process of ever-growing inequality. There is, in fact, no such word as “equality” in nature’s lexicon. With an increasingly uneven hand she distributes health, beauty, vigor, intelligence, genius — all the qualities which confer on their possessors superiority over their fellows.

In this view, the arrival of a Caesar as democracy crumbles returns a society to its natural state: Dominance hierarchies.

> The Heroic Vitalists [like Nietzsche who influenced Spengler] feared that the recent trends toward democracy would hand over power to the ill-bred, uneducated, and immoral, whereas their belief in a transcendent force in nature directing itself onward and upward gave some hope that this force would overrule in favor of the strong, intelligent, and noble.

It may well be that there is no alternative to a Caesar if the West wishes to survive. Given the choice between Caesarism or chaos and destruction at the hands of the socialist left, people will choose order even if it is given to them by a dictator.

3 Things You Must Do If Donald Trump Is Assassinated

The danger of Donald J. Trump or his supporters being seriously injured or killed is very real. At a minimum, you need to have a basic contingency plan for if things go south. Trump may be a political candidate, celebrity, and billionaire vehemently hated by liberals, but if he were to be assassinated, it would be an unprecedented event in the modern political climate. If it happens, leftwing luminaries and the media will be shown to have no control over their supporters, despite them stoking the very same hatred that ended up killing him. The prospect of semi-anarchy in that situation is very likely.

Already, violent mobs descended on Trump's rally in Chicago. Psuedo-journalist Michelle Fields accused Trump's campaign manager Corey Lewandowski of assault in a bid to stir up white knight antipathy against The Donald and even violence. Protestors in Arizona blocked highways and then complained about being "run over." The list goes on.

In light of these very angry leftist zombies hellbent on destruction, here are three ways to respond if Trump is taken out by them:

1. Get a gun for self-defense

You may need one of these when times are rough.

Protecting yourself and your family will be paramount if Trump is assassinated, especially if you have not associated yourself with any leftwing cause. “Donald Trump said things we didn’t like and someone rightfully killed him for it” is going to be the general excuse if the Presidential candidate is assassinated. And this portends very badly for those who supported him, whose safety is never going to make the six o’clock news. It is up to you to help secure yourself and those you love, including with legal firearms.

Sadly, it is endemic to our age that such a low bar for liberal violence has been approved. In Chicago, leftwing hate groups insisted that free speech and freedom of assembly are rights reserved only for people like themselves. We had fists in this case, but expect far more lethal means going forward. Police forces across the United States have engaged in extensive layoffs over the last eight or so years since the Global Financial Crisis; do not expect the authorities to be able to help you. We value their service, yet they are beyond overworked in 2016.

For initial insights into the world of firearms, I recommend my colleague Luke Stranahan’s pieces, notably his guide to buying your first gun. But be sure to familiarize yourself with your state gun laws. From safe storage requirements to conceal and carry provisions, jurisdictional differences do matter.

2. Have two months’ savings plus supplies to ride out political instability or economic depression

You can start much smaller than this. What's important, though, is that you actually start.

America is a social and economic tinderbox. You need to be materially prepared in terms of food, physical money, and basic medicines for the panic and craziness that will follow an attack on Trump. US government debt is currently at 20 trillion, significantly higher than annual GDP. Liberals and others, although most do not know it, need the crisis of something like an assassination on a controversial conservative figure to absolve themselves of the financial mess they have helped create. So what happens to you? Do you have food and other supplies to ride out the day, let alone the week?

Even without the provocation of an assassination of Trump, the country would have remained in the doldrums without someone like him taking charge. Yet with an assassination, things will get very bad very quickly. Violence against Trump's person will beget more criminal acts against his supporters and those aligned even moderately with him (i.e. the Republican Party). Plus resources needed for survival will be quickly snapped up or plain stolen in what is left of the marketplace.

Aim to have two months' salary or more, plus basic foods and other supplies, in reserve to tide you over. If you lack this base at present, build it up over time, regardless of whether Trump ends up being assassinated or not. Obviously you will not spending on certain normal things like the internet and pub drinks when a crisis explodes, so being two regular months ahead will potentially buy you much more time than eight or nine weeks.

It up to you to decide what you need, reflecting your area's climate, demographics, geography, and other features. Clear essentials include non-perishable food, sufficient clothing to brave the elements, one or two power generators, a first aid kit, and things like flashlights and matches. Be particularly focused on vulnerable members of your family and immediate social circle, such as young children, the elderly, and the sick or disabled.

3. Have social and political backup

Laugh at them all you want, but I'd sooner trust myself with this older group (and the youngster) than a bunch of young men who only just met.

Apparent true believers can always be frauds, but your best bets in a time of crisis like the aftermath of Trump's assassination will be like-minded people. The media will not bother to help you or others in your situation and in all likelihood relishes the prospect of not covering the violent threats or acts that come your way. As I have already said, US police departments have been ravaged by underfunding, making it extremely shortsighted to rely on them for safety.

Organizations such as (conservative) churches, gun clubs, informal Tea Party groups, neighborhood watch programs, and veterans' associations are some of the social communities that can provide you with support and companionship during difficult times. You should by no means think that everyone in these contexts is either a Trump sympathizer or reliable, but on the whole they are far more trustworthy than the public at large. Think of other options you may have in lieu of the ones I have mentioned. You know your own community better than I do.

These contacts are best arranged before shit goes down. So take the initiative now and either get involved for the first time or become re-involved with groups that you not only can draw assistance from in times of need, but with which you agree ideologically. The safety factor is joined by the need for Trump supporters to carry on his ideals after he is gone. Inasmuch as Trump has a commanding personality, his resonance with voters reflects deep-seated values and ambitions for America which are not unique to him.

People mistakenly believe that planning for political emergencies or disasters in your country is a sign of paranoia, not to mention outright psychosis. However, these are the same people who have never had to live through such turmoil. Our world is well overdue for the sort of existential crises that faced our grandparents and great-grandparents. The real fear and mental illness comes from the SJWs trying to desperately shut down alternative viewpoints.

Naturally, we do not want a violent series of events centered on the death of Donald Trump to instigate mass political and social instability. Rather, we want Trump to triumph and bring back the sort of leadership that existed prior to the onslaught of political correctness and social justice activism. This is by no means a foregone conclusion, however. Trump has significant numbers of bitter and sniping enemies. We should support him to the best of our ability, but be ready to protect ourselves and what he stands for in his absence.

It is better to be prepared to live than to have no plan and perish.

5 Hard Lessons From The Downfall Of MMA Pioneer Mark Kerr

April 10, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Today's article is something I've never done before on this site: it's a film review-and more accurately, the lessons that can be learned from this film. The Smashing Machine is a documentary about a specific person, a person that is very well known to old-school Mixed Martial Arts fans. For the other 90% of the readers, allow me to introduce you to Mark Kerr (he's the featured image), two-time UFC champion and, for the majority of the Clinton years, probably the most terrifying human being on the planet.

A former collegiate wrestler, Mark Kerr entered the fledgling sport of MMA during it's "outlaw" years, quickly establishing himself as a name fighting in both Brazil (winning the World Vale Tudo Championship '97 with a broken hand, palm-striking his way to victory in a tournament where one of his opponents actually tried to run from the ring), the UAE (winning the Abu Dhabi Combat Championships gold medal thrice) and the USA (Winning the UFC 14 and 15 tournaments later that same year).

Within four years, Mark Kerr's career and life would enter a precipitous downfall that he has not yet recovered from—his previously undefeated record quickly amassed 11 losses, and his Herculean physique quickly atrophied into what can only be described as a dad bod.

How could this negative change have occurred so quickly? The 2002 documentary The Smashing Machine elucidates, and provides "copybook heading" lessons for both the professional and amateur athlete, as well as men in general.

1. Fighting and competition can both create and destroy you

The opening narration, from the subject of the documentary, offers immediate corroboration:

> The second the bell rings, you can look at some guys and see they're terrified…I developed the reaction to be angry at a punch, to want to get them back, instead of running away…when you feel a man wither away, it's pretty powerful.

> You start out having fun, having this animal instant take over. And then you're left holding nothing-at that point, you ask me why I'm in it, and I didn't know.

The film goes on to explain that fighting in vale tudo started out as a necessity for him. As a former collegiate wrestler, there wasn't much employment available for his skill set. Having decided on this career path, Mark spends the weeks leading up to his debut (the Brazilian tournament) in a state of mild terror, before this anxiety melts away as soon as the bell rings, projecting itself onto his opponents.

I, of course, am not a professional fighter, nor have I ever been. But, having done a couple of amateur fights, a few unsanctioned fights, and many a spar, I can indeed confirm that this sort of emotional mixture is typical. No matter how many times you fight, you will be nervous before a fight that is "for real," your amygdala and adrenaline glands will take over and produce a low burn of anger in the midst of the fight, and you will experience either a massive high or an abyssal low afterwards, depending on whether you won or lost. I can only imagine how amplified these effects would be in front of a crowd of 30,000 people.

The emotional turmoil of combat can catch many unprepared (I've personally seen people who win fights vomit afterwards, due to the sheer stress of it all), and this leads to the second lesson to be learned:

2. Emotional strength is just as useful as physical strength, if not more so

The documentary starts off with very stark, minimalist music, non-verbally telling you that this won't be a very happy film. Indeed, a major theme of the film is Kerr's emotional fragility, in marked contrast to his monstrous physical ability.

The term "emotionally fragile" should not be taken to mean "cowardice." It should be reiterated that in his debut as a shootfighter, Mark Kerr won an eight-man tournament, beating three men in one night, the last of these in a 30 minute slog with a broken hand. These are plainly not the actions of a coward.

Oddly, it is only after this tournament that we begin to see cracks in his mighty facade: he admits that he starts to feel apprehension after recovering from his injury "…so to take the edge off, you take the shit you don't want to do," utilizing painkillers before matches to boost his pain tolerance. It's worth pointing out that 1990s MMA had, essentially, no drug testing at all, and Kerr was hardly unique in this.

Arguably more damaging to his career than his fear of injury was his emotional neediness—early on, it is established that he is estranged from his family, and is emotionally supported only by his girlfriend Dawn: "If our relationship doesn't exist… on some level, I don't have any family." But as the film goes on, it's clear that their relationship is not so clean-cut.

3. Women can hurt you and distract you from your purpose

This is, of course, something that most of us on this web site are well aware of, but this documentary shows one of the purest examples of it occurring. In the 90 minute running time, we see Dawn admitting that they were out partying and using various controlled substances a week before a fight (which ultimately ended up being his first loss, later ruled a no-contest), before she essentially admits that her drug use is enabling her boyfriend.

Furthermore, later in the film she exposes her own jealousy and clinginess towards Mark: “He needs me bad, and now there’s a lot of influences in his life other than me, and it’ll require patience from me. Because I’m jealous at times…my biggest fear, now that he’s sober, is having him not love me anymore.”

Note that at no point in this talking head segment does she voice concern about her boyfriend who, let me remind you, is a drug-addicted emotional trainwreck who is also a professional fighter that, in his own words, needs the help: “I want somebody to be there with me, not at the high, but at the depression.”

4. Use drugs sparingly, and needles never

This one needs little explanation: This film shows plenty of the ill effects of drug use: potential overdose, exacerbation of mental issues, and eventual dad bod. While I admit I'm no pharmacologist—the hardest drug I've ever done was shrooms—it seems to me that injected drugs in general, and opiates in particular, will end up leading you to ruin in the long run. It certainly seems more likely that this hurt him more than the alcohol use he and Dawn are shown occasionally doing in the film's run.

5. "The best laid schemes of mice and men"

It seems for a time that Mark is making a comeback: he has broken away from the toxic effects of his girlfriend, he's gotten back into training seriously, and he appears ready for the Pride FC 2000 Grand Prix. Ultimately, he loses in the quarterfinals.

While I have always said that improvement can be made with effort, unfortunately, sometimes you can still fail due to some outside circumstances: in this case, exhausting himself against Kazuyuki Fujita and his Homer Simpson-esque skull. Bitterly humorous is the fact that the tournament does indeed serve as a redemption and comeback…but for somebody else, namely Kerr's mentor and training partner Mark Coleman, who gets about 20 minutes of screen time and, essentially, serves as a foil to Kerr.

The last image of the film is of Kerr's eyes, filled with anger and disappointment, before closing to black. A caption informs us that he and Dawn have gotten married. Since then, his former 11-0 record has become 15-11, last fighting in 2009.

No matter where you are in your physical training, from a total novice to a professional athlete, realize that, like the triumphant Roman would have whispered in his ear, you are mortal, and no matter how physically strong you are, your emotions, your thumos, can destroy you. While there are many ways to control your emotions, realizing the danger they represent is one of the most difficult conflicts any man can face.

The film featured in this article presents a man who is, frankly, more of a man than anybody reading this article, including myself, and who nonetheless lost that battle.

Swedish Feminist Loses Her Job Because Of Her Man-Hating Facebook Videos

April 10, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

EliSophie Andrée got a job as a receptionist at a physical therapy clinic in Helsingborg, Sweden. But when her boss, a woman, found out she had posted radical feminist "poetry" videos on Facebook, she told her to pack up her things and go home.

This story raises the question of whether should be able to fire someone for their opinions. On the one hand, it would be a fitting way to punish feminists for their hateful views. On the other hand, anti-feminist men have become targets as well, and at a much higher rate.

She got the boot after three shifts

EliSophie Andrée was happy about her new job at the clinic. She needed the money to go on a trip over the summer with her boyfriend. But after having worked only three shifts as a receptionist, the 19-year-old was fired. Her boss found out about her political views and decided she had to go. EliSophie told Sveriges Radio:

> She called me up and told me I was fired. I partly felt trampled on in patriarchal terms [emphasis mine], but also that you step on someone as an individual. And I thought, how many has this boss done this to previously?

The clinic is privately owned, and this could not have happened if it was run by the government. EliSophie said she couldn't understand that a female boss would do something like that. The employer, who wants to remain anonymous, defended her decision:

> The reason that EliSophie did not get to continue working for me was that I think her videos violate the ethical rules and that they can offend my patients.

Whether or not you can legally fire someone for their opinions seems to be an open question, with some experts saying it isn't normally allowed according to the law. But as I'm writing this, EliSophie is still fired and haven't pressed charges against her former employer.

Makes "poetry" about men having small dicks

I decided to watch some of this girl's videos to hear what she's actually said that was so terrible. What first strikes me as I enter her Facebook page is how stereotypically feminist she looks. Blue and purple hair, chubby body, and just a weird face overall. She describes herself as a spoken word artist and poet, and she calls her videos poems.

After watching a few of her "poems" I can safely say that it's the most obnoxious stuff I've ever seen. She tries hard but fails miserably at being funny. Her god-awful opinions include that men who won't sleep with transsexuals must have small dicks, and that men who want to talk about the fact that men get raped as well, are just trying to take attention away from women's issues.

In one video she claims she doesn't hate men. This seems to contradict all of the videos she's done where the one common theme is man-hating, where she lambastes men in general and makes fun of those who criticize feminism. I don't blame her former employer for thinking that this rabid young woman is not fit for a civilized workplace.

Hateful employees are bad for business

The interesting question here is if it's all right to fire someone for having the wrong opinions. If you asked me that without giving any particular context or example, I would've probably said no. I'm mostly concerned for the sake of anti-feminist men, not being able to speak their mind for fear of losing their job. Being politically incorrect shouldn't be a sufficient reason in itself to fire a guy. Ultimately, this could be viewed as a matter of freedom of speech.

But at the same time, it's obvious that having certain strong opinions can get in the way of you fulfilling your duties. Belief systems do matter. There are cases where some opinions should rightfully disqualify you from being hired. Hating certain groups of people makes you very unsuitable for doing jobs where you might need to deal with those people. An openly racist person isn't fit to work at a hospital, for instance. A nurse who hates black people can definitely not be relied on to perform at her best when a black patient is in need of treatment.

Many of you probably agree with me that racist views can't be tolerated at a place of business that serves customers of all colors. The same standard should be applied to radical feminists. Their man-hatred would ideally disqualify them from working at any place that's open to men. You can't count on them to treat men the same way they treat women, and chances are they'll treat men badly. That's not only morally wrong, but also bad for business.

In the case of EliSophie and the clinic, it was probably the right decision to let her go. But what would've been even better is if she had never been hired in the first place. Her Facebook videos are public, and anyone can easily do a simple background check on her. Now she's a martyr for those who think "the patriarchy" is out to get women.

Some advice to all employers looking to hire new staff members: consider purple hair a big red flag.

10 Life Lessons That Should Be Taught To All Teenage Males

April 11, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

My youth had been a disaster. I practically had no friends, people treated me like shit (and I let them), I never met a girl, I didn't do any exercise whatsoever, I kept my mind dull and numb, I was undisciplined with some embarrassing grades, and I accomplished practically nothing.

While everyone else was cheerfully living out their youthful days, I was shy, angry, and miserable all at the same time, all the time. I wish I'd had someone to guide me during this difficult period, but my father had problems of his own and I had no one else that I could look up to or even trust. I was completely abandoned in my own clusterfuck world of pain and loneliness.

And because of this personal experience, I have a soft spot for teenagers who struggle with life. And I write this guide for the young readers here who may be going through the same struggles I had gone through in this crazy world of ours.

1. Cultivate the three pillars of life

If you decide to ignore all the tips but one, let this be it.

The three pillars of life—in order—are: body, mind, and social. These are all basic stuff, but it’s often the basic stuff that teenagers end up neglecting.

With body, exercise and eat healthy. You must stay fit. And cut out all the junk food. You may not be so fat and unhealthy now, but it will accumulate and hit you eventually when your eating habits continue into your adulthood.

For mind, read non-fiction books to learn about the world. Those who don’t read non-fiction are like those who are blind or deaf.

And finally with social, connect with other men who share your values (I personally wouldn’t bother wasting time being friends with girls). A good friendship kindled at a young age can last you a life-time. Besides friendship, improve your communication skills by joining a debating club or toastmasters which will also boost your confidence. Or, if you happen to be an INTJ like me and think that everyone else is dumb and useless, learn to write instead. You’re going to need to communicate with people eventually unless you plan to live in the woods by yourself.

2. Small things will seem important while important things go under the radar

Due to lack of masculine guidance in our feminized society, you are most likely sweating over insignificant stuff like what other people think about you, the score on your biology test, and that girl you have a crush on whom you won't even care about in few years (although she may seem like the world to you now). Meanwhile, you're likely to neglect building a foundation for your future as you can't see anything further than what's right in front of you.

Remember that discipline is all that matters in success. So forget about all the small matters and dedicate yourself day in and day out into self-improvement—even if you don't see any immediate results from the get-go.

3. Screw your dreams, go for opportunities

No matter what your mom may have told you to boost your fragile ego, there is nothing special about you. If you happen to have an unrealistic dream like becoming the next big musician, the chances are, you won't. Maybe you haven't noticed yet, but the economy is in the gutter and the ~~SJW daycare centers~~ colleges that await you only want to rob you in exchange for a useless degree. You'll be lucky to find a decent job in the future when things will only get worse. As a little clue for you, I know a chick who graduated from Harvard who is now working in Starbucks. It's best to keep your options open and diversify your skills so that you'll be ready to adapt to the uncertain times.

I posted this video before and it's worth posting it here again:

And if you happen to be the one in a million who follows his dreams and becomes successful, this post shouldn't deter you.

4. Start developing useful skills now

There is no better time start learning something useful than today. And as a teenager, you have the advantage of time and a youthful mind at your disposal, so don't waste them.

Go learn to fix and build things, learn programming, learn to speak a new language, learn sales techniques, learn to fight, or heck, go learn how to skateboard if that's your thing. Start learning something now that will reward you for the rest of your life and stick to it, because when you're my age, you're going to wish you had listened to me.

Speaking of which…

5. Get off electronic screens

I would say the biggest mistake I made in my youth was wasting so much time in front of television, computer, and video games instead of doing things that bring value to my life. I would also include spectator sports, porn, movies, smartphones, and almost the entire internet to the list of offenders. Not only do these things waste your time, but they also degenerate your mind and body. The faster you get rid of them, the faster your life will improve.

Really, get off them starting today and get busy living. And if you think I'm not being forceful enough, read this classic article from our archives.

6. You can become a man whenever you choose to live as one

Our society lacks the rite of passage that mark the transition to manhood.

Not so long ago, a teenager would become a full man as soon as he got a job and a wife. But that is no longer the case today. In today's society, manhood as a concept has been smudged out while some garbage, fictional phase called "adolescence" was invented to justify abandoning young men.

This, however, means that you are now free to be a man whenever you choose to be one. Being a man is all about character; it has little to do with your age or career. I've met some feckless career "men" in their 30's and 40's devoid of masculinity and I've also met few teenagers who were stronger and braver than the older men.

If you want to be a man, think, talk, and act like one. You don't need anyone's permission.

7. It's time to start taking full responsibility

One of the fastest ways to become a man is to start taking full responsibility for all matters in your life. No more bitching, complaining, and blaming others for your problems. You have to start making the changes that you want to see in your life.

People don't respect you? It's your fault for being a loser. A girl rejected you? Too bad, move on and improve your game. You're too "lazy" to do things because you don't feel like doing them? Is that even an excuse?

Remember, no one can "make" you feel or do something you don't want, only you can allow that to happen to yourself.

8. Learn to manage money

Dumb and impulsive teens are the biggest targets for selling useless, consumerist garbage as they are insecure in their pursuit for objects that convey status: don't be one of them. Learn to save early on by practicing self-discipline, and try to learn about how to make money as soon as possible.

9. Go against the current

The vast majority of teens today are bunch of smartphone-addicted, attention-seeking, ADHD fucktards. If you're a teen who managed to read this far instead of going TL;DR, then you're probably not too bad.

Just about the only thing I managed to "accomplish" when I was a teenager was to not get sucked into the teen culture of partying, drinking, doing drugs and other retarded shit (not to mention their obsession for gayass music and fashion). Most of your clueless peers will only likely have negative influence on you, so avoid them like lepers and avoid living like the turds they are. Stick to whatever decent guys you can find and get a mentor if you can. An older, masculine man is the best teacher you can ever have at your age.

10. If you're going through hell, keep going

Last, don't give up. Things may seem impossibly shitty now, but you have the ability to get through them and come out even stronger. I won't make bullshit promises that things will magically get better and that you'll live happily ever after, but you must fight through these crucial years of your life.

Yes, we live in an insane feminist society, but that can't be your excuse to lie down and not act. My life didn't exactly turn out the way I expected (and yours most likely won't either), but I managed to get through my teenage years—and the even shittier period of early 20's—and survived. I don't have a dream life now, but considering how awful it was before, I feel as though I managed to crawl out of a hell, coming out tougher and wiser than ever before. And trust me when I say that things could've been a lot worse for me without my determination to turn things around.

Much more could be written about this subject, but I must keep short. Let me conclude by saying that by focusing your life energy into each and every day without worrying about whatever goals you may have, you'll accomplish a lot more.

I have shown you the door, now it's up to you to enter it. Go ahead and kick some ass.

Should Flogging Be Reinstated As A Criminal Punishment?

April 11, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The contemporary Western prison system is a disaster. It is overcrowded, especially in the US, where more than two million adults are incarcerated—more than in China, which has thrice the American population. It is expensive: the incarceration of an inmate costs, on the average, between $20,000 and $60,000 per year, resulting in no less than $212 billion spent in 2011 (that is, in one year) to cover the judicial, police, and correction costs. And, perhaps the worst thing, it is inefficient at protecting the good people from the violent and the insane. These grow in "no-go" zones and pour from unprotected borders.

Recognizing the inefficiency of the prison system, some governments in Europe tried to change it rather oddly. It has been especially true in France, where a living leftist symbol, the former Guiana separatist Christiane Taubira, was appointed Minister of Justice to conduct an absurd reform. Under the pretense of jail overcrowding, and of a leftoid totem pole called "prevention," the sentences turned lighter: house arrest with an electronic bracelet in lieu of incarceration; non-application of conditioned sentences for the recidivists; no minimum penalty; no more searches at the parlor; early releases. As a result, chronic offenders were released and were not long to assault innocent people again.

Here I would like to consider a forgotten type of sentence: flogging. Deemed as "barbaric" and "old" by the progressive—who prefer letting free rein to the worst crimes as long as they can turn a blind eye on them—flogging has been used for ages. It has been practiced by a variety of cultures. When one goes beyond the haughty “but it’s the current year” prejudice, one can see that flogging criminals could actually be an efficient solution to a host of chronic problems.

1. Flogging is a real deterrent

No matter how powerful a gang leader is, flogging is the same to him

Individuals answer to incentives. Rewards and punishments are an important guide in daily life. Today, prison is a deterrent for normal, civilized persons, but it has long ceased to be for those who dwell in a thug culture. Thugs boast about their condemnations as if they were something to be proud of. In jail, they are surrounded with inmates who are just like them—in stark contrast with more civilized types who, to them, will appear as frail.

In France, prisons have become directed by gang leaders. These have enough influence on other inmates to have them rioting or pressuring a particular prison guard or inmate. Guards, whose testimonies make hair stand on end, have been forsaken by a bureaucracy that wants no fuss. They turn a blind eye on bloody settlements of accounts, on drug and cell phone trafficking. (In 2015, 30.000 cellphones have been confiscated, and that is but the tip of the iceberg.) Gang leaders keep communicating with their (anti)social networks from inside the prison. Islam has become prevalent to the point that 80% inmates are practicing Muslims: young Frenchmen, hopeless in such an environment, often convert, while Muslims and thugs feel at home.

Prison is still a deterrent for normal people. It ceased to be so for delinquents. Delinquents must be duly punished in order to be deterred. No more assaulted guards, no more gang leaders exerting underground power over jails and beyond, no more inmates feeling at home: just flog them.

2. Flogging avoids the “crime school” effect

In January 2015, these inmates from the Baumettes (south of France) published photos of themselves living like in a vacation camp

It is often said on the left that prison is a school for crime. Someone early in his twenties goes to jail for a petty crime, say, a nonviolent theft. Before jail, he may have been unruly, but the universe of crime was still something foreign to him. In jail, he meets with hardened criminals, chronic offenders, guys who have a lot of experience of crime and constantly talk about it. In jail, he hardens himself in order to survive, both physically and mentally. Once he is out, far from being cured of his criminal tendencies, he will often still be part of a gang or thug network and live in a culture of crime.

This is a valid point. But what do we do then? If we remain inside the left's usual walls, we face a dilemma: either those who commit unlawful—and especially violent—acts are let free, which allows them to reoffend, or they go to jail, where they harden as criminals.

Neither of these solutions is ultimately satisfying. On the other hand, being sentenced to whipping avoids both disadvantages. If you receive ten or twenty whiplashes, you will not learn to commit crimes, to scheme, or be pressured to convert to Salafi Islam. Flogging sentences safely avoid teaching how to be a criminal and merely teach not to be one.

3. Flogging is cheap and consequently fairer to the taxpayers

Rikers Island, the prison complex where one can find New York's most expensive apartments (Business Insider, "New York's Most Expensive Apartments Are Jail Cells," August 23, 2013)

The prison system is very expensive. Some inmates work, but what they produce is far from paying even a small part of the cost of the system they live in. The burden falls on the taxpayers' shoulders and contributes to the ever-growing public debt. Both ways, the average worker is ultimately the one who has to pay for it, even when he is a victim of the delinquents he isn't even really protected from.

Loading...

Having the victims paying for their assaulters is unfair. Having them paying for a system that fails to reform the criminals is even worse. A cheaper sentence would be fairer to those who have to pay for it—and it would benefit the nation's economy in the long run.

4. Delinquents could keep their place inside society

Flogging allows for a punishment without stigma and without uprooting: that guy may have committed a crime, he paid for it, won't do it again, and you do not need to know

If you get sentenced to years of jail, you will be separated from where you are used to live. These years will be a blank part of your CV. When you get out, if you evolve in a normal culture, you may have a stigma from your stay in prison and difficulties finding employment again. (If you evolve in a thug culture, your return will be celebrated as if you were a hero, but then you are unlikely to have anything good to offer.)

Flogging only takes a moment. It can be done discretely. Instead of spending, say, five years in jail, you could simply take some days off, then be back at work and resume with your daily life. No occupational de-integration, less space for thug culture, a system that punishes without destroying the social fabric.

5. No more corporations outsourcing their work to inmates

"Inmates' labor is a very good thing, it helps them being rehabilitated, especially if they spend many years working for me… I mean, working for society and their own improvement, eh eh”

According to Wikipedia,

> About 18% of eligible prisoners held in federal prisons are employed by UNICOR and are paid less than $1.25 an hour. Prisons have gradually become a source of low-wage labor for corporations seeking to outsource work to inmates. Corporations that utilize prison labor include Walmart, Eddie Bauer, Victoria’s Secret, Microsoft, Starbucks, McDonald’s, Nintendo, Chevron Corporation, Bank of America, Koch Industries, Boeing and Costco Wholesale.

A more precise article adds:

> Under current law, all physically able inmates who are not a security risk or have a health exception are required to work, either for UNICOR or at some other prison job. Inmates earn from US$0.23 per hour up to a maximum of US$1.15 per hour, and all inmates with court-ordered financial obligations must use at least 50% of this UNICOR income to satisfy those debts.

And though UNICOR was basically owned by government, allowing it to be the sole beneficiary of inmates’ labor, the company became gradually privatized. Corporate fat cats, always prowling for cheap labor and legal tax evasion—while the middle class is collapsing under the weight of high taxes, debt, and precarious work—became able to benefit from a very cheap labor. This is one of the “secrets” behind Walmart’s unbeatably small prices, which have driven more than a small business to bankruptcy whereas the average Joe was blissfully happy to consume cheaply.

“Nationalize losses, privatize profits”: this is what happened with UNICOR and the inmates required to work. Now, if there were less prisoners due to the commutation of prison sentences into flogging sentences, the flogged could keep working for a fair wage—thus benefiting themselves and other small-scale businesses as well—instead of being used as near-slaves for the global elite.

6. A Manly Punishment

Indeed.

Prussian officers used to fight each other in traditional sword plays. When their duels resulted in them being scarred, they were usually proud of it, as scars were considered as marks of bravery.

In the same fashion, someone having chosen to be flogged instead of going to jail, if one could choose, would likely have a healthier pride of his experience. Today, those who are proud of having been jailed are usually the kind of individuals who propagate a toxic thug culture. Instead, having been flogged would be a healthier source of pride: one would not boast about frequenting the aforementioned "crime school," but of having survived moments of intense pain.

Said pride would be fully compatible with the drive to behave well, as the proud flogged would also be efficiently deterred from straying again.

Conclusion

Due to the hegemonic progressive culture, flogging has been either deemed a "barbarian" thing of the past or is thought about as the prerogative of "backward" governments, like North Korea or Iran. Yet, this good old punishment has a variety of advantages which make it worthwhile to reassess. It is efficient, straightforward, and beneficial to the social fabric and to the economy as a whole.

If the delinquents and criminals were given a choice between jail and the flog, or if some of them were sentenced to mandatory flogging, they might be really deterred and would go back to work honestly; the jail system would be freed from its continuous overpopulation, and various breeds of corrupts or exploiters—gang leaders, corrupt prison guards, corporate fat cats—would lose some of their grip on society.

When we manage to get in power, we should really consider reinstating flogging.

How One Man’s Leap Of Intuition Led To A Life-Saving Discovery

Smallpox ranks among the world’s most terrible diseases. Over the centuries, it has killed or scarred hundreds of millions of people. It seems to have originated in the tropical zones of sub-Saharan Africa or India, and spread along trade routes to China and Europe. Virologists suspect that the disease was a mutation of a pox-like virus that afflicted domesticated animals.

Epidemics are recorded in ancient times, in the Middle Ages, and in the early modern period. But it was in the New World that it reaped its most deadly harvest. The disease decimated the native American populations of Mexico and Peru, and greatly assisted in the Spanish conquest. The Indians had developed no natural resistances to the disease, and were very nearly wiped out by it.

Experience with the disease had brought some progress in controlling it. In China and the Near East, it was known that exposing an uninfected person to smallpox scabs or pustules could act as some insurance from catching the disease. The Chinese method was to have a patient inhale a powder made from ground scabs; in the Middle East, a “wet” smallpox scab was rubbed into a cut in the person’s skin. This method came to be called “variolation,” a word derived from the medical term for the smallpox virus (variola).

Variolation was popularized in England and the American colonies through the efforts of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, a former sufferer of the disease who managed to cure herself. She accompanied her husband to Constantinople in 1716 and observed doctors practice variolation on patients. After returning to England in 1718, she worked hard to have the practice adopted, but progress was slow.

It seems strange to us today why it took so long for “obvious” medical treatments to become generally accepted, but it must be remembered that the medical field is an establishment like any other, with vested interests that can look on innovations with suspicion. We need only remember how long it took for the cure for scurvy to become recognized, despite the fact that sailors in the Middle East and India had been eating fresh citrus as a preventative for centuries.

There was a terrible outbreak of smallpox in Boston in 1721 that killed 15% of the population. The numbers would have been even worse had it not been for the efforts of Cotton Mather, a scholarly clergyman and amateur scientist. Mather personally vaccinated dozens of families, often at great physical risk to himself. The risk came not from the virus, but from attempted assaults on his person by uninformed people who distrusted the procedure.

But it would be Edward Jenner who finally brought the disease to heel. He did not “invent” vaccination, but he did figure out a new and improved way of administering it. Jenner’s discovery began, like many great discoveries, with an observation that not many had thought much of.

Jenner was a maverick country doctor and a man of many interests. He noticed that milkmaids in Gloucestershire often contracted a mild infection called cowpox from rubbing the nipples of lactating cows. Once the maids had cowpox, they never contracted smallpox. Could there be some connection between these two facts?

Jenner believed there was. The idea came to him that if he infected a patient with the mild cowpox, he could thereby safeguard them from the deadly smallpox. But proving this was another matter. Jenner did not have an advanced knowledge of the immune system or virology. He had intuition and conviction, and these proved to be enough.

In a risky procedure (done apparently without his patient’s consent), Jenner infected an eight-year old boy named James Phipps with cowpox. He took a drop of fluid from a cowpox scab on the wrist of a milkmaid named Sarah Nelms, and rubbed it on the skin of his test subject Phipps.

He noticed the appearance of the disease, but it went away in about ten days. He then infected the boy directly with smallpox. And nothing happened. “Several months afterwards,” he wrote in a paper published in 1798, “he was again inoculated with variolous matter, but no sensible effect was produced in the constitution.”

So the procedure worked. Jenner did receive some castigation for his human experiments, but the criticism subsided when the results began to become evident. Jenner’s method was much more efficient and practical than the old ones. Parliament in 1802 and 1807 funded him lavishly, and he set about eradicating the disease in England.

Smallpox practically vanished in Europe and America soon after, and its control is practically taken for granted in the modern era. Jenner’s discovery was relevant not only in controlling smallpox, but also for the practice of vaccination in general.

In May 1980, the World Health Organization formally certified smallpox as “eradicated.” This feat was due largely to the techniques pioneered by Jenner. We should note that eradication of a disease is not a permanent condition. If future generations fail to heed the lessons of the past, they will find smallpox—“the speckled monster”—more than willing to return.

The New Star Wars Movie Spinoff Reaffirms Disney's Hatred Of White Males

> This is a rebellion, isn't it? I rebel.
> — Rogue One character Jyn Erso, continuing the sad new Star Wars emphasis on "girl power" in a world where men do basically all the heavy lifting.

Rogue One, due for release in December this year, is the first of several planned Star Wars spinoff films. And, like its trilogy predecessor The Force Awakens, which Return of Kings boycotted, this new instalment reiterates Disney's hatred for white males. Unless, of course, they are cast as villains.

In The Force Awakens, for example, the only highly visible "good" white male character was Han Solo, who was a preexisting part of the Star Wars franchise and could hardly be replaced by either a non-white or non-male. Maybe I spoke too soon, however, because the new female lead of Rogue One is an obvious but very flawed attempted copy of the Han Solo template.

Rogue One tells the story of Jyn Erso, who, according to the trailer, is so rebellious even the Rebel Alliance apparently has severe reservations about recruiting her for a mission. Along with Hispanic Diego Luna's character, she assembles a group of Rebel soldiers and sympathizers (who are all non-white males) to steal the plans for the first Death Star. This group is about as white male as Mogadishu prior to the arrival of American soldiers in Black Hawk Down.

Band of non-white males led by a female? Oh, yeah! Now let's make the bad guys white males!

Those rounding out Disney's "screw white men" squad include Rizwan Ahmed, a British rapper of Pakistani descent, who plays Bodhi Rook and simultaneously fills Disney's Muslim quota. Ahmed stirred up considerable controversy with his 9/11-themed song about British police supposedly shooting "brown" people deliberately ten years ago. The song solidified his attempt at victim-status as a brown man himself, despite being a privileged Oxford graduate whose ancestors included indigenous elite stooges for the British in India. Asians Donnie Yen and Jiang Wen play two other members of the team, while African-American Forest Whitaker has joined the cast as what is perhaps best described as a non-Force using Obi-Wan Kenobi-style Clone Wars veteran.

The most laughable aspect of Erso's recruitment is that the character Mon Mothma, another female, describes her as having been alone since she was 15. Here we see another example of the canonizing of otherwise damaged women presumably raised by single mothers and who do not know their father. Despite every objective measure pointing out that girls who grow up like this are much, much more likely to be dysfunctional and grow up to be outright delinquents, somehow it is what makes Jyn Erso perfect for the job.

Meanwhile, the villains are all white men. Ben Mendelsohn plays a white cape-wearing Imperial admiral and Danish actor Mads Mikkelsen is rumored to play another senior-ranking officer of the Empire, particularly as a non-film Star Wars character has already been based on his likeness.

Why don't we see so many Jyn Ersos in our world?

Yes, because so many of the heroes you see in real world situations are female.

It is ironic that the two danger-seeking "good side" leads of The Force Awakens and Rogue One are female. Feminists like Anita Sarkeesian bellow for female representation in video games and other media, but they forget that in no sense are women even close to represented in real-life, life-endangering activities. As I have opined in at least two other articles, one about women and liberalism, and the other about a man who died trying to save his shit-testing girlfriend, women meticulously avoid trying to put themselves in harm's way to save other people, especially men. Jyn Erso is nothing short of a false mirror for what feminists think women are when, in fact, almost all of them are completely different.

The female warrior mentality that Jyn Erso is meant to represent is pure folly. As continental Europe continues to feel threatened by the perceived expansionism of Russia, it is men in places like Finland and Lithuania who are carrying the increased defense load. Some 900,000 Finnish men received conscription reminders last year and Lithuania, which had both a female President and female Parliamentary Speaker at the time, went so far as to reintroduce male-only conscription.

It is little wonder that women claiming an equal martial spirit for females have to resort to obscure figures like Boudica resisting the Romans or the supremely mentally ill Joan of Arc, before then supporting the invention of puffed up heroines like Jyn Erso and Katniss Everdeen from The Hunger Games.

When justifying the character Jyn Erso, it no defense to say that Star Wars is science fiction. Whilst the franchise's technology and the Force itself are concepts that have no direct parallels with our world, its higher themes, namely power, redemption, and sacrifice, reflect more concretely struggles we can relate to. Unless someone is brainwashed by the pernicious modern "culture," no one can rationally relate to a world where women equally shoulder the burden of self-endangerment, let alone take the lead in it, for some good cause.

What's Disney's angle?

So if Western countries must (over-)diversify their populations, media, culture, and films, why don't non-Western countries have to? Rizwan Ahmed's parents and Donnie Yen himself both come from societies that categorically refuse to diversify.

The Star Wars franchise's owner Disney is unquestionably championing women as something they are not amidst the cold, hard truths of real life. This fantasy portrayal of women will be very regressive for popular culture, ravaged as it already is, because the corporate juggernaut's share of the film industry is, along with Marvel's, so gargantuan. Expect much more of this claptrap to disgrace your local cinema screens.

Universities, which miraculously manage to still produce notable conservatives and other non-leftists, have been banging on the door with anti-white male "theories" for decades. Yet it seems that film and other entertainment mediums are finally closing the distance between themselves and academia with output like The Force Awakens and Rogue One. This development will be interesting to watch, as so many white male (or just male) celebrities have attached their public images to leftist causes, without ever having to lose something from their affiliation. They may indeed be feeling the pinch from this Hollywood feminist shift soon.

As we saw in The Force Awakens, the black character Finn became something of a fumbling parody compared to the "she always has her shit together" Rey. Likewise, in Rogue One, the non-white men are seemingly falling in behind Jyn Erso, with Diego Luna's character only nominally calling the shots.

All in all, Rogue One is just another example of women doing things in films they never bother to do in real life.

How To Securely Communicate And Meet With Thought Criminals

April 12, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Two massive outrages against us in the past six months shows that the establishment does not want us to organize offline. We're allowed to have a monitored corner of the internet to discuss most of what we want, but we cannot meet in public without the machine whirling into action to stop us. We therefore have to take our meetings underground and conceal them from the public. I will never again allow the enemy to get as close to us as they did during the weekend of the planned international meetups.

Two Communications Tools That You Need

Men on RVF have been meeting for years. This was primarily done through the private messaging system where personal email addresses and phone numbers were exchanged. Because of the additional heat that is on us, and the fact that messages sent on the forum are not encrypted, I no longer advise you to share personal details on the forum, even through private messages. Instead, you need to set up these two means of communication:

1. Burner email address.

Sign up for an email address that you keep sandboxed away from your real identity. Here are some options for your burner email account:

- Mail.com – doesn't ask for private information. Free.
- Openmailbox – similar to mail.com. Free.
- Protonmail – sign up may require a donation. Hosted in Switzerland. Encrypted.
- ShazzleMail – no server copies of mails. Smartphone only. Encrypted and free.

- Tutanota – encrypted and free.
- Yandex Mail – hosted in Russia. Free.

Google your burner email every few months to ensure that it is not linked to you in any way.

2. Telegram app for mobile.

Telegram is essentially a secure Whatsapp that features encrypted “secret” chats that can’t be deciphered from the cloud. It also gives you a username that allows you to communicate with others without them knowing what your phone number is. Choose a username that is different from your RVF username or ROK commenting handle since friends who have your phone number will be able see your Telegram username, and make sure that all of your chats are using the secret feature to take advantage of full encryption. The app is available on Android, iPhone, and Windows.

When you want to meet someone from the forum, share your burner email or Telegram username and then arrange your meeting. Telegram has the additional benefit of allowing you to create private groups to arrange meetings of more than two people.

It’s also possible to meet someone through ROK comments. In that case, set your Disqus profile to public so that men can vet you through your posting history. When you want to meet someone, arrange it in a comment thread by sharing your burner email. I advise you not to post your Telegram username publicly. Be cautious of unsolicited messages from people you don’t know.

Meeting In Public Locations

Arrange your meeting in a public venue of your city. Outside of international meetup day, we’ve never had a situation where someone acted as a poseur in order to meet with members. Nonetheless, you always have the right to get up and leave if the person you're meeting acts shady by bringing someone without notifying you beforehand or spending too much time on their phone.

During your initial meeting, don't ask overly specific personal questions. Examples…

Good question: "What kind of work do you do?"
Bad question: "What is the name of your company?"

Good question: "How old are you?"
Bad question: "What is your exact birth date?"

Good question: "What area of the city do you live in?"
Bad question: "What is your street address?"

Good question: "What is your first name?"
Bad question: "What is your last name… and your social security number?"

Good question: "What do you think of Kratom?"
Bad question: "What do you think of rape?"

Do not to take any pictures of the men you're meeting with and do not share details of that meeting with outsiders.

Establishing Trust

Trust is not automatic or instant. It takes many hours to get to know someone else and understand what type of person they are. While it's easy to fake a persona online, it's exceedingly difficult to do so in real life. It will probably take you less than five minutes to spot any poseur that you happen to meet, especially since male feminists have gay mannerisms, gay speech cadence, gay style, and gay hair.

The gay face of a male feminist. He was arrested while protesting our New York meetup.

One reliable way to convey trust with someone you're meeting is to have reputation points on the forum (or comment upvotes on ROK). It has yet to happen that a forum member with over 5 rep points turned out to be a feminist infiltrator. Therefore if you want to meet other men, first contribute genuine value on the forum or ROK.

If you have zero reps and a low post count, don't be surprised if senior members decline to meet with you. What benefit do they have for meeting a complete stranger who has yet to contribute anything to the community? Personally, I wouldn't take that chance. While you may be eager to meet other like-minded men, put in your dues first by spending at least three months building your reputation by sharing information that is difficult to fake by a poseur.

Personal Risks For Getting Involved

We are a counter-cultural movement. The establishment and its proxies (e.g. media organizations, Anonymous, universities, municipal governments, etc.) have done everything they could to shut me down and scare you away while linking our masculine philosophy to rape and evil. This is occurring because we've reached a point where our ideas are starting to hurt their agenda and narrative. Getting involved in our community may make you a target, especially if you ignore the precautions I've written above.

While I don't anticipate future worldwide mob action against us, I can't rule out an act of God that comes in the form of targeted hack attempts or government infiltration. It has never happened that men who got involved in a counter-cultural movement were not taking on risk, and we are no exception. Of course we can minimize that risk, but understand that the benefits of meeting men who share your "dangerous" beliefs comes with a downside of being seen as a thought criminal of the establishment. On the bright side, thousands of men have already accepted this risk, so you will not be alone.

Conclusion

The meetup outrage of February 2016 changes the protocol but not the mission. We will still organize and meet offline, but it will be invisible to the general public. From this point on, only men who are vetted by myself or someone I trust can lead tribes in their cities. These tribes will not be announced through the public like before and there will be no updated map showing their locations. You will have to know someone in order to enter or prove your alignment with our beliefs.

The establishment has shown that they can hurt us if our activities are public, so we're going underground. We will walk among them, meet under their noses, and they will have absolutely no knowledge of our activities, which will continue to be legal like it always has been. They may have interrupted our plans in the short term, but our adaption to their attack methods will ensure success from this point on. The fight is just getting started.

5 Reasons Why Learning Self-Defense Is Non-Negotiable

We live in a violent world. We have always lived in a violent world. We are a violent species. This is not bad or good, it is a fact. Facts, unlike opinions, have consequences when ignored. Like thinking that getting an education will provide you with a stable income or that treating your spouse with respect will keep her attached to you. Facts override opinion, reality overrides delusions and illusions.

Not understanding how to defend yourself in a violent world has consequences. Consequences that can often be far worse than not knowing game or understanding personal finance. Many in the Western world believe that we are headed towards a violence-free world. That human nature can be molded and changed. That our violent past is just that…in the past. Unfortunately this is far from the truth. America is an empire in the state of decline. A shooting star on the descent.

What does this mean for us? That we must prepare for the future. Regardless of whether we seek to rebuild Western civilization from the ashes or to simply “enjoy the decline.” Either way we must be prepared for what is coming.

Learning self-defense was something that humans have had to do since the beginning of time. Something necessary for survival. There was no choice in the matter. Either learn to kill or be killed. That was the rule. We live in a time where we can ignore rules for a limited time. But like stated before reality will reassert itself and often with overwhelming force. Like a dam breaking. Let’s take a look at our future.

1. Increased Racial Tensions

Humans are a tribal species. People will always trust others who are like them. Whether this is in political or religious beliefs or even more powerfully a person's ethnic makeup. Despite all the "progress" that has been made between races it has done little to quell the unrest between different races. Now, as individuals we can ignore this and be friends with whomever we want, but on a societal level it doesn't work this way.

You may not care about what a person's race is, but that will not stop that other person from judging you by your race, and you may be a target of violence because of it. This is only going to increase in the future. We are headed into an even more marginalized society thanks in large part to the progressive policies of the West.

2. Governmental Oppression

Ruby Ridge

In states of unrest, such as that of a declining empire, the governing authorities often push harder to maintain control. We see this in censorship, "safe spaces," and other policies designed to subvert dissent.

However, dissent can only be pushed down for so long before it blows over. Right now we are seeing "soft" measures of population control but we will soon see the harder measures coming out. And not only will these measures be used on rioting goons, but also on anyone who doesn't agree with whatever the puppet master's current narrative is.

A populace of the American founding fathers, Leonidas's Spartans, or Alexander's Greek army would spell death for the power structure of modern day Western society. Force can only be met with force.

3. Empire In Decline

America is on its way out with Western society close behind it. The vandals and goths are already among us. The barbarians have already taken the gate and are sacking the city.

The only way to survive in the midst of barbarians is to be a tougher barbarian. The only reason hardened street thugs listen to police officers is because the police officers have more force than then thugs do. Which generally means better weapons, better training, and the law on their side. The law would be meaningless without the batons and firearms.

As a matter of fact the only reason anyone listens to anyone is because of force. Ultimately all control is maintained through force. The only reasons feminists and other crazies can say and do the things they do is because the governing structure that defends them has men with guns who will ultimately uphold its power.

4. Corrupt Justice System

There is no such thing as a fair trial. The great thinkers of the West devised a trial system that got us close but now that system has been turned on its head. Example: You are attacked on the street, you press charges, but because of the perp's background you are painted as the bad guy. You get a slap on the wrist for having the gall to dare demand justice against an "oppressed" class.

You cannot rely on the justice system for justice. Now understand you must still act under the law, but do expect the law to mete out justice. You must take justice into your own hands. This doesn't mean become a vigilante.

Remember you must operate under the law.

Let's say you wake up one morning and have to go into work early. You hurry out to your car and as you place your hands on the car door you feel some at the back of your neck.

A man orders you to give him the keys. He pulls you back, keeping his knife at your throat.

You have two options.

Option A – Let him get away and hope that the police can locate your car and the man who held a knife to your throat. Then pray that he isn't a protected class so that justice can be meted out.

Option B – Pull out your Glock, blow him away, and then inform the police. Sleep like a baby that night.

5. Personal Responsibility

You are responsible for what happens to you in life. This goes against what we are told day in and day out but it is the truth. You're a kid who gets bullied. It's your own fault for not being tougher. You're a twenty-five year old virgin. It's your fault for not learning game.

At first this seems cruel and harsh. However it is anything but. You see when it's your responsibility than you can change it. The ball is in your court, you are now empowered. Self-defense is no different. Now while even the best of us can get caught off guard from time to time. This doesn't negate the factor that preparation and training can make a world of difference.

I have heard people say that violence is so chaotic that training won't have much of an effect, and I call bullshit. If it didn't have much of an effect then why has every military group that has ever existed trained, and continues to do so? Why do the Marines have Parris Island, LEOs the police academy, Spartans the agoge. Don't listen to these jackasses.

Training can mean the difference between life and death. Between peace of mind and a shattered psyche. Between sleeping in peace or waking up with night terrors. Do yourself a favor and learn how to inflict harm on another human being should the situation call for it. Learn a martial art, learn how to handle a firearm, and most importantly of all learn the correct mindset to be able to do all of these things when the time comes.

The human race hasn't changed in a very long time and we are not going to. Violence is a fundamental part of our nature. Embrace it, channel it, and be ready to use it on those who wish to use it on you.

How To Take A Beautiful Girl On An Instant Date

April 13, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Over the past few weeks I have written extensively about the art of day game—that is, approaching and attracting women during the day, far away from the bars and clubs where chodes frequently try their luck and fail. One considerable benefit of day game is that it offers a relatively even playing field in that a guy can approach a beautiful girl going about her business without having to pay a cover charge, buy expensive drinks or deal with cock blocks and other nonsense.

Another great thing about day game is that it allows the canny player the opportunity to take girls on mini "dates" there and then without having to go through the rigamarole of texting to set up the meet. Learning to initiate instant dates is a vital day game skill: once mastered, it will enable you to build up sufficient rapport to move rapidly forward through the seduction process.

What Is An Instant Date?

An instant date is what is says on the tin—it's when you meet a girl and take her on a "date" there and then. Simple, right? Yes, but as with many concepts related to meeting women, it can at first be counter-intuitive for men. We have been socially conditioned to assume that the "right" procedure is an exchange of contact details and then a parting of ways, followed by the arrangement of a date over text or social media some time later. Instant dates fly in the face of this, and can seem like an intimidating prospect, or even an impossibility, before you try it out for yourself.

Of course, most of the time you will be taking girls' phone numbers and contacting them by text later—this is how probably 80% of daytime pulls happen. After all, if you meet a girl on the train in the morning before work then you probably won't have the luxury of being able to go for coffee with her there and then. But if the circumstances and vibe are right then an instant date could really help you to move things to the next level.

The Benefits And Pitfalls Of Instant Dates

Say you use the tips in Roosh's book Day Bang to open a cute girl in the street. After having asked her where the pet shop is, rambled for a while and taken care to drop in intriguing big and small bait, then hopefully she will have relaxed, become receptive to talking to you and begun to show signs of interest. At this point you could run Galnuc, take her phone number, and walk on.

Another option is to take her on an instant date, perhaps for a coffee at a nearby cafe. In my experience, the benefit of doing this is simple—it will help to solidify the encounter in the girls mind, making it more "real." Make no mistake, guys can and do get laid from fizzy, two minute encounters on the street where telephone numbers are exchanged and contact is resumed later. But the danger here is that after the "high" of being approached has subsided for the girl, she will realize that actually she knows very little about the guy she has just entrusted with her cellphone number. This can trigger skepticism ("He's probably a player who does this all the time") or even fear ("he's a complete stranger"), making it unlikely that she will respond when you contact her.

A well-executed instant date can alleviate these fears. Talking to her for longer also allows you to show more of your personality and to make a stronger impression. Also, given how unusual instant dates are, it will also communicate confidence and social savvy.

However, instant dates are not without their pitfalls. If you are not a good conversationalist then there's a danger that the instant date could fall flat as you run out of stream, making things awkward. There is also something to be said for the archetype of the "sexy stranger" who sweeps in, obtains her phone number and then disappears. If you fail to maintain some mystery and attraction over your latte then you may find yourself being dumped in the friends box. After all, rapport is a tricky part of seduction—you need a bit, enough to ensure she knows you're not a serial killer and that you "get on", at least superficially. But too much rapport before attraction is confirmed merely leads to tepid feelings of friendship.

How To Initiate An Instant Date

Getting a girl to go on an instant date with you is actually not that difficult, provided your approach and chat has gone well and she doesn't have to be somewhere in the next half hour or so.

Hopefully you will have internalised and followed Roosh's advice from Day Bang, and so now you have a girl standing in front of you who likes you. At this point you're ready to pull an instant date. Here's how you do it. First of all, you should always remember to put in a false time constraint up front—after all, you don't want her to think that you may intend to monopolize her whole day at this stage. I usually say something like this:

"Listen, I've only got twenty minutes before my next meeting…"

[That way it sounds casual and not too binding.]

"…But I was going to grab a coffee at Barista Heaven down the street. You should come."

The idea is to make the proposition sound very casual, but at the same time you should ensure you sound gently commanding. What I mean is, better to say "you should come" or "come with me" rather than asking her with a weak "would you like to come with me."

If you can make the instant date sound off the cuff and fun, but ensure that you are seen as leading the interaction rather than begging for a favour then you'll see more successes.

What To Do On An Instant Date

Where should you take her for an instant date? Well, for me coffee shops tend to be the default. While I would never take a girl on a “proper” date to a coffee shop, as it is always beneficial to go somewhere that serves alcohol to help lubricate things, in the daytime you have to recognise that suggesting an alcoholic drink may not be so readily accepted. I wouldn’t go for food—you then get into the issue of who pays, and some guys are messy eaters, and it won’t help your cause if you are too.

Once you’re in the venue, continue to chat informally without grilling her or asking too many “interview”-style questions. Talk about yourself, your interests and projects, but take care not to do so in a boastful way. You should aim to make her feel comfortable but at the same time you should try to retain a little mystery or edge. If you like, drop in very mild teases now and again (NOT so-called “negs”, but humorous, jokey comments) to show that you are an interesting guy with your own mind.

At the end of twenty minutes (or whatever time limit you set), look at your watch and tell her that you have to go now. Don’t let her be the first one to leave—ideally, you want to go slightly early so she’s left wanting more. Don’t tell her you’ll message her later, or make elaborate plans for the next date—leave her wondering when you’ll next be in touch, so when you do message she’ll be pleasantly surprised.

Making An Instant Date A Same-Day Lay

Occasionally, an instant date can turn into a same-day lay. This very much depends on the type of girl she is, the circumstances, how attracted she is and so on. There’s no single rule to tell if things are heading in that direction as there are so many variables, but if you sense a girl you’ve met that day through a cold approach may be down to take things further, then don’t make the mistake of bailing too early and losing an opportunity that may not arise again.

In a situation that looks promising it’s worth changing venues a few times, or going for a walk—don’t stay in the same place all day. If it’s later on in the day then at this point you can suggest an alcoholic drink. What you’re really aiming for is to bounce her back to your place—and of course there are logistics here in terms of where you live and so on. The best way of accomplishing this manoeuvre is to say something like “There’s this great movie on my computer you’ll really love—come over for a bit and we’ll watch it.” Again, the trick is to lead rather than to ask—doing so will give you an air of confidence that she will find attractive, even if for whatever reason she can’t come back with you on that occasion.

Roosh has some great tips on how to develop your day game in his classic book Day Bang, home of the “elderly chat” strategy and the now infamous “pet shop” line. Day Bang, which I have referenced throughout my day game series, is a 201-page book that solely focuses on approaching women during the day. Using dozens of examples, it teaches you how to meet girls in common daytime venues like the coffee shop, retail store, street, bookstore, and grocery store, among others. It’s available on paperback, Kindle, or ebook. Click here to learn more about Roosh’s book.

April 13, 2016 | by Henry Adollah | Link | Original Link

Last weekend I had to the opportunity to work as a brand ambassador for a company at Comic-Con in Saint Louis, Missouri. My job was simply to approach people and tell them about my company's amazing breakthroughs in research, but in those three days I made several observations about our society that explains why America is a cuck-nation. Now I do realize that the people that go to these types of conventions are a small sample size and do not represent all Americans, but what I saw can be seen pretty much anywhere else in the country

Grown Men Getting Dressed Up As Comic Book Characters

There’s nothing super about these guys.

When I was a kid, I loved Spider-Man. Every month I would ride my bicycle to the comic book store and buy the newest issue. I watched the Spider-Man cartoons and played the Spider-Man video games. I collected entire box sets of Spider-Man cards. I was very passionate about Spider-Man. But I did all this as a kid, and eventually grew out of it all as I got older.

At Comic-Con, grown men come dressed up as their favorite comic book or movie character. I saw men in their 40s wearing capes. I witnessed a duel between one man with a Harry Potter magic wand and another man with a lightsaber. A very obese man was dressed up as Nintendo’s Mario.

I can completely understand being passionate about a certain character. But what does it say about a society where grown adult men are still playing dress up and buying toys made for children? These are basically little boys trapped in men’s bodies.

Men Are Afraid To Touch Women

The classic double hover hand

Comic-Con is a great excuse for women to wear something sexy and go get massive attention. The most popular costume was Harley Quinn (because of course women want to dress as the bad girl that dates the psychotic bad boy, Joker). Girls were also dressed as the X-Men, Poison Ivy, Jessica Rabbit, and several anime characters that I'm unfamiliar with.

As these women are walking around the convention collecting attention, men will stop them and ask to take their picture. They won't ask to be in it though. They're just content with getting a picture and that's it. Several times I would butt-in and tell the guy "wouldn't you like to be in the picture? Give me your camera." The guy is happy to have his picture taken with a sexy girl, but then you can feel his awkwardness come out as he's not sure what to with his hands. Most guys just keep their hands to their sides. One guy even held his hands together, as if to make sure 100% sure he would not accidentally touch the girl. Then there's the famous "hover-hand" where the guy hovers his hand over the girl's shoulders or side.

I'm guessing these men are playing it safe by not touching the girls. With the constant crying about rape culture and the many false rape accusations out there, men have become too scared to touch women.

The Average American Man Is Content With Being A Sad Cunt

In case you are unaware of the term "sad cunt," it's basically what you call a man that has no interest in self-improvement. He doesn't work out. He doesn't further his education. He doesn't seek out to improve his status. Most of the men at this convention just do not care how bad they look. For them, it's just easier to be fat than to get in shape. It’s easier to just put on a t-shirt and sweatpants than to find a nice fitted outfit. It’s easier to just stick with the job that pays $10 an hour than to try find a better paying opportunity.

So when you have men that are content with being low-status, then it’s no surprise to see the kind of women these men will be with. Low-status men will have no problem at all being with a fat woman and taking care of her bastard children. Low-status men also have no issue with their woman taking her time to talk to another man in front of him. Women will have long conversations with me while their boyfriends stand idly by the side holding her bags, the both of us just ignoring him and not include him in the conversation. There were a couple of times where I had to ask the woman if that man was with her, because he was just standing there quietly waiting for her to finish talking to me. Women have no shame; they will talk and flirt with other men in front of their own husband if he allows it.

Boys Are Groomed To Be Gay

When your parents tell you that you are a strong independent woman that don’t need no man!

I used to think homosexuals were born that way, but today I think boys are actually groomed to be queer. Several people might say this is a silly opinion, but let me explain. When I was in high school I had zero exposure to anyone that was gay. I thought being gay was some weird rare abnormality. The first time I ever met a gay guy was not until college, and it was my roommate freshman year (keep in mind I graduated high school back in 1997). Throughout my four years of attending a university in North Carolina, I did not know anyone else that was gay. It really wasn’t until I moved to California for a job in 2007 that I began to see gay people all over the place.

This weekend I encountered so many young high school boys that were very effeminate. Boys are hanging out with girls, but instead of having sex with them, they are becoming like them. I just find it strange how I went from never seeing someone that is gay, to seeing gay people everywhere every day. It's like the cool thing now to be gay. I'm definitely going to put the blame on the liberal media, since they have constantly been on an agenda of normalizing homosexuality. What really shocked me was seeing a mom and dad walking with their two teenage sons, which were dressed as some female anime characters. Parents today encourage their boys to dress as women. My dad would have kicked my ass if I ever wore a skirt and a long pink wig.

Women Are Degenerates That Like To Dye Their Hair Unnatural Colors

I've said enough about the men, so let me make one final comment about several of the women that I saw. There were a lot of ugly women here, and for some reason these ugly women make themselves even uglier by dyeing their hair purple or blue, covering their bodies in tattoos, and piercing body parts that should not be pierced. One would think that an obese woman with blue hair and a pierced septum would live a lonely life, but somehow these ugly wildebeests still manage to find a man willing to do whatever she tells him.

In Conclusion

Based on my observations at Comic-Con over three days, you can see why I call America a cuck-nation. I know that the people that go to Comic-Con are just a small part of the American population, but aside from the dressing up as a superhero part, you can pretty much observe what I observed anywhere you go.

Go to the mall on Saturday and you'll see plenty of weak men walking around with their obese wives that have some purple or blue in her hair. You can pretty much see the despair in his eyes, whenever a young slim girl walks by that he could only dream about touching, as he walks hand in hand with his 1.5/10 wife. Go to any other convention where attractive women would be at, such as a fitness expo, and be prepared to count how many "hover hands" you see. Go to a bar and try to find one woman nowadays that does not have a tattoo. This is sadly what our society has come to.

Why Isn't Anyone In The Establishment Talking About Jewish And Asian Privilege?

When people of African descent speak to me about white privilege, it's one thing, however much I find the concept deeply flawed. But when Jews and Asians, two groups which earn more than whites, talk about it, it truly enters the realm of the absurd. These people are so institutionally oppressed that, on average, they earn more than the people whom society supposedly elevates to the most special of categories.

In recent times, 44% of Jewish households earned over $100,000 annually, two and a half times the national average and still significantly more than gentile whites. The "masters" of American political and social life, white mainline Protestants (pejoratively called WASPs), were only half as likely to be in this category of household wealth.

Similar privilege can be found amongst Asians in the United States. Asian-American men earn one-fifth more than white American men and Asian-American women are effectively at parity with white American men. In a recent article for Forbes, by no means a friend of ROK because of its biased "reporting" on our Star Wars: The Force Awakens coverage, Tim Worstall points out statistics showing that white men earn just 83 cents for every dollar earned by Asian men in America. Worstall drew his figures from Mark J. Perry, Professor of Economics and Finance at the University of Michigan.

If structural racism against Gentile whites in the United States is less than a thimble's worth or non-existent, how can two groups like Jews and Asians earn so much more than them?

What happened to context and reporting figures properly?

Nope, I don't. And neither do you.

Let's be clear here: there are millions of non-privileged Jews and Asians in the United States and other Western nations. Poor Jews and Asians share the same miseries as poor whites, Latinos and blacks. Yet this is precisely the sort of context those who claim white privilege exists refuse to admit or insert into their arguments. The white garbage collector from Staten Island somehow benefits from the same invisible force as trust fund baby Mitt Romney.

I do not dispute that Jews and Asians receive better test scores, grades and other indications of academic achievement. But why? Well, to start off with, their parents are unsurprisingly much more likely to not only have a good education but also a good job. The privilege this creates is no different from a WASP family who passes on their wealth and non-genetic family traits to their children. In addition, because of years of pseudo-moral arguments about "white racism," it is presumed that at least 25% of the rationale behind a white getting his job is based on his race, not his qualifications, experience, or other attributes.

Despite no evidence that Jews faced markedly greater social and economic barriers in the first half of the 1900s than Irish or Italians in America, who were the subject of repeated immigration control attempts by authorities, they have been elevated to a superior level of victimhood. Similarly, the internment of Japanese families during the Second World War is used to argue that America was and still is irrefutably racist, even during the 1990s, 2000s and now 2010s. This ignores the fact that internment was a fate faced by a number of German and Italian immigrants, or their first and second generation descendants.

Gerrymandering white privilege arguments

White male privilege in action.

There are a number of devices those believing in white privilege use to make their position seem more realistic. One of the most potent, as Seth Rogen illustrated last year, is to count Jews, whose phenotypes are usually white, as Caucasians:

> If you think there's some conspiracy against white people, you are, I guarantee, a stupid white person.
> — Seth Rogen (@Sethrogen) September 17, 2015

The benefits of this approach are obvious. If Jews are counted as whites, thorny questions about things such as their overrepresentation in higher education, including the Ivy League, can be averted. Harvard had a student body that was 25% Jewish according to 2013 figures. Yet Jews are only about 2.5% of the population and Harvard draws from across America, and even the world (the world being much less Jewish than even the United States). The numbers for Yale and Columbia were 27% and 30% respectively.

Leaving Jews to the side for a moment, Asians are around 4-5% of the US population and accounted for over 20% of Harvard College admissions for the class of 2019. People have alleged that Harvard and other Ivy League schools discriminate against Asians, requiring them to have much higher SAT scores and other measures than non-Asians. But if your race is roughly four times more represented at a place like Harvard, it is difficult to argue that racism is rife in the United States.

Again, in trying to refute the idea that white privilege is a myth, critics will no doubt raise certain aspects of US history, however far back into the past they need to sift. They will re-raise Franklin Roosevelt's wartime internment of Japanese-Americans (once is not enough, clearly), Sinophobia during the Californian Gold Rush, or the hostile reception meted out to Jewish immigrants to America in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, even though they had just escaped the pogroms of the old Russian Empire. And all this does not even broach the topic of slavery. Regrettable things have happened in America over hundreds of years, but the notion that white privilege is pervasive is no less a fairytale than the stories of Pinocchio or Cinderella.

These critics could also reference individual instances of racism in a country comprising over 300 million people to claim that racial bigotry and white privilege are rife. Whether through a swastika hoax in a university dorm or a random white man beating up an Asian kid, though, such assertions about society-wide hatred by whites and a system of privilege reserved for them are all drivel.

White privilege is nearly as outdated and false as the claim that the sun revolves around the world. It is nothing but a lie liberals tell their children and, worse still, yours, whenever they get their hands on them through popular culture or the education system.

Will A Crushing Victory In New York Reinvigorate Donald Trump's Campaign?

After a poor few weeks for Donald Trump's campaign, it looks like the Trump Train is back on track in his home state of New York. The Empire State votes this Tuesday, and polling shows Trump with a massive, insurmountable lead over opponents Ted Cruz and John Kasich. Indeed, Cruz—who had been touted as the candidate to unite anti-Trump voters after his victory in Wisconsin—is polling in third behind Kasich, with neither of them likely to win any delegates (like Wisconsin, New York divvies up its delegates according to the winner of each congressional district).

Much in the same way that Wisconsin's nicey-nice social milieu was hard for Trump to crack, there's no state less receptive to Cruz's revivalist preacher shtick than New York, his remarks about "New York values" notwithstanding. When Cruz and his wife Heidi tried to campaign in the Bronx last week, it was an unmitigated disaster: his town hall drew only a handful of people and his planned tour of a charter school had to be cancelled after students threatened to walk out. New Yorkers are too wise to fall for a con man like Cruz.

I've been on the ground in New York for the past week and having attended two of Trump's rallies (one in Rochester, another in Albany) as well as one of Kasich's town hall meetings (in Rochester), I can say that Trump has nothing to worry about in New York. Barring some kind of unprecedented voter fraud or meltdown on Trump's behalf, he will run the table here, putting him in a strong position to clinch the 1,237 delegates necessary to get the Republican nomination.

New York Loves Donald Trump

Despite New York's Democratic lean, there's a strong base of Republican support on Long Island and in upstate, the latter of which has been hit hard by the free trade agreements that Trump decries. Cities such as Buffalo, Rochester and my hometown of Syracuse were built on manufacturing jobs, most of which have been outsourced to Mexico or China. Combined with high taxation from the Democratic-controlled state government, upstate New York has become an economic wasteland, with countless people fleeing to other states.

It's no surprise then that the Trump rallies I attended in Rochester and Albany had a huge turnout. The Rochester rally drew about 15,000 people, with thousands more having to be turned away due to space limits. The Albany rally drew over 20,000 people, remarkable considering that the city is both the state capital (and thus quite liberal) and only has a population of about 100,000. Both events were a far cry from the Trump rally in Milwaukee I went to last week, which drew only about 1,000-1,500 people.

Not only that, Trump's New York fans were fired up to a degree I haven't seen at any Trump rally before, or any other candidate's rally. At both events, whenever Trump brought up Ted Cruz, the crowd erupted into a chorus of boos and chants of "LYIN' TED! LYIN' TED!", and Trump himself was far more excited and energetic then he was in Wisconsin. The number of protesters at both rallies was also small: only about a hundred each, and in Albany, they were deliberately placed in a tiny pen and massively outnumbered by Trump fans.

While John Kasich was able to get a decent crowd for his Rochester town hall—over a thousand, enough to force the community center to use an overflow room—many of them were there not out of loyalty to him but because a presidential candidate visiting Rochester was a novel experience. Given New York's status as a blue state and the fact that it votes relatively late in the primaries, this is probably the first time in decades that national politicians care what we have to say:

Even still, Kasich is a long-shot for winning any of New York's delegates. Beyond Trump's home state advantage, he's the only Republican candidate who is addressing the issues that New Yorkers care about: illegal immigration and trade. Kasich's phony "aw, shucks" persona and conciliatory, moderate platform might have been assets in 2008 or 2012, but in a year in which voters are demanding radical change, he's left out in the cold.

Rewriting The Electoral Map

While recent presidential elections have been fought under the assumption that large portions of America are too heavily Democratic (the Northeast and West Coast) or Republican (the South, the Mountain West) to be worth campaigning in, Donald Trump's entry into presidential politics stands a strong chance of rewriting the electoral map. In particular, he could win states such as New York and California that haven't gone GOP since the 1980's.

While the paid partisans of #NeverTrump claim that the Donald will lose to Hillary Clinton in a general election landslide, they're basing this on polls conducted well before the general election has begun. Hillary's advantage is almost entirely due to name recognition, as shown by the fact that she's lost huge amounts of ground to Bernie Sanders as he becomes better-known. In a general election, Trump's charisma and populist campaign platform will give him an edge over Hillary's hair of the dog leftism and horrendous personality.

7 Methods The Elites Use To Control Us

All societies are run by an elite. In the past, this elite was the hereditary aristocracy. Today, the elite are extremely wealthy globalists. Here are some of the techniques they use to stay on top.

The first three items in this list are items that we have little influence over. They are determined by the government, which in turn is wholly owned by the elite. In theory, we can change these through our votes. In reality, we have almost no influence on these policies.

The last four are also wholly owned by the elite, but our use of them is within our control. If we are being controlled through them, we have no one but ourselves to blame.

1. Violence

One of the obvious ways that the elite control the populace is through the threat of violence. If someone from outside the ruling class tries to gain entry, he will quickly find himself either killed or imprisoned. Virtually every ruling class has used this method.

The US makes abundant use of violence to enforce the established order. Frequently the force used is excessive. For example, in 2013 a dental hygienist named Miriam Carey drove to a White House security checkpoint. When an officer told her to stop, she instead tried to make a U-turn back to the road. Officers tried to block her and she took off leading to a car chase that ended when officers shot and killed the young mother even though she posed no real threat.

The state monopoly on violence is the most acceptable form of control. When used well, it preserves order without negatively affecting most of the people. It only becomes a problem when it becomes excessive.

2. Welfare

Governments have been using welfare to placate the unwashed masses for thousands of years. During that last days of the Roman Republic, politicians provided bread to poor voters in order to buy their votes.

Unfortunately, the vote buying scheme did not last forever. Once the people figured out that they could vote for “free stuff” for themselves, the Republic became unmanageable. After a lot of political upheaval, this eventually required that a strong dictator in the form of Julius Caesar rise to power.

In our own day, governments provide free food, housing, and even cell phones to the poor to buy their votes and keep them from causing trouble. Don’t think for a minute that when you hear Hillary Clinton propose another handout that she actually has a shred of concern for her fellow citizens. It is still a method of control and vote buying.

3. Taxes

Taxes used to really anger Americans

The elite use tax policy to prevent others from becoming wealthy and thus entering the ranks of the elite themselves. In the US, the wealthiest 1% pays very little in taxes because the majority of their income derives from capital gains, which are taxed at a much lower rate than ordinary income.

Ironically, Democrats who want to tax high wage earners in the name of “sticking it to the rich” are in reality perpetuating the entrenched elite of the super rich. To foster greater economic mobility, the tax system should be made less progressive with the goal being to lower taxes on ordinary income.

4. Sportsball

Karl Marx famously said that religion is the opiate of the masses. Perhaps that was true in Marx's day but it is definitely not true now. Today, religion plays a minor role in the lives of most people. Rather, the more powerful opiate in the lives of modern men is watching sports.

There are whole segments of the male (and increasingly the female) populace who spend Saturdays and Sundays glued to the TV watching their favorite college and professional sports teams. And it is not just mere entertainment. People take their sports so seriously that they may get depressed if their team loses an important game.

Sports are a multibillion dollar industry in the US and it is all put on by the elites who are wealthy enough to own sports teams. Even college sports are sponsored by the wealthy trustees of universities.

The way to avoid being trapped by the spectator sports distraction is to put it in its proper perspective. While there is nothing wrong with watching a game on the weekend, there is no reason to buy lots of paraphernalia or to waste time memorizing statistics. Why get emotionally involved over the battle of two corporations? Also, it is better to participate in sports directly rather than watching somebody else do it. That is also good advice for the next distraction which is…

5. Porn

Starting in the 1950s, pornographers waged a three-decade long battle to overturn or weaken US obscenity laws. They were successful. With the advent of the internet, porn became ubiquitous. While libertarians may celebrate this as the triumph of personal freedom, the reality is that it has become one of the most powerful forms of control of the masses.

I don’t have to tell any man how potent the sex drive is. We find the visual stimulation of porn extremely addicting. Some studies show that at least half of all men are addicted. I think the percentage is much higher.

Using porn is a huge time waster. Rather than accomplishing something useful, some men spend an hour or two a day trying to find exciting images. That’s time that would be better put to use lifting weights, learning a martial art, meeting girls, fathering a family, or starting a company.

But porn is more than a time suck. It also takes away a man’s edge. It tricks his mind into believing that he has become the emperor of China with 300 vaginas ready to meet his every need. In other words, using porn makes a man complacent. You can see this in the herbivore men of Japan who consider it easier to sit at home and wank instead of finding a wife or achieving great things.

Whether it was intentional or not, porn has turned into one of the most effective forms of control of the masses. If we are all busy spanking our brains out, we are not going to notice the fact that our government has turned into a plutocracy. We are not going to care that we are being treated like cattle to make our masters even richer.

6. Entertainment

The most popular post on my blog is the very first one I wrote. The topic is what I learned from watching the television show Naked and Afraid. While I think the post has a beneficial message, my weightier posts get much less traffic. The primary reason for the popularity of my post is because it concerns a TV show. Posts on ROK that comment on movies are similarly very popular.

Like sports, there is nothing wrong with enjoying television, film, or video games when it is done in moderation. But popular entertainment is almost always laced with messages that try to advance the progressive agenda. And like porn or sports, getting too involved with entertainment can blind us to what is happening in the real world.

How do you know if you are addicted to entertainment? Here is a simple test. If you are a grown man, and you felt a strong compulsion to go see the latest Star Wars movie, you are addicted to entertainment. The next time a blockbuster rolls around, wait until it comes out on video.

7. Social Media

When it is not being censored by the elites, social media can be an extremely powerful tool that we can exploit to bring back the patriarchy. Unfortunately, 99% of people don't use it as a tool for good. They use it to status whore. Women are the guiltiest users but men do it as well posting pictures of their scotch or barbecue techniques.

The best fix for social media is to use it with awareness. If you find yourself slipping into status whoring or getting involved with pointless arguments, drop it and do something useful instead.

Conclusion

Aristotle teaches that true freedom is not the license to do whatever we please. True freedom is the ability to act in accordance with reason. If we are unable to do what is good, we are slaves no matter how much empowering language we use to dress up the fact of our servitude.

Liberating ourselves from elite control may not topple them in the short term, but it will make our individual lives better. That alone makes it worth the effort.

4 Effective Throws That Every Man Should Know

April 14, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

So, we have now honoured the Chinese saying "Being far, you kick. Being close, you punch" with a few techniques to add to our arsenal. But no fighter is complete without using grappling techniques and throws. We will now observe four techniques that many martial arts consider essential.

1. The Burmese elbow toss

Burmese boxing or Lethwei is particularly efficient in a non-competitive environment as all its competitions are bare-knuckle fights. This move is one of their classics. Muay Thai also uses it extensively.

1. It starts with an horizontal elbow strike to stun the opponent or can be used after fading in front of a jab. At the end of the hit, you find yourself close to your opponent, with your body turned sideways

2. Your arm is now on the outside of the opponent’s head and your body bent away from him. You will bring your front leg on the side of his and block it. Your stomach is against is hip

3. While you use a reverse motion (like a spring), you will push his head under your arm and away from your body, while turning your hips. The opponent will lose balance and fall

2. The chidaoba hip throw (ura nage + leg lift)

This move is used as a side attack or a counter to an opponent that has his arm over your neck and attempts to throw you over his hip. It comes from the traditional Georgian wrestling called “Chidaoba.” This one is like a wrestling suplex but instead of being directly behind your opponent, you are slightly on his side.

Example of a classic Olympic wrestling suplex

1. It has a similar start as the judo throw “Ura-nage.” You are under the arm of the opponent, as close as possible, slightly under hip level. You start the movement by squatting with a straight back, exactly like under a squat rack. The hand you have behind his back rests flat on his hip. Your other hand can grab any part of his upper body (lapel, shoulder, side of the neck, etc)

2. You then drive him upwards with the strength of your legs and hips, limiting the strain on your own back. The lower you will go, the easier it will be to lift him. What makes this move particular is that you use the top of your thigh in addition to your hip as you are at the maximum of your extension

3. It has two purposes: helping with the weight of the opponent to make him fall on his two shoulders (maximum score in competition or disorientation in a non-competitive scenario) and preventing him from hooking his leg between yours to block the throw. Reaching the full swing of the throw, you rotate with your opponent to accelerate his fall with your own weight.

Here it is, perfectly demonstrated on an opponent 80 pounds heavier than the victor. The victim also happens to be the European Champion and the world bronze medalist in Judo.

3. The middle kick counter and inside hook

This movement comes from Combat Sambo. This is the most important move I have ever learnt and has helped me a lot both inside and outside the dojo. It is a middle kick block with a throw.

The block in itself is composed of three steps:

1. As the kick comes towards you, you must side step to absorb some of the force of the hit

2. From the guard up, you must intercept the kick at ribcage level, by passing your hand under your elbow

You will stop it with your open palm, to “cup” the coming kick. Too rigid, you will hurt your wrist, too soft, the kick will pass and hit you in the ribs. It must feel like a spring

3. You must then catch the foot under your arm and lock it tight under your armpit, before the opponent withdraws it

Then things become interesting:

1. First of all, you must grab the lead arm of your opponent and bend his chest towards the ground, to prevent him from hitting you, as you have only one arm free

2. Then hook his support leg from the inside while slightly lifting him to make it easier

3.You can then finish the move by using a leg submission on his Achilles tendon, stepping on his groin or carrying the fight on the ground

4. Tai Otoshi

This throw comes from Judo and the Japanese equivalent is “body drop.” Both legs of the opponent are blocked, which makes it harder for him to counter. Almost all of the martial arts that use prehension include this technique, which is proof of its efficiency.

1. The throw starts when your back is in contact with the chest of the opponent. You are either holding him by his lapel and sleeve or neck and wrist/elbow. This move can also be used after punching the opponent while holding him in a side clinch

2. You extend your leg (the one in front of the opponent) wide enough to block both his knees while you remain stable on your feet. It is important that you remain strong on your support foot

3. Finalize the movement by turning your hips and pulling the opponent towards the ground and the inside

4. Quite often, the opponent can cling to your clothing and bring you with him as he falls. It is not as bad as it seems as his body will absorb the impact for you, hurt him and put you in a good pinning hold (Hon-Gesa-Gatame)

Bosse et progresse

There you have it—effective ways to throw down your opponent and bring the fight to the ground. A good warm up is necessary before a grappling session and practicing throws is an excellent way to work on your cardio.

The next and final installment will focus on delivering the coup de grâce on the ground.

Has The Theft Of The 2016 Presidential Election Already Begun?

April 15, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

We are seven months from America's presidential elections. While as recently as last week, major media outlets were claiming that a Trump Republican candidacy was close to inevitable, and with Bernie Sanders winning seven of the past eight state elections, the establishment power brokers have gone into red alert and are scrambling to stop the anti-establishment candidates Donald Trump and Bernie Sanders. They will stop at nothing, including lying, manipulating, changing rules, stealing elections, and running alternative candidates at the primary. On April 10, 2016, three massive frauds occurred:

Election cancelled in Colorado; Cruz declared winner

> The people of Colorado had their vote taken away from them by the phony politicians. Biggest story in politics. This will not be allowed!
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) April 11, 2016

This past weekend, Colorado awarded all of its electoral votes to Ted Cruz, after deciding to cancel elections there, and leave the decision up to the Republican party power brokers. Donald Trump recently warned that millions will follow the example set by angry Colorado voters, who are burning their Republican party registrations, saying "To hell with the Republican party." Colorado is a forward-thinking state, with legalized gambling and marijuana, a strong economy, and is in the top 10 "nonreligious" states in the nation—making it a natural hotbed of support for Donald Trump and an unlikely place where theo-conservative Ted Cruz would gain much support. But a Republican executive committee panel, along with the state's elected politicians, decided to award all 37 electoral votes to Ted Cruz, voters be damned.

> This is happening all over our country—great people being disenfranchised by politicians. Repub party is in trouble! https://t.co/wNXRqVl9Uu

Election stolen from Sanders; more votes given to the loser Clinton

Sanders has strong grassroots support, but only among voters

On the same day, voters in Wyoming gave Bernie Sanders an impressive victory—56-44 over Hillary Clinton. However, Clinton walks away with 11 delegates and Sanders only 7. Why? Due to special caucus rules, the two candidates split 14 of the votes 7/7 and Clinton is awarded an additional 4 superdelegates, who have pledged to vote for the loser, Clinton, instead of the winner, Sanders.

Superdelegates are delegates who can ignore the voter's choice and cast a ballot in the official party primary for whatever candidate they want. And almost all of these superdelegates (over 93% so far) have pledged to support Clinton. Despite winning seven of the last eight elections in a row, turning out tens of thousands of grassroots protesters, and funding an entire campaign on small individual contributions, Bernie Sanders is trailing Clinton 1068 to 1756 (due mostly to the 469 superdelegates pledged to Clinton).

Paul Ryan Launching His Own Cuckpaign

What business does an American legislator have meeting abroad with a foreign head of state?

On the same day as Trump's and Sanders' votes were being stolen, the NY Times reported that cuckservative Paul Ryan visited the Israeli Prime Minister to obtain his blessing in waging his own stealth campaign for president. While Ryan is not campaigning alongside his rivals Cruz and Trump, he is quietly assembling the machinery needed to become a candidate at the Republican convention in July. Ryan is raising funds, writing position papers, and working behind the scenes to ensure the important people—the delegates, not the voters—will support him in July.

Dirty Tricks To Come

What can we predict for the future? The main goal of the Republicans will be first: to ensure that Trump does not earn the 1,237 delegates he needs to win the candidacy outright. In that case, the decision would be made at the Republican convention in Cleveland, Ohio in July. So, for the remaining three months of primary voting (16 states remain), expect more dirty tricks, lies, and outright theft. The establishment would love to repeat the tactics in Colorado where voters are not even given the chance to cast ballots, although I expect they are more likely to give voters the appearance of power, by letting them go to a voting box and marking a piece of paper, and then trashing the ballots and completely ignoring the votes at the July convention.

After ensuring there is a contested primary with no clear winner, they must also make sure that Trump does not win the first vote taken by delegates at the Cleveland convention. Rules for many delegates for them to vote for the person their voting base elected, but only on the first vote; if there is still no winner, they are free to vote for whoever they damn well please on any votes thereafter. So again, expect more dirty tricks, protests, distractions, obscure procedural rules, and lies which prevent Trump from winning the first ballot, so that his delegates can vote for Cruz, or Ryan, or whatever figurehead the party bosses pick. Another wild card is will Kasich remain in the race, and if not, who will he endorse?

Is Ryan running to win? Is he running only to split votes and prevent Trump from winning the first vote, so that delegates can later vote for a non-Trump candidate? Or does he plan to surprise everyone and walk away with the crown, without having to ever campaign or debate?

For the Democrats, their technique is more simple–just rely on the fraudulent superdelegates, who can vote for Clinton no matter what the voters say. Clinton needs only 626 more delegates, and there are 243 remaining superdelegates, which are almost assuredly going to vote for her. New York alone, where she was elected Senator, can award her 247 delegates, leaving only 136 delegates in the remaining 19 state or territory elections. We probably won't know who wins until the Democratic primary, but barring any huge protests or backlash, Clinton will be crowned leader in July at her convention.

April 19 – New York Primary (Proportional) 95 delegates

New York is Trump's home turf. Ted Cruz has made public statements attacking "New York values". If there is anything but an overwhelming Trump victory here, it's a clear sign of massive fraud.

April 26 – Pennsylvania Primary (Winner Take All) 71 delegates

Trump currently leading 42.8% to 27% Cruz and 24% Kasich

June 7 – California (Winner Take All) 172 delegates plus 4 other states

This is the final primary, and includes Trump strongholds of New Jersey and California. The independent minded and non-religious states of Montana, New Mexico, and South Dakota seem unlikely to vote for Cruz.

July 18 – Republican Convention Cleveland, OH

July 25 – Democratic Convention Philadelphia, PA

Tuesday November 8- Presidential Election

A good place to track the delegate count, along with poll numbers for upcoming votes is here (R) and here (D).

How Will The People React?

Are we too lazy to care?

With massive theft and fraud, including outright denial of all Coloradans to place a vote for president, except for between the two-sides-of-the-same-coin Democratic and Republican boss's picks in November, will there be massive outrage and protests? Will the public accept the fraudulent candidates of Hillary Clinton and Ted Cruz, or will they fight back? Will more theft and fraud be allowed to continue? One thing is sure. We will keep you informed on any suspicious activity and we will be out in force in July at the Republican convention!

4 Things I Learned About Free Speech From The ROK Meetup Outrage

I've now had two months to reflect on the outrage that happened against our community when the establishment attacked our planned meetups. Here is a video I made sharing what I've learned:

I will be incorporating these lessons into my future plans.

An Introduction To The Study Of Certitude (Criteriology)

April 15, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the men of ROK in the joyful season of Paschaltide. This week, we'll look ahead to the continuation of our philosophical series.

Though Cardinal Mercier's manual discusses Cosmology next, we will be proceed to Criteriology, or Epistemology. I have judged this to be the best course of action, because one of my chief goals in this series on philosophy, is to dispel the notion that man can never be sure of the truth he knows—this idea is central to our relativism, our nihilism and the thoroughly incoherent principles of Liberalism which pull our society apart.

I intend to demonstrate that man may have certainty of God's existence, and of many other truths as well; once these are known, we can confidently act upon them, dispensing with the rubbish that we are "imposing our opinions" on other people. We do the world a service in displacing the hegemony of Liberalism's absurdity with Patriarchy's hegemonic truths, for which the people should thank us (though I wouldn't hold my breath).

Sometimes people don't appreciate what you do for them.

In hindsight we will see that the West's late-stage Liberalism was just a rationalization employed to justify a more convenient neglect of truth. I believe some men proposed the incoherent principles knowingly, in an attempt to destroy the Christian order with goals of erecting another in its place; but the masses accepted it because it legitimizes man's general preference for inertia and soothes the conscience in its choice to be something less than it can (and ought) to be. For those who may object that this sounds like just another Liberal wish to "fix" the benighted rubes of society, I'll say that it is not, because we do not embrace the incoherence of Liberalism, nor do we attempt to make incoherence' "perfection" the enemy of incoherence' good.

I therefore don't intend to convince the masses through reasoned debate (nor should you), precisely because nobody accepts Liberalism on rational grounds, least of all the mass man; the favour shown to these ideas is rooted in vice and the deformity of the intellect through the passions. But for the men who are clawing themselves out of the pit, and who may form a future elite some day, or who at least aspire to be high-functioning members of a saner, post-collapse society, hopefully this contribution will serve as an elementary dose of cult de-programming from the Liberalism we have imbibed with (lamentably) our own mothers' milk.

The fields of Criteriology and Epistemology bear directly upon this. What are they? Cardinal Mercier defines Criteriology as "the reflex study of our certain knowledge, and of the grounds, upon which certitude rests." Criteriology comes from the Greek κρίνω (krino), meaning "I judge," because any assertion of certitude is founded upon a judgment (as we'll see, if it's not already clear).

If we refuse to judge and discriminate, there is neither anything to teach nor anything to learn.

The science is also known as Epistemology, from Greek ἐπιστήμη (episteme), meaning "knowleldge," especially "skillful knowledge" rooted in focus and experience. In discussing the broader science to which this field belongs, Cardinal Mercier rejects the fuzzy idea gaining popularity in his day (and still prevalent), that sought to subject this to the science of Logic, sometimes calling it “real logic” (as Kant did). But logic properly studies Being only as it exists in the mind (i.e., the attributes with which the action of the mind vests considered objects), whereas Metaphysics is the science of Being itself. Criteriology studies a correspondence between these things, inhering as a property in the act of knowledge, “hence it is directly connected with ideology and thus with psychology.”

As an aside, I’ve been interested to see how many terms have changed their meanings since their separation from the integrated whole of the Western tradition of learning a century ago. “Psychology,” as Mercier uses it, is the science of all living creatures (psyche, soul, being the principle of life); expanding secularism and specialization broke this up into many fields.

Man’s rational soul, as the highest type of soul, was the subject of Psychology par excellence; but with the advent of Freud and other alien, hostile influences, psychology was coopted to spread the subversive propaganda that man does not have a rational soul at all, but is simply a beast with an highly developed rationalization-machine in his head. And indeed many men behave this way, which gave credence to this idea; but when Western society promoted the higher ideal, many men lived up to it and proved it true. Having now abandoned the concept, many fail to do anything beyond the level of animal activity—eat, sleep, sex—which was the goal of advancing the degenerate concept in the first place.

Some Terms And Ideas We Will Examine

Cardinal Mercier defines certitude (which is the object of Criteriology’s science) as “the state of the human mind, when it recognizes that it knows the truth.”

Now, to quote Pilate: “What is truth? ”

Judgment or certitude of truth implies a relation between two terms—a term in itself or conceptualized, and an idea already present in the mind (even Christ, The Truth, is the Hypostatic Wisdom of the Father). The Cardinal explains that nobody speaks of a term as “true” in absolute abstraction from this relation (i.e., “one thousand seven hundred and twelve is so true, man”—something that could make sense relative to solving a math problem, but is nonsense in absolute abstraction). We often describe things as real or true (“he’s a true friend”), and we often predicate truth of our knowledge of things (“it is true that four right angles contain 360 degrees between them”). When we speak of truth as an attribute of a thing, this is concerned with objective or ontological truth. When we speak of truth as an attribute of our knowledge of things, this is dealing with logical or subjective truth.

Objective Or Ontological Truth

This is NOT to deny the objective element in truth; it simply acknowledges that the judgment or assertion of truth, implies a relation between two things: the objective and subjective elements. Specifically, this relation is one of real, congruous agreement.

In fact, this brings us to St. Thomas’ definition of truth: Veritas est adaequatio intellectus et rei (“truth is an adequation of intellection and res). “Adequation” means “an exact correspondence or conformity.” “Intellection” is the act of perceiving with understanding, roughly equivalent to Greek νοήσις (noesis). Some people translate res as “thing,” but in English a “thing” is usually a material object, whereas the Latin res is any thing or idea, material or immaterial. So, truth is present when the mind’s idea and another res (thing or idea in itself, or conceptualized, etc.) correspond to one another in an exact way. Objective truth, then, is the part played by the res.

Subjective Or Logical Truth

Therefore, “subjective truth” does not here mean “personal” (i.e., untrue) truth, as it does in a Modernist’s mouth. Rather, we use the term here to denote the perception of truth in the mind. Speaking of the adequation of intellect and res, or truth, the Cardinal says: “to assert that this relation is present, is to formulate a judgment.” So, subjective truth is the nature of a judgment, in which there is an objective conformity on the part of the res to the judgment of the mind; it is the role of intellection, and exists only when the mind’s judgment conforms to the objective truth or reality of a res; when the mind’s judgment does not so conform, we reject the idea that it is “true” in any sense. His judgment is not “subjectively” true (for him), it is simply false.

The point, here, is twofold: 1) I am beating the dead horse, that “subjective truth” does not mean “personal opinion,” as it does for Liberals; subjective truth is the true perception and assertion of accord with an objective truth, in/by the mind; 2) this goes beyond the mere level of perception, or even of assent; it involves a deliberate judgment of the mind.

Those are the preliminaries to the discussion; and there are many implications and assumptions to address. Next week we will start to get into the meat of it, exploring whether man can be certain in his knowledge of any truth. In the meantime, don’t forget…

Surrexit Dominus vere, alleluia!

I regret not getting to say more about Easter this year; this is my first year of keeping up the whole cycle of services in the Latin Rite, and I've been deeply moved by them. So, in lieu of more thorough posts on Easter, I may just leave you with some tidbits of Easter traditions at the end of posts.

This year, while looking for land in Central and Southern America, I was reminded of some of the Holy Week and Easter celebrations that are common in Spain and many countries evangelized by Spain. Here is the "Encuentro Glorioso," where the appearance of our Lord to His mother on the morning of the Resurrection is re-enacted by a procession early on Easter Sunday. The pasos (biers) are moved close together and swayed, to represent the joy at the meeting.

Their joy, already great for Easter, is better understood when you know some of the surrounding traditions. As a gesture of repentance, folk voluntarily donned the conical dunce' cap imposed on public sinners and criminals in the Middle Ages (but with a veil, so their penance would not be an occasion for pride; this is the garb of the Nazarenos). They accompanied images of the sorrowing Virgin, or of Christ during the events of His last days and hours, to and from the Cathedral, barefoot (some still do this). They pour their heart and soul into making these images and processions beautiful. Here is the sorrowing Virgin of the La Hiniesta brotherhood, exiting her church on the 450th anniversary of that brotherhood (skip to about 2:30).

Some of these processions can last as many as 14 hours. Often the Virgin of Easter morning has been one of the sorrowing Virgins on procession earlier, but with her mantle changed from penitential colors to white.

Some of these images are very old, and are interwoven with the history of the people, which has often been bitter in recent centuries; I respect the people of Seville for not giving up on their traditions. The brotherhood based out of the Sailors' chapel (Esperanza de Triana) had their Church stolen by Napoleonic Revolutionaries and handed over to Anglicans, then turned into a bar and brothel.

Revolutionaries and the Civil War destroyed many chapels and their images in the 20th century, and just a few years ago processional brotherhoods were threatened with graffiti on their buildings promising "ardereis como en el treinta y seis" ("you will burn just like in 1936"). Understandably, then, the people of Triana show their love very plainly as their image is escorted back into the Sailors' chapel (restored as a Catholic Church in 1954) on the somber day of Good Friday. And their band, the Banda del Santíssimo Cristo de los Trés Caídos, is the best of all the processional brass bands at present. There are moments of real virtuosity by the trumpeters, as well as by the man who sings a solo at the end. The first half of this video is a bit slow, but from the lift at 18:00 and onward, it is touching to watch.

This is just a last remnant of what the culture of Europe and Christendom can be like, when vacuous and ugly ideologies are not withering all our beauty. When Holy Week comes around next year, one could do worse than to watch some of the many videos of these great processions, or to try to start a similar one near you.

Katie B. Nelson, Sometimes Homeless Drug User, Has Been Identified As Roosh's Montreal Assaulter

April 16, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

At last, the other woman who assaulted Roosh in Montreal, Katie B. Nelson, has been identified. The literal partner-in-crime of Jessica Lelièvre (now strangely a law student) has desperately tried to avoid being outed for her anti-social, criminal behavior in August of last year. She saw the very adverse reactions towards Lelièvre, who was forced to go underground away from social media and now faces the likelihood of having prospective employers permanently associate her name with the organizing of an attempted lynch mob.

Nelson was the first woman to throw a beer on Roosh in this video:

After Roosh's World Tour, Nelson has been finally banned from Twitter for harassing multiple people. These people have included purported Roosh supporters whom she has stalked online and tried to stir up offline violence against. Inasmuch as we welcome her banning, Twitter was extremely slow to act appropriately when Nelson's nefarious intentions became clear. Many complaints of doxxing were made against her before she was suspended indefinitely. By contrast, Milo Yiannopoulos' legitimate investigative journalism about college graduate fraudster (and transgender person) Brianna Wu was immediately shut down by Twitter.

You can find Nelson's remaining social media pages, where she has an ironic penchant for objectifying herself well beyond her natural appearance, here: Facebook and Instagram. Most disgustingly, we also have a snapshot of her unabashed anti-Semitism and support for the tunnels used by terrorist group Hamas to murder Jewish-Israeli civilians. And Roosh is supposedly an anti-Semite?

Katie B. Nelson's may actually just be Caitlin Nelson, based on her 2013 arrest. Nelson is probably well aware of the professional consequences she might face in the future for her deplorable past, so it's possible that the "B." is either a complete ruse or a legal initial she uses on and off to separate her different activities, like with her appropriation of both Katie and Caitlin as first names.

In Montreal, after hitting Roosh with their drinks (a crime in Canada, as multiple court decisions prove), Lelièvre and Katie B. Nelson duly slip behind their slavish white knights but continue trying to fan the flames to create more dangerous levels of physical violence. The men, followed by the "brave" women, proceed to force Roosh and his smaller entourage down the street, on pain of risking being maimed or even killed.

Why Roosh didn't press charges

Roosh gave much more than a middle finger to his enemies in Montreal and wider Canada. He schooled them in how to beat a mass of leftists frothing at the mouth for blood.

Roosh's recollection of "Jennifer," the name Katie B. Nelson gave herself, is as follows: "I approached her on the street and then I moved into the bar. There she was making cow eyes on me and rubbed her legs against me to distract me until her white knights could get there. Her act was quite believable (I felt foolish afterwards)."

In terms of why he didn't press charges, Roosh said, "A detective from the Montreal SPVM police force contacted me and said that I should expect to also be charged with assault because I allegedly threw my water at Katie's face after she attacked me first. If I did such a thing, it was a self-defense reflex to fend off my attackers. The last thing I wanted to do was return to Canada for a trial, so I didn't pursue charges. I had to assume that a Canadian judge would throw the book at me while giving leniency to the girls after they turned on the water works in the courtroom. This shows that if you want a woman to go to jail for assault, you better not try to defend yourself."

Isn’t the idea of ambulance-chasing to do up the velcro strap of your neck brace? Katie B. Nelson/Caitlin Nelson is presently suing the Montreal Police for alleged brutality. Makes perfectly sense that an anarchist would use an “illegitimate” capitalist court system in this way, right?

Proving that feminist complaints about being doxxed never apply to those who criticize them, Lelièvre and Katie B. Nelson were instrumental, along with Sara Parker-Toulson the Hutt, in disseminating Roosh’s alleged Montreal address. The intention here was to have people show up to render Roosh unconscious, beat him to within an inch of his life or, again, end his life. Yet do not take my word for it; the evidence is both linked to my articles and across the broader internet.

In the biggest irony of the whole saga, it was feminist-anarchist Katie B. Nelson (or Caitlin Nelson, take your pick) whose actions helped bolster the already very heavily supported proposition that rape culture is not just a myth but also a deliberate SJW fiction. Women can and do lie when it suits them during flirting, courtship, and sex. Knowing exactly who Roosh was, Nelson pretended to be unaware and sexually propositioned him, entirely for the purposes of soon attacking him and unleashing the assembled sheep-like mob.

Same old, same old

The only thing Katie B. Nelson doesn't want to liberate is her drug-affected "intellect."

Katie B. Nelson comes across as a most unsurprising ultra-leftist figure: "former" homeless drug addict; feminist-anarchist whose political activism depends on living in a tolerant, productive First World Western country; street radical who cries "Police brutality!" at every corner; and someone with a phenomenally maladjusted background and childhood. Some people overcome their past, whereas people like Nelson let theirs consume them and deliberately play it up for attention and "street cred."

Let's take a look at Nelson's own "story." In a narrative that's par for the course with self-obsessed SJWs, Nelson claims she had to "leave behind one of the most amazing children I have ever met." Whether this means she very stupidly and recklessly had a son or daughter she gave up, or just wants to make her life sound dramatic and so involves a child who isn't hers, remains to be seen.

She additionally assists in vindicating the basis of so many ROK articles, including my recent one about how women reward violent men with sex and relationships. I, like many of you, do not find Nelson aesthetically-pleasing, but the general principle of a damaged female's preference for anti-social men works well in her case. She very explicitly references a habit of "getting into relationships with abusive piece-of-shit boyfriends."

The commonalities between Katie B. Nelson and her ideological bosom buddies, like Jessica Lelièvre, are the ones you have come to expect from the most opportunistic feminist attention-seekers. Naturally, there's that obsession with enhancing their appearances well beyond what nature gave them. Nelson is the same girl who will rally against patriarchy and unrealistic physical expectations on women in one breath, and then plaster herself with copious layers of make-up and digital filters in the next. These hypocritical actions are merely shortcuts for propping up her flagging self-esteem. A girl's gotta do what a girl's gotta do.

She advocates for bank robberies and equates Israeli polices with the Holocaust

No doubt, Katie B. Nelson/Caitlin Nelson will claim the tweet above was a joke or a "thought experiment." SJWs always do when their future employment prospects are limited because of statements that would blacklist a non-leftist for eternity. How strange then that such a comment still fits within her putrid overall ideology, including not merely an unfavorable comparison of Israel with Nazi Germany but rather saying Israel is Nazi Germany:

> .@KatieNelsonMTL of @Concordia equates #Israel w/ #Nazi Germany. NEVER OK. https://t.co/PYBllgNKp7 pic.twitter.com/WiDUqsVZMi
> — Canary Mission (@canarymission) January 27, 2016

Then there's her wonderful encouragement of Hamas wilfully murdering Israeli civilians, mentioned earlier. All in all, we are left with an impression of a virulently unhappy and mentally unstable "woman" (more like a child), who lashes out with calls for violence, requests for other people's money (see below) and presenting herself, almost schizophrenically, as a target of continuous police harassment.

Katie B. Nelson also lives off suspicious crowdfunding drives

Prostitution is more much honest than Katie B. Nelson's crowdfunding efforts.

Before we address her shameless profiteering and refusal to get a job able to fully support her activism, there's the tricky question of why an anarchist would try to get a payday via the civil, capitalist court system. This is exactly what Katie B. Nelson/Caitlin Nelson has been doing and is the main reason ROK became aware of who she was. She claims she was "pushed" at a rally by an undercover police officer and is suing the Montreal Police. This continues her multiyear obsession with portraying herself as a victim of "police brutality." Of all the sick SJWs in Canada, she's miraculously the one being "targeted." In psychiatric terms, this would be called epic and never-ending narcissism and paranoia.

She has raised, for her at least, substantial "legal fees" funds online, including on GoFundMe (archive) and Generosity (archive). For someone with the gall to make a name for herself pretty much only through "combating" police, surely she could muster the discipline to parlay her "skills" in getting a decent job to fund her extremism. And as a social justice warrior who believes in the power of Montreal's anarchist collectivity, she has a quaint habit of making herself the sole public standard-bearer for the cause.

These funding drives intersect with other serious questions about Nelson's finances. She repeatedly shares her long history of drugs and being homeless, yet has the time and money to study at Concordia University, the alma mater of Jessica Lelièvre. Comparable to Lelièvre, Nelson might have an affluent family in her home province of Alberta. The suggestion is that she hails from Edmonton, a not-so-bad city that benefited from a contemporary boom from oil and other resources. But unless she has resorted to living off white knight men, actual prostitution, or her family, how she bankrolls herself with all these legal entanglements is very murky indeed.

There is just not enough room for more facts about Katie B. Nelson

"E.T. phone home… for money."

I thoroughly encourage you to peruse the main forum thread on Katie B. Nelson/Caitlin Nelson. I have no doubt that more about her is out there and this may soon appear, thanks to the contributions of Roosh and ROK supporters. For now, this exposé must regrettably (or thankfully?) come to an end.

I have lost count of the number of times I have mentioned SJWs' flair for outing themselves. They so desperately believe in their false creed and their broken selves that they cannot help but confirm their mental illnesses, crimes, and other brain-dead positions and activities.

Of any SJW I have ever had the displeasure of covering, from rich daddy's girl Jessica Lelièvre to the truly awful Anita Sarkeesian, Katie B. Nelson is without a shadow of a doubt the most repulsive and delusional. Enjoy your notoriety, Katie. Once what little of your non-make-up-generated looks have been sapped by your long-term drug abuse, the life of needles and deliberately sought out violent men will be even more familiar to you than it was before.

How To Take A Girl Canoeing

The canoe, perhaps one of the most universal and time honored means of marine transportation, is slowly falling out of style and its operation becoming a lost art in today's society. There is no man-powered craft better to take a girl on a date and, in this article, we'll cover enough basics so you can do so confidently.

Canoes are, in modern times, typically two person boats made for inland waterways and are around 15 feet long. Although it's more stable and higher performance to kneel, most people sit out of comfort. Canoeing is easy to learn, and, provided one has a grasp of physics, straightforward to master. Fortunately for us here at ROK, if you know what you're doing, you can take a girl on a date canoeing without her ever having sat in one before, and you'll have a great time. The trick is that, with a canoe, you want to be a back seat driver. Put her in the front, teach her to paddle and backpaddle on command, you take care of the rest, and the boat magically goes where you want it, resulting in a good time for all and maybe her riding the front of something else later on.

Canoes beat rowboats because they're more elegant and nimble (and you can see where you are going as opposed to sitting backwards), but, most importantly, she's INVOLVED and not just sitting there. She gets ownership in the "we did this" activity of the day, and gets all the exercise endorphins, too.

Canoes also beat kayaks, because, while she gets exercise from them, too, you don't get to control where she goes if she's got her own boat; and kayaks are more straightforward than a canoe, which robs you of your mastery over something she doesn't know. Paddle boards are just stupid.

Anatomy of a canoe

Canoes are simple craft; new ones are plastic or aluminum, old ones are aluminum, fiberglass, or even wood. I'd go with a new plastic one, or get a Grumman aluminum. Pointed at both ends, the only difference between the bow and the stern (front and back) is that the stern seat is right on the stern, and the bow seat has room for your feet.

The struts across the top are thwarts, the rails are gunwales, and the ridge on the bottom is a keel, designed to keep you from sliding sideways in wind. Most canoes have a flattish bottom, which makes them relatively more stable. If your canoe has a rounded bottom and no keel; that's a whitewater boat designed to sideslip, and is more unstable than a lake canoe. Your paddle's components (made of either wood, or plastic and aluminum) are a blade that has a tip and a throat where the shaft joins on, and a grip at the other end of the shaft. They come in varying lengths, if you put the throat at your nuts, the grip should be at about your forehead.

You need two paddles, one canoe, two personal flotation devices (lifejackets, use types 2 or 3), sunscreen, and a woman, and you're all set to go canoeing.

Moving the boat

Basic Principle

The basic principle of a canoe is based off of the idea that the guy in the stern is further away from the center of the boat than the girl in the bow. This gives you more leverage than the girl, and means that, if you both paddle equally, the canoe will turn away from the side on which the stern guy is paddling. This is by design, and allows you to control the boat. Do not, I repeat, DO NOT, swap sides to turn the boat. That is for idiots and actors, and is something called the “Hollywood J stroke” for that reason.

The money in controlling the canoe lies solely in the real J stroke and, through it, you can do everything you need to do from whatever side you are paddling on. Put your girl paddling on whatever side she wants, you paddle on the other, and switch every so often for fatigue.

Bow Strokes

Let’s talk about her job. She has five strokes to know, and all are simple. Always put the hand of the side you’re paddling on on the throat, and the other on the grip. The forward paddle consists of leaning forward, inserting the blade into the water up to your hand, and pulling back smoothly alongside the hull of the boat till your bottom hand is past your waist, then removing the paddle from the water and going back to the start. The Back Paddle is the opposite of this. That’s forward and backwards.

If you need to turn the boat away from the side she’s on, you have her do the “quarter sweep.” Lean forward, stick the paddle into the water pointing forward, and sweep away from the boat to 90 degrees out. Do not go further than 90 degrees as any further is actually stopping your turn. To turn the boat towards her side, she doesn’t have to do anything other than paddle forward normally; you’ll do it.

Sideways movement of the canoe, like getting to a dock, is either the draw, or the push, depending on which way you want to go. If she’s on the right, and you want to go left, she’ll do the push, which is putting the paddle straight into the water, parallel to the side of the boat, and pushing away as far as comfortable. The draw, designed to pull you towards the side you’re on, is the opposite.

To pivot the boat, have her either do the quarter sweep, or the backpaddle, depending on which way you want to spin, and you’ll do the opposite on your side in the stern. There’s some other bow stuff I’ll cover in a later article, but that will do for now.

Stern Strokes

Hold the paddle in the same way, and most of these are the same, or almost the same, as the bow strokes. The big one to know is the J stroke. This is the stroke you’ll do 90% of the time in the boat, and, through it, that boat does what you want. Know it, and rule the boat; don’t, and you’re going in circles.

Since it’s named J, the stroke is the basic forward paddle, along with a flip at the end. Insert the blade normally at the front of your stroke, pull alongside the hull, and, when you get to the end, with the paddle extended behind you, curl your wrist so that the blade is sideways in the water, and give a little push away from the boat.

Remember the leverage I talked about earlier? You have three things you want to do while in forward motion in a canoe: go straight, turn away from the side you're on, or turn towards the side you're on. The J cancels out your natural leverage to turn the boat away from the side you're on, so, if you want to turn that way, omit the J, or employ the same quarter sweep we talked about in the bow positions.

If you want to go straight, use enough J to cancel your leverage. If you want to turn towards the direction you're on, give it more J, and maybe even leave the paddle in the water at the end of the J, leaving it dragging at an angle, which is something called a "stern rudder."

Back paddle works the same way as in the front, as does the draw and the push. There's something called the reverse sweep, which is a backwards quarter sweep, and done like you think it would be; by putting the blade in sideways by the stern, and sweeping out 90 degrees. Coupling a reverse sweep on your side with a quarter sweep on her side is the preferred way (and fastest) to pivot a canoe, although pushing and drawing together works too.

You can tell her to stop paddling and let it run, and she pulls the paddle out and you coast, or to hold water, and that is to stick the paddle in and hold it there against the flow, which is the closest thing you'll get to brakes.

Entry and exit

The preferred method to entry and exit is on land, but we'll cover water methods too. To launch a canoe, carry it into the water, one at the bow and one at the stern. You will get your feet wet. Get it floating, bow out, then come back to the stern, cross your arms over the stern, and hug it with your legs. Your girl will walk down the center of the boat, holding onto the gunwales and sit down. You then push off a bit, stand beside the boat, and step onto the centerline in front of your seat and sit down.

To land is the same thing in reverse. Hit the shore, have her get out and stabilize it for you as you move down the centerline in the same way as above. Getting into the boat from a dock involves lowering yourself, standing on the centerline facing forward, and sitting down. You get in first and get out last so you can stabilize it for her.

Exiting a canoe while underway is as simple as standing up and rolling sideways. Don't jump, just roll and tuck your feet. Your partner can lean the opposite direction and put their paddle in in a push position to counteract the tilt of your departure.

Getting back in from the water is a little more challenging. If you're both out, have her hold her side down while you reach in above the gunwales and do a push up off the inside of the hull where it curves to be the bottom, and roll your ass over the gunwale in. Once in, lean sideways away from her side, and she can do a pushup on the gunwale to enter, which is easier than you just did. Do not lean over to help her, else you'll capsize. I'll cover solo reentry at another time.

Capsize recovery

You need to know what to do if you swamp the boat. Canoes have flotation, they won't sink while swamped, so make sure your girl is ok, then collect all the floating away stuff (make sure that cell phone is double bagged before you go.)

If you're near the land, grab the painter line on one end, and swim towards shore towing the boat. Once there, turn it sideways, pick it up, dump the water, set it down, and off you go. If you're with another canoe, once they get done laughing, turn yours upside down, point it perpendicular at the center of their boat, and have them lift the end of yours over theirs, sliding it onboard, doing what is called a T rescue since that's the letter it resembles. Once totally out of the water, flip it right side up, slide it off, and have them hold it parallel to theirs while you two board.

If you're in open water with no buddies, you get to do it the fun way. Turn the boat upside down, and swim underneath it, popping up in the air bubble inside the thing. This, incidentally, is a good position to maintain if you are in such rough water you can't resume navigation; keep it upside down, and hang onto the gunwales.

Assuming you can safely right it, face your partner, and both grab ahold of the submerged gunwales. Decide to which side you want to fling it, and count three and toss it up and sideways so it chucks out most of the water and ends up right side up. Board as covered earlier.

1 Flip inverted. 2. Get under it (they put it over them here). 3 Lift above head. 4 Toss sideways. 5/6 Board.

Conclusion

That should get you enough basic knowledge to run a canoe in a decently competent manner. Canoe rentals are cheap, and it’s a good date. Be warned, the waterways are one of the premier places for men who are “supposed to know how to do this” to screw up royally and endanger everyone around them while trying to be macho as hell. Add to that the situation of everyone coming at it from a different philosophy; you’ve got hippies, Outward Bound types, Manly Men ™, yuppies, and former Boy Scouts, of which the Scouts are the only ones who actually know what they’re doing. I taught it many years ago at a BSA summer camp in Florida, so I may be a little biased. Regardless, unless you’re Burt Reynolds, go practice (a lot) before you try anything in open water or a long way away from others. Be safe.

Is Circumcision Dangerous For Males?

Circumcision is a procedure done on men throughout the world. It is a controversial operation that some claim has many benefits with no downsides, while others claim circumcision is abusive and causes severe damage. Which one of these two beliefs is closer to the truth? First this article will outline the reasons circumcision is performed. Second, we'll discuss the history of circumcision. Finally, we'll talk about the two types of harm that circumcision might cause men.

Why Are Men Circumcised?

Why does the color of the USA match the colors of much worse countries?

According to the World Health Organization, approximately 30% of the world's males are circumcised. In the U.S., circumcision rates range between 50-60%. For comparison, the rate in Germany is 11%, France 14%, and the U.K. 16%.

Why is the U.S. so much different than the rest of the Western world on this issue? Our rates of circumcision are closer to Middle Eastern countries like Saudi Arabia and Israel

America has a long and strange history with circumcision. It is currently the most common surgical operation done in the U.S. and between 2-10% of circumcisions result in complications.

In the late 19th century, in the U.S., circumcision was widely promoted and was seen as a cure for masturbation. John Harvey Kellogg, a chief proponent of circumcision, advocated in Plain Facts for Young and Old (1881) that circumcision should be performed without anesthesia as the pain would have a “salutary effect on the mind.” The argument was that the pain associated with circumcision would deter the boy from touching his penis. In the late 19th century, Victorian-era doctors described the male foreskin as a “source of serious mischief.”

These doctors believed that masturbation led to insanity. They thought that the sensitive, responsive foreskin stimulated masturbation, and surgeons promoted “therapeutic” circumcision to cure young men of the “sin” of excessive indulgence and prevent the potential for, “masturbatory insanity,” a catchall phrase for various psychiatric and physical disorders that perplexed physicians.

Furthermore, John Kellogg invented Corn Flakes breakfast cereal in 1878. He hoped that feeding children this plain cereal every morning would help to combat the urges of “self-abuse”.

While today some say circumcision prevents HIV transmission and other risks, others say circumcision has long been, in America, a cultural practice looking for a medical justification.

Women’s Views On Circumcision

Don’t worry– she’s seen it all

Among women, uncircumcised penises get something of a bad rap, being described as unattractive and undesirable. The confluence of medicine and popular opinion serve to perpetuate the societal norm.

Still, it is an unnecessary surgery performed on a person unable to give consent. One might argue that it violates the most basic assumptions of medical ethics. Why are we allowed to perform an unnecessary operation on a human who is not yet able to provide consent? It seems odd that for Western women who are obsessed with consent, they are perfectly happy to perform a pseudo-castration on a boy without his permission.

There is a well-known stigma, at least among middle-class women, of uncircumcised penises. Some women claim that they are less attractive and are averse to giving blowjobs if they see that a guy is uncut. In this article in Cosmopolitan, several women are interviewed and while they say that they generally prefer the appearance of a circumcised penis, there also either a neutral or enhanced effect on their sexual pleasure when having sex with an uncircumcised man.

A couple of insightful quotes from the Cosmo sluts:

> I feel like there is a little something extra when a man is not circumcised. It’s almost like being “ribbed for her pleasure.” I don’t think it necessarily makes it better than a circumcised man, but it is a little different. I also think the after-sex rituals are different. Usually, when a guy is not circumcised, he has to get up and clean off sooner.

And:

> I have a decent sample size of both intact and circumcised men, and while I have had circumcised men be able to get me off from vaginal intercourse alone, it’s > only been after plenty of getting to know each other sexually. The uncircumcised men have been the only ones who I orgasm from vaginal intercourse alone easily, even during casual encounters. The gliding sensation from the foreskin just does it for me.

With the advent of digital porn, you can rest assured that whether your penis is cut or uncut, Western sluts will have seen all varieties of male genitalia by the time they are sexually active.

Two Types Of Damage

There are two types of possible harm that might be done to a male who has undergone circumcision as a baby: damage to the body and damage to the psyche.

The foreskin is densely filled with nerve endings and is an erogenous zone. By removing the foreskin, circumcision weakens the range of sensations that a man is able to have when having sex. It is also believed to serve other functions, like protecting and lubricating the head of the penis and maintaining its sensitivity, similar to the way an eyelid protects the eye.

There are multiple studies indicating that circumcision may have a negative effect on sexual functioning. In one study done in Britain, researchers found that the head of the circumcised penis is less sensitive to touch than the glans of the uncircumcised penis. According to this study, circumcision erodes the most sensitive parts of the penis. If you leave a naturally moist and sensitive body part in the exposed air, it makes sense that it would grow less sensitive over time.

In another study, researchers surveyed 123 men who had undergone circumcision as adults. They found that following their operation, erectile dysfunction increased and penile sensitivity decreased.

Finally, an interesting study in Denmark found that circumcised men reported more sexual partners than uncut men. However, they were also more likely to admit to frequent orgasm difficulties, likely due to reduced sensitivity. Women with circumcised husbands more often reported incomplete sexual needs fulfillment and frequent sexual function difficulties overall.

The second consequence of circumcision on men is psychological trauma. Circumcision is frequently done on babies without anesthetic. One can imagine the severe amount of pain an infant experiences during this operation.

Research has demonstrated the hormone cortisol, which is linked to stress and pain, sharply increases during circumcision. Although some believe that babies “won’t remember” the pain, we now know that the body “remembers” as evidenced by studies which demonstrate that circumcised infants are more sensitive to pain later in life.

It seems that the claims of various organizations, including the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) that “the scientific evidence is clear that the benefits outweigh the risks” is a flimsy statement that is not entirely rooted in truth.

How To Deal With Friends Who Believe In Social Justice

There are two kinds of people in this world: those who can think for themselves and see the truth for what it is, and those who don't bother to do any critical thinking, and just believe what the majority tells them to believe. To them, truth matters less than what is socially expedient.

Unfortunately, the second type outnumber the first at least 10 to 1. This ratio might be different in other countries, but I'm speaking from what I've experienced in Sweden. Generally, though, it seems like a rule of humanity that only some relatively few bright minds have the honesty and clarity to see things for what they are, instead of what they wish them to be.

What this means is that you likely have a lot of people around you—neighbors, friends, family, coworkers—who belong to the group that let others do their thinking for them. I know that's the case for me. It's not easy finding friends who agree with me on subjects like politics and ethics. Hell, it's hard enough to find someone who will even tolerate any ideology that didn't originate with Karl Marx.

I still like to hang out with my leftist friends, even if we have our differences. I've tried to change their minds, but so far without any luck. So if I can't change it, I'll have to learn how to live with it. Over the years, I've found ways to deal with the circumstance of being right-wing in a left-wing society. Below I share with you some thoughts I have on dealing with friends who have opinions that you disagree with.

1. Don't bring up your own views without good reason

Your friend’s face when you dare to question her.

I’m not saying you should hide your opinions as if you were ashamed of them. But from my experience, having a calm, factual and productive political discussion with SJWs is nearly impossible. They get offended and emotional for the smallest things—what they call being “triggered.” If you’re not with them and their Marxism all the way, you must be a right-wing extremist bent on raping women and lynching blacks. Maybe you haven’t done those things already, but you surely have the potential to.

My conclusion is that it’s best not to bring up politics at all when you’re in the company of these kinds of friends. At best you’ll spoil the mood, at worst you’ll make them break down and run away in tears.

2. Prepare yourself with good arguments

If you do get into a political argument with them, make sure you have your facts straight and all of your points clear ahead of time. Watch debates on Youtube and learn from your favorite pundits. Even if you don’t have any chance of changing their minds, you’ll at least be able to stand your ground against their onslaught of stupidity.

Just before you completely crush them with your superior arguments, take the high road and give them a chance to retreat in a dignified way. Say you agree with them on some minor detail, but that you can agree to disagree on the bigger issue. Hopefully, that’ll be the end of it.

3. Don’t trust them to be loyal when shit hits the fan

Think 1984. A totalitarian government has come to power, violently suppressing every dissenting voice in the nation. You’re under constant surveillance, not only by the government but also by the people around you. Say the wrong words an they’ll report your political incorrectness to Big Brother. Imagine if something like that would happen for real. It could—we’ve already seen it in places like Russia, China and North Korea.

SJWs are cowardly collectivists. You can never really count on them to have your back. Rather, you can be sure that they’ll climb over your dead body to move further up in the hierarchy. If shit does hit the fan, you need good people close to you to fight whatever power is holding you back. Which brings me to my next and last point.

4. Find new friends

The smart thing for you to do is look around for new friends that are more reliable.The Internet has made it a lot easier to find and contact fellow thought criminals, so you should take advantage of that opportunity. Roosh V Forum is the place where fans of Roosh and Return Of Kings come together. They come from all around the world, and some of them have already organized more or less clandestine meet-ups.

Some say one should judge a man by the company he keeps. I'd say that's true to a degree. If you don't feel comfortable being judged by what kind of friends you have, maybe it's time to go looking for new ones.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Why Stretching Is Essential For The Body (With 6 Beginner Stretches To Get You Started)

Flexibility is an issue that many embryonic physical culturists ignore until it is too late, when injuries or athletic mediocrity have already occurred: stretching, mobility and flexibility may be of a secondary importance to the physical man, but it is still a goal worth pursuing.

Why Stretch?

Some of you might be groaning already, saying that this is predominantly a “woman’s goal” of fitness, citing the always-prevalent female desire to “tone” and “lengthen” muscles without adding bulk. And while stretching certainly accomplishes these things, there are many benefits specifically for the masculine man, such as:

1. Improved Posture

Much fun is made in these circles of “hunched over beta males” with sloping shoulders, a high degree of swayback, and other effeminate body language. A variety of stretches for the chest, shoulders, hip flexors, hamstrings, and glutes (several of which will be discussed later in this post) can have you standing like the tall, confident alpha male you’ve always wanted to be.

2. Increased Athletic Ability

Having contracted, atrophied muscles leads to the posture issues detailed in the previous number, and muscular atrophy comes from disuse. That same atrophy leads to decreased physical aptitude. And if you don’t believe me, I’d like to see you try to deadlift, sprint, or jump with lower back pain caused by hyperlordosis, which is in turn caused by atrophied hip flexor muscles. After you try and fail at that, do a bench press or throw a punch with proper form due to your sloped, inward-facing shoulders. And finally, try to throw a high roundhouse kick so we can all laugh at you.

3. Increased Mental Fortitude And Tolerance To Pain

A stretch properly done is a slow, gradual, arduous process. This is to avoid over-stretching and injuring the muscle in question, but also as a strictly mental, almost meditative exercise. The goal of fortitude is what has traditionally made kung fu schools force their students to perform the horse stance (ma bu in the original Mandarin*)* for several minutes at a time, although the horse stance is not strictly a stretch.
Similarly, the Russian spetsnaz forces their recruits to learn how to do splits (both the front split and the "wishbone" side split) for the exact same reason. Simply put, if you've gritted, gnashed, and sweated through a wishbone split, you won't fear much in the way of pain.

4. Increased Sex Appeal

This is mostly a byproduct of the previous three steps. Speaking personally from experience and observation, women are certainly not adverse to seeing a muscled, masculine man perform a full bridge or a split. If you can pull off some of those moves on the dance floor, even better.

Stretching is a field of training that requires just as much progressive training as weights or calisthenics. The trainee should begin with the basic stretches that you probably remember from elementary school, before moving onto intermediate stretches (bridges, twist holds, etc.) and the advanced stretches (splits, scorpion holds, and other movements that seem unreal to the uninitiated). This article will only go over basic stretches to increase mobility in preparation for the intermediate stretches, but first…

Commonalities For All Stretches

Without going into too much anatomical detail, let me just say that a properly done stretch applies the pull to the muscles rather than a tendon or ligament. Muscles evolved to move, pull, contract, agonize, and antagonize. Ligaments attach bone to bone and tendons attach bone to skeletal muscle, both of which are tough connective tissues that evolved to basically keep things in place. They are made of collagen, which is meant to withstand and "hold fast" in response to tension, not stretch and move in the direction of the tension.

Stretching, thus, essentially, conditions the muscle fibers to their maximum plasticity and elasticity (for those who don't remember physics class, plasticity is the capability of being stretched, elasticity is the capability of returning to the original length once the pressure is taken off). If you feel any pain in places you know joint tissue exists such as the hip sockets, the spine, the groin, the ankles), you're doing it wrong. Try again with proper form.

Related to the above, there is nothing between your two legs. A lot of people will tell you that there's some sort of ligament or muscle between the two legs keeping you from doing splits. That's a lie. The reason splits, or any stretch, are difficult, is because your muscles are reflexively resisting the stretch, and this is normal. Much of flexibility training is gradually training your body to not use that reflex.

Stretching is a workout all its own. We've all seen that tubby guy at the gym doing gimpy stretches that accomplish nothing at the gym. Don't be that guy. Personally, I do my stretching after martial arts practice, and not before or after heavy lifting or calisthenics (with two major exceptions I will specify). You can stretch whenever you want, but bear in mind—if you are not pouring sweat, and your heart isn't pounding after your stretching is complete, then you're not stretching right. Remember the third reason of why stretching is relevant to you.

The contraction reflex can be overcome, and there are many methods of doing so, ranging from "waiting out the stretch" (essentially holding a stretched position until the pain goes away, then extending, and repeat until it doesn't work anymore), to getting into a stretched position and flexing the stretched muscles for 20-30 seconds to basically exhaust them into stopping the contraction reflex, and more. Those are the two main methods I use, and there are several variations of "forced relaxation", AKA the contraction method, and:

Finally, breathe regularly. In my experience, holding your breath or breathing shallow leads to muscle cramping, which of course impairs your flexibility. But don't breathe too deep either, just breathe smooth and regular.

Most of the information in this section was gleaned from the works of "The Mad Russian" Pavel Tsatsouline, a former Spetsnaz who defected to the USA in the late 1980s, and became a highly regarded fitness trainer and writer. More specifically, his book "Relax into Stretch" (Dragon Door Publications, 2001). I highly recommend it if you desire more in-depth information.

A Beginner Stretching Routine

1. The Bow Stance

This works the hip flexors, making your hips more mobile and flexible. Put one leg behind the other, as far as it can go while keeping the back foot flat on the floor. Keep the chest and back straight and vertical. Bend the front leg, go until parallel. Keep pressure on the back leg. The stretch is felt in the hip and groin, and as always the back is kept high and straight. Switch legs when done.

2. The Floor Hamstring Stretch

This is one we all remember from elementary school. Sit down on the floor, and extend your legs fully. Keep the feet together and pointed straight up, keep the chest and back high and straight, and bend at the waist, reaching your arms to your feet. I say “arms” and not “hands,” because training can enable you to reach your hands beyond your feet, as seen in the picture.

3. The Bridge

This is one of the two stretches I do after weightlifting rather than martial arts. Possibly because it’s half stretch, half calisthenic. It’s also one of the best exercises you can possibly do in general. It is ubiquitous in a variety of physical disciplines, from yoga to wrestling. It works the seldom-exercised erector spinae, tones the arms and legs, expands lung capacity, promotes circulation and, most importantly, rejuvenates and expands compressed or dislocated vertebral discs. To put it bluntly, if you’re not already bridging, get to it.

Lay down flat on the floor, put your hands on the floor behind your head, and push up simultaneously with your hands and feet. More than just getting your back off the floor, a proper bridge has four components: 1) Straight arms and legs, 2) An arch in the back, 3) The head tilted back in a relaxed position, and 4) Breathing is natural and deep.

Once this is mastered, there are more advanced bridges, culminating in falling into a bridge from a standing position. This is largely where the bridge stops being a stretch and becomes a calisthenic, a topic which I have already discussed on this website.

4. The Hang Stretch

My other post-weightlifting stretch. Hang from a pull-up bar, with arms fully extended and the breath held, then, let the breath go in one gasp, and let your body sag. You should feel the stretch in the back muscles. Helps your posture as well.

5. The Chest Stretch

Put your feet together and stand straight. Then clench the buttocks and thrust the hips forward, while keeping your back as straight as possible, lean your head back and look at the ceiling, and spread your arms out and as wide as possible (do NOT lock the elbows). This expands the chest and shoulders, reduces “droopiness” of the neck, and reduces hyperlordosis in the lumbar as well.

6. The Floor Hip Flexor Stretch

Put one foot on the ground, and one knee on the ground far behind. Then lean forward on the front leg, keeping the back and chest high and straight (I repeat, do not move your torso at all), while putting pressure on the hind leg. You should feel the stretch in the hip flexor of the hind leg. Then switch legs and repeat

In Conclusion

As mentioned before, I do various stretches after weightlifting, calisthenics, and martial arts. I perform all of the above stretches at some point in the week, as well as some more advanced ones. Some of these I use to warm up, and some of these I do afterwards.

Having hopefully convinced you of the need to stretch, try these and see if they improve your athletic game. Be safe and see you next time.

13 Unorthodox Ways To Completely Change Your Life

April 18, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Do you feel stuck? Does life seem stale and boring? Do you still get that looming sense of nihilism despite the fact that you've already gotten everything you wanted in life?

When you get used to the same old routine in life, change can seem difficult, if not impossible. And when you submit to the slave life that our modern society has to offer, it's easy to overlook all the options that are available to you. If you want change, try these 13 unorthodox methods to start a spark that will revitalize your life.

1. Start with mundane changes

Sometimes it’s not easy to make big changes from the get-go. So start small by making seemingly mundane changes to your life. Try listening to different genre of music, try different hobbies, change how you spend your free time, change your posture, expose yourself to strange new ideas through books and websites, etc. Making these small changes can snowball and lead to bigger changes—this method certainly worked for me.

2. Read biographies

Maybe your worldview is limited. Try to read biographies of men from the past to gain a perspective into what their passions were, how they carried themselves in everyday life, and how they went about striving for their goals. You can feel motivated, learn life lessons, or get new ideas about what you would like to do in your life.

3. Do the opposite of what you normally do

"Do you know what the definition of insanity is? It's doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results."

If you ever watched the Seinfeld episode, then you know exactly what this is about. Start doing the opposite of what you'd normally do. If you usually put off work, start doing it right away from now on. If you usually let people walk all over you, start standing up for yourself. If you cower in fear of approaching a girl, do the approach before you get all the crazy thoughts that will stop you from doing so. You can only change when you start to challenge the auto-pilot within you.

4. Write a list what you fear and defeat them

Instead of writing down lame goals that you hope to achieve in the distant future, try listing your greatest fears instead. You can often learn more from your fears than you do with your desires.

Do you fear being alone for the rest of your life? Do you fear being looked down upon by other people? Do you fear that you might die without any legacy to call your own? Do you fear that you won't reach your potential? Do you fear that people will judge you if you were to be assertive? Write them all down and dedicate yourself to conquering them one by one. Once you conquer them all, you'll be fearless and nothing will stop you from living your life under your own terms.

5. Escape the West

The West has long been corrupted with feminism, homosexuality, multiculturalism, and PC culture. Wondering why your life is miserable while living in some SJW cesspool is like being in a prison and wondering why living conditions are so awful.

Get out of your diseased society for an extended travel or just leave for good. If you don't have anything to look forward to in your so-called home country, then you only have a better life to look forward to elsewhere.

6. Go live in the wild

Perhaps it's not enough to escape just from the West. The world as a whole is becoming increasingly infected with progressivism, globalism, modern technology, and other forms of antiphysical degeneracy, so It might not be so crazy to consider living in the wild.

Men don't become strong and masculine by living in some cushy urban centers with Starbucks and air-conditioned offices. Men were meant to survive and thrive by building, enduring, and fighting. You probably don't even realize just how comfortable and distracted you are by all the things that surround you until you abandon it all. It's a personal desire of mine to go live in the woods or a quiet desert, away from all the inanity that our putrid society has to offer.

7. Focus on helping others

It may seem counter-intuitive to be helping others when you're looking to help yourself. And if that's how you think, this may be exactly what you need—especially if you're an accomplished man who has the wisdom and resources to give. In our atomized world that is obsessed with individual pleasure and shallow gratification, altruism and serving a greater purpose is exactly the remedy that many men need.

You can choose to help men close to you, including relatives and friends, or complete strangers both online and offline. Whatever you choose to do, be sure to do it through your genuine desire to bring value to the other person's life unlike many in the West who do it out of their 'holier-than-thou' narcissism.

8. Hop off the fence

Some people are too fixated with being impartial and neutral for the sake of being on the side of truth, reason, or whatever. Being neutral will not get you anywhere in life and you will remain as a nobody. To live, you sometimes have to throw your lot in. I myself am a nihilist at the core, but I know that such is not a life any man should strive for. And it is for that reason I've picked up a cause that will push me forward.

9. Break your routines

Does everyday seem the same? If so, then it's probably due to the fact that you're too comfortable with your established script. If you don't like how your life is stuck in a loop, break out by smashing your routines. Try new things that make you uncomfortable, and avoid things that you numb yourself with—it's the only way out. You'll be surprised by just how much of a world there is out there for you to discover and experience.

10. Live like a monk

Western consumerism and affluence is toxic to the masculine spirit. All the material comforts afforded by our society turn us weak and complacent, feminizing us in the process, and they shut off our drive for new challenges. Our society never ceases to turn us into mindless and distracted slaves that serve the interests of corporations and governments.

So instead, try living a minimalist life for a while where you only spend money on bare minimum needs while shunning all the mindless pleasures that bring no value to your life. Deprivation will teach you. Experience what it is like to live without desires and distractions, and you just might be amazed how different life feels.

11. Ditch the people who drag you down

They say you're an average of the five people you spend most time with. It might be worthwhile to examine the kind of people you spend time with. If they're losers, they will infect you with their loser mentality. If they're whiners, they'll turn you into a whiner. If they're weak and unmotivated, they will sap your own energy. You see the pattern?

I had one friend whom I kept around for a long time out of misguided sense of loyalty. The only reward I got was having us reinforce each other's loserdom. I'm not friends with him anymore and I hope he's doing well, but I'm glad I lost him.

12. Take more risks and live dangerously

I have a theory that ennui and meaninglessness that plague our modern societies is the direct result of living a life without danger. Let's face it, our lives in the West are just too safe and too comfortable; is it any wonder that so many men today are addicted to gambling, drugs, and video games as a result?

To change that, be stupid (but not too stupid): take more risks in life.

13. Change your goals

The problem for you could be what you least expect: your goal. Perhaps your goal is not something you truly want. Maybe it's a goal you've been conditioned to believe is important. Your goal can even be supremely idiotic and you might not even realize it now.

I myself had several goals that I later abandoned when I realized how foolish they were.

It’s not always a good idea to have a single, grand goal and devote your life to it, “believing” in yourself that you will eventually actualize it. No, that’s foolish in our fast changing times. You wouldn’t bet your entire savings on a single investment, so why would you do that with goals? If you’re a slave to your dream, take a good look at yourself, take a good look at what you’re after, and take a good look at yourself again. Maybe it’s a supreme goal that you are fully capable of, maybe not. Only you can tell.

6 Signs You're A Slave To Vagina

April 18, 2016 | by Frank Follie | Link | Original Link

2014 was a bad year for me. Incidentally, I got laid more that year than in any other before or since. Wait. That doesn't add up. Sex = fulfillment = happiness, right?

No way.

I started out as a beta, the ultimate non-threat, a corkscrew in a Swiss Army Knife. If I knew one thing, it was how to pedestalize women. Woman actually, always one at a time. But through game I was able to plow through beta fields and graduate to what I thought was greener grass. No more oneitis goggles; they were all the same now: a mush of indistinct faces and vaginas, none any worse or better than the next, just a giant blank canvas for me to unleash the day's new colors on, creating what and however I felt like creating purely for inventor's delight.

A Kafkaesque metamorphosis. In 2014 I was now a relentless gamer: street game, library game, public transport game, cafe game, bar game, Tinder game, Wechat game, Tantan game. I was dominating every channel imaginable, short of doing 30-second TV slots to get me in your, well, slot. No job? No matter. No money? Enough for drinks, taxi fares, and KY Jelly. The rest? Fuck it. I had only one singular purpose in life: Henry Chinaski, women, women, women.

Yes, in shedding beta I'd given up being a prolific pedestalizer of women in distress. But in turning "alpha," I'd become something just as pathetic, if not more so: a pedestalizer of pussy, a slave to the very notion of snatch. Fortunately, most of that is in the past. I understand now that women are not a reason to get out of bed in the morning. If your daily priority list reads like such:

1. Bone Laqueefa

2. Scratch balls
3. Marathon through Big Bang Theory

…then you're in serious need of self-appraising.

As David Deida says in The Way of the Superior Man,

A man's highest purpose is his priority, not his intimacy. Your woman knows this. Deep inside, she really wants it to be this way. [A woman] would actually feel strange if her man suddenly said, "I've changed my mind. You are more important to me than the freedom of mankind. You are the most important thing in my life, and I don't care if my service to humanity is needed elsewhere, so I'm staying here with you."

As a man, you must live the straight and narrow, defined by your highest life purpose. But you must also watch out for the sirens. Homer warned us two millennia back—and that was a joke compared to today. With the rise and takeover of the whore machine, we are the most susceptible generation in history to the snatch virus that puts momentary euphoria over the masculine imperative of life purpose.

Odysseus (tied to the mast) vs. Sirens in BC. Imagine this same man in a place like Magaluf in 2016.

So I ask you: right now, what are you living for? Are you walking the straight and narrow? Or are the Siren songs making it little too hard to keep focus? Can't tell for sure? Here are six signs that women need to be demoted on your list of life priorities:

1. You're on Tinder or an equivalent—or worse, both

When your Tinder obsession gets so out of hand that you start taking on physical properties of the digital app.

If you find that you're opening Tinder multiple times in the day, swiping like there's real gold on the other side of your phone screen, (1) there's not and (2) it's time to trash the app for good. Frequent Tinder use is never an indication that a man is on top of his shit, working toward and putting his ultimate life goal front and center. Moreover, if Tinder's just one of many hookup apps in your phone, then the worst has been confirmed: you're a slave to the snatch. Get out now.

Everything in moderation: If you absolutely must use Tinder, limit your activity to one ten-minute swipe and message session per day.

2. You go on too many dates

In my "prime" I was doing four dates a week, four different girls. The entirety of my life's focus was on converting those dates to same-night lays. Whether I succeeded or not is immaterial. The point to let sink in here is that my spending everything (time and money) on a chance at casual sex was scientific proof that I'd lost my way as a man.

Everything in moderation: If it's solely for sex, I recommend one date a week max, with an extra freebie thrown in once a month at your discretion.

3. You're a scavenger at the club

Loading…

Here's what a club scavenger looks like: he hits the club with a friend or two, and as soon as everyone pays the trillion-dollar entrance fee… BREAK. They split into one-man search parties, ~~cocks~~ flashlights out and on the hunt for one thing only: isolated snatch.

While some people are there to enjoy the scene, the scavenger's purpose is very different; he will have enjoyed himself only if, by sunup, the sheriff has dick-dueled vagina and won flat-out. Otherwise the night was a failure, a waste of time, money, and especially dignity.

Everything in moderation: Maybe I'm biased because I hate clubs. Lots of ROK readers agree, but if you must go, I suggest twice a month max. Remember, go to have fun, not to scavenge.

4. You cum too much

This one is so underrated, and could be the key to unlocking your true potential as a man. As Napoleon Hill says in his seminal (no pun intended) Think And Grow Rich,

Sex desire is the most powerful of human desires. When driven by this desire, men develop keenness of imagination, courage, will-power, persistence, and creative ability unknown to them at other times. So strong and impelling is the desire for sexual contact that men freely run the risk of life and reputation to indulge it. When harnessed, and redirected along other lines, this motivating force maintains all of its attributes of keenness of imagination, courage, etc., which may be used as powerful creative forces in literature, art, or in any other profession of calling, including, of course, the accumulation of riches.

The "When harnessed…" line is a shout-out to sexual transmutation—that is, the art of transferring sex desire into other outlets for self-betterment purposes.

Everything in moderation: Remember, you drain yourself of the most powerful energy in the universe every time you shoot [Peter] North. Try this instead: take your age, divide by five, and the end result is your new magic number in between nut-busting days. So if you're 30, then you should be busting once every six days only. Internalizing this no doubt keeps you strong on your straight and narrow and ensures you're putting life purpose before vagina and short-term gratification.

5. You have unprotected casual sex

The embodiment of "6 Signs You're A Slave To Vagina."

Going raw with randos is the worst (and most dangerous) indicator of a man totally enslaved by his sex desire. What you're saying when you forego condoms is that the momentary dopamine fill is worth more than your past, present, and future life combined.

As Dave Chappelle liked to say, WRAP IT UP. Yes, easier said than done in the moment of passion and pleasure. But your life is about more than pleasure, remember?

Everything in moderation: Make her show you a notarized test result coming back negative for THE WORKS. Or, abide by the Big Sean line when he raps, "I'm the type to have a bulletproof condom… and still gotta pull out."

6. You often break your schedule for a shot at vagina

Everything in moderation: Always go by your schedule, not hers.

Remember, a letter to grandma is more important than twenty minutes with Sally Sue. If you find yourself constantly postponing or procrastinating on P1 tasks to accommodate the schedule of your hookup buddy(-ies), then you're in the red and it's time to make a change.

A Final Word

When I was a slave to vagina, it wasn't so much the addiction to actual snatch, or even the notion of it that kept me lighting the spoon for new fixes. That is, though her insides felt good, my own felt that much better, and that's why I couldn't stop. I'm talking, of course, about Ego, capital "E." Every time I brought a girl back home I felt like a fucking champ way before we ever stripped each others' clothes off. That was the carrot I was after, and that was why my 2014 was so depressing.

Once I identified Ego as the root of the problem, it was easier to ween off the snatch teat and focus on the things that truly matter in life. Make sure you're doing the same—there's no two ways around it. It's your imperative as a man.

Fortune Gives, And Fortune Takes Away

There is a quote of Michel Houellebecq that I like very much. “Anything can happen in life,” he once said, “especially nothing.” And this may be true. But sometimes, even nothing can have wide-reaching effects.

This was the first thought that came to mind when I tried to understand how things could so quickly have gone from good to very bad for Brazilian president Dilma Rousseff. Sometimes there is no discernible reason for one’s fall from grace. Being in the wrong place at the wrong time can be enough of a reason.

So much depends on what the Stoics called fortuna, or Fortune.

How quickly it can all unravel! Let us use Brazilian politics as an example. In the December 5, 2011 edition of the New Yorker Magazine, Rousseff was the subject of a glowing article that celebrated her transition from communist radical to head of state. The future was bright. Everything was moving in a forward direction.

And then, all of a sudden, it wasn’t. The economy faltered after 2012, and nothing the government did seemed to make it any better. Inflation began to fester, then took off at a full gallop. For all her attempt to look presidential, the Brazilian president seemed (at least to this writer) aloof, distracted, and perpetually flummoxed.

But it is hard not to separate Rousseff from her predecessor, ex-president Lula. An astute politician who left office with nearly an 80% approval rating, he seemed blessed by fortune. He rose from extreme poverty to become president; and when I say extreme poverty, I mean extreme.

His father had had two families and a total of twenty-two children. He began working as a machinist at the age of fourteen and lost a finger five years later. His first wife died in childbirth because he had lacked access to medical care. But somehow he overcame these handicaps and entered politics; some would say he was at the right place at the right time. As Brazil's political system became transformed after the end of the military period in the 1980s, his star rose.

Lula ran for president in 2002 when his predecessor Henrique Cardoso retired. It was a time of rising economic progress in the world, and the market for commodities was exploding. Everyone thought it would last for a long time. But perceptive observers would have smiled at the rosy, optimistic predictions. They would know that nations, like people, are often prisoners of their histories. In retrospect, it seems that much of Lula's achievements were transitory, or perhaps even illusory. He happened to be at the right place at the right time.

When Lula got into office, he was able to ride the wave of success created by Cardoso's anti-inflation program. Cardoso had completely overhauled Brazil's currency system and replace it with the real. It was a massive reset of the national economic system, but it worked. Lula cobbled together some social programs created by Cardoso and greatly expanded them into what would be called the Bolsa Familia system ("family grant"). It is a massive program that provides financial assistance to poor or disadvantaged families; it reaches about a quarter of the country's population.

Lula also initiated a consumer credit system for many citizens who had been unable to access loans of any kind. Under the credito consignado, financial institutions would be able to deduct payments directly from people's employers. Lula might have presided over the program, but it would not have worked without his predecessor's successes. Cynics would say that it was a simplified way for big business to pick the pockets of the average consumer.

These accomplishments—which look less impressive now than they did in 2010—came at some cost. Many would say that Lula simply tossed around a lot of money, rode the economic surge of the time, and coasted off the hard work of others. Corruption was still there, if one was prepared to look past the emotive headlines praising Lula.

The Brazilian press reported a huge government scandal in 2005 called the mensalão ("big monthly"). It was the usual story of payoffs being made to cement political alliances. Two of Lula's closest aides (Antonio Palocci and Jose Dirceu) were brought down in the scandal, and it was opening this that paved the way for the rise of Dilma Rousseff. The philosophically-minded reader will no doubt smile at the irony of this fact.

Corruption was always there. But when the money was rolling in, and the economy was steaming forward, no one wanted to pay it too much attention. Lula was even reelected in 2006, despite being surrounded by scandal and corruption. He was hailed as the world's best statesman, and he basked in the glory. Lula was everywhere, flexing his muscles; he even pushed to gain a permanent seat at the UN Security Council.

But fortuna always has a way of exacting her own revenge. One day we are riding the crests of waves; the next day, those same waves may grind our bodies against the seafloor.

Sometimes my Brazilian friends harangue me with great passion about how bad Dilma and Lula have been for the economy. As an ignorant foreigner, I listen politely, aware of the limitations of my knowledge of the subject. No doubt those in office should be held to account for the things that happen on their watches. But one could also see these two politicos, I gently suggest, as victims of circumstance, in the same way Herbert Hoover was when the Depression hit in 1929.

No one was more of a prodigy than Herbert Hoover. In the 1920s, he was considered a brilliant engineer and technocrat, a man who could work miracles. And yet it all evaporated after 1929. He would spend the rest of his life trying to vindicate his legacy. Perhaps the analogy is misplaced, and perhaps not.

"But you don't understand! They're corrupt!" my friends tell me. I know, I know, I say. And maybe they are right. But has not corruption always been there? Isn't it often a matter of circumstance as to who takes the blame?

I remember one time I was with a girl in one of the museums in Rio de Janeiro. On display in one of the cases was the blood-stained shirt of President Getulio Vargas. Vargas shot himself in the chest in 1954 in a suicide brought on by an apparent fit of depression.

I told the girl I was with that it was sad that he had killed himself. It’s too bad, I said, that he had been afflicted by depression. But she was not sympathetic. Her eyes narrowed, and she looked at me bemusedly. “He was depressed,” she said, “because he was caught stealing money.”

Why It’s Impossible For Men To Be Authentic

I noticed that the more I’m myself in a relationship with a woman (as I see myself), the happier I am with her. On the other hand, the more I have to change my behavior in line to what I think she would find attractive, the less satisfaction I get from that relationship. While “being yourself” is not the key to getting laid, it may be the key to being satisfied in relationships, but now that times have changed, this may be an impossible feat.

In more ancient times, relationships were much different than what we experience now. Back then, when a woman valued a man’s resources for her very own survival, the man could more or less be himself since there were less options for her to walk away YOLO-style and immediately find another man. He acted the opposite of what we have today, where most men apply a filter to their natural impulses in order to keep their women in a permanent state of being attracted. Today we do what we believe or know that women will like in a way to minimize our rejection rate and maximize the quantity or quality of sex or love that we receive. We apply rules, techniques, and strategies to meet women, because without them it would not be possible to achieve intimacy.

Even beta orbiters do this when they volunteer to be in the friendzone—they are applying a strategy that they truly believe will be the most effective means of starting a sexual relationship, however foolhardy that may be. Whatever strategy is used, whether beta or alpha, men must act inauthentic in order to gain intimacy that feels authentic. The beta must pretend to be a friend when he is interested in the girl and wants sex. The alpha must pretend to be aloof when he is interested in the girl and wants sex. They are both putting on a performance for the same goal. One performance gets the girl in her prime while the other gets her afterwards, when she has gained 20 pounds and becomes host to three different HPV strains.

The extreme of this inauthenticity is the married man who must apply “game” on his wife, even though she pledged to dedicate her life to him unto death, just so that she doesn’t get bored with him and cheat before draining his blood in a divorce. While the player has to put on a clown suit when he goes to the club to pick up women, the married man has to permanently wear the clown suit and hope she never strays, especially if he married an attractive Western woman.

Male authenticity is dead

Today, no man can be authentic in front of a woman. We can only behave and act through techniques and behaviors which have been documented to work. We have to learn an assortment of alpha traits and become more psychologically aware than BF Skinner just to get laid. We have to rip out our beta male souls, or just a natural impulse to be a good person, and morph it into something that a modern woman appreciates enough to spread her legs for the moment of sex, which ironically is becoming less authentic with each passing year as girls poorly mimic what they see in porn or read in stupid books, making loud noises of simulated pleasure while demanding to be strangled like a rag doll.

For men, acting must occur in the most mundane of situations:

- Are you sitting next to your girlfriend in a cafe and get the urge to compliment her beauty? You better not because then she will think you're needy.
- Are you annoyed that she's taking so long to reply to text messages? Too bad because you can't tell her it bothers you. Take a long time to reply as well so she becomes anxious and remains attracted to you.
- Are you sad because your aunt just died? You better hide it because if she sees that you're upset she will think you're a weak man and start replying to her OK Cupid message backlog.
- Do you want to tell a girl on a first date how she is fun to be with? You can't do that because she'll think you're falling in love with her.

One reason the game is not worth it for some men is because we are forced to be actors and clowns in the presence of women for transient sexual gain. I would do 1,000 approaches if it meant I met a girl who would unconditionally love me for who I am and will become for all eternity, but this is an absolute impossibility where girls can survive without men. Instead I will have to dance and juggle for her, sleep with her maybe 10 times, but more like 4 or 5, and then the relationship will get stale, neither of us able to find the will or motivation to continue because of the type of 20th century environment we were born into by no choice of our own.

Successful relationships depend on authenticity

Relationship that is not successful

Relationships that have lifelong worth, where you gain as much value as you put in, can only come when you're the most authentic (it's impossible to be 100% authentic, but 80% or above is a good goal). This is the point where it doesn't feel like you're expending labor every day just to keep her. Unfortunately, it's becoming impossible to achieve high authenticity outside the realm of familial and friendly relations where you can be more direct with your beliefs, desires, dreams, and hopes. With women you're sexual with, being open and honest is dangerous. Tell her what you think or feel and she's out the door.

The problem is that if you can't be honest with someone and express your true thoughts, you're in a relationship that can't possibly last. If you're applying game to your wife, and that game is not congruent with your beliefs, the marriage will end. If you're authentic to a person who is inauthentic, that relationship will fail. Becoming authentic—of knowing not only the red pill truths of the world but the truths of your self—may be a losing proposition in a world that is becoming grotesquely inauthentic, even denying basic truths of human nature and gender like we see with progressivism in America. Knowing the truth may be the fastest path to isolation and loneliness because sooner than later you'll tired of putting on your actor's mask.

Options for men who don't want to wear the mask

While it’s easy to be inauthentic for the short time it takes to get many girls into bed, this isn’t a sustainable solution if you ever want to take off the mask. That leaves us with two options. The first is to become the alpha male that most women want, where your impulse changes from unconsciously doing naturally beta acts to alpha acts. This can only come when you internalize game (at least 5 years of practice) like how a professional basketball player can shoot with his eyes closed, but how alpha you can become from full-blown beta is up for debate.

The second option is to have fun being the clown to get a variety of sex, but only plan for long-term relationships with women who appreciate your true—albeit constantly changing—self. It’s clear to me that for men to be happy with women in today’s environment, a combination of both will have to take place.

Men will have to uproot their nice guy instincts and put on a mask to have sex with pretty girls who demand a clown while considering something long term with the occasional girl who loves us even more when we temporarily take off that mask. Yet in terms of being ourselves at all times with women and being everlastingly happy with them—I’m sad to announce that we live in an age where that is not possible. And there’s nothing we can do about it.

How Motorcycle Racing Helps Us Rediscover Masculine Risk-Taking

What could be crazier than a white-knuckle race through city streets, countryside, and around blind curves on a motorcycle? The Isle of Man TT is just that, widely considered the most prestigious race in all of motorcycle racing and the ultimate test of man and machine. The TT has run since 1907 on the tiny Isle of Man between Ireland and Scotland.

The highlight is the Superbike TT which contains motorcycles of 1000c to 1200c and regularly reaches speeds of over 200 miles per hour. There are other classes of racing, but the Superbike TT is without a doubt the biggest adrenaline rush.

The race showcases risk-taking, death-defying male behavior rarely seen in the increasingly gelded Western world. It is literally death-defying, it is balls out, it is certifiably insane. That is arguably what makes it great.

The legacy media roundly criticizes the event, as there have been over 140 deaths of competitors at practices or races since its inception—an average of slightly more than one death annually! In 2005 alone 11 men died. If the entire series is included, adding the Manx Grand Prix and Clubman series of the 1940s and 1950s the total number of deaths jumps to almost 250. But the races continue.

Death is waiting around every turn at the TT

The Course

The Snaefell Mountain Course is where the action takes place. It is a 37.73 mile course around the Isle of Man that starts in Douglas. At the incredible speeds of 150 to 200 miles per hour, it takes less than 20 minutes to run the entire course.

The 37.73 mile Isle of Man TT course starts in Douglas

The course runs through narrow city streets, bumpy back roads, curvy mountain roads, and rolling countryside. Some say it makes Nürburgring look like an amateur course by comparison. This video shows what it is like to run a lap around the Isle of Man TT at speeds topping 200 mph, seen from Guy Martin’s point of view as he races one of the event’s biggest names, Michael Dunlop. The skill of these riders is simply amazing.

TT Titans

The Lap Record was set by John McGuinness during the 2015 season. McGuinness blazed through the course at an average speed of 132.701 miles per hour in 17 minutes and 3.567 seconds.

McGuinness had this to say after his record-setting run in 2015.

> It’s something I’m really proud of, winning against all those youngsters. The bar is going up and up and I’ve got to go up with them. I’m 43 now, and I’m not in the greatest shape in the world, but mentally I’m strong. When you reach my age, you look crap but I feel great, and I still know how to do it. I just needed to find that little bit of heart and determination, and belief.

The Race Record is held by Michael Dunlop, who completed the 6 laps of the TT in 1 hour, 45 minutes and 29.980 seconds at an average speed of 128.747 miles per hour during the 2013 season. Together with McGuinness, Dunlop is one of the biggest names in the sport.

Dunlop’s brother, Robert died in the 2008 Isle of Man TT after a crash. Dunlop responds to some of the criticism he regularly receives for racing each year.

> People say it’s a dangerous sport and that you are mad in the head and if I’m honest, yeah, I have a little touch in the head and I’m probably not the full square.
> But at the end of the day, I’m not battering women or taking drugs.

Male Risk Taking Behavior

Aside from the glory and love of sport, what could possibly motivate men to take such risks? We need look no further than the demands of natural selection. It is ingrained into male DNA to take risks. The University of California at San Diego did research into male risk-taking and came up with these scientific conclusions:

> For physiological reasons, the investment required to produce an offspring is generally much greater for a female than for a male (in humans 9 months of gestation time vs. a few minutes). Thus, a male potentially can greatly increase his Darwinian fitness by having sex with multiple partners, whereas a female cannot. One potential consequence of this is much greater variability in male reproductive success than female. This difference may make it adaptive for males to be willing to take great risks for a chance of raising their attractiveness to mates (Buss, 2003). For example, suppose that running a 5% risk of death can move an organism's fertility from the 50th percentile for their sex to the 90th.

And that is what it is all about at the end of the day. As one scientist puts it:

> [Sexual selection] comes down to the heartless business of nature saving those heredities that work and rejecting those that don't.

It is a cost-benefit analysis that works out in favor of male risk-taking behavior. Of course there will be males that die or are maimed, but females fuck the winners. As cold as that statement is, it is absolutely true in nature. You need look no further than the first few seconds of this video to see the female reaction to the risk taking at the Isle of Man TT. The lady literally screams with glee as each of the racers zoom by.

Sad as it is, in nature the male is expendable. Only in the human family through patriarchy have males been given a seat at the table. (Feminism will return the human species to a feral state since there will be no more paternity guarantees or incentive for paternal investment.)

Biologically, even though civilization has refined men through patriarchy, the same drives towards risk-taking behavior are still encoded into us. We all know women are drawn to risk takers and bad boys like a moth to a flame. To a female, a risk-taking, devil may care male attitude says to her biological sex drive these genes are worth keeping. So, men take risks. It's just part of what we do.

Imagine if men did not take risks in the past where we would be as a species. It is evolutionary advantageous for males to take risks versus being soft, safety-obsessed herbs that stay home and hide behind mommy's skirt. This risk-taking behavior has pushed our species forward, which is why it is so tragic that male behavior is being socially engineered to be more lady-like in the West. We need to rediscover this behavior in the West.

Rediscovering Masculinity

It goes without saying that not every man needs to be doing 200 mph in a motorcycle road race, but masculinity and its rough around the edges, risk-taking, experimenting behavior is important to the continued well-being of our species. For that reason, the Isle of Man TT is a celebration of what makes it great to be a man.

Risk-taking behavior is ingrained into male DNA

One can then carry this inspiration over into other areas of life that have nothing to do with motorcycles: entrepreneurship, travel, forming a family, competition, or running off to the Caribbean. Rather than obsess over security and safety, men need to be worrying about liberty and the freedom to take risks. We need to be allowed to fail since men often learn more from failure than anything else. The state needs to get out of mens' lives and let us live.

As politician Dean Alfange puts it in his classic poem:

> I do not choose to be a common man. It is my right to be uncommon— if I can. I seek opportunity not security. I do not wish to be a kept citizen, humbled and dulled by having the state look after me.
> I want to take the calculated risk; to dream and to build, to fail and to succeed. I refuse to barter incentive for a dole. I prefer the challenges of life to the guaranteed existence; the thrill of fulfillment to the stale calm of utopia.
> I will not trade freedom for beneficence nor my dignity for a handout. I will never cower before any master nor bend to any threat.
> It is my heritage to stand erect, proud and unafraid; to think and act for myself, enjoy the benefit of my creations and to face the world boldly and say, "This I have done."

Another area of encouragement also coming out of Europe has been a recent move towards music and music videos with masculine themes as more and more men perhaps realize being tranquilized by a nanny state and bossed around by women is not good for them or humanity.

If you are interested in seeing the Isle of Man TT in person, it will run in late May and early June this year. You can find out more on the Isle of Man TT web site.

11 Male “Superfoods” You Need To Eat To Burn Fat And Build Ripped Muscle

April 19, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Drew Canole

Hey!

My name is Drew Canole, and I’m the founder and CEO of Fitlife.tv. Not only am I a health and fitness trainer, but I’m a Life Transformation Coach as well. What I teach starts with getting you into super human, vibrant health internally first…

Which leads to awesome results on the outside, that will result in the great looking body that you want regardless of your age, size, metabolism, or genetics.

And I’m going to be completely honest with you… Despite what so many other “health” and “fitness” coaches have told you, THIS is the only thing that will make you the best on the inside AND outside as you can be…

Superfoods.

I’m obsessed with superfoods. Here’s why…

Why I love Superfoods

Currently, you and I are living in a toxic environment, my friend. Everywhere we go there are more and more toxins creeping up on us. Should you live in fear, build a giant bubble and only go outside in that plastic construct that protects you?
Probably not… even though it’d be better for you, that’s not reasonable.

In studying about toxins and all the nasty things in our food and environment, it can be easy to get discouraged. Sometimes it can feel absolutely impossible to eat clean.

Modern society had made cheap food convenient and healthy food something for the wealthy.

Should we be scared? Angry? Bitter? Sad? Hopeless? I don't think so.

Mother Nature has not left us alone. She is still working hard to provide us with amazing, nutrient-dense, healing superfoods that can help protect and heal us from the toxins in our world.

I'm telling you, superfoods are the most nutrient dense you will ever come across.

So, if you are ready to raise testosterone, burn fat, and build muscle… you've come to the right place.

Top 11 Superfoods Your Body NEEDS Every Single Day

1. Chlorella

Chlorella is a single celled microalgae that is loaded with nutrients needed for many body functions. This is one of the very first super foods I ever purchased.

Daily consumption of chlorella has been linked to lowered risk of cardiovascular disease.

Some evidence shows that chlorella, which is rich in proteins, vitamins and minerals, may help to relieve symptoms of fibromyalgia and other similar disorders like hypertension and ulcerative colitis.

Because chlorella is high in chlorophyll, it also helps to control hunger cravings, body odor, relieve swelling and redness from infections, promote cleansing and healing in the body and even protect DNA against fried foods.

2. Moringa Leaf

In 2007, Moringa leaf was recognized by the National Institute of Health as the Botanical of the Year! It is said to have saved more lives in Third World countries than any other plant and has potential to treat over 300 diseases.

An animal study done at the University of Allahabad showed Moringa lowers blood sugar levels by up to 29%! This puts Moringa Leaf high on the list of foods that may help those suffering from diabetes.

This superfood may also prove to have potent anti-cancer properties. A study at the Korea Atomic Energy Research Institute showed Moringa leaf can kill up to 93% of lung cancer cells.

Moringa leaf is also believed to boost the immune system, increase metabolism and help with weight loss, aid digestion, help with tumors and ulcers and to detoxify the kidneys and liver.

3. Spirulina

Spirulina is a natural algae powder. May not look pretty but it is a nutritional monster! Spirulina is packed with chlorophyll, protein, iron, Vitamin C, D, A, E, B12, folic acid, potassium, calcium and ALL all essential amino acids!!

Studies have been done that show components in spirulina have neuroprotective benefits and may have potential as an alternative drug therapy in aging related disorders such as Parkinson’s and Alzheimer’s Disease.

Spirulina has been found to have incredibly high levels of antioxidants. It has 4 times the ORAC (or antioxidant value) of blueberries! It is a good source of gamma linoleic acid (GLA – an essential fatty acid) that is known for its anti-inflammatory properties. Inflammation is a major cause/contributor to a number of cardiovascular and other chronic diseases.

Because of its high chlorophyll content, spirulina is a natural detoxifier and cleanser that removes foreign material (heavy metals, toxins etc.) from the body.

4. Mint

Here's a superfood you're probably familiar with. Mint has an impressive lineup of antimicrobial, antiviral anti-tumor, anti-allergenic and antioxidant properties.

Mint is most well known for its healing effects on the digestive system. It soothes the stomach and also triggers the production of more saliva and digestive enzymes in the mouth. This helps to start the breakdown of foods before they even hit the intestines, making for more comfortable digestion.

Peppermint may help to alleviate gas and other sources of abdominal pain due to its relaxing effect on the muscles of the intestines. Some studies have found peppermint oil to be as effective as Buscopan for treating colonic spasms.

Dr. Mercola quotes several studies saying that Peppermint oil capsules are "the drug of first choice" in patients suffering from IBS.

5. Matcha Green Tea

A Japanese priest named Esai said of green tea: "Tea is the ultimate mental and medical remedy and has the ability to make one's life more full and complete." Matcha has remained a staple in sacred Japanese ceremonies for centuries.

Green Tea is is packed with antioxidants and nutrients, which reduce stress, regulate hormones and promote relaxation and mental clarity. It has long been used for weight loss and boosting the metabolism.

This superfood has particularly beneficial properties for the liver. Our liver is incredibly important as it removes toxins from the blood, regulates the composition of blood, processes nutrients and metabolizes drugs and substances like alcohol.

Matcha protects the liver from harmful chemicals, helps slow dehydration, inhibits tumor growth in the liver, protects against damage that is caused by medication, etc. The caffeine in matcha appears to help strengthen serum and membrane density in the liver.

6. Wheatgrass

Some of the most powerful animals on the planet live off a diet of mainly grass. Turns out that consuming one ounce of wheatgrass is nutritionally equivalent to eating two pounds of greens…!

Wheatgrass is rich in chlorophyll; a green-pigment molecule that gives plants power to absorb energy from the sun. Studies have shown that chlorophyll may help to protect DNA from toxin damage, suppress appetite, sooth infections and has powerful cleansing properties.

The chlorophyll in wheatgrass may also help those with anemia or other blood-related disorders. Animal studies have shown that administration of wheatgrass returns red cell count back to normal in animals with anemia within 4-5 days!

7. Ashwagandha

Ashwagandha is one of the most powerful herbs in Ayurvedic medicine and use of the root can be traced back over 3000 years. It has been called “King and Queen of Herbs” and is esteemed very highly for its medicinal properties.

The Ashwagandha plant is a tonic and an adaptogen, which means it restores the brain and body to homeostasis after physical and psychological stress. Ashwagandha helps our bodies maintain balance and improves our ability to cope with stress.

A study published in the Indian Journal of Psychological Medicine shows that Ashwagandha achieves a highly significant reduction in stress and anxiety, and serum cortisol levels. In fact it was able to reduce cortisol up to 27.9%!

One of my very favorite things about Ashwagandha (this blew my mind) is its ability to stimulate neurogenesis—the birth of new brain cells… Not very many plants out there can do this!

In human clinical trials, taking Ashwagandha by mouth for only five days suggested anti-anxiety and anti-depressant effects just as strong as when taking certain pharmaceutical drugs.

8. Turmeric

Turmeric is a popular spice that is widely used in India. It’s easy to use and inexpensive and my cupboards are absolutely full of it! The main ingredient found in turmeric is curcumin and most of it’s medicinal properties come from this active ingredient.

Research has linked turmeric to lower incidence of certain cancers like breast, prostate, lung and colon. Turmeric combined with onions has been shown to prevent colon cancer. A study published in the journal of Clinical Gastroenterology and Hepatology found that turmeric and quercetin (found in onions) help prevent and even reduce precancerous cells in the colon. Turmeric combined with cruciferous vegetables like cauliflower is helpful in the prevention of prostate cancer.

Turmeric is packed with anti-inflammatory properties that are useful for preventing and alleviating symptoms of arthritis, muscle soreness, and much more. In research studies, cucumin is comparable to anti-inflammatory prescription and over the counter drugs like hydrocortisone and phenylbutazone.

Curcumin contains potent antioxidant effects. Clinical studies conducted on curcumin have found that it is able to neutralize free radicals that in many instances cause cancer.

Besides the benefits of antioxidant properties that turmeric provides, turmeric also is great for liver detoxification and improves liver function, cardiovascular protection, reduction of cholesterol levels and prevention of Alzheimer's disease.

Think we're finished with this awesome superfood yet? Think again…

Studies also reveal that turmeric is superior to Prozac in treating depression.

9. Lemon

We're big fans of lemons here at FitLife and use them on a daily basis for their nutritional, medicinal, healing and beautifying properties. There are SO MANY THINGS you can do with lemon juice and lemon peel that I could write a long book about them all.

Although lemon is an acidic fruit, it has an alkalizing effect on the body. Lemon balances the body's pH, which in turn protects the body from illness and disease. You see, disease CANNOT thrive in an alkaline environment…

Lemons contain powerful antibacterial and anticancer properties and are rich in vitamin C. They also help to purify your blood and clean out the kidneys.

Drinking water with fresh squeezed lemon every morning is an excellent and easy habit that can make a big difference in your health.

10. Beets

Beets are packed with potassium, iron, vitamin C, magnesium, calcium, manganese, folic acid and zinc. Beet juice is high in antioxidants and known for its ability to cleanse the liver, which has many benefits to the health of your skin…

When the liver becomes overloaded with toxins, it often sends them to the skin for detoxification help. In trying to process these substances, the skin can become inflamed or irritated. So supporting the liver is vital to maintaining a youthful appearance as you age.

Beet juice has also been shown to boost stamina. A study showed athletes who drank beetroot juice could exercise 16% longer than those who didn't. That's pretty impressive.

Beet juice may also be a helpful tool in overcoming symptoms of leaky gut.

Don't get stuck only using the roots—the beet greens actually contain more nutrients than the roots!

11. Monk Fruit

Did you know that monk fruit is 170 times sweeter than regular sugar? Not only that but it is full of medicinal properties that have been recognized since the 13th century. It was known by Chinese monks as the longevity fruit and is believed to be a factor in their living to be over 100 years old.

Monk fruit is a powerful anti-allergenic because of its antihistamine-like effects. Histamine is also a problem in those with asthma, making this superfood beneficial on the respiratory system.

Monk fruit is also believed to soothe the digestive tract and boost the immune system.

If you are looking for that extra boost in life…

If you are wanting more energy…

If you are combating a challenging disease or illness…

I would HIGHLY recommend you turn to superfoods. They will give you the edge you need to jump to that next level of health and vitality.

If you're busy and worried about having enough time and money to buy and make enough superfoods to keep you on top of your game, the FitLife team has created a green superfood powder with all the above listed superfoods just for you.

It's the easiest way to get all the fat burning and muscle building nutrients you need for a long life and healthy body.

This juice even promotes neurogenesis. That's the replication of brand new brain cells. What do you think juice like that could do for the rest of your body?

Drink a glass of green juice each day and start burning fat, building muscle, and getting the body you deserve.

Remember, we're in this together.

Drew Canole

P.S. After I started taking the right superfoods every day, my entire life changed. I went from 17.2% body fat to 5.75%, and I've kept it off for years.

Not only do I look better, but I have more energy and feel incredible as well.

3 Chilling Predictions For The United States In 2040

April 20, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The United States has gone from the most powerful country in the world, one that could best the Soviet Union in military capacity whilst having living standards ten times higher, to a flimsy shell about to break at any moment. And it will only get worse in the coming quarter of a century. America's financial situation will implode, its already fractious race relations will explode, and its external prestige and even security will be under unprecedented threat from China. Added to these massive problems will be draconian anti-male laws and political policies, plus the severe demographic crisis facilitated by illegal immigration and non-assimilation, especially in the Mexican border states, after so many years of rampant neglect.

In effect, America will cease to be America. It will be a distended mass of land and people whose continuing livelihoods (or what remains of them) will often depend more on outside countries and forces than internal factors or characteristics.

This first article on America's very negative impending future will focus on "rape" trials, race-based crimes, and the cultural, if not political absorption of US border states by Mexico.

1. "Affirmative consent" will be enforced in the legal system, not just on college campuses

Jurisdictions such as California have already had their legislatures enact requirements for affirmative consent in any state-funded higher education institution. These states, invariably liberal ones, have ample room to change local criminal laws. Presently, the legal fraternity and civil libertarians are capable of arresting any such push, along with perhaps a majority of the population. But for how long? 2040 is looming as part of a period where such caution is thrown to wind and men can be convicted in a court of law using standards and "protections" that make the rules of a typical kangaroo court look robust.

Worse still, legal trends analogous to affirmative consent have been in operation for criminal charges of rape for a very long time. So this anticipated shift to bogus affirmative consent standards may occur well before 25 years from now, meaning that 2040 might see still worse legal biases against men. We will also continue to see disproportionate sentences handed out for rape compared to other serious crimes, such as a man maiming another man for life, putting him in a wheelchair, or giving him permanent brain damage.

As I have consistently opined, the beyond reasonable doubt standard for male-on-female sexual assault accusations is currently significantly gerrymandered. Whereas very few juries or judges will convict based on circumstantial evidence for an armed robbery, murder or a very serious (male-on-male) assault, sexual assault is a misnomer. The testimony of one woman, even after it changes multiple times or involves proven lies, is frequently used to send a man to jail for countless years. Plus, her sexual history, including any previous false or doubtful rape allegations, is generally discarded or outright banned from being raised in the courtroom. Yet his purported history, which should have no bearing on the allegation itself, is most often admissible. Expect this sad set of legal realities to become much worse over the coming years.

2. Black-on-white and Hispanic-on-white crime will explode and be tolerated like never before

Unless America's present social trajectory is changed, attacks on whites by minorities will become nothing short of a sport. Like in 2016, 2040 will likely show that facts have zero bearing on the campaigns mounted by SJWs. Far less than 1% of blacks killed by others in modern times are killed by police. And the vast majority of those downed by law enforcement, including Ferguson thug Michael Brown, were attacking the police or third parties when they were shot, whether with weapons or without them. Yet Black Lives Matter supporters and their enablers would have us believe that 99% of black homicides are caused by police, namely because they literally devote 10,000 times less attention to blacks killing other blacks. This ignorance of the truth will have only compounded by 2040.

Meanwhile, black-on-white attacks in the early 21st century, proportionally much more common than the reverse, are perennially ignored. This is despite trends such as white flight to the suburbs and the claiming of once white-majority cities, such as Detroit, by blacks. Persistent media refusal to report on and government refusal to address the heavily racialized nature of crime in the United States has created an environment where black-on-white crimes cannot ever be racist and are even seen as "payback" for slavery and Jim Crow laws. Again, we will see this excusing of violence drag on and expand.

This vacuum of ignoring black-on-black and black-on-white crime will snowball very deleteriously in the coming decades. It is very hard for the proportion of black deaths caused by other blacks to go much higher, only because it currently rests at about 93%. But the raw numbers themselves, against both blacks and whites, will increase. Felony-inclined Hispanics will join the minority-on-white free-for-all as well. The permissive environment of failing to call out crimes against whites will lead to an even more cowering and politically correct Caucasian population. SJWs and other whites under their spell will believe they deserve what they get, no matter how atrocious the behavior.

Aside from just impacting whites, this climate of sanctioned violence will relegate yet another generation of blacks and Hispanics to poverty created by the bad elements within their own communities. A cross-section of blacks and Hispanics will ruin life for the majority who are law-abiding and simply want a good life and harmonious relations with their neighbors, whether they are white, black, Hispanic, or Asian. All we need is 5-10% of one of the main ethnic populations to go haywire and everyone else of all races is left to pick up the pieces.

3. Southern California, Arizona, New Mexico, and southern Texas will be de facto states of Mexico

2040 will have proven fear-inducing forecasts about Mexico and illegal immigration from a number of paleo-conservative and other genuine rightwing pundits. For example, Pat Buchanan, former Presidential advisor and Republican and Reform Party Presidential candidate, warned years ago in his books State of Emergency and The Death of the West that immigration and internal demographic trends were going to destroy the US as we know it. He pointed to the massive changes wrought by the extension of citizenship and multiculturalism in the Roman Empire and how every society that has gone down America's path has eventually disintegrated. The first places to disintegrate in the US will be those that have borne the brunt of the illegal immigration pandemic: California, Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas.

For years, Mexican illegal immigrants, enabled by even nominal conservatives like Ronald Reagan, have been allowed to pour across the United States, obtain over-generous offers of amnesty, or maintain de facto residence courtesy of having anchor babies. Promises to stop the lunacy of amnesties and other concessions are only followed by an even greater set of privileges given to more illegals five to ten years later. This has sent a clear message that very serious US laws are either not going to be enforced or cannot be enforced, which is reflected in the free hand Mexican drug cartels have in many parts of the southeastern United States.

Because of all this, 2040 will see majority Hispanic populations from Los Angeles to El Paso. Most Hispanic-Americans will either have comparable loyalties to foreign countries like Mexico, or weak American identities susceptible to switching when local populations begin to express a clear Hispanic majority. And with superior Hispanic birthrates, major cities will express decisive Hispanic majorities.

If southern California, Arizona, New Mexico, and southern Texas are not politically dictated to by Mexico in a direct sense, they will be massively influenced indirectly. Crime levels currently seen in areas controlled by Mexican drug cartels, such as Tijuana, will push ever further into the US itself, bringing governmental havoc, unprecedented violence, horrendous rates of drug addiction, and in many places endemic political corruption.

Get out or be prepared to ride the storm

If you are in your teens, twenties or thirties and either plan to have children or already have young ones, now is the time to be setting yourself up for an almost certainly bad and probably very bad future for the United States. For those of you who are older, you need to expect the worst also. This applies to men of all races. The SJW ideology is particularly pernicious to white males, but the color of your skin will not protect you from the continued decline and then collapse of the once unchallengeable USA.

Return Of Kings is an outlet that unapologetically strives to help you get the best out of yourself. We believe in optimism and the ability to fight back against a corrosive and cancerous cultural narrative. Nevertheless, we are not starry-eyed fools. We should never mollycoddle ourselves or each other about the very harsh social and political realities that await us, both now and in the future.

Why Is The Media's Reporting On The Panama Papers So Focused On Vladimir Putin?

Unless you have been living under a big rock for the last few weeks, you have probably heard of the Panama Papers, documents that mysteriously found their way into the hands of the German daily Sueddeutsche Zeitung, member of particular Western media group that we will focus on a bit later.

The files allegedly "leaked" from the fourth biggest offshore law firm in the world, Mossack Fonseca. Among the names present in the documents, 12 national leaders and 143 politicians, their families and close associates from around the world known to have been using offshore tax havens.

The use of offshore business entities is not illegal when they are regimented and follow the jurisdictions in which they are registered. But the investigation reporters apparently found that some of the companies may have been used (the investigation is still pending and just like for those propagating rape culture, unfortunately, an accusation is not a proof of guilt) for illegal purposes, including fraud, drug trafficking, and tax evasion.

But interestingly, only one face has been plastered all over the news. Who, among the world leaders, embodies the nemesis of the gay-friendly, feminized, globalist scheming Left?

And we have a winner!

So why this organized kabbala against Vladimir, absent from the papers, and the clemency shown towards the Saudi Arabian king, the Ukrainian president, or the UK's Prime Minister? Many factors can explain it: his refusal to bow under Western hegemony, his refusal to adopt the gay-friendly, multicultural agenda imposed by leftists' standards, his protection of the interests of his country against foreign investors. The list is quite long.

What interests us here is the incredible media bias that is at play here and that has become too regular lately, not verifying information or cherrypicking it for more clicks and following the plans of their employers. It proves once more that impartiality and reporting facts is not a priority or a duty. The reporters obey to masters, follow an agenda and must have quotas and targets.

A few facts

In contradiction with speculations on the Panama Papers, here are a few interesting facts:

- Western media (list detailed later in the article) speak of Putin's "best friend(s)", "inner circle" but are covering the headlines with his own picture, often ignoring prominent figures who are present in the Panama Papers
- The leaked material includes 4.8 million email messages, 1 million images, and covers 40 years of the operations of the Panama-based law firm Mossack Fonseca, starting in 1977 — with 14,000 clients and 214,000 companies named in the files. In the "groundbreaking" parts released to the public, the name of Vladimir Putin is not mentioned once.
- There are no US or American political figures, citizens of the first global economical power, involved in the leak.
- Mossack Fonseca partner, Mr Ramon Fonseca, also reported that the documents, taken out of context, according to him, have not been leaked as advertised, but stolen. Washington, on its side, does not really know if the leak was data-theft or not. They also could not say if there was a difference between the Panama Papers leak and the documents disclosed by Wikileaks, that they consider a crime and an act of treason and theft.
- The reports have been "leaked" over a year ago and kept in the greatest secrecy. International "journalists" supposedly "compiled it" together to give it to the public. For the "groundbreaking leak of the century", that is a hell of a suspense builder.

The two persons described as “Putin’s inner circle” and “best friends”

Mentioned in the Panama Papers and described as Putin’s “brothers” or “best friends,” billionaire Rotenberg and his brother (blacklisted by the USA) know Vladimir Putin because they practiced Judo together in the 60’s. Roldugin, a famous cellist, met Putin in the 70’s and is the godfather of his daughter. Who is one’s best friend? I can count my friends on one hand. Only a man himself can tell who his best friend really is in his close knit community.

How can the media, who lately do not investigate thoroughly and is satisfied with only pointing fingers, know who Putin’s “best friend” is? Would one of the most powerful man in the world would mix friendship and business, and entrust his money to a musician?

Meanwhile, Vova does not give a hoot

Men eat together, hang out, or do business with people that are not their friends. But onlookers could think so. As they shake each other's hand and are courteous to one another, in our new sanitized world, any physical mark of politeness is considered abnormal. In this world of sharks and traitors, Putin has probably not more than a couple of "true" friends, that do not care about his power or money. They are certainly not dealing with his fortune. But he has legions of vultures, lapping at his feet to receive crumbs of his wealth.

The David Cameron case

Let's take the case of Mr Cameron, neck deep in the Panama papers, as it is his own father who sorted out his piggybank with the firm Mossack Fonseca. Dave first denied, then changed his mind, then confessed, then vowed to be the champion of the UK's fight against tax evasion. Bit too late, Dave?

English sunburn or blush of the liar's guilt?

Here it is not an hypothetical "best friend," but rather someone that has a direct blood link to the accused. His own flesh. Nothing is stronger than blood ties. But strangely, the British Brainwashing Cloaca, also known as the BBC, did not mention him until very recently in the Panama Papers scandal. Nor did the leftist Guardian. Even with their own head of state involved, the only picture you find in the article depicts Putin.

In a Hail-mary bid to try to justify himself, Cameron publicly published his "accounts" after a statement at the House of Commons. his line of defense was "Yes, I did it a bit. But everyone does it too".

We do not want to see your tax files, David. If you show us what you want us to see, you won't choose incriminating papers. A man won't present the stick he will be beaten with. Just like the beta male displaying the freshly cleared, almost virginal browser history after a 12-hour one-handed porn binge, with his face still red, Cameron has "liar" seared on his forehead.

He also asserts that he does not have "any offshore accounts or funds since 2010." Strange coincidence that his dad, the one running the accounts, died the same year. The 3 to 30 million dollars (to be determined) fund is still active. Who calls the shots? Who is enjoying it? I'd be curious to see David Cameron publishing the same kind of accounts for his three other siblings.

We don't want to see what you willingly show us. If we want to uncover the truth, we want to see what an exterior authority (a court) orders you to show, such as your father's accounts and who he transferred his money to.

The Shadow of Soros looms all over it

As usual, he has all his dirty little fingers in a lot of dirty little pies. For the few of you sleeping at the back of the classroom who do not know, George Soros is born Schwartz Györgi, a US-Hungarian business investor, magnate and billionaire which focuses on investing his fortune and influence into "progressive" and liberal causes such as:

- The "defense of human rights, especially the rights of women, ethnic, racial, and religious minorities, drug users, sex workers, and LGBTQ communities"
- "Developing democracy in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union"
- The "promotion, in the USA, of reforms in criminal justice, drug policy, palliative care, education, immigration, equal rights, and democratic governance
- The "advancement of the rights of Roma communities in Europe"
- The Black Lives Matter movement
- Anything that prevents Donald Trump from being elected President
- The French Collective Against Islamophobia and the Open Society Justice Initiative, which invented the catchphrase "contrôle au faciès" ("features-related control") to throw as an accusation on any police constable that searches Non-native French suspects.
- The OTPOR organization, dissident group that tried to bring down the Milosevic regime in Serbia
- The CANVAS "non-violent" organization, leading various seminar to teach people how to bring down sovereign governents, like it did in Georgia, Ukraine, Egypt, The Maldives and others. Many of the leaders of the "Arab Spring" received training from CANVAS.

And many, many others. Is Mr. Soros advancing his pawns, trying to castigate Putin and his country, in order to start his own "Cold War 2.0"?

Only a certain group of people wants to impose "vibrant" additions to Western nations

Incidentally, Soros' activities in Russia are not very popular. As Russian channel RT puts it :

> Organizations belonging to Soros have been proclaimed to be "undesirable" in Russia. Last year, the Russian Prosecutor General's Office recognized Soros's Open Society Foundations and the Open Society Institute Assistance Foundation as undesirable groups, banning Russian citizens and organizations from participation in any of their projects.
> Prosecutors then said the activities of the institute and its assistance foundation were a threat to the basis of Russia's constitutional order and national security. Earlier this year, the billionaire US investor alleged that Putin is "no ally" to US and EU leaders, and that he aims "to gain considerable economic benefits from dividing Europe."

He is also the one behind the No Border group which smuggles illegally legions of migrants in the recent European invasion crisis and the author of the delightful sentence "National borders are the enemy".

The puppeteer's curtain is not thick enough to hide him

Wikileaks have indeed confirmed that the whole Panama Papers leak was organized by Washington and Soros, who had the info in their possession. It was just kept handy to strike at the ones that bother their plans.

Shots fired

The main organizations between the leak are the OpenSociety/Soros funded OCCRP (Organized Crime and Corruption Reporting Project), which has, despite its ominous name, no juridical weight or power.

The main media sources and partners relaying the info and focusing on Putin's hypothetical involvement are part of the ICIJ syndicate.

The ICIJ (International Consortium of Investigative journalism) backed by the Center for Public Integrity, is also the one that Wikileaks accuses of bias, directing the fire on Putin and almost forgetting the others incriminated. They did not wait long to start a cut-throat competition:

But who are exactly the ICIJ? According to their page (emphasis theirs):

> Founded in 1997 by the respected American journalist Chuck Lewis, ICIJ was launched as a project of the Center for Public Integrity to extend the Center's style of watchdog journalism, focusing on issues that do not stop at national frontiers: cross-border crime, corruption, and the accountability of power.

> Why we exist
> The need for such an organization has never been greater. Globalization and development have placed extraordinary pressures on human societies, posing unprecedented threats from polluting industries, transnational crime networks, rogue states, and the actions of powerful figures in business and government.
> The news media, hobbled by short attention spans and lack of resources, are even less of a match for those who would harm the public interest. Broadcast networks and major newspapers have closed foreign bureaus, cut travel budgets, and disbanded investigative teams. We are losing our eyes and ears around the world precisely when we need them most.

> What we do
> ICIJ projects are typically staffed by teams ranging from as few as three to as many as 100-plus reporters spread around the world. These journalists work with counterparts in other countries and with our Washington, D.C., staff to report, edit, and produce groundbreaking multimedia reports that adhere to the highest standards of fairness and accuracy.
> Over the years, our teams have exposed smuggling by multinational tobacco companies and by organized crime syndicates; investigated private military cartels, asbestos companies, and climate change lobbyists; and broke new ground by publicizing details of Iraq and Afghanistan war contracts.

In other words, it is little more than a tabloid organization, with an agenda with globalism, ignoring national sovereignty and looking for scandals to smear on their opponents, under the guise of a Robin Hood-esque “investigative journalism.”

I will not expand on how their patron organization’s logo is a Doric column, symbol of American secularism and Freemasonry. The Doric column is associated with the Senior Warden in the Masonic Order.

Over the years, our teams have exposed smuggling by multinational tobacco companies and by organized crime syndicates; investigated private military cartels, asbestos companies, and climate change lobbyists; and broke new ground by publicizing details of Iraq and Afghanistan war contracts.

Who we work with

To release its findings, ICIJ works with leading news organizations worldwide. We are always open to new collaborations. Our stories have appeared in more than a dozen languages and with such partners as the BBC, including flagship program Panorama, Le Monde (France), El Mundo (Spain), El País (Spain), Folha de Sao Paulo (Brazil), Le Soir (Belgium), the South China Morning Post (Hong Kong), Stern (Germany), The Guardian (UK), The Sunday Times (UK), Proceso (Mexico), the Huffington Post (USA), The Age (Australia), 24chasa (Bulgaria), ABC Color Digital (Paraguay), Armando.info/Ipys (Venezuela), The Asahi Shimbun (Japan), Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) (Canada), Center for Investigative Reporting Investigative Journalism Center (CIN IJC) (Croatia), CIPER (Chile), Commonwealth Magazine (Hong Kong), El Comercio (Ecuador), El Confidencial (Spain), Finnish Broadcasting Company YLE (Finland), Fokus (Sweden), Heto Association of Investigative Journalists (Armenia), The Indian Express (India), Isra News Agency (Thailand), The Irish Times (Ireland), Korea Center for Investigative Journalism Newstapa (South Korea), Kyiv Post (Ukraine), La Nación (Argentina), La Nación (Costa Rica), Le Matin Dimanche and Sonntagszeitung (Switzerland), L'Espresso (Italy), M&G Centre for Investigative Journalism (amaBhungane) (South Africa), Malaysia Kini (Malaysia), Ming Pao (Hong Kong), NDR (Germany), New Age (Bangladesh), NEWS (Austria), Norwegian Broadcasting Corporation NRK (Norway), Novaya Gazeta (Russia), Novi Magazin (Serbia), Origo (Hungary), Pak Tribune Pakistan News Service (Pakistan), Philippine Center for Investigative Journalism (Philippines), Premium Times (Nigeria), Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (Azerbaijan), Romanian Centre for Investigative Journalism (Romania), Rustavi TV (Georgia), Süddeutsche Zeitung (Germany), The New York Times, The Sydney Morning Herald (Australia), The Sunday Times (UK), Ta Nea (Greece), Trouw (Netherlands), The Washington Post (USA)

These unique collaborations have been honored repeatedly. Among ICIJ's awards: George Polk Award, Overseas Press Club Award, John Oakes Award, Editor and Publisher Award, Society of Professional Journalists, KC Kulich Award and the Investigative Reporters and Editors Award.

The fact that the ones behind the scenes waited for more than a year to release this nuke of an info shows that they are truly running out of options to hurt the ones that don't follow the plan. But rest assured that no quarter will be given and that they will not spare any options. Even if that means sacrificing allies such as ISIS-supporting Saudi Arabian King, Western puppet Porochenko or multicultural poster boy Cameron.

By doing this, they throw out the baby with the bathwater. Next steps can only be coup d'états or assassination. Once more, the media weapon exposes what their masters want them to disclose, and ignore what is inconvenient.

3 Important Lessons I Learned About Civilization From Living In A Hippie Commune

April 20, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Every year, over 15,000 hippies flock to a national forest and set up an entire civilization for 2 weeks. This is known as the "Rainbow Gathering." They walk into the middle of a national forest, dozens of miles away from civilization, and just start building. Kitchens, water supplies, shit houses, tents—they build everything out of the logs and trees in the forest, nothing is wasted. Even an economy emerges based off of the bartering system.

I had known about this event for quite some time, and had always wanted to go. Not because I aspired to be a wandering vagabond, but because I thought it would be interesting to see how civilizations are built, how the bureaucracy evolves, and how human nature plays a role in all of this.

I wanted to get a taste of what it was like for the English settlers to found America. I wanted to see how the women acted, what would happen to gender roles, what the legal system, medical system, and leadership system would look like.

The only problem was that you can only gain access to the gathering if you know somebody, who knows somebody, who knows somebody, all the way back to the "Grand Elders" who determine its location (it changes every year). They do this to keep the "weirdos" or "sociopaths" out, lest they take advantage of anyone.

Fortunately for me, I found someone who had this connection. I ran into this cute little hippie girl that I hadn't seen in years—we talked for a while, and I found out that she was going to Rainbow Gathering. I told her that I'd always wanted to go, and she invited me along.

Over the course of a week, I helped to build a miniature civilization. I cooperated with the medics, the local park rangers, I helped build the kitchens, and I had my fair share of bonfire parties as well. I saw what the women acted like when they were free from the confines of society, and I saw both the generosity and selfishness in human nature.

Here's three lessons that I learned from the Gathering:

1. Most Human Beings Are Lazy… And This Is Fine

When I first arrived at the campgrounds, the civilization was just starting to emerge. There were a few rudimentary kitchens, a water supply, some paths laid down, and a couple of shit houses. This may sound like a lot, but it's not enough to support nearly 15,000 people.

The first thing that I did when I got there was get involved – I spent hours gathering logs for the kitchens to make fire, I spent the better part of a day digging a latrine, and I helped build a giant table for one of the kitchens to make food on. And do you know what I learned?

Most people are fucking lazy.

About 90% of the people there didn't contribute anything to the society – they simply sat around, got high or drunk, and reaped all of the rewards that the hard working men fought for. And this is just fine. Do you know why? It's because the people who were actually willing to put in hard work had it much better off. When I spent hours helping the kitchens, do you think that they fed me the same scraps that they gave the other 90% of people?

No. Together, we feasted like kings – and we deserved it, because we put in the work. When there was a new shipment in of alcohol or of good quality meat, who do you think the first were to taste it? We were, because we put in the work. When the food trucks came in every day, bringing news of incoming travelers who do you think the first were to hear it? We were.

Technically, there was no power hierarchy – but there was sort of an unofficial one that started to emerge. And do you know who it was comprised of? The people that actually did the work.

Most people just did this all day

We had a say in how things went, because without us there wouldn't even be any "things." We got to choose what was for dinner and who ate how much; we helped each other out, with food, but also with invites to tent parties, VIP access to the "shows" we put on (we built a stage and had local hippie bands play songs), and other things. Basically, the people who put in the effort to build the society had all of the resources—this is the way that it naturally is. One problem that became abundantly clear was that in "regular society," this is obviously not the case.

In regular society, you can work your ass off day in and day out, and you won't get shit. In regular society the power isn't given to the people who put in hard work – it's handed down, and some little punk gets it, because his great, great, great, great grandfather worked to earn it in the past.

When you're living in an emerging civilization, you don't care all that much if others are lazy, because you know that if you work hard, you'll get more access to food, resources, and women, which brings me to my next point…

2. Natural Gender Roles Emerged

When you're living in the middle of the forest, there is no "we're all equal" bullshit. The men were the ones who did the heavy lifting – they carried logs around, lugged water jugs around, dug shit holes, and built community buildings. The women (the ones who participated, at least) were in the kitchen where they belonged.

I do not mean this in some sort of a derogatory way, but the fact of the matter is that it becomes abundantly clear that men and women are different when you aren't safe within the confines of civilization. There was one moment that really illustrated this lesson for me.

It was late at night – I have no idea when, because we didn't go by time in the forest, we went by sunrise and sunset, but the point is that it was very dark. I was sitting around a giant bonfire with about 35 people. Behind us was "stockpot," where all of the kitchen supplies were stored, and to the right was a campground. There were several little "outposts" like this set up throughout the forest, consisting of a kitchen, a bonfire, and a campground. They each had different names, and they were roughly 2-3 miles apart.

A group of women stood up, and slowly walked to the edge of the little "outpost" that we had set up. What were they doing? They looked kind of nervous, but I couldn't tell what was going on. And then it hit me. They realized that they couldn't walk through the forest alone back to their campground. They needed a man to protect them.

One of the men, I'm going to call him Jack, was a natural alpha male. He had been in charge of the kitchen and various logistical issues – he saw immediately that the women needed protection, and he volunteered to walk them back to their camp ground. I'm sure that the women were very grateful for Jack's protection – who knows, maybe he slept with one (or five) of them. Either way, when a civilization is just emerging, women develop a natural appreciation for men, and men develop a natural desire to protect women.

It leads to a much more cohesive society—relationships form much more smoothly. This is in part why we're seeing so many problems in Western civilization.

Nope – no feminists here.

Women don't appreciate men, because they don't need us anymore – in the forest, they needed us for protection. They needed us to build civilization. In the West, they don't need shit because "Daddy Government" handles everything for them. This creates a sense of spite between the genders – men recognize that they aren't appreciated and are practically worthless, so they come to develop a cynical, bitter view towards women

3. Women Are Attracted to Power… And This is A Good Thing

Like I said before, plenty of men develop a very cynical attitude towards women. This is only exacerbated in our society by the rampant "power-sluts"—women who will fuck any man who has power, so that they may get a taste of it.

In the forest, I came to accept that this was the natural way of things—women want men who have power. However, I realized that this is only a bad thing when you live in a very well established civilization, such as the West. The reason for this, as I alluded to before, is because the men who have all of the power in the West are manipulative, greedy elites who have a deep sense of hatred for the general public. So obviously, it isn't very comforting that women are attracted to these men.

However, in the forest, the men who had the power weren't the ones that were manipulative – in fact, it was quite the opposite. At The Gathering, the men who had the power were the ones who were selfless. The man who was willing to walk those women home, Jack, is a great example of this.

He spent hours every day organizing logistical issues, because he cared about the well-being of the tribe. He was always coordinating with the "food trucks," men who would drive into town and bring food back for the people, he was always hard at work collaborating with the women in the kitchen to make sure that dinner was on time, and he was always welcoming newcomers.

The man even helped to build a “kid village,” for god’s sake—a designated daycare center for children that was to be free of drugs and alcohol. So when somebody had a question or an issue, who do you think they went to? They went to Jack. When there was a conflict between the men or the women, who do you think they went to? They went to Jack.

So what we start to see is that the men who are actually selfless and care about the tribe slowly become the leaders. People began to look up to Jack for guidance – and why wouldn’t they? He was the one who was putting so much effort into helping our civilization grow. I saw some of this myself, as well. As I began to help out more and more in the kitchen, I started to rub shoulders with some pretty cool guys.

Soon enough, I was a messenger – I ran between the kitchens (sometimes running 10-15 miles a day) coordinating who had what supplies and if they were short on butter, olive oil, beans, or some other essential cooking food. So when people in the kitchens had a question, who do you think they went to? They went to me. When a group of men wanted to have “seconds” (the kitchen served breakfast and dinner every day), I got to decide if we should give out our valuable resources to them. If they were assholes, they wouldn’t get a single grain of rice.

I began to become a leader, just like Jack – not because I was a greedy, power hungry, manipulative wall street exec, but because I was a man who cared about the tribe and put in effort to make things better. And that’s the difference – in a “baby civilization,” women fuck the hard working men who protect the tribe. In the West, they fuck spoiled, rich trust fund babies who don’t give two fucks about the world’s suffering.

There is no way in hell that this girl would have any power in the forest

Women’s biology can’t distinguish between the two – they’re attracted to power, plain and simple. And like I said, this isn’t inherently a bad thing. In fact, I’d say it was a good thing for 99% of history.

But when a civilization devolves into what it is today, where the men in power are corrupt, selfish, evil human beings, it clearly becomes a bad thing. The problem isn’t women’s nature, it’s our dogshit society that puts evil, corrupt men in power.

Why Is The United States Doing So Little To Halt The Spread Of Zika Virus?

April 21, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

An alarming new strain of the Zika virus is spreading through the Western hemisphere, yet the US government has not announced quarantines or travel bans. What's behind the recent lackadaisical approach to combating infectious disease?

Background to current Zika outbreak

The Zika virus is not new. It was first isolated in 1947 during an outbreak in the Zika Forest of Uganda. It is spread primarily by daytime mosquitos A. aegypti and A. albopictus, but it can also be passed through contact with blood and through sex.

The virus spread across the Pacific in 2013. Since then it has spread to Central America, the Caribbean, and South America, where it has reached pandemic levels.

In the past, the Zika virus has not been much of a concern because it usually causes only mild symptoms. At its worst, it resembles Dengue fever which results in a high fever, vomiting, and aches and pains. But the outbreak in Central and South America is showing a monstrous and heartbreaking side effect: the Zika virus appears to be causing microcephaly and brain damage in infants of infected mothers.

The situation is so bad that some Central and South American governments have recommended that women avoid getting pregnant until more is known about the risks that are involved. For instance, does the Zika virus only affect the infants of women who become infected while they are pregnant, or does the the virus persist and pose a danger to infants even later in life?

What the US is doing to stop the spread of Zika

Even though the Zika virus could potentially affect millions of American women who are planning to have children, the US is doing very little to address the threat. The CDC has issued an advisory to pregnant women traveling to Zika infested countries and provided them with this extremely helpful genius advice:

> Don’t let mosquitoes bite you.

No vaccine currently exists. The National Institutes of Health hopes to have an experimental vaccine by the end of this year, but it would need to be tested before it could be given to the populace as a whole. In other words, we could be years away from a safe, generally available vaccine.

Some localities are taking steps to curb the mosquito population. Over the next three years, New York City will deploy additional mosquito traps and make a better effort to prevent sitting water from serving as incubators for Zika-bearing mosquitos.

One big thing that the US has not done is put any travel restrictions or quarantines into place to prevent the disease from becoming an epidemic in the US. So far, there have been 358 cases of Zika virus in the US. All of these cases have been the result of travel to the US from a Zika infested region. The Centers for Disease Control proudly point to this number to show that the virus is not rampant in the US—at least not yet.

The CDC is also warning us to avoid getting bitten by mosquitos this summer. The underlying assumption is that at some point, American mosquitos will eventually bite a Zika-infected individual who traveled from Central or South America. Once that happens, it is possible that Zika will become a pandemic in North America just like it is in South America.

How the US dealt with infectious disease in the past

1930 photo of immigrant with a communicable disease who was quarantined prior to being allowed into the US.

The US did not always have such a relaxed approach to infectious disease that threatened the health of Americans.

— In 1808, Boston imposed a mandatory three-day quarantine on all ships arriving from the Caribbean and Mediterranean to prevent the spread of tropical disease in the US.

— After a cholera epidemic in Britain killed 30,000 people in 1832, New York passed a law that prevented ships from approaching within 300 feet of the shore when the captain knew or suspected that cholera was aboard.

— In 1866, a ship arriving from into New York from Liverpool was found to have passengers who were infected with cholera. The ship was immediately placed under strict quarantine.

— An Asiatic cholera epidemic in 1892 caused President Benjamin Harrison to place a mandatory 20-day quarantine on any vessel that was carrying immigrants.

— The bubonic plague death of the Chinese owner of lumberyard in 1900 led to the City of San Francisco rope off 15 blocks of Chinatown that led to the closure of many businesses.

— A polio outbreak in 1916 caused New York to take children away from their parents and place them in quarantine.

— During World War I, the US incarcerated 30,000 prostitutes to prevent the spread of venereal disease.

— During the 1980s, Ronald Reagan banned people with HIV/AIDS from immigrating into the US. The ban remained in place until it was removed by President Obama.

In retrospect, some of these measures appear to be overkill but at the time they were prudent given the known facts. For example, when President Reagan banned immigrants with AIDS, scientists didn't know exactly how the disease was communicated. Since HIV was detected in saliva, there were fears that casual contact, such as kissing, could spread the disease. Later, it became clear that HIV is mostly spread through sex and the sharing of needles.

On the other hand, there is no question that some of these quarantines saved lives. This is especially the case with the cholera epidemics. The point is that when it came to saving the lives of Americans, the government used to act in favor of saving lives even when it meant seriously inconveniencing a smaller group.

Is political correctness preventing the US from taking adequate measures?

From recent epidemics, it has become clear that the US government is now taking a different approach.

Starting in 2013, West Africa saw the largest outbreak of the deadly Ebola virus on record. The outbreak started in Guinea and quickly spread to neighboring Sierra Leone and Liberia. The World Health Organization stated:

> The Ebola epidemic ravaging parts of West Africa is the most severe acute public health emergency seen in modern times. Never before in recorded history has a biosafety level 4 pathogen infected so many people so quickly, over such a broad geographical area, for so long.

In response, the governments of several African nations banned all travel from the infected countries. After all, epidemic was still limited to those three countries and was still containable through travel bans. Yet the US government steadfastly refused to take any measures to prevent Ebola from entering the US.

When CDC director Dr. Thomas Frieden was asked why the US did not impose a travel ban, he said that a travel ban would have prevented the infected areas from receiving medical help. But surely the government could have exempted medical personal from the ban. Several other health experts hinted that the real reason for refusing to impose a travel ban was political correctness: it would have made the people of those West African nations feel bad.

In hindsight, Frieden's gamble paid off. Although some infected Ebola patients did make their way to the US, the disease never spread beyond a handful of people. But it could have just as easily have gone the other way. One has to wonder if it was worth endangering thousands of Americans just so that the people of Sierra Leone could have higher self-esteem.

If you have any doubts that the US is letting political expediency dictate our policy when it comes to dealing with infectious disease, check out Jonathan Katz's article on the Haiti cholera outbreak, which has killed almost 10,000 people. Katz alleges that the CDC knew all along that the source of the cholera came from a UN peacekeeping force from Nepal that was defecating in Haiti's main river, but that they covered it up because it cast the United Nations in a bad light.

Conclusion

In the end, it may not just be political correctness that is driving US policy. It may be that our ruling elite are so committed to the agenda of creating "diversity" in the US and Europe that not even the prospect of a pandemic will be allowed to slow it down. In fact, the elite may even welcome a pandemic as lowering the earth's carbon footprint—as long as it does not include them, of course.

How False Accuser Michelle Fields Tried To Bring Down Donald Trump—And Failed

The news just keeps on getting better for Donald Trump. Buoyed by his huge win in the New York primary—as well as polls showing him leading in the primaries taking place next week—the Trump campaign got another boost last week when charges were dropped against manager Corey Lewandowski. Lewandowski had been arrested for simple battery after he grabbed the arm of Breitbart reporter Michelle Fields when she tried to approach Trump at a rally in Jupiter, Florida last month. In her own words:

> Trump acknowledged the question, but before he could answer I was jolted backwards. Someone had grabbed me tightly by the arm and yanked me down. I almost fell to the ground, but was able to maintain my balance. Nonetheless, I was shaken.

Even by normal Trump Derangement Syndrome standards, Fields' false accusation—derisively called "GrabGate"—sent both leftists and cuckservatives into a tizzy. Both used the alleged incident to claim that Trump is a misogynist who was encouraging violence at his rallies. Media outlets from the Washington Post to the Daily Caller were in on the hoax, raging manlet Ben Shapiro resigned his position at Breitbart so he could white-knight for Fields, and a group of female conservative "journalists" even tried to use their gender to shame Trump into firing Lewandowski.

With the charges against Lewandowski dropped, Trump's actions have been vindicated and then some. Between both this and his massive victory in New York, Trump is well-positioned to secure the delegates he needs to clinch the Republican nomination.

Michelle Fields, Professional Attention Whore

> View post on imgur.com

The media jackals who rushed to feast on Michelle Fields' attention-grabbing stunts failed to look into her background. Fields has a history of attention-whoring and making false accusations against men of various kinds. Among other things, she once falsely accused journalist Chuck Johnson of hacking her computer, falsely accused former Congressman Allen West of sexually assaulting her, and falsely accused NYPD officers of attacking her with batons during an #OccupyWallStreet protest. Her mother is also a pro-amnesty activist who opposes Donald Trump for his anti-illegal immigration policies.

In the days after her initial accusation, Fields changed her story multiple times, the Washington Post actively colluded with her, and reports surfaced that she had defied Secret Service in trying to pursue Trump. When Lewandowski was arrested for battery, independent journalists noted that Palm Beach County's district attorney—responsible for bringing charges against him—was a major Hillary Clinton supporter and thus had a political motivation to prosecute him.

At the time of Lewandowski's arrest, Trump refused to fire him, stating that he was loyal to his employees and didn't want to ruin Lewandowski's life over what he believed were trumped-up charges. While Trump was initially slammed for his decision, with the charges against Lewandowski now dropped, he's scored a two-fer: he's shown that he's a man of character who will defend his people and not throw them to the lions, and he's also shown how the Michelle Fields case was a blatant attempt to derail his campaign.

The Empire State Is Trump Country

While most political analysts assumed that Trump would win his home state of New York, his crushing victory—winning 61 percent of the vote and taking all but five delegates—is still a massive boon for his campaign. Trump not only won the statewide vote, he won all but one of the state's congressional districts (New York parcels out its delegates according to the winner of each district) and broke 50% of the vote in all but four of them.

While Ted Cruz had been trying to position himself as the #NeverTrump candidate after his Wisconsin win, he was completely routed in New York, coming in a distant third and getting no delegates. John Kasich was able to snatch a few delegates away from Trump, but not enough to matter: he still has fewer delegates than Marco Rubio, who dropped out of the race a month ago. Additionally, Trump's margin of victory in his home state is far larger than Cruz's or Kasich's in theirs.

It's too early to call the race yet, but Trump's blowout win in New York combined with the implosion of Michelle Fields means that his campaign isn't dead yet. While there's still time for the GOP establishment to stop the Trump Train, it's going to take a lot more effort on their behalf.

It is very clear based off of the past several months that many problems with contemporary society are being exposed, and that more and more men are willing to change. As a result, I predict that much of the conversation that we're having on ROK will start to become common—first colloquially, then eventually in the news.

This was made evident by the Canadian media "coverage," or rather spinning Roosh's State of Man tour. Thankfully, however, we won. As more and more men start to join our underground community, discussion of the issues which modern men face will become more and more common.

Consequently, feminist opposition to said discussion will also grow.

This is why men must be prepared—we must have our shit down pat, because the feminists are damn sure going to use every single underhanded tactic and emotional appeal that they can. Thus, I have compiled a list of the 13 most common SJW arguments. Not only should you be able to clearly and concisely explain why these arguments are wrong (as shown below), but you must do so without growing overly emotional.

The second that you get too emotional, you're entering into a territory that SJW's have dominion over—and you best be sure that they will use this against you, either by faking victimhood when you grow angry and shout, or by eagerly using your rage to support their claims that you're a cruel, bitter misogynist.

Disclaimer…

Now, before I delve into the arguments, I want to make something clear. You must be extremely careful with who you say these things to. Saying them to the wrong person may only incite violence or a false rape accusation. I recommend only responding to these SJW arguments when there is either a large group of men surrounding you who may be open to hearing the truth, or when you are discussing it with a single man (or level headed woman) who is open to hearing the truth.

Do not say these things to your coworkers–you'll probably be fired, unless you work on an oil rig or something, in which case you can say whatever you want.

"I knew I shouldn't have argued with my girlfriend about women's rights!"

And whatever you do, don't waste your time on hardened SJW's–their beliefs likely stem from a very dysfunctional childhood, and no amount of reasoning will undo their daddy issues. Stick to people who you have a chance at converting. The truth is a very powerful thing, and you must be sure that whoever you're telling it to won't get you fired (unless your boss is a cool dude, or you're self-employed).

That being said, don't hesitate to spread the truth if the situation permits.

1. "Patriarchy oppresses women!"

Patriarchy frees women from having to work for a living—instead they can do what makes them happiest: develop relationships with men, and spend time raising children. Patriarchy ensures that women are respected for their feminine characteristics and maternal qualities as opposed to being seen as sexual objects.

Contrary to popular belief, it is feminism that encourages the rape and oppression of women. It removes the sexual morals which patriarchy upheld, thus encouraging women (through social pressure) to have as much sex as they want. After being raised around women who are sexually promiscuous, men come to view them as mere objects of pleasure.

In short, patriarchy ensures that women are protected by strong men, that they don't compete against men for wages, that they can spend time doing what is fulfilling (raising children), and that they are respected for their personalities as opposed to being valued for their mere appearance.

2. "Women deserve equal pay!"

Women have equal pay—they simply make less on average. This is because women tend to work less hours than men, choose less profitable careers than men, and accept less dangerous and demanding jobs than men. In addition to this, women also demand that men pay for them, a hypocrisy of the highest order. If you want to be treated as an equal in the workforce, then stop using your sexuality to manipulate your male coworkers and bosses, and stop expecting men to pay for you.

If you want men to pay for your things, and if you want to use your sexuality to manipulate men, then get the hell out of the work force and stop pushing your power hungry agenda under the guise of equality.

3. “My body, my rules!”

I care not what you do with your body, but I care how it affects others. You walking around with your muffin top hanging out of your shorts is offensive not only to my eyes, but also to families and children walking around in public. You wearing a t-shirt with offensive language on it is a bad influence on children, and quite frankly it’s very irresponsible.

In addition to this, just as you are entitled to do what you wish with your body (so long as it does not negatively affect others), I am free to do what I wish with my mind—if I find your body disgusting, I do not have to sleep with you. No, men do not like curves. If you want to be a fat pig, that's fine, it's your decision. But don't get angry at men and try to guilt trip them because they don't find a 300-pound ham beast sexually appealing.

4. "Men are violent!"

On average, men are more violent than women. However, women are equally at fault. When a man has an issue with something, he confronts it directly—his often results in physical violence. When a woman has an issue with something, she simply uses sly underhanded tactics to destroy someone's reputation, get someone thrown in jail, or get a man to do the fighting for her. Both men and women cause problems in their own ways. The only difference is that women are sneakier.

In addition to this, the aggression often found in men is a good thing if harnessed properly. When men are allowed to confront one another over a dispute, it clears the air, and it allows them to express their feelings in a natural, albeit primal, way. If somebody called you a slut and spit in your face, would you expect your boyfriend to beat them up? The problem with modern society, is that everyone is completely feminized and scared shitless of violence, so something as simple as a fist fight is treated as if it is a murder.

Examples such as how "He got punched, then hit his head on the concrete and died!" are thrown around very often to support this, however the fact of the matter is that these examples are few and far between, and getting punched in the face (if you deserve it) is a very healthy way to learn to respect others, and a very concrete demonstration of how there are consequences to your actions.

5. “Women cooperate better!”

As said before, it only seems this way, because with men there is more direct conflict. Women only seem to cooperate better, because they never attack one another in the open. In reality, they let bitterness and grudges fester and never confront one another about it. They simply resort to petty passive aggressive tactics, emotional warfare, and manipulative techniques to harm their enemies.

At least with men, when there is a problem, they confront one another about it and it’s very clear who stands where. With women, you never know who stands where, and nothing ever gets done, because everyone is passive aggressively hindering one another.

6. “Immigration is a good thing!”

How? Is it good economically? Culturally? Legally? If you cannot provide proof aside from emotional appeals, then your opinion is of no validity. Economically, high immigration rates flood the labor pool, thus increasing supply of workers, thus lowering average wages. This works out to a lower average quality of living for everyone.

Culturally, immigration is horrible—introducing 30 different cultures into a nation causes a severe sense of disunity, and actually destroys cultures by watering them down and mixing them all together until they're no longer distinguishable.

Legally, immigration is also horrible. The men and women that are sent here by other countries are not their best. It's usually rapists, thieves, and general scum either trying to chase a fortune in America, or escape the legal ramifications they've experienced in their country.

7. "Women are the most victimized group on the planet!"

Quite the contrary, they're the most privileged group on the planet. All throughout history, women have had everything provided for them: food, shelter, safety, and they never had to lift a finger to attain it. Men were off working hard to provide women with everything that they needed.

Men are drafted to fight and die for women, who sit idle at home playing with children. Men were expected to work 16-hour days in coal mines to feed their families, and to figure out a way to put food on the table, despite horrible job markets.

In addition to this, women now also have economic and political power, in addition to the sexual and emotional power that they have over men. As has clearly been shown, women are actually the most privileged group on the planet, and they always have been.

8. "You're racist!"

Because I don't want to allow numerous immigrants into my country? Because I admit that most of the violence in this country is due to immigrants living in ghettos?

If you disagree with my claims, this is fine—you have the right to do this, because men have died before us protecting this right. I do, however, expect you to postulate a logical explanation as to why you disagree. Simply calling me a name will not do because it's the stuff of middle school arguments, and holds no evidential weight whatsoever.

9. "Rape is a real problem! We need to listen to the woman!"

Rape is in fact a real problem; this is why rapists should be in jail. We cannot, however, convict somebody with no evidence of their crime, especially when there are numerous social, emotional, and financial reasons to lie about being raped.

No, we should not simply "listen to the woman," we need proof. Yes, women do in fact lie about rape very frequently. Why? Well, it's simple—women are extremely judgmental towards sluts. If a girl feels as if she's a slut for sleeping with a man, she would often rather accuse him of being a rapist than tarnish her social reputation.

In addition to this, women are clearly the most mentally ill demographic of the modern age. Those that are mentally ill often have victim complexes and suppressed anger, thus providing a serious emotional incentive to accuse someone of a false rape. If there is evidence of a rape, then the man who did the raping should be thrown in jail. If there is no evidence, however, it is not fair to potentially ruin an innocent man's life.

10. "That's so offensive, you can't say that!"

So in other words what you're saying is that your feelings take priority over the truth. That is an extremely solipsistic, narcissistic, and selfish way of interpreting reality, and you should be ashamed.

11. "White men have oppressed the world for centuries!"

Have we now? Do you see that phone in your pocket? This building that we're standing in? The electricity that powers these lights? Do you see your car, and the gas which is used to power it? They were all invented by white men.

Yes, white men have done their fair share of conquering, raping, and enslaving – every single race has done this, however. We are no different than them. You focus in on the bad things that white men have done, and selectively ignore the good things they've done. White men built the western world. They invented the vast majority of things which make our lives easier. They built civilization.

12. "Men aren't sluts, but women are. Double standard!"

This is in fact a double standard, however it is a very reasonable one, such as how men are expected to provide for women, and not vice versa. Men aren't sluts, because if a man wants to get laid very frequently, he has to actually be worth something. He has to be confident. He has to have game. He probably has money and looks. He has probably spent years developing himself through working out, cultivating good habits, and grinding away at his finances.

If a woman wants to get laid, however, all she has to do is open her legs. Women have an abundance of suitors, even if they are appallingly unattractive. In short, men have to actually try to get laid—women just say yes. This is why men are not judged for having ample sex, while women are.

13. And lastly…the good old "You're sexist!"

For pointing out that men and women are biologically and psychologically different? This has been very clearly shown in nearly every single branch of science, from anatomy to psychology to evolutionary biology to medicine.

Men tend to have higher levels of testosterone, which makes them more confident, ambitious, and assertive. Women tend to have higher levels of estrogen, which makes them more insecure, satisfied, and passive. Men tend to be left brain dominant—this makes them more logical. Women tend to use both hemispheres, which makes them more emotional.

If you disagree with these facts, then this is fine. However, please propose a logical argument as to why I am wrong, as opposed to simply calling me a name.

6 Ways To Pay Less In Taxes

April 22, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Self improvement includes mental and physical improvement, and developing financial resources. One very important aspect of this is minimizing the taxes you pay. This has two benefits. First, you are saving more of your money, which can be invested, used to purchase items you want, or kept as an emergency fund. Second, you are not contributing as much financially to any of the SJW projects, endless warmongering, and general incompetence of the government.

Let's look at a few ways you can reduce your tax burden. Note that I live in the US, but many of these general ideas should work in most jurisdictions.

1. Purchase Online

Most internet and mail order purchases are free from sales tax. Sales tax rates can be 10% or more. Much of what I purchase in an average year is available on sites like Amazon, Jet, and other smaller internet retailers. Saving 10% off your entire purchases for the year is quite easy, not to mention the time, gas, and effort you save by ordering items delivered straight to your door. Bonus tip: You can use sites like Retailmenot for discounts and 3Camel to compare prices before you buy.

2. Consider Downsizing

Tax Free Houseboat

In the US, you are subject to local, state, and national taxes. Jurisdictions find a way to have an optimal mix of these taxes in order to extract the most resources from you.

For example, New Hampshire has no income tax, but one of the highest property tax rates in the nation. Florida is home to the largest retiree population in the US. Any plan to raise taxes from Floridians would do well to tax incomes lower and purchases higher (as the retirees have no income, but plenty of assets off which to live and make purchases). So, don't you know it, Florida has a high sales and property tax.

If you live in a high property tax state, consider downsizing or moving into an apartment, which has a far lower property tax burden than a detached home. I actually know a guy who lived in a houseboat (it was permanently located in the same spot) and paid zero property taxes on his "house."

3. Work In The Underground Economy

Waiting…

I have a buddy in his late thirties who has been a bartender for over a decade. He's tried quitting, and getting a "real job" but always comes back because he simply can't beat the easy, tax free money.

If you work in a cash industry, including construction, service industry, blue collar trade like plumbing, electrician, etc, or for a small employer who will pay you in cash, you can work up to 30% less. Note that this method is the only one discussed here that may not be legal—you are technically required to report any income received on your annual income tax return, but if you are paid in cash, there's less risk that anyone other than you knows your true earnings.

4. Become Self-Employed

Self employment has a ton of benefits, including setting one's own schedule, becoming anti-fragile, not having to deal with a human resources department, and more freedom. But it is one of the very best tax decisions one can make. Why? Because of expenses that are deducted from one's gross income. Let's just take a simple example.

Say you learn to be a plumber. You can go work for a repair or plumbing company, who will pay you a set wage. Or you could work independently as a self employed plumber. If you choose the latter, many of the costs you have with doing a plumbing job now become "deductible expenses." Whereas in the first case, they are simply costs the employee must pay for with after-tax dollars.

You will need a set of tools, which you can buy, and the purchase of these tools is a business expense. You may need to wear a certain uniform or clothing to crawl underneath houses. You might need heavy duty coveralls, good work boots, etc. Need a telephone for people to make service calls? Need a tablet to map out the GPS addresses? Need a camera to document repairs and identify parts? All of these can be deductible expenses.

They are also items you can use when you are not on the clock and have real benefits to you. After a year or so, assuming business is good, you may wish to buy a truck to carry around your tools and supplies. Guess what? The purchase of that truck is a deductible expense. Even the cost of fuel and maintenance can be deductible. When you subtract all of these expenses from your gross income, you are paying far less tax.

Let's assume you earned $50,000 plumbing, and bought a used $15,000 truck and $5,000 in other expenses for the year. You now pay taxes on $30,000 of income. And guess what? A $30,000 income is below average, and you are therefore taxed at a lower rate as well. So you now have more money and a truck paid for out of your plumbing earnings, while your plumbing buddy working for the man has to pay for his truck with his own money.

5. Work Abroad

The USA is one of two nations (the other is the primitive African dictatorship of Eritrea) to tax income worldwide. But luckily, due to the lower cost of living in much of the developing world, one can work abroad and find a way to minimize or avoid paying taxes to the US. You may be able to exclude up to $100,800 of foreign income from taxation, provided you pay local taxes abroad and meet certain other requirements (note: the local taxes are always FAR less than what the US charges).

6. Invest in real estate

Real estate investment has several tax-advantaged rules that make it a great investment, especially for those earning $50,000 a year or more. There is a reason why so many highly compensated white collar workers like doctors and lawyers invest in real estate. It is one of the best ways to lower their tax bill. There are two main reasons: deductibility of expenses and depreciation.

(Note: The general ideas here are accurate, but I don't want anyone audited or fined for not property following the rules, so please do your own research, as property investing is somewhat complex.)

Deductibility means that any expenses, including property taxes, insurance, maintenance, even interest on the mortgage used to purchase the property, are all deducted from its total income that year. The remaining amount is taxed. But wait. First a special further deduction only done for tax purposes is made. It's called depreciation. This is a special federal tax rule where the value of the property is diminished by a certain percentage each year. The IRS describes it as "an annual allowance for wear and tear, deterioration, or obsolescence of the property."

For example, a rental home has a depreciation amount of ~3.5% per year of the building value. It doesn't matter if the home is actually deteriorating. Perhaps you just put in all new hardwood floors, which actually improve the condition of the home. You're still entitled, just like any owner, to take this automatic deduction. So, assuming the home's value was $100,000, there is an annual deduction of ~$3,500. This is the same as if you spent $3,500 of your money on deductible expenses, except you didn't spend a penny!

A Hypothetical Example

Let's say you decide to purchase a $100,000 investment home. First, any repairs or purchases made for maintenance of the home are deductible. Need a lawn mower? That's a deductible expense. Need a tool set to make basic repairs? That's also deductible. Need a blower, weed eater, landscape supplies, plants, gravel, etc.? All deductible.

Let's say the rent is $500. At the end of the year, the total rental income is $6,000. After deducting expenses and interest payments, the net income is $3,000. And then we deduct another $3,500 in depreciation. The property now shows a net loss of $500! Zero tax is due, and in some cases, that loss can be used to offset income from another source.

Fast forward 20 years, and the home, due to inflation, is now worth $200,000. The mortgage has been paid off completely by the tenant. During that time you have paid no taxes on what would otherwise be $200,000 of income. And if the property generated taxable losses due to the depreciation "expense," you even reduced your tax bill lower than it would have been had you not ever purchased the home. And you also have a lawn mower, tool set, and a bunch of other items that your tenant paid for that are useful to you.

The Purpose of Money

Money is a medium of exchange in order to buy things we need or want. If you go into a business that you enjoy, the purchase of things you wanted to buy anyway, now become deductible business expenses. They can be purchased with the proceeds of your business, not with your after tax income. Love photography and want thousands of dollars of photography equipment? Start a photography business. Love working on cars and having tools? Start your own mechanic business.

Do not start a sham business as this is not legal—it must be legitimate in order to deduct these expenses (i.e. you can't just call yourself a motorcycle racer and then go buy a Harley). But using these examples, one can acquire many things tax free, saving money and starving the beast at the same time. Legally.

Can We Attain Certitude Through Our Perceptions?

Paschal greetings to the men of ROK! This week, we continue the philosophical series upon certitude.

Last week, we discussed how truth subsists in a judgment where there is a real correspondence between a "thing" (Latin res) and an intellection (perception/understanding); I noted the difference between the objective and subjective element in the judgment of Truth, with an emphasis on dispelling the prejudicial assumption we have in modernity, by which "objective" and "subjective" correspond most closely to "true" and "false." Rather, objective truth is the truth of the "thing's" side in this judgment, and subjective truth is the truth of the intellection.

Thus, a judgment may be true before we are certain of it; moreover, certainty is not an emotional feeling of "sureness," but is the result of reflection, whereby we become fully aware of the actual truthfulness of a judgment—thus, certainty does not exist where a judgment is false, no matter how certain one "feels" about it. We remember putting our keys in our pocket; we judge it to be true, that our keys are in our pocket; and, truly, they are. Still, we put our hands in our pocket and feel them—now we are certain of the truth of our judgment. Truth or untruth is in this sense independent from our certain knowledge; our judgment was true before we were certain.

Contrarily, we feel sure that we have seen something coming at us from the corner of our eye, and we flinch, wheeling around to see what it is; actually, there was nothing there—probably just a fleeting shadow or darting bird. We felt sure that something was coming at us (indeed, this feeling was stronger than our assuredness that our keys were in our pocket), but further examination proved us wrong.

Certitude is thus the result of reflection upon the true judgments that we make, whereby their truthfulness becomes evident and confirmed for us. Evidence, etymologically, comes from e vidente ("from the perceiver/seer")—i.e., something manifest, and plainly seen. Truth is not a mere apprehension, but a judgment; certitude is not a feeling, but a verification of that judgment on the basis of evidence, i.e., of things which are manifest.

The problem then becomes: What is manifest? What is evident? A philosophical analysis arrives at two basic principles that bear upon this problem; but for most modern men with modern prejudices, the mind is likely to pose a false problem, before it gets to these. Cardinal Mercier mentions that, since the time of Descartes, the question is usually posed: "Is human reason able to know things as they really are? Or, in other words: can we attain to a consciousness that our ideas are conformable to things as they are in themselves? How can the mind arrive at an assurance of this conformity?" He rejects this problem on sensible grounds.

First, he points out that this is an incomplete formulation of the problem, since the main concern we have in discussing our certitude of objective truths, is whether the relations we perceive between things, exist apart from our perception of them. I.e., rather than wondering whether you and I see violet in the same way is not the primary concern in this context, but whether whatever is manifest to me as violet, is an actually extant thing whether I am perceiving it or not. Mathematical truths can sometimes illustrate this better: are 2 and 2 equivalent to four, whether I am perceiving these quantities or not? Such relations as these are more easily understood as concepts which are less filtered by our perceptions.

We already know perception differs; but what of the perceived phenomenon itself?

More importantly, he points out that “a thing as it exists considered without reference to our knowledge is, as far as we are concerned, as if it did not exist, a pure non-entity.” Not because the thing does not/cannot exist apart from our knowledge, but because it is an absurdity to talk about our knowledge of it apart from our knowledge of it. “It is, then, an absurdity to try, under these conditions, to form a comparison between a mental representation [i.e., our knowledge of the thing in our minds] and the-thing-in-itself.”

Correlating to this, he points out that “a cognition is an immanent act which necessarily partakes of the nature of the subject knowing,” in conformity with the maxim of St. Thomas: cognitio est in cognoscente ad modum cognoscentis (“the thought process is in the thinker according to the thinker’s own manner”). That is to say, we have only one tool for perceiving and thinking—the human intellect—and there is no such thing as an exact identity between our thought process, and the thing of which we think; one is a thing, the other is a mental representation, or perception, of the thing. That thing is perceived and represented to us according to the manner of our own nature. I perceive colors based on the nature of the eye and the mind’s capacity for mentally representing these sense impressions to me; and even the abstract concepts I can imagine in the mind, occur according to the nature of the human mind. I don’t doubt that an angel, for example, perceives objects differently from me, having an entirely different nature, and therefore a different manner of perception and manner of cognition.

Saint Benedict’s Perception Transfigured by an Intellection of the Divine Light

I see a red ball and my mind represents it to me in a certain way; far be it from me to think that some other entity would perceive or mentally represent its perceptions in the same way. For me, what that object is-in-itself, abstracted absolutely from my knowledge of it, is a closed book.

All that matters, is whether my perception and judgment corresponds to something real, though I can only approach that real object according to my own nature and manner of perception and of cognition. Thus, as the Cardinal points out, the real problems of Criteriology resolve into two: the problem of the form and matter of the judgment.

The first, the form of the judgment, is a question of the mental synthesis by which we affirm the agreement of the subject and predicate in our judgment. Some (like Kant) say that the perception of an agreement of the two terms in a judgment (i.e., two and two on the one hand, and four on the other) is purely determined by the nature of the thinking subject. The Cardinal's opinion is that the impression of an identity or correspondence between these two terms, is moved by something outside the thinking subject—i.e., it is due to a manifestation of an objective relation, to a fact that the concept "two and two" really corresponds to "four," and the subjective thinker merely acknowledges this according to his own manner.

The Cardinal is careful to point out, here, that this question of the form of the judgment is a separate issue from whether those concepts are really extant things. So, for example, perhaps there is no such thing as "two" or "four" in the objective order of things, and these exist only as conceptualizations represented to ourselves in the mind. The question then, is whether the equivalence we perceive between the conceptualizations "two and two" and "four" results from a real relation of the concepts as such, or whether even the judgment of their equivalence is a creation of the thinking subject. Or: perhaps there is no perfect sphere really existing anywhere; yet the mind, reflecting upon mathematical and geometric principles, sees that the volume of such a thing would be equivalent to four-thirds of pi times the cube of its radius. This question of the form of our mental judgment, asks whether the mental synthesis by which one perceives the identity in that relation is determined by the nature of the thinking subject, or whether the relation of the terms in that judgment exists objectively. This question is the question of the objectivity of the ideal order (i.e., the objectivity of ideas themselves).

It can be difficult to think of an apt image for illustrating the question of the objectivity of the ideal order in the mind.

The second question, regards the matter of the judgment. That is to say, do our concepts correspond to things that really exist? Are there spheres? Do the concepts of “two” and “four” correspond to any real thing? As the Cardinal puts it: “Are the terms of our judgments pure creations of the mind, with no counterpart in real fact, or are they trustworthy representations of objects which really exist? This second problem is that of the objective reality of our concepts.”

So, our examination of certitude and truth will focus upon that. But something must be determined before we may do that effectively. As the Cardinal says: “The object of epistemology is to analyse and to verify our knowledge of truth, and so of every truth. Consequently it is both legitimate and necessary to ask whether at the outset we may presuppose anything at all, and what we may presuppose. This is the question concerning the initial state of the mind of one inquiring into the main problem of certain knowledge.”

I will say that this is one of the things that appealed so much to me about the authentic, traditional Christianity. When I was an atheist, I casually assumed that Christians acted on “faith,” which I imagined was blind by definition, and made all kinds of unwarranted assumptions. But when I discovered the Fathers of the Church, and then especially the Scholastic Doctors, I saw that an appreciation of clear, true, careful thinking was everywhere in evidence. Here in Mercier, and in many other authors (such as St. Thomas), I always found great care in examining first principles, ensuring that unwarranted assumptions were being avoided, careful attention to the implications of ideas, a readiness to play devil’s advocate, etc. In fact, to be blunt, I saw that the Christians, contrary to popular myth, seemed more open to critical self-examination than other thinkers. I have profited immensely from this example, and the fruits it has borne.

The Venerable Bede, whose care to find accurate information was admirable in his time.

I hope you all are enjoying the series, and do not find it too boring or incomprehensible. I am learning as we go along, too, so I hope I am able to explain things more or less clearly. Let me know!

Why American Society Has Decayed Since 1960

April 23, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Famous political thinker Charles Murray is the author of Coming Apart: The State of White America, 1960-2010. Murray presents the case that in the U.S., there are two distinct cultures within white America which have formed over the last 50 years: The New Upper Class and the New Lower Class.

Murray focuses primarily on white America because he wanted to avoid the complexity that race would introduce into discussions of class. Fifty years ago, white Americans were a homogeneous bunch, with mostly the same social and cultural norms. They watched the same television shows, ate the same food, and had the same rate of marriage and happiness across social classes. This is not true today. What happened?

Four Requirements For The Functioning Of American Society

Murray argues that the feasibility of the American project has historically been based on four founding virtues. He identified these virtues based on the writings of John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and other key figures of the 18th century:

1. Industriousness. This was a signature characteristic of Americans. It consists of the deep-seated American assumption that life is meant to be spent getting ahead by working hard to make a better life for oneself and one's children. American industriousness fascinated citizens of other nations.

2. Honesty. For Thomas Jefferson, "honesty is the first chapter in the book of wisdom." Many Americans are familiar with the stories of "Honest Abe Lincoln" and George Washington. This unique trait most observed by European intellectuals when they noted the willingness of Americans to obey the law. Tocqueville, during his journey throughout the U.S. in the late 19th century, noted, "In America, the criminal is looked upon as an enemy of the human race."

3. Marriage. The founders took for granted that marriage was the bedrock institution of American society. In fact, the founders often used the word "morality" as a synonym for fidelity, meaning to remain faithful to one's spouse. The American concept of marriage was different from the European one, with its lack of arranged marriages and more religious roots.

4. Religiosity. Interestingly, Murray notes the relatively progressive views the founders held on religion. Jefferson was a Deist, Franklin did not believe in the divinity of Christ, Hamilton and Madison were suspected of being relaxed about their devotion to Anglicanism, and Washington was evasive about his views on Christianity. However, all of the founders were united in their view that religion was essential to the health of American society. The social institution of religion placed an emphasis on self-restraint and self-discipline, which the founders considered essential for civic bonds.

The founders were explicit in their belief that the American constitution would only work for moral and virtuous people who followed the above four precepts. As anyone can clearly see through mere observation, these values have eroded in American society.

The New Upper Class And Lower Class

Now let's take a look at the data. Charles Murray defines the new social classes along educational and occupational lines. He has created a quiz here that measures how disconnected you are from mainstream American society.

To qualify for the upper class, individuals must have at least a bachelor's degree and work as a manager, physician, attorney, engineer, architect, scientist, college professor or content producer in the media. For the most part, these are your stereotypical white collar careers. To be assigned to the lower class, individuals must have no academic credentials higher than a high-school diploma. If they work, it must be in a blue-collar job, a low-skill service job such as cashier, or a low-skill white-collar job such as mail clerk or receptionist.

For the lower classes, marriage has undergone a particularly dramatic transformation. Working class Americans 50 years ago would not even recognize their counterparts in modern America.

In 1960, high proportions of whites in both upper and lower social classes were married. For the upper class, it was 94%, and for the lower class it was 83%. In the 1970s came the great divergence. Among the upper classes, marriage has stabilized at 83% since the 1980s where it has remained. But for the working class, it has plummeted. As of 2010, only 48% of working class Americans are married. In 50 years we have gone from an 11% to 36% gap in marriage rates between the two social classes.

Children of the lower class today are being raised in very different situations than their 1960 counterparts. For white Americans as a whole in 1960, 2% of children were born out of wedlock and only 6% for women with only a high school education. By 2008, the out-of-wedlock birthrate for lower class white women has jumped to a staggering 44%.

White privilege.

Other factors are disrupting and dividing the social classes as well. These include drug addiction in working class white neighborhoods, lack of social capital formerly created by religion in addition to marriage, and increasing economic competition from legal and illegal immigrants.

A working class man from 1960 would not even recognize the neighborhoods, norms, and families of his social equivalents in 2016.

Two Forces With Unforeseen Collateral Effects

Murray argues that since the 1950s, there have been two powerful forces that have had collateral effects which has contributed to ever greater social class division: changes in the college admissions process and the increasing value of brains in the job market.

Murray refers to the first force as “the college sorting machine.” This is the initial mechanism that brings people with distinctive tastes and preferences together. He states in Coming Apart, “People like to be around other people who understand them and to whom they can talk. Cognitive segregation was bound to start developing as soon as unusually smart people began to have the opportunity to hang out with other unusually smart people.”

Elite colleges changed their admissions policies to place a greater emphasis on intelligence and less on wealth. In other words, top colleges used to be filled with rich students, some of whom were smart. Today, top colleges are filled with smart students, some of whom are rich. In 1952, the average SAT verbal score of incoming Harvard freshmen was 583. By 1960, it had jumped to 678.

However, most of the students who did well enough in school to get into an elite college came from upper middle class families. So the upper middle class kids attended school with the wealthy, and the few working class students who get into top colleges rarely returned to their hometowns. This perpetuates the divide.

The second factor is the increased value placed on intelligence. Today, businessmen and mathematicians get paid far more and are afforded many more opportunities to create wealth than existed in 1960.

As the nature of work changes, how does the working class adapt?

In the early 1990s, Bill Gates was asked what competitor would be most likely to draw potential employees away from Microsoft. Goldman Sachs, Gates answered. He explained: “Software is an IQ business. Microsoft must win the IQ war, or we won’t have a future. Our competitors for IQ are investment banks such as Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley.”

Over the last century, brains became much more valuable in the marketplace. For high-tech economies, companies hire people who can improve and exploit the technology. For complex business decisions, businesses rely on people who can navigate through labyrinths that require advanced cognitive ability.

Furthermore, the bigger the stakes, the greater the value of small increments in skills. The corporation ranked 500 in 2010 was about eight times larger than the 500th-ranked corporation in 1960. Today, a worker who can add a few percentage points of profitability can be rewarded with several times as much income as a result.

Now What?

The first step we can take is to acknowledge that something has happened to America. People on both sides of the political spectrum point to different causes. But one area where both can agree is that the upper class must have a sense obligation to the lower class. It is reasonable to suggest that the upper class must preach what they practice. One way we can do this is to stop the myth that "all families are equal." The elite must stop pushing social boundaries to the detriment of the lower classes. It is not true that a single mother, gay parents, and other forms deviant families are equally healthy for a civil society.

Observing the effects of the last 50 years, it is clear that the U.S. is coming apart. If there is any hope to halting or reversing the decline, the 2016 presidential election may be the last chance we have.

3 Reasons I Will Never Apologize For Being White

"White people are terrible," "I have white privilege," and "most of the world's problems are caused by white people" are three general statements countless social justice warriors and their enablers agree with. Yet they are all based on the severest distortion of reality. You or I should no more apologize for being white than an African-American should for being black.

Just as many blacks, Hispanics, and other minorities are made more pliable by the media and the establishment by being told they are eternal victims, white people are made more pliable by agreeing that they need to always feel guilty. Using an SJW "anti-racism" that feels awfully like the leftist version of a Nazi book about hereditary, white people supposedly inherit the evil deeds of dead dudes who owned slaves prior to the Civil War or arrived on a foreign continent in a year like 1492 or 1788.

The establishment-enforced guilt is even greater for those directly descended from such people, but even culturally and genetically unrelated individuals like Polish- and Italian-Americans, whose ancestors pretty much all arrived after periods like the slavery era, are held accountable, too. Why? Even if we ridiculously assumed we can find descendants "guilty" of their ancestry, the white guilt thesis is like putting all of Harlem's young black men in 2016 under house arrest because 20 of them were involved in a vicious street brawl… in 1937.

Provided you adhere to our creed, neomasculinity and the Return Of Kings community form the broadest functional church you will find. We do not care where you come from, so long as you support our goal of a return to masculine societies that emphasize community-building and do not apologize for taking pride in their own cultures. ROK readers who are black, white, Asian or something else are all equal in this regard.

Here are just three of many reasons why I will not hate or feel guilty about my skin tone.

1. I'm the descendant of victims myself because many of my ancestors were from oppressed ethnic and religious groups

Look at those privileged starving Irish!

Are you heavily Irish-blooded, like me? Italian? Polish? Ukrainian? Were your ancestors Catholics living in heavily Protestant areas, or perhaps Huguenots who had to flee persecutory France?

It's funny how SJWs prance on about white privilege when over half of all whites who emigrated to America, Canada or Australia, from the Puritans to Yugoslavian Civil War refugees, came because the civilian government or monarchy representing another ethnicity or religion essentially chased them out, had killed their family members, or wanted them dead, too. Many of the white groups who did take the journey, particularly the Italians or Irish, were then subjected to quotas and mistreatment in places like New York for years.

A great deal of my ancestors were Catholics in Prussia and other Protestant parts of northern Germany. This section of my family tree is replete with persecutions, including one great-great-great-great grandfather who lost sight in one eye and movement in his arm after being brutally assaulted by a Prussian policeman. His crime? Being an ethnic German leaving a Catholic church on Sunday in the 1800s. Catholic churches were only for "subhuman" Poles. Catholic Prussians were seen as traitors who belonged in Bavaria, prison, or dead. He ended up eking out an existence as a tailor with one good arm, after both he and his brother were repeatedly refused admission to the civil service for their faith.

In addition, I had Irish immigrant forebears whose fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters died as a result of the Potato Famine. One of these ancestors, the eldest child in his family, was working in Dublin to make money for the family when, in the space of three months, he received news that his parents, all his sisters, and all but one of his brothers had died from starvation, malnutrition, or diseases related to them.

When my aunt did the genealogy over three years, she counted 37 family members in one corner of an Irish county who died from starvation or starvation-related illness in 13 months. The famine was predicted and even aggravated by the British. Considering the squalor into which the occupiers had driven the Irish Catholics, the whole ordeal was fundamentally caused by them, too. With only an extra mouth to feed, this great-great-great grandfather of mine took his barely school-aged brother with him to Australia two months later. What role did these two have in oppressing others, white or non-white, that I should feel shame about today?

Look further back into my family tree and you find German, Dutch and Swiss Jews, many of whom were shunted around various locations within Europe, depending on what limited patience local authorities had for yarmulke-wearers at the time.

With this lineage, what exactly do I have to apologize for, aside from my supposedly very, very privileged, at best lower middle-class English forebears from drab West London and grim Yorkshire? Most of them never saw a dark person, let alone mistreated one. To boot, the vast majority lived poor, thankless lives without clean sanitation, abundant food, or anything close to job security. And these are the stations in life, through no fault of their own, that 95% of your ancestors reached as well.

2. Minorities and other non-whites frequently treated and still treat each other far worse than white people did

Rwandan genocide, anyone?

From the pre-Columbian Central and South American peoples to the Rwandan genocide, non-whites have very often treated one another even more abysmally than whites have treated them. European technology may have amplified the number of indigenous and other deaths in places like the Americas, but raw hatred, aggression, and the continuity of violence can be found in even greater quantities in non-white historical squabbles.

Europeans have also been incorrectly blamed for things like infectious diseases, despite the scientific work of antiseptic procedure pioneer Ignaz Semmelweiss being years, sometimes even centuries away. Meanwhile, non-whites have been allowed to kill non-whites without serious condemnation from SJWs.

For example, critics of the Iraq War and the attempted rebuilding of post-Saddam Iraq have said that the whole country is based on a fiction that dates back to the European post-World War I mandate systems. In other words, if Kurds, Shia Arabs, and Sunni Arabs inhabit the same country, they kill each other! Whilst it is appetizing for SJWs to blame the big, bad British and French for this, it is far from the truth. Kurds and Arabs have been butchering each other for countless centuries. The greatest Muslim figure of all the Crusades, Saladin, was consistently mistrusted because of his Kurdish origins. Similarly, intra-Arab or Arab-Iranian Sunni-Shia violence is age-old and has little if anything to do with Europeans.

Last year, Rock Thompson wrote a superb piece about the hypocrisy of attacking Columbus Day in the Americas. His work exposed the double standards of many Native American and also Central and South American tribes, who pretend their ancestors were routinely peaceful when, in fact, they regularly engaged in deplorable acts of gratuitous violence, including human sacrifices and the sadistic mutilation of enemies who were not so ethnically different. The conquistadors and Puritans are falsely seen as the harbingers of cultural and racial genocide in the Americas. Local indigenous tribes, however, were already hunting each other down for sport well before the tall ships arrived.

3. White-majority countries make the humanitarian world go round

A tent city the Saudis refused to make available for fellow Arab Syrian refugees.

Whenever you find an aid program for starving Africans, war-torn Arabs, or other suffering people, chances are that a number of white Westerners are behind it. Even if they're not all white, they invariably come from white-majority and/or white-founded Western countries, or are funded by them. All to assuage the guilt of white people living in 2016 who feel the need to apologize for a European colonial regime that replaced almost always far more brutal indigenous ones.

Western countries also welcome non-whites in droves, both as immigrants and as "refugees." The recent Syrian crisis is a testament to this (over-)generosity. While Saudi Arabia refused to accommodate fellow Arab Syrians in their already-constructed tent city, used normally for the Haj Priligrimage, Germany and other European states bore the brunt of those fleeing, including through the open door policies of leaders like Angela Merkel.

In general terms, white people care more about the developmental outcomes of non-whites. Wealthy non-white countries like Japan and Korea have perfected a system of meticulously keeping their populations pure and rejecting the asylum claims of over 99% of claimed refugees. This asymmetrical state of affairs is ironic when Japan's own history of colonisation, notably the Rape of Nanking, is taken into consideration.

White guilt is also very profitable for certain establishment figures and zealous entertainers. It's why twats like Bono and Bob Geldof get up every morning, after all. And, far from sucking the world dry, white folks have repeatedly tried to make it better. Very often this generosity is taken to an extreme, but the point of white-majority countries acting and non-white countries stalling or ignoring remains valid.

Be proud of who you are

Give up on the self-hatred. Too many people already have it without resorting to race. Whatever your skin tone or creed, stand tall. For white people, sadly, we need to say this to ourselves even more because society has shoved it down our throats that we should feel eternal shame. So many instances are used by SJWs and others to try and force us to collectively apologize for historical events. These events are often so old that only people who died decades or centuries ago actually lived through them.

You are only responsible for yourself, no matter how bad faceless leftists want you to feel about your skin tone.

The Truth About Andrew Jackson And Harriet Tubman

April 24, 2016 | by Inigo Montoya | Link | Original Link

By now you might have seen the confusing news of the treasury replacing President Andrew Jackson on the $20 bill for Harriet Tubman. While such a move would normally lead us to scratch our heads, when you look deeper the reasoning behind the decision becomes clear.

In an age where literally anything else would be more important to focus on right now, it takes a very ballsy agenda to outright dismantle a past American great. It seems that the powers that be enjoy pushing the line to test the limits of how much the American people will accept outright mocking of their political process.

From the NY Times:

> The new designs, from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, would be made public in 2020 in time for the centennial of woman's suffrage and the 19th Amendment to the Constitution. None of the bills, including a new $5 note, would reach circulation until the next decade.

To clear up the mess, here is the information you need to know doing battle against any SJW praising this change.

The Real Andrew Jackson

There's no real way to completely describe the aura and attitude of Andrew Jackson besides the word badass. He was one of the last true patriot presidents and we owe a lot of America's success to his policies and personality. Here are a few quick facts on Andrew Jackson:

- Involved in over 103 duels. That's right, the "take five paces back to back then turn and shoot" type of duels. Usually the duel was to protect the integrity of his wife.
- Saved America from being recaptured by the British. While being at war with several factions of the Indians and French, Jackson also fought off a formidable army of British in the battle of New Orleans.
- Was the only president to lead America out of debt. Jackson hated the private banking cartels and fought them aggressively through his presidency.
- The first president with an assassination attempt. When the gun didn't function properly, Jackson beat the assassin with this cane!

Those are only a few of the courageous acts from a true American. So why does the SJWs say he was, like, a total meanie to the Indians and stuff?

Because they don't read history or live in reality. The reality was that rural American populations were being attacked and entire towns wiped out by the Red Stick Indian tribe. From his biography,

> In 1813 a faction of the Creek Indian Nation called the Red Sticks under Red Eagle, slew nearly 250 Alabama settlers in a brutal manner, resulting in the calling out of two 2,500 man forces, one under Jackson to punish and stop the Indians. It was feared that the Indians, in close contact with the Spanish, would begin a cooperative campaign against the southern U.S.

It goes on to record that Jackson even had one of his own men shot who threatened to abandon his post. There's no doubt Jackson was a hard and relentless man. However, the age he lived in demanded that he do what was necessary for the survival of the American people.

Jackson was involved in what was later called the “Banking Wars.” He was strongly against the private national banking system which could create debt out of thin air and own the nation through interest (sound familiar?). In the end, Jackson was victorious taking down the national private bank, thus delivering America debt free for the only time in its history. His later years would be described as “empire building” and you can do your own research from here.

Jackson was aggressively against the private banking system and effectively ended it. Now the Federal Reserve, which is our modern private banking system, gets their revenge while mocking the American people by removing their historical enemy.

The Myth Of Harriet Tubman

According to the Maxwell School of Syracuse University, a study was done on the truth of this woman and the conclusion was*:*

> That is where much of the misinformation about her has come from—historical fiction that is not always clear about when it is historical and when it is fictive.

“So little information about Tubman has been based on fact and so much based on myth and created history,” says anthropologist Douglas Armstrong. It seems most of her deeds were excessively exaggerated or completely made up. Milton Sernett, another researcher on the project, also stated;

> It gradually dawned on me that much of what we as Americans thought we knew about Harriet Tubman was not derived from good historical research but was a perpetuation of a larger-than-life story,” he says. “The symbol had overpowered the life, had overshadowed the historical person.

So how can a more-or-less mythical American figure topple the true heroic deeds of one of America’s most important icons? Because America is cucked. The Fed owns your interpretation of history and culture at this point. With a legion of SJWs who support this narrative, it will be hard press to get the truth out.

What You Can Do

This action will not be taking place until at least 2020. That's the deadline. So we still have time to turn things around. Get educated with the power of truth and reality. Go to battle against shills any chance you get. Not to persuade them, but to show others the fallacy of their arguments.

As you go through this process, you will only see more and more of your culture covered up, slandered or openly mocked by the elite and their minions until the official narrative is busted open in the mainstream. Be the one who helps that initiative.

How To Do Handstand Push-Ups

If there is any muscle that is indelibly linked to the concept of masculinity, and serves as a cultural shorthand for “strength”…it’s probably the biceps. And that’s because people are stupid. In an ideal world, a much better candidate just might be the deltoids. For while women are quite capable of having lower body strength roughly comparable to a man (due to them typically having a lower center of gravity and having wider hips), men have the advantage in upper body strength, a difference that is noticeable when looking at a man’s shoulders, which are going to be wider than the hips (assuming the owner of said shoulders isn’t a complete tub).

Or, to put it another way, broad shoulders are an instant signifier of strength and power, so it’s in your best interests to get some.

A Brief Anatomy Lesson

The body part we call “the shoulder” actually consists of several muscles that connect to the scapula (shoulder blade), humerus (upper arm), and clavicle (collarbone)—the most prominent of these being the deltoid, which forms the main contour of the shoulder.

In addition to this, the trapezius and pectoralis minor complete the visual element that is informally called the shoulder. There are several other muscles that involve the movement of the arm, but these will not be discussed.

Most upper body compound exercises that involve any sort of a pushing motion will work the deltoids and pectoralis minor to some extent-bench presses, push presses, overhead presses, push-ups, punching the heavy bag, etc. The trapezius muscles, in contrast, are worked in pulling exercises: pull-ups, rows, deadlifts, and the like.

And of course, the subject of today's article: the handstand push-up. It does not hit the trapezius muscles, but it is a tremendous workout for the other two muscles listed above. It also promotes blood circulation to the head and trains your dexterity and balance. It is an exercise that you ought to be doing.

The Steps

Doing a handstand, let alone a handstand pushup, seems a daunting, terrifying task. And…yes, it is for a beginner. Trying to do the technique cold will result in you slamming your sacral vertebrae, your head, or both into the ground—hard.

To begin, realize that it is perfectly okay to do the techniques with your feet on the wall. This will build up the strength and muscular power sufficiently, but if you want to do "free" handstands (i.e. off the wall), you will eventually need to train specifically for this. Bear in mind that handstand pushups can be done either free or on the wall, but of course they are much easier on the wall due to having your feet on the wall for balance

Speaking of feet, I have recently dislocated my right, so sadly I will not be showing pictures of myself. Enjoy the stock photos.

Anyway, to begin, you won't even be doing a handstand. You will be doing a headstand: put your head on the ground, get into a "sprinter" position, then kick up, with your feet on the wall and your hands and feet bearing your weight. Train this until you can hold it for one minute, and then go to the next step

The second is another held position, the "tuck plank" or the "Crow stand": crouch down on the ground with your hands on the floor, tip forward, and bear your weight on your hands as shown below. Hold this for a minute again.

Number three is the first true handstand you'll be doing, and it's again just a static position. Kick into the handstand, and hold it for time. After one minute, move on.

Then we have half handstand pushups. From the static handstand position, bend down until you're halfway down. And then push up. Do 10 of these and move on

Then do the full handstand pushups, put your hands shoulder width, descend until your head touches the ground (CONTROL your descent, obviously), and then push back up.

Diamond handstand pushups are just like the diamond regular pushups: put your hands together into a diamond, and do a pushup. If you can’t do a diamond, then gradually bring your hands closer and closer together (i.e. from shoulder width, move your hands a couple of inches closer together, and then repeatedly do so until you are doing the diamond)

If you completed the one-armed pushup steps, then hand and a half pushups will be exactly what you think: one hand on a basketball or stack of books (the latter being easier due to its stability), the other on the floor, and do a push-up. This makes the hand on the floor work harder, as well as training the central nervous system to work unilaterally.

1/2 one handed pushups are where this series gets really hard: kick into a regular handstand, then remove one hand and put it on the wall. Then do a pushup, going halfway down. This exercise will train the joints and muscles of the shoulder doing the work, as well as the central nervous system. Do 10 with each hand.

Assisted one handed pushups consist of getting into a one-handed pushup position, with the non-working arm extended diagonally outward resting on its back on the floor. Then do the one-handed pushup-the extended arm provides a little bit of assistance, but the vast majority of labor is on the flat arm. Do 10 of these with each hand, and move onto that awe-inspiring last step…

The one handed pushup is, to be blunt, extremely difficult, even when using the wall. Get into the same position as step 8, and go all the way down. Do not expect to be able to do more than 1 of these with each hand when starting out (I still can only do one with each hand).

Moving Forward

So once you have mastered this (it will take some time), you might ask how to move on—obviously, adding weight to this exercise will be difficult and awkward. The answer is free balancing, and then doing the exercises free of the wall.

You will likely not be able to do a handstand on your first go—try a headstand free of the wall first. Once you can hold that for a minute, do the same for a crow stand.

Once that’s done, try the free handstand. And from there, try the push-ups. And if you don’t want to do free handstands, there are always more exercises to try.

Feminists Have No Idea What's In Store When Muslim Values Become Accepted

April 24, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The Swedish government has been through a tough week. One of the two ruling parties, the Green Party, has had two of their representatives resign after scandals related to their Muslim identity.

Now people are asking the question: is there a place for practicing Muslims in Swedish politics? The fact that this question has to be asked shows how badly multiculturalism actually works in practice.

Minister resigns after meeting with Islamists

for having connections to extremist organizations. Photographs show him eating dinner with people from the Turkish ultra-nationalist group the Grey Wolves. He also met with representatives of the Islamist organization Millî Görüş. Televsision footage recorded in 2009, five years before he became minister, shows him comparing Israel's actions against Palestinians to Nazi Germany's treatment of Jews. Mehmet Kaplan finally threw in the towel on Monday.

Yasri Khan, candidate for the Green Party board, was next to resign. When meeting a female reporter for an interview about the Kaplan scandal, he refused to shake her hand. When greeting a woman, he instead puts his hand on his heart. Khan explained that he was raised to think that "physical contact with the other sex is considered to be very intimate." After much criticism from both inside and outside his own feminist party, he decided to leave all of his political posts on Wednesday.

Interestingly, the organization which Yasri Khan is the chairman of, Swedish Muslims for Peace and Justice, was founded by Mehmet Kaplan. Khan has said that he sees Kaplan as a "great role model."

On Thursday, Prime Minister Stefan Löfven commented on the recent events in the parliament. "The government has no involvement with extremists," he said, and added: "It goes without saying that you should shake hands with both men and women."

This sends a message to Muslims

Yasri Khan demonstrating how he greets women.

As you can imagine, there have been a number of allegations of Islamophobia coming from SJWs. They are easy to predict in that way. If something bad happens to a Muslim, you can be sure that they'll blame anyone but the Muslim himself. But that's not what's interesting about what happened this week. Only the most extreme leftists have spoken out in defense of Kaplan and Khan. The rest, including the mainstream media, have been pretty much unified in their condemnation of the two former politicians.

What this shows is that it's really not possible to be an orthodox Muslim and politician at the same time in Sweden. There appears to be an unwritten code of conduct that must apply to everyone, and it includes treating men and women equally. Like the Prime Minister said, you have to be able to shake a woman's hand. If you've been raised like Yasri Khan and many other Muslims like him, you have to change your behavior or stay out of politics.

It is widely recognized that the Green Party is the most liberal party when it comes to immigration, and it's also a great proponent of multiculturalism. Its top leaders proclaimed in 2014 that they "will never make it more difficult for people to come to Sweden." Yet this is the party that now kicked out two of its Muslim representatives, for reasons that had everything to do with their immigrant and Muslim identity. I can't come to any other conclusion than that no one actually wants multiculturalism for real—not even the most idealistic of leftists.

Feminists and Islamists don't play well together

Common sense will tell you that feminism and Islamism are impossible to combine. While modern feminism is basically a women's supremacy movement, women in Islamic societies are subjugated and under the supervision of their male relatives. Feminists have refused to admit that there are great issues with Islam related to the role women, instead vehemently castigating white men as sexists and misogynists. Now it looks like reality is catching up to them.

Leftists do one thing great, and that's selling their ideological product to the masses. They've made almost everyone think that multiculturalism is a great idea, and that anyone who opposes it must be a racist. But when tried in practice, even they seem to realize that it's a terrible idea. There's nothing wrong with Islam—it's the religion of peace, they say. Then they encounter an actual practicing Muslim and suddenly become very nationalistic and conservative. Their message is as contradictory as it is destructive: "Come to Sweden! Be a Muslim, by all means. All we ask is that you to think and act the way us progressive Swedes do. We know you secretly want to be like us."

I see things changing for the better. It’s become more accepted to be skeptical of immigration and multiculturalism in the last few months. The left seems a little bit less hellbent on destroying Western civilization than before. Whatever opinion one has of Islam and immigration, it’s a good thing that people can talk about it all more openly and ask the serious questions.

Now people are asking: Can an orthodox Muslim be a politician in Sweden? All I know is that the answer is not as certain as it used to be.

20 Degenerate “Cultures” That Have Formed The Dystopia We’re Living In

April 25, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Welcome to the depraved new world. Forget the books and movies, because you’re already living in a dystopia. Take a moment to familiarize yourself with the following progressive cultures of our society that will show you what a wonderful world we now live in.

1. Victim Culture

Victim culture is the mother of all other social insanity that we are witnessing today.

But being a victim today is not without its perks. In one victim package you get: attention, sympathy, ego-boost, the right to censor other people, the right to attack people with impunity, freedom from criticism, financial support from the government and moronic sympathizers, an elevated status, plus other privileges. It’s no wonder so many people today are scrambling to claim their own victim status lest they find themselves at a disadvantage.

And if you ever wonder why these professional victims are so aggressive, you have to understand that victim playing is a zero-sum game where the winner is the biggest loser. There is only so much prize to be won and far too many competitors to play nice. Anyone who engages in victim Olympics must shove their opponents off the stage lest they lose the spotlight.

2. PC Culture

You know you're living in a dystopia when cry-babies are policing your language.

We live in a toxic PC culture with an unprecedented level of control being imposed upon our daily lives.

While some of the most repulsive men and women are free to roam around naked in gay pride parades and slutwalks, scientist Matt Taylor was bullied until he apologized in tears for wearing a 'sexist' shirt his female friend made for him as a gift. And that's just one of many examples of the politically correct terrorism we're witnessing on a daily basis.

The most frightening aspect is that there is no knowing what you'll be guilty of until it happens, for the PC police is always on the lookout for new things to get offended by and new ways to ruin your life. You are to conform and submit in fear, not knowing when or where the next blow will come.

3. "Rape Culture" Culture

Number of rapes has been free-falling while rape hysteria and false rape accusations are soaring.

Spreading lies about the "rape culture" is vital for the feminists to propagate their narrative of eternal victimhood. You can tell how obsessed they are with maintaining this fantasy with the way they spend more time bitching about it than doing anything to solve it, even going as far as shutting down police campaigns to prevent them.

4. Hypersensitivity Culture

In our infantilized society, just about everything is offensive and triggering. It can be anything from Halloween costumes, a priest in a robe, pro-Trump messages scrawled with chalk, differing opinions, to the word "upset."

I’m surprised that social justice cowards are even able to muster up the courage to scream at people’s faces while they themselves have to snap their fingers because clapping is too triggering.

5. Shameless Culture

Giving tips on self-improvement? “Stop shaming me into marriage! I want to play my video games!”

Imagine yourself as an obese woman with no self-discipline. Do you:

A) Decide to be healthy by eating right and working out.

Or,

B) Bitch at everyone to accept you for who you are and call them fat-shamers if they gag in disgust from looking at your pile of lard.

“A” kind of requires effort, so…

6. Zero-Responsibility Culture

Ella Dawson
@brosandprose

I'll keep saying it until I'm blue in the face: STIs are not a consequence of poor decisions or bad character. #ShoutYourStatus

4/7/16, 2:52 PM

Why am I not surprised to find out that she's a feminist?

Everyone today is perfect and nothing is ever their fault.

"It's not my fault I'm fat, It's my genes."

"I feel like a slut after having drunk sex with him. It's not my fault, I must've been raped."

"I can't attract women because [insert your usual excuse]."

"My life sucks and it's all because of [select favorite scapegoat: Patriarchy, big government, evil white men, feminists, discrimination, Obama, etc.]."

7. Sexual Deviancy Culture

Sodom and Gomorrah had nothing compared to the sexual degeneracy of today. Now with homosexuality normalized and transsexuality also going mainstream, the door as flung open for all other sexual degeneracy to follow. Expect more furries, bestiality, pedophilia, and other biology-defying sexual deviance in the near future.

8. “Empowerment” Culture

Suggestion: Make it a criminal offense to criticize feminism

Feminist terror movement needs government force like fish needs water.

“Empowerment” is a code word for all the losers who desperately need to compensate for their insecurities. The truth is that the only way these leaches are able to “empower” themselves is by shoving others down while sucking off society’s sympathy and resources.

9. Oppressor Guilt Culture

“I’m so sorry for being white, just please don’t call me a racist again!”

When the victims start oppressing their “oppressors,” the wimps among them will break down and start feeling guilty for their very existence.

10. “I’m Disgusting, So I’ll Bring Everyone Else Down To My Level” Culture

Feminist role model for today's dumb and shallow American girls. The future certainly looks sparkling.

When feminists can't improve themselves (which is always), they need to start poisoning everyone and everything around them. This is especially prominent among the sluts who feel the need to turn all other decent women into drunken whores. Go to a feminist site like Jezebel and you'll see how they openly teach women to corrupt themselves.

11. Special Snowflake Culture

"Look! I dyed my hair blue and got retarded tattoos, now I'm unique and special like the other attention-whores!”

Everyone is so unique and special like everyone else, and we have to respect their individuality no matter how stupid and repulsive they are. If you don’t have any real accomplishments to speak of, your self-perceived uniqueness is the next best thing.

12. “You Can Be Anything You Want” Culture

If you’re still innocent enough to think that male and female are the only sex identities, consider yourself spared. You’ll be surprised to know that we now have a dozen or more different types of sexual identities (I lost track of them after trans-whatever), along with other batshit made-up identities. Our world has gone completely insane with mentally sick individuals coming up with new ways to identify themselves just to see how low they can go.

13. Infantilized Culture

Adults in New York paying up to $1000 to be in preschool again.

It’s not just the cry-babies in colleges who are infantilized, but the adults as well. This sort of degeneracy, along with the others on this list, only seem to be prevalent in large cities, which is why I now refuse to live in one.

14. Diversity For The Sake Of Diversity Culture

Excellent photoshop job by the Canadian Socialist Republic’s Ministry of Truth.

Everything, everyone, and every space must now be ~~enforced~~ enriched with diversity, which is our strength (whatever that means)—everything except our political opinions, of course.

15. Go Cry To The Authorities Culture

Nothing says strong and independent woman like crying to the UN for help.

Want to make easy money? Play professional victim and beg people to crowd fund you.

Is someone making fun of you on Twitter? Whine about sexism and get him censored or fired from his job.

Want to get back at your ex-lover? Cry rape and get him kicked out of school or jailed without a shred of evidence. Even if he doesn't get convicted, his life will still be ruined.

16. Nanny-State Culture

The professional whiners of today complain that they even have to go cry to the government to receive the pampering they seek. They believe Big Brother should turn the entire society into a giant safe space while being spoiled with freebies until they die.

17. Knee-Jerk Hostility Culture

When identity-politics gets out of control, people start to develop knee-jerk reaction to those who they consider their enemies:

White male? "Your opinions are worthless, cis-scum. Go kill yourself."

Skin colour is a shade browner than an Ivory soap? "Filthy muslim kebab, wait till we exterminate you."

Not excited about having multiculturalism and pansexuality shoved down your throat? "You ignorant, Nazi piece of shit! Intolerant assholes like you need to disappear from the world!"

Not enthusiastic about putting anyone left of Pinochet into gas chambers? "I'm going to punch your mouth you cultural-Marxist filth! Calm down? Don't try to censor me you Leftist faggot!"

18. The "-ist" Culture

Person A: "Oh, you're just a _____-ist, so your opinions are invalid."

Person B: "Shut up, _____-ist! You're just delusional."

19. Labeling People With Political Mental Illness Culture

Not only are the patients running the asylum, but they're also diagnosing YOU with mental illness.

"You don't like gay Muslims? Since I'm a doctor with a PhD in Social Justice, I'm going to diagnose you with homophobia and islamophobia. My treatment is going to be to shame you for your mental illness you until you shut up."

20. Emasculation Culture

Emasculation of men starts early in today's America with feckless parents who enable it.

When feminists, government, and the entire culture is harping for female empowerment at the expense of men, the result should be obvious: the systematic emasculation of men at all ages. Today, men are starting to talk like women, more men are turning homosexual, and more of them are changing sex. For the wimps, when it's too difficult to be a man, it's far easier to just abandon ship.

The Verdict

It’s the only way to be sure.

I realistically don’t see any hope of peaceful return to a patriarchal (or just normal) social order even if Trump becomes dictator for life. Nothing short of violent upheaval will reverse the cultural decay we’re witnessing today. Our society is going on a downward spiral and it can’t burn down fast enough.

Why Does America Lack A “Warrior-Patriot” Ethic?

Columnist Andrew Bacevich recently wrote an article for the Dallas Morning New entitled “Why America’s All Volunteer Force Fails To Win Wars.” The article makes the point that something is seriously wrong with the US military. While most of the article is couched in politically-correct innuendo and a studied avoidance of the real problems, it at least has the merit of pointing out the obvious. And this is that the military has sold out the martial virtues, and replaced them with something else.

Bacevich starts off on shaky ground when he makes the claim (dubious at best) that the US military is “by common consent the world’s finest, even history’s finest.” The arrogance of the this statement is profound, but this is in keeping with the American penchant for self-congratulatory hyperbole. Despite being so great, Bacevich laments, the US is still “unable to win its wars.”

Why is this? According to Bacevich, the reason lies in the fact that the nation’s “military mission is out of sync with its military ambitions.” At the core of the problem, he continues, is that far too few Americans are invested in the grandiose military projects that the American ruling elites have decreed, like invading Iraq and pacifying Afghanistan:

> Crucially, this indifference toward wars in which Americans as a whole are so little invested allows policymakers to continue those wars in perpetuity, with few questions asked. War thereby becomes a normal condition, with peace at best a theoretical proposition.
> The complaint here is not that in a time of protracted armed conflict a mere 1 percent serve. Rather, the complaint is that the other 99 percent find the arrangement and ensuing results tolerable. A conspiracy of silence, or perhaps a clamor of hollow cheerleading, shields our prevailing military system from critical scrutiny. Political and military leaders collaborate in ignoring its shortcomings. The great majority of Americans finds it expedient to go along.

This may be true, but whose fault is this? The American people had little or no say in the invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan. That was mandated by the neo-conservative clique who ran the Bush administration, and, to a lesser extent, the Obama administration.

But Bucevich does come close to identifying the real problem. He skirts around the edges of the problem, and nibbles here and there on the margins. Of course, he can't come out and say it, for fear that he would lose his comfortable media position. It remains for truly independent news outlets—like Return Of Kings—to speak openly and honestly. No one else will. Here, he says, is the crux of the problem:

> To fulfill its self-imposed obligations as sole superpower, the United States would need a citizenry that subscribes to the warrior-patriot's code: Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori. How sweet and fitting it is to die for one's country. Most Americans are far more likely to subscribe to the code vividly displayed each weekend in Style sections of newspapers. There, the appeal of dying for one's country takes a backseat to the latest tips on relationships, restaurants, recipes, street wear, household furnishings, and places to be seen.

What Bucevich is really saying here is this: America lacks a true warrior-patriot ethic. And on this point, I agree with him. How could it be otherwise? America has spent the past forty years shaming and denigrating that ethic by systematically removing masculine virtue from the public sphere. Could we expect any different outcome?

It is characteristic of the modern media to avoid asking the real questions, and to avoid giving the real answers. If we really want to know why the US currently lacks the "warrior-patriot" ethic, we need look no further than that modern state of masculinity in the US.

Instead of praising or encouraging the attempts at a “masculine renaissance” (which is the essence of the manosphere), journalists like Bucevich are the first to line up to condemn it for its perceived “misogyny” and lack of adherence to politically correct mantras.

These are the real reasons why America lacks a true warrior-patriot ethic. They will come as no surprise to readers of this site, but others may find the summary useful:

1. The warrior-patriot virtue is grounded in masculinity. Destroy one, and you destroy the other. It is beyond debate that masculine virtue has been under severe attack by political correctness, feminism, pro-gay media culture, and the continuing effort to rewrite history in a way that marginalizes or denigrates the achievements of European patriarchies. A man will not fight for a system that devalues and denigrates him.

2. The continuing infiltration of feminist doctrines into the military. The unrelenting push to put women in combat and remove any barriers between the genders is setting the stage for military softness, alienation, and lack of readiness. The message to men is clear, and unrelenting: you don’t matter. We don’t value you or anything you stand for.

3. The cowardly acquiescence of the generals and leaders in Washington. Men key off of the examples set by their superiors. When they see that the generals in Washington are not standing up for them, but are simply going along with all the politically-correct social engineering projects coming from Congress and the media, they draw their own conclusions. The conclusion is this: these guys are all chickenshits who care only about their own careers. Why should I care if they don’t?

4. The continuing infiltration of pro-gay and pro-transgender propaganda in the military. There is a sense that the military has become one vast social engineering project. Actually it is not just a sense, but a reality. Dissenters who fail to get on board with the new priorities (i.e., coddling misfits) will find themselves purged. With privileged special classes the rule now, a regular, normal man can hardly say or do anything without running afoul of the Orwellian thought police. The effect on morale is ultimately crippling, and is not being addressed.

5. The continuing of infiltration of “rape” and “sexual harassment” propaganda into the military. Again, the message is being put out that males need be bludgeoned into submission to politically-correct mantras. With a completely gender-mixed environment, sexual contacts are going to happen. It is inevitable. And yet, when they do, the military retreats to the comfortable hypocrisies of yesteryear: that men are always aggressors, and women are always victims. For the average man who is just trying to do his job, it is a no-win situation.

6. There is an increasing sense that the wars in the Middle East were undertaken not for the benefit of the US as a nation, but for the benefit of domestic elites, foreign powers, or entrenched cabals with their own agendas. To inspire a man to fight for something, he must feel that it matters to him, and that the issues affect him directly.

These, then are the real reasons why the US lacks a "warrior-patriot" ethic. The problem is that the entire US culture flies in the face of this ethic. If we really want a warrior-patriot ethic, it will have to be established from the ground up. If your culture celebrates and promotes shit, it will produce shit. The price of all this will be paid when the US actually has to fight a real war, not just some colonialist adventure. When that happens, all of the politically correct bullshit will go out the window so fast it will boggle the imagination.

Politicians will have to start listening—and I mean really listening—to what is happening in the worlds and subcultures of men. When has the mainstream ever taken notice of the manosphere, except to lie about it, or malign it? There are some truly revolutionary voices here, and there is some great writing here. But no one is listening. The entire American cultural value system will have to change. Nothing short of a cultural revolution will suffice. Degenerate, corrupt, and sick philosophies will have to be thrown out the window, and new ones embraced.

This will happen either voluntarily (which seems unlikely) or it will happen involuntarily, in the wake of a catastrophic military defeat. The choice is ours.

5 Reasons Atlanta Is A Good City For Heterosexual Men

April 25, 2016 | by Brock Robinson | Link | Original Link

With American cities becoming less and less appealing, men of all ages have been starting to wonder if there's a better place to call home. Skyrocketing costs of living, degradation in the quality of women, and general lack of opportunity are all problems that men face. But I'm here to tell you that there's still an American city that's not half bad, especially for younger guys. Here are five reasons you should consider taking a look at Atlanta.

1. Southern Women

Although they are still American, Southern girls are on average more feminine and appreciate traditional gender roles more so than their west coast and northeastern counterparts. Their upbringing is more conducive in preparing them for a traditional relationship where the man is expected to be a masculine protector and the woman is to possess more nurturing and feminine traits.

Girls raised in the South are usually going to lean more politically conservative as a result of the culture they grew up in. This is not a guarantee that they aren't riding the carousel and getting off to the Instagram attention chodestream (many are). But it does mean you won't hear any annoying opinions about the latest feminist pet cause or any nagging to attend a dinner party with her five homosexual friends.

Atlanta is like the NYC of the south. It's a central hotspot for the post-college SEC (Southeastern Conference) crowd. And every summer, after annoyingly chanting their last sorority cheer and banging their final frat bro, thousands of sorostitutes from across the southeast graduate with their $60,000 piece of paper and descend upon the city of Atlanta. Here they begin a new life and engage in a form of post-grad promiscuity never before seen until recent years. These girls are in a strange and new place and are no longer subject to the confines of keeping up a reputation that southern conservative Greek life obliged them to.

In their college towns, it was permissible to fuck around with a select few socially approved frat guys. But in Atlanta, they're ready to get down with any guy who has a dating profile and good text game. Now that the scrutiny of their peers is a no longer a factor, and their social circle has taken a huge hit, these hotties hit the dating apps HARD in the ATL. Girls from the SEC schools are known for being some of the hottest in the country, and now they've never been easier to lay. Get down to Atlanta and get a piece of the action.

Now if you're looking for a girl who's a little more relationship material, I would advise you to just avoid big cities in general. However, there are a few diamonds in the rough that can be found in this southern whorehouse of a city. The way to snuff them out is to determine if they've completely abstained from the dating app sex buffet going on here and instead prefer long term relationships stemming from their social circle. They are a rare find but they're out there.

2. Influence Of Southern Music

The rap game is strong in Atlanta. It could be argued that it's been the hip hop capital of the world for much of the last two decades. This is important because most rap music encourages men to be masculine and women to be feminine. It also has an interesting way of encouraging some women to be sluts while at the same time slut-shaming them. Then also occasionally praising the girls who are relationship worthy.

Effectively, these heavy rap influences lead to more people that value a masculine gender role for the man to carry out, a feminine role for the socially adept women, and certain number of sluts for alpha men to indulge in. The influence of rap music has rubbed off on all races in Atlanta and is liked by almost everyone.

On the flipside, you also have a huge country music culture which has strongly impacted nearly every attractive white girl in Atlanta. Country music, for the most part, encourages the same traditional gender roles that make southern women desirable. If you ask an Atlantan what kind of music they listen to, you will often get the response, “country and rap.”

It seems that there’s a concert or festival in Atlanta every other week. These types of events are perfect for meeting some of the talent the city has to offer and they make a great adventure for people who are coming to visit from other cities.

3. Much Less Expensive Than Other Large Cities

This is often a cliche and tired old point made by those who are blinded by city pride to the point of bias. I may be guilty of the above in some regard but the fact remains that Atlanta is a steal when it comes to the cost of living and what you get for it. The south as a region is cheaper than the coastal areas due in part to sweltering summers that can make being outside brutal unless you’re poolside (drinking pool culture is another big plus in Atlanta). However, with the widespread adoption of air conditioning in the 1960’s, people began swarming to the south en masse to take advantage of the cheap real estate coupled with the new-found comfort of A/C. Decades later, the south is still a bargain compared to other regions of the country.

According to recent data, Atlanta is 41% cheaper overall than Los Angeles, and housing in particular is a whopping 71% less expensive. A salary of $80,000 in Los Angeles could decrease to $47,364 in Atlanta bucks and get you the SAME standard of living you had in LA.

You might assume that more expensive cities balance out the cost of living with higher incomes. That is usually far from the case. Here are the most recent stats from Forbes.

Los Angeles
Median Income: $55,988
Median Home Price: $454,500
Unemployment: 7.3%
Cost of Living: 17.9% above nat'l average

Atlanta
Median Income: $57,062
Median Home Price: $162,200
Unemployment: 5.9%
Cost of Living: 1.7% below nat'l average

Those data points tell all. If you own property in an expensive part of the country, sell and move to Atlanta, you'll soon be balling out on a level you never could in those rich liberal havens.

4. Gentrification

Thirty years ago, Atlanta used to be one steaming shithole. But business has been booming in ATL over the last few decades. There seem to be 20 new high rises going up at any given time and you can actually live in a nice apartment in a desirable area on an entry level salary.

The city used to not be a very safe place, which is why most middle and upper class people fled to the northern suburbs. But today it's out with the old and in with the new. Ghettos are being pushed further south and west while the central parts of the city have been rejuvenated with new restaurants, bars, shops, and even the occasional Korean whorehouse fronting as a massage parlor.

Every time I travel to a typical major city, I complain in my head how old and run down most of the buildings are. They're usually only 20-30 years old which isn't that bad but Atlanta has got me spoiled. Everything here is brand new, contemporary, and most notably, affordable.

Here's what I recommend you earn in Atlanta for a typical bachelor lifestyle:

Shitty apartment in the city with 1 roommate – $35,000-$40,000
Nice apartment in the city with 1 roommate – $50,000-$60,000
Baller high rise with 1 roommate – $70,000+

The housing you can get off middle class salaries is something you'd need to be moderately wealthy for in other parts of the country. If you want to live by yourself I would recommend bumping those salaries up another $15,000-$20,000. The suburbs are cheap and 20 minutes out if you can't afford the above.

5. Strip Clubs

One last noteworthy item is that ATL is known for is its strip clubs. As you may know, Atlanta is home to the world's busiest airport. High business travel and hip hop culture have teamed up to create a city with more gentleman's club offerings than you'll know what to do with. I'm not huge on strip clubs (a lot of money blown just for blue balls) but I do enjoy the occasional bros night out and a strip club is always a classic staple of that. With strip clubs being a part of the culture here, cute normal girls are also known to pop in on occasion, giving you some options to game, although they are a minority.

Here are a few gems:

Pink Pony North – Located where Brookhaven and Buckhead come together. Hotly debated as the best strip club in Atlanta. (Not to be confused with its ugly cousin Pink Pony South near the airport.)

The Cheetah – Very classy spot. Located in midtown. Lots of college students dropping in due to GA Tech and GA State being nearby. Everybody seems to recommend going to other shittier strip clubs first so you can fully comprehend the contrast.

Magic City – Located downtown. I've personally never been but I've heard it in so many songs that I had to give it mention. Mostly black girls here and you might just see your favorite rapper's favorite rapper.

The Verdict

All things considered, Atlanta has broken in to the list of best American cities for men. There are a few downsides, of course, such as not having a beach (Atlantic Ocean and Gulf Coast both 4.5 hours away) but the quality of the women, the upscale but affordable lifestyle, and the anti-PC culture the south is known for have all come together to make this city a top-tier destination. It is absolutely one of the best places for living up your bachelorhood as well as settle down with a family in the surrounding towns if you can find that unicorn. Good luck.

The Great Filter Hypothesis Suggests That Foregoing Patriarchy Will Lead To Human Extinction

The Great Filter hypothesis is one of the most terrifying ideas in all of science. We often discuss problems related to sexual selection on men's web sites, but what is seldom discussed is how it relates to the larger schemes of science and life in the rest of the universe. The Great Filter is one hypothesis that ties up these loose ends.

It has been said everything we see as progress in the human world is due to runaway sexual selection, and particularly K-selection for sophisticated societies. As explained in The Evolutionary Psychology Behind Politics:

> One strategy, named the r-strategy, imbues those who are programmed with it to be averse to all peer on peer competition, embrace promiscuity, embrace single parenting, and support early onset sexual activity in youth. Obviously, this mirrors the Liberal philosophy's aversion to individual Darwinian competitions such as capitalism and self defense with firearms, as well as group competitions such as war. Likewise, Liberalism is tolerant of promiscuity, tolerant of single parenting, and more prone to support early sex education for children and the sexualization of cultural influences. Designed to exploit a plethora of resources, one will often find this r-type strategy embodied within prey species, where predation has lowered the population's numbers, and thereby increased the resources available to its individuals.

Prey species are r-selected while predators are K-selected; could pushing humans towards r-selection be turning us into prey for the elite?

> The other strategy, termed the K-strategy, imbues those who pursue it with a fierce competitiveness, as well as tendencies towards abstinence until monogamy, two-parent parenting, and delaying sexual activity until later in life. Obviously, this mirrors Conservatism's acceptance of all sorts of competitive social schemes, from free market capitalism, to war, to individuals owning and carrying private weapons for self defense. Conservatives also tend to favor abstinence until monogamy, two parent parenting with an emphasis upon "family values" and children being shielded from any sexualized stimuli until later in life. This strategy is found most commonly in species which lack predation, and whose population's have grown to the point individuals must compete with each other for the limited environmental resources that they are rapidly running out of.

Seeing as humans seem to be subject to cyclical forces in history, one must wonder what the future of our species is since we are currently on the downswing of the great historical sine-wave and we are making a sharp turn towards r-selection. The prime reason we are on the downswing is feminism has unleashed the primitive sexual forces of women in the West. No society that has remained civilized has lifted restrictions on monogamy and female sexuality, as anthropologist J.D. Unwin found when he studied 80 tribes and 6 civilizations. Will we recover? Or, as astrophysicist Carl Sagan put it:

> We've arranged a global civilization in which most crucial elements profoundly depend on science and technology. We have also arranged things so that almost no one understands science and technology. This is a prescription for disaster. We might get away with it for a while, but sooner or later this combustible mixture of ignorance and power is going to blow up in our faces.

Given the ease with which life arose on Earth, it should be common the Universe. In that case, where the hell is everybody?

The Drake Equation

Back in the 1960s, astrophysicist Frank Drake proposed an equation to estimate the number of societies that might exist in the universe. It is based on the number of stars in the galaxy, the number of those stars that have planets, the number of those planets that can support life and the number on which life actually arises.

Using this imperfect equation, Drake came up with a very rough estimate of anywhere from 20 to 50,000,000 societies potentially existing in the Milky Way galaxy. If that is the case—where the hell is everybody? Either intelligent life is exceedingly rare or exceedingly short-lived on evolutionary timescales. Enter The Great Filter hypothesis.

Well over 99.9 percent of all species that have ever lived on Earth are extinct

The Great Filter

> The Great Filter concept originates in the argument that the failure to find any extraterrestrial civilizations in the observable universe implies the possibility something is wrong with one or more of the arguments from various scientific disciplines that the appearance of advanced intelligent life is probable; this observation is conceptualized in terms of a Great Filter which acts to reduce the great number of sites where intelligent life might arise to a tiny number of intelligent species.

Basically, it is the idea there is a Great Filter humanity will be subjected to that will lead to its downfall. After passing through this filter, humanity either survives as a non-technological civilization (returning to the cave dwelling life our ancestors if we are lucky) or goes extinct. It gets worse.

> The main counter-intuitive conclusion of this observation is that the easier it was for life to evolve to our stage, the bleaker our future chances probably are.

Enrico Fermi was the first to notice the seeming complete lack of civilizations in the universe once radio astronomy began. In our own galaxy there are some 400 billion suns, and based on what we have seen with the distribution of organic molecules throughout the universe it should not only be possible but probable that life exists elsewhere in the universe.

Also, life arose on earth almost immediately after it formed which makes it seem like life forms easily in the universe. However, this fact is a double edged sword because we aren't finding life in the universe despite exhaustive searches and improving technology. This means 9 out of 10 societies could be self-destructing once they reach a certain level of technology.

No civilization has thrived without restraints on female sexuality

How This Relates To Us

Some scientists say we could be at the most crucial stage in our long-term survival as a species: the stage at which we reach interplanetary and interstellar colonization. Many societies could have developed up to our point in the universe and fallen apart soon after. It is interesting to note the U.S. has long led scientific exploration of space, but since the sexual revolution took root we now hitch rides on Russian rockets in order to fly humans into space.

Sexual selection is the engine that drives evolution to high levels of intelligence, and perhaps once any society reaches our level of development it eases up restrictions on monogamy.

This is risky business as we have seen since the sexual revolution in the West with falling birth rates, the exile of the father from the family, and the rise of degeneracy. J.D. Unwin found in his anthropological survey:

> The whole of human history does not contain a single instance of a group becoming civilized unless it has been absolutely monogamous, nor is there any example of a group retaining its culture after it has adopted less rigorous customs.

After unleashing all restrictions on female sexuality, men adapt to the drastically altered sexual environment by learning game. But, this leads to an 80/20 rule of most females being monopolized by a small percentages of males. Betas, the bedrock of building and maintaining society then check out of doing grunt work since the sexual market is the granddaddy of all the other markets of man. Environmental conditions that led to the development of high intelligence and a high culture then self-destruct, causing the society to fall apart.

Implanted RFID chips are closer to reality than you might think

Technological Enslavement

Another worrying sign that seems to be coming into existence in the West is technological enslavement. With the advent of ever cheaper, smaller, and faster computer chips it is plausible that the human race will be enslaved by an elite. Perhaps this is why the limitations on female sexuality were removed in the first place. Man becomes feral after monogamy is abandoned, and is not able to organize the way he would have in an orderly, monogamous society to avert the threat of technological enslavement.

Forces are already at work to eliminate cash completely and put all money and all documentation on a GPS-trackable RFID chip that will be implanted into our hands. Japan is conducting its own experiments in this vaunted "cashless" society by using fingerprints. In any case, our lives are increasingly managed by computers and micromanaged by a government that manages the computers.

As the Financial Times pointed out:

> The anonymity of cash helps to free people from their governments.

Aaron Russo warned us about this agenda over 10 years ago.

> All money will be in your chips. And so, instead of having cash, any time you have money in your chip, they can take out whatever they want to take out whenever they want to. If they say "you owe us this much money in taxes," they just deduct it out of your chip, digitally.

Using social engineering, Cultural Marxism and total financial control (all of which are advancing at a rapid rate) the human species could be transformed into docile servants of the state. This view, as pessimistic as it is falls in line with history. As Aristotle observed 2,000 years ago, the natural state of man is slavery. The politicians know this, which is why they lie in our faces and get away with it.

Work on the implantable RFID chip proceeds at a rapid pace. The only real boundary now is engineering social acceptance of an electronic dog collar.

Was baking a cake for your family really such horrible oppression, and is licking the boot of a corporate paymaster a better life?

What Worked In The Past

What these dystopian views have in common is they're all illustrations of the value of patriarchy and the grand error of discarding it. Patriarchy, with its paternity guarantees for men and provision of a role in society other than that of a sperm donor and child support check-writer has led our society to greatness in the past.

The decision to toss patriarchy overboard is having profound implications, and it is not leading us to a better place as a society or as a species. The sexual revolution brought on the law of the jungle and the 80/20 phenomenon and is making the human species more feral with each passing generation.

What incentive does a man have to give a damn about society or sacrificing for the betterment of his offspring if he is no longer offered a seat at the table of the human family? Man is also becoming easier to boss around as r-selection breaks down the family, the building block of civilization; bossing him around is much harder to do when the family is headed up by a strong patriarch. The solitary individual is much more desirable to an autocratic society.

Perhaps the human species' Great Filter has arrived via either de-civilizing feminism, matriarchy, technological enslavement, or an unholy trinity of all three. With a 99.9% extinction rate across a span of 4.5 billion years, the odds are not in our favor. Personally, I would prefer extinction to enslavement.

It’s Becoming Easy For Single Men To “Drop Out” And Live On Minimum Wage

One of the upcoming negative effects of feminism that has yet to take hold in the United States is the increasing prevalence of the unmotivated, single man in the workplace. Since he has no family to support, a man of modest appetites does not need a high-powered career. Taken to an extreme, a man who is a social recluse can exist happily with an income near the poverty level based on the following expenses.

Although my income is currently nowhere near the poverty level, for a good chunk of years I lived in a simple apartment with a short commute to work and supported only myself. I was an avid Warcraft gamer, and was fat and did not go anywhere usually other than work and to see relatives. We’ll use numbers from my past for this exercise.

Expenses

Rent

The apartment I lived in during the time of this discussion cost $600 US per month, and that included water and heat, both of which I could have all I wanted. The apartment complex went Section 8 about halfway through my time here, but I have not been bothered and I felt safe, except for one time there was a fire.

Not my building, but in the same complex, about 5 years ago. Girls smoking and doing yoga; caught the mat on fire. Section 8 for the win.

Utilities

Power ranged from $20in the winter to $100 in the summer to run the air-conditioners. The internet connection and cable has averaged $75, so we will say $150 a month for utilities.

Food

I usually ate two meals a day at the plant for under $10 total, and would often have fast food in the evening, which made me very overweight. $20 a day did it for food, so say $600 a month.

Not me, but I DID love the Taco Bell, multiple nights a week.

Gasoline

I drove five miles each way to work, and WalMart is practically on the way. Although that is way less than one tank of gas a month, let’s say I did other things and at $4 per gallon, too, so $160 per month for gasoline.

Warcraft

That game costs fifteen dollars a month and your soul.

This one was mine.

Total

So far, we are running a yearly total of $18,300. Yes, it was an ideal situation—I had enough clothes, and no car payment on a reliable car. I had a good computer upon which to waste my life in Azeroth, and a short commute to work. While I did make mad money during this time, I was just living, but not having a life.

Minimum Income

Tacking on 15% taxes to the $18,300 gives us $21,045 gross income, which is 177% of the $11,880 that the federal government considers poverty level for a single person. So I need me $21k in income. What’s a simple job I can do around here that requires no ambition or real skill?

Any of these would work for a slacker with a gaming addiction.

Wal Mart

Says here I can make $10 an hour minimum working at Wal Mart. That is 2,104 hours of work over the year which puts me at just over 40 hours a week and a week's vacation. Might even make some overtime.

McDonald's

This tells me I can get $9 an hour working for Ronald. This would mean I would have to work 45 hours a week all year long, but it's still certainly doable.

AutoZone

Glassdoor.com lists the base job at AutoZone at $9 an hour, so it's the same setup as working at the burger joint, just with a better set of duties, in my opinion. 45 hour work weeks here.

Jobs Abound

Those are three jobs within less than a mile of me as I write this. I guarantee Walmart is hiring, since they have their shingle out every time I go in there. There have got to be more jobs for similar income around as well.

Welfare

I've never been on welfare, but some quick googling shows me that if I go Section 8 and get free housing, that would put me down to needing only $9300 per year. Cut gas down to just going to work and that's down to $7740. Eat cheaper and I'm down to $5940. If I get $200 dollars in SNAP food stamps a month, and $300 in TANF allowances, that puts me right at $6000. It's doable, barely, on welfare.

Work has to have a point

What women don't get in the feminism movement is that there has to be a point for men to hold down a job. I work as an engineer because I like having money. Sure, there's a bit of prestige that comes with the job, but I only put in the long hours of tedium and dealing with people with high school educations or worse trying to tell me that I'm wrong because I want a paycheck.

I like making the money I do because I like nice things, and I like having my surplus income make more income on its own so that I can retire sooner. Some married guys I know make the money they do to provide for their wives and kids. I live in a very conservative area of the USA where this is still a little normal.

But what if you don't have a family and don't need or want nice things? Are you going to pursue a high stress career just because you can? Women certainly seem to think so. Many of the female engineers I know define their success at their career as their success at life, and will do anything, and I mean anything, to advance it. They won't learn until near the end that their career is a means to an end, and not the end in itself.

If you're a guy with no family and no real ambition, a ten dollar an hour job will suit you right down to the ground, and a fifteen dollar an hour job might even allow you to get a retirement going, once the left passes those minimum wage laws they want.

Satire, but extremely accurate.

It's all going to come crashing down

The feminists' tragic flaw is that they assume that they are the only ones changing their game. They expect that they can sleep around in their 20s and get their power career going, marry a perfect man in their mid 30s, then have perfect children in their early 40s once their career is set for good.

We've seen here at ROK that the babies are not perfect when the mother is in her forties, and that the men who will marry a 35 year old post-wall carousel rider are far from perfect as well. We know that they are wrong on those.

We also know that they are wrong on substituting the corporation for a husband; it has no loyalty to you, you can't sleep with it, and you're going to die alone if you take that path.

But now, we also know that feminism, by making men realize there is no longer any point to having a high powered career, will replace men with women in those careers, as the men will no longer pursue those positions. By removing our obligations to society, they've freed us from the need for these careers. Once they harness up the yoke over their shoulders that was formerly ours, they may then finally learn that they are wrong in this, too.

Until that point, equality means I don't have to help and you can carry that load all on your own, sweetheart.

How To Massage A Woman’s Body Before Great Sex

April 26, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Climax University

https://vimeo.com/163289537

If you’re a regular Return of Kings reader then Ukrainian born sexologist Elena Pellicano will be no stranger to you. You may remember previous contributions in which she offered her opinions on why European women make excellent wives and how men can use their natural scents to attract women – a true cannot-miss!

Today however Elena is turning her expert eye over the importance of two key skills that every man should be well aware of if he wants to truly satisfy a woman in bed; Foreplay Massage and Oral Sex.

For today we are just going to focus on foreplay massage. She will explore the topic of oral sex, also known as cunnilingus, in the short video clip below and will go into more details in a future article.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Fql0RYBsYXg

Let’s get something clear first, however—just because you’re good at foreplay, or oral for that matter, does not a happy relationship make! This isn’t about how to have a happy relationship as that’s a topic with unique and complex considerations of its own.

This article is related to our baser animal instincts that unite pretty much all of us and the feeding of which we mostly cannot ignore. There is something to say about being ‘good’ at both foreplay and wider bedroom business increasing your confidence and the amount of worth you are viewed with by others, but that is not to be the goal.

So what actually is foreplay? You can't be good at it unless you know what it is!

Broadly speaking, foreplay is defined as any pre-sex ritual designed to further ignite the intimacy between the two partners and prepares both male and female properly for sex—thus increasing the pleasure and satisfaction felt by both parties.

If there is one thing that you need to consider in your quest for better foreplay it's this; it is her pleasure that should be your focus, not yours!

While there is much evidence to suggest that in the bedroom, the more you give then the more you get, that cannot be your goal. If you are doing this for selfish ends, then ultimately the whole experience is going to just become very awkward and it's a deeply un-gentlemanly way to behave.

Foreplay massage and regular massage are ultimately different—regular massage is generally aimed at muscle relaxation and stress relief, where foreplay is to encourage the body to become ready for pleasurable sex. However one may lead into the other as if your lady has had a long and tough day at work, you will almost certainly need to relax her properly so she can abandon all the stress of the day and settle into a happy evening.

Avoiding eye contact is, in this case, beneficial (which I will elaborate more on in the video) so encourage her to lie on her stomach. Start your massage on her legs – only start on her back if you need to first alleviate the stresses of the day, then move to the legs.

Move your hands slowly and confidently along her legs and buttocks, encouraging blood flow to her most intimate of areas – the more blood that flows to her vaginal area the more intense her sensations, sensitivity, lubrication and ultimate satisfaction will be.

If you want to really set the mood, burning candles and natural massage oils packed with ingredients designed to stimulate her blood flow and warm her body are perfect.

Don't use something cheap that resembles synthetic jelly and smells more like the plastic container its packaged in. It will do nothing physiologically beneficial for either of you. Essential oils are used because of their ability to promote positive reactions in the body in terms of stress relief, calming nerves, relaxing muscles, igniting sexual awareness and alleviating a busy mind so she is more accepting of bedroom activities.

Elena, constantly impressed with the positive effects of essential oils, has used her considerable expertise to create her very own range of handmade and entirely natural products designed to attract women and amplify love making, which you can find here.

If you're not yet convinced of using oil to massage, think of your hands. Many men have rough, coarse hands—especially if you work with them or lead a very active lifestyle.

While many women may love the feel of holding a rough hand while you're walking down the street, it's going to do little to alleviate her stress after a long day and prepare her for a sensational night.

So, please consider the art of foreplay massage, there really is no secret to it – since any man can learn it. Learn the rules and methods once, and you'll be set for life.

Remember; her pleasure is always the focus!

5 Tips For Non-White Men Who Want To Date White Women

A while back I wrote a column about the pros and cons of practicing the Venusian Arts as a black man in the U.S. I touched on a few things that make a significant difference such as the expectation for us to push for sex, and the fact that we shouldn't expect women to pressure us to put rings on their fingers (though they often push for some sort of exclusivity if you're game is tight).

People on and off the web assume that because I don't game or date black women anymore, then I must only approach white girls. Though I couldn't care less about who people think I'm dating or running game on (though I do have a sweet tooth for Latinas), I have had success with Caucasian women for quite some time.

My achilles heel

Cougars, mudsharks, college chicks, and everything in between have all taken a ride on the Donovan Sharpe Express at some point or another. But my ability to slay these girls was anything but dumb luck or good fortune. And you can bet your ass that learning to game them as a man of a different race didn't happen over night. I had to recognize the necessary changes in my game and work at it to become successful:

> …as soon as I became cognizant of the racial components of game and tweaked my approach accordingly, my conquests with the second sex improved considerably.

About 30% of our US readers are not white. And because most women in this country are white, it would help to know a few tricks of the trade on how to meet them romantically. So here are five things that men of a darker hue can adjust in order to improve their odds with white girls.

5. Don't be a stereotype

Do NOT be this guy

Back in '14, Steven Kendall wrote a column about Asian men in the West. He talked about the difficulties they have shaking the stereotypical view of them and how it quite literally puts a choke hold on their sexual prospects—even with women of their own race:

> The dismal reality you find yourself in is that women don't want you for anything except the occasional help on a computer or numbers-related problem. Without knowing it, you are at all times competing with your one billion brothers and cousins to be the World's Least Fuckable Man.
> -Excerpt from An Open Letter To Asian Men Of The West by Steven Kendall

A guy I worked with a few years back came to the states from India in his early twenties. He's a decent looking dude, a cool guy, and recently ditched his office job to become a charter pilot. This dude is living the dream so you would think he'd be swimming in women but because he looks, acts, and talks like a stereotypical Indian he repels women like a citronella candle repels mosquitoes.

We all have personality traits that have been infused in us through our experiences, upbringing, and environment. Sometimes they work for us, other times they work against us. Within the context of gaming white females it is paramount not to be the stereotypical version of your given race. You've got to stand out from the crowd to get noticed by women.

The exception, of course, is black men (and a few Hispanic nationalities). I talked about the so-called "assumed alpha advantage" that black men seem to have when gaming any race of female in the article I referenced at this start of this one:

> While most white men in the Anglo world have to prove their sexual fitness to women (on the "alpha fucks" side of hypergamy) there's an unspoken sentiment that black men who are at or near the extreme poles of the financial hierarchy > (wealthy and poor) are natural alphas. The hip hop culture, ghettos, and black professional athletes make compelling arguments for that assumption but the truth is no one really knows for sure.

White girls would sleep with this dude before a stereotypical Asian

The fact of the matter is that black men are portrayed by the media as natural, static alphas. For better or worse this places black men higher on the SMV totem pole than any other man of color in the West. When it comes down to it, a woman will bang who she perceives as an alpha regardless of how “hood” he is.

No, this doesn’t mean ditch your culture, become another person, or try to lose your foreign accent just to get white chicks, but we all know that “being ourselves” isn’t going to cut it when running game on females of any race. You have to connect with her while maintaining your uniqueness. This sounds difficult but it’s actually quite easy and requires little practice.

Which leads me to my next tip which is…

4. Accentuate your “SWPL” tendencies

Shit White People Like……such as “problem glasses”

If you reside anywhere for an extended period of time, it’s inevitable that you’ll be influenced by your surroundings and eventually take a liking to many of the cultural norms around you. Using your affinities for certain aspects of Western culture will help you to find common ground with American women. In other words, embracing a few of your “stuff white people like” habits rather than tamping them down works in your favor when gaming Caucasian females.

Again, this doesn’t mean you have to start drinking Starbucks and following the Kardashians just to have something to talk to white girls about. But showing her that you can connect with her on some level will increase her comfort level with you and make her more receptive to game and escalation.

If you already drink Starbucks coffee, cool. But there’s no need to pick up the habit for the sole purpose of banging white chicks.

When girls see my bike rack on my Jeep Wrangler, it gives them a glimpse of the “All-American” guy they drool over in rom-coms. Of course my skin tone and tattoos takes me out of the running for husband material (thankfully) but the fact that they see I’m not completely clueless about their world works to my advantage.

If you like drinking wine (I’m a huge fan of red wine), take her to a wine tasting event. If you dig classic rock and roll (my personal favorite) throw on some Boston when you’re in the car with her. The bottom line here is not to be ashamed to admit or show that you like a few SWPL-endorsed indulgences for fear you might betray your culture or come off as a “sell out.”

Staying true to yourself doesn’t mean rejecting things you genuinely enjoy to keep up appearances. So embrace your SWPL side a little and watch your interactions with white chicks escalate from casual conversations to planned meet ups.

3. Make white friends

Social proof is one of the most powerful parts of a man's overall game. If a woman sees a man has a lot of friends, acquaintances, connections, and the approval of good looking females, she will be more attracted to him because he is socially approved.

However, if a white woman you're interested in sees that you only have Black, Hispanic, or Asian friends, not only will she be in a perpetual state of apprehension in terms of comfort (which hinders attraction), she'll start wonder "what's wrong with you" if people of her own kind aren't signing off on you.

Of course there's nothing "wrong" with you if you don't have a rainbow coalition of friends but it's important to, once again, remember that women have to be comfortable with you in order to be relaxed around you. If they're not relaxed, you're not getting laid and that's all there is to it. Making friends with white dudes (it helps if they're like-minded) will most certainly boost your social value as well as give you access to more white chicks as a natural consequence.

2. Avoid giving off beta vibes

Lower value Caucasian women know their options are limited with regards to high value white males. To compensate, some latch onto lower value white men, and some date outside their race to expand their prospects. Great for men of color right?

Wrong.

If you're a man with red pill knowledge who stays in shape and in the black financially, you're going to have a more "expensive" taste in women—namely women who are fit and beautiful. As we all know in the manosphere, the quickest way to making low quality females such as fatties, single moms, and parachute seeking post-wall sluts your main source of poon, is to give off provider vibes.

Banging the desperate white females mentioned above on the regular is easy. But as a man in demand, you're looking to dine on steak and lobster—not hot dogs and under cooked tater tots. Giving high value white women (or any woman for that matter) the impression that you'd take care of them or wife them up will do two things: 1) Make the good-looking ones put you on the back burner until she's done riding the cock carousel because she thinks you'll rescue her from her bad decisions when she hits The Wall and 2) It will draw the low value females to you at an alarming rate. A lose-lose situation to be sure.

Easy to sleep with, sure. But do you really want to bang nothing but post wall sluts?

The key here is to refrain from talking about the money you make, the stability of your job, etc. Presenting yourself as a Beta Bucks option as opposed to an Alpha Fuck will give you desert dick-itis. Sure, this is standard game. But good looking white females have the most suitors of any other race of female in the West. They have the ultimate abundance mentality so if she catches so much as a trace amount of Captain Save-A-Ho tendencies, you'll be put into the backup plan category with the other half dozen dudes she has there already.

1. Get ripped, get rich, get status

No shit, right?

Tell you something you don't already know, right? Maybe. But as far as the sexual market goes, men of color are at a disadvantage because of our skin tone and this applies to both sides of the female imperative. We can deny it all we want to and take the SJW route and proclaim that women should be aroused by a "good heart." But we know that outward appearance matters to women almost as much as it matters to men…..

…..unless your body fat percentage is sub 5%, you're net worth is at least seven figures, and a celebrity. Okay, so those examples are extreme and few men in the world embody all three simultaneously but you get the picture.

If you have a darker tint to your skin, you're going to have to increase your SMV in the areas you have control over. All things being equal, white women prefer white men. So the solution is to tip the most important traits that attract them in your favor.

He has more opportunities with white girls than the average white guy does.

This means you have to be in better shape, have more social currency, and be better off financially than the average white guy in order elevate your status with fair skinned girls. So hit the gym, stop spending money on useless crap you don't need, and start making friends with movers and shakers.

Remember…

…this isn't about developing relationships, cultivating long term companionship, or finding a wife. This is about increasing your chances at dating Caucasian women and nothing more. If one of your trysts with white girls turns into something more, cool. Adjust your game accordingly and let the good times roll.

It's important to remember, however, that because of the overabundance of options they have combined with their lack of impulse control which is fortified by the YOLO lifestyle crammed down their throats by anything and everything around them, white chicks are at or near the top of the notch count tally. It goes without saying that this makes them some of the worst significant others out there.

My next installment will be for my Caucasian brothers and will cover how to game non-white chicks. Because I'm not white I can't contribute to this column in terms of content. My friends "Paul" and "Doug," however, most certainly can and are more than willing to share their knowledge and experience. Stay tuned.

The Bonehead Alliance Between Ted Cruz And John Kasich Will Do Nothing To Stop Trump

With Donald Trump having scored a crushing victory in last week's primary in New York and his sweep last night of the mid-Atlantic primaries, the GOP establishment is in emergency, break glass mode. This past weekend, Ted Cruz and John Kasich announced that they have formed a political pact in a last ditch effort to keep Trump from winning enough delegates to get the nomination on the first ballot of the Republican convention:

> Due to the fact that the Indiana primary is winner-take-all statewide and by congressional district, keeping Trump from winning a plurality in Indiana is critical to keeping him under 1237 bound delegates before Cleveland. We are very comfortable with our delegate position in Indiana already, and given the current dynamics of the primary there, we will shift our campaign's resources West and give the Cruz campaign a clear path in Indiana.
> In turn, we will focus our time and resources in New Mexico and Oregon, both areas that are structurally similar to the Northeast politically, where Gov. Kasich is performing well. We would expect independent third-party groups to do the same and honor the commitments made by the Cruz and Kasich campaigns.

Much like the Wisconsin primary earlier this month, the GOP views next week's primary in Indiana as Cuckster's Last Stand, the last chance they have to force a brokered convention. With Cruz mathematically eliminated from the race due to his humiliating defeat in New York—coming in a distant third and winning no delegates—denying Trump a majority of delegates is the only way he'll have even a glimmer of a chance of getting the nomination.

Unfortunately for the cucksultant class, the Cruz-Kasich deal looks like it will backfire tremendously. Lyin' Ted's campaign has been in freefall ever since his fluke Wisconsin win, and in cutting a deal with Kasich, he risks losing the remainder of his supporters.

Ted Cruz, Professional Loser

The biggest problem with the Cruz-Kasich pact is that it shows that Ted Cruz's rhetoric about fighting the establishment is a flat-out lie. Cruz has built his political career on his supposed opposition to the "Washington cartel," spending most of his time in the Senate grandstanding against the Republicans' leadership, including orchestrating a shutdown of the government over Obamacare and calling Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell a liar on the Senate floor. Yet he is now teaming up with John Kasich, a long-time Washington insider who was recruited to run for president solely to help former GOP golden boy Jeb Bush.

Despite the GOP establishment embracing Cruz as their preferred anti-Trump stool pigeon, the man's support is still derived in large part from the most autistically inflexible portion of the party's conservative base, who admire Cruz for his supposed dedication to the Constitution. Cruz's base will not tolerate any sort of compromise with the establishment, as shown by how he lost huge amounts of support when he sided with the Marxist agitators who incited a riot at Donald Trump's Chicago rally last month. Cruz's deal with Kasich could very well lead to the former's supporters either voting for Trump or staying home out of spite.

Furthermore, Cruz's nonstop bragging about his voterless victories in states such as Colorado and Wyoming have also hurt his poll numbers. Last year, the Colorado Republican Party canceled their presidential preference vote so they could keep anti-establishment candidates like Trump from winning the state's delegates. At the party's convention earlier this month, they awarded all of their delegates to Cruz, then sent a Tweet bragging about how they had scored a victory against Trump.

In crowing about his ability to manipulate the machinery of the GOP and circumvent the party's supporters, Cruz has shown that his claims of being "anti-establishment" are lies. In the past month, the only primaries he's won are Wisconsin and Utah, cultural outliers where Trump's masculine personality and bluntness are liabilities. In every other state that allowed its citizens to vote, the voters chose Donald Trump.

Last Days Inside The Cuckenbunker

It's clear that Trump's Wisconsin loss was just a temporary speed bump on his way to the nomination. Ted Cruz has failed to make a dent in New York or any of the other Northeastern primaries—in several of them, he's come in third place—and while Kasich was able to win a few delegates in New York, he wasn't able to impact Trump's overwhelming victory.

While Cruz is hoping Indiana will turn out like Wisconsin, his dreams are going to be dashed due to the Hoosier State's demography. Indiana is a central part of the Rust Belt, whose manufacturing base has been absolutely devastated by the free trade policies that Trump opposes. Additionally, much of southern Indiana was settled by the same people who settled Kentucky, West Virginia and other parts of Appalachia, one of Trump's largest bases of support. The Donald's wide and consistent lead in the Indiana polls reflects this.

Ultimately, while a Trump nomination is still far from guaranteed, it's clear that Trump has recovered from the missteps his campaign took in the past month. Cruz's constant betrayals of his principles and his unlikable, slimy personality have steadily eroded his chances of forcing a brokered convention. Barring any major missteps, Trump's path to the White House has never been clearer.

What Makes A Man Excellent

Below is a conversation with my college-bound little brother.

Little Brother: I don't know what's wrong with me, but I feel so lazy. I just don't want to do anything.

Roosh: Can you give me an example of when you were recently lazy?

LB: I went to the gym the other day, and when I arrived, I just didn't want to lift. So I worked out very slowly and talked to the guys instead.

R: This is a common problem, because lifting is hard. Your body wants to conserve its energy so it decides that the better option is just to do nothing. Let me ask you something: what makes an excellent man?

LB: Motivation.

R: Motivation to do what?

LB: To do the work.

R: Remember a while back we had a conversation about the unit of one hour, where you can break down the greatness or accomplishments of a man in one-hour increments?

LB: I remember.

R: When you look at an athlete, you see a man with a strong body who has the right skills to do his sport. But what you don't see is the hours of work he put behind it. When you see a successful businessman, you see the big company he built up and maybe his fancy car, but you don't see the hundreds of hours he worked to build up the business. I'm learning Russian now, and have gotten compliments on it, but the people who compliment me do not see my daily struggle with it, the hours I put in every day just to learn a few new words. Any kind of excellency or greatness you see in other men comes down to the work they put in. Therefore, excellency is work. Can you see that?

LB: Yes.

R: Now when you were at the gym, and you decided not to work, would you say that was the decision of a normal man or an excellent man?

LB: Normal man.

R: Correct, a normal man will take the path of least resistance that does not involve work. What percentage of the population would you say is normal?

LB: Most.

R: I would say 99.5% of the population is normal, maybe even higher. They are sheep who follow, who prefer to stay in the herd, who like being told what to do to spare them the expense of thinking or taking risks, who seek entertainment over work, who are not in control of their emotions, and who lack willpower. They want glory and riches from not putting in effort, from not going above and beyond what they were told to do by their teacher, parents, or boss. They do the bare minimum in life and so they have a normal life that all the other people have. They have their iPhone, their entertainment, they surf the internet all day to feel some emotional pleasure, and they go to the club on the weekends to get drunk and maybe get laid. This is the life of a sheep.

LB: Is that bad? Is it bad to be normal?

R: It’s not bad. There is nothing wrong with being a sheep, and most people don’t have the genetic constitution to be anything else, but it’s not what I wanted to be. When I was faced with forks in the road, one leading back to the herd and one leading into the unknown, often involving much risk, almost every time I’ve picked the road that took me away from the herd. I’m not saying I’m an excellent man right now, but I want to be an excellent man, so I must do the work that it takes to be one, one hour at a time, one workout at a time, one Russian word at a time. This means avoiding comfort, luxury, entertainment, and mindless distraction. This means straining my mind and body, because as you know, your muscles only get bigger when you lift to your limit. If in my studies or work my brain is not tired, I did not work hard enough.

LB: But I don't have the motivation. Like at the gym, it's so much easier when I have a friend to push me to work out. And now I'm busy with school. If I didn't have school, I would have the energy to do all these things.

R: Remember when you visited me in Odessa last year? I had to drag you every day just to go to boxing training. You didn't have school or any other responsibilities, but you still didn't want to do it. Is it possible you are using school as an excuse?

LB: It's possible.

R: There is often something in life that keeps you busy, such as school or work obligations, but in spite of that, you must have the desire within you to fight off the fatigue and laziness to make that decision to be an excellent man. What you're looking for is external motivation, something in your environment that will push you to do something that you should do. But external motivation is fleeting. One day it's present and the next day it's not. You can go to the best motivational seminar in the world, and pay thousands of dollars to do so, like many adults do, but after two weeks you'll be lazy again and revert to your old habits. You'll work out when your friend is present, but how about if he moves to a new town? Then you won't work out anymore?

External motivation is only temporary, like getting energy from a cup of coffee. Only internal motivation to be excellent will push you to do the work every day, every week, every month, every year. You will not need any external motivation if you know that you want to be an excellent man, but if you don't choose excellency, you will be like a sailboat with no sail, no direction, allowing everything in your environment to whip you this way or that. Sometimes you'll be motivated and sometimes you won't, sometimes you'll do the work and sometimes you won't.

LB: But it is helpful when my friend calls me to go to the gym. I work out harder.

R: I believe it, but let's view things from your friend's perspective. He is internally motivated to be strong and fit, so he goes to the gym alone, but here you come, a friend who admits he’s lazy and needs his encouragement and motivation. He’s giving you a finite resource, his energy, to help you out. In other words, you are holding him down! If I was his brother, I’d say, “Hey man, your friend is a bum, he doesn’t want to work. Find friends who have internal motivation, who lift you up.” Can you see that?

LB: I didn’t think of that way.

R: Look, I’m not saying you’re a bad kid, but those who are not internally motivated drag down those who are. If someone wants, I can be their motivation coach, but I should get paid for that, because it takes away my energy and time and prevents me from doing other work. I’ve known guys who just want to socialize, who aren’t hard workers, and don’t mind disturbing my work in order to just hang out. I don’t mind hanging out every now and then, but they don’t care if I don’t finish my new book or my language studies. So I have to say no to those guys, and spend time only with those who are as internally motivated as myself to be excellent.

LB: How do I become internally motivated?

R: Do you want to be an excellent man? If you want to be a normal sheep, then keep doing what you’re doing. There is nothing wrong with it, and my love for you as a brother would not change, but you will have a standard issue life—neither extraordinary nor horrible—if you continue to choose comfort and laziness over work. When you’re faced with two options, where one involves work and discomfort and the other involves comfort and relaxation, you are making the choice between being excellent and being a sheep. When you decided at the gym the other day not to work out hard, what decision did you make?

LB: To be a sheep.

R: Right. It was the easy decision for you, because being a sheep is easy and being excellent is hard, but I can not make you excellent because being excellent is a personal decision. Understand that excellency is not one big event or one lucky break, but hundreds of tiny decisions. Being excellent is your daily habits, the extra one or two hours of work you put in every day, that when accumulated over many years, makes you excellent. The books I've written come from only one or two hours of focus a day. I've built a living doing this over the past several years, and it has given me my freedom and independence to live anywhere in the world, but it was difficult to do these two hours of work a day.

One hour of extra work a day is just too much for 99.5% of people, so they will not do it, because they never made the choice to be excellent. Why would they choose work over entertainment if they didn't choose to be an excellent man? Excellency is not flashy or exciting—it's the tedious, boring, and hard work you do every day. Three workouts a week over many years will make you a strong man. One hour of hard reading a day will strengthen your mind. One hour of your own work can be the start of a business. Do you see how that works?

LB: I do.

R: You're still young, so I'm not saying don't have fun with your friends or don't play video games, but just keep in mind what it takes to be excellent. If there isn't an excellent seed within you right now that is begging for water and soil, then it's possible you are destined to be a sheep. But if there is that seed, it's my job as a big brother to tell you how much water it needs and what kind of soil it needs to grow. Long ago I looked into the mirror and decided that I wanted to be an excellent man, so every day I put in the work, because like I said before, excellency is work. If you also want to be excellent, you now know what it takes. The only thing that can stop you is yourself.

Why Do SJWs Like Game Of Thrones When It Stands For Everything They're Against?

As the new season of the HBO series Game of Thrones got underway, I noticed that all of the Social Justice Warriors on my social media were really excited about the new season. It seems like an odd fit given that Game of Thrones seems to stand for almost the exact opposite of what SJWs profess to believe. What does their fondness for the series tell us about their real beliefs?

Monarchy

Joffrey Baratheon—The SJW as King

The story of Game of Thrones takes place in a medieval-like fantasy world. As the title of the series suggests, it is about the cloak and dagger political machinations that take place as various noble families vie to gain control of the throne of the fictional country of Westeros.

SJWs profess to be staunch defenders of democracy so it is strange that they love a show that is all about royalty. For SJWs, the popular will trumps all authority. They are constantly at work trying to expand the voting franchise when it comes to people who will vote for their candidates. For example, the Democrat governor of Virginia Terry McAuliffe recently signed an order which will give felons the right to vote—perhaps because he believes that the criminals will recognize Hillary as one of their own and vote for her in November.

But their love of Game of Thrones reveals that SJWs really love the pomp and circumstance that accompanies monarchy. This is what is behind their incessant praise of Obama's vaunted intellect, Michelle's great beauty, and how the Obamas have brought "class" (an undemocratic concept) to DC.

SJW might give democracy lip service but not even the biggest left winger can get excited about the will of ignorant people whose philosophy boils down to YOLO (you only live once).

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YEIGl8LP278

Aristocracy

Game of Thrones is almost exclusively about the nobility. In the books on which the series is based, the common people are called "small folk." The are a few characters who are of low birth, but they play relatively small roles.

Again, SJWs profess to be against any sort of hereditary aristocracy. On paper, they oppose class distinctions and celebrate "the poor." In practice though, they are very class conscious and if they are already in the upper class, they take steps to ensure that their children remain there.

SJWs do this in several ways. They support progressive taxation that prevents others from bettering their station. While wealthy SJWs celebrate single motherhood and deviant relationships for the lower classes, they themselves engage in traditional marriage. They always try to marry upward. They send their children to private schools attended by children of the upper class. Meanwhile, they take action to ensure that your children will attend school with children from the lower class.

By taking these actions, SJWs have created a new aristocracy in everything but name. The only difference is that it is an aristocracy of the worst rather than best elements of society.

Violence

Game of Thrones is notorious for its violent scenes. In the infamous “red wedding” scene of a couple of seasons ago, the young king Rob Stark and his mother are tricked into attending a wedding of a professed ally, Lord Walder Frey. But Lord Frey has allied himself with the Starks’ enemy and the wedding is just a ruse to get the Starks to drop their guard. The wedding ends with Rob Stark being shot through with arrows and his mother’s throat being slit—all graphically portrayed, of course.

In the Game of Thrones universe, violence is how things get done. The series has been filled with wars and murder. It is fair to say the philosophy of the series can be boiled down to the 48 Laws of Power maxim: “Crush your enemy totally.”

The violence of Game of Thrones stands in contrast to SJWs’ stated goal of making the country less violent. SJWs push for gun control. They lobby for special laws that protect only certain groups such as the “Violence Against Women Act.” SJWs claim to be anti-war.

SJWs may be “personally opposed” to violence but they have no problem with using the government, which they control, to violently crush anyone who the SJWs don’t like. One SJW acquaintance expressed glee in the hope that the recent Ammon Bundy stand off in Oregon would end in a Waco-like slaughter of the protestors because they were conservative white men.

When it comes to ruthlessness, no one exceeds SJWs. Traditional men want the punishment to fit the crime, but SJWs are willing to use even outrageously excessive measures to remove their enemies. If that means wholesale slaughter of their perceived enemies, SJWs are willing to do it.

Faith

The *Game of Throne*s fantasy world is, like the Middle Ages, dominated by faith. Unlike the Middle Ages, most of the ruling elite in Game of Thrones are atheists. Like many GOP politicians, they only use religion as a tool to fool their subjects.

SJWs identify with the ruling class in Game of Thrones. SJWs view religion as something that is backward and only suitable for simpletons, the emotionally weak, and the uneducated. Meanwhile, SJWs see themselves as being too intelligent to subscribe to what they believe to be fables. Rather, they worship at the altar of Science. It doesn't seem to bother them that the extent of their scientific knowledge comes from watching the Daily Show.

Homogeneity

On the surface there is a conflict between the diversity that SJWs champion, and the homogeneity of the world of Game of Thrones. The land of Westeros is almost entirely white. All the nonwhites live in the free cities that can only be reached by sea. Still, there are some characters that cater to the SJW diversity fetish.

One of these characters is Daenerys Targaryen, the white haired princess of Westeros who lives in a foreign land. Daenerys becomes the ruler of these lands by freeing the slaves of that land, which in HBO's interpretation are mostly nonwhite. In one cloying scene, the grateful ex-slaves adore Daenerys by carrying her aloft and chanting "Mhysa" or "mother."

Every racial group has its share of SJWs, but most SJWs are white people who live in largely white enclaves. True, they may have a token nonwhite friend but for the most part SJWs resemble the all-white cast of Girls or the staff of liberal news site Vox. By favoring maternalistic welfare programs, SJWs see themselves as Daenerys, ruling the nonwhite masses from a lofty perch

Conclusion

There’s a reason that the ultra-liberal HBO network produced the Game of Thrones series—it is a perfect mirror into how SJWs view themselves. They are engaged in a ruthless game of strategy in a quest for unadulterated power. For too long, traditional men have been as “innocent as doves.” It is time that we become “as wise as serpents” and begin thinking strategically as well.

4 Effective Ground Submissions That Every Man Should Know

We arrive to the final installment of our series on fighting techniques. In “complete” martial styles (involving blows, throws and fighting on the ground) and in non-competitive confrontations, a large majority of fights end on the ground, concluded by a KO, submission, or technical victory of some sort. Hence the importance of the four techniques that follow.

1. The vine (calf crusher)

This move starts after both of you fell to the ground and are still fighting. In this scenario, you have the upper hand on your opponent, as he is on his fours ("turtle" defense), with you having control over his back, or kneeling on his side.

1. You need to rest your weight with both your hands on his back to keep balance. As you squat (more powerful) or kneel on your support leg, raise and bend your free leg towards the inside so you can hook it between the legs of your target

Your free leg should be parallel to the ground, like when you rest it on your other knee while sitting in a chair. Why not call this move the "Alpha Body Language Vine"?

2. Pivot on your support leg while pushing your free leg in the popliteal fossa of the opponent until the back of your knee is in contact with his thigh. Exactly like a vine around a tree. You must remain stable and bent forward, not to collapse backwards.

3. Bent slightly more to cup both of your hands around the front of his foot. You can then sit back and push him with your shoulder to flatten him on the ground and keep control with your bodyweight. As you pull, your tibia bone will press the muscle fibers of the calf, inflicting a great deal of pain. He will most likely tap out

4. If this is not enough, you can put the sole of your free foot on your own heel and push, so the tibia drills deeper in the muscle, while you pull harder on his foot. If this is not enough, you can kick with force your heel BUT THIS IS LIKELY TO RESULT IN AN INJURY FOR YOUR OPPONENT.

This one takes quite a bit of practice, but is well worth it. Note that the bigger the legs of your adversary, the more painful it will be for him, as his muscle groups are larger.

The hematoma created would incapacitate him. It is important to keep the leg in line while you pull, to inflict pain on the muscle and not the articulation. The tension created on the kneecap if twisted, can damage the ligaments of his knee and the whole articulation.

I'll let the boys of Human Weapon demonstrate (here, they used a rolling movement to conclude):

2. The Hon-Gesa-Gatame shoulder lock

This one is one of the most, if not the most, useful submission I know to make an opponent tap out. Useful because it starts from the Hon-gesa-gatame position. 70% of the time, two fighters in a standing clinch or trying to throw one another will end up in this position.

1. Both fighters are on the floor. You are on top of your opponent, pinning his weight on the floor with your ribcage. One hand controlling his neck and the other holding his wrist/arm. Your legs are ideally forming a right angle to control a maximum of surface

2. Using the leg closer to his head, you will raise it up towards the ceiling, in order to hook his forearm under your popliteal fossa, using your strength and the weight of the leg to keep his arm AT A RIGHT ANGLE. This needs to be practiced thoroughly to execute it fast, as he won't wait there passively

3. The final step is to use a scissor-like motion, pulling down his wrist with one leg, while pushing his elbow upwards by thrusting your hips towards the ceiling. It creates pressure and pain both on the elbow and shoulder joint. If he does not tap out, you can also push (GRADUALLY) his shoulder towards the floor with your free hand.

In a non-competitive scenario, you can push his shoulder down while thrusting up with your hips in one movement. You can punch his shoulder down in last resort. WARNING: this is highly likely to create serious lesions on the elbow and shoulder ligaments.

3.The ankle lock (Achilles tendon compression)

It is one of the pillar techniques of Russian sambo and is probably how 70% of the submission victories occur in the discipline. It is also popular in BJJ and MMA. It is a matter of skills, speed and mental as if you do it, your opponent has exactly the reverse set up to use it on you too.

The submission can be done while you stand (for example after you used the Thai sweep or the inside hook that we saw before, or while you are sitting, facing the opponent.

1. The key part of the submission starts with you, properly locking his ankle joint as high and as close as you can under your armpit, while keeping his leg straight, with his knee and toes pointing towards the sky, not in a diagonal. Your radius will be placed under his leg, at the spot where the Achilles tendon meets the root of the calf

2. You must clasp your elbow against your ribcage as tight as possible. Meanwhile, your leg (the closest to the one you hold) will remain outside his, to prevent him to scoot away, while your other leg, locked straight, will push the popliteal fossa of his other leg, to prevent him to reach forward to grab your lapel or punch you

3. The final step is to lean backwards, while pulling his leg up. You can use a “sawing” movement with your radius on his tendon. It should be enough to inflict pain. However, I recommend to lift your hips towards the sky in order to maximise the leverage on his Achilles tendon

What NOT TO DO: Leg is not vertical. Hips are not raised. Dude's spending is energy for nothing.

4. The rear naked choke

Also known as Hadaka-Jime or "mata leão" (the "lion killer," as it is known in Brazil), it is the easiest, most useful choke and my favourite hands down. Who would not like the move that Hercules most likely used to slay the Nemean lion?

You need to practice this one with care and regularly, while controlling your strength and reading the signs that show that it is working. This choke is dangerous as it reduces the supply of oxygen to the brain.

Always used controlled practice under the supervision of a qualified teacher. Best way to learn: listen to what your partner and “guinea pig” is saying.

(Note: this choke hold can be used while both fighters stand and the same steps can be followed, with slight variations)

1. You find yourself on the side of your opponent (like the fighter in red shorts) after the two most likely scenarios: 1.He tried to punch while moving forward and you deflected his blow, knocking him off balance 2.You were in a clinch and while he pushed, you made way and dodged his force, while stepping towards his side

2.Get closer to your opponent immediately. Slide your arm under his chin, resting the inside of your elbow on his trachea. Get your hand (the one under his chin) flat on the inside of your other elbow. Rest the palm of your free hand flat on the occipital bone

3. The choke (a blood strangulation) comes from three different points: 1. Squeezing your am to flex your forearm and biceps muscle, in order to apply pressure on his arteries. 2. Pushing his skull forward and down with your hand, to block his blood circulation and restrict his movements. 3. Pulling your body backwards to exercise greater pressure while his hips are still.

To limit his movements, you can execute a “figure of four” or lie on your back or on your side, to prevent him from having any point of contact with the ground.

Your technique needs to be good and the practice must be done on different partners with different morphologies. Even is the choke is there, an opponent with experience and strong neck muscles will not be affected if your technique is not spot-on.

Un apprentissage sans fin

Those four dimensions are the foundation of martial arts but are not limited to those. Techniques and counter-techniques are thousands and variations are endless. But more than anything, it is practice, good guidance and dedication that makes an excellent fighter more than an endless repertoire of techniques.

After all, Bruce Lee was right when he said “I fear not the man who has practiced 10,000 kicks once but I fear the man who has practiced one kick 10,000 times.”

So go on. Put on some sports clothes and go hit the mat. Be serious, humble and attentive. But before anything else, have fun!

Until next time…

3 Ways Women Show Their Narcissism On Social Media

April 28, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The advent of social media has given rise to millions of new opportunities for women to find desperately needed attention. This phenomenon has expanded so greatly in recent years that we have become accustomed to seemingly every woman using downward-looking Facebook and Instagram photos to present their cleavage for an online audience. The excuse is usually that they are showcasing a new dress or top. Many uninitiated men are so habituated to this new form of sluttery that they forget it's actually all about attention-seeking. Instead, they see it as a "cultural" expression of modern femininity.

Yet many methods women use to get male (or female) eyes to look at them or care about them are not so obvious. Not every issue can be shared with their Facebook friends or Instagram followers, or must be shared sparingly. In fact, despite attention-seeking being most associated with trying to capture as many admirers or viewers as possible, the worst examples of it often occur in either small groups or one-on-one.

The kinds of attention-seeking I explore below should serve as examples for you to make decisions about the kinds of girls you spend time with. Some, like coworkers, will be harder or perhaps impossible to get rid of. If this is the case, you simply know to be careful around them, creating space where possible. So, here we go:

1. Family death or personal tragedy attention-seeking

Why is everyone suddenly so vocal about their family relationships after family members die? Because of all the perks and advantages people get from “grieving”! Some girl barely called her grandmother once a month, let alone visited her 45 minutes away, but when the old woman died, ¡voila¡, instant sympathy from others!

I have seen this pattern repeat itself again and again. Old family members especially were treated as burdens to be endured by girls I have known, unless they could expect to receive financial gratuities while relatives were alive or after they had died, or if ancillary benefits like attention could be derived from their illness or death.

Totally unexpected deaths, like most of a family dying in a media-covered jetliner crash, are so rare as to be almost meaningless for the vast majority of the population. Instead, girls who court attention by way of family tales of woe are forced to use events they themselves predicted but practically-speaking ignored. Poor grandma or grandpa spent five years with terminal cancer or using an oxygen tank, yet their death really was a shock! And now they deserve your carnations, coffee-dates, invitations to the next weekend party, or something similarly rewarding for them.

If you have known a girl for an extended period of time and, even as a half-close friend, she rarely mentions her family or the time she spends with them, tears after a relative’s death are most likely crocodile ones. She does not need to have mentioned the particular family member who died, but there needs to be some previous evidence that she takes these relationships seriously. If Aunt Joan, who you’ve never heard of, dies, but she always speaks about visiting her grandparents, her grieving may not be attention-seeking. However, if the sobs come without that sort of history, you’re probably dealing with a narcissist.

You should apply this very healthy skepticism to dead “friend” situations, too. Far too many girls seem to have known the deceased as a lifelong, continual pal when it comes to trumpeting the loss on Facebook or in real-life social gatherings.

2. The gross-out or graphic details approach

This is a general category that includes women who brag about or allude to having unprotected sex with many, many partners (without even the most basic regard for STD tests), girls who talk about scatology or other elements of their bowel movements, and other lovely examples of female depravity. The idea of regressive women wanting to act like men is nothing new, especially in relation to numbers of sexual partners.

To try and cultivate an image of "independent" women, the idea of these women is to shock others so they can garner an audience. Many or most people find them repulsive, but the girls' truly intoxicating hope is that a small cross-section of people, principally men, will deeply like them for their "honesty."

A powerful, albeit disgusting illustration of this form of attention-seeking arrived recently in the form of one "Makala" from Toronto. She shared her supposedly "embarrassing" story of going to a man's house and "having to" put a piece of her own excrement in her handbag because his toilet would not flush. Interspersed within the tale were desperate self-appeals to her ego, such as "All of the hard work I put into being a hot girl is tarnished by one teeny tiny poop story. Now I'm just the poop girl." So tarnished she decided to share it with the Twitter world!

The girl claims to have received a huge amount of non-fake positive male attention afterwards, which, if true, proves that women behave this way expecting rewards to follow.

I know what some of you are thinking: "Do you think we're idiots, David? Of course we know not to associate with girls who talk about their bowel movements!" Yet the threshold starts a lot lower than this. A woman who goes into graphic, non-romantic detail about the last man/men she slept with is also a part of this category. She has taken up the belief that she should act like a man with breasts. Instead of it being normal to talk about this, it is for the purposes of attracting attention and projecting themselves as desired objects of male lust.

Most young women are constantly fretting over their value in the sexual marketplace, more so as they age. Detailed stories about sexuality and related matters are just vehicles for convincing people of how "good" they are.

3. Humblebragging

This is a style of attention-seeking best illustrated by a clear example: "I won 2nd place at the hairdressing contest and it's so, so unfair!" A woman who says this is trying to use what she thinks is an acceptable way to brag about being the first runner-up. Many women are more discreet with their humblebrags, which are still anything but humble.

The general principle is that what a woman received for some specific event or in life generally is not enough, she feels bad, and she wants to arrange an opportunity for others to praise her or simply think about her more in the future. It extends to acts of "charity" as well, with women cloaking their publicly declared donations or deeds in lamentations that the experience of seeing the suffering of the needy traumatized them.

Even showing non-made-up appearances is now an opportunity for women to exhibit narcissism and humbebrag. As females have become more and more aware that their "beauty" rests on the illusion of camera filters, make-up and other tools, "make-up-less selfies" have become all the rage with narcissistic girls.

On the one hand, the fad presents women as being fine with their flaws and open to appearing vulnerable. In reality, it is all about fellow women or men "reminding" them about how naturally beautiful they apparently are, even to the point of being more beautiful without make-up. If the craze was really about honesty in appearances, the women would take make-up less photos in the park, on dates, and at birthday parties, all without the fanfare of telling people they're not wearing product.

The problem with humbebragging is that it only gives a temporary, superficial lift to the woman's flagging self-esteem. Like a meth addict requiring progressively higher doses, she will expect more and more flattery to come her way. So it is better to never step on the merry-go-round of appealing to an emotionally broken woman's vanity. Your best bet is to totally avoid any woman whose words and actions serve as a perpetual half-finished sentence that she wants you to complete with an epic ballad about her magnificence.

How will you get these women out of your life?

If all I have done here is alert you to some of the common mechanisms used by women for courting attention and helped you to navigate them, my job is done. And, very importantly, you should not restrict yourself to these three. There are plenty of others and also a multitude of carefully planned borderline actions that the more skilled female manipulators engage in.

In addition, knowing the tactics of such women enables you to start to outfox them at every turn. If you were unfortunate enough to marry a girl like this, have a child with her, or just got into a relationship with a standard issue succubus, do not despair. Begin to take the steps to remove yourself from the situation. And the starting point for this is recognizing the attention-seeking behavior.

I would wish you luck, but it's never about luck. Tally-ho, gentlemen!

How To Get Over Your Anxiety When Approaching Women

April 29, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

One of my best life lessons I learned in a Boy Scout wilderness survival class. I learned that the number one thing that keeps you alive if you are lost in the woods is a Positive Mental Attitude. Preventing yourself from becoming stressed, worried, depressed, or dejected and keeping a clear head is more important than finding water, carrying a compass, having a map, or any other single factor. And the best thing about that lesson is anyone can change their attitude.

I've found this lesson applies equally to success in life, success with women, and general happiness. Napoleon Hill and Dale Carnegie have both written books on the importance of P.M.A.

What is the biggest reason you are not getting laid more? You are not meeting, engaging, and flirting with enough women. Why not? It's 100% a mental decision. If you approach women with a positive attitude, a smile, and carefree attitude, eventually you will get laid.

Motivate Yourself

A positive attitude is important for two reasons. First, you must put yourself in the correct frame of mind to approach women in the first place. I'm fairly disgusted and exhausted by American women, their games, their personalities, and their general lack of femininity. If I stop and dwell on these issues too long, I lose the desire to approach them and miss out on the opportunity for a bang.

The other night, I was standing in a bar waiting for friends. There was a slim, long haired American girl also waiting alone. I'm fairly picky, and have had my fill of cunty, aggressive western women, and the pains of wasted time and past relationships with ex girlfriends were filling my mind. When I began thinking of all these things, and how inferior this chick would be vs. a slim Mexican salsa dancer, I hesitated before approaching, she looked over and saw me in my awkward state, and the opportunity was lost.

If you DO want an easy lay, you must set aside ALL negativity, and just have a goal of staying positive and upbeat no matter what, and to interact with every passable woman that you come across that day. I consider all the unpleasant components a Western girl may have just another part of her "shit test" that I must pass if I want to bang her. When you consider it that way, the correct response is to ignore it as irrelevant, and keep your goal in mind—getting her alone and sealing the deal.

Women Have High Emotional Intelligence

The second reason a positive mental attitude is important is because once you have approached, you must project a confident, happy go lucky, masculine image to the woman with your actions, tone of voice, and conversation topic. Women have a naturally higher EQ than men, and can pick up on body language, nervousness, and other factors far easier than we can. You have to be naturally happy, and talking about subjects that are interesting to you or make you happy (at least on some superficial level), and you should be speaking with a smile.

In order to make them comfortable enough with us to hand over their contact info after only a few short minutes of conversation, you must come across as genuinely confident, happy, and carefree. This is very difficult to fake, so the easiest thing to do is make multiple approaches, so the individual outcome of each one matters very little. Then you have little reason to be nervous or feel odd, and your natural calm and confident manner will moisten her privates and make her more receptive. Remember, the first couple of minutes of casual flirting is an exciting event for both man and woman, and you want her emotions to tell her “Yes! See him again!” and overcome her rational mind (bear with me) which is saying “You don’t even know this stranger.”

Fear Factor

What’s the main thing stopping you from approaching?

It’s far easier to do nothing

A masculine man takes on a difficult task, because it allows him to grow and learn. It's easier to sit and home and watch TV instead of lifting. It's easier to collect welfare than it is to learn a skill and work a job. It's easier to wife up the first sloot you come across than remain single or hold out for the absolute best option. But we are men and we ENJOY challenges, because we enjoy the rewards that come with them.

You consider you will see the girl again

You might, and you might not. Either way, you should approach her, even if you aren't going to close. Say hi, be friendly, make your presence known to her. You can always pick up where you left off if you see her again.

You hesitate and question how much you might like her

If you are looking for a quick bang, the only thing that should matter is if she passes the boner test. This can be decided within two seconds. Approach or pass.

You don't feel physically attractive enough

First, remember the P.M.A. lesson. A positive mental attitude is WAY more sexy to a woman than a great body, a tall guy, or a certain "type." Second, you should be working out in order to build and maintain strength, maintain healthy testosterone levels, and not be overweight. But trust me, if you are anywhere near average shape, the girl you want to approach has likely already slept with someone far below your SMV.

You aren't dressed good enough to impress her

Again, attitude is more important than what you're wearing. That said, I'm guilty of leaving the house without always looking my best. And it seems that EVERY time I do, I find myself around a really hot girl who's alone. You know how the hot girl always has to spend time on her appearance, even if she's only going to the grocery store? You need to do the same. It doesn't have to be elaborate, just practice good hygiene and wear decent enough clothing where you feel comfortable approaching a stranger whenever you go out.

You don't want the discomfort that comes with rejection

This is likely the biggest reason. Consider that meeting girls is simply a numbers game, and that you must pass x number of rejections until you reach the goal. Consider every interaction to be a learning experience. Therefore, when you don't get the number, you haven't failed, you've practiced another approach, you've gauged the girl's reaction to your style, your opening line, a specific question, or something you can tweak and use on your next approach. Consider this: even if you fail 100% of the time, all you've done is spent a few minutes getting to know someone you will never see again. Psychologists tell us talking to strangers improves our well-being. So at a bare minimum, you've improved your mental and emotional health.

Overcoming Fear Of Rejection

Approach first, hesitate after you number close

Accept that even for the best of PUAs, they will likely convert only single digit percentages of approaches into lays. This fact alone should make you feel better. If I told you, you were guaranteed pussy if you approached the next 100 women you saw, would you do it? Because that's almost assuredly what will happen. Guys new to game often report a success rate of 1, 2, 3%. While some pros often say it's not much higher than 6%. What's the catch? The pros are simply APPROACHING more.

The key for me is to make casual conversation with anyone and everyone you come across. This does a few things:

1) Puts you in a Positive Mood! We are social creatures and we get tiny endorphin highs off social interactions.

2) Warms you up and gives you practice at making small talk

3) Takes the pressure off when you see a hot girl, you just repeat the same behavior you did with the last 5 strangers you passed, and she either responds, or doesn't.

The May Challenge

The school year is ending, couples are breaking up, bodies are getting beach ready, and juices are flowing. Now is the time to act. For the month of May, the challenge is to approach 100 women in 30 days. That means approaching 3 girls every day, 4 girls on weekends. Depending on your comfort level, if you're not ready for something that aggressive, take 2 months. If you're ready, start today. If you can't dive right in, here is the plan:

Week 1: Begin your first couple of days approaching neighbors, fellow guys, old ladies, married women, etc. Just make small talk with them. If you feel weird starting a conversation with a stranger, just make a comment while passing like "Hey! Great day isn't it?" Or "Good afternoon! I'm loving this great weather" Understand that reading this comes across as cheesy and dumb, but when you say it with a smile, it comes across as genuine and positive and friendly, which is the attitude you're wanting to project.

The goal is really more how you say something and the fact that you are speaking at all, instead of what you say. Think of someone who always speaks to you. You probably think of them as a friendly and happy person, without remembering anything specific they say to you. By the end of this week you should be approaching at least one new girl a day.

Week 2: The goal is to develop a conversation. You aren't merely saying "hi" but you are going for a back-and-forth. You need to develop some follow up questions. Day Bang is very helpful for some ideas here, and will cost you roughly two coffees at Starbucks. I'll leave it up to you if you think that's a worthwhile investment. Again, what you say is of less importance. Obviously saying something dumb or awkward can blow your chances, but most guys are too afraid to approach women at all, and most women will love the opportunity to talk about themselves. Make a compliment, comment about their clothing, their style, where they are going, what they are doing, etc. Approach and make conversation with at least one girl a day.

Post a note on your mirror and motivate yourself to keep approaching!

Week 3: At this point you should see that it's easy to approach and talk to strangers, especially if you have no expectations for the outcome. The goal here is to ask for one phone number a day. At this point, you need to not really care about getting the number, just casually throw out "Well, hey, I have to run, but it was nice chatting, we should talk again some time, what's your number?" At the same time don't expect to get the number, because girls will read your anxiety and fear. It is work to go out and meet girls, so you don't have to ask for a number every single day, but you should complete seven attempts within this week.

Week 4: The goal here is to collect as many digits as possible. Challenge yourself to approach three girls every day, at a minimum. At the end of this month, you should have over 35 approaches. Continue into month two with three approaches per day, and you'll reach your goal of 100 at the end of this month.

You will have to work to meet 100 strange women. You may find yourself going to the mall, going to the park, the coffee shop, and places where you wouldn't normally go. But at the end of this challenge I can GUARANTEE you will be more confident, have less fear of rejection, be more comfortable and relaxed around strange women, and will being to naturally act on opportunities that come your way, instead of letting them slide by.

And you statistically have enough approaches to have earned a bang. All you need is a Positive Mental Attitude. Do you have one?

The Relationships Between Skepticism, Dogmatism, And Certitude

Greetings to all in this, the fourth week of Paschaltide; surrexit Dominus vere!

In the past two weeks, working with an eye to Cardinal Mercier's Manual of Scholastic Philosophy, we looked at some preliminaries to the science of certitude, with special emphasis on defining truth ("an adequation of a thing and of the understanding") and some of the terms involved, marking the distinction between objective and subjective truth (and how both deal properly with real truth), and clearing up common logical errors when it comes to questioning the nature of our perceptions.

We discovered that, ultimately, the problem of certitude resolves into two questions—the first, regarding the objectivity of the ideal order (i.e., whether the mental perception and synthesis of the elements in a true judgment has an objective element based in a real relation, or is itself the product of the thinking subject), and the second, regarding the objective reality of our concepts (i.e., do they correspond to objectively real things, or are they abstracted and particular to ourselves).

This may seem very abstruse and stringent, but the fact is that one must prepared to make such inquiries if he really wants to understand things, rather than having mere opinions about things. I'm afraid not much can be done to mitigate that! And, as I say, when I beheld the Christian saints and philosophers making these demands of themselves, I first began to see that their relationship to truth and certainty was not one of fear or hesitation.

In that same spirit, the good cardinal mentions that there is another question to resolve before we can address these two questions. Namely: what can we say about the initial state of mind, in our discussion of certitude? That is: can we assume that the mind must doubt everything? Or must we assume that the mind knows some truths, as we proceed to examine others?

Vice, Ease and Opinion – Haven't We Had Enough?

Two Opposed Errors

He mentions that there are two errors, one to the right and the other to the left of the problem. One error is the error of radical doubt, which he calls the theory of universal doubt. The other is an exaggerated dogmatism. He prefers a middle path, which he names the path of rational dogmatism.

As to the excessively skeptical view, he points out that it departs from a merely methodological skepticism, by which one uses doubt in order to attain a greater certainty of the truth. Rather, this form of exaggerated skepticism winds up abandoning skepticism in order to make unproven assertions on the matter. This theory of universal doubt regards every act of human reason as inherently doubtful, thereby doubting its own capability of arriving at any certain knowledge of truth, and mistrusting any apparent path of escape from the predicament. I think many modern folk have more or less absorbed this view from the modern culture. There are two main arguments used in favour of this view.

1. The Argument from the Fact of Self-Deception. We often deceive ourselves, and we know this about ourselves, so a prudent man will assume that people who allow themselves to be deceived, and sometimes come to see this fact, are likely to deceive themselves on many occasions when this is not so clear.

2. The Argument from "The Vicious Circle." Before we can verify a proposition as a certain one, we examine and judge it by some other criterion; otherwise we risk admitting it on unproven, a priori grounds. Yet before we can be certain of this criterion, we must verify it in a similar way, and so on ad infinitum. In this way we keep going back forever, or at least until we arrive at something for which we can discover no adequate, prior criterion, and even then we end in failure to arrive at certainty.

These Errors Analyzed

In the first place, we can respond that it is supremely absurd to be certain of universal uncertainty. The second argument, for example, is advanced as an airtight proof of the impossibility of certainty; this should be a clue that something is amiss! Indeed, since the very question is the possibility of certainty, a true skeptic does not begin by "proving" that nothing can be proven! No, we require suspension of judgment until a more correct examination can be made. The arguments are actually fairly easily answered. That a man deceives himself sometimes, and that it is therefore prudent to be wary against self-deceit, is not at all a proof that every single act of human reason is doubtful.

Indeed, how do we "know" that we deceive ourselves, unless we have some criterion for discerning between the true and the false; how do we recognize that we have sometimes embraced the latter over the former? To assert the fact of self-deception is already to have sinned against the dogma of uncertainty.

I'm Certain that we cannot be Certain…

As to the second argument, it errs in assuming that every proposition is justified by means of a prior and distinct criterion. Some true judgments contain in themselves the grounds of their justification, as we will see. And again, in short, since the question is whether the mind can know truth, we do ourselves no favors by making the assumption in one direction or the other without a certain grounds for demonstrating the opinion.

Those who err in the direction of an exaggerated dogmatism err by doing this, as well. Some philosophers have tried to move forward on the assumption that there are a few primary truths which we must assume if we are to hold that the mind can know certitude. These truths are:

1. The thinking subject truly exists

2. The principle of contradiction

3. The mind has thoughts that correspond really to reality

They assert that these truths are primary and must be assumed, because one has to accept them even to argue against them. This is true, insofar as it goes; these truths are necessary truths in the ontological order, by which one means to say that if these truths are not true, then it is impossible for the mind to know certainty. And so, yes, to attempt to argue against them, is to imply that one agrees with them (and that one is an idiot, or a nihilist who delights in the irony of it all).

Yet, this is still not a proof that this the mind can no truth; it is just to affirm that, if the mind can know the truth with certainty, it is because these principles are true. In exactly the same way, there is no basis for a conception of authentic morality (i.e., values that transcend mere considerations of pleasure or utility to rise to an actual level of "good" or “evil”) unless God exists and is Himself the source of the Good – yet, this does not prove the existence of God, or of morals; it simply acknowledges the necessity of the correlation between the two. So, while the exaggerated dogmatist has indeed hit upon necessary principles of certitude, he has simply acknowledged this correlation and has not yet proved that it does, in fact, exist.

Necessary, but not Necessary and Sufficient

A Better Way

Neither error has the right to lay down its view as a proven principle, therefore. The good Cardinal proffers instead what he calls Mitigated or Rational Dogmatism, which “deliberately abstains from making a judgment, holding that at the beginning of the study of the problem of certitude it is impossible either to affirm or to deny our mental capability of knowing truth.” He says that we may “be able legitimately to infer that our mind is capable of attaining true knowledge” ONLY if by some dint of our reflection, we can discover a grounds for concluding that our mental acts are conformable to reality.

Ne notes that our approach to this question will hinge upon whether things are mediately or immediately evident – that is, whether certain things proffer some direct proof, contained in themselves, of their truthfulness, or whether they can only be seen as true through various proofs and criteria which “mediate” (i.e., “stand between”) the thing and our ability to form a judgment of it. He acknowledges that “when the mind examines the propositions by which it expresses its knowledge, it finds a great number of them in which it does not see the identity or the non-identity between the predicate and subject” (i.e., of its judgment of truth).

This doubt is real and not merely methodical, and he acknowledges that the real acknowledgment of doubt about mediate propositions is not new, but is fully admitted in St. Thomas and in Aristotle. But the error of the Theory of Universal Doubt did hit upon a true insight; if all propositions were mediate propositions, we would have to go back ad infinitum citing proofs of each view. And this is itself is nearly self-evident—i.e., it comes close to being a truly immediate proposition, and as the Cardinal says: “immediate propositions, although indemonstrable [by means of a prior criterion] are by no means doubtful: their very self-evidence makes them indemonstrable – that is to say, incapable of being referred to propositions which are more evident” (since they are already entirely self-evident; they are indemonstrable not because they are not true, but because they are not demonstrated by something else). When these are reflected upon by the mind, they force their truthfulness upon the mind.

The Cardinal therefore says that we only assert two facts at the beginning of our discussion on certitude. 1) There are necessarily spontaneous assents (i.e., things that "seem true" to the mind at first glance) and 2) the power to examine these by reflection (without yet affirming too many things about the quality of this reflection). I will point out that he is here talking about the things we are required to admit if we want even to discuss the question. For, as he points out, "to suppress id de quo queritur is necessarily to suppress id quod quaeritur" ("to suppress any mention of that of which we are inquiring, is to suppress discovering the thing itself").

He acknowledges that "there is, however, all the difference in the world between taking these data for granted, and the a priori assertion that we are sure to find skepticism wrong, or that the result of our investigation must be the dogmatic thesis that the mind is capable of knowing truth." He has given the data we must necessary admit in order even to ask questions about the topic, avoiding on the one hand an error that contradicts itself and buries the question under an absurd certainty of incertainty on the one hand, or a dogmatic assertion that we must assume certain truths which, though necessary for certitude to exist, have, along with certitude itself, not yet been proven.

I know I'm proceeding fairly deliberately, here. Festina lente is my motto for this series – to cover a lot of important ground more quickly than would be normal, but not to omit necessary steps in the rush.

How To Influence People In The Modern Era

To Sell is Human by Dan Pink is a book about influence in the modern era. It combines interesting research with anecdotes about individual cases of people who have found success. Sprinkled throughout the book are exercises that will both amuse and stimulate you, links to online tests and assessments, and many book recommendations regarding social skills, improvisation, and influence.

Much of this book can be applied to game. It's been said more than once that game is like sales, and learning about influence and sales can improve you skills with people in any situation.

Pink makes a convincing case that in the modern age we must all be adept at sales to be successful. He goes into detail about how even if we are not directly selling merchandise, we are always selling ourselves. This will be a review and summary of each of the three sections of the book.

Rebirth Of A Salesman

Dan Pink cites a study that shows one in nine Americans work in sales. However, he also shows that the other eight work in sales as well. We all work day in and day out to influence, persuade, and move others to act in a manner we desire. That is the main point of the book: moving others. Whether it be money, time, attention, or a decision in our favor, much of what we do amounts to moving others.

We're all in sales now. Some people are uncomfortable with this fact, but Pink shows that in this new age of hyperconnectedness, we are better off in many ways. In the past, sellers had the power. If you went into a car dealership 30 years ago, chances are the salesman knew much more than you about the specs of whatever car you were interested in. Today with the internet, it's not uncommon for buyers to know more than sellers.

Even if a seller screws you over, there are many platforms for you to let thousands of others know via social media and review sites to warn others to avoid a person or company. Everyone is a couple of quick taps on their phone away from leaving a review. We're moving from Caveat Emptor (buyer beware) to Caveat Venditor (seller beware).

The New ABCs

Pink provides his version of the new ABCs (no longer "Always Be Closing")

A—-Attunement

B—Buoyancy

C—Clarity

These are the 3 qualities one should develop have in order to be successful at either sales or non-sales selling in the new landscape of the 21st century.

Attunement means to enhance your perspective-taking

Attunement hinges on three principles.

1. Increase your power by reducing it. This means essentially seeing the world through the customer's eyes.

2. Use your head as much as your heart. In a 2008 experiment at INSEAD business school in France, researchers simulated a negotiation over the sale of a business. One-third of the negotiators were instructed to imagine what the other side was feeling, one-third was instructed to imagine what the others side was thinking, and the final third was the control group. The group who imagined what the other side was thinking managed to make a deal that satisfied both sides 76% of the time. Perspective-taking is crucial.

3. Mimic strategically. Matching our mannerisms and vocal tones to the other person is fundamental to attunement; just make sure the other person doesn't notice. A Dutch study found that waitresses who repeated diners' orders word for word earned 70% more tips than those who paraphrased orders. The Dutch are cheap people, so this means a lot.

Buoyancy is the ability to stay afloat amidst an ocean of rejection

Anyone who sells must contend with rebuffs, refusals, and repudiations (and if you're approaching women in the West, outright insults). Buoyancy is Pink's word for dealing with rejection and maintaining your stride.

There are 3 components to buoyancy which apply before, during, and after any effort to move others.

1. Before: Self-Talk. We humans frequently talk to ourselves. The best form of self-talk is to move from making statements (e.g., I can do this, I got this, I'm the greatest) to asking questions (Can I do this? Can I make a great pitch? Can I talk to her?). There are two reasons for this. Number one, by asking the question you elicit an answer, it requires you to think about the question you just asked. Number two, this sort of interrogative self-talk may elicit intrinsically motivated reasons to accomplish your goal.

2. During: Emotion Ratios. Positive and negative emotions broaden people's ideas about possible actions, expanding our awareness to a wider range of thoughts making us more creative. Studies show that positive emotions can expand our behavioral repertoires and heighten intuition. Pink claims that there is a ratio of emotions best suited for people which is 3-to-1 positive to negative emotions.

3. After: Explanatory Style. At the end of a day, how you think about it can go a long way in determining whether you succeed. Explanatory style is a form of self-talk that occurs after an experience. In one study, researchers found that salespeople with an optimistic explanatory style sold more insurance and kept their jobs longer.

Clarity means to help others identify problems they didn't realize they had

This third quality hinges less on problem solving and more on problem finding. In research done at the University of Chicago, researchers found that people most disposed to creative breakthroughs in art, science, and other endeavors tend to be problem finders.

Pink gives a quick example. Suppose fifteen years ago you were in the market for a new vacuum cleaner. You would have had to go into a store and speak to a salesman who likely knew much more than you about the product. Today, you can hop online and research the vacuum model you want. But what if you've gotten your problem wrong? Maybe your real aim isn't to buy a vacuum cleaner, but to have clean floors. Maybe the problem is the screen on your windows aren't keeping out the dust, maybe your carpet collects dirt too easily and you need a new one, maybe you shouldn't but a vacuum but instead join a neighborhood cooperative that shares appliances, or hire a cheap cleaning crew.

There is one interesting exercise in this chapter to clarify others' motives using 2 questions.

1. On a scale of 1 to 10, 1 meaning "not ready at all" and 10 meaning "totally ready," how ready are you to [insert difficult task]?

2. Why didn't you pick a lower number?

The second question catches the person off guard. The person moves from defending their current behavior to explaining why, on some level, they want to behave differently. It allows the person to clarify their motives.

Adapting To The Modern Era Of Sales

This section focuses on three key abilities concerning what to do in sales: to pitch, to improvise, and to serve.

The purpose of a pitch isn't necessarily to move others to immediately adopt your idea. The purpose is to offer something so compelling that it begins a conversation, brings the other person in as a participant, and eventually arrives at an outcome that appeals to both of you. This chapter zeroes on in new alternatives to the elevator pitch, some examples include.

- One-word pitch (Reduce your essence down to one word e.g., Trump's 2016 slogan "MAGA")
- Question pitch (Are you better off today than you were eight years ago?)
- Rhyming pitch (Easy to remember)
- Subject line pitch (Regarding e-mail)

- Twitter pitch (Cuts through PR nonsense and forces companies to summarize what they do in 140 characters).
- Pixar pitch (Once upon a time…).

The book emphasizes the role of improv in moving products today. The old method of sales relied on stable scripts (if the customer says this, you should say that) but today it has given way to complex and unpredictable conditions that favor improvisation. This chapter delves into how to listen to offers and make your partner look good in the process.

The book closes out on saying that service is the most important quality. It's a feel-good ender, and it mostly works. He writes that sales and non-sales selling are ultimately about service. If you believe in your product (or yourself, or your company, etc.), you will be more likely to move others to believe in it too. Pink speaks of service in its best form—improving the lives of others and in turn, improving the world. This can happen if we follow two principles: Make it personal and make it purposeful.

The secret to sales is to remember who we are serving and why we are serving them. In sales, we do better when we move beyond just trying to make a sale and remember that we are serving a person.

Great short book, recommended.

Helio Gracie Was A Frail, Defenseless Man—Who Happened To Give Birth To Brazilian Jiu Jitsu

April 30, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

I had the opportunity to train with Toney Waldecker, one of the few Brazilian Jiu Jitsu blackbelts that can trace their craft all the way back to Helio Gracie. In fact, I even got to train with Relson Gracie, the oldest son of Helio, the man who started it all.

I recall my own astonishment upon watching Relson Gracie, a 135 pound 5’6″ old Brazilian man, systematically beat every single one of my fellow students. It didn’t matter if they were 6’3″ 255 pounds, or if they were 5’8″ 155 pounds—he beat them all just the same.

He told us that Brazilian Jiu Jitsu was created by his father, Helio Gracie, way back in the 1930’s.

Helio’s Childhood

Helio Gracie was not a very physically impressive man – in fact, he was quite the opposite. Standing at a mere 5’6” and weighing 115 soaking wet, most men would laugh at the thought of this man pioneering the world’s newest and deadliest martial art.

Helio Gracie

He was born in Belem do Para, Brazil in 1913, to an influential business man named Gastão Gracie. Ever since a young age, Helio had fainting spells, often triggered by something as simple as running up the stairs too quickly. In fact, when he reached second grade, he convinced his mother that he was too sick to continue school, and she fell for it—he never attended a day of schooling past second grade.

It seemed that this young Helio Gracie was destined for nothing special; just another human being taking up resources and giving very little to the earth in return. However all of this changed one fateful day when a Japanese Jiu Jitsu master moved to the same neighborhood as the Gracies.

Esai Maeda, often referred to as Count Coma, needed help getting established in this new city, and Helio's father, being an established businessman, helped him to do so. As a sign of his gratitude, Esai offered to teach the noble art of Japanese Jiu Jitsu to Helio's oldest brother, Carlos Gracie.

How The Seed Was Planted

Carlos was becoming better and better at Japanese Jiu Jitsu, but seemingly out of nowhere, his father began to experience some financial troubles. Helio and his 7 other children were then sent off to live with various relatives in Brazil, to save the Gracie family some financial burden.

When Helio was 14, he moved to a borough of Rio de Janeiro, known as Botafogo, with his older brothers. They all supported themselves through various means, but the man of the house was Carlos. He managed to pull in a sizable amount of money by teaching Japanese Jiu Jitsu to the locals at his very own dojo.

Soon enough, Helio began to practice Japanese Jiu Jitsu with his older brothers, but he would get his ass beat on the regular due to his small size. Japanese Jiu Jitsu emphasizes strength and speed, which worked well for Helio's older brothers. But for someone of such a modest size, such an art doesn't work.

A Japanese Jiu Jitsu throw that relies on strength

Thus, Helio began to modify the techniques he was taught to emphasize leverage and timing, rather than strength and speed. Over the course of the next four years he developed what is now known as Brazilian (or "Gracie") Jiu Jitsu.

An Open Challenge: Spreading The Word

As a way to spread the word of Gracie Jiu Jitsu's brutal effectiveness, Helio openly challenged every single martial artist in all of Rio. Soon enough, black belts from all different disciplines were knocking at his door accepting the challenge.

One by one, he beat them all—it didn't matter what their discipline was, because in the words of Helio Gracie: "When we go to the ground, you are in my world. The ground is the ocean, I am the shark, and most people don't even know how to swim."

Soon enough, he began to capture a wide audience. Word of this unbeatable martial art spread across Brazil, eventually attracting the attention of Yukio Kato, one of the top Judoka competitors in the world.

Kato outweighed Helio Gracie by nearly 40 pounds. Gracie intended to use this to showcase the sheer deadliness of his martial art. If a 185 pound man had beaten Kato, sure it would have been impressive, but it's not that big of a deal. If a 115 pound man beat Kato, however, this would draw some attention.

Helio choked him out within eight minutes, to the astonishment of the crowd—"How the hell did he do that?” was the predominant thought racing through all of their heads. And like that, Helio Gracie and his infamous martial art grew in landslide popularity.

Helio The Player (And Father)

As one might assume, Helio’s widespread popularity brought him ample attention from the ladies—in fact, his second wife was 32 years younger than him. Quite the womanizer, indeed. Helio had 7 sons and 2 daughters, however I will focus on Rorion and Royce (pronounced Horion and Hoyce), because they are the most integral to the spread of Gracie Jiu Jitsu.

Helio was sure to teach both of them Gracie Jiu Jitsu from a very young age—some sources claim he started teaching them as soon as they could walk. Nonetheless, by the time that they were adults, they were absolutely ruthless black belts, skilled at beating even the most challenging opponent.

The Gracie Challenge

When he was 26, Rorion moved to Southern California. For a while, he had to support himself as an extra in various movies, but he decided that it was his mission to spread the knowledge of Gracie Jiu Jitsu. What he did was very simple. He laid down some mats in his garage, and offered anyone who could beat him $100,000.

Yes, that’s right—$100,000. Rorion didn’t even have that kind of money, being an immigrant who just moved to the states, but he was so utterly confident in his own abilities, that he was prepared to take that risk. This became known as the “Gracie Challenge.”

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=0b9v1slvjFo

One by one, competitors came in and were submitted. None could stand against the awesome might of Gracie Jiu Jitsu, nonetheless against a man who had been training in it since he was 2 years old.

Eventually Rorion began teaching classes. Everybody wanted to know how to do Gracie Jiu Jitsu. It started to spread through word of mouth, and soon enough people from all over Southern California were flocking to Rorion’s dojo.

The Birth Of The Ultimate Fighting Championship

Rorion, being the ambitious man that he is, decided that this wasn’t enough. He wanted to create an ultimate competition, to determine the best martial art of all time, modeled off of the “Vale Tudo,” or Portuguese for “Anything Goes,” fights so common in Brazil.

So, in 1993, he founded the UFC—a pay per view event that shocked thousands of people all across the USA, including John McCain who called for a ban on the sport due to its brutality. Rorion recruited seven of the world’s deadliest and most popular martial artists, enticing them with the chance to prove their superiority. Little did they know, however, what they had in store.

Rorion decided that he could fight in the UFC himself. The best showcase of Gracie Jiu Jitsu's awesome power, however, would be from Royce Gracie. Rorion was around 215 pounds, and 6'3″—and although it would be impressive if he won, he thought that it would be far more impressive if his younger brother, Royce, took the gold medal.

Royce was 6'1″ and weighed in at 176; considering that he was up against a Sumo wrestler weighing over 400 pounds, and Ken Shamrock, a world class wrestler at a lean 212 pounds, Royce's humble weight of 176 was nothing.

UFC 1 was a martial artist's wet dream. The only rules were no biting or eye gouging. Aside from that, anything else was allowed.

Each competitor represented a different martial art: Teila Tuli (Sumo Wrestling), Gerard Gordeau (Savate), Kevin Rosier (Kickboxing), Zane Frazier (Kenpo), Art Jimmerson (Boxing), Ken Shamrock (Shootfighting), and Patrick Smith (Tae Kwon Do) were all too concerned with one another to even notice Royce Gracie who represented BJJ.

The first fight was Gerard Gordeau vs. Teila Tuli; a 216 lb Savate practitioner vs. a 460 pound Sumo wrestler. It seemed like everyone knew what was going to happen. Ken Shamrock tells the story well—all the guys in the locker room were jumping around, pounding their chests, and getting psyched. "Who do you think will win?" one of them asked. "Are you kidding? That guy's massive, Gerard doesn't stand a chance."

And like that, under just 30 seconds, the match ended—Gerard knocked 3 of Teila's teeth out in a series of savage kicks to the face. The referee was forced to stop the match lest Teila become permanently brain damaged.

There was dead silence in the locker room—“Holy shit,” one of them said. “What have we gotten ourselves into?”

Royce’s Victory

One by one, the champions fought. For the semi-finals it was Gerard Gordeau vs. Kevin Rosier, an American kickboxing super-heavyweight champion. Despite his impressive title, Gerard completely demolished him within 2 minutes. You can watch the fight here.

The other semi-finals match was Royce Gracie vs. Ken Shamrock. Shamrock was probably the biggest threat to Gracie, due to his knowledge of wrestling. Obviously it wasn’t on-par with Royce’s knowledge of submissions, but Shamrock at least had enough knowledge to make submission very difficult for Gracie. In addition to this, Shamrock outweighed Gracie by over 30 pounds—and for anyone who’s ever sparred with others, you’ll be aware of just how huge this weight disparity is.

The massive Ken Shamrock

Royce was extremely aggressive from the start—the bell rings, he goes right in for the take-down, but Shamrock expects this and counters. After struggling, Royce manages to get Shamrock into a half guard and begins kicking his kidney with his right heel. Shamrock stands up and tries to pass Royce’s guard, but Royce gets him off balance, pushes him back and gets the full mount!
Ken struggles, but Royce gets his back and finishes him off with a rear-naked choke hold. And like that, Ken was stunned. He had a 30 pound advantage on this skinny Brazilian man, and somehow Royce had won.

But it wasn’t over yet. For the final match he was up against Gordeau, who is known for being a dirty fighter. He eye-gouged and ear bit others on multiple occasions, and in addition to this he is a ruthless Savate practitioner. He stands at 6’5″ giving him a huge reach advantage over Royce, not to mention the 40 pound difference between the two.

The bell rings, and Gordeau keeps his distance—he's very well aware of Royce's ground advantage. But Royce throws a kick, distracts Gordeau, and goes in for the double leg take down! Gordeau backs up and retains his balance, but Royce is determined. He slips a leg behind Gordeau and manages to push him back into a corner of the octagon.

Royce manages to get Gerard off balance and throws him onto the ground—now we're in Gracie territory. Royce gets the full mount, and it seems like an easy win, but Gerard pulls out the dirty tricks. He starts trying to bite Royce's ear! Royce won't have this, though—he head butts the shit out of Gerard and manages to get him into a rear-naked choke hold. He holds it for a little extra to let Gordeau know what's up.

The Fame Spread

And like that, Gracie Jiu Jitsu had become a world-wide phenomena. Fighters from all over the globe flew in to learn the secrets of this mysterious martial art. Various branches of Brazilian Jiu Jitsu began to emerge as the art began to evolve, but one fact remained the same: everyone wanted in on the action. Who wouldn't want to know how a 178 pound scrawny Brazilian man beat the world's top competitors who outweighed him by over 30 pounds?

The UFC went on to experience massive backlash from American politicians and senators in the mid 1990's, but it had already become a cultural phenomena. John McCain was particularly vocal against it, calling it "human cockfighting," but the people wanted more. As a way to make the sport more "family friendly," the UFC implemented various rules such as no fish-hooking, hair-pulling, or skull stomping.

And now, here we are today. Nearly every other person in the US practices BJJ, but don't forget where it all started. It wasn't always like this, with a BJJ mat set up in nearly every city across the US. Once upon a time, it was only taught in Brazil, in one of the poorer boroughs of Rio. Don't forget that it all started when one man decided that he had had enough—he was fed up with getting his ass kicked, and decided to change things.

And because of his determination and work-ethic, he started what is now widely respected as the greatest ground fighting martial art of all time.

White Chalk May Be The Missing Ingredient To Increasing Your Lifts

May 1, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

If you will recall, I wrote an article a few months ago expressing the dubious experiences I have had with dietary supplements. And I stand by that, as I do with a similar conviction that the fitness hobbyist doesn't need fancy equipment such as weightlifting belts to aid him: namely, if you're not attempting to set a weightlifting record, you don't really need a belt.

While I will cautiously advocate buying equipment such as Fat Grips to make your workout harder (I emphasize caution on this specific device not because they're not useful, but rather due to the fact that grip can be trained equally as well without spending money), there remains only one tool I would advocate to assist your compound lifts, a tool that doesn't provide additional support but can add 20-30 pounds to some of your lifts. That tool is: chalk.

A Geology Lesson

Chalk, or calcium carbonate ($CaCO_3$) is a common sedimentary rock that is formed from calcite shells and millions of years of weathering and surface gradations. Indeed, most "chalk" purchased nowadays is, in fact, calcium sulfate, talc, or some other powdery mineral more common than naturally mined calcium carbonate. Whatever the composition of the purchased "chalk," they all have in common a property of increasing friction and wicking up moisture. And this property is where chalk benefits you.

Chalk In Physical Fitness

You've likely seen Olympic weightlifters using chalk on their hands before lifts to reduce perspiration, as well as other strength-intensive sports such as gymnastics and rock climbing. Even in the "barest" and most simple of these sports, such as Olympic style lifting or free-scale rock climbing, chalk is used. As stated previously, the chalk does not enhance strength at all so much as allow you to lift to your maximum strength and ability. To speak from my own experience, my maximum deadlift is 350 pounds with chalk, but only 325 pounds without—a discrepancy that can only be attributed to sweaty palms weakening my hands.

I also find that chalk helps with stability in pressing lifts such as the bench press and over head press: it allows you to grip harder, causing increased muscle flexion and thus increased muscular force through the principle of "proprioceptive muscular tension".

I'll even bring a bottle of chalk along when helping friends move furniture, as it gives me a better grip on uneven heavy objects.

Of course, the usefulness of chalk is only compounded in ring gymnastics, rock climbing, and other sports that involve a risk of dying should you lose your grip (or should I say a higher risk of dying than olympic lifting, as all of the sports listed can give truly grotesque injuries).

How To Get Chalk

It's about now that you probably want to obtain some chalk for your own purposes, and are thus asking how to get it. Specifically made weightlifter's or gymnasts chalk can be purchased from sporting goods stores and websites, in both powdered and block form.

But, if you're a stingy son of a bitch like myself—and really, if you're reading this website, or similar websites, there's no reason that you shouldn't be—then there's a much easier way to get usable chalk: grind it yourself.

The first step is to go to a nearby dollar store—or the equivalent in whatever country you live in—and buy a pack of white blackboard chalk (for obvious reasons, buying multicolored sidewalk chalk is not advised). This is exactly the sort of cheap, crumbly chalk that you hated to use in elementary school, but for weightlifting purposes is in some ways preferable to a higher quality stick.

Once obtained, you have to grind it. If you're high agency or mildly autistic like myself, then you already own a mortar and pestle.

If not, then grab a hammer, a heavy ashtray, a big rock, or something similar, and grind the chalk into a fine powder. Feel free to put on a movie or a podcast as you do this-that's how I write most of my articles.

There should be no large chunks in it, and when it's done, put it inside some sort of container. I personally put it inside a plastic water bottle, which allows me to parcel it out in controlled portions without spilling

And with that, you're done. Just an hour or two of work, and you'll already have increased the amount of weight you'll be able to lift and the dexterity of your hands.

Man Shares Hard-Earned Wisdom After Being Married To A Swedish Feminist For 25 Years

May 1, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

I want to share with you a selection of quotes from a new book I've just read. The book, called Den sista grisen (The Last Pig), is basically a collection of aphorisms, short sentences or paragraphs filled with important meaning. The author is Horace Engdahl, a famous writer and intellectual in Sweden. He's a member of the Swedish Academy, which might be best known for yearly deciding who will win the Nobel Prize in Literature.

Another thing that Horace Engdahl is known for is that he was married to a prominent Swedish feminist, Ebba Witt-Brattström, from 1989 to 2014. How such a gifted man could have married a harpy like that is beyond me, but the experience obviously had an affect on his thinking and writing. Den sista grisen has gotten attention from the leftist critics for being somewhat anti-feminist. Below I will give you a few examples of what he's written, that makes feminist blood boil.

I've done the translations to English myself. Some expressions may sound strange, but I hope you get the big picture.

"The natural way for a man is to be pleased with himself"

> A woman's contempt for a man can in some cases be excessive, greater than natural size. What triggers her reaction is the sense of how pleased this man is with himself and how important he feels, feelings which she knows she can't achieve on her own and which she therefore furiously revolts against.

> But the natural way for a man is to be pleased with himself and feel important. The one who dislikes that might as well hang herself in the attic.

I like this quote because it's about how some women have a way of hating and at the same time adoring masculine men. They hate the way masculine men don't need anyone's approval to be happy with themselves, least of all the approval of women. Yet they want to be like that too, but can't, because it's not in their nature—and that's why they refuse to admit to themselves that this innate female nature exists. More on that point later.

The feminist harpy he wasted 25 years of his life living with.

"In a young man's mind there is an innermost room"

> In a young man's mind there is an innermost room, and in it there's only space for one thing, himself. To expect something else or to demand something else, now or ever, would be foolish.
> What doesn't fit in the young man's center, namely everything else, is put in the waiting room. There sits his girlfriends, his ambitions, society, God and the devil. Maybe one day they'll be allowed to enter, maybe not. But until further notice, the inner room, the most sacred, is occupied. God is not angered by this, and therefore no one else should be either.
> Toward the end, when the no longer young man shall die, he notices that the others have taken over his center and driven him out to the waiting room. That's how he knows it's time to turn off the lights and leave.
> In a young woman's mind there is an innermost room, and this center is empty, not even she herself is there. She sits outside waiting for someone to fill it. Then comes the friends, the men, the children, society, God and the devil and answer her call, and she steps in and places herself among all of this that is her life.
> One day she notices that she's become alone in there. Those who came have gone away, she might even have drove them off. Then she understands that it's time to turn off the lights and close. But it would be good if she first wrote some > lines about how it feels. We already know everything about the man's loneliness.

Women have a void in themselves waiting to be filled by a man. If it's not filled, they feel as if they have nothing to live for, and they respond with anger. This explains why man-hating feminists are so miserable. The question is whether no man wanted them from the start, and they turned to feminism for answers, or if they turned to feminism and men suddenly stopped paying them any attention.

Scene from a failed marriage.

"The human is not only a part of nature but also has a nature"

> The human is an animal that can't stand its own nature. This expresses itself in, among other things, that she with the help of philosophical arguments tries to prove that she doesn't have a nature but that she is an infinitely malleable being, which realizes itself in the form of conscious projects, where she through sheer will transforms herself to what her reason has freely chosen. Other more exact sciences would however suggest that the human is not only a part of nature but also has a nature in the sense of a great number of species-specific and gender-specific qualities.
> History shows that there's a considerable regularity in the human's basic behavior: the formation of hierarchies, the suspiciousness toward strangers, tendencies in the sexes' choice of partners and a number of virtues and vices known through all times. However, to admit this these days is considered more inappropriate than ever before. By that you can draw the conclusion that human nature has never been perceived as more repulsive than right now.
> The enlightened human has become hypersensitive to her own image and in rage breaks the mirrors held up by the annals and the classics. It's no wonder that there are loud demands for theaters to stop playing old plays! Without banning the old masters, erasing history will be incomplete, and only by erasing history will it be possible to forget the nature you have come to hate and toward which you feel so powerless.

The first step in healing this broken, degenerate society is to admit that we have a nature. A human nature that we either embrace or waste the rest of our lives fighting. One important key to happiness and success is knowing who and what you really are, not what some Marxist professor preaches that you should be. Understanding and embracing our nature is needed to combat the forces trying to destroy every good thing that we have built so far.

Lastly, I want to share a short quote that reminded me of Roosh and his experiences with the media earlier this year.

> It is easy to create a monster. Put a journalist on the case!

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

31 Signs You Might Be A Bobo

May 2, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

"Bobo" is the contraction of "Bourgeois Bohemian," an expression that surfaced in the late 1990s. According to David Brooks, self-claimed Bobo and author of the first book on the topic, the Bobo is a mix of 1960s "Bohemian" Leftist spirit and of 1980s "Bourgeois" yuppie attitude. Typically, a Bobo lives in a metropolitan city, thinks of himself as an artist or an intellectual, earns more money than the average Joe, and leans to that weft which caters to "minorities" but spits on the white working class and the "white male."

Though the word "Bobo" seemingly appeared in the United States, it is barely used there. ROK writers who unmasked feminist slanderers and threat-makers that typically fall in the Bobo social class did not use the word. The hipsters, the wealthy, the urban elves, the global elite are commonly referred to, but the Bobo is not. In France, the expression fared much better, to the point of being widely used. I used it in my first article here and thought that, without it, the article would have been incomplete.

A member of a new and privileged social class, a Bobo thrives on the so-called information age and usually makes enough money to live near the center of a city rather than in suburbs or in the countryside. A Bobo is typically smug, has a higher IQ than most people, and is only too aware of it. He openly despises the beaufs—the Homer Simpsons, the Archie Bunkers. He identifies with the current mainstream culture and often shares its financial interests.

The Bobo's worldview and class interest make him an enforcer of double standards. He has no problem with women committing sexual assaults and a variety of reprehensible acts, just as he is okay with immigrants swarming over Europe and committing violent crimes, because in his views they are "minorities," but shows contempt and even hatred for the suffering white working class whose dispossession was so complete it led thousands of men to suicide. Likewise, the Bobo loves to denounce those who were left to the mercy of the public anger through the "Panama papers" scandal, but conveniently forgets who paid for manufacturing said scandal and who pays him as well.

Considering that the Western world opposes two social classes, namely the typical urban elves on the one side and the dispossessed, downgraded majority, whose members often come from the middle and working classes, it is worthwhile asking where we, the neomasculine and red-pilled, fit in.

If you are not a prole or beauf and do not identify with the Jersey Shore culture, are you sure you are not a Bobo either? Here are some cues that will help you determining your own level of boboism.

1. Your work consists of handling information

If you work as a journalist, a marketer, an advertiser, a webmaster, a freelance writer or graphic designer, or a novelist, you are performing an activity that is mostly practiced by Bobos. These jobs mix the artsy with the business, the "Bohemian" with the hunt for bucks.

2. You work as a white-collar in the corporate world

Today, corporations cater to SJWs. If you manage to work there, chances are you are not an old-fashioned alpha boss who gets the shit done. If you work in finance, you must also go to trendy bars with your colleagues for the sole reason of assuring your social status inside the company. Though this is not as essentially Bobo as being a millionaire advertiser, this puts you straight within the system and on a financial par with the Bobos.

3. You live at the center of a metropolis

Downtowns are hotbeds of hipsterism and boboism. The Bobo class tends to appropriate city centers by buying flats there and opening bars and shops that reflect them. If you can afford living there and are used to the atmosphere, it may be hard to distinguish you from a usual Bobo at first glance.

4. You pay frequent visits to Starbucks or other coffee shops

And when you travel to a country that still does not have any, you miss them.

5. You have a liberal arts diploma or working experience in the left-leaning world

Self-explanatory.

6. You care about eating organic

Eating organic means buying expensive food that has an “organic” label on it. If you follow a Paleo diet and legitimately blame the vegetarians’ annoying holier-than-thou attitude, eating lots of meat is expensive too, and caring a lot about your food is typically Bobo. Bonus points if you eat goji berries on a regular basis.

7. You inhabit an “artsy” world

A world of art exhibitions featuring abstract paintings and pompous comments over glasses of champagne.

8. You are an atheist

And you believe that ancient history is made of “myths,” that everything can be boiled down to “human” and physical causes, that Christopher Hitchens or Richard Dawkins deserve public recognition.

9. Your cultural references are hipster- or SWPL-ish

Comic parodies, indie rock bands, Jeff Koons, Damien Hirst, Banksy, Gossip Girl, Moleskin notebooks. For detailed lists, check the infamous Stuff White People Like blog and its Parisian counterpart, De l'art d'être un bobo.

10. You have an opinion on everything and are eager to show it

When you see every event, news item or conversation theme as an opportunity to display a "witty" opinion, this means you are both an asshole and an accomplished Bobo. Congratulations.

11. You often take "artsy" photos

And enjoy showing them off on Facebook. Bonus point if you claim to be a photographer.

12. You own expensive photo or video material

Which implies that you consider yourself talented enough to use professional-rate material and can afford it.

13. You own a MacBook or an iPhone

“Okay, it’s expensive and commonly overrated, but I like these and it is my choice.” Or: “I am a graphic designer, I also edit high definition videos, hence I need it.”

14. You despise the proles, the redneck, the beaufs

Even those whom you should support if you want Trump to beat the establishment.

15. You have, or would like to have, a state-of-the-art kitchen

Bobos find it vulgar to spend a lot on a Jacuzzi, but are okay with showing off on household equipment.

16. Your home is stuffed with “hype” designer or colorful stuff

Voodoo knife-rack, exotic hangings, green wallpaper behind a red sofa, cushions with ten different colors or patterns…

17. Your home decoration is eclectic in character

Because you have good taste and are well-traveled.

18. You wear “cool” and “witty” t-shirts

A significant part of your t-shirts display puns, catchphrases, and private jokes that need either a decent level of culture—by who's standards?—or being part of a specific milieu to be understood. Bonus points if you own The Kooples clothes.

19. You despise hipsters, but often hang out in hipster places

You know most of the microbrewery bars, organic shops, art galleries downtown. You go to hipster bars to game girls and spend the day after studying at Starbucks, but find most hipsters ridiculous and tryhard.

20. You travel to Bobo places

The first time you could go far away to game girls, you chose New York, Vancouver, San Francisco, Paris, Berlin… and went downtown.

21. You favor bicycles over cars

Bicycles are a very convenient vehicle as long as you go from one neighbourhood to another (that is, do not work or study far from home).

22. You feel awkward while dirtying your hands

And no, gardening on the top of a building in New York does not make you an accomplished gardener.

23. You judge clothes by how fashionable or aesthetic they are rather than by convenience

A prole is glad that he can buy a $20 polar sweatshirt that will keep him warm during winter. A Bobo despises this kind of clothing and prefers a $300 polar sweatshirt because it's "classy."

24. You've got money but barely assume it

A friend of mine once said that he shared a class with young Bobo girls. When he told said girls that his parents were fabric workers, some opened wide eyes and said, “Wow, how lucky!” These girls would like the chic of having “roots” in modest milieus but want comfort, fashion, and no contact with the proles.

25. You often analyze and criticize plebe-oriented cultural products

Hence the “witty” comments on Hollywood movies, geek nostalgia, and related topics.

26. You often meet with Bobo (small) celebrities, or at least go to the same places than they do

And though you did not talk to them, you recognize them when they are present.

27. You often read Vice

I've seen a non-negligible amount of scrawny hipsters having a fetish for the various deviants, especially the violent ones, who get honored by Vice magazine daily. A surrogate source of violence for those who never traded blows in real life.

28. You own mountain boots, rangers, and even an off-road vehicle…

…but you never used them in wilderness, or only a couple of times.

29. You were Charlie

When Salafi terrorists assassinated a bunch of Bobo press drawers in Paris on January 7, 2015, you sported a nice Je suis Charlie as your Facebook profile picture. And, later that year, you asked gleefully to your Parisian friend—because you are well-traveled enough to know at least one person in Paris—if he could hear the explosions and screams. Now, of course, you despise the Charlie crowd as mainstream and blue-pilled, but prefer living near them than in a ghetto.

30. You are white but blame other whites for "racism"

Speaking of ghettos, you would never live there, but still blame other whites for being “racists.” You have few or no experience of said ghettos, never had to take late night trains where whites are but a minority, never had to compose with gangs of teenage thugs, never had to support space obfuscation, night noise, smell, or threats. Only someone who always managed to avoid that—which is, perhaps fortunately, more difficult today than only ten years ago—can blame “white racism” in good faith.

31. You recognize yourself here, but think: I can’t be a Bobo, I’m red-pilled!

This is exactly how I felt while reading Brooks’ book. Initially, I saw the Bobos as an enemy, felt alienated from their culture, and wanted to know more about them for that reason. Yet, going through the book, I realized I had some Bobo-like features myself. Well, the Bobo world tends to attract us because it has money and stimulating employments. And, also, because most of us red-pilled are honestly more intelligent and with better tastes than, in Roissy’s words, “lower classes [that] are crass, boorish and often thoughtlessly impulsive.”

“Being in the world without being from the world”: this is how Guillaume Faye, a notorious European New Right intellectual, justified his career as a radio host and porn actor between two books that criticized the system…

Many of us are trapped in that strange condition. We work with, or for, the leftist establishment because we need money and want some social status. We are these “brogrammers” who practice game in places that belong to Bobos. Is there any hope to change society—make neomasculinity triumph—or are we somehow necessitated to end up swallowed by either the Bobo or the prole herds? The answer may not be easy to find.

Even Misplaced Nationalism Can Be Good For A Country’s Morale

I much prefer to be in a country that has a strong sense of nationalism than one which does not. One tends to respect those who respect themselves. One also tends not to respect those who have no sense of tradition, heritage, or pride in their nation’s past. Societies infected with the globalist ethic have a few things in common: excessive deference to English, obsequious worship of Americanism, and mindless parroting of liberal talking points. You get the idea. Even if the nationalism happens on occasion to make mistakes, it is still better to have that than the alternative.

The other day I visited a new museum in Rio called the “Museum of Tomorrow.” It appears to have been built to accommodate the anticipated Olympic crowds. The building itself is one of those over-engineered monstrosities that could have used some cost-cutting advice, and the displays were mostly superficial and shallow. But I did learn something of value. There was an extensive display about the Brazilian aviation pioneer Alberto Santos-Dumont.

Santos-Dumont (1873-1932) was a unique individual. Born the scion of a family of wealthy coffee growers, he used his family's fortune to conduct researches into heavier-than-air flight. Because his father was French, he spent much of his time in France, and did pioneering work in balloons and dirigibles. It is difficult for us to appreciate it now, but at the end of the nineteenth century, flight was a subject that fascinated the entire civilized world. Many engineers and experimenters around the world were working frantically to be the first to achieve a breakthrough.

He achieved fame in October 1901 by becoming the first to make a dirigible trip around the Eiffel Tower within a certain time frame. For this feat he was awarded the Deutsch de la Meurthe prize. It was an incredible achievement for someone with no formal scientific training or background in engineering. He seemed to have an intuitive feel for machines and how best to construct them. Parisians did not quite know what to make of this exotic, energetic Brazilian man, who would fly his machines up and down the boulevards of the city.

His true moment of glory came in 1906, when he managed to pilot an actual airplane he had designed. This contraption, called the "14-bis" was flown near Paris for a distance of about 60 meters in front of a large crowd of witnesses. It was the first flight to be certified by the Aéro Club de France and the Fédération Aéronautique Internationale (FAI).

At the Museum of Tomorrow display, there is not a word of mention about the Wright brothers or their Kitty Hawk flight which took place in 1903. Santos-Dumont is held to be inventor of flight. It would have been impolite of me to engage in a historical debate on who was first. But it is nearly universally agreed today that the secretive Wrights made the first confirmed airplane flight.

But the Wrights tended to avoid publicity, and their inventions did not seem to captivate the public imagination in the same way that European aviators did. It does not seem that Santos-Dumont had any contact with the Wrights; he likely made his own discoveries completely independent of theirs. He was without question the first man to fly outside the United States.

Does it really matter who was first? Let us give both of these great inventors and visionaries their due, and extend our gratitude in advancing the progress of mankind. There is a nationalistic element that comes into play here. The debate as to who was "first" reminded me of the old debate as to who was the first to invent calculus. It is now generally agreed that Newton was first, but he failed to publish his findings. Leibnitz was the first to publish his results. But does it really matter?

There was one interesting thing I noticed with the museum display. It seems that Santos-Dumont was directly involved in the invention of the wrist-watch. After one of his flights in 1904, he had asked the watchmaker Cartier to design something he could use that would free him from having to use his pocket-watch. The result was the world's first wrist-watch. This is significant because I had previously (and erroneously) read that the wrist-watch was a product of the First World War naval service. Not so.

His later years were tragic. He was eventually diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, and had to give up flying. He was also dogged by episodes of depression and melancholy. He lived to see the widespread use of airplanes as destructive engines of war, and this fact caused him to leave the field of aviation entirely. Returning to Brazil, he eventually ended his own life in 1932.

It was interesting for me to hear some overly enthusiastic Santos-Dumont partisans try to dethrone the Wright brothers from their perch. I heard claims that their flight was "unverified" or relied on a "catapult," or was due to "excessive wind." It is not important. We smile at these controversies, and move on.

What matters for us is a national spirit. It elevates and dignifies the struggles of great men. Far too many countries today are suffering from a deficit of such pride. And it is good that a country takes pride in its great figures, even if such enthusiasm may burst the boundaries of verified historicity.

4 Reasons Why Assad Must Win The Syrian War

May 2, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Besides the US election, this year's most important event that will change the course of world history is the Syrian war. As of now, the Syrian Arab Army, or SAA, is pushing forward to retake the country's second city, Aleppo, while there are also reports that they're making plans to assault Raqqah itself. And despite all Western efforts to destroy the country as they did with Libya, and all the media's propaganda work to demonize him, Assad is the only legitimate power in Syria who has the capacity to both win the war and bring stability to the country. Anything less than his victory would mean that the country will become yet another failed state in the Middle East serving as a hotbed for radical Islamic terrorists.

The Syrian war is extremely complicated with many factions within the country and just as many outside of it siding with the government or its opposition depending on their own national interests and ideological leanings. The war—that has now gone on for more than five years—has brought untold amount of suffering to its citizens and has global implications as the migrant crisis and terrorism in Europe has shown. I don't pretend to be an expert and I won't get into all the details of the war, but there are clear reasons why the government forces under Assad must come out victorious from this brutal conflict.

1. Syria is engaged in a nationalist war against global terrorism

While Zionists and other morons in the West are goading over the fact that Muslims are killings each other, in reality this is a war between a secular Arab state that tolerates many religious minorities—including Christians and Jews—against Islamic jihadists like ISIS, al-Nusra, and other "moderate" rebels who behead anyone that doesn't submit to their strand of Sunni dogma. In other words, this is a battle for the Syrian nation's survival against Islamic terrorists from all over the world who are funded by the US and its Sunni allies in the region.

People of the West should remember that Syrians (along with Iraqis and Yemenis) have been the greatest victims of Islamic terror attacks. A suicide bomb attack in Baghdad that kills 120 people is not going to get as much media attention as smaller attacks in Europe, and Facebook is not going to introduce Syrian flags to be displayed on people's profile pictures to show solidarity for the thousands murdered by the jihadists.

And while Western governments are using the public fear of terrorism to further justify and implement police states (even as they allow millions of refugees to flood in without screening them), and pussyfooting in actually engaging the terrorists, no one is doing more to fight ISIS and other Islamist groups than Assad and his allies. The SAA with the help of Russians have killed more terrorists and extremists in the past few years than anyone in the world, but will they get any credit for their heroics? No, for the West is more interested in sacrificing Syria for Zionist and Sunni interests than they are in defeating terrorism.

2. The need for a secular regime

Nothing good has ever come out by toppling secular regimes in the Muslim world. Every Arab state that the US and its flunkies have destroyed by introducing "democracy" has turned into a hellhole and a breeding ground for extremist groups. So why should we believe that yet another regime change in the Middle East will be a good thing for the world?

History has proven again and again that a strong, authoritarian ruler is often necessary in the Arab world to prevent sectarian violence and radicalization through its secular, nationalist authority. Saddam Hussein may have been too ruthless and ambitious, but Iraq was far better under his rule than the chaos they are in now. As for Syria, Assad is—by far—the best hope Syrians ever have of living in a stable and secular nation.

All the efforts by the Western media and politicians to paint him as a brutal dictator, including the accusation of using of chemical weapons (which was most likely the work of Western-backed "rebels") had been nothing but a build-up towards intervention in Syria—an effort which was largely thwarted by Russia's diplomatic maneuvering. Besides, who cares if he's a "brutal" dictator considering the enemies he is facing? The last thing Syria needs is some soft, democratically-elected clown who would sellout his own country like they do in the EU.

These are the lives of people living under the safety of the Syrian government that the West wants to destroy:

And by the way, when will the US bring regime change to theocratic Saudi Arabia, the Wahhabi cancer that funds Sunni extremists around the world (and was almost certainly involved in the 9/11 attacks)? Oh, I forgot. They're allies.

3. Stability will mean less refugees to the West

Qaddafi Warns France: If I Go Down, You Will Be Flooded With "Millions Of Blacks"

JOE WEISENTHAL

Qaddafi's latest gambit: Convince the European public that they really want him to stick around, with all the stability that entails.

He spoke today to TV network France 24.

This quote (via Reuters) certainly stands out: "There are millions of blacks who could come to the Mediterranean to cross to France and Italy, and Libya plays a role in security in the Mediterranean."

Bear in mind that after the fall of Tunisia's Ben Ali, Italy has seen a wave of immigrants that continue today.

See more here at France 24.

(via Sultan Al Qassemi)

Europe ignored his warnings, now it's paying the price for it.

Even if you don't care about Syria and its people, if you live in the West—and especially Western Europe—you should know that there are consequences to this war for you as well. For all the bitching and moaning people do about Muslim immigrants and refugees, none of these people have done anything to fight back against their own criminal governments that caused the problem in the first place and is welcoming the migrants into their countries.

By winning the war and bringing peace and order back to the country, Assad will effectively slow down the flow of migrants entering Europe and will encourage many there to return to Syria. There are already reports of many Syrian refugees returning to their homes thanks to the advancements made by the SAA and the Russian air force. This, of course, doesn't mean that all refugees will halt and that Europe will be free from having to deal with migrants—in fact, things are likely to get worse before they get any better. But defending one's own borders are something Europeans need to take responsibility for themselves by challenging those who govern them.

4. The bigger picture

Comparisons have been drawn between the Syrian civil war and the Spanish civil war, and it is a relevant comparison. Much like the Spanish counterpart, the Syrian conflict has implications beyond the nation itself with external powers hedging their bets on the fate of Syria to either expand or defend their own sphere of influence.

The truth is that Syria is but a single chessboard in the grand war between the globalist forces of the American-Wahhabi-Zionist Axis and its client-states on one side and the opposition powers that resist it—led by Russia, China, and Iran—on the other. Crisis in Ukraine, the Yemeni civil war, the emergence of BRIC, the currency wars, and the culture wars are all part of this power struggle.

The reason why Syria is being targeted is because the Sunni states, led by the Saudis and Erdogan’s Turkey, want a puppet Sunni state to counter Iran’s Shia influence while the US and the West are simply doing the bidding of their Israeli overlords while trying to knock off Russia’s Middle East and Mediterranean ally (note how they previously tried to cut off Russian naval influence in the Black Sea by knocking out pro-Kremlin government in Ukraine, which is why Putin decided to take over Crimea). Therefore, the victory of the Syrian state against the globalist-sponsored terrorists would be a victory for humanity and a blow to the American agenda for a New World Order.

Conclusion

Who knows if the Syrian war will be an indication of a global war to come just as the Spanish civil war had been the prelude to the second world war? The world is changing rapidly and we shouldn’t discard any possibilities. Peace in one moment can turn into hell the next, shattering all dreams and hopes. History will repeat itself and open new chapters, but it has never lied.

8 Things That Eastern Europe Girls Have Said To Me That Blew My Mind

May 3, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I recently relocated from Los Angeles, California to Poland. While I've spent time in both Eastern Europe and South America before, and noticed the cultural differences between North American women and EE or SA ones, my experience with the women here has continued to be mind-blowing.

Here are eight things that Eastern European girls have said to me, and what their American counterparts would likely have said in place of it. Keep in mind that these are close-to-exact quotes, so read past their charming English mistakes (it truly is cute).

These quotes came from three different girls, and are not in any particular order.

Quote #1

"Why are American girls masculine? Men and women are compatible. I think… man is the head of the relationship. The woman should be the neck. The neck supports the head. But… the head does much better with a neck. It cannot do without."

An American girl would say: "I'm a strong and independent woman who has never needed a man and never will. In fact, men just get in the way of what I could accomplish. I am oppressed!"

Analysis: I've often used the term "polarity" to describe why men and women need each other, but this girl took made it an extremely teachable lesson. It does a better job of illustrating the lesson of "a building needs a foundation" by taking it to an extremely human level.

Quote #2

[When setting up a date] "Okay, Monday is good for you? I wrote you in my calendar. I can't wait :)"

She also attached this picture:

An American girl would say: "Umm, so I'm pretty busy this week with my Feminist Dance Movement studies and my job at Starbucks, but MAYBE I can fit you in on Tuesday at 4pm. But I only have one hour. Then I have to get home and feed my four cats. I'll let you know on Tuesday by 3pm."

Analysis: I thought this was the sweetest thing in the world to send me that picture. I won't lie, all girls have not been this easy to get out on a date. Many of them sing the same song about how busy they are with their lives. But many of the ones who have agreed to meet have said similar things about looking forward to it—they are showing eagerness and excitement to meet an interesting guy. American girls, on the other hand, would clam up and go silent.

Quote #3

"I only kiss men I have strong feelings for. How can an American girls have sex with 50+ men? She must be ruined, her face must have no light left."

An American girl would say: "Well, I kissed five guys in a night once. I once had sex with seven guys in seven days. But those days are past now. I've had my fun and want to settle down with one special guy. By the way, what is your annual income?"

Analysis: I found it hilarious. The Ukrainian girl who said this described the 1,000 cock stare on an expert level. European girls recognize the value of their youth and beauty, and will not squander it away for some fleeting pleasure; I couldn't even get this girl to kiss me despite 10+ attempts and a 3 hour+ date. They recognize that men like a chaste girl for long-term commitments.

Also—that American girl who had sex with seven guys in seven days? That was a true quote, it really happened to me. I was the seventh. She didn't tell me until after the fact.

Quote #4

"Of course I cook. It is a woman's responsibility."

An American girl would say: "Of course I cook. But it's not my job to cook for a man. What are my best recipes? Well, I make a mean box of Kraft Mac 'n Cheese. I'm also quite talented with Lean Cuisines, and know the Domino's delivery number by heart."

Analysis: A Polish girl cooked me an egg soup on our third date—a recipe passed down from her grandmother. It was delicious. Later that week, she invited me over for cake and wine. She and her roommates made three different types of cake for my friend and me to sample.

Girls here take real pride in knowing domestic skills like cooking. The best thing in the world is when they shoo you out of the kitchen and tell you that is not a man's place.

Quote #5

"I want kids, though I am not sure about right now. But I think it is a woman's destiny to be a mother. To nurture. Sometimes I have very vivid dreams where I am pregnant. They are wonderful and beautiful."

An American girl would say: "Eww, I never want kids. They're so gross. The days of women being nothing but child-bearers is over."

Analysis: This girl was partially Westernized, as shown by the "not sure about now" bit. Many of her friends are already married and she seemed to be the rebel of the group. However, it's been repeatedly proven that women respond to societal pressures and shaming. So if all of her friends start popping out babies soon enough, it's very possible she'll cave in to that.

Quote #6

I asked what her hobbies were. “I paint, but I am not very good I think. I do not have many talents, I am not sure what I am good at.”

She then proceeds to show me 20+ amazing paintings, several of which are are on display and were bought at an art show.

An American girl would say: “Well, I really like watching the Kardashians on television. They’re definitely the celebrities I’m most passionate about. But in my other spare time, I like to watch Modern Family and Sex and the City reruns.”

Analysis: I’m still trying to figure out if these girls downplay their talents because they don’t want to intimidate you, or because they’re searching for praise. I sense that many of them are truly insecure in some matters, but are also deeply flattered by praise from men. This goes back to the head and neck reference—they want to feel good and make you feel good, too.

“Wait, you mean American girls do not know the different between macro and micro economics? How is this possible?”

An American girl would say: “Well, I thought Econ 101 was boring, so I dropped it and picked a major I’m truly passionate about—social work!” I’m sure I’ll get a high-paying six figure job right out of college with this degree.”

Analysis: The girls here in Eastern Europe are truly cultured and intelligent. One of the girls I’m dating speaks seven languages and understands another eight at a very basic level. They can discuss politics at an intelligent, logical level, can discuss economic theory, and actually read books instead of just gossip magazines.

Quote #8

"I want a man who can be my rock. Sometimes… I just want to be a little girl."

American girl would say: I don't even have anything to say here that hasn't been said already.

Needless to say, this is the kind of quote that brings out a man's primal instinct. To protect. To provide. It's everything that's sorely lacking in America.

I've only been in Eastern Europe a month, but I never want to go back.

Allowing Transsexuals To Pick Which Bathroom To Use Is Pure Madness

May 3, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

Transgender people, the latest of the trendy sexualities, have been pushing for accommodation of their ways recently, most noticeably in the use of public bathrooms. Usually at schools, and other places where young girls will be in a state of nakedness, the obvious downside of this can be seen by any sane man, and this article will outline some talking points you can use to keep the boys out of the girls' room.

This debate has moved fully out of the physical, real world, where what you are is what you are, and into SJW bizarro-world where how you feel dictates your position in your world. The only way to win these illogical arguments is to use your opponent's strength against her and spin her arguments around, quickly step out of the way, and watch them collide together in sparks of cognitive dissonance.

With Target's recent decision to allow transgenders to use their preferred bathroom, and North Carolina signing a law mandating that they use the one for the sex on their birth certificate, things are heating up.

Probably the most accurate icons out there.

All Men Are Potential Rapists

This is one of the classic SJW arguments, and usually comes along with the “1 in 5 college women have been raped” false claim. While it is insulting to imply that a man could rape a woman simply because he has a penis, and although it smacks of the gun control argument of “If they HAVE guns, they have a greater chance of using them illegally than if they DON’T,” we can ignore the fact that this argument dismisses a man’s ability to discern right from wrong, and simply go straight to the “dick=rapist” core of the matter.

Just like any other argument against them, the chinks in the SJW armors lie in their hypocrisies. If a woman should be allowed her safe space from any man that she feels is "creepy," then this should go double for when she is in the bathroom being naked.

Although it does happen, female-on-male rape is less common than male-on-female, and the anatomical differences should explain why, since a man has to get it up for rape to happen, and the woman just needs to be there (although I did hear a story about four Navy chicks giving some poor seaman an artificial erection via a pencil insertion. Perhaps a trigger warning would have been useful there.)

Point being, if you have a penis, you are capable of raping women, and should not be in the girl's room, regardless of your mental state or identity. Bathrooms are used based on your sex and plumbing, not your gender identity or mental illness, which brings us to the next point.

One Mental Illness Over Another

The SJWs like to cite that homosexuality, having been removed from the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) by the American Psychiatric Association in 1973, is not a mental illness. Assuming the shrinks know what they are talking about, and that the point isn't a fallacious argument to authority, there is enough conflict over how it went down to lend credence to it being a politically expedient decision, as opposed to scientific.

Loading...

I mention the above because it is one of the first acts of SJW politics and influence based, rather than science based, medical policy changes in the US. Fast forward forty some years, and we are in the same area with transgendered people. Politics and The Feels are pushing an agenda which, in no way, is backed up by medicine but the APA removed it anyway a few years ago.

When there is no medical consensus, and an objective observer with a critical mind can tell that one person's "it just feels right" is the rest of us's "nah, dude, you're just crazy," it becomes an issue of trading one mental problem for another. Forcing sexual congress on a woman simply because a man wants to is a crime, and behavior stemming from a mental disorder (psychopathic, sociopathic, etc). Believing you are a woman even though your entire body is male is simply another disorder.

The problem is that you can't tell what some guy ducking into the girls' room is thinking. Is he going to rape some 15-year-old or is he going to go sit to pee, hating his-her pre-op dick that is still there? Mental illness is mental illness, and, although the treatments are different, people with them are suspect until proven otherwise.

A Question Of Commitment

Since the presence of a penis is a declaration of being a potential rapist, and since you can't tell, can't ask, and even can't be sure of the truthfulness of the answer you receive regarding the mental state of a man going into a girl's room, there is only one way to be sure.

Take off and nuke the entire site from orbit by chopping off your dick and growing a pair of tits.

Physically altering your body to resemble a woman not only removes your ability to rape women, it proves you are positive about changing genders. It also makes you look like an (ugly) woman, and you can dress like one so you don't alarm people going into the girls' room.

Maybe Obama and his Welfare Kingdom can offer taxpayer funded castration as a starting point for those trannies who are too poor to get the "operation" right now. (Side note, back in my white knight days, I went with a girl to a lecture done by a tranny, and he-she claimed it cost the price of a small car, so figure $15k.)

My Kid's Safety > You Not Being Offended

Last argument you can pull out to defeat the SJW feels is that children are the priority, and that you will do anything to protect yours even if it offends some people of alternate identity or mental disorder. Remember, the SJW and liberal cause absolutely loves children, except for abortion rallies.

It's ok, that's a woman.

SJW causes often have competing victims. If you can cast the young girls as the potential victims (they're kids, there's more of them, and they're not possessed of a mental disorder) over the transsexuals, then it becomes a choice of the Greater Good.

Conclusion

All men are potential rapists, you can't tell whether a man is a pre-op transsexual or a rapist, anyone who wants to be transgender should be encouraged to go ahead and lop it off, or at least get snipped to show their commitment towards their choice and the safety of others, and that the safety of the kids come first should provide you with enough ammo to shame some SJWs into at least temporary silence.

Offer a temporary solution of a porta-potty if they feel like neither bathroom is appropriate.

Does The Hollywood Elite Use Rituals And Sexual Blackmail To Keep Its Stars In Line?

May 3, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Most people in the mainstream already know that Hollywood is a liberal safe space that was the first to promote leftist causes such as socialism, drug use, feminism, hookup culture, atheism, environmentalism, homosexuality, and transsexualism. This can be attributed to the fact that Hollywood is run by Jews who seem to greatly dislike traditional America, small-town values, and Christianity. What's even more peculiar is that we hardly see any infighting between Hollywood actors and the producers or executives who hire them. It's like they're one big happy family. Or are they?

You probably already know that the casting couch is a way for directors and producers to have sex with the female talent in exchange for jobs, but what if I were to tell you that male actors also must have sex with other men to get work, and that the top male actors in Hollywood have had to submit to degrading homosexual rituals in order to get acting jobs, and that trophies like the Oscars are not based on merit but on those who have paid their dues into the system by enduring the most humiliation, and that the degrading sexual acts all actors commit are used to keep them in line?

You'd think I'm crazy, surely, but every now and then something happens which lends credibility to "conspiracy theories" that were floating around beforehand.

A couple of months ago I found a detailed article showing how producers, writers, and directors leverage their influence to sodomize young boys. Many of those boys go on to become "heterosexual" male stars, all because they gave up the ass for a shot at fame.

> "I never slept with [X-Men producer Bryan Singer] before I was 18," he writes. "But after my 18th birthday, I was quickly passed off to him by a friend, Gary Goddard, who was having sex with me at 17. Gary was his good friend at the time, so Bryan would be out with us—with his dates of the moment, all young > guys. I saw him at parties and out in LA, and we hooked up in Gary's house when I was 18, like three days after my birthday."

Two years ago, a compelling video was published that made outlandish claims about the Hollywood system. Here's a sample of the claims that were made:

> – Will Smith, Denzel Washington, and other big-name stars not immune from ritual sodomy
> – Benny Medina and Quincy Jones sexually initiated actor Will Smith
> – If someone in the Kabbalah cult likes the daughter of a star, he/she must relinquish their child in order to move up > – Queen Latifah initiates Hollywood women using a strap-on > – Monster's Ball movie with Halle Berry and Billy Bob Thorton featured live sex ritual
> – Jewish produced "Ghetto Gaggers" not just a porn but also in Hollywood
> – Porn stars go to Pandora's Box Hollywood sex parties, initiate stars
> – Tony Braxton driven out of her mind over what she had to give up to be famous

Wait, Will Smith is gay? No way. The entire video must be bullshit, because Will Smith is heterosexual and masculine. He's married with two kids. But then his wife Jada Pinkett Smith went full social justice and called for a boycott at the Oscars because it was not black enough. Only one day later, a marginal transsexual actress named Alexis Arquette came out with this, confirming what the above video stated years before:

The video explained how Hollywood actors are controlled: their sexual hazing is recorded on video and used to manage their future behavior so it's in line with Hollywood elite interests. When actors go off the rails, or refuse to submit to the demands of their bosses, "rumors" are leaked that destroy their reputation and acting jobs are withheld from them.

What I think happened is that Will Smith's "owners" gave Alexis the information to publish in exchange for later favors while making it appear as a "leak." But if you examine the final three sentences of the Facebook post above, it's easy to see how those words are coming from the men who write Smith's paycheck, warning him to get his wife in line immediately. And she did. Not even half a day later, she thanked the Academy for their response.

No further rumors about Will Smith were disseminated. Within only two days, a challenge to Hollywood's elite seemed completely squashed. Will Smith, sitting on his $200 million fortune, did later double down and state that the boycott would take place anyway. We should now expect him to never work in a major Hollywood blockbuster again.

Consider that in Hollywood there is hardly any public infighting at all, but here in the alt sphere we have fights seemingly every week. Human nature is aggressive. People fight and argue publicly. Yet in Hollywood, everyone is calm as sheep. It could be because stars are controlled. Through submitting to hazing rituals and having gay blackmail hanging over them, they are slaves to the Hollywood elite who give them fame and money in exchange for their complete compliance, including having to display stupid Illuminati symbols in music videos and photo shoots.

Every major actor in Hollywood has made a deal with the devil, and has had to trade things that you wouldn't, often starting when they were children and passed around to pedophiles, as Corey Feldman revealed. Therefore Hollywood looks not for talent, but for souls, explaining why you can't even name more than five actors who are actually good. This is the industry that has sway not only among the mainstream American public, but the world as a whole.

One of my favorite actors is Leonardo DiCaprio. Before the recent Oscars, I noticed that he was spouting some social justice ideas:

> On Tuesday, Leo received the Crystal Award for "improving the state of the world" at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. During his acceptance speech he called out the "corporate greed of the coal, oil and gas industries" who "have denied and even covered-up the evidence of our changing climate."

It seemed so out of place for a man who travels around in private jets banging hoes on yachts, but then when you understand that stars must submit to rituals in order to gain favor, and that DiCaprio was up for an Oscar this year, it makes complete sense. He must satisfy his masters by helping their leftist agenda in order to receive a reward. We can only guess what private rituals DiCaprio had to submit to before becoming a top contender for the award—which he did win—especially when he was a child actor, and what gay rumor will come out about him if he ever calls for a boycott against the Oscars. There is dirt on all the stars, and even most of the famous musicians and rappers. If you research the issue further, the rabbit hole goes much deeper than what I'm describing.

My personal take is that the younger someone enters the entertainment machine, and the lower amount of natural talent they have, the more likely they have submitted to deplorable degradations in order to be famous. I wouldn't be surprised if pop singers like Lady Gaga and Katy Perry serve as personal port-a-potties to industry bigwigs. In fact, Hollywood is probably where the Saudis got the idea to use paid "models" as hired toilets.

I write about this today not to participate in Hollywood gossip, but to shine a light in how elite circles operate. All the actors and singers that you may respect, whose views you may actually allow to influence you, have traded their dignity and their souls for fame and money. All the "masculine" Hollywood actors you like watching in films have certainly been sodomized or privately humiliated. At best, Hollywood spreads anti-male propaganda to the world. At worst, they are devil worshipers who practice every degenerate cause known to man.

I fully denounce Hollywood and their liberalism, their communism, their social justice, and their faggotry. There is no room for them in a man's life, and I personally won't be casually brainwashed and influenced by the anti-American and degenerate content they put out.

It’s Time To Start Demanding More From Immigrants Who Wish To Live In The West

May 4, 2016 | by Ezri Little | Link | Original Link

Several months back, I flew fourteen hours away from my home country to embark on an undergraduate degree in the United Kingdom. Of course, the battles that we see on the political arena and even on the ground between immigrants and “fascistic, racist, far-right” nationalists (as the deceived world today believes) do not concern a group of immigrants called foreign students. Nevertheless, I realized the realm of tertiary education can be seen as a microcosm of the society outside it.

Ideal

Stereotypical image portrayed on brochures, flyers, booklets pertaining to university advertisement material – as if ethnic diversity in reality is that charming.

So, in the first place, what are some reasons why a university would open doors to foreign students? These are probably the “official” reasons given:

1. Money

Foreign students pay much higher fees, and they also have to spend on non-academic products and services for sustenance—not only are liberal policies embraced by education administrators but government has rationale for opening the floodgates to foreign students.

2. Diversity

A more diverse student population should benefit the home students as they will be exposed to different viewpoints, perspectives, etc. Their minds are broadened, their knowledge of how other cultures are like will somehow make them more "well-rounded students."

3. Talent

The very best universities in the world already have long histories of attracting the brightest minds in the world. Opening doors to foreign students increases the chances of the university educating a future revered leader of a country or the next multi-billionaire.

The "red-blooded" ones among you may already sniff a faint, foul smell of modern-day, liberal philosophy garbage at the sight of the word "diversity." Steady there, this is just the whiff from a mile away, it gets better—or rather, worse.

Reality

The truth is that money is the only benefit for the destination country. Paralleling the world outside the university, a cultural enrichment that is hoped to be gleaned from mass immigration is only in theory.

Do you think the ethnic enclaves formed by immigrants in a part of a city—or even an entire city—has no similar phenomenon in universities? Wander around the university campus from late morning until early evening and you will see what the social scene is like: cliques of white students, white couples, black students together, bearded Arab guys together, and large groups of Asian students of various nationalities or ethnicities. Of course, sometimes you see interracial couples or one black guy in a clique of white students, but what I tell you is the majority of cases, and you can see it in plain sight when you walk about a university campus.

Where is the integration? How are the benefits of cultural enrichment (if there is even such a thing) going to materialize if the cultures do not entangle? How is it any different from foreign ethnic enclaves taking over British towns when a Chinese student speaks only in Mandarin with his Chinese friends, shops at the Chinese supermarket, eats out at Chinese restaurants, goes back to his accommodation full of other Chinese students, watches Chinese dramas online, and the list goes on. I am sure you get my point.

Chinese students—probably the most isolated foreign group in universities

In the first place, many foreign students do not even have a decent level of proficiency in English. If you cannot even communicate properly and sufficiently in English, then my question to you is, “What are you doing here in the UK?” How can you participate in classes, and share your supposedly “diverse, interesting, out-of-the-box perspectives and ideas” when you cannot even speak English in England? This has been my experience in all of my group assignments so far: work gets allocated early on, naturally, work is split as equally as possible. When the time comes, the foreign students produce their horribly inferior work and the rest of the group have no choice but to re-do the parts contributed by the foreign students.

Worse yet, in this world we red pill men realize, criticism cannot be given out of “respect for others of differing nationalities”—purely for the sake that they are different and we should be understanding. How about these students understand that they are making life difficult for their peers because of their ridiculously poor level of proficiency in English? Just as with other types of immigrants, most foreign students do not give two hoots about the history, geography, and culture of the destination country. Their only purpose is to get the piece of paper and fly back to their home country, and apply for jobs while selling the notion that they studied overseas and have an edge over those who did not.

There is absolutely no interest in learning and engaging in the culture of the destination country: whether it be music, sports, film, festivals, etc.

I highly doubt many—or any at all—of my fellow foreign students can describe the English culture in the terms shown below the water surface level in the picture above.

Responsible Immigration

Now, does it not seem hypocritical that I would be so critical of foreign students when I am one myself? If I may say, is it not the same dilemma that a Trump-supporting Hispanic may face?

I must realize that I am not the majority. What this means is that while I condemn foreign students as a whole—we are truly not giving anything else back to the destination countries apart from money, and we are not gaining any of the advantages that are supposed to arise from studying overseas. Is this not the same with immigrants outside the university? While the liberals will say that they contribute in certain ways, are they not also destroying the social fabric of the destination countries? For every immigrant taking up a job or applying for social benefits, are they not taking away that which could have been given to a local?

The paragraph above gives rise to a debate over open borders. I will leave that for other writers or an article by me in future. In short, I believe every country should accept a small number of immigrants for the sake of tapping on the talents, the brains, the perspectives of someone from “outside.” It is vital to understand that immigration in theory is supposed to be a good thing, but the massive immigration we see today (or actually, in the last few decades) has destroyed the ideal picture of immigration benefiting the destination country.

The reason is simply the number: with massive immigration, you are basically transplanting an entire race or nationality of people into another country, and as many articles here on ROK have commented on, the immigrants will slowly devour the culture of the destination country.

Allow me to propose to you what it means to be a responsible immigrant from the perspective of a university student. I am sure there are parallels can be drawn and applied to outside of the university campus. To start off, this should be the first rule for any immigrant:

- Embrace the culture of the destination country; if you abhor it, go back home.
- Second rule: do not bring your culture over wholesale when you move to another country.

These two rules alone should be preached to all Muslim immigrants in Western civilizations. Problems with women's covering, lack of Halal offerings, not enough road signs in your mother tongue, etc? Then go back to where you came from.

Now, I will look at the different facets of society that relate to an immigrant. I will try to portray the image of a Responsible Immigrant—an immigrant who should be embraced in this age of a flood of uncontrolled, uncivilized, ungrateful, demanding, and parasitic immigration.

The Responsible Immigrant

First, you must ask yourself what is the purpose of moving to another country. Why is it that you cannot pursue your endeavour in your home country? Why would you want to "flee" from your home where your loved ones and friends are?

After much deliberation and observation of the different profiles of immigrants, I have an idea of what is one kind of immigrant who will turn out to be a good immigrant—one embraced by the destination country. Somewhere in that sea of immigrants, there lies that Responsible Immigrant. He has decided to emigrate because of many “push factors”: he does not feel like he belongs in his home country, he feels like he is very different from his family, friends, neighbours, countrymen. Not only that but he is probably feeling frustrated with his current environment, and needs to move somewhere else.

Next, after the Responsible Immigrant has decided that the grass will be greener on the other side, he then has to choose a destination. What are some of the common considerations? Language is a very strong point of consideration. It is very difficult to assimilate into a society when you cannot speak the language of that place. Communication plays a big part in the progression of societies. So what good is there between a migrant and his destination country if the migrant either does not know the local language or does not strive to learn it? The last few words before this sentence are very important: it serves as one of the litmus tests differentiating between a responsible immigrant and an irresponsible one.

The next factor will cause controversy: religion. I know we live in an environment (at least, in the Western sphere) that is embracing atheism but like it or not, most countries have their dominant slants, and migrants have to know and understand the implications. I am a Christian, and I do not need anyone to tell me where not to go. The point to stress here is this: religion matters a lot, and so the migrant must think of the implications with his own beliefs and that of the destination country.

Personal Account

The first reason why I believe I am able to connect with the people is because there is no language barrier at all. From my writing, you can tell I am truly fluent in English. Now, for those of you here who are living in an adopted homeland where you are not fluent in the local language, fret not: strive to master it. Prove to the people there that you are willing to be like them in language by trying hard to learn the language. Do not be that irresponsible immigrant living in that immigrant enclave and not needing to speak a word of the local language.

Even though I was born and raised in an Asian country, my upbringing has been largely based on Western ideals and entertainment. Notwithstanding that, I remember that in the months prior to flying to the UK, I devoured British sitcom after sitcom: Hi-De-Hi, Dad’s Army, Not Going Out. When you start enjoying the entertainment—music, film, etc.—from the destination country, it does teach you certain things about the society there that you just do not find in Wikipedia. Many times, I surprise locals when I steer conversation to local entertainment. It brings a smile to their face when they realize they do not only have to keep asking me, “So, in your country, do they…”.

If this is your only form of entertainment in the UK, for example, there is no way you are going to integrate with the locals socially.

Finally, the mindset I have adopted ever since landing in the UK has helped me understand and appreciate the UK. Is it so probable that I have not met with things that I dislike or even hate? Of course not. For one, I do not binge-drink, and I am an "early-sleeper." On many nights in the week, the student accommodation areas will be very noisy until 2 or 3 a.m. Although under the accommodation contract, I have the right to call in security to my flat to break off the parties, do I do that? As a Responsible Immigrant, I jolly well accept that the culture among the university students here includes late-night partying, loud music, and cliques of students screaming popular choruses late into the night.

Conclusion

Perhaps, it is not so much about the immigrant issue but the issue of being a minority: you're black, you're a woman, or maybe you're a Muslim but somehow you find yourself subscribing to the beliefs this website. You may be wondering how to reconcile your life or your beliefs to this new-found philosophy. You need to realize you are truly a minority. Your people are not like you. You are different.

If you are an immigrant right now, I urge you to be a Responsible Immigrant. Do not expect the same kind of treatment as locals. If you feel slighted, insulted, and discriminated against, who cares? Your ancestors did not bleed for the sovereignty of the destination country and culture. Keep your mouth closed, flash a wry smile, and fight for your honour and dignity through deed and character. I appeal to you on the philosophical level too: how often we slam our ideological enemies for always demanding for this and that. Are you going to be a hypocrite demanding for equality? Or are you going to win over the local people by making real effort to assimilate over the long-run?

Trust me, when the only difference between you and your adopted country is your skin colour, you are that Responsible Immigrant who will be embraced by the local people.

How Brave New World Author Aldous Huxley Foresaw Modern America In 1958

May 4, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Brave New World is one of the most important novels of the 20th century. Aldous Huxley's novel anticipates developments in reproductive technology, sleep-learning, psychological manipulation, and social conditioning that combine to change society into a dystopian hell. More than just a novel, it is a social commentary that has withstood the test of time and is more relevant today than when it was published in 1931.

Huxley was interviewed about his novel by Mike Wallace for ABC television in 1958, and Huxley's predictions are astonishing in that they accurately portray life in the world we have awakened to in 2016.

The full interview can be seen here, and some of the most important segments of the interview are analyzed below.

Not A Conspiracy Theory

Rather than being some "conspiracy theory" (which, incidentally is a CIA-created code word to discredit people), the ideas of Huxley instead appeal to man's often sociopathic lust for power and control, which is the force driving today's Anglo-American cultural Matrix. Huxley explains this idea:

> I don't think there are any sinister persons deliberately trying to rob people of their freedom, but I do think, first of all, that there are a number of impersonal forces which are pushing in the direction of less and less freedom, and I also think that there are a number of technological devices which anybody who > wishes to use can use to accelerate this process of going away from freedom, of imposing control.

Huxley foresaw the bureaucratic, authoritarian, micromanaging government the United States now lives under. The following passage illustrates that.

> Another force which I think is very strongly operative in this country is the force of what may be called of over-organization. As technology becomes more and more complicated, it becomes necessary to have more and more elaborate organizations, more hierarchical organizations, and incidentally the advance of technology is being accompanied by an advance in the science of organization.
> It's now possible to make organizations on a larger scale than it was ever possible before, and so that you have more and more people living their lives out as subordinates in these hierarchical systems controlled by bureaucracy, either the bureaucracies of big businesses or the bureaucracies of big government.

At The New Modern Man, we call this collusion of big business and bureaucratic interests the Corporate-Government Complex. This infographic explains the concept.

The intersection of big business and government interests Huxley warned about is today's Corporate Government Complex

How The Corporate Government Complex Expands Its Power

Huxley knew that having an educated populace was not insurance against total brainwashing by propaganda methods. In America, these methods were perfected by Edward Bernays, nephew of Sigmund Freud. Bernays invented the principle of using corporate and government propaganda to "engineer consent" by shaping the thoughts, values, and responses of the masses. Bernays proved those who create knowledge and propaganda rule over the rest of society. Huxley continues:

> Hitler used terror on the one kind, brute force on the one hand, but he also used a very efficient form of propaganda, which he was using every modern device at that time. He didn't have TV, but he had the radio which he used to the fullest extent, and was able to impose his will on an immense mass of people. I mean, the Germans were a highly educated people.

Just as Huxley predicted, advancing technology has imperiled the principles of freedom in the 21st century. It started with television, but has since advanced to smaller and smaller devices with the current goal of microchipping the entire population, rendering them subservient to financial interests and the state. Huxley goes on, proving that not all progress is good progress when it is hijacked by an elite who want nothing but pure power.

> What I feel very strongly is that we mustn't be caught by surprise by our own advancing technology.
> This has happened again and again in history with technology's advance and this changes social condition, and suddenly people have found themselves in a situation which they didn't foresee and doing all sorts of things they really didn't want to do. It's not creating a wide front of distraction it's creating a one-pointed, drumming in of a single idea, all the time. It's obviously an immensely powerful instrument.

Today's mind-altering drugs like SSRIs are the somas from Huxley's novel

Soma

Huxley foresaw today's current medical-pharmaceutical complex, in which the media (the creators of knowledge and propaganda Bernays discussed) persuade the masses to believe the solution to every problem they have in life is a trip to the doctor and a pill.

There are frightening similarities between Huxley's soma and today's SSRI antidepressants. Huxley talks about somas with Wallace:

> This is a very interesting subject. I mean, in this book that you mentioned, this book of mine, Brave New World, I postulated it a substance called 'soma,' which was a very versatile drug. It would make people feel happy in small doses, it would make them see visions in medium doses, and it would send them to sleep in large doses.
> I think it's quite on the cards that we may have drugs which will profoundly change our mental states. I mean, this is the… the pharmacological revolution which is taking place.

Indeed, SSRIs are dangerous drugs as they alter the brain in such a way it becomes dependent on the drugs, and are strongly correlated with mass shootings. Drugs are only one aspect of his vision for dystopia which have come to pass. Huxley went into detail about how propaganda would be used.

Today's media runs purely on a propaganda model

Propaganda Techniques And Scientific Dictatorship

Huxley knew that a dictatorship of the future would rely on propaganda instead of only relying on brute force, as had always been the case in the past.

> Well, to start with, I think this kind of dictatorship of the future, I think will be very unlike the dictatorships which we've been familiar with in the immediate past. I mean, take another book prophesying the future, which was a very remarkable book, George Orwell's 1984.
> This book was written at the height of the Stalinist regime, and just after the Hitler regime, and there he foresaw a dictatorship using entirely the methods of terror, the methods of physical violence. Now, I think what is going to happen in the future is that dictators will find, as the old saying goes, that you can do everything with bayonets except sit on them!

Huxley knew the days of using bayonets or force was passing, and instead the elite were working on scientific dictatorship, a type of dictatorship which uses science in a perverse way. Instead of advancing the human species with science, the elite subjugate the human species with its knowledge.

Pushing Cultural Marxism and taking The Long March approach, tearing down traditional Western institutions one by one starting in the 1960s, progressing with the “limited learning for lifelong labor” educational approach exposed by whistleblower Charlotte Thomson-Iserbyt in the 1980s, and arriving at today’s exposure of the media as a mass brainwashing tool by the arrival of the Internet, is how the following predictions of Huxley have played out in the real world.

> But, if you want to preserve your power indefinitely, you have to get the consent of the ruled, and this they will do partly by drugs as I foresaw in “Brave New World,” partly by these new techniques of propaganda. They will do it by bypassing the sort of rational side of man and appealing to his subconscious and his deeper emotions, and his physiology even, and so, making him actually love his slavery.
> I mean, I think, this is the danger that actually people may be, in some ways, happy under the new regime, but that they will be happy in situations where they oughtn’t to be happy.

Having spent a decade in the media, I know full well how advertising and persuasion works. As Huxley knew, and Bernays proved, effective propaganda and advertising bypasses rational thought aims directly at the subconscious desires we all have.

> [The candidates in the 1956 election] were being advised by powerful advertising agencies who were making campaigns of a quite different kind from what had been made before. And I think we shall see probably, all kinds of new devices coming into the picture. I mean, for example, this thing which got a good deal of publicity last autumn, subliminal projection.
> I mean, as it stands, this thing, I think is of no menace to us at the moment, but I was talking the other day to one of the people who has done most experimental work in the…psychological laboratory with this, was saying precisely this, that it is not at the moment a danger, but once you’ve established the principle that something works, you can be absolutely sure that the technology of it is going to improve steadily.

Authoritarianism works best if you can make people love their slavery

Socially Accepted Authoritarianism

Huxley warned of the Managed Democracy and Inverted Totalitarianism we now live under in America today. In effect, people still get to participate in free and fair elections but the choices they get to make do not change the overall system one iota. This is the "Demican" and "Republicrat" phenomenon of today, with parties as two heads of the same hydra. The illusion of choice is given to the masses by the media and advertising.

> Advertisement plays a very necessary role, but the danger it seems to me in a democracy is this…I mean what does a democracy depend on? A democracy depends on the individual voter making an intelligent and rational choice for what he regards as his enlightened self-interest, in any given circumstance.
> But what these people are doing, I mean what both, for their particular purposes, for selling goods and the dictatorial propagandists are for doing, is to try to bypass the rational side of man and to appeal directly to these unconscious forces below the surfaces so that you are, in a way, making nonsense of the whole democratic procedure, which is based on conscious choice on rational ground.

The following passage from Huxley's prophetic interview touches on how feminism has taken women out of the home, and how today the state indoctrinates children with propaganda (careerism, the government is a god of sorts in the absence of religion, etc.) from a very young age. As Fabian Socialist Bertrand Russell put it, influences of the home with a mother and father in it are counterproductive to what the social engineers want to accomplish. Huxley continues:

> This whole question of children, I think, is a terribly important one because children are quite clearly much more suggestible than the average grownup; and again, suppose that, that for one reason or another all the propaganda was in the hands of one or very few agencies, you would have an extraordinarily powerful > force playing on these children, who after all are going to grow up and be adults quite soon. I do think that this is not an immediate threat, but it remains a possible threat.

As Huxley warned, propaganda is a frighteningly powerful tool. With it, the spinmeisters have been able to turn environmentalism and global warming into a religion, as best-selling author Michael Crichton knew. And, as Lord Acton said, power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely. What we see today is not a conspiracy as much as it is misplaced power in the hands of the wrong people. Huxley said this to Wallace:

> I think one of the reasons is that these are all instruments for obtaining power, and obviously the passion for power is one of the most moving passions that exists in man; and after all, all democracies are based on the proposition that power is very dangerous and that it is extremely important not to let any one man or any one small group have too much power for too long a time.
> After all what are the British and American Constitution except devices for limiting power, and all these new devices are extremely efficient instruments for the imposition of power by small groups over larger masses.

The entire idea behind a republic like the United States is that misplaced power has led to disasters in human history, and that no person or group should have that much power over people. But, as freedom becomes nothing more than sloganeering in America, Huxley knew losing it would ultimately lead to our modern day dystopia and the death of creativity.

> WALLACE: Mr. Huxley, let me ask you this, quite seriously, is freedom necessary?
> HUXLEY: Yes, I should say it is. I mean, a genuinely productive society. I mean you could produce plenty of goods without much freedom, but I think the whole sort of creative life of man is ultimately impossible without a considerable measure of individual freedom, of initiative, creation, all these things which we value, and I think value properly, are impossible without a large measure of freedom.

What decisions do we have this late in the game?

What Can Be Done

What makes this interview all the more remarkable is it was filmed in 1958, but it sounds as though it could have been filmed yesterday. There have been 60 years of warnings about the world we are now in, but the masses have not listened. The cancer of the march of socialism through the institutions of the West is already at an advanced stage, as is the consolidation of financial power into the hands of 10 corporations that control nearly everything we buy and 6 media corporations that control nearly everything we get to see, read, and hear.

This may leave one with a sense of despair. However, in the past the world seemingly marched steadily towards one ideal before revolution tore down the old ideas and made way for new ones.

Will we escape? Or will we fall continue to fall prey to a devious masterpiece of social engineering and social control devised by a sociopathic corporate and government elite who are interested in maintaining their superiority?

At the very least, we can assume a posture of civil disobedience, as journalist John Stossel has suggested. The truth is out there, thanks to the Internet and free speech, while we have mostly uncontrolled use of them.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. 4 Ways To Win Divorce Trials, Child Custody Disputes, And False Rape Accusations

May 4, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Police investigations, judicial processes, and the court of public opinion are not only geared towards falsely convicting men, taking their kids away, or financially eviscerating them through divorce. They also meticulously seek to emotionally destroy men before any verdict or decision is handed down. Proper evidence is almost always an arcane concept in these situations. The proof you need for anything close to a neutral outcome needs to be much higher than what the system says is necessary. By contrast, all your ex-wife, the mother of your child, or some crazy false accuser needs is some tears, a set of feminist backers, and words from her mouth.

I hate to break it to you, but in divorce cases, child custody disputes, and scenarios involving false rape accusations, you are close to completely on your own. Certain friends may come to your aid, but if they stick too close and defend you too vociferously, their own careers, livelihoods and even safety will be at risk. Yet women who have been outed as undeniable liars, like Lucy DeCoutere in the Jian Ghomeshi case, can always count on strong support. The onus is on you to be prepared for any malicious mudslinging that comes your way. You must have a backup plan and means of counterattacking standard issue female lies.

1. Film or document her drug or other substance abuse

There are two main ways to approach this. The first is to call her a drug user from the very beginning of whatever proceedings you find yourself in. So, using this path, you would immediately show the evidence you have. Or secondly, you can make the accusation at the start or wait a while to make it, but leave the evidence until she denies having used drugs.

This latter angle is usually best, as it incontrovertibly outs her as both a substance abuser and a liar. In many cases, she will have committed the criminal offence of perjury through such lying. Women usually escape prosecution for perjury, as so many thrown-out “sexual assault” cases prove, yet her established lack of credibility may mean the difference between you seeing your kids or not, going to jail for a rape you did not commit or remaining free, or getting a favorable divorce settlement (for men) in lieu of being taken to the cleaners. She should face negative consequences for perjury, but the idea here is to get the best possible outcome you can in an environment that deliberate targets you.

For obvious reasons, it is preferable that you have film footage showing drug use or something similar, instead of just photos. Oftentimes there are laws that prevent filming people without their consent. You might be treated more leniently if she’s snorting coke around her or someone else’s children and you’re trying to put a stop to it, but be wary. However tempting, do not make yourself a martyr. You can also exploit text messages, emails and other communications from her that reveal she is doing or did drugs. Pretend to act as a trusted confidante when she texts you about having driven drunk, doing lines at a club, or suffering from alcoholism.

If the relationship with your girl is already solid, you should still be doing this anyway. Half of you have fathers who had “solid” marriages at one time. Then marital problems came along, which frequently include the substance abuse of one partner, and the facade imploded. It is imperative that you constantly vet your woman, if only for the purposes of nipping any bad habits in the bud. Most of all, fathers should keep their children away from drug-addicted mothers. The courts will sometimes be very reluctant to do so, remember.

Plus, feelings change, whether yours or hers. If you eventually find someone better, you want every excuse to be able to excise yourself from the union and feast on greener pastures, the ones you deserve. Start accumulating stocks of documentable information for that possibility, regardless of how happy you are now. It also serves as an insurance policy for you if she leaves first or you are suddenly forced to leave her for something she has done. Readers in fault-based divorce jurisdictions should be particularly enthusiastic about these opportunities.

2. Keep copies of any sordid sexual revelations about her or "disgusting" fantasies

Whilst sexting, has a girl ever begged you to bruise her next time you see each other? Demanded that you pound her senseless with "no mercy"? Particularly if you are falsely accused of rape, such evidence, when retained, could be a godsend. The dilemma falsely accused men often face is that they have engaged in very rough but consensual sex with their partners. The traces of this behavior, bruises, rashes and other visible marks, are then used against the man to prove the woman's made-up allegation. Do not fall into the trap of complacency. Always keep copies of such revelations. They may save you.

Many jurisdictions around the world have so-called "rape shield" laws, which render a woman's broader sexual history with other men inadmissible during prosecutions for rape. Though strange, considering that the accused's sexual history is usually fair game, these provisions do vary. Usually though, because a false rape accusations concerns the relationship between you and the false accuser, your long-term history with her will indeed be admissible in a court. To boot, because there is almost always no evidence against men, most accusations are played out in public. Ridiculous “rape shield” laws will not apply in court of public opinion trials. You will be able to try and defend yourself with text messages and other things that you have documented.

Like with documenting any drug or other substance abuse problems she has, your ideal option may be to lure her into denying what you say (but have not proven yet with texts or other evidence). This can get a little complicated, notably when police and/or lawyers become involved. But it is possible and frequently advisable to take such an approach. Revenge porn provisions prevent you from disseminating her nude photos, and I heartily recommend you never ever do so, but they can be powerful pieces of evidence to share with authorities, especially if she thinks you have deleted or forgotten about them. Their importance is only amplified the kinkier they are.

A large percentage of women do have rape fantasies. In addition to these overt desires, a whole generation (or two) of women have been able to express their suppressed longings for dominance and mistreatment at the hands of men via Fifty Shades of Grey. Even in our deleterious world of “listen and believe,” a girl making rape accusations after having asked her boyfriend or lover to carry out fetishes resembling it is far less likely to be believed. If the fetishes and general behaviors are sordid enough, you may find her sexual proclivities are so lurid they can be used as ammunition in child custody and divorce cases, too.

3. Have access to any proof of other crimes or serious moral failings, particularly in relation to her work

You might be surprised at how many women admit to their partners or bed sharers about criminal or other immoral acts they have committed outside of substance abuse. Girls I know have even gone so far as to text or email me about the time they stole from their employer. One wrote to me about how she put laxatives in a co-worker's coffee, to the point where this work rival required time away from the office. Most of the time I never think about them, but they're always there in my unconscious.

Learning these damaging facts about girls should not be your priority only when things get bad or when you suspect they eventually will. Even when your relationship, whether romantic or purely sexual, is going well, knowing her secrets is a powerful tool for getting what you want. A girl with more to lose from upsetting you is generally more pliable. Fundamentally, knowing some of the worst elements about women and their histories empowers you to make choices about whether you want to remain with them.

If you have heard her admission only in face-to-face conversations, there are ways for you to get her to admit it in documentable ways a second time. Conversation leading like "Remember that time you told me you stole money from Dave's shop?" can work wonders in having her divulge in detail again what occurred, or at least have her admit it casually. Make up some reasonable excuse for having raised the topic, like seeing someone else steal from their employer and how it made you laugh about the cheekiness of it. Be creative, as your girl's secrets may be drastically different than this example.

This recommendation may seem difficult at first. Many of you will likely struggle to find something serious to keep in the wings for a time it can be used against her. Most of the time, this is a good thing. Because of this, your girl is probably less likely to cause you the kind of trouble that would cause a hard-hitting divorce lawyer to be hired, an acrimonious child custody war, or a trial based on a mendacious false rape accusation. But keep your eyes totally open. What appears to be a saintly girl can easily become a viper you need to socially throttle fast.

4. Keep records of any financial agreements between you both and have multiple instances of her consenting to them

Some time ago I wrote a piece about protecting yourself financially from women. This should concern all men, not just those who are married. Nevertheless, married men have the most to lose from not having long trails about how money was used with the woman in their life. The prescriptions in that earlier article of mine are valid here, too.

Be sure to firmly lay out your expectations when paying for things. What you need to do is usually very simple. For example, if you paid for European holidays with your credit card and she's paying half of the sum to you later, shoot her an email when you're away from her with what you did. Itemize it. The most important thing is to keep everything for posterity, not merely for the next six months. I sincerely doubt that most of you would allow a girl to break multiple financial commitments in a row. The principal concern is rather what a judge will say in five to ten years' time if either divorce or a child custody dispute ensues. Have proof that you did not simply bankroll her and that she does not deserve more than a penny from you.

If you send cash to her during your relationship, wherever possible label it as a loan using online banking or Paypal. Then insist that she pay back any money owed later electronically with phrases like "Repayment to John." Often this phrase will appear on your own banking statement when the money arrives to you.

Once habitualized, these procedures take nothing but seconds. And, again, they are a powerful means of throwing doubt into a woman's already evidence-lacking accusations against you. Women like Kesha have already been outed for making false rape accusations at the exact same time they wanted out of a commercial agreement. Normal women are capable of identical behavior regarding false accusations, or in divorce and child custody cases. If you can show that there is a powerful incentive for her to lie or want to get money from you (i.e. to avoid paying you money), you are more likely to believed and escape with less damage to both your reputation and wallet.

One instance of her agreeing to financial commitments may not be enough. She could easily say an agreement or habitual patterns of spending were changed verbally. Be sure to remind her or thank her for repayments or something similar in documentable ways. "Thanks for paying part of the money back, Babe" is so simple that you have no excuse for not sending something like it. Have contingency plans for when things go either well or badly. So long as the paper and digital trails you have are long enough, you can mitigate any financial and person damages wrought by false rape accusations, divorce proceedings, or child custody wars. Yes, in the end you may suffer more than you should have from some female-related ordeal. This is still much better than losing badly.

If the shit hit the fan tomorrow, how prepared would you be?

This is the litmus test every man needs to take. If you are thoroughly unready for a bitter female-precipitated slugging match, start getting ready today. You can still deeply enjoy your life whilst being realistic about a woman's ability to cause trouble for you. In fact, once you pull down the veil of femininity, many of the frustrations and angers that used to paralyze you disappear. You do not expect women to be the kind creatures they like to be seen as. Instead, you see them as human beings who, in the right circumstances, can be managed to serve your interests.

Women try to manipulate men, so why not manage them back?

Why The Ladies' Restrooms In Target Stores Are The Best Place To Meet Women In 2016

May 5, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Men have to stay on top of pickup trends when it comes to meeting girls because what may have worked a decade ago will no longer be effective today. Since I'm an expert on American pickup culture, you are the first to know what works best before the masses do. After doing some extensive experimentation, I'm happy to say that I'm having an incredible success rate picking up women in Target stores, specifically in their ladies' restrooms.

For those of you who aren't American, Target is a popular low-cost retailer that sells food, home goods, and cheap clothes. Target is so progressive and cutting-edge that they have recently passed a new company policy catering to transvestites, specifically allowing biological males to use the female restroom.

In other words, men can now legally use the female Target bathroom without any repercussions. I have decided to use this loophole to my advantage and get laid consistently by approaching girls inside the ladies' room. I've slept with six girls from the strategy since the policy was announced on April 19.

Simulated in-field footage of me picking up Scandinavian-derived white girls in Target.

Here the game plan I've been using, which I'm sharing only because I don't spend that much time in the United States (if I did, there would be no way I'd publicly reveal my high-octane tactics for free).

1. Go into the Target women's restroom and set up camp in a private stall

My testing showed that appearing within her stall will not lead to the bang

Most Target ladies' rooms have two stalls. You will be occupying one for a "session" that lasts approximately an hour. I recommend you bring an e-reader or fully-charged smartphone to deal with possible down time of no women coming in.

2. Be patient and listen for hot girls to enter

Loud footsteps indicate obesity

It will take some experience to know the “sounds” of a hot girl, but usually it involves a light tippy-tap step instead of the thud-boom step of a fattie, an invariably sweet-smelling fragrance that cuts through the bathroom odor instead of the rotting yogurt stench of vaginal yeast, and a jingle-jangle from extensive cosmetic jewelry that cannot fit the log wrists of land whales. I got so good at hearing hot girls that I can predict a girl’s rating to within one point after listening to her movements for a mere 10 seconds.

3. Time it so that you intersect with the hot girl at the sink after she does her potty

Great female to male ratio

Once she completes her tinkle in the neighboring stall, she will want go to the sink to wash her hands and fix herself in the mirror. This is when you emerge from your stall and get behind her as if you're patiently waiting to use the sink yourself, even though you don't actually have to use the sink.

4. Break the ice by saying how you're having a bad hair day

Women who use the bathroom often engage in conversation by talking about how bad they look in an attempt to fish for compliments. You will mimic this behavior to get the conversation going (if you're bald, your statement will elicit a smile). The purpose of the ice breaker is to get her used to the fact that a man is in the women's room and to establish your powerful, unbreakable masculine frame.

5. She's not DTF if she questions why you're in the women's restroom

My wingman Stanley running A+ game in Target

If she starts challenging your female identity, she's definitely not going to bang you, but so you don't get banged in jail, you have to provide authentic legal cover by stating the following: "Today I identify as a woman." Technically that's not a lie if you're feeling moody, jealous, needy, anxious, or insecure, because women feel these traits every day. Be thankful that we live in a progressive nation where we can identify as anything without having to provide a shred of evidence, meaning your statement is truthful and supported by an American establishment that is catering more to mentally ill trannies every year.

6. She's DTF if she completely ignores the fact that a man is in the women's restroom

If she doesn't even ask why a man just came out of the women's stall, you're halfway into her panties, which will be getting moist by the second due to the fact that you took such a progressive risk in bucking the patriarchal order to fully express yourself in a modern manner. Have a normal conversation with her about what sort of Chinese-made goods she's shopping for at Target and then go for the digits quickly before security or non-progressive women attempt to cockblock your approach. You can also try for an instant date in the parking lot if you feel the attraction she has for you is especially strong.

7. Rotate your game sessions between all Targets in your area

You don't want to wear out your welcome in one Target, so mix it up a bit. You may even want to learn the schedule of the Target staff so you don't run into the same individuals too often, because being a regular at Target is not the same as being a regular in a normal bar or club. Since this tip is hot, you will surely run into other ROK readers who will want to take advantage of the "identity loophole." Ask them where the pet shop is and give them a knowing nod once they give the correct answer.

Advantages of running game in the Target women's room

As you know from my history, I've run game just about everywhere women can be found, but I haven't found such a treasure trove of easy lays like I have in the Target ladies' bathroom. Check out these benefits:

- Total pickup costs of $0. There's nothing to buy in the bathroom, even if you have money to spend (i.e. there's no bathroom attendant peddling mints).
- Private, one-on-one conversation in an intimate setting. Interruptions will be few, meaning you can run game on the girl in complete silence.
- Less flaking. Girls will want to bang you for the novelty of telling her friends that she met a man from the Target women's restroom.

The best advantage of all is that it provides a big middle finger to feminism. If it wasn't for feminist victories in inverting the traditional order, would I be getting laid from the tranny clusterfuck they created where biological men can peep on women in public? What pedophiles had to do secretly in the hopes of not going to jail can now be legally done by all men, without consequences. Sweet!

There is one downside in that sometimes I encounter doo-doo smells because some women think Target is suitable for releasing chocolate hostages, but other than that, I can't recommend the women's bathroom enough as a way to meet women for casual sex, and who knows, you may even meet someone you truly care about. So thank you Target Corporation, for allowing men to use your female restrooms. This great progressive company is bringing society together, just perhaps not in the way that they imagined.

Are Women Careless With Contraception Because They Love The Attention From Getting An Abortion?

"Having an abortion was such a traumatic experience for me." I have heard these words before and undoubtedly I will hear them again, whether in person or via the media. Put simply, women want the attention that comes from both abortion and debates about abortion. Many of them also adore the decision-making capability they can wield in having a foetus inside of them and deciding that it will not ever breathe outside the womb.

Playing the abortion card, despite the ease with which 99% of abortion situations can be avoided, enables women to portray themselves as oppressed pieces of oestrogen-producing meat. After all, there is no quicker way to make feminists feel like victims than to either a) put restrictions or bans on abortion or b) point out the obvious, namely that if women were more responsible with their genitalia abortions would be all the rarer.

It certainly takes two to tango, as men should be wearing condoms if they wish to avoid fathering a child. Yet it is feminist women who ultimately want the right and "difficult choice" to keep or terminate pregnancies. If the issue is supposedly theirs alone, the responsibility to prevent such choices even being required is theirs, too.

Abortion is such a great way for courting attention that Emily Letts decided to film hers and spread the video across the whole of the internet. I kid you not.

Despite thousands of years' worth of evidence that not at least sheathing a man's penis is a surefire recipe for pregnancy, women continue to get knocked up. From the ditzy cashier girl in her mid twenties to the deplorably feminist gender studies graduate, women are continually getting themselves pregnant, despite most of them not wanting a child or planning it like a cat plans to swim. But why? If abortion involves such a traumatic choice, even for women who are pro-abortion, why do they subject themselves to a form of masochism easily averted by just using a condom and either a pill or contraceptive implant?

Although I do not discount the huge personal, social, and even environmental impacts the pill has, we can all agree that women are reckless when it comes to sex and abortion. Women who get abortions are more likely not to want children in the first place, at least not now and probably not for the foreseeable future, if ever. Their antics comprise a curious mix of narcissism and self-hatred.

The relative cost of contraception is ridiculously small

It is so damn easy to avoid the coat hanger stage. There should be only 10,000 abortions in the US, not over 1 million.

$150 to $600 is the estimated yearly cost of taking the pill. Half of childbearing-age American women would spend double that sum on café coffees and restaurant food and perhaps thrice it (or more) on clothes and shoes. Condoms, which are improving in protective abilities every half-generation, not to mention their thinness, cost about $1 or less per rubber for packs of one dozen and up. These seem like very small costs to avoid both the alleged trauma of having an abortion (plus the public condemnation feminists claim go with it) and the expenses of raising child, which can easily run to $250,000, by the time they reach 18.

Let's also not forget that condom use, when performed correctly, has a breakage rate of about 2%. Many of these figures are older and do not take into account improvements in condom design and materials. Even when a woman is fertile, breakage will not always result in pregnancy (not even close). As a result, condoms and other contraceptive measures are clearly not being used because the US records around 700,000 abortions every year. The true figure is well over 1 million, as official figures only count voluntarily submitted data.

If "my body, my choice" rings true, then feminist women have a lot to answer for. On the one hand, they want total choice over the abortion issue. Paradoxically, however, it is anathema for them to acknowledge that most abortions constitute, in fact, self-inflicted trauma. The means of preventing this trauma are so simple and realisable that women doing anything less are usually deliberately bringing abortion-related misery on themselves.

Even if you disagree with me, women are amazingly reckless when it comes to abortion "trauma"

Abortion trauma is real in many ways, as proven by science. But when women avoid excellent ways of preventing this trauma, i.e. taking proper steps not to get pregnant, this trauma is better termed as masochism.

It is fair to say that most people reading this will mostly or totally agree with me. Nonetheless, if you do not feel women maintain angry abortion debates for the purposes of attention and a sense of being able to decide, they are still recklessly bringing abortion "trauma" on themselves. Men are constantly told that we cannot know about the pain of abortion and that many women choose to terminate pregnancies because the demands of motherhood are so onerous. If we assume this is true, women who do not want or are uncertain about children should be avoiding pregnancy like the plague, instead of playing outright Russian roulette with it.

For the record, I am rather ambivalent towards abortion. Low birth rates have essentially destroyed the vitality of Western cultures, so on that count I find it in practical terms a form of social suicide. Conversely, feminists love abortions more than any other group and so them failing to reproduce as much is a win for society. What I find disdainful is that most women get themselves to the abortion stage in the first place. So much public energy, which could be better channelled in solving truly hard problems, is wasted on correcting the lack of responsibility on the part of sexually active women.

If you do not want to face either an abortion or having a child, do not get pregnant. It is literally that fucking simple. But if, like many women, you want a form of perverse attention and victimhood, abortion and fighting about abortion are great ways to achieve this ignoble aim.

8 Solid Day Game Tips For Beginners

With the constant decrease in quality in the behaviour of modern women, one of the symptoms of the cultural decline, it seems that soon night game will no longer be a viable option to find a girl for something other than sex. The West does not seem to improve, so guess what? It's up to you to change or pack your bags.

Relying heavily on day game and approaches, I can say that I rake in 75% of my lays from it. 20% of them come from night or club approaches. 5% or less come from my internet game, something I truly suck at, but I am working on it.

Direct or indirect game, choose the one that brings you the best results, suits your character and get out there. I would redirect you to Troy's article if you do not clearly see the difference. For our brothers who might be starting, here are some ingredients that you can implement in your day game for greater success.

1. Do not give a shit

This is by far the most important tip of all this list. Rejection is the big sword that looms over the head of rookies. It is there, so what? There are millions of pretty girls out there. You are the prize, boy. Never forget that. If it's not her, it will be another.

Step by step, you need to reach a point in your day game when rejection is only a distant notion, part of a routine. Eventually, you should also reach a point where her beauty does not faze you. When a girl flakes, does not answer or outright rejects you, you need to reach a level where you are completely detached. Believe in and show your self-worth with a ruthless abundance mentality.

Roll in like you own the place. You are the emperor of the squares, interrupting his stroll for a chat with an attractive female commoner, in the perspective of enjoying her moist holes. As one puts it: “Who cares if 10 women rejected you, if the 11th approach leads to a bang?”

2. Pay attention to your voice

Speak slowly, even slower than normal. Use all your lung capacity and your stomach muscles, you must be clear as crystal in your elocution. This is even more relevant when approaching girls that do not speak English.

A good habit I have developed is to constantly hum a low tune, getting my vocal chords warmed up for a smooth, low-tone opener. Something like the low hums in Vangelis’ song “Conquest of Paradise”

Asking questions and expecting a answer will make you raise the accent at the end of the sentence. Because that is the most common way in many languages to orally stress that you are requesting an reply.

The problem is that you tend to raise the pitch of your voice in doing so. A high pitched, effeminate voice detected during the first impression is a good way to shoot yourself in the foot. What you say does not matter as much as the way you say it. Your tone must express confidence and calm.

3. When in doubt, approach anyway

Then eject if necessary. There are always cases when you can’t immediately tell if the girl is attractive in your book. She passed too fast, she turned around, she wears a hat, she has an oversized pair of sunglasses (slut tell!), she looks nice from behind but she might be a butter face… cases are too long to list. One answer: who cares?

Go anyway. While you talk, you will have the opportunity to study her face, style and the kind of girl she might be. Give it your best shot and use what you have learnt. It is an absolute game of trial and error. She is a bitch, she looks at you like you fell from Mars, or is cross-eyed? Eject. You can even do it without saying a word. Your time is important, not hers.

4. Mind appearances

It is valid for every poon, slayer but if your presence is strong and your game is bullet-proof, you can slightly dress down or approach with a t-shirt full of holes, stains, or a convict outfit. Nobody rocks the suit look 24/7, especially in warmer climates.

But for a beginner, better keep it sharp. It will give a better first impression, even if a few mistakes are made during the approach. If you notice that you get more numbers and smiles when you wear a shirt and dress shoes, than with a plain fitted t-shirt with casual shoes, keep doing it. But you can see the issue in having to get changed after work and getting a new shirt, especially if you are like me and hate ironing.

5. Be persistent (within reason)

Get over here

A girl might not take the bait straight away. Or she did not understand what you just said. You might not have been convincing enough or she is just shy. Whatever it is, keep talking, unless you clearly see that this ship has sailed.

Block her way for a bit, keep involving her in the conversation, walk side by side if she carries on walking but sends you positive signals, direct her by saying “Hold on. Stop here as I (stress the “I”, you are the boss) need to go that way,” pointing at the other direction, then resume. You have balls, use them. You should clearly feel that the attraction is absent before leaving.

6. Try different approach patterns

We are animals. Relatively intelligent ones, but animals nonetheless. Note that the most popular style of predation in the carnivorous fauna is to isolate a target instead of charging groups.

Like novice diurnal predators, day game beginners should first approach single girls before turning into multi-tasking charming comedians. Try the different techniques from those predators of the animal kingdom. Not trying to play the mysterious kung fu master here, but it describes quite well the way to proceed:

Eagle game

Here, you stay at your post, near a square or a very busy street. You need good eyes to scan the crowd for a extended period of time and spot the attractive girl in the blur of people. Spot her from far, intentionally cross her path or go after her fast on a short distance, stop her and open. You might need to face her and monopolize the space with your arms, bag, umbrella etc. to create an invisible barrier and stop her for a bit. Once you are done, return to your post and wait for the next one.

Crocodile game

You can bring a fellow crocodile along to watch your valuables while you stand and stop the girl or turn it into a small contest to see who's the man. Grab a coffee and observe. Stay at a cafe terrace or a bench near a busy street or square. Saturday afternoons work well. The careless antelope walks by. You act, charm, number close, then back to your coffee until the next one.

"Hey. I saw you passing by and you look nice. So I came to say hello. I am JB"

Wolf game

It is a blend of the previous ones. But you walk, walk, walk. You must never stop for something else than talking to an attractive girl. No texting, no wifi browsing, maybe a take-away coffee.

Stop when you see a potential hottie. Then you go for the insta-date or you carry on to accumulate approaches. The wolf is motivated because he is hungry, he outruns failure and Incel.

Bonus: Monkey game

Shout-out to Roosh on that one, an equivalent could be used at the end of concert, when a large crowd gets of a train or when the students leave the university classes:

> I do not run around the venue approaching every girl in sight. Other girls will see this and be reluctant to indulge in your approach later on. The only exception is > when last call has arrived, I have no solid prospects, and the club is dying out. Then I approach at will any girl within sight, running around like a monkey to do so (monkey game?).

7. Be constant

Better approach during a smaller time frame every day than in excess during one day (although approaching in any amount is better than doing nothing), the only exception being extreme time constraint or irrepressible horniness. Dedicate a time slot to day game on a given number of days and stick to it.

Approach like a machine. If you feel like it, use an insta-date but I would stick to massive amounts of approaches if your rejection still hits you hard or your confidence and frame are still shaky. A long break makes you lose the momentum and confidence that you accumulate with the memories of successful approaches. A good mental habit is to decide of a number of approaches you have to make a day in order to keep a steady flow. We keep repeating it, but after all, mathematics will always be on your side in game.

8. Stop choking the chicken

This one is a no-brainer. You need to be focused, so keep your hormones in. You need to be horny and feel that you are more aggressive. You need to reach of point where you can't resist approaching girls. It becomes a mission.

Your animal instincts must completely override your logical brain. It is also a proven fact that men that get natural sex instead of masturbation are subconsciously perceived as more attractive by girls. Science will prove one day that the "I just had sex" victorious stride is real.

Vas-y, garçon

Day game and its success can be centered around a few main factors: mathematics, logistics, presence, body language, persistence, level of attractiveness, self-esteem… The list is quite long. But one factor tramples them all: balls. At the end of the day, it is the foundation that needs to be solid to support the whole structure.

So get out there and conquer!

What You Need To Know To Survive A Police Interrogation

May 6, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

In July, 1997, Michelle Moore-Bosko was raped and murdered in Norfolk, Virginia. There was no forced entry, and the perpetrator was described as a single assailant. Soon, seven US sailors were arrested and jailed. There is no evidence that any of the men committed a crime. The police were able to extract false confessions from four Navy sailors. What happened?

The Victim, Michelle Bosko

A female neighbor who only knew the victim for a month told the police that they should investigate Danial Williams, a 25-year-old married Navy machinist who lived in the same apartment building. Danial, being a law abiding innocent man used to obeying orders, drove to the police station to help in the investigation. He was given a polygraph test. He was innocent, and passed the test, but the police lied and told him he failed, and that he needed to stop lying to them and confess.

With no evidence pointing to Danial, and a polygraph test confirming his innocence, the police decided to interrogate him for 11 hours. Because that's far easier than doing real police work to find a criminal.

Initial Interview: 11 Hours

After 11 hours of this, your mind weakens

Danial states: Being in a small room… getting in your face, yelling at you, calling you a liar, poking you in the chest with their finger, and then turns around and says ‘Well, I can help you, if you tell me the truth, tell me what happened’. It went on and on throughout the night with them calling me a liar.” After 11 hours, Danial falsely confessed to entering the apartment and raping Michelle, beating her in the face with a shoe, and then leaving.

The police received the autopsy report the next day. It showed that the victim was not hit with a shoe, or beaten in any way, but was stabbed and strangled (which Danial had denied doing). Instead of finding evidence, searching for the murder weapon, or finding a suspect who fit this profile, the police instead forced Danial to change his confession to fit the facts. Less than 24 hours after the murder, Danial was charged with rape and murder.

The Goal Of Interrogation Is To Obtain A Confession

When police are in an interrogation, they are not looking for clues to solve the crime. They are trying to get the person in the room to confess. People who have never been interrogated must understand that interrogation is unnatural, stressful, and intense. There is extreme psychological pressure, sleep deprivation, hunger, and confusion. After being trapped in a small place for a long period of time, people break in response to that pressure, and they think the only way to save themselves is to put an end to the interrogation, and the police tell them the way to do that is to sign a confession.

Prosecutors Do Not Care About Justice Or Solving Crimes

Unfortunately, prosecutors acting out of laziness or downright purposefully framing an innocent person, in order to close the case, happens far too often in America. There is no motivation to solve the crime, or obtain justice for the victim, but merely to close the case and move on to another one.

As high profile programs like the podcasts Serial and Truth & Justice, or Netflix's Making a Murderer show, prosecutors will willingly lock up people for crimes which they know they did not commit, while leaving the real criminal free to continue raping and murdering. But what happened here went far beyond framing a single innocent man.

Four months after locking up Danial for the crime, Danial's DNA test came back and proved he was innocent. Unlike the UK, which has strict rules for police behavior, rules for interrogation, required taping of procedures, and prohibitions on lying to suspects, the police in America are free to lie, distort, and manipulate. They kept the DNA results which proved Danial's innocence secret, while he rotted in jail.

The police decided that although the facts proved otherwise, there must have been multiple assailants, and sought out to lock up more innocent men. They picked up another Navy shipmate, Joe Dick Jr., a socially awkward young man with likely below average IQ. Joe claimed he was on the USS Baltimore at the time, which the police could have easily verified. But instead they also told Joe he failed his polygraph test, and traumatized him with brutal crime scene photos.

The police told Joe they knew he was guilty, and that he needed to confess. He gave DNA samples, knowing they would exonerate him, as he was innocent. Instead, the police sent him to jail and charged him with the death penalty, despite zero evidence.

The “Norfolk Four”, all coerced into giving false confessions

After being fed info about the crime that only the killer would know, Joe made up a story naming another Navy man, Eric Wilson, as the real killer. They cops locked up Eric, and two months later, when Eric’s DNA proved him innocent, the police went back to Joe for the real killer’s name again.

Joe made up the name George Clark. The police couldn’t find a George Clark, so they instead arrested a Navy man from a completely different ship named Derek Tice, who vaguely matched this description. After 11 hours of interrogation, Derek signed a confession.

The police then pressured Derek for more names. Derek named John Danser, who had an ironclad alibi—it was his birthday and he was out celebrating with friends. Detective Ford came back to Derek, angrily accusing him of lying because John Danser was obviously innocent.

But at the same time as the police admitted Danser had a bulletproof alibi, they prosecuted him for the crime anyway, while asking Derek for even more names. That’s right, the prosecutor admitted Danser couldn’t have done the crime, yet prosecuted him for it anyway.

Never speak to the police without a lawyer.

There is the perception by innocent people that they do not need a lawyer, because they are innocent, and the truth is the best defense of all. Asking for a lawyer makes one appear like one has something to hide. In reality, however, the innocent need a lawyer even more than the guilty.

Forced Confessions Are Easily Obtained

The 7 Innocent Men in Jail

As NYPD detective Jay Salpeter says “How could you confess to a crime you never did? Put them in a room with me. I could do it.” Detective Glenn Ford got 100% of the Navy men, military trained men who should have above average physical, if not mental strength, and some type of training in interrogation, to confess. “He postured like a bulldog, leaning towards me, yelling at me, calling me a liar, telling me I was going to die, and this went on for 8 hours. At least every 30 seconds, for 8 hours of constant talking, Ford would say ‘You’re going to die, you’re going to get the needle. How does it feel to die?’”

During the Spanish Inquisition, the authorities developed rigorous rules and methods for obtaining confessions. One stage was “showing the instruments” of torture. Many people confessed at merely the sight of the instruments they would be tortured with. The police in this case were effectively “showing the instruments” of death by threatening the needle over and over again for hours.

To most people, it sounds inconceivable that an innocent person could confess. But know that after many hours, most people can and do break down. Your will is broken down, and eventually you will cooperate in order to end the interrogation. The key is to never put yourself in the position where you are being interrogated. No one other than your family will believe you are innocent after you make a false confession.

The Truth Does Not Matter

Omar Ballard, murderer

A woman's stepdaughter turned in a letter to the police from Omar Ballard, who was in jail for raping a 14 year old girl, and had raped and killed another woman. In this letter, he angrily threatens the girl, and admits to killing Michelle Bosko. The police tested his semen, which matched that found in the victim, and Omar confessed to the murder, saying he acted alone.

Case closed, right? The innocent men, who don't know Omar and have no connection to the crime other than their false confessions, will now be apologized to and let go, right? Wrong. The police said Omar must have run into the other seven men, in the parking lot, and talked them in to coming in and raping a stranger with him.

No One Is Looking Out For You

In 2009, after serving more than a decade in prison for a crime they were clearly innocent of, VA governor Tim Kaine released three of the men (Wilson, the 4th, had already been released after serving 9 years for rape—he was never charged with murder). They went into prison as young men in their prime, and now have their souls crushed and will have trouble living out the rest of their days, and are still considered convicted felons and sex offenders.

The police, the justice system, the government, the military, and anyone else you think is supposed to look out for you, simply will not. The victims families typically do not care about finding the actual perpetrator, but just want the police to find and kill someone.

The important lesson is never talk to the police, other than identifying yourself if asked, and never, ever agree to an interrogation. Always request an attorney, and even a free public defender is better than facing the police alone. Finally, be aware of what happens to innocent men, how interrogation works, and how the mind breaks down under torture or duress.

How To Build Your Own Home Gym—And Why You Should Do It

May 6, 2016 | by Kullervo Kalervonpoika | Link | Original Link

So you've decided to start lifting and you've walked into your local gym. Inside you are greeted by a cute blonde behind the counter and walls painted orange or purple. You sign up for a membership and change your gear.

You will find that free weights are hard to find. Instead, the place is filled with treadmills and elliptical machines. You try to get in the mood but Lady Gaga is blasting of the radio. Focusing on your sets is difficult with all those 20-year-old girls in yoga pants.

While you wouldn't want to find yourself in a bed with Bill Kazmaier, he doesn't fuck with your focus at the gym.

A MRA would whine that gyms are not immune to the feminization of the society. A MGTOW would cancel his membership. You, however, will be kicked out for dropping your clean-and-jerks. Then you drive halfway across the town to find a meathead gym or go for possibly the most manly of options: building a gym of your very own.

First of all it must be stated, obviously, that this is not a possibility for everyone. To start with, you should have a place to build the gym in. Ideally, you own a house with a garage large enough. A little craftsmanship in carpentry or blacksmithing won't hurt you. Other things to consider are the cost of the equipment and the time and effort to put in. Some equipment you can make pretty easily yourself; others you are probably better off buying.

What You Will Need

Building is a gradual process. You will prioritize and acquire first what you need the most. Lets say you are into Olympic lifts. Then a solid platform is a must. For calisthenics a pull-up bar would be the number one thing. In the case of your average gym bro, here is a list of what you would need, roughly in the order of importance:

Barbell

And enough plates for your needs. This beats dumbbells hands down in home gyms. Adjustable dumbbells are pain in the ass to use and solid ones would end up costing a fortune. Besides, try doing deadlifts or squats with dumbbells.

Forget the famous brands unless you want to spend a thousand bucks on an elongated piece of metal. That doesn't mean you should buy the cheapest thing out there that will bend permanently at 315 pounds. A new quality barbell will set you back around $300, used ones obviously less. The internet is full of information on the best buys.

Platform

No floor can take continuous hits of hundreds of pounds. This is of utmost importance if we are talking about one's home. My recommendation is to arrange old tires on their sides single file and have a sheet of thick plywood on top. Heck, put some rubber mat on top of that and the floor is safe and sound. Size can also be adjusted to your needs. If you are one of the good guys who quietly lower their weights, you can get along with the rubber mat alone.

Power Rack

You can buy one or you can build one. Either way, it should be strong. Commercial racks can be expensive, but they are easy to adjust. A handy man will improvise and use 6-by-6 lumber or railroad tracks. Make sure there are hooks at proper heights for squats and bench presses.

A tip: cover the hooks with rubber to protect the knurling of the barbell. Gyms are full of bars that cannot be used for snatch anymore as the knurling at the ends has been honed off by metal hooks.

The top of the rack is an ideal place to fit a pull-up bar. The interior you can equip with safety pins. Those come in handy when bench pressing.

Bench

Unless you are into sewing leather, this is an item you should buy. Just don't get one with too thick a padding. Those are unstable to lift of. Consider whether you want an adjustable one to allow incline press or a regular flat one. Flat benches usually beat the adjustable ones in stability.

The Sky's The Limit

With simply this hardware you can do a lot. From here on it is completely up to you. I have seen people build leg presses, cable machines, heavy bags, stripper poles and everything in between. Also, strongman training goes hand-in-hand with garage gyms. If there is some space outside, like a parking lot, the next additions could be farmer's walk handles, easy-peasy to make with a little welding skills.

What about cardio? Running is boring and results in injury. Find an old truck tire and a sledgehammer and put your back into it, or make a jump rope out of metal wire and learn dancing.

African ingenuity

Things To Consider

- The room you have greatly dictate your options. If there is not enough space to safely move around with a barbell, you may want to reconsider the project. You don't want to break the ceiling with over-head presses or scratch the door of your car in a garage.
- Everything you build should be well fastened. If you mount a pull-up bar on the ceiling, find a heavy supporting beam or solid concrete and use it.
- In case you are building your gym in a basement for example, keep in mind the ventilation. In a garage you can simply open the door. If you live up north, that may not be an option. If the climate is very warm, on the other hand, consider air conditioning.
- Garage floors may incline slightly toward a drain. Note this if setting up a power rack.
- Also lighting, mirrors for checking out your body, a tap for water, if the gym is not at your home where to take a shower, what if the place is rental…

Pros And Cons

While by staying home you avoid the broscience, you also lose the valuable advice of other men. Gyms should, along with being sports facilities, serve as places to find other like-minded men to get to know and share masculine ideas with. Insofar as solitude can be precious when training, so can having a spotter. Naturally you can invite others to train with you, but then you may need more space and equipment.

Evidently, a project like this takes time, depending on how much you build yourself of course, and shouldn't be taken up unless one is going to enjoy the process itself. Money-wise, you can get a year's cheap gym membership with the price of a mere barbell. In the long run, you may break even or save some money. That should not be a ruling factor here though.

A huge upside is certainly the chance to avoid the problems of generic modern gyms. No more waiting to use the barbells. No more complaints about grunting and dropping weights. No more notifications on the wall banning the use of chalk. Simply put, you do what you want to. It is your gym and your responsibility.

It's Perfect For Kids

U mirin' brah?

Lets say you found your unicorn, married her and made children. Gyms are usually off-limits for kids and possibly, in the future, for teenagers too. While we wait for this great advice to be implemented, you wouldn't want to count on school gym classes either.

Football with the neighborhood kids is becoming increasingly rare, with electronic screens becoming the preferred pastime. A garage gym is the place for introducing your offspring to sports. Children's wrestling classes, for example, only allow so much. At home you control what they do, what they learn, and make sure they are safe and ready to take on real sports classes in a couple of years.

In Conclusion

When choosing a gym, try to avoid the big chains with the word "fitness" in their name. Meathead gyms are usually not found there. If you choose to train at home, understand that a home gym is more than a spider-looking Weider Home Gym machine. Building a place of your own is not a possibility for everyone. While it takes work, the results are rewarding and you get to exercise your natural manly instincts to invent and create. Lastly, there's no better place to take your kids to for their first workout.

The Feast Of The Ascension

Surrexit Dominus vere, alleluia!

Greetings to the men of ROK, as we enter the final stretch of Paschaltide. This week, we take a break from the series on philosophy, to look at the Feast of the Ascension (which takes place the day before this article posts) and its relation to the Pentecost cycle.

Christ, the Author of the Seasons and Center of the Church's Calendar

I was surprised to find some persons stating that Easter was a "pagan" holiday in my post about that. I'll say a word about Easter, Ascension and Pentecost here in that regard.

The Scriptures, the Tradition and the Liturgy of the Church all associate our Lord's Passion with the Jewish Passover, both as the fulfillment of the prophetic types of the Passover, and also as occurring on the eve of Passover in actual fact. The Church's method of calculating Easter corresponds closely to Passover (which came later this year because it is a "leap year" on the Jewish calendar, calling for an whole month to be added). Easter is always the Sunday following the first full moon after the Spring Equinox, as this corresponded to the Sunday after Passover in the year of His Passion and Resurrection. In fact, in most languages the word for it has always been Pascha, from

Hebrew pesach—“Passover.”

The Scriptures say that Jesus remained on earth for forty days (Acts 1:3), and then ascended, commanding His men to wait and pray for the promised Spirit to be sent to them, which the Scriptures tell us occurred at the completion of the Pentecost (Acts 2:1). This was the Greek word (meaning “fiftieth”) used by the Jews to refer to the feast of Shavuot, or “Weeks,” since it marked “A Week of Weeks” (i.e., seven weeks) from Passover, with the fiftieth day being the fulfillment of this period—also called “the counting of the Omer,” as per the Lord’s command in Leviticus 23: 15-16. In any case, now you know the correspondence of Easter, Paschaltide, Ascension and Pentecost to the exact events of the Bible.

The Feast of the Ascension is my favorite Feast, and is the dedication of my hermitage; our old webpage, “Idithun,” was a reference to the man by that name amongst King David’s choirmasters. The name was translated by St. Isidore of Seville as meaning “leaping up, or leaping over,” and was said to be suitable for the holy choirmaster because “by singing, he leapt over all those who keep their thoughts bent down low to the earth, thinking only of transitory things.”

As the psalms were always read as a prophetic book, full of prophesies and types of Jesus the Christ, this name was taken to be especially suitable to Him in reference to His Ascension. St. Notker’s Sequence takes up this theme, and marvelously explains the meaning of the feast. I give the Latin and English, underneath.

The music builds very deliberately in this sequence; it begins fairly monotonously, with the tones not straying far from the tonic. It begins to soar when it gets to the greatest of all ascents, the one made on this day by the Son of God. The sequence:

1. Summi triumphum Regis prosequamur laude.
2a. Qui cæli, qui terræ regit sceptra inferni jure domito.
2b. Qui sese pro nobis redimendis per magnum dedit precium.
3a. Huic nomen extat conveni’ens Idithum.
3b. Nam transilivit omnes strenue montes colliculosque Bethel,
4a. Saltum de cælo dedit in virginalem ventrem, inde in pelagus seculi.
4b. Postquam illud suo mitigavit potentatu, tetras Phlegethontis assiliit tenebras.
5a. Principis illius disturbato imperio.
5b. Maniplis plurimis inde erutis, mundum illustrat suo jubare.
6a. Captivitatemque detentam in ibi, victor duxit secum.
6b. Et redivivum jam suis se præbuit servis et amicis.
7a. Denique saltum dederat hodie maximum, nubes polosque cursu præpeti transiens.
7b. Celebret ergo populus hunc diem credulus cujus morbida, Idithum, corpora in semetipso altis sedibus cæli invexit Dei Filius.
8a. Et tremens, judicem expectat adfuturum, ut duo angeli fratres docuerunt,
8b. Qui Jesus a vobis assumptus est in cælum, iterum veniet, ut vidistis eum.
9a. Jam Idithum nostrum vocibus sedulis omnes imploremus,
9b. Ut a dextris Patris qui sedet, Spiritum mittat nobis sanctum,

10. In fine sæculi, ipse quocque semper sit nobiscum.

1. Let us enter upon the High King's triumph with praise,
2a. Who rules heaven and earth with His sceptre, hell's might being now destroyed.
2b. He gave Himself, o costly price!, for us, who needed redeeming.
3a. Thus, Idithun stands out as a fitting name for this Man,
3b. For mightily hath he leapt over all the mountains and hills of Bethel.
4a. From heaven, He leapt into the Virgin's womb; from thence, into the world's vast sea.
4b. After He calmed that by His power, He assailed the loathsome darkness of Phlegethon.
5a. With the prince thereof's empire overthrown,
5b. And many delivered thence from their shackles, He illumined the world by His rising, like the Dayspring.
6a. And indeed, there He bound captivity itself, and led it behind Him as a Conqueror.
6b. At last He showed Himself to His servants and friends, alive again.
7a. Next, on this day, He made the greatest leap of all, passing o'er the clouds and heaven's vaults with fleet-footed course!
7b. Therefore celebrate this day, believing populace, whose ailing flesh Idithun has, in His own Self, borne up to the lofty thrones of heaven, as God's own Son.
8a. And, trembling, expect Him again as Judge, as angels twain taught the brethren:
8b. "This Jesus who was taken from you to heaven shall come in like manner as ye have seen Him going."
9a. Now, with unceasing voices let us all implore our Idithun,
9b. That He Who sits at the Father's right hand would send us His Holy Spirit,
10. That till the end of the age He too may abide with us forever.

I am drawn to the Ascension, for the way it seems to recapitulate in itself all of Christ's dispensation, pointing backwards and forwards to everything. His departure from us, points back to His arrival amongst us at the Incarnation. There, God humbled and emptied Himself; now, He lifts us up with Him and promises to fill us with the Spirit. His departure also looks forward to the Parousia, when He comes again as Judge on Doomsday.

As His Apostles were with Him when He left, so shall they be when He returns for the Doom of man.

The Ascension also consummates the Paschal victory. Ancient conquerors used to return in triumph to their city with a train of captives and spoils; here the high King is returning to the heavenly citadel with His captives and spoils in train, the fruits of His war of conquest fought upon the Cross.

It also points forward to the Pentecost, and the descent of the Spirit. On account of the Incarnation and Redemption, man's nature is now able to share by grace in the divine nature, as St. Peter says in His second epistle (1:4). Thus, in ascending, He promises to send the faithful the Spirit of Adoption, by which they call "abba, father." His departure is thus a bittersweet moment, in which the frequent liturgical cry of Paschaltide—"Abide with us yet a while longer, Lord; for the day is now long spent, and eventide draws nigh"—becomes poignant, describing the current age of the world, which is now begun: the age of the Church, in which our Lord's presence continues under the Sacramental veil, but His Person has ascended up from us. What joy, to see the God-man ascending over all; what sorrow, to see the Lord depart!

Yet in going, He promises to be with us through the activity of this same, promised Spirit, by Whom the Church is continually born and renewed, and the Sacraments are wrought, keeping Christ with us. And the Spirit indeed continues to deepen the knowledge of the Church, leading Her into all truth, though with no change in the substance of what she knew before. Thus, our Lord spoke truly when He said it was better for us if He departed, for know, in the Church formed and illumined by His Spirit, we can know Him better than we otherwise could have.

The nine-day period between Ascension and the Feast of Pentecost, in which the Apostles and faithful waited and prayed for the Spirit, became the basis of the devotional practice of "novenas"—nine days of prayer with a specific goal in mind. The men of ROK may wish to observe a traditional Novena to the Holy Ghost from this Friday to next Saturday.

In the link just given, one finds prayers to be said every day on the right; click the days of the Novena for a prayer proper to each day, in addition to a brief description of each gift of the Holy Ghost, for those who do not understand them, yet. Those who find the English verses of poetry corny, may prefer to simply recite the original Latin verses, or another translation.

Next week we will speak of Pentecost and its significance, and prepare to take leave of this most sacred season. For now, I close with some of the Roman Breviary's lessons (taken from Pope St. Leo the Great) for the Feast.

> After the blessed and glorious Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ, wherein the Divine Power raised up in three days the true Temple of God Which the iniquity of the Jews had destroyed John ii. 19, God was pleased to ordain, by His Most Sacred Will, and in His Providence for our instruction and the profit of our souls, a season of forty days—which season, dearly beloved brethren, doth end on this day. During that season the bodily Presence of the Lord still lingered on earth, that the reality of the fact of His having risen again from the dead might be armed with all needful proofs. The death of Christ had troubled the hearts of many of His disciples their thoughts were sad when they remembered His agony upon the Cross, His giving up of the Ghost, and the laying in the grave of His lifeless Body, and a sort of hesitation had begun to weigh on them.
> Hence the most blessed Apostles and all the disciples, who had been fearful at the finishing on the Cross, and doubtful of the trustworthiness of the rising again, were so strengthened by the clear demonstration of the fact, that, when they saw the Lord going up into the height of heaven, they sorrowed not, many there were even filled with great joy and, in all verity, it was a great and unspeakable cause for joy to see Manhood, in the presence of that multitude of believers, exalted above all creatures even heavenly, rising above the ranks of the angelic armies and speeding Its glorious way where the most noble of the Archangels lie far behind, to rest no lower than that place where, high above all principality and power, It taketh Its seat at the right hand of the Eternal Father, Sharer of His throne, and Partaker of His glory, and still of the very human nature which the Son hath taken upon Himself. Now do Thou, o Lord, have mercy upon us. Thanks be to God!

How Donald Trump Vanquished His Enemies And Conquered The Republican Party

With Donald Trump's crushing victory in the Indiana primary this week—scoring a solid majority of the vote and winning all of the state's delegates—he is now the undisputed Republican nominee for president. With Ted Cruz ending his campaign following his loss and acid casualty John Kasich suspending his the following day, the stage is set for Trump and his supporters to take over the GOP and take back the White House.

It wasn't supposed to end like this. Indiana had long been viewed as a pro-Cruz state due to its agrarian nature, evangelical population, and lack of diversity. After losing six primaries in a row to the Donald—indeed, finishing behind Kasich in all but one of them—Lyin' Ted needed a win in Indiana to lend credibility to his campaign and stop Trump from getting the majority of delegates he needed to win the nomination on the first ballot.

Alas, it was not to be. Any goodwill Cruz had built up among voters was completely exhausted by the time the Hoosier State voted. Cruz's backroom backstabbing in Colorado and Wyoming—garnering delegates in states where the voters didn't get a say—along with his botched collusion pact with Kasich and his inexplicable decision to name Creepy Carly Fiorina as his running mate caused his poll numbers to collapse. With both his opponents out of the way, Trump is now free to take on Hillary Clinton from now until the general election in November.

A Tale Of Two Rallies

I got a firsthand view of the massive gulf between Trump's and Cruz's popularity among Hoosiers when I attended a rally by each candidate held in the same room of the same building: the Century Center in South Bend. (I also attended a Bernie Sanders rally in between that was also held at the Century Center.) Cruz held his rally a week ago, and despite the South Bend region supposedly being favorable to him (Michiana, the home of Notre Dame, has a highly-educated population), only about 500-600 people showed up, filling maybe a sixth of the room:

To make matters worse, Cruz had decided to completely rip off Trump's campaign style and policy positions. Not only did we begin the rally with a prayer and by reciting the Pledge of Allegiance (something Trump has done at his rallies since the Iowa caucuses), when he was speaking, Lyin' Ted declared he would fight to keep American companies from outsourcing manufacturing jobs, an issue Trump has built his campaign on. Cruz even name-dropped Carrier as one of the companies on his shit-list despite the fact that the Donald has been lambasting them for months:

In contrast, Trump's South Bend rally on Monday was a full house, with 3,000-4,000 people crammed into the room and another 4,000 in overflow rooms. The content of Trump's speeches had also changed from when I'd last seen him in New York. In both that speech and another rally I'd attended in Indianapolis the week before, the Donald relaxed his attacks on Lyin' Ted and focused on the fact that he was the presumptive nominee:

Demolishing Cruz took a while—compared to his attacks on Jeb Bush or Marco Rubio—but Trump eventually made Lyin' Ted crack. The Indiana campaign was a nonstop series of disasters for Cruz, from his pact with Kasich falling apart mere hours after it was announced to his running mate announcement backfiring (selecting Fiorina caused his poll numbers to decline even further). When Cruz flipped out the morning of the election and called Trump a "bully" and a "pathological liar," it was because he knew the end was near.

Chicago '68, Philly '16

Bernie Sanders' unexpected triumph in the Indiana Democratic primary—he had been trailing Hillary Clinton by a significant margin in the polls—also works to Trump's advantage. While Clinton still leads in the delegate count, Sanders has enough support to fight to the end of the primaries and he's signaled that he will continue his campaign all the way to the Democratic convention in Philadelphia in July.

As my own experiences at Sanders' events show, his supporters despise Hillary, viewing her as a hopelessly corrupt, warmongering crypto-Republican. There will be no reconciliation between the Hillary and Sanders camps, setting the scene for a nasty fight at the convention. Hillary will likely get the nomination due to her support from the party's donor class, which will lead a significant number of Sanders voters to either stay home or support Trump (and in fact, Trump has been making overtures to Sanders' supporters for a month now).

It's the perfect situation for Trump: not only has he vanquished his opponents in the GOP, his likely Democratic opponent will have to spend the next two months fending off attacks from her own party, softening her up for the general election. While there are no guarantees, at this stage, you wouldn't go wrong betting on a Trump victory in November.

Did Divorced Women Create A Generation Of Abused Children?

May 7, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Today, divorce rates are at an all time high. With the advent of no-fault divorce in the 1970s, more and more marriages destabilized, leaving millions of children to fend for themselves in broken homes. A fact that is still not well-known is that approximately 70% of divorces are initiated by women. This article focuses on how these women have created a generation of children who have been abused, and how this may help explain the rise of recent SJW-style leftism.

The Effect Of Divorce On Number Of Children Murdered

Figure 4.9. The risk of being killed by a stepparent versus a natural parent in relation to the child's age. Canada 1974–1983.

In the United States, the divorce rate has hovered between 40-50% over the last several decades. For historical comparison, divorce rates went from less than 3% to almost 7% from the late 1800s to the late 1960s.

Divorce was practically unheard of before the 1970s, and divorcees were shunned and treated like pariahs. Social shaming helped to keep families intact and children living with their birth fathers.

Yet the rise of no-fault divorce, in which the ending of a marriage does not require a showing of wrongdoing or reason by either party, completely changed the landscape for families. One unintended consequence is the manner in which children have been raised. Several studies have investigated the outcomes for children raised in various environments and unearthed disheartening realities.

One direct effect of divorce are the rising numbers of children who have been physically, sexually, or emotionally abused by adults. All types of child abuse have skyrocketed since 1980. For children, the odds of being murdered by a stepparent or their mother's boyfriend is anywhere from 100 to 700 times greater than being murdered by their birth father.

If we extrapolate this data over multiple decades, it is possible that women, who initiate the overwhelming majority of divorces, have caused the deaths of many thousands of children. Women's desire to be free from their marriage in order to remarry a man who has no blood relation to their children has led to enough corpses to fill several cemeteries.

Birth Families Versus Alternate Family Structures

She's ready for round 2 on the cock carousel.

In another study, researchers found that compared to children living with married biological parents, the children living with a single parent who had a live-in partner were at least eight times more likely to be maltreated in some way. Moreover, they were 10 times more likely to experience abuse and eight times more likely to experience neglect.

In other words, women are inviting strange men into their homes to allow them to terrorize their children. It is also likely that the type of men women are often attracted to are also the type of men likely to show aggression or be violent, even toward small children.

For women who do not have a live in partner, they often bring strange men into their homes not knowing what the man is capable of. In fact, a woman's innate desire for thrill and danger puts her children's safety at risk, merely so she can feel the excitement of having a criminal's penis inside of her.

Furthermore, men who are not biologically related to a woman's children do not feel a connection to them. This can be easily understood through an evolutionary lens. While appealing to evolution does not make an act right or moral, it can help cast light on why, for example, a male lion that takes over a pride kills the cubs of the previous leader before mating with the lionesses.

This is known as the "Cinderella effect" in evolutionary psychology. Stepparents who are not biologically related to children are more likely to either mistreat them, abuse them, or neglect them in such a way that leads to their death. One interesting study found that stepparents are less likely to buckle their stepchildren with a seatbelt before driving.

How Divorce Affects Children

In a study in England, researchers compiled data on intact families in which children live with birth parents compared to other family configurations. Here is what they found:

- The safest environment for a child—that is, the family environment with the lowest risk ratio for physical abuse—is one in which the biological parents are married and the family has always been intact.
- The rate of abuse is six times higher in the second-safest environment: the blended family in which the divorced mother has remarried.

- The rate of abuse is 14 times higher if the child is living with a biological mother who lives alone.
- The rate of abuse is 20 times higher if the child is living with a biological father who lives alone.
- The rate of abuse is 20 times higher if the child is living with biological parents who are not married but are cohabiting.
- The rate of abuse is 33 times higher if the child is living with a mother who is cohabiting with another man.

As we can see, the destabilization of families has caused a generation of people who have not been raised in intact families, and many have been victims of abuse. The choice of women to initiate divorce immediately multiplies the statistical odds of her children being harmed or killed. Yet women continue to file for divorce at astronomical rates, not out of malice or ill-intent, but simply because they require the guidance of men in order to maintain societal order.

Are Social Justice Warriors Victims Of Child Abuse?

This new phenomenon helps to explain SJW-leftism. These individuals did not grow up in a traditional home environment with a mother and birth father. They did not receive proper care and attention as children, and a sizable percentage of them were fondled by the multiple boyfriends of their mothers or observed as their mothers brought a new boyfriend into their home every week.

The alternative life choices of their mothers has caused a rift in the psyche of SJWs and damaged their ability to function sexually. The next time you see a protestor screaming about the patriarchy, you can rest assured that their mother made choices guided by her desire for bad-boy cock, rather than the love of her children.

Are There Legitimate Reasons To Be Fat?

Anybody that has been involved in physical fitness for a substantial length of time has undoubtedly been confronted with militant fatties yelling at them (the vast majority of whom, I should point out, appear to be women). Indeed, the mere existence of your fitness is a grave affront to the lives and well-being of these particular people. To justify their own obesity, they will claim that they are "literally incapable" of getting in shape or losing weight, referring to a number of medical conditions that they have, or allege to have, that keeps them from losing weight. But is there any truth to this?

Being that I like to consider myself a nice person, I'll give these claims a fair shake: Here are a few commonly claimed medical reasons for obesity, and the legitimacy of these claims for the average…heavier than average person.

1. Hypothyroidism

Hypothyroidism is an endocrine disease in which the thyroid gland does not produce enough thyroid hormone, which is predominantly necessary for regulation of body metabolism for various nutrients. It stems from a lack of iodine in the diet.

And here, indeed, is a possibly legitimate reason for uncontrolled weight gain—a low metabolism will lead to a lack of calories utilized, which will cause adipose cells to retain more fat. With that being said…

Hypothyroidism has other symptoms beyond weight gain in adult patients, such as: Poor ability to regulate body temperature, low energy, constipation, and depression, as well as an enlarged thyroid gland known as a goiter (for your sake and mine, I won't include pictures).

The point I'm trying to make is, it seems unlikely to me that a case of hypothyroidism would ONLY cause weight gain without the other symptoms. And while fat women often seem emotionally unstable—seemingly giving credence to the depression symptom—there's probably a variety of other reasons for that.

Even if a case of hypothyroidism had just the one symptom, statistics show that iodine supplementation has caused rates of hypothyroidism to decrease through the world. In the United States, less than 5% of the population aged 12 and over has hypothyroidism. So while it is possible that the vengeful fatty in your life has this disorder…it's not likely.

2. Diabetes

Diabetes is a family of disorders characterized by high blood sugar levels, and the inability of the body to process this. There are two types of diabetes: Type 1 is characterized by the inability of the pancreas to create insulin (a hormone that promotes the absorption of glucose from the bloodstream and into the skeletal muscles), and Type 2 is characterized by the cells being incapable of absorbing the insulin that is produced.

Diabetes is indeed an ailment associated with weight, but unfortunately for those using it to justify their weight gain, type 1 diabetes is actually associated with weight loss, as well as blurry vision, fatigue, and eventual organ failure and potential death.

And type 2 diabetes is a consequence of obesity and lack of exercise, not a cause of these two things. Simply put, if you are overweight, not getting enough exercise, and eating a bad diet, you are more likely to get Type 2 diabetes. There are also certain populations and ethnicities that are more likely to get it, suggesting a genetic component, but this does not negate the individual human factor of this illlness.

3. Stress

The area surrounding the human kidney contains a gland you might have heard of: the adrenal gland. This is another endocrine gland that provides hormones for internal use in the human body. The actual adrenaline hormone is produced by the adrenal medulla, the inner portion of the gland. The adrenal cortex—the outer portion—secretes a variety of steroid hormones, including the one that is of importance to this discussion: cortisol.

Cortisol is a steroid hormone that is released in response to stress. It suppresses normal immune and metabolic function to free up bodily resources for a “fight or flight” response. While it is very useful for short bursts of fear or violence (this is where the archetypical “turning white with fear” comes from—blood rushes away from the face and into the muscles so you can run away from danger faster), long term stress and thus long-term cortisol exposure has been associated with numerous deleterious health effects such as increased susceptibility to illness, stomach ulcers, difficulty sleeping, cardiac arrhythmia, and yes, weight gain.

Stress brought on by external circumstances can indeed cause weight gain and fat retention. With that being said, I have to ask: Is your life truly that stressful? Isn’t the whole concept of fat acceptance the absolute epitome of “First World Problems,” which is to say, not actually worthy of being called stressful?

In other words, while fat acceptance people may be fat, and they may be under stress, perhaps they’re overreacting over comparatively minor problems. And there are numerous ways to actively deal with stress. Physical exercise does it for me most times, and that is an enormous hint that I am dropping for the benefit of the amply sized. If exercise isn’t your thing, try meditation or talking to somebody about your problems.

The point I’m trying to make is, stress is a factor in weight gain, but it’s not some sort of mysterious miasma that just comes upon you and forces you to gain weight. It is a negative, but manageable, facet of life.

4. Genetic predisposition

And when all else fails, these people will just claim that their genetics give them a predisposition to weight gain. And again, there is some truth to this: Some individuals are endomorphic and naturally more likely to be large, as are certain races and ethnicities.

But, much like the stress issue discussed above, this is a bump in the road that can be overcome. While I share the belief of any red-pilled person that human existence is not entirely an issue of nurture, a genetic predisposition to weight gain should not force you to give up even trying. And that's not even getting into how ironic it is that a facet of Social Justice Warriordom, which fat acceptance undoubtedly is, is utilizing an argument based on human genetics, a field that they ruthlessly suppress when it can't be used to argue for them. Which is to say, most times.

Also, this argument fails to stand up to statistical scrutiny: In the United States, 65% of people are overweight or obese. Is it likely that an overwhelming majority of people in a nation are "genetically predisposed" to being overweight? Either the United States' 300 million people all can be traced back to a small "Founder's Effect" population that had a predisposition for obesity (not likely, considering the massive amounts of immigration the US had from 1830-1880, and 1965-present), or this excuse is full of crap. I think for most people, it's the latter.

So in conclusion, there are indeed legitimate reasons that can cause people to be overweight against their will. The ones I analyzed here are just a few of them. But the likelihood of every fat person having one of those reasons is astronomically low. If you're overweight, it's more likely that you don't have these issues, and proper diet and exercise can help you more than any excuse.

Sweden’s Hopeless Impotence Shows That Nations Need Hardship To Remain Strong

Why is your people so nationalistic while my Swedish countrymen are not? I asked my Eastern European friend this question recently, and he quickly came up with an answer. “We are proud of our country. We’ve been through hard times, and it has brought us together.” He was mainly referring to the Second World War and the following decades under the rule of Communist tyrants. I understood right away what that meant for the Swedes, who haven’t been at war for the last 200 years.

In the Swedish NATO debate, those who are opposed to us joining the organization often claim that it has “served us well” to stay out of military alliances. Their theory is that we’ve stayed out of armed conflicts for so long because we stand alone, not taking sides. They say this as if it’s a given that wars are bad for a country. As if fighting is always something to be avoided. But I wonder if that’s really true.

Refugees are welcome where nationalism isn’t Normal Swedes (not the most extremist Marxists) rarely say that Sweden is a bad country. Yet they are more careless than almost every other nation in preserving the good things they have, like (relative) freedom and high living standards. It's frowned upon to say that you care about Sweden and its future, but you should be damned if you don't care about other people.

Hundreds of thousands of migrants come here to seek asylum, and it's no wonder because we give them all they want, and when they complain we feel ashamed that we didn't give them more. There are no migrants crossing the border to my Slavic friend's home country. They know they're not getting anything there.

So why would I think that wars, fighting and hardship could be good for a nation? I think so because it brings the people together. It gives them a reason to work together for a common cause, and if they succeed they have a reason to be proud of themselves. Importantly, they know what it's like to lose what they have, and they'll make sure it doesn't happen again.

Swedes haven't fought for anything in centuries. They don't know what it's like to lose everything, and then having to build a new society from scratch. Because they didn't create their wealth, and were rather handed it from birth, they can't see the real value of it, the work that it took to amass it. Furthermore, they feel ashamed that they have so much, while others have so little. It's understandable; how could they take pride in something they didn't create? And therefore they don't see why they shouldn't just give it away.

The Holocaust sent Germany and Israel in different directions

Germany is another interesting case to examine. The Germans have wealth, freedom, and are highly influential in international politics. If that's not enough to make them proud, their experience of wars and hardships in the 20th century should have done a lot to tighten their bonds to each other. Yet that doesn't seem to be the case at all. Like Sweden, they take in massive amounts of "refugees," and nationalist sentiments are kept down.

The reason for that is guilt. The wars and hardships they went through don't bring them together today, because they feel like they caused them. They're the bad guys in their own history, so now they have to make up for it by giving away everything they built. Nationalism has become tightly linked with Nazism—a German who's proud to be German is looked upon with great suspicion.

Now, while on the subject of Nazism, let's contrast the two cuck countries and future caliphates Sweden and Germany with Israel. Like the Germans, the Jews have a history of war and struggles. But there are differences in both the scale and character of those struggles. Jews have been persecuted for thousands of years. Their collective memory consists of traumatic events like the Babylonian captivity, pogroms and, of course, the Holocaust. Unlike the Germans, they're the victims in their own historical narrative. But by creating a nation of their own, they can now fight back. Since Israel was founded it has also been in constant conflict with the Arab states surrounding it.

No one can shame an Israeli for being nationalist. As Matt Forney wrote in his article about why Israel is such a success: "Israel was explicitly founded as a homeland for the Jewish people and its government has worked to ensure that it remains one." Their leadership, with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu currently at the top, are unabashedly nationalist. Both men and women proudly fight to keep their country safe, and unlike the Germans and Swedes, they see no reason to share it.

Trying times make both nations and men better

The example of Israel and the Jews shows how hardship can split a people apart and turn them into a diaspora. It also shows how, in the long run, it can bring those people together tightly and force them to put their interests and safety before anyone else's. Meanwhile, the case of Germany reveals how fighting and surviving difficult times is not enough to make people proud of their own group. There must be a sense of us having been done wrong by them. The history books should read "they hit us and we hit back," not the other way around.

So what I'm getting to is that Sweden could use a little war. Sure, some of us will die in that war, but that might be necessary if we want to prevent us all from perishing. How long can the Swedish people last if we bit by bit give away our homeland to other peoples? It seems like only a matter of time before our country becomes their country, and we will be the ones who have to assimilate to their culture. Since we likely won't fight to preserve the society that we so willingly give away today, we'll go out not with a bang but a whimper.

Lastly, I think fighting and war have a healthy effect on men as well. How can a man take pride in himself if he never fought and won? How can he cherish his own life if he never risked losing it? How will he find the motivation to protect his property and wealth, if he didn't create it himself? Men who never fought will not last long against men who have.

6 Reasons To Never Be Friends With Girls

For about a century or more, a systematic androgynization has been taking place in our societies. And one of the major consequences of this transformation is the emergence of friendship between men and women—something that had been quite alien throughout human history. It's sickening to see so many men today who readily befriend females due to lack of masculine order, groveling and supplicating to feed the already bloated egos of Western women. It's clear that many men continue to befriend females as a way of receiving whatever little validation they can as a substitute for their lack of love and sex.

If you are one of those men, here are six reasons to reconsider the friendship you have with your special gal.

1. You don't have your motives straightened out

Being “friends” with girls is a pathetic tactic losers use to lure a chick they have a crush on. The idea is that by being around her for a long enough time and being the “nice guy” who is there for her, she will eventually come to see what a great person he is and reward him with love. This is an extremely ineffective method of attracting a woman that almost always end up with a major heartbreak.

Speaking of which, you need to be clear about your intentions. The sad truth is that most men who befriend women are unaware of their own attraction towards their female friend, and even when they are aware of it, they mistakenly believe that their counterparts feel the same way about them (which they don’t).

So, ask yourself: are you trying to have sex with her or be her pal? The losers may believe that the first step towards forming a romantic relationship with a girl is to be friends with her, but it’s actually sex first. If your female “friend” isn’t about to have sex with you after having known you for a month or more (many men would give even less time), the chances are, she never will and she’s not interested in you.

But maybe I’m being too pessimistic. I’m sure there is still a small chance that your dream girl will eventually fall for you when she turns 34 after being penetrated with mouthful of penises, and is riddled with wrinkles and cellulite—plus sagging breasts to top it all. Maybe then she will be ready to fall in love with how good of a toady provider you are.

2. You’re practicing being friendzoned

Even if you genuinely don't have any romantic or sexual interest in your female friend, all you're doing is practicing going in the friendzone for another girl you might be interested in. By being friends with multiple girls for a long enough time, the way you interact with females in general will gradually transform. You will start to act like one of the girls and become infected with supplicating and boyish behaviour that will ruin your masculine frame. It doesn't always happen and you might be the exception, but it certainly is true for the majority of today's hapless males who have no idea what they're doing to themselves.

3. They're unreliable

Women have never failed to disappoint me with their unreliability. If you think lying, flaking, and broken promises are limited to dating, you are horribly mistaken. You have to understand that honor is a foreign concept to women (I've actually had two women on two different occasions express disgust when I used that word).

I can't count how many times I've been lied to and stabbed in the back for placing my trust on a female who twisted her words and smiled at me to manipulate me. And like a sucker, I kept believing that not all women were like that and went on to trust the next one who would dupe me the same way. Rinse and repeat.

Simply put, women are worse than worthless as friends; they will actually harm you through their lies and betrayal.

4. You're being a friend-slut

Would you respect a woman who spreads her legs open for any and every man she meets? No, of course not. You might take advantage of the sex she gives out, but you would never consider her a worthwhile companion for the simple fact that she is a slut. As obvious as it may seem, many female-befriending simps can't seem to grasp the same concept when applied to themselves. If you readily befriend every women you meet and offer services to them without getting anything in return, you're being a friend-slut.

And as it was with the example of the female slut who offers sex to everyone, women will simply take advantage of all the thankless services the loser friend-slut has to offer without giving anything in return. They might respond with their typical "Awww thanks! :)" to keep you attached, but deep inside, they will have zero respect you. In fact, they're crossing their fingers in hopes that you don't have a crush on them.

5. You're being used as an object

It’s no secret that women view men as mere objects to be exploited for their own benefit. By being a friend to a woman, you’re simply making it easier for her to take advantage of you. And as a utility, you are to remain loyal and dependable to serve her fickle needs while she goes out at night to have sex with undependable and disloyal bad boys.

As a good boy, you must make sure she’s physically comfortable at all times, listen to all her petty problems by being her emotional tampon, and allow her to walk all over you like a servant would with his master. And if you fail to provide the value she seeks, she is more than willing to throw you out like a used toilet paper. Years of friendship don’t mean anything to females who simply see you as a tool.

6. You’re feminizing yourself

Even if you manage to find a unicorn that you're not sexually or romantically attracted to, is a reliable person, and doesn't exploit you, why would you bother? What value can a woman possibly bring to you as a friend? Do you actually believe that friendship between men and women should be normalized?

Like a wine that gets mixed with water, the more you spend time mingling with females as their buddies, the more diluted your masculinity becomes. The feminization of men is a true phenomenon and I have no doubt in my mind that inter-sex mingling is both reinforcing and augmenting the problem. I've personally witnessed many pathetic men who've spent far too much time with girls and have adopted their feminine speech and behaviour. I probably would've mistaken them for homosexuals if I didn't know them any better.

The Alternative

Friendship with females is an aberration and must be shunned by masculine men of today who are cognizant of the realities of modern sex relationship. And as an alternative, I propose a basic system where you limit your interactions with a given woman to a single category without muddling the lines between them. The categories are:

1.Women who you are already in an intimate relationship with.

2. Women who you want to pursue a romantic or sexual relationship with.

3. Women who you must communicate with out of necessity, whether it be co-workers or the cashier at a grocery store.

4. Optional: Dependable and trustworthy women who are able to provide equal or greater value than what you offer her, or has a special value you can't get from anyone else. A woman of this caliber is rare, and even if you find one, you must tread carefully. I got scalped by at least two women whom I thought deserved to be in this category only to have them talk shit behind my back and throw me under the bus later on. Right now, I only have couple of foreign women in this category. And even then, they're closer to an acquaintance than a real friend. I personally will never trust another Western woman again.

I used to feel guilty about being so calculating about my relationships and the ROI I get from women, but then I realized that women do the exact same thing with all the men they interact with.

Get male friends, they're better.

But above all, beyond the debate of whether you should be friends with women or not, the most important thing is to develop friendship with men instead. Yes, the majority of Western men are almost or just as bad as the female counterparts in many cases, but it is your job to find the right ones. Overall, men are more supportive and forgiving, men possess honor and loyalty, and they will hold you up to a standard of masculinity that you cannot deny.

There are many decent people out there for you to be friends with. Just don't try to make females one of them for all the wrong reasons.

Feminist Senator Demands End To Filmed Rape Scenes—But Dogs Eating Babies Is Okay

After the Sansa Stark rape scene in Season 5 of Game of Thrones, über-feminist Senator Claire McCaskill and other feminist head honchos went into overdrive and lambasted the show's producers for featuring the off-camera act. Now, in only the second episode of Season 6, a baby has been mauled to death by his brother's hunting dogs. Moreover, the brother deliberately let the hounds eat his stepmother and the infant. What was McCaskill's response? Absolutely nothing.

If ever we needed a single piece of evidence about the brain-dead and narcissistic selectivity of feminist media complaints, here we have it. McCaskill sought every microphone and media outlet she could find when she promised to boycott Game of Thrones after Sansa's rape. Mind you, the threat came into 46 episodes into the series, after nearly two days' worth of graphic television footage.

All of it has been replete with blood, guts, penis-severing, people being skinned alive and immolated, and other niceties. Unsurprisingly, when tiny girl Shireen Baratheon was burned alive a few episodes after Ramsay Bolton violated Sansa, McCaskill did not rear her geriatric head to complain. This is despite her having every interest in keeping abreast of the show's developments, just so she could complain about sexual assault again.

Ramsay Bolton is about to take his baby brother and stepmother to the kennels, where they will be ripped in half by giant-sized dogs.

To be blunt, feminists believe that nothing, whether it be run-of-the-mill murder, the bloody butchering of children, or gratuitous torture, comes anywhere close to the victimhood associated with rape. Even the mere sight of a nude woman on television is equated with "rape culture," all while other unbelievably cruel acts, like countless ones on Game of Thrones, are ignored. The worst part of all is that Game of Thrones' pussy-whipped producers, David Benioff and D. B. Weiss, caved in to all the feminist shrieking. Far from only promising to not have future rape scenes, they changed already written scripts to accommodate the SJWs.

Where did everything go so wrong? When did the fictional but painful murder of an infant matter one thousand times less than a pretend rape?

Enter the very cucked Alfie Allen

Alfie Allen, celebrity cuck, pictured with a member of the gender that owns him.

One could expect that singer Lily Allen's brother would be a little ball-less, yet the actor playing Theon Greyjoy went above and beyond in supporting the tripe spouted by Claire McCaskill and others. His own character had had his penis cut off but, no, the worst moment of his time working on the show was the Sansa Stark rape scene!

Continuing the plain sad trend of male actors doing everything they can to be utterly obsequious towards feminism, Alfie Allen waxed lyrical about actress Sophie Turner's "bravery" in filming the made-up sexual assault. He gave no such praise for Pedro Pascal sucking it up and acting out his character Oberyn Martell having his eyes gouged out and head crushed. We should not keep any hope that Allen comes out with half-tears about the violent death of Ramsay Bolton's baby brother.

Combined with the pathetic surrender of the producers, Allen's sycophancy illustrates that sexual assault is the only truly no-go zone in modern television and film. Only obvious exceptions like Law and Order: SVU, which support the claimed existence of "rape culture," are allowed. Even if we dispense with the argument of permitting very wide creative expression, a refusal to feature rape scenes can only be justified if equally or more repulsive acts are also quarantined from television shows and films. For Allen's position to make any sense, he should be speaking out more stridently still on the fate that befell Theon Greyjoy. At least Sansa Stark so far has her entire body together.

At best, Allen, Benioff, Weiss, and Claire McCaskill have given a massive middle finger to most real-life victims of serious violence. If you take what they say at face value, only those who have been through sexual assault can ever be "triggered" and "traumatised" by what happens on television or in film. Had your skull smashed or fractured during an unprovoked attack and then see the same thing happen on Game of Thrones? Grow up, princess, it's just a show! Gone through the murder of a family member? Get over it, son, it's fiction! These are the patronizing messages SJWs and their celebrity slaves are making abundantly clear.

You should feel no shame whatsoever in buying quality films and watching television shows that have rape scenes

Either get pissed off at everything violent or shut the hell up.

If the acting, story and visuals are good, purchase or view any movie or series you wish, either ones with rape or without it. In fact, you should arguably buy items from the first category more eagerly than from the latter one, just as you might buy books and other material because the creator stands for free speech. Films and television series should be consistent in showing or not showing certain forms of violence. The alternative is bizarrely cordoning off certain pet topics of feminists and others from being portrayed onscreen.

Provided you are paying for a quality violent film or television show, or at least recommending it to your friends, you are promoting free and reasonable artistic expression. Until such time as society has a common sense approach to acceptable versus unacceptable violence, we must actively support realism in acted-out stories, most of all in narratives that parallel history itself. Game of Thrones is nothing but a loose representation of medieval society, remember.

In the meantime, Claire McCaskill should get off her high horse. She is both too fat for the horse and undeserving of any platform for spitting out her putrid brand of politics.

The Revealing Autobiography Of Jean-Jacques Rousseau

Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-1778) is by any reasonable measure one of the most influential figures in modern philosophy. His radical ideas profoundly influenced literature, education, philosophy, religion, public morals, art, manners, and politics in the eighteenth century and far beyond.

To summarize rudely the main outlines of his thought, we can say that he celebrated feeling, emotion, sentiment, subjectivism, imagination, mysticism, nature, and romanticism. He practically founded the Romantic movement, inspired the French Revolution, and influenced many great writers, among them Goethe, Byron, Wordsworth, and Tolstoi.

His influence was due to the cyclical nature of ideas in history. Before him, for many generations, European philosophy had been lecturing everyone about rationalism and reason. Human emotions and affairs, implied Spinoza, Descartes, and Hobbes, could be reduced to geometric and mathematical categories. And this analogy had its uses.

But eventually we become tired of being reduced to mathematical abstractions.

We long to spread our Romantic wings, to celebrate our individualism, to exalt the irrational over the rational, and to go where our imaginations take us, unfettered by the constricting bonds of reason. It is only natural to want to plunge into that primeval forest of the mind, and explore its darker regions. Rousseau knew this, too, and provided a voice for the age.

Rousseau is not a favorite of mine, I have to say. With the perspective of time, we can see more clearly now how his ideas easily lent themselves to excess and frivolous abuse. Our modern age now rebels against his excesses, just as he rebelled against the excesses of what preceded him. But it is important to read things that we do not agree with.

It was for this reason that I took up his autobiography, the Confessions. There is no better way to get the measure of a man than to read him in his own words. And the Confessions do not disappoint: they are a sincere, revealing portrait of a brilliant but deeply flawed man. What comes through is the author's sensitivity, sincerity, anger, and—it must be said—his paranoia.

At the beginning he states his purpose:

> My purpose is to display to my kind a portrait in every way true to nature, and the man I shall portray will be myself…I have displayed myself as I was, as vile and despicable when my behavior was such, as good, generous, and noble when I was so. I have bared my secret soul as you yourself has seen it, Eternal Being! So let the numberless legion of my fellow men gather round me, and hear my confessions.

Who can resist this kind of soul-bearing honesty? From this point forward, Rousseau launches on a series of perceptive observations about himself and humanity, all of it backed up by practical experience. Here he relates an experience that ignited his passionate sense of honor and justice:

> The course of my education was interrupted by an accident, the consequences of which have influenced the rest of my life. My father quarreled with M. Gautier, a French captain with relations on the [local political] Council. This Gautier was a braggart and a coward who, happening to bleed at the nose, revenged himself by accusing my father of having drawn his sword against him in the city. When they decided to put my father in prison, however, he insisted that, according to the law, his accuser should be arrested also; and when he failed to get his way he preferred to leave Geneva and remain abroad for the rest of his life rather than lose both liberty and honor by giving in.

Rousseau was acutely sensitive to women and their charms. But he was also supremely aware of their psychological workings. This passage, describing the unpleasant consequences of his withholding affection from a woman, clearly demonstrates this knowledge:

> That privation which I had imposed on myself and which she had pretended to approve is one of those things that women do not pardon, whatever show they make of doing so; not so much on account of the resulting privation to themselves, but because it seems to imply a certain indifference to their favors.
> Take the most sensible, the most philosophical, the least sensual of women: the most unpardonable crime that a man in whom she is not otherwise interested can commit is that of not possessing her when he has the chance of doing so. This rule can admit of no exception…

All in all, the Confessions are a powerful testament. His honesty is so apparent that it can be disconcerting; he frankly admits that his memory may be hazy, and that much of what he believes to be true may only be retrospective self-delusion. He never made much progress in formal education. Perhaps this fact contributed, in some way, to his rootless tendencies, his lack of discipline and moderation, and to his elevation of emotion over reason. Education is not just for the purpose of learning information; it is also meant to temper and harness the unwieldy soul of zealous youth.

The book provides a window into the soul of one of the most complicated and strange figures of modern philosophy. The record is not perfect, of course; the book's second part is marred by tasteless criticisms of his contemporaries, and imagined conspiracies against his own character.

But this sort of thing comes with the territory. We cannot expect geniuses to be paragons of stability. Rousseau retains his place in the history of western thought precisely because of his anti-rationality.

Introducing Kings Wiki, A Wikipedia For Us

May 9, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

With the help from MediaWiki expert Raymond Kertezc, I have launched Kings Wikis, a wiki centered around the themes of masculinity and nationalism. After a one-month beta run, we are now ready for a wider launch with over 300 articles already published. Here are the most developed articles we currently have:

- Neomasculinity
- Female Body Types
- R/K Selection Theory
- #NoHymenNoDiamond
- Cockblocking
- Female hair length
- Dark triad
- Secret Internet Fatty

For a list of all articles, click here.

The goal with Kings Wiki is to have a wiki resource that presents truthful information from a masculine viewpoint. Instead of competing with Wikipedia, Kings Wiki will focus on subjects that are most relevant to our sphere. When these subjects are Googled, the public will be able to easily find our take, especially since Google ranks wikis very highly in their results. I view Kings Wiki as a long-term project to build influence. While it's not an active destination like ROK, it does have new daily content that will make it worth frequent visits.

Of course a wiki is not possible without users who edit it, so I encourage you to participate in the project by editing an existing page from clicking the “edit” button or creating your own page from simply typing a phrase in the search box and then clicking the red create link. Here is a wiki editing guide to get you started. You can also check out the forum thread on the wiki to participate further. If you create a page, drop the link in the comments so we can take a look.

Join Our Meetups In Cleveland During The Republican National Convention (July 18-21)

I will be in Cleveland with a group of supporters during the Republican National Convention in July. I'm attending the convention to have fun, observe the proceedings, meet likeminded men, and be a part of a historic moment. I invite readers to join in for meetups that will happen on July 18, 19, 20, and 21 in downtown Cleveland. I'm planning for roughly one daytime and one nighttime meetup for each day.

Because of the establishment heat that is on us, I will not post details of the meetups in public. If you would like to attend, I ask that you go through our screening process by filling out this interest form. I can only invite men who can provide evidence that they have been a trusted member of the community before January 1. This is the price we must pay for living under unjust oppression.

It's important to state that these are non-violent gatherings. You will receive a security protocol that explains how to remove yourself from potentially violent situations. We will not get into fights or brawls. If you intend to break the law, confront liberal protesters with aggression, or participate in violence, you are not invited to attend. Any man in the meetup who causes trouble will be seen as a false flag operative and ejected from the group. Our main goal in the meetups is to have fun socially, not make a political statement.

If you're interested, fill out this form. You will get a response around June 1. In the meantime, I recommend you buddy up with another man to decrease your lodging costs and to provide an extra measure of safety.

American Neoconservatives Were Supposed To Save The World, But For Whom?

We are living in a political age of fear. Western governments continuously push fear-based propaganda of a shadowy network of terrorism while stripping individual liberties. In the USA, first came the dubiously named Patriot Act and then NDAA, which allows unwarranted spying on citizens and tracking of personal information such as financial records by law enforcement, and also allows citizens to be detained indefinitely for merely being suspected of a crime. In addition, it says that you are a potential terrorist if you "blame the government," "travel an illogical distance" or "pay with cash."

Then there's Obamacare, giving the IRS power over your healthcare decisions and other measures which attack freedoms guaranteed in the Bill of Rights, including the introduction of the term hate speech into the public discourse which is nothing more than a thinly veiled attack on the First Amendment. Is there a real threat necessitating these measures? Or are governments only seeking to increase their power and authority over our lives?

Many of the cultural issues plaguing the West and now discussed on the manosphere have actually been playing out over the last 75 years or more in the political realm, hidden from the public but well known among political operatives.

This leads us to the introduction to one of the most important films of our generation, The Power of Nightmares by Adam Curtis. The film was originally produced for BBC in 2004, during the height of the politics of fear post-9/11. YouTube has been removing the film based on spurious copyright issues, but a Google search will turn up other places where you can watch it online.

The powerful introduction to The Power of Nightmares states the following:

> In the past, politicians promised to create a better world. They had different ways of achieving this, but their power and authority came from the optimistic visions they offered their people. Those dreams failed and today people have lost faith in ideologies. Increasingly, politicians are seen simply as managers of public life, but now they have discovered a new role that restores their power and authority. Instead of delivering dreams, politicians now promise to protect us from nightmares.
> They say that they will rescue us from dreadful dangers that we cannot see and do not understand. And the greatest danger of all is international terrorism, a powerful and sinister network with sleeper cells in countries across the world, a threat that needs to be fought by a War on Terror. But much of this threat is a fantasy, which has been exaggerated and distorted by politicians. It's a dark illusion that has spread unquestioned through governments around the world, the security services and the international media. This is a series of films about how and why that fantasy was created, and who it benefits.
> At the heart of the story are two groups: the American neoconservatives and the radical Islamists. Both were idealists who were born out of the failure of the liberal dream to build a better world, and both had a very similar explanation of what caused that failure. These two groups have changed the world, but not in the way that either intended. Together, they created today's nightmare vision of a secret organized evil that threatens the world, a fantasy that politicians then found restored their power and authority in a disillusioned age. And those with the darkest fears became the most powerful.

The Birth Of Modern Islamist And Neoconservative Thinking

Sayyid Qutb, known for his work on what he believed to be the social and political role of Islam

The story begins with Sayyid Qutb, the founder of modern Islamist thinking. Qutb came to the U.S. in 1948 from Egypt, a nation that was rapidly Westernizing after World War II. He came on a scholarship to study the U.S. education system, but became disgusted with what he saw as the corruption of morals and values in American society caused by individualism, liberalism and materialism. He returned to Egypt in 1950 and set out to prevent these ideals from taking over his own country.

Qutb wanted to create a moral framework to stop the infiltration of American culture into Egypt and Islamic countries at large. He did this by becoming politically active and joining the Muslim Brotherhood. The group wanted Egyptian society governed by Islam rather than the secularism that was infiltrating from the West. The Muslim Brotherhood later supported a revolution against then Egyptian President Nasser based on these desires. Responding to this threat to his power, President Nasser formed an alliance with the CIA and Qutb was later arrested and put into prison.

While in prison, torturers trained by the CIA tortured Qutb. One of their torture methods was covering him with animal fat and unleashing a pack of dogs on him. This, and other types of CIA-influenced torture had a radicalizing influence on Qutb. To him, it only proved that Western culture was in worse condition than he had originally expected.

To Qutb, Western culture had fallen under jahilliyah—a state of barbarous ignorance. He believed the West had come to worship materialism over other philosophies, and that a dramatic change of course was needed to cleanse jahilliyah from Islamic culture, rapidly spreading in Egypt. His group wanted to kill government leaders they thought were infected by the West's jahilliyah. Qutb was later hanged for plotting to overthrow the Egyptian government but his ideas spread, and they had a powerful influence on Ayman Zawahiri, the current leader of Al-Qaeda.

Leo Strauss, father of neoconservatism

At the same time, Leo Strauss, whose political philosophy led to neoconservatism, was coming to some of the same conclusions as Qutb. He believed Western liberalism would lead to legalism, totalitarianism, and chaos because it questioned all moral values and all truths. This created a nihilistic culture where nothing is true and everything is permitted. Strauss feared this cultural nihilism and degeneracy would tear apart society.

Strauss said the prosperous society America had become contained the seeds of its own destruction. He believed powerful myths and necessary illusions were needed (echoing Reinhold Niebuhr) to keep the society from tearing itself apart. These myths would be promoted by government officials in public, while there was no need for the mythmakers to believe the myths themselves. These myths, Strauss thought, would keep individualism in check and the society from disintegrating.

Strauss' Neoconservatism would influence the United States government starting in the 1970s through today.

Strauss Influences Neoconservatives

As a prosperous but increasingly detached from traditional values America began to run into serious problems in the 1960s, and later the Great Society dream seemed to end in violence and hatred, the big political question in Washington shifted to whether the liberal, individualist policies were causing the social breakdown. Irving Kristol, the "godfather" of neoconservativism, sums up the thinking of the time.

> If you had asked any liberal in 1960, we are going to pass these laws, these laws, these laws, and these laws, mentioning all the laws that in fact were passed in the 1960s and 70s, would you say crime will go up, drug addiction will go up, illegitimacy will go up, or will they go down? Obviously, everyone would have said, they will go down. And everyone would have been wrong. Now, that's not something that the liberals have been able to face up to. They've had their reforms, and they have led to consequences that they did not expect and they don't know what to do about.

Strauss and other neoconservatives believed individual freedom was causing the chaos, as people pursued their own selfish interests instead of those which mutually benefit themselves and society, leading to conflict. The ideas Strauss had were studied by men who were to become very influential in the U.S. government: Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, Paul Wolfowitz and Bill Kristol, son of Irving Kristol. They believed the philosophical grounds for liberal democracy had been weakened, and wanted to give the masses a new purpose by creating a new myth of America as having a unique destiny battling against evil in the world.

The myth they developed claimed America was the only force for good in the world, and it would spread this goodness through the world by spreading democracy. (Never mind that America was overthrowing democratically-elected leaders at the same time this doxy was being preached.) There was only one problem with this myth: neoconservatives needed to invent an ever-present enemy since the messages they would be giving to the masses boiled down to a battle between good and evil.

That enemy would first become the Soviet Union before becoming an obscure network of terrorists a generation later. While the Cold War had already been ongoing, the neoconservatives set out to maximize their power and influences by making the Soviet Union seem even more vicious and extreme than it actually was.

The neoconservative view was in stark contrast to the global interdependence championed by Henry Kissinger, but after Watergate and the defeat of the U.S. in Vietnam, there was a crisis of confidence in this school of thought. In a shift away from Kissinger's ruthless but pragmatic vision of the need for a balance of power, the newly empowered neoconservatives wanted to move away from the idea of global interdependence and towards mythmaking.

Along came Dick Cheney, Paul Wolfowitz, Donald Rumsfeld and Bill Kristol to spread the new ideology. Dick Cheney first came to power as Gerald Ford's White House Chief of Staff, one of several neoconservatives in that administration. He would later become the Secretary of Defense under George H.W. Bush and eventually the Vice President.

The Strauss "Necessary Myth" Becomes "Truth"

Rumsfeld became Secretary of Defense in 1975 under President Gerald Ford. Rumsfeld wanted to create a more terrifying view of the Soviet Union and the prospect for nuclear war. His claim was whatever the USSR said publicly, its real goal was to conquer the United States. Rumsfeld gave an important speech in 1976 which incorporated many of the "good vs. evil" themes Strauss thought were necessary to provide the public with a good guy vs. bad guy scenario.

> The Soviet Union has been busy. They've been busy in terms of their level of effort; they've been busy in terms of the actual weapons they've been producing; they've been busy in terms of expanding production rates; they've been busy in terms of expanding their institutional capability to produce additional weapons at additional rates; they've been busy in terms of expanding their capability to increasingly improve the sophistication of those weapons. Year after year after year, they've been demonstrating that they have steadiness of purpose. They're purposeful about what they're doing. Now, your question is, what ought one to be doing about that?

The CIA of the time said there was no truth to Rumsfeld's claims, that it was complete fiction. As often happens in politics, reality has very little to do with policy making. Rumsfeld persuaded President Ford to set up a committee to investigate the Soviet threat. This committee was called Team B, led by Paul Wolfowitz, who claimed the Soviet Union had weapon systems that were later proven not to exist. Team B said the weapons were so advanced they could not even be detected. In eerie similarities to the later weapons of mass destruction claims that led the U.S. into a bloody war with Iraq in 2003, Plan B said there was an invisible threat from the Soviet Union even though there was no

Neocons would later go so far as to claim terrorism was coordinated by Moscow as an attempt to take over the world during the Reagan administration. They said all terrorist groups were part of a coordinated network of terror run by the Soviet Union. (If this sounds familiar, that's because it is the exact same playbook used a generation later during the War on Terror!)

The CIA responded by saying the claim that the Soviet Union was behind a secret network of terror was another neocon fantasy. That is, until William Casey took over the CIA. Casey based CIA policy on The Terror Network book, which was full of black propaganda and was totally fabricated by the CIA. The neocons had to know the terror network didn't exist, because the CIA itself had made the entire story up.

In a triumph for the neoconservatives, the fantasies created by Rumsfeld and Wolfowitz became reality, at least as far as public policy was concerned.

Paul Wolfowitz and Donald Rumsfeld, spinning fantasies into reality

Qutb's Goal Realized: President Sadat Assassinated

Around the same time, Ayman Zawahiri became increasingly concerned about Qutb's predictions about the corrupting influence of Western culture in the Middle East. Zawahiri was convinced it was time to overthrow the secular, Western-backed regime of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat.

Zawahiri was particulary enraged by Sadat's trip to negotiate a peace treaty with the Israelis, which Zawahiri claimed meant Sadat was no longer a Muslim and could be legitimately killed through jihad. Also, Ayatollah Khomeini came to power in 1979 as the First Supreme Leader of Iran. To Zawahiri, it meant his dream of creating an Islamist, non-Westernized nation in Egypt was possible. Ayatollah Khomeini talked about the corrupting influence of individualism and liberalism.

> You who want freedom for everything, the freedom that will corrupt our country, corrupt our youth, and freedom that will pave the way for the oppressor—freedom that would drag our country to the bottom.

Sadat was later assassinated by Zawahiri's group in an effort to create an fundamentalist state in Egypt. The assassination failed to establish an Islamic state, which only made Zawahiri take an even more extreme stance. Zawahiri was sentenced to 3 years in prison, and like Qutb, became even more radicalized by torture while in prison.

The Religious Right Makes Their Move

Echoing the desires of Qutb and Zawahiri to combine fundamentalism and government, the Religious Right was mobilized by neoconservatives and were in part responsible for Ronald Reagan's landslide victory in 1980. Up until the Reagan era, neoconservativism had been a purely intellectual movement. Irving Kristol gave his opinion on why he thinks religion is necessary for a stable society. This gives us insight as to why the neocons embraced organized religion.

> The notion that a purely secular society can cope with all of the terrible pathologies that now affect our society, I think has turned out to be false. And that has made me culturally conservative. I mean, I really think religion has a role now to play in redeeming the country. And liberalism is not prepared to give religion a role. Conservatism is, but it doesn't know how to do it.

Religious leaders joined the chorus denouncing the Soviet Union as the force for evil in the world, while the U.S. was branded as the force for good in the world. In reality, neither country was purely good or purely evil.

Richard Pipes, one of the heads of Team B, the group who totally fabricated allegations against the Soviet Union, was appointed to Reagan's administration. Neocons initially faced opposition from Reagan but he later adopted many of their ideals. The myths Strauss said were so desperately needed were now becoming public policy and political reality. Neoconservatives had successfully created the idea that America's purpose was to spread democracy throughout the world. Meanwhile, Islamists were becoming ever more radical in their desire to eradicate jahilliyah from their society and create an Islamic state.

Part 2 of this series will focus on the developments through the rest of the Reagan and subsequent Bush I, Clinton, and Bush II administrations. The neocons and Islamists team up in the 1980s, but when the Soviet Union collapses neoconservatives need a new enemy. As Islamists became more radical, the neoconservatives turn them into public enemy number one even though Al-Quaeda's actual power and reach is vastly overblown by the American government.

How To Properly Aim A Firearm

Despite the left's false platitudes that firearms are the cause of the high murder rates in some areas of the US, as if they committed the crimes themselves, a firearm will only ever hit that at which it is aimed. Successful use of a firearm, whether it be in war, sport, or practice depends upon the correct utilization of the sighting system on the weapon, and, in this article, I'll cover the four basic types of sights, how to properly use them, and the first two steps in firing a shot.

We've now covered introductions to pistols, shotguns, and rifles, along with some articles on carrying concealed and safety, so we are now going to move on into actual use of firearms. Although I will continue to delve into types of weapons and even specific guns themselves in articles, further discussion of the tools loses import when there is no discussion of the art. Before we can get into ballistics and in-depth discussion of ammunition, we need to discuss shooting itself.

Firing The Shot

Most novices assume that you simply point the gun at your target and pull the trigger and you will almost always hit him. This isn't true for stormtroopers in Star Wars, and it fortunately isn't true for the majority of criminal thugs shooting "gangsta style."

I primarily teach rifle shooting, and, as it is the area in which I have the most expertise, and most of its lessons can transfer to pistols, we will discuss rifle shooting. The best way to learn to shoot is good instruction from an experienced teacher, and practice using a .22 rifle or other low recoil rifle until the basics are mastered.

Depending on your organization, there are a different number of “steps” in firing a shot, but they all mean the same thing. I will list them here.

- Sight Alignment
- Sight Picture
- Breathing
- Focus
- Squeeze the trigger
- Follow Through

The first four are often lumped together into just Sight Picture, and the last two together are considered Trigger Control. If you have a good sight picture when the shot breaks, and if you have good trigger control, your bullet WILL go where you want it to go, assuming the rifle and ammo are functioning correctly in all areas. We will leave the breathing and focus for the next article, and concentrate today on Sight Alignment and Sight Picture.

Sight Alignment

“But Luke, my sights ARE aligned! See?” a student might comment to me. Yes, assuming you have tightened all the bolts, your scope may be firmly on its rings, or your irons may be properly on the front and back of the sight radius indeed. However, your HEAD is not aligned to the sights, and, unless you do that the right way, the same way, every time, you may miss, even though you saw a good sight picture.

The way you position your head on a rifle stock involves two things, charmingly called “turkey neck” and “cheek weld.” Turkey neck is a reminder for you to extend your neck and get your face close to the sights. If you extend your head to the (comfortable) maximum, you will be consistent.

Note that there is also something called “eye relief.” It is far too common for scopes to be mounted too far back, and a student gets up and close to it, and the recoil gives you a nice ring around your eye. This is called “scoping” and is one reason you should always wear safety glasses. Proper eye relief, which means that the scope is where it needs to be so that it is the proper distance out from your eye when your head is in the right spot on the stock, is essential. More on determining eye relief in a bit.

We’re not looking at anything, but notice how you can see the entire field of view of the scope, this means your eye (or my phone) is at correct eye relief.

Cheek weld is the other method to insure repeatability. You want to tuck that stock under your cheekbone so it is always in the same spot. Your scope may be too high, and often is, as stocks are usually set for irons. You should always put the scope as low as you can on a rifle as long as it will clear. There are riser pads available to adjust “comb height” (which is what this is called) as well as inserts and movable pieces in the better stocks to do it for you.

There are two basic types of sights: irons and optics. Iron sights are made up of a front and a rear sight that you align with your eye to make a combined sight picture. The front sight is typically a blade of some thickness, or a thin blade with a pin on top. The rear sight is either an open V of metal with a notch, or a round disc with a hole through which you look. The former are called “open sights” and the latter are called “peep” or, more properly, “aperture” sights.

Proper alignment of open sights involves centering the blade of the front sight in the notch of the rear sight, with the tops of both sights being equal. For aperture sights, center the top edge of the front sight blade directly across the middle of the aperture.

We’re not aiming at anything, but notice how the front sight is in between and level with the rear.

Optics are traditional scopes, red dot scopes, and holographic sights like EOTechs and AimPoints. To get proper sight alignment on a scope, you need to see the reticule in the middle clearly (the crosshairs), and have no blackness anywhere in the optic field. If you have a black ring around the field of view, but you can still see out the middle, you are either too close to the scope, or too far away; move your head. If you see that blackness, but the view is also off to the side, or up or down, you need to move your head in those directions as well.

If you see this, you need to move your head either forward or away until you see no black, and also left or right until you center up.

Red dot scopes are the same, but, due to their more “scout” style positioning, you won’t see black around them. The modern holographic reflex sights allow the user to not actually have good sight alignment because the crosshairs moves its reflection with you as you move. These last are fabulous sights, and many professionals use them. I recommend learning on irons, or at least a traditional scope, so that you can master the shooting before you use a reflex sight.

Sight Picture

This is actually easier to describe and do than sight alignment. Once you have your head welded to that stock, and are looking through the sights, you have to point the gun where you want the bullets to go. There are two schools of thought on this, and you should use both at varying times.

Pardon the tilt. Center hold, with a scope, on small target.

We need four terms here. Point of aim, point of impact, center hold, and 6 o’clock hold. Point of aim is where you are aiming, obviously. Point of impact is where the bullet lands. Ideally, your sights will be set up so that the bullet flies true regarding right and left, and has enough upwards tilt to counteract gravity. (If you truly set your sights zeroed to the barrel, at any range, the bullet would be below it at least some amount due to gravity.)

Center Hold on Big Target with Iron Sights.

Here’s the money. Center hold versus 6 o’clock hold. Center hold is best used for scopes.

Line those crosshairs dead over the center of the target and let fly. Center hold also works on no-bullshit combat pistols. Center the target up just over the top of the front sight, or right behind it, and let fly.

6 o’clock hold on big target.

6 o’clock hold is for precision shooting at range. You set your sights up so that you aim at the base of the target (i.e. 6 o clock on a clock face) and the bullet hits in the middle. You do this so that the blade of the sight does not obscure the target as it raises and lowers due to breathing.

6 o’clock hold on small target with irons. Note how a center hold would block the entire target.

Reflex sights should be set for center hold. Lasers, which we haven’t discussed yet, should be set for center hold as well.

Lasers don’t need you (or the camera) to be lined up on the iron sights to work.

Sighting In

I teach riflery to new shooters and experienced ones. The experienced ones wonder why we do not adjust sights often until hours into the course. The reason is that it is much more important for you to put together a good shot group that is somewhere on the target than it is to adjust the sights.

It’s a question of accuracy versus precision. The Boy Scouts teach that accuracy is whether or not the group is centered on the bullseye, and precision is how tight the group is. Appleseed and Revere’s Riders teach that the software problems (your head and shooting) have to be fixed before the hardware (the sights of the gun.)

However, we will talk mechanical adjustments here briefly, and get into what we call IMC (Inches, Minutes, Clicks) in a future article. The simplest mechanical sight has a fixed front blade, and a fixed rear notch, and the gun shoots where it will. The next up is drift adjustable rear sights, and you tap (with a brass punch) them left or right (go the same direction as you want the bullet to go). Some rear sights have spring loaded wedges to raise them or lower them as needed.

Adjustable mechanical sights can be “clicked” with a screwdriver or similar vertically and horizontally. Some front sights are also adjustable for height. The most advanced mechanical sights are “zeroable” which means you can set them to be on at a certain distance, and that will match an adjustable drum that you can turn to be on target at longer ranges. These sights also can be dialed in for wind compensation as well, and will be the subject of future articles.

Scopes have click adjustable dials that can be used to move the crosshair to the bullet impact point at whatever range you want. This is “sighting in” and not “zeroing.” Zeroing, just like iron sights, requires you to set the sighting turret system to “zero” at whatever range you want, and most scopes are just able to be sighted in, not zeroed, unless you can move the turret separately.

Conclusion

This should help with the fundamentals of aiming a rifle (and a pistol, and I guess a rifle-sighted combat shotgun, too.) In future articles, we'll cover trigger control, IMC, ballistics, zeroing, and correction, as well as the basics of bullet and powder choices. Be safe.

Is Hillary Clinton Trying To Sabotage Her Campaign Against Donald Trump?

Ever since Donald Trump began dominating the Republican presidential primaries, cuckservatives and pundits have asserted that he has no chance of winning against Hillary Clinton, the presumptive Democratic nominee. Trump's nationalist views on trade and border security have supposedly made him incredibly unpopular among Latinos, while his "sexist" remarks about women have hurt him among female voters. While these same pundits failed to predict Trump's victory in the Republican race, they keep assuring us that this time, they have it right.

Common sense would dictate that Trump—a man who knocked out over a dozen challengers to claim the GOP nomination, all while the party machinery was aligned against him—would have a few tricks up his sleeve for ol' Hilldog, but the problem is that common sense is uncommon. Hillary Clinton's actions in the past week have indicated that she's trying to sabotage her own campaign and ensure Trump's victory in the fall.

Donald Trump is easily one of the finest political minds in American history, able to provoke his enemies into destroying themselves with psychological warfare. Trump's "low-energy" jab at Jeb Bush sent his campaign into a death spiral and destroyed his family's reputation; his "Little Marco" taunting provoked Rubio into embarrassing himself by making "mine's bigger than yours" jokes; his constant refrain of "Lyin' Ted" made Cruz have a nervous breakdown on live television.

Much in the same way that UFC fighter Conor McGregor destroyed Jose Aldo's spirit with nonstop trash talk, softening him up for an easy win, Trump is manipulating Hillary into shooting herself in the foot.

Hillary Gets Trumped

Ever since he began his campaign, the Donald has hammered Hillary on her corruption, her enabling of her husband's infidelity and alleged rapes, and her ties to big money Wall Street donors. The first sign that "Crooked Hillary" is cracking under pressure can be seen above, when she recently changed her haircut to look like Trump's. Fox News anchor Megyn Kelly also changed her haircut to look more professional after Trump ridiculed her as a "bimbo" and a "lightweight."

Following this, in response to Trump's accusation that Hillary was playing the "woman card," her campaign issued a "Woman Card" to mock the incident. However, as Scott Adams pointed out, the design of the Woman Card is an absolute disaster:

Not only is the "woman" symbol on the front the same as a public restroom's (thus marrying Clinton's image with that of a toilet), the magnetic strip calls to mind Grandma

Hillary's inability to navigate the advanced technology of the turnstiles in the New York City Subway.

Furthermore, the Hillary campaign has opted to push back against Trump by arguing that he's too "risky" to be entrusted with the presidency, dubbing him "Dangerous Donald." For a candidate who says he's going to shake up the Washington consensus and change how government operates, "risky" borders on being an endorsement. Similarly, an ad showing how Republican establishment figures despise Trump actually helps him since he's built his campaign on dismantling the corrupt, impotent GOP establishment.

Finally, in a move that is absolute poison to her electoral chances, Hillary has begun wooing Bush family donors, following the news that former presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush will not participate in the election. Dubya is still a widely reviled figure among the left; indeed, when I went to a Bernie Sanders rally in South Bend, Indiana last week, there was a vendor selling "Hillary is Bush" buttons. Given that Hillary is still competing with Sanders for the nomination—and his supporters regard her as a warmonger and a closeted Republican—cozying up to the Bushes is the absolute worst thing she could do.

Hillary's Political Suicide

While Hillary still leads Trump in general election polling, her numbers have been eroding continuously for the past few months, and new polls now show the Donald leading her in crucial swing states such as Ohio. Not only that, for all of #NeverTrump's whining, polling shows that the vast majority of registered Republicans will vote for Trump in November:

https://twitter.com/Ricky_Vaughn99/status/729896078116564992

Hillary's self-sabotage is no doubt playing a role in her falling poll numbers, to the point where her own supporters are starting to panic over her inept campaigning.

Why is Hillary ruining her own chances of being elected? Part of it is because she's always been an unlikable, talentless campaigner: she lost the 2008 nomination to Barack Obama despite being better-funded and known, and she's barely treading water against Bernie Sanders despite the primary race being rigged for her benefit. However, Trump's psychological warfare has also played a big role: by bringing the FBI investigation into her emails to the forefront, he has made her fearful of being indicted, leading her to sabotage her campaign as a result.

While it's still possible that Hillary will be able to overrun Trump at the polls due to America's increasingly non-white demographics, her constant own goals are crippling her campaign. Political experts who claim she has the race in the bag should be roundly ignored and mocked.

What To Do When You've Been Rejected So Many Times That You're Ready To Give Up

May 11, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The idea that meeting and attracting girls consistently has much in common with sales is nothing new. However, having recently read Jeb Blount's excellent business book Fanatical Prospecting, I can reveal that he drops in one particular nugget that every seducer would do well keep in mind at all times:

> When it is time to go home, make one more call.

This simple eleven word mantra, if applied consistently, is guaranteed to increase your success with girls, whether you are looking for a relationship or something more short term.

Fanatical Prospecting

Currently employed by a start-up to generate new business in a tough marketplace, I have gone back to basics recently and sought to sharpen up my skills and gain inspiration from a number of business and sales books. By far the best that I have come across is Jeb Blount's Fanatical Prospecting. Blount, a US sales profession who has built up a multi-million dollar sales and marketing business from scratch through sheer grit and the determination to make thousands of sales calls, has a very simple piece of advice.

Every business is built through sales, or to put it another way, sales are the lifeblood of every business. For this reason, it is essential to always maintain a healthy pipeline of "possible" deals. Some of these deals will come off, some won't, but those that don't matter less if you have another ten prospects hot and ready to go.

For this reason, the most fundamental task the salesman has, over and above administrative tasks, filling in spreadsheets, lunching existing clients and so on, is fanatical prospecting. To put it at its simplest, the more sales calls you make, the more likely you will be to enjoy eventual success through at least a few of them.

Make One More Call

Of course, the process of sales, just like the process of going out to a club or high street and chatting up girls you've never met before, can be both daunting and spirit-crushing. Rejection after rejection piles up, making you question the quality of your product (yourself), your skills and the market.

This is normal.

Blount correctly points out that even superstar sales people don't particularly like this process. No one enjoys getting door after door slammed in their face after all. But what separates that men from the boys, so to speak, is having the ability to take those nos, carry on, and just make one more call anyway.

Another useful analogy to bear in mind is weight training. How often has it been said that it is doing one more rep that truly makes the difference? If, at the end of a grueling bench press set, you can bring yourself to push out one more rep—and you do this consistently—then the effect on your physique over time will be exponential.

Grit

The idea of "grit" being at the heart of success is a fashionable one right now, with books like Angela Duckworth's "Grit: The Power of Passion and Perseverance" being very popular among the business and self-help communities. In fact, Duckworth claim's that grit is a more accurate predictor of success than IQ.

Such a theory is of course very seductive, almost a variant on the American dream, in that it states that anyone can achieve anything they want if only they work hard enough for it. But it also happens to be true. In any endeavour, it is not necessarily the most talented, but actually those willing to go the extra mile, who end up succeeding.

What Does This Have to Do With Meeting Women?

Grit is not only an essential component in business—you also need it when you set out to meet girls. Why? Simply because the truth of the matter is that not every girl you meet will be open to having a relationship or sex with you. In fact—unless you're exceptional good-looking or famous—most won't. Therefore, you need to be resilient enough to work through the rejections, roll with the punches and keep going until you find someone with whom you click.

There have been countless times where I have seen this principle play out in nightclubs and bars where I have sought to meet women with no immediate success. But remember, it only takes one "yes" to turn a terrible night into an amazing night.

I recall attending one night out where it seemed that I would enjoy no success whatsoever. My every approach was spurned, and I got no traction with any of the girls at all. This in turn began to affect my mood. I lost confidence and felt certain that tonight I would enjoy no such at all.

But I kept going—approaching even as everything appeared to be against me. And finally, standing by the downstairs bar, there she was—an angel in fairy wings, a short skirt, stockings and suspenders (yes, it was that kind of party).

Having done little more than opening her with a cheeky "hey," within five minutes I was making out with her and a couple of hours later I was in a taxi heading back to her place.

The lesson here is clear—had I not made that one last approach then it would not have gotten laid that night. So next time you're out, remember: it isn't over 'til it's over. However bad things may seem, just make one more approach. You never know what may happen.

Either Everyone Can Use The N-Word Or No One Can

May 11, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Forgetting black airport workers and travelers, what's the first thing an Australian like me often hears an African-American saying on the street after arriving in the US? Nigga, nigga, and nigga. Again and again, this word accosts my ears. From New York City to LA, Chicago to Seattle, it does not matter, unless you're a white guy saying it. Because of this very strange, asymmetrical phenomenon, I put the following to you: either everyone should be able to use the word "nigga" and its ancestor "nigger," or no one should.

If a white person, even a non-American, says either "nigger" or, more commonly, "nigga" in the presence of a so-called "brother," their subsequent dental bill will be conservatively estimated at above $10,000. Yet for blacks it is the perennial term of endearment or rebuke, used in situations as disparate as casual greetings to bickering over a particular loose woman two parties want. How can a word be racist when a white says it, but acceptable when a black does?

The problem is really one of self-serving leftists selectively condoning different users of what is essentially one word, not two, depending on the skin color of the user. Why are liberals and SJWs especially so insistent on eliminating the word "nigger" from all parlance, all while turning a completely blind eye to African-Americans uttering "nigga"? After all, American elocution across every race and location is not only diverse in its types but greatly slackening overall. Lax, casual pronunciation invariably results in "nigger" sounding either identical or very close to "nigga." Furthermore, a quasi-suffix change, lazy word endings or not, should not mean the difference between perpetuating racism and promoting a "beneficial," expressive form of ebonics between African-Americans.

What SJWs really want is two separate but related forms of linguistic victimhood for African-Americans. On the one hand, whites using the term "nigger" or non-racistly appropriating "nigga" is the modern reinvention of slavery and Jim Crow era styles of oppression. Or so leftists say. Then we have blacks referring to one another as a "nigga." The substitution of "-a" for "-er" is meant to make the word not just palatable but acceptable. Having been derived from "nigger," though, the word is a subtle instrument for making African-Americans feel like victims amongst their own communities, with just the slightest phonetic difference between the two varieties. This reinforced victimhood is vital for left-of-center elites.

Democrats and SJWs need an almost universally pro-leftist and "victimized" black community, hence why "nigga" is tolerated and even promoted

Bill could count on the black vote and Hillary will. But what have they actually produced, aside from racial conspiracy theories that serve to keep African-Americans feeling victimized?

People often remark that evangelicals are the backbone of the Republican Party. What few remember, nonetheless, is that only 79% of them voted for Mitt Romney in the 2012. Comparable figures can be retrieved for both Bush elections and John McCain's failed Presidential bid. Still, when this is compared to the proportion of blacks voting for Democratic Presidential (or Congressional) candidates, it fizzles into mediocrity. Some 93% of blacks voted for Obama in 2012. It did not matter that Obama himself was black; Clinton, Gore and Kerry all routed Republicans in attaining black votes. Unless you discount the liberal vs. conservative and Democratic vs. Republican categories, which are essentially meaningless in explaining voting preferences, no major demographic group votes anywhere close to as reliably for one party as blacks do for the Democrats.

This loyal base of support, which proves the difference in election after election won by Democrats, depends on reminding blacks of the past and, unfairly, associating that past directly with modern Republicans and just generally non-Democrats and non-SJWs. The GOP may have presided over the elimination of slavery in the 1860s, but the once vehemently pro-slavery Democrats are falsely equated with fighting contemporary racism.

This is where "nigga" comes in. Whenever it is used by African-Americans, it is seen as “reclaiming” the word. But to use “nigga” implies that the word “nigger” is in overuse today, which is patently not the case. The reality does not matter. What does is the bonafide scaremongering, namely that racism apparently lurks behind every corner featuring a white.

If this false climate of persecution were lacking or faded into non-existence, Democrats would have nothing to lure in black voters. They have delivered nothing of value for African-American communities. Incarceration rates for African-American young men actually increased due to Clinton era policies of sentencing, even as Democrats claimed that racism, not personal choice, explained the superlative rates of blacks being jailed for violent crimes.

To hide these failures, which extend to areas as wide as social welfare dependency and representation within the corporate and professional worlds, leftists need to use cheap devices like fixations on when whites rarely use the N-word or cops shooting black men either armed or reaching for their gun.

Beat up on everyone who says the N-word or let them all say it without consequence

People who use the word “nigga” in empowering ways. Not pictured: the white guy they kicked the shit out for saying “nigga” without even using “nigger.”

I do not support violence but using the N-word in either of its forms would be semi-understandable… if everyone faced the same penalties for mouthing it out. Until such time as there is equivalency in social and even physical rebukes, no black person should be able to reserve an exclusive right of use compared to whites and others.

Reaction to the word “nigger,” when blacks use basically the same term but with an “-a” themselves, also underscores the lack of legitimate gripes race baiters like Al Sharpton and Jesse Jackson have. They have to use poster boys for alleged police violence like

Michael Brown, who was unequivocally proven to have assaulted Officer Darren Wilson and definitely tried to take his gun. Failing that, they can rail against a word whose derivative is the most commonly used noun of a massive proportion of African-Americans

For once in debates like this one, can we please inject some common sense? Alas, again probably, that's asking for far too much.

How Advertising Shows The Decline Of American Culture

May 12, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Commercials are a convenient window into the culture. Even when commercials don't exactly reflect the culture, they still speak to what the culture aspires to. Unfortunately, a comparison of the commercials of today with those of the past reveals that our culture has degenerated in several areas.

Male And Female Roles

In commercials from the 1960s, it is clear that society was still structured around a patriarchal model with the husband being the head of the family. As time went on, the traditional male and female roles diminished but it was still evident in the 1980s. As hard as it is to imagine, there was a time when slim and feminine wives actually cared about making their husbands happy as demonstrated by the following advertisements.

Also notice how both men and women did not dress like slobs.

Today, men are not portrayed as respected members in a marriage. At best, husbands are portrayed as being hapless idiots. At worst, husbands are shown to be impediments to women's happiness. Take this Roomba commercial. The husband is portrayed as a jackass. And what mother thinks of her children as pigs?

The Kingsford charcoal commercial below demonstrates the trend that husbands are ignorant dolts who are only deserving of a wife's disdain.

Where's Dad?

Products aimed at families like breakfast cereal, soup, or TV dinners used to feature traditional households. When the entire family sat down for dinner it meant, mom, dad and at least two children. The modern equivalent paints a much different picture.

In the Banquet foods commercial above, mom comes home from a hard day of work to greet her hungry children. She is praised for her many roles—coach, artist, and even zoologist, as they sit down for a high carb, high fat, nutritionally deficient meal which will encourage obesity in her children. But there is no chair for dad at the table. Dad must have been an ignorant dolt so mom divorced him. Now, she is free—free to ride the cock carousel and free to work in a soul-killing dead end job.

Dad Is Gay

In the rare event that fathers are portrayed as competent and loving, they are usually gay. Gay men always make wonderful fathers. In the following Campbell's Soup ad, gay men are cast as being funny, creative, and nurturing fathers—the complete opposite of the modern portrayal of heterosexual fathers.

The reality is that homosexuals comprise only about 2% of the population and the number of them that want to adopt children are even lower. These ads are probably trying to target heterosexual women who seem to have a soft spot for gay men raising children. And gay men are not necessarily the wonderful fathers that they are portrayed to be in commercials. A British man claims he was molested by his gay father and his father's boyfriend. When he went to social workers to get help, he was ignored because of the wholesome image gay men have in the media.

Obesity

The idea that real women are fat and beautiful is another common theme in current advertising. Almost all clothing commercials feature at least one plus size model. And of course, Dove beauty products has made it a mission to highlight "real" beauty. Obese acceptance is inserted everywhere.

In this case, commercials are reflecting the changes in society. Americans are getting fatter. The average woman now weighs as much as the average man did in the 1960s. Advertisers have a nearly impossible task. They have to make fat women feel like they are still attractive.

The ads in the past did not have to contend with this dynamic. Many magazine ads from the 1950s and 1960s were drawings that showed the ideal woman to be tall, thin, and feminine.

Wimpy Men

Gucci runway show

It is not just the images of women that have changed. Men, too, are being portrayed differently in ads. Even though men have gotten fatter in the real world, you will not see obese, body positive male models. Instead, you will see ads featuring extremely wimpy men.

As an example, take Versace, the Italian fashion house. It was started by Gianni Versace, who was a homosexual, and it has always had a reputation for edgy ads that frequently featured gay themes. Yet, in the 1990s their ads featured somewhat muscular models.

Compare the Versace ad to this 2016 ad from Gucci, another Italian fashion house. It looks like the girl in the photo could easily beat the tar out of the weak male model.

Sweet parrot shirt!

Conclusion

These are just a few examples of the trends that can be detected by viewing advertisements. Of course, there are exceptions. Most women in ads are still thin because we find thin women attractive and you will still see intact traditional families in some commercials—but the overall drift of society is apparent. Our culture is stamping out the last vestiges of patriarchy, family, and traditional masculinity and femininity.

30 Signs That An Eastern European Girl Isn't Relationship Material

Tuthmosis' seminal ROK lists paved the way in matter of divining slut tells. While the signs are generally applicable to most girls under the sun, I noticed that they had a pronounced American flavour. So it is now time to expose the sluts of the East.

Eastern European girls are lovely but they remain women. I love their character and idiosyncracies. But as I am a cynic by nature, here is are some signs that you should look for that I gathered after years of observations.

1. She exposes her belly button (without being in bikini)

This one is especially relevant if the temperature is quite low. More skin exposed, more attention wanted. It is generally the mark of an especially childish and irresponsible girl.

For Eastern European girls it is quite normal to show cleavage or wear skirts, as it is a traditional feminine attribute. But the slutty belly show is quite recent as it was considered indecent (if not on a beach) in the Socialist era.

2. She is past 25 and is not married

EE considers girls over 25 who are not engaged or married to be social failures. The family members, especially the female ones, constantly remind them of it. I have observed firsthand on a few occasions girls that are in a state of depression because they did not manage to secure a husband at that age. They are significantly easier to lay as well, as they have usually a higher notch count and some kind of a despair for a cock that comes with a prospect of relationship.

3. She declares that she does not like to clean

If you see her as potential relationship material, reconsider right now. EE girls are natural at cleaning and expected to do so. “You are the man, you need to rest” is what i often hear.

If you go to hers and she says her place is a mess (and not the euphemism one) and you discover that she has clothes on the floor and everything is out of place, beware. She is careless and has probably the same behavior towards sex and protection. Also she will transmit this poisonous absence of discipline to her offspring, guaranteed. See this A.V. Yader piece for more info.

4. She can’t cook for shit

Same as above, it is expected of them to take care of their man. Their mothers have prepared them since their childhood for this. She does not need to be Gordon Ramsay, but she needs to be able to cook varied, healthy food for a long period.

5. She is well traveled, even if it is just in Europe

The only excuse she has if she traveled around is if she did it with her immediate family. The other options are previous boyfriends (loads of places, rarely with the same guy), her girlfriends (worse) or alone (the worst). If she is decent looking, she got hit on by the local guys and she did not spend her Friday nights at the library.

6. You banged her on the first night

No matter how bloody smooth you are, you should always tick when it happens and should definitely leave her in the “easy girl” box. Slut points if she was drunk (frowned upon in the East for a girl to be anything more than “very slightly tipsy”).

7. The names from her social circles are not native

Gigantic red flag. The local guys are in majority looking for a girlfriend or wife. This leaves the foreigners around her to satisfy her urges. She likes foreign culture, ergo she is partial to a foreign knob that is not designed to be static.

8. She is on Instagram

Useless look at me site. My life as a bartender in Subotica is not that interesting. How can I get more likes? Cleavage shots!

Their native place is not dashingly pretty. They need a pretty exotic place for the pictures. How do you reach exotic places when you are a pretty girl and poor?

9. She turns up to the date not dressed to the nines

If she is meeting you for a date and she is not dressed to impress, there is something very wrong going on. Flat shoes, t-shirts, jeans (not “jeggings” or tight, “elegant” jeans), sneakers… It could mean a few things: She does not see you as a romantic prospect, she could not be bothered, or that is her idea of a date outfit. Don’t listen to the “yes but if maybe” that your cock clings to. Hit the bricks.

10. She has traveled to Dubai

She was not there for the libraries either. If she is relatively pretty and you somehow did not hear about that phenomenon, read on.

11. She lives alone

Not with flatmates or with the family? Either career obsessed, divorced, or wants to avoid the neighbors’ questions. Unload and leave.

12. You met her at a “gringo” place

There might be the excuse that she followed a friend (“birds of a feather flock together”) for her birthday or “has not been there in a while.” See the “I only had three boyfriends” line.

13. She uses the word “player”

She calls you out for escalating, not by playfully delaying it but putting it in words in the “I know what you are doing” way. She calls you out on sleeping with local girls before, or tries to shame you on being sexual after meeting her even is she looks like the slutty type. She has been pumped and dumped before and recognizes a foreign smooth talker when she sees one. One that is not convincing enough this time.

14. She does not follow your plans for a date

Proposes a “better” one, shit tests you on your authority or cuts short to the date to “meet some friends.” She will compare your mettle to the local guys and the vast spectrum of her experiences, which can oscillate between play doh nice guys or gym rat criminal hooligan. You can pass with flying colors no doubt. But if you are not a priority, neither is a relationship with you.

15. She does not pay for a round

If she does not buy drinks or propose to do it or, for the most FSU or similar traditional places, at the very least say “thank you,” you are being played. Best case scenario, you’ll score once after considerable amount of times or investment. Worst case scenario, you are the warm-up before her local man rolls in.

16. She criticizes your home

Night is going fine. You bring her over, she overtly criticizes your above average flat. She is probably rude and you are unlikely to fuck (that night). Three of the many possible answers: 1) “The door is there if you don’t like it”, 2) “Don’t push it. 30 years ago, you would have lived in a Soviet block with no hot water”, 3) “There is no difference when the lights are off.”

17. She is not religious

She hates going to church and says it out loud. She claims to be an atheist or laughs at her grandmother for going to church every week. This is a woman that has turned her back one of the pillars of her culture. Don’t expect her to have any respect for yours.

18. She has been drunk, even once, to sickness

Finding a Western girl that has not done it a few times is like looking for a needle in a haystack. It is still a rare occurrence among EE girls, although the global free, independent thought is doing its work. Try to focus your efforts on a girl that actually dislikes the fact that the local guys get regularly smashed into oblivion.

The only acceptable level she should have ever reached is “a bit tipsy” when she wants to dance. Period

19. She watches too much television

The tube directs her life. Instead of being productive, planning ahead, cleaning her place or having interesting hobbies, she is constantly stuck on her couch, digesting what MTV sends her, such as Warsaw Shore.

19. She is not a patriot (or the other extreme, she is hanging out with the neo-nazi or hooligan scene)

There are a only few things that I hate more than a non-constructive anti-patriot. If the Croatian or Ukrainian girl you meet is not anti-multiculturalism in her country or does not have “conservative” views, she will always be bitter about the place or leave eventually. If she says that her country is shit without bringing constructive criticism, she will not want her family to grow like she did. The other extreme is no better. Alpha violent men all around. “Let’s do pure babies together” kind of trip.

20. She hangs out at high-end venues ALL THE TIME

Always cruising around the well-known local “sponsor” and apex predator spots and would not go to a normal bar to save her life. She hangs out around rich men or men of status and name-drops whenever she has the chance.

21. She is too Westernized

Her English is too good, even if she did not leave abroad. You notice “hipster elements” in her behavior, she has tattoos, she likes hip hop or has her hair dyed in a non-traditional colour

22. She speaks openly about sex

This is still a taboo in EE’s traditional milieu. During the Communist time, sex was the only source of entertainment that could be not be totally controlled by the state. Add to that the religious fabric that preceded and replaced it and you have a textbook taboo subject. It should also come up as a red flag if she uses the English terminology. She did not learn the world “squirting” in a book.

23. She does not want a family in the near future

Probably the biggest red flag of all the list. It is her nature and it is expected of her in that environment. If she winces at the view of small children and fawns when she sees kittens, you know what to do.

24. She speaks badly of her family

It is central in that culture. If she does not pay respect to the parents that baptized her in secret during the Soviet times or acknowledges that the previous generation had it much worse than her or is not thankful, just pump and dump.

25. She has condoms

The etiquette of raw dogging is different there, more present. Probably because the girls are relatively monogamous in comparison to the West. They feel safer with reason. But she might insist on you wrapping it up. No probs, until she pulls put her own stock.

26. She is repulsed by the idea of violence, manliness, or weapons

She does not understand that a man could fight for his family, enjoy masculine hobbies or knows how to shoot. She wants a progressive man that reads poetry and is not ashamed to cry. Guaranteed successful relationship.

27. She has a slutty professional past

> She’s worked in the bar, stripper, promotions, glamor and entertainment, PR, HR, PA, hospitality, airline and modeling industry. Or she has visited or hails from the sex industry hotspots of the world – Oscar Zach

Add to that cruise ship employee, “exotic dancer”, hairdresser and anything related to cosmetics (such as “nail artist” whatever the fuck that is). This is especially true in EE, where money is notoriously tight. Her family would shame her into finding another job and would rather support her and have her live at home than seeing her in those professions.

28. She studied or worked abroad

By abroad, I mean the Western world. Philology in Germany? Highly likely Franz’s wurst was part of the package.

29. She has short hair

Why would a man want to have sex with something that looks like an underfed woman that got sheared just after the locals found out she slept with the occupying army? I still do not get it, but I know guys out there who would sleep with short haired girls. Girls that voluntarily cut their hair short are mocked there by men and women alike. Don’t think she will let it grow for you either.

30. She has manly hobbies

Martial arts, automotive sports, drinking… One the other masculine hobbies she probably has is sleeping with many members of the opposite sex and forgetting their names.

There you have it. Keep banging as you please but if you even remotely consider going after something else with those girls, hear my words.

If you can think of some that you witnessed firsthand, share it by all means. What are other anti-LTR signs you have spotted in Eastern European girls?

The Truth About People From The American South

May 12, 2016 | by August Fahren | Link | Original Link

Work hard. Play hard. Pray hard.

These are words to live by in the American south. Easily summed up, but deeper meaning can be quickly lost on someone who hasn't grown up there. This article shares what I've learned from living here in the last five years.

A Brief History

Most areas of the United States identify with one group or another without much effort, but in the south an often-cited ancestry is "American." Which usually refers to the Scots-Irish. A group who had an influence so great on the course of American culture that it basically became synonymous with American culture.

To understand the south you first have to understand who southerners are and where they come from. From their earliest days in their fight against the English under the likes of William Wallace to the Protestant Reformation, the Scottish people have been an independent group with a fighting spirit.

None embodied this more than the Border Reivers who were a wild bunch living along the borders of Scotland. Quickly the Borderers found that raising crops only to have them burned when warring factions came through was a waste of time. Raiding livestock however proved to be profitable, as did their riding ability as skilled horsemen and guerrilla tactics.

During war in this area allegiance to any one side could mean death whenever a new ruler rose to power so the Borderers remained loyal only to their kin and clan. To make matters worse the rulers who employed them to maintain law and as the first line of defense would often deal with them harshly in other times when their lawlessness got out of hand.

All this encouragement of predatory behavior gave rise to a way of life based around their own strength, cunning, and gain at another’s expense. Combined with their defiance to authority you have the beginnings of what would later become Ulster-Scots in Ireland and the Scots-Irish in America.

Having failed to find their desired life in Ulster the Scots set out once again for America. First brought here by the promise of land on the frontier (as a buffer between the Indians and Quaker pacifists) they didn’t start arriving in large numbers until Governor Gooch of Virginia offered them something they never truly had before—religious freedom.

Work Hard

Frontier life in the Shenandoah Valley was full of hardships and danger, which soon gave rise to one of the key characteristics of the southerner—self-reliance. Southerners are hard workers. They hold on dearly to their second amendment rights, stemming from a time where mistrust of the government was common and the threat of wolves or Indians was real. A man had to defend his home, family, and way of life. If he wanted to eat he had to put in the work farming or making whiskey.

If you want respect from a southerner the first way is to be a hard worker.

Play Hard

It wasn’t all hard work though. Often people would gather together to help with the work and with them they’d bring whiskey and music. Out of these Appalachian hollows came the fiddle and banjo music, which would later transform in Nashville to what is known today as country music.

Speaking of Tennessee there must be something in the water as Knoxville has also produced some great looking women like Megan Fox, Christina Hendricks, and Hailey Bright. What's more southern women really are friendly, but there are a few things you're going to need to learn before you get carte blanche.

The first is basic social conduct and the other is the southern man.

One of the first things you'll notice about the south is complete strangers will talk to you. It's not weird here, it's just good manners. Manners are big in the south. Here are a few more:

- Whenever you want to talk to someone you can't just get right to it. You have to have polite small talk before issues are addressed. Otherwise you're seen as rude.
- Despite speaking to everyone if a southerner doesn't like you they'll talk behind your back. Adding, "bless their heart" at the end isn't a complement it's pity.
- People will say, "yes sir," or "yes ma'am" out of respect and habit. It's not like other areas where this is calling someone old. Elders are sometimes addressed with Ms. or Mr. in front of their name.
- Being called a Yankee in a derogatory way happens. Watch out for the southerner who will bait you by asking you questions about "up there." They don't want to know more about you they're just looking to twist your answer into a veiled insult.

One of the most baffling examples is perhaps the southern version of saving face. Anytime you say something that falls too far outside of proper social conduct you'll be ignored as though you never said what you said thus doing you a favor by not acknowledging it and saving you the embarrassment.

While manners are important so is the concept of honor. Most readily seen in the southern man. Masculine guys who like to drink and fight still live here. They're territorial and honor is quickly upheld with violence. He's raised to be respectful and chivalrous towards women. Take what's his, he thinks is his, or disrespect his women and you'll have a fight on your hands.

Basically this came out of the tradition of early settlers feuding. Men desired to be feared and respected enough that others wouldn't try to steal from them. Post war poverty ensured many men were only left with their honor, which was defended at all costs.

Pray Hard

Southerners go to church. Even the non-religious ones go on the major holidays like Christmas, Easter, and Mother's Day. Yes, Mother's Day. It's the south. Family is a big deal here.

Although church going isn't the only religion you'll find in the south. There are two others: food and college football. BBQ, booze, and co-ed boobs tailgating on game day means you've come full circle. Now you're playing hard!

Conclusion

Just remember if you really want to know what it is to be a southerner keep in mind it really comes down to four key elements: music, food and drink, religion, and honor. Stay on the right side of these and you too can work hard, play hard, and pray hard in the south.

7 Examples Of The “Pussy Pass” In Action

May 13, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Following up last week’s article where four innocent men were coerced into giving false confessions and then imprisoned for over a decade for a crime the prosecutor knew they didn’t commit, this week we are going to look at the other side of the law. Specifically, the pussy pass, and what happens when it is effectively used. Here are a few cases of this powerful “get out of jail free” card:

1. Killed A Man

Sharon Howell, 44, of Boise, Idaho, ran into a cyclist while driving drunk, killing him. Kurt Krieger, 46, of Boise was struck by Ms. Howell and died instantly. If you remember the Navy case from last week, the police had their first innocent man in jail less than 24 hours after the murder occurred. In this case, Howell, who was the known perpetrator, was not arrested until eight months later. Howell was charged with felony vehicular manslaughter, and sentenced to 4 years of probation and a suspended drivers license for killing a man.

2. Committed Arson

2/10 WNB

South Carolina woman Talina Bratcher, 29, committed arson and destroyed a lakehouse owned by her parents where she was living with her three children. She reportedly set the fire, and handed her two-year-old toddler to a neighbor so she could watch the fire burn. She was arrested and charged with 3rd degree arson. Comments from her parents included, “Everybody is fearful. I worry in years to come of what she might do. She picks up rocks and cleans them. She needs to get adequate help for drugs and her mental health.”

Talina was sentenced to 5 years probation. No mention was made of her suitability to retain custody of the children.

Men went to a lot of work to create a vibrant mental health community, analyzing, studying, and creating the DSM for diagnosing and treating diseases, building special facilities with well-trained staff to house and treat mentally ill patients, and protecting the rest of the society from dangerous individuals. The facilities are often quite nice, with Victorian style architecture, large rooms, pleasant views, drugs to wipe the unpleasantness from the mind, and adequate staff to provide one on one care.

The efforts of these men from our grandparent’s generation are now fully wasted. These mental health facilities are being torn down and clear cut candidates such as Bratcher are set free instead of sentenced to an institution.

If Talina Bratcher isn’t a candidate for a mental health ward, who is?

3. Killed A Man And Fled The Scene

27-year-old Maria Martinez was driving in Lubbock, Texas when she looked into her purse for her cellphone and felt an impact. She had hit jogger Matthew Valadez, disfiguring his body so badly the family had to have a closed casket funeral. Matthew's sister describes his body as "shattered glass that was pieced together", his face swollen to twice its size, a bulge protruding from the right side of his neck where it broke when he was struck by Maria's vehicle. After hitting Matthew, Maria fled the scene.

Facing between 2 and 20 years in prison, Maria gave the defense that "her mental illness distorted her perception of reality and convinced her she did not hit Valadez and hit a telephone pole instead." It is hard to find humor here, but I did laugh at the social worker's description of Maria as "being child-like but possessing average intelligence." How many women does that describe? Maria was sentenced to 10 years probation, no mention of a suspended driving license.

Oops, had to tweet something, my bad.

4. Drugged Multiple Victims And Six-Figure Theft

New York strippers Karina Pascucci and Marsi Rosen hung around fancy hotels looking for rich businessmen, flirted with them, drugged their drinks, stole their wallets and charged hundreds of thousands of dollars. Unlike the other ladies discussed here, these girls did receive some jail time—four months of weekends in jail and 5 years probation-–likely because they stole from some well connected powerful men. But still a very light sentence considering the crime.

WB, sober, with wallet and keys safely hidden

5. Sexually Assaulted Two Young Boys For Four Years

25-year-old Shawna Nerby of Lower Lake, California, sexually assaulted two boys repeatedly when they were ages 6 and 8, for approximately 4 years. She was charged with first degree sodomy and first degree rape, but plead guilty to lesser charges and was sentenced to 5 years probation. She has a child of her own that was taken into custody, but she may be allowed to parent the child if she follows the restrictions placed on her.

6. Severed Construction Worker’s Legs, Fled Scene

My pussy pass is taken for 2 years

26-year-old Amanda Brown, a rich Alabama woman, and heiress to her grandfather's fortune, was driving her SUV after midnight on a Saturday night, when she flew past lit barricades and cones, plowed through a traffic circle, and pinned the legs of construction worker Bobby Joe Smith, screaming, between her bumper and the sharp edge of a bulldozer. Smith's legs were immediately severed, and his co-workers used duct tape to keep him from bleeding out before he was taken to the hospital, where his legs were amputated and part of his colon removed.

Brown, meanwhile, attempted to flee the scene, then abandoned her car and stumbled home to her apartment a few blocks away. When police arrived, she admitted "I was drunk when I did it." She reportedly mouthed off at police on her trip to the station, referring to her family's wealth and prominence.

Bobby Joe Smith is no longer able to walk, or work again, in any meaningful way. He was toiling away late at night replacing a natural gas line so rich girls like Amanda Brown could have hot water to take 30 minute showers with, and working at night so she wouldn't be inconvenienced with the traffic delays it would cause during the day. So how was Brown punished? Two years of unsupervised probation. Which basically means, you are free, just don't do it again for two years or you may be punished.

7. Maimed Male College Freshman, Fled

Part Time Waitress Ashley Coleman

Ashley Coleman, 24, was driving with a .22 blood alcohol content when she struck USC Freshman Mac Dunbar, standing in the road median, shattering his body and causing permanent brain injury. Over the five years since the accident, Mac has undergone 18 surgeries, after breaking practically every bone in both legs, shoulder and arm. He has "massive hardware" including screws, pins, and plates in both legs, and his arm and shoulder. After years of therapy and training, he has been able to re-learn how to speak and walk.

Mac was a varsity athlete in basketball, soccer, and tennis, a student leader, and pillar of his community. He almost died at the scene due to the severity of his injuries, and was only saved because there was an ambulance at the intersection on a food break. Mac was in a deep coma for two months before his family or doctors knew if he would recover. He was transferred to an intensive brain unit in Atlanta, Georgia for five months.

As director of the S.C. Crime Victims Council stated, "There are some things that are worse than death–having a lifetime of not being the same person that you were." Witnesses report after hitting Mac, the woman "hit the gas and kept going." She was only discovered because a taxi driver tailed her and called police. Her sentence? Five years probation with one year home detention.

It's Only A Crime If A Man Does It

Of course, the current rape hysteria on college campuses is centered around the ridiculous idea that intoxicated sex is rape (but only the man can be punished). Every time a couple leaves a bar together and goes home to have sex, a rape is happening minutes later. Under this redefinition of “rape” the 1-in-5 stat is probably true.

No, Really, Women Cannot Commit Crimes

Lest the reader think that these are just uncoordinated mistakes made by our flawed legal system, I will direct your attention to an article published over a year ago in The Washington Post by a Social Work professor at UIC titled "We Should Stop Putting Women In Jail For Anything." This is not a ROK headline on April Fool's Day. This is an actual movement to stop punishing women no matter what.

I really can't consider any of her arguments seriously, but be aware that there is a movement to stop punishing women whatsoever for their actions. As we can see in the cases above, this is already happening.

Women Must Be Excluded From Priesthood To Save Christianity

May 13, 2016 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

One Sunday, the bishop at my church remarked that too many women were standing around chatting after the meeting. He said they needed to proceed quickly to their Sunday school classes.

Disapproving female whispers erupted from the congregation. Then, one of the prominent women in the church barked loudly, “I’m sorry…” and stormed out of the chapel. The bishop did not apologize or back down. He calmly ordered members of the church to behave like adults, and explained that church should be a spiritual learning environment, not social hour.

The next week, I was surprised to see the angry woman sitting quietly. After the service, the congregation proceeded reverently to their classes. This experience as a boy taught me a powerful lesson how men should lead in a church. I learned that if the men take charge, the women follow.

Religions today have become sanitized and weak. Shamed by our cultural overmasters, religions seek “tolerance” and “acceptance.” This destroys a productive spiritual environment, and we yearn for strong leaders to speak boldly the hard truths.

The loss of our holy spaces leads men to flee the church, and this is tragic. Spirituality fulfills men as they act with righteous dominion. It is possible to expel the poisonous social justice ideology from religion, and it can be done by restoring patriarchal leadership. The world desperately needs this, for without religion we spiral into pride, apathy, and confusion.

Gender Equality Is Poison

Many churches are falling prey to the poison of “gender equality.”

Writer Kelly Bishop recently listed several ways for churches to practice “egalitarian theology.” She suggests that the church “assign passages about women in the Bible to men” to talk about. She says sermons can be given to “both men and women” for editing before being delivered. She also says pastors should “teach gender reconciliation from the pulpit.”

If she had her way, would church become a Women’s Studies course?

Priesthood is not a feel-good counsel or public-relations office, Kelly. It is a man’s direct connection to God, with authority to act and speak the words of God, and this is not something that is achieved through political correctness exercises.

Feminists love to preach their non-scriptural philosophies to the masses, so it is no surprise that they strive to occupy the church pulpit. They love the glory and image of superiority. You hear the same sermons in newspapers, television media, classrooms, and social media.

In the 5th century, a female priestess accidentally burned down the temple of Hera at Argos. “Oopsie!” (Thucydides 2:2.1)

In Bali, female priestesses would dope up slaves on opium, and then coax them into jumping into a fire, where they burned to death. At Pythia, they breathed toxic fumes and spoke gibberish, which was “translated” in prophesies.

Over at the LDS church, a feminist named Kate Kelly pressured the church to ordain women into priesthood leadership. When it looked like she wouldn’t get her way, she lashed out at fellow church members for having standards of obedience:

> Sadly, the Mormon faith has become a place that incentivizes the survival of the least fit. Since strict obedience is demanded and harshly enforced, only the least talented, least articulate, least nuanced thinkers, least likely to take a stand against abuse, and the least courageous people thrive in the Church today."

Does it strengthen religion if people are not expected to follow a set ofles? Is that what feminism is about? What is the point of religion if it does not require adherence to a moral code?

I was struck by how similar Kate sounded to anti-Christian Roman Celsus. In the 2nd century, Census said Christians "are able to convince only the foolish, dishonorable and stupid" to follow their doctrine.

He said: "Let no one educated, no one wise, no one sensible draw near. For these abilities are thought by us to be evils. But as for anyone ignorant, anyone stupid, anyone uneducated, anyone who is a child, let him come boldly."

The LDS church wisely excommunicated Kate Kelly for apostasy. But leftists continue to attack anyone who separates themselves from profane worldly philosophies, such as gender equality.

Many women and weak-minded men give in to the shame. We need men to weather these attacks, publicly expose the apostates, and boldly declare the rigid standards for obedience.

Universal Salvation

Martin Luther opened up the possibility of female ordination with a poorly-worded definition of priesthood which made women equal to men.

> "Every Christian man is a priest, and every Christian woman a priestess… All > Christians are, properly speaking, members of the ecclesiastical order, and there is no difference between them except that they hold different offices."

The left's obsession with "equality" is tearing churches apart. What is the point of religion if we are all equal no matter what we do?

This is the most acidic element of Social Justice ideology. Is the woman who confesses adultery every week to her female priest on the same level as an ancient prophet? If our actions have no bearing on our salvation, why not permit any kind of aberration?

No, you cannot wave your hands in the air and declare yourself "saved." It is our job as men to figure out how to access redemption and atonement, through justice and mercy. We need to get to the core falsehoods behind the Social Justice ideology and understand how it opposes true doctrine.

We also need to depart from Dante's version of hell, with grinning goblins and "bad boy" devils, and look critically at what organized evil really is. How does the devil oppose truth? Isn't universal salvation a demonic doctrine?

Absolutely it is. Religion should improve people's behavior, not make excuses for their refusals to change. The devil is the omega who attacks men who have a higher IQ for their "white male privilege." The devil is the androgynous feminist who blames men for the misery in her life. Constantly, the devil is pulling down the strong and excellent, and demanding conformance to the perverted and weak.

This is why the devil told Eve that she would be equal to God if she ate the forbidden fruit. All it would take was a bite of an apple and exaltation would be achieved–no work or merit needed! No need for Adam either! But of course, justice turned out to be very different. She would be plunged into a dark and lonely world, where she toiled for her achievement and gained joy through marriage with Adam, who would be her priesthood authority.

Government Persecution

> “Childish leaders oppress my people, and women rule over them. O my people, your leaders mislead you; they send you down the wrong road.” (Isaiah 3:12)

America was once a land where the state separated itself from the church. This used to allow men to pursue the dictates of their conscience. But lately, un-elected leaders of the government took it upon themselves to redefine marriage–a religious institution.

The government is further being used to punish religions that do not include gays. Just the other day, President Obama published a “shame list” of Christian colleges that exclude transgenders from their staff.

It is important to realize that this is not a case of secularism versus religion. This is not government versus faith. Rather, this is a case of one religion oppressing another, with government as a weapon. The government is being used by the abominable religion of social justice to stamp out opposition.

Feminism is a church, a very intolerant church, and it dismantles the separation of church and state that should exist. They are no different, really, than the witches of old who worked dark magic.

You may think there is multitude of churches claiming to be true, and the alternative choice of a secular lifestyle. But really, there are two ways only, the right way and wrong way. Regardless of how you feel about religion, you are on one of those roads.

The time for a pacific attitude is over. Through research, pondering and personal prayer, we have what it takes to discern the devil’s destructive elements in our society and to walk the good path.

It was prophesied that childish leaders would place women in positions of authority over people. You must not give any concessions to them. Do not budge an inch. Because the moment you do, that gives them room to inject their poison and their inquisitions grow more severe.

This is a scary prospect when you have the government being used against you. The incessant propaganda in the media makes you think everyone is against you. But you must not apologize for being right.

If it becomes overwhelming, do not run away from spirituality completely, because the devil points his guns in the areas that are most vital for our growth and happiness. Look inside yourself.

Conclusion

The first thing to do is to stop the ordination of women in the churches. Commodus in Antioch appointed female priestesses if they were able to recite hymns or if they won a wrestling match. Today, all a woman needs to gain moral authority is a liberal arts degree. But they do not bring us closer to truth.

The second thing is to enforce good behavior through obedience to scripture. Yes, we can gain atonement for our mistakes, but that does not mean ignoring divine justice. It means a firm grasp of scriptural doctrine.

Finally, carefully consider the spiritual blessings and responsibilities that come with being a man. It is not your place as a man to submit to a church public-relations board or diversity officer. God is a Father in Heaven, and we grow closer to Him as men by emulating the great compassion, justice, and holiness that we see in His grand creations.

The church begins with this personal relationship, and then it grows as the enlightened and chosen lift up the humble and faithful.

How Abortion And Birth Control Destroyed Traditional Families

May 14, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

Over the last several decades, the number of children being raised in single parent homes has skyrocketed. While there is plenty of evidence to confirm that children are less likely to be abused and more likely to be successful when raised in a traditional two parent family, more children are living in single parent homes than ever before. This raises an interesting question: In an era of birth control and legal abortion, why are there more broken homes and children born to unwed mothers?

A Brief Visit To The Past

Suppose you entered a time machine and traveled to 1960. You start a conversation with a citizen and tell him you're from the future. After his initial shock subsides, you tell him that in the 21st century, our cool black president will ensure birth control would be available to all young women, condoms will be freely available at clinics and high schools, and even if contraception fails, abortion is legal in all 50 states. You then ask him, "Do you think in the future there will be more unwanted pregnancies, more broken homes, and more children living in poverty, or fewer?" Imagine what this man might think.

Our friend from 1960 might be astounded to learn that the number of single parents have more than tripled as a share of American households over the last six decades. He might reasonably ask, "But if you have free birth control and legal abortion, why aren't more people waiting or optimizing their plans so their children have two parents?"

Moreover, births to unmarried mothers and number of children in foster care have also risen. In 1960, the number of children living in foster care and institutions was approximately 200,000. In the 1990s it jumped to over half a million, and most recently it is still more than 400,000.

It may sound crass to ask this, but why did their parents not take advantage of the widely available options to prevent pregnancy? Some would argue that preventing the birth of a child in dire circumstances would be far more compassionate than allowing their child to be raised by multiple different foster families. Why did American families fall apart after the rise of birth control and abortion?

Broken Families Are The Direct Consequence Of Birth Control And Abortion

Enter the Akerloff-Yellen theory of reproductive technology. In a provocative paper from the Brookings Institute, researchers analyzed the influence of reproductive technology on families and births in the United States.

The researchers linked the decline of the traditional family to a "technology shock" created by both birth control and legal abortion. That combination changed the incentives surrounding sex and marriage: Women now have power over reproduction at the expense of other kinds of power in relationships (particularly the collective power to not have sex with uncommitted men), and men "changed their attitudes regarding the responsibility for unplanned pregnancies." Men began to place reproductive responsibility mostly on the woman. After all, her body, her choice.

Her body, her choice

As a consequence of making pregnancy and birth the physical choice of the woman, marriage and fatherhood became the social choice of the man.
Fatherhood is no longer an obligation, thanks to contraception and loose social norms. In the past, women were far more selective about their sexual partners, and had few options when they became pregnant. Furthermore, men were often more invested in the women by the time they had sex, and felt a sense of responsibility and obligation to both the woman and child.

His Body, His Choice

More choices for women means more choices for men, too

Today, with the lack of social stigma plus the emphasis on female choice, we can observe the predictable consequences for the two-parent family. Previously, sex had higher stakes for both men and women, and their behavior reflected that. Today, women can engage in sex with multiple partners while sterilizing her body at the height of her fertility.

Women also appear to be using the outdated strategy of trying to lock down a man for marriage by "accidentally" skipping her birth control and getting pregnant. Today, women seem to be unaware that while they have the choice whether or not to get pregnant, men now have the choice to stick around and help raise the child or leave and send her a monthly check.

Men no longer feel the same duty toward women that our grandfathers felt. When we see women behaving like sluts, taking semi-nude selfies on social media, and openly discussing in public their sexual misadventures of the previous night, we don't think to ourselves, "This women would be an excellent mother." Some men, if their sexual partner gets pregnant whether on purpose or on accident, feel no obligation to the woman for two reasons:

- She could easily have prevented it by taking birth control
- The variety of backup options including the morning-after pill and abortion.

Why, some men think to themselves, should I help her with this problem that she created for herself?

Perfectly encapsulated in a single tweet.

These are the results of the technology that supposedly set women free. Women craved the chance to live like men by giving their best years in order to attain a worthless degree and enter a soul-sucking office job. Women embraced the sexual revolution by swallowing sterilization pills so they could impress strangers by saying they are a "diversity consultant" or other nonsensical, self-important titles.

Women made their choice, not understanding that their decisions don't exist in a vacuum. For something as sensitive and important and children and family, it is surprising that more people did not predict that this technology would disrupt nearly every facet of American society, not just women's ability to avoid childrearing.

To conclude, birth control and abortion have had an immense effect on American culture: By reducing the chances that any particular sexual encounter would lead to pregnancy or childrearing, the widespread availability of contraception in the 1960s in addition to Planned Parenthood clinics popping up across the country after Roe v. Wade in 1973, essentially guaranteed a loosening of sexual attitudes, a period of great social upheaval, and a shift away from the traditions of courtship.

One quote sums up men's reactions to women's poor choices, "Women today want men more like our grandfathers. But our grandfathers were only attracted to women like our grandmothers."

The 5 Best Jobs For Men In College

May 14, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Nowadays, it seems that everyone is recommending internships—either paid, or unpaid. As has already been said here on Return Of Kings, unpaid internships are a huge scam, and you should not accept them.

However, even paid internships often don't offer you any real life experience, and they end up paying you a "stipend." What this really means, is that you'll be copying documents and organizing papers for often less than minimum wage.

For the young men here, I want the best for you. I want you to get college jobs that will not only earn you some decent cash, but that will also teach you about life, women, and happiness… while getting you some pretty nice perks along the way.

I am sharing this wisdom with you, because I want more men like us in power—men who are aware of the liberal machine and its curtain of deceit should be given more financial and social power. And what better way to do that than by starting in college?

1. Caddie

One of my mentors, who now owns a tech-startup company in Silicon Valley, said that being a caddie during his college years was one of the best decisions he ever made.

The key, however, is to choose the right club. There's one right outside of Washington, D.C. known as the Burning Tree Club. This is the one that he worked at. He told me that the initiatory fee was $75,000, and in order to be a member an additional $500 per month fee was required. In other words, you'll be getting tipped $50 per hour by rich old men who want to help out hard-working young lads such as yourselves. My mentor said that he even pulled $150 per hour on some occasions.

In addition to this, you get to spend time with wealthy, successful politicians and businessmen—just this alone makes being a caddie an invaluable job. Imagine being able to ask them for one piece of advice after every hole they play. You would surely gain countless pearls of wisdom in just a matter of months. And as if that isn't enough, you'll be working outside getting a tan. What more could a young boy want?

Caddies operate on a first come, first serve basis, and the bar is extremely low. Just find a wealthy country club near you, show up at 5:30AM, and tell them you want to caddie. For the first week they'll probably make you follow around an experienced caddie, just so you can learn the ropes.

Once this learning phase is over, however, you can come in and work as often as you want—there's no schedule and no minimum hours required of you. There's also no age requirement which is nice; you just have to be strong enough to carry around one or two golf bags.

2. Uber Driver

Although I don’t personally have experience as a caddie, I do have experience as an Uber driver—and let me tell you, if you know what you’re doing, it’s very easy.

There are certain regulations depending on the state, but I got registered within a week and a half. The beauty of this job is that you can pretty much work whenever you want, and if you’re smart, you can net an easy $15-20 per hour after expenses while driving around, listening to audio-books or educational podcasts.

It’s best if you live near a major city (DC, Las Vegas, Boston, etc.) but even in small towns the payout can often be large. Expect to make $25-35 per hour during the morning commute and nighttime commute hours, and up to $100 per hour on busy events (St. Patrick’s Day, New Orleans, the Superbowl, etc.).

The key to doing Uber is to only accept the rides when the surge is 2.0 or above—anything less than that and it isn’t worth it in my opinion. Also be sure to learn the local hot spots in your area. For DC it’s Dupont Circle, Foggy Bottom, and Capitol Hill. The best times to drive, like I said before, are either 5-10AM on weekdays or 4-11PM Monday through Saturday.

3. Club Promoter

Being a club promoter is by far the best job that you can have if you're trying to get laid and develop some really good social skills.

In a nutshell, the way that this job works, is that you get paid a flat rate (usually, but not always) like $10 per hour. It's your job to get as many people to come to a specific night club as possible—so you'll also get a commission per ticket that you sell. The job consists of putting up flyers, contacting local celebrities, repping the event on Instagram, Facebook, etc.

This can easily add up to $1,000 a week if you put in the work, but the real benefits come from the connections you'll make. When you're repping a certain event, you never know who you'll shake hands with. It could be an up and coming musician who invites you to an amazing after party, it could be the local coke dealer, or it could be a girl who's willing to suck your dick in the bathroom if you give her and her friends VIP access.

Either way, this job is a win-win—not only does it pay pretty handsomely, but you'll also score girls left and right.

Unfortunately, this only works if you live in a city that has a vibrant nightlife, but if you can get this opportunity I would highly recommend it. The bar is pretty low, although some experience in sales helps. I recommend meeting one on one with the club manager and handing him your resume personally.

Jobs that are based off of social skills and networking tend to only hire once they actually meet you – they care a lot less about your resume than they do your appearance and social skills. Be sure to dress well and make a good impression if you want to get this job.

4. Lifeguard

Although it isn't very high paying, the perks are incredible. You get paid to sit outside in the nice weather, get a tan, and chat with sexy girls in bikinis all day. Seriously, what could be better?

All you have to do in order to get a job as a lifeguard is get certified in CPR (I did this in one night, it took me 4 hours) and be able to swim 200 meters or something like that (it changes depending on where you apply).

Regardless, it's ridiculously easy to get a job being a lifeguard, and I guarantee if you work out you'll meet tons of girls who want to fuck you so that they can brag to their friends about how they "slept with that cute lifeguard."

5. Supplement Store Salesman

I actually had a job at a place called Max Muscle. which sells some extremely high quality supplements. This was good for several reasons. First off, I got a massive discount on supplements. In addition to this, I got to spend time with the amateur bodybuilders that worked there. They would always give me tips on specific exercises to do, the best meal plans, and other things.

But, perhaps the biggest benefit I got was developing relationships with the sexy fitness model chicks that would come in on a regular basis. Because I was in a position of authority (the guy recommending and selling them stuff), they were pretty attracted to me. I actually had quite a few girls invite me out to go get drinks.

I also learned the ins and outs of the supplement industry—what's bullshit, what works, and what doesn't. I learned what ingredients make a pre-workout effective, why you should buy cold processed whey protein powder, and how literally 95% of "natural" fitness models are actually on steroids.

In short, it was a great job. I also got paid a 5% commission (most supplement stores do the same), and seeing that you can often sell $200 worth of product every hour, this adds up to roughly $27 per hour including minimum wage.

Not bad for a job where you get to hang out with bodybuilder bros, flirt with sexy fitness chicks, and learn about the most effective supplements.

BONUS: Scams to Avoid

There's a lot of scams out there, especially when it comes to college students. Unfortunately, a lot of fucking losers try to make their money by pushing false hope and promises onto college students desperate for money. Here are three scams to avoid:

1. Amway

I had a brief stint in Amway, because my boss at the time pressured me to go to a meeting. Afraid I would lose my job if I didn't, I caved.

However, I quit as soon as I found a different job—Amway is a cult filled with weirdos who think that they're going to make a million dollars a day in passive income by recommending shit quality overpriced products. Do not fall for the hype or listen to the people who claim that they're making money with this—it's a scam, plain and simple.

2. Vector

Vector is the distribution network of Cutco (a company that manufactures knives). I actually made $100 per hour in commission with them, but even with this huge wage I do not recommend it. All of the money is commissions based, so if you aren't a good salesman you won't make a dime (after you factor in gas money).

Their environment is extremely condescending and their corporate culture is based off of lies and false promises. My boss was extremely manipulative, and upon talking with other people who worked for Vector they said the same about their bosses. They also pay you to give them your phone contacts so that they can pester your friends with promises of "make $20 per hour or more!"

The reality is that 99% of people who worked with me didn't make shit. The only reason I made $100 per hour was because I'm naturally a great salesman, but even then I walked away from it, because the company was highly unethical and took advantage of young, desperate college kids.

3. Anything Where You Make More Money By Recruiting

Generally speaking, even if they aren't technically pyramid schemes, if you make more money by recruiting people than you do by actually working, it's a pyramid scheme.

Avoid working for companies like Herbalife, ACN, Mary Kay, or Shaklee. You can make money with these companies, yes, but only if you spent over a decade hustling your ass off 80 hours a week duping friends and family into selling products for you.

Also any flyers you see offering "$12 per hour for college students!" or "$15 per hour per base appointment!" is almost indefinitely a scam. They make you spend hours cold calling people setting up appointments to sell their garbage, telling you even if you don't sell anything you're guaranteed $15 per appointment. In reality, this works out to being like $3 per hour once you factor in gas, driving time, and calling time.

Stay safe, get good jobs, and become financially empowered, so that when the US economy starts to crumble we will be the ones with the power to rebuild it.

Are Isometric Exercises Worth Doing?

May 15, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

As I alluded to in a previous article, I have suffered an injury to my foot that necessitates a cast, but I have continued writing articles and even decided to come up with a few pertinent to those in similar conditions.

What Are Isometric Exercises?

Isometric exercise is defined as any exercise in which the muscle and joint contract and "flex," but do not extend—a static position, in other words. These can be done by resisting against any immovable force, such as a wall, a standard weight, or even one's own body.

While in an ideal situation, I feel that having a full and natural path of motion will provide a superior workout, which is incidentally why free weights will always be superior to machines. Isometrics can still be a nice supplemental workout, as advocated by many of the earliest proponents of modern physical culture such as Monte Saldo and Eugen Sandow—as well as one of the few options for exercise available to those in restrictive situations. I myself have started to utilize isometrics while I am temporarily incapable of walking.

My Isometric Routine

The routine that I started with, and still largely use (doing it twice a week as I would have done with standard resistance training) is taken from the “Black Monk” set of isometrics, which are claimed to have been invented by a group of Buddhist monks imprisoned in highly constricted conditions before ultimately escaping via applying nerve pressure to the guards outside (this printed set of isometrics is also where the pictures are taken from).

While I personally doubt this comic book-esque origin story, I do find that these exercises are fairly rigorous, and have reduced the amount of muscular atrophy that I have had in the month-plus of inactivity I have been through, and likely will continue to do so in the coming months ahead. This article will deal with the upper body isometric exercises.

The first isometric exercise I do is one I have previously discussed in my article on abdominal exercise: the abdomen vacuum. To do this exercise, stand up as straight as you can. In my case, I put my knee up on a chair-place the hands on your hips. Take a deep breath while simultaneously “sucking in” the abdominal muscles—imagine that you are trying to touch your bellybutton to your spine.

Then exhale while simultaneously continuing to suck in your abdomen, Once you have completely breathed out, relax.

The first black monk isometric is to place the hands together in the prayer position at chest level. Take a deep breath and push the hands together hard, exhaling as you apply pressure (this method of breathing is done for all isometrics). Your arms should visibly be shaking. Do a couple of sets of these, making sure to catch your breath before the next set, and move on.

Next, lock fingers as shown and attempt to pull apart, do a few sets of these and move on. The actual document recommends four sets for adult men for all exercises, but I would start with one or two.

The next pose is the famous chest pose used by bodybuilders. Place on arm at the side, and bend 90 degrees at the elbow. Bring the other arm around and clasp hands—one palm should be facing up, one should be facing down. Inhale and apply conflicting pressure while exhaling. Then switch sides. Whether or not you want to do two sets or four sets for each side is a decision best left up to the individual.

Moving the arms down to waist level, make one hand into a fist, and clasp it in the other hand, exhaling and pressing as hard as possible. Then switch hands and repeat.

Bring the hands back up to chest level, make two fists, and put one fist on top of the other. Push the top fist down and the bottom fist up, keeping the two fists between the pectoral muscles and the bellybutton, then switch.

Bringing the hands back to the belly button, place one palm facing out and clasp it with the other hand, then push away/towards the torso.

The back receives its first workout with this exercise—place the arms behind the back and have them laying next to each other as pictured. Then push forward with both arms.

The hands and forearms are worked with the last two exercises: The first consists of grabbing each forearm with the opposite hand and squeezing very hard.

The second consists of the fingers being interlaced, and having the hands rotate in opposite directions. Then switch the directions the hands are rotating in.

Conclusion

While I admit I am not sure how effective these exercises are in comparison to standard resistance training (I would wager the latter is more effective), I can personally vouch for isometrics being useful in maintaining musculature and preventing atrophy when regular methods of exercise are not available. Isometrics are useful to learn should you find yourself inconvenienced, and as a supplemental exercise as well. Try for yourself!

When Everyone Has To Accept Gay Marriage, It’s Not Tolerance But Tyranny

May 15, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

A Swedish business owner will have to pay thousands in damages to a lesbian couple who wanted to have their wedding at her rural venue. The religious owner of the establishment didn’t want a gay wedding on her property, which counts as discrimination and a crime.

This is just one of many examples of how legalising same-sex marriage is not about love or equal rights, it’s about about making people accept something their conscience and beliefs find unacceptable. It’s about criminalizing conservatism and infringing on people’s freedom of religion.

Lesbians pressed charges after being turned down

Trollebo Gård on its web page describes itself as a “paradise.” Situated in Småland, Sweden, the farm dates back to the 14th century. According to its own description, a knight by the name of Lionface gave it to his wife as a wedding gift in 1361. Now it’s for sale, with a starting price of 15 million SEK (about 1.8 million USD).

In November 2014, the farm wasn’t on the market yet. For what I assume was a high price, you could arrange parties, conferences and other festive events there. A lesbian couple decided they wanted to have their wedding at the scenic location. They called up the owner who said that it wasn’t possible, there were no times available for a wedding. But only four days later, a heterosexual couple had no problem making a reservation for their wedding at the same place.

Somehow the lesbian couple found out about this and charged Trollebo Gård for discrimination. Now the case has been settled and the owner has admitted to the charges. The owner, a woman, did in fact not want homosexuals to be married at her venue, so she turned the couple's request down. She claimed that the reason for this was her religious beliefs.

The Equality Ombudsman says that religiosity is not a valid reason to turn down a customer. Therefore, Trollebo Gård now has to pay 15.000 SEK to each of the women, 30.000 total ($3,664 USD), in damages.

An ominous rainbow over Trollebo Gård.

Freedom of religion ended with gay marriage

I haven't seen this case get a lot of attention in the media. Maybe it's because people don't see it as a big deal. Maybe they think it's right that the owner got this punishment for discriminating against gays. Or maybe they think it's too embarrassing that this has happened in a country that purports to have freedom of religion. Obviously the right of this woman to live by her moral principles, rooted in her religious beliefs, has not been respected.

What's interesting is that the law doesn't seem to treat all people the same in this matter. The Swedish parliament decided to make marriage laws gender neutral in 2009, and so same-sex marriage became legal. The same year, the Lutheran Church of Sweden changed their own statutes to make it possible for gay couples to get married in church. However, the new rules also meant that no individual priest was obligated to conduct same-sex weddings.

What this means is that a priest can legally refuse to marry gay couples with reference to his own conscience and deeply held beliefs. Yet when a business owner for the same reasons don't want to have gay weddings on her private property, it's deemed discrimination and a violation of the law. To me, this doesn't make any sense at all. It does seem like the church and its clerics have privileges that normal citizens don't have.

Sorry that you didn't get a trigger warning for this, but neither did I.

Traditional values have become illegal

I've never really given gay marriage that much thought. I'm not a religious person, so I don't see it as an issue in that sense. But when you get the government involved in things, it's never as simple as a private matter. Now we're all involved, because the government's dictates can't be ignored. If the politicians want you to approve of same-sex marriage, you have no other choice than to abide. (Or they'll put a gun to your face.)

But wait a minute. Maybe I'm the bad guy in all of this. Gay people should have the same rights as straight people, shouldn't they? So if straight people can get married, gay people should be able to do that too. Wouldn't you be a really bigoted homophobe if you thought that marriage could only be between a man and a woman? And shouldn't that kind of thinking be a crime, since it can make gays feel badly treated?

My answer to that last question is: nope. I don't think any opinions or values should be criminal. Freedom of religion means you can practice your religion in whatever way you like, as long as it doesn't hurt anyone else. Getting some angry dyke's feelings hurt doesn't count.

Gay marriage isn't really the problem here, it's the laws that force everyone to accept it. They make you think it's about tolerance, "being nice," yet the very idea behind these laws is that traditional, conservative values can't be allowed to exist and must be suppressed. The political scene is infested with Marxists who are by far the most intolerant people on this planet. Yet they are also great deceivers and can make you think that their intolerance is really about being nice and inclusive, 2 plus 2 equals 5.

Tyranny is being sold as tolerance, and it’s unfortunate that so many are buying into it.

6 Steps To Becoming A Good Male Feminist

May 16, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

So, you think white-knighting part-time isn't enough and you want to be a full-time male feminist fighting for "equality"? Here is the only guide you'll ever need to get started on your journey to becoming a feminist patsy.

1. Be a total loser

That's too extreme; try castration instead.

First, before you even embark on your quest for self-degradation, be sure that you're a total loser. A confident and self-respecting man reminds feminists of the patriarchy, so you must shed yourself of all masculinity and be a sniveling and groveling man-child to ensure that the feminists feel safe around you.

Remember: men who are drawn to feminism are human garbage by their nature. They don't work out, they get bitchy and whiny, they're poisoned with envy, they do nothing to improve themselves, women avoid them like rapists, they don't ever accomplish anything worthwhile, they find glory in being friendzoned, and they have absolutely no value to the world. Deep inside, they themselves know that they're low-grade shits, which is why they need to compensate for their worthlessness by seeking female approval.

Oh, sure there are few famous entertainers who pretend to be feminists to virtue signal, but you're better than that. You're not like them (of course you're not, you're a loser); instead, you want to be a genuine and humble every-day male feminist, right?

So, be sure to complete this step before moving onto the next. It's mandatory.

2. Supplicate to women

All good feminist boys know that their very existence contributes to rape culture.

Now that you've established yourself as a loser, you must prove yourself worthy of being both a male and a feminist by supplicating to the womankind. You see, as a cis-scum and a potential rapist, you're not welcomed in their terrorist movement. You must go below and beyond in your efforts to debase yourself to show that you're not like those rapey, sexist men. No, you're one of the "good" guys who does everything that women tell him to do, sort of like how a little boy does everything to win his mommy's approval.

So, always do as women say and not as they do. Failure to accept women's contradictory nature will lead to your failure as a male feminist.

3. Bash other men

Is this: A) Room full of women willing to date you for your valiant efforts, or, B) Room full of men you've converted to the feminist cause by bashing them?

Since women are clearly above men and completely free from criticism regardless of what they do (remember: any criticism of female behaviour is sexist), you have no one else to feel superior to than the other men. But since you're a loser how can you compensate for this and feel good about yourself? It's simple: bash other men for not being a good feminist dog like you.

It doesn't matter how accomplished and decent another man is and how many women they are able to attract (unlike you), if they do not submit to the feminist dogma, you must shame and attack them with the same pitiful envy that you've adopted from your feminazi masters.

Are they giving tips on how to attract women? Call them losers and rapists (remember, projection is your weapon). Are they exposing feminist lies and double-standards? Avoid facts and just call them "misogynists." Sure, you might piss them off and encourage more of them to hate feminism, but your goal is to earn female approval, right? Not to actually help women's cause.

Perhaps you can even start your own blog and trawl through all the sexist manosphere websites like a stalker to look for all the mean things that are said (after all, you're a loser who doesn't have anything better to do with your time). Be careful though, try avoid reading all the self-improvement materials that are offered lest you accidentally improve yourself and reverse your loserdom (remember, you can't be a male feminist without being a loser). Do your best to ignore those and cherry-pick all the things that make you feel good about yourself. You accomplished nothing in your life, so you might as well celebrate not being a "misogynist."

4. Submit to your feminist overlords

Meet your feminist master. Maybe you can make the world a better place by volunteering to be her first victim.

Once you've completed the first three steps, you are now ready to present yourself as a useful pawn for the feminists. Always keep in mind that feminism is based on three principles: ignorance, lies, and double standards. You can't call yourself a feminist unless you master those three principles, so practice them daily: Stay ignorant to the realities of sex relationships and the nature of women; continue spreading baseless claims of "rape culture," wage gap, and other brainless hysteria; pretend to be tough and ridicule your opponents when faced with facts; and last, ignore all the double standards of feminism no matter how often they are brought up. Feminists can't be sexists because they're oppressed.

Also, remember that it's not enough to simply show your support for feminism, you must completely submit your existence to it. For example, it wasn't enough for Jian Ghomeshi to openly support feminism with his status, he was back-stabbed regardless because he didn't give into the female imperative. And don't try something stupid like questioning why the feminists are such hateful garbage that they are, because they will not hesitate to eat their own for heresy. You are to simply shut up and continue playing your role of the useful idiot.

5. Keep your faith guarded

Don't bother being a male feminist unless you hate yourself and all other men this much.

In a dangerously patriarchal world like ours, it is imperative for you to guard your faith against the truth. Today, less and less women are identifying themselves as feminists as they are starting to realize how idiotic the entire lunatic movement is, and many are even openly opposing it. But you cannot lose hope!

Sure, the other sexist men of manosphere may be building businesses, traveling the world, broadening their wisdom, giving self-improvement tips to help other men, and actually dating and having sex with women (unlike you), but none of that stuff matters. YOU are the good guy in this war even though you do absolutely nothing to improve the lives of others (or yourself for that matter). You're not some white knight who fights for female love, you do it for nothing like a pawn!

Self-deception is the key to maintaining your sanity and your sanctimonious sense of moral superiority. You have to constantly lie to yourself that you're better than the other men even as you waste your life away trolling and spewing your hate for them all over the internet, knowing full well that you're no match for them in real life. If you're a loser, the best thing you can do is to attack other men who are more accomplished than you are.

6. Go reap your reward

A man who was finally awarded for being a good feminist dog. You can be like him too if you only try harder!

If you've been a good boy for a long enough time, you just might get rewarded with what you've been seeking the whole time: female acceptance. Heck, one of the fat and aesthetically challenged ones might even want to marry you once she's done sleeping around with all the sexist bastards. You can then be her personal bitch-boy who serves her like a slave only to be cuckolded later on. But of course, it's your job to continue being a faithful husband while she is free to experiment and "embrace herself" all she wants. Equality, right?

Conclusion

Being a self-loathing cuck with no self-esteem is not an easy task. You have to juggle between having the audacity to attack your own sex while putting yourself down far enough to get a pat on the head from the feminists. But, in spite of all the difficulties, I urge you to continue on. The feminists may get their fragile egos temporarily bolstered up by your undying support, but in the long-run, your efforts will expose exactly what those harpies have in store for us men. Both men and women of today will be disgusted by your toady efforts to spread the toxic ideology and be repulsed by it, thereby slowly killing the cancer that is feminism. You know, the same movement that is supposedly led by independent women who don't need some lowly cis-gendered man like you.

So, please, continue being a miserable simp while the rest of us live our lives.

Have fun!

10 Tips For Successfully Using Airbnb

May 16, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The explosive growth of Airbnb has been impressive, to say the least. Like many "platform" businesses, it was initially created out of necessity. It all started in 2007, when two designers, Joe Gebbia and Brian Chesky, began to have problems making the rent payments on their San Francisco apartment. They thought they could turn their loft into a "rental space," but felt that existing platforms like Craigslist were not the right way to advertise the space.

The best solution, they felt, was to set up a special website just to handle temporary rentals. This turned out to be an inspired move. Visionary business ideas often seem "obvious" in retrospect, but they are anything but this at the time.

Gebbia and Chesky set up their website, added photos of the rental space, and got the word out there. The space rented instantly, and in a city like San Francisco where hotel space is limited, the word spread fast. Soon they were getting emails from people all over the world asking when they could rent their space too. This was when they realized that they had stumbed on a gold mine. Seven years later (2014), Airbnb.com had over 550,000 properties listed, 10 million guests, and a valuation of around 10 billion dollars. Chesky and Gebbia no longer have problems making their rent.

Some of you may be frequent users of the site. Some may have never used it at all. I started using it a few years ago during my frequent visits to a certain Brazilian city. I got tired of dealing with the rather insulting restrictions that some hotels in the city would mandate regarding guests and visitors. I also wanted the option of having more privacy than a traditional hotel might allow.

I had a few friends who said good things about the site, so I gave it a try. It turned out to be a great decision. This might be a good time to offer my thoughts on how to make your Airbnb experience a good one. If you can follow these tips, you'll be well on your way.

1. Read the listings very, very carefully

Airbnb gives the apartment owners some leeway in what they can do. Make sure you check out all the details, and then re-check them. Is the bathroom shared or not? Is there a security deposit required? Is there wifi access? Will you have to pay extra for certain things? I once made the mistake of not seeing that one host had a policy of charging extra for electricity usage during the stay.

2. Communicate with the host through the site

You want there to be a record of your communication with the owner of the property. If something goes wrong, the Airbnb people will be able to see all of the dialogue. When it comes to disputes, he who keeps the best records usually wins.

3. Make sure you also have the host's WhatsApp info or phone number

There is no contradiction between this and the previous point. Always have a backup option for communication. If you get off a plane and are tired and disoriented, you want to be able to call your host if some problem occurs.

4. Be alert to warning signs for bad hosts

This is critical. How can you tell if a host will be a problem? You will get a sense for it over time. Unreasonable hosts generally will have too many requirements, will make too many demands, and will just not “feel” right.

Some like to play “hide the ball” and not disclose things overtly. One prospective host, for example, wanted to know the names and ID numbers of any guest that would come to my room. That is not reasonable. Another host wanted to charge extra for electricity. That is also not reasonable (in my opinion).

Remember, when you reserve that room with your credit card, you are committed. So, before you actually book the room, make sure you communicate with the host. Doing so will enable you to sniff out whether he or she is a dunce. The minute you get the feeling that the host is a dunce, move on. Trust me, you’ll thank yourself.

5. Only use a credit card online

Do I really need to tell you this in 2016? Just making sure, guys.

6. Make sure you write a good review for your host

And ask that he or she reciprocates and does the same for you. You want to build up some credibility on the site, and nothing does that better than peer reviews.

7. Use Airbnb’s customer service

Google the number and take it with you. The customer service has come a long way in recent years. They used to just toss you back to the host and tell you to resolve it with them. Not any more. Perhaps because of some recent bad publicity from a couple unfortunate incidents (which I need not relate here), Airbnb has done a great job of having a real customer service department. I had a great experience with them the one time I had to cancel a reservation. They were prompt, responsive, and professional.

8. Check your communication skills

If you are communicating in a foreign language, keep things short and simple. Repeat key points when needed. That will reduce the chances of misunderstandings. You don’t want your host to misread something important, so make your sentences clear, short, and free of any slang or idiom.

9. It is not a hotel

Remember that this is someone's property. Don't disrespect it. Clean it up before you go, and treat the property with care. You get the idea.

10. Pay attention to the host's "cancellation policy"

This will be listed right on the host's page. Some hosts have strict policies on cancellation, and others are more lenient. Strict policies are going to be just that: once you're booked, you are financially committed. Be warned.

Like anything in life, Airbnb is not perfect. Like the decision whether to use Uber or hire a cab, there are going to be trade-offs both ways. But it's clear that Airbnb is here to stay, and for me, the pros far outweigh the cons.

The Significance Of The Feast Of Pentecost

May 16, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

> For you are not come to a mountain that might be touched, and a burning fire, and a whirlwind, and darkness, and storm, and the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words, which they that heard excused themselves, that the word might not be spoken to them; for they did not endure that which was said: "and if so much as a beast shall touch the mount, it shall be stoned." And so terrible was that which was seen, that Moses said "I fear and tremble." But you are come to mount Sion, and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to the company of many thousands of angels, and to the Church of the firstborn, who are written in the heavens, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of the just made perfect, and to Jesus the mediator of the new testament, and to the sprinkling of blood which speaketh better than that of Abel.

As the Pentecost cycle of the Synagogue (i.e., the Jews) treats of the core elements of the Old Covenant, so the Pentecost cycle of the Church exposits the core mysteries of the New Covenant, and the realization of the reconciliation between God and man. Let us interrupt our course on philosophy one week more, to look at this Feast and how it corresponds to what transpired more anciently.

God Occludes Himself atop Sinai

Pentecost and the Law

In the Old Testament, the Passover was when the Angel of the Lord "passed over" the Hebrews' homes, slaying the firstborn of Egypt. Fifty days later, the liberated Hebrews arrived at Mount Sinai and received the Law. Hence this festival is called Shavuot in Hebrew, or "Weeks," because it is a week of weeks (i.e., seven weeks) after Passover.

The Pentecost of the Old Covenant is an "antitype" of the Pentecost of the New Covenant. The term "antitype" refers to how a stamp is made in the mirror image of its desired impression. Thus does the Old Testament point forward to the New, with events of either Pentecost mirroring the other. Moses, the prophet of the Old Law, received it on the Pentecost after Pesach (Passover); Jesus, the fulfiller of the Old Law, gave a New Law on the Pentecost after Pascha (Easter). Jesus the Christ ascended to God on the 40th day after Pascha; Moses descended from God on the 40th day after Pentecost. Moses, leading the other Levites, killed 3000 idolaters on the ancient Pentecost; St. Peter, leading the other Apostles, converted 3000 devout Jews to eternal life, who had come to worship God on the festival.

The Old Law was written upon dead stones and emphasized the separation between the people and God, forbidding them to approach the mountain and being set in the Ark of the Covenant which the people could not touch; the New Law was not written down, but descended upon the true Ark of the Covenant (the Blessed Virgin, who bore the Word of God and the Manna from heaven in her womb), and upon all the Apostles and disciples who were gathered together in the high place of the upper room on mount Sion.

This latter point (of direct contact between God and man) is very important. The whole book of Hebrews dwells on the fulfillment of the Law in the Gospel; quoting in part from Jeremiah's prophesy of this new covenant (or testament), St. Paul says:

> And this is the testament which I will make unto them after those days, saith the > Lord. I will give my laws in their hearts, and on their minds will I write them: and their sins and iniquities I will remember no more. Now where there is a remission of these, there is no more an oblation for sin. Having therefore, brethren, a confidence in the entering into the holies by the blood of Christ; a new and living way which he hath dedicated for us through the veil, that is to say, his flesh, as a high priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with clean water. – Hebrews 10:16-22

Moses and the Brazen Serpent, Another Antitype of Christ's Fulfillment of the Law

This is a matter of stunning importance; in the New Covenant, the Law is not given as a fait accompli, written down in stone or on a page. Rather, God Himself descended upon the Church in the fire of the Holy Ghost, making of each heart a sanctuary, abiding in each soul and giving it the power to fulfill the Law in Spirit and Truth. Of course, this is not to make each person into his own priest, prophet and king, justifying persons in their private opinions about religious truth – the Spirit is given to the whole Body of the Church, and the differing ranks and duties of the members must be honored, all cleaving together in Faith, Hope and Charity by the same Spirit.

But, it certainly is to say that the New Law is a matter of God abiding with men, in and through them guiding the Church in a continuity of faith and activity through the "latter days." The last days are fully upon us in the Pentecost, for that begins the age in which the estrangement between men and God is overcome; God abides with men, and men begin finally to fulfill His Law in Spirit and Truth, becoming "perfect, as the Father in Heaven is perfect." St. Peter makes this explicit in his sermon on the Pentecost, again quoting the Old Covenant's prophets: "it shall come to pass, in the last days, (saith the Lord,) I will pour out of My Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams. And upon my servants indeed, and upon my handmaids will I pour out in those days of My Spirit…"

Indeed, this is another of the more important elements of the Pentecost; let us look at what has happened, again with reference to the times before Christ

Moses Sees the New Covenant Prefigured in the Burning Bush and Receives the Law

In the beginning, when Adam and Eve had sinned in paradise, the Lord ejected them from the garden, and set cherubim before the entrance with whirling swords of flame; they remained biologically alive, but spiritually they had perished—"in what day soever thou shalt eat of it, thou shalt die the death." On Sinai, God first appears to Moses in the burning bush, smokeless and unconsumed. Later, He hid Himself from the people in fire and smoke, warning that the people would die if they beheld Him or approached.

When God ordained the temple rites, many things indicate that the Temple, and especially the Holy of Holies (the innermost sanctuary) represent paradise. The words for the priests' service and tending of the temple are the same words used for Adam and Eve's duties in paradise. He commanded that the Holy of Holies be separated from the rest of the temple by a veil covered with cherubim. Just outside of it was the altar of incense, on which a fire was lit and incense burnt, so that the priest could protect himself with a cloud of smoke "lest he die" (Leviticus 16:13). Outside the Temple itself was the altar of holocausts, which also veiled the face of the temple in smoke. These altars were lit by a fire that had descended from heaven, and which the priests were to tend perpetually.

It is also recorded that men of old tried to bridge this gap once before, with the Tower of Babel. As a punishment, their tongues were confounded and they were unable to attain their aim; moreover, in Jewish tradition the uppermost regions of the tower were destroyed by fire from above. The theme is continual: God and man are estranged; God sets thick smoke and fire between Himself and man; the fire has a dual aspect, alternately punishing and rebuffing or shielding, protecting, purifying.

The Tower of Babel

Fallen man, at the beginning of the 40 days of Lent, hears this: “remember, man, that thou art ash, and to ash thou shalt be returned.” Redeemed, ascended man, 40 days after Easter, prepares to receive the flame of the Paraclete. “Presently the Lord, Whom you seek, and the Angel of the Testament, Whom you desire, shall come to His temple. Behold He cometh, saith the Lord of hosts. And who shall be able to think of the day of His coming? and who shall stand to see Him? for He is like a refining fire.” Indeed, our God is a consuming fire, and behold! On the Pentecost, He falls upon the prepared in cloven tongues of flame! Here is the New Law given and fulfilled in Spirit and Truth. Here the confusion of tongues at Babel is reversed; charity between men, and between men and God, is rekindled. “I have come to cast fire upon the earth,” our Lord said, “and how I wish it were already kindled!” He shall come again to judge the world by this self-same fire, and I tell you plainly, with Pentecost the judgment has already begun. The Kingdom has come, albeit only in part… for now.

Pentecost from a 6th Century Gospel Book

God has cast His fire on the earth, and when the time is ripe it shall become an ineluctable conflagration. Dies irae, dies illa, solvet saeclum in favilla, teste David cum Sibylla (“That day, the day of wrath, blasts the cosmos to cinder and ash; so David and the Sibyll swear”). Our choices and deeds shall determine whether we are reduced to cinders as well, or whether we shall be found to be “not of this world,” and already accustomed to the purifying fire of the divine nature in the tabernacle of our hearts.

He that thinks he stands, let him take heed, lest he fall; for we are unworthy of so great an inheritance. God speed you, men!

5 Shocking Things I Learned From Working In The Mainstream Media

May 17, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

After spending over a decade working in medium-sized cities for different television affiliates of ABC, NBC, and CBS, I came to the conclusion the industry does nothing but spew corporate, government, and Marxist propaganda nonstop. I was not content to spout this propaganda any longer, and I had to get out.

I went into the career with quite a different illusion. From childhood, growing up in the country we believed in the illusions the puppet masters in the “big city” media were creating. The media’s vision of the world and of our government led us to believe it was all truly a shining city on the hill, and journalists were wonderful people serving the public interest and looking out for the little guy.

Growing up a poor kid, with no connections, no race or gender card to play, and no money, landing a job as a news anchor seemed like a far off fantasy. Many in high school, including my teachers believed I could never make it. After driving off to college in a broken down car with $800 in my pocket, hitting the ground running in a different state 500 miles from home, often working two jobs, I pushed harder than the other kids at my school and landed an on-air position while in college.

Further hard work and sacrifice landed me another job and then another in a highly competitive field. Meantime, I could have been out doing blow off a whore’s ass instead of studying calculus and other tough subjects, effectively sacrificing some of the best years of my life, but I figured the payoff would be worth the sacrifice and pushed through.

However, I began to lose respect for the media once I found out the truth about who works in it, how it operates, why it operates, who it operates in the interest of, and how it was treating me. Here are five reasons I grew to despise the mainstream media before striking out to do my own thing. After all, I've learned it takes very little to make a man like me happy.

5. The Entire Industry Is Based On A Paper-Thin Illusion

Carrot dangling is a good metaphor for the fantasy of becoming journalist fighting for truth and justice and a decent living, the reality is low pay and exploitation

Many television stations are located in the bad part of town, relics of the Golden Age of America and the Golden Age of Television, and a good number are dumps with broken down buildings and shady management. The most arrogant, duplicitous men I have ever known are two former supervisors of mine.

In my final year, a former supervisor pulled me aside into the conference room to dissect email replies I had sent him, one of which included a complaint of his about a sesame seed in the floor of our office. His other purpose was to threaten me for not using the proper tone in my responses to his nattering emails. This man had a sterling image in my mind up until that day. Then I saw who he really was, and as I had seen from day one other talking heads were not living up to their nice guy public image, either.

But that was only one more in a long series of letdowns. The smiling faces that greet you each morning, noon, and night are put-ons. As Shakespeare said, the world is a stage and we are all actors upon it. That famous quote is a perfect description of the television news business.

Then there is the dark underbelly of the industry. Turnover rates are high, morale is low, and people who work in the industry are often the most evil, vicious people you will ever know, but who know how to convincingly hide it under a smiling face (just like politicians!). Furthermore, many in the industry are unhappy and lonely, sometimes to the point of being suicidal.

A Weather Channel employee's January suicide, sadly, was not surprising to me and seems typical of an Omega male rampage that we are seeing more of in today's debased society. The news report stated:

> Nicholas Wiltgen died from major head and brain injury after deliberately driving > through a concrete wall. Weather Channel meteorologist Nicholas Wiltgen committed suicide, the Fulton County Medical Examiner in Georgia said Tuesday. According to a statement issued by the medical examiner's office, Wiltgen died Sunday from major head and brain injury, the result of an intentional act of driving a vehicle through the concrete wall of a parking deck.

The industry is often a meat grinder, especially for beta and omega males who drink the Kool-Aid of the Anglo American cultural narrative. Not surprisingly, management and women step all over smart betas and omegas.

Forbes just ran an expose on the April suicide of another television news personality.

> This month a young television meteorologist took his life. Meteorologist Eric Sorenson posted a very stirring blog empathizing with Russell Bird and framing how his situation was very similar to many young broadcast meteorologists: in an unfamiliar place, low-paying starter job, and few local friends. This is a side of the glamorous TV world the public doesn't see.

The reality of the industry does not fit the gleaming image it broadcasts to the world. Since corporate consolidation, six corporate Goliaths now own 90% of the media, working conditions have deteriorated and the news turned into a cookie-cutter product. TV Spy, a news business gossip rag, used the Bird suicide to shine some light on the low pay and low morale that is the reality at most local news stations.

> In his post, Sorensen said, "Small-market TV still employs editors, photographers, reporters, and anchors who make less than cashiers at Walgreen's and cooks at McDonald's," says Sorensen. "And I know for a fact that in Rockford, answering phones pays more of the bills than directing an Emmy-award-winning newscast."

The duplicity of the spinmeisters never ceases to amaze. The official statement lamenting Russell Bird's suicide reads:

> Russell was a graduate of Ohio State University and had been with us since last July. He's remembered as a great weather scientist, and mostly as a great friend to all of us at the station. We will miss the joy he had, on and off camera, every day. We will miss the passion he brought to his work. Most of all, we will miss the man, and everything he was to us. Russell Bird was 27.

First of all nobody is a great friend when you work at a TV station, everyone is out for themselves and treachery is the norm, not the exception. Being forced to smile and put on a happy face every day is the "joy" they speak of. And the "passion" one has for his work is totally disrespected and not valued by the bosses.

Low pay (a friend of mine made minimum wage at his first on-air TV job, with a degree) was brought up by some members of the media as one contributing factor to low morale, as are contracts which stations use as tools of indentured servitude to keep you locked in for as many as five years at a time. Clauses in the contracts also keep successful people from going across town to work for a competitor for more money without getting sued. And, I personally know of one television station whose pay was so low for staff members that they were seen in the community using food stamp cards. After a public outrage, what was the solution from corporate management? Give these staff members a tiny raise, just large enough they would be denied benefits.

Before quitting, I was told bluntly my education and credentials did not matter by management. The illusion of the media sold to society been shattered, not only for those of us who dedicated a good part of our lives to it but for the public as well.

4. Since The Internet, Nobody Believes The Talking Heads Anymore

Credibility is everything, and the mainstream media has lost theirs

Since communication has become decentralized thanks to the internet, nobody but grey-haired oldsters, dupes, and Kool-Aid drinkers believe anything the talking heads say. Today, commoners like us have a voice equal to that of the once invincible "on-air personalities" at your local news outfit. They can be, and frequently are called out on their lies, half-truths, and misrepresentations. RT, which ironically tells more truth nowadays than any of the American corporate media, released this telling survey:

> A survey of more than 2,000 adults showed that trust in the media has dipped to dramatically low levels. About 52 percent of respondents said they have "some confidence" in the press, while 41 percent said they have "hardly any confidence." Only six percent expressed "a great deal of confidence." "Over the last two decades, research shows the public has grown increasingly skeptical of the news industry," the report from the American Press Institute reads.

This does not keep them from further muddying their image with drama over everything from vivisection of local political squabbling to fear mongering in a thinly veiled attempt at creating social hysteria every time there is a thunderstorm in the neighborhood.

3. Sensationalism Is What The Industry Runs On

TV news operates on a business model that draws heavily from the playground gossip model

The media has to create problems to create profit. The industry runs on finding a problem anywhere it can, then exploiting that problem to the max, no matter how many lives or careers it destroys all while looking over their own numerous faults. Most stations would be more appropriately named your “drama” station rather than your “news” station.

Understandably, when an industry has to cater to an audience that is 75% female and majority liberal, the message skews towards pedestalization of women, materialism, consumerism, and Marxism.

The people who populate news rooms are typically case studies in hypocrisy. A perfect example: A news room I worked in used to love to roast local pillars of the community or anyone of note who got arrested for DUIs. However, when a prominent member of our news team got arrested twice in a row for DUIs, the entire issue was swept under the rug. Let he who is without sin cast the first stone. If people would scratch the surface of many of these journalists, they would find out most of them live in glass houses and yet these deeply flawed news personalities love throwing huge stones around.

2. The Agenda Is One Of Cultural Marxism

Once vehemently denied, the Marxist agenda of the mainstream media has been laid bare in the Internet Age

Conservative or common sense views are shouted down at morning news planning meetings. The echo chamber from the elite media in New York, Los Angeles, and Atlanta sets the tone of what gets covered, how it gets covered, how the issues are framed, and who gets attacked when the talking heads do one of their infamous drive-bys.

Even conservative-minded news directors have to bite their lip, bow their head and kowtow to the Marxist agenda being pushed for fear of losing their job. Not only has the remaining television audience been conditioned to only accept ideas which conform to leftist ideology, but the "journalists" have also been conditioned by the education system to skew their reporting towards enforcing this cultural narrative.

What's more, instead of the cigarette-smoking, hard-nosed, no bull type of journalists the country had in the 1950s and 1960s, the new generation of interchangeable corporate cogs are young, inexperienced, indoctrinated, and usually mushy-headed blondes or those with a chip on their shoulder who are out to strike a blow against middle America and its evil Caucasian overlords. The accepted politics in news rooms ranges from overt Marxism to Socialism lite. If you do not comply to hivemind groupthink, you risk a Social Justice Warrior swarming, firing, and excommunication from the industry.

The manosphere and its steady stream of government and corporate suppressed information is a development in response to this closed circuit communication model which has divided the population into either useful idiots or thought criminals.

1. You Quickly Learn To Watch Your Back Around These People

The higher you go on the pyramid, the fewer friends you have

The newsroom is a huge groupthink shark tank, filled with vicious co-workers who will anxiously throw you under the bus if it means 15 minutes or even 15 seconds of fame and glory for them. Most are Social Justice Warriors or those who conform to leftist ideology. They will swarm and destroy anyone who does not conform to their opinions, such as: Barack Obama is god, the government will bring about heaven on earth once the Evil White Male is destroyed, and anyone who has a grievance against the WASP middle class represents The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed and cannot be questioned or challenged on any of their positions.

Time magazine ran an article confirming what anyone who has worked in this dying industry already knows: media talking heads hold two of the top 10 places for careers with the highest number of psychopaths.

Never Again

My new life plan includes a lot more pleasure and a lot less bullshit

In the last few years, 60 hour weeks have become the norm with 40 hours of pay (thanks to employers abusing salaries), verbal abuse by management is common, there is no such thing as a personal life in the city you work in because of social media, and hoping for any future with your employer has become as farcical as the metaphorical carrot and stick. Add to that a bunch of nihilistic, often miserable and duplicitous co-workers and you have quite a toxic stew.

Additionally, while this will never be admitted, one need do nothing more than turn on the television to hear evil white male propaganda being disseminated on a daily basis. But that is only the outward reflection of an industry that now actively looks to hire and promote anyone except white males. It is well known, even if it is only whispered, that people are regularly hired and promoted based on nothing more than the ability of managers to check off a box on an affirmative action form. Of course, I was persona non grata because of this.

Combine these facts with the list of five things I learned presented above, and it's easy to see why I walked. It's also easy to see why I have no respect for 90% of the people that populate this industry. I can count on one hand the number of people who were decent human beings, and all of those were members of the old school of broadcasting who somehow have survived to 2016. The Social Justice Warrior generation is a toxic waste dump of inhumanity and vanity.

It should come as no surprise to know that I, and a number of former colleagues of mine, have collectively said, "Never again!" to employment in this industry. Now you know some of the ugly realities behind the pretty face business.

Bring on the bitches and blow, I'm going to live the youth I sacrificed for nothing.

Women Will Never Admit That They Love Being Mistreated And Objectified

May 17, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The most passionate relationships I have ever had all involved a healthy, even heavy dose of objectifying women. That objectification has made the woman wetter and happier, whatever intellectual opinions she has had about the matter. I am certain the same goes for you in your relationship history. The rosy, sanitized vision of romance women often claim they want, or say they want to confuse men, is nothing but a furphy. Accordingly, I will stop treating women like objects when they stop getting wet when I treat them like objects. Deal?

Of course, feminists are already hard at work trying to counter women's natural inclinations. Appalled at the willingness of women to subject themselves to objectification porn like Fifty Shades of Grey, they are continuing to erect college regulations and even proper legislation to penalize the slightest form of male sexual activity. Has a woman voluntarily pulled down your pants and started giving you a blowjob? Hold on, soldier, that's not nearly enough, especially for regular coitus. Where's your notarized document, certified only after a five-hour cooling off period?

Inasmuch as many women having these beliefs foisted on them is outright brainwashing, not reversing deep-seated biological drives, for the present purposes I will pretend this constitutes women not getting wet when objectified. But what about all the other women?

Even as the SJWs march down on common sense again and again, the responses you get from women are invariably better when you demonstrate that they are, in large part, an object for you. By treating her as an object, you are saying that she is not unconditionally eternal in your life, nor are any feelings you have for her. If she misbehaves unacceptably, falls out of line beyond normal human foibles, or otherwise substantially disappoints you, you are very likely gone and she assumes a similar lack of relevance for you compared to before you knew each other. So why the hell should you stop doing this, if it works?

Some good, by no means exhaustive examples of how objectifying behavior can coincide with women getting sexually aroused or romantically attracted include:

- Painful spanking of her buttocks. The pain itself is part and parcel of the arousal or attraction (but remember, it has a limit);
- Calling her a slut, whore, bitch, piece of meat, or something analogous, including prior to and after sex. Oftentimes saying it outside the bedroom illustrates the objectification point much better as many girls say practically anything during coitus;
- Telling her to do something that she does not have to, especially immediately after she has already done something for you;
- Depending on the girl: joking or talking far too much with other women. This is an acquired skill, particularly in paying just enough attention to your girl, but it is not simply a matter of inducing jealousy—it shows you have quickly seizable options should you and her part ways; and
- Out of the blue sending her text messages or telling her point-blank in person the things you want, usually sex-related. As you do so, you make it clear that she is really only the vehicle for your gratification, not an equal participant in it.

Look at the examples in your own life

"I really, really don't like this girl anymore," I tell the woman behind the deli counter, whom I have never met before, in Czech. I am pointing to the 25-year-old blonde girl next to me, whose face is now a beetroot red. It's a joke, and all parties know it, but for Eastern Europe it's moderately audacious. For good measure I add, "Do you have any meat made from gypsies? This one [again pointing to the blonde] hates paying half for sirloin steak." My girl goes redder still.

This was just one of many examples on a recent jaunt I made to Prague. The girl in question, whom I will call Kristýna, learned almost every day that me objectifying her made her wet. When shopping for clothes, she would come out of the change room for my opinion. Instead of just looking, I would grab her ass to see if they fit, slapping her rear end afterwards for good measure. "Yeah, it fits," I would say, but only after the slap.

"You treated me like a piece of meat today!" she stammered out that evening, disbelievingly, after the latest clothes shopping episode. Incidentally, this was just after we started making out on the bed. The antics that followed afterwards, which I will let you imagine for yourself, should not surprise you, either. Quite frankly, there are clear rewards for "mistreating" women.

Having thought for most of my teens that the "nice guy" approach was the answer, with periods of asshole-ish in between, by the age of 18 and 19 I was changing. I came to learn that in most ways treating women heavily as objects at the beginning and even well into the relationship was not just a choice some people made but essential. In fact, it constitutes a very large segment of the only workable path to dealing with women romantically. This has all been confirmed to me ad nauseam by the women in my life, who have represented just shy of two dozen nationalities.

That said, being legitimately cocky and objectifying a woman is not a sure-proof way to get girls and arouse them. If you are morbidly obese and do not have some other redeeming quality, like a famous name or career, your chances using this approach are likely very, very limited. It is your job to use a holistic approach and see the objectification of women as causally necessary but not casually sufficient. There is a difference!

What I am not saying

Objectification has a time, a place and a context. This photo has none of those necessary ingredients, as her face shows. Be aware of them!

This is not an ROK sanctioning to go out on some kind of ass-slapping free-for-all, especially on women you do not know or barely know. Likewise, if you go overboard on the objectification in particular circumstances, expect at least some (very) negative outcomes. Doing it excessively, sometimes even just moderately, in front of her friends is a no-go zone. In these sorts of cases, you are better off modulating your tone to something regularly dominating like, “I need to make a call, can you get some water?” and then working up from there to determine the appropriate limit. The same goes for her (or your) family. Importantly, when you overdo it, you look like you have no place doing it in the first place.

In my own life as well, I have a couple of men edge provocatively close to a sexual assault charge, one pretty much of their own making. Objectification, as you should already long know, only works when you either have attraction or can guarantee she will be attracted to you after the action you perform. Going in gung-ho and acting your way to such a result is a recipe for a lot of drama you could definitely do without.

Moreover, having the ability to objectify is not the only asset you need to have. As a relationship or fling progresses, you need both wits and emotional depth to manage a woman and her reactions. Objectification alone does not provide this, irrespective of the potency it gives you in pursuing women initially.

What women tell you is almost always bullshit—objectification is what they want

You would be incredulous about believing a woman with a loudspeaker, just as you should be incredulous about a woman with an opinion about what men should give women.

A new friend of mine in Europe is hopelessly lost with girls. In trying to teach him how to speak with them, I approached random women at a beer garden. I jokingly asked one of them for her advice on him getting women. When she said “respect” as her first piece of “wisdom” and claimed that a lack of it from men was why she was single, I laughed out loud. I retorted: “If you really wanted respect, you would never be single… the world is full of nice guys.” After that, she could not say anything in reply, so she promptly changed the subject.

Like this girl at a bustling beer garden in Prague, women will say what they want to be the right answer or, sometimes even more commonly, what they think deep down is the right answer. It is almost always bullshit. It does not take a sexual Einstein to realize that almost every trend in the human world proves otherwise. If women did not respond positively to objectification based on natural inclinations, men would not engage in it. And nice boys like my new, hopefully soon-to-be less clueless friend would finally have the girl they desired.

The Truth About Sports Drinks And Getting Ripped

May 17, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Jonny Catanzano.

Hey guys, it's Jonny — head trainer at the most subscribed fitness channel on YouTube. If you ever drink Gatorade or any other sports drink like Vitamin Water, this article's for you…

Because you need to know how these so called "Sports Drinks" are holding you back from your true muscle building potential. I want you to think of the last Gatorade commercial you saw…

Man, they really do their best in making it look pretty awesome. And not only do they advertise constantly during sports events, they also probably sponsor many of your favorite athletes and sports teams.

Gatorade is incredibly popular. Literally millions of men drink Gatorade when they work out and even as a regular drink throughout the day, under the assumption that it's "good for them"…

Gatorade has claimed that it's a superior way to hydrate yourself, and that it can improve your athletic performance. And everyone just seems to believe them—no questions asked. But if you look at the scientific research, you'll see these claims are absolutely false. And Powerade, Vitaminwater, and other sports drink brands aren't any better.

The truth is that all sports drinks are actually unhealthy. They don't make your workout performance better, and they actually cause you to gain fat. The biggest reason for this is that Gatorade and other sports drinks contain a massive amount of sugar. Just check out the nutrition facts:

Just one serving contains 42 grams of sugar, and 180 calories! That's as many calories as you'll burn directly from an intense hour long workout.

That means if you work out for an hour, and then drink a sports drink, you have basically cancelled out all of your hard work by dumping excess sugar into your body.

Sports drink marketers say that a huge amount of sugar is necessary because it improves athletic performance. But this is only true for professional long distance performance athletes, like marathoners or cyclists, who don't have to worry about getting fat.

The truth is, for guys like us, looking to drop all our fat while replacing it with solid, rock hard muscles, there is no need to consume a huge amount of sugar every time you work out. The second problem with Gatorade is that it does not contain the ideal balance of electrolytes—minerals like sodium and potassium—for your body.

In my opinion as a trainer and nutrition expert, this balance of sodium and potassium makes no sense. The reality is that most people are deficient in potassium and are consuming far too much sodium already from their diets. Not only this, but Gatorade does not contain one of the most important and proven nutrients for enhancing athletic performance and improving your body's muscle to fat ratio—free form amino acids.

If you don't know what an amino acid is, they are the molecules that combine to form protein. Scientists refer to them as "the building blocks of your muscles," because they're one of the essential molecules your body needs in order to produce new muscle tissue and to repair the muscle tissue you already have.

And unlike sugar and sodium, amino acids are actually scientifically proven to improve your workout performance. According to the medical researchers at WebMD, amino acid supplements are proven to "improve exercise performance and reduce protein and muscle breakdown during intense exercise."

So why don't you see amino acids in sports drinks? Well, the truth is because corn syrup and sodium are far cheaper.

There's no way that sports drink companies can afford massive advertising campaigns and multi-million dollar athlete endorsements while also selling a quality product that contains amino acids, so they choose to spend their money on marketing rather than the products' ingredients.

That's why I personally NEVER consume sports drinks. Instead, I consume an alternative that's about the same price per serving, but which I can be 100% certain this is far better for me nutritionally.

And it's called Afterburn Aminos.

The first reason that I prefer Afterburn Aminos over sports drinks is that it contains a premium blend of amino acids. And the amino acids in Afterburn Aminos are MUCH higher quality than what you'd find in a cheaper, generic recovery supplement.

Most amino acid supplements do not contain the proper ratio of branched chain amino acids. If you don't already know, branched chain amino acids or BCAAs are some of the most important and scientifically proven amino acids.

Second, most cheap amino acid supplements contain no glutamine at all. Next to leucine, it's the second most important amino acid and I feel no amino supplements are complete without it.

Afterburn Aminos gives you a full 2.5 grams of premium quality glutamine.

Not only does Afterburn Aminos contain a premium blend of amino acids, it also contains no sugar and no calories.

On top of that, Afterburn Aminos contains a far superior electrolyte blend with much more potassium than sports drinks contain. One serving of Afterburn Aminos contains a full 170 milligrams of potassium, compared to to a mere 80 milligrams in a large bottle of Gatorade.

The reality is, no supplement does you any good unless you take it regularly, and the great taste of Afterburn Aminos makes it easy to drink during every workout.

Most amino acid supplements taste like medicine, but the team at Afterburn Labs really nailed it with their amazing cherry lime flavor profile blend. It's absolutely delicious, and I know you'll love it once you try it.

5 Tips For White Men Who Want To Date Non-White Women

May 18, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

A few weeks back I wrote a column that offered tips to men of color who want to increase their success with white women. As promised, I've inverted the skin hues to help out my Caucasian brothers this time around.

Because I'm black, I obviously can't speak to what it takes to bed females of any race as a white guy. So I've recruited two of my red pill buddies to help us out.

A quick refresher on "Paul" and "Doug":

> "Paul" is a tall, good looking dude I've known since my college days. I mentioned him near the end of this article. He's a stone cold assassin and red pill to the core.
> "Doug" is a good friend of Paul's whom I'd never met before this trip. Paul told me about some of the red pill knowledge Doug had inadvertently dropped in the past so I knew he'd be a solid guy to roll with. Upon meeting him it didn't take long to discern that he was as advertised.

Both of these men are like-minded and have a good working knowledge of a woman's true nature. Suffice it to say they are both more than adequately qualified to give advise regarding this subject matter. It's also worth noting that they answered my questions separately so one man's advice won't be influenced by the other's.

5. Be bold and confident

Q: What do you think is the single most important element when running game on a non-white girl as a white guy?

Paul: “As with most encounters with women of any color, I think confidence is the most important element. Non-white girls don’t expect a guy like me to show them interest or to have balls enough talk to them. When you show no fear of racial stereotypes and societies expectations, it automatically soaks their panties.”

Doug: “Being bold. Which is having confidence to run your game without hesitation. I’ve found non-white girls will find weakness in your armor much faster than white girls.”

Boldness and confidence when approaching is standard operating procedure when approaching girls and women of color are no different. However, Doug points out a very important element regarding non-white chicks testing your congruence more stringently than their fair skinned counterparts.

I addressed this in a previous article:

> Latin women can be very intimidating. Their fiery personalities are another part of their culture they embrace. Incidentally, this acts as a highly effective beta repellent. Step to a mami with weak game and she will blow you out like a bad tire. I speak from personal experience.

It appears that a man's skin tone has no bearing on the hyper drive shit testing dolled out by exotic females.

4. Once she's on the hook, go in for the kill

Q: What have you found helps the most in terms of closing the deal?

Paul: "Dude there's no secret to closing the deal. Once you got a girl on the hook, closing the deal is a given. The challenging part of game is getting the deal TO the close. Follow all the other steps and then bring some skills to the physical escalation and you'll get it in for sure. If you get a girl to WANT to fuck, then she WILL fuck.

Doug: "Be direct when going in for the kill. Know what you want and don't be afraid."

Once again Doug points out that boldness is the key throughout the interaction, up to and including closing the deal. Paul, however, brings up an excellent point in that if there's no deal to close, you're not getting laid. In other words you can't just show up, buy her a drink and try to fuck her without first escalating properly and running tight game. If a girl doesn't have the tingles, she's not dropping her panties.

3. Don't try to adopt her culture

Q: Are most exotic chicks you've been with 'white washed' or do they tend to hold onto their cultural traits?

Paul: "YES! All of them are white-washed. For one, I am not attracted to ghetto chicks or Boniquas and so I wouldn't even give them the time of day. It goes the other way too, because most white-washed exotics look at me and see their ideal mate. They want to be a part of the culture that they attach to a guy like me."

Doug: "Culture traits are still in tact. Although a majority that I have found that date white, say they prefer to date white due to the fact that they do not like some of the culture differences in their own race."

Standard game tells us to bring her into her our world and the same holds true with women of color. Regardless of what race a man is, a woman who wants to be with a man will adapt to his lifestyle, his preferences, and his overall personal culture because her biological hard wiring wants to belong to a male.

It’s probably safe to say that most non-white chicks in the U.S are “white washed” in some way, shape, or form depending on how long they’ve been in the country. This means their ideal mate is whatever television shows and movies tell them—which is a white male.

Because of this, I’m fairly certain there’s also an added sense of accomplishment and status if a Hispanic, Black, or Asian female can lock one of them down. This probably makes gaming them much easier than white girls, who feel they’re entitled to white men simply because they, too, are white.

2. They’re just as slutty as white chicks…run standard game, rinse and repeat

Q: Based on your experience, are non-white chicks sluttier than white girls? Less slutty? Equally slutty?

Paul: “Equally slutty I think. My theory is that the vast majority of girls are equally throwing it around and the only thing that varies is how open they are about it.”

Doug: “All chicks are down to fuck when your game is on and you’re confident.”

Not much to say here. Most females in western countries have adopted the culture of sluttiness no matter what her skin tone is.

1. Tweak your game according to the situation

Q: What tweaks in your game to you employ when stepping to exotic chicks?

Paul: “I become more brazen and blunt I think. In reference to answer one, exotic girls respond more to the guys who are out of the norm for them and so a tall, blonde white guy who’s confident, knows how to talk game and comes at them with an abundance mentality is a guaranteed way to get those panties off. Of course this can backfire every once in a while, but usually only with certain Asian girls. Latinas and Blacks chicks who are used to “strong alpha male” types just eat that up when it comes from me.”

“With that being said, you have to know the situation and adjust accordingly, because some of these chicks have dated assholes constantly and being the ‘Nice guy, with an edge’ has worked well also.”

Doug: “For me its trying not to make tweaks. I find myself subconsciously trying to fit their cultural mold and quickly reel myself back in to just be myself. If non-white girls have interest in me, I believe they are interested because of who I am and are not looking for me to conform to their own race.”

I’ve witnessed Paul in action employing his “nice guy with an edge” routine and chicks of all colors eat it up. This strategy is not unlike running calculated beta game to moisten the panties of females by giving them the impression you may be looking to settle down, when in reality you’re just looking to nail ‘n bail.

Doug’s answer goes back to #2. As a white male in the West, there’s no need to conform to the culture of a non-white female to keep her interested. She’ll adapt to your culture as a matter of obligation if she wants to keep you around.

In the end…

…gaming non-white girls in the West is similar to gaming white girls. They've all been infected by feminism and their time in this part of the world has little bearing on their immunity to its effects.

My thanks goes out to Paul and Doug for taking the time to share their experiences with us. Hopefully this helps our fair-skinned readers increase their prospects with not-so-fair-skinned females.

The Real Impact Of Automated Fast Food Kiosks On Society

May 18, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

As the progressives have increasingly pushed the 15 dollar per hour federal minimum wage, and with California already at $10/hour and rising to $15/hour, fast food corporations have been anticipated to pursue alternative methods to maintain profitability. Wendy's recently announced that they will rolling out self service kiosks in the latter part of 2016 across the US. Technological advances and other sea-changes in society often reveal truths about our world, and the discerning man will find this no exception.

Although the pictures of the McDonald's kiosks in Asia have been making the rounds on Facebook and similar recently with pithy predictions of liberal comeuppance, this is the first news of this employee headcount reducing technology coming to fast food in the US. Self service checkouts have been around in Wal-Marts and similar for years offered as an alternative to express checkouts, but these are deliberately designed to replace, not augment, workers, and that's a different ball game entirely.

You're only going to be paid what you're worth

The free market is an interesting animal and responds in ways unpredictable to some. It is a symptom of the megalomania of Barack Obama and others in federal and state governments that they think they can regulate free market capitalism and make it do their bidding. If you have a river, and you want to make some power, you can dam it up and run it through some turbines to a certain extent, but, if you restrict the flow too much, the river will find an easier path in which to do so, and that is what is happening here.

The technology of the self service kiosk is the same thing as ATMs and self checkout machines and has been around for a while. It hasn't been implemented into fast food joints because it probably wasn't economically viable to pay the initial costs, the upkeep, and the costs of maintenance employees versus paying minimum wage to the cashiers.

Raising the minimum wage is not going to actually raise the wages of fast food cashiers at all. You can't impose a value on a job (and thus, its wages); the value of the job is what it is. In the past, when the minimum wage has been raised, the whole economy has shifted to make the new minimum wage the floor again and left minimum wage earners with more money that was worth correspondingly less.

I don't think that will happen this time. I believe the entry level cashier position is on the way out across the board. A quarter pounder will still cost a couple bucks, and the cashier job will still be worth some seven bucks an hour, but it will be paid against an expense line of buying that kiosk on a budget, not to a paycheck.

The bottom tier of the economy will remain the same, but it will be empty

Raising (doubling) the minimum wage will make all cashier jobs financially unfeasible, and we should look forward to a lot less errors in our orders at Taco Bell because of this. I believe that the determining factor of whether or not someone should be employed in a job versus a machine doing it will become if it is physically possible for a machine to do the job versus if it is financially feasible to do so.

Taking your typical fast food joint, these kiosks will replace the cashiers running the lobby, and eventually, once voice recognition or the format of the touchscreens get tuned in, probably the drive through cashiers, too. I don't doubt that automated assembly and cooking machines are too far behind, either.

The ultimate evolution of this concept is that a fast food joint will have two employees per shift to replenish the cooking machines, hand out the food, and troubleshoot basic mechanical problems. Someone else will come along daily to remove the money from the kiosks.

People who formerly had these jobs will be out of work and will find they are faced with the harsh truth that, while the minimum wage has increased, the skills required for the jobs have also increased. Working at Taco Bell may require an industrial maintenance degree and relevant experience, which would, in a semi-ironic fashion, fix the whole problem with people trying to create a career out of burger flipping by forcing them to ass-up and get some skills for a real job, which is what they should have done in the first place.

That amp clamp ain't a sex toy.

But, there will only be one maintenance guy for every five burger flippers, and people are lazy, so we will end up with the following.

More people will be on welfare

Normally, this situation would be self-correcting. If it is no longer viable to employ people at base level; then those people will not be employed and will have to find an alternative. They would either find a job that their skills could secure for them, level up their skills so that they could then secure a job with them, or mooch off family members in either a temporary or permanent manner.

However, being a semi-socialist country, most of them will simply go on welfare and make the rest of us pay for them. Public assistance has always been a parasite on great civilizations and contributes to their eventual, and inevitable, downfall. It sounds like such a good idea to help the poor out when you can't understand the role of laziness in human psychology or basic math and how it impacts an economy.

Being on welfare should be shameful, and the fact that it is not is indicative of the problems in our societies. Part of our platform of neomasculinity is the concept of being skilled and providing for yourself. You need to learn a trade and have a work ethic. A basic high school education and a worthless "Choose-You-Own-Degree" College of Arts And Crafts bachelors in the courtship rituals of Victorian England along with a complete lack of grit from never having done anything in your life will leave you unprepared for ANY job.

The jobs are there. The pay is there. Most people are just unqualified and unmotivated; just ask Mike Rowe.

The dissatisfaction with the useless will grow

I'm an engineer, not a sociologist, so I'm not going to speculate on how race and religion affect work ethic, education, and productivity, but I don't think it's a race or religion or orientation thing. Rather, the problem with people in the US, and probably other countries as well, is that they are simply lazy.

I work in a car factory, and I can do any job the guys on the line can do; the jobs aren't that complicated. However, I would never make the cycle time of the line because I wouldn't be fast enough to finish my job on one car before the next one came piling in. Eventually, I could train up to be as fast as they are, but they work hard for their money and deserve it, just like I deserve mine by doing what I do.

I think we are going to see, as more and more people get on and abuse welfare, a dissatisfaction with lazy people begin to grow. Shaming will become the powerful force that it used to be, and worthless will become an insult again. I think this will occur regardless, but whether or not it happens before an economic collapse or after remains to be seen.

Conclusion

I believe that this minimum wage hike is going to disrupt the economy of the US similar to the problems of 2008 with the recession. In that recession, the economy downsized and laid off millions. It has since recovered profitability, but on a smaller scale, and many of those people that were laid off are still unemployed, and will perhaps remain permanently so. Those people are outside the economy as a casualty that was expendable to fix the situation.

Raising the minimum wage will do the same thing. Jobs that aren't worth the wage increase that can be replaced by technology will be replaced by that technology, and those people will be out of work. They will either have to level up, or remain unemployed. Part of making a good sports team is cutting the bad players. Our job is to make sure that we have marketable skills so that we're in demand, and that we teach that work ethic and necessity of skill to our children.

When Jethro Exposed The Computer Simulation We’re Living In

May 18, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

“Remember when you spawned Hitler?” Fodos asked.

“Remember?” Ghartek replied. “That was the highlight of my career! But it almost crashed the simulation.”

“What I loved about it is how you weaved Biblical themes into Hitler’s actions. It really scared the Jews.”

“Wait until we give Israel to Iran in the next update. The Persian empire must rise again!” Fodos laughed.

“Hey watch this,” Ghartek said, “I’m going to mess with this guy by vanishing his orange toothbrush.” Ghartek made a couple clicks on his display and then somewhere in Siberia, a man couldn’t find his toothbrush, no matter where he looked.

“He’s checking the door to see if someone came in to steal it.” Ghartek smirked, pleased at his work.

Both Fodos and Ghartek were senior programmers on Bethlabus, a planet where a race of hyper-intelligent species called Homo futurans lived. They shared human genetic ancestry with those living in a simulation that they controlled, though technically the connection was only virtual. Real Homo sapiens died out long ago, following in the footsteps of their Homo erectus and Homo neanderthalensis ancestors. Futurans created the simulation to better understand their roots and their future, with a goal to prevent their own extinction. The simulation itself was housed on a quantum computer the size of

While there were dozens of simulations in operation, Simulation Earth was the most interesting. Not only was it the longest, spanning over 5 billion years, but it seemed to mirror what Futurans knew about their own past of spurts and stops in evolution that seemed to be a microcosm of the rise and fall of human empires. Data from the simulation was continually analyzed with reports presented yearly to the public through academic papers and conferences. “If we understand our past, we will safeguard our future,” the motto went.

The most important fact they learned from the simulations is the universal difficulty of intelligent organisms to properly foresee and plan again long-term disasters. Once a species gets too technologically advanced, their over-confidence in problem solving and fixing the environment actually accelerates their demise instead of retarding it.

All previous simulations with more intelligent beings than humans invariably ended in self-annihilation. One notable method of extinction was when one species created a black hole on their own planet from a physics experiment gone terribly wrong. Once the black hole took hold of the coffee shop across the street from the laboratory, none of the planet’s 34 billion inhabitants had even a chance to bid farewell to each other.

One important innovation that allowed for these simulations was the ability to disconnect real time from simulated time, meaning that one million simulated years could take only a matter of months in Futuran time. The most recent advance allowed simulated time to be contracted or expanded in vivo instead of being locked in with a preset value. The simulation could be fast-forwarded through boring parts when nothing was really going on or put in slow motion during the exciting bits. World War 2, for example, was watched in real time by the Futuran programmers. They worked overtime to see what would happen when humans were taken to the brink of their destruction.

Ghartek arrived home from work and sat at the dinner table with his wife. “How was your day, honey?”

“It started off amusing,” Ghartek explained, “but then there was an Awareness Incident.”

“Another glitch?” she asked.

“Not quite. I was messing around with this guy by vanishing his toothbrush. I thought he’d go mentally insane or just blame rats, but instead he got really shook up and started reading materials about computer simulation theory.”

“Uh oh.”

“Yeah, now he seems convinced that Earth is a simulation. And get this: he has a popular blog.”

“A blog?”

“Yeah it’s like a feed screen. He gathered up papers on computer simulations and wrote about it to his audience.”

“I thought you were supposed to hide the fact to humans that they live in a simulation,” she wondered politely.

“And that’s why I was reprimanded today and have to work extra hours over the weekend.”

“A human got the better of you?” she smiled.

Ghartek furrowed his unibrow. “You can’t underestimate humans. Some are crafty. But let’s just say that I have some intense experiences in store for the orange toothbrush man so that he veers towards God as an explanation for existence instead of computer simulation. Whenever we identify someone who is about to blow the lid on things, we make miracles happen to them so they go religious. It works every time, but I still have to be careful who I troll. I think for laughs I’ll just go back to making men accidentally sleep with their wives’ sisters. It’s much safer.”

“You don’t think it’s a little mean to do that?”

“Mean to give humans extra sex? They’re slaves to it! All they think about is sex, especially the males, but we’ve been able to harness that drive into building a rudimentary civilization.”

“How about we go in the bedroom and build some civilization right now?” His wife kissed his horn and brushed her claw against his leathery face. Ghartek’s one-inch Futuran erection instantly formed and he rolled her into the bedroom for lovemaking.

The next day at work, Ghartek and Fodos attended the weekly project meeting of the Earth simulation. Ghartek began the briefing. “Russia continues to flex her muscles, but nothing noteworthy to report. Last week we spawned a potential genocidal maniac in Germany to be ready for use in thirty Earth years, just in case.”

“Germany, again?” his boss asked.

Ghartek replied, “Well we wanted him to be from a place that the world would least expect. If it turns out that we don’t need him, we can halt his reign of terror by just giving him an advanced video game system. He’ll lose interest in murderous domination within a few months.”

“Speaking of evil, how is our epic battle for the fate of human civilization going?”

“And on the forces of good?”

“Our lineup is Vladimir Putin, Donald Trump, Bashar al-Assad, Kim Jong-un, and the Ayatollah.”

“Now you were telling us something about a plot twist?”

“We studied Hollywood and noticed that humans like being surprised about their heroes. Everyone will think that Obama, Cameron, Merckel, and Netanyahu are on the forces of good, but they’re actually worse than Hitler. The people they think are evil will—if our prediction models are correct—end up saving mankind in World War 3.”

“And what if our models are not correct, and our future genocidal maniac can’t right the ship?”

“Then we lose Europe. If we lose Europe, we lose humanity. The simulation ends.” Managers looked at each other nervously. Ghartek added, “There is some hope that the Indians and Chinese will step up to the plate and herald a civilization that becomes even greater than the West.” The room erupted in laughter. “Yeah, right, Ghartek,” someone snorted.

“Can we give Trump and Putin more power boosts?”

“We already gave them all known power boosts,” Ghartek replied. “If we give them any more, we’ll enter miracle territory.”

“Speaking of miracle, is our Hail Mary option loaded into the system?”

“Which one?” Ghartek asked.

“The only one that matters, goddamnit!”

“The Second Coming of Christ? Yes that is loaded, but sir you have to understand that the simulation is over once we put Jesus back. According to the New Testament…”

“Yes I know what’s in the New Testament—my father had a hand in writing it. Look, if we’re going to lose the simulation, we’re putting in Jesus. At least we’ll get rigorous data on what degenerate humans do in the presence of their Almighty Lord. It’s possible we can use such a figure to save ourselves in case we experience a cataclysmic decline.”

A man entered the room and approached Ghartek, speaking rapidly into his ear cone for nearly a minute. Ghartek remained seated with a troubled look on his face.

“What is it, Ghartek?”

“My associate just informed me that a human has discovered a recurring glitch.” Of all the things that could destroy the simulation, the most severe was a glitch that could be reproduced.

Ghartek continued, “A man in Savannah, Georgia named Jethro discovered that if he flushes his toilet in a specific way, the water twirls above it instead of in the bowl. News crews have already filmed the glitch and it’s becoming the most viral video known to man.” The room went silent.

“Can we pause the simulation until we figure out what to do?”

“The shut-it-down technology wasn’t yet implemented for this simulation, only for the ones that started after it. I told my assistant to time-constrict the simulation so that one Earth minute is the same as one minute on Bethlabus. That should give us some time to shape the outcome.”

Ghartek excused himself from the meeting to monitor the events unfolding on his workstation. He zoomed in to Jethro’s house and saw more than two dozen news vans crowding around. A long line of cameramen snaked through his house to his toilet bowl. There, Jethro was explaining how he discovered the recurring glitch.

“I went into the bathroom the other day to do my business. I sat down on the bowl and then started watching videos on my tablet. I've done this before and nothing weird happens. Then the other day, after I finished, I got up and flushed the toilet. Lo and behold, the toilet water raised to my eye level. It spun around as if it were still in the toilet, and then disappeared down through it. I tried to do it again but it didn't work, until I found out that I had to watch a specific video on maximum sound. I watch the video for one minute, stand up, flush the toilet, and then it happens."

Before Jethro demonstrated the glitch, a reporter asked him which video he had to watch. Without hesitation he replied, "Amy's amazing anal adventures volume thirty four." Jethro then sat on the toilet, pulled up the video of Amy, maximized the sound, got up after exactly one minute, flushed the toilet, and there it was, spinning water elevated above the toilet bowl. Three cameramen jostled for position to get the best footage of the glitch. Once the toilet emptied, Jethro escorted them out and invited additional news crews to see the glitch themselves.

Ghartek immediately recognized the glitch as a holdover bug from when the television program was released in the human 20th century. It had incompatibilities with the water physics program if used in close proximity. The programmers at the time didn't give it priority because humans didn't watch television in the bathroom, but the advent of tablets made the bathroom a multimedia entertainment center. One-time glitches were easy to discount, but a recurring glitch could spell the end of the simulation if humans no longer believed they were organic life forms.

As word of the glitch spread, other humans were able to recreate it using the same "Amy's amazing anal adventures" video. Ghartek became furious that it had yet to be patched, causing his alien head to turn a bright purple. He released his anger on a junior level programmer: "Fix this glitch now, motherfucker!" The glitch was repaired on the second day, but not before videos of the bug spread throughout the world.

Too many humans saw firsthand that that the laws of physics could be broken in a consistent way. Computer simulation theorists had their day in the sun, making appearances on all media channels to confirm that humans indeed lived in an artificial world. Even Amy became famous, and was soon offered a trip to Dubai to celebrate with wealthy princes and sheikhs. She eagerly accepted.

"I don't believe we got this far in the simulation without having a pause or rollback feature," Ghartek lamented to his colleagues. "We were doing so well. We were about to serve the ultimate test to humanity in a wonderful narrative that would have given them hope for centuries had they survived it, but now it's all ruined thanks to Jethro's toilet bowl. I'm going home early. When I come back tomorrow, I expect it all to be over."

Ghartek reminisced about his work on humans. He was there when Newton uncovered the physical laws. He was there when controversial power boosts were first tested on Alexander the Great, the first time Futurans played God in the simulation. And he was there when twerking took America by storm, the result of a catastrophic glitch in the dancing algorithm. The simulation felt like his own baby, one that he was guiding into a purposeful end where the human species would recognize their own flaws and dedicate themselves to anything but their own self-satisfactions and wants, but now a programming error was bringing his life's work to an end.

Ghartek slumped into work the next day, ready to bring back Jesus. Fodos greeted him. "Hey Ghartek, my man! Our simulation is safe!"

"What do you mean?"

"Kanye West, Jay Z, Beyonce, and Kim Kardashian just died in a plane crash. The whole world is stricken with equal amounts of grief and joy."

"But don't they know that Kim Kardashian's butt was a simulation? Why do they care?"

"Come on Ghartek, don't tell me that you already forgot the basic principles of human psychology. Even though they know it's a simulation, they can't help but feel consciousness and states that seem real to them. In the past two days they're still eating, shitting, talking, fucking, working, crying. Sure, many believe the Earth is a simulation, but they don't want it to end because they are still confined by a programmed desire to keep existing."

"But the toilet water was so convincing."

"The conspiracy theorists are taking care of it. They are spreading memes that it was special effects and that the media is on board with the globalists to scare humanity into accepting a one-world government. They're actually convincing people that our programming glitch is a way for the elite to control the world through Freemasonry and Kabbalah."

Ghartek replied, "I guess the ones who believe they are simulated are really no different from the atheists. They know the world is meaningless and random but want to continue living in it anyway."

"Exactly. The toilet glitch will be forgotten by most humans in a week. Actually, an interesting development is that the glitch is being harnessed by the religious. They're stating that it's a sign by their God, and so we predict church attendance to skyrocket. It looks like people are committing more to the simulation than ever."

"And what is the status of the Islamic migrants to Europe?"

"They're still invading in massive numbers. War is coming! Whoooooo!"

Ghartek was relieved. For all the years he has been working on the Earth simulation, he was still unable to put himself in the shoes of a far more inferior being than himself. He severely overestimated the capacity of humans to think clearly about their own nature. In a way, he pitied them and their seemingly insatiable need for ignorance and falsehoods.

Humans were certainly a technologically advanced species, but in spite of that they still avoided the truth of their own reality, even when they witnessed it firsthand. Yet other earthly animals with more acute vision and hearing like owls, lions, and dogs were dominated and subjugated by these myth-seekers. It almost seemed to Ghartek that a prerequisite of an advanced species is that of submission, not to a superior power, but to comforting lies and illusions.

One Earth year later, the simulation was smoothly chugging along. Civil war erupted in Italy between the local nationalists and ruling establishment. Both Russia and the United States prepared for war through their proxies in the Middle East that would undoubtedly involve tactical nuclear weapons. While the possible destruction of the Earth by humans was not entirely a favorable outcome to simulation managers, it removed all awareness in the humans that they were nothing but inconsequential bits and bytes in a massive computer mainframe.

In the middle of the raging Italian Civil War, Fodos was in the office watching a human orgy take place in Brazil when Ghartek caught up on events in the United States. He began laughing.

“What’s so funny?” Fodos asked.

“Time magazine just named Amy as their Person Of The Year for being the most sexually objectified woman of the world. Her courage to face a ‘lightning storm of terrorist misogyny’ was called ‘the bravest act of the century.’”

“Bombs are about to rain down on their cities and they glorify a porn actress? I just don’t get humans.”

Is Heat Street A Thinly-Veiled Cuckservative Attempt To Thwart Donald Trump?

May 19, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

There's a new anti-Trump site on the web called Heat Street, that has built its credibility by attacking SJWs. It purports to be "An engaging new destination for news, features, opinion and commentary. Free speech celebrated. No safe spaces." In reality, it is just another boring attempt by the journalistic establishment to squash the political awakening that is happening in the US.

Who owns Heat Street?

Rupert Murdoch

I'll give credit to Heat Street in that they are very open about who owns them. Knowing who owns a media outlet is important as the owner ultimately sets the editorial direction. Just as you would not expect a website run by Roosh to push feminism, you would not expect a website run by Jeb Bush to promote traditional masculinity.

Heat Street is owned by Dow Jones & Company, the same company that owns the Wall Street Journal. Dow Jones & Company, in turn, is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation, which also owns Fox News. Not surprisingly, Heat Street has the same editorial slant as the Wall Street Journal and Fox News—a slant that happens to mesh perfectly with the position of the Republican donor class.

Heat Street is another example of establishment cluelessness

There is no doubt that Heat Street was created partially—perhaps entirely—as a response to the popularity of Donald Trump and the rise of the Alt Right. Yet, the creators of Heat Street, like the GOP establishment, seem to be incapable of understanding what is happening in the country.

Republican strategists have never been able to understand why Trump has captured the hearts of the rank and file voters. First, they guessed it was because Trump insulted people, so donor lapdog Marco Rubio was commanded to put the theory to the test. Rubio instantly changed his tone from the carefully scripted, focus group-crafted material to being an insult comic. Of course, people don't support Trump because he insults people so Rubio's Lisa Lampanelli routine had the exact opposite of what was intended: Rubio saw his poll numbers plummet while Trump's rose.

The most recent establishment theory is that Trump is popular because he is a reality show star. Mitt Romney is even trying to draft Mark Cuban, host of Shark Tank, into a third party run against Trump. Apparently, it has never crossed the mind of the elites that people support Trump because of his policies to build a wall, curb immigration, and put America first in foreign policy and trade.

In a similar way, the marketers at News Corp. who created Heat Street don't understand why young people are rejecting the libertarianism of the conservative movement in favor of more radical politics. They seem to believe that people are rejecting conventional politics because they are tired of political correctness, which is why they include "No safe spaces" in their tagline. What they fail to understand is that people are not just tired of political correctness but the entire progressive edifice that it supports.

Heat Street's positions

Louise Mensch – head of Heat Street

Here is a flavor of some of Heat Street's editorial positions.

Trump

Heat Street hates Trump. It is possible that the only reason it was created was to stop Trump from winning the presidency and to serve as a foil to him if he wins. To borrow a phrase from Chesterton, it is almost as if the writers at Heat Street believe that any stick is good enough to beat Trump with. You will not find a single word of praise for Trump within Heat Street.

For inveterate Trump-hater Rick Wilson, Trump spells disaster for noble Republican Party, the Party of Dennis Hastert and Larry Craig:

> Standing against his [Trump's] repellent positions and cancerous candidacy is probably the only way to avoid having the electoral hopes of hundreds of down-ballot Republican candidates consumed in the dumpster fire of his campaign. It's inconvenient for Trump fans, but not every candidate lives in a deep-red, economically illiterate, violently anti-immigrant, pro-war crime enclave.

In a piece entitled, Miller Time: Donald Trump lied that he was 'John Miller' to Spread Misogyny, Heat Street chief Louise Mensch asks "Can the GOP ask any respectable delegate to support this [Trump's] misogyny?" The hatred continues with a piece criticizing Trump's penchant for retweeting white supremacists. And of course, Heat Street paints Trump supporters as rabid, threatening, and potentially violent hillbillies.

Racism

Racism is probably the most powerful and most overused weapon in the SJW arsenal. Therefore, Heat Street tries to steer a middle path. There are a handful of articles that poke fun of SJWs who claim something is racist when it really isn't. For example, Heat Street thinks it is ridiculous that some white SJWs are expressing outrage that the black Ghostbusters character is not a professor.

To add a little personalization and "tragic mulatto" street cred, writer Marjorie Romeyn-Sanabria penned a personal piece bemoaning the issue of "colorism." Colorism, she states is "prejudice against a person who has one black parent and another parent of a different ethnic origin." Romeyn-Sanabria details the flood of hateful Tweets she received when she mentioned that she did not feel accepted as a "young, biracial woman" on Twitter. Interestingly, all of the tweets seemed to come from one person. Maybe only one person is "colorist." Terms like "whitesplaining" are also thrown in to make Heat Street readers feel like they are on the cutting edge of SJW lingo.

Heat Street tries to be edgy when it comes to race, but even here, Heat Street breaks no new ground. It does nothing to destroy the SJW straightjacket.

Immigration

Some countries can limit immigration and some countries can't.

As you would expect from a sister publication of the Wall Street Journal, Heat Street is pro-immigration. It ran a piece from a professor alleging that Trump's border wall is no longer needed because most of the Mexicans are now here and that Mexicans in Mexico are having fewer children. Heat Street also carried Lin-Manual Miranda's address at University of Pennsylvania speech which turned out to be a panegyric to immigrants:

> In a year when politicians traffic in anti-immigrant rhetoric, there is also a Broadway musical reminding us that a broke, orphan immigrant from the West Indies built our financial system. A story that reminds us that since the beginning of the great unfinished symphony that is our American experiment, time and time again, immigrants get the job done.

BREXIT

One welcome surprise is that it seems that Heat Street supports Britain's exit from the EU. This is one area where Heat Street diverges from the globalist agenda that it otherwise adheres to so closely.

Globalists favor eliminating national boundaries because it gets in the way of "free" trade. This is the end game behind NAFTA and TPP. The exit of the UK from the European Union would be a step in a nationalist direction—and nationalism is the opposite of globalism.

The real problem

Under the makeup, conservatives and liberals are both progressives.

The real problem with Heat Street is that it wants to perpetuate the lie that there are two forces locked in an eternal struggle. One side stands for free markets, free trade, and personal freedom. The other stands for unnecessary regulation and poorly conceived social programs.

The Heat Street version of conservatism (or libertarianism, same thing) supports “lean in” type feminism, but not fat women in pink hair. It is pro-immigration and definitely not racist. It welcomes gays and transgenders if they agree with tax breaks for hedge fund managers, unregulated GMO food, and proxy wars for Israel and Saudi Arabia. It views people not as part of families and nations, but as free-floating, rootless economic units.

The problem with the Heat Street narrative is that the dichotomy between the party of economic freedom and the party of controlled markets is largely false. It is kabuki theatre for the proles. Rhetoric aside, both the Republicans and the Democrats support unlimited free trade, unchecked immigration, and low corporate tax rates. That’s why many CEOs of large corporations are Democrats.

The real divide is between globalism and nationalism. In the US, both parties are in the thrall of globalist donors who place their own needs ahead of the well-being of their fellow countrymen.

What Heat Street misses

In the end, Heat Street fails to understand what is driving voters in 2016. It is not that we want vulgarity or flashy memes, it is that we want to put our own interests first. We want our own countrymen to have good jobs even if it means we pay a little more for our iPhones.

We don’t want to just do away with Trigglypuff-type feminism. We don’t want to go back to second-wave feminism, we want to bring back the patriarchy.

We don’t just want to do away with the racial extremism of the Mizzou protestors. We want to do away with the whole racial animus industry.

We don’t want to live, as John Kerry has stated, a borderless future. Immigration can be good but when it happens on such a large scale that citizens start to feel like they are living in a foreign country, it is time to slow it down.

Conclusion

Rod Berne @RodBerne · May 14
@DemsARealRacist @heatstreet Heatstreet is Return of Kings for people who still shop at Whole Foods. Sad!

Roosh @rooshv · May 14
It took @heatstreet only one month from launch to blow it's cover as an anti-Trump operation. Their "mission" is urgent and time sensitive.

I asked my wife to read some Heat Street articles to make sure my reading was not too jaundiced. She said that she felt as though there was no passion behind their articles. It was almost as if they were written by people who were covering mandatory points but who didn't really believe strongly in their own content.

I have to agree. I don't think I will be spending anymore time at Heat Street.

5 Myths About Love

May 19, 2016 | by Nikolai Vladivostok | Link | Original Link

Romantic love is one of the most intense experiences you are ever likely to experience. But as with anything related to feelings, it has become exalted to moral and almost religious status in our over-feminized society.

A man should be aware of the power of love. He should not allow himself to be overpowered by it, losing all his mental faculties and common sense. Of all self improvement efforts, this can be the most difficult. Resistance training can be built up gradually over time, but love can hit like an unexpected freight train, knocking a fellow off his feet and leaving him floundering helplessly like a newborn baby. Young, inexperienced men seem most vulnerable to Cupid's bow, but older gents are not immune to his spell, especially if the man is accomplished enough to win the attentions of a much younger woman. Understanding love may help a man to embrace its power without losing his direction.

Here are myths about love that you must recognize if you are to keep your head

1. Love is the best thing that can happen to you

Love might be a wonderful thing, leading to cherished children, grandchildren, and a loyal partner to share your dotage. It might result in an immensely memorable holiday romance. Love might also blind you to the true nature of a woman with Borderline Personality Disorder—one who may try to take your money, your children or even your freedom. More likely, it will simply lead you to impregnate, marry, or cohabitate with the wrong person. Peruse these real life accounts of relationships on the rocks after the honeymoon is well and truly over. Not to be read at night while you're home alone.

Love might not even be enjoyable. The sensation of losing control over one's feelings and turning into a daydreaming zombie who keeps missing his train station might be cute for onlookers but can be uncomfortable for the poor sod experiencing this state. It is sometimes said that no two people's experience of love are the same.

2. Love justifies all

Since the High Middle Ages, Europe and its diaspora have fallen under the spell of courtly love. In this view, love is a transcendent experience that makes everything right and its absence makes everything wrong.

The reader will be familiar with common societal beliefs that stem from this moral view of romantic love: one should only marry for true love; a couple should break up if the woman says "I love you but I'm not in love with you"; and it's okay (for a woman) to have an affair if it's for love. Love outweighs all other considerations—duty, justice, faith—as the yardstick to measure one's actions.

This is not a view shared in the greater part of the world. In other times and places, romantic love has been seen as a dangerous and humiliating sickness that ought to be avoided. The next time someone tells you that love justifies some recent outrage, ask them why. Ask if passionate emotion would also justify kicking a dog. No? Well, it's clearly not everything then, is it?

3. True love will last forever

Romantic love is like a rainbow. It can be lovely but it's not a permanent feature of the landscape. The first flush of love can last for a long time—perhaps for years—but it will not last forever. Basing a marriage and stable child rearing on this emotion alone is likely to end in tears.

An enduring relationship must be grounded on more than romantic love. It might be based on a more sedate, familiar love born of mutual respect for each other's roles and duties. This is the sort of love a man might experience when watching his wife breastfeed their baby. A relationship can also be based on commitment and the idea of being responsible to a community. Religion and culture have traditionally played an important part here.

In fact, it is possible to do away with romantic love altogether. Marriages in many places continue to be arranged by parents and are often quite successful, with the familiar love described gradually developing over the years spent together. Romantic love is more appropriate for girlfriends and flings.

They say that in ancient Rome, a servant would whisper in a triumphant, returned general's ear: fame is fleeting. Before making a major life decision, whisper this gentle truth to yourself to maintain some rationality: love is transient.

4. Women and men love the same way

You already know how men love. Women's love is more fickle. While she may experience feelings even more deeply than a man, a woman's love is not blind. It has an eagle's vision and can immediately spot weakness, loss of status or other disappointments. A women will usually not know why her feelings have changed. She will merely notice that they have, and a once passionate attraction will vanish into the air quite as though it never was. This is why a woman will often abandon her man if he is sick, unemployed, or has otherwise fallen into a funk.

Do not despise women for their nature. They are adapted to seek out a strong partner just as surely as we are evolved to seek out a sexy one. But see their love for what it is and accept the requirements it lays upon you should you wish to retain your preeminence in her heart.

5. Love is all there is

In Western culture children are led to believe that the point of being born is to grow up and to fall in love. Those who are not in love are thought to be incomplete as human beings. The dirty tramp with his wizened crone of a girlfriend is considered happier than the wealthy bachelor who enjoys the attentions of many women but favors none in particular. Clearly this is not right. I've been in love and I've been out of love. They're both perfectly acceptable and bearable states for a person to experience.

There are various things that are just as important, if not more so, than being in love. Here are just a few: saving money, learning, caring for your family. You want more? Eating properly, exercise, hygiene, creativity and invention. Friendship. Adventure. Teaching another person what you know. Love can be great but it does not trump all.

Conclusion

Love can be a magnificent thing. It can be exhilarating. It can be miserable. It can raise a man up and inspire him to improve himself or it can muddy his mind and cause his ignominious disgrace.

When love strikes your heart and makes the colors of the world swirl before your face, it is difficult to maintain any reason amid this intense passion. But you must. Because you know better.

The Two Major Problems With Psychology

May 19, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Animus Empire

I've been a graduate student in psychology for the past four years. And every day I become more dumbfounded by how unhelpful if not damaging the field has become.

Every criticism of psychology you've heard, or expressed yourself, is correct. It's unscientific, it's driven by feminism, it views masculinity as toxic, it perpetuates subjectivism through identity politics, and it would sooner validate our problems than help us solve them. It's Hillary's campaign platform in academic form.

If a civil engineer conducted himself like a psychologist, he would write a book about how bridges are impossible to build and then insist anyone who has built a bridge only does so by oppressing minorities.

But each one of these problems with psychology is connected—each is rooted in the field's two main problems.

1. Psychology is run by women

Psychology is a soft science, so it has become overrun by soft people: women. They have turned the field into a barrage of gratitude lists, emotional indulgences, and safe spaces. This is great for women—not so great for men, because now we have come see psychological health as becoming feminized. A rabbit may as well teach a wolf how to hunt.

2. It’s based on post-modern philosophy

Psychology, as it’s studied and practiced today, has been deformed since it was a sapling. It grew out of the philosophy of the 1800s, the century that started by ending the Enlightenment and ended by starting Communism. The field’s fertilizer has been critical theory in which freedom is slavery, ignorance is strength, and a man can be a woman if he puts on a wig. Psychology is the abused stepchild of a century that couldn’t appreciate its potential.

The Reformation

At Animus, we’ve developed a system of psychology that looks past the 200 years of post-Enlightenment philosophy to the philosophy of the Ancient Greeks. We were able to do this because we’re men and so able to comprehend philosophy.

As Plato unified philosophy by its fundamental components, we’ve unified psychology by its fundamental components. We distill the pseudoscientific mess of today’s psychology to its purified form.

After hundreds of essays, five ebooks, and 120 pages of notes on the history of philosophy, we're releasing a magazine. You can pre-order your copy of the first issue. Yes, it's a Kickstarter page, but not a donation page. (You can donate if you want, but we'd rather give you value for value.)

Psychology can be a powerful field, a force to help men with, as Aristotle would say, the form of their issues. And this magazine is the next step in making that happen. As such, it's more than a magazine—it represents the obliteration of a field that has tried its best to usurp masculinity and turn everything that makes life enjoyable as men against us.

Why this matters

Every problem in our lives is psychological.

No career path? We haven't developed our identity to the point where we're the kind of man who can choose a career path.

Not getting laid? We have avoided or unacknowledged anxiety around women, and we don't know who we are in relation to women.

No friends? We prefer isolation because our neurology hasn't acclimated to social interaction.

Spend all day browsing the internet and complaining about women? All of the above.

Every problem comes down to psychology.

When we grasp psychology in the same way we grasp any other science, like botany, then we can understand, elucidate, and so overcome our problems. Consequently, cultivating a healthy psychology is as easy as cultivating a garden—it may take time, but principles make progress measurable and guarantee our eventual success.

5 Reasons You Should Become A Mental Health Worker

May 20, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

One sad fact of the world today is that the single earner household is all but dead and gone. While in the past a man could graduate high school and find a job that would give him enough income to support a family, have nice vacations, and buy a new car every five years, this is no longer possible even with both husband and wife working. And many career choices are no longer good long term options for men graduating today. With that in mind I encourage anyone planning their career to strongly consider working in the mental health field.

1. 25% of American women are mentally ill

As we previously reported, at least a fourth of all American women are mentally ill. Many unsuspecting men will become involved with these women, which will cause at least a few of them to go crazy as well. With a considerable portion of the population needing your services, that's what we call job security.

2. Increase in mentally ill behaviors

Tattoos, piercings, skrillex haircuts, one night stands, double digit abortions, and neon hair dying are all on the rise. These types of behaviors have a hive-like incubation effect, which spreads rapidly to other women. These behaviors are signs of a future lifetime of severe mental illness starting in the woman's 30s. The market for this will be huge, and the industry won't have enough staff to take on all the new patients.

3. New disorders are created all the time

In 1952 the first edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, aka the DSM, was published, with 60 different categories of mental illness. A committee of psychologists, mental health experts, the World Health Organization, and others collaborated and came up with 60 precise, definite different types of mental illness that one could diagnose. Fast forward to 2016 and the 5th edition of this manual lists a whopping 300+ disorders, including such new additions as hoarding, caffeine withdrawal, and disruptive mood dysregulation disorders (temper tantrums). Meanwhile, homosexuality was removed in the 1970s.

Additionally, the authors openly state they plan to accelerate the publication of new editions and will be adding more and more disorders. If you are a mental health worker, more diagnoses = more patients for you and more money.

4. Restless leg syndrome

Hippocrates ALMOST included these in his early medical diagnoses

With over 300 mental illnesses, it is incredibly easy to qualify for mental illness. If you are a mental health worker, you have more freedom than a police chief with a brand new ticket book to create a disorder to fit whoever is in front of you. One of my favorite examples is restless leg syndrome (formerly known as fidgeting).

Congressman Henry Waxman recently criticized this saying “I don’t think there is such a thing as restless leg syndrome. I thought that restless leg syndrome was a disease that was created by a drug company that wanted to sell a drug for a disease they had created.”

Indeed, side effects of the drugs used to treat tapping your feet include causing you to fall asleep during normal activities such as driving, causing you to faint or fall asleep while standing up, increased gambling or sexual urges, nausea, vomiting, anal bleeding, dizziness and drowsiness. I’d take a pill to get rid of all THOSE symptoms if it made me tap my leg!

5. Your income is guaranteed by the full force of the U.S. government

The Affordable Care Act was ruled by the Supreme Court to be Constitutional, and forces most Americans to buy a private health insurance policy from a number of well-connected for profit insurance companies, which includes mental health care. Your customers are literally forced to pay for your services. And you have an array of disorders which you can label them with. Easy money.

There is a huge untapped market out there, as sadly, many women are suffering from multiple mental disorders but have not even been diagnosed. Be part of the solution. Sign up now and be ready to treat all the casualties of feminism, which should provide you with an income big enough to enjoy any sane woman—providing you can find one.

4 Groups Of People SJWs Don’t Care Or Talk About

May 20, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As we battle against SJWs and their egregious positions, we have the habit of challenging them only for what they support. This is certainly necessary, but one thing we need to pay more attention to is who they do not support, who they deliberately ignore, and who never even crosses their minds.

These four groups do not form by any means an exhaustive list of the kicked around and forgotten. Yet they do very saliently represent the sort of people with whom society’s biggest sympathies should lie. The fact that their discarded needs and ignored services are so obvious makes SJWs’ disdain for them all the greater.

1. The Disabled

The wage gap is a myth, completely explained by women's choices to pursue less skilled occupations, take more vacation time, and work less overtime. So, too, is the "rape" crisis on college campuses, whereby anything from wolf-whistling to asking a girl out when she does not like you equals "harassment."

Unlike these false statistics, however, the disabled suffer the highest level of poverty of any group. In my native Australia, the figure is around 50%. The plight of America's disabled is comparable: they are twice as likely to live in economic squalor. Even these pitiful outcomes would no doubt be a lot worse if many disabled individuals did not receive significant support from family and friends. Yet supposed "sexism" in video games and other fabricated mole hills have received 100 times more attention from SJWs over the last five years.

So how can we explain or justify the almost complete SJW silence on this disability shame? Supposedly students paying off education loans are some the biggest victims of the "crooked" financial system, but barely a thought is kept for those disabled people who have no or only a limited chance to gain an education, let alone get a long-term job to support themselves. The last thing I wish to do is underestimate the often untapped capabilities of disabled individuals. Many have disabilities that do not generally interfere with the job they currently have.

That said, many are greatly impacted, impeded or even prevented from living a full life by their conditions. No amount of positive thinking and inclusion can change the fact that so frequently they live objectively terrible lives, especially in material terms. So why does their incontrovertible, quantifiable plight receive just an iota of the attention, and usually only for cosmetic purposes, given to privileged white upper middle-class college girls?

2. Senior Citizens

Socialist Bernie Sanders may look older than your great-grandmother. Hillary Clinton may be 70 next year. Big deal. On the whole, SJWs do not give a damn about senior citizens. If they did, they would recognize that, as much younger people, they should get off their backsides and prioritize what limited social security the US has for those who cannot work or have worked all their lives.

If you think life is hard paying for college when you can work, try having to pay for a billion medical pills and bills while you cannot work due to age or other infirmities. I have never in my life met a student in deleterious financial circumstances who was working as hard as they could to alleviate them. I have, in contrast, met at least 500 senior citizens who did not predict rapid extensions in their lifespans, coupled with soaring health costs as they aged.

Let us remember as well that middle-aged and older people overwhelmingly vote for Republicans. Focusing on pet projects like non-gendered bathrooms is much, much more important than ensuring that more right-leaning senior citizens have the care that they need. To save face, SJWs group all welfare recipients together as one block. This does not change their natural contempt for older generations. They are simply a means to an end for leftist extremists.

Older people's actual needs are conflated with other people's desires to try and justify moronic policy platforms like free college for US students while the country has a $20 trillion national debt, or higher welfare payments for uneducated mothers who popped out three or four kids before they bothered to find a steady job or even finish high school.

3. The White Working Classes

Mitt Romney, worth several hundred million dollars, and the white garbage collector are always seen as the one person: the eternally privileged whit male. Like with senior citizens, the white working classes are shoved in alongside other poorer groups to make Democrats and SJWs look like champions for the economic battlers. The unspoken meaning, nevertheless, is that whites are poor because they choose to be and blacks and others are poor because of history and contemporary oppression.

Underprivileged whites are therefore seen as lazy, not toilers trying to make their way in a world just as difficult as it is for blacks in the same income bracket. SJWs will only came to their "aid" in the weakest sense possible, giving them the most generalized sympathy, all while devoting continual attentions to "special" groups like African-American gang members, illegal immigrants, and transgender prostitutes who cannot find work.

Southern whites in particular should feel aggrieved by the concept of white privilege. Thanks to John Wilkes Booth and several other factors, the South remained economically underfunded from the end of the Civil War until the present day. Reconstruction was the sham of all shams, performed quarter-halfedly for political expediency, not followed through genuinely.

In places such as the United Kingdom, peripheral (and whiter) regions such as Wales and northern England are routinely denigrated when, in fact, their only "crimes" are a) not having the population base to support large economic centers and b) being ignored for countless years by the government in London when it came to funding, infrastructure and other economic stimuli.

4. The Police

I take that back. SJWs do not ignore police; they devote inordinate amounts of time to undermining them! Police in the United States do not have a proper right to defend themselves, most notably when their assailants are black or SJWs themselves. To SJWs, they are murderers and rapists (usually because of one bad egg per 10,000 cops). What they are entitled to instead is a barrage of criticisms, consistent abuse, and threats from those who are basically saying society would be better off without the direct enforcement of laws.

Issues such as PTSD amongst police officers are also routinely swept under the carpet, in favor of self-serving narratives, such as gay and transgender people suffering appalling "mental illnesses" because of discrimination on college campuses. It would seem that these same campuses, which are the biggest champions of LGBT interests and special privileges, are more dangerous than the streets of Camden, NJ, St. Louis, MO, or Detroit, MI.

If you want an interesting account of how a would-be anarchist realized the error of his ways, read about Harvard scientist, psychologist, and linguist Steven Pinker's transformation. Having witnessed the effects of the Montreal police strike, namely chaos and unprecedented criminality, he changed his outlook about the need for armed authority. Sadly, this was in the 1960s and the current breed of leftists are seemingly impervious to any lessons from life, not to mention elementary school age logic. It would probably take social disorder ten times more intense and hundred times wider than what Pinker observed for contemporary SJWs to undergo the same ideological reversal.

The cancellation of a feminist dance class is more hurtful for SJWs

than the situations of those needing actual help

Nothing should really surprise you anymore. The wants of the narcissistic outweigh the needs of the needy or those who deserve our support and admiration. Inasmuch as I counsel against you getting into almost always pointless arguments with SJWs, I hope this article can add fuel to the fire in any retorts you give back to them.

Things invariably tend to get worse with SJW-generated trends, so what you should expect is an even higher ignorance towards those our society should be focusing on. Attention is a drug for the worst feminists and other leftists: the more they get of it now, the higher the dose they require in the future. The disabled, old people, poor whites, and embattled police forces all lower the personal vanity upon which SJWs depend.

Fat Acceptance Is The Leftist Elite's Ultimate Cultural Doomsday Device

May 21, 2016 | by Ray Coleman | Link | Original Link

I've noticed a recent trend on ROK these past few weeks: the editors are reaching back into the vault and reminding us of some key tenets of not only game, but of nation building and societal maintenance. Of particular note is the series of common-sense articles posted regarding overweight women, and why right-thinking men should avoid them like the plague. But whenever I read an article here, I like to delve deeper down the rabbit hole.

I look around and see fat acceptance taking the nation by storm, and I see key figures in the manosphere yanking back the covers and playing reveille as loud as they can to wake the groggy masses from their media-induced slumber. But here's an issue few of us ever discuss: where did all of this "fat acceptance" come from, and what's the agenda behind it?

Phase I: The Farce Awakens

As indicated in the feature photo above, it is a well-known fact that, by and large, the African American community has essentially accepted overweight women as par for the course. But it wasn't always that way. If you grew up in the mid-70s or early 80s, you remember a time when women like Nichelle Nichols, Heather Locklear, Cheryl Ladd, and Morgan Fairchild dominated the airwaves. In the 90s you had Jennifer Lopez, Salma Hayek, Rosie Perez, En Vogue, and TLC. Sure, you might see a few tubby chicks in Wal-

Mart, but even that was a rarity. But then, between circa 1999 and 2006, we went from seeing this every day:

to this:

Yes, both of those photos are of American Idol star Kelly Clarkson. She's not alone, and people like her didn't just materialize out of the ether. The reason we regularly see land whales dragging around five kids spawned by ten different dudes and the reason we see these same train-wrecks giving fit, well-paid dudes the cold shoulder in clubs all across America is because the leftist elites learned a long time ago that without a patriarchy, a society's standards go out of the window.

What's left is a confused, disorganized rabble ready and willing to be led whichever way the wind blows. With Western women, it's even worse, because they have NO CLUE that they're lost and listless; in fact, they think they've become "empowered."

Back to the feature photo. It's well known that one of the most detrimental effects the welfare state of the 60s had on urban communities is that it decimated the family unit. The effects were not immediate, to be sure; it took several decades for the lack of father figures to coalesce into a communities-wide attitude of "let me do me and you do you." The women from these communities no longer saw a need to keep their sexuality in check, to watch their weight, or to even act in a remotely feminine manner.

The sad truth behind this, however, is that this metamorphosis was by design rather than by chance. The elites, since time immemorial, have used minorities as crash test dummies for their pet social projects. Ever since the French Revolution, the elites have been looking for that magic formula, that soothing mantra, that could tame the masses. Police state regimes of the kind you see in movies like "The Hunger Games" and "Equilibrium" don't work in the real world because the open degradation and brutalization of the populace invariably leads to open and violent rebellion.

Religion worked for a time, until the working class witnessed the elites so frequently and flagrantly violate the very religious mantras they espoused that they soon became disillusioned with it all, and, once again, rebelled. With urban minorities they found their magic bullet: destroy the patriarchy and sell women on the idea that they can act as heads of households, communities, and, by extension, society, and you win by default.

Nobody really paid much attention to this phenomenon so long as only specific, remote segments of the population were affected. But now, like a malignant cyst, this phenomenon has erupted out of our nation's inner cities and trailer parks and has now invaded every aspect of our culture, so that now you frequently see things like this:

One of my cousins was the first to coin the phrase “weaponized stupidity.” What else do you call a phenomenon or philosophy that convinces a society to embrace physically and emotionally dysfunctional individuals as mothers, wives, and potential mates? At this point you’re probably saying, okay, Ray, we get it, Sports Illustrated put a fat chick on its cover, you’ve got MTV, aka lib-tard central, showing a regular-sized guy literally rolling around on the floor with a beached whale. What else is new? What’s new is that the end goal is not just fat acceptance for fat acceptance’s sake. It’s not just about big women getting laid. It’s about the hijacking of a society.

Phase II: The Trap Is Sprung

So what happens when a society at large finds itself predominated by women who look and act in an unattractive manner? You get a lot of men who aren’t willing to stick with the families they form with those women and an even larger number of men who won’t jump on the grenade in the first place.

Sure, you’ll find thirsty betas who’ll pick up one of these barkers from the kennel and put a ring on them. But at some point, even the thirstiest of betas will wake up one day, look at the behemoth snoring loudly next to him, and say, what the hell am I doing with my life? At that point, all it takes is for our portly missus to make one criticism too many, to spill a whole plate of nachos all over the bed once too many times, or to stop up the toilet one time too many, and our beta chump will be out the door faster than Scooby and Shaggy after spotting a g-g-g-g-ghost.

What you’re left with is yet another divorced couple, yet another bitter single mother, and yet another set of children who will be shuttled back and forth between two bitter, disgruntled parents. Chances are, these women had mothers or grandmothers who bought the feminist lie back in the 70s, and passed on their misguided beliefs to them. A man should appreciate your mind, not your body, they probably told them. You are not a sex object!

What the sisterhood failed to realize is that biology cares not for empty pseudo-philosophies. Men generally want to share their lives and livelihoods with young, vibrant, attractive women. But now society’s gone into full-reeducation mode, directing its trained lackeys to constantly chastise established men of means for going after young, slender women instead of their physically and emotionally weathered mothers and grandmothers.

The elites have known for years that a nuclear family, with a healthy, dutiful man, an attractive, nurturing woman, and well-rounded, obedient children set up on their own plot of land, is basically a self-contained unit. Government intervention is fairly superfluous at that point. Women—real women who will stand by their men and help carve out a future for their children—are needed to build a society. But when you look around today, short of an Amish girl here or there, such women are in extremely short supply. The dating and marriage pool is largely dominated by jewels like this one:

This is why you’ve got a mass sexodus amongst western men. The elites have boosted the egos of your Rebel Wilsons and Gabourey Sidibes of the world to such all-time highs that they think they should be able to bed the kings and princes among men. This in turn gives the genuine 8's, 9's, and 10's an even higher sense of entitlement to the point to where they're virtually unapproachable unless you've got at least ten years of game under your belt, a private jet, and an endless supply of cash.

So now you've got a bunch of aimless single men and clueless single women wandering around; single, lost souls who would have in times past banded together to effect real social change in the face of injustice, but have now become tools of the very elites that oppress them. Without patriarchy, relationships between men and women devolve into little more than a hodge-podge of random hookups and drunken text messages.

In the absence of healthy, nurturing male-female relationships as the standard, the door suddenly becomes open for same sex marriage, pedophilia, bestiality, and any other nightmarish mockery of the human condition you can think of. Think back to the months leading up to Obergefell, the Supreme Court ruling that sanctioned homosexual marriage. You had a lot of people saying "meh, men and women have pretty much screwed up the marriage institution, why not let the gays have a shot?" That sentiment did NOT come from the people themselves. It was spoon-fed to them by the leftist cabal.

Haven't you ever wondered why, in the face of a 50-70% divorce rate in America, we haven't had a run of PSAs on television coaching men and women on how to make heterosexual relationships and marriages work? The plan all along has been to obliterate male-female relationships so that every freak and weirdo imaginable could legitimate their respective fetishes. A handful of gays like lesbian activist Masha Gessen have gone as far as to openly admit that the endgame all along was to destroy heterosexual relationships, so that their own sordid facsimiles of "relationships" could thrive.

With half of your population apathetic towards the demise of normal relationships, and the other half consisting of weak-willed, weak-minded men who may actually view homosexuality as a viable alternative in the face of an increasingly hostile sexual and relationship landscape, it's little wonder that we find ourselves where we are today. And that was the plan all along.

We must remember that the elite ranks, if Hollywood is any indication, are primarily comprised of people with virtually nonexistent morals. Their leaders want to remake the world in a way that reflects the chaotic, drug-fueled, fetish-infused lifestyle to which they have become accustomed. Only a patriarchy consisting of men who have women in their society worth fighting for can stand against them. But in the absence of such women, why will a man fight against the system? If anything, he'll fight other men over what few, attractive, feminine women remain. I believe much of the racial tension we see today is based at least in part on this, and that the elites manufactured this tension just like they did in the aftermath of Bacon's Rebellion.

In Conclusion

We've all known that the liberal elites have been behind the reorganization of American society for the past forty years. But few know the reason behind it, the ultimate end-game, or the full extent of the means used by the elites to bring their goals to fruition. Fat acceptance is one such means, and it's deadlier than many of us realize.

The way I see it, crippling this monstrosity would be like blowing up the Death Star: sure, the Empire still had other weapons in its arsenal, but the universe got a whole lot safer once it was gone. With a return to patriarchy comes the return of women men will want to form and maintain intact relationships and families with. We will then find a world devoid of drug-addled kids, divorced, slutty soccer-moms spreading eagle on Instagram, purple-haired men in dresses filing lawsuits for the "right" to use women's bathrooms, and women wanting to marry their dogs.

We'll finally be living in a society where a majority of its members—rather than a handful of elites and their special-interest flunkies—can truly chart their own destinies.

Why Are People So Polarized By Politics And Morality?

May 21, 2016 | by Rod Berne | Link | Original Link

As the 2016 election moves forward, we are witnessing politics become increasingly polarized. On the Democrat side, Hillary Clinton continues struggling to solidify her status as the presumptive Democratic nominee against aging Marxist Bernie Sanders. On the Republican side, Donald Trump has effectively cemented his place as the nominee, though the GOP establishment shows signs of wariness at his unexpected meteoric rise.

In The Righteous Mind: Why Good People Are Divided By Politics And Religion, psychologist Jonathan Haidt writes about why it is that people's arguments about politics get so heated, and why people very rarely change their minds even when presented with clear evidence. We have all had political conversations with people and wondered why they are unable to just accept that we are right and they are wrong. We may dismiss them as naïve or stupid, but there may be something else going on.

Moral Reasoning Is Used To Justify Our Gut Responses

The book opens with a couple of interesting hypothetical scenarios:

> "A family's dog was killed by a car in front of their house. They had heard that dog meat was delicious, so they cut up the dog's body and cooked it and ate it for dinner. Nobody saw them do this."
> "A man goes to the supermarket once a week and buys a chicken. But before cooking the chicken, he has sexual intercourse with it. Then he cooks it and eats it."

In both of these cases, no one was harmed. Yet when Haidt presented these scenarios to people, they almost universally agreed that the individuals in both scenarios had done something wrong. When pressed to give a reason exactly why they were wrong, many people were unable to offer a clear answer. After doing research around the world, from universities to poor towns in Brazil, Haidt noticed that people often give gut responses to difficult moral questions, and when asked why, they provide a mishmash of responses that oftentimes they admit do not make sense.

This led Haidt to form his famous social intuitionist model of moral psychology: Intuitions come first, strategic reasoning second. For instance, many college students would readily agree that as long as no one is hurt and there is no victim, people should be able to do what they want. Yet when Haidt pressed them to say who the victim is in the chicken scenario, they flounder about, unable to give an answer. This moral dumbfounding seems to suggest that people come up with an answer first, and then use reasoning to support their emotional gut reactions. Most moral reasoning is often simply a post-hoc justification for our intuitions.

Haidt also found that in non-Western cultures like India and Brazil, they have a "thicker" moral world. In non-individualistic societies, cultures broaden the moral domain to encompass and regulate more aspects of life. From what a person wears, how they eat, and who they have sex with, most cultures across the globe have much stricter moral codes than the relaxed ones familiar to Westerners, which center around harm and fairness.

Interestingly, his experiments found that the effect of social class is far larger than the effect of culture. Upper-middle class Brazilians, Indians, and Americans often reluctantly agreed that in hypothetical moral scenarios with no victim, even if they don't agree with it or feel disgusted by it, there was nothing wrong with what had occurred. Yet for lower-class people across cultures, including poor people in the U.S., they were far less likely to endorse any disgusting act, even if it is completely victimless.

To expand on the social intuitionist model, the book gives a metaphor of the mind divided into two parts: The rider and the elephant. The elephant is your mind's emotions, which are rapidly activated when making a political or moral judgment. The rider serves the elephant—whatever way the elephant leans, the rider assists with explaining why the elephant makes that decision. Think of the rider as a lawyer, backwards-rationalizing the elephant's actions.

Another way to think about this is that your reasoning is like a press secretary, who automatically justifies any position taken by the president, your emotions. It is a mistake to think of moral reasoning as something people do by themselves to figure out a truth.

The book states that while we may think of reasoning as central to morality, it in fact plays a secondary role to emotions. For example, psychopaths are able to reason yet lack emotion. Babies, on the other hand, are unable to reason yet have strong emotions. Psychopaths are famously morally deficient. Yet when babies are presented with simple moral scenarios, they show signs of morality.

The book also offers an interesting way to look at how people come to conclusions when presented with evidence: Can versus must. When we are presented with evidence that we want to believe, we ask ourselves the question: Can I believe it? Often we'll find that the answer is yes.

Conversely, when we are shown evidence that goes against what we would prefer to believe, we ask ourselves the question: Must I believe it? Often we'll find that the answer is no.

Morality Is About More Than Just Harm And Fairness

The book lays out the six foundations of morality that each individual holds to varying degrees. The six moral foundations are:

1. Care and harm. It makes us sensitive to signs of suffering and need.

2. Fairness and cheating. We vigilantly look for signs of cheating, in part because fairness helps us form cohesive communities.

3. Liberty and oppression. Centers around people's desire to be free from external constraints.

4. Authority and subversion. It allows us to forge a social hierarchy and build relationships.

5. Sanctity and degradation. We have inherited sensitive disgust receptors to identify signs of impurity. It makes it possible for people to invest objects with irrational and extreme values.

6. Loyalty and betrayal. It makes us sensitive to signs that another person is not a team player, and want to punish those who betray our tribe.

As you might imagine, liberals tend to view the first three moral foundations as supremely important, while neglecting the other three. On the other hand, conservatives value all six foundations roughly equally. This is a major source of disagreement between both tribes. Liberals tend to think that if no one is being harmed, an action is fine. They also think that if a person is being harmed, that is the worst possible thing. For conservatives with a wider variance of morality, they are also sensitive to loyalty to one's country, and the sanctity of certain institutions.

One reason why liberals are so unable to understand conservatives is because of this very point: There is more to morality than harm and fairness. It's not just Western conservatives who value loyalty, authority, and sanctity. If you travel to any country outside of the West, you will find cultures value place enormous importance on those three foundations. The idea of harm and fairness being the only center of morality would be completely alien to most cultures.

Morality Strengthens Our Tribes, But Also Blocks Our Ability To Think Clearly About The Beliefs Of Others

The third principle of moral psychology is that morality binds and blinds. Humans are social animals, and we need common moral standards to rally around to increase trust in one another. Communities form in part by establishing moral standards. If a person violates the tribe morality, they are punished.

Once people join a political team, they get ensnared in its moral matrix. They see confirmation of their viewpoints everywhere and it is often impossible to convince them that they are wrong. We saw this during the mainstream media coverage of the meetup outrage back in February.

Think about one common moral code on college campuses today: feminism. If a college student were to violate the shared moral matrix by saying aloud that feminism is a false idol, he would be banished from the tribe, perhaps literally removed from campus if enough students rally together and shout loud enough. In the past, Galileo questioned the moral matrix of his day, the Catholic Church, by saying that the earth revolves around the sun. Thus, he was punished.

Today, if a college student says that women would be better off as wives rather than careerists, he would be punished. Punishing such heretics allows the moral tribe to reaffirm their faith in their moral matrix and feel better about ridding themselves of a violator of the moral code, never thinking whether the code is true or false. Morality binds and blinds.

My only complaint with the book is that it does not delve deep enough into status signaling and its role in morality. He touches on it briefly when describing how moral tribes form, but I would like to have seen him explore it further.

The Righteous Mind is a fascinating book filled with interesting information about how morality evolved and its relationship with politics. It also teaches you how to speak with someone from the opposite end of the political spectrum and find common ground. It offers some useful tools to think about liberal and conservative morality, and how some cultures have a “thicker” moral matrix with many moral codes, and how others have a “thinner” moral matrix with few codes outside of harm and fairness.

It will broaden the way you think about politics, reasoning, and people. Highly recommended.

Muslims Reward European “Refugee” Generosity By Blowing Up Another Civilian Aircraft

May 22, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As SJW Europeans, including men in relationships most weirdly of all, respond to mass rapes and other crimes by inviting ungrateful migrants into their homes, yet another civilian airliner has been blown up by a suspected Islamist bomb over Greek waters. Luggage and human body parts from EgyptAir flight MS804 continue to be found in the Mediterranean. Instead of showing solidarity with the victims and their families, we can expect that SJWs will double down and say that the only way to fight terrorism is to force open Europe’s external borders even further. The solution, however, is for Europe to demand that its population maintain a minimum level of nativity and unconditional integration, just like the terrorism-free societies of Japan and South Korea.

At the heart of this issue is the fact that there is no fundamental difference between the non-terrorist criminal proclivities of young Arab and North African migrant men on the streets of Europe and the actions of actual Islamic terrorists. Both varieties represent cultural attitudes that are savagely opposed to any assimilation into European societies and even the concept of Europe itself. Moreover, most of the Batalcan attackers, for example, transitioned from lives of regular crime to wanton destruction inspired by religious terrorism.

Rather than being assuaged by promises of homes, livelihoods and welfare-on-tap for millions of new arrivals over the coming years, a plurality, if not majority of Muslim immigrants and their descendants consciously see this as an opportunity to erode Europe's indigenous base and make it more amenable to Islamization.

The more Europe gives out concessions, the greater and more onerous the additional demands it will face from migrants.

Should MS804's bloody end be shown to have been the work of extraterrestrials, the Flying Spaghetti Monster or God, the argument above still stands. SJWs' exaggerated rejoicing when a deadly or otherwise violent event is not the work of Islamic terrorists or migrants shows just how many unacceptable incidents involving foreigners and their progeny are occurring right now.

Let's fight terrorism and "racism" by me being cuckolded!

The body language here says it all, sadly. If he's already looking like he's about to get kicked out of a photo, what about his relationship?

Insofar as MS804's demise will matter to SJWs, it will be used as a pretext to batten down the hatches. Expect them to insist that only the reason why previous attempts at letting in over a million "refugees" failed to achieve peace and "tolerance" is because those efforts simply did not go far enough. The so-called racism of a majority of the German, French, British and other European populations will be to implicitly, sometimes explicitly rationalize MS804. That the biggest number of victims were Egyptians does not obscure how the airliners and cities invariably targeted are either European or directly linked with Europe, such as leaving a major European airport. The Egyptian passengers and crew were seen as traitors to Islam, plain and simple.

How will these SJWs excuses crystallize in real life? German and other governments will pump out more propaganda encouraging migrant men to copulate with and impregnate local women so the chances of them returning home fall from 20% to practically 0%. Welfare desperately needed for Europe's legitimately sick and old, who have worked all their lives, will be reallocated to migrants whose refugee status is dubious at best. All in all, austerity will be felt by the rest of the population, while millions of new and recent migrant arrivals live on what limited largesse Europe has left. Oh, and more men with poor body language will feature in photos of a migrant man about to steal his European wife.

Some of the more common cries from SJWs after MS804 and similar happenings are bound to be something like:

- "The most popular party ahead of the Dutch elections is racist Geert Wilders'!!"
- "Too many people in France are supporting Marine Le Pen, particularly after the Bataclan attacks!!"
- "More than half of migrant crime [everything from petty theft to rape and murder] is because of racism!!"

As you can see, the same crowd opposed to any form of "victim-blaming" for those alleging rape are surprisingly open to condoning the deaths of Europeans and other Westerners at the hands of non-Western terrorists and migrants.

Europe faces an existential threat it is either too weak or too cowardly to fight

Common sense politicians like Marine Le Pen are perennially labeled as extremists for pointing out that Europe is destroying itself with moronic immigration and other social policies.

Europe is afraid of younger, more fecund and audacious peoples both within its territory and outside them. Being European, notably a white European, has become a wellspring for self-hatred. The tragic circumstances behind MS804's loss will paradoxically exacerbate this feeling amongst many Europeans, most of all SJWs. Many will blame Europeans for this event. Meanwhile, those firm enough to demand changes to the lunacy of Europe's border policies will be again castigated as racists and extremists ad nauseam, despite being the only group without blood on their hands.

The Bataclan massacre did not steer Europe away from self-made disaster. Neither did the mass rapes in Cologne and other European cities. Unless Europeans are prepared for drastic changes in government and are not only prepared but incensed enough to take to the streets, more attacks like the one on MS804 are going to happen. It is not a matter of if, only when.

How To Work Out The Lower Half Of Your Body Using Isometric Exercises

May 22, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Last week, I discussed the use of isometric exercises to provide a workout for those in restrictive positions. That article explained some of the theory behind these exercises, as well as their practice for the muscles of the upper body. This article will deal with the exact same subject matter, but for the muscles of the lower body instead (and no, this article will not discuss exercising the pubococcygeus muscles, please see one of my previous articles for a particular set of isometric exercises for working those elusive muscles).

A Review

Before we begin, let us review the basic principles of isometric exercise:

1. All isometrics are static, flexed positions, not dynamic movements

2. A full breath is done before the flexion, the breath is exhaled during the flexion, and the normal breathing resumes as the muscles are relaxed

3. Hold each flexion for 10-15 seconds

4. Do each exercise 2-4 times, depending on your preference.

With that being said, let us now discuss the positions that will work the lower body, as well as other muscles that were not worked by the exercises discussed in last week's article.

The Exercises

These exercises, and the images of them, are once again taken from the “Black Monk” isometric set.

The first exercise is another one for the abdomen, a pose you’ll sometimes see referred to as the “Scrunch.” Lay down flat on the floor, and lift your legs up, bending at a 90 degree angle with your feet off the ground. Then bend at the abdomen, lifting the torso up until you cannot move forward any further. Then hold this position while holding your breath, exhaling upon relaxing the muscles.

The next exercise works the back, shoulders, and triceps: lay down on the floor, keeping the feet together, the legs straight and extended, and the arms in a “Crucifix” position. Then press down hard with the palms up.

This exercise is done three times, with the arms held in three different positions as pictured

Then do the reverse of this exercise: lay on the stomach with the palms down, and push down with the palms down, remembering to breathe properly. This exercise will work the biceps, chest, and shoulders.

The next set of exercises are ones that actually work the legs:

To begin, sit down with the feet on the floor. Using the hands, attempt to press the legs together as hard as possible, while resisting with the legs. In addition to working the quadriceps muscles, this exercise also works the chest and shoulders.

The next exercise also works the legs, but the calves and hamstrings rather than the quadriceps: While sitting on a chair and dangling the feet down, cross ankles and push one foot forward while pulling the other one back. Do two sets of each direction.

This next exercise works the inner thighs knees and groin: sitting in a similar position to the previous two exercises (sitting on a chair or bed with the feet dangling off them to the floor), put a folded up pillow, towel, or some similar padded object in between the legs. Then attempt to force the legs together. You can use a hard, rigid object (such as a box, or a watermelon), but bear in mind there is a risk of breaking, so use common sense.

And finally, a “total body” isometric exercise that can be done is to lay flat on your back, with the arms crossed bend your head and the feet pointing up. Apply pressure through the elbows and heels, balancing the body on those body parts while lifting the back and buttocks slightly off the floor.

Conclusion

So concludes the hoary “Black Monk” isometric exercises. But these are certainly not the only applications of this style of muscular exercise. Indeed, any resistance exercise can be made into an isometric exercise by holding it in a static position. For example, a lifted weight can be held in a fixed position over head, this giving an isometric exercise to the shoulders and forearms.

Isometric exercise can also be combined with movement of other muscles to increase instability and thus force the muscles to work harder, such as in the overhead farmer’s walk: an exercise consisting of lifting a heavy weight over head (the static component) and walking while keeping the weight overhead (the dynamic component).

While isometrics are no substitute for traditional resistance training, they do have their place for any athlete.

Is Sweden Slowly Becoming An Islamic Caliphate?

May 22, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

In French writer Michel Houellebecq's novel Soumission (Submission) from 2015, the Muslim Brotherhood Party wins the presidential election in France. The French protagonist sees his country change to become more like Saudi Arabia than a European country.

While the story seems dystopic, every day it looks more and more like a realistic depiction of what's going on in Europe. In Sweden I can see the changes happening in my own neighborhood, where immigrants (although they're not all Muslims) already outnumber ethnic Swedes. I'm the one looking like a foreigner around here.

Some recent stories in the news illustrate how this country is changing. One example is that halal products are becoming more popular. Two big grocery store chains report that their sales of halal meat increased by 20 percent last year. Halal means that it's permissible to use according to Islamic law. Some stores are now also selling halal branded makeup.

Schools have started serving halal meat to students, despite that some parents have expressed concern about it. One mother in Gävle called it "a slap in the face" when her son told her that his school now serves halal meat. Apparently this is something the schools see no reason to inform the parents about beforehand.

Immigrants are overrepresented in sexual assault statistics

But there are way more nefarious problems than schools teaching children Muslim eating habits. After the events on New Year's Eve when women in several cities were assaulted by immigrant men, Swedish Police has gathered data on sexual assaults and a new report came out this week.

The results show that of those sexual assaults that have been committed by groups of men in public areas, most of the perpetrators have been "youths" seeking or having received asylum. When it comes to assaults at bath houses, which is a growing problem, 80 percent of perpetrators were immigrants.

Here's one of many accounts made by molested girls, cited in the report:

> A girl was surrounded on a train by eight men that got on board together. Two of the men started touching her thigh and up toward her crotch. She finally took out a pepper spray and they all stepped back. All of the men were over 25 and had foreign origin.

If that's not enough to make you feel disgusted, here's one more account:

> A sixteen year old girl was attacked by a great number of boys who "were foreign and spoke poor Swedish" who tried to tear her clothes off. Some of them photographed the event. The girl was on her way home from a party with her boyfriend when she was assaulted. The boyfriend was a witness to the event.

The hatred toward ethnic Swedes finally gets the media's attention

It’s well known that Muslim men look down on non-Muslim women. They treat Western girls walking around in slutty mini skirts differently then those “honorable” women who wear bags over their heads. They see Swedish girls dressing like whores and treat them as such. It’s a part of the “sinful” Swedish society, which they have a more or less concealed contempt for.

The tabloid Expressen recently published a reportage about the hatred that’s growing toward “svennar,” ethnic Swedes. In some neighborhoods in Sweden you will be harassed for being a “svenne.” If your hair isn’t dark as coal, you better watch your back.

One property owner talks about what Seved, a neighborhood in Malmö, is like today.

> As long as you abide by their rules, they often won’t do anything to you. Otherwise they become violent, no matter what background they have. But they are much harder on the original Swedes. They don’t want Swedes in the area. They want a ghetto where they are kings. I don’t think the authorities dare to talk about it.

An anonymous Serbian man who used to live in that area has similar things to say.

> What I noticed at first was that they didn’t attack people from the Middle East. They treated those with Swedish background the worst. One day I saw them throwing a rock that hit the ground just as a Swedish woman with a stroller passed by. Then I thought that it had gone way too far.

Many of the Swedes in Seved don’t want to talk to Expressen’s reporter. They’re too scared—and who can blame them. Osama Krayem, who’s been charged for his involvement in the terror attacks in Paris and Brussels, came from the same neighborhood.

Of course, some excuse this despicable behavior by referring to “structures” and “marginalization,” ignoring the fact that immigrants are the majority in many of these areas, and Swedes are the ones being marginalized. But let’s pretend that it’s all about Swedes being racist—it’s easier than facing the truth.

Houellebecq should have written about Sweden

Michel Houellebecq.

Halal food, rampant sexual harassment, racism toward Swedes—these are three examples of how this country is changing because of immigration and multiculturalism. Many immigrants are nice people, sure. But these are just a few of the trends we are seeing, and they're going to fundamentally change this country.

I don't see any hope for it, honestly. Like I've said in previous articles, Swedes won't fight for their country, their white guilt is enough to make them give it away for free. Personally, I'm looking to get out of here as soon as possible. Preferably to some place where the population is ethnically homogeneous and people don't hate whites.

Michel Houellebecq imagined a future where France has become an Islamic state. I'd bet his prediction would come true sooner if he had written about Sweden.

7 Reasons Western Women Can Empower Themselves By Covering Their Faces With Veils

May 23, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

We all know how bad Western women have it today with daily misogyny and sexism. I therefore propose a solution that will satisfy all parties while liberating women once for all: All Western women, especially the wealthy white feminists who face the worst oppression ever in the history of humanity, should wear niqabs, burqas, or other forms of veils to empower themselves. Read the following seven reasons and you'll see how they're the greatest weapons ever against the evil patriarchy.

1. It's not oppressive at all

First, in spite of what many in the West might say, the veils are not oppressive to women at all. If anything, they're quite liberating as we shall see later on.

The key is to wear it because you want to while rationalizing that it's empowering. Just as men giving you attention for looking feminine is harassment while dressing like a slut to attention-whore is empowering, all that matters is the intention and the justification you spin out of your emotional mind.

But don't you have to be a Muslim to wear one?

Not necessarily. And who cares if it means stopping daily misogyny? Some women have already experimented and described feeling "liberated." You should also know that many Muslim women wear the veil and identify themselves as feminists at the same time. So, drop your prejudice and don't be afraid to give it a try!

2. Overcome patriarchal air conditioners

What other female fashion can be worn in both desert and snow?

Did you know that the patriarchy has been employing an invisible weapon to put women down in corporate workplaces? That's right. These pesky sexist men have been trying to undermine your work performance by keeping the air conditioners at a room temperature to make you feel uncomfortable when you decide to wear your tank tops and shorts to the office.

By wearing a veil to cover yourself, you're giving a big collective middle finger to your sexist male co-workers by keeping yourself nice and warm. Take that, patriarchy!

3. You won't have to shave or take care of yourself anymore

Just enough slit on the eyes to do your all-important texting.

Feminists complain about having to shave their legs, armpits, as well as having to maintain their hair, put on make-up, and so on even as they rationalize that they're not doing it to impress men. Why bother wasting your time with like that when you can just wake up in the morning and put on a niqab instead? It will save you enormous amount of time each day which you can then allocate to your precious texting and social media time.

4. You won't be objectified

Feminists complain that women are being sexually objectified all the time (yet don't mind marching around in their underwears with "slut" written all over their bodies). If you don't like being sexually objectified, why not simply cover yourself? A simple burqa on you means no more street harassment, no more workplace harassment, and no more being judged based on your looks. Us men will benefit too by not having to look at your ugly and hate-ridden faces.

But sorry fatties, it won't make you look slimmer.

5. It's the best anti-rape defense

You think these women get cat-called and raped by evil Western men?

How about a using it as a way to survive our rape-apocalypse where one in four women are raped every single day (no exaggeration, it’s all supported by feminist data)? What man would dare jump you and try to rape you when they don’t even know what you look like on the inside? What man would get turned on just by looking at a drape of curtain? It will even prevent drunk rape where you wake up feeling like a slut and decide to ruin a man’s life by accusing him of rape because no man would even hit on you to begin with. It’s the best anti-rape defense ever for women concerned for their own safety.

6. Be unique without self-mutilation

So many colors to show off your unique identity!

Far too many Western women are mutilating themselves to show how unique and special they are. Why damage yourself to meet patriarchal standards of uniqueness? So, instead of getting silly tattoos (that you'll likely regret in the future), chopping off your hair to look like a punk rocker, or getting piercings like some African tribal warrior, why not just wear a veil? Tattoos and colored hair are so mainstream now, you can do much better to show off what a special snowflake you are with your unique fashion.

7. Attract the right man

You probably wouldn't get as many Tinder matches though.

Tired of losers and douchebags who just want you for sex? By wearing a veil, you can attract your own Mr. Perfect. Instead of being judged by your body and looks, you'll attract men who will value you for your… uh… um…

Education and career!

Yes, men will finally ignore your aesthetics and whatever little femininity you have and appreciate you for your hard-earned college degree and desk job. You're guaranteed to have a line of men waiting for a chance to date you.

So, will the Western women do it?

"Is my Pussy Pass still valid if I'm covered up?"

No, of course not. Who are we kidding?

Western women, even the feminists, intrinsically understand that their women card is too valuable to throw away. They still want to whore for attention and feed their egos over on Instagram and Tinder (even as they complain about sexual objectification); they still want thirsty men to worship them just for not being a land-whale; the ugly ones will still want to engage in reaction-formation and purposely augment their ugliness to disgust men; they want to slut around with all the sexist and masculine men they claim to despise; they still believe the burden of rape is solely on the entire male gender while they themselves lead irresponsible lives; and so on.

The very thought that they should even make an ounce of effort to keep themselves accountable for themselves without blaming and controlling men is completely alien and unacceptable for them; they'll just come up with excuses after excuses to avoid taking responsibility for their own lives.

The feminists have no solution to any of their complaints, and that is by design. Feminists need to keep their torch of victimhood burning forever so that they can continue blaming their problems on men and society at large while they themselves want an impossible dream of being able to eat their cake and have it too. Feminists of today will never stop complaining and whining until stronger men come to put them in their places. Maybe then they will gladly consider wearing niqabs or burqas to submit to more masculine men with powerful ideology (like they already do in Europe).

In cucked Sweden even the men wear veils.

After all, feminists are still women; they will always submit to the strong and repudiate the weak. Why would they respect feeble Western men who can't even defend their own culture and family values? Why would they be attracted to insecure men who are afraid of their own masculinity and sexual attraction? Perhaps that was their goal all along: to filter out the weak men with their tantrums and see which men will overcome their giant shit-test.

A test which the majority of Western men failed miserably by trying to be nice and reasonable.

How Donald Trump Is Inspiring A Masculine Renaissance In America

May 23, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Much of the importance of Donald Trump's presidential campaign has come not from his specific policy positions, but what he represents. Much in the same way that Trump's brash, outspoken style has helped roll back political correctness and shift American political dialogue to the right, his unabashedly masculine personality has (in the words of my friend the Bechtloff) been an injection of testosterone directly into the nation's bloodstream.

The left has taken notice of this: in the past week, there have been a wave of MSM stinkpieces deriding Trump as a "mens' rights activist" (a catch-all term for any anti-feminist man) and "sexist." This past weekend, the New York Times attempted to lambaste Trump for acting like a normal, heterosexual man by publishing an "expose" of his relationships with the women he's interacted with over the years:

> Donald Trump and women: The words evoke a familiar cascade of casual insults, hurled from the safe distance of a Twitter account, a radio show or a campaign podium. This is the public treatment of some women by Mr. Trump, the presumptive Republican nominee for president: degrading, impersonal, performed. "That must be a pretty picture, you dropping to your knees," he told a female contestant on "The Celebrity Apprentice." Rosie O'Donnell, he said, had a "fat, ugly face." A lawyer who needed to pump milk for a newborn? "Disgusting," he said.

If any other conservative candidate was attacked in this manner, he'd immediately drop to his knees and beg for forgiveness. Instead, Trump has refused to apologize, and with the revelation that one of the interview subjects had her words twisted to make it look like she was attacking him, the story—and the New York Times—has been completely discredited.

Similarly, writing for New York Magazine's new "Beta Male" blog (no, I'm not making that name up), Jonathan Chait attacked Trump for pointing out obvious realities of life for men in America:

> About a week ago, Donald Trump managed to say something noteworthy even by Trumpian standards, and unusually revealing. "All of the men, we're petrified to speak to women anymore, we may raise our voice — you know what, the women get it better than we do, folks, they get it better than we do." This was remarkable not only in its ignorance of well-established inequalities between male and female pay and household burdens, among other things, but also in Trump's bizarre political thought process. Trump had casually reverted to discussing men and women as "we" and "they," as though he were addressing a men's-rights rally rather than competing for an electorate in which women will compose some 53 percent. "Us versus them" is a standard trope for demagogues, but demagogues usually grasp that the "them" is supposed to be an unpopular subgroup, not a constituency that will cast a majority of the ballots.

Chait derisively refers to Trump's vision of masculinity as a "cult" instead of what it actually is: the normal state of men in the world. For years, Return Of Kings and other anti-feminist sites have tracked the decline of masculinity and femininity in America due to leftist brainwashing and government social engineering, culminating in the rise of social justice warriors, transsexuality and other sexually dysfunctional subcultures. Merely by being a masculine man in a sea of whiny androgynes, Trump is inspiring a rejuvenation of manliness in America.

Cucked Up Beyond All Reason

One of the massive contradictions of mainstream conservatism is that while it purports to advocate for traditional values and gender roles, its leading figures are all sackless losers. An illustrative example is Ben Howe, an editor for RedState and one of the loudest voices of the slowly-dying #NeverTrump movement. Howe's wife divorced him and flaunted it in an editorial for the leftist Huffington Post, which combined with his Tweet referring to Trump's wife Melania as a "whore," gave rise to the #CuckHowe hashtag on Twitter.

GOP cucksultant Rick Wilson is another fine example of the overly feminized nature of mainstream conservatives. Last summer, Wilson had a public meltdown, claiming that a Breitbart reader had threatened to rape his daughter after the site attacked him for his views on Donald Trump. After conservative pundit Ann Coulter made fun of Wilson's hysteria, he responded by asking her if Trump paid her for anal sex, backing down after he was the target of an online backlash.

But no man better exemplifies the testosterone-deprived nature of modern cuckservatives than their standard bearer, former presidential candidate Ted Cruz. Cruz is by far the biggest whiner to ever run for high office, blaming the failure of his campaign on media bias and threatening reprisals against those who "supported" Trump's rise. Similarly, Cruz's cult-like supporters respond to attacks on him by acting like crybabies, sniveling about "bias" and acting like nerds who've been pantsed. Contrast this with how Trump supporters defend their candidate by trolling his enemies and making funny memes.

Dad vs. Mom

Trump's masculine persona is an invaluable asset for the general election given the creatures that the Democrats are putting forth to oppose him. Hillary Clinton, the presumptive nominee, is a shrill harridan who irritates men and women alike with her obnoxious voice and phony persona. Bernie Sanders, her erstwhile opponent, is a sackless chump who lets angry black women steal his microphone and dumps a load in his diaper when protesters heckle him at his rallies. The contrast between them and Trump could not be starker.

In a country threatened by illegal immigration and Muslim terrorism, voters are looking to a strong leader to protect them, and Trump is the only one who fits the bill. Early polling showing Trump gaining on Hillary shows this. In particular, polls have begun showing that Trump has an unusual amount of strength among Hispanics, with one poll showing him winning a majority of Latino voters, his stance on illegal aliens notwithstanding. This shouldn't be too much of a shock: anyone who thought that Latinos, steeped as they are in a culture of machismo, would vote in huge numbers for a shrieking termagent like Hillary Clinton is smoking something strong.

Again, while it's too early to say how the election will unfold, Donald Trump's shamelessly masculine persona has been a massive boon to the American social fabric. He may not be able to make America great again, but he's helping make men great again.

How One Man Rejected Obesity Propaganda And Turned His Life Around

We read so many media stories about how we have to “accept” or “deal with” mediocrity, or even things worse than mediocrity. It has all become so routine as to pass almost without comment. But every now and then an inspiring story will get the attention that it deserves. I recently came across story of a young guy who literally fought his way out of depression and obesity. I thought I’d share the story here, which I learned from reading his long blog article on how he changed his life.

You don’t need to have experienced obesity to admire this guy. I’ve never had a weight problem, but I do know how difficult it can be for someone to change his way of thinking and his lifestyle. It takes a supreme, sustained effort for many years, and even then it becomes a life-long responsibility. It’s easy to see why so few people can do it. But we should all strive to crush our personal demons to achieve a better life. That’s the real lesson here.

Matt Harmon grew up loving food. He readily admits it. But he doesn't take refuge in any excuses. He freely admits that it was his personal choice to be fat:

> The way I packed on pounds was my fault, and mine alone. I can't blame my parents, there's no fingers to point at "society" or modern technology. I stayed fat because I wanted to. I didn't know how much I hated it, or the way the negativity of my consistent weight gain consumed me, until much later in life.

Even so, for a long time he remained oblivious to calls to change. His family pestered him to be more active and try to lose weight. But Matt just didn't care. He couldn't see the logic in it. At the end of the day, when all was said and done, the benefit he got from being fat outweighed any negatives he experienced from his condition. And so nothing changed.

College brought with it a host of new opportunities to indulge in food. He tried to visit the gym, and did, but his workouts just didn't take. He explains why here:

> So I'd piddle around at the gym without any real direction for two or three weeks at a time. But I'd quickly become disenfranchised when I would lose just a couple pounds in a month and didn't see a lick of difference in the mirror. I was also insecure about being the fat guy in the gym, like all the in-shape people were looking in my direction thinking "what the hell are you doing here?" That reminds me, don't be the person who gym-shames. It's fun to laugh at those goofy commercials, and yes, crowded gyms are not ideal for regular visitors. But that unspoken feeling of insecurity and shame kept me out of gyms for years.

At one point, his weight exceeded 300 pounds. He was also binge drinking, and he was out of control. And somehow, at some point, he realized that something had to change. The first real change began with getting rid of soda. He believes soda, more than anything else, was the demon that kept him addicted to bad food habits. After that, he made other healthy dietary changes. And soon, these little steps began to look like big steps.

Take one step toward your goal, and it takes two steps towards you, to modify an old religious maxim.

But then things took a nosedive again when he graduated from college and began his first job. He was dealing with personal issues—family issues—as well, and just getting out of bed in the morning had become a real task.

The real, final decision to change came around December 2013. Two key factors played into this decision: first, he had begun writing a personal blog that focused on football; second, he just got sick of being overweight. It was that simple. As he describes it:

> Simply put, I was just tired of being overweight. I had enough! For years, I hated looking in the mirror and facing the image that stared back at me. The chubby face, a stomach that hung over my belt and covered in shirts that hugged in unflattering spots; I wanted it all gone. Sure, I had those thoughts and desires for years. But this time, I was taking control. I was going to fight for my health. From that moment on, my life changed forever and I never looked back.

Other fortuitous circumstances played a role here as well. He chose to take a job that gave him the time and ability to work out seriously. He also “radically” transformed his eating habits. Realizing that the baby steps he had been taking were not working, he launched into some bold moves. And it all came together.

He even got a new job offer at NFL Media in Los Angeles. When good things happen in one area of your life, the positivity tends to carry over into other areas.

What can we learn from this story? Here are the four major points:

1. Your interests and hobbies can save you. Cultivate them, and never abandon them unless they are self-destructive. If you like to write, write about them. Do what you know best, and you'll do it better than anyone else.

2. Do not give in to negativity. Do not coddle yourself. Do not listen to the media's attempts to brainwash you into becoming a mediocre loser. There are millions of people out there who have the same problem that Matt Harmon did. And most of them are making excuses for themselves. Don't be one of those people.

Nobody cares about your negativity, your excuses, and your problems. Being negative is a character trait of chickenshits and wimps. You have to take charge of your own life. If you don't, your demons will control your life for you. And they'll take you right over the edge of the abyss.

3. Sometimes you need to change your city and environment dramatically. Bold changes are often better than incremental changes. You need something to "shock" you into new patterns and new directions.

4. Only you can make the decision to change. At some point, you will just reach a crisis point where you either fight or collapse. What are you going to do? Are you going to drop your pack on the side of the road and be a whiner, or are you going to keep moving forward? The decision is yours.

What makes Harmon's achievement so impressive (at least to me) is that it comes in the face of unrelenting obesity propaganda from the mainstream media. Rather than try to help people, the media instead caters to their basest instincts, with the sole purpose of making money from their misery.

Sometimes I think we need to start a "Man of the Week" or "Man of the Month" featurette. If so, my vote this week goes to Matt Harmon, for having the balls and the discipline to break out of his inner prison.

Well done, Matt.

Why You Should Never Help Women

May 24, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

One of the most false beliefs about being successful with women is the concept that, by helping them, you will earn their gratitude and be rewarded with sex. Along with voluntarily defending their honor, this behavior comprises the actions of the white knight, and is right up there with “just be yourself” for dating advice guaranteed to fail. We here at ROK dismiss this behavior out of hand, as it never works, but why is that, and is there any woman that you should help in today’s society?

The social acceptability of “soft prostitution”

Prostitution, long held as either the original occupation or the world’s first crime, depending on which side of the moral compass to which your needle swings, has long been used by women to get what they want out of life at the moment. Trading their relative beauty for a relative lack of capability has always been a trade that varies in acceptability to society.

How much is the “Thunder from Down Under?”

“Hard prostitution,” as the term is used, is reserved for the traditional version of putting your money on the nightstand for sex right then and there. Porn workers, paid for “acting,” could also be considered hard prostitutes, selling their bodies to the production company. Outside of the porn business and brothels, hard prostitution is still mostly illegal, but, like the joke goes, if every man’s equipped to be a rapist; every woman’s equipped to be a hooker, and selling your ass is always on the table when she gets desperate enough.

“Soft prostitution,” on the other hand, is the implicit bargain of repaying with sex for certain goods and services a man has bestowed upon a woman. If you take a girl out on anywhere from one to a few dates, pay for meals and entertainment, it’s expected that she has sex with you soon thereafter. Often, a few drinks in the bar that night is enough, and you may even be able to pull a one-night bang with your game alone. All of these are acceptable by today’s society, especially if it is seen as her “choice” to have sex with you.

soft prostitution

The act of buying drinks, dinner, or other ancillary things for a partner while on a date with the hopes of sexual coitus.

Sherry will go down on you if you buy her a double double and some timbits. She's into soft prostitution like that.

What is NOT acceptable in society is to trade favors for sex if you are not already in a relationship at some level with someone. Changing the oil in her car will not get her to allow you to check her own oil; while she may or may not be an actual soft prostitute, she doesn't THINK she is, so she would not trade car maintenance for sex, UNLESS you're her boyfriend, which makes it ok.

Women don't have sex with men in their friendzone. I'll refer you to my colleague Mr. Savage's works on the matter but the upshot of this is that, if you're getting no sex from your efforts, not only should you not be friends with them, you shouldn't help them at all, with anything, because equality, and the following.

Favors and friendship are based on reciprocal value

I maintain no friendships with worthless people, and you should not either. As I grew up, I made friends from various stages in my life, and some I remain friends with to this day, some are merely acquaintances now, and some I have no contact with anymore at all.

We all have those friends that, when we were younger, had all their shit straightened out and were of good value in a friendship. Time moved on, and we grew up, and maybe they didn't. Maybe someone fell to vice or crime or mental instability, and we cut our losses and went on. Some didn't, and remained our friends, and, along with more recent additions, comprise your tribe of people to call upon in times of need and to hang out with in times of fun.

All my friends have knowledge that they will use to assist me if I need it, plus being fun to hang with. Whether it's just simply moving, or long range precision shooting, or the finer points of cam selection on an Olds Rocket 400, or how to best run a Big Green Egg, a good friend will explain his knowledge and usually invite you over for a demonstration of the topic at hand, or loan you parts, cook a meal showing the grill off, or make you some hand loads to try in your rifle.

They do this because they value your friendship, and they know that you'll be there for them when they need help in their time. You have similar interests, and do the same things for fun. People like hanging out with like-minded individuals because we're social animals and like to learn new things and occasionally show off a little.

The hard truth is that most women simply have no skills at much of anything, anymore. I'm not going to find a girl that likes to run, garden, and cook, and is into guns and classic cars; there's never been many of those to begin with, and even less now. Many women today can't even do the traditionally feminine skills of cooking and sewing. You're going to get next to nothing, other than maybe a thank you, for doing something for a woman simply because she lacks any means to repay the favor.

Imagine if a female coworker asked me to help her and her husband with a big project some weekend. The appropriate solution is that you'd come over and help him with it, and she would cook you both dinner, and you'd have a fine evening following the endeavor, but nowadays, even if you didn't get hauled into HR court by suggesting she repay the favor with a cherry pie, she probably couldn't make one anyway.

Don't help women that can't help you. It's a waste of time, and any association with a woman can now land you in SJW hell, so it's just not worth it.

Women you should help

Given the above, surely there must be some women it is appropriate to assist. Ones that have helped you along the way, made you the man you are, or can help with something, or with whom you're in a good relationship with? Certainly there are, but there's not many.

The first one is your mother. I owe my mom everything, so anything she needs from me, she gets. Advice, physical labor, just being around to keep her company, anything. One perk of growing up with her was fabulous cooking, and she enjoys demonstrating the old skills as thanks for anything I do for her, which is nice.

Awesome moms deserve any help they need from their kids.

The second is your serious relationship material. Wife, fiancée, long term live in girlfriend, whatever. You live together, so by helping her, you're helping yourself as you have shared objectives. Also, since you're banging her already, extra sex and desserts should be on the table for your labors.

Third up is any female extended family members you may have that fit into a motherly role, full of nurturing and home cooked goodness. However, be advised, your mileage may vary on the woman involved, the less traditional and family minded she is, the less benefit.

Lastly is any long-term friends that you may have had from high school or earlier that are female and have withstood the test of time. You may not get anything from your endeavors, but maybe it's worth it for old time's sake or help in the distant pass.

You'll note that there are two kinds of women out there I did not list that perhaps should have been in there. The first is the female coworker. You simply don't want anything to do with women in the workplace; it's an HR complaint waiting to happen. Help them as much as you have to within the scope of your job and during work hours, but always beg off of any outside of work interaction apart from mandatory fun "team building" with an appropriately polite excuse.

The second is the wives of your friends. Do not help them directly. Always help your friend. Even if it is doing something for his wife, it needs to be clear you are helping him, and, although you don't mind helping her out, it's because of him that you are there. This establishes the priorities and keeps you safe. When my good friend and his wife come to visit, I sometimes go running with her, since she and I both run, and he doesn't. This is scary ground, and it's only because of very solid friendship I even consider it; it's probably not a good idea.

Conclusion

It’s depressing to sort your interactions on whether or not they are investments with a return, or whether or not it’s politically safe to do so, but, like much of the red pill philosophy, it’s a reaction to our times. Sure, I wish women would embrace re-developing feminine skills and repaying for help with them, but it’s not likely going to happen, so, if they won’t screw you, screw them.

The executive editor of The Huffington Post, Liz Heron, has celebrated "diversity" at her workplace by tweeting a photo of 14 non-black women and no men at an editorial meeting. Aside from steadfastly refusing to have at least one African-American or male editor in the room (and creating a seating plan that keeps multiple Asian staff at the far end of the table), Heron sought fawning approval from the Twittersphere for her "inclusive" employment policies.

> Notice anything about this @HuffingtonPost editors meeting? □□□□□□ pic.twitter.com/7sg4SyraPa
> — Liz Heron (@lheron) May 20, 2016

Strangely enough, Heron was a savage, unambiguously unbalanced critic during the "Black Oscars" controversy, in which SJWs insisted that nominations for acting awards had to follow rigid quotas based on the percentage of the black population (about 10% if the main Anglosphere demographics of the United States and United Kingdom are taken into account). Yet by her and her publication's own explicit and implicit standards, both she and The Huffington Post are both sexist and racist. Liz Heron liked this "HuffPost Black Voices" video attacking the lack of black nominees (#OscarsSoWhite) and made a number of other very vapid social media "contributions" about the beat-up, including this one.

What we are left with is more proof that the diversity agenda is nothing but a sham to advance women, notably those subscribing to the white-centric Western female style of feminism. Heron and her cronies make a very immoral living from attacking other people, organizations and institutions for allegedly not being "inclusive." When push comes to shove, though, they refuse to follow the very same strictures they shove down other people's throats on pain of being called misogynists and racial bigots.

How incredibly stupid (or mentally ill) was Heron in expecting praise for that tweet?

Liz Heron celebrates diversity by not including men or blacks.

Are we going too hard on Liz Heron? Is her idea of what diversity is (i.e. no men and no blacks) instead a sign of serious mental illness that needs to be clinically treated? Or maybe a sign she is so intellectually challenged that she cannot perform simple arithmetic? Or finally, like I have said many times before, SJWs are so compulsively blind that they honestly believe the crap they spout.

These claims are frequently believed to the very marrow of leftists' bones. Why are there so few females in engineering fields, despite the proliferation of so many "scholarships" and other ridiculous advantages for women? "It must be sexism!" No blacks get nominated for an acting Oscar this year? "Racism!" Only women and no blacks are put on an editorial board for a notoriously leftwing so-called news source? "It's diversity!"

Heron publicly outing her own bigotry has obviously done society a favor. That said, it is also disturbing that someone of her misshapen caliber is acting as the executive editor for a publication that already possesses a rather stellar reputation for distorting the truth.

The executive editorship has only been in Peron's hands since November, after all. A lot worse is bound to ensue during her tenure. Before her present Huffington Post role, she was "Head of News Partnership" for Facebook, the same social media platform that was revealed this week to be either advancing or suppressing trending news stories, depending on whether the story suited leftist presuppositions. Notwithstanding her lack of real technical expertise, I am sure Heron was an integral part of previous attempts by Facebook to politically manage and not merely disseminate news.

How bad will the liberal bias against men and blacks get?

This picture also explains the media's choice of fabricated stories in a nutshell.

It is time to remind yourself that liberal publications like The Huffington Post are the same ones that support labeling all men as would-be rapists and upholding black victimhood. And with pernicious people like Peron farcically still maintaining roles at less leftwing news outlets like the Wall Street Journal, we can see that the leftist domination of the mainstream media is some way off being complete. Things can and almost certainly will get worse. Even if for delusional reasons and not through bravery, SJWs are nowadays very, very open about their bigotry. Couple this with a preexisting and expanding control of most media mediums and we have a recipe for additional social and political disaster.

There is no time better than the present for supporting, socially and financially, the forms of journalism that challenge this bias with facts. First and foremost amongst these publications is Return of Kings, which has weathered attacks that would have triggered outlets like the The Huffington Post into closing down forever. Using Peron's foot-in-mouth moment is certainly necessary, but it cannot take the place of advocating for and backing up good news sources. Inasmuch as the bar for contemporary "journalism" is likely to be lowered again and again in coming years, there are a number of very credible alternatives. With only a modicum of the budget of printed and online rags like The Huffington Post, we have made inroads they could never imagine with the same resources.

The biggest bigots always call others bigots

Liz Heron and Anita Sarkeesian are kindred souls.

The confluence of self-victimhood and opportunities for career advancement is a lucrative one for countless females in modern society. By appealing to invented notions of diversity and misogyny, cretins like Liz Heron and Anita Sarkeesian do not have to sell a brand based on actual worth. They can justify not producing anything of value, or in Heron's case distract attention from The Huffington Post's massive long-term decline in revenue (it made no profit last year).

Plus, the rules they try to enforce do not apply to them. They can keep going long after apparent "equality" has been achieved and carve out even more special and privileged positions for women, ignoring any pretend obligation they have to balance things in favor of certain races or men.

But wait, almost all of you reading this already knew that. The key is making millions of others realize it as well. So, let's get to it, all while continuing to offer a set of life-enhancing, socially-enriching alternatives for men in particular to read and follow. As the editorial board of The Huffington Post proves, they don't give a damn about us.

The End Game Of Feminism And Cultural Marxism Is To Eliminate Sex Differences

Leftists tell us that feminism started in the 1960s as a way of achieving the liberal code word "equality." What initially sounded like a noble venture has led to disastrous results. Even so, Marxists are nowhere near achieving their ultimate goal of either figuratively or literally neutering the entire population. The Transgenders and Toilets or Great Bathroom Debate, which effectively means people have been confused as to which bathroom to use in America by 0.3% of the population that identifies as transgender and a compliant, Marxist media are only pieces of a larger puzzle these lunatics are trying to put together. It helps to reference what the definition of Cultural Marxism is:

> The gradual process of destroying all traditions, languages, religions, individuality, government, family, law and order in order to re-assemble society in the future as a communist utopia. This Utopia will have no notion of gender, traditions, morality, god or even family or the state.

For the purposes of this piece, we will focus on the liberal Utopian dream of no gender. Feminism is the first volley in this assault on the biological, psychological, and anatomical realities of gender. Feminism has been trying to masculinize women and feminize men for 50 years. It has yielded results that encourage the Marxists to push even harder towards their ultimate goal of an androgynous, sexless society. Men are becoming softer spoken, meeker, and we have even seen the rise of cuckoldry as a mainstream sexual fetish when in the past men would have killed another man who was banging their wife. The leftist rag The Daily Beast even ran an article praising it as the fetish of intellectuals:

> Cuckoldry is defined as a wife's infidelity. Chaucer and Shakespeare characterized it as the ultimate shame. So perhaps it's no surprise that today it's developed into a fairly popular fetish. The Internet is rife with husbands enthusiastically soliciting other men—often larger, hotter, sexier men than themselves—to have sex with their wives while they watch.
> Once a month, Drs. Paul and Sally Pines, a pair of New York City-area Ph.D.s who have been married 25 years, check into a hotel suite with another man. As Paul looks on, Sally and the man snuggle up together on the couch like lovebirds. Soon their clothes are off, and before long, she's wailing in ecstasy as the man has aggressive, passionate sex with her. Paul, helpless, can only watch and suffer. Afterward, Paul serves lunch to his wife and the man in the suite's dining area; they eat in the nude before launching into another long, loud, sweaty session.

Beyond weird fetishes that turn men into eunuchs, on the other side women have become man-jawier, less fertile, career-obsessed, and manlier in the Anglo world. The fact this is happening is not an accident. Blogger Christina Laila wrote about these trends fulfilling part of a plan:

> Gender inequality became the focus to breakdown Western culture. The strong family unit became a target. At the time, families consisted of a father who worked and provided for the family, while the mother stayed at home and reared children (often times elderly grandparents also lived in the home). In order to get the people to acquiesce and become part of the fodder, the leaders knew that they had to remove the father from the home and get women in the workforce. The 'think tank', Critical Theory was formed and so began the introduction to feminism and the idea that the two sexes are merely a 'social construct'.

Marxists literally believe they can put an end to sex. As we are about to see, this idea will lead to a nightmare if brought to its conclusion.

Androgynous pods are the way of the future to far leftists

Androgyny

Realizing the goal of eliminating the "concept" of man and woman would mean no more traditional sex roles, and it would mean that males and females would become androgynous corporate and government-serving pods. After all, to use Huxley's term, viviparous reproduction will become a primitive relic once the New World Communist Order enlightens us all.

> For you must remember that in those days of gross viviparous reproduction, children were always brought up by their parents and not in State Conditioning Centres.
> "Human beings used to be …" he hesitated; the blood rushed to his cheeks. "Well, they used to be viviparous."
> "Quite right." The Director nodded approvingly.
> "And when the babies were decanted …"
> "'Born,'" came the correction.
> "Well, then they were the parents—I mean, not the babies, of course; the other ones."
> The poor boy was overwhelmed with confusion.
> "In brief," the Director summed up, "the parents were the father and the mother." The smut that was really science fell with a crash into the boys' eye-avoiding silence. "Mother," he repeated loudly rubbing in the science; and, leaning back in his chair, "These," he said gravely, "are unpleasant facts; I know it. But then most historical facts are unpleasant."

This concept of a sexless society was also dealt with a quarter of a century ago in a Star Trek: The Next Generation episode called The Outcast. The parallels between this episode and the path feminism and Marxism are taking us down is chilling:

> According to their official doctrine, the J'naii had evolved beyond gender and thus view the idea of male/female sexuality as primitive. Those among the J'naii who view themselves as possessing gender are ridiculed, outcast, and forced to undergo "psychotectic therapy" – a form of therapy meant to remediate gender-specificity [essentially neutering people] and allow acceptance back into J'naii society. Soren [who feels like a woman] is essentially put on trial where she passionately defends herself and expresses her outrage at what their society does to those who are different. J'naii diplomats force Soren to undergo this therapy, citing reformed citizens' newfound happiness and desire to be normal.

Traditional gender roles are already seen as "primitive" by Marxists, even though studies consistently show both men and women are happier when they conform to roles that have evolved in diverse societies all over the world and been a part of history for thousands of generations.

It does not require a huge leap of the imagination to think men and women who want to live their lives with traditional sex roles, have sex with each other, and reproduce through pregnancy will be taken to a State re-education camp, much in the same say Soren was.

Man trying to become a machine in search of Utopia was predicted by none other than Oswald Spengler

Machine Culture

Drilling down to a more philosophical level, this strange sex and gender problem the West finds itself in the middle of is an offshoot of what Spengler called the spread of the Final World Sentiment of Western culture. He predicted the Final World Sentiment for Western culture would be Socialism and Communism from the year 1900, which is the culture's innate desire to fulfill the promise of its Prime Symbol Infinity. To achieve an infinity of prosperity, heaven on earth in other words, Spengler said Western culture fundamentally believes man must not only design machines in search of this goal but one day become a machine.

From The New Modern Man article The Last Act: The Rise and End of the Machine Culture:

> As the Final World Sentiment of Western man spreads (which Spengler said was the quest for a Socialist Utopia from the year 1900 onward) the Socialist longing develops into a desire to become God. This is a profound commentary on > anti-religious Marxists of today and what they really want to accomplish by removing all biology from man. Cultural Marxism's goal of stripping man of all traditions, individuality, religion, family, and even his gender – making both sexes androgynous as the sickness of feminism is attempting to do with disastrous results – represents Western man's longing to achieve infinity: He must become a machine himself in order to become God.

This ultimately leads to catastrophe, which Spengler explained in Man and Technics is the engine that either causes a species to go extinct or for a mutation to spread throughout it. Scientifically, this fact is defined as punctuated equilibrium. Indeed the cycles of history show no deviation from a civilization ultimately sterilizing itself demographically, and often the last chapter of a civilization ends in catastrophe. The West might end up sterilizing itself not only demographically, but literally.

It is reasonable to think the West's long arc through history could end in a catastrophe as it tries to figuratively or literally neuter the entire world to get rid of the "primitive" notion of men, women and sex. Beyond proving Freud's penis envy theory correct, feminism and Marxism could be catastrophes that put the very survival of the human species into question.

How To Master The Basics Of Communication And Game

May 25, 2016 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

Any martial artist who's worth his salt will tell you the same thing: 99% of being an expert is nailing down the basics. As my old instructor liked to joke, "Anything above yellow belt is just for looking fancy." The same is true elsewhere in life. Establish a basis, a solid foundation, a routine, and the rest will follow. Try and run before you can walk, however, and you'll just fall flat on your face. Game is no different.

The number one thing you need to do to improve your dating prospects is to regularly approach women. That's it; just go out and speak to them. Fancy push-pull dialogue, clever openers, understanding kino—all of that stuff is useful, but if you don't approach women in the first place it's never going to work.

With that in mind it's worth revisiting the basics of communication; it's worth detailing the step-by-step process which we all use whenever we converse with anyone—whether it be with one of the few remaining North American women who's worth speaking to, your boss at work, or a client you're cold calling. Each situation might be tactically unique, but strategically they're all the same, and since communication is such a vital skill it's worth understanding what the basics actually are.

The Art Of The Sale

I've worked as a salesman on and off for most of my life. Telemarketing, door-to-door, business-to-business—even a bit of retail. Cold calling is a tough skill to master, but I managed to make a living off of it for many years. The secret? I always returned to the basics, and made sure I was getting them right.

Sales can be summed up in six steps:

1. Introduction
2. Description
3. Emphasis
4. Question
5. Rebuttal
6. Conclusion

In practice they all seem to flow together, creating a seamless whole, but if you've ever seen a sales script written out, the individual elements become obvious. Often each portion will be separated by a paragraph break. In fact, these six steps appear in other places, as well—not just in the bull pen. Consider, for instance:

1. Establish the setting
2. Inciting incident
3. Rising tensions
4. Low point
5. Climax
6. Denouement

The six steps that salesmen use to hawk a product are functionally identical to the six-steps in a narrative arc; they're also reflected in essay writing, classroom lectures, contract negotiations, you name it. These aren't merely technical techniques used by sales experts, these six steps are the primordial basis for all human communication. They are the dance of life. If you want to communicate effectively, then you need to understand how they work, and why each one of them is necessary.

The Six Steps Analyzed

Introduction

Who are you and how do I know you?

Any time you initiate conversation—whether you're knocking on somebody's door, bringing up an issue to your boss, or meeting a girl at a coffee shop—you need to establish who you are to them and why they should care.

Human beings spend most of their time living in their own head. They worry about how others think of them, they muse on past memories, they reflect on the local environment, but what they're not doing is thinking of others. This isn't to say that they're all selfish (though there is an element of that); it's mainly to point out that they're not mind readers!

When you initiate a conversation in real life, it isn't like a text message which is stored in somebody's inbox until they have time to analyze it; you need to quickly establish who you are in relation to them. You need to employ the appropriate body language—smiling if you're friendly, stern if there's a problem that needs addressing—and inform them of who you are, and how the two of you are related. We all have multiple relationships with everybody in our lives, and it's important to define which relationship you're talking about right off the bat. For example:

"Hey boss, it's Mick from the IT Department, (there's an IT issue that needs to be addressed)," versus:

"Hey boss, it's Mick, the guy on your payroll, (I need to talk to you about pay issues)."

or:

"Hey honey, you're looking sexy, (I want to discuss our love life),"

versus:

"Hey honey, I've been reviewing our finances, (we need to discuss the mortgage)."

An effective introduction allows them to establish the correct frame of mind for dealing with the issue you're about to bring up. Remember – people are busy worrying about their own stuff, and the more of their own thinking that you can do for them, the easier of a time they'll have understanding you.

Description

What's the problem?

The second step is where you address the issue at hand. In many cases this is obvious: "Hey boss, it's Mick from the IT Department, we need to talk about the Cisco Routers," but when it comes to interpersonal communications people will often assume that the other person knows what they're talking about.

"Honey, I'm upset…"

"About what? The weather? The national debt? Our gay, autistic son? WHAT DO YOU WANT FROM ME WOMAN???"

Notice that in the above there was no Introduction or Description—merely the next step, Emphasis. Once you've established who it is that's speaking, you need to immediately get to the point; failing to do so frustrates and infuriates the person you're speaking to.

Emphasis

Is this important?

Once again, remember that other people are too busy dealing with their own issues to worry about yours; they aren't mind readers. If something's important—to the future of your business, the future of the family, or if it's just a really cool vacuum cleaner that you're selling—then you need to tell the person why it's important. If you don't provide the emphasis, then they'll assume that you're just making small talk, or cathartically venting, or just chatting to hear your own voice. "Boss, those Cisco Routers? They control the Debit machines, not just the Internet."

This is where you provide the energy that will propel the conversation forward; if you fail to do so, the other person will remain indifferent, they won't realize that what you're saying really matters.

Question

What do you think?

Other people aren't sitting around waiting for you to walk up to them, which is why you needed the first three steps; the fourth step involves you being empathetic.

Since you initiated the contact, it's up to you to consider the other person's thoughts and feelings. Ask them questions; Are you familiar with this problem? Have you given any thought to this issue? How do you feel about this? Provide them an opening to respond to you; assess their thoughts and feelings so that you can calibrate your own response. Involve them in the dialogue as an active participant.

Don't dictate to others; dialogue with them.

Rebuttal

I'm just not interested, bub.

As door-to-door salesmen like to say, "Every 'No' gets you closer to a 'Yes!'"

The whole point of initiating dialogue is that there is already a disagreement in place; after all, if there wasn't, you could both continue on as you were. The reason you're conversing is to introduce the disagreement, analyze it, and negotiate it. By questioning the other person you gave them a chance to bring up their concerns, you gave them a chance to explain why they don't think it's a problem; the rebuttal is your chance to acknowledge their argument, and provide a counter.

"I understand what you're saying, but I wouldn't bring this up if it weren't important."

Acknowledge their response to your question, and use it to form your rebuttal; then go back to step four and repeat, until…

Conclusion

So it's all settled then?

Revisit the initial problem, and restate the conclusion that you arrived at. In sales, this is known as "Closing"; getting their signature, reiterating what they're signing up for, and ensuring that they're happy with the final result. As one of my old sergeants used to say, "First you tell them what you're going to learn, then you learn 'em, then you tell them what they just learned." The movie needs the denouement after the climax, the happy ending, and the conversation needs to revisit the results it achieved. This ensure clarity for all parties, and helps settle any emotions or frustrations that were brought up in the process.

The Six Steps And Game

1. "Hi, do you know where I can find…?" I'm just a friendly fellow on the street, who needs help finding something.
2. "…the nearest pet store?" I'm looking for a pet store; I like animals, you can trust me.
3. "I'm thinking of buying a pet for my friend." I need to find a pet store so I can do something kind.

4. "Do you think buying a pet for someone else is a good idea?" That's what I'm all about — what are you all about?
5. "Oh really? Well, would you say…" Dialogue initiated; go back to step 4 with a new question.
6. "I'll call you this weekend!" Close it out – future relations now have a solid footing.

Each step is necessary. Back when I was doing sales, if I ran into difficulties it was usually because I had skipped over or muddled one of them. A basic rule of diagnostics is that you eliminate the simple explanations before looking for the advanced explanations, and if you're running into difficulties in a market you should start by re-examining yourself before attributing your problems to some sort of external event. By breaking down communication this way—and getting a sense of where it was along the process that the conversation started to falter—you can correct your mistakes more quickly to help improve your outcomes.

As I mentioned in my video Charisma for Introverts, communication is a vital skill throughout all of our life, and if you can nail down game then there's no reason you can't apply the same skills elsewhere. The tactics may be different, but the strategy remains the same.

What The Future Of News Will Look Like

May 25, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The mainstream media is in free fall collapse. Big outlets are laying off workers by the hundreds, the masses have low trust for politically correct articles, entire TV networks are getting pushed around by the likes of Donald Trump, crushing lawsuits are making their unethical practices obsolete, and their blatant hoaxes are being immediately called out instead of slipping under the radar. We are firmly in the eye of a turbulent storm that will lead to a new order for news.

The siren node

Right now there is opportunity for “siren nodes” to start their own news outlet. A siren node is an individual who has built up enough trust within his network that he is fed scoops before it reaches the desks of mainstream journalists. All the big guys you know in the alt sphere, including myself, are siren nodes, a position that we can then leverage into forming a rudimentary news organization along the the likes of Charles J Johnson’s Got News. Once Johnson became an entrenched siren node, people began sending him daily tips without him having to seek them out.

The biggest problem with the indie news approach is that the profit margin is razor thin. News is the most expensive non-video content you can produce, and competition is incredibly high. If you’re just one hour late with your story then you will get scooped and miss out on tens of thousands of pages views, losing out on untold recognition and glory. If you want to do news, you must have cat-like readiness to the smallest perturbation of the news cycle and be more on-call than an emergency room doctor.

Another problem is that advertising alone will not be sufficient to keep indie news operations afloat, especially in a time where readers are getting annoyed at ads and seeking out blocking solutions. If the mainstream guys can’t make a profit, with their in-house MBAs trying to monetize even inch of content, it won’t be easy for the little guys either. This means that indie news outlets will certainly be required to use crowd-donation efforts (Kickstarter, Patreon, etc.) or sell their own products.

Why the old media won’t completely die

Old media will find it impossible to run a profit, but most outlets will continue to survive as pet projects for oligarchs who need to push out their agenda in the form of propaganda. One oligarch will buy Newspaper A to focus on his global warming agenda, another oligarch will buy another Newspaper B to aid his immigration agenda, and so on. These oligarchs will accept their money-losing outlets as merely the cost of doing business. What's a $100 million a year loss for your own personal Pravda if it's making you $1 billion a year through favorable government policies and modified consumer behavior?

You'll always see the big names like Washington Post and Guardian exist, but their news desks will be gutted and replaced with cheap scribes who pump out Buzzfeed-like garbage with the occasional propaganda piece thrown in. It will be a race to the bottom in terms of quality, pushing additional readers away from these outlets to indie news, especially as the narrative continues to fade away. Oligarchs will have no love for the "news tradition," putting thousands of veteran journalists out of a job to be replaced by low-wage millennials who believe that rape culture is the number one problem in the world. Most of the journalists who wrote attack pieces against me and Return Of Kings in February will be out of a job within five years.

How indie news will evolve

Indie news sites will start niche, focusing on specific areas, and out-scoop or embarrass old media outlets that will find themselves in an increasingly small box of political correctness. Each indie news site will be relatively small, serving under 1 million users a month, and so there will be a logical push for them to merge and create outlets that look very similar to old media. Until then, expect indie news to be rough around the edges with typos and a lack of fancy multimedia content like custom charts and original photography.

The best example of how a large indie news outlet will look like is Info Wars. It started as small news site that piggybacked off of Alex Jones' radio show but now pumps out 40 articles a day, much of it original reporting. They have a TV studio and a growing staff of journalists. Their main way of making money is not through advertising but through the sale of supplements that fit the overall conspiracy and survivalist theme of the news it offers. Within a few years, you will see several additional outlets that are similar to Info Wars in providing both print and video coverage.

Indie media outlets will compete head-on with a zombified old guard composed mostly of "true believers" to the social justice cause. Old media will be able to survive on brand recognition for many years until they get driven into the ground, and then the oligarchs will simply buy the indie media sites before destroying them, just like they did with Vice.

Another option I anticipate is for old media to create outlets that appear indie, such as the billionaire-owned The Intercept, but still share massive overlap with the establishment on umbrella issues like feminism and immigration. It'll be increasingly important for you to know who owns the outlet you're reading, and which agendas that owner has vested interests in.

Why I won't get into news

As of now I have no intention of starting a news outlet that goes beyond the occasional news article you see here. Other than being a low profit business, the news business is too much of a grind. The news never stops, and you can't even rest after a successful scoop because the insatiable public demands more. I'd be more inclined to get into news if I had an agenda that was monetarily tied to my business, such as if I was a globalist who needed massive amounts of cheap labor. I also don't have a go-getter or fast-paced nature that is required for news operations.

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/712072306647048192

I will move into focusing more on timeless content that doesn't go stale after two days, and which can give value to the reader for years. Such "long tail" articles are also more friendly to advertising revenues and promotional tie-ins, but this means I will miss out on the daily action and fun of being a part of the hectic news cycle. There are always trade offs.

Conclusion

The news industry is being realigned as we speak. The old media will lose a lot of jobs and readership, but still maintain enough influence that it's worthwhile to run for those with money-driven global agendas. Indie news will rise forth and cause a lot of pain to the establishment but remain niche until they mimic the old guard and form more professional outlets along the model of Info Wars. Either way, opportunity has arrived, and I have no doubt that ambitious men will take advantage of that. I just won't be one of them.

Liberals Petition Marvel For A Homosexual Captain America

May 25, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Progressive superhero fans took to Twitter Monday to petition Marvel to change Captain America's sexual orientation in an upcoming film.

Using the hashtag #GiveCaptainAmericaABoyfriend, thousands of people asked the company behind the popular superhero to re-fashion him as a gay man in an upcoming installment.

Some Twitter users were quick to offer a candidate who could capture Captain America's heart; Bucky Barnes, aka the Winter Soldier, played by actor Sebastian Stan in the latest installment in the Marvel cinematic universe, Captain America: Civil War.

Marvel fans apparently took a page out of the Frozen playbook for their hashtag campaign; earlier this month, Disney fans used the social media service to petition the studio to make that film's protagonist, princess Elsa, a lesbian.

Twitter users in that campaign used the hashtag #GiveElsaAGirlfriend.

While the majority of tweeters used the Captain America hashtag earnestly, a vocal contingent of critics questioned why the character's sexual orientation needed to be explored at all.

Black Lives Matter Protesters Shut Down Milo Yiannopoulos' Speech In Chicago (UPDATE)

May 26, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

This past Tuesday, Breitbart's Milo Yiannopoulos was slated to speak at Chicago's DePaul University as part of his Dangerous Faggot Tour. Unfortunately, angry SJWs and #BlackLivesMatter activists invaded the event and shut it down, threatening Milo with violence and attacking and harassing attendees (yours truly being one of them). Their success was enabled by the DePaul administration's refusal to allow security and police to eject the disrupters from Milo's speech, as well as the political connections of one of the rioters.

For the past year, Milo has been touring the U.S., giving talks at college campuses where he espouses his conservative, anti-PC ideas. The Dangerous Faggot Tour has been met with consternation and outrage across the nation, as hypersensitive left-wing crybabies throw hissy fits at the thought of someone to the right of Karl Marx being in their vicinity. Students have been driven to "tears" by Milo's speeches at universities from Pitt to Michigan, and one particularly upset—and obese—protester at his UMass Amherst talk was dubbed "Trigglypuff" by the Internet due to her epic meltdown.

The cancellation of Milo's DePaul talk is the first time that his whiny, triggered enemies have succeeded in shutting one of his events down. However, while the petty partisans of #BlackLivesMatter may have won a battle, their success in depriving a gay man of his First Amendment rights—as well as DePaul's support and encouragement of them—have hurt them in the overall war. Much in the same way that the leftist-instigated riot at Donald Trump's Chicago rally helped propel him to victory, Milo's loss in the Windy City benefits opponents of the left.

Timeline Of A Mass Temper Tantrum

I attended Milo's speech with some of my friends, and it began normally enough, with the man himself being introduced by the DePaul College Republicans. However, 15 minutes into the speech, a pair of black rioters—one male, one female—stormed the stage and took control of the mics. They've since been identified as church minister Edward Ward and DePaul student Kayla Johnson; the latter's mother is the Chicago Police Department's Director of Administration. Additionally, the protest was organized by S.T.R.O.N.G., a radical black leftist group:

For the next half-hour, Ward, Johnson, and a few other accomplices took over the room, blowing whistles and heckling the audience with chants of "FEEL THE BERN!" and "DUMP THE TRUMP!" while the audience jeered them back. One of the event organizers called both DePaul security and the Chicago police, both of whom refused to eject the protesters, having been ordered by school administrators to hang back (and the latter probably influenced by Johnson's mommy being a high-ranking public official).

The police's inaction was even more insulting considering that several days before, DePaul had attempted to shake down the College Republicans for more money for security. They were forced to pony up an extra $1,000 for increased security under threat of cancellation, which Breitbart paid for. Said security did nothing as a pair of leftist radicals hijacked an event that had been paid for and physically threatened Milo on multiple occasions.

After attempting to wrest control back from the protesters, Milo announced that he would be heading over to the president's office to get some answers as to why security weren't doing their jobs. Both his fans and hecklers followed him outside, where a horde of social justice warriors had assembled, chanting “RACIST, SEXIST, ANTI-GAY, MILO GO AWAY!” and other hackneyed slogans:

We followed Milo down the street, as he occasionally climbed onto a bench or terrace to guide us. Along the way, I watched leftists physically attack Milo’s fans. One of my friends also reported that the SJWs were stealing Trump hats from people who were wearing them:

A few minutes later, one of the protesters, a fat redhead (UPDATE: the woman has since been identified, see the update at the end of this article), assaulted me and tried to steal my phone after I jokingly told her she needed to drop a few pounds (the second clip in this montage was provided by Daniel Duerst):

After we reached the next building, Milo vanished. I later found out that he’d tried to reenter the room where his speech was supposed to be taking place, but was denied by Rico Tyler, the Associate Vice President of Diversity, Empowerment and Inclusion. Afterwards, fearing for his safety, Milo left the scene in a car. After returning to the student union, my friends and I left for a nearby bar.

Meltdown In The Windy City

Following the end of the event, Milo’s fans and free speech activists took to the Internet, leaving negative reviews of DePaul on the college’s Facebook page and contacting the school’s donors. DePaul President Dennis Holtschneider issued a half-hearted apology the day after in which he sided with the protesters and effectively told Milo he was asking for it. While none of the leftist protesters were arrested, Chicago police arrested conservative journalist Jeremy Segal (aka Rebel Pundit) at the behest of one of the school’s administrators. Both Breitbart and the College Republicans are demanding to be refunded for the money they spent on the event.

Put simply, the leftist attack on Milo was a massive disaster, both for the protesters and DePaul University itself. Free speech activists have been working overtime to expose the corruption at the heart of American leftism, and with leftist rioters having attacked a Trump rally in Albuquerque on the same night as Milo's speech, America is getting to see what these ambassadors of peace and tolerance are truly like.

UPDATE (5/26/2016)

The woman who assaulted me has been identified as Katie O'Reilly, a DePaul student, left-wing activist and contributor to feminist site Feministing.

I have filed charges against O'Reilly with the Chicago Police Department and will be obtaining a warrant for her arrest tomorrow. Anyone with more information about her is encouraged to contact them or me.

4 Reasons Why Women Cannot And Should Not Lead

May 26, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

We here at Return Of Kings pretty much agree on what makes a woman attractive. I will spare you a list, as enough material is already available on the website if you do not know the feminine attributes that makes a woman desirable.

Though we also generally agree on what makes a woman unattractive, specific traits seems to disgust men more than others. But one psychological attribute stands out as one of the most hated: power. Especially the abuse of this power.

Men have a deeply rooted aversion to powerful women, and rightly so. In addition to being repulsive, it involves huge risks. Giving power to woman is not a smart decision and here is why.

1. It is unnatural

Photoshop montage of a female leader with long hair

The law of the leader is eternal. He is the most charismatic, the wisest or the strongest of a group, not the one that feels the most or wants to live in a carefree bubble. The law of the jungle, applied in its rawest form, chews a lone woman and spits her out.

The handful of women that led successfully in the past, such as Queen Victoria, Joan of Arc or Boudicca for the most famous, always had an army of men and a government of men to reach their goals. It was composed of male ministers, male officers, and male soldiers only. Imagine what would have been the outcome if leading an army of women.

Women do not want to lead! This is not in their nature. They want to be led. It is what defines their attraction to men. It is more out of spite and in a thirst for revenge that they seek power. Revenge on failed relationship, professional failure, personal issues… the whole world governed by men is their nemesis and must be shown that she can do it just as good as any man.

2. It is unattractive

Dilma Rousseff, the shame of her Bulgarian ancestors and butch president of Brazil

Dalia Grybauskaité, (classic rabid anti-Russian, pro-homosexual, pro-male-only conscription agenda) incompetent president of Lithuania. This is not what Lithuanian women look like

Angela Merkel, female (yet to be determined) president of Germanistan

The c. Start to see a pattern there?

A feminine and fragile, and therefore attractive, woman seeking power cannot be taken seriously as a leader. A leader is someone that shows more than the others. More mettle, more courage, more intelligence or more grit. Women that desire to inspire trust from weaker men (voters, subordinates, white knights, etc) have to consciously become more masculine (short hair, male clothing and masculine behaviour), in order to mimic the masculine attributes that compose the archetype of the leader.

In essence, whereas power held by men is an aphrodisiac for women, it as the opposite effect on attractiveness when women hold power. Feminine attractiveness to men on the psychological level can be narrowed down to: femininity, obedience, loyalty and submission.

Women in positions of power rarely look like this

Let’s say that your boss is attractive. You want to fuck your boss because she is a physically attractive woman. She could be flipping burgers for all you care. The position occupied is irrelevant on the pure physical aspect. But you also want to fuck her for the pleasure of having submitted her abstract position of authority to your own, physical authority and the strength of your magnificent meat.

Just like the warrior of the tribe challenges the chief and prevails, having triumphed using the universal expression of power, dominance through physical strength, makes one the new guy in charge. Women fuck men of power in the hope of gaining access to their resources, protection, or secured environment. Men fuck women of power to prove a point and assert their authority over them.

3. It is dangerous

Women are governed by their emotions. People that need safe spaces are not able to be leaders. Feminists that demand power or claim that they have it are delusional. They are empowered if they are in a secluded room, where the exterior world and its dangers cannot reach them and confront them.

Female soldiers in elite corps (or willing to be) crack under pressure, being mentally and physically weaker than men. Even if they are given a favourable treatment, they cannot cope. When they access power, it is through bureaucracy and the enforcement of a political agenda, not through excellence. They also cannot be put on the battlefield as they are a liability for their colleagues and a prize if the enemy captures them.

Physical and mental tests of resistance are the absolute base on selecting future leaders. Not picking the best of the best is illogical and puts lives in danger. In professions that require calm under extreme pressure and peak physical capability, such as firefighter, their level is cruelly insufficient.

Women's standard response when caught in the act, be it cheating, lying or having a man's blood on their hands

Female leaders listen to their emotions and their feelings. Thinking rationally about the consequences of their decisions is second. "It was the heat of the moment!" she said. Feminist leaders, such as the Lithuanian female president, are fundamentally guided by their feelings and misconceptions, applying the highest levels of double standards.

A true chief leads by example. Women, by nature, want to have their cake and eat it too, sacrificing others for their own personal benefit.

4. It is counterproductive

Focused on leading or exercising a position a power, women sacrifice their own happiness and their loved ones', which can be achieved through a stable relationship focusing on nurturing and raising children. Women possessing any level of power are seldom happy. The distrust they inspire among men creates a void around them which turns into a vicious circle of anger and bitterness, hindering their capacity to think rationally and to reach goals

It is not easy to lead. That is part of the gig. Trials and failure are constant and keeping calm when facing adversity is what makes a chief. Women simply do not have what it takes and it is normal. What is not is that what visibly does not work is enforced to satisfy a small number of mad individuals.

Women are proven to be less effective leaders than men. They create resentment among their (mentally stable) male subordinates as they are being dominated by an individual that is physically far weaker than them. It is a deep, visceral feeling that cannot be repressed. The results are less motivation to reach higher results for this individual and distrust.

Le mot de la fin

Women, for their own good and that of the world surrounding them, must renounce seeking power. A happier, more balanced, and successful society can be the result of this decision, as it has been endlessly proven in the past.

But we all know that with the help of the elites of today and their plans, they will not do it willingly.

3 Proven Steps To Shred Fat And Get Six Pack Abs

May 26, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Clark Shao

Hey guys, it's Clark – the #1 subscribed-to fitness trainer on Youtube. I'm going to explain the single most important factor for why most guys aren't able to get the ripped body they want – despite exhausting, repetitive efforts – and how you can fix this with just 3 simple steps.

I also have a really sweet special hook up for you guys just for being Return Of Kings readers… which you'll see in just a minute.

But first, I just want to say thanks to Return Of Kings (and you guys reading) for supporting our Six Pack Shortcuts Youtube Channel. I can't believe it's been six years since we've posted our first workout on Youtube. It's unbelievable how many guys we get sharing their fitness success stories with us.

Now, many guys are at least a little familiar with our Six Pack Shortcuts program… But what most guys don't know is that I've spent the past 6 years doing new research with the help of my doctor and team. I've updated and improved the Original Six Pack Shortcuts program and there's an all new design based on some revolutionary discoveries we made about fat loss.

Using this research, we've narrowed it down to just 3 simple steps that involve improving and supporting your body's most powerful fat burning hormones – which will allow you to accelerate your fat loss and overcome plateaus.

The Answer Is In Your Hormones

For those who aren't too familiar… Let me explain a bit about the importance of your hormones in the fat loss process: Hormones (or hormone imbalances, really) are one of the main reasons why most guys can never achieve the body they want – no matter how much they workout or diet.

The truth is, if you don't have control of your key fat burning hormones, you'll be left with a huge fat burning disadvantage… and all the results you expect to see from your hard work at the gym can be cancelled out due to poor hormone production in your body.

Now, if you haven't seen the results you truly want with your current workouts or eating plan, chances are that a hormone imbalance could be responsible. To make it worse, the workouts and diets you have tried or are still using now might be hurting your hormones even more.

Exercises that Zap Fat-Burning Hormones

For example, did you know that exercises like long term cardio or aerobic group exercise, like those you see on late night infomercials or your local gym, can decrease your body's two most vital fat burning hormones – Testosterone and Leptin. (source: http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/12324651)

The US National Library of Medicine reports that, "leptin concentrations are reduced 48 hours after long-term aerobic exercise." And that's just the beginning.

http://journals.lww.com/nsca-jscr/Abstract/2013/02000/Acute_Neuromuscular_and_Endocrine_Responses_and.19.aspx

In a study done by the National Strength and Conditioning Association – Research showed that… Performing (cardio) also known as conditioning work left testosterone depressed at 24 and 48 hours post exercise.

And when it comes to dieting, many of us were tricked to believe that cutting calories was healthy for fat loss, but there's more to the story here….

Webmd reports that "when people diet, they eat less… which then decreases the amount of leptin produced… Now your leptin level goes below your ideal leptin threshold. When it does that, your brain senses starvation…. so you get hungrier. Plus, your body will then begin to take up extra energy and store it as fat."

After just a few days of calorie-restriction dieting… your leptin levels can drop by over 30%… This means you'll immediately start adding fat straight to your belly.

Don't Panic! Restore Your Key Fat-Burning Hormones With These Steps

But guys, don't worry… if you have belly fat, or think you can't get into the shape you want due to poor hormone levels, I want to assure you that it's not your fault and you can definitely fix it in these 3 simple steps.

Now the first step is to "Jump start" your fat loss using a few weeks of workouts designed to maximize the Afterburn Effect.

Now if you're not familiar with the Afterburn Effect, otherwise known as EPOC (Excessive Post-Exercise Oxygen Consumption)… it's a way to keep your body automatically burning fat on it's own – even when you're not working out. It's done using a unique sequence of compound exercises to trigger a post workout, fat-burning effect that can last up to 48 hours.

This means you're not only burning fat in the short period of time you're exercising… But the Afterburn effect will allow you to keep burning fat even after your workout ends… like when you're sitting at work, hangout with your friends, and even while you're sleeping.

The reason we need to do this fat loss jump start first is because having belly fat suppresses your leptin and your testosterone.

Men's Health reports that Belly fat "contains aromatase, an enzyme that converts testosterone into estrogens, the main sex hormones in women. Having extra estrogens floating around your system triggers your body to slow its production of testosterone. And the less testosterone you make, the more belly fat you accumulate and the more estrogens you spew. It's a vicious, emasculating circle."

But like I just explained, using Afterburn training workouts will allow you to quickly and dramatically reduce your belly fat, and stop any further hormonal damage. At the same time, it will allow you to focus on boosting the production of these hormones, and get you ripped abs fast.

Step 2. Next, take a few weeks to focus your workouts and diet to maximizing your leptin levels.

With your belly fat eliminated from the fat loss jump start… Your vital fat burning hormones will no longer be destroyed by the dangerous chemicals your belly fat was harnessing, and you'll now be able to fully optimize and support your master fat burning hormone, Leptin.

In Step 2, I recommend customizing and choosing specific exercises that are scientifically proven to support your leptin levels. This will ensure that you don't just gain the weight back.

Free Video: Workouts For Supporting Your Leptin Hormone.

Step 3. Finally, take a few weeks and focus your training on boosting your testosterone.

This will actually block the fat from being stored on your stomach.

It's critical that you do these steps in this exact order, and that you do the right compound workouts and eat the right foods in each phase.

Free Video: Best Compound Workouts For Supporting Your Testosterone Hormone.

Check out my buddy Johnson…

He's a few months away from turning 36, and just one of the thousands who has already transformed his body from the soft and pudgy look to the ripped athletic body we all want…

And he did it by following my 3 Simple Hormone Boosting Steps:

This is Johnson Before he started…

Step 1. “Jump-start your fat loss”

This is Johnson after quickly eliminating his belly fat with the Afterburn Effect in Step 1.

Step 2: Maximize Your Leptin levels.

Here’s Johnson after completing Step 2 – the Leptin boosting phase.

Step 3: Boost your testosterone.

This will help you more with your fat burning, and will help you gain muscle once you’re lean. And this is Johnson after completing the final step – The testosterone boosting phase.

It was shocking to see how Johnson was getting more ripped than most guys I'd seen in magazines… in fact I think he even had better abs than me. And it didn't take him years, it took only a couple of short weeks… and all with just those 3 hormone boosting steps.

Now if you're like Johnson was, you're probably still a little bit confused on exactly what you need to do…
That's why we put together this free video, showing you exactly what to do to get started right away.
Get the body you want and deserve today.

And one last thing… As a gift to you in our celebration to our 6 years to Six Pack Shortcuts, I'm going to hook you up huge today.

Female Danish Athletes Diminish Their Own Championship Victory By Taking Nude Photos

May 26, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A female sports team has celebrated winning the Women's European Handball Federation Cup by posing naked with their trophy. In a photograph that shows both the attention-seeking narcissism and self-objectification rampant amongst Western women today, members of the winning Danish squad, Tvis Holstebro, use different angles, their teammates' bodies, their hands or even the trophy itself to conceal their breasts and genitals.

Once more, the self-objectification of female athletes raises important questions about the relative value of women's sports. Men are routinely denigrated, attacked and witch-hunted for judging female athletes on their bodies, yet those in female sports, provided they have semi-decent figures (or even only scary ones), seem to take every opportunity to try to exploit and then commercialize their sexuality.

People like British "psychologist" Priscilla Choi have in the past complained that female athletes are evaluated more on their looks than their athletic ability. There are nonetheless at least two glaring holes in this kind of argument: 1) women are generally and markedly inferior to men in sports and 2) female athletes themselves directly participate and even want objectification if it is profitable for them.

As you would expect in these hypocritical times of ours, female athletes and their backers have demanded that they be taken as seriously as the men over recent years. Forgetting the fact that even boys' teams are frequently superior to adult women's teams, female athletes want “equality” for providing grossly inferior performances. They want their own gendered fields so as to not compete with the men, maintaining the very flimsy illusion that the women are just as good and worthy of similar or identical remuneration.

Is there an actual justification for taking female athletes like those in the Tvis Holstebro squad seriously, especially after the otherwise “sexist” behavior of arranging the nude photograph or the all-round self-objectification female athletes use? Why can’t their sporting prowess, including compared to men, do all the talking?

A joke from the start

And what a joke it is to try and treat this team as an equal alternative to the men’s one from the same club.

Tvis Holstebro’s European finals victory occurred in the early part of May against a Russian side. Provided the women in the photograph are from Tvis Holstebro, it appears likely that they were jealous of the greater attention men’s handball or men’s sports in general get in Denmark. Surprisingly to those not familiar with the differences between the Nordic countries, Denmark has a reputation for being the most conservative of the five culturally Scandinavian societies. It may not be saying much to describe Denmark in this way, but it is the least socially insane of the group. So, what better way to get some desperately craved attention than “leaving” a sexualized picture or two in the hope that someone would leak it to the media and it would go viral?

There has, however, been some confusion after the nude team photograph gained widespread attention. Some have alleged that the team is not Tvis Holstebro but rather a somewhat non-adult under-18’s team from the Copenhagen region. If this alternative explanation is true, it is even worse. Unlike many other behaviors, like underage shoplifting and associated petty crimes, sexualized attention-whoring established in adolescence usually gets worse as girls enter adulthood.

Plus, if it is indeed an under-18’s team, some of the women may be underage. “Under-18” sports teams very often include those who have recently turned 18 but also, as the name would suggest, those below 18. There may be no direct nudity in the photograph, but there is a world of difference socially-speaking between some underage girls posing nude but covered and very young adults doing the same thing.

Regardless of which explanation is the correct one, the main argument still stares squarely in the face at us: women's sports have become a set of circuses for political correctness and self-objectification. If you cannot compete in athletic ability, which is the primary impetus for the attention sportspeople receive, take out your breasts and vaginas and make the barest of attempts to cover them, if you cover them at all. Empower yourself and show everyone you're equal to the men!

Ignore women's sports at all costs

The Anna Kournikova Effect explains why women's sports can be so popular. It's definitely not for their equal athletic ability when compared to the men!

Women should be physically active, just as the Tvis Holstebro handball team is. Since its inception, which predates my time writing here, Return Of Kings has chronicled the obesity epidemic that is encouraging women in particular to take pride in being ridiculously overweight from laziness. Notwithstanding all this, there is a huge disparity between having women keeping themselves fit and moronically telling them that their athletic endeavors are objectively as good as the men or deserving of equal pay for "equal" work.

Given the inferiority of professional female athletes to male ones, female sports are just not worth your consideration. Already, rabid feminists are trying to brainwash the general population into thinking that both gendered fields are equivalent. In fact, they argue the women deserve more admiration because they get paid less and keep on competing (by that definition, men playing in local, non-professional city leagues should be given gold medals). Do not contribute to this farce by giving female sports anything but the flicking of your television remote to change the channel.

International No Diet Day Shows The Miserable Depths Feminists Go To Stay Morbidly Obese

May 27, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

As I watched Roosh's interview on Dr. Oz last year, I was thinking to myself, "Why all the uproar—being thin is healthy and sexually attractive. Who could be against that?" Well, it turns out, feminists. Having secured equal rights, equal pay, and the ability to vote, feminists no longer have anything legitimate to fight for. Indeed, women already are treated more favorably than men, with government social programs targeted directly to them, preference in divorce cases, and boosted employment status through affirmative action and quota based hiring.

So, instead of turning from fighting the oppression of women to another meaningful and important issue, feminists have jumped the shark and embrace ideas like censorship, fat shaming, and attacking men.

No to happiness, a boyfriend, or ever seeing your belly button

Last week, the University of Minnesota invited Virgie Tovar, a self-proclaimed "fat activist" (such a thing would have been impossible just one generation ago) to campus to celebrate.. wait for it.. International No Diet Day. If that isn't crazy enough, consider that the College of Food and Agriculture, who presumably teaches food nutrition to its students, sponsored and endorsed the event. That's right, an institution of higher learning with a school of food and nutrition is actually endorsing the idea that we should ignore what we eat, and just let the chips fall where they may (directly into Virgie Tovar's mouth—she loves chips).

A public university is encouraging the idea that its people should be fat, unhealthy blobs, and shouldn't strive for physical conditioning. If this is how higher education feels about your body, is it any wonder what they want to do with your mind?

Tovar has made profiting off the slovenliness of other women a viable career, and has written books with hundreds of pages telling them to "ignore what science, logic, and men tell you, and just pig out because feelings." She also sells an annual retreat to Jamaica in November, which at the time of publishing was almost sold out with prices starting at $1,400.

International No Diet Day

Though you might have thought this holiday was created by Lindy West sometime in the early 2000s, it was actually created in 1992 by Mary Evans Young, a British woman who was bullied at school for being fat. She also wrote the book "Diet Breaking: Having It All Without Having To Diet," she sums up her philosophy by asking the perverse question, "What do you think would happen if you spent as much time and energy on your careers as you do on diets?"

Under her twisted logic, if being bullied at school for being fat means we should all abandon dieting and healthy eating, then should every man who was ever called "fag" in the locker room turn gay? I think that is already part of their agenda. Male restaurant owners quickly capitalized on this joke of a holiday as a trick to sell extra desserts and plus sized meals at marked up prices, but one can only expect this holiday to gain more mainstream acceptance as time goes by.

The Fatkini

Water levels must be lowered before they are allowed to enter the pool

Tovar and her followers proudly wear their fatkinis — “a two piece bathing suit for fat girls often involving high waisted bottoms.” Here are a few of Tovar’s reasons for wearing her Fatkini in public:

My fatkini is the swimwear equivalent of farting in the face of patriarchy. How lovely, a 30 year old woman acting like a child.

My fatkini is my claim to visibility and an open invitation to admire me, flirt with me, and worship me (do please make sure to ask first!). OK, I’ll humor you: But you clearly don’t understand what “open invitation” means.

My fatkini disproves one of the diet industry’s biggest lies: I don’t need to lose 20 or 30 or 50 pounds to look good in a bathing suit. I look good right now. Correct, you need to lose about 100 to “look good.”

A question that would never be asked without social programming

One thing you will never notice fat accepting women talk about is men. They will not talk about their love life. You will not see pictures of them with men. Because they receive no attention or admiration from men. Men, outside of those with special kinks or fetishes, find fat women disgusting and unattractive. Fatness is even a bigger factor than age, which is one of the most appealing aspects of a woman. A thin, fit 30 year old with a toned body is always preferred over a 19-year-old in a fatkini.

Pushing The Agenda Of Unhealthiness

U Minnesota is ranked as one of the top 10 schools in the nation for public health. And they have invited a fat activist who is opposed to the very existence of studying nutrition or analyzing food content to speak to their students. Why do people naturally shun fatness? It's unhealthy, leading to shorter lifespans and more medical problems. It's physically unappealing: I've seen small children—children too young to have been exposed to social norms of what is beautiful or not—react favorably to thin bodies and facial symmetry and react with disgust to obesity and odd facial features.

Hopefully this natural beauty from the past cancels out the earlier eyerape

Certainly beauty is unfair to some degree. I will never be as objectively beautiful as whatever movie star the ladies are currently fawning over. But I can develop a strong body, a strong mind, confidence, muscles, and charm, which is beautiful enough to attract lots of women. As we've seen before, women are capable of doing the same—maximizing their assets and remaining naturally attractive to men, but today's culture would prefer that they just give up and turn into blobs.

Tovar tells a story of seeing a group of four women sharing a slice of cake for dessert in a restaurant where she overheard them talking about needing to exercise afterwards so as not to become fat. Tovar attacks this as an example of "fat-phobia." The agenda Tovar is pushing is more extreme than anything seen before. We're not talking about the idea of "it's ok to splurge once in a while and eat something tasty to reward yourself" being an acceptable message. No, society is openly pushing for degeneracy—choosing pizza and ice cream over healthy food. Shunning diet choices completely and eating whatever, whenever, and however much that you want to. Rejecting exercise. Society is openly pushing for negative, harmful behaviors.

In the past, libertarians complained about the government being used as a tool to enforce moral behavior. But at least the behavior they were pushing was generally good. Don't do drugs. Stay in school. Exercise. Be Healthy. Be a good neighbor. We have now jumped the shark and are openly advocating destructive and sickening behaviors.

Without a sharp change, hopefully spearheaded by Trump, expect to see more degeneracy and sickness not just tolerated, but actually promoted in the future.

Here’s What To Do When Your Life Is Hit With Adversity

May 27, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

If you live long enough, you are going to face situations that will test your mettle. Here are some things to keep in mind so that when adversity strikes, you will be prepared.

After a life of relatively smooth sailing, the last few years have brought me some adversity. I lost my grandmother who practically raised me. A business that I had started failed due to lack of sufficient funds. My dishwasher malfunctioned and flooded my kitchen and basement. Both of my parents were diagnosed with cancer. And I got fired from a job by a woman who suddenly started to loathe my work after she figured out that I have a cute wife who is significantly younger than I am.

Having come out the other end of the storm, I have some observations that may help if you should ever find yourself facing a tough situation.

Don’t panic

Our natural reaction when adversity strikes is to panic. The fight-or-flight reflex kicks in and our natural inclination is to either run away from the situation or lash out at the source of the adversity. Either option is usually a mistake.

Thus, the first step in dealing with adversity is not to panic. Panicking prevents you from seeing all the options. When you don't see all the options, it is easy to make a bad choice. Fight-or-flight does have some relevance if you are being chased by a wild boar. For most other situations, the best thing to do is to be calm.

Reject negative thoughts and get the right mindset

When you go through adversity, the temptation is to start thinking disempowering thoughts. You must avoid these like the plague if you want to get through tough times.

Don’t get bitter. When things don’t go like you planned, it is easy to become bitter. This is especially true when things might be going swimmingly for all your friends.

The problem with bitterness is that it can poison a person’s entire life causing him to lose the good things he still has. A man who becomes bitter about his adversity runs the risk of alienating the people who truly love him—his wife and children. And I believe bitterness can even negatively effect a person’s health.

The best antidote to bitterness is to cultivate gratitude in your life. Every successful person I’ve ever talked to spends a portion of their day thinking about all the things that they are grateful for. If you are truly grateful, it is impossible to be bitter even in times of hardship.

Don’t feel cursed. In the midst of the trials I was going through my wife, in a moment of exasperation, asked me: “Do you think we are cursed?”

When things go wrong, it is easy to believe that there is some cosmic force that is opposing you. Whether that force is an indifferent universe or the gods, it is too vast to oppose. If you believe you are cursed, it makes you passive. That’s the exact opposite attitude you need to get through adversity.

Instead of feeling cursed, tackle each problem separately. If you are diagnosed with heart disease, work on improving your health. If you are harassed at work by a short, fat, mentally unstable harpy of a boss with swollen ankles, float your resume. But don’t turn your problems into battles against cosmic forces.

In summary, when you run into difficulty, the most important thing to overcome it is to adopt the right mindset. Be grateful for anything that is still good in your life and resolve to be active in fighting the problems.

Look at all your options

If you have the right mindset, you will be able to do the next step which is to consider all of your options. Even with the most terrible of problems, there may be some way to cope with the problem that may be tolerable. For example, I know a man with a gambling problem. He borrowed a large some of money from a mobster that he unwisely failed to repay. I am not certain of the details, but this man’s life is now in constant jeopardy.

This would be enough to drive many men to suicide, but this man has opted to survive. He chose to go on the lam. He now moves his family every year or two. One year, he is in Florida. The next he is in California. Even though he is a highly qualified electrical engineer, he does not work, presumably to stay under the radar. His family relies on his wife's income. Despite everything, they seem to have a reasonably comfortable life.

In his book, How to Fail at Almost Everything and Still Win Big, Scott Adams relates how he lost his voice due to a rare neurological disorder. It was only after years of trying various things that he found a doctor who performed a cutting edge procedure that was able to solve the problem. But to do this, he had to stay open to investigating every option.

Don't alienate your allies

John Donne wrote that "no man is an island." Unfortunately, I'm the kind of person who tends to retreat into a metaphorical cave to solve my own problems. That's a mistake. I might be resourceful, but I don't have all the answers. While I was going through difficult periods, it was usually friends or family members who had information that helped me solve the problems.

When adversity hits, be kind to those who are closest to you, especially your family. Keep your friends in good repair. Avoid the temptation to be a rugged individualist.

Treat it like a game

A couple of years ago, Roosh published an article called Are We Living in a Computer Simulation? At the time, I dismissed the article because I'm a Catholic. I believe the universe is real.

Still, the concept of this life ultimately being a game or a computer simulation is a good paradigm. Every religious tradition treats this life as a temporary situation. In Christianity, the universe is a proving ground where we can decide whether we want to accept God's offer to become his sons—divinization—or reject it and become denizens of hell. In Hinduism, this life is regarded as a delusion that we must wake up from. Even Stoicism envisions this life as a fleeting phenomenon that will lead to union with God, however vaguely the Stoics understood that union.

What every tradition seems to agree on is that how your life goes is less important than how you react in response to what happens. You might be less wealthy and famous than Mark Zuckerberg, but you are not in competition with him. Your job is to do your best in your situation.

This means cultivating detachment from this life. If your video game character is killed, you probably don't get too upset. Similarly, reflecting on the temporary nature of the current world should lead you to not take it too seriously.

Welcome adversity

Another point on which all spiritual traditions agree is that adversity is a goad that forces us to change our character. Just like lifting weights forces our muscles to grow, adversity is the resistance that spurs our souls to grow. Without adversity, we would have flabby character.

In my own case, I can see how some of the things that I went through forced me to deal with some things in my life that I was ignoring. It proved to be a boot camp for my character.

For example, getting fired forced me to re-evaluate the whole idea of working for someone else. It led me to start another business that has doubled my earnings over what I was making while I was an employee. It also led me to start writing—something that I always wanted to do but never found time for.

Conclusion

Adversity is never pleasant when you are going through it but it brings rewards that you could never receive from a soft, indolent life.

I don't want to leave you with the idea that it is possible to "conquer" every adversity. Sometimes, even the greatest general is routed. Even the healthiest man will one day die. But it is possible to meet every adversity and not be inwardly defeated. The best summary of this attitude is captured in the the poem Invictus, which was written by William Ernest Henley.

Invictus

Out of the night that covers me,

Black as the pit from pole to pole,

I thank whatever gods may be

For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance

I have not winced nor cried aloud.

Under the bludgeonings of chance

My head is bloody, but unbowed.

Beyond this place of wrath and tears

Looms but the Horror of the shade,

And yet the menace of the years

Finds, and shall find me, unafraid.

It matters not how strait the gate,

How charged with punishments the scroll,

I am the master of my fate:

I am the captain of my soul.

Why Men Cannot Be Both Free And Equal

May 27, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the men of ROK this week.

In the comments of my last article, a commenter suggested that even if religion was not exactly true, it still contained some helpful things (not my view, of course). Another man rejoined that most people were not intelligent enough to separate the good from the bad, making religion essentially undesirable in society. I responded:

> Most people are not intelligent enough to manage any complex system properly.
> It is why the healthiest societies have usually involved a give and take between an healthy aristocracy that created an high culture and led by example, and a populace that strove to be moral rather than "intellectual."
> The idea of "educating" and exalting "the people," has simply destroyed high culture and exalted the vulgar tastes of vulgar persons who, over-reaching their station in life, desire to enjoy the feeling of impersonating an elite, without having the capacity to be one.

My interlocutor misunderstood me as asserting an inverse ratio between education and morality. It is to this that I wish to respond, because this is at the center of my concept of a true "Return of Kings," and of the intended scope of my articles, before I have to cease contributing in the coming year. So, this is a "sneak peak" of the future.

I will also preface my remarks by saying that, even if my ideas on society and modern, European history are not exactly inchoate, they are not highly advanced, either. I avoid applying the label “Neoreactionary” to myself, because I do not presently have the leisure to devote as much time as I would like to Carlyle, Evola, Moldbug and other more recent thinkers; it is despicable to claim association with a philosophical school, if one cannot be bothered to read its canon and understand it. Nor, though I of course know something about the subjects, am I presently free to devote as much time as I would like to the finer points of the history of the Protestant, French, Socialist and Communist revolutions.

My duty at present is to prepare for seminary studies, so my perspective on the crisis of modernity comes primarily from a theological and philosophical perspective. A “big picture” is emerging for me of the story of Western Civilization over the past five centuries, which grows clearer every day. But it is not yet crystal clear.

To begin, then:

Virtue and (Pseudo)-Intellectualism

My statement that an healthy society’s populace strives to be “moral rather than ‘intellectual,’” was not intended to imply that there is some sort of opposition or inverse relation between the two in society. Indeed, true education is necessarily moral. The reason I put “intellectual” in quotes, was to indicate that this desideratum of modern society is not authentically intellectual at all.

The political ideologies and theories that have driven the chaos of the past centuries were always rooted in vain pretenses of pseudo-intellectualism; no person or class of persons is wise enough to manage such a chaotic element in a society; the masses, especially (including somewhat clever folk), will never understand what these theories pretend to know. The intrusion into daily life of pseudo-intellectual ideology, and of modern “politics,” is itself unnatural and constitutive of a crisis.

Voltaire – a Perfect Example of a Fool Too Clever by Half

In the past, society worked by a more natural give and take between an exemplary high culture, and the general populace attracted by that example to the emphasis upon virtue and transcendence. In practice, we see that even well-crafted, ideological theories of governance are powerless, unless the populace itself is virtuous. Similarly, many theoretical shortcomings are ameliorated by a virtuous populace. The chief aim of a society should therefore be prudently to encourage virtue and punish vice, for then the battle is more than half-won, whereas all the "rights" you could care to claim will not save you from a vicious society. If virtue is first, true liberty will follow; if anything is put before virtue—even "liberty"—then nothing will stand for long.

Moreover: virtue is within every man's competence, and it is as beautiful in the peasant's home as it is in the royal chapel. So an aristocratic society, where the elites cultivate the exemplary, high culture of virtue and transcendence, attracting the common man in turn to his natural and supernatural end, is a very natural character for a society to have, even though virtue is difficult.

But to truly attain a liberal education, which is the traditional and indispensable education of the aristocracy (because it is "liberal" not in the sense of being "Left," obviously, but of being conducive to maximizing true liberty—not license—in one's self and in society), one needs, in addition to sufficient virtue, the gifts of a keen intellect and sufficient prosperity for the means of education. These are not in the competence of most people.

Thus, not many men will become truly fit to govern a society that upholds authentic rights and freedom; to base a society on this assumption is unnatural in the extreme. The accrued wisdom of the aristocratic tradition can supply some lack, thank God. Still, to understand and to act well upon this tradition, especially beyond one's private sphere, is not the lot of the masses.

Flawed Premises and Ends

The shift from the emphasis on virtue to an emphasis on “empowering” people with a pretense of education and “equitable” distribution of capital, is complex. To be overly brief, it can be tied to the development of the Bourgeoisie—the upper-middle class in the increasingly prosperous, Western civilization. They were prosperous enough folk to have a little too much and way too little knowledge. They came within striking distance of the nobility. Doubtless, not every nobleman was an exemplar of noble blood; many upper-middle class persons naturally felt quite superior to some of them, and resented their positions. As the Bourgeoisie grew more successful, they merely made formal what was already true, informally. In the words of Frederic Grunfeld:

> “The government remained monarchic and aristocratic; the economy had passed into the hands of merchants, lawyers, manufacturers, and engineers-all legally barred from enjoying the prerogatives reserved for the nobility -a privileged elite that, together with the clergy, constituted less than one percent of the population in a nation of twenty-four million. The French Revolution, therefore, was essentially the chaotic and often violent process by which political power passed into the hands of those who already possessed economic power. In the words of one modem historian, it made “the bourgeoisie mistress of the world.” – The French Kings

The expanding wealth and knowledge of the middle class occurred during the old order of the Church and the nobility; rather than impeding education and prosperity, the Ancien Régime was too successful in fostering it! To credit revolutionaries with creating this (when in fact their chaos disrupted the process for some time), and to blame the aristocracy for impeding it, is wrong and unjust.

To justify the overthrowing of the nobility and its traditional culture of virtue and transcendence, we adapted a rhetoric and a culture of egalitarianism, assuming that all men were “equal” in the raw, and, given the opportunity (via education and prosperity), would govern themselves wisely and well. Hence two powerful engines of egalitarianism are universal education and the redistribution of wealth. As reality increasingly disproves this absurd, revolutionary thesis, the goal of equal opportunity is increasingly revised to mandate the expectation of equality of outcomes. Equality is mandatory, lest the theory be falsified!We, the intelligent and educated, know that our theories can’t be false!

A “caregiver” stays with my grandmother on the farm for a couple hours in the middle of the day; sometimes she watches Dr. Phil or Dr. Oz, and there are frequent commercials featuring bimbos who want to improve themselves by attending online college in their pajamas. And this illustrates the situation rather well; skip motherhood, ride the carousel, get an online degree in Communications and prepare for a life of depressing, hedonistic nihilism followed by crippling spinsterhood.

We have abandoned a sane society oriented towards virtue and transcendence for an insane society where the Economy is the supreme end, and the means for attaining it are “education,” vice and frequently superfluous “work.” Even women are indulged in their flimsiest pretentions towards “educated” and “independent” status. Nobody notices that these people have not been “educated” in the sense formerly understood to be indispensable for such an involvement in public affairs. The Universities no longer provide this education; they are vocational schools for people without vocations.

Just think what we’d miss out on, if this gal were not empowered to enjoy an education.

The abolition of virtue and the high standards of aristocratic hierarchy is an ongoing devastation. Temporary gains via technology (which would have continued under aristocracy) improved the material comfort of our lives; but the loss of virtue threatens worse calamities. The obsession with The Economy, to the exclusion of the more profound crisis of the West, tells the whole story. I don’t want to be mistaken for a Leftist or a Communist, simply because I use the term “bourgeoisie” and criticize the obsession with the Economy; I condemn Communism, though Capitalism and Communism are just two sides of the same coin, if in “Capitalism” you include the modern, unnatural tendency to generate or accrue capital that is not tied to real wealth (through usury, fiat currency, etc.).

To sum up: the masses are never really going to become truly educated, and so are never going to be fit for making wise judgments on sublimely difficult matters of religion, philosophy, statecraft, etc.; this is why aristocracy and tradition exists. Only a society with warped priorities, reads that as an insult against the masses.

Indeed, the society with egalitarian pretenses dooms the masses to the tragedy of pretending at qualities and achievements they can never truly attain (with all the political tension that promises), whereas a more sane view can find true dignity even in an illiterate scullery maid. Hence my articles emphasize such things as: 1) enjoying the traditions and culture of the West, which supplies much of what is lacking to us, by setting us on the shoulders of the great men of our past; 2) clear, simple thought on first principles; 3) developing personal virtue and a connection to the transcendent, so as to become the best men we can be.

If some of us are capable of rising to be a new aristocracy, it will be through virtue, a careful education and other, gratuitous gifts of nature's God; if not all of us can rise to that level, virtue at least confers upon us something of immense dignity, and our greatest possible share of nobility, truly empowering us to rule ourselves and our immediate sphere of influence well. In any time, but especially ours, such a feat is aristocratic at least by participation—a veritable "Return of Kings."

Blessed Karl of Austria, a king worthy of his crown.

4 Men Who Obtained Absolute Devotion And Worship From Women

May 28, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

> I would go to the end of the world, I would dye my hair blond, if you asked me
> I would betray my country, I would reject my friends, if you asked me
> —Edith Piaf, Hymne à l'amour

Most evolved societies in history, from pre-Columbian far West to Japanese far East, are patriarchal. This means that men and women are recognized specific, complementary roles to play. The role of women consists, mainly, in being loving and nurturing: it is oriented towards family, husband, children…

These roles are far from arbitrary. They stem out of the inner nature of each sex. Whether they come from an evolutionary process rewarding complementarism between agents or from immutable metaphysical essences—ever heard about the Purusha and Prakriti?—the natural processes behind them are confirmed by game experience. Women want to mate with dominant males, are attracted to power, money, and sheer alphaness. Just think about the magical pussy-magnet effect of uniforms.

Beta males and nice guys are despised for not taking risks, not defending their dignity and letting themselves get used by manipulative girls or disrespectful authority. Men who position themselves as being no threat are at best relegated into the dreaded friendzone, at worst utterly despised. But alpha males—or those who can mimic them—meet with a very different response. Namely, interest, respect, and even love.

Sure, a lot of girls today are too flimsy to maintain a long-standing interest in any man and too narcissistic to really respect anyone but themselves. But there are also many girls who, even if they genuinely believe in the feminist dogmas of the day, have their natural processes preserved enough to be capable of commitment for a dominant man.

These girls are those most playing men are interested into. We sometimes force our spontaneous ways to hook with these modern-but-still-longing-for-a-true-man girls. Bad boy types get them easily but squander their girl capital by their inconstant, violent, and overall repulsive behaviour. On the other hand, some rare men are able to not only gain girls' interest, but also to maintain it and even raise it to the highest heights, where girls have ceased to be interested or loving but turned into worshippers and devotees of their male. This is the highest level of game—when one manages to be worshipped by his conquests and wrap several of them around one's finders without problems. Here are some men who managed to cling to these heights.

1. Rocco Siffredi

Advertising himself as "the Italian stallion," Rocco Siffredi is much more than a usual porn actor. A 52 years old, he claims to have "worked with" no less than 5000 girls. Equipped with a 9-inch dick, he managed to get most of these girls consent to receive his gear in the ass at a time when anal was much less practiced than today. His stamina, passion for rough sex and custom to enlarge girly anuses brought him a global fame no other porn actor can par with.

A legend to fappers, Rocco is beloved by many girls as well. Porn actress Jewel De'nyle said she waited four years for Rocco to come to North America. English actress Kelly Stafford drank his piss. Various actresses gladly had their heads basked in the toilet as Rocco was ramming their asses, including one who got stitches over the anus as a result and did not sue him. An actress reported how she vomited on another girl because she thought that Rocco wanted her to do so:

> Looking deeply into my eyes Rocco murmured in his commanding voice "I want you to vomit all over her face", all the while forcing his fingers deeper down my throat. Vomit? Ok, I wasn't expecting that, but Rocco wants he gets. Who am I to say no? It wasn't hard, his fingers were so far my throat the vomit came up easily. I leaned over and heaved bits of bagel and apple juice all over Ashley's upturned face.

The same testimony speaks of five minutes with Rocco on a tone so exalted it can be considered as worship:

> I only got around 5 minutes on Rocco's magic penis, but it was everything I had hoped for and more… I desperately hung onto the nearest wall with what little muscle control I had left while Rocco did his best to fuck me to death. Gurgled sounds bubbled out of me. I couldn't tell where the camera was, I could not act or pose… My brain was goo. [Rocco] only operates at one speed—destroy. It was epic. I couldn't remember my name, I could hardly even stand.I want more. I NEED more. That magic man is addictive as hell.

Another actress, aware of Rocco's reputation to bask down heads in toilets, was not the least shocked but, on the contrary, willing that the "Italian stallion" put her head down as well.

2. Paul de Séligny

Séligny with one of his devotees

Born a few times before the first World War, Paul de Séligny was a Frenchman interested into spiritual traditionalism. He joined an esoteric Muslim (Sufi) order in Morocco in 1939 or 40. After twenty years living there, Séligny was asked by another Frenchman, Jean-Victor Hocquard, if he could guide him into the rediscovery of Tradition through Sufism. It is seemingly at this moment that Séligny's life soared, revealing him, perhaps not as a saint or true spiritual guide, but at least as a very charming leader.

When Séligny created his own Sufi group to answer Hocquard's demand, he quickly used it as a place for personal entrepreneurship. Indeed, he was not long moving his group from Morocco to the wealthy city of Monaco, then created a journal named Je suis ("I am”) targeting the young, managed to buy a yacht boat, and created a company of private lessons for post-high school students.

According to historian Mark Sigdwick, Séligny managed to extract a lot of money from his followers. He had a taste for luxurious cars and champagne. His ways to make bucks had him expelled from Monaco, but the incident did not create any problem to his followers: they accompanied him down the French Riviera, where he maintained his luxurious lifestyle. He banged his friend Hocquard’s daughter as well as many girls who went to him either for classes or “spiritual” activities.

One of them, a daughter of diplomats, loved him enough to ask her parents for money and expensive goods that she immediately gave to Séligny. She once received a new car from her parents and sold it to give the money to her lover. As she was underage, her father got her back at home, but once she turned 21, she flew back to Séligny to resume her affair with him.

Overall, Séligny managed to maintain various affairs at the same time, each girl being aware of the others. He was hardly a true spiritual guide but his feats with girls and followers were impressive.

3. Booba

Elie Yaffa, as a real name, is basically a “French” version of 50 Cent. Spotted by the show-business industry for his raps and small-scale ghetto fame, he enjoyed an important radio promotion and distribution. And whereas political correctness oppresses us, this race-mixed guy was able to rap things like “shut your big mouth, go make me a steak-fries, you gave me a headache, I’m on the verge to smack you” (Killer) or “there are bitches everywhere ‘cuz I’m in the place, and if it hurts, if you’re shouting, if you’re coming, that’s because I’m in your pussy” (Jour de paye) without being hunted down by SJWs.

Arrogant, muscular, pretending to be immensely rich (there are controversies over how much he really owns), Booba has been pedestalized by girls of North African origin, to the point that men of the same origin resent him for fucking their “sisters.” Many beurettes, as these girls are commonly referred to in France, have turned into the kind of “bitches” Booba talked about, by running after blacks with enough money to pay for champagne in clubs, giving them their pussy, and sometimes keeping the bastard children they got as a result.

Moderately appreciated by some for his raps talents, idolized by “swaggy” girls, Booba is also perceived as either a male whore who overplays virility but is actually a globalist puppet in charge of promoting race-mixing and crime, or as a giant asshole abusing his position to bed and disrespect girls. In any case, Booba has been pedestalized by many girls and doubtlessly helped a lot of thuggish Blacks to appear desirable. His alphaness is partly artificial, just like his juice-grown muscles, but it works.

4. Fritjof Schuon

Unlike Séligny, Fritjof Schuon is one of these guys whom we can assume to have had a deep knowledge of spirituality. A traditionalist as well, Schuon has been one of the first Muslim Sufis in Europe—he was drawn to Sufism during a quest for esoteric initiation—and wrote dozens of books about metaphysics and religions, including the milestone Transcendent Unity of Religions. Together with other traditionalists, Schuon helped to spawn a Sufi center in Basil, Switzerland, which he eventually took over. Under his leadership, the Sufi center evolved into an international order called Maryamiyya, a name referring to the order’s recognition of the Holy Virgin.

At 73, Schuon left Europe to Bloomington, Indiana, where he created a new religious community. Relocating at this age was already an impressive feat—but more impressive was Schuon’s interest shifting towards women. In Bloomington, he managed to “marry” several women, which is allowed by the Islamic law but unlikely for someone who was born a European. At least two of these women were already married with male followers, yet accepted to be given to their guru. Schuon was also prosecuted for child molestation when a disgruntled follower revealed that he organized dinners in which he allegedly touched teenage girls. It is controversial whether his touching was sexual or not. Nonetheless, he was revered as a living saint, both inside and outside his own community, and his works contain genuine metaphysical nuggets.

Conclusion

Can a man who is busy banging several women ask at least some of them to accept the other girls? If the answer is yes, be the man a pornstar, a musician, a community leader or someone able to wife several women at once, then he has reached the highest levels of game. Such a man's competition ranges from rare to nonexistent. Only a woman who worships a man can tolerate him to bang other girls and even be glad that he deigns to bang her too.

Some say that "forbidden patterns" of game—known as October Man, Fractionalism, and other stuff based on NLP—may achieve similar results. Perhaps it is true. As far as I'm concerned, I never felt the need to use these in game and consequently have no first-person experience on the topic. However, I would advise those interested into having women running at their feet that these matters may be tricky. A devoted woman who may accept anything minus one, say, being set aside for a cuter or younger one, can shift from devotion to tenacious hatred, so be careful.

Finland's Prime Minister Breaks Promise To House "Refugees" In His Second Home

Finnish Prime Minister Juha Sipilä made headlines in September last year for promising to house a "refugee" family in his second home. Though hardly the sort of generosity it was made out to be (Sipilä is a millionaire, besides owning at least two homes and residing in a government-funded one), the commitment was meant to show he would help shoulder the impact of the migrant crisis in a much more direct way than most Western politicians. Fast-forward mere months and the national leader has reneged on his promise, citing security concerns and "heavy publicity."

What we know beyond a shadow of a doubt is that Sipilä made his fake promise to sell his noxious half-open border policy. Compared to most European states, Finland is far removed from the migrant crisis. Things could be a whole lot worse. Thankfully for the Finns, migrants going there have to come via places like Denmark and Sweden, as the Baltic states and Russia have something of a zero tolerance approach to pretend refugees wandering through their lands. Too many of them have already arrived in Finnish cities like Helsinki, yet the numbers are nothing like Germany's.

Finland, however, is already in the midst of a serious recession. Even if the fraud Juha Sipilä had kept his word, the effects on him and his family would have been far less than an average Finnish household not even taking in asylum seekers. Through his wealth and status as a politician, the Prime Minister is untouchable in relative terms. He is surrounded by bodyguards and no migrant in their right mind would attack, rob or otherwise accost him. And if Sipilä needed months to determine whether security concerns would be an issue, discarding for a moment that we know he is a liar, the man is clearly incompetent and not fit for office.

At least 20% of Scandinavians are livid over the fake refugee influxes

Forgivably, we associate Scandinavia (including Finland in this case) with literally the worst strands of feminism and other SJW viruses. Still, this obscures the vociferous anger boiling up within local populations. In Sweden, for example, the Swedish Democrats continue to capture impressive portions of the national vote, especially so in a nation where tenuous coalition governments are the norm. They have also had the effect of pushing nominally center-right parties to comparatively harder immigration policies in a bid to stem the leaking of votes. Additionally, factions within these center-right groups have become vocal in demanding much more restrictive intakes of newcomers, defying their parties' leaders.

The same goes for Finland. The Finns Party, the coalition partner of Sipilä's Center Party, has recently called for the stripping of any public funds promoting multiculturalism, the scaling back of Finland's refugee quotas, and the total rejection of any "sharing the load" agreements championed by people like Angela Merkel, who want to dump their "refugees" onto countries that never invited them. This nationalist organisation presently has 38 of the 200 representatives sitting in the Finnish Parliament. Coalition-building is a necessity in the Finnish system, like its Swedish counterpart, so it is unclear exactly how the Finns Party will proceed. Open rebellion against the Center Party may simply lead to a more leftwing coalition taking the current one's place.

In fact, I am most likely grossly underestimating the proportion of incensed Scandinavians. My numbers only reflect the rough percentage vote or regular polling numbers of an openly anti-immigrant party in countries like Sweden and Finland. Many more disenchanted Scandinavians, rightly or wrongly, feel they have no choice but to vote for a mainstream candidate. There are oftentimes some credibility deficits in how voters perceive anti-immigration parties, particularly in their proposed management of the economy once common sense immigration policies are implemented.

What all this shows is that the firm base of Europeans willingly to oppose the migrant invasions extends beyond the main part of the continent and Great Britain. Aside from Germany, the United Kingdom, and France, Scandinavia is perhaps the most important battleground, as for decades its countries have staked their entire reputations on an unquestioning subservience to farcical notions of tolerance. If after years of attempted anti-indigenous brainwashing elites cannot sell their policies to the people and make those policies work, what does this say about the whole system?

Paying for a policy does not make the policy right

Let us pretend again that poser Juha Sipilä had actually fulfilled his promise to house fake refugees. Why should his willingness to pay for and accommodate a handful of them legitimize the letting in of tens of thousands of otherwise unwanted migrants? The George Soros-style approach of funding the hell out of things should not be mistaken for a moral obligation for the rest of society to foot the bill for some rich person's pet political project. Moreover, the price that Sipilä would have paid and the price that Soros does is so insignificant to either of them as to become meaningless. Rather than being a noteworthy personal sacrifice, it is an instance of both men throwing Monopoly money around.

Over the past year, we have constantly seen the chameleon-like lies of European elites. Only five or so years ago, Angela Merkel was calling multiculturalism an unmitigated

“failure.” Plus, at that time she was referring to longstanding immigrant communities, notably the Turks, who had arrived decades before, not sudden arrivals. Then in 2015, lo and behold, 1.2 million entirely unestablished migrants were grafted onto Germany directly from the Middle East and North Africa. Sipilä is merely the newest addition to an increasingly long list of supposed conservatives and proponents of immigration reform who have betrayed their countries.

While the average Finnish renter is kept awake at night wondering about how his country has fallen apart so fast, Juha Sipilä will be sleeping peacefully, knowing full well none of the mess he has created will ever touch him.

Is Anthony Bourdain Getting Cucked By His MMA Wife?

May 29, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Anthony Bourdain has emerged as one of the preeminent celebrity critics of Donald Trump. The vitriol he unleashed last year against The Donald over the latter's illegal immigration stances was particularly vocal. It is possible, however, that a big part of Bourdain's beef with the Republican Presidential nominee has to do with the television chef's jealousy over Trump's continuing assertion of his masculinity. After all, Bourdain's current wife Ottavia, who is considerably younger, has a special talent for posing very cosily with other younger, more muscular and almost certainly much more virile men.

Wife of Anthony Bourdain with MMA colleague

Ottavia, an aspiring MMA fighter, has benefited immensely from her marriage to Bourdain. A New York Times profile on her from several years ago makes it clear, even if the writer tries to deny it, that the Italian-born brunette owes pretty much all she has to her much older spouse. She came to America with basically zero money and zero English to follow a rock musician she was “in love with” (bad boy syndrome?) and, after a lot of time in menial restaurant jobs, eventually met and married the fabulously wealthy Bourdain. Whilst Melania Trump has also garnered a huge number of benefits from marrying The Donald, the third Mrs. Trump does not exactly do everything she can to embrace other men constantly in her social media pictures.

Whether Ottavia is actually cheating is yet to be proven. What can be said beyond a shadow of a doubt, though, is that her social media antics are of the kind that would drive a woman to the depths of anger and horror if her husband were posing with younger girls like Ottavia does with younger men. Considering that many of the men she poses with are not only significantly stronger but much more experienced in MMA than her, many of the up-and-close social media shots are flagrantly contrived.

Rather than feeling schadenfreude towards Anthony Bourdain, let us try and understand why an otherwise successful man puts up with this from his own wife.

The man she is embracing rather too happily in the picture below appears regularly across her social media sharings:

"I always love to hang out with my male-only teammates after training, especially the dude on my left."

Almost everything like this posted by Ottavia seems to be designed to emphasize other men's masculinities at the expense of her husband's.

Worst of all, however, is this attempted successful humiliation of him:

Loading…

In order to thank the man who rescued her from a life of quasi-poverty and enabled her to pursue her MMA dream without having to work for a living, Ottavia has resorted to pointing out how old and decrepit he is compared to the other men (friends?) in her life. Anthony Bourdain may regularly travel, but it still does not explain the paucity of photographs with him relative to those depicting her and often shirtless younger men.

Compare Bourdain’s life to Donald Trump’s

Would Anthony Bourdain get away with a photograph like this, even as his wife does everything she can to pose with younger men?

Sure, Donald Trump was the owner of the Miss USA beauty pageant for twenty years. But can you imagine Anthony Bourdain posing with young, fertile women in the same way The Donald constantly does or Bourdain’s own wife does with younger, more virile men? Inasmuch as you can probably conjure up some images of Melania Trump by herself with men who are her own age or just plain young, these sorts of depictions are in the minority. Ottavia Bourdain, by contrast, throws them in the internet’s face.

Every liberal man and his even more liberal dog have argued that Trump is insecure because of everything from the size of his hands and fingers to the money he got from his father. So why not look into the idea that Anthony Bourdain is grossly insecure about his wife, age and marriage and is reflecting any lack of self-esteem back on Trump? Bourdain’s pro-Obama and pro-SJW politics may be noxious to us, yet we should have some sympathy for him.

It seems the behavior of his wife may have led the renowned culinary authority, who turns 60 this year, to take up martial arts himself. Undoubtedly, he has experienced success in his chosen pursuit, even recently winning a gold medal in a competition. Plus, men at his age should definitely be doing everything they can to stay fit. Notwithstanding his impressive performances, was it a matter of health and exercise that caused Bourdain to take up Brazilian jiu-jitsu or fears over his wife’s friendships with more virile younger men?

Bourdain’s politics are liberal, but we do not revel in his possible marital pain

Yes, yes, he dines with Obama, but at least allow yourself to feel some of Anthony Bourdain’s likely misery.

It goes without saying that Anthony Bourdain is to political thought what Jessica Valenti is to common sense. Sadly, nonetheless, his plight is one shared by far too many men around the world. Women have been blessed with abounding social opportunities to secure meal tickets from wealthy or merely hardworking average men and then show not even a modicum of gratitude for what they have been given. And the biggest way to make a man feel that his efforts will stay thankless is to basically shove it in other people’s faces that you want a younger, more buff and virile man, to the point where for every one recent public photo of you and your husband there are five to ten of you engaging in cuddles and exercise with less aged males.

Take this opportunity to recognize that if Anthony Bourdain is having these apparent struggles, you can as well. A multimillionaire who is known to countless millions, Bourdain’s romantic life looks as close to as precarious as it was for the founder of Bodybuilding.com, who found his long-term girlfriend quickly snapped up by Dan Bilzerian when they had a break from each other.

So what can be done? For a start, you need to be judicious about the woman you choose to settle down with, let alone have a child with, as is the case with Bourdain currently. There are additionally certain red lines that you cannot allow a woman to cross. If she does, your choice is to either give her the flick or make it clear that you will not tolerate her staying there. Or, if you feel you have to put up with it, you can always ask Anthony for advice, right?

Studies Reveal That Walking Is A Surprising Way To Reduce Post-Workout Soreness

May 29, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Anybody who does any sort of resistance training, particularly those just starting out with a fitness regimen, will tell you that one of the worst things about it is the muscular exhaustion and soreness the morning after: while I do love that first rush of dull pain to tell me that I did a good job yesterday, it does make going about your day to day business a bit harder than it normally would be.

Most people likely don't have the slight masochistic streak that I do, and would much prefer reducing their soreness. As it turns out, there is a way, and it is one that I discovered purely by accident.

A Story From College

As a young man in college, being away from my parents for the first time, I had a fair amount of free time, most of which I spent either working out or attempting to sleep with every woman in the county (as a side note, I learned much of women and sexuality from the "school of hard knocks", which is why I must admit that I do not have any sort of story about Return Of Kings giving me some great epiphany about women).

This was around the same time that I decided to reduce my masturbation, for reasons that have already been discussed on this website, so after playing the field for a month or two, my Saturdays solidified into a wonderful and idyllic routine: after breakfast and washing up I would finish my homework or reading for the upcoming week in the morning, play some saxophone or do some other recreation, then go to the gym, shower, eat lunch, do some reading or another recreational thing, then shack up with one of my four regular girls for the evening.

Every one of those girls lived off campus, 1-2 miles away from my dorm, a distance that I almost always walked. While the constant walking in addition to formally scheduled exercise, both combined with the calorically reduced diet I was eating (as detailed in one of my earlier posts) made me drop more than 30 pounds in the span of about two months and gave me a trim and lean physique that the women in my life could barely keep their hands off of.

What I didn't expect is that the morning after I would barely be sore and be much more functional, capable of going about my business with a spring in my step and without any soreness at all.

What Happened

As excited as I was to finally be having sexual intercourse on a regular basis—I freely admit that I did not lose my virginity until my sophomore year in college—I doubted that that was the reason I had reduced soreness. So I reasoned that, perhaps the 3 miles I had intermittently walked after going to the gym had something to do with it.

As luck would have it, research has confirmed that this was indeed the case…sort of: More accurately, any sort of light, sustained aerobic physical activity (like walking or stretching) after a shorter bout of heavy anaerobic training (such as sprints, weightlifting, or hitting a punching bag) can reduce soreness a great deal:

A study published in 2011 analyzed whether stretching before or after heavy physical activity would be a more effective way to reduce soreness. The results showed that there was a statistically noticeable difference in each, with pre-exercise stretching reducing "next day" soreness by, on average, half a point—"points" were defined purely by perception by the test subjects on a 100 point scale. Post-exercise stretching reduced soreness by a full point. The results seem to indicate that while post-exercise physical activity reduces soreness more than pre-exercise stretching, stretching in general does not produce a huge reduction in soreness.

And, admittedly, I could not find any academic data specifically on taking a long-distance walk (defining long distance walk as anything longer than 1 mile). So instead, I looked for information on fitness websites—and, in the style of Mike Cernovich, I found the information I was looking for, from "bros" who were more knowledgeable than the men in labcoats:

Livestrong.com, isatori.com, builtlean.com, Bodybuilding.com, and even HuffPo all agree that a bit of light cardio is a great way to reduce muscular soreness. And if the SJWs of Huffington Post and the Racist Bodybuilders For Trump can agree on something, you might be behooved to give it a try.

Should Racist Words And Drawings Be Forbidden To Not Offend Muslims In Europe?

May 29, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

A drawing (seen above) by the Norwegian artist Thomas Knarvik, with Swedish politician Ali Esbati depicted as an ape, has sparked controversy in Norway. The satiric drawing shows Esbati's head on an ape body saying "You are racist" over and over again, with the title "the King of Apes" above.

Thomas Knarvik posted a series of similar caricatures on Facebook, and got his profile pulled down after people made reports. Now Norwegians are debating the limits of freedom of speech.

Ali Esbati.

Ali Esbati, born in Iran and now a parliament member for the Swedish Left Party, calls the caricature of him racist. He's made several appearences in Norwegian media after he was a witness to the terror attack on Utøya in 2011, where Anders Behring Breivik killed 69 people.

"It's very hard to discuss racism on a systemic level in Norway and it has only gotten worse," the left-wing politician says. "Today it's almost regarded as an extreme position to stand for anti-racism."

The artist himself denies that his drawing is racist and says that it should be interpreted in its proper context. To understand it, you should know that Ali Esbati is one of those typical leftists who's made a career of calling everything and everyone racist.

> You can see how the monkey has been portrayed in earlier satires, and in Aesop's fable. The monkey is smart, while the cat is spontaneous and impatient. Ali Esbati knows what he's doing when he accuses everyone of being racist. It's actually well done to accuse such a leftist media company as NRK [Norwegian Broadcasting Corporation] for being racist. He's like a parrot who repeats the same things all the time, as I have tried to convey through the drawing.

The parrot strikes again.

Thomas Knarvik says that he's for "full freedom of speech." He supports Pamela Geller's call for a special day when people draw Muhammad, which he calls "provocation for the sake of provocation."

Norwegian socialist politician Snorre Valen has written an article where he urges Knarvik and those who have defended him to apologize to Esbati. Valen writes: "The drawings follow a tradition of portraying non-whites as subhuman and wild animals, monkeys who can not control their sexuality and bodily functions."

Politically incorrect art is outlawed

Dan Park.

So Knarvik got banned from Facebook for sharing his art with the world. But far more severe punishments can be dealt to those who are politically incorrect in Scandinavia. Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Finland all have laws against hate crimes. The Swedish law states that "expressing contempt" for certain groups can get you in jail for up to four years.

Swedish artist Dan Park has been convicted several times for his “hateful” art. His work is provocative to say the least. In 1998 he was convicted for wearing a jacket with a swastika on it. In 2012 he was convicted again for putting up posters with the words “Our negro slave has escaped.” In 2014 he was sentenced to five months in prison for a set of artworks, one of them with the text “Anxious negroes go crazy.”

On Park’s blog you can see that he continues to put up his art on the streets, despite the establishment doing everything it can to shut him down. His resistance and perseverance is admirable, and I think many more should follow his example.

It shouldn’t come as a surprise that I’m against laws that put limits on your ability to express yourself and what opinions you’re allowed to utter. It seems obvious to me that the only ones that are against freedom of speech today, is those who are afraid that the truth will come out.

With growing awareness of my own country’s injust laws, and seeing how conservatives are being shut down and silenced in other countries, I’m beginning to think that what’s called “hate speech” should not only be legal, but that we have a duty to express it for the sake of it being expressed. Or as Thomas Knarvik might have put it, we should provoke for the sake of provoking.

I normally never use the word negro and I fully understand anyone thinking that it’s an offensive word. But when dirty words are prohibited, something has gone wrong and one has to take a stand against it. One way to do that is by merely using those words and refusing to comply when people tell you to shut up. That’s called exercising your freedom of speech, and doing it becomes even more important when that freedom is being curtailed.

Thomas Knarvik, Dan Park—and Roosh as well—are three men who have paid dearly for speaking their minds and making art. Because of their actions, we know where the limits are. I hope more people follow their example, and make art that is intentionally provocative and offensive. It will come at a price, but it cant be worse than what will happen if we lose our freedom entirely.

In a society where offensiveness is illegal, being offensive is imperative.

14 Stupid Things To Stop Being Angry About

May 30, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Anger had always been an issue for me. It's actually embarrassing to remember all the times I flared up over insignificant matters and worthless individuals. My past experience, however, did teach me few things about the nature of anger.

First, anger, in every form, is all about power. Anger exists because it protects us from harm whether it be a harm to your body or harm to your reputation that will ruin your social status. Anger also drives us to defend what we care for whether it be your loved ones or your tribe and beliefs. But, of course, it's also used as a means to assert and maintain your dominance over others. In any way you see it, anger functions as a way to both guard and expand your power.

But anger, like fire, can either help you or destroy you—you must be the one in control. And to master anger, you must be aware of how you're using it: You're either using anger to control a situation or you're throwing a tantrum because you have no control.

So, for all situations that induce rage, disgust, and bitterness, ask yourself the Anger Question: Is my anger helping me defend, assert, or improve my life situation in any way? If the answer is no, cool down and disengage. There's no point burning your energy needlessly.

To get you started, here are some common things that enrage people that shouldn't.

1. The Past

The past is gone; it exists only in your mind. Just learn whatever lesson you must and move on. You should also know that our memories are prone to biases and distortions—especially with emotional events. So, don't get distracted over something that is irrelevant to your current life that's distorted and unreal.

2. Stupid People

Stupid people have always existed and they will continue to exist no matter how much they annoy you. It’s absurd to claim that there are people who are so imbecilic as to “insult” your intelligence and “lower” your IQ. If you’re so easily offended by your supposed intellectual inferiors, maybe you’re not as smart as you think you are.

3. Disgusting People

I once had the misfortune to witness a morbidly obese man on a scooter moaning about lack of accessibility in an aging facility. He did nothing to battle his obesity (he drank Pepsi non-stop and even took his medicine with it, claiming that it was impossible for him to drink something without sugar), but he felt like he had the right to complain even as he was being pampered by the government that paid all his medical expenses.

I used to feel utter disgust and rage by these type of people who relish in their victim-status and see weakness as a virtue, but I just don’t see the point anymore. These days, I prefer detached contempt.

4. Feminists And SJWs

Speaking of stupid and disgusting people, feminists and SJWs are some of the most idiotic and nauseating people to have ever existed on Earth. But what does getting outraged and hating them accomplish? These people are being deliberately provocative to troll you. They want you to play their negative-sum game so that you'll drop down to their level of misery. By spewing your hatred towards them, you're playing into their hands and giving the attention they crave. The better option is to ridicule them like the joke they are or just ignore them.

5. Your "Enemies"

The truth is, unless you have people who are actively plotting to harm you or kill you, you don't really have "enemies." Maybe you have resentment towards your useless boss, a bitch ex, or people who insulted you or betrayed you in the past, but unless they're somehow trying to destroy you this very moment, holding on to anger will only torment you. You're essentially letting your "enemies" win just by keeping them in your mind. Kick them out.

6. Entertainment Sports

During my more miserable years, I followed sports to numb myself. Oh, the joys of rage, frustration, anguish, and disappointment that comes with cheering for a sub-par team—not to mention being burned with humiliation by your laughing rivals. I finally ended the idiotic self-torture when I decided that my own life was too important to be sitting and watching millionaire entertainers duke it out in a modern-day circus.

7. Your Life Circumstance

You’re angry that girls won’t date you because of your race, height, or whatever? You blame your parents and shitty upbringing for your current problems? Oh please, countless men have succeeded in spite of having gone through harsher conditions than you have. Even if you have a legitimate case of hardship, you’re wasting your energy on anger if you’re not directing it towards self-improvement.

8. Money And Objects

Growing up financially unstable, I used to get high-strung over money and possessions—every dollar and every cent counted for me. I guarded my possessions like my own children and I would get furious for days when something got damaged, lost, or stolen. This is what happens with a scarcity mindset: you fuss over the insignificant stuff.

Wealth is vital to your well-being, but acting like it's the most important thing in the world and getting overly attached to your possessions is petty and pathetic. Don't be an arrogant dipshit like this Ferrari owner:

9. Politicians

Getting angry at professional politicians for being corrupt liars is like getting angry at professional prostitutes for being dirty and slutty. I actually find it hilarious how much hatred people hold for the likes of Obama and Trump.

Get it through your head: unless you're actively doing something to get them out of office, you're getting fussed up over something you can't control.

10. World Affairs

Know that the media makes its money by garnering your attention with the most negative and conflict-arousing drama they can find in the world while feeding you propaganda at the same time. What is the point of getting angry over something happening around the world that doesn't even affect you? Even the local news is barely relevant to your own life. If there's something important that I should concern myself with, I'm sure I'll hear about it through the word of mouth.

11. Different Opinions

We all know how bitchy the SJWs get when faced with opinions that go against their delusions, so isn't it time to stop doing the same? Why get angry because someone would dare espouse socialist ideas or express their Christian beliefs? You don't have to prove them wrong and you probably won't change their minds anyway. Focus your energy on things that benefit you instead.

12. Arguments

To continue with the previous point, most arguments—especially regarding politics or religious beliefs—are total waste of time. I remember all my heated online arguments from the past, and guess what: they've accomplished exactly nothing. Unless you're doing it to defend your reputation, to win over an audience that matters, or as part of your job, arguing is almost always unnecessary. If you're going to argue, do it for practical reasons and not for your ego.

13. The Injustice of the World

I personally find this the hardest to swallow. It's a familiar story: spoiled feminist girls get to engage in weekly, alcohol-fueled debauchery thanks to their indulging parents that support their lifestyle while their supposed oppressors—the men—are working their asses off just to get by (or getting maimed and killed in wars). I can repeat the same scenario in many variations. But I guess the world has always been unfair and complaining about it is not going to change it.

In the end, all we can do is focus on improving our own lives while ignoring these human garbage.

14. Yourself

You messed up, embarrassed yourself, and now you're angry with no one to blame but yourself. It's a tough place to be in and you'll find little sympathy anywhere. But no matter what you did and how badly you screwed up, you must find a way to forgive yourself and move on. Failure to do so can be fatal.

Taming Anger

Now, I'm not suggesting that you flat-out banish anger from your life; that would be a woeful mistake. As I've said in the beginning, anger is vital for your existence, which is why you must tame it and use it to your advantage. All I'm suggesting is that your energy and focus be concentrated towards creating value for yourself, no more.

Also, now that I'm more stoic, I do find that people mistake my lack of reactiveness with weakness. I therefore suggest that you always keep some heat on so that people don't think you're a pushover.

To conclude, tame your anger like you would a wild horse. You must command your anger lest you be commanded by it. Don't get angry over worthless matters that bring no value to your life and focus your energy on worthwhile things you can take practical action on.

The Slow Merging Of Government Disinformation, Propaganda, And Censorship

May 30, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In May of this year, a bill was introduced in the US Congress called the "Countering Information Warfare Act (CIWA) of 2016." It is currently pending in the Committee on Foreign Relations. The premise behind the bill is, in essence, that Russia and China are devoting huge sums of money on "propaganda" and "disinformation" which has the net effect of smearing US policies around the world.

Advocates of the bill note that Russia allegedly devotes significant resources to its 24-hour news site rt.com. It also apparently funds the Orwellian-named "Agency for Internet Studies." This last organization has been called a "troll farm" and is supposed to be the source of a fake video showing a US "soldier" firing a gun at a Qur'an that was circulated widely in Russian Muslim communities.

Proponents of the bill note that disinformation and propaganda can take various forms. One form is the "accurate" news story that draws a "false" conclusion. Another form is the totally fake “news” story. Such disinformation is also seeded among news outlets in the target country, with the assumption that lazy native journalists will spread the story without checking on its veracity.

China’s propaganda and disinformation exceeds that of Russia by several orders of magnitude. As Michel Juneau-Katsuya, the former chief of the Asia-Pacific Bureau of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, said: “The sheer volume of spies that have been deployed—it’s just absolutely phenomenal. It’s never been seen in the history of the world.” On the domestic front, China uses false stories and disinformation to discredit dissident groups like the Falun Gong or to cover up human rights abuses, environmental crimes, or massive commercial fraud.

In one recent example of pure disinformation (from 2001), the Chinese media claimed that five members of the Falun Gong sect had set themselves afire in Tiennamen Square. The incident proved to be a hoax, but it served its short-term purpose in providing a pretext for the persecution of the group.

Some of this is an expected part of the new tri-polar world power system. Great powers of every era have engaged in “black ops” propaganda: election rigging, disinformation, subversion, and nastier activities. But what we are seeing now seems to be an escalation of propaganda into a virtual arm of warfare. As the great powers hesitate to confront each other militarily, the zone of conflict shifts into the electronic realm.

Chinese military doctrine emphasizes what it calls the “three warfares”: legal warfare (lawsuits and administrative entanglements), psychological warfare, and media warfare. Agencies of the Chinese government and military are specifically tasked with carrying out operations in support of this theory. The United States has been slow to respond; and when it has responded, the effect has been feeble or inept.

Right on the US’s doorstep, for example, the Chinese have been engaged in building a canal through Nicaragua. Without question, this project (if it is completed) will turn that country into a vassal state of China, and cause a fearsome amount of damage to the natural environment. Yet there has been barely a whisper in response to the whole boondoggle in Washington.

If the CIWA passes, it will task the State Department with the responsibility of tracking and countering foreign disinformation. Within six months of the bill’s passage, there would be established something called the Center for Information Analysis and Response. This office would have direct connection with the State Department, the Secretary of Defense, and the Broadcasting Board of Governors. Cynics (or realists) might say that for the first time the government will have the power to screen and evaluate “news” for authenticity. CIWA thus represents a significant official intrusion into the way news is culled and reported by the mainstream media.

But troublesome questions remain. The first problem is that too many vested interests are likely to be threatened for the bill to have any practical effect. Chinese money has been liberally spread around the US for many years now, and their fingers are in a great many pies.

Many US news outlets like the New York Times, the Washington Post, and others are willing to run propaganda stories from the China Daily (Beijing’s English-language organ) as long as they are paid well. Some large news organizations are conglomerates who have major financial investments in China. The existence of paid agents masquerading as journalists also cannot be ruled out.

Beyond these practical considerations, there are more subtle and troubling implications of CIWA. As a practical matter, it would have the effect of deciding what information is “true” and what information is “disinformation” or “propaganda.” As everyone knows, the boundary between these categories is not always clear; one man’s news may be another man’s disinformation.

Unfortunately, years of incompetence and ineptitude on the part of the US government have given the US’s enemies much of the ammunition they currently use. Lax immigration policies and greed have allowed too much Chinese influence in US industry, universities, and the economy. The greed and selfishness of US industry has permitted the wholesale dismantling of America’s industrial base and caused it to be outsourced to China.

On the international scene, years of stupid, ruinous foreign wars have destroyed the US’s credibility and made it vulnerable to atrocity propaganda. The ruling elites in the US have failed to act as stewards of the national health and interest; instead, they have sought to plunder the country’s wealth for their own selfish gain. If there ever is an honest reckoning, the price for all this will have to be paid.

It is easy to imagine a scenario where CIWA becomes the genesis of the most subtle and insidious form of censorship: the official labeling of unwanted truth as “disinformation.” Fraud, hoaxes, and disinformation undoubtedly do happen, but the selective exposure of them often operates as a de facto form of censorship. The only way to guard against creeping censorship—of whatever form—is for the intellectual class to maintain its vigilance. Threats to national security are no doubt real. But they must never be used as pretexts to enforce a certain narrative on the population.

Open Borders Advocate Mark Zuckerberg Building A Fortified Bunker Within His Walled Family Home

May 30, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Facebook founder and CEO Mark Zuckerberg is reported to be building a panic bunker next to his home in Palo Alto, California after a series of recent security upgrades.

Zuckerberg bought four surrounding houses to his $7 million mansion and has started the process of tearing one down in order to make way for security additions detailed in a recently submitted plan to the Palo Alto planning department.

According to the plans, Zuckerberg's panic bunker is described as having "white brick walls, dark steel doors and windows, dark gray siding and louvers where they occur above the roof line, and a dark gray standing seam metal roof," giving the impression of a steel fortress for the Facebook CEO to hide in if necessary.

Zuckerberg's compound already has a perimeter of black panel walls in an attempt to stop both trespassers and snoopers. The Facebook CEO was slammed on social media after criticizing Donald Trump's Mexican border wall plans and then returning to his fortressed mansion.

You’re A “Bigot” If You Don’t Support Pedophilia

May 31, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The free fall continues. Pedophile Todd Nickerson just published a new article and video with support of Salon this month. In the piece, video of a young girl in a pink dress plays while Nickerson rationalizes his lust for children, and describes “relieving himself” of his sexual lust in the bathroom after spending time with her.

The march towards total sexual degeneracy continues at a rapid pace in Anglo America. Even as heterosexuals (and especially heterosexual men) are just getting used to their new second-class status as a result of the ongoing Marxist revolution, social engineers are already at work destroying the last vestiges of morality and sexual restraint in the culture. In a display of just how duplicitous the American legal system is, even though there are laws against prostitution in every state some states do not have laws against sex with animals, and now leftist media is pushing for legal acceptance of pedophilia. As George Carlin said about prostitution: Selling is legal, fucking is legal. Why isn’t selling fucking legal? Why should it be illegal to sell something you can give away?

Beyond the comedy and contradictions of the American legal system and the marginalization of heterosexuals, sometime soon it is reasonable to expect people who do not support pedophilia will be called bigots, cave dwellers, and other colorful labels the left invents, because to leftists sex with children (and later sex with animals) is just another lifestyle choice.

Enter Todd Nickerson

The leftist Salon magazine has been at the forefront of pushing the pedophilia agenda. In fact, Todd Nickerson has become their unofficial poster boy, as they attempt to knock down the remaining columns that hold up what's left of Western Civilization. Twice within the last year they have given Nickerson the podium, letting him push his blog called Virtuous Pedophiles. It's a strategy that uses Saul Alinsky's 10th Rule for Radicals: If you push a negative hard enough, it will push through and become a positive. Nickerson plays the victim card, just as homosexuals did for a generation before gay marriage was legalized:

> My purpose is to go out and educate people, allowing people like myself to come out and be open. Society makes it harder by persecuting us because a lot of us become fatalistic. We start to think it doesn't matter what we do or say they're going to hate us anyway.

In addition to marginalizing those who do not want to live in a society where pedophilia is the norm as "ignorant" people who need to be "educated," Salon pushes the victim narrative, reporting that poor Nickerson had to pack up and leave town after he "came out" to his family so he wouldn't offend anyone. (Offend is, of course, an insidious leftist code word.) Nickerson says he learned he was a pedophile at age 18 when he babysat a 5-year old girl that he "fell in love with" but did not act on his urges.

Salon ran another Nickerson piece in September 2015 entitled "I'm a pedophile, not a monster." In the bloviating screed, Salon lets him label pedophilia as an alternate sexual behavior. Nickerson did receive at least some support after posting the article:

> Maybe he's right. Maybe pedophilia is, at least for some people, an intractable in-born trait that it is possible to have without supporting or endorsing. I think we should all at least have the humility to entertain the possibility he knows his own experience better than we do.
> There's nothing about being able to sympathize with someone who possesses a terrible trait that they didn't choose for themselves that precludes us from also taking every necessary step to protect kids. I know this much is true: historically, acting out of a sense of moral panic (whether that was communists, witches or drugs) has pretty much always made us less safe because it removes our ability to think.

Next up will be crackpot psychologists defending pedophilia as an alternative lifestyle choice (already happening in legacy media publications like the Los Angeles Times as we will see, but becoming more widespread in the future), before the media take up the issue, turning it into another circus, and legislators once again bend their knee as a lobby for pedophilia organizes.

“Hell is empty and all the devils are here.” -Shakespeare

Destroying Morality

This latest attack is another in a long line aimed at demoralizing the population. There is no doubt the normalization of all sexual urges will reduce human beings to a pre-civilization level of existence, i.e. return man to a sexual jungle. Legalizing pedophilia and bestiality will be the capstones of the Marxist revolution that is ongoing right now across the Western world. Once America and Europe have been broken, the rest of the world will fall into line like dominoes.

Feminism was only the first chapter in the move against humanity. Even though anthropologists knew a century ago that lifting restrictions on monogamy and female sexual freedom would cause society to collapse, their warnings were not heeded either because of foolishness, ignorance, or on purpose. Sex and Culture, published in 1934 by J.D. Unwin, was considered “a work of the highest importance” by Aldous Huxley, whose warnings about where America was going were also not heeded. Huxley wrote:

> Unwin’s conclusions, which are based upon an enormous wealth of carefully sifted evidence, may be summed up as follows. All human societies are in one or another of four cultural conditions: zoistic, manistic, deistic, rationalistic. Of these societies the zoistic displays the least amount of mental and social energy, the rationalistic the most. Investigation shows that the societies exhibiting the least amount of energy are those where pre-nuptial continence is not imposed and where the opportunities for sexual indulgence after marriage are greatest. The cultural condition of a society rises in exact proportion as it imposes pre-nuptial and post-nuptial restraints upon sexual opportunity.

In Unwin’s study of 80 tribes and 6 civilizations, these startling findings were published:

> The whole of human history does not contain a single instance of a group becoming civilized unless it has been absolutely monogamous, nor is there any example of a group retaining its culture after it has adopted less rigorous customs.

The sexual market is the grandfather of all the other markets of man. Once a society becomes liberal with sexual behavior, it loses its cohesion, impetus, and purpose. The abandonment of any sexual restraint puts America on the road to becoming a modern day Sodom and Gomorrah with a low level of social and mental energy. In other words, it puts us on the road to Idiocracy.

Those who do not support sex with children are bigots, according to the media and Nickerson

"You Are a Bigot"

Because of the genius with which the left is enacting these de-civilizing policies and bringing them into the media for mainstream discussion, it is likely they will soon begin marginalizing resisters. As with so many other cultural norms that have been razed in the West, anyone who resists will be labeled a bigot. The puppet masters have realized enormous success using this playbook. Look how far they have already pushed Western culture. Gayness is lionized by the media because, after all, someone can't help that they're gay. Transsexuals can't help they were a woman born in a man's body and want to use a bathroom that is the opposite of their anatomy. And, coming soon, pedophiles can't help that they're attracted to children.

Barack Obama has already said he thinks sex education in kindergarten is "the right thing to do." In addition, he threatened to cut off school lunch funding for poor children at schools that did not provide third gender bathrooms to children in a thinly veiled effort at sexualizing children. The Los Angeles Times jumped on board with the pedophilia narrative, placing pedophilia on the same level as heterosexuality as it reported the sob story of pedophile Paul Cristiano who told reporters he prefers pre-pubescent girls.

> Many researchers taking a different view of pedophilia: Pedophilia once was thought to stem from psychological influences early in life. Now, many experts view it as a deep-rooted predisposition that does not change. "These people felt they could snuff out the desire, or shame me into denying it existed," he said. "But it's as intrinsic as the next person's heterosexuality."

Western civilization is already on a slippery slope as it slides towards mainstreaming pedophilia. Leftists have already set a precedent unseen in world history with the enshrinement of homosexual marriage into law. As The New American put it, there is no historical precedent in the world for the acceptance of faux marriage yet America accepted it. There is, however a lengthy history of pedophilia across the world:

> Yet if I say that our current cultural trajectory — a bizarre trek that has caused us to boldly go where no American had gone before — has as a point on its arc the acceptance of pedophilia, I'm sure I'll hear "never, ever under the stars and stripes!" This is a normal human reaction. But the past is a picture of futures man > inevitably will paint again, and history hollers its warnings for those with ears to hear.

There is indeed a history of pedophilia in humans, but as Unwin pointed out it was seen only when a society was declining. One must think about this critically: with a retrograde push for men to be able to have sex with children, the marginalization of heterosexuality, and pushing androgyny of the men and women, what is the end goal of this insanity?

Once the full agenda of sexual degeneracy and moral relativism is realized, considering the lack of resistance Americans have put up so far to the agendas designed to break civilization, we will have arrived in a dystopia where everything is normal and nothing can be judged. Moral relativism, which tells us we can't judge the behavior of others, even if they are child molesters is ultimately a deal with the devil. The 1960s mantra "If it feels good do it!" has become the theme on our road to hell.

The marginalization of heterosexuality continues with a newly invented term "stare rape"

Change Tactics

Traditionalists and conservatives tend to put up symbolic opposition to changes like these, before eventually caving in and kowtowing to the demands of the "oppressed." This is the wrong tactic when fighting in war, whether it be a cultural war or a literal one. By setting the tone of the discussion in advance, liberals are ensuring conservatives play defense. Ancient Chinese philosopher Sun Tzu, master tactician and author of The Art of War would not approve. From Chapter 6, Weak Points and Strong:

> Whoever is first in the field and awaits the coming of the enemy, will be fresh for the fight; whoever is second in the field and has to hasten to battle will arrive exhausted.

In addition to the colossal error of letting the left set the conditions of the narrative, other tactics must be changed. Each time a leftist agenda item is shoved in their faces, the left imposes their will on the right rather than the other way around. Sun Tzu continues:

> Therefore the clever combatant imposes his will on the enemy, but does not allow the enemy's will to be imposed on him.

Since many conservatives are already reeling from 50 years or more of losses in the Culture War, they're lost and most have no idea where the next attack will come from (like the pedophilia agenda):

> Appear at points which the enemy must hasten to defend; march swiftly to places where you are not expected.

The left also plays the victim card and uses what Bertrand Russell called The Fallacy of the Superior Virtue of the Oppressed as a shield, while they strike with their sword of moral relativism.

> You can ensure the safety of your defense if you only hold positions that cannot be attacked.

Conservatives consistently play defense rather than putting the left in a defensive crouch.

> Hence that general is skillful in attack whose opponent does not know what to defend; and he is skillful in defense whose opponent does not know what to attack.

These short passages illustrate only a few of the ways the culture war will be lost and pedophilia will be imposed on the population if those against degeneracy do not change tactics. The re-education of the public to accept any sexual behavior, while criminalizing heterosexuality in every way possible (i.e. there is a new push against stare rape) is an attempt at reducing humans to the equivalent of easily manipulated farm animals, who, echoing the battery metaphor in The Matrix, only exist to create profit for their masters on the Anglo-American (and eventually world) tax farm. H.L. Mencken wrote about the true aims of those in power:

> The aim…is simply to reduce as many individuals as possible to the same safe level, to breed and train a standardized citizenry, to put down dissent and originality. That is its aim in the United States, whatever the pretensions of politicians, pedagogues and other such mountebanks, and that is its aim everywhere else.

Will the push to normalize pedophilia be the breaking point in the Culture War, and a turning point before the stroke of midnight? Or will Americans once again march to the orders of the left when this issue soon enters the Overton Window?

The 12 Step Social Justice Warrior Recovery Program

May 31, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

'Twelve Step' programs have become famous in the United States as a set of guiding principles which outline a course of action to recover from an addiction, compulsion, or detrimental personality problem. The first twelve step program was AA or 'Alcoholics Anonymous', which was set up in the 1930's as a method of recovery from alcoholism.

Since that time, many other programs have sprung up which deal with other afflictions, such as gambling or methamphetamine addiction. However, now that we are getting deep into the 2010's, doesn't it seem obvious that there should be a recovery program for social justice warriors as well?

Here is a new set of guidelines which will help address their addictions to cultural Marxism, profanity, white male hatred, civilization-destroying egalitarianism, and excessive "tumblring" among other things. Hopefully, coming to terms with their expensive Starbucks coffee habit can also be addressed as an added bonus.

1. Admit You Have A Problem

The first step to take in any twelve step program is publicly admitting that you have a problem. You simply cannot progress to step number two if you continue to live in denial. Your addiction is detrimentally impacting your life and the people around you.

> We admitted we were powerless over ~~alcohol~~ social justice, and that our lives had become unmanageable.

2. Understand That "Social Justice" Is Complete Poppycock

Now that you have taken the vital first step, it is imperative for you to know what "social justice" actually represents.

Be prepared to be shocked, appalled, and utterly humiliated as Prager University gives you the correct spiel on what this cancerous buzzword actually means. Fortunately, in less than six minutes you will be given a true education, and hopefully emerge a much greater and level-headed human being as a result.

3. Believe That Rational Thinking And Factual Data Can Restore Your Sanity

Assuming that Buzzfeed, Gawker, Upworthy, Alternet, MSNBC, and a host of other far-left media outlets are the only places where you get your news and opinion, they are unfortunately drilling your brains with non-stop lies and general SJW cry-me-a-river nonsense.

Expanding your reading and viewing horizons (LewRockwell.com, Return Of Kings, Zero Hedge, Prager University, Liberty Pen, Taki's Magazine, Paul Joseph Watson, etc.) will set you on the path to discovering the real truth about what is going on in the world.

Among other things, these portals will address and debunk such controversial make-believe issues like the "gender wage gap" and "rape culture". If you uncover the raw intelligence, the truth shall set you free.

4. Cut All Association With Active SJW's

Similar to how completely severing contact with your ex-girlfriend is a major part of moving on from a broken relationship, it is absolutely imperative that you do the same with your former SJW brethren.

For instance, if you are in the process of recovering from chemotherapy because of your SJD (social justice disease), you must staunchly confront any active SJW's who wish to turn you back to your old ways.

Be strong, be firm, be confident, and be really, really, in your face with your powerfully negative response.

5. Surround Yourself With Positive Support

Form stronger bonds with your (remaining) friends who do not possess any SJW habits and personalities, and express gratitude for those who will support and comfort you on the road to recovery. Make sure your visitors are calm and caring individuals who will not say anything which could "trigger" a relapse of overly emotional SJW butthurt.

6. Clean Up Your Language And Your Attitude

SJW's are notorious for regurgitating R-rated sludge from both their mouths and their typing fingers at an alarming frequency. In order to successfully assimilate with civil society, you are going to have to tone down your love affair with profanity by at least 90%, and stop acting like a hot pepper has been perpetually lodged where the sun don't shine.

This is absolutely vital if you ever intend on obtaining (or holding down) a real job. Because unfortunately, being an "activist" or a "community organizer" won't pay your rent, let alone your gas bill.

7. Get Out Of Major 'Social Justice' Cities

Canadian ex-SJW's need to get out of Toronto yesterday, and relocating out of Montreal and Vancouver are highly recommended as well. As for Australians, taking an extended break from SJW strongholds Sydney and Melbourne definitely wouldn't hurt your recovery efforts.

Thankfully, U.S. citizens have plenty of places to go. The southern states in particular (minus Austin, Texas and Asheville, North Carolina) are probably among the best areas in the western world where you can avoid excessive social justice mentalities and not have to sacrifice by living among extreme weather variations and/or economically destitute regions (Eastern Europe, etc).

However, you must avoid the San Francisco bay area at all costs. The U.S. capital of degenerate lifestyles, attitudes, fashion statements, and virtue signaling tech companies is where you need to pack up and depart. And I mean now.

8. Make A Searching And Fearless Moral Inventory Of Yourself

It helps to rationally and philosophically address your past motives and behaviors as part of your recovery process. Here are several great questions which reforming SJW's should ask themselves, and they are encouraged to answer many more.

"Why can I not accept that people can have dissenting opinions on gay marriage or other social issues, and why do I feel they must be severely ridiculed, ostracized, or even removed from their chief source of income as punishment?"

"Why do I specifically lament white males so much, even though wartime atrocities, slavery, environmental destruction, and other forms of oppression have been committed by all races and ethnic groups over the course of history?"

"Why am I such a party-pooper who has to ruin any kind of event which does not meet our tyrannical leftist demands?"

9. Make A List Of All Persons You Have Harmed, And Be Willing To Make Amends With Them

It is important to recognize that your past as an SJW has undoubtedly made other people suffer as a result of your actions and transgressions. Making a list of the people you have harmed will serve as a solemn reminder that you do not wish to return to that destructive manner of living.

No list is created equal (like most things in life as you will also learn), but a common example of an SJW shit list goes a little something like this.

- Straight White Male A
- Straight White Male B
- Straight White Male C
- Straight White Male D
- Straight White Male E

SJW's love white male tears. Any minute now…

10. Make Direct Amends To Such People Wherever Possible

If both proximity and time are no major hurdles, set up an in-person meeting with your past (presumably straight white male) adversaries and kindly apologize to them. Put particular emphasis on seeking out those you have doxed in the past, and thus potentially rendered destitute and unemployable for the "crime" of having a dissenting opinion to progressive dogma.

Imagine his surprise, when he thinks he's about to yet again have his ass chewed for being a heterosexual Caucasian male residing in an overly-feminist western country, and he's actually set to receive a long overdue apology!

11. Accept That The World Is Not Fair

You are almost there, but there are many bitter red pills that you are going to have to swallow before carrying on with life. For instance, there is always going to be poverty. There is always going to be income inequality. The man who studied electrical engineering is almost always going to have greater earning potential than the feminist who took women's studies etc.

Additionally, you must accept that western countries cannot continue to act as 'moral superpowers' and be overwhelmed with "refugees" (economic migrants) from non-assimilating cultures without disastrous consequences for the long-term health of western civilization. Mindless egalitarianism will ultimately destroy your nation and your neighborhood. Maybe even your relationship (via cuckoldry).

12. Join The Fight Against SJW's And Cultural Marxism

Embrace all the good things that feminists and SJW's hate, like masculinity, logic, free speech, Austrian economics, capitalism, game, sharp clothes, tattoo-free skin, natural hair colors, clean language, the gym, making white men and their ancestors feel appreciated for a change (for all the amazing infrastructure, medicine, technology, stable and prosperous countries, ending slavery etc), harmonious male-female relationships, and traditional two-parent homes among other things.

Try and bring others over to the light if you can, but unfortunately a great deal of SJW's are going to continue to support false narrative movements like "Black Lives Matter" no matter how much you try to cram logic, factual data, and reason into their skulls. Leave them be, but keep an eye on them and always stay at least one step ahead of the curve.

Is Bedding And Keeping Virgins The Key To Successful Relationships With Women?

May 31, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Dating a virgin of legal age may give the best opportunities for securing long-term, satisfying relationships. Many, many men, and certainly not just those familiar with Return Of Kings, deplore the state of modern, slutty "femininity." But what are you doing to both avoid the emotionally and/or physically diseased female population and find the better women? This is the question you need to be asking yourself every day you seek, spend time, or cultivate a connection with women you might bed.

Regardless of whether you've already bedded zero virgins or twenty, you should still be chasing them, if you have not already taken one as a girlfriend, fiancé or wife.
Your priority should be to find a woman who has either had no sexual partners or very few. This can be a relative thing, depending on the woman's age (four partners for a 25-year-old is most often better than three for a 20-year-old).

What my relationships with virgins have taught me

Though it has been easier to find regular sexual relationships with girls who have had a few sexual partners, these relationships often lasting years, my longest serious romantic relationships have been with virgins or near-virgins.

These women shared three characteristics:

1. They paid for their share of things. They knew I had traveled and still traveled extensively. They knew I had a penchant for jetting off somewhere for months at a time, eating out at restaurants (I deplore cooking), and new clothes, all of which pointed to the ability to pay for them (the girls) as well. All this said, they did not even try to manipulate the situation in their favor. Of course, I would have dumped them if they had, but the fact they did not is a trait too rare found in today's women.

2. In many cases they put themselves into debt or sacrificed very heavily to do things with me. If we planned a trip, whether in Europe, Australia or elsewhere, I made it clear I would pay only half. Anything lent to them would have to paid back with inflation. The same went for any living arrangements we had. There was one exception to this, where I offered to pay two-thirds for my girlfriend at the time when she was working as a shop assistant (I consider it a mistake that I did this, but the one third was still a lot harder for her to get than the two-thirds was for me). With these girls, I was always paid back, even if we had broken up before all the funds were returned.

3. They went out of their way to help me, in the way men should be able to expect. Lunches were made when necessary, dinners were prepared, and they performed serendipitous acts like gift-giving, other surprises, and generally helping me day-to-day. Everything in life is transactional, remember, but the best things feel the least transactional. This was the case, in large part, with these girls.

The general profile of virgins in contemporary times

The virgins you seek are more likely to be:

- Younger, in their mid to late teens and early twenties. Attractive girls can certainly be older virgins, but your prospects greatly diminish after 22 and even 20. You may as well presume any decent-looking girl who has already hit 18 is not a virgin. You will be right most of the time.
- Religious or previously impacted on by a religious code or religious-style morality. Do not be put off by this if you are not a religious person yourself. Plenty of girls have abandoned the formality of religious practice whilst not deciding to whore themselves out to the world. Lapsed or ex-Mormons I have known from Brigham Young University in Hawaii are an excellent example of these girls. After leaving their church days behind them, they were somewhat “slow” in moving onto sex.
- Politically conservative or nationalist. Again, do not count on this. It should be tattooed on your brain that women vote leftwing in greater proportions than men.

It is up to you to locate the places where these women are more likely to be. More factors can be at play, either hindering or enhancing your search for virgins or near-virgins. If you live in a university city, your options will be better. If you live in an oil rig town, they will be harder. Be aware of and act with an appreciation of your social environment, but do not be controled by it.

Act before time runs out

You only have a limited amount of time on Earth. As you get older, unless you have somehow accumulated the fame, body or material resources that will attract the quite young and other women more likely to be virgins, your window for finding a purer girl to marry, mix your seed, and have children with will diminish.

So act now. A regressive modern culture will not permit you as many good women to choose from as you would like, so it is your responsibility to find them in a very competitive sexual marketplace. And find them you must, as before too long either other men will have them or they will not be worth your desire once they become whores.

3 Reasons Why You Should Not Date Older Women

June 1, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

For the past decade, the mainstream media has been pushing older women (defined here as 35 and up) as "the new sexy," to the point where it's become cultural white noise. Not a week goes by without a listicle or stinkpiece extolling the virtues of older women, whether they're trying to shame thirty- and forty-something men into dating women "their own age" or selling younger men on "cougars," those mythological maneaters that don't exist outside of MILF porn. And each article cites the same reasons why these women are hot:

- "They're confident."
- "They pay their own way."
- "They know what they want."

By sheer accident, I've spent a good portion of the past few years involved with women in their late thirties/early forties. If you're in your twenties, getting entangled with a woman more than a decade older than you is a disastrous move. While they can be fun in the sack (as my friend the Bechtloff is fond of stating), trying to forge a deeper relationship with one will end in misery for you.

While it's tempting to point out the obvious ("LOL old women have wrinkles and their boobies sag!"), the girls I talk about in this article were in shape and cute for their age; their problems go far beyond gravity and aging. Here's why getting involved with women 35 and up is a bad idea…

1. They're mentally ill

Despite the twin specters of cultural Marxism and technology-induced social retardation ruining Western society, most girls still manage to pair up by their early thirties. Given how severely the modern sexual marketplace favors women, any girl who isn't married or in a long-term relationship (7+ years) by the time she's 40 is damaged goods. Her mental issues are so deep and intractable that even with an international epidemic of male thirst, she can't get any man to take a sip. Given that women are generally more enthusiastic about marriage and relationships than men, a girl who can't achieve either is irreversibly broken.

For example, a long time ago, I was involved with a girl in her late thirties I'll refer to as J. A fan of my work, she invited me to meet her and her boyfriend one day when I was passing through their area. After taking me out drinking, she forced herself on me while "the love of [her] life" was sleeping ten feet away, then when I confronted her about it months later, she confessed to having a "crush" on me and claimed she had blacked out that night. After J.'s boyfriend dumped her for a woman in her twenties, she began smearing him online as a "pedophile," leaving out the fact that she'd repeatedly cheated on him with a man in his twenties (me).

In addition to her infidelity, J. was a severe alcoholic: near the end of our relationship, she was relapsing at the rate of once a month. Whenever she was starved for attention, she would go on multi-day benders in which she refused to shave, shower or eat, demanding I drop everything and come over to make sure she was alright. During one episode, she begged me to come over with "a 24-pack of beer" and "some thick fuckin' condoms," berating me at the door for not bringing another girl so we could have a threesome. Another time, she got so drunk that she forgot she was on her period and ended up menstruating all over her bedsheets.

2. They're incredibly insecure

Let's just explode this lie right here, right now. The you-go-grrl fantasy of "cougars" who chase younger men and don't care what anyone thinks of them is just that: a fantasy. Most single women over 35 are miserable wretches who want nothing more than a husband and kids, constantly screwing up due to their mental disorders and poor life choices. Their loneliness and personality defects make them ludicrously easy to manipulate, to the point where men in third-world countries can make a living fleecing them.

Moreover, while feminists may deny that women become less attractive as they age, deep down, every girl knows the truth. As a man in your twenties, you have more (and better) options than any woman over 35, and she knows this. Contrary to Benjamin Franklin's claim that old women are "grateful" for attention from young men, any older woman you bang will eventually grow to resent you for dating down. It's the same reason why fat girls are meaner than skinny girls; they know they're ugly and assume that men who pursue them are doing so out of pity.

For example, a while back, I met a single mother reader of mine in Pittsburgh I'll refer to as W. She was nearing 40 and had a pretty face and decent body, though she could stand to lose 20 pounds. While she was incredibly grabby at the bar—constantly touching me on the arm and rubbing my shoulders—when she took me back to her place, she screamed when I tried to turn the lights on in her bedroom. Turns out she needed the darkness to hide her stretch marks, which were so bad they made her stomach look like it had been carved up with a panga.

In another incident, J. went ballistic on me when I tried to wheedle a nude selfie out of her, claiming she was "revolting" naked because of her flat chest and "horrifying" face, accusing me of trying to entrap her in a legal scheme. Another time, she invited me over to her place to do cocaine, and an hour after I got there, she was simultaneously begging me to have sex with her (a running theme in our relationship) while claiming I needed to stay away from her because she was too old, ugly and crazy for me, exclaiming, “You can do so much better than me.”

3. They’re immature

I forgot who it was that said “women don’t grow up, they just grow old,” but it’s the absolute truth. As young men, we’re inclined to think that our elders are wiser than us, having learned from the trials and tribulations life has put them through. The truth is that few women mentally mature past high school. If you become involved with an older women, she’ll act just as childishly as girls your age, only she’s not as good-looking as girls your age… making her behavior inexcusable.

While female immaturity is in part enabled by white knights and thirsty simps, a significant part of it is physiological. In his essay “On Women,” Arthur Schopenhauer pointed out that women reach the peak of their maturity at age 18. My friend Davis Aurini has pointed out that girls don’t reach full maturity until they give birth; women who don’t have children will remain children themselves no matter how old they get. It’s no surprise that men who have the option to date younger girls almost always do so: they’re just as mature as women their own age, but they’re hotter naked.

A couple of months back, I scored an OkCupid date with a 37-year old girl I’ll call T. She was part Argentine, stood about six feet tall, worked as a librarian and exuded a sexual desperation endemic to single women of a certain age. After we got liquored up at a bar near my apartment, I brought her back to my place to seal the deal. As we were making out on my bed, she suddenly pushed me off her.

“What is that?” she cried.

“What’s what?” I had no clue what she was talking about.

T. jumped off the bed and stormed over to my coffee table, snatching up the “Trump: Make America Great Again” sign I’d stashed on top of a pile with all the other tchotchkes I’d scored while on the campaign trail.

“Did you actually vote for Donald Trump?” she interrogated me, a vein rising in her forehead.

“Yeah,” I said nonchalantly.

“Omigod, omigod, what is wrong with you?” she hollered. “He’s a fucking racist!”

“He is not a racist,” I argued, too drunk to come up with better retorts.

The argument degenerated from there, as T. hyperventilated about my hidden bigotry and I tried to reassure her that no, I don’t moonlight as a KKK Grand Wizard. At one point, she actually screamed, “OH MY GOD, I ALMOST FUCKED A WHITE SUPREMACIST!” After about ten minutes of pointless back and forth, she put her coat back on and stormed out. I suppose I should be glad that she didn’t Google my name.

J. is another fine example of female immaturity: she’s incapable of accepting any responsibility for her actions. When I confronted her for seducing me and cheating on her boyfriend, she tried to excuse her unfaithfulness by claiming that he refused to have sex with her. She also had the audacity to claim that I “ruined [her] life” by confronting her, saying that she was “traumatiz[ed]” by me being angry at her using me for her own gratification.

While women over 35 do have some things to recommend them—namely, they tend to be easy to lay, good in bed, and are eager to please you in the hopes that you’ll stick around—committing to one is a bad idea. While it’s possible for people to change, by the time someone hits their thirties, their personality is pretty much set in stone. Any woman who is perpetually single past a certain age is bad news for any man who tries to court her.

How To Properly Fire A Gun

June 1, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Now that we know a little about gun sights and how to use them, we should discuss the rest of the steps of firing a shot and what your resulting group on paper will tell you. Combined with the first article on sight picture, and a planned article on sight adjustment, this will explain the fundamentals of shooting accurately at close distances. This, in turn, will lead to discussion of shooting positions, and, ultimately, ballistics.

Respiration and its effects on accuracy

One of the more important things to understand about accurate shooting, whether it be pistols or rifles, is that you cannot hold sights on target continuously. Two things prevent you from doing that, and those are that your muscles get tired, and your breathing will mess you up.

I teach rifle shooting as one of my hobbies, and, paradoxically, it is often the young guys, in shape, who also think they know how to shoot, that end up getting out shot by their less physically strong and less experienced wives, girlfriends, or kids. The dudes try to muscle the rifle onto the target, instead of using something commonly called natural point of aim, which abbreviates to NPOA.

Although the discussion is incomplete without explaining shooting positions in depth, the idea behind NPOA is, when you are in a shooting position (prone, seated, or standing), the rifle will point somewhere naturally. This is most easily seen if you shoulder a rifle, and close your eyes. Breathe a couple times, then open them, and notice that the rifle is NOT where you left it on the target.

Establishing NPOA

The novice will quickly move the rifle with his arms where it needs to go, and wonder why his groups are inconsistent. This is because muscle control is not precise, especially over time as you get tired. The trick is to not move your arms, but to move your body. It is best explained by a question posed to a WWII fighter pilot of “how do you aim the guns?” by a young boy. The answer: “You don’t aim the guns; you aim the plane.” The rifle and your body is a unit, move them together to stay reliably on target.

The second concept is breathing. Every marksmanship coach has their thing; the programs I teach come from the old Army shooting courses, which is now only done by the Marine Corps. The key concept here is repeatability. You can’t hold your breath, low oxygen will ruin your shooting, and the act of breathing will move your sights as your diaphragm moves. You want to fire at the end of a breath. Breath normally, exhale normally and completely, and squeeze the trigger at the end of the exhalation, during that 3 to 5 second window before you need to breathe again.

This is called “Rifleman’s Cadence” and is what “rapid fire” actually is. Once you have your position and NPOA dialed in, you should be able to fire one accurate shot (later, more) per breath, on a target, at any range, and continue until you run out of ammo, or need to switch targets.

Focus

Riflery is a Zen sport. You lie on the ground, control your breathing, and get into the zone where it's just you, your weapon, and your target. You must have two kinds of focus here, with the first being mental. Don't worry about other things, concentrate on good shooting.

Even if Massad Ayoob himself uncorks a compact .44 in the lane next to you, focus on YOUR shooting.

The second focus is visual. If you are shooting an iron sighted rifle, you need to focus your eye on the front sight. Not the back sight, and not the target. The back sight exists to frame the front sight, and the target is there, and you can't move it. The only thing you can move is the front sight, and that is what you should focus your eyes upon.

The target is blurry, the rear sight is blurry, but the front sight is in focus. This works for pistols and rifles.

Scopes are both harder and easier. Sometimes, you can focus on both the crosshair and the target, but you need to prioritize the crosshair. Often, you can see your bullet holes, and you can over exaggerate your sight movement at high power, so your target shooting should be done at lowest power on a scope so you don't chase your bullet holes of previous shots, or get overly concerned with the sights movement and "fuss the shot."

Trigger control

Most people, misinformed by Hollywood, think that you yank the trigger and it will result in an accurate shot. There are only two times I can think of to punch a trigger, with the first being wing shooting (clay pigeons and skeet and dove hunting, etc) which is a totally different style of shooting, and the second being close range shooting where you are under a time crunch to send lead down range, and a little bit of disruption to your aim by punching the trigger can be afforded. However, many excellent shooters can shoot very fast with good trigger control.

Triggers are a mixed bag, and most stock triggers on budget rifles are bad, but that shouldn't stop anyone from shooting poorly when they know what they are doing. There are a few terms we should know about triggers. Take-up is the slack in the trigger from its at-rest position until you feel decent resistance.

If it's a one stage trigger, that resistance after the take-up will "break" at a certain force (usually measured in pounds over here, kilograms elsewhere), and the sear will be released and the hammer or striker will actuate. If it's a two stage trigger, there will be a lighter force first section, and a stronger second section before the trigger breaks. I tend to think single stage triggers are more for match shooting, and two stage triggers are more for duty/combat work.

Overtravel is when a trigger breaks, but keeps going past that spot, and it can be adjusted out with stop screws and internal work. Sear reset is when you release the trigger after the shot, and the sear resets itself to shoot again. (Full auto guns work differently in that area.) Creep is when you put the amount of force needed to break the trigger on it, but it moves further before breaking, instead of breaking "like a glass rod." Lastly, roughness in the mechanism is often compared to being gritty.

When firing, you want to press the trigger through its take-up before you fire, and apply some force (either enough to get to the second stage or not enough to break the first stage if it's a single stage) and keep it there. As you cycle your breath, and the sights come back on the target, apply the last amount of force and break the shot.

Once the shot goes off, you must do two things. Firstly, you must follow through. A golfer does not stop his swing after he hits the ball, he goes all the way. You should not reflexively let go of the trigger, either, for two reasons. The first is that it can actually disrupt your aim, even though the bullet is mostly gone down the barrel, and the second is that you do not need to fully release the trigger to shoot again. If you hold the trigger down after a shot, and release it slowly, the gun will make a click when you reset the sear, and that's all you need to do. This saves you time on the next shots.

The second thing you must do is call your shot. You must know where the sights are when the shot goes off, and you must be able to call fliers, which are off target shots due to bad aim. If you know you threw a flier out of a group of five, and know it went high left, when you go down to the target, you know to discount the one high and left, knowing that it's not the gun that did that.

Shot group analysis

In the first article, we covered sight alignment and sight picture. We just discussed breathing, focus, firing the shot, and follow through. Doing this properly, with a good position and sling use (look for these in future articles), will result in good groups.

A group is your collection of holes from the amount of rounds you fired into the target. These should be shot in a string in cadence, and are usually five shots. What we are going to concentrate on now is the shape of group, and not where it is on the target. The size and shape of the group is on you, the shooter. Where the group is on the target is on the rifle, and you fix that by sight adjustment, which will be the next article in this three part series, but the takeaway point here is that you must fix your shooting before you fix the sights, otherwise you won't know how to fix them.

I will cover the most common group errors I see on firing lines.

Wide open group: This group has rounds all over the place, and it means that the shooter does not have a solid shooting position, or does not have NPOA established.

Vertical stringing: These rounds are in a line up and down, and show that the shooter is not shooting at a consistent point in his breathing cycle.

Horizontal stringing: These rounds are in a line left and right, and indicate bad trigger control.

Diagonal stringing: Bad breathing, and either also bad trigger control, or poor position with the support elbow not under the rifle.

Two groups: This shows that the shooter changed something mid string of fire, and, since you can't tell which is which, you need to eliminate the change before further addressing the problem.

Note that these groups can be wherever on the target, and, if they are off target, as well as having a shape problem, it means there is a human problem AND a sights problem.

Conclusion

Although I will attempt to break up the monotony of the shooting tutorials here soon, since these are admittedly getting a little dry, with something like "Idiots Seen In The Gun Store," like the efforts of my colleague Br. Moner, I am trying to get someplace and stick an 8 hour class into a series of articles.

I do agree with one of the comments in the previous article in particular that Ed said. "Don't learn to shoot from a webpage." Although I'd happily take anyone here shooting if I could, and I would feel completely competent keeping you safe and teaching good habits and skill on a range in person, the internet, even with videos, leaves a lot to be desired. My intention is to awaken your awareness of the shooting discipline so that you will seek out competent instruction of your own and that my words might help you to discern good instruction from bad and know which areas of the sport, if any, you might be interested in pursuing. Be safe.

Brexit Vote: Why Britain Should Leave The European Union

June 1, 2016 | by Bernard Rieux | Link | Original Link

Let's provide a little bit of background to those that may be unfamiliar with the situation. On Thursday, June 23, 2016, a referendum known as Brexit will be held to determine whether or not Britain will remain in the European Union.

As for its origins, the EU is an economic and political "agreement" between 28 European countries that was conceived after World War II amidst the destruction and financial devastation that ensued during the post-war years. The idea at the time was to encourage trade among the various member states and discourage going to war with one another given the economic benefits that would result. This logic likewise led to the idea of "free circulation" where goods and people could freely move around without borders while also eliminating the need for visas.

During the 2015 general elections, Prime Minister David Cameron ran under the campaign promise that he would hold a referendum to allow the British people to voice their opinion. This was a result of an ever increasing amount of calls from conservatives to give the country an opportunity to formally weigh in, since the British people have not had a say on the matter since 1975.

Over 40 years have gone by since the last referendum was held, so it's within reason to assume that the political, social, and economic landscape of Britain has changed somewhat in the last four decades. Although one could pay credence to the notion of establishing the EU in the context of a post World War society, it simply does not benefit

Britain to stay in for a number of reasons.

Let's analyze some of the erroneous arguments that are often spouted from the pro-EU side.

This Won't Be The First Time A Country Has Left

The exit is this way. Let me show you…

"This has never happened before! It could lead to chaos!"

False. This is probably one of the weakest arguments because it just reverts to a "doomsday" scenario instead of arguing with facts. In actuality, Greenland held a referendum in 1982 and voted 52% to 48% in favor of leaving the EU. After going through the process of exit negotiations, Greenlanders were able to take control of their country's history and say NO.

A large portion of Greenland's population relies on the fishing industry for their livelihood. They resented being told by Brussels what they had to do and exactly how much fish they were allowed to take out of their waters. Furthermore, Greenland's fishing industry improved after its exit according to industry figures.

Britain Will See Job Growth And Savings Of Considerable Money

"Jobs will be lost, and the economy will be damaged!"

False. More than 300 of the country's biggest business leaders and executives published a letter to the Telegraph last week stating that Brussels' red tape stifles growth and undermines economic growth. Additionally, they stated that Brexit would enable them to create more jobs.

Lord Farmer, the former head of the Conservative party, lambasted the globalist fear-mongering: "Warnings of disaster if we leave are misguided. Britain, the world's fifth-biggest economy, should be confident that others will want to trade freely with it especially if, like the EU, they already do so. Europe has a surplus of nearly £70bn with us and no reason to put up barriers."

A responsible British citizen taking out the trash.

Another area where Britain would see immediate economic savings relates to EU membership fees. That's right. You didn't think they called it a "club" just for fun, did you? Britain is one of 10 member states who pays more into the EU budget then they get out of it. Britain currently sends a whopping £350m, the equivalent of 50% of England's school budget, to Brussels on a weekly basis. That money can easily be put back into the British economy by reinvesting the funds in different industry sectors to stimulate growth and create jobs.

In the long-term, Britain would save billions of pounds in imposed membership fees that are most likely squandered in other areas of the superstate that is fed by the insatiable appetite of the Brussels bureaucratic machine. Some think tanks have even posited that Britain's GDP could rise by 1.6% in 2030 under the assumption that the UK renegotiates good trade deals with the US, the EU, China, and other major economic powers.

What should come to no surprise to the reader is that the same Telegraph article mentioned above discusses how hundreds of thousands of pounds from foreign companies and America's biggest banks—such as Citigroup, Goldman Sachs, and Morgan Stanley—were donated to the Remain campaign. Globalists sure love to take care of each other, don't they?

Stronger Borders And Immigration Regulation

"The EU border policies don't really affect the UK, since it's not part of Schengen!"

False. EU law stipulates that Britain must allow EU citizens from other member states to live in the country. As we have unfortunately witnessed over the past few months following the tragic events in Paris and Brussels, the lack of strong border controls within the Eurozone has led to radicalized terrorists easily sliding their way back into the continent after receiving training in Syria.

Although the UK technically isn't part of the Schengen Agreement, which allows for passport free movement in the EU bloc, the other 26 states that do belong are responsible for vetting those who enter in from non-EU countries. Are we naive enough to believe that every single one of those countries is doing a thorough job at gathering intelligence?

The fact that terrorists Abdeslam and Abaaoud were able to slip back into Belgium the same night of the Paris attacks is proof enough that the EU borders are porous at the very least and flimsy at the very best. The herculean task of keeping tabs on 400 million people throughout a 1.6 million square mile area across these 26 countries has shown to be unreliable. Free movement on such a massive scale simply cannot be controlled effectively. Keep this in mind: one illegal-border hopping into the EU would not in any way prevent someone from illegally continuing to cross into numerous other states without detection.

Not the postcard anyone ever imagines from Paris.

Amidst the continuing migrant debacle, the European Commission has also become more brazen and blatantly hostile with its demands. This tends to be typical of tyrannical rulers realizing that they are losing their grips on power. For example, the EC unveiled plans in May to impose a draconian penalty of €250,000 per rejected migrant that countries refuse to take in. That's a pretty convenient "deal" if your long-term plan is to flood the European market with tens of millions of refugees that will drastically push down wages in the labor market.

Another laughable move recently came from the European Court of Justice, as it deemed that foreign criminals could avoid being deported from the UK if they were to be placed in overcrowded prisons back home, which would be a "violation of their human rights." Instead of having these criminals sent back to serve their sentence in their countries of origins, the British tax payer will now have to foot the bill to ensure these thugs are catered to in a cushier penitentiary system.

Let's also not forget that the European Commission is currently in the process of striking a deal with Turkey to allow for visa-free travel within the EU under the condition that the latter sharply cut the flow of illegal migrants into Greece. Even though the negotiations are at a stalemate over Turkey's refusal to amend its anti-terror laws, I do believe that Britons should be asking themselves the following question: would it really be in your country's best interest to remain in the EU pending the very real possibility that a country of 75 million people that borders war torn Syria and Iraq, along with sporadic territory under control of the Islamic State, be granted visa-free travel?

Britons are waking up to who's really calling the shots.

Conclusion

Brexit is the wake-up call that the rest of the Europe desperately needs. There's a very real reason that far-right parties are surging all across the continent: people are fed up with pro-globalist economic and migratory policies that do not benefit them or their families. Furthermore, the working class is sick and tired of the political elite dictating and shoving policy down their throat from Brussels. Have a look at how Britons took Obama's last visit to the UK when he sternly urged them to stay in the EU:

That little pep talk went over really well, didn't it?

Roughly a month away from the Brexit referendum, the writing is on the wall. A vote for Brexit is a vote for nationalism and sovereignty. Perhaps even more importantly, a vote for the UK exiting the Euro zone would be the spark of confidence in nationalism that will serve as a model to fellow Europeans who are grappling with a migratory invasion of epic proportions, porous border security, and a crippled economy beset by sluggish wage growth.

Choose The Cover For My New Book Free Speech Isn't Free

June 1, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm planning to release my new book Free Speech Isn't Free on June 13. It will be about the efforts to shut down my lectures in Canada last year and the meetup outrage that happened this February. The book is over 200 pages long and includes some bonus transcripts and materials.

The text is complete and all that's left is deciding on a cover. After doing a design contest, I've narrowed it down to three finalists. Here they are:

Click here to vote on your favorite. Since all three covers are quite good, I'm inclined to pick the one that gets the most votes. It’s in your hands!

David French’s Candidacy For President Shows That Cuckservatives Can’t Stop Donald Trump

June 2, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

While polling has shown that the majority of Republicans have fallen in line behind Donald Trump now that he’s secured the presidential election, the shrinking #NeverTrump contingent continues to bark and woof on Twitter. Chief among the recalcitrant is notorious neocon and Weekly Standard founder and editor Bill Kristol, who announced earlier this week that National Review contributor David French would be the presidential nominee of his new third party, the Renegade Party.

French’s selection was roundly mocked by both leftists and conservatives, with his relative obscurity, creepily protective relationship with his wife and fondness for multiracial adoption singled out for scorn. The fact that Kristol was unable to convince any well-known anti-Trump Republican politicians—such as 2012 failed candidate Mitt Romney or Ben Sasse—to join his party shows the weakness of the #NeverTrump movement. Nobody wants to sacrifice their political career for a long-shot candidacy that, at most, would deliver the White House to Hillary Clinton.

The very branding of Kristol’s party is an absolute disaster: beyond the questionable implications of the word “renegade,” the name suggests an out-of-touch old man trying to be hip. For the past year, cuckservatives have desperately tried to reverse-engineer Trump’s popularity among young people and use it for their own ends; for example, Marco Rubio began insulting Trump in the final weeks of his campaign, thinking that the reason people like Trump is because he insults his opponents constantly. It’s because of this that the Renegade Party is doomed to failure.

Who Is David French?

To his credit, David French has a few merits to his character that put him a cut above the average cuckservative. For example, he's a military veteran who served a tour in Iraq, a stark contrast to other neocons who agitate for war despite having either weaseled their way out of the draft or never volunteered to begin with. He also (presumably) has a good relationship with his wife, which will appeal to the dried-out evangelicucks salty over Trump's supermodel wife.

However, French is far too much of a cuck to make an impact in the American political landscape. During the lead-up to the Republican primaries, he was a loud-and-proud member of the Church Lady brigade, fainting on the couch every time his delicate ears heard the word "cuckservative." Like many cucks, he also has an unhealthy fixation on multiracial adoption, having adopted a black baby in a desperate attempt to avoid being called racist. French and his ilk lack the backbone to make an impression on voters.

A good historical comparison to French and the Renegade Party would be the independent candidacy of John Anderson in 1980. An obscure 10-term Republican congressman from Illinois, Anderson ran for president as an independent with the backing of portions of the GOP establishment who found Ronald Reagan unpalatable due to his "extreme" views. While he initially did well in the polls, Anderson's numbers slid as Election Day approached and Republicans united behind Reagan. In the end, he only won 6.6 percent of the vote, concentrated in left-leaning states like New York that might otherwise have been won by Jimmy Carter.

Similarly, Kristol and French have massively overestimated the Republican and conservative angst against Trump. With the exception of a few talking heads and some intransigent members of the Cruz cult, most GOP members have united behind their presumptive nominee. The fact that the Renegade Party has only gotten about 5,000 followers on Twitter in a month shows this. We are in a realigning election, where political certainties of past decades are being rewritten, and the success of Trump's candidacy shows this.

#NeverTrump Means #AlwaysHillary

We saw another third-party cuckservative failure over the weekend when the dumpster fire known as the Libertarian Party nominated has-been GOP flacks Gary Johnson and William Weld as their presidential ticket. Ever since Trump clinched the Republican nomination last month, cucks had been threatening to vote Libertarian because they view him as insufficiently conservative, oblivious to the fact that libertarians are not conservative by definition (due to their support for social liberalism and opposition to the foreign wars that cuckservatives love).

Ever since Ron Paul left the national stage four years ago, libertarianism has been progressively taken over by leftist attention whores such as Julie Borowski and Cathy Reisenwitz, who've subverted it into another outpost of social justice. Similarly, the Libertarian Party has become a coffee klatch for failed Republicans like Johnson and 2008 presidential nominee Bob Barr, who received fewer votes than also-run Ralph Nader despite being hyped up as the Libertarians' strongest candidate to date.

Gary Johnson's strategy for fighting Donald Trump is to call him "racist," because that line of attack has worked so well in the past. Choosing William Weld—the former governor of that bastion of liberty and small-government conservatism known as Massachusetts—as his running mate has also alienated traditional supporters of the Libertarian Party. I anticipate the Johnson/Weld ticket will massively underperform in the general election.

The simple reality is that Donald Trump is the new face of the Republican Party. The Israel-obsessed, warmongering, corporate tax cut wing of the GOP had their time in the sun, and all they've done is give us eight years of Barack Obama. The future of the GOP is protectionist and nationalist. Anyone who doesn't climb aboard the Trump Train will get crushed beneath its wheels.

Australian Senator Gets Attacked By The Media For Merely Tweeting One Of Roosh's Articles

June 2, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Conservative Australian Senator Cory Bernardi, who represents the state of South Australia, is currently being lambasted by SJWs and others for prominently sharing an article on SJWs by Roosh. The writing Bernardi linked to ("What Is A Social Justice Warrior (SJW)?") has become a staple for disillusioned men wanting to understand why the political and social climate of Western society is at all time lows for stupidity and cultural regression.

Modern support for everything from "rape conviction by accusation" to gender-fluid bathrooms can be explained by the social justice warrior "creed." By helping to disseminate Roosh's piece, Senator Bernardi exposed the tactics, strategies and all-round twisted thinking of SJWs to a much broader audience. The rage with which the SJW crowd has responded is a testament to their underlying hatred of free speech and constructive, reasoned argument. Plus, in trying to strangle Bernardi in their attacks, SJWs are proving exactly what Roosh said about their intrinsically unbalanced, precious temperament and commitment to ad hominem assaults.

In addition to serving as a poor excuse for bringing down Bernardi, the sharing of Roosh's article by a prominent and frequently attacked politician gives SJWs another opportunity to falsely, maliciously, and libelously accuse Roosh of rape or being pro-rape over a different satirical article. The furor that erupted after the planned Return Of Kings global meet-ups could not have continued indefinitely. Members of the public, already being unabashedly misled, would have become bored and started to question the narrative they were swallowing without question. One can therefore imagine the glee with which so many pro-SJW "journalists" took up the opportunity to defame Roosh again through an angry flurry of "reports" against Bernardi, whom they also hate with an unmistakeable passion.

SJWs have previously harassed and threatened Bernardi's (female) staff

How to threaten female staff working for a conservative politician.

Cory Bernardi knows firsthand how depraved SJWs are and how quickly violent they can become. As a vocal critic of Australia's program "Safe Schools," which serves as a euphemism for the semi-SJW propaganda being shoved down children's throats, Senator Bernardi found himself at the center of a furious backlash this year. The problem was, however, that the SJWs decided to try and intimidate the politician whilst he was 700 miles away in Canberra, Australia's capital city. They knew this, of course, but what better way to spread the SJW love by intimidating, harassing and threatening a bunch of female political workers, who then have to take shelter in a back room?

Remember that constructive, reasoned argument I spoke of earlier? Here is an image from Bernardi's trashed office that proves how seriously SJWs take it:

Yet the more proximate cause for Bernardi's sharing of Roosh's article was the forced cancelation of an event he was scheduled to speak at. Because Australia is facing either a parliamentary vote or plebiscite on gay marriage in the coming year or so, SJWs have stepped up on their attacks on anyway endorsing the heterosexual conception of marriage. They successfully blackmailed a hotel in Sydney to ban the speaking panel that included Senator Bernardi. There is no such thing as free speech if you disagree with SJWs.

By SJW logic, Hillary Clinton is a supporter of public beheadings and the beating and mutilation of women for hanging out with Middle Eastern despots

Woman abuser by association?

Roosh does not in any sense support rape, a false accusation militant leftists are now trying to smear Bernardi with by association. But if we take the logic being spouted by SJWs, all manner of people can be painted in particular ways. For instance, people should be a lot more concerned about the receipt of money by Bill and Hillary Clinton's foundation and what it supposedly says about their own views. By receiving millions in donations from Middle Eastern monarchs who make it their business to actually oppress women, kill gays, and target or ban religious minorities, surely this means Hillary supports what they are doing? Come on, guys, it's only logical!

If the threshold for association crimes is now so low that sharing an article, not even the satirical article Roosh was persecuted for, fits the bill, virtually every SJW or their enabler is open to being labeled as a devil worshipper.

How would you respond to being publicly maligned, defamed and threatened?

Bernardi is courageous in the face of SJW witch-hunting, but he does have the status of a politician and also the support of a wing of a major political party.

Roosh has an incontrovertible target painted on his back. When given the opportunity, SJWs will pounce. Unlike Senator Cory Bernardi, the Return Of Kings proprietor relies on his ideas alone. He cannot rely on the protection of high political office or the conservative faction of a center-right governing political party.

As Roosh's newest book will demonstrate, free speech is not free, especially when it accords with basic common sense, science, and historical experience. Times have certainly been difficult this and last year for Return Of Kings after even our readers were threatened with mass violence for desiring to meet with like-minded, decent fellow men. Notwithstanding this, Cory Bernardi's sharing of Roosh's work is a testament to the fundamental strength of our message.

Feminist Prime Minister Causes Outrage When He Accidentally Elbows “Vegas Girl” In The Chest

June 2, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Earlier this month, an altercation occurred at the House of Commons that the Canadian media did not hesitate to describe as a “mêlée”. During a session, Justin Trudeau brushed female MP Ruth Ellen Brosseau with his elbow, while trying to pull the Conservative Whip through the crowd in order to start the vote. That is it.

The Conservative Whip was trying to regain his seat, as the vote was about to take place. His way was intentionally blocked by members of the opposition (a well known maneuver to slow down the voting process when unfavourable). Premier Justin Trudeau left his seat in order to assist him. He did not see the female PM behind him and pushed her unintentionally.

The “elbowgate”

It is a scene that anyone witnesses on a daily basis in any crowded place.

But there, all hell broke loose. Cries of “misogyny,” “molestation,” and “violence against women” start to fly around. What is a feminist like Trudeau to do in this situation? That’s right: Say sorry many times.

So there goes the weakest beta boy move I have seen Trudeau do. He grovels in apologies. He stammers and sweats. He is not guilty, it is not his fault but it sure does not look like it. Adding insult to injury, he carries on apologizing while the harpies and white knights turn the blade in the wound.

How not to say sorry

He could have done things differently. Leaving the House. Denial. Scoffing. Flipping her the bird. Anything would have been better than this display of utter humiliation. It is the textbook version of how not to apologise. His apology is not accepted, the faux outrage seems real and his enemies are in a stronger position than ever.

Not only did he look fragile and helpless that day, but he kept going in a cringe-worthy display of public humiliation the next day. By god, that man has a severe lack of testicles.

By all the gods, will you stop being such a doormat!

Even that would have been better

The irony of fate

His feminist political image comes back to bite him in the arse. One cannot help but feel the irony. But although I am far from sharing Trudeau's political views and I am convinced that he is incompetent as a politician, I feel for him as a man. What good can possibly come from such an act of surrender? Let it be a cautionary tale for those who think you can reason with the terrorists of feminism.

Gomeshi and Trudeau, cannibalized by their feminist allies.

Trudeau crystallizes what is missing in today's men. A severe lack of strength, self-worth and self-respect. Men living in a bubble where they believe that touching someone with their arm by accident is a war crime. How do you expect these people to lead?

Far away are the days when Trudeau had the minerals to challenge a male MP on the ring, even if it was for charity

Who is Ruth Ellen Brosseau?

Standard “problem glasses”. Nothing out of the ordinary

Ruth Ellen Brosseau, 32, that “had to leave the House” because it was “very overwhelming.” She “could not vote because of this.”

A chubby 6 with an almost cute face but no arse, gets hit unintentionally by a skinny man that is probably lighter than her judging by her rump. She probably has rougher sex at least twice a week, and she used to work as a bartender and was probably exposed to drunk men and bar fights.

“That’s how my b-hole looks like now. Thank you, feminism!”

Was her reaction excessive when Trudeau shuffled her? Could she be crying wolf for attention or in order to destabilize her rival over a “violence bait”?

She has a familiar profile

> Two years ago, a single mom working as a bartender at Carleton’s Oliver’s Pub shocked herself and everyone else by getting elected as an MP.

Oh, Canada. You so silly. “Vegas girl,” “accidental politician,” “phantom MP”. She has been lampooned for years for her incompetence but if you dare criticize her presence in the House of Commons and her competence as a politician, you must be a cis-gender, sexist frat boy.

The question remains. Can we trust this woman or is she lying? Her lies have been exposed before, regarding her university degree for example, as she dropped out before completing it. What better way to test her integrity and seriousness than to index it on the universal indicator, her level of slutiness? As we know, sluts cannot be trusted.

Place your bets, please

Let’s see how she scores on the slutiness card, using Tuthmosis’ lists of 50 slut tells (1), (2) and her various biographical elements:

1. Has tattoos

> Fortunately for her, the national media missed all five of her tattoos, her pierced lip (…) ottawamagazine.com

2. Piercings outside of the traditional earlobe placement Yes. See above

3. Has the “slut face”

It was the House of Commons or camgirl porn

4. Cusses a lot

Watch out, Cicero! A real orator is in da house

> She resents the way the media singled her out — "I thought it was shit, real crap," she said — but accepts it.

Seven words. Two profanities. It was an official public interview between her, an MP, an a journalist that took only a few minutes. Yet she could not refrain from swearing.

5. Not ticklish She is not ticklish indeed. Except when you use your elbows. Then, boy are you in for a treat!

6. Broaches the topic of illegal drugs (even marijuana) without prompting

7. Has big tits

Yes. Even if it is mainly due to body fat.

8. Shows excessive skin for weather conditions No, but she lives in Canada. It could be risky, with all the cold and the rape culture.

9. Has extra body hair (arms, girl-sideburns, girl-mustache) and/or a low speaking voice

Yes. Deep voice.

10. Associates with confirmed sluts

> She went to Vegas with a girlfriend to create distance from the ritual her life had become

11. Shows interests in girls, has “hooked up” with girls, or claims to be “bi-sexual.” N/A

12. Is currently, or was at some point, in a sorority N/A

13. Has traveled alone, or with only girls, to fuck-fest locations (e.g., Jamaica)

Vegas. The City of Sin nonetheless. This gem:

> She went to Vegas with a girlfriend to create distance from the ritual her life had become: taking care of Logan, her beloved son, a fifth year of living back at home with her parents and working days and nights in a bar, serving drinks Playing the mum is to hard. Time for a cockfest in Vegas.

14. Was a cheerleader in high school N/A

15. Went, or goes, to a known party college (e.g., Arizona State, USC, UC Santa Barbara)

She dropped from St. Lawrence College before working as a bartender on Carleton University’s campus in Ottawa.

Carleton viewed by its students

16. Lost her virginity on the younger side (15 and down)

> The boy is 14. Ruth Ellen Brosseau is 31. Do the maths, she became a mum at 17, an age where you are still a teenager. lapresse.ca

Mum at 17. Child most likely conceived at 16. Lost her virginity before that

17. Likes tequila shots or party drugs (e.g., Extasy/MDMA)

Yes. She was a bartender. That is almost a requirement.

18. Is “friends” with DJs, promoters, or other small-time pseudo-celebs

Yes. And it will only get worse from now on.

19. Is an artist, or a wannabe “model” who has done “photo shoots.”

Now that she is an MP, getting her picture taken is all she does. Apparently, her campaign poster sample photograph was one of her selfies.

20. Broaches the topic of sex first

That is pretty much all she can bring to the table, being a single mom, you go grrrl party wench. So yeah. A man that meets her will have the prospect of a bang advertised early.

21. Has a bad relationship with her father and/or has divorced parents

Yes. Teen mom. Dropped her kid on her parents to slut it up working in bars. Left the child behind to slut it up in Vegas. How would you react as her father?

22. Describes herself as a feminist or with any of its jargon (“pansexual,” “demi-sexual,” “cis-gendered”)

“Happy Woman’s Day!” Letters read “We are feminist politicians!”

23. Has an even, nice tan that she maintains

i am suspicious of your tan

24. Hair dyed a nontraditional color (e.g., blue) N/A

25. She smokes (cigarettes)

26. Has mostly "guy friends." Yes. She always had and despite her government's effort to kick out white males from the House of Commons, the Sikhs, Muslims or Aboriginal males will still be around to have coffee break fun with.

27. Wears color contacts N/A

28. Has slutty role models like Miley Cyrus, Taylor Swift, or any of the Kardashians N/A

29. Wears hoop earrings N/A

30. Grew up with multiple brothers, especially if they're older N/A

31. Went to Catholic- or all-girls school (during or after puberty)

> But by the time R.E. got to be 16, her world was about to change. For months, she had been dating the most popular boy in school; for once, she had missed taking her pill and became pregnant with Logan.

Much better than that. Her highschool consisted in banging the popular jerkboy, then changing diapers.

32. Has a loud voice and/or a loud laugh Yes

33. Is an athlete, especially at the elite level No. Her physical shape confirms that she is not and has never been

34. Drinks manly drinks

35. Is an inveterate online attention-whore (i.e., has thousands of Facebook "friends," regularly uploads tons of sexy "selfies," includes herself in pictures of everything she "shares")

Yes. Whoring for attention is her raison d'être and explains why this whole storm in a teacup started.

36. Majored in psychology No. She did not major. She had a child out of wedlock instead.

37. Doesn't object to, or outright proposes, unprotected sex early on Yes. See previous answer and find a correlation

38. Is good at giving blow jobs She's 32. Started fucking around 16. With a career of 16 years with no husband, few years at university and a job that involves bonding with drunk people, I am pretty sure she knows how to give a decent blowie.

39. Claims to be "good at dancing" but doesn't do any formal dances (e.g., tango) N/A

40. Is a single mother. Yes. Yes. Ten times yes

Hush, hush! Daddy government will take care of you now

41. Describes herself as polyamorous, "into kink," sex-positive, or simply as being "sexual." N/A

42. Moved to New York City at some point in her life but isn't actually from there Moved to the equivalent capital city to live alone with her son while occupying a position in a male-dominated environment

43. Has fake tits or, worse, a fake ass. No. If they were, I'd ask my money back to the plastic surgeon.

44. Is a "fag-hag" (a.k.a. "fruit fly")

"Love is a hundred times stronger than hate. Well done, Google!"

Her party, The NDP

45. Is into "cosplay." N/A

46. Is on birth control, but not in a relationship

After one unwanted child, she probably takes the steps to avoid it again. Although she has proven to be irresponsible

47. Is always late to things

Yes. She was late to vote after the elbow nuclear attack and had to leave. Was also late on her menstrual cycle a couple of years back.

48. Has an oversized man-jaw or a big mouth

Hellz yeah! Manjaw!

49. Is somewhat overweight.

> Girls who dance around the 6 range—especially if it's because of their dumpy, unfit physiques—are sufficiently attractive to participate in the sexual marketplace, but not cute enough to compete with the real hotties. They'll make up the difference by being easy.

Right on the money

50. Her mother is a slut. Like mother, like daughter. N/A

Verdict: 34 out of 50

Solid results. Not the Queen of Sluts, but a prime lying slut indeed.

Feminists do not have allies, they have tools

It is simply the Michelle Fields case all over again. A plain woman in the shadows that recognizes an opportunity to be in the spotlights when she sees it, no matter the consequences or how she might destroy a man's world.

In Brosseau's own words: "I am a tough woman, I know how to stand up and deal with situations," she said. "I was just shocked … I was overwhelmed." She completely contradicts her statement. This woman should not be in a position where she can take decisions.

But people are not as stupid as the power hopes they are. The world quickly reacted to Brosseau lies.

Conclusion: If you ever apologize, do it correctly

Trudeau made one fatal mistake: play by the rules of his foes. But once in a lifetime, there is no other option but to apologise. But there is a way to do it.

Enter Trump and his feminist nemesis Kelly. He has to apologise. And he does it brilliantly. Starts at 6:08. It is all in the formula.

He does not believe a word of it. He uses the fact that he will benefit from this apology more than it would cost him. Using disbelief before that, then two words: “S’cuse me” cheeky grin.

Case closed. Tingles on overdrive. Megyn is hooked. She has never smiled like that when interacting with a man on air. You could hear the sploosh from a mile away.

Trump decided to apologize for something that he believed in and knowingly did. Trudeau was forced to apologize for something that he was not guilty of.

6 Reasons For The Planned Obsolescence Of Men

June 3, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

In my beta days, I dated a career girl in a big city. We dated for two years, it ended poorly, and played a large part in my finally swallowing the red pill. She was a 30 year old career woman, and a few weeks into the relationship she revealed she had never dated a guy for more than a couple of months. I soon concluded this was because she did not have a need for men in her life. Sure, she enjoyed the occasional attention, flirting, and possibly even enjoyed sex, but she did not NEED a man. Here are six ways that you may recognize men as becoming outdated in the modern dating and relationship marketplace.

1. They don’t need a man to be the breadwinner

The girl I mentioned had a nice career as an accountant, and was paid well enough to have her own condo in a good neighborhood overlooking many beer gardens, restaurants, and sources of entertainment for her. She was encouraged throughout high school to pursue a career in whatever field she wished, and in college was recruited by a quota-hiring firm, and likely interviewed by a feminist HR worker who quickly found a cubicle for her where she could begin filling out TPS reports.

She owned a car, a nice condo in a very desirable part of town, a trendy wardrobe, and had a generous budget for entertainment. She can (and probably will—she is approaching the wall) go the rest of her life without needing a man to provide any material things to her.

The days of a man providing a home, doing repairs, giving her food, clothing, shelter, and trinkets, are gone. A woman can graduate any public university (she attended a mediocre school) with the ability to find a career which provides her all the basic necessities. If a woman doesn't make it into corporate America, there are a variety of special government programs—tailored specifically to and only for women—which will help pay for her housing, food, childraising, and education costs.

2. They don't need a man to defend them

The West is a quite safe place, statistically speaking. A woman can go about her business, and as long as she doesn't make any glaringly stupid mistakes, like getting pass out drunk and stumbling around in a miniskirt, or hanging out in the hood after dark, she has a very low chance of any serious harm coming to her. Most crimes are petty crimes, like theft, and with today's prevalence of credit cards and digital currency, thieves can't make much money by robbing strangers, other than perhaps scoring a smartphone.

The modern woman has very little risk of any serious harm coming to her, especially as compared to the past, or to women in developing countries.

3. They don't need a man to entertain them

The level of extremity needed to attract attention about 10 years ago

In the past, being a funny or interesting guy was a huge plus. And yes, clown game can work, to an extent. Women simply are not funny, and are often miserable to talk to, and they are naturally drawn to a man who can tell them interesting, funny, or ironic things, make them smile or blush, or simply pass the time.

But today, every woman has a flat screen TV in her apartment, with hundreds of channels of digital content beamed to it electronically, with a huge variety of entertainment choices at her fingertips, 24 hours a day, not to mention carrying a computer in her purse that offers most of the same content, as well as social media, time wasting apps and games, and attention-whoring programs like Tinder, that are available to them free of charge.

While men struggle to find any program where the male character is not portrayed as a useless idiot, there are dozens of programs created specifically for feminists, not to mention trannies or gays. Also, many women's friends are also single, and they are perfectly content to go out with the girlfriends and do the same old thing every weekend, no man needed.

4. They don't need a man to build a family

Many modern women are brainwashed against raising a family. For those who do want children, sex is easily and readily available at any time of day by sliding her finger across a custom engineered and well-designed screen of scratch-resistant capacitive glass approximately one inch to the right. They can turn a hookup into a single parent family, and often can force the sperm donor to contribute tens of thousands of dollars in payments while she gets to raise this child alone. Indeed, according to Johns Hopkins, the majority of children (57%) born to millennials are bastards.

5. They don't need a man for sex

Almost every woman today has a vibrator at home, that can operate whenever, wherever, and for as long or short, at the perfect intensity, at the touch of a button. And if a woman does prefer the old fashioned regular rogering, she can obtain that through anonymous one night stand sex, where she will beg to be choked, slapped, spit on, or worse, and then can go home, never to think about or call the man again.

6. They don't need a man for even basic social exchanges

I ran into a female friend this weekend, and told her about a fun event happening that she expressed interest in. She asked for some details and I said, if you want to go, I'll text you the details later (I am somewhat old fashioned and do not carry a telephone with me 24/7). She replied, “Oh, no need, I will just look up the details on google.”

That’s exactly what she did, and she ended up attending the event. She is an independent, strong “career girl” who does not need a man to even do her a favor of texting her an address, because she literally has no need for men. I should mention that despite being physically attractive, she has been single for as long as I’ve known her, and has expressed interested in artificial insemination because she can’t find the right man, but wants to have a family.

Contrast that with one of my Latina women who regularly message me saying “Amor, necesito tu ayuda” (Baby, I need your help). And I happily oblige.

So what are men good for?

The fact is women today do not NEED a man. When you do not NEED something, you do not value or treasure it. This explains why men are disrespected and ignored in modern society. Game can be used to extract sexual favors from women, or even enter into mini-relationships, but the fact is, a woman who does not need you can never truly devote herself to you.

Patriarchy established clear roles and boundaries for the sexes. The men appreciated and admired the woman’s feminine traits. The woman adored and relied on the man for fulfilling his duties. If you decide to marry, it had better be a woman from a traditional, conservative household, and those are all but nonexistent in the west. Until men are needed again (financial collapse, war, utter breakdown of infrastructure), they will continue to be ignored and disrespected.

Mexican Protesters Attack Trump Supporters In San Jose While Police Stand Down

June 3, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via San Jose Mercury News:

Dozens of fights broke out on the streets of downtown San Jose on Thursday night as police in riot gear struggled to keep the peace between hundreds of protesters and streams of Donald Trump fans leaving his rally at the city's convention center.

Protesters jumped on cars, while others burned red "Make America Great" hats and took selfies with the charred remains. Demonstrators waved Mexican flags as Trump supporters shouted at them to "go back to Mexico."

At the height of the biggest and most violent political protest San Jose has seen in decades, hundreds of people clashed with police and Trump supporters. One young woman was struck in the forehead by a flying metal parking barricade, and police were pelted with traffic cones and water bottles.

Police helicopters circled overhead for more than two hours, commanding the crowds to disperse, while police from numerous Bay Area agencies marched through the heart of downtown San Jose, containing protesters along Park Avenue, Almaden Boulevard and San Carlos Street.

Earlier, inside the convention hall, Trump supporters chanted “Build that wall, build that wall,” as the candidate repeated his call to erect a concrete wall on the border with Mexico.

During the rally, Trump was uncharacteristically tempered with two protesters who made it inside the hall, including one who stood near the front of the crowd holding a Bernie Sanders sign.

“Darling,” Trump said, “there’s no way he can win, but keep your sign high.”

To another, he told security to “leave him alone. Don’t hurt him. See the way I said that? I’ve learned.”
Exactly who was involved in the violence outside and where they were from remains unclear, but numerous members of the crowd were Latinos from East San Jose who said they opposed the violence and condemned Trump for touting racism.

Why Liberalism Is Just Passive-Aggressive Totalitarianism

June 3, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the men of ROK this week. As a brief note, I'll say that I've posted two articles at my blog: one is about the attitude that a traditional man should take to churches and clerics who oppose the restoration of red-pilled, patriarchal values in society (with an emphasis on the Catholic Church); the other, in honor of the end of the month of May, our Lady's month, presents some of the Catholic teaching on the Blessed Virgin – a misunderstood topic, for many. Navigate there if you care to.

I wanted to respond to some ideas that came up regarding last week's article—specifically, some men chafed at the idea that an hierarchical, aristocratic state that emphasized virtue, was not sufficiently deferent to the special nature of their snowflakery (I tease, fellas), and would threaten to trample upon their rights. This is a common idea, even amongst people who think they have rejected egalitarianism; they admit not all men are equal, but they are very keen to say "don't inflict your morals on me," thinking their morals are just as equal (maybe even more equal!) than others'. Today we will look at why this, too, is one more impossible vision from the Liberal House of Mirrors.

The Essence of Liberalism

Let me first state that any philosophy allowing for rights in abstraction from the norms of objective morality, is Liberal—and this includes almost all of what calls itself “Conservatism” in the Anglosphere (and, increasingly, beyond). At the heart of Liberalism, aka Modernism (in the technical terms used by Catholics such as myself), is the incoherent and irrational endowing of error with rights, often consequent to an incorrect valuation and application of the good of tolerance.

The first manifestation of this new philosophy in the West was Protestantism, which as Don Felix Sarda y Salvany said, “begets by nature tolerance of error.” I do not say this to be offensive, but descriptive; it was the first manifestation of the feeling that men are entitled to their own opinions on ultimate questions, and ought to be “free” to act in accord with their conscience on these opinions—and that, therefore, authority must yield more or less to individuals’ rights of conscience.

Concepts as Flawed and Broken as the Bell that Stands for Them

One can see that there is essentially no difference between this and the maxim of Justice Kennedy, which he penned to uphold worthless whores’ rights to murder their children without so much as notifying their husbands, the fathers: “At the heart of liberty is the right to define one’s own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life.” I spit upon such damned nonsense; this is literally a carte blanche to do whatever the hell you want. The story of Western Civilization from about 1500 A.D. to the present, is the story of how this absurd idea has played out in successive waves of incoherence and irrationality.

The only limit on this “right to define one’s own concept of existence” is the flimsy protestation that “your rights end where mine begin,” or, put otherwise: “don’t inflict your morality on me!” This sounds good to the person who has not analyzed it critically, but in fact it is a complete impossibility. We all live together in society. Any view that one enshrines as the societal ideal is automatically and inevitably going to inflict itself upon everybody in that society, and will frustrate or contradict their own “concept of existence,” to some extent.

Indeed, it is a wildly tyrannical idea, because it is tantamount to saying that everyone who does not consider their concept of existence to be totally private, relative and arbitrary, has no right to implement their views in society. Yes, as we see, even Libertarianism advances this radically hegemonic principle, squelching all opinions and beliefs that reject the relativistic premise. For, even to advocate that one should not inflict his moral views on someone else, is already an attempt to inflict one’s moral views on someone else! And in the absence of an objective norm of morality, there is really nothing stopping the Supreme Court from interpreting the Constitution to mean that your right not to bake cakes for sodomites, ends where a sodomite's right to demand cakes of you begins. That this is even an issue, is proof of the absurdity of our system.

But please do convert to my secular religion, abandon all hope of living in a society oriented by sane principles, and prepare to subsidize all the things I don't want to hear your opinions on.

What is Truly Right, is Inevitably Annihilated by Pseudo-Rights

I, for example, believe that there are objective principles of morality, and a moral and rational role for the state; I believe it is absolutely right and just and salutary for society to be run on these principles, and that this means making definite judgments upon certain ideas and behaviors, "inflicting" this system upon everybody. I also believe that I am morally obliged to prefer this system of governance, and to reject a Liberal one.

The Liberal, Libertarian or "Conservative" will recoil in horror; but, they are reacting to the mere candor of my position. The fact, is that their viewpoints also require me to shut up, forsake my dearest religious and moral principles, and submit to a society organized along their preferred principles, which I know to be not only immoral, but also impossible and irrational.

When members of society install a form of specious relativism as their governing principle, they are inflicting their moral view upon me. They limit the scope of my social and moral action; they compel my submission to what they accomplish via their appeal to the mob; they shackle me to the moral drift and societal decline of a state piloted by the demagogued masses. They are denying my moral view that a just, rational and even divine social order should reign over society, and that, far from according "power to the people,"

I should hold the uninformed dissent of infidels and fools in contempt, regarding this latter as the infallible source of civilizational decadence. If they succeed in preventing me from implementing my moral vision and living in the society I would form for myself and others, they have succeeded in inflicting their moral vision upon me. They have nullified my moral and social aspirations. They have compelled me to live in a State where a chimerical relativism bulldozes my sublimer views without scruple.

An House Divided

Or, put another way: people who say they believe in equality and freedom have determined that my beliefs are not equal to theirs, I am not free to run my business and spend my money as I wish, nor can I associate with whom I wish, nor can I simply be left alone; in the name of freedom and equality, they will inflict their morality on me, precisely on the grounds that I mustn't inflict my morality on them.

This conflict splits Liberalism down the middle: on the one hand, you have neo-Liberals claiming that people have a right to goods and services such as healthcare, because you can't exercise your other "rights" or really be "free," unless the government gives you a house, food, health care and Wi-Fi. They still pay lip service to the "your rights end where mine begin" view, but it's obvious they now believe that anything that may be necessary to guarantee the more important rights, can plausibly be asserted as something to which one is entitled.

On the other hand, the sorry few who still cling to Classical Liberalism (Libertarians, some "Conservatives"), are futilely trying to keep the barque of negative rights afloat. They will say, for instance, that you don't have a right to free health care, because this would mean you have a right to compel others to provide you with a service. They take this as a general principle – you don't have a right to make other people provide you with the substance of your rights; your rights end where the rights of others begin—"don't inflict your morality on me!"—but, unlike neo-Liberals, Classical Liberals "really mean it."

The Only Sane Solution

But I answer that this principle is also incorrect. I believe in the right to due process, for example, and this requires that the State provide competent law enforcement, a judiciary, equitable processes for jury selection and compensation, etc., etc. I believe that the King(/State) has a duty to provide just laws and to govern justly. It is NOT a universal rule that I have no right to receive provision of goods or services from the State; the reason I am not entitled to free health care, is because it does not belong to the State to provide my health care, and it is not right for me to force others to do so, either. The lesson to be drawn, is that real justice cannot exist in an (impossible) neutrality or compromise between "equal yet opposite," mutually valid yet contradictory worldviews.

Rather than pretend that "neutrality" is actually neutral, the state's governance and justice must be rooted in what is Right, and in that alone. You may object: "but who determines what that is?" We'll explore this in future, but for now, suffice it to say that the objection solves nothing: even to determine that we must not determine this, is to determine it.

The Non-Aggression Principle, or Declining to Initiate Force, makes sense only if infractions against objective norms of morality are understood to be initiations of force. Without a unified acknowledgment of said norms, the government can easily justify its protection of any kind of outrage, and its persecution of any kind of necessary intervention or prohibition. The "family" in this picture, above, was celebrated for pioneering gay "rights;" then they pimped their adopted son out to a global pedophilia ring. This was one step too far… for now. Tomorrow, when society recognizes the "right" of children to consent to sex – they already "consent" to sex change operations, no? – the police who arrested these men will be unjust aggressors, and the "family" will be persecuted for having "their own concept of existence."

That's the heart of all this. Since we no longer believe that the only basis of rights is objective uprightness, and since we no longer orient our society towards this (allowing the masses, instead, to simply assert their whimsies as "rights"), and since we have founded a society based on the irrational attempt to accord rights to this tangled abyss of error, we are doomed to pretend that we are not inflicting ourselves on each other, despite the fact that any set of social norms—even the norm of pretending to reject norms—inevitably inflicts itself upon everyone. Unless we repent, this already bitter crisis will keep playing out to the bitter, bitter, bitterest end.

I used to think people would wake up. Yet most still seem oblivious to the manifest inevitability of "inflicting a view," despite the steadily escalating clash of moral inflictions in the name of forbidding moral inflictions over five centuries. This has now entered a critical stage, because, having moved on from disagreement about less obvious points like the Trinity and Papal Primacy, sane people are now being asked to acquiesce even to palpably absurd ideas: collusion in sodomy = holy matrimony; Bruce Jenner = woman; up = down; square = circle.

The only thing for it, is to stop worrying about inflicting “a” view, and to start worrying about inflicting the right one. Until men with just convictions no longer fear to take up the sword of a righteous authority, and to smite those who demand the right to dissent from justice and just authority, the West will continue to tear itself apart with a specious and manifestly prevaricating, passive-aggressive, intolerant “tolerance.”

“Know you not that the unjust shall not possess the kingdom of God? Do not err: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, Nor the effeminate, nor liers with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor railers, nor extortioners, shall possess the kingdom of God” (1 Corinthians 6:9). And if an earthly king is smart, such persons shouldn’t last long in his kingdom, either.

God save you, men.

The Ideology That Can Soundly Defeat Liberalism Is Patriarchal Nationalism

June 4, 2016 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

Patriarchal nationalism is a political and social framework based on red-pill wisdom, articulated by ROK's own Roosh Valizadeh and Michael Sebastian. This framework is an antidote to the poison that has corrupted virtually every facet of Western civilization, now drawing ever closer to systemic collapse. If you haven't already, you should read the article on patriarchal nationalism now.

The Foundations For Practicing Patriarchal Nationalism

The various positions contained within patriarchal nationalism are evident to anyone who has taken the red pill, to anyone who can look and see what made societies healthy in the past and what is making them unhealthy now. Unfortunately, many in the West have indulged in the luxury of setting aside reality in favor of an alternative, one that begins as pleasant-sounding ideology, then sinks into wishful thinking, and finally collapses into delusion.

There is a natural tendency for people to synchronize their outward actions and their ideological understanding of the world, so that the practical and the ideal can reinforce each other in harmony. If people lack an ideology behind a practice, that practice becomes demoted to merely a habit or custom. If a practice and an ideology are out of harmony with each other, one or the other must change to restore balance.

In times past, pressure on this practice-ideology system came primarily from necessity and hard reality. With reality as the final arbiter, practices were continuously shaped to the necessities of the world as it is, and people adjusted their ideologies accordingly. In the safety and prosperity of the modern West, pressure on the practice-ideology system has come primarily from desires and feelings. With fancy as the final arbiter, ideology has been shaped to a vision of the world as it ought to be, and people have adjusted their practices accordingly.

For patriarchal nationalism to be implemented, its rational basis must be articulated in ideological terms that justify, guide, and refine its practice. Furthermore, if patriarchal nationalism is to supplant the current system of social and political practices, it must have a corresponding ideology that can supplant the current ideology of liberalism. The first step toward this is to identify the myopia of liberalism, its fatal flaw, and to articulate a fuller understanding of human nature.

The Myopia Of Liberalism

Liberalism in the most general sense is an ideology of individualism, in which the individual is paramount. For classical liberals, a man’s active self is sacred, such that individual labor, opinions, speech, liberty, equality under the law, and safety from others are valued by society, which serves as a policeman. For modern liberals, a man’s passive self is sacred, such that individual needs, desires, feelings, equality of outcome, and safety (including from natural consequences) are valued by society, which serves as a nanny.

Liberalism is an ideology in which society exists to serve individuals; how adult or childish those individuals are expected to be is merely a secondary consideration. The first sin of liberalism is its myopia, its doctrine that individuals are the only fundamental, essential units of the human species.

The second sin of liberalism is its idealization of individual morality and reason as the foundation of society, the faith that the individual as an institution is strong enough of mind and character to hold as the center around which all other facets of society revolve. Such an idealization grossly underestimates how much people can value taking over contributing, being over doing, feeling over thinking, and wishing over seeing. Sufficiently degenerated, men will beat their plowshares into televisions; they will forgo the sowing season to glut upon seeds.

The Three Fundamental Units Of The Human Species

Through the myopia of liberalism, individuals are seen as the fundamental units of the human species, while all larger units are merely groups in which individuals participate in order to achieve useful results. Families are formed in order to secure companionship and to share burdens. Tribes and nations arise in order to facilitate trade and collective security. For the liberal, the larger units are only utilitarian arrangements for individuals.

The benefits of larger social units are obvious. However, a more careful analysis reveals that these larger units, the family and the tribe, are not just useful, but are essential to the survival and thriving of both human individuals and the human species.

The Individual

The individual is the most obvious unit of the human species. Without individuals, the species would cease to exist. Furthermore, an individual can be a wellspring of benefits to the rest of society. A man’s good ideas, his productive labor, and his virtuous character enrich those around him. In general, when individuals flourish, families and tribes flourish as well.

The Family Or Clan

The family is also essential for the human species. A man comes into this world helpless and ignorant, without the ability to defend or provide for himself. Without a family to protect and feed him, he will perish. Furthermore, a man's uncultivated instincts and potentials serve him little. He requires a family to teach him language and skills, to teach him over the course of many years how to survive. An extended family (clan) is able to provide even more guidance and support.

Even when children's material needs are met by other means (usually the welfare state as surrogate father), those children experience worse life outcomes. Traditional families are still the best system for producing healthy and successful people. In general, when families flourish, individuals and tribes also flourish.

The Tribe Or Nation

A tribe is made up of many families or clans, and a nation is more or less a vast tribe. Although an individual requires a family to survive into competent adulthood, after that he may not require a family or tribe to survive. Similarly, a family may be able to survive on its own with the effort of its members, without being a part of a tribe. However, this tribe-less survival can only occur for a limited time, and it is biologically unsustainable.

If the human species were only a single man, the species would die out in a few decades because a man cannot reproduce alone. If the human species were only a single family or clan, the species would die out in a few generations. This is because a man may be able to reproduce with a member of his family, but incestuous reproduction in the long term leads to biological degeneration and extinction.

The tribe is the smallest unit necessary for the long-term survival of the human species. Furthermore, the tribe provides a myriad of benefits to its constituent individuals and families. The collectivization of security, the specialization of knowledge and labor, and cooperation all benefit members of the tribe enormously. In general, when tribes flourish, individuals and families flourish too.

Beyond Liberalism

Patriarchal nationalism rests on an understanding of the tri-part nature of the human species, that the individual, the family, and tribe are all essential. These three units are so fundamental that they existed even before the evolution of modern humans. The family and the tribe are not products of humanity; they are its prerequisites. A fitting name for this ideology is Human Trinitarianism.

Liberalism has a single focus, recognizing a single valued component of the human species which must be prioritized above all else. In contrast, Human Trinitarianism has three foci, recognizing three valued components of the human species which must negotiate with one another. The interests of each part sometimes overlap, and sometimes are at odds with one another, but their relationship with each other is synergistic. In conflict, they degenerate. When each is healthy and they act in harmony, they all flourish.

Just as physical reality is the highest arbiter of practice, objective truth is the highest arbiter of ideology. To survive, the West must realign its practices and ideologies according to an objective understanding of nature and an unclouded assessment of which practices actually work. Part of this task means developing a clearer understanding of how a healthy society negotiates the congruent and the conflicting interests of the individual, the family, and the tribe. However, the details of such negations are for another time.

Ultimately, the ideas presented here are not a conclusion, but a beginning. I offer them as a small contribution toward the development of patriarchal nationalism. As I continue my own work developing these ideas, I look forward to your comments and your ideas as well.

Did Feminist Writer Emily Eveland Lie About Beating Up Her Rapist?

June 5, 2016 | by Phil Elmore | Link | Original Link

XO Jane is not a publication known for its hard-hitting journalism. Still, one hopes that the articles posted there would at least be not completely made up. In the absence of credible evidence to the contrary, we should default to believing that a woman's accusations of sexual assault are true, should we not?

I do not believe—unlike other pundits in the manosphere—that all public rape accusations, unaccompanied by law enforcement involvement, are necessarily false. But I cannot view with anything but complete incredulity Emily Eveland's remarkable piece of clickbait, "My Friends And I Beat Up My Rapist, And I Will Never Apologize For Getting Revenge."

"Before he raped me, I considered Sean my friend," writes Eveland. She goes on to craft a compelling, dramatic narrative. Sean took advantage of her while she was too drunk, or too drugged, to resist. He didn't care that she had a tampon in. He left his used condom behind. He had the temerity to act like he was her boyfriend when they ate at a local diner the next day. It was only after having brunch with her rapist, evidently, that Emily decided, "I think I was raped." The story, had it ended there, would be an unremarkable one. But it gets decidedly weirder.

Emily Eveland, Serial Victim

Eveland has been raped seemingly time and time again, in her analysis. “When Sean raped me,” she writes, “I knew my survival depended on creating an alternate ending. After years of wearing shame like a self-fastened straight jacket, I finally trusted that the assaults were not my fault. And I was livid. I knew the police wouldn’t help. I had heard of friends going to the police, only to be blamed or slut-shamed. I assumed I would be met with similar accusations, since I was drunk and considered Sean my friend.”

Just like that, Eveland summarily dismisses any thought of going to the police or seeking legal redress for the assault. It’s a cynical view, to be sure. There seem to be an awful lot of feminist buzzwords sprinkled in there, but that by itself is not alarming or suspicious. No, it’s what happens next that should raise your eyebrows.

“I called my ex-boyfriend, a relative, and a friend, told them I had been raped, and asked the three of them to come to Rochester,” she writes.

> I said I had a plan. They didn’t ask questions. My ex hopped a train from Indiana to Rochester and the others came in from Chicago. Over the next three days, we held private discussions in my bedroom, met up with Sean’s roommates, and talked to his friends. The consensus was that our plan was fair.

Emily Eveland, Avenging Street Angel

The much-debated plan was to travel to Sean’s house and beat him. Ms. Eveland writes that she and the ex sang along to Tupac on the way to the assault. It’s a very rousing moment, a bit of visual imagery that emphasizes Emily’s journey to reclaim her personal power by beating the living hell out of her alleged rapist.

Eveland claims that she and her posse of ski-mask-wearing rapist-beaters arrive at Sean’s house a grand total of two weeks after Eveland was raped. They “walked through snow flurries” to his door (because Eveland repeatedly drops Rochester landmarks and other details to emphasize her connection to Upstate New York, where this event is supposed to have taken place). When Sean answered the door, they punched him, “threw him into a glass coffee table,” and screamed at him not to rape people as Eveland beat him with a “sock-in-lock.” This is presumably a padlock in a sock, because Emily Eveland has seen “Orange Is The New Black.”

“Sean said nothing throughout the attack,” Eveland claims, “just looked at the ceiling.

Maybe he knew he deserved it. Maybe he was busy learning how it felt to be violated. As the others headed for the front door, I turned around once more and screamed “FUCK YOU” in my own voice — the voice Sean had tried to take away from me. I lifted my weapon and whipped it hard into his stomach.”

Eveland then describes how she had a very empowering tattoo with the slogan “Burn It To The Ground” inked on her chest. She characterizes her gang assault on her rapist as “controversial” and says that, five years after the assault, she “stands by” her decision to beat her rapist.

The only problem is that every part of her story is probably made up.

The Red Flags In Eveland’s Tale

The red flags of falsehood are numerous. The tone of the piece is straight from Feminist Central Casting, but let’s let that go by. Instead, we’ll hit the other major red flags one at a time.

The Article Is Too Good

This is some powerfully written stuff. It’s crafted so well, in fact, that you have to question the narrative, because real life seldom works out so poetically. People questioned Lorenzo Carcaterra’s Sleepers for the same reason—the story was so good it couldn’t possibly be taken from the messy, often inconvenient world of real life. I don’t for a minute believe this incredibly vivid story, replete with so much grrl-power iconography and trite feminist imagery, happened as described.

Rochester, Rochester, Rochester—Also, Rochester

I work in Rochester, New York. I know the city she’s describing. This woman drops so many prominent landmarks it’s like she’s writing one of those dating profiles where she needs to prove she’s not a spam-bot by invoking the local landscape. Something about the way she does that just doesn’t ring true—it’s like the way people in television commercials talk about the products, or the way people in soap operas always offer unnecessary details in conversation so that the audience can keep up with what has happened.

Hey, Wanna Travel Across State Lines To Assault Some Guy?

I don't for a second believe a woman's ex-boyfriend, much less that ex and other people, would drop everything and travel from other states to New York without asking a single question. I don't know of anyone I've dated for whom I would cross state lines because she hinted at a terrible plan for vengeance. Who commands that sort of loyalty? And why, among all the friends, relatives, exes, friends' roommates, and uncle's cousin's brother's former car-pool members did nobody say, "Hey, committing a revenge assault seems like a really bad idea and a great way to get shot in the face."

If Emily Eveland was so traumatized by being raped that she was willing to commit vigilante violence, why the bizarre, television-friendly episode in which she and the ex rap along with Tupac on their way to get some payback? Why the tattoo? Why the final, triumphant strike with the slock, to prove that this odious man could not rob her of her voice? None of it sounds like real life. It reads like the pornographic revenge fantasy of a woman who wants to feel powerful. Emily Eveland sounds like an insecure lunatic who thinks making up stories about beating up silently suffering men (who somehow know they deserve it) will get the attention of those seated at the cool kids' table.

Ski Masks. Yes, She Said They Wore Ski Masks

Honestly?

Statute of Limitations, Shmatute of Limitations

Five years isn't enough time for the authorities to lose interest in a violent assault of this nature, regardless of the rationalization for it. Admitting that you conspired to commit home invasion and battery, and giving the police a date range and a location with which to work, would be an incredibly bad idea… if the event actually happened. I strongly doubt that Eveland has the kind of courage that would see her, five years after the fact, desperately begging to be imprisoned.

We Will Never Know If Emily Eveland Lied

There will be no consequences for Eveland's "admission." In my opinion, she shared this story because she knows there is no one to press charges for it. The victim is imaginary. The rape is imaginary. The violent attack is imaginary. There will be no consequences because there was no crime.

If pressed sufficiently, I've no doubt that Eveland will claim the whole thing was an intellectual exercise designed to help her cope with the trauma of being raped. I don't buy any part of this story and no part of it will ever be substantiated. It's too cinematic, too unlikely to have occurred the way it's described and, quite honestly, it speaks to Emily Eveland's emotional state.

Actual rape is a horrible act that should be fully punished by the power of our justice system. But Emily Eveland describes not the trauma of a rape, but rather the gleeful anger of a woman who seems more offended at Sean's temerity than injured by his violation. Any person who, after being raped, committed the series of acts in the order and manner Eveland describes could be nothing less than a complete psychopath.

That is, of course, only true if Eveland's story did happen.

But it didn't.

3 Ways High-Rep Lifting Can Improve Your Routine

June 5, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

In general, I am one to separate exercises done with high repetition and low weights from those done for maximal strength (high weights and low reps). This is mainly for two reasons: The first is because, when training novices don't know proper form, I prefer to have these people reduce their repetitions to avoid risk of injury. The second reason, which I apply both to trainees and myself, is simply due to the fact that most people have jobs, school, family or some combination of all three of these, they are not capable of spending multiple hours a day in training.

With all of that being said, there is a place for increasing repetitions of in your arsenal of weightlifting knowledge and tricks. More specifically, there are three reasons that I am aware of, and if there are any more, do inform me:

1. Increasing Muscular Stamina

This is the use of increasing repetitions that you are most likely familiar with: doing more repetitions to increase your capability of doing even more repetitions. To be more accurate, increasing the amount of repetitions done will cause a build-up of lactic acid that the body will gradually become more tolerant to. This, combined with the build-up of "slow-burning" red oxidative muscles (As discussed in a previous article), will increase muscular endurance—which is to say, the amount of time that the muscle being used can be exerted to some degree. Increasing muscular endurance will increase the amount of time that any muscular exertion will last, from the lightest exertion to the maximum.

To accomplish this, you can use weights, but I find that doing bodyweight exercises like push-ups and bridges, as well as martial arts practice, works sufficiently for purposes of muscular endurance. However, weights can be used in high repetitions for purposes of strength and mass training, and this is where the odd-seeming title comes from:

2. “Greasing The Groove”

Greasing the groove is, essentially, doing repeated repetitions of lifts to increase strength in the long term. In the words of Pavel Tsatsouline, “As your grandmother should have told you, if you want to increase your ability to do something, you ought to do a lot of that.” The mechanism of this can be done exactly like the first subheading, but I think you’ll find that doing multiple sets of your one-rep maximum weight is going to result in, at best, rapidly deteriorating form and crippling injury at worst. You could decrease the amount of weight done, but that sort of defeats the purpose of building pure strength, which “greasing the groove” can do (increasing and decreasing weight will be discussed in the next and final subheading).

Greasing the groove is a variant technique that you can do to increase the amount of repetitions of your “one rep maximum” (and yes, I understand the paradox of that statement), and it is a technique that actual professional weightlifters use—both Olympic style and powerlifting style.

This technique involves doing a high-weight low rep routine as is typical for strength training, but increasing the number of sets, rather than the amount of repetitions within sets. To begin, get up fairly early in the morning, and after getting some breakfast in your stomach, do a few heavy lifts—no more than 2-3 sets of 2-3 reps. Then go relax for a bit, and when you’re up to it, do a few more lifts—again a few sets of 1-2 reps. Then eat lunch, wait a few more hours, and then—you guessed it—do a few more lifts. And that is all. As you can see, this routine organizes itself very well around the eating of three square meals a day; I'm not really a fan of that "grazing cow, six meals a day" stuff.

Thus, throughout the day, you will have done 18-24 repetitions of your one rep maximum, or a weight pretty close to it. And that's nothing to sneeze at. The problem with this method is, of course, that you need to set aside your whole day to utilize it, and this is not practical for most people. Still, as it is a legitimate technique utilized by people whose trade it is to lift heavy things over their head, it is worth knowing. Perhaps you can do a truncated version of it—do a few sets, take a break for 10-20 minutes, and then another set to call it a day.

3. Increase Size And Strength Through Gradual Decreases

While this technique is hindered by a lack of a catchy name, it is a useful one for those who want to build both strength and a statuesque physique: Referencing the works of Pavel Tsatsouline again, his Power to the People book refers to incidences of Spetsnaz commanders in Afghanistan having so-called "Hollywood Units" of hulking, chiseled muscle men to satisfy the inspectors from Moscow. These men trained to be both big and physically capable by—again—increasing their repetitions. But in a different way then the second subheading here:

Begin with one set of your one rep maximum, with no more than 2-3 reps. Then drop 5 pounds and do another set of 2-3 reps. Then drop another 5 pounds. And another, and so on and so forth. You can literally do this exercise until you're just lifting the bar. With this technique, you will be training your one rep max, as well as doing a massive amount of repetitions, developing both size and strength.

The downside to this technique is, again, that it basically kills your entire day. But if it was good enough to satisfy Moscow Center, it should be good enough for you should you choose to use it.

In conclusion, I must admit I only do the first of these techniques for bodyweight exercises. However, as numerous professional lifters swear by these tactics, and they require literally no training once you've learned proper form and technique, you might want to try them out.

The European Union Partners With Facebook, Google, And Twitter To Censor “Hate Speech”

June 5, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The EU recently made an Orwellian announcement: it is moving to institute policies of censorship to “protect” free speech online. This is a thinly veiled first volley in curbing all freedom of expression on the internet, and forcing leftist political correctness on dissidents. Any post deemed by the European Commission and IT companies “racist” or “xenophobic” could be censored under the proposal. Spokesmouth Věra Jourová, the Commissioner for Justice, Consumers, and Gender Equality said:

> I welcome the commitment of worldwide IT companies to review the majority of valid notifications for removal of illegal hate speech in less than 24 hours and remove or disable access to such content, if necessary.

The official EU statement says the move comes as part of a bureaucratic junta held in late 2015 which made plans to start enforcing “tolerance and respect” online and claims to be aimed at “preventing and combating Antisemitic and anti-Muslim hatred in Europe.”

These men have never trivialized rape

However, contradicting herself in the same press release, and using the Trojan Horse excuse of protecting the public from terrorism, which in some circles seems to be orchestrated or encouraged by Western governments rather than prevented by it, Jourová says:

> The recent terror attacks have reminded us of the urgent need to address illegal online hate speech. Social media is unfortunately one of the tools that terrorist groups use to radicalize young people and racist use to spread violence and hatred. This agreement is an important step forward to ensure that the internet remains a place of free and democratic expression.

In stark contrast to rosy and misleading PR flack spin, the move will cripple online speech among traditional European populations who have anything critical to stay about open door immigration policy for Muslims or about the ongoing epidemics of rape and violence by "immigrants." The fact Jourová, who is also responsible for "gender equality" put out the statement hints that manosphere sites like Return Of Kings could soon be under fire because they do not follow the narratives of female superiority. Facebook, Twitter, Microsoft, Google and other major tech companies all said they would be complicit in the curbing on free speech online.

It should be pointed out protections for free speech were not instituted to protect polite speech, as polite speech needs no protection. In fact, the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution was written to protect offensive speech. Debate.org statistics currently show the majority of the public understands this concept, as 70% say "hate speech" should be protected. Some of the more astute commentators pointed out the end of freedom begins with censorship of politically correct, hot-button issues then progresses to the banning of books and other authoritarian moves.

Moreover, who is to determine which types of speech quality as racist or xenophobic? The status quo in Europe and America allows people to say anything critical of whites, but it is verboten for whites to criticize "protected" classes no matter how valid those criticisms may be. Protected classes include any group that is not Caucasian, Christian, male, or heterosexual.

Merkel has already warned Zuckerberg: She does not like criticism of her policies from the rabble (us)

Free Speech Is Under Attack

The move by the EU will create yet another bureaucratic boondoggle and cover online speech in red tape. It will require speech determined by censors to be violating vague policies to be removed within 24 hours. The aims will also be directed towards:

> …promoting independent counter-narratives, new ideas and initiatives, and supporting educational programs that encourage critical thinking.

In other words, bureaucrats are hinting they will force "controversial" sites to offer alternative views those in the government find acceptable. Benjamin Jones of the The National Secular Society (UK) said the proposals will threaten criticisms of religion and other important functions of free speech online:

> Far from tackling online 'cyber jihad,' the agreement risks having the exact opposite effect and entrapping any critical discussion of religion under vague 'hate speech' rules. Poorly-trained Facebook or Twitter staff, perhaps with their own ideological bias, could easily see heated criticism of Islam and think it is 'hate speech,' particularly if pages or users are targeted and mass reported by Islamists.

Other groups, including the Index on Censorship (UK) have warned the laws will give tech corporations carte blanche to determine what qualifies as hate speech and what does not, rather than forcing them to adhere to established law:

> Hate speech laws are already too broad and ambiguous in much of Europe. This agreement fails to properly define what 'illegal hate speech' is and does not provide sufficient safeguards for freedom of expression. It devolves power once again to unelected corporations to determine what amounts to hate speech and police it — a move that is guaranteed to stifle free speech in the mistaken belief this will make us all safer. It won't. It will simply drive unpalatable ideas and opinions underground where they are harder to police — or to challenge. There have been precedents of content removal for unpopular or offensive viewpoints > and this agreement risks amplifying the phenomenon of deleting controversial — yet legal — content via misuse or abuse of the notification processes.

Further, just last September Mark Zuckerberg was confronted by German Chancellor Andrea Merkel for not doing enough to combat online discussion of her open-door immigration policy. The interchange came to light only because it was accidentally picked up on a live microphone. Facebook was already cracking down on free speech before the new, tyrannical moves by the Merkel and the EU. Even Muslims who are critical of extremists, such as those who expose corruption in the Palestinian Authority like Khaled Abu Toameh, are being censored by Facebook. After his Facebook account was suspended but later reopened after he protested, he wrote:

> It's still a matter of censorship. They decide what's acceptable. Now we have to be careful about what we post and what we share. Does this mean we can't criticize Arab governments anymore?

It seems the European and American governments are hell bent on shutting down discussion on topics that do not fit their agendas. Just as the Soviet Union once punished those who dissented against Communism, the organizing world government is attempting to shut down dissent of multiculturalism and other suicidal far left policies.

The race is on to either stop government censorship or develop a communications alternative to the current internet.

An Open Letter To The Men Of MGTOW

June 6, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

First, let me start off by saying that I'm not a PUA who's trying to sell products, I wasn't commissioned to write this specific piece, and I'm also not a "pussy beggar" or a "Tradcon" (far from it, in fact). I have nothing against MGTOW and quite frankly find any and all in-fighting among the manosphere groups deplorable.

I do, however, feel compelled to address the criticisms of and from the MGTOW sphere in an attempt to bridge misunderstandings. While I'm not as critical of MGTOW as the others who dismiss the whole movement as a congregation of virgin losers, I do feel that a large segment of its members are lost. Instead of going their own way to live a fulfilling life, they're using the movement as a crutch to justify and validate their lack of zest for life. They're essentially selling themselves short.

For the purpose of this article, I'll generalize the movement into two groups: Group A and Group B. Group A are the active and well-adjusted men who simply reject the high-risk, state-sanctioned marriage and other social contracts offered to men. These are men who genuinely have better things to focus on than chasing women all the time or be a utility to the system. The Group B, for whom this article is directed to, are the ones who have seemingly withdrawn not just from society, but life itself. This is the group that pretends to be the A group, but are actually men who just gave up and are creating rationalizations for it.

The "Shaming" Hysteria

To start off, the B group's incessant criticism of men's drive towards self-improvement is getting tiresome.

For example, I published an article last year to share my own experience of overcoming video game addiction and finding other meaningful activities to do. All I wanted to do was to give advice to other men who might be in the same situation I had been in so that they can get ideas on new things to experience in life. And what happened? In a rather predictable fashion, I was accused of "shaming" men by the MGTOW members who didn't even read the article.

> But the really big thing is that Roosh and his site are constantly shaming men. Here's a few recent articles I found in about five minutes:
> http://www.returnofkings.com/75094/this-single-personality-trait-is-wrecking-your-chances-with-hot-women-right-now > http://www.returnofkings.com/75862/5-things-you-should-be-doing-if-you-consume-porn > http://www.returnofkings.com/74585/20-things-you-can-do-instead-of-playing-video-games > http://www.returnofkings.com/20166/stop-watching-porn
> Just from these, in short, we get the following: change your personality, stop being self-aware, don't pursue porn - instead pursue women, stop playing video games, and "no, we mean it, stop watching porn now, the only good orgasm is with a woman".
> Yeah, no. I mean, this inspires me, being somewhat contrary, with the immediate desire to go buy an Xbox and then jerk off furiously.

Oh, the horror. How dare we suggest that there might be more to life than porn and video games.

This is the typical knee-jerk response from the B group of MGTOW who have fallen to a mode of complacency—and it doesn't end there. Everything for them is a "shame" tactic. Want to be in a happy relationship with a woman? Pussy worshiper. Offering information on self-improvement? Scam to sell products. Free tips on how to live the life you want? More shaming tactics.

People who make these sort of criticisms leave no room for a possibility of a healthy relationship or life. According to the more bitter adherents of MGTOW, even if a man is in an intimate relationship with a decent woman on his terms, he is still a slave to pussy who has relinquished his freedom (but somehow dedicating time, money, and effort to gain validation from video games isn't). This is the sort of attitude you would expect from a hater who is jealous of another man's success, which is why many men feel repellent to MGTOW as a whole.

The blunt truth is this: men absolutely hate seeing weakness in other men. This is not some conspiracy to "shame" men into doing something they're not supposed to like, it's a fact of human nature. We men have an innate awareness of how infectious weakness can be, and guess what? The MGTOW community reeks of it. Those in the A category may have legitimate reasons to deny this, but it's the B group that is swelling in numbers and defining the movement as a whole. If you get just one point out of this article, let that be it.

More "Shaming"

I've also written an article listing the seven deadly sins of manhood (which was also criticized by the MGTOW readers because it supposedly robs men of being able to play victims). If you read the article, you'll see that the entire B group has all seven sins checked off while being utterly unwilling to fix them due to their anti-shame rationalization. The movement has gone to a point where even helping yourself is somehow seen as a sinister effort to turn you into a drone.

As another example of the self-pitying victim-mentality some of these men have dug themselves into, I've seen one commenter on this very site (with a MGTOW logo for his avatar) complaining that simply striking up a conversation with a woman will automatically land him in jail and how it was all was hopeless for him. That sort of distorted and pessimistic outlook on life is exactly the kind of negativity that men hate. Again, that's not the same thing as shaming.

It's one thing to face obstacles and experience set-backs—men are allowed to feel dejected when shit happens. Other men will help you and support you as long as you yourself are willing to make the effort to stand up again and fight. But giving up before you even get started? No, we will not accept that. We men loathe defeatists and are repulsed by them, and rightfully so.

Going your own way towards what?

Ask the Japanese Hikikomoris how happy they are. MGTOW may have started as a rational response to irrational circumstances, but this will be the eventuality of all men who lack direction.

Now, if the MGTOW mission is true, its members wouldn't even bother identifying themselves as one. Normally, when a man goes his own way, he doesn't feel the need to advertise it to the world. (I know because individuals close to me have done just that without feeling the need to identify themselves as "Going His Own Way"). He just goes about doing what gives meaning to his life without concern for other people. But by labeling yourself as a member and going as far as accusing men's self-improvement articles of “shaming,” the group B members of MGTOW are openly admitting that they’re secretly ashamed of having surrendered. They hate things that compel them to take action because it’s a reminder that they’re not living a meaningful life.

MGTOW philosophy would make sense if these men were leaving the society to start their own way of life, but almost all of them still work, they still pay their taxes, and they still operate within the society they’re supposedly refusing to contribute to. So, in the end, the B group of the MGTOW is not rejecting slavery from gynocracy as they claim; instead, they want to enslave themselves to mind-numbing entertainment and live a life of complacency with minimal effort and zero risk-taking. They may convince themselves that they’re just being “realistic” and doing what is best for themselves, but it’s clear that—for the B group at least—it’s all just rationalization for their learned helplessness.

Last, the MGTOW community also proclaims the likes of Issac Newton and Nikola Tesla as role-models who have rejected women in pursuit of higher meaning. However, the the whole of the B group is not engaging in scientific discoveries or advancing the human race in any way. No, not even. Instead, what they’re doing with their supposed independence is playing video games and wasting time online complaining and spewing their bitterness. Although anger is a legitimate emotion to be felt when you you’ve been lied to about the nature of sex relations all your life, it can’t be your default mode of existence. If you’re going to build an identity, you must base it around creating and striving, not around opposition and rejection.

Conclusion

To conclude, my points are:

1. Not all self-improvement tips are attempts to shame you.

2. Men loathe signs of weakness and defeatism; their derision is not an attempt to control your life or sell you stuff.
3. Complete withdrawal isn't necessarily a good thing and it shouldn't be seen as the only possible option for men.
4. Without drive, purpose, and direction, men of MGTOW will go nowhere.
5. The Group B are taking over the movement and they're not doing themselves or the movement any favor.

If you can't even take a light criticism and think this is just another effort at shaming, I won't do anything more. It's your life and I don't lose anything. I'll just say that when you become trapped in your own mind without experiencing the world, it's very easy to get caught in a loop of complacency and get cozy with it. You'll convince yourself that you're right and anything that suggests a different outlook or possibilities will be seen as a threat to your comfort zone. You might even convince yourself that you're happy when you're not. I know all this because I've been there.

Being single and unsuccessful (assuming that's the issue for you) in itself is nothing to be ashamed of, most of us have all been there at least one point in our lives. But claiming the grapes are sour and saying you're the one rejecting women and society without doing anything for self-improvement is something you should be ashamed of: you're letting yourself down.

So, go your own way and take charge of your life if you must, but just make sure you're actually using the opportunity to do something for yourself—not for anyone else, but for your own sake.

Things Change: The Startling Contrasts Of Venezuela And Colombia

June 6, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Things can change. And they can change quickly. I remember the rock musician Billy Squier from the 1980s. He rose from total obscurity to international stardom, and then somehow went right back to obscurity.

David Mamet made a great little movie a while ago called Things Change (you should be seeing all of his movies, regardless). It captures this "variability of fortune" ethic very well. And I've talked about it before, in books and articles here and there.

The point can apply to nations as well as people. Take Columbia and Venezuela, for example. The two sisterly countries are economically and socially now polar opposites. Venezuela is literally a failed state. The country is currently run by Hugo Chavez's hand-picked successor. Maybe "run" is the wrong word, unless that word means "run into the ground."

Maduro: Mr. Useless

By any measure, Venezuela is a disaster zone. Inflation has been about 500% so far this year, and is likely to exceed an incredible 1000% within the next year or so. Nothing is in the stores, and nothing is on the shelves. The few hotel visitors that do show up in the country are advised to bring their own toilet paper.

Crime is exploding, even in rural areas. Police hardly even bother to investigate crime any more, leaving vigilante groups to do the work of "law enforcement," which can mean lynchings and murder.

Years of corruption, mismanagement, greed, graft, and stupidity are to blame. No one can blame this one on the United States. Hugo Chavez embedded himself in the seat of power a few years back and, proclaiming Fidel Castro as his "mentor," propelled the nation right over the brink. What makes this all so gut-wrenchingly tragic is that Venezuela is one of the richest nations in the hemisphere. It is sitting on oil and gas reserves second to none. Its leaders essentially created OPEC many decades ago. There is enough mineral wealth in the country to literally do everything.

Everything, that is, except run the country.

Things change.

But let's now take a look at Colombia. Columbia in the 1980s and early 1990s was crazy. Violence was off the charts. Narco-trafficers, cartels, and rebel groups turned the country into a tropical version of Afghanistan, with rival warlords and bosses battling each other for the biggest share of the spoils. In 1985, for example, the rebel group M-19 laid siege to the Colombian Supreme Court building itself. Incredibly, eleven of the twenty-five Supreme Court justices were killed in the battle.

Medellin was the murder capital of the world in the early 1990s. Everybody shuddered and joked about how dangerous Colombia's cities were. But good tactics, discipline, and not a little law enforcement and intelligence assistance from abroad helped turn things around. The cartels were decapitated. Rebel groups were hunted down and liquidated. Slowly, order began to take the place of disorder. Medellin's crime rate is about 95% lower than what it was in the early 1990s. Tourists are pouring in, attracted by the country's scenic beauty, stability, and strong infrastructure.

Things change.

How could this have happened? How could things have just fallen apart so rapidly for Venezuela, and gotten so much better for Colombia? Well, lots of reasons. Most of them have to do with three things: leadership, leadership, and leadership.

Good leaders set the tone, provide the guidance, the vision, and the motivating spirit. When you have good people in the right places, things work well. Even countries with relatively few resources can do a lot with good leadership. And conversely, countries with abundant resources will get nothing done with corrupt or venal leaders. This something we should keep in mind, always.

Venezuela may have to go through its own dark night of its soul. Even though more than two-thirds of the population want corrupt, useless flunky Nicolas Maduro and his United Socialist Party out of power, he seems unlikely to give up without a fight. Of course, in his delusional world, it's everyone else's fault but his: the United States, monetary fluctuations, the collapse of the petroleum market, voodoo spells, maybe even radio waves bouncing off the clouds.

Colombia is doing very well.

But at the end of the day, he's the leader. His party's and his predecessor's policies made it so. And if he had any amount of integrity or love for his country, he'd step down and make way for someone else who can reverse a decade of useless, failed "socialist" policies. How this will all play out remains to be seen.

Change is the natural order of things, as Lucretius tells us. The world changes rapidly every day, even every hour. We need to be aware of, and responsive to, these changes. When things are great, we should be grateful. And enjoy it while it lasts. Because it never does. And when things have run their course, we should know when it is time to move on.

We are all nomads, selling our wares door-to-door.

It is well for us to reflect on the fact that things can change so quickly, and so completely. Forward progress is not inevitable. It is not irreversible. The demons of ignorance, greed, and vanity are always lurking just below the basement trap-door, calling out to us in muffled voices, pushing for a way up and out.

And if bad leadership lets them loose, they can cause untold harm.

How New York Killed Male Literature

June 6, 2016 | by Jonatan Stamm | Link | Original Link

Many neomasculine men are aware of the backlashes to the depredations of cultural Marxists on video games (i.e. Gamergate) and science fiction (i.e. Sad Puppies). Yet literary fiction has already been so compromised that the prospects for change are about as good as those of a secular-humanist revolution sweeping through Saudi Arabia. One should not simply balk, understandable though the urge may be, that literary fiction is just flowery, solipsistic indulgence—for that would be dismissing some of our greatest thinkers, from Cervantes to Tolstoy to Beckett, due to our modern emasculated writers and the prattle of the social justice class.

To be clear, making it onto the NY Times bestseller list or getting published by Random House is brutally hard for anyone not writing crime, vampire or chick-lit novels. But the obstacles that non-leftist men face in an industry where 80% of executives are women are soul-crushing. This article will examine the current literary world—centered around New York publishing and MFA (Master of Fine Arts) programs—the SJW stranglehold thereof, the literary men of today vs. yesterday, and a prognosis for modern literature.

New York, New York

First things first: New York is publishing. If you haven't spent a year riding the N-train between Brooklyn and Manhattan attending readings and expos, sucking up to magazine editors and readers (i.e. those who read submissions), and building contacts, then you're like a goldfish swimming with sharks. If you want to make it in literary publishing, which means signing a deal with a New York agent and publisher, then the only excuse you have for not living there is if you attend a respectable MFA program outside the city.

The recent mushrooming of these programs—where writers workshop their stories and study craft while escaping from the daily grind—has resulted in more perfectly cut gems of sentences, more aesthetic groupthink and conformity, and a literary class system, where an MFA from the Iowa Writers Workshop opens many doors and an MFA from a lesser program opens none.

Landing a book deal or finding an agent is far easier with a publication record, meaning having placed stories and essays in prestigious literary magazines. But a litmag might publish four issues per year, each with 10 poems, 5 stories, and 2 essays. Two of these story slots (of interest to would-be Ernest Hemingways) are reserved for contributing editors, 2 are given to established writers whose names will boost the magazine's profile, and 1 will be given to a newish writer—maybe. And if the choice comes down to you, an unknown male with a possibly white-sounding name from the Midwest, and the painter girl with 2000 Twitter followers who the editors party with in Bushwick, who do you think they'll choose?

An internship paradox exists in literary publishing, where in order to get a book deal, you need a reputation, and in order to get a reputation, you need publications, and in order to get publications, you need a reputation. Two factors explain the existence of the literary class system as a substitute for talent. First, it's hard for a magazine or agent to make value judgments between two solid pieces of work based on reading them for 5 minutes. Whereas listening to two musicians for 5 minutes each could deliver in-your-face impressions, browsing two stories often won't. With most agents and magazines inundated with submissions, there's no time to read everything and so they choose the person with the top MFA, the New York connections, and the five-digit Twitter followers.

The second reason for the literary class system relates to the economics of literary fiction. Though agents want to find and sell the next Great American Novel, the reality is that most books, authors, editors, and agents make no money. While the literati gloat that the industry is unique in standing outside the profit motive—as if it purely serves the human imagination—this lack of market orientation can be disorienting.

Most small magazines have no expectation of a large readership and no real business model, surviving instead on local arts council handouts. As such, considering that almost no one reads literary magazines (besides The New Yorker or Harper's) and that they're not appealing (or readable) to anyone but a tiny in-group of museum-going, naval-gazing yuppies, a magazine will leverage the literary class system and throw in some high-profile Iowa MFA writers in order to justify itself as not completely disappearing up its own ass. It needs to lend legitimacy to its drivel, which was never designed to appeal to anyone but the Brooklyn literati — or wannabe Brooklyn literati (the border is porous).

Think of the literary class system as a sort of coupon system in a communist state.

The SJW Takeover

So far, my intention has been to disillusion anyone who hopes otherwise as to the patent falsehood that what you write is half as important as your membership in the New York literary class. While an outsider can't count on agents and editors reading their work for more than two minutes upon submission (unless they're a card-carrying Park Slope resident with an MFA), there is one other way you can try to jostle your way into the Communist Politburo of Books: leftist virtue signalling.

I am not joking when I say that one of the best possible investments in your writing career, as a straight male who wants to get published, would be to hire a fat transgender "woman" of color and simply ghostwrite for "her," or else acquire pictures of one and add "agoraphobic" to your Twitter resume of socially appealing forms of oppression—so no one expects to ever meet you.

No occupational field has inhaled diversity quotas this much. Looking at lists of award winners, grant recipients and editorial board members, made up predominantly of women, one would think that men are half-way illiterate. But in truth, far-left badges are ravenously shared and traded by the NY literary establishment, with many magazines and agents expressing a preference for "underrepresented writers," not to mention all the literary events based around LGBT youth, minorities, inner-city kids, etc.

For example, let's look at the identities and leftist credentials of the just-announced winners of the Whiting Awards:

Brian Blanchfield: white, LGBT

LaTasha N. Nevada Diggs: African-American, BLM, ebonics

Madeleine George: lesbian, generalized SJW

Mitchell S. Jackson: African-American, BLM, former drug dealer

Alice Sola Kim: Korean-American, lives with editor of Buzzfeed Books

Catherine Lacey: white, pinned tweet: "Fiction is the practice of queering reality."

Layli Long Soldier: Native-American, SJW

Safiya Sinclair: Jamaican-American, BLM

Ocean Vuong: Vietnamese-American, gay

D. Daniels: white, non-SJW?

In this group, I only see one person with no immediate SJW affiliation (or Twitter account). While I can't comment on the skill of some of these writers, the selection, like other modern literary selections, reeks of a PR wet dream chosen by a Buzzfeed panel.

You need Roxanne Gay's approval to write

The identity-politic quota system, of course, hasn't gone unnoticed by writers. Beyond the Sad Puppies episode in the more libertarian domain of science fiction, a recent incident in the Best American Poetry anthology was highly illustrative of the imposition of identity politics on literary publishing.

A writer, Michael Derrick Hudson, had his poem accepted into the anthology under the Chinese name Yi-Fen Chou, only to later reveal that he was a white man from Indiana who'd been perpetually rejected under his real name. There was a backlash, with Buzzfeed excoriating this talentless white patriarchal monster who should have "taken a hint" and stopped writing when he couldn't get published. Some writers concede the vexed nature of getting published simply for being "exotic." Ultimately though, they justify it based on the distinction between equality (equal treatment) and equity (equal access). That is, even if a white man is being discriminated against compared to a "translatina," the white man faces fewer hurdles to publication (because his life is easier) and is still at an advantage despite the overt discrimination by publishing gatekeepers.

As in American life, identity politics will continue full-steam-ahead, powered by the unflappable nexus between writers of color and white women, whereby the former receive a platform from which to excoriate white people, so long as they trumpet the latter's "rape culture" agenda. See, for example, one black writer's response to the rape allegations facing Bill Cosby:

As far as Cosby's alleged abuses, I was never conflicted. My only question was would this nation care if all, or most, of Cosby's alleged victims were black women and girls. There wasn't much intellectual or emotional reconciliation needed for me to understand that white Americans will go to all lengths to justify their terrorizing and pilfering of black folks, and most black men and boys, like most white men and boys, will go to all lengths to deny our active roles in sexual violence, sexual assault, sexual humiliation, and interpersonal violations of women and girls. The reality that white Americans are responsible for some of the most lasting, crazy-making violence on Earth does nothing to negate the reality that black men and boys, like white men and boys, are formally and informally educated by other men, boys, and patriarchal structures, to unrepentantly harm and sexually violate black women and girls.

What Kind Of Books Does This Produce?

The artistic goal of diversity quotas—if there could ever be a half-way acceptable one—might be to infuse lesser known narratives into the artistic zeitgeist through memorable but seldom heard characters and experiences. But we know this isn't how it works in practice.

In novels from the Brooklyn intelligentsia, almost any African-American character is witty, pragmatic, agreeable, and surrounded by fools. But calling such a 2D cut-out a character is like calling a Pop-Tart baking. How such a character is supposed to elevate black people and nourish black artistic consciousness, let alone satisfy the average reader, is unclear. Rather than creating characters instead of identity-politics pets, establishment writers reach for the evermore rarefied tokenism.

Witness Garth Risk Hallberg, whose novel City on Fire recently received the possibly highest advance ever given to a novel: $2 million. Right from the first page, Hallberg introduces us to an interracial gay couple comprised of a wealthy but negligent white man who walks out on his long-suffering, paragon-of-virtue black boyfriend.

Or consider the "masculine" baseball novel The Art of Fielding, which revolves around a college dean and his affair with a black male student. Or the brand new What Belongs to You, whose author markets his book by saying he's been cruising public bathrooms since he was 14. While these Ivy-educated authors are skilled at craft, it's impossible to know where the virtue-signalling impulse ends and the story-telling begins. Possibly, they are trying to avoid the fate of Jonathan Franzen, who, despite being a bespectacled, militantly Democratic bird-watcher who writes an excess of female characters, faces a wrathful literary establishment who can't quite countenance a straight male writer who has opinions about things.

Stephen King doesn't want you to vote for Trump

Dead or muted are the mainstream male literary writers of yesteryear—Thomas Pynchon, Don DeLillo, Philip Roth, John Updike—many of whom are now considered arch-misogynists. In their stead, we have a generation of soldiers of Clintonian globalism led by radical feminists who write about "MUH FEELINGZ" and getting abortions, not to mention race agitators who get front-page editorials in The New York Times for their screeds against the never-ending assault against the "black body."

Conclusion

Artistic communities have often been marked by dilettante behaviour, in-group rituals, and urbanism. But whereas 1920s Paris gave us works of Joyce, Hemingway, and Fitzgerald that still live on (the ultimate test of quality), it's hard to imagine longevity for any socially conscious work written in a rent-controlled Park Slope flat—or any pitch-perfect but insipidly conformist book cranked out of one of America's writing factories. Rather than writing bravely about the issues that define our experience and have no easy answer, the modern writer has to kneel before and pay his dues to the shrine of social justice.

Not only must he gain a large flock of SJW Twitter followers and relocate to New York to win over gatekeepers, he must design stories that include grotesquely high representations of women, LGBT people, and minorities, lest his "privilege" be a noose around his neck.

To this generation, it doesn't matter how anti-art this is. It doesn't matter that diversity in literature can't possibly be served by the industry's domination by four Manhattan publishing houses. It doesn't matter that Dostoevsky would have mangled Crime And Punishment had his goal been to write a suburban novel with a Tatar Raskolnikov, a lesbian Dunya, and a lower-class non-binary Razumikhin. None of that matters, because New York killed literature long ago.

Should Men Sue Women For Dating Expenses And Hookup Damages?

June 7, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Taking a page out of the feminist playbook and performing a long overdue role reversal, a Russian man is suing his ex-girlfriend for the expenses he incurred while dating her. Due to the inherent misandry and anti-male disposition of Western culture, which could spark a backlash, the attorney and ex-boyfriend wishes to remain anonymous but he did tell an interviewer:

> She can't prove that we were even in a relationship. I never said that I was giving her a present or a free ride. Is it immoral to go to court? Am I expected to give money to every woman on the street?

Let's reframe this issue from the "outdated" thinking of generations past. Indeed, the female expectation—that women are entitled to cash and prizes from men for going on dates and providing sexual favors—tells us women view dating as a sophisticated form of prostitution. In other words, for attention and sex during the relationship, she is entitled to "stuff" and the man is entitled to the bill. That mentality is evident in this case. After taking Nina Zgurskaya on a romantic vacation in Crimea, a 12-day holiday she suggested the couple embark on, she walked out on him because she did not get the proposal she wanted. Nina describes her flighty behavior in an interview:

> We went to Fedosia, Crimea, for 12 days and agreed that it was a romantic trip where he will propose to me. But it didn't happen. So I left. We've been in court > since October 2015. He filed two suits against me, for money transfers to me and for the holiday. He had receipts.

Just an opinion, but this sounds like she was trying to worm her way into exploiting the young lawyer's money, status, and power by sexing him up on an exotic vacation. She was already in his wallet as he was wiring her money. She thought she could get a proposal out of the deal to entitle herself to half his income and possibly more in divorce court, and the manipulation blew up in her face.

In turn, Nina received court papers a few weeks later demanding she refund flower, restaurant and café expenses her ex-boyfriend incurred while dating her. The court dismissed his first claim, but he filed a second one. (Bravo, man!) Her ex boyfriend is demanding around $700 in expenses, which does not seem like much to ask, considering the circumstances. Men are regularly expected to pay hundreds or thousands of dollars a month to ex-wives in alimony payments, even though today's liberated women supposedly Don't Need a Man™. If women are demanding equal pay, why do they need a man to pay for anything? She should happily refund his money.

The man claims he never agreed to be her boyfriend and had nothing more than a "working relationship" with Nina. Legal experts said the man had little chance of winning the case because he did not make Nina sign the receipts. Moreover, men are viewed as little more than sperm donors and meal tickets in the court system. However, the case speaks volumes about a change in mentality men are having worldwide.

Expecting entitlement to a man's money in exchange for dates and sexual favors is little more than sophisticated prostitution

Lessons Learned

The plaintiff's actions should be applauded by red pill men everywhere as we work towards men's liberation from sexist, feminist ideology that says men should be merry walking wallets who pay for everything from meals to vacations in Crimea, with women able to walk out on the relationship at any time, even after debts and other financial obligations have been made fulfilling their desires. We should be happy for the use and abuse, in other words.

Even though this is a hopeless case to win, it is causing stress for Nina in that she has to go to court and explain everything to a judge. If thousands, no, millions of men worldwide banded together and did the same thing a change could be forced on both the court system and women's condescension of men, treating us a little more than utilities to be exploited until our usefulness runs out.

The puss pass needs to be revoked in order to achieve equality. Recouping expenses incurred in failed relationships, especially if men starting keeping receipts and records would set a precedent that should be followed everywhere: women no longer get special privileges only because of their sex.

We can also glean yet another example of predatory female behavior and victim card playing from this case. Nina expected a proposal for offering herself up for a vacation, and when she didn't get what she wanted she walked out, more than likely expecting the young attorney to chase after like a lost puppy dog. However, an unpleasant surprise arrived in her mailbox a few weeks later when a summons showed up. What does she do? Go play the victim for getting sued.

In another case, a wealthy film producer is being sued for not disclosing she had herpes to a Tinder hookup partner

Tinder Hookup Herpes

In an unrelated, amusing case of men using the legal system game against women instead of the other way around, a Las Vegas man is suing a girl he met on Tinder for giving him herpes. The man, who is anonymously referred to in court documents as John Doe, said the woman gave him herpes after she explicitly requested he not use a condom because she was a "good Jewish mother."

His claims against the single mom include fraud, battery, willful misconduct, gross negligence and infliction of emotional distress. He is seeking $10,000 in damages for medical care expenses and loss of life enjoyment, as well as an unknown amount for punitive damages.

After waking up with painful herpes blisters, John Doe contacted his Tinder hookup. The woman, who is as reported by news sources a wealthy film producer, described having many hookups with men to the plaintiff on Tinder, then later told John Doe she "had no idea" her herpes could be transmitted even without an outbreak after he confronted her. Indeed, Tinder and its gay equivalent Grindr, have been connected with the spread of STDs and in creating a "dating apocalypse" in an already degenerate American culture. Charles Prince of Vegas Matchmakers, an offline dating agency, told interviewers:

> On her end of the scale, she should have been honest, but his decision to pursue > instant gratification is going to affect him the rest of his life. They both went on the site, they both knew what they were getting into: they were looking for a quick night of fun, a good time. Now he's paying the price and he doesn't like it.

Prince's comment represents willingness to give the producer the puss pass again. If the case had been reversed, the likelihood a man would be so easily forgiven for knowingly passing an STD to a women is very low.

If the only way to deal with the consequences of today's increasingly petty and degenerate dating market is to pursue legal recourse in the court system, more power to the men who use it to their advantage rather than allowing themselves to be eternal defendants. Women have been manipulating the legal system to their advantage a long time by playing the victim card. Now men are learning to play the victim game. If you can't beat 'em, join 'em.

Silicon Valley Darling Elizabeth Holmes Goes From A Net Worth Of $4.5 Billion To Zero

The woman touted as "the female Steve Jobs" has had her wealth revised by Forbes from $4.5 billion last year to $0 this month. Elizabeth Holmes, whose name has been associated with all manner of feminist attempts to claim that women are inherently awesome at business, founded the blood-testing company Theranos. Yet Theranos has been involved in scandal after scandal recently, largely based on the company's obsession with secrecy and claiming without verification that its Edison blood-testing device is "revolutionary."

On the back of what appears to be sensationalized statements about the Edison device, Theranos has raised hundreds of millions of dollars in investor money. The allegedly illegal manner in which that money was raised has even led recently to the opening of criminal investigations by both the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and the northern California district of the US Attorney's Office. Others have accused Theranos of consumer fraud. Like with the likely criminal charges, should just one of the pending customer lawsuits succeed, it is hard to see how Holmes could not have been intricately involved in any wrongdoing. The company has already admitted its products fall well below what it itself has said about them–it had to reissue two whole years of blood tests because of rampant inaccuracies.

Even the perennial feminist propaganda mouthpieces are having to report on (some of) the major facts

Forbes' frank admission is glaring not just for the rapid decline in Holmes' theoretical astronomical wealth. The more revealing aspect, rather, is how the publication has gone from trumpeting the mere smell of the Stanford dropout to questioning both her credibility and underlying honesty. An article by Fortune was even more savage. Forbes' rival pointed out that Holmes should never have been considered a billionaire in the first place, even though it, too, had made the mistake of referring to her as such.

Additional publications, Inc. among them, have been quietly juxtaposing the seeming downfall of Elizabeth Holmes, which started in earnest last year, with the stories of established business fraudsters. Whilst not overtly disseminating fraud accusations against the founder herself, the implied allegations are obvious.

That these allegations are even circulating so widely in mainstream print is an anomaly. Over recent years, outlets such as Forbes, Fortune and Inc. have regressed into the pumping out of feel-good pop psychology pieces and, frequently enough, contrived SJW propaganda. For example, all three have engaged in ridiculous fawning over Gamergate liars Anita Sarkeesian and Brianna Wu. [1] [2] [3] The disasters enveloping Theranos and the world of Elizabeth Holmes have been sufficient for usually highly biased coverage to shift markedly given the typical leftist media climate.

Problematically, though, most outlets have been extraordinarily reticent to associate Elizabeth Holmes herself with potential criminal conduct, despite the huge control she wields over Theranos and the number of technology patents registered in her name. More so than, say, Facebook's Mark Zuckerberg, Holmes continues to carve out a reputation as a hands-on manager. And then there's that fixation on secrecy, which, thanks to media, governmental and Silicon Valley acquiescence, has allowed Theranos and Holmes to operate without proper scrutiny. Compulsive secrecy is bad enough when the company offers a social media platform, but it is particularly unacceptable when the big business in question is in the healthcare industry, on which the lives of millions of people literally depend.

Was there a cover-up?

General James Mattis went from fielding Elizabeth Holmes' emails, which requested the suppression of concerns about her company's products, to being on her board of directors.

We live in a very heavily populated world. Despite the overall leftist bent of the media, there are countless newspaper reporters who would be nominally willing to put career advancement ahead of leftwing ideology and publish about the Theranos debacle much earlier and in much greater detail. So why didn't they? The answer probably lies in the repeated attempts of powerful interests to dial down any negative attention focused on Elizabeth Holmes and her corporate project.

One failure deserves special attention. Months before Holmes' $0 net worth evaluation, The Washington Post revealed that she had petitioned a now retired US Marines commander, General James Mattis, to quash concerns within the military that Theranos' market offerings were bonafide duds. One military official was so flabbergasted by a lack of medical and other evidence behind the company's products that they sought a Food and Drug Administration (FDA) investigation. This desire for greater testing of Theranos' claims, in a context of soldiers' lives being at risk, amounted to nothing. Also, Mattis found himself appointed to a Theranos board position some time later. If this does not raise ethics alarm bells for you, I do not know what will.

I am not one for conspiracy theories, but even the simplest kinds of third party due diligence could have exposed the apparent scam of Theranos years ago. Having patents for products in no ways prevents determinations about their efficacy. And in the case of information suppressions like within the US military, any earlier fact-finding missions were promptly jackknifed.

This is what happens when you put "females in business" above actual business success

Oppressed female workers, clearly.

Under the rules of "gender equality," because we had Steve Jobs, we needed a female Steve Jobs. So media outlets and others came together to create one in Elizabeth Holmes. It did not matter that one could make out how well an iPhone or MacBook worked based on personal use, whereas a blood testing device should be looked at and evaluated intensely by independent experts. What did matter was that Holmes could serve an ideological purpose: women are not as good as men at business, they are even better.

The end result is that many investors have almost certainly been fleeced or at the very least shortchanged, customers have been ripped off, and the lives of the sick and vulnerable, who depend on accurate health tests, have been gravely jeopardized.

Once again, feminism says it helps society when it really undermines and endangers it.

Osta-Red (Ostarine): The Holy Grail For Natural Athletes?

June 7, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Red Supplements

There are so many "steroid alternative" products that have hit the market over the years that when something seems too good to be true, it almost always is, and it's actually usually complete and utter crap.

However, since the conception of SARMs, there has been promise invigorated back into the supplement industry. This one WILL NOT disappoint you like all the others will, and I'm going to tell you why.

What Is Ostarine? What The Hell is A SARM?

Ostarine is a selective androgen receptor modulator (SARM for short) which has been studied and proven to significantly improve lean body mass and physical function.

It also exhibits increases in tendon strength, ligament health, bone density and collagen turn-over.

Ostarine is a specific type of SARM that has proven to be very effective at building lean muscle tissue, burning fat, and increasing strength as well as endurance past the point your natural genetics would allow you otherwise.

It is important to note, that while Ostarine isn't a steroid, it still exerts anabolic effects in muscle and bone formidable to the results one could expect from a mild dose of certain less harsh steroids.

So Ostarine Isn’t A Steroid But It Can Give You The Same Benefits Steroids Do?

Ostarine isn’t as strong as most steroids are. HOWEVER, I think it certainly does deliver muscle gains and body recomposition benefits comparable to modest doses of certain “milder” steroids.

I would assert that mild doses of Equipoise, Primobolan, or low doses of Anavar provide similar results to a recommended dose of Ostarine.

Realistic expectations must be made when you start using this supplement though.

It won’t pack on 15-20 pounds of lean muscle on you in a few months; however, you definitely can expect LEAN gains upwards of 5-10 pounds in my opinion with a decent diet and training regimen.

5-10 pounds of muscle is still a HUGE gain, and the results will certainly be even more dramatic for an individual who has never touched performance enhancing supplements in their lives before.

Ostarine Is A Great Alternative For Those Who Don’t Want To Use Steroids

Ostarine binds to the androgen receptor via the same process anabolic steroids do, but have a selective process in which they work on the receptors in your body (hence the category of supplements being named: SELECTIVE androgen receptor modulators).

This selectivity allows Ostarine to deliver some of the same anabolic activity normal steroids would, but without the nasty androgenic related side effects that natural athletes want to avoid like hair loss, testicle shrinkage, testosterone shutdown, infertility, bitch tits (gyno), etc.

Most steroids convert to DHT or Estrogen, and when the body is subjected to higher than normal levels of those two hormones you have the increased chance of a huge myriad of unwanted side effects.

Those side effects will be non-existent during the use of Ostarine.

A lot of direct parallels can be made between certain steroids and Ostarine not only because of increase in muscle mass it causes, but the increase in nitrogen retention as well as the improvement of joint mobility and ligament strength it causes.

What you can expect from Ostarine are respectable and easy to maintain gains in lean muscle mass, strength and endurance with little to no side effects.

Can I Bulk Up Or Cut Down On Ostarine? Will It Benefit Me In Either Scenario?

The anabolic attributes of Ostarine make it the perfect addition to any bulk or cut phase. Regardless of your physique goals, Ostarine has benefit in any training regimen.

For example, if you are cutting in a calorie deficit Ostarine will retain a much greater amount of muscle (if not all of it) than you would be able to hold onto naturally.

Alternatively, if you are trying to bulk up in a calorie surplus to gain muscle or strength, Ostarine will bring you far more lean muscle gains and strength gains than you would otherwise be able to achieve naturally.

Also, if you are simply trying to lose a bit of fat and gain a bit of muscle, Ostarine works great as a body recomposition supplement as well.

Real Life OSTA-RED Experience And Results

This is Derek, he set a goal for his Ostarine cycle to cut as much body fat as possible or at least get into the sub 9-10% body fat range without losing any muscle.

The results speak for themselves:

Osta-Red Before And After

“I lost no strength and I didn’t lose any lean muscle tissue, and I was able to get to around 8-9% body fat with only 3 cardio sessions per week at about 25-30 minutes a piece at my most involved portion of the cut which took 6 weeks.” – Derek

“I actually gained a few reps on a few of my compound lifts during that Ostarine cycle so it is arguable that I gained a bit of lean muscle despite being in a calorie deficit.” – Derek

What Dose of Ostarine Should I Be Using?

Diminishing returns seem to start at around the 37.5 mg per day mark.

We recommend that you use 25-37.5 mg per day for 6 weeks to achieve optimal results with the least chance of side effects.

If you choose to do another Ostarine cycle, we recommend that you complete your PCT phase and then take as many weeks off as you were on Ostarine for.

This will ensure your body has fully recovered and that your androgen receptors are fully refreshed so your body is primed to deliver great results again during your next cycle.

In other words, the gains from Ostarine will eventually plateau if you don’t take time off from it by cycling it on and off.

Ostarine has a very convenient half-life of 23.8 hours, so timing your dosing schedule and popping pills a certain amount of hours apart several times per day is totally unnecessary.

Once per day dosing is the most effective way to ensure you get the biggest peak in your blood plasma serum levels from Ostarine, so take your daily dose in its’ entirety all at once at the same time each day. Easy to remember and simple.

I just take mine right when I wake up before breakfast.

Is PCT Necessary Afterwards/Is There Testosterone Suppression On Ostarine?

Those who choose to try higher than average dosing protocols may find their testosterone levels slightly suppressed in rare instances.

Don't fret if this happens, it is very temporary and if you follow the recommended dosing instructions you will very likely not even encounter this side effect.

To offset the slight chance that you experience a bit of testosterone suppression, it is highly recommended that you complete a PCT (post-cycle therapy) after your Ostarine cycle finishes. This means literally the day after your last Ostarine dose, you begin your PCT.

We highly recommend you use this PCT supplement linked below for your PCT phase.

Red Supplement's "RED-PCT" product contains a potent natural testosterone booster and a potent aromatase inhibitor (lowers your estrogen levels back to a healthy range if they are elevated).

Red-PCT will expedite your recovery process to bring your testosterone levels back up to where they naturally should be and were previous to your Ostarine cycle.

Even if you don't experience any testosterone suppression on Ostarine, it is still highly recommended to complete the PCT to solidify and retain your gains from the Ostarine cycle you just ran.

It's better to be safe than sorry, so I recommend that everybody who does an Ostarine cycle do a full PCT to ensure their test levels have recovered to homeostasis.

20 Things Deeply Wrong With Australia

June 8, 2016 | by Hamish Rangi | Link | Original Link

We've talked before about the many reasons how Australia is degenerating into a SJW paradise. Let's review 20 of them.

1. An absolutely repulsive media landscape

…which routinely resorts to subterfuge or outright lies in order to advance the feminist and progressive agenda, dominating the national discourse. Fact checking and truth reporting are either complete afterthoughts or are non-existent altogether.

People like Roosh can post article after article after article confirming that he is neither a "men's rights activist," nor advocates rape on private property (it was a thought experiment), and the Australian media genuinely won't care.

> Q: "Why do you want to legalize rape?"
> I don't. Legalizing rape is a notion so insanely absurd I never imagined that people would take it 100% seriously, including politicians. I don't believe any form of physical violence against men or women should be legalized. I've said that "How To Stop Rape" was a satirical thought experiment so many times that it's clear to me current misinterpretation of it by the media is deliberate. – Roosh V

Lies, damn lies, and emotional manipulation

2. Anti white male bias

The feminist Australian media will quickly resort to witch-hunting of white male public figures within their own country, if they dare to not march lockstep with the social justice narrative.

Using the expected straw man and appeal to emotion fallacies, the media lambasted the conservative Australian senator Cory Bernardi for re-tweeting an intellectually insightful article from Roosh, which was laughably deemed both irresponsible and "dangerous".

If you speak up for common sense in Australia, you will be shunned

3. Regulation

Australia is one of the most over-regulated countries in the world, which makes the cost of starting and running a business enterprise, and ultimately the goods and services they provide, astronomically high.

what….a….friggin…..HEADACHE

4. False egalitarian pride

Australia takes a false sense of egalitarian pride in the “high” minimum wage of slightly over $17 AUD per hour ($12.75 US at 75 cent exchange rate). This is despite the fact that sticker prices of goods and services are often more than twice that of the equivalent product in the United States.

That $4.97 whole chicken at a U.S. Sam’s Club will be in the vicinity of $15 in Australia, and that 99 cent candy bar in the U.S. will be $2.50 or more in Australia. A pint of beer at the local pub can be more than $10. So what difference does it make?

This maybe still gets you a pint down at the local pub

5. Backpackers

Australia has a peculiar habit of sending swarms of its most boorish and aggressive young men on lengthy backpacking trips across southeast Asia, Latin America, and Europe every year.

These traits are often greatly at odds with the personalities of most other backpacker nationalities, who are often far more mellow, respectful, and inclusive of people from different cliques. If a fight ever breaks out at a popular backpacker bar, or somebody is ejected from a hostel for belligerent behavior, chances are it was probably an Australian. The “Ugly American” stereotype honestly needs to be handed over to these guys.

ye wanna fight ya cunt!?

6. Melbourne sucks

Melbourne is laughably lauded as the “world’s most livable city” when in fact it’s anything but. With one of the world’s most wildly overpriced property and housing markets, $500,000 may not even get you a simple bungalow with a sand-box sized yard in a neighborhood which may be many kilometers away from the CBD or a beach.

The unspectacular weather, bland beaches, rip-off restaurants, snobby women, and rampant social justice environment means that men with financial resilience and the means to escape should go somewhere abroad which is “less livable” (more livable).

Melbourne. It appears nice but…

7. Kindness is punished

Australia boasts kindness-is-mistaken-for-weakness “dating” culture where men, whether local or foreign, who behave rationally, calmly, and with good manners may be unduly punished into an almost sexless existence in their youth.

Australian women like to sleep with obnoxious and aloof bad boys while in their late teenage and 20-something prime at a rate which is even noticeably higher than their North American counterparts.

With few exceptions, we'll only sleep with aloof jerks while we're under 27!

8. The personalities of the women

Australian women are often rude, snobby, condescending, dismissive, feminist, degenerate, career obsessed, and travel obsessed to the point of completely forgoing family formation in huge numbers.

Women who have backpacked extensively around the world in their 20's often have notch counts beyond the half century mark and are highly unlikely to be able to pair bond well with a single man who could be husband and father material.

The unmarried and childless former Prime Minister of 'Straya

9. The men won't reproduce with the women

Australian men, tired of both the poor quality of local women, their sky-high expectations, and sensing that a marriage with them would be doomed from the start, are among the world's highest takers of foreign-born brides per capita in the world.

Brazilian, Colombian, Polish, Russian, Japanese, Vietnamese, or Filipina ladies often blow Australian women completely out of the water in regards to their looks, attitudes, femininity, and overall positive relationship qualities.

What’s on offer in 2010’s ‘Straya

10. The terrain

It’s not the fault of human beings, but a few hidden gems aside, interior Australia is a barren and unattractive place where the natural beauty simply cannot compare to the national park systems of the U.S., Canada, central Europe, or neighboring New Zealand.

Fancy spending $1,000 or more on return flights, road transportation, accommodation, and heavily price-inflated food in order to see a big rock?

11. Lack of proper search and seizure laws

Lack of a similar equivalent to the U.S. 4th amendment (the right of the people to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures without probable cause that a crime has been committed) means that Australian drivers are regularly subjected to state encroachment and police harassment.

Guilty-until-proven-innocent breathalyzer checkpoints and shanking operations to fine drivers for slightly expired registrations or warrant-of-fitness stickers are the norm.

Americans can be proud they do not have to be subjected to this

12. Even the cops are degenerates

Australia has a degenerate-friendly police force where butt ugly and visible tattoos are no barrier to being hired. This sets an extremely poor example to young people and creates an outright unprofessional appearance for one of the world's highest paid law enforcement entities.

Another day, another no-refusal breathalyzer checkpoint by a scumbag Aussie cop

13. Weathered-looking women

Incessant sun exposure creates arguably the most prematurely aged looking population of all Western nations, especially in the state of Queensland.

14. Anti-American sentiment

Many Australians tend to have a very ambivalent attitude towards American tourists (minus attractive young females), and will casually refer to all of them by the irritating term “Yanks”, even if they are from the Deep South (translation: not yankees).

So what do Australians get for all this tepid treatment and cultural ignorance when they come to the US? Routinely being treated like rock stars everywhere they go, all the while completely stiffing U.S. service workers who rely almost entirely on tips to supplement their starvation wages.

The poor attitude far too many Aussies take in the U.S.

15. Promotion of homosexuality

Flamboyant homosexuals and transgenders are openly embraced and “celebrated” at the Sydney Mardi Gras, in full public view of children who don’t yet understand the nature of human sex and what is supposed to be common and decent.

16. Immunity for women in the corporate environment

Australia is a nation where disrespectful and unprofessional women can make snide, embarrassing, and humiliating remarks to male coworkers on a television newscast and suffer no serious consequences from HR, feminists, or social justice warriors.

17. Suffocating diversity quotas

Over-the-top diversity laws and entirely pro-female human resource departments are making office environments increasingly hostile places for white Australian men to work. Male office workers are increasingly finding out they have to be careful with everything they say and do, or else face the wrath of HR.

18. Pedestalization of women

Australia is a country where women's interests and concerns are elevated to almost demigod status, while men's problems are routinely brushed aside as non-issues. The large numbers of homeless men in the capital cities can just crawl into a gutter and die for all they care.

Melbourne – The world's most livable city (for women)

19. Hatred for heterosexual males

Shaming a specific gender in public is completely acceptable. That is, only if the ridicule and scorn is directed against "cisgender" males.

Melbourne looks like such a great place for men doesn't it?

20. Rampant cultural Marxism

It's not just subtle like it is in many other countries, it's literally in your face. This picture was captured outside Melbourne's Etihad Stadium in August 2014, where the advertisements are insinuating that multicultural "programs" will build better neighborhoods (because nearly all-white Australian neighborhoods are such horrendous places to live), and that these de-whitened neighborhoods should of course be "celebrated".

When you consider these points, Australia no longer seems like such a desirable place to travel or live. At least, not if you're a masculine man.

Crooked Hillary Accepts Democratic Party Nomination In Ravishing Chairman Mao Outfit

June 8, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via CNN:

Hillary Clinton claimed her place in history Tuesday as America's first female presumptive presidential nominee but rival Bernie Sanders is refusing to drop his bid despite overwhelming odds.

The former secretary of state immediately pivoted from her victory to a full bore assault on the presumptive Republican nominee Donald Trump and made a sweeping effort to reach out to Sanders supporters in an attempt to unify Democrats.
Primary results maps

But hours after Clinton's euphoric victory rally in Brooklyn, Sanders spoke before a roaring crowd of his own in California to declare "the struggle continues." The Vermont senator pledged to stay in the race through next week's primary in Washington, D.C., and to fight on for social, economic, racial and environmental justice at the Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia.

But he did not specifically commit to pursuing his fight for the nomination at the convention, leaving his ultimate intentions unclear.

President Barack Obama, who waited until voting ended in the last six primary states to weigh in on the race, called both candidates to congratulate them for "running inspiring campaigns that have energized Democrats," according to a White House statement.

But the President, who will meet with Sanders Thursday at the Vermont senator's request, clearly sided with Clinton by lauding her for "securing the delegates necessary to clinch the Democratic nomination for President."

"Her historic campaign inspired millions and is an extension of her lifelong fight for middle-class families and children," the statement said.

Reaching the highest peak yet in a tumultuous and trailblazing political career, Clinton claimed victory exactly eight years after folding her 2008 Democratic primary campaign against Obama.

"Thanks to you, we've reached a milestone," she said during a speech in Brooklyn. "Tonight's victory is not about one person. It belongs to generations of women and men who struggled and sacrificed and made this moment possible."

Her long-awaited moment of celebration came as she notched wins in the night's primaries in New Jersey, South Dakota and New Mexico Democratic primaries, according to CNN projections. By 2:30 a.m. ET, she had a lead of 400,000 votes in the California primary, which has 475 delegates — the most on offer in the entire nominating season. Sanders won victories in North Dakota and Montana.

Clinton took the stage in Brooklyn to an explosion of cheers from her crowd, in the kind of eruption of enthusiasm that has been fleeting during much of her campaign. Clearly delighted, she stood with her arms outstretched on stage, savoring the adulation. Reaching out to Sanders supporters, Clinton praised the Vermont senator for his long public service and mirrored some of his progressive economic rhetoric. She played down any notion of divisions and said their vigorous primary campaign was "very good for the Democratic Party and for America."

But in a sign of the task she faces in uniting the party, Sanders supporters loudly booed her name when he said he had received a "gracious" call from his rival and said he had congratulated her on her victories on Tuesday.

Sanders confounded the notion that the end of the state primary races would mean the end of his campaign.

"Next Tuesday, we continue the fight in the last primary in Washington DC," Sanders said. "We are going to fight hard to win the primary in Washington, D.C., and then we take our fight for social, economic, racial and environmental justice to Philadelphia." "I am pretty good at arithmetic and I know that the fight in front of us in a very, very steep fight."

But Sanders vowed to fight on for every delegate and every vote.

Clinton vs. Trump

While Sanders signaled that he was not yet ready to fold a campaign that started with him as a fringe candidate and ignited a startling grass roots uprising that won more than 10 million votes, Clinton looked ahead to the general election.

Clinton intensified her assault on Trump, laying out a case that his values and rhetoric are incompatible with American principles and that he's "temperamentally unfit" to be President.

“He is not just trying to build a wall between America and Mexico. He is trying to wall of Americans from each other. When he says let’s make America great again, that is code for let’s take American backwards.”

She hit Trump hard for his recent attacks on a judge with Mexican ancestry along with mocking a disabled reporter and calling “women pigs.”

“He wants to win by stoking fear and rubbing salt in wounds and reminding us daily just how great he is.”

Clinton also signaled a robust challenge to Trump resonating with gender and personal themes. She spoke of how her late mother, Dorothy Rodham, taught her “never to back down from a bully.”

The First Review Of My New Book Free Speech Isn't Free

June 8, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have no idea how a new book of mine will be perceived before I release it. When you edit a book multiple times, you become so familiar with it that you can't really judge it, similar to how a parent who loves his daughter assumes that she's beautiful (even if she's not). So I'm happy that early reviews from those who received a review copy are positive.

Here's the first review of the book from a forum member:

> Free Speech Isn't Free is a riveting first-hand story about how the media establishment and some government officials tried to shut down one man's speech — and failed miserably. Roosh starts with a historical lesson by Quintus Curtius on how freedom of speech evolved over time, and how shaming and intimidation tactics are used to limit speech today in the age of the Internet.
> He tells a compelling and honest story on how his idea of a world tour about neomasculinity was born. While the book is entertaining, it is also a humble read. During his tour, Roosh shows how he learned from the men attending his lectures. He built upon what he'd learned to create a fast-growing neomasculinity movement without allowing his own ego to get in the way. Reading about the growth and evolution of the man behind the world tour is nothing short of extraordinary.
> In chilling prose, Roosh connects the dots between seemingly unrelated issues such as sexual harassment, gay marriage, declining birth rates, single parenthood, open-borders immigration, welfare, abortion, gun control, etc, to expose a depopulation agenda — to destroy the family unit — being pushed deliberately by the globalist elites. He also describes how these elites are using the media and feminists as foot soldiers to help further their globalist agenda, > and to prevent strong men from fighting back.

> When Roosh recounts his experience in Montreal, Toronto, and the Meetup Outrage, strap in your seat belts. You're in for quite a ride.
> Roosh tells his story in a timeline full of bizarre plot twists, comedy, shocking revelations, disinformation campaigns, and touching displays of unwavering loyalty from his followers at their own personal risk. You'll not only discover how the media, social justice warriors, and even government officials fight information wars against ordinary people, but also how you can fight back.
> The way he describes his journey allows you to imagine that you're right by his side the whole time, living vicariously through everything he had experienced: overcoming the fear of public speaking, the enlightening discourse with intelligent men he'd met, the incredible stress resulting from getting smeared with outright lies propagated by the media, having beer tossed on his head by a mob, and even graphic death threats that prompted him to hire a bodyguard service.
> Most importantly, as you read Roosh's new book, you feel the author's gritty determination and resolve to fight back against the feminist-controlled media by enabling like-minded men to congregate with each other without a politically correct filter. His brutally honest and courageous writing does not fail to hold the reader's attention and keep the pages turning.
> Finally, if you believe in protecting your right to free speech and pursuit of the truth, get this book. Today.

And here is a brief video review from Davis Aurini:

My new book, Free Speech Isn't Free, gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with an agenda that promotes censorship and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against leftist attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help fund our operation.

How To Take The Perfect Shot With A Firearm

June 8, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

In previous articles, we discussed the steps in firing a shot, with both proper sight picture and trigger control. Good shot control will result in small, tight groups of holes on your target, but what if those groups are not centered on your bulls eye? Instead of randomly dialing in correction to your sights and then chasing subsequent shots across your target, in today's column we'll discuss the correct and fast way to efficiently adjust your sights to put your group of shots exactly where it should be.

The Three Measurements of Shooting

There are three elements involved in shooting besides you yourself, and those are your sights, your gun, and the target. These all speak different languages, to make a poor analogy, and you need to be able to translate between the three. On your target, the distance away from the center of the group to the center of the target is measured in distance, which is typically inches or centimeters. Your gun shoots a pattern of shots that disperse into an ever-increasing angular spread as your distance from the target increases, and that is measured in minutes or mils. Finally, your sights increment in measured amounts called clicks because of the tactile and audible click the detents make as you move them.

	I	M	C

Use a grid like this or similar.

If you use the standard measurement system, this results in a system called IMC (Inches, Minutes, and Clicks.) Metric is also done the same way, just with centimeters, mils, and clicks. Coupled with Windage and Elevation (left/right, and up/down, respectively), you can formulaically compute and log your corrections needed to your sights and only have to make one adjustment to get your next group on target.

What's a "moa"?

You may have heard the phrase "It's a sub-moa rifle," and maybe wondered what that meant. MOA, in addition to being a dead bird in New Zealand and a shopping mall in Minnesota, is an acronym used in the shooting sports as Minutes of Angle. Angles are measured in degrees or radians, and, as any trigonometry student that ever put their scientific calculator into the wrong mode knows, they both accomplish the same thing, but go about it in different ways. MOA uses the degree system, and milliradians, abbreviated to mils, uses the radian method.

Ideally, each shot from a rifle aimed at the same point would hit that same point. In reality, even when we clamp down the rifle to avoid shooter error, and use the best ammo to avoid those errors too, the bullets coming out the barrel will angularly deflect off the true flight path a certain amount, and this will result in a small group on a close up target, and a large group on a far away target, as the bullet has more time to spread out from a perfect shot because of a longer flight.

We must measure this, then, in angles. 360 degrees in a circle, using just one degree over a distance of one hundred yards yields us a spread on the paper of 62.83 inches, if I get my trig right, which is an unusable measurement, as it is not precise enough. However, 1/60th of that angle would be a usable 1.047 inch spread on the paper at 100 yards. Just like a minute is 1/60th of an hour, a minute of angle is 1/60th of a degree of angle.

Radians, of which there are 2π in a circle, are also too big, so milliradians, of which there are 6283 in a circle are used instead. The angular "mil" used in shooting is 1/6400 of a circle, so 1 mil = 3.85 inches at 100 meters, or 9.78 centimeters. Typically, 1/10th mil is used as an increment, so you end with the very useful 1/10th mil = 1 cm at 100 meters, and 1 MOA = 1 inch at 100 yards.

Range Card Examples

Both are based on real ballistics for a 308 Win firing Federal's Gold Medal Match Ammo with 175gr Sierra MatchKing bullets at 2600 fps

MIL

Range (yd)	Elev (mil)	Wind (mil)
600	4.8	1.5
625	5.2	1.6
650	5.5	1.7
675	5.9	1.8
700	6.3	1.9
725	6.6	2.0

MOA

Range (yd)	Elev (MOA)	Wind (MOA)
600	16.50	5.2
625	17.75	5.5
650	19.00	5.8
675	20.25	6.1
700	21.50	6.4
725	22.75	6.7

2 digits 4 digits

Some say you deal with less digits with mils, and some say MOA is easier to conceptualize; use whichever works.

We're going to use MOA for the rest of the article, as I know it better. So, if a MOA is 1 inch at 100 yards, someone saying a gun is a sub MOA gun means that it shoots a group into a target at 100 yards that is smaller than an inch apart. Cool.

Now, angular measurements increase and decrease with distance. A minute of angle is worth 1 inch at 100 yards, but it's worth two inches at two hundred yards, and four inches at four hundred yards. It's also worth 1/4 inch at 25 yards. So, our sub-MOA gun will shoot a group a quarter inch apart at 25 yards, and 4 inches apart at 400 yards.

The important take-away for this particular discussion is not that group size increases as distance increases (although that's useful), it's that the distance from the center of your target that your group is will ALSO increase with distance along the same lines. You cannot say "I want to move my sights to move the group 2 inches on the target" because the amount of correction your sights will need varies on how far away that target that is two inches off is. You have to think angularly, not linearly. As we talk about targets, this will become clear.

Target Correction

You'll have a group on paper that will, on a not-sighted in rifle, not be on the center of the target. People get very confused at this point about how to articulate what to do. Is "the bullet left and high" or "I need to go right and low"?

The best thing to do is speak in terms of what you need to do, and write it down, with the direction. Write “Up 2 inches and Right 1/2 inch” and, that way, you’ll always know that you need to move it that way.

This guy wrote what his shots did, and not what he needs to do, but he did circle it and measure from the center and write on the target, all of which is important.

However, here is the critical part from the takeaway of MOA. Know that the amount of correction depends on the amount of MOA you are off, not the inches you are off. A gun that is 1 inch off to the left at 100 yards requires the same 1 MOA adjustment to the right that a gun is off 2 inches to the left at 200 yards will require. More relevantly, since you should be sighting in at a close distance, like 25 yards, that same gun with the same problem will be 1/4 inch to the left at 100 yards and require the SAME ONE MOA correction to the right.

Before you head back to the firing line, write down the MOA you need to go, and what direction, for both windage and elevation.

Clicks

Ok, so the target speaks inches, the gun shoots in MOA, and the sights adjust in clicks. How do we convert clicks to the MOA data I just brought back from the firing line?

Adjustable sights increment in clicks, and that click is worth some fraction of a MOA, or a mil. Scopes also click in those increments. If you are running good iron sights, like on an M1 Garand or a Springfield M1A, the elevation and windage is in 1 MOA per click amounts (although to zero them horizontally you should be sliding the front sight on its dovetail.) TechSights, a popular shooting sight upgrade company, usually get you 1/2 MOA per click. Scopes are usually 1/4 MOA per click, although they may say “4 clicks = 1 inch at 100 yards” on the dial, but that’s the same thing as 1/4 MOA per click, as a MOA is 1 inch at 100 yards, remember.

Non-zeroable scope dial. Note the text about what the clicks do.

The upshot of all this is you need to know how much movement the sights on your gun do per click. That's assuming they even click in the first place. If you have more rudimentary sights on your carry pistol that are "drift adjustable," that means you beat them with a brass punch or a sight drifter bit by bit to get them right. A lot of stock rifle sights leave a lot to be desired, as well, and the two best things you can do to a rifle are upgrade the sights, and put on a good sling. TechSights are good iron sights, and slings will be the subject of a future article.

Tech Sights. Adjustable (but not zeroable) for windage and elevation in the rear, and elevation in the front.

Remember to go the right way in your sight adjustments. Scopes will often have an arrow pointing one way around the dial with a U or an R or something meaning “go this way for up.” This corresponds with the same data you took earlier that always means “I need to go this way.”

Iron sights are a mixed bag. Some front sights can be windage adjustable, some are elevation adjustable. Most rear sights are elevation adjustable, and some are windage adjustable. The idea to remember with irons is the acronym FORS, or Forward Opposite, Reverse Same. Or remember that your rear sight is closer to you, and is your buddy, and will work with you; whereas your front sight is far away, your enemy, and works against you.

Either way, your rear sight moves in the same direction you want the impact to go. If the bullet is hitting low and left, you will want to go up and right. Adjusting your rear sight up and right will do that for you. Also, adjusting your front sight the opposite, low and left, will also do the same for you.

The M1A and Garand have the same sights. Note how the front sight is driftable on the dovetail slider; this lets you sight it in with the back sight zeroed for windage.

Before we put it all together, let’s talk zeroing versus sighting in. Sighting in simply means that your gun sights are set to put a bullet on the bulls eye at the distance you are currently away from the target. That’s all it means, and most pistol sights and cheap iron rifle sights, and most scopes are that way. Most hunters will set their scopes on their rifles to be “on at 50 and 200,” which means that the gun is sighted in at 50, will be a little high at 100 yards, and back on target as the bullet drops at 200 yards, then drop off as range increases.

Note how the windage (left/right) is at mechanical zero (centered) on this Garand. It’s backed all the way down elevation-wise as 7 or 8 clicks up would get you about to the line below the 2 on the left dial for 100 yards, so it’s probably zeroed elevation wise as well.

Zeroing is more advanced, and is used by people who want their sights on target at multiple distances. This becomes important in long range shooting, and is something we’ll go in depth into in a ballistics article, but the idea is that, not only is the gun sighted in at the distance you are shooting, but the dials on the scope turrets or iron sight adjustment knobs are set relative to the sight adjustment themselves so that the range on the dials, or the MOA on the turrets, matches the distance you are shooting, or the amount of correction you want to add, respectively. This is so you can crank the sights on the fly to the distance you want, aim center mass, and hit shit, as opposed to having to add Kentucky Windage and aim a foot above a target that is a long way off.

Zeroable scope turret. Sight it in, then loosen the set screw and move the dials to 0 and 0, hence “zeroed” at that range. If zeroed at 100 yards, cranking the top dial to “2” would add 2MOA, which is usually right for 200 yards.

Putting it together

Let’s make a hypothetical example to put it together. We’re shooting 25 yards at a target made on quarter inch graph paper (which is really useful for this exercise.) The center of our group is 3/4 of an inch high, and is 2 inches to the left of the center of the target.

We write down “go down 3/4 inch and right 2 inches.” We then remember that, at 25 yards, a MOA is worth 1/4 inch, so we do some math, and realize we need to “go down 3 MOA, and right 8 MOA.”

We go back to our rifle, and read on our scope “1 click = 1/4 inch at 100 yards” and realize we have a scope that does 1 click for every 1/4 MOA, so we need to multiple our MOA by 4 clicks per MOA to get our number of clicks. This means we need to put in 12 clicks down to get 3 MOA down, and 32 clicks right to get 8 MOA right. Ideally, our next shots will be right on target, but, if not, we will go downrange, get more data, and do more correction. This idea of shoot, get data, then correct and shoot again is often called the Rifleman’s Dance, and doing it precisely will save you time and money.

Conclusion

This is the third article in a series on basic shooting and sighting in guns, mainly rifles. Once you know how to shoot well, and have sighted in your rifle at one distance, you can adjust your sights or how much you “hold over” (aim above) the target to score hits at longer ranges. We’ll get to an article on ballistics soon. Until then, be safe.

What The Coming Race War Will Look Like

June 9, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The 2016 presidential is shaping up to be one of the ugliest in recent history. After eight years of racial agitation under the Obama administration and social justice warriors run wild, race relations have reached a low point. We may even be witnessing the beginnings of a race war.

The evidence

At a recent Trump rally in San Jose California, a white woman was egged by a group of Hispanic men. The men waved the Mexican flag while screaming “fuck you!” in her face. The woman was merely exercising her right to attend a rally for the Republican presidential nominee.

In the video below, a white man is sucker punched by a man who is carrying a Mexican flag. Also, a white boy is chased by a crowd of non-white protestors because of his support of Trump.

Official approval of racial violence

The anti-Trump protestors are propagating the same message as Hillary. What a coincidence!

Recently, Hillary Clinton has changed her campaign approach. She has gone from emphasizing her supposed expertise and competence to using Trump's German heritage to imply that he is a new Hitler.

Dilbert creator Scott Adams explains why Hillary's new approach is so dangerous.

> The only downside I can see to [Hillary's] new approach is that it is likely to trigger a race war in the United States. And I would be a top-ten assassination target in that scenario because once you define Trump as Hitler, you also give citizens moral permission to kill him. And obviously it would be okay to kill anyone who actively supports a genocidal dictator, including anyone who wrote about his persuasion skills in positive terms. (I'm called an "apologist" on Twitter, or sometimes just Joseph Goebbels).

Why are they doing this?

Anti-white provocateur Jesse Benn is doing his part to encourage violence

The most obvious reason is that they are trying to get white Trump supporters to lash out at illegal immigrants or blacks. If that happens, the left will be able to paint Trump and his supporters as inherently violent. This would allow a weak, unattractive candidate like Clinton to paint herself as a hero battling the forces of violence, hate, and ignorance. In other words, it might make Hillary, the poster child for political corruption, appear good.

Another, darker possibility is that the left is trying to create a situation where nationalists are regarded as enemies of the state. This could open the door to legal action, and even military action, against nationalist groups. If Hillary were to get into power, she could use any violence committed by whites, even in self-defense, as an excuse to push draconian gun laws that all but repeal the Second Amendment.

But the left is playing a dangerous game. By trying to stop the rise of nationalism by encouraging racial hatred they are flirting with starting a cycle of violence that has not been seen in the US for decades.

What will the battle lines be?

The narrative that is being peddled is that there are two divisions of humanity: white people and “People of Color (POC).” White people are responsible for all the bad things in the world: racism, slavery, colonialism, wars, the Crusades, transgender discrimination, and income inequality. People of Color have been the victims of white aggression. The only way to correct this unjust situation is for the white people to cede power to the POC and gradually cease to exist.

This narrative is ridiculous, but it does have currency in a world where people get degrees in gender studies and are willing to pay to go to a nightclub where Kim Kardashian is making an appearance. In reality, there is nothing that unites all People of Color. An educated Indian has more in common with an educated white person than he does with an uneducated illegal immigrant.

For that reason, we won’t see a stand-off between whites and POC even though the left would love to see that. Rather, the coming racial violence will likely break along the same lines that we are witnessing at the anti-Trump protests—groups of illegal immigrants with smaller numbers of leftist blacks and whites versus whites who are perceived to support Trump.

In some cases, law enforcement has already shown an unwillingness to deal with anti-Trump protestors out of concerns for political correctness. If the police are unwilling to protect law abiding citizens, those citizens will begin to take their self-defense into their own hands. That would kick off a spiral of violence that could easily develop into a race war.

Why would anyone want a race war?

It is hard to understand why anyone would want an outbreak of racial violence. To do so, one must understand that our elites are unencumbered by any hint of Christian morality. Their only goals are to amass more money and power. All of the policies they support are aimed at achieving these goals.

The elites are globalists. While they may live in the US, they don’t necessarily feel an attachment to this country or any other. Their monetary interests benefit from the free flow of capital and labor throughout the world. National borders are a hindrance. Therefore, the elites probably do not want a race war per se, but they would be more than willing to use it as a mechanism to prevent a healthy nationalism coming to power in the US.

Elites will not suffer from a race war

The people responsible for instituting the policies that will lead us to a race war will not suffer once it begins. These individuals live in wealthy, homogenous neighborhoods with excellent security systems in their homes. They never take public transportation, and if they are important enough, they have chauffeurs who drive them to work. Their children almost always attend private schools. They will watch everything unfold on television from the safety of their own homes. Thus, they have little to lose and a lot to gain by setting off the power keg of racial animus.

Conclusion

If you are familiar with my other articles you know that I tend to be contrarian when it comes to the narratives being pushed by our globalist elites. If they are trying to incite violence, the best thing to do is to avoid it. On the other hand, it would be wrong to give up our right of assembly due to leftist intimidation. The next several months, and possibly the next few years, promise to be interesting. The least that we can do is go into it with our eyes wide open.

Soviet Defector Yuri Bezmenov Accurately Predicted How America Would Decline

June 9, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Yuri Bezmenov, a disillusioned Soviet KGB agent, defected to North America while stationed in India. His goal was to save the West from Soviet subversion by publicizing KGB tactics and goals. While he received some attention in the Western press, his warnings have mostly gone unheeded while much of what he predicted has come true.

For an overview of Bezmenov's work, I strongly recommended you watch the following interview he conducted. The short book I review below, titled Love Letter To America, expands on ideas contained in the video.

Russians are masters of deception, mind control, and subversion. If you study their more modern methods, such as reflex control, which is certainly used by Putin in his foreign policy, you'll know that Russians have put in their dues when it comes to developing tactics to control others on a mass scale. These strategies of control were used for an extended period of time against America to make its citizens believe in a collectivist ideology that would lead to the destruction of traditional American values.

Bezmenov states that once the "hippies" in the Clinton-era were subverted with collectivism, they went on to accumulate power and institutionalize harmful policies that would transform America into a failed state that no longer posed a threat to the USSR. The USSR has of course since been dissolved, but the subversive ideas have not stopped, and ironically has served as blowback to the current non-communist Russian state.

Ideology can be weaponized

> The real driving force of this war of aggression is IDEOLOGY — something you cannot eat, wear or store for a “rainy day”. An integral part of this war of ideology is IDEOLOGICAL SUBVERSION — the process of changing the perception of reality in the minds of millions of peoples all over the world.
> Fighting on a battlefield is the most primitive way of making war. There is no art higher than to destroy your enemy without a fight – by SUBVERTING anything of value in enemy’s country.
> The main principle of ideological subversion is TURNING A STRONGER FORCE AGAINST ITSELF. Just like in the Japanese martial arts: you do not stop the blow of a heavier more powerful enemy with an equally forceful blow. You may simply hurt your hand. Instead you catch the striking fist with your hand and PULL the enemy in the direction of his blow until he crashes into a wall or any other heavy object in his way.

Soviets introduced the idea of “America privilege,” a precursor to “white privilege”

> KGB influence in our media, politics and nearly every phase of our life has produced a growing conviction on the part of many Americans that we are the “bad guys” — again I have to remind you that to date, there has never been a single defection from the United States. The Soviets have produced an absolutely ludicrous global lie that people are believing — why? Because the tactics of ideological subversion work.

Why do so many people decide to sell out their own country?

They do it for creature comforts, money, awards, honors, and other benefits. Many masculine men today bite their lip when fed lies in diversity and sexual harassment trainings because they want the money to pay for their food, rent, and material items. It’s only a couple steps from there to actively sell out your country for even greater personal rewards.

> The majority of my former colleagues are now firmly entrenched in the ‘privileged class and their humanistic ideals have all been traded one by one for small comforts such as a private car (a rare thing in the USSR), a free apartment, a country house (“dacha”), free trips abroad and freedom to socialize with foreigners, none of which would be possible or available to the average Russian worker.

“The Rules Of Revolution”

> 1 . Corrupt the young, get them interested in sex, take them away from religion. Make them superficial and enfeebled.
> 2. Divide the people into hostile groups by constantly harping on controversial issues of no importance.
> 3. Destroy people’s faith in their national leaders by holding the latter up for contempt, ridicule and disgrace.
> 4. Always preach democracy, but seize power as fast and as ruthlessly as possible.

Legislating equality will destroy a free nation

> All you have to do to “screw up” the status quo of a free nation, is to borrow ONE false idea from the ideology of a communist or totalitarian government. For the sake of simplicity, I have chosen the idea of “egalitarianism”. “People born equal therefore must be equal”. Sounds great. But look at yourselves. Were you born equal? Some of you weighed 7 pounds at birth, others 6 or 5 . . . Are you NOW equal? In any way? Physically, mentally, emotionally, racially, spiritually? Some are tall and dumb, others — short, bald and clever.
> Now, let’s figure out what will happen if we LEGISLATE EQUALITY, and make the concept of “equality” a cornerstone and pillar of socio- economical and political system. All right? You don’t have to be a great economist or sociologist to foresee that some of the people who are “less equal” would demand as much as those who are “more equal” BY LAW!
> Aha, now you’ve got it. There will be some who get more for GIVING less and take advantage of those, who are even “less equal”, say, in the art of TAKING. And to avoid the squabble for “equal redistribution” you will have to introduce a THIRD FORCE — the State. Why? Because people were never equal, are not equal and if God wanted us to be equal He would probably have made us equal.

How egalitarianism destroys the economy

> People who have declared themselves to be equal will inevitably come to expect more for their individual needs, which sooner or later will tragically come to conflict with the “unequal” reality. That will automatically produce discontent. Unhappy and discontent masses are less productive than those who are happy being what they are and making the best of it. Decreased productivity, as we all know, leads to such unpleasant things as inflation, un-employment and recession. These, in turn, cause social unrest and instability, both economical and political.

Subversion is hard to defeat because it’s insidious and long-term

> Most of the actions are overt, legitimate, and easily identifiable. The only trouble is — they are “stretched in time”. In other words, the process of subversion is such a long-term process that an average individual, due to the short time-span of his historical memory, is unable to perceive the process of subversion as a CONSISTENT and willful effort. That is exactly how it is intended to be: like the small hand of your watch. You know it moves, but you CAN NOT SEE it moving.

Demoralization of the masses is an important step of subversion

> The purpose of this process is to change your perception of reality to such an extent, that even despite an abundance of information and evidence about the danger of Communism, you are unable to come to sensible conclusions in your own interests and in the interests of your nation.
> Demoralized and enfeebled ‘masses’ tend to grab the ‘easiest’ short-cut solution to social ills and socialism seems to them to be the best answer.

Subversion can happen through entertainment

> A group of rock or pop-musicians with a message of ‘social-justice’ sugar-coated in popular ‘spiritual’ tunes can be actually more helpful to the KGB than someone standing in the pulpit preaching Marxist-Leninist doctrine. The sugar-sweet messages of social equality from the crooning mouths of the entertainers is quite enough to accomplish the aims of the KGB without any overt activity on their part.

The way that George Soros finances Pussy Riot and FEMEN to subvert Russia is the same method the KGB used to do to subvert America. There’s nothing new under the sun—only the players have changed.

Deliberate distraction of masses with non-issues

> [An issue that] may benefit a few is a non-issue (civil rights of homosexuals is not an issue; defending sexual morality is the larger, real issue).
> The main purpose of non-issues and the devastating result of their introduction is the SIDE-TRACKING of public opinion, energy (both mental and physical), money and TIME from the constructive solutions. Soviet propaganda elevated the art of infiltrating and emphasizing non-issues in American public life to the level of actual state policy.

Subversion of education

> The American romance with state-run education as encouraged by KGB subverters has already produced generations of graduates who cannot spell, > cannot find Nicaragua on a world map, cannot THINK creatively and independently.

Does socialism allow for the human need of self-destruction?

> Dr. Shafarevich in analyzing the 'dead' civilizations of Egypt, Maya, Mohenjo-Dara, Babylon, etc., comes to an ominous conclusion: EVERY ONE OF THESE CIVILIZATIONS DIED WHEN PEOPLE REJECTED RELIGION AND GOD, AND TRIED TO CREATE 'SOCIAL JUSTICE' ALONG THE SOCIALIST PRINCIPLES. Thus, Socialism, according to Shafarevich, may be a manifestation of an inborn human instinct of SELF-DESTRUCTION, if unrestrained — leading ultimately to PHYSICAL DEATH OF ALL MANKIND.

You must love Big Brother

> In the struggle for the 'final victory of Communism', the goal of the subverter is to substitute, as slowly and painlessly as possible, the concept of loyalty for NATION with loyalty to the "Big Brother" welfare state, who gives everything and is able to TAKE everything, including personal freedom — from every citizen.

Prediction of Obama's rise to the Presidency

> All that will be needed is to 'elect' a 'progressive thinking' president who will be voted to power by Americans, who have been addicted to welfare and 'security' as defined by Soviet subverters.

At some point, the Soviet method of control was identified by Western elites as a better method than what Christian-based democracy offered. Our elites must have had the knowledge that it would likely lead to the collapse and death of nations that used it. So why did they do it? For the same reason that a Soviet sympathizer will sell out his country for access to a car, because it benefits them in spite of harming a nation they're from. Why do they care if you and your family collapse into poverty and mindless degeneracy as long as they have their power, wealth, and estates?

I recently wrote about how depopulation is an agenda being actively used by the elites in the Western world. Would you say that a socialist system that will surely lead to national death is compatible with depopulation? It's clear that they go hand-in-hand. At the same time our elites are ushering in the collapse of the system, they amplify their method of authoritarian control to ensure the masses don't threaten their lives and their theft of billions of dollars of wealth from the system in order to weather the inevitable storm that they created and then accelerated.

The top one-hundred families of the world know of the cycles of empires. They know that America and Europe had to inevitably decline relative to other developing parts of the world, but they refuse to accept that they will be guillotined in the process. To preserve their wealth and power, they have used collectivist ideology, banking control, and depopulation agenda to ensure they stay in power even after this cycle plays its course.

In effect, they aim to prolong their rule, control, and wealth for eternity while praying to Baphomet, their owl god, or whomever is popular in their secret societies, regardless of how many people are hurt by their ideas of egalitarianism and environmentalism, and regardless of how many people die through their failed policies and false flag events.

During his lifetime, Bezmenov did not succeed in steering America away from socialism, and we are now suffering because of it. Even though he is no longer with us, I hope this article today vindicates his ideas and predictions. He was right all along.

Canadian Minister Bans Delivery Of “Right-Wing” Newspaper In Alarming Act Of Censorship

Proving that feminist politicians believe in following their feelings as much as their non-politician contemporaries, a female Canadian government minister has ordered Canada Post to stop delivering a controversial right-wing newspaper. Depending on how desperate the publisher and staff are to keep Your Ward News going, the decision is tantamount to a ban. Judy Foote, who serves as the national Public Services and Procurement Minister, said she believed the publication violated subsection 319(2) of the Canadian criminal code. Tellingly, police who had investigated the newspaper and its staff found no evidence of hate speech.

Censorship in Canada, whether official or unofficial, legal or illegal, should be as surprising to you as rain is to England. The fulcrum of Roosh’s new book, Free Speech Isn’t Free, comes from his experiences of literally being hunted down by rabid SJWs and their mainstream political and media enablers. Like in many other jurisdictions, the concept of “free speech” has become an empty vessel that the powers-that-be conjure up from time to time to pretend that they are classical liberals like Montesquieu, rather than the fascistic far-left ideologues they really are.

Your Ward News may not be the sort of fare we at Return Of Kings would consume, but the newspaper is not encouraging violence and is yet to be taken to task by a court faithfully interpreting Canadian law. Having outspoken opinions about the self-serving, anti-male nature of feminism, the Islamization of Western society, and the way in which any criticism of Zionism is spun into accusations of anti-Semitism is not hate speech. It is free speech. Likewise, inasmuch as I find this form of historical revisionism factually erroneous, questioning whether the Holocaust occurred, which Your Ward News does, should not be (pardon the pun) a trigger for government intervention, censorship or criminal prosecution.

Unsurprisingly, Canadian politicians have been far less enthusiastic about combating leftist hate speech directed against men, most notably the idea of "rape culture". Why are they only going after people like Roosh and publications like Your Ward News? By using bizarre euphemisms, feminists, many of them on Canadian university campuses in cushy tenured positions, have been able to declare that masculinity itself and men in general should be held to account for rape, rather than an absolutely tiny male minority.

You never see a public rape, yet you and I are apparently responsible for the relatively few private ones that take place without our knowledge. Even supposedly "neutral" takes on the issue like this one find no fault with the proposition that a group of angry women and their supporters should be allowed to tarnish the entire male gender with the same broad brush.

What happened to the courts?

In this "case" involving Your Ward News, a member of the executive, who also serves as a member of the legislature (the norm in Westminster system countries like the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada), has made a decision that really belongs in the judicial system. This is not to say the executive arm of government has no place in making decisions that need to be made quickly or with more leeway. Laws are much more complex and copious than they used to be. But for a country like Canada, which constantly rants on about people possessing inalienable rights, having a minister like Judy Foote decide on what is and is not free speech is a very, very slippery slope. This is especially so when she is saying it involves a crime for which police found no evidence and Foote herself comes from a party (the Liberals) vehemently against anything resembling rightwing philosophies.

Plus, legality does not mean that a law is right or correct. Courts themselves can become mouthpieces for leftist policy through laws that give them no room not to convict someone for certain speech or behavior. And, though it is hard to change certain important rights in federal systems like Canada's, Australia's and America's, due to protected constitutional provisions that require special, much higher thresholds for alteration or repeal, it is more than possible.

Constitutional provisions nominally enshrining equality, for example, have been reread to give all manner of special, undeserved privileges to women, minorities and others in these countries. Consequently, with a sympathetic, oftentimes wholly supportive media and backed by powerful corporate interests, center-left or plain left-wing governments are more than capable of restricting, outlawing and imprisoning those on the right with whom they disagree. You should consider the hit on Your Ward News as merely one of the opening strikes. Before too long, something as innocent as questioning transgender bathrooms will be hate speech, if it is not already in Canada.

When free speech starts to crack, mob rule follows soon after

Those of you familiar with my work for Return Of Kings over the past year will remember that my articles went into overdrive last August, when Roosh found himself at the center of a 1984-style "Two Minutes Hate" in Canada that lasted a whole lot longer than in Orwell's book. The same thing happened earlier this year, when proposals for law-abiding, concerned men like ourselves to meet were met with serious threats of violence that were condoned by establishment interests in multiple countries. Your Ward News' apparent demise is another opportunity for a new Canadian government to flex its censorship muscles.

Roosh's role in the free speech movement, as groundbreaking as it is, do not come from nowhere. Prior to him becoming a pariah to be conveniently spat on by SJWs and those others they managed to manipulate, free speech had been under sustained assault by SJWs and other leftists. After years of conditioning, leftists are primed to react savagely when a viewpoint they do not like is put before them. Where possible, they will opt for the more sanitized mechanisms of government executive decisions, gerrymandered court judgments based on very restrictive laws, and media attacks on divergent opinions. When that fails, violence or its threat, just as Roosh discovered, will be unleashed as well.

My Encounter With Washington DC Police

By now you've probably seen the press conference I held with the media in a Washington DC hotel. As soon as it was over, I began packing up my camera equipment. The friends of mine who were there said I did fine and updated me about the responses coming in on Twitter from those who watched it live.

We all went upstairs to the lobby and I waited at the front desk to settle the conference room bill. While waiting, I noticed three uniformed police officers a few feet away. I thought it was strange for them to be in the hotel. Was a serious crime reported? I would have guessed that they were there for me had I not kept the location private after instructing journalists not to disclose the hotel name to anyone.

My lead bodyguard starting talking to one of the cops. It's quite common for bodyguards and other executive protection personal to either have worked in law enforcement or be on good terms with them. I squeezed myself into the conversation and asked one of the cops, "So why are you here in the hotel?" He looked at his partner and then looked back at me. "Because of you."

"Because of me?" I exclaimed. "But how did you know I was here?"

"Because the protesters told us. They're walking here right now from Dupont Circle." I immediately suspected one of the journalists for the security leak, who probably sent the location in the middle of the press conference once they realized it wasn't going in the direction they hoped for. As I learned in Canada, members of the press work directly with social justice activists, in a similar way that branches of Anonymous now attack anyone who the media also happens to hate.

After signing off on the receipt with the hotel, I walked outside with my entourage. I counted four police cars. In other cities around the world, hundreds more policemen were monitoring protests against the meetups, guarding fragile blue-haired women against horrible "rapists." This was the precise moment that I can say was the most surreal of my life. A week of outrage, threats, anger, and lies culminated at the sight of DC police vehicles while two bodyguards stayed within arm's reach of me. The situation was so absurd that it didn't even feel real, but it was real, and hopefully the future for me doesn't get much more real than that.

Top 6 Acts Of Censorship In The First Half Of 2016

June 10, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

There has been a dangerous and troublesome trend of increasing censorship in the west. In the wake of the Second World War, it became criminal to speak certain things about the war, question details of the holocaust, or possess Nazi memorabilia. In 1990, France passed the Gayssot Act, making it illegal to question whether Nazi leaders committed crimes against humanity.

Germany bans usage of the SS Sig runes, and the rock band Kiss was forced to create a new logo that they use exclusively in Germany, so as not to bring down the wrath of the police state on them, as their actual logo may resemble the SS enough to trigger someone to create a fourth Reich and stampede across Europe.

America passed a law in 1994 which provides for stricter penalties if a crime is deemed a “hate crime.” In the early 2000s, we saw the use of “Free Speech Zones,” which are basically a way of outlawing political protest, by saying protest cannot occur freely and organically, but instead only within a specifically designed and cordoned off area designated by the authorities (that is typically blocks or even miles away from the event or person being protested).

Free Speech Zone at 2004 DNC

The Obama administration has increased police power to restrict speech and make arrests. Expect these powers to be exercised in the upcoming presidential election. The world is heading towards an Orwellian police state, and recent events reveal an acceleration of censorship. Here are a list of some of the most egregious censorship incidents so far this year.

1. DePaul University Bans Chalk

Dangerous speech which can harm vulnerable minds

In April of this year, a massive triggering of emotionally unstable and coddled automatons occurred when students left the safe space of their cell-like dorm rooms and ventured outside to be confronted with violent messages scrawled in chalk across their sidewalks, forcing ideas into their tightly sealed minds such as “Make DePaul Great Again” and “Trump Train.” After much weeping and gnashing of teeth, the university decided the only answer to combat the foe of different ideas such as “being great” was to ban chalk from campus.

2. Lauren Southern Temporarily Banned From Facebook

> I'm banned on @facebook for a month for saying Facebook is censoring conservatives. pic.twitter.com/oKStHdEGNM
> — Lauren Southern (@Lauren_Southern) May 21, 2016

Journalist and author Lauren Southern made a posting saying Facebook banned the account of one of her friends, which she called “utterly insane.” In response, she was banned from Facebook for 30 days. After media attention and in the wake of widespread allegations that Facebook censors conservative speech, the ban was removed hours after articles were published on Drudge Report and Infowars calling attention to the ban. Facebook said she had been banned “in error.”

Southern did nothing other than point out that her friend was banned from the service. This does not even rise to the level of dissent, but merely discussion factual things that Facebook indeed did. If I had a Facebook account, I’m sure this article alone is enough to ban me from the service.

3. Cancellation Of Milo Yiannopoulos Speeches

Conservative blogger and Breitbart Tech editor Milo Yiannopoulos launched a speaking tour of American Universities earlier this year. Several of these events were interrupted, most famously the Trigglypuff event at UMass Amherst in April, where speakers were prevented from talking for several minutes, while profanity-laden outburst were yelled at them by triggered feminists, including the “Fuck You! Keep Your Hate Speech Off Our Campus!” intellectual now known as Triggypuff.

In May, a speech at Chicago's DePaul University was cancelled after protestors stormed the stage and police refused to intervene and restore order.

4. Supreme Court Upholds Ban On Protests Outside Courthouse

Court to Hodge: Your presence here is triggering me

Although the first amendment to the US Constitution prohibits the government from restricting free speech, specifically stating that "Congress shall make no law… abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble…", it upheld exactly such a law in May when it turned down an appeal by Harold Hodge, arrested for silently protesting outside the Court Plaza. Hodge had silently carried an anti-racism sign and was arrested for attempting to “intimidate or influence” the court. The message is simple: dissent will not be tolerated.

5. Scotland Man Arrested For Bad Comedy

Racist, mysoginist cis scum

In April, Scotland police arrested a man from Coatbridge in North Lanarkshire after he posted an online video of his dog raising his paw as if making a Nazi salute, in front of footage of Adolf Hitler. DI David Cockburn stated “Posting offensive material…will not be tolerated and police will act swiftly to tackle hate crimes… this clip has been shared and viewed online, which ultimately has caused offence and hurt to many people in our community.” The video is only mildly funny, and was merely an attempt by this man of teasing his girlfriend. As of the time of publication, the video had just under 2 million views, with 29,500 likes and 1,800 dislikes.

As he states in the video introduction: “My girlfriend is always ranting and raving about how cute and adorable her wee dog is, so I thought I would [unintelligible] the least cute thing I could think of, which is a Nazi.” By his own admission in the video itself, the man explains that he is choosing the subject of Nazis precisely because they are a disturbing and unpleasant thing to contrast against the “cute” image of the dog, and of course is in no way supporting or condoning Nazism. Basically, the man was arrested because he hurt the feelings or offended someone, which is the new standard of hate crime. Of course, authorities will pick and choose what “offenses” to prosecute, as there are videos with far more negative content or higher dislikes than this video (1,800), which went viral and gained international attention.

6. Men Publicly Congregating Deemed Intolerable

They forgot “Nazi”

A group of international meetups was planned for ROK readers on February 6 in 160 cities across 43 countries. The goal was for like minded men to meet each other, form friendships, and provide male bonding in a culture that views male spaces and masculinity as dangerous and repulsive.

The backlash to allowing men to congregate together was so violent and swift, that opposition from local police chiefs to national government leaders mobilized rapidly to prevent men from meeting together. They were labeled rapists, fascists, homophobes, and sexists, and the meetup was soon cancelled. Dozens of media outlets parroted the story that a group of rapists was coming to town, beware! Note than any attempt at male bonding is shunned and attacked as criminal, while women’s only groups are encouraged and lauded as brave.

What’s To Come?

Free speech is a myth in the west. We are not free to protest our political leaders. We are not free to express unpopular or traditional ideas, despite the fact that they are often simply the status quo throughout all recorded history. We are not free to congregate together in public or form groups with like minded ideals.

The second half of 2016 should see more violence against political protesters, more shunning of masculine ideas and labeling traditional or masculine values as criminal, and more marginalization of any male-friendly spaces or media outlets.

Why Electing Donald Trump Is The Only Way To Preserve Freedom Of Speech In America

June 10, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With the Democratic primary all but settled and the GOP firmly under the aegis of Donald Trump, the general election has effectively begun. While it's common for political partisans to claim that this or that election is the "MOST IMPORTANT ELEK-SHUN EVAR!!!!!11", the 2016 presidential race is absolutely paramount for those who value free speech, and the only candidate who can defend freedom of speech is Donald Trump.

The past eight years have seen Barack Obama and the radical left transform America to the point where it's barely recognizable. Obama's tenure gave birth to the hordes of pierced-lipped, easily triggered social justice warriors roaming college campuses like a herd of hormonally-damaged buffalo. It was under Obama that Gawker, Buzzfeed and other sites began leading witch-hunts against people like Pax Dickinson and Justine Sacco, getting them fired from their jobs for being un-PC. It's under Obama that a foreign government—Mexico—has been fomenting riots against the presumptive Republican presidential nominee.

Make no mistake: if Hillary Clinton becomes president, she will kill free speech in America. If you value the freedoms bequeathed to you by the Constitution, you have no choice but to support Donald Trump. His persuasiveness and openly nationalist platform make him the only candidate capable of halting—and possibly reversing—the left's destruction of our nation.

Electing A New People

The dwindling #NeverTrump contingent justifies their refusal to support the Donald on the basis that they'll be able to come back in 2020 and defeat Hillary after Trump flames out in the general election. This delusional action plan ignores America's changing demographics. Ever since the Immigration and Naturalization of 1965, the U.S. has become increasingly non-white: as of 2014, only 62.1 percent of Americans are non-Hispanic whites. Demographers project that America will become a minority-majority nation sometime in the next thirty years, with illegal immigration and amnesty worsening the problem.

Latino form the bulk of immigrants to the U.S., and for all the cuckservatives' claims that they are "natural Republicans," Latinos hold leftist views on everything from gun control to taxes to gay marriage. Most Latin American countries are run by socialists or communists who have no respect for free speech: speaking your mind in Brazil, Colombia or Venezuela can result in you being arrested and/or killed. Mexico—where the bulk of Latino immigrants to the U.S. hail from—is a failed state run by drug cartels who hunt down and murder anyone who criticizes them.

Latinos monolithically support the Democratic Party, the party that has done more than any other to destroy free speech in America. Even as leftists crow about how the growing number of Latinos in America will make it impossible for the Republicans to win national elections in the coming years, cuckservatives labor under the delusion that crossing the Rio Grande will magically transform authoritarian socialists into free-market capitalists.

The same pattern holds in other Western countries with large amounts of non-white immigration. For example, in last year's federal elections in Canada, Justin Trudeau's Liberal Party won a majority government largely by swallowing the immigrant vote whole. In every region of the country except for the prairie provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Liberals won the overwhelming majority of constituencies with a visible minority population higher than 26.8 percent. The same goes for other countries: non-whites primarily support Labour in the U.K. (excluding Scotland, where they support the crypto-Marxist SNP), the Socialists in France, and Labor in Australia.

If you're thinking of voting for Cuckitarian presidential candidate Gary Johnson because Donald Trump makes your pussy hurt, think again. Beyond the fact that all a third-party vote will do is hand the presidency to Hillary, Johnson has stated that he's more aligned with Bernie Sanders than any of the other major party candidates remaining. Additionally, in recent years, cuckitarians have become militant supporters of open borders and amnesty, and given that immigrants primarily support big government, this will all but ensure the extinction of freedom in America.

Freedom of Speech… If You Can Keep It

The simple reality is that freedom of speech in America—as well as the other freedoms we take for granted—only came about because the U.S. was founded by whites. Free speech, the rule of law, and the entire framework of our society evolved out of the unique culture of Europe, starting with the ancient Greeks and developed by the theologians of the Reformation and the philosophers of the Enlightenment. By importing massive numbers of immigrants whose cultures lack these philosophical developments, we're ensuring that our country becomes more like theirs: less prosperous, less safe and less free.

The only way freedom of speech can be preserved in the U.S. is if whites remain a majority, and Donald Trump is the only candidate who is fighting to ensure this. By building a border wall and cracking down on illegal immigration, Trump will stem the flow of foreigners into America and ensure that the people who founded this country remain in control of it. Hillary Clinton will do the opposite: flood this country with foreign peasants who will give electoral heft to her campaign to destroy freedom in America.

If you value freedom of speech, you can't afford to spend this election on the sidelines. Whatever his flaws, Trump has established himself as the only man who can preserve America as it is and turn back the tide of cultural Marxist subversion that has defined Obama's presidency. Even if you have reservations about the man, you need to get out and vote for him: like it or not, he's your only option.

Huffington Post And Jesse Benn Are Getting Away With Endorsing Violence Against Patriots

June 11, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> ...there's an inherent value in forestalling Trump's normalization. Violent resistance accomplishes this.
> — Jesse Benn glorifying and justifying violence against the Trump campaign

The Huffington Post has sensationally allowed a liberal extremist, Jesse Benn, to advocate violence against Donald Trump and his supporters. Despite his comments, and the near certainty that a conservative saying the same things about stopping liberal campaigns would be arrested, Benn is yet to be questioned by authorities. Perhaps observers should be far from surprised; San Jose police have already been accused of letting thugs draped in Mexican flags attack Trump supporters recently. It may even be that police are concerned for their safety if they crack down fully on liberal violence.

Benn weirdly says that Donald Trump is not but still is a fascist. Using the fascist analogy, he implicitly compares Trump's previous calls for the deportation of 11 million illegal immigrants with some sort of unspoken Nazi Einzatsgruppen operation or the mass deportations of Jews to extermination camps. The Einzatzgruppen were the special SS and other police task forces charged with killing Jews using firing squads and mobile gas vans before permanent extermination camps were fully established.

This vague conjuring up of the Holocaust (though he never explicitly mentions it or the Nazi forces behind it) is especially audacious for Benn, who is himself a Jew and should know better than to use ridiculous hyperbole about it. Whether he agrees with Trump is a very different matter from basically defaming those killed in World War II acts of genocide and trivializing their suffering with the lamest of equations.

Another lovely aspect of Benn's piece is that he says Trump, for whom at least 40-50% of Americans will vote in November, espouses a politics so radical that it cannot be considered part of the normal US political spectrum. This essentially forms the crux of his reasoning as to why violence against the Trump campaign is "logical." Violence is okay for Benn if you can apparently rationalize away why a group you do not like should be legitimate participants in the democratic process. It is a thoroughly self-serving and circular argument, not to mention one that involves the convenient infliction of violence upon your ideological enemies.

Finally, according to Benn, you should also suspend your critical thinking, most notably if you are a white male. You cannot understand the "oppression" of certain people, namely Mexicans, other minorities, and women, and if you can, you must still understand why they react with violence.

Our meet-ups this year were canceled after serious threats, but Jesse Benn is permitted to glorify violence with impunity

Roosh had to organize a secret press conference to avoid mass SJW violence but Jesse Benn gets a platform for calling for it.

This situation is both amusing and tragic for us here at Return Of Kings. Amusing because of the contrived liberal drama that more resembles a circus than reasoned debate. Tragic because our own supporters had to be protected from serious threats of violence earlier this year, leading to the cancellation of our planned global meet-ups. Vague but spurious allegations were made against us at that time, but the only documentable threats were made by our opponents.

Fast-forward a few months and an opinion columnist for a newspaper that makes a living off making allegations of violent threats against conservatives is openly advocating for violence against people they do not like. When will someone be arrested or at least served with a deterrent that prevents this from happening again?

The media silence over Benn's calls is reprehensible, too. Just when I thought some outlets such as CNN were moderately improving their coverage of Mexican nationalist and general SJW violence, they fell away again and refused to even discuss the putrid pro-violence Huffington Post article. The only sites giving it real scrutiny are the so-called "extremist" platforms like Fox News, Breitbart and Mediaite.

And what happens when Trump groups start to defend themselves? Based on the present condoning or ignorance of liberal violence, mainstream media outlets will portray it as unjustified Trump supporter aggression, not the countermeasures of people legitimately fearful of their safety in environments where police are seemingly unable to protect them. People are going to get hurt as a result and the liberal establishment is largely to blame.

When will someone be arrested promptly for liberal violence or for calling for it?

The very definition of assault and false imprisonment.

After the footage of Mexican nationalists harassing and assaulting a woman went viral, suspects suddenly started being taken into custody. The speed of follow-up in San Jose was lax at best. It is time for proper resources to be devoted to preventing egregious acts of SJW political terrorism. I can understand police need to calm situations, but it is clear that they are either being restrained by political considerations above their heads or they need more feet on the ground at Trump rallies to stop leftist thuggery.

Jesse Benn must also be arrested by the authorities. His attempted demagoguery has no place in the United States. Inciting violence, last time I checked, is a crime. Nonetheless, it seems it is a crime created on inherently unequal terms in the modern political system. Say something liberals do not like and it is incitement to violence. When liberals actually preach violence, though, it is not incitement but “logic.”

When will the madness end?

Roosh’s Search For Truth Has Put Him On The “Wrong” Side Of The Culture War

June 11, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Operation Medusa. NSA encryption. Undercover infiltration. Disinformation operations. Transvestite informants. Counterespionage. Squeezing through border checkpoints. Sexy vampire wigs. Operation Goebbels. Conspiracy theories. Canadian government press conferences. Double-agent seductresses. Humor. Ambush and assault. No, these are not elements of the latest spy masterpiece. They are all part of the true story of giving a public talk to men detailed in Free Speech Isn’t Free, to be released by Roosh on Monday.

The Fight For Freedom

Quintus Curtius provides a brief, non-ideological historical background, stressing the idea that no, things don't just naturally eventually end up better over time, but instead history is actively shaped by the actions of those living in it. We all have the power to help shape the direction our society or world is moving in. And if we do not, many things we take for granted, such as free speech, wealth, clean air and water, attractive women, and travel, will be completely foreign ideas to our descendants. As Quintus states "Victories once won are not permanent; they must be re-won by every generation"

The book gives a glimpse into the background, rationale, preparation, and delivery of Roosh's public lectures in six cities: Berlin, London, D.C. NYC, Montreal, and Toronto. The writing is fluid and thoughtful.

The Germany and U.K. talks were relatively uneventful. A female journalist came to Berlin (I thought women were banned?!) and later wrote an article for Vice in German calling Roosh a rapist, while the London event was attended by the Reggie Yates BBC film crew, who later released a hit piece.

All Hell Breaks Loose In Canada

A remake of this would be saner

The Montreal and Toronto chapters, which detail the terror-alert-orange level of backlash against the talks, comprise most of the writing. I was mentally exhausted after reading the Montreal chapter and had to relax outside for a bit before continuing. Through these trials and eventual victory, Roosh developed the plan for a neomasculine movement so men could join together in opposing the harmful changes they see occurring.

Always Be Prepared

As an Eagle Scout, the motto “Be Prepared” is permanently embedded in my mind. And Roosh was prepared for the tricks the protestors pulled. If an event was cancelled, there was a backup plan to release free video of the talk online, which would only draw more attention to the message they were trying to censor. If a hotel hosting an event cancelled, there were already backup locations under consideration. If groups were infiltrated, a private notification and verification system (which was used in Canada) was ready to activate.

Learning from past experiences, such as the ambushing on the Dr. Oz show, and some earlier problems during the Europe talks, Roosh was determined to be prepared for whatever happened in North America. But the enormous backlash could not have been predicted.

Conspiracy?

At one stop, Roosh has a lengthy talk with a man about a conspiracy to undo Western civilization’s gains. I’m not convinced there is that degree of organization in the world, and the historical theme of QC’s foreword seems at odds with the idea of a planned coordinated worldwide movement to destroy patriarchy. Is there such a coordinated effort? Or do degenerate ideas simply spread like wildfire when a strong masculine culture does not keep them in check?

On Second Thought…

But as I read on, evidence for deliberate, planned anti-family and anti-cohesive policies piled up. Policies which affected minuscule subminority groups were enacted, and the entire legal system and government were altered to accommodate them, while real issues affecting mainstream men were ignored. Was this just bad luck? Straight white men getting the short end of the stick because we have a black president? Or was there more to it?

Was there a planned and coordinated worldwide agenda of anti-male, anti-family thoughts and practices? Is multiculturalism merely benevolent inclusiveness? An attempt to combine the best of all ideas from disparate groups? Or is it actually an underhanded method of attacking man, family, and Western values?

I expected the book to be about the author's state of the world, and some ideas for fixing it. Of course, that is part of it, but I was pleasantly surprised and impressed to see Roosh deeply in the midst of a quest for knowledge, asking questions of attendees, delving deeply into ideas, and looking for solutions to the problems we face in modern day life. This isn't the story of a zealous theorist convinced he has the answers to everything, and forcing them to fit his belief system; instead he is questioning, seeking, being curious, and learning.

Unpopular Speech Is Why We Protect Speech

As linguist and philosopher Noam Chomsky stated, protections of free speech exist precisely to protect unpopular speech.

> If you're really in favor of free speech, then you're in favor of freedom of speech for precisely the views you despise. Otherwise you're not in favor of free speech.

Free Speech Isn't Free is a narrative, a warning, and a path for our future. It's troubling that we are living in times where ideas such as health, strength, happiness, family, cohesiveness, and beauty are unpopular, but after reading this book, you will have no doubts that we are. The next step is channeling our forces into something positive.

Islamic Terrorist Kills 20 People At Homosexual Nightclub In Florida (UPDATE: 50 Killed)

June 12, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Daily Mail:

Update from CNN: Police: 50 killed in Florida nightclub terror attack

A suspected Islamic extremist wielding an assault rifle and a handgun has killed about 20 people after taking party-goers hostage inside a gay club in Orlando.

The gunman was carrying a suspicious device, possibly a suicide vest, when he opened fire on the dance floor inside Pulse in the early hours of this morning.

Orlando Police Chief John Mina said authorities have not determined the exact number of people killed, but that 'approximately 20' have died. Another 42 people were taken to hospital.

An FBI spokesman said the mass shooting is being investigated as an act of terrorism, adding that they are looking into whether this was an act of domestic or international terror, and if the shooter was a lone wolf.

Police said the gunman, who was shot dead by officers, was believed to be in his 20s was not a local man, while the FBI believe he may have 'leanings to radical Islamic terrorism'.

A Helpful Guide To The Upcoming Australian Federal Election For Non-Australians

June 12, 2016 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Australia is a country of which I am very proud, though even the best countries have their quirks. One of ours is the almost insane proliferation of minor parties in the Australian political system. To our friends overseas this will make little sense. Doesn't voting for a minor party simply split the vote? But we have a curious method to get around the duopoly that is the two-party system.

Australia has a preferential voting system, meaning that rather than ticking a box, we number the parties on the ballot from first to last. When the ballots are tallied, they go through several rounds in an instant run-off process. The last candidate is eliminated and their second choice preferences distributed to the rest. This process is then repeated until only two candidates remain, deciding the winner.

While a bit confusing, this system is a boon to everyone from the hippie socialist to the ardent neo-nazi. It keeps the major parties paying attention to the fringes, or else risk bleeding votes. This is why the Greens for instance, win around 10% of the vote in Australian elections, while in America they're lucky to win 0.5%.

The flip-side of course, is that since any man and his dog (with $500 and 500 signatures) can start their own political party, choice abounds. Last election, the NSW senate ballot paper had 110 names listed and was more than a meter long. The current list of registered parties can be found here and the vote will take place on July 2.

So who to choose?

IN THE RED CORNER

Socialist Alliance

A couple of hundred dirty hippies still holding out for the overthrow of the bourgeoisie. The Socialist Alliance has long been irrelevant in Australian politics – and continues to remain so. Initially soaring in 2004 to a tenth of a percent of the vote, they now win about a fifth of that.

Also – don't confuse them with the Socialist Alternative. They hate it when people confuse them for the Socialist Alternative. Nobody is quite sure why.

Australian Sex Party

Yes, you read that name right. I had several co-workers who voted for this party last election. It got them an upper house seat in Victoria.

Fiona Patten – Australia's 'Sex' Senator

This party gets points for sheer ballsiness. They're also for legalising drugs, against censorship and on board with a few other 'civil libertarian' policies that may get a nod, but overall they could hardly be more diametrically opposed to your typical manosphere crowd.

They're steadfastly for abortion, gay marriage, euthanasia and a laundry list of other trendy leftist causes. They're basically the political arm of Australia's (rapidly growing) sex industry with a social justice flavor throw in. A whole section of their website is devoted to 'LGBTIQ asylum seekers'. Need I say more?

Greens

Ah—the Greens. Australia's third largest party with ten Senators in the upper house and one representative in the lower. The Greens are what happens when an entire generation of people grow up without ever having visited the real world.

DUUUUUDE

Likes: trains, bicycles, whales, windmills, marijuana, socialism, veganism and long acronyms.

Dislikes: cars, highways, mines, fossil fuels, hard work, guns and wealthy capitalist pig-dogs.

Do not vote for them if you enjoy such luxuries as electric lighting, hot showers and paid employment.

Palmer United Party

Found in 2013 by (semi-)billionaire Clive Palmer to ~~try and stroke his tiny penis to erection~~ reunite the nation. Won a surprising 5% of the vote in 2013. Elected three senators, all of whom immediately fucked off except for one bewildered-looking Asian guy, leaving the party more-or-less defunct.

Mr Parma absorbing nutrients from the surrounding environment

Note this is essentially what happens when a Donald Trump-esque figure tries to run for parliament in Australia. They may get elected, but they'll end up just one guy among 150 and will be sent to sit quietly in the corner accordingly.

Australian Motoring Enthusiast Party

Who comes up with these names?

This party won the lucky dip at the last election (literally). By a fortunate flow of excess preferences from dozens of micro-parties was plucked AMEP Senator Ricky Muir. Having just lost his job at a sawmill, he suddenly found himself working a $200,000 a year job as an Australian senator.

To date, nobody really knows what he stands for or what we're getting for our taxpayer dollars. As such, we can consider him the current living embodiment of the phrase "she'll be right mate!"

Labor Party

One of Australia’s oldest and proudest parties with a long history of nearly winning elections, Labor is the political arm of Australia’s union movement and is seeking to take back the house from the coalition which it lost in 2013. The main plank of its economic policy is to spend way more money then we actually have until the country goes broke and somebody else has to pay for it.

The latest polling shows Labor neck-and-neck with the coalition, though they are unlikely to win the requisite number of seats. Hopefully the country still has not forgotten the Rudd-Gillard government (2007-2013) leaving Australia hundreds of billions in debt and luring more than a thousand asylum seekers to their deaths before the coalition sealed off the border again. A sure path to eventual fiscal and cultural ruin.

IN THE BLUE CORNER

Liberal/National Coalition

A once great force of Australian politics, a welcome counterweight to the excesses of the Labor Party and brake on Australia's slide into leftism. Comprises the business-oriented 'Liberal' Party (equivalent to the UK's Tories or America's Republicans) and the rural National Party.

Unfortunately, the Coalition in 2016 is struggling to distinguish itself from Labor, having knifed previous leader Tony Abbot last year and moved to the left on issues like welfare and gay marriage. Definitely worth putting them before Labor on the ballot, but would strongly recommend picking at least one of the minor conservative parties below, where men of principle can still be found, as a warning.

Liberal Democrats

This party lucked out majorly in the 2013 elections, where they were placed first on the ballot in New South Wales. Roughly 10% of the electorate saw the word 'liberal' and thought they were voting for the Coalition (they won roughly 0.1% elsewhere) handing them a senate seat. Isn't democracy great?

This is our equivalent of the libertarian party, so they're worth a look. Anti big government, regulation, high taxes and welfare. Possibly the only party that could save Australia from economic oblivion, were it by some miracle able to form a government.

Family First

Diametrically opposed to the Sex Party, we may find common ground here, though they come from a conservative Christian viewpoint (divergent from my own agnosticism). Anti-abortion, anti-drugs, anti-gay marriage and anything else post 1950s. Currently with one senator, they have rarely polled above 2% since forming in 2001.

Shooters, Fishers & Farmers

Another name you read right. Australia has a political party specifically for the gun nuts.

Originally called the ‘Shooters Party’, then the ‘Shooters & Fishers Party’ before adopting the current ‘Shooters, Fishers & Farmers’, this is basically a party where all of Australia’s Steve Irwin and Mick Dundee-types are slowly gathering. Before long, I fully expect their name to read the Shooters, Fishers, Farmers, Campers, Lumberjacks, Crocodile Hunters And Just General Manliness Party.

‘That’s not a political party…’

Originally just anti-gun control, they are now anti-big government, anti-greens and in general anti-insanity, making them a definite option if you’re an American who happens to move to Australia. In fact, this is probably the closest we already have to a manosphere party.

Oh—and they also hold seats in three Australian states. Worth a look.

One Nation

Once Australia's primary anti-immigrant party, achieving 9% polling nationwide at the 1998 election (and 22% in Queensland – because of course). Was the victim of its own success when the conservative Howard government (1996-2007) adopted its policies with a hard line on immigrants that continues to this day.

As of 2016 Fuhrer Pauline Hanson has returned to the Fatherland and once again intends to lead the nation to glory. It is unclear if the party will win a significant share of votes, mostly due to competition from newer parties like –

Australian Liberty Alliance

One Nation wannabes also derived from the new wave of anti-immigrant parties in Europe. They recently picked former rock star Gary 'Angry' Anderson as a candidate and have been putting anti-political correctness signs up everywhere, which makes them ok in my book. If they're lucky, they might turn into a sort of Australian UKIP and drag the argument back against the multiculturalism that is slowly eroding our nation's foundations.

Conclusions

So there you have it, how we do things down under. Note this is just a sample. I didn't even mention groups like the 'Animal Justice Party', 'Help End Marijuana Party', 'No Carbon Tax Climate Skeptics', 'Bullet Train For Australia', 'Pirate Party' and others bands of assorted fuckwits.

Honestly, a part of me has toyed with the idea of starting a manosphere party of some sort – perhaps the 'Neomasculine' Party? Or the 'Redpill Alliance?' But lets face it, while it may get a decent amount of press, we'd be lucky to receive more than a few thousand votes. Give it time.

If anything, the biggest problem we have here is that all of the far-right parties are focused around specific issues. Most people left-of-center tend to congregate in the Greens, allowing them to make a real mark on Australian politics. If all of our little right-wing parties combined they'd win close to 10% of the vote, enough to make the big boys notice and present a real alternative to the soft-cocks in the coalition, just as the Greens have been slowly bleeding votes away from Labor.

Now there's a plan for Australia's future.

How Seriously Should You Take Online Death Threats?

June 12, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Are online threats serious or not? I've given this question a lot of thought after receiving dozens of threats in the past year, mostly as a result of the worldwide meetup outrage. Feminists will often falsely claim to have received death threats as a way to get in the news or solicit money donations, but what do you do when the threats are real and numerous?

Here is a representative sample of messages I received from the meetup outrage, many of which were direct threats:

If you make a stand against the establishment, it’s almost a certainty that you’ll get threats similar to the ones above. To know whether to take them seriously or not, you have to account for the context. Ask yourself the following questions:

- Are the threats part of a wave of outrage that has thousands of individuals angry at you?
- Has your address been recently published or included within the threats?
- Are the threats showing a specific mechanism of harm (knife, shooting, etc)?
- Is an individual sending repeated messages, showing that he’s emotionally invested in you?
- Does the threat include inside information of your daily routine or habits that can’t easily be found online?

The more you can answer ‘yes’ to the above questions, the more likely you should take the threats seriously. In my case, I could answer yes to the first three questions. It didn’t help that the dox of my family was perhaps the most viewed dox of all time, accumulating over one million views.

The only positive going for me was that the threats were spread out worldwide, so many of the individuals weren't even close to the Washington DC area. Nonetheless, I hired an armed security service and had them stationed around the clock in front of my father's home. I also put a flag on the address with local police to prevent a SWAT attempt. Thankfully, there was no successful attack against a member of my family or the home.

I'm counting on this happening again. My family is better prepared for it and the enemy no longer has the advantage of a surprise attack. If you exercise your free speech in a way that conflicts with the globalist agenda, I guarantee threats will come your way. If they're serious enough, I recommend you remove yourself from the threat or hire security, at least until the dust settles and the mob moves on to another target. I'm definitely more prepared today for when the mob sets its sights back on me again.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

ISIS Terror Shooting At Gay Nightclub Dismantles The Liberal Narrative

June 13, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The progressive narrative is that all people are "just like us." Any differences between different groups of people is the result of racism, colonialism, or bad economic policies. The Islamic terrorist attack on the gay nightclub in Orlando has destroyed that narrative.

What we know so far

We know that the shooter, Omar Mateen, was an American-born Afghani Muslim. He had been on an FBI watch list in 2013 after he made inflammatory remarks to a coworker and stated that he had terrorist ties. The FBI interviewed Mateen but closed the investigation. He was put on the watch list again in 2014 after he made contact with a person who later became a suicide bomber. Again, the FBI closed the case as being nothing to worry about.

Although Mateen's ex-wife said that he was not particularly religious, his father said that he hated the sight of two men kissing. NBC reports that Mateen called 911 and swore his allegiance to ISIS before he started shooting at the Pulse nightclub in Orlando. He also reportedly shouted Allahu Akbar while he was doing the shooting.

Mateen entered the nightclub and started shooting around 2:02 AM. There are some reports that Mateen was wearing a suicide vest. He was armed with a handgun and an assault rifle. The police treated it as a hostage situation but it sounds like Mateen was able to do as he pleased for nearly three hours. SWAT didn't start shooting until around 5:00 AM. Experts have already pointed out that there are similarities between the terrorist attack on the Bataclan nightclub in Paris and the shooting in Orlando.

Obama reacts

> Is President Obama going to finally mention the words radical Islamic terrorism? If he doesn't he should immediately resign in disgrace!
> — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) June 12, 2016

Given that the shooting involved gays and Islam, President Obama had his work cut out for him. His speech writers took a long time to come up with a response. The President was silent until nearly 2:00 PM on Sunday after the massacre.

Obama said that the shooting was being investigated as both a hate crime and an act of terrorism. Predictably, Obama's biggest criticism was aimed at the Second Amendment:

> This massacre is therefore a further reminder of how easy it is for someone to get their hands on a weapon that lets them shoot people in a school, or in a house of worship, or a movie theater, or in a nightclub. And we have to decide if that's the kind of country we want to be. And to actively do nothing is a decision as well.

Obama stopped short of calling it an act of Islamic terrorism. This is probably because the shooting pointed out a giant hole in the narrative that President Obama wants to prevail.

What is the official narrative?

> The Orlando club massacre is a shame, but if I or my supporters got gunned down, gays and their feminist allies would be the first to cheer.
> — Roosh (@rooshv) June 12, 2016

The media, educational institutions, and the government all push one official narrative. On the one side, there are the "good" people who are on the side of progress. These are the gays, transsexuals, furries, atheists, Muslims, Jews, people of color, Hollywood actors, women, feminist men, bronies, and liberal Christians. Any differences between these groups are merely cosmetic. At the end of the day, all of these people are “just like us” regardless of how different their beliefs and practices are. What they mean by “just like us” is that these different groups are all just like liberal, heterosexual, middle class whites.

On the other side there are the “bad” people: Trump supporters, traditional men and women, conservative whites, masculine men, and theologically conservative Christians. You, dear ROK readers, are definitely on the “bad” side because masculinity is bad. Very bad.

The overarching narrative is that the bad people are what spoil it for everybody else. So the Left (and their cuckservative enablers) have led a jihad to minimize the influence of the bad people by importing more people of color, especially Muslims. The thinking is that by importing more good people, the retrograde effect of the bad people could be countered. The terrorist incident at the Orlando gay club has destroyed this whole liberal narrative.

Islam is not compatible with liberal culture

Homosexual being thrown to his death in an Islamic country

The mistake that the non-elite leftists have made is that they have believed their own propaganda. Because religion plays no role in their own lives, leftists believe that it doesn’t play a role in anyone’s life. They can’t imagine that there is a group of people out there that is willing to kill and die for their faith.

Islam is that group of people. Unlike Christianity, which allows men to create laws based on Christian principles, Islam has a strict code called Shariah that it claims is divinely inspired. If it is divinely inspired, it cannot be changed. Unfortunately for liberals, under Shariah law, the penalty for homosexual behavior is death. This is why homosexuals are hurled from the tops of buildings in the Middle East.

Another problem is that Islam views itself as being in a perpetual state of war with all non-Muslims. While Muslims are permitted to live peaceably for a time, it is only until they are able to gather critical mass to mount an offensive against the unbelievers. This is what we are witnessing in Europe and now in the US.

There are things we can do

No, not this.

Every time there is an Islamic terrorist incident, we always get the same response from our leaders: “It is very sad, but there is nothing that could have been done (besides restrict gun ownership for the entire population). Terrorism just happens randomly. Light a candle, hold hands, and wait for the next terrorist incident.” We must no longer allow our politicians to adopt this passive approach. There is almost always something that could be done to close the holes in the system that allowed the terrorist to act.

Islamic terror in the US is often related to a breakdown in US immigration policy. The family of the Boston bombers were admitted to the US under poorly written asylum laws. In her book, Adios America, Ann Coulter describes how the asylum laws are easily abused. Yet neither the Republicans nor the Democrats have lifted a finger to close the asylum loophole.

The situation with Omar Mateen raises similar questions. Mateen was born in the US, but his family is from Afghanistan. According to Pamela Gellar, his father, Seddique Mateen, is a supporter of the Taliban who also had a political Islam TV show. The father was running for president in Afghanistan. Why was the Mateen family admitted to the US in the first place? And why was an alleged supporter of the Taliban, the enemy that the US is fighting, permitted to remain in the US?

Once we know the answers to those questions we need to hold our politicians accountable to actually closing the loopholes that allows Islamic terrorists to gain a foothold in the US.

The current approach to fighting Islamic terror is not sustainable

The policy of the US when it comes to Islamic terrorism is to pretend that it has no relation to Islam. Thus, the US continues to import Muslims. But, each new Muslim arrival increases the threat of Islamic terror. To counter that threat, the US steps up surveillance, but to ensure it is not profiling, it increases surveillance of all citizens. One of the shocking revelations that came out of the Edward Snowden affair is that the vast majority of the information gathered on innocent US citizens has no relation to terrorism.

But it is impossible to watch everyone. Real threats, like Omar Mateen, will drop off the radar. As long as there is a large Muslim presence in the US, a certain percentage of terror attacks will get through. This approach is unsustainable. It is not possible to keep increasing the surveillance state and to keep increasing the Islamic population in the US. The only solution is to curb Islamic immigration. Donald Trump's proposed ban on new Muslim immigration would go a long way of stopping the problem from getting even worse. Deporting known terrorist sympathizers would also help.

Conclusion

The Leftist narrative that everyone is "just like us" has been destroyed but don't expect the masses to understand this. Our government and media elites will double down on the narrative and use this tragic incident as an excuse to grab yet more power and control.

Still, at least some people are going to realize that the narrative is a lie. They will become our allies as we set out to create a healthy nation.

READ NOW: Free Speech Isn't Free — How 90 Men Stood Up Against The Establishment And Won

June 13, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As I announced on my blog this morning, today I'm releasing my newest book, Free Speech Isn't Free, which tells the inside story of being a target of censorship and violence at the hands of the media, political establishment, and social justice mob. The book is intended for men in the Western world who are concerned about the restriction of their rights. It gives them key knowledge of the cultural climate so they can better protect themselves against degenerate forces, and even fight back.

The cover

Official synopsis

> Free speech may be your right, but unless you fight for it, you'll lose it. That is the message of Free Speech Isn't Free, which chronicles how organizing a lecture tour for masculine men inserted Roosh Valizadeh into an unexpected free speech fight spanning several continents, putting both him and his family in danger from the globalist establishment and their mob of deranged social justice warriors.
> After becoming activated by mass-scale media distortions and mayoral denouncements, the SJW mob in Canada rose up against Roosh and his followers to halt his tour. Roosh refused to cancel and set out to hold the lectures in secret.
> He shares how he fought back against the mob while trying to come to terms with the globalist agenda that they're controlled by. The well-informed men he met throughout the tour were critical in sharing hidden knowledge that put the agenda's puzzle pieces into place.
> Even after the lecture, when Roosh tried to conduct happy hour meetings for his followers, a bigger worldwide outrage befell him, leading to the doxing of his family and threats to burn their house to the ground. Free Speech Isn't Free shares that story for the first time in a special epilogue, and what was going through the mind of a man who was the number one target for a 1984-inspired "two minutes of hate" that took place worldwide.
> How far will you go if the establishment attacks you for what you believe in? Are you ready to defend yourself if they come after your reputation, your job, and your family? Free Speech Isn't Free shows what one man did when powerful > groups tried to silence him, along with everything he learned during the most momentous months of his life that will help others be able to identify and defend against attacks within their own lives.

Video trailer

Early reader review

> Free Speech isn't Free is a watershed work detailing the (mis)adventures of Roosh and his followers during his book tour of 2015 and the February 2016 RoK meet ups. Being a part of the forum during both of these events only revealed a quarter of what was going on to the man himself. Getting a glimpse of Roosh's inner world during these harrowing events showed us that even under great stress and pressure, a strategic win is never impossible.
> Unlike Roosh's previous works that i've read (Bang & Day Bang), Free Speech isn't Free departs from the older scientifically detached writing that we're used to and changes into something that spoke from a more emotional place.
> Being so close to these events made this a nail biter. Much to my shame I wasn't able to attend, but now knowing what was going on in the background made me disappointed with myself for not being more focused during the war time measures. How can Roosh fight effectively if we're all just being misfocused kittens over here?
> The beginning took a bit of time to get into. It almost felt like the beginning of Bang with that familiar analytic approach. Once Reggie hit the scene, things started to get real. Roosh was no longer an internet blogger but a full on media sensation.
> This fails to mention the spiritual journey we also find Roosh embarking on as he attempts to hold a private discussion with a few of his followers. I'm a casual reader of Roosh's blog, but some of the things revealed in the book show a deeply spiritual man who has worked hard to learn about himself and seek the truth. In that quest, he found meaning in the strangest of places.
> This story has the potential to be one of those books for a generation like The Diary of Anne Frank and The Catcher and the Rye that others in the future can read to get a cultural cross section of what life was like for men in the early part of the 21st century.
> By far the strongest book Roosh has written to date. Highly recommended.

Receive two bonuses with the book

Bonus #1: An important new article explaining how to keep yourself safe from social justice attacks, especially by attackers who are already enmeshed in your social and professional circles.

Bonus #2: Full transcript of The State Of Man, the "dangerous" speech that initially created the hysterical censorship crusade. Here is a sample of what the speech contains:

- The paradox of modern women
- 11 problems that Western culture is facing today
- How to mentally approach living in a degenerate world
- An examination of three different time periods men faced in the past
- What today's man has gained and lost compared to his ancestors
- The unique sacrifice that modern men have to make that historical men didn't
- How women are creating a generation of men who are eager to drop out
- How to construct a win-win lifestyle where you come out on top no matter what
- 7 tips on how to meet women and experience intimacy in 2015
- Examination of the sustainability of game for men who aim to use it for the long term
- The overall benefits we can expect from women in the pursuit of relationships with them
- The two things that will allow you to enjoy life to the fullest
- One important need that all men require in life
- Three mental processes to use when you're feeling beaten and hopeless

Both of the above bonuses are embedded in the main book file.

- Order your ebook copy (pdf, mobi, and epub) for instant download ($9.99)

Free Speech Isn't Free is my 18th book, and the first one that doesn't have a sex scene, representing the general change in my writing over the past two years. The download package includes pdf, mobi, and epub files so you can read it on any device.

If you're new to my work, I'm offering a bundle special where you can download all 18 of my books and two audiobooks for only $37.

Email me if you have a question or an issue with downloading. I thank everyone who supports this book and also to those men who came out to see the lectures last year and became a part of the story. The book could be my best yet, and I eagerly await your comments about it. I hope it helps masculine men who are beginning to find themselves a target of censorship and other types of attacks from the establishment.

How Peru Defeated The Shining Path Guerrillas

Dictators get little gratitude.

When they are on top, everyone loves (or claims to love) them; but when they fall or leave office, they are reviled, accused, and loathed. Chile's former strongman Pinochet spent the last years of his life fighting criminal charges, yet a good argument can be made that his authoritarian rule laid the groundwork for Chilean economic progress after him.

The same perhaps could be said of South Korean dictator Park Chung-Hee and Peru's Alberto Fujimori. Maybe the safest survival tactic for a dictator is to die in office, out of reach of the courts and investigators.

The Fujimori case is an interesting one. I had heard the other day that his daughter had recently been defeated in her presidential election campaign. And I had remembered how her father, Alberto Fujimori, had played a major role in the defeat of the communist "Shining Path" insurgency during his term in office from 1990 to 2000.

The defeat of the Shining Path was no small achievement. This vicious guerrilla movement had terrorized Peru all through the 1980s, and at one point came very close to overthrowing the government. Its specialty was rural terror: peasants and laborers who refused to join the group were executed and their villages burned.

The spiritual leader of the Shining Path (Sendero Luminoso) was a bespectacled philosophy professor named Abimael Guzman. Not satisfied with the progress of political reforms that might change Peru's stratified social and economic system, Guzman launched an armed Maoist insurgency in 1980. The group's doctrine was a weird mix of communist and indigenous ideas. Their strategy was to attack trade unions, peasants, and government officials in an effort to separate the people from the political leadership.

From 1980 onwards, Guzman went into hiding and never appeared publicly. He sought to create a mythological aura about himself, in much the same way as Osama Bin Laden. His methods—violence, sabotage, and guerrilla warfare—were designed to erode the credibility of the state, and prepare the way for his ascent, which he thought might take decades.

But the government eventually learned counter-insurgency methods. These began before the election of Alberto Fujimori, but he definitely added impetus and urgency to them. In 1992, Guzman himself was captured and exhibited to the public in a cage. It was a stunning reversal for the Shining Path, and thereafter it gradually withered away.

How had the government won the war? These were the major methods used.

Arming The Local Population

From the late 1980s, the government began to establish civil defense committees (CDCs, or comites de civil) in the countryside. These were basically vigilante groups designed to be government allies. But the government shrewdly exploited the fact that the Shining Path had alienated much of the rural population by their excessive violence. The CDCs also added an extra intelligence arm to the government.

Land Reform

Peru had long been a place where the majority of the country's wealth was in the hands of a few. Land was especially important to the rural peasant, and he naturally preferred to work his own land. Stealing the Shining Path's thunder by pushing through agrarian reform was another masterstroke.

The rebels liked to claim that they were acting in the peasants' best interests, but this became more and more difficult to do once land reforms had been implemented. In 1990, for example, over 2400 hectares of land were distributed to about 350 families in Otuzco province.

Eliminating Corruption

Fujimori took action to stamp out corruption. He not only removed corrupt officials, but he introduced anonymity for federal judges. The Shining Path thus became unable to target and intimidate judges as it had done in the past.

Government Amnesty

Amnesties seem to work well in defusing insurgencies. As we noted in a previous article, Algeria used one in its own fight against Islamist insurgencies. Fujimori introduced the Repentance Law of 1992, which granted sentence commutations and amnesties to those who renounced the insurgency and agreed to inform on their fellow members. This measure alone began a steady stream of defectors leaving the Shining Path, and in the long term proved fatal to the movement.

Improved Intelligence Work

Fujimori placed an increased emphasis on "special forces," commando units, and patient intelligence collection. These efforts were rewarded in 1992 when his men located and captured Guzman himself. He had been hiding at his girlfriend's apartment. Intelligence operatives noticed that the volume of trash outside the residence exceeded the normal quantity produced by one person. Trash pulls revealed evidence of Guzman's presence (e.g., his favorite cigarette brand, medications, etc.), and the site was raided.

All of these measures had the net effect of isolating the insurgents from their rural bases. This is absolutely critical in getting the upper hand over rural guerrilla movements. Besides all of the measure noted above, the Shining Path did itself very few favors by stepping up its campaign of terror and violence in an ever-increasing spiral of viciousness.

This, in short, is how Fujimori's government broke the back of the Shining Path.

Its desperation caused it to lash out again and again, much as ISIS is doing today in Syria and Iraq. Exploding car bombs in urban areas (e.g., the Tarata Bombing of 1992) is the quickest way to turn public opinion against any movement that claims to speak for the people.

Ingratitude?

Despite all this, however, Fujimori's political enemies finally caught up with him. He was implicated in "human rights" violation after another, and also accused of financial corruption. Anyone who knows anything about counter-insurgency warfare knows that it is impossible to defeat guerrillas by playing by the standard rule-book.

Fujimori, like Pinochet, is still a controversial figure. Some admire his ruthless action and make the case that no other methods could have produced results. Others portray him as a corrupt dictator, trampling on the rights of the indigenous Peruvians (he presided over a controversial rural sterilization campaign) and journalists.

In the same way, Pinochet's admirers (of which there are many) claim that he rescued the country from communist subversion and laid the foundation for economic prosperity, while his detractors point to evidence of government-sanctioned torture and disappearances of regime opponents. The individual reader will have to judge for himself.

In any case, we may leave such political judgments for the history books. But the lessons on how the Shining Path was defeated are more relevant today than ever.

11 Ways To Master Your Anger

June 14, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Couple of weeks ago I published an article on types of things that men get angry about but shouldn't. But since I haven't offered a way to deal with anger itself, I have decided to compile some tips into this article. Most—if not all—solutions to anger that are available out there involve seeking professional help (which are pathetically unhelpful) and don't address the specific type of anger that men experience. So, instead, this here is a zero-nonsense guide written by a man who has battled his own demons. I can't promise you the results, but you must promise yourself dedication.

1. Accept the nature of anger

First, you must understand the nature of anger—specifically the one you possess based on your own life circumstances. Know that there are two types of anger: chronic anger due to past experience or living in a state of dissatisfaction, and acute anger which is the explosive anger of a man with short fuse. Of course, most men have a combination of the two, but I will be focusing mainly on chronic anger for this article.

Second, unlike those who say that anger is something problematic to be ridden of, know that anger in itself is not a bad thing—it's an essential emotion for humans. Think of it like pain. Pain is an unpleasant but a necessary part of our existence. We feel pain so that we avoid and defend ourselves against things that harm us. Pain doesn't become "bad" unless you feel it needlessly and without a way to stop it. And if that's the kind of anger you are experiencing, then it is something that needs to be corrected.

Speaking of pain, anger is exactly that: an expression of emotional pain used to defend yourself. This is especially true for men who cover their hurt and despair under anger for the fear of being seen weak (this is also why most depressed men appear irritable or stone-cold rather than sad and in need of help).

So, don't feel guilty about your anger; it doesn't make you a bad person.

2. Be present minded

Much of your anger is caused by your mind drifting away from the present moment. Maybe you get angry by remembering something awful from the past. Due to our power of imagination, the bygone events will seem real and immediate. You can even get angry about something that might happen in the future when you let worries overcome you. By focusing on your life towards the present moment and living in the reality—as opposed to being inside your mind—you will be free of the phantoms that haunt you.

3. Understand the root cause of your anger

This doesn't work for everyone, but understanding the root cause of your anger can be liberating and help you deal with your anger better. As a personal example, I know that whatever rage I feel towards manipulative and abusive women (even if the victim is another man) is augmented by my childhood experience: when I was seven and eight years old, I had female teachers who would pinch, slap, beat, and terrorize me non-stop. One abused me on a daily basis until I got too sick to go to school—all because my parents didn't pay her the bribe she wanted. And that's just one example from series of harsh experiences with women that I've been through in my life.

I understand that my horrid past exaggerates whatever anger I feel in the present moment, so I often remind myself to sever whatever I feel now from the past to not let it get out of control.

4. Ask yourself the Anger Question

Taming anger doesn't mean you're being a listless wimp who enjoys getting shoved around. As I've said before, anger exists to help you. You're either using anger to solve your problem or you're just getting pissed because you can't do anything about it. Really, what's the point of getting angry if you're not going to take action? So, whenever you find yourself burning up from the inside, ask yourself the Anger Question: Is my anger helping me? If the answer is no, cool down and disengage.

5. Change your mindset and thinking

Ever got angry by a specific situation only to realize that you made a mistake and there's nothing to be angry about? Did you notice just how quickly you cooled down? You can do the same with much of your anger by changing your mindset and perspective.

If you suffer from chronic anger because of your victim mentality that makes you feel as though you've been screwed over all your life, change it by being grateful for what you have and see yourself as someone who overcomes challenges. You are what you focus on. It's also helpful to write exactly what's pissing you off and why they're making you angry. You'll be surprised by just how different things appear when you take your thoughts out of your mind and onto a sheet of paper. Through that process, you'll free yourself from distortions and gain a more realistic perspective.

Also, reading books on Buddhist thoughts and stoic philosophy can do wonders for your mind as well.

6. Remove or avoid the source of anger

You probably have specific things that cause needless anger whenever you encounter them. In my previous article I used spectator sports as an example of something I decided to disengage from when I realized how frustrated and bitter I would get from watching them.

Catalog things that often anger you and either completely remove them from your life or decrease your exposure to them. Or, if you can't completely avoid them, find a way to deal with them effectively before you even engage them. Just make sure you're not running away from your problems.

7. Talk to people you trust

I was reluctant to include this one as it seemed like a feminine way of dealing with problems. However, talking can be helpful in healthy dosages when done with the right people. Just don't make a habit of it and seek attention and sympathy every time you face a problem; people will start to despise you for it. Also, try seeking someone wise whom you can trust. Just because someone cares about you, it doesn't mean they'll be helpful. Their best of intentions can make you feel even worse when they prove to be feckless.

8. Don't repress, refocus and re-channel instead

Lot of men make the mistake of repressing their anger. Repressing damages your physical health and does nothing to solve your anger problem. Yes, sometimes you need to stop yourself from doing something you'll be sorry for, but you can't make repressing your default state. If you do, you'll repress all your positive emotions along with it and suck your life energy dry. Instead, release when you can and simply re-channel or refocus your energy towards other activities that bring value to your life. It's not going to be easy, but that's part of the process.

9. Change your physiological state

Although it may start from your mind, anger is a physiological response and you should treat it as such. When you feel burning up, change your physiological state by doing an intense workout or by taking a cold shower—see if you're still angry when you're pushing your limits by placing yourself in mercy.

10. Practice meditation

You can do all the above tips to temporarily relieve your anger and loosen its grip over you, but if you truly want to master not just anger, but your mind as well, you must practice daily meditation. Meditation is simple, but not easy.

To start, find a quiet place to sit, close your eyes, and breathe slow and deep breaths. Make an effort to become aware of your own internal state. Note your thoughts and how you feel, and find where you feel the tightness of anger. Imagine breathing into that area to release the tension.

The more you practice and the more consistently you do your meditation, the better your results will be.

11. Accept the mastery of your mind as a journey

Some of you may be frustrated that I haven’t really given away the “how to” for stopping and controlling anger. “Disengage, avoid, refocus, but how?!” some may ask. How? You just do it.

Really, there’s no trick to it, all that requires is your will. If you’re looking for some sort of mind hack or secret method that will make you go “Ah-ha!” and solve your anger problems in flash, you’re searching in vain. Nothing you read, including this article, will do anything for you unless dedicate yourself.

Like any mastery, mastering your anger is going to take time, effort, and discipline. Think of how much effort and energy you have to invest to maintain a strong and healthy body. Think of the patience and focus it takes to play a musical instrument at a professional level. How many hours and how many years does it take to master them? In comparison, how much time and effort do you dedicate towards mastering your mind, the most important and difficult thing of all to master? Think about that and only then will you begin to appreciate what it takes to master anger, your mind, and your self.

Should Men Strive To Become An “Alpha Provider”?

June 14, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Most of you already know what’s in store for a “beta provider,” a man who wifes up a slut without understanding the true nature of women. By seeing her as virtuous and honest, he sets himself up for being controlled in a miserable marriage that ends in a divorce, leaving him financially destitute and unable to maintain custody of his children. Any man under the age of 40 who marries a woman today with a promiscuous background has no excuse for such a mistake because there have been ample warnings on the internet for well over a decade. With ROK having been in the news multiple times, a man has certainly been exposed to our ideas more than once.

By refusing to take on the beta provider role, it may seem that the only option left for a man is to be an “alpha male,” a leave-’em-and-forget-’em stud who maintains large harems of women that please him on demand thanks to his hard frame and aloof attitude. His knowledge of the true nature of woman, however, causes him to develop a visceral opposition to marriage, and it’s assumed that an alpha male stays in the game indefinitely.

But there’s a problem. What if you’re an alpha male who wants to create a family, not from loneliness or needing a woman, but to be a father in the traditional ways of the past? You would have a steady income where you can maintain a patriarchal household with a submissive wife who mostly stays at home and understands your leadership role and the parental involvement necessary for raising your children. Is it possible for this “alpha provider” to succeed in the modern world?

The term alpha provider was first used by Donovan Sharpe in January 2015:

> He brings home enough bacon to provide his woman the kind of lifestyle that gives her validation and comfort, as well as providing for their offspring. Keeping himself in optimal physical condition assures his woman of good, masculine genes making her willing to bear as many of his children as he wishes.
> The fabled Alpha Provider is the captain of his ship and has the genuine respect and adoration of both his woman and his children. He does not tolerate foolishness in his household and is quick to punish such shenanigans. But he is equally bountiful whereas he rewards his woman for the nurturing of his brood, her sexual loyalty, and the upkeep of his domicile and property. Though it took him quite a while, his patience and red pill wisdom allowed him to successfully find a woman worthy to be his first mate.
> A man such as this is the object of every female's desire and they seldom hide it, often openly flirting with him even in the presence of his woman. This is precisely what keeps her motivated to stay fit and feminine while keeping him sexually satiated and his domain in pristine condition.

It's certain that you have descended from alpha providers of the past. They were masculine and strong enough to defend the home (or cave) against mortal threats while providing the food and shelter that allowed your bloodline to continue. It's only now that the idea of a firm male leader within a home is considered "misogynist" and part of rape culture.

You may hate the idea of children today, but tomorrow will come

When I was in my late 20's and early 30's, I never considered having children, but now that I'm in my late 30's, the prospect doesn't seem so bad, and I envision myself as being a good father who could teach my future sons and daughters important wisdom and truths of the world that allow them to live in harmony according to their individual natures. The alpha provider role may be a good fit for me, but is there any space for it to exist in society today? What will happen to a man who wants to follow patriarchal ideas of old when feminist laws are in place to sabotage his attempt?

I already have a firm idea of what type of woman would complement me if I take on an alpha provider role. In 7 Things I Require In The Future Mother Of My Child, I listed the following traits:

> 1. She must be between 18-25 years old
> 2. She must have less than three prior sexual partners
> 3. Her physical attractiveness should hover around the 7 range
> 4. Her skin tone should be within two shades of myself
> 5. She must be feminine
> 6. She must want to be a traditional stay-at-home mother
> 7. She must believe in a god

But now I must create another list for the location that I could potentially reproduce with such a girl. To begin doing so, I have to consider the following:

> 1. What is the divorce rate of the country I want to have children in?
> 2. What are the divorce and custody laws like?
> 3. What have been the experiences of foreign men who have married there?
> 4. What is the country's birth rate and receptiveness to family formation? How do people view the nuclear family?
> 5. Does the country have values that are multicultural and atheist or traditional and spiritual?
> 6. Will there be degenerate cultural forces that try to ruin the stability and happiness of my family?

There are many countries that we know have feminine women, particularly in South America, Eastern Europe, and Southeast Asia, but just because a country has pretty women doesn't mean it's automatically great for something more than casual relationships, especially when many countries I've been to wholeheartedly support women in the workforce, delayed motherhood, and easy divorce.

We have the knowledge on where to find pretty women, but now it's time to examine exactly where a man who strives to be an alpha provider can create his own castle without government interference or cultural oppression. From the looks of it, it won't be in the Western nations that we were born in.

Islam Pass: Feminists And World Leaders Silent As ISIS Burns Alive Child Sex Slaves

June 14, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The media continues to give radical Islam a pass. Not only are the media blaming gun owners or "toxic masculinity" rather than ISIS for the unfolding tragedy in Orlando, last week as a horrific story came out from Mosul, Iraq of Yazidi girls as young as 8 years old being imprisoned, caged and burned alive for refusing to become sex slaves, it quickly became evident the death of Harambe the gorilla would end up sparking more public outrage on social media and more genuflecting in the dying (once mainstream) media than misogynistic rape and murder at the hand of religious fanatics. An anonymous witness described the nightmarish scene as the young girls were incinerated:

> The 19 girls were burned to death, while hundreds of people were watching. Nobody could do anything to save them from the brutal punishment. They were punished for refusing to have sex with ISIS militants.

Adding to the issue of this issue not receiving proper attention, it is believed radical Islamists hold an additional 1,800 to 3,500 more sex slaves hostage, with many of the girls aged 10 to 12. Ahmed Amin Koro, a 15-year old Yazidi boy escaped imprisonment and told interviewers what he witnessed:

> The girls were covering their faces with dirt, trying to make themselves less beautiful. But if they were caught doing that they were beaten. They were all > beaten and taken away.

The lack of attention to this huge story came despite feminists in Western culture regularly labeling themselves as champions of women and young girls, as they create a culture that chastises, demonizes, and marginalizes men for everything from "microaggressions" to requesting sandwiches from "liberated" women. In the twisted world of American media, even if young females are burned to death by radical Islamists, it does not warrant the same level of outrage as a gorilla death, or even the level of outrage Donald Trump sparked last week after making this mild comment about a judge who is the member of a group that calls itself La Raza or "The Race."

> Judge Curiel is a member of a club or society, very strongly pro-Mexican, which is all fine. But I say he's got bias.

The media was screaming, flopping on the floor, and foaming at the mouth over the tepid Trump comment before the cindered corpses of 19 young girls, true victims of sex crimes and female oppression, had even cooled down. The biases of feminists, leftists, and their marionettes in the media are becoming more obvious, and more worrisome by the day. Here are a few examples of how the bias works based on last week's events:

- Radical Islamic crimes are not subjected to the same standard of scrutiny as Christian crimes
- The media will blame terrorist attacks on gun owners rather than radical Islam
- The media cares more about zoo animals than it does young sex slaves being burned to death
- Feminists are concerned more with personal power and removing men from their roles in society than actual evil being done against women
- Leftists claim to want to live in a world without borders but ignore evil going on outside the U.S.
- An activist judge can be a member of a anti-gringo group but a Caucasian Presidential Candidate cannot point out his potential for biasing a high-profile court case

Without getting sidetracked on the Trump comments, it is important to point out that even the Marxist Cesar Chavez said La Raza is an anti-gringo group:

> I hear more and more Mexicans talking about la raza—to build up their pride. Some people don't look at it as racism, but when you say La Raza, you are saying an anti-gringo thing, and it won't stop there. Today it's anti-gringo, tomorrow it will be anti-Negro.

While discussing media bias, the alphabet networks even went so far as to blame women who support Trump for the violence of Marxist protestors pelting them with eggs. The media also underplayed the fact "migrants" committed 69,000 crimes in Germany alone in the first 3 months of 2016, and routinely ignore brutal rape cases or hide the ethnicity of perpetrators.

With the tragedy of young girls being burned alive and the other stunning examples of bias, the cognitive dissonance feminists and leftists continue to demonstrate is breathtaking. It proves that in the liberal hierarchy of concerns, religion trumps feminism, as long as that religion is Islam. It also shows there is and will be more conflict between two groups under the liberal tent: feminists and Islamists.

The Messiah failed to comment on the tragedy of young sex slaves being burned alive

The Silence Is Deafening

Where was the Pope on the matter? President Obama? Hillary, the supposed champion of women? Other world leaders? Prominent feminists? The media? Other than a few short, tepidly written news stories the matter was largely shuffled under the rug and dismissed, except insofar as it helped provide a pretext to keep funneling money into the military-industrial complex. Michelle Obama was apparently too busy complaining about having to live in a White House partially built by slaves, eating French fries and vegetable gardening to take notice of young women being raped and burned alive.

Even more telling, Yazidis are a minority religion which has remnants of Christianity and other religions in it. We all know the Hollyweird, New York Talking Head, and Marxist political operatives in America have been decidedly anti-Christian for generations.

Imagine if the situation were reversed: a radical Christian group burned to death 19 Islamic sex slaves. It would receive 24/7 attention and condemnation. CNN would get on its soap box and pontificate over how terrible the oppression of women by burning them to death is until "something is done!" The U.S. would send in SWAT teams and elite units teams to take out the oppressors, as it has done numerous times on its own soil against groups who challenge government tyranny, as when it killed LaVoy Finicum in an ambush style attack earlier this year. (FBI storm troopers are now under investigation in the Oregon standoff with Finicum, and the land the family refused to vacate has ties to a Clinton uranium deal.)

When an issue like the rape and murder of young girls by radicals are suppressed or ignored, it implies some level of consent to what is happening by those in power. It also tells us political game players do not really give a damn about moral issues no matter how much preening they do in front of television cameras. The only way they get involved is if the issue means either gaining more personal power, a boost in their public persona, and/or higher approval ratings.

An issue like the murders of sex slaves could also expose leftist hypocrisy and diametrically opposed ideologies (feminism vs. Islamism) in the Democrat tent if it became lodged in the admittedly short memories of fast food and ball games obsessed sheeple. This is why issues like these are never given a lot of air time. Multiculturalism implies tolerance, but it is hard for people to tolerate crimes against humanity like sex slavery and burning people alive. Leftists claim to be champions of women but at the same time tell people not to worry when a religion that oppresses women is increasing in number in Europe and America. Leftists claim multiculturalism will bring about Utopia on earth when in fact people are self-segregating, forming groups like La Raza and Black Lives Matter, and the population of Europe and America grows ever more vivisected and divided.

In short, an issue like one of the liberals' "protected classes" of people burning sex slaves alive throws the political narrative off to such a degree it will never receive the emphasis it deserves. Just as Hillary claims to be a great champion of women while many of Bill's former hookups say she tried to shut them up, including a black prostitute who claims Bill fathered her biracial son, it is hypocrisy in The Political Game and The Corrupt Media. Four legs good, two legs bad, as in George Orwell's Animal Farm.

Sex With Animals Is Now Legal In Canada But Speaking Your Mind Leads To Persecution

Oh Canada, why you so lame? At a time when free speech has been under repeated attack from Vancouver to Newfoundland, the Canadian Supreme Court has ruled that bestiality falling short of penetration is legal. The decision was not even close, with seven justices outnumbering the sole dissenter. Inasmuch as the outcome of the case in question, which involved a man accused of sexually abusing both his stepdaughters and a dog, came as a shock to many, such lunacy has been brewing in Canada for many years. Meanwhile, Roosh was hunted down by rabid feminists and SJWs in Montreal in particular last year for daring to talk about gender relations!

Although people having all kinds of sex with animals is not unheard of, and is probably more common than we imagine, laws for or against bestiality are not the sort of things that should be occupying society's attention much. Concepts like free speech, appropriate levels of policing, what misdeeds warrant criminal prosecution, and related matters are actually the bread and butter of making political and legal systems work. Yet instead of strengthening provisions protecting those who speak their mind without inciting violence, Canada has persecuted and/or prosecuted those who dare to espouse rightwing opinions, or even criticize people such as feminists.

Many of those who reveled in the possibility that Roosh would be seriously injured or killed in Canada in 2015, including drug smuggler-cum-politician Cheri DiNovo, have said nothing or very little about the oral bestiality ruling by the Canadian Supreme Court. (But I do notice far too many shots of DiNovo trying to wear tight clothing on her Twitter feed.) I have not seen negative social media comments about the decision from fellow Roosh haters John Tory, the Mayor of Toronto, and Norm Kelly, Toronto Councilman and acting extra from The Walking Dead, either. Rather than focusing on Canadian issues, like the bestiality legalization, which directly affects their country, the trio are too busy trying to score electoral points from the Orlando gay nightclub shooting more than a thousand miles away. But that Roosh guy? Yeah, let's pick on him!

Roosh is just one of many persecuted for his non-violent speech, while sick people who want sex with animals are protected

It's a good thing that members of the Canadian Supreme Court dress like Santa Claus because Christmas just came early for those who like oral sex with animals.

An international sex tourist targeting animals for oral sex would have far less problems in Canada today than Roosh did when trying to give lectures to fellow men last year. This is the very sad reality that confronts "modern" Canada. And he is not alone. Take, for example, the deplorable treatment meted out to Gregory Alan Elliott, who was prosecuted for daring to disagree with and hurt the precious feelings of some feminists. Even after he emerged victorious, the ordeal has probably eviscerated his finances for the next decade, shaved years off his prospective lifespan, and ensured he will be the recipient of future, serious harassment. But any John Smith wishing to be orally pleasured by a domestic goat will have no problems with Canadian law now, thanks to the Supreme Court ruling.

Then we have instances where outright slander and perjury disguised as "free speech" and "testimony" is enabled by the Canadian court system. Despite lie after lie after lie after lie from false accuser Lucy DeCoutere and her fellow rape fantasist to both police and in the courtroom, no criminal charges will be laid. Whereas Jian Ghomeshi's career is over and will never be resurrected, DeCoutere and miscreants like her are able to carve out lucrative professions as victims ad infinitum. They are as untouchable as the Canadians now legally engaging in oral sex with all manner of canines, felines, bovines and numerous other animal categories.

Canada is in undeniable free fall

Uh-huh.

It would seem that pedophilia is the next domain of the depraved to be given protected status in Canada now oral sex with animals is fine. American publications like Salon are already going into overdrive to "humanize" and justify self-confessed pedophiles and the crossover between Canadian and American SJWs does not know any national border. Just make sure your politics are not right-of-center, though. Otherwise you're in for a very tough ride and probable criminal prosecution if you don't keep your mouth shut.

The relationship between Return Of Kings and Canada is staggering, to say the least. We have numerous American and Australian contributors, plus European correspondents, but inordinate amounts of writers' time are consumed by a single country north of the mainland US, one that is presently trying to out-Sweden Sweden. When the world ends, people will say the inspiration for the cataclysm was Canada.

If you are unfortunate enough to be in Canada as this social and political disaster unfolds, the following advice may help and console you in your dark times: get out of Canada. Period.

Can The Player Lifestyle Damage Your Ability To Have Long-Term Relationships?

June 15, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Women with plenty of notches get a bad rap for not being able to hold down relationships or become decent mothers, but a male "player" with a ton of sexual experience is just as likely to become bored and cheat. While youthful experimentation is not only healthy but is actually desirable for men, bedding an excessive number of women may not benefit you if you aspire to a wife and family in later life.

Rick and Chloe

Woman sitting on bed, man sleeping

Rick is married to Chloe. Both Rick and Chloe work for an organization that used to employ me a while back. Recently I met up with a former colleague who also works there and he updated me on everything that was going on, including the state of Rick and Chloe's relationship. What he told me was intriguing, if not a little depressing.

First some context. Rick is probably the most successful "natural" I've ever met when it comes to picking up women. With a lay count of nearly five hundred, he possesses all of the characteristics, both physical and attitudinal, required to be great with girls. Tall, decent-looking, well-dressed and with a great line in verbal banter, he was always going to be a contender. But on top of that, he also displays clear “dark triadic” characteristics—that is narcissism, Machaiavellianism and psychopathy. It is these characteristics, in my view, which have really sealed his success with the opposite sex.

Entirely casting aside the old adage about not shitting where you eat, Rick has been involved with several very high-profile relationships in the office. One was with an attractive young girl of about twenty-five called Zoe, whom he dated for two years or so. During that time he bought her a breast enlargement, presumably in order to increase the value of his investment. He even moved in with her, but at around the eighteen month mark he showed signs of becoming bored and moved out again, although the pair continued to sleep together. Then he began seeing Chloe—concurrently. This led to a huge public break-up with Zoe that was broadcast on social media and beyond.

For a good while, Rick and Chloe seemed to enjoy the perfect relationship. Chloe, who was blond and still very attractive (despite being thirty-six years old) had apparently brought about a great change in his life. The narrative constructed around this pairing was that Rick had finally “grown up”—that Chloe had “tamed him” and that now, finally, he was ready to put aside his philandering ways in order to commit to a good woman.

At the end of last year Rick and Chloe got married. It was a very expensive ceremony at an exclusive country house venue. The black and white photographs showed the well-groomed pair stepping joyfully into this new phase of their lives. The look of victory on Chloe’s face was clear.

The joy lasted for approximately six months. Recently it came to light that Rick had been sleeping with a very attractive young intern, Emily, from the office (22 years old). Understandably all hell broke loose and Chloe threw Rick out of their marital home. But she was prepared to forgive him. For a while the plan was that they would work it out—right up until the moment when Chloe discovered Rick was still sexing Emily on the quiet. Now Chloe has resigned her position at work, too humiliated to return. Rick remains unrepentant, still enjoying his affair with a much younger woman, and seemingly not concerned about attempting to save his marriage. The fact that they spent something like £60,000 on the big day itself makes the whole thing even more ridiculous.

You Can’t Put It Back In The Bottle

The difficulty for both men and women is that once you’ve tasted variety, and realized that yes, there is an infinite abundance of potential sexual partners out there in the world, it becomes very hard to stick with just one for the rest of your life.

Monogamy, and whether or not it is a natural state, has been debated frequently elsewhere. Whether or not long-term monogamy and happiness was ever truly possible is a moot point. But in 2016, with smartphones and Tinder and more lax societal conventions around sex, it's certainly a hell of a lot more difficult. As a man, this is something worth bearing in mind. What is it that you really want? If one day you would like to settle down with one woman and have kids then realise that experiencing variety may not benefit you.

My writing largely concerns itself with meeting and attracting women (for the purposes of experimentation or finding a partner). This is an area that fascinates me, as does the interplay between men and women, and the way that it has slowly changed over time. But there is a darker side to the life of the serial player. You can do what you want with your life, but it's worth recognizing this.

Women Love Damaged Men

Rick's story also contains a lesson for those interested in attracting women. Perhaps there will be men reading this who are jealous of his ability to draw women to him, even against their own interests—think about the risk of social ostracizing that Emily was prepared to take in order to have sex with him. Unfortunately, for me this story simply confirms that many women are attracted to damaged men. Rick's high quotient of the dark triad of characteristics—narcissism, Machaiavellianism and psychopathy—make him irresistible to many women. But it is these same characteristics that mark him as unsuitable for monogamy or family life. Perhaps he's cool with that, but if you're not then you should think carefully about what your life goals are and move towards them strategically.

It’s Becoming Too Dangerous For College Males To Date Girls On Campus

June 15, 2016 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

The day was too busy for me to notice it at the time, but in retrospect I had a very interesting client. He faced a problem that is increasingly present in college campuses:

He was accused not once, but twice of making a girl feel “uncomfortable.”

No formal complaint was made to the cops (so it didn’t happen), no attempt to personally tell him he was bothering them was made, but a complaint was filed with the increasingly defacto (though illegitimate) fourth layer of government – the college. He didn’t get in trouble (because I believe his offense was so slight and unintentional even the school management deemed it not worth pursuing), but the experience obviously disturbed and concerned him enough that he thought it wise to seek and pay for my counsel.

However, while I was more focused on trying to figure out if he just naturally looked creepy, failed to read their signals, or truly was the victim of an increasing feminist-anti-male-rape-hysteria-drama, a solution recommended in the comments section to my consult hit me as it is a depressing portender of things to come.

"Don't date girls on your campus."

Forbidden Fruit

This was not recommended once, but thrice, which prompted me to see if this was now becoming mainstream advice as a way for men to battle the false rape accusations of today's Mattress Girls. It hasn't, but the manosphere and neomasculinity community has a tendency to be on the cutting end of developing advice and wisdom. And in 2-5 years time (especially if these false rape accusations and anti-male college environments continue) I can see this becoming standard basic advice we elder brothers of teh interwebz pass along to our younger incoming freshmen brothers. This advice will become mainstream.

The sad thing, however, is what this says about the state of male and female relationships on college campuses.

The truth is the vast majority of men look forward to college as a place to met and bang chicks. I would honestly assess that for the majority of them, their degree is a close….or perhaps maybe distant…second reason they attend college. Additionally, for biological and marketing reasons, women and college are hyped up to be the most important thing in every high school boy's life. So not only do they have hormones driving them to chase tail on college campuses, but all of the movies, shows, and media point to college as one huge parentless orgy of loose women with big tatas and poor decision making skills. And while most men's college experiences fell drastically short of this, this dream that every high school boy has, will be completely destroyed if the threat of false rape or harassment makes dating women on campus too risky.

College women will also suffer. I simply cannot believe that the majority of young women today on college campuses swallow whole the anti-male, everything is rape, feminist hysteria. Some of them may vote left, some of them may like Hillary, but only those with mental damage can I see filing false rape accusations. Of course, I am no longer on a college campus, nor date college age girls (and those of you on the front lines please correct me if I'm wrong), but I don't see 80% of the girls looking like Triggly Puff and slapping false rape accusations against a guy who sits next to her in class.

But you don't need 80% of college campus girls to be male-hating feminists. You just need 2-3% and that's enough to poison the whole lot because a man simply cannot afford a 2-3% chance of getting kicked out of school and being falsely accused of rape. And so if the rape hysteria continues, women may have to get used to having even worse chances than they do now of finding a boyfriend, let alone a husband.

Why Can't I Find A Man?

Logically, with their lives, future husbands, and future families on the line you would think these women would call for a stop to false accusations, fake rape claims, and insist all claims be investigated by police (not the college). They would also reject the leftist-feminist brainwashing they receive on college campus, insisting a man merely trying to kiss a girl at a party or asking a girl out is not harassment, let alone rape. Unfortunately, however, while the majority of college age women would not falsely accuse somebody of rape, they have been so steeped in leftist indoctrination they are unable to make the connection between this self-destructive ideology and how it ruins their chances of a happy life with typically the only thing that can bring them true happiness—the love of a man. So it is unlikely this trend will be reversed within our collegiate lifetimes.

In the meantime boys, if your campus is particularly pro-feminist or the women's studies department claims officially "1 out of 2" women is sexually assaulted on campus you may want to look down the street at that small little private college and see if there are any honies you can date over there.

DePaul University President Resigns Due To Fallout From Cancelled Milo Yiannopoulos Speech

June 16, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Earlier this week, DePaul University President Dennis Holtschneider announced that he was stepping down later in the week due to the ongoing fallout from Breitbart's Milo Yiannopoulos' cancelled speech at the university last month. In a resignation letter sent to students and faculty, Holtschneider claimed that his retirement was in the works for several months prior and that he is planning to remain at DePaul as a professor:

> Please know I am not leaving for another position. While I will remain open to assignments after 2017, my present plan is to return to DePaul in my tenured faculty position following a year away from the institution to give the new president the breathing room he or she deserves.

While supporters of Milo and cultural libertarians may hail Holtschneider's resignation as a victory, the reality is that he is stepping down not due to pressure from us, but from the radical left hooligans who shut down Milo's speech. In this, DePaul is going down the same path as the University of Missouri, which capitulated to social justice whiners and subsequently saw its enrollment plummet. DePaul will no doubt see its student body collapse in the coming months.

The Right Move, The Wrong Reasons

To recap, Milo Yiannopoulos was slated to give a speech at DePaul University on May 24th, but barely 15 minutes into the event, the speech was effectively cancelled when a pair of #BlackLivesMatter activists stormed the stage and stole the mics, threatening Milo multiple times in the process. The event's organizers attempted to call both security and the police, but both were ordered to stand by and do nothing, despite the fact that DePaul had shaken down the organizers for added security fees just prior to the event. (I was at the speech and got attacked by Katie O'Reilly, an SJW student who tried to steal my phone.)

The day after the event, Holtschneider issued a mealy-mouthed apology for what happened, conspicuously avoiding apologizing to Milo, whose speech was disrupted and personal safety threatened by Holtschneider's actions. In response, angry Milo fans began flooding DePaul's Facebook page with negative reviews and contacting donors, causing the college's ratings to collapse. Breitbart and the College Republicans have also been fighting to get the money they were forced to spend on security refunded.

Amazingly, despite the fact that they succeeded in shutting down an event that Milo and the College Republicans had paid for and had every right to hold, DePaul's leftists still weren't happy. The DePaul Black Leadership Coalition were incensed by Holtschneider's apology, offended by the fact that he even allowed the speech to take place. Sociology professor Dr. Shu-Ju Ada Cheng resigned for similar reasons, claiming that free speech is a "delusional" idea "rooted" in "market ideology." I also discovered that DePaul's Islamic chaplain Abdul-Malik Ryan is an ISIS supporter with connections to John Walker Lindh.

In response, Holtschneider walked back his apology, pledging to increase funding to groups that were involved in disrupting Milo's speech. Unfortunately, the first rule of dealing with SJWs is never apologize, and Holtschneider's attempts at conciliation only made the situation worse. As he resigns, he's accomplished the truly remarkable feat of pissing off both leftists and conservatives and pleasing no one.

Swirling The Bowl

The DePaul incident is yet another in a recent string of clashes between college students and their administrators, as kids drunk on social justice move further left than their elders are comfortable with. As mentioned above, the chancellor of Mizzou was forced to resign following a series of leftist protests kicked off by a poop swastika supposedly found in a bathroom, with students alleging that the administration wasn't doing enough to "protect" them. Following the administration acceding to the protesters' demands, enrollment dropped off a cliff, putting Mizzou's future in jeopardy.

Similarly, I wouldn't be surprised if DePaul University sees its enrollment for coming semesters collapse. While leftists are still powerful in many ways, the cultural victories of the past two years—GamerGate, the Trump campaign and the like—have shown that people are sick of social justice warriors. Given his cowardly response to what happened with Milo Yiannopoulos, DePaul deserves to go down, and Dennis Holtschneider deserves to leave in disgrace.

The Resistance Pyramid: A Strategy For Men To Defend Themselves And Fight Back

June 16, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A week doesn't go by without a man asking me how he can fight back. He's ready to take action but is not sure how. For the longest time I've been thinking about this problem, because while we do want to win, we don't want to lose our jobs from witch hunts or end up in jail for a trivial reason. There's a balance to be struck between maintaining our freedom (self-preservation) and enacting the change we want to see in our city or society.

I've developed the resistance pyramid as a hierarchy of action to becoming a force that resists state or mob efforts to remove your liberties or displace you from your home. Lower levels on the hierarchy should be completed before attempting the higher levels.

Individual Improvement

It's not wise to send an untrained civilian into battle. He must first realize his masculine potential, understand his strengths, manage his weaknesses, and face the fears from his own anxieties and existential questions about life. A man must become physically strong, mentally strong, and self-aware of his reality.

It may be hard for some of you to believe, but learning how to sleep with a lot of women put me on this path. I dealt with my anxieties, learned objective truths of the world, improved my bodily strength, steeled my will and resolve, and built up the courage to face difficult situations that included defending my "misogynist" views against the establishment.

Every man has a unique path to reaching his potential, but for a lot of men, game is a reliable device that allows him to do so. Whatever method you pick, you must find a way to develop your physical and mental abilities above that of an average man. By the end of this stage, you will have the strength to begin fighting.

Financial Resilience

In the modern era, you must earn money in order to have shelter, food, clothing, and other essentials like internet and basic communication devices. Without money, you will not be able to live in a proper environment that allows you to develop your strengths.

But merely having a job is not enough, because that job is now your number one weakness when your enemies decide to come after you. Since corporations are sensitive to even tiny amounts of bad publicity, you will become a target for false accusations by liberal activists that intend to remove you from employment. In fact, this is their number one method of going after those whom they disagree with. You must therefore create proper defenses against such an attack.

There are various strategies to steel your cash flow:

- Have multiple sources of income, preferable from internet sources that are at least partially concealed from the public
- Create a business, consulting firm, or freelancing operation with a large client base instead of working for a corporation
- Have a savings fund that you can live on for three years without a steady job
- Have a detailed action plan for replenishing your income after an attack
- Maintain a local professional network of men who can aid you in case your finances are weakened

Even though my cash flow is continually attacked by my enemies, they have not disrupted my operations because I have so many different sources of income with backup plans for replacing them. There are multiple ways to sell electronic books (or physical goods), receive donations, serve advertising, and hold events that if they shut down one avenue I'll just open another. It took me well over five years to achieve this level of resilience. Start today, and build your financial bunker one step at a time.

Global Information Warfare

During individual improvement, you began making thought crimes against the official egalitarian narrative. You will now accelerate your learning and disseminate truth through participation on masculine sites, forums, and Youtube channels while observing and participating in online raids against SJW's and feminists. This is where you learn how the system works, how truth is concealed, how lies are disseminated, who your enemy is, and how to cause them pain. You also begin finding communities of men who you can trust.

Many men participate in global information warfare without taking the first step of individual improvement. They are often called keyboard jockies. The problem with them is that they are fighting out of boredom or to alleviate their insecurities, not because they are part of a movement that has goals which lift up men. When the fighting gets especially tough, they will be the first to drop out since they lack the mental conviction. They are essentially role-playing actors.

By the end of this stage, your individual strength, financial resilience, and warfare knowledge will allow you to successfully defend yourself against attacks that arrive right at your front door.

Tribal Organization

The next step for a man is to link up to other men within his city. We currently take for granted that the internet is always on, but previous internal disturbances like with the Arab Spring show that governments will cut off the internet and cell phone service in times of crisis or revolt against their rule, and in a case like 9/11, electronic communications may be down in certain areas. What will you do right now if the internet gets shut off and you can't get in touch with your existing allies? You're probably screwed.

Last year I started the tribal meeting to allow for local organization. In times of calm, it will resemble a social happy hour, but it can be quickly weaponized into a force that keeps its members safe. It's important to realize that you must have your tribe assembled before war comes to you, because after that it will be too late to organize. The tribe can also experiment with small resistance actions that don't put their existence in jeopardy, such as disrupting social justice or feminist protests or causing difficultly for corrupt local politicians.

It is extremely hard to stop groups of organized men. This is why the worldwide leftist establishment threw a temper tantrum against tribal meetup day in February 2016. Once your tribe is organized, you'll now have the strength to fight, the knowledge on how to fight, and a team of men to fight with.

Local Resistance & Self-Defense

The pyramid now turns on its edge and becomes a spear.

All the pieces are in place for you to react to enemy attacks on yourself, your family, and your fellow tribesmen. I cannot give you specific advice on how to fight back, because each battle will be different, but I can say that if you've made it to this last stage, you will be able to cause devastating pain to the enemy while posing an existential threat to the establishment.

Your resistance may have components that are seen as illegal, so at this stage you now open yourself up to prosecution by the state. It's here that you must decide if the pain from the oppression you're facing is greater than a possible loss of your freedom or life. If you choose not to fight, you must live with that decision, and if you choose to fight, you must be prepared to go all the way. The gods will not smile down on men who only go halfway.

The one mistake that men make is wanting to change their entire nation or world. They try to run before they can walk. I hate to break your heart, but you will not change the world. Your ideas will not become national policy or get you a job as the personal adviser to the President. As a man who has had significant world influence, I can state this with confidence because at the end of the day I'm still just a man with a web site, but I can confidently state that you can successfully change yourself and the men near you. You can affect your most immediate world, meaning your local community, neighborhood, and town. You may not know this because you have yet to try.

Global change is out of our hands, at least for the time being, but local change is not. Instead of lamenting of the worldwide changes concerning feminism or immigration, focus instead on local changes that can limit harmful effects upon you and your tribe.

Example Of The Spear In Action

The first time that I used the spear was in Canada when they tried to shut down my speeches and hunt me down on the streets. I did not have a pre-formed local organization in Canada, but due to my internet presence, I was able to make one on-the-fly. I created and led operations to attack individual SJW's, I maintained propaganda campaigns, I hired local protection to keep me safe, and I used guerrilla tactics to make sure the events proceeded as planned.

A Montreal police officer did state to me on the telephone that he believes I participated in assault by throwing my drink at one of my attackers, and "legal experts" hired by the media said I committed "illegal harassment." I fully deny all wrongdoing, but things did get dirty and I could not say with 100% confidence during the thick of it that I would not be charged with a crime. When you enter battle, your actions and those of your enemy will enter gray areas or outright illegality.

The decision to enter local battle should not be taken lightly. Every time a Muslim terrorist decides to blow something up, he mentally accepts that his death may take place before deciding to continue. You must also accept the worst case scenario (imprisonment, injury, death) in your battle planning. If you can accept that worst case scenario, that likely means you are facing a battle that is a clear and present threat to your existence or well-being. In that case, proceeding may be the right decision, but only you can decide for sure. I was ready to go to jail in Canada, and did not fear it, so I knew that fighting back against the threat I faced was aligned with my individual nature and capabilities.

Conclusion

The pyramid I've described above will not create a revolution that marches on the capital to demand regime change. It will not cause men to "rise up" with butcher knives and clubs. It will instead allow a man to reach his mental and physical potential, give him self-awareness of the forces he's up against, learn how he's being attacked, learn to defend himself against attack, learn how to cause his enemy harm, forge local bonds with men he can rely on in case of national or local disturbances, and develop the ability to fight battles that help his community and defend himself, his tribe, and his family.

I did not devise this pyramid lightly, because I know that a man who follows it can hurt himself or even be killed, so I advise only what I've personally gone through and what I will certainly go through in the future. Aside from getting into entertaining internet scraps, I will certainly not invent or contrive a fight that puts myself or my tribe in danger. The stakes must be high and they must be real.

I will not advise men to suddenly pick up arms and start killing their enemy and taking towns, so if this is the movement you want, you will have to look elsewhere. Our heaviest resistance should be locally based and from a position of self-defense. Only if arms have been raised against us can we even consider likewise. Until then, we must train, prepare, and connect with men that we can trust and bond with, because I'm certain that there are difficult times ahead of us.

Why Fragility And Inaction Could Be The Death Of Free Speech

June 16, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

You are not free to say what you think without risks. You cannot expose a truth that does not suit those who are in control, without paying a price. You will be under fire for stating what is true but dangerous for the established order.

Hoping that you will forever dodge the attacks is unrealistic. Your position is not safe and you must come to terms with this. In due course, they will eventually hit you.

Like the falling man said : “So far, so good”.

For the right to be free, there is no such thing as mercy

In this war for free speech, rest assured that the victor will not be magnanimous towards the loser. The focus, in addition to seeking truth and exposing lies, should be on how to take hits and survive it. Resilience is the aim. Today, liberal governments can try to publicly disgrace you, make you lose your job or imprison you. Tomorrow, through inaction and letting them progress in their hegemony, death could be your sentence for saying out loud what you think.

Every man has something to lose. The less vulnerability you expose to the enemy, the less likely he is to defeat you.

Resilience versus fragility

The reinforcement of the body and the mind by being exposed to conflict gradually, makes us progress through trial and error. There is a total absence of exposure to actual harm among the large majority of SJWs. “Fragile” is what defines our foes and will be their downfall. It is the weak one that asks for equality from the strong. Like cackling schoolgirls, the ones who criticize or mock do very little when facing an opponent that is impervious to their words.

Carl the Cuck. What can this pencil neck do without a crowd? Beware as the likes of him could be in a position of power in the future, provided that they are not culled by the very people they try to defend first

By celebrating strength and seeking resilience instead of weakness, we arm ourselves and the ones that will follow us for the dark times ahead.

The fragile, when cornered and exposed to violence, prays and hopes for the best. When he rarely reacts, he quickly learns that life is not an Internet argument.

Inaction is as dangerous as the threat itself

In a textbook display of fragility, after being openly attacked by Islam, the left's reaction in Belgium, France or Orlando is the same. People hold hands, light candles and stay idle, hoping things will change by themselves. Whoring publicly for attention is easy. It is a different thing to actually fight what threatens you.

The choice of inaction can be motivated by two things:

- Fear of being hurt or shamed for someone else’s sake
- Indifference for the problem at hand

Showing weakness inspires disgust and hatred. This is how things are. Mercy is a recent Christian value that goes against our instinct of wiping the weak from the face of the Earth. Men universally respect the warrior that fights bravely. Cowardice makes the last thoughts of respect vanish.

The weak crumbles under pressure. The resilient stands tall in the storm

Calm is always temporary

When attacked by something they defend, the liberal pretends to be shocked. The delusion is abysmal. The monster the leftist allows to grow will always attack him in return. While curled in a ball on the floor and losing his blood, he says “At least I am tolerant and I have the moral high ground.”

The war for free speech is as simple as any other. The first one to cave in will lose. The enemies will keep hitting. This is why we have to bring back the notion of standing our ground.

On how to be resilient

Among the numerous things that can be done, here are a few that immediately cross the mind:

- Give an honest look at what your weaknesses are and work on them daily
- Protect your family and friends
- Create a very strict circle of trust.
- Work towards being financially untouchable
- Strengthen your body by learning how to defend yourself, regular exercise, meditation and a good hygiene of life
- Arm yourself as your raw physical strength is finite
- Toughen your mind through reading, writing, developing a state of constant “relaxed but alert” state of awareness
- Striving for a maximum and balanced level of strength in mind and body
- Expose the lies of your foes for the world to know
- Be visible. ACT

The list is longer and it is a lifetime commitment. Take a good, hard look at your actions when you are striving towards what you believe is just. Is what I do genuinely effective? Am I looking for recognition more than a positive outcome? Does it have an actual impact on the world around me?

In his recent article, The Resistance Pyramid, Roosh details how you must firstly be an example of what you preach, acting locally before influencing your surroundings.

As a body can be broken, it is paramount for the mind to be strong, to survive trauma and overcome. I will insist, once again, on physical confrontation being vital. You know after being repeatedly punched and kicked that words, if they do not carry truth, are just a sound wave.

Pour finir

Become the "captain of your soul." When your own world is under control, bring guidance to others when they seek it. You cannot convince those who shut their minds, no matter the proof you bring them.

When you witness someone drowning, you want to help. But there is no point helping someone that consciously does not want to be saved. Let him drown. Your life is more important.

As Big Brother Closes In, We Can Choose Dangerous Freedom Or Comfortable Slavery

June 17, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Every day, I open the news headlines hoping for some break in the barrage of bad news befalling our society. And every day, I am disappointed as things get worse, not better. At times it is like waking up in the middle of some awful dream that won't end. At times I feel despair as the odds are stacked against those who value freedom, masculinity, femininity, and self-determination.

The propaganda ministers are so smooth, duplicitous and efficient they have brainwashed millions. An elite controls all the money and all the weapons. Americans think the Second Amendment will protect them from the specter of abject tyranny, and while it offers some modicum of protection, with the advanced weaponry the government has access any opposition will most likely be very bloody, and ineffective when the clock strikes midnight and a false flag pretext to martial law signals the end of the Old World Order.

Warnings about the world we have awakened to have fallen on deaf ears for half a century. Bellies are full but souls are empty. People are busy licking their chops and loosening their belts to accommodate expanding waistlines as they eat like pigs at the corporate feedbag rather than paying attention to the noose quietly being slipped around their necks. As evidence, total sales of food at restaurants just surpassed sales of food bought at grocery stores for the first time in history. Much of the binging out (eating out) is driven by millennials, who view dining at as a social event, as cooking becomes a lost art since feminists turned the kitchen into the vortex of hell in the female mind.

America in the 21st century has morphed into the Land of Cockaigne, as depicted by Dutch Renaissance artist Breugel the Elder:

> In medieval times, Cockaigne was a mythical land of plenty, but Bruegel's depiction of Cockaigne and its residents is not meant to be a flattering one. He chooses rather a comic illustration of the spiritual emptiness believed to derive from gluttony and sloth, two of the seven deadly sins.

The sheeple are also impulse buying their way into $733 billion of credit card bondage, as eating out and shopping are essentially the only government-approved outlets for their Freudian ids. As further evidence of how enslaved people are by over-consumption:

- $8.25 trillion is owed on mortgages (mortgage literally means pay until death)
- $1.06 trillion is owed on car loans
- $1.23 trillion is owed on student loans

But, it gets worse. As if being debt slaves addicted to the greasy, slow death of fast food, and lifestyles of buying crap we don't need to impress people we don't like wasn't enough, a more insidious type of slavery, electronic slavery, is closing in on us.

Modern day Westerners have become the oafs portrayed in Bruegel the Elder's famous painting the Land of Cockaigne

The End of Free Speech and Anonymity

Last week offered quite a number of disturbing stories to anyone paying attention and concerned about the loss of freedom in the world. First, the EU proposed requiring government ID to log on to the internet. This would effectively end freedom of expression and anonymity online. Indeed, governments are good at taking rights away from people then selling them back under the guise of "licensing." Following the frequently used and abused Hegelian dialectic, which clueless media talking heads in America are now using to tell people to accept getting microchips implanted into their children, because chip implants are just as harmless as bar codes, the Soviet… er… European Union released this statement, selling tyranny under the guise of keeping people safe:

> It is recognized that a multitude of username and password combinations is both inconvenient and a security risk. In order to keep identification simple and secure, consumers should be able to choose the credentials by which they want > to identify or authenticate themselves. In particular, online platforms should only accept credentials issued or recognized by national public authorities, such as electronic or mobile IDs, national identity cards, or bank cards.

Already, EU member Estonia, a former Communist country boasts how wonderful its mandatory electronic ID card has been. The blueprint for centralized control of all human activity is evident in how the card is used:

- For "legal travel" [there's such a thing as illegal travel now?]
- As the national health insurance card [didn't get your mandated vaccine last year?]
- As proof of identification when logging into bank accounts from a home computer [no access to cash means corrupt banksters and politicians have total control over lives as money buys freedom]
- As a public transport ticket [no ticky, no laundry]
- For digital signatures
- For i-voting
- For accessing government databases to check one's medical records, file taxes, etc.
- For picking up e-Prescriptions

In other words, the intent of electronic ID is to make it so people cannot go take a shit without government permission, and for them to pay a tax each time they do.

Beyond implementing government control and censorship of the Internet, freedom of movement is threatened by growing electronic tyranny. There is the newly introduced, unbelievable concept of illegal travel as evidenced above. Adding to the mess, a new app is tracking the movements of people around the world using their faces, according to MarketWatch.

> A new app called FindFace, recently released in Russia, gives us a glimpse into what this future might look like. FindFace allows anybody to snap a photo of a passerby and discover their real name — already with 70% reliability.
> Nearly 250 million video surveillance cameras have been installed throughout the world, and chances are you've been seen by several of them today. Soon anybody with a high-resolution camera and the right software will be able to determine your identity. Recognition algorithms have become far more accurate, the devices we carry can process huge amounts of data, and there's massive databases of faces now available on social media that are tied to our real names.

Here's an example of how this software could be used: Say you show up on the streets of Kolkota with a legal prostitute in your young and stupid years, and a FindFace image of you gets uploaded into a government database at oh, let's say the Utah Data Center. The government uses the image, as it already uses red light cameras, to fine you for becoming a signed risk in its socialist healthcare system, even though the CDC's own statistics tell us even if you had unprotected vaginal sex with someone known to have the HIV virus you only have a 1 in 10,000 chance of contracting the virus. No worries, the doubled premium will be deducted out with your next Shared Responsibility Payment.

By the way, you can't refuse to pay because all money has been made electronic. Oops…had a Coca-Cola with dinner? No worries, the soda tax was automatically deducted. But wait, you've had 7 sodas this month, which puts you at a higher risk for Type II diabetes. The limit is 6 sodas per month. Your Shared Responsibility Payment will have to be increased again. Oh, and it seems you've been hanging out a lot outside of town. Sorry, but we are going to have to restrict your area of travel as your carbon emissions are too high. Your car will automatically shut off if you drive outside the restricted area. Your electronic ID will also not allow you to make any purchases in that area code. See how insidious this can get?

These stories came on the heels of another report showing arrests once again have surged in Merry Old England for social media posts that violated Orwellian "online crimes of speech" and a hypocritical crackdown on online "hate speech" by Faceberg and other majors in the social media world. As Paul Joseph Watson reported, Facebook refused to take pages like "I Fucking Want to Kill Donald Trump" down despite numerous reports that it violated their "Community Standards," while it removed posts remotely critical of one of the protected classes on the modern day Animal Farm. Read: If you are Caucasian, and especially if you are a Caucasian male, you are NOT a protected class.

"It is dangerous to be right when the government is wrong." -Voltaire

Moral Relativism And The End Of Freedom

Americans and Europeans thought they won the Cold War only to wake up a generation later and find themselves in the midst of a socialist revolution. The tenets of Marxism are steadily being implemented in the U.S. and Europe. Pat Buchanan sounded the alarm in an interview about Cultural Marxism:

> The United States has undergone a cultural, moral and religious revolution. A militant secularism has arisen in this country. It has always had a hold on the intellectual and academic elites, but in the 1960s it captured the young in the universities and the colleges. This is the basis of the great cultural war we're undergoing… We are two countries now. We are two countries morally, culturally, > socially, and theologically. Cultural wars do not lend themselves to peaceful co-existence. One side prevails, or the other prevails. The truth is that while conservatives won the Cold War with political and economic Communism, we've lost the cultural war with cultural Marxism, which I think has prevailed pretty much in the United States. It is now the dominant culture. Whereas those of us who are traditionalists, we are, if you will, the counterculture.

The coming end to free speech and anonymity are only the latest chapters in the socialist revolution saga. Laying the groundwork, Marxists have fulfilled many of the tenets of the Communist Manifesto in varying degrees, including centralization of both communication and transportation. Already, 6 corporations own 90% of the media and the EU openly dreams of requiring government issued ID to use the internet. (A similar proposal is in the pipeline in America.) Then we have the ever-expanding and intrusive TSA. By the way, in recent years the TSA has been expanding its grasp onto America's roads with VIPR checkpoints, which subject people to searches on the highway that are similar to those at airports.

A handful of corporations now control 90% of the purchases we make at the supermarket, fulfilling another tenet of the Communist Manifesto: centralization of the means of production. Free government education for the masses, expatriation fines for people who try to leave the country (currently $2,350 to officially renounce citizenship), centralization of the money supply, a progressive income tax, and government control of private property through property taxes—in which people never really own their property as much as they rent it from the government—are other tenets of the Communist Manifesto that have been implemented. In fact, America has already completed 8 out of 10 of the tenets in the Manifesto to varying degrees!

Marxists are coming out the woodwork with even more evil designs, openly discussing new items on their checklist they want to implement once the masses are under complete, centralized control. Government bureaucrats, including one of the architects of Obamacare, Ezekiel Emmanuel (Rahm's brother), are openly discussing age 75 as the politically correct time for people to die, suggesting a scheme of government euthanization could ultimately come about as people should not let themselves become "burdens" after they have lived out their usefulness to society. Eugenics, anyone?

Marxists are also pushing the implementation of 1,000 new, micromanaging bureaucracies, carbon "sin" wealth transfers from America and Europe to the rest of the world, and giving rights of legal personality Mother Earth to sue and bankrupt Western nations in a world climate court at annual global warming conferences. (No, they're not discussing sunshine, lollipops, and rainbows as the media would have you believe.)

Without giving their subjects time to recover from the last shock to their system, social engineers are now busy turning pedophiles the next protected class. The ultimate goal is a world of moral relativism and top-down bureaucratic control in which no human behavior can be judged, and people have to get government permission to breathe. (We all exhale carbon, which is now classified a pollutant even though all life on earth is made of it and cannot live without it!)

The battle between those who want to be free and those who want to micromanage lives stretches back to Ancient China

Libertarianism vs. Authoritarianism

The battle we find ourselves in the middle of today between live and let live people and the authoritarians is unending in the history of civilization. In Ancient China, a similar battle played out between the Legalists, Confucians and Taoists, with Murray Rothbard calling the Taoists "the world's first libertarians." Mises Daily details the philosophy of each group, and this excerpt makes it obvious the type of battle we are fighting today stretches back thousands of years.

> Roughly, the Legalists, the latest of the three broad schools, simply believed in maximal power to the state, and advised rulers how to increase that power. The Taoists were the world's first libertarians, who believed in virtually no interference by the state in economy or society, and the Confucians were middle-of-the-roaders on this critical issue.

Anyone who loves freedom and liberty knows we are currently on the losing side of this eternal struggle, and electronics offer a chance for "Legalist" authoritarians to realize social and political control that goes beyond their wildest dreams. The battle is not Democrat vs. Republican. It is libertarianism vs. authoritarianism, plain and simple. Both major American political parties have become authoritarian. (And the fake Gary Johnson is a liberal wolf in Libertarian sheep's clothing, as he said he agrees with Bernie Sanders on 73% of the issues.)

What is most disheartening is even though great numbers of people seem to be awakening, the masses seem content to scratch their bellies, lick their lips, drool, and wait for a government check to arrive, oblivious to their ongoing enslavement. It is time for men to throw off their cultural indoctrination, stop with the meekness, stand up, and say hell no to the chains that are being forged around us day by day. Electronic tyranny is the new method of authoritarianism, and the creep of it into all aspects of our lives must be stopped.

If we fail as guardians of society, we have only ourselves to blame. As men, no one is going to come help us out. We should have never let ourselves boxed so far into a corner. No, better to adapt this mindset, as so brilliantly laid out by The Savage Lifestyle:

> Then the paltry crumbs of self righteous virtue signaling become yours to parade around to other simps all competing in a pathetic clown act. Stepping on and over one another in wanton displays of who is the weakest and loudest crybaby. In a race to to the ABSOLUTE BOTTOM. To mock these detestable caricatures is to establish a clear boundary. You will not stand for that shit. Contrarily in the glorious and unmolested expanses of still wild Nature we observe plainly which values are most important to a given species. At the foundation of the natural and savage earth is this: Survival of the species. The strong survive. The weak perish. No amount of millennial tears, hashtags, online petitions, and circle jerk slacktivism will change this brutal truth. The impish weakling of the modern world does not stop slaking his overwhelming thirst for consumption at this manure trough of cultural and personal suicide.

Those are our choices: Continue to consume ourselves to death on the path to suicide or stand up for survival. We have several options available right now. Peaceful civil disobedience, downshifting to a lifestyle of minimalism to "starve the beast" of tax money, and most importantly, no longer staying silent and hoping for the best.

SJWs Bomb Free Speech Isn't Free With Fake Reviews Because It Hurts Their Feelings

June 17, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It only took only one day for Reddit losers to mobilize against me, which is much faster than their previous efforts against my lectures and meetups. I must assume they're following my work more religiously than my actual supporters.

The reviews are worthy of literary merit:

Last week I did a video where a bird pooped on me while I was filming. An SJW is the human equivalent of a bird that poops on you because mommy and daddy didn't raise them right, but it's too bad that their activism is becoming increasingly impotent. Not only did their earlier petition against me not result in my books being banned, and not only does my operation remain 100% functional after their multiple DDOS attempts and a million "rapist" comments, but Free Speech Isn't Free is slated to be my biggest book launch ever. It has been consistently at number 1 or 2 in the censorship category.

Based on a word cloud analysis that a reader performed, it's clear that the fake reviews are a projection of nothing more than their own abnormal sexual fantasies:

> For a book that doesn't advocate for rape or violence, your detractors certainly think it does. pic.twitter.com/7tlN7HECcI

Of course it's a pity that a quality work is tarnished by losers, but it's called "culture war" for a reason, and I seem to be at the front lines. Just like I state in the book, sacrifices have to be made if you want to exercise your free speech, and I'm prepared for 1,000 more fake reviews that will surely come in the next outrage. I'm also prepared for them to yell at me from their safe spaces this July in Cleveland during the Republican National Convention.

Three fresh reviews

Vox Day, author of SJWs Always Lie, has made Free Speech Isn't Free the book of the week at his blog. I expect both of our books to be companions in understanding and defeating social justice warriors.

> Free Speech Isn't Free: How 90 Men Stood Up Against The Globalist Establishment — And Won is a fascinating look behind the scenes of Roosh's notorious speaking tour, which culminated this spring in one of the biggest, most unjustified attempted media lynchings I have ever witnessed. Roosh walks the reader through the entire experience of the tour and its aftermath, from conception to conclusion, in remarkably honest detail. He not only bares his thought processes, he bares his hopes and his fears in a way few writers would > dare.

Seth from Masculine Books writes a thorough review:

> The lengths to which other men were willing to aid and stand up for Roosh was profound and admirable. It's something all men should take to heart. Although Roosh did much of the grunt work on his own, his dedicated band of followers was able to implement maneuvers as means of disrupting SJW communication.
> What really stood out to me was that SJW's are incapable of doing the same. They don't care about each other. They have no concept of loyalty, and if one of their own gets picked off, they'll cry foul, but then move on.
> The SJW mob is weak. Their true power, when measured individually, is quite laughable. As Roosh routinely mocks: Tens of thousands of Canadian SJW's, aided by parliamentarians and mayors, could not stop Roosh from giving his happy hour speech.

Lastly, Bernard Chapin does a video review on the book where he wasn't shy to point out the errors that he thinks I made.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. The Sacred Heart And Masculinity

June 17, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Before becoming Catholic, reverence for the Sacred Heart seemed like a devotion for silly women; this was not helped by the many lacy, pretty, effeminate pictures attached to this facet of Christian devotion. Also, having been an Orthodox Christian, the practice seemed odd, to me; many in Orthodox circles spoke of the devotion as being "Crypto-Nestorian," as though it separated Christ's Humanity from His Divinity. Finally, it seemed to me that it was yet another example of modern "Churchianity" (i.e., all "love" and no consequences).

But, as I have come to see, the authentic spirituality of this devotion is precisely the inverse of each case. Rather than being an effeminate devotion for silly women, it is focused upon the most masculine qualities of Christ. Rather than being fraught with theological shortcomings, it is rooted in the profoundest doctrines of the Fathers on the Incarnation. Far from being Churchian, the devotion deals extensively with God's wrath and disappointment.

The Masculine and Feminine Principles

For all of human history, society has been furthered and protected chiefly by the labors and sacrifices of men. We all know the saying: "no pain, no gain;" this is as true when are shredding our muscle tissue so that it can rebuild, or enduring discomfort and even pain to grow in virtue, as it is when men bleed and sweat for their countries and for their kin. Thus, though many have balked at the idea of a "weak" or suffering God, we see that Christ's Passion puts Him right in the center of the mystery of the human experience, which is trapped between vulnerability and strength, often preserving strength at a great price. Media vita in morte sumus.

More than that, however, the Church always saw that there was an added mystery. We have spoken before of how God is the supreme masculine, of which created masculinity is a shadow, and that the creature is feminine in relation to Him. Christ, in emptying Himself of the exterior glory of the Godhead, in humbling Himself to be shrunk into a span, in putting Himself into the "feminine" sphere of creation and even consenting to be penetrated with the nails and the lance, seems to have inverted, as it were, the "Yin and the Yang" in the order of being. And there is in this a great mystery.

In the splendor of the Divine Nature, God is Impassible and Incorrupt, the Masculine Act, never the feminine potential. First Satan and his apostate angels, then man, insisted nevertheless on exalting themselves against Him, as though they could do Him despite or injury. "Very well," one could imagine God reckoning; "if you want Me to come down to where you can exalt yourselves over Me, subject Me to your whims, attempt to do Me harm and despite, then fine, I'll play fair: here I come."

But, though this condescension in the Incarnation appeared to put God in a position of womanly weakness (analogously speaking), it was His counsel that this should be the manner of displaying His nature to be of such invincible might, that when God our Father broke upon the sharpened daggers of this world, life and strength would flow out from Him so forcefully as to annihilate all weakness. Man drinks this down as mercy or as wrath, depending upon whether he continues to resist the flood of His power, or learns to stoop and drink from the torrent.

Strength and Weakness; O Admirabile Commercium!

One will find many of the ancient philosophers, and also the theologians, speak of continence. The idea is of "containing" one's self, physically and spiritually, as a matter of manliness and virtue. The body loses fluids for reasons related to weakness; injury can result in loss of blood, and "the life is in the blood;" labor brings sweat; stress and sorrow bring tears; sickness expels many fluids; our nether regions express the waste product of our mortal coil; a man's mind is overthrown, his limbs grow weak and his body releases sleep hormones upon ejaculating. As a general rule, men stressed the need to avoid the loss of vigor and life through moral and physical incontinence.

Yet here is Christ: emptied of His divine glory, and stripped even of His clothes; He has wept; He sweated, even to the point of bursting His capillaries and sweating blood; He is bleeding from innumerable flesh wounds; He spouts blood, riven through with nails; at last, as the final insult, a lance is thrust into His already dead Body, piercing the Heart and releasing a torrent of blood and water. Well might He have said, “I thirst,” for He has been drilled full of holes and drained like a cask of wine pressed from the grapes of Wrath.

We looked at the mystery of suffering and its relation to strength; sometimes when the man bleeds, sweats, ejaculates, etc., though he grows somewhat weaker, new life or strength is defended or propagated elsewhere. Even Adam, immune at that point to corruption or suffering, was reduced to a weakened state of sleep, for God to take Eve from his side. For mere men, who are finite, there is a limit to this. But the Lord in His shrewdness deceived the Devil with the bait of weakness. The God Who came down to allow His creatures to visit the hurt upon Him in His Humanity, which they could not visit upon His Divinity, has had the last laugh.

For in reducing Him to the lowest pitch of humility, passivity and physical incontinence, with the thrust of the nails and the lance they have unwittingly burst the dike of the Divinity! Now, from the Holy of Holies in the Temple that is God’s Body, the Sacred Heart of the Lord, flows a torrent of blood, water and fire, which deifies us, the deicides! Such is God’s virility, such His power, such His potency, that when His creatures could finally do Him the hurt they wished, it caused healing, strength and power to flood out to every corner of the cosmos. The weakness of God is itself strength beyond the mind’s imagining.

Saint John Chrysostom and the other Fathers, speak of how the Church was born from the side of the Lord, from the water and blood flowing from His Heart, just as Eve was born from the rib of Adam's side. The rending of the Lord's Heart, therefore, is the husband's betrothal of his wife; it is the father's begetting of his children; it is the winning of the rights of conquest; it is the labor of the husbandman producing good fruit in season; it is the reminder of the subordination of woman to man, wrought by God with a belly laugh and a glint in His eye; it is the humour, the cunning, the meekness, the wrath and, yes, the ardent love, of the Supreme Patriarch.

One could say it is the passing of a certain kind of test, to which women often try to subject their men… but I will stop just shy of saying so.

The Patriarch's Ultimatum: Take it or Leave it

While devotion to the Lord's Most Sacred Heart is as ancient as the Church itself, it gained a new clarity of form and content as the modern age was born, and is one of three spiritual treasures given to man to warn him of the increasing urgency of making his peace with the Maker. The devotion to the Sacred Heart acquired a special momentum from the Medieval devotion to the Five Wounds. This devotion focused on the lengths to which the Patriarch has gone to recall His errant wife and children back to Him, as witnessed to in His Five, Chief Wounds: the hands, feet and side. The wound in the side gained a special significance, as it opened access to His Heart, Origin of the Church and of the Sacraments, Fount of Forgiveness, Holy of Holies where Christ communed, in His Humanity, with the Father, and locus of all His intentions, vengeance and mercy alike.

Hence a common image of that age, is the Ostensio Vulnerum, showing Christ returning on Doomsday and showing His Five Wounds to all mankind. The repentant see in Them the pledge of their salvation; the impenitent see in them the evidence of their crimes. A vision oft-repeated in devotional literature at that time, was an apparition of Christ to an impenitent man on his deathbed, entreating him to repent by showing His wounds and saying: “look, these I have suffered to save you; accept them.” When the man still refused, Christ reached into the Wound of His side, into His heart, and drew from there an handful of blood, which He then splattered all over the man’s face, saying: “Thou demon-spawn, this shall be a ready token betwixt Me and thee in the day of doom, that I would have done thee mercy, and thou wouldst not!” Iesu, misericordia!

In the Heart of Christ we see, indeed, the depth, the ardor, the perfection, the super-abundance, of God’s love for man. We see the assertion of His rights as much as of His providence towards us. If, after condescending to indulge us in our lust to subject the Deity to our whimsy, we still will not bend the knee to the infinite grace and might which flowed from His rent Heart, then truly He has done all for us that could be done, “and we would not.” All that remains is the expectation of severe judgment. All the saints who refined devotion to the Heart, spoke of Its sorrow and wrath in the face of man’s indifference.

In our days, we see how hysterical and haughty many females have become, kicking against the goads of nature and resenting man his superior role. Men could point to rows of military graves, the lives spent in back-breaking labor, the glories of art, architecture, literature and science with which we have showered them. The day is at hand when, if we live, women will have to be dealt with severely. But we must remember that, as women are to men, so we men are to our rightful superiors, chiefly God. Let us not recompense Him by acting like odoriferous, lunatic, blue-haired dykes, ourselves.

I have spoken here of but one, central aspect of the devotion to the Heart of the Lord, which I think is most suited to ROK. I encourage you to learn more about it; I have put some things on my blog about it, and will probably write some more. Those who increase their devotion to the Sacred Heart, especially in this month of June, can gain many graces from God our Savior. To Him be glory now and forever, amen.

Why Aren't Disabled Athletes Paid The Same As Normal Female Athletes?

June 18, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Women's sport has more than a few problems. In addition to the pathetic wrangling of female athletes for "equal pay," despite having separate gender-based fields that spare women from being embarrassed by superior male players, feminists do not mention how calls for equality completely ignore the grossly inferior remuneration given to disabled, mature-age, and even youth competitors. So, using feminist and SJW logic, in advocating for so-called women's equality in sport, leftists and self-aggrandizing female athletes have condoned and perpetuated discrimination against the disabled, older people, and the young.

During the recently ended French Open, the able-bodied women's events for this tennis tournament featured a total prize pool of €14,712,000 (ca. US$16,700,000), pretty much half of the nearly €31,000,000 handed out across all parts of the tournament. This was nearly 70 times higher than the meager €217,000 given to wheelchair tennis players across both the male and female fields. But why? What happened to equal pay for equal work? If anyone seriously suggesting that wheelchair athletes do not work as hard as female able-bodied athletes?

Here's the catch, though: able-bodied women will never support equal pay for disabled athletes. Because of the number of very high-profile global or semi-global sports, mixed in with swathes of internationally-recognized athletes, it could be said we have reached a dead-end for sport-related financial expansion. If not, then at the very least the rate of expansion is slowing. If wheelchair-bound and other disabled athletes start to get the attention of their able-bodied counterparts, the able-bodied women lose and will have to sacrifice much of their own ignominiously-acquired earnings. They clearly sensed this from the start, as they never called for “equal pay” for the disabled when they were demanding the same as the able-bodied men.

The shifting sands trying to justify “equal pay” for women only bolster the arguments for paying disabled athletes the same

Why not pay this person the same as an able-bodied athlete? Or pay the same to a masters’ level (35-40+) or youth competitor?

The first “pillar” used to justify equal pay for women who do not compete in the same competitive field as men was (and remains) that “both sexes are equal, how can we pay them differently?” This completely sidesteps why women are playing amongst themselves, but it is the point that feminists and female athletes have banged on about for years. The contrived “Battle of the Sexes” tennis match, where still-playing female player Billie Jean King beat a long-retired 55-year-old man with a distinct paunch, was used to try and press this point of so-called equality. And here’s my own questions about equality: “Are disabled people not equal, too? If not, why are we paying them less?”

A second justification is the idea of effort. Women supposedly work as hard as men and this means they should be compensated equally. Yet a few major roadblocks emerge: we have no idea what the average male vs. female athlete level of effort is, effort can vary between male athletes and between female athletes and not just between genders, and effort itself is not directly rewarded in any sporting competition in the world. And if effort is a benchmark for financial reward, then disabled athletes should be paid the most of all. Instead of wallowing in their disability, they have gone out in the world, traveled with severe physical impediments, and chased a dream that currently offers little financial security.

The third pillar is a mass bombardment of popular media with exhortations that the public watch female sports, especially increasingly politically correct ones like soccer. If you don't, you are in possession of some significant chauvinistic moral failings. Though the propaganda (and it is propaganda) is unmistaken, it usually stops short of explicitly telling viewers to support female athletes in the same way as men. When the popular media tries this with disabled athletes, the calls for viewership and other backing seem more patronizing and forced, as if the outlets just have to.

Finally, the concept of revenue comes into play. Feminists and their enablers are hoping to crank up the popular media propaganda to such a point that financial support for women's sports equals men's and they can say both genders deserve the same pay, despite grossly inferior female physical output. Of course, this outcome would be artificial. It is a method that relies on indoctrination and shaming of those who find women's sports less appealing, rather than a proper appreciation for the merits of male and female sport compared side-by-side. At present, a mixing-and-matching process is going on, whereby the excuse fluctuates from the equality argument back to the revenue argument. There is no similar dexterity in advocating for disabled athletes, unsurprisingly.

All manner of "equal pay" permutations can be discussed

Why doesn't he get equal pay compared to the able-bodied, adult-but-not-middle-aged women?

We have discussed disabled athletes here, but what about masters' level (35-40+) competitors? Most notably when people hit their 60s, participating in sports is a choice we should be rewarding, not ignoring, It is amusing how feminists are willing to dismiss physical aptitude differences between men and women and demand equal pay in sports for separate gender-based fields, but act as if older athletes did not deserve equal pay because their physical abilities are in general decline. The same can be said of juvenile athletes, who frequently earn close to nothing, despite boys' teams having beaten the women's adult football teams of both the United States and Australia. Age cuts across the skills barrier as much as gender.

Sadly, you could bet your final dollar that the madness of "equal pay" will continue in its closed-off, selfish form. For the record, I am not for equal pay for disabled athletes. It is unfeasible and would, as I have suggested, necessitate a multitude of other fields divided by gender, age and level of disability, each of them entitled to "equal pay." At the same time, however, female athletes' own arguments require them to support equal pay for disabled athletes, not that they will.

It is much easier for feminists to pretend to stand for an ideal than to actually stand for it when it does not benefit them.

The Quest For Freedom Of Thought

June 18, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published on Fortress of the Mind.

We take it for granted today that we should be able to think and speak as we wish. It is very easy to forget that this right has been the exception, and not the rule, for most of recorded history. It is a quite recent development. At one stage of history, the struggle to assert freedom of thought was bound up with the fight for freedom of religion: that is, the idea that a person should be able to worship as he pleased.

At later stages of history, the fight to assert freedom of thought and speech was bound up with political and social struggles. Whatever form it took, the quest was always the same: the desire to be free from retaliation while asserting one's personal rights.

It will be useful to draw a general sketch on how freedom of thought developed. It is very important that we do this. For it will enable us to appreciate our current situation much better, and show us how it was the end result of a long, and even bloody, struggle.

Our story must begin with the ancient Greeks of the Ionian islands. For it was they who first bequeathed to history this most precious gift. There were many societies more ancient than they: Egyptians, Cretans, Assyrians, Chinese, Indians, and a few others. But in all of these societies–without exception, as it turns out–intellectual activity was kept firmly in the hands of the priestly classes, or in the hands of the monarchy.

Egypt presents a typical case. Only priests were taught the secret of reading and writing; we note that hieroglyphic writing died out so thoroughly because knowledge of it was in the hands of so few. The same situation existed in Assyria and India as well. In China, entry into the privileged classes was controlled by a formidable examination system. These societies were also rigidly stratified. No one outside the clergies or royal courts had much time or inclination for intellectual activity.

But something miraculous happened in early Greece. Perhaps it had something to do with the climate, the geography, or the fact that the Greeks had frequent contact with other cultures: Phoenicians, Persians, Cretans, and barbarians. Perhaps this intercourse stimulated them and caused them to question everything. Or maybe it was the fact that they were a trading and commercial people, who rebelled against the idea of control by despots.

Whatever the cause, it was a real and lasting development for European history. Philosophy and natural science (the two were one at this time) took shape with thinkers like Democritus, Thales of Miletus, Heraclitus, Anaximander, and many others. We know little more than the names of most of them. Diogenes Laertius's Lives of the Philosophers contains many stories and short summaries of most of the pre-Socratic philosophers. It is well worth reading.

What matters is that these thinkers did something no one (as far as we know) had done before. They had the courage to question the established and inherited wisdom. They had the vision to ask "why?" about nearly everything. Nothing was forbidden: government, human relations, material substances, spiritualism, the existence of God, anything.

No central government or divine sovereign sought to muzzle them, except in very rare cases (that of Socrates being one). Reason and speech were truly free, and the result was the greatest explosion of creative activity the world had yet seen. Art, literature, music, drama, science, and mathematics flourished.

With the advent of Rome, this situation generally persisted. The spark of independence went out with Rome's conquest of Greece in 146 B.C., but for the most part, scholars and philosophers were left alone as long as they paid lip service fealty to the emperors in Rome. The Romans were actually quite tolerant of religious diversity. All over the empire, a myriad of cults and religions could be found: the Oriental "mystery" religions of Serapis, Isis, and Mithras were just few of a great many. All the emperors asked was that communities pay their tributes and erect a statue of the emperor as a sign of loyalty.

Things began to change with the advent of Christianity, however. It upset the tacit agreement of religious tolerance in the Empire. It was different from all the other religions, in fact. To the Romans, it was deeply subversive: it preached that the "end of the world" was at hand; that Christians should refuse military service; and, most crucially, that theirs was the only true religion. It was profoundly intolerant of other religions. And this was something new.

At first the Romans looked up on the Christians as harmless fanatics, as just another obscure offshoot sect of the perpetually rebellious Jews. The Jews were also looked upon by the Romans with suspicion for refusing to accept emperor-worship; but for the most part, the Jews kept to themselves, and were content to preserve their customs and traditions in peace. But the Christians were different. They proselytized aggressively, and this made them dangerous.

It is almost amusing to read the Roman official Pliny the Younger's frustrations in dealing with the Christian fanatics that came before him. They would not cooperate with Rome. They were recalcitrant and unyielding. And in his letters to the Emperor Trajan, he gave vent to his anger at these upstarts.

When Christianity finally inherited the Empire, its victory was complete. It became the sole official religion, and promptly banned all others. "Religious toleration" as we know it today did not exist then. Pagan temples were closed; heretical beliefs were persecuted; and the Platonic Academy in Athens, operating for many centuries, was finally closed. The emperor Julian the Apostate's feeble attempt to revive paganism during his reign was ineffective and doomed.

Reason would sleep for a thousand years. To understand why this was so, we must appreciate what Europe was like at the dawn of the Middle Ages (i.e., in late antiquity). Men had lived through chaos and disorder, and were profoundly disillusioned. The great empire of Rome, in existence for many hundreds of years, was shattered. Stability and prosperity gave way to violence and chaos. Men had little time for speculative activity or books. They preferred certainty and comfort to the fresh air of reason. And a highly structured religion (Christianity) gave this to them.

Human thought made little progress in the Middle Ages. Scientific inquiry that might contradict Christian theology was discouraged, even dangerous. But the stirrings of the Renaissance in fifteenth century Italy changed everything. Scholars rediscovered the glories of classical antiquity, and the brilliant classical spirit of questioning received knowledge. Greek and Latin manuscripts (some hidden for centuries) came to light which fired men's imaginations.

Although the Italian humanists had a gentleman's agreement with the Holy See not to attack Christian doctrines openly, there could be no going back to the old ways once the new discoveries had been made. The Inquisition in Spain and Italy could keep a lid on "deviant" thought for some time, but ultimately it was a losing battle.

But the modern concepts of "freedom of speech" and "freedom of thought" were the outgrowth of two historical periods: (1) the European religious wars following the Reformation, and (2) the eighteenth-century Enlightenment. They both had a profound significance on history.

The major lesson of the religious wars, as we can see in the agreement that ended the Thirty Years' War (the Peace of Westphalia in 1648) was religious tolerance. Neither Protestants nor Catholics could exterminate each other, or forcibly convert each other; so they must learn to live with each other. Europe was exhausted, and had no other choice. But this realization came at a horrendous price in blood and treasure.

With the Enlightenment, which burned most brightly in France, official Church doctrine finally came under direct attack. The growth of scientific, geographical, and astronomical knowledge made this inevitable. Man began to realize that he was part of a vast world, that extended across many continents and nations; and if he looked at the sky, he discovered that his world was only one of countless millions in space. Biblical teachings came to be seen more as allegory than as literal fact as biblical textual criticism began to take shape. What was once considered infallible now came to be appreciated as a literary work of man.

And yet, as ecclesiastical authority waned, the power of the modern nation-state grew. In many cases, it just stepped into the Church's shoes as the unquestioned authority. It became the new overlord. Control of printing, books, newspapers, and magazines became an important part of keeping the public under a firm hand.

The societies that some permitted freedom of thought (e.g., Holland and England) seemed to be better at innovating that those that did not. The connection between these two things (freedom of thought and economic success) could not be denied. As Spain and Italy declined in economic power, so rose England and Holland.

This lesson–that innovation and vitality is impossible without freedom of speech and thought–is what we must conclude from this brief overview. As John Stuart Mill has noted, the societies that permit it do well; and those that do not, stagnate and shrivel up.

It goes without saying that I think freedom of speech is something we should all be interested in. For me personally, the topic matters a great deal. Attorneys who practice law and represent clients are confronted almost daily by examples of injustice and abuses of power. In some situations, these abuses can shock the conscience of any fair-minded man. The attorney must then do his best to give his client a chance at justice, even when the client is an unpopular one. And as writer, I believe writers should be able to express their opinions without fear of retaliation, whether such retaliation is direct or indirect.

The enemies of freedom of thought and speech are two: fear and laziness. Most people are naturally lazy and refuse to exert any mental effort that imposes demands on them. Fear is an even more insidious evil. People instinctively recoil in fear when confronted with ideas that challenge their own. They see such new ideas as threats to themselves personally. It is an irrational response, but we should at least be aware that it exists.

The writer Roosh Valizadeh (who is also a friend of mine) has just released an important book called Free Speech Isn't Free. The book chronicles the story of his efforts to give a series of totally innocuous lectures in Canada last year, and relates the hysterical responses he received in opposition. I hope you will read it. His experience hammers home the point that freedom of thought is something that must be fought for.

Those who pull the levers of power in modern societies have all sorts of underhanded ways of suppressing or discouraging such freedom. It is our responsibility to be ever vigilant to such encroachments on our hard-won rights, and to call to account those who seek to abridge such freedoms.

It is supremely relevant for all of us, because in today's world we will be confronted with those who lack any sense of justice, and who will wish to prevent us from expressing ourselves. To understand how such forces are emboldened and encouraged, we must learn from the example of others. Today it was Roosh Valizadeh; tomorrow, it could be anyone else. We have no excuse for not learning from history.

Freedom of thought is something worth fighting for. When we exercise this right, we finally begin to feel the intellectual bonds we share with those who came before us in history, and whom I have discussed above. Whether you agree with his opinions is irrelevant. The larger message is what matters; it resonates for anyone who seeks to advance a point of view in the marketplace of ideas without fear of violence or intimidation.

Those who seek to question the nature of things are part of a proud legacy, one that stretches all the way back to the Ionian shores; one that first began, perhaps, when a bearded Thales of Miletus looked at the world around him and began to ask the daring questions:

Why are things this way? And how did they come to be so?

How Social Justice Warriors Have Been Infecting Science For Half A Century

June 19, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

This week marks the release of Roosh's new book Free Speech Isn't Free, a chronicle of his World Speaking Tour last year. It includes conclusions he made from discussions with his audience and—most importantly—the rhetorically and occasionally physically violent clashes with those who would attempt to censor his speech: the SJWs, the feminists, and certain members of the governments of the nations in question.

You know this already. And you're also wondering what, if anything, does this have to do with science, specifically anthropology? A bit of background: I studied anthropology in college—more specifically biological anthropology, and there is a very specific reason that I mention this caveat: for, much like the Catholic and Orthodox Churches, the field of anthropology has had a schism: in this case, between biological and cultural factions.

To put it very simply, anthropology studies what you probably know as "human biodiversity" (this term is not regularly used. Perhaps it should be "hominid biodiversity" instead), and cultural, naturally, studies culture—without any input from biology.

It seems relatively sedate, but I don't think it is much of an exaggeration to say that at least half of what we hate about modern society comes from cultural anthropology. Starting in the 20th century with Franz Boas and his fraudulent measures of human skulls to "debunk" HBD, to Margaret Mead's staggeringly inaccurate depiction of a gender-neutral Samoa, the field has only gotten worse since then, essentially becoming a left-wing pseudo-religion that cites "proof" to justify any degree of social engineering.

As I wrote in an article on the subject of the schism for my site, I didn't know why exactly this has occurred, but after reading Noble Savages, I have come closer to the truth. More to the point of this article specifically, the reaction to Doctor Chagnon's findings in the 1970s is almost identical to the reaction that writers in our sphere receive today. The seeds of social justice warriors were born decades ago, and just as he was censored for years, so too could we be censored should we not fight back. His memoir also reveals ways of fighting back that are similar to Roosh's.

30 Years In The Amazon

The story of his travails in the Amazonas province of Brazil are fascinating, and deserve the 200+ pages they receive in the book, but for purposes of readability I will be concise.

As a young PHD student in anthropology (the schism had not yet occurred), Napoleon Chagnon went to Amazonas to live amongst the Yanomamo tribe. Expecting to find Rousseauian "noble savages", what he found was a strikingly brutal and violent "honor culture" of primeval masculinity that, overall, would completely terrify and disgust your average SJW ("Tribesmen are paranoid and hateful of cuckoldry? How dare they!"). On and off over the next 30 years, he lived amongst them, learning their language and culture and gaining a great deal of respect for them. Nonetheless, he realizes that the "noble savage" ideal is, and always will be, false.

His book presents four main theses, all of which we have seen are massively triggering to the progressive mind-

- Violence is ubiquitous in primitive society
- The desire to maximize security (ie: form large, effective fighting forces) is the biggest driving force behind increasing socialization
- Kinship selection is the predominant factor for increased socialization: in times of danger, you look to your family, your tribe, your culture—no atomized "blank slate" individuals in the jungle.
- As population increases, so too does the power of leaders: despotism is the natural state of man, with only a few legitimate democracies.

While these theories are interesting enough, they are not what we have truly come here to discuss.

The Reaction

When Napoleon Chagnon first attempted to present his findings to academia, the world of scientists reacted in a way more befitting the neon-haired Tumblrite than a rational, objective intellectual. Chagnon makes it explicit that their hatred of him is far beyond that of allegedly falsified data:

> For many anthropologists who cling to Rousseau's view of mankind rather than Hobbes', I am a heretic, a misanthrope, and the object of condemnation by politically correct colleagues, especially those who identify themselves as 'activists' for native peoples, because I described the Yanomamo as I found them. (page 9)

The tactics of these opponents were also identical to their modern descendants:

1. Ignorance Of Science, While Claiming To Represent Science

At the 1976 Anthropology Association of America Consortium, Edward O. Wilson was scheduled to give a lecture—Wilson being the author of Sociobiology, a book whose central thesis was that evolution, particularly social and cultural behavior, could be applied to humans. Naturally, cultural anthropologists—referred to as being openly Marxist by the author—protested and demanded that he be banned.

The entire doctrine of "safe spaces" is almost identical, but here's just one example of them demanding that something that makes them feel bad be banned, and here's another example of progressives using bad science as a political bludgeon. Asks Chagnon "How can a group of scientists in 1976 be vehemently protesting the theory of evolution?"

2. Cherry Picking Data

In addition to having missionaries and other researchers go amongst the tribe and tell them "This guy thinks you evolved from monkeys!" specifically in hopes it would offend them, they would also seek out the most extreme proponents of biological anthro to use as a strawman argument: "Predictably, cultural anthropologists resisted these trends [studies of primates revealing possibly the evolution of social behavior], often by denigrating the academics or by criticizing the most sensational and amateurish work", (P. 208).

This can be seen by media focus on our efforts being placed entire on the most extreme and odious neo-Nazis, "he man woman haters", etc.

3. Outright Lying

Beginning at the first consortium, Chagnon is called out—in the most prissy way imaginable—by rival anthropologist Marvin Harris: "Did you know that there is a certain anthropologist who believes that this tribe has genes for warfare and infanticide?" (p. 390)

This marks the beginning of more than two decades of slander and abuse, in which Chagnon is accused of deliberately spreading measles, distributing machetes and shotguns amongst the tribe to increase violence, and somehow "causing" the high rate of observed domestic abuse in the tribe, making him a pariah in the anthropology community until the 21st century. Sound familiar?

4. Violence And Intimidation

Of course, this violence and intimidation is done in the most cowardly way possible: At the aforementioned 1976 consortium, E.O. Wilson was scheduled to speak, despite the fact that he had recently broken his leg. As he hobbles up to the podium, the stage was rushed by guests representing the "International Committee Against Racism", who proceeded to dump multiple pitchers of ice water over the handicapped presenter while screaming that he is an evil-Nazi-racist-eugenicist.

These four tactics are what we can observe in the reaction to our meet-ups, or whenever "our side" tries to speak in public.

How To Fight It

Eventually, Napoleon Chagnon was vindicated, and he was tepidly welcomed back into the fold. How did things change?

Simply put, he stuck to his guns. He knew that his data was right, and he refused to submit to the left, knowing that even if he did his career would still be ruined. He continued to publish books and articles, and sought people who would give him a fair shake and corroborate his findings.

It wasn't easy: Bitter fighting took place from 1976 until the late 2000s, leading Chagnon to retire from fieldwork in 1999 after a massive, stress-induced cardiac episode. And the slander essentially continued until 2010, when his findings were finally redeemed by both peer-reviewed surveys and testimony from the tribe itself:

> Mr. Tierney's book [Darkness in El Dorado, an anti-Chagnon book] has been translated…and we are annoyed with all his lies. When he was in the Orinoco [River Delta] he promised medical aid, and hospitals, we have none of these. They accuse Neel, Brewer, Roche, and Chagnon of manipulating us, when they were THE ONLY ONES that helped us (page 410).

And now that he has been vindicated, he can easily find a mainstream publisher to sell his book, which was released to rave reviews—even Huffington Post gave it a good review, in a remarkable display of tone-deafness.

"It's not hyperbole to call Chagnon the most controversial and famous anthropologist in America. . . . [Noble Savages] is a memoir that offers a highly readable mixture of adventure, science, and scandal."

—Nick Romeo, Daily Beast

"A hundred years from now, after the dust has settled, the case of renowned anthropologist Napoleon Chagnon will surely rank high in the annals of science for the systematic persecution of scientific conclusions. . . . Chagnon could arguably be considered the most influential anthropologist of all time."

—Huffington Post

This was a small but significant personal victory—he notes that nobody who attacked him in the four decades has been fired or stripped of their status. In making their wrongdoing visible, that might be a bigger victory. Our eventually victory will likely be a long and arduous one as well.

10 Ways Men Are Horribly Oppressing Women

June 19, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

Lately I've had a change of heart when it comes to feminism. I've started to notice the kind of everyday sexism and misogyny that women go through. I'm thinking, if I had daughters, would I want them to put up with all of the horrible stuff white cisgender men do on a regular basis?

Of course women need feminism. Yet there are some of them who still don't know that. They can't see how they themselves are oppressed, and make fun of feminists who call it like it is. That's NOT okay. If you are one of those girls who do this, I'm talking to you. I want you to know about how sexism affects you every day, around the clock. So I've made a list of oppressive actions you probably encounter regularly.

Below are ten signs of how oppressed you actually are in your everyday life. Things you might not have noticed until now, but make your life miserable. Go through the list and check how many of them happened to you in the last 24 hours. Keep score, and at the end you'll see to which degree you face oppression in a normal day.

1. A male stranger flirted with you and gave you compliments

Disgusting, isn't it? Why men feel they have the right to give you attention and compliment your appearance is beyond me. Of course, they should get your consent to even speak to you in the first place, as one brave feminist has pointed out.

2. A man sitting next to you spread his legs

The problem of manspreading cannot be exaggerated. When a man sits next to you with his legs apart, he's taking up the space you need to be a strong independent woman and spread your own legs to show your amazing vagina to the world.

This manspreading sadist should go to jail.

3. You felt cold at your workplace

I stand with you, cold woman.

The reason is that the air conditioning is set to make your male colleagues comfortable. How sexist. Women need to stand up for themselves and make the temperature better suited for them and their bodies.

4. The store you shop at has special products marketed for women

It's hateful to women when companies make products specifically tailored for their needs. Women and men are exactly the same.

5. A male coworker stayed behind after you went home for the day

That means he will be making more money than you in the end. What a jerk! Women still earn less than men over a lifetime, and it doesn't matter that it's because men work harder, take more dangerous jobs, and so forth. It's still sexist!

Douchebag.

6. A man commented on a woman’s body or women’s bodies in general

That men like certain body types more than others is sexist and makes plus sized women feel bad about themselves. The truth is that ALL bodies are beautiful, ALL bodies are beach bodies.

Gorgeous, amiright?

7. You saw a commercial featuring a woman with a slim body

Does this woman look healthy to you? Didn't think so.

Again, this makes plus sized women feel bad for not looking like the women they see in commercials. Thankfully, London's Muslim mayor Sadiq Khan has decided to ban ads with sexy women from the city's transport network. While I did say that all bodies are beautiful and great, slim bodies are clearly unnatural and must be the result of the model starving herself.

8. A man assumed your gender

Just because you look, talk and act like a woman, doesn't mean you're a woman. It's science (feminist science). For all he knows, you could be a cat. If my future daughters would tell me they're actually boys, I would accept it in a heartbeat. (But then I guess they wouldn't be my daughters anymore, rather my sons. Which would mean that they wouldn't be oppressed anymore, I guess. But they would still have female bodies, and I guess that counts as them being oppressed, maybe… This is all a bit confusing.)

9. A man tried to explain something to you that you already knew

Mens' habit of bringing bullhorns to work has to stop!

How dare this mansplaining man assume that he knows something you don't. How are you supposed to have a meaningful conversation with someone who insists on passing on information to you in a friendly way? It's gross!

10. You encountered a Trump supporter

This one is self-explanatory. Trump is LITERALLY Hitler.

Adolf Hitler.

Finally, let's check your oppression

I hoped you kept score. Now it's time to see how bad your oppression really is.

1-3: While this might not seem so awful, and you could have it worse, it's still outrageously misogynist.

4-6: I can only imagine the terror you must be feeling right now. Run to your safe space and don’t look back!

7-10: You need to call the police, now!

Only Six Hours Left For My Special Offers!

June 19, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After ten days of nonstop promotions for the launch of Free Speech Isn't Free, we're down to the wire. In case you missed the news, here's a video summary of what the book is about:

Here are the three bonuses you'll receive if you order the book by midnight:

Bonus #1: An important new article explaining how to keep yourself safe from social justice attacks, especially by attackers who are already enmeshed in your social and professional circles.

Bonus #2: Full transcript of The State Of Man, the "dangerous" speech that initially created the hysterical censorship crusade. Here is a sample of what the speech contains:

- The paradox of modern women
- 11 problems that Western culture is facing today
- How to mentally approach living in a degenerate world
- How to construct a win-win lifestyle where you come out on top no matter what
- 7 tips on how to meet women and experience intimacy in 2015
- Examination of the sustainability of game for men who aim to use it for the long term
- The two things that will allow you to enjoy life to the fullest
- One important need that all men require in life
- Three mental processes to use when you're feeling beaten and hopeless

Bonus #3: 30% discount. If you order now, you'll be charged only $7, which is 30% off the normal price (on June 20, the price will increase to $9.99).

Since I'm getting feedback that the first two bonuses are essential for the book, I'll probably leave them in after today (they're included in the main file), but to guarantee you get everything above, especially the discount, I recommend you place your order before midnight if you haven't done so already.

Limited edition Roosh-head USB card

There are also a couple more USB cards left that are pre-loaded with all my books. These are hand-signed by me, meaning my skin oils and essence have fused with the card. After midnight, they will be removed from sale.

They're also produced in limited quantities, ensuring they'll be worth many thousands of dollars in the future. The cards are re-usable and slim for daily use. While you wait for your card to ship, you will receive instant access to all digital files

Order now before midnight

Click one of the following three links to support my work:

- Order Amazon Kindle copy for $7 (or paperback)
- Order your ebook copy (pdf, mobi, and epub) for instant download ($7)
- Order limited edition USB card pre-loaded with everything I've ever written ($53)

★★★★★ Possibly the most important book of 2016, or the last 5 years for that matter., June 18, 2016

Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Free Speech Isn't Free: How 90 Men Stood Up Against The Globalist Establishment -- And Won (Paperback)

The fact that so many people have left poor reviews on this book without puchasing or reading it is a testament to the thesis of the book: the fact that in order to exercise your right to free speech you must sacrifice and face huge adversity due to those in power (and the many common people devoid of critical thinking skills) attempting to silence you.

The book is not only an extremely interesting page turner but also an incredibly enlightening experience, especially to those who may not be privy to the danger our free speech is in at this point in time. While reading, I found myself unable to put the book down. I had to see what he went through simply to have a happy hour meeting among men.

That wraps up this launch. I give thanks to the approximately 900 of you who have bought the book so far, making it my biggest launch ever (previous record was around 650). Drop an email to and let me know what you think of the book. In the next few days I'll share my strategy for book launches for those of you interested in what it takes to sell books online.

4 Reasons Why Collapse Will Be The Best Thing To Happen For Men

June 20, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Quite frankly, all this talk of society's decline and how we should prevent its course towards self-destruction bores me. It is true that the economic situation around the world is becoming more and more unstable. It's also true that cultural upheavals are flipping our society inside out, causing widespread degeneracy and demographic upheavals. And who knows what future diseases and environmental catastrophes lie ahead? A major global war may even break out as resources become scarce while our population continues to explode out of control. Collapse in the near future appears to be a matter of when, not if.

This sort of population growth always leads to the one and same ending.

But fear not, for there's no need for worry and pessimism. While you may not have any power to avoid the eventuality, the destruction of the world as we know it could be the best thing that ever happens for us men. Think I'm crazy? Read the four reasons why and see how it won't be as bad as you think it might be.

1. Collapse is only a single stage

It has already happened many times in the past.

First, know that the "progress" of society is cyclical, not linear. Collapse would only be a single and eventual stage of a cycle that will do away with the current stagnation and clear the path for a new era of human prosperity. Sure, things will likely be brutal and ugly in the beginning, but it would take a pessimist to think that chaos and destruction will reign forever. We humans have an innate proclivity towards creation and order, and new social orders will soon rise with greater strength and vitality.

Every civilization that collapsed throughout history brought about the golden age of newer ones and rotting empires collapsed to bring about fresh national independence of peoples. Civilization is not the same as human race; man will march on while civilizations rise and fall. We have already survived countless famines, plagues, and wars—and we will survive again.

2. No more Big Brother

We’re supposed to believe that this is for our own good.

When shit hits the fan, the governments will either disintegrate into oblivion or drop all pretense of freedom and democracy to declare a police-state (thanks to the terrorism hysteria the people bought into, Western governments already have the means of implementing a permanent martial law). But in spite of it all, I believe that the people will eventually prevail in their fight against the state. The oligarchs and their dreams of a globalist super-state will go the way of Pharoahs, Cesars, feudalism, imperialism, the Third Reich, and the Soviet Union. They will face their demise while we ascend to fill the vacuum.

With the Frankenstein centralized governments no longer around to dictate people’s lives and use them as lab rats for their social experiments, you will have all the freedom in the world. No more taxes, no more surveillance, no more PC policing, no more divorce courts, no more forced multiculturalism, and so on. You alone will be responsible for your life with no one to bail you out and no one to blame. That, my friends, is true freedom.

3. Freedom and self-determination for everyone

Lack of globalist states will also mean that you'll be free to create the society you want. Still think Communist utopia is possible? Good luck. Want to start an all-white Aryan state? Be my guest. Want to create a progressive rainbow society without all the racist-sexist-homo-transphobe-Nazi-bigots? Great, get out of my sight. Want to form a Christian cult where creationism will be never challenged by evil science? May God be with you. Think all men are rapists and want to live in a lesbian tribe? Have fun trying to build anything or defending yourselves (assuming you even have something worthwhile to defend.) The basic idea is that you can create or join any society you want without interference from the overlords above.

But the caveat is this: 1) Your society must be practical and functional, 2) People must be willing to join and remain in your society, and 3) You must defend your society against external threats. If you fail in any of the three, you and your tribe will perish. It's funny how those who worship the free-market can't seem to apply the same principles of their religion to society as a whole. This arrangement is so perfect for everyone that the only people I can imagine opposing it are statists from both left and right who love to impose their values upon others. They are the leaches who suck other people's money through the nanny-state or the toady "patriots" who blindly support their morally bankrupt government even as it robs them of their freedom (and that of other nations).

So, if a collapse means total freedom and responsibility for all, I'm all in.

4. The return of primal order

You want patriarchy? Then you better fight for it.

The collapse will mean the restoration of natural order: the rule of the jungle. In fact, I think it would be wrong to call the destruction of our so-called civilization as a “collapse”; it would simply be a return to the way things were. No more corporate serfdom, no more putrid consumerism, no more technological slavery, and no safe spaces for the cry-babies to hide and cry in. Wimps, complainers, and the weak will not survive. People will once again be naturally selected instead of being artificially sheltered.

One of the best aspect of the new order would be the return of masculine virtue. As I’ve said, any new society that people form must be defended against external threats. This is not an option. And only an organized group of men with strength, courage, mastery, and honor (as per Jack Donovan) will prevail in the post-apocalyptic world. Men will be men again.

Who knows what savage energy is begging to be unleashed within that man serving as an office drone? Who knows if that guy flipping burgers for a minimum wage will become the future tribal leader? How many men today are living jaded and unfulfilling lives when they could be fighters and warriors instead?

Can’t wait until men are allowed to be men again? Then you better be ready for the war for survival.

How "oppression" of women got its start before our current civilization.

And guess what? There won't be feminist harpies demanding "equality" when strong men are needed to rebuild civilization and defend against gangs and rival tribes. They'll be begging for some of that "toxic" masculinity to come and protect them. They'll kneel in submission to a patriarchal order faster than they would have screamed "rape!" in the previous world. Suddenly, with their government boyfriend gone and the internet white knights nowhere to to be found, their whole feminist charade will shatter and the ridiculousness of it all will become apparent. The unstable and fat ones will likely disappear first as they offer no value to anyone.

Also in the new world, the SJWs and the rest of the progressive freaks will die faster than a gay snowman in Saudi Arabia. No more bitching and insulting each other on the internet, no more trying to censor or ruin other people, and no more crying for sympathy and victim privileges. There won't be anymore idiotic debates about who is right or wrong: only who survives and who doesn't. The struggle for life without civilization will be face to face and man to man. I would love to see how well the loser male-feminists fare against the very men they love to bash without a computer screen to hide behind.

The future without the gynocentric system is a future where men will dominate.

Conclusion

I find it amusing that many people enjoy watching movies and television shows about apocalypse and survival, and play a number of video games along the same theme. There's clearly a masculine drive within them that wants to escape the stagnant conditions of our modern world even if they don't want to be ushered into an anarchy in real life.

So much for everyone just wanting love and eternal peace.

Men today who fantasize about living in a different world are dreamers. They dream of a world without degeneracy, world without foreign invaders, world without feminism, and world without big government. Deep inside, even as they indulge in today's material comfort, they long for true freedom and heroism. But none of that will happen as long as the current order is intact. Nothing will change if these men insist on eating their cake and having it too by clinging onto civilization and hoping to haggle with it.

The change you want to see is not going to appear peacefully through some online arguments, petitions, protests, or asinine 'democratic' processes. You cannot fix a rotting society; you must tear it all down and start from scratch. You must wake up and face the reality of our world.

Now, you don't have to like the idea of a collapse; whether you want it or not won't change the course of the future. But the real question you should ask yourself is this: Am I prepared for it?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

4 Things I Learned From Being Falsely Accused Of Rape On Campus

June 20, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

It was my first year at college, and I was starting to immerse myself in the PUA community. I saw a pretty redhead, let's call her Kayla for the sake of anonymity, sitting in front of me in one of my classes. After a couple of weeks, I managed to get her number—she told me that she wanted to "study" with me for a big test we had coming up.

"I'm here," she texted me. I eagerly got up and let her into my dorm room; she was squeezed into some tight booty shorts and a low cut top that would make any man look twice. "Let's go to the study room, here," I said. I walked her to our dorm's designated study space.

"What do you want to go over?" I asked her. "Umm, I don't know—you're really smart, what do you think?" she asked.

"Well, I already get most of the material—but do you have anything in particular you're confused about?"

"Uhh, no haha not really," she said. It didn't take me long to figure out that she had no intention of studying. It was pretty obvious that she just wanted me to pull her.

"Do you want to go back to my room and just hang out?" I asked, my 18-year-old voice quivering from nervousness. I guess she thought it was cute, because she eagerly consented. "Yeah, that sounds good!"

We got back to my dorm room, and within two minutes she was biting my lips so hard I thought I might bleed to death. “OH GOD, why didn’t I kiss you sooner?” she yelled out in between kisses. “You look just like Nick Jonas!” she exclaimed. What the fuck. I guess that’s good? I don’t know, but either way she was into me.

She ended up giving me head and we had completely consensual sex—she left gleefully and I never spoke to her again.

Months passed, and I had almost forgotten about the whole thing, until I got a call one day. “Is this Mr. Anthony?” a stern voice asked.

“Uhh, yeah. Who is this?”

“This is Investigator Jackson with the Department of Judiciary Action. Do you recall having sex with a girl by the name of Kayla?”

Chills went down my spine. “Oh my god,” I thought. “Am I being accused of rape?”

“Can you come in and talk some time today?” he spoke. “Uhh, yeah sure—I’ll be there in 20 minutes,” I told him. Holy fuck.

I got there as fast as I could, and asked him if I could record the questions he was asking me. “NO,” he barked. “You can not record our conversation.”

“What the fuck kind of crooked legal system is this?” I said to myself.

“Sir, I’m sorry but I’m going to talk to my lawyer. Please send me a list of your questions and I will draft some responses with him.” I got the fuck out of there, and $500 worth of legal fees later (which is a lot when you’re 19), it turns out she didn’t want to press charges. I wonder why.

I’m glad that this happened early on in my life. Every man needs to understand what women are capable of, and I hope that you can all learn from my story. Here’s what I learned from my experience with campus police.

1. The Odds Are Stacked Against You

[image]

From the moment that Investigator Jackson called me, I could tell that I was guilty until proven innocent. My suspicion was only confirmed upon walking into the “Sexual Assault” office, or whatever the hell they called it.

I was greeted by a fat, feminist-looking secretary who gave me a scowl. She knew what I was there for. “Hi, you can take a seat,” she spat with an overt tone of hatred. “Sure, is here okay?” I asked. She didn’t respond.

I was sure to be as nice as humanly possible, but it didn’t matter—they had their minds made up about me from the start. And who knows how deep the problem really was? Maybe the person who appointed them was a die-hard feminist, and maybe the very president of my university was, too.

Regardless, they treated me like I was a criminal. Rather than asking me what my side of the story was, out of genuine concern, they simply asked me a bunch of loaded questions. “Did you bite and spit on Miss Kayla?” “Did you force Miss Kayla to have sexual intercourse with you?” “Did you verbally abuse Miss Kayla, calling her names such as ‘slut,’ and ‘whore'”?

What the hell, I didn’t do any of that. But again, it didn’t matter to them—they were out to prove their little world view that “all men are rapists.” It didn’t matter that I LITERALLY had text messages that she had been sending me asking to come over. “That doesn’t prove that you didn’t rape her,” they would say. In other words, I was guilty until proven innocent.

2. Women Can Be Incredibly Narcissistic

Now I want to be very clear—not all women have rape tourettes. And there’s plenty of women that are actually raped. Their rapists belong in jail.

But I DID NOT rape that woman. In fact, she WANTED me to have sex with her. She solicited it. But she didn’t care—all she wanted was the attention that came from this whole matter.

This point hit me very hard one day when I was at the university gym. I saw her over in the corner with some other girl, whispering in her ear and pointing at me. “Great,” I thought.

Based off of her behavior, it’s very obvious that she “got off,” so to speak, on being a victim. She liked the attention that she got from other women and probably manginas. She liked the emotional validation that it gave her. “I was raped,” is synonymous with “I’m attractive enough to be raped,” and she couldn’t get enough.

Thank god that she transferred soon after—word probably got out that she was a lying slut. If she had stuck around, who knows what would have happened to my reputation.

The fact that a woman can go around and spread rumors about how a man “raped” her, without ANY legal consequences is absolutely ridiculous. She could have gotten me expelled, socially ostracized, or thrown in jail. She could have ruined my life, all so that she could get her little emotional high. And there were zero legal or social consequences for her.

3. Manginas Are The Real Problem

This became abundantly clear when I first shook hands with the investigator. Based off of the fact that his office was plastered with pictures of his mother, I’d guess that he never had a father around.

He was a boy raised by a single mother, on a noble crusade to stop the evils of patriarchy—and he’s the real problem. That police officer who automatically assumes that the girlfriend is telling the truth, that judge who has a deep seeded hatred for men, because he thinks it will get him laid, and that mangina in your workplace who offers women endless emotional attention when they tell him that they were “raped”? They’re the real problems.

It’s very easy to get caught up in your anger towards women (I know that I certainly was for a while). But the problem isn’t women. It’s the men that raise them, the men that encourage them, and the men that appoint them.

If the investigator wasn’t a mangina, how do you think my appointment would have played out? I would have told him my side of the story, shown him my log of text messages, and he would’ve dismissed the case because there was ZERO evidence to support her claims.

If we want to have any hope of reclaiming our past culture, we must start with men.

Modern women are merely a symptom of a larger problem, they are not the cause. The root cause is the lack of masculinity in today's men. The patriarchs of the past weren't complete morons, unaware of what women will do for attention or social status.

They weren't desperate for sex, they weren't socially retarded, and they sure as hell weren't weak. They were strong, confident men who ruled with compassion. The idea that patriarchs are cruel is ridiculous. In fact, it's quite the opposite—manginas are far more cruel when they gain positions of power than any patriarch would ever be.

4. There's A Pattern Here

Although I had started slowly taking my daily dose of red pill around the age of 16, being falsely accused of rape was what really pulled the curtains up for me.

Now, all of a sudden, I started noticing that it wasn't just me—false rape accusations were incredibly common, despite the media's complete lack of coverage on them. I started doing my research and eventually found ROK. I took solace in the fact that other men were experiencing what I was experiencing.

The fact that there is an abundance of men who have been falsely accused of rape, yet that there are absolutely zero penalties for women who do the accusing, speaks to the media's agenda loud and clear. They want to eliminate men. They want us to be weak, pathetic, sniveling little cowards under the thumb of their massive power. They want us to be good little cogs in the machine.

But we're not going to play by their rules.

So What Do We Do?

I always like to end my articles with some practical advice, because pointing out problems doesn't really do much to solve them.

The first thing that you have to do is cover your ass. Learn to tell when a girl is crazy. If she claims she was raped, DO NOT date her or sleep with her. It may even be a good idea to have some sort of a hidden camera in your room (although I'm sure the legality depends on your state or country).

Next, you have to work on creating passive revenue. Work on being self-employed. This is by far the most important thing that any modern day man can do. When you work under a mangina who has a fleet of HR feminists ready to kick you out at the slightest hint of assertiveness, it's pretty fucking hard to be masculine.

Consider starting a consulting firm, learning how to day trade, or monetizing your passion. You want to be completely financially free so that you can speak what's on your mind without fearing financial ruin.

Incorporate the principles of masculinity into your daily life. This is the only way that you can accomplish these things. Learn to be assertive, decisive, and confident. Start working out to develop strength of discipline. Consider meditating, and reading good books to expand your mind.

The goal is to eventually become a fully realized man—one who does not depend on others for his own sustenance, and who is thus free.

Go, and become a free man. Because if more men don't start becoming free, in a few decades, none of us will be.

Australian Media That Defamed Roosh Inks Landmark Deal With Chinese Ministry Of Propaganda

June 20, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Early in 2016, the Australian media was being driven into hysterical fits of rage that a random US blogger named Roosh Valizadeh might set foot in their country and have a few beers with his friends. His obviously deviant and dangerous ideas (i.e., traditional gender roles, nationalism, and masculinity) were presented as a threat to the safety of the entire country, and even the world. Groveling, simpering Australian officials wasted no time assuring their constituencies that they were prepared to face this threat by mobilizing their navy against the evil pub-crawler.

So at least we know Australian leaders are vigilant in defense of their county's interests. We are comforted by that, and grateful for their brave stand.

This was why I was so surprised to learn recently that the Australian media had signed on May 26, 2016 a series of six important media deals with the Chinese Ministry of Propaganda. The deals were signed in Sydney, and involved Liu Qibao, Head of the Central Propaganda Bureau of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). Liu, one of the most powerful Communist cadres outside of the Chinese Politburo, actually arrived in person to attend the signing. Also present was Gary Quinlan, Acting Secretary of the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade.

I wonder what this could be all about? So I searched Australian media outlets to see if I could find any more details about it. After all, something this important merited at least some sort of story, right? I mean, if they can mobilize armies screaming social justice warriors over a random American who has written some "offensive" things, surely they should be able to inform the Australian people about something that directly affects the integrity and impartiality of Australian journalism, right?

But guess what? I couldn't find anything. Not a word. Not even a whisper in the mainstream Australian press. There must have been some unfortunate mistake. Of that I'm sure. Media elites would never seek to hide the truth, bury important stories, or omit critical information. I tried to contact a few journalists, but forgot that over 100 employees from Fairfax had been fired right before the China deal was signed. But I'm sure that's only a coincidence.

Who I am I to judge? After all, I'm just an uninformed American. I'm sure the story's absence was not because Australian media is being sold out to Chinese money. I'm sure that Australian journalism has not degenerated into being a pack of lazy, lying, chickenshits. Of that I am certain. No, the answers must lie elsewhere.

And so I did some more checking on the specifics of the agreement. Of course, since the Australian media was blacked out about the news, I had to read about it elsewhere. The six agreements involved (on the Chinese side) the Xinhua News Agency, China Daily, China Radio International, People's Daily Website, and Qingdao Publishing Group, and (on the Australian side) Fairfax Media, Sky News Australia, Global China-Australia Media Group, Weldon International, and Bob Carr's Australia-China Relations Institute at the University of Technology, Sydney.

Xinhua, soon after the signing of the deals, gushed in its editorials that the new agreements would usher in a new era of regional understanding and cooperation. This is the public rhetoric. The reality, of course, is that China will now be able to funnel money and influence to the Australian media market, permanently affecting its impartiality and integrity. As if to underscore this point, the China Daily ran a story in Australia right after the media deal explaining—in serious tones—that claims of the Philippines in the South China Sea were without any merit. It was not made clear that the story was being paid for the Propaganda Bureau of the Chinese Communist Party.

In a nutshell, the deal with allow China to plant propaganda stories in Australian media outlets and pass them off as news. But I'm sure that the informed, educated public will be able to distinguish propaganda from truth. I mean, they saw through the lies about Roosh, right?

Oh, well… maybe that's a bad example.

I dug a little deeper. I could see that Australia has, at least on paper, a tradition of separating editorial from commercial journalism. But I'm sure that huge amounts of Chinese money pouring into the Australian market will have no effect on the objectivity, integrity and quality of Australian journalism. It's just money, right? I'm sure that Australian journalists (what few of them are left) will be able to maintain their integrity.

I'm also sure that the fact that China practices a rigorous censorship of its media at home will have no bearing—no bearing at all!—on how it conducts itself in Australia. I mean, it's totally irrelevant that certain topics (the Panama Papers, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, civil liberties) are forbidden in China.

Who am I to question things? Fairfax tells us that it's all just a "commercial printing agreement." What could possibly go wrong when one economic giant dumps tons of money and resources on a much smaller neighbor? What could possibly go wrong when a totalitarian dictatorship with zero respect for freedom of speech comes into contact with a country that (in theory) values British Commonwealth notions of freedom of speech? No chance, no chance at all, for any corruption of journalistic integrity here, people.

I'm sure the Chinese Propaganda Ministry will be on its best behavior in Sydney and Canberra. I'm just positive that they have no intention to sway domestic opinion by planting (sorry, I mean "running") stories in the local media. I'm convinced that China is not trying to push its "soft power" all around the world. It's just a coincidence that they are all over Africa, South America, and Europe.

There is just no way—no way—that Australia is playing into Beijing's grand strategy of buying up or influencing media outlets around the world.

I mean, after all, the valiant Australian media protected its people from an obscure American dude with a beard who writes about sex and culture on his blog.

I am fully confident in their competence and priorities. And you should be also.

The Mysterious Death Of Iraq Veteran And “Gray State” Film Director David Crowley

June 21, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The director of a dystopian film five years in the making entitled Gray State was found dead, along with his 28-year old wife and 5-year old daughter in their Minneapolis home last year. Screenwriter and Iraq Veteran David Crowley is said to have committed murder-suicide, killing his Pakistani wife Komel and daughter Raniya. At least, that is the official story.

Officials say Crowley shot his family and then himself after learning a deal to finish the Gray State project fell through. Musician and friend Jordan Page said Crowley was negotiating a $30 million production budget with a major Hollywood studio to finish the film. Crowley was a former Army soldier who met his wife Komel while serving in Texas. She converted from Islam to Christianity for the marriage.

Neighbor Collin Prochnow grew suspicious when he saw unopened Christmas presents lingering on the couple’s doorstep three weeks after the holiday. He decided to check on them, and found the family dead inside their home. Following his death, the future of the Gray State project is in doubt as Crowley’s colleagues wrote:

> The future of Gray State is uncertain… please understand we are all in complete shock by this having lost a great friend.

Interestingly, Gray State is a movie about emerging world government, which dramatized FEMA camps, the police state, martial law, RFID chip implants, state violence against the citizenry, false flags, and the loss of freedom. The film shows U.S. military patrolling American streets, FEMA soldiers shooting dissenters, surveillance cameras in homes, and a “cashless” society in which one has to be implanted with a chip to buy food from government-run food distribution centers because supermarket shelves are empty.

This is the concept trailer, which shows how far production on the film was before Crowley's untimely death. The tag line for the film is The Second American Revolution may not be remembered.

Intimidation Tactic

Many of Crowley's followers feel he was murdered as an intimidation tactic, and as a warning to those would pick up the Gray State mantle and try to alert the masses to what's coming. Live Free or Die posted this reaction on All News Pipeline:

> With 'watchmen' and US Patriots/Veterans now under what appears to be a well-coordinated assault to silence them, were the deaths of Crowley and his wife and child another such move by a NWO now desperate to continue their long-held plans? Were these deaths REALLY murder suicide or something MUCH more sinister?

A Facebook page has been set up calling for Justice for David Crowley, which aims "to help clear the good name of David Crowley." The page currently has over 7,000 supporters.

Since most of the people involved with the film are advocates for personal liberty speaking out against organizing world government and the loss of liberty, a box office success of the film could help spark a wider awakening and change in public opinion. It is plausible that striking at the shepherd to dispel his followers was the real reason behind Crowley's death.

The crime scene offers up questionable evidence, including an opened Quran, Allahu Akbar written on a wall in the home in blood, and a quickly scribbled note which is claimed to be the suicide note. Investigators said Crowley wrote Allahu Akbar as a swipe at his wife after he killed her, which is strange since she converted to Christianity to marry him. Crowley's neighbor Prochnow, who discovered their bodies, said he never heard the couple fighting and that they seemed an idyllic family. This makes the murder-suicide claim all the more suspicious. Further, why would Crowley kill his own 5-year old daughter? Why did the neighbors not hear gunfire? The issue has never received the attention or scrutiny it deserves.

When looking at the intimidation tactic angle, it helps to examine Crowley's project further.

Gray State Director Crowley and his wife

Film Synopsis

The film description for Gray State picks up where Orwell, Huxley, and Bradbury left off. Here is the synopsis:

> The world reels with the turmoil of war, geological disaster, and economic collapse, while Americans continue to submerge themselves in illusions of safety and immunity. While rights are sold for security, the federal government, swollen with power, begins a systematic takeover of liberty in order to bring about a New World Order.
> Americans, quarantined to militarized districts, become a population ripe for tyrannical control. Fear mongering, terrorism, police state, martial law, war, arrest, internment, hunger, oppression, violence, resistance – these are the terms by which Americans define their existence. Neighbor is turned against neighbor as the value of the dollar plunges to zero, food supplies are depleted, and everyone becomes a terror suspect. There are arrests. Disappearances. Bio attacks. Public executions of those even suspected of dissent. Even rumors of concentration camps on American soil.
> This is the backdrop to an unfolding story of resistance. American militias prepare for guerilla warfare. There are mass defections from the military as true Patriots attempt to rally around the Constitution and defend liberty, preparing a national insurgency against federal forces, knowing full well this will be the last time in history the oppressed will be capable of organized resistance.
> It is a time of transition, of shifting alliance, of mass awakening and mass execution. It is an impending storm, an iron-gray morning that puts into effect decades of over-comfort and complacency, and Americans wake up to an occupied homeland. It is a time of lists. Black list, white list, and those still caught in the middle, those who risk physical death for their free will and those > who sell their souls to maintain their idle thoughts and easy comforts. It is in this Gray State that the perpetuation of human freedom will be contested, or crushed.

> Is it the near future, or is it the present? The Gray State is coming – by consent or conquest. This is battlefield USA.

The idea behind the film is as chilling as it is prescient about current world events. This documentary about the film, entitled Behind The Veil, offers astute commentary as to what is going on in the world and why those involved with the film felt it was so important to get it released.

In the documentary, when asked is Gray State real Lead Actor Danny August Mason said this to interviewers:

> Absolutely it's real. We see it every day. We see it in the news. We see it in headlines, but people still don't acknowledge it. People don't want to recognize that it's actually here.

Lord Christopher Monckton, former advisor to Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, seen in the behind the scenes documentary has perhaps the most chilling and relevant commentary:

> If we allow democracy, through negligence, and carelessness, and the crude ambition for money, power and glory of politicians, to be handed away as we already have in Britain, to a super-national entity which we do not elect and cannot control, then you become just another police state. The freedom of the people will no longer be guaranteed by their own voices and their own vote. There will be an increasing gulf fixed between the governing class which will wield all realistic power, and the governed who will wield none. We'll be right back to square one, and all the work of your Founding Fathers will be carelessly set to naught by the very people to whom you have entrusted the defense of that Constitution.

Stifling debate about the issue of encroaching tyranny by eliminating or censoring other views has been the modus operandi of authoritarian governments since time immemorial.

The just-leased Mercedes C250 coupe of another whistle-blower, journalist Michael Hastings, aflame after a mysterious high speed impact in 2012

Political Assassinations

Going back thousands of years, the political elimination of enemies of the state or those who reveal dirty deeds is nothing new. It was a regular occurrence in Roman government. If one scratches the surface, the Crowley death is just one of many deaths of those who do not adhere to the official narrative coming out of Washington that have occurred under mysterious circumstances.

A cursory Google search will reveal numerous credible sources asking questions that never get asked by the mainstream media about whistle-blowers randomly dying of everything from high speed car accidents (Michael Hastings) to heart attacks (Andrew Breitbart) to cancers (Aaron Russo, who refused to be recruited by the Rockefeller family) when they challenge corporate-government power brokers. What makes these deaths suspicious is the fact they came either as major stories were about to be broke or after the whistle had already been blown.

Speaking of heart attacks, interestingly, Military.com confirmed the existence of a heart-attack gun by digging up Congressional testimony from the 1970s. Keep in mind, this technology is now 40 years old, and even then the U.S. had the technology to fire a heart attack dart into a target—a dart so small it was imperceptible as it enters the victim and leaves no evidence other than a tiny red dot. The toxin breaks down and is undetectable in an autopsy. This interview with a former CIA agent is very revealing and includes relevant testimony from the Congressional Church Committee in 1975, who wanted to find out what they shadowy agency was up to.

There are also other assassination techniques such as the infamous “polonium sushi” and tea meal (KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko) and electronically hijacking cars causing them to suddenly speed out of control, such as some claim in the mysterious death of Rolling Stone journalist Michael Hastings. A Wikileaks document from 2010 reveals CIA Director John Brennan was on a witch hunt against investigative journalists like Hastings who the agency perceived as hostile. San Diego 6 News (yes, the legacy media!) even reported this email about the Michael Hastings incident, sent by none other than Fred Burton, head of Stratfor, which is often referred to as “The Shadow CIA”:

> Brennan is behind the witch hunts of investigative journalists learning information from inside the beltway sources.

At the time of his death, Hastings was working on a story about Brennan. Hastings had previously brought down General Stanley McChrystal with an award-winning story. Hastings, much like Gray State director Crowley, was also a vocal critic of the growing surveillance state who referred to Obama administration censorship and blackballing of journalists as a “war on journalism.” The potential motives in both deaths are easy to see.

As previously mentioned, assassinations for political reasons are nothing new. What is new is the fact millions of people are waking up from the collective delusion that dominated the Television Age. We have seen media talking heads at least appear to be controlled opposition quite often. Once the Internet Age destroyed the propaganda model of mass communication, all sorts of chilling stories and inconvenient realities started to emerge. Chalk it up either to conspiracy theories, a CIA-created term invented to discredit dissenters, or to something more sinister going on—that really should not come as a surprise when reviewing the history of governments and of the human species.

Why are false flags and politically motivated assassinations hard to believe when such a small percentage of people control virtually all the wealth and power in the world, and have weapons and tactical killing strategies at their disposal that most dare not dream of? Many ask how can that many people be in on a crime when nobody speaks out or spills the beans. This question was broached a few months back in my expose entitled "Compartmentalization and Conspiracy Theories." Compartmentalization of information is so effective at hiding state secrets it was successfully used to have thousands of people working on the Manhattan Project without knowing they were building a nuclear bomb.

As former Minnesota Governor Jesse Ventura pointed out, people who scoff at conspiracy theories of 9/11 actually believe in a conspiracy theory themselves. They believe a conspiracy of mostly Saudi Arabian terrorists were able to get funding from a man living in caves in Afghanistan, remain undetected, then conspire to commit the worst act of terrorism to date. In this case, either one conspiracy theory is true or another one is true. Which do you believe?

For these reasons alone, it behooves us to treat each untimely death of people who challenge those in power with at least a modicum of suspicion. Not every trail will lead to a conspiracy. But there are a lot of people dropping if you are paying attention, and Crowley was working on a film that could be devastating to the consolidation of centralized power in Western governments. Those in power have the means, they have the motives, and they have ways of keeping their activities secret. Are we supposed to believe it's preposterous that forces are at work silencing people each time another whistle blower falls? Do people in government really have that strong a moral compass? Often, it's not a conspiracy as much as it is oligarchy, psychopathy, and greed.

Gun Control Is Not The Answer To Islamic Terrorism

June 21, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

"You never let a serious crisis go to waste. And what I mean by that it's an opportunity to do things you think you could not do before." — Rahm Emanuel.

The left is renewing their calls for gun control as they try to salvage their narrative from the damage of their Islamic sacred cow massacring their LGBT one. Across their spectrum, so many people know so little about firearms, rights of American citizens, and the goals of radical Islam for the world. All they see is an opportunity to further accomplish their goals of control of the populace.

Anyone with a social media account can broadcast their thoughts to the world, and their ignorance breeds with itself and makes yet more. We at ROK have the opportunity to inject some reason into the insanity and keep the liberals from grabbing more control.

The solution to cognitive dissonance

One would expect some mental introspection from the left. It's Gay Pride month, the attack was at the supposedly trendiest gay bar in Orlando, and the shooter reportedly was gay and had been there before.

Omar Mateen was Islamic, had ties to a fundamentalist cleric, was of Afghani descent, and even swore to ISIS. If this had been a terrorist attack against Christians, or conservatives, not one damn would have been given by Barack Obama Inc., and his vaunted Muslims would have been spared any criticism.

However, the victims were all presumably gay, which makes them matter to the left agenda. It's hard to choose with which flag you should color your Facebook picture; the ISIS flag, or a rainbowed Lake Eola.

(We don't mind if you download and share this image, just leave the attribution.)

The solution is the same as it always is for the left; double down on some other part of your narrative, and that's gun control. Never mind that Mateen also had bombs and a pistol on him, and was a hateful man blinded by religious fury to kill people of a legal sexual preference, let's blame the rifle he used instead.

The difference between Paris, Brussels, and Orlando

If we compare the ISIS attacks in Paris and in Brussels to this attack in Orlando, we learn a few things. The Paris terrorists used suicide bombs and AK pattern rifles, both of which are illegal in Europe. The Brussels terrorists used bombs made of explosives presumably illegal in Europe.

However, the semi-automatic carbine used in this attack was legal to purchase by citizens who pass the NICS background check to buy. If you have no criminal record, or a history of mental illness or instability, you can buy one wherever they are sold.

Mateen was of legal status to purchase firearms, even though he had ties to radical clerics and Islamic fundamentalism. His Floridian Concealed Weapons Permit should never have been issued (or at least revoked), and he should have failed the NICS check, but, thanks to the policies of the left, radical Islam is NOT considered a mental illness or reason to deny a firearms sale, nor is it enough to flag your background check in the employment of a large security company. G4S, Mateen's employer, claims that they saw nothing of his radicalism.

Mateen also was rejected by a gun store a month prior to the shooting for wanting large amounts of ammunition, body armor, and speaking a foreign language into a phone while he was there. The owners denied his sale and contacted the FBI, who did nothing.

It is illegal to carry into a bar in Florida. I hold a Florida CWP, and, just like most concealed carry permits, you cannot take it into schools, government buildings, or any place where alcohol is the primary product sold.

Murder always has been illegal. The only forms of killing someone that are legal are: military action, self-defense, execution by governmental authority, and abortion. The core problem with using control over a weapon to prevent a crime with that weapon is that the criminal will simply find an illegal way to get one, or use a different weapon.

If someone mows down ten Black Lives Matter thugs with his car, are you going to ban his vehicle from private ownership? What about two men arguing and one picks up a rock and kills him? Are rocks now illegal? Dead is dead, no matter the weapon.

Would have allowing guns in bars and other “gun free zones” have stopped this massacre? Probably not in this case, but usually, in any public gathering place in Florida where firearms are allowed to be carried and like-minded people are there, at least someone, hopefully multiple people, would be shooting back within ten seconds.

A decent, free people or disarmed animals?

This country was founded on decent people having autonomous rule. People self-governed, and, if they didn’t like what you were trying to pull, they shot you. This went for criminals and the Crown Regulars. Decent, armed people would’ve shot Omar Mateen shortly after he pulled out his rifle. Yes, a rifle would beat a handgun, but it wouldn’t have beaten multiple handguns, and heroes would have gone down swinging instead of being forced to hide.

The left doesn’t want decent armed people. They don’t want this because good people who have a means at their disposal to resist bullshit have the annoying habit of resisting ALL bullshit that comes their way, and they don't discriminate between governmental oppression and criminal acts. The left wants to push their authoritarian agenda on you free men, take your income and your kids, promote their protected classes, and your having the ability to fight back is not in their playbook.

The Second Amendment was written for the purpose of keeping the population armed to resist the abuses of an over-reaching government. "A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed."

This means organized groups of local men protecting their homes and interests. Any time there's a natural disaster, and people patrol for looters, that's a militia in the Founders' sense of the word.

"A free state" is why the Amendment exists. We have this right protected by the Constitution so that we can be free from people trying to kill or control us. A man being persecuted for his sexual preference by an Islamic terrorist would definitely be covered.

This amendment means have and carry guns. Arms means handheld firearms of modern design, both then and now. One of the favorite leftist tactics is to gradually restrict your rights. They like to "compromise" by agreeing since they want all your rights gone, and you want to keep them all, that you should "compromise" by giving up some of them. You need to push the OTHER way, for the abolishment of gun free zones so that we can protect ourselves always.

You can’t have it both ways

Even when the radical portions of the religion want Sharia Law implemented worldwide (including the killing of homosexuals, slavery of women, and enslavement of non-Muslims), the left adores the very people who would conquer and kill them. The idea of “moderate Muslims” being good people is not always true, and is something to be verified for each one you encounter individually.

This guy was an Islamic terrorist with clear ties to radical Islam. His background checks failed to catch this, and the FBI did NOTHING when a gun shop called. Did the owner of the gun shop where he finally got the weapons have any concerns, or had he been browbeaten into politically correct lockstep and so afraid of being branded Islamaphobic that he made the sale anyway?

I would suggest that the leftist regime wants events like this to happen to have an excuse to crack down on control of the people.

I don’t care what gun he had, I care that his victims had none

Some consternation is being raised about the fact that the left rushed to call the rifle used an AR-15 and misspoke in their zeal to start a gun ban. The rifle used is a Sig Sauer MCX carbine, which is a proprietary weapon of an style similar to an AR pattern rifle. I urge anyone arguing with a leftist not to try to score points on the technicality of which model gun it was and which ones it was not. I mean, one reporter went and shot an AR and claimed he was traumatized, even though little girls shoot it and it’s too little to be used for legal deer hunting.

Sig Sauer MCX. Not an AR-15. Any liberal suggesting they look or are the same just because they’re both black might be justifiably called a racist.

The important point is that a mass murderer carried a legal weapon into a “gun free zone” and committed murder with it. His victims were prevented from protecting themselves by unjust laws, and their blood is on the hands of any lawmaker who ever had a say in making a “gun free zone” a part of the law.

We must stand united against Islamic terror and the liberal left who would try to disarm us in the face of the enemy.

First, you must discount any talk of gun control as in horribly poor taste. “Over 50 people are DEAD, and you want to push a political agenda?!?!”

Secondly, imply they hate gay people. “What, you don’t want gay people to be able to defend their lives and lifestyle against bigots? Being gay is NOT a mental illness, you know, they’re allowed to own firearms just like you and me, and firearms should NOT be banned in gay bars, either.”

Third, appeal to what little bit of national pride they may have left and explain the difference between how a European reacts to danger versus an American. “I don’t know if you know this, but the USA has stood up against Islamic terror since the Barbary Wars 200 years ago. We don’t run and hide from terrorists; we kill them.”

Fourth, push for enforcement of laws already on the books and fighting Islamic terror. “You know, he should have tripped the existing NICS background check system and never gotten a Florida weapons permit if it was known he had ties to radical Islam. He was denied a sale by a gun store and the FBI was called, and they did nothing. We already have these laws, let’s just enforce them better along with our borders.”

Fifth, show sympathy that they have never known guns and offer to help them learn and buy their first. “Man, I’m sorry your dad was not around to teach you shooting; why don’t we go to the range, you can learn some basic skills and find out what guns you like, and I’ll help you decide on your first one and teach you safe use and maintenance of it.”

Sixth, vote for Trump, because you know what happens when a Clinton is in the White House; mass shootings (by the government.)

Seventh: Arm up, don't forget lots of ammo and magazines.

Conclusion

The left is trying to turn this tragedy into their political gain by making it about gun control instead of fighting terrorism. You need to own the conversation, imply that anyone who thinks more gun control is the answer is mentally deficient, then give them the opportunity to be on the right side of the debate. Imply that you are totally opposed to any more gun control and that any attempts to enact it on you would be ill advised. There is a movement called the Three Percent, and I urge you to adopt their doctrine:

"We will not disarm. You cannot convince us. You cannot intimidate us. You can try to kill us, if you think you can. But, remember, we'll shoot back. And, we are not going away. Your move."

In the spirit of resisting leftist tyranny and disarmament attempts, I've got some AR-15 lower receivers on order, and we're going to build one up right here on ROK in future articles. Until then, be safe.

Why Can’t Women Find A “Good Man”?

June 21, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

This article was sponsored by Tim Patten

Right now, all over the world, millions of women are searching for a “good man.”[i] Even after decades of effort on the part of the women’s liberation movement to empower women with the mantra, “I do not need a man,” they continue on this seemingly endless quest.

The process to find a good man begins early by assuring little girls that they’ll “meet a good partner one day”. Indeed, they seem to intuitively understand that someone, someday, will take care of them for the rest of their lives. They are told, “When you’re married, you’ll be happy,” as they bask in dreams of a fancy wedding and a life with a perfect soul mate. He’ll be masculine, he’ll work hard and he’ll earn enough money to care for his woman and for her children. He will be strong, intelligent, healthy and courageous – all the while being by her side for protection and support.

For men however, it is a different story. We don’t ask for much. We like our women to be attractive and have a job. We like them to enjoy sex, and we like them to provide us with companionship. What we don’t want is for them to try to change us.

It is these dichotic extremes that lie at the root of the modern global gender liberation phenomenon.[ii] A dichotomy where women are driving good men away.

Women and Society

The fact is that women and society at large have systematically stacked mountains of needs, obstacles and expectations in front of us men, challenging us to measure up to impossible standards of masculinity at every stage of our lives. Boys fend off schoolyard bullies, teenage males strut their stuff, and men feel compelled to protect females from even the slightest random belligerence. We are like cub scouts consigned to, among other things, helping little old ladies cross the street to earn our “real man” badge.

For the most part, women’s, gender studies and society at large skirt around male suicide[iii] and other related issues. But this must stop. It is time to zero in on who – and what – is corralling men into the destructive confines of hegemonic masculinity.

One obvious question is this: Where is the relentless demand for the “good man” coming from? In truth, this gender “policing” abomination is perpetrated by everyone, whether they are aware of it or not. It reflects a gynocentric society rife with the crumbling artifacts of institutionalized patriarchy. But that is not the whole story. Most of the time, those we love most – especially the women many of us spend our lives chasing – place this straightjacket of idealized masculinity on us. They are a favorite object of love and desire and in return, they expect stereotypical masculine perfection. Many hold dear those things that will elevate partners to “good man” status. Our girlfriends, wives and significant others wield this power over us like a sword, or they leave us with hurdle after hurdle to jump over.[iv]

Relationships Between Men and Women

One day every young girl grows up and finds her true love, a good man, and an exclusive relationship ensues. The couple becomes entangled and sometimes will marry. Suddenly the man’s responsibilities and demands skyrocket. Some men undoubtedly love the challenges of manhood and they experience a certain male pride when they assume responsibility for looking after a woman for the rest of her life. But for others, the burden of living up to an idealized version of manhood often leads to great stress and intense feelings of shame, anxiety, depression, and in extreme cases, suicide.[v] These marital burdens have created an escape phenomena for many men.

Women often try to control their man by slapping, hitting, and throwing him out of their homes. Oddly, society and even many men seem to approve of this abuse. In fact, some of us do not seem to care if loving a woman is dangerous. It seems that for many females, the fear of male domination echoes incessantly inside their heads. To dodge male authority, women go on the offensive and begin subjugating and manipulating men to ensure that they won't be oppressed.

They also try to hammer us into submission with their words. They'll say things like, "He's a little boy who needs to grow up and act like a man." They make us feel guilty and shame us with ridicule. Another common refrain is, "If you were a real man, you'd…", along with other self-serving diatribes like, "If you love me you'd man-up, earn more and help me at home".

The woman's weapon of choice is a sharp tongue. While the things they say might smack of moral authority and loving concern, they often cut deeper than physical violence. The intent is to strike at our inherent male core. Many women are experts at inflicting pain through words alone while others rely on tactics like bickering and nagging to stoke our insecurity even more. This has the potential to force even the most independent and self-assured of us to cower—or worse. As an example of how critical this issue has become, a 2014 study found that verbal abuse was often a catalyst for husband suicides.[vi]

Male Fear

Our worst fear is being seen as something other than male. We can be humiliated and devastated by any suggestion that, because of passivity or effeminacy, we might be like a woman. We live in perpetual anxiety about being considered weak, gay, unfit or "unmanly"; it is our Achilles' heel. When women demand that we be a "real man," our adrenaline spikes; when they shout, "Man-up!" we become agitated. When they undermine our masculinity, our pride is destroyed.

And yet, women are the ones who are often afraid. They are so frightened by our powerful maleness that they command us to submit. But many women don't seem to grasp the emasculating impact that their abuse can have. Lacking our biology, they cannot understand our emotions at their most primal level. They only see that we react and comply. They have no real understanding of the damage their reckless behavior can cause.

The Role of the Women's Movement

We should not have to succumb to the shackles placed on us by the women's rights and social justice movements either. In theory, these hugely successful campaigns were intended to level the playing field between men and women. In reality however, many have been hijacked by extremists and then misinformed for nefarious purposes. While these hardline activists try to make their mission sound noble, their words often betray then, as evidenced by the popular media battle cries below:

"R.E.S.P.E.C.T."…"I am woman"…"Hear me roar"…"Ladies first"…"This is a woman's world"…"Nobody can hold us down"…"She dominates all access"… "You don't own me"…"We run this mutha"… "If you like it, put a ring on it"…"Who runs the world? GIRLS!"

Over time, the drive for equality has been transformed into a crusade for female advantage and a strategy for imposing their worldview on men. Women have been given special rights and they've signed misguided legislation into law – legislation that benefits them at our male expense. Many of these so-called women's movements have devolved into full-fledged man-hating struggles for gender supremacy, inspiring a significant backlash.[vii][viii]

The Role of Sex

Unfortunately, our biological imperatives make things complicated and difficult. Even when women's demands are entirely unreasonable, most of us will comply because we are motivated by powerful and instinctual urges, most notable of which is our male sex drive. It is still not clear why society views this as an acceptable form of coercion and something used for the purpose of harnessing masculinity's unruly nature.

Once our male sexual appetite is triggered, we kowtow into submission, potentially sacrificing our long-term health and financial wellbeing by clinging to the false belief that physical intimacy is our reward for being "good." We are not just compelled to 'save the women and children first'. In many respects, we have become "vagina beggars". Like lemmings, we follow a dangerous and potentially disastrous course. We have become imprisoned, and women hold the key.

Liberation and Discovering Happiness

As Bob Dylan once wrote, the times they are a-changin'. Years of submission to abusive treatment and acquiescing to unrealistic expectations have taken their toll, and many of us are starting to ask some very pointed questions. Do we deserve to be treated like workhorses? Are we supposed to sit back and become totally marginalized, similar to how males in certain matriarchal African villages were relegated by the female leadership to the lowest rungs of the social ladder?[ix] Will we become nothing more than "manginas," capriciously and carelessly manipulated at the whims of our female overlords?

For millions of us, the answer to those questions is a resounding "no!" Good men around the world have decided to go their own way, and like us, they understand that there is nothing wrong with men or masculinity. They understand that they do not need to be schooled by women nor do they need to be enslaved to the family with little reward. A tsunami of male sovereignty is sweeping across our planet and we are grabbing the sword of opportunity to enlighten ourselves.

This growing movement of masculine awareness goes by many names—MGTOW, the Red Pill and Herbivore men. This new paradigm is helping us to understand our true selves, our unique assets and the techniques we can employ to end our toxic entanglements with women. We're learning how to liberate ourselves from a primitive and self-destructive social order. We're speaking out and helping to empower others to break free from the bonds of the biased relationship expectations of love, marriage and myopic monogamy – expectations that are enforced with female violence.

A New World

Gloria Steinem recently asked on Real Time with Bill Maher, "What's wrong with people using their talents and doing what they want?" As men, we want that liberation as well.

For many of us, this is a new and exciting environment, and it's quickly changing for the better. It is a world where we can finally do what we want and work at the things that we love.

It doesn't matter whether we enjoy tinkering with automobiles, flying kites, dancing in a ballet, playing sports or prepping ourselves so that we may, by choice rather than compulsion, become leaders, inventors and creators. We seek to express and enjoy our innermost interests and talents, rather than toil endlessly in the pursuit of a life of inequality and lopsided relationships. We are realizing our right to define who we are, and we are choosing our higher purpose.

As men, we are amazing; we have the qualities and drive to change the world. Only now, it is our own decision to make. No longer condemned to live a life dictated by women and their obsolete restrictions, we can shed the debilitating confines of social expectation and truly relish the fruits of our labors. It is time to unleash the full potential of men in our society. A life of freedom and happiness awaits us!

7 Common Logical Fallacies That Marxist Sympathizer Sally Kohn Effortlessly Teaches Us

June 22, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Sally Kohn is a lawyer, political commentator, and "community organizer" (professional agitator) who worked extensively with the National LGBTQ Task Force and regularly appears on CNN.

A secular Jew, ardent supporter of Hillary Clinton, and lesbian to boot, it should come as a surprise to nobody that she is also a militant feminist.

Kohn is perhaps most famous for inciting controversy in February 2015, when she wrote an article stating that she wants her daughter to grow up to be a lesbian like her. However, Sally was disappointed that she was… wait for it… starting to show a romantic interest in boys.

The horror right? Since Ms. Kohn metaphorically dwells in a living cuckoo clock where heterosexuality is discouraged rather than embraced, it is clear that logic and reason are not her particular strong points.

In the wake of the Pulse night club shooting in Orlando, I noticed that her Twitter feed was unloading a series of messages which were so full of various fallacies that I decided to start an educational series addressing SJW's and their questionable Twitter logic. Sally will be the first inadvertently helpful teaching assistant, but others will inevitably follow.

Logical Fallacy #1: Appeal To Emotion

Sally is clearly butt-hurt that Donald Trump actually wants to stick up for the dejected and increasingly derided majority of the U.S. population. This stands in great contrast to her cultural Marxist narrative, where the needs and demands of distinct minorities (gays, transgenders, Muslims, etc.) are championed at the expense of a classic Western tradition which she clearly despises: Christianity.

Logical Fallacy #2: Appeal To Tradition

Sally Kohn @sallykohn · 6h

Throughout history, extremist groups have used religion to preach and rationalize hate.

63 113

Sally is upset that a member of a religion she champions under her social justice narrative (Islam) has caused the biggest mass shooting in U.S. history. Therefore, Sally is making an unsuccessful attempt to save face by using the distant past to try and implicate other religions, such as Christianity during the Middle Ages (Crusades, Inquisition, etc.)

What Sally does not realize is that since the late 20th and early 21st centuries, the lions share of high death toll terrorist or "hate" attacks where religion played a major role, have been caused by Muslims. The statement she is making is almost entirely irrelevant to a major and growing crisis of the 21st century. Radical Islam.

Logical Fallacy #3: Cherry Picking, or "The Texas Sharpshooter Fallacy"

Sally Kohn @sallykohn · 10h

Worst mass shooting in US history.

Let's look at what ALL mass shootings in US have in common:

Guns.
Hatred.

Time to address both.

4.2K 5.9K

Sally is taking a very small cluster of data (and "hatred" is highly debatable as a form of data) to advance her leftist narrative of putting blame squarely on guns, rather than addressing many other factors which are commonplace in mass shootings.

For instance, Muslims make up barely over one percent of the U.S. population, but have been responsible for a very large number of mass shooting related deaths in recent years. If even just 20% of mass killings were caused by Muslims, that would be an amount so widely disproportionate to their population that it would be socially and academically irresponsible to not warrant attention.

Logical Fallacy #4: False Dilemma, Or Black-And-White Thinking

False dilemmas or “black-and-white thinking” do not allow for many different variables or conditions to exist. For instance, in this tweet, Sally has put forth an argument where just two possibilities exist in regards to how the general public supports LGBT people.

However, there are many more options available in regards to how everyday citizens can treat LGBT issues. Indifference for example, and just wanting to get on with their lives without having cultural Marxist hogwash beating in their eardrums all year long.

what me worry?

We see it here again:

Again, Sally is creating a false dilemma where only two options exist, when in fact there are many more available. For instance, logic and reason is a side which should be promoted, but instead she is merely arguing for impotent emotional gestures and continued cultural ignorance as a way to address mass killings. Lame.

Logical Fallacy #5: Middle Ground

Unfortunately, Sally does not realize that many times the awful truth does indeed find itself positioned at just one of two extreme points. Being half way between the truth and a lie, is still a lie.

What is the awful truth? The awful truth is that Islam is far more intolerant and hostile towards homosexuality than anything modern day Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, Hinduism, or Shintoism could conjure. Yet Sally wants to equally implicate them all for anti-gay extremism, at the expense of inadvertently defending the one religion which truly despises her sexual preferences and lifestyle to the point of imprisonment or death (outside of western nations). Islam.

Even the Westboro Baptist Church is mostly just retarded hate-speech dialogue directed towards gays. Last time I checked, words never actually killed anybody.

Logical Fallacy #6: No True Scotsman

“No True Scotsman” is an appeal to a sense of purity in order to dismiss factual criticisms. For instance “No TRUE Muslim would ever commit a terrorist attack!” is a relevant example of the fallacy.

In this tweet, Sally is essentially dubbing people “Un-American” if they use logic and data to come to the unfortunate, yet truthful, realization that Islam is more hateful towards homosexuals than other religions. After all, no TRUE American would ever dare to stereotype or hold a negative opinion towards Islam, and no TRUE Muslim would perpetrate such an attack.

Unfortunately for her, Americans do not all have SJW hive-minds, and are free to have their own opinions regarding various religions. It's all protected under the 1st amendment in the Bill of Rights (free speech, which lots of leftists want to destroy).

Logical Fallacy #7: Moving The Goal Posts or "Shifting Sands"

"Moving the goal posts" is a fallacy in which the evidence presented in response to a specific claim (Islamic terrorism) is dismissed and some other vaguely related topic (global violence) is often demanded to take it's place.

Why would Sally want to "move the goal posts" here? It's because she wants to take the heat off the narrative she is trying to protect (Islam is good and a religion of peace) without sounding completely off-topic. "Global violence" in general should be the center of the new debate.

Final Remarks

Sally Kohn is good little modern day Marxist commissar. Like all SJW's, she insists on doubling down on the leftist narrative no matter how many times reality can metaphorically hit her square in the face.

Nonetheless, her sound bytes and tweets can make for an entertaining spectacle to brush up on your logical fallacies. Whom shall be my next semi-celebrity teaching assistant? DeRay McKesson? Tim Wise? I'll be paying attention to the commentary.

Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg Covers His Laptop Camera With Tape—Should You, Too?

June 22, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Daily Mail:

Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg appears to be concerned about being spied on.

A photo that he shared to help celebrate Instagram's 500 million monthly active users shows the camera and audio jack on the billionaire's Macbook covered with pieces of tape.

He's holding a life-sized Instagram frame that reads: 'Thanks to everyone in our community for helping us reach this milestone!'

After posting the photo online, several Internet users spotted and pointed out the tape covering his camera and audio jack on his Macbook at his desk.

It's rumored that skilled hackers are able to take over the front facing cameras on laptops when they're not covered up.

It appears as though Zuckerberg, who is worth $35.7billion, is trying to prevent that from happening by placing a piece of tape over his camera, making the webcam useless.

Zuckerberg has been previously photographed at the same desk.

Roughly nine months ago while on a tour, he showed off the same desk that's complete with the same items on it then as it is now, according to Gizmodo.

This isn't the first time businessman was concerned about his security and privacy.

Back in February he was photographed out on a casual jog while on a trip in Berlin with at least five security guards running alongside him.

Furthermore, Zuckerberg has no less than 16 people who protect him, his wife Priscilla and their daughter Maxima at their $7million Palo Alto, California home.

In five years, the 31-year-old's company has spent more than $16million protecting him and his family.

The firm disclosed the staggering amount spent on security for Zuckerberg – the fourth richest person in the world – in a regulatory filing back in April.

It reveals that in 2015, $5 million was invested in bodyguards and other protective services to ensure the safety of its founder and CEO.

Why The Female “Anti-Feminist” Is A Feminist In Disguise

June 22, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Starting at the end of 2015, I began seeing a sharp rise of women declaring themselves to be “anti-feminist.” They created Twitter accounts and Youtube channels to mock social justice warriors and feminists in similar ways that we have, even borrowing our talking points. While they may come across as genuine, these female infiltrators are mostly attention whoring to a male audience. They don’t want to change the world—they just want you to look at them.

If you have an anti-feminist movement with a high percentage of women in it, you don’t have an anti-feminist movement. The reason is that single women raised in the West will find it impossible to go against the female urge of sleeping with whomever they want and having complete control over their lives to pursue useless college degrees and degenerate behaviors. The only exception is women who want to be mothers before 30, but such women wouldn’t waste her time “building a brand” online instead of creating the family she greatly desires.

Anti-feminists share great overlap in ideology with actual feminists

Female Media Members Ask Trump Campaign to Fire Corey Lewandowski

Sixteen signatories respond to the "inexcusable, unprofessional" behavior of campaign manager

The press is to have an adversarial, yet civil approach to those in, or running, for elected office. Never in the line of work is it acceptable to respond to reasonable and legitimate questioning with use of physical force. The photographs, audio, videos, and witness accounts documenting the treatment of Michelle Fields by Corey Lewandowski, Donald Trump's campaign manager, are inexcusable and unprofessional. Donald Trump should immediately remove Lewandowski from his campaign. The Trump campaign has stated that Lewandowski will not be fired even if convicted, however unlike the Trump campaign, we believe in making a statement on the record to clearly highlight the difference between right and wrong.

List of "conservative" "anti-feminists" that supported the firing of an innocent man based on a false accusation

The new anti-feminist will bash SJWs and their censorship efforts with great vigor, but when it's time for society to stop them from opening their legs to sexy alpha males, they throw a temper tantrum. When it's time to force them adopt traditional behaviors of maintaining a home instead of merely agreeing to traditional ideas in theory, they reveal themselves to be feminists at heart and use SJW language that labels you a "misogynist" or "rapist."

I've had numerous "anti-feminists" in infiltrated movements (alt right, gamergate, men's rights) attack me to the point where I can't tell the difference between them and standard issue SJWs, even though our enemy is supposedly the same. This includes popular "anti-feminist" Shoe0nhead, pictured at the top of this article with one of her many Arabian lovers that she is desperate to keep secret for some reason. The reality is that anti-feminists like her are more aligned with the enemy than ourselves. They used entryist tactics that started with merely uploading a female avatar and looking pretty in webcam pictures.

One of the reasons for the rise of anti-feminists is not necessarily the strength of our ideas, but the fact that the feminist camp is too crowded. Being a feminist and holding an "I need feminism" sign used to be a great way to get attention online without having to show tits, but with thousands of girls doing it, any one girl no longer stands out. The practice of anti-feminism by females is therefore an alternative strategy to getting attention. Consider that a girl who is a 6 out of 10 can now make a Youtube video denouncing feminism and easily get 25,000 views. It's also a way for girls to show men that they are "hip," "dangerous," and "cool." Men online are so thirsty and lonely that they lavish these girls with attention because they're "just like one of the guys."

The anti-feminist test

These anti-feminist females are not traditional and not even conservative. They are liberals in disguise. You can ask them these questions to reveal where their true sympathies lie:

- “Are you against homosexual marriage?”
- “Do you believe it’s ideal for a woman to remain a virgin until she gets married?”
- “Do you believe that it’s best for children to be raised by a stay-at-home mother?”
- “Do you believe a woman’s choices should be constrained by her husband, tribe, or church with the intention of doing what’s best for her?”
- “Do you believe it’s wrong for a young girl to find herself by traveling around the world and trying new experiences?”

Good luck finding an anti-feminist who says yes to even two of the above questions. I suspect the only girl who would is already married and a stay-at-home mother who happily submits to her masculine husband.

While the anti-feminists have been useful during group actions against SJWs online, the drawback is that their platform size may grow enough to cause damage in the future when they have a difficult menstrual cycle and start needless drama by attacking genuine conservatives. They will not submit to anything but their female biology and bottomless pit of narcissism while the weak men who follow them act as their enablers and white knights.

In spite of their big talk online, anti-feminists ultimately want to maintain the status quo, and have taken on our ideas as a strategy to get attention and fill the childless void in their lives. They will have absolutely no place within the sphere of neomasculinity.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. Today Is The Brexit Vote—Did The Global Elite Fumble By Allowing It?

June 23, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Today, British citizens will vote on Brexit—whether the UK should remain or leave the European Union. The debate leading up to the vote contains valuable insights into the tactics of the globalists. It also demonstrates that the globalists can make mistakes. These are valuable pieces of knowledge for men who are committed to building a healthy society.

What is the European Union?

Konrad Adenauer

The idea of European Union (EU) came about after the horror of World War II. Christian men such as Konrad Adenauer, Robert Schuman and Winston Churchill dreamt of a Europe at peace, united by its Christian faith and common ancestral heritage. The EU started off as merely a free trade zone—the European Economic Community. The EU itself came into being in 1993 when the Maastricht Treaty became operative. The treaty created something like a "United States of Europe" with the concept of European citizenship.

What's wrong with the EU?

> Huge mob of 300 migrants storm port in Calais in violent bid to smuggle their way into UK https://t.co/zgpQUuknSh
> — Louise Mensch (@LouiseMensch) June 21, 2016

Ironically, becoming the United States of Europe is the biggest problem of the EU. Just as the original 13 American colonies gave up their individual sovereignty to form the United States, each EU country will gradually have to give up its sovereignty.

What makes it worse is that they will yield their sovereignty to an undemocratic institution. While the EU does have an elected Parliament, it is a sham intended to make the EU look like a democratic body. The real power resides in the EU Commission, a body of 28 unelected bureaucrats. The individual member countries do have an opportunity to vote against EU Commission proposals, but unless a majority of the 28 member states also oppose the proposal, it becomes EU law. In other words, the EU can dictate not just trade between EU countries, but also what goes on within those countries.

In no area is this more evident that when it comes to immigration policy. For example, the EU member countries are currently negotiating a deal where Turkey will temporarily prevent a certain number of “refugees” from entering Europe in exchange for granting Turkey 1,500,000 visas. While Turks are probably preferable to some of the other “refugees” it would still mark a big step toward the Islamization of the UK.

The Left’s Method of Debate—Instill Fear

> Love it @BrookesTimes.#VoteLeave pic.twitter.com/XJzGjdEHXG
> — Peter Thompson (@TheRedRag) June 10, 2016

Most of the benefits of being a member of the EU are economic. Being a member of the EU means that you don’t need to negotiate separate trade deals with 27 other countries. It also means that the EU can negotiate better trade deals with other countries such as the United States. Being part of the EU means you have more leverage when it comes to trade.

The natural fear is that if the UK leaves the EU, the other nations will impose tariffs on it. That’s an unlikely scenario as the UK is the second largest economy in the Europe and could easily retaliate by imposing tariffs of its own. Still, it is a rational argument.

But the “Remain” side of the debate has not been making rational arguments. Make-up wearing “comedian” Eddie Izzard implied that World War III awaits if UK leaves the EU.

> ICYMI: “Saw some poppies in Nottingham. We set up the European Union to stop world wars ever happening again. Lest … https://t.co/q15qX8pwp6
> — Eddie Izzard (@eddieizzard) June 11, 2016

The Labour Party suggested that leaving the EU could cause workers to lose their vacation.

And our old friend, arch globalist George Soros wrote an opinion piece claiming that Britons would see their living standards crater.

Why should you care?

It is important to know about the EU and Brexit even if you are not a British citizen. First, it demonstrates how trade treaties can serve as a precursor to taking away a country's sovereignty. The EU started as a trade agreement but it has now reached the point where EU trumps the laws of the individual nation.

The United States faces a similar challenge as globalists use NAFTA as a starting point to turn Canada, the United States, and Mexico into one "North American Community." The massive influx of illegal immigrants into the US, aided by both Central American governments and the US, is the tip of the spear to achieve a single North American state.

Second, it gives a glimpse into how our elites control us by fear. Fear is the primary tool in the arsenal of elite control techniques. Sometimes these take the form of threats against our physical safety—as when the Muslim mayor of London threatened the US with Islamic terror attacks if Trump imposes a ban on Muslim immigration.

Third, it shows the growing use of the tactic of calling anyone who stands in the way of the globalist agenda a 'racist' or 'far right wing.' In this way, anyone who wants to vote in his self interest is automatically branded as being an extremist, worse than any actual terrorist. This is by design. It lays the groundwork for police action against these "dangerous" elements in society.

The final lesson of Brexit is that there is still some small possibility of democratic change. It is a miracle—or a big miscalculation—that the globalist elite have allowed the UK to have a referendum on whether to leave the EU. It would be a stunning blow to the globalist agenda if the UK leaves the EU as it opens the door to a healthy nationalist government.

This means that the globalist lock on power is not yet complete. Now is the time to do everything in our power to wrest control from them.

Conclusion

One thing is certain: This is the last time that Britons will have a chance to vote to leave the EU in a generation. If the UK votes to remain, the future will look less English, Scottish, and Irish and more African and Islamic. That's not scare mongering. That's an inevitable consequence of how demographics are shaping up in the third world. The destiny of any nation that fails to control its own borders is to get inundated by that rising wave.

10 Steps To Capture A New Country’s Flag

June 23, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Why sleep with an attractive girl of a specific nationality? Because it brings you an additional comprehension of the world by comparing what you truly seek in a woman. It brings variety. Something exotic, unknown, and part of a man’s travel experience. And it may lead a fulfilling long-term relationship that is becoming harder to find in the West.

An example of my method

We shall bang hotties on the beaches, we shall smash sluts on the landing grounds, we shall slay pussy in the fields and in the streets, we shall fornicate 9's in the hills; we shall never come back with blue balls.

We will not focus on self improvement and the things that you already know about. We will also not focus on administrative requirements for you to go to X country as every case is different. I will show you some of the methods that helped me in the past, making the capture of a specific flag easier.

To illustrate my point, I will choose a hypothetical trip to Kazakhstan, for a few reasons:

- Still need my Kazakh flag. Having met a few, I find ethnic Kazakh girls attractive, elegant and accessible. There also are Russian girls for a good time.
- A Muslim country on the Silk Road, quite exotic. A chunk of the former Soviet Union with desert and steppes
- Unknown and unusual food and language
- Fairly close to Europe and relatively tourist-free so I would have a decent foreigner value
- Never been there so far

The important steps

1. Choose a city

- Choose the city considering the foreigner value that you will have
- The smaller the city, the fewer the girls and the occasions to bang with little time or without a social circle. Try to find something between 300,000 inhabitants and above.
- Find which cities have the most universities. Once you find it, stick to it to build momentum.

Largest cities or towns in Kazakhstan

http://www.geonames.org/KZ/largest-cities-in-kazakhstan.html

Rank	Name	Region	Pop.
1	Almaty	Almaty	1,703,481
2	Astana	Astana	860,368
3	Shymkent	South Kazakhstan	683,273
4	Karaganda	Karagandy	496,173
5	Aktobe	Aktobe	427,719
6	Taraz	Jambyl	351,476
7	Pavlodar	Pavlodar	350,998
8	Oskemen	East Kazakhstan	344,421
9	Semey	East Kazakhstan	312,136
10	Oral	West Kazakhstan	278,096

Cities in red would be ideal for less than a week. Cities in blue would be ideal for 2 weeks +

Less than a week, it will be Almaty and its 30 universities. If time allows it, I would choose Karaganda (three universities and I can piss off to Astana if it turns out to be a hole).

2. Sharpen your language skills

- A month prior, practice 30 minutes a day the target language
- Find apps on your phone with flash cards. Watch the news in the target language. Find local groups on social media and practice live with native speakers

Everyone speaks Russian in Kazakhstan. With my conversational level. I'd dust off the classics by applying the points above, plus calling my Russian friends and practicing on Skype. I would learn greetings in Kazakh such as "Come here" or "Let's go and dance."

3. Study the culture

- Read about history, family, traditions and the weight of religion in the country
- Check what kind of men local girls look for. Stay the same but tweak you personality in accordance.
- Know your target. Stereotypes exist for a reason. Try to focus your reasoning around a few adjectives that describe the local girls.

Moderate Islam because of Communist past. More conservative than Russian girls. Double shield against the influence of the West, but girls drink and still dress sexy.

4. Logistics

- Book a room or apartment of your own (Airbnb and Booking.com seem to have the best offers)
- When a room is the only alternative, check if you can bring a girl over. Ask the security or landlord “A friend of mine will come and chill this afternoon before we go for dinner, do you mind?”

- It needs to be less than a 20 minutes walk from the bar or club
- Scout on your first day a date spot with alcohol and no food near your place
- Ask the locals their recommendations for clubs/bars

The blue circle is the 20 minutes walking distance, the red circle is the ideal position where I should stay in Karaganda

5. Pay attention to timing

- There is an unwritten rule that two weeks is the ideal amount of time to get a flag at least once.
- Try to be rested. Skip a night of game if needed. Use the strategical afternoon nap
- Find the season where the city will have the most girls. Winter universally less active. Summer months, girls are away working or on holiday.

Following the Russian model, the ideal months would be : April to Mid-June / Late August to beginning of October. It is a Muslim country with some Orthodox Christians. Would avoid bank holidays and Ramadan.

6. Arrive focused and ready

- Pipeline a few weeks before your arrival on dating websites and applications
- You are on a mission. Do not achieve orgasm for a few days. Build up horniness and motivation

7. Set up your lair

- Alcoholic drinks and mixers stored at your place
- Needs to be clean
- Keep your valuables hidden if the local girls have the reputation of being poor and stealing stuff from foreigners
- Have appropriate music to set the mood

Vodka, lemonade and a lemon in the fridge. When I don’t have a sound system where I stay, I usually use one of these with my phone

8. Get dressed

- Check the weather forecast and the seasonal pattern
- Dress down if you have time ahead of you or if your foreigner value compensates your casual clothes
- Good, comfortable shoes are important

Kazakh men, in true FSU fashion, rarely dress well. With smart casual, you would stand out.

My day game uniform (minus the moped). Comfy and better dressed than 90% of the locals

9. Game like a machine

- Approach all the time. Groups, hair dresser, cops. The girl is pretty, you pounce. Only stop for sport and work
- Listen to your gut. Weed out flaky girls. Eject and find new prospects

- Venues to choose for night game: student places, lounge bars that are not sponsor spots. Avoid snobby clubs with crazy entrance cover, overpriced drinks and girls that have no interest in banging a foreigner if he is not in their social circle
- Schedule if you are free: 1st date 15.00, 2nd date 18.00, 3rd date 21.00 + night game. Meet, drink, build comfort, escalate and bring her to your place. If you don't succeed, rinse and repeat.

In Kazakhstan, headscarves are rare and I should not have problems approaching during the day (when it is not Ramadan). I would try to do 10 daily approaches (sometimes a lot more) and 10 at night until success

10. Mind your health

- Bring Condoms. Loads.
- Vitamins
- Eat well. Don’t change your habits because you travel
- Careful with the street food and tap water. Getting sick is the last thing you need
- Always have a 5 liter bottle of still water at your place
- Go for a run. It will allow you to get a sense of the place.

Un dernier mot

The flag is not the main purpose of my travels but I have physical needs and I am always thirsty for adventure, and sometimes love. One should not travel to a place that does not seem interesting or where the culture repulses him in order to just get a flag.

Facebook CEO Promotes Subversive Globalist Views In His First Live Q&A

June 23, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

Last week via Facebook, Mark Zuckerberg hosted his first hour-long live Q&A from the company's headquarters in Menlo Park, California. Intended as an open forum for any of Facebook's 1.65 billion users to ask the company's CEO their burning questions, Zuckerberg quickly used one of them to pitch his vision of the "global community".

The naive viewer would find nothing strange or off-putting about Zuckerberg's spiel. His voice had that giddy, effete inflection a lot of Millennial techies tend to use to lull their listeners into a passive state of glee and unthinking optimism about technology's future (without us). It is worth noting that since cashing in on public figure status, Zuckerberg's body language has improved–the confidence in his firm hand gestures chopping the air has helped reinforce the message behind his words, even when that message is a bad one. However, for the initiated viewer attuned to Facebook's newfangled political agenda, you will detect what Zuckerberg is espousing is undeniably globalist in nature.

After the opening pleasantries, Zuckerberg warmed viewers up with a broad and cozy premise: "We need to use social media to find solutions to humanity's problems." By solutions, of course, he doesn't mean generating colourful banners for the site's users to feign dedication toward a particular tragedy or cause? No, that is not his implication, per se.

He continues, while, on the way, stumbling over the acronym LGBT with "LGDP" (Lesbian-Gay-Double Penetration?), to propose his solution: By building technology, "people can come together and kind of level up humanity and start to see ourselves less as nations of people and more as a global community." Did a nuke Dr. Strangelove-style just go off in your head? If it did, you should remove the words “Little Boy” from its shell and replace it with “Cultural Marxism”.

Zuckerberg’s so-called solution denotes the very definition of globalism: a socio-political system that strips nations of their traditions and replaces them with a globalized society run by a group of elites (who only serve to benefit) without a unified culture. Of course, Zuckerberg skirts that explanation, couching it in vague language like “new political systems” and “citizens of the world.”

By “technology,” Zuckerberg never clarifies what type of technology and who would control it. In a globalist society, the controllers would be private monopolies under the auspices of foreign banks and the Federal Reserve, but Zuckerberg avoids getting down to those specifics–or perhaps he is not even aware.

“A lot of the problems you’re talking about,” he adds, “whether it’s terrorism, the refugee crisis, or climate change, or global diseases spreading around the world, these are not things that can be solved by any one city or one nation or one small group of people.” Yet, Zuckerberg fails to point out that these issues are perpetuated by the globalist agenda itself.

For example, the influx of Syrian refugees into “generous” European countries like Germany, France, and Sweden has destabilized those regions, upsetting their social order and leading to increases in crime, namely the rape of its women (a subject Western feminists have chosen to stay silent on). Globalism is the very engine of this current calamity; it, by definition, requires a world with open borders for “diverse” cultures to mix and muddle up. Thus, globalism’s “multiculturalism” seeks to overwhelm nations and local communities with groups that will not (or cannot) assimilate to the national culture.

Today, nationalism has become a faux pas (hence Donald Trump’s surging popularity amongst America’s traditionally patriotic base–and lack of popularity amongst globalist leftists and cuckservatives, in turn). With the proliferation of worldwide information sharing and virtual interconnectivity (due, in part, by Facebook), globalism has become the mainstay for which countries around the world are meant to participate. Zuckerberg is encouraging this gross idea, admitting “we have a lot of work to do”, without acknowledging that globalism itself is riding shotgun in exacerbating the world’s “problems”.

Throughout the Q&A, you can sense the hollowness behind Zuckerberg’s words. His overuse of “global infrastructure,” “organize everyone together,” and other platitudes imply the merry-go-round simplicity of his ideas. His arguments are the verbal equivalent of placing daisies in a rifle, if those carnations were sprayed down with DDT–and if Zuckerberg were wearing a turtleneck, but, alas, he’s sporting a bland grey crew neck. Zuckerberg’s bloodshot eyes–either from a lack of sleep or pure camera fright–remain lit open throughout most of the Q&A, giving off the strange feeling that he is scared of what he is saying, and not confident about it, either.

Comedians In Cars Getting Censored

Fortunately, the Q&A gets enlivened by the arrival of comedian Jerry Seinfeld. At first, his appearance brought tremendous woe, thinking one of today’s great funny mans and leaders against political correctness had sold himself out to a billionaire yuccie who censors conservatives’s free speech.

Thankfully, that wasn’t the case. Stopping by Facebook’s headquarters to test drive an Oculus Rift demo, Seinfeld crashed Zuckerberg’s globalist party to playfully mock the CEO’s said views. Responding to the “global community,” Seinfeld scoffs, “what part would we play other than can I take a selfie with you?” Zuckerberg blushes, stifling his frustration that Seinfeld won’t nod along to his nonsense. Seinfeld goes so far as to reject a Q’ers invitation to a block party and dismiss Zuckerberg’s queue of questions as “not interesting at all”.

Here, Seinfeld's pitch-perfect candour actually starts to disarm the nebbish CEO. Zuckerberg's facial expressions become less stilted, his speech more uninhibited ("I wasn't planning to talk about this publicly!", Zuckerberg admits after Seinfeld prods him about his personal life), and his body language looser. The hilarity escalates as Seinfeld continues to poke fun at Zuckerberg's philosophy: "Your goal was to take the social experience and put it online; I want to eliminate the entire social experience," noting the irony that Zuckerberg's social media website has effectively done just that.

With Seinfeld's appearance, the Q&A veered from a globalist gymboree to a frank yet lighthearted exposé of Zuckerberg's dubious political position. Once again, Seinfeld reminds us that humour–combined with decisive action and critical thinking–is the answer to taking the legs out from under the globalist's stance.

5 Signs You Are Still Purple Pill

June 24, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The Matrix gave us the analogy of the red pill of truth versus the blue pill of lies. The purple pill describes those who have begun to open their eyes to the truth but don't want to fully believe all of it.

There is no middle ground. There is truth and reality, and then there is the made up world that society presents. For those still stuck in between, here are some warning signs you are stuck in purple pill territory.

1. You watch mainstream news

If the constant lying, manipulation, failing to report important stories, and distorting others that regularly goes on in the media wasn't enough, the meetup outrage should have been enough to make you completely shut out mainstream media from your life. Alternative media, the foreign press, and online sources are, for now, the best replacements. If you still watch the news, you're just not getting the truth.

2. You don't flush condoms down the toilet

That’s what THEY want you to think.

Thanks to alimony and child support laws going full retard, a man can be on the hook for tens if not hundreds of thousands of dollars after a mere one night stand if the woman is able to capture some of his semen and impregnate yourself. If you believe that modern women are not dirty enough to reach into the garbage can, pull out a used condom, and stick it inside them, you are taking the purple pill.

This happens often enough with celebrities where it makes mainstream news (most recently Olympian skier Bode Miller’s ex-girlfriend supposedly impregnated herself this way), but the phenomenon has gone mainstream. If a woman is ready for a child, there is really no downside to this scenario.

Worst case she is unable to shake someone down for money, and collects extra welfare, housing, food stamp, and medical benefits by having a kid as a single mom, and best case scenario, her target is wealthy enough that she can shake him down for thousands a month in payments for a single night of fun. It’s a win-win for her, so don’t think women won’t shove garbage inside their holes for the big payoff.

3. You listen to a woman (while ignoring her actions)

Bristol Palin, single mother and abstinence advocate!

OK, maybe you're aware that around 70% of divorces are initiated by women, that obesity is a huge problem, that game is a necessary component of successfully dating in 2016, and you're aware that society is training toddlers to become trannies. But if you don't immediately discount every thing that comes out of the mouth of the girl you are gaming, you're purple pill (at best). Always, always always look at her actions, and ignore her speech.

This past weekend, I met a Chinese student who had just graduated college in the states. She said she hadn't been in a relationship for over a year, and only had two real boyfriends since coming to the U.S. as a teenager. She told me her friends are pushing her to find someone, but she doesn't date because she "doesn't want to be with a guy who's only looking for fun" and wants something serious. For a moment, I believed her. After all, she was raised in a traditional Asian household, was not a party girl, and stayed out of mainstream American life, socializing mostly with other Asians (her English was broken and bad, even after living here for 6 years).

Two hours later, as I'm banging her in her shower, I reflected on how this was only happening because I completely ignored everything that came out of her mouth and proceeded gaming her. Purple pill Max would have taken her at her word, been friendzoned, and given up, hoping for an easier target. But this experience reinforced how everywhere and always, one must ignore a female's words and observe only her actions.

4. You don't slap, spit on and choke your date at the end of the evening

OJ Simpson reportedly forced himself on 18 year old Nicole Brown on their first date.

In 2016, the proper way to demonstrate to your date that you enjoy spending time with her is not by giving her a small kiss as you part ways, but instead to violently choke, slap, spit on, and say demeaning things to her as you pound away at her genitals. This is the proper first date behavior in most cases, if you wish to see the young woman again.

I have only recently discovered this truth, and experimented last weekend with said Chinese student. Every violent and aggressive act I initiated was welcomed and encouraged. I took advantage of the Father's Day holiday by instructing her to say filthy things about what her "daddy" was doing to her (daddy being a stranger she did not know several hours earlier), and she happily obliged. Sadly, I do not yet possess the masochism to spit on or port-o-potty a stranger, but we are moving in that direction, and I feel I must learn this skill in order to remain competitive in the dating market.

5. You use Facebook

Sure, maybe you are a regular. Maybe you follow ROK, have game, and are on the path to an independent self-actualized future. But you still have a Facebook account, log on, waste time, get bombarded by ads and spied on. Facebook is a censoring, propagandizing, tranny-promoting degenerate corporate marketing firm where YOU are the product. Your actions, web histories, movements, friends, and activities are all tracked, monitored, and sold to the highest bidder. And remember, Facebook invented 69 genders. You already spend too much time in front of the screen, so drop Facebook now.

There is no Purple Pill

In the words of Steven Colbert, we're at war with feminists—pick a side. You can't believe "most" of the truth, but still hold out for a special snowflake. You can't behave as your parents or grandparents did, even with conservative or virginal women. You will get nowhere, and be friendzoned immediately. You have two choices: go full beta, wife up your nearest landwhale, pull out the credit cards, and be ready to work the rest of your life as a sexless debt-slave in a cubicle filling out TPS reports, or fully accept the red pill, as bitter as it may be. The choice is yours.

WORLDWIDE SHOCK: Britain Votes To Leave European Union, David Cameron Resigns

June 24, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Daily Mail:

Boris Johnson has made a pitch to be Prime Minister of a new 'great' Britain outside the EU after a devastated David Cameron announced his resignation.

Mr Johnson started to set out his vision for a revitalised, outward looking country in a speech just hours after his long-time rival tearfully declared that he would stand aside in the wake of the referendum Brexit vote.

But it immediately became clear that whoever is in Downing Street will face a struggle to hold the UK together – as SNP leader Nicola Sturgeon warned it was now 'highly likely' that a second ballot on independence will be held north of the border.

The developments came after the Leave campaign stacked up 52 per cent of the votes – despite massive support for Remain in Scotland and major cities including London.

The Bank of England governor Mark Carney has attempted to reassure panicking markets this morning after the Pound nose-dived to its lowest level against the US dollar for 31 years, and the FTSE slumped by 8 per cent.

Flanked by wife Samantha in Downing Street, Mr Cameron said he had been ‘proud’ to serve as PM for the past six years.

But he said it would not be right for him to be the ‘captain of the ship’ while the UK negotiated its exit from the EU.

After his speech, Mr Cameron travelled to Buckingham Palace to discuss the results with the Queen.

Prince Charles getting reprimanded by his boss Evelyn de Rothschild

The bombshell announcement came after possibly the most dramatic night Britain has experienced in peacetime. Among the biggest developments are:

- Leave ended up the clear winner in the EU referendum by 52 per cent to 48 per cent, after Remain's strong performance in Scotland and big cities such as London failed to offset huge Brexit votes in England and Wales.
- The news sent the Pound plunging against the US dollar, losing around 20 cents to hit its lowest level since 1985. The FTSE was also down as much as 8 per cent in morning trading.
- Standard & Poor's have also warned that Britain's AAA credit rating looks 'untenable' in the wake of the Brexit vote.
- The Bank of England has moved to reassure investors that it will take 'all necessary steps' to stabilise the economy.
- Scottish first minister Nicola Sturgeon said it was now 'highly likely' that a second independence referendum will be held, potentially within months.
- European Council president Donald Tusk expressed sorrow at Britain's verdict but insisted: 'What doesn't kill you only makes you stronger.'
- German Chancellor Angela Merkel expressed 'deep regret' that the UK had chosen to leave, while French president Francois Hollande said negotiations over terms should start as quickly as possible.
- Tony Blair said the decision would have 'vast' political and economic consequences for the UK and all sides had to be 'grown up'.
- Conservative Party chairman Andrew Feldman joined his close friend Mr Cameron in declaring he will stand down

Mr Johnson, who was booed and called a ‘tw*t’ by protesters as he left his home in central London this morning, started off his statement at the Vote Leave HQ in central London by paying tribute to his ‘extraordinary’ Tory colleague Mr Cameron.

The former London mayor stopped short of confirming that he would stand to succeed the PM – but made a pitch for people to help him forge a better future.

He also sought to soothe fears over the financial market panic that has greeted the historic result, stressing that nothing would change in the short term.

39 Statements That Reveal Whether You Are A True Man Of The Right

June 24, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

In keeping with the thrust of my articles over the past several weeks, let's have a bit of fun. Tally up how many of the following 39 statements you agree with, and think about why. I'd love to hear your results in the comments. I'll share more about the list and my thoughts, at the end.

1. All forms of racial segregation and discrimination are wrong.

2. Everyone is entitled to his own opinion.

3. Everyone has a right to free, public education.

4. Political, economic or social discrimination based on religious belief is wrong.

5. In political or military conflict it is wrong to use methods of torture and physical terror.

6. A popular movement or revolt against a tyranny or dictatorship is right, and deserves approval.

7. The government has a duty to provide for the ill, aged, unemployed and poor if they cannot take care of themselves.

8. Progressive income and inheritance taxes are the fairest form of taxation.

9. If reasonable compensation is made, the government of a nation has the legal and moral right to expropriate private property within its borders, whether owned by citizens or foreigners.

10. We have a duty to mankind; that is, to men in general.

11. The United Nations, even if limited in accomplishment, is a step in the right direction.

12. Any interference with free speech and free assembly, except for cases of immediate public danger or juvenile corruption, is wrong.

13. Wealthy nations, like the United States, have a duty to aid the less privileged portions of mankind.

14. Colonialism and imperialism are wrong.

15. Hotels, motels, stores and restaurants in southern United States ought to be obliged by law to allow blacks to use all of their facilities on the same basis as whites.

16. The chief sources of delinquency and crime are ignorance, discrimination, poverty and exploitation.

17. Communists have a right to express their opinions.

18. We should always be ready to negotiate with the Soviet Union and other communist nations.

19. Corporal punishment, except possibly for small children, is wrong.

20. All nations and peoples, including the nations and peoples of Asia and Africa, have a right to political independence when a majority of the population wants it.

21. We always ought to respect the religious beliefs of others.

22. The primary goal of international policy in the nuclear age ought to be peace.

23. Except in cases of a clear threat to national security or, possibly, to juvenile morals, censorship is wrong.

24. Congressional investigating committees are dangerous institutions, and need to be watched and curbed if they are not to become a serious threat to freedom.

25. The money amount of school and university scholarships ought to be decided primarily by need.

26. Qualified teachers, at least at the university level, are entitled to academic freedom: that is, the right to express their own beliefs and opinions, in or out of the classroom, without interference from administrators, trustees, parents or public bodies.

27. In determining who is to be admitted to schools and universities, quota systems based on color, religion, family or similar factors are wrong.

28. The national government should guarantee that all adult citizens, except for criminals and the insane, should have the right to vote.

29. Joseph McCarthy was probably the most dangerous man in American public life during the fifteen years following the Second World War.

30. There are no significant differences in intellectual, moral or civilizing capacity among human races and ethnic types.

31. Steps toward world disarmament would be a good thing.

32. Everyone is entitled to political and social rights without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

33. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and expression.

34. Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression.

35. The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government.

36. Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security.

37. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.

38. Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions.

39. Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

The 39 sentences were written by James Burnham, in his book The Suicide of the West. Burnham recognized that Liberalism was a "syndrome," producing incoherent attitudes and unprincipled exceptions in Western civilization to the detriment of its inherited, Classical and Christian Tradition. These articles illustrating post-revolutionary thought, can expose how effectively the solvent of Liberalism has acted upon Western minds, obliterating all trace of the old order.

Many who think of themselves as men of the "right," nowadays, would agree with many of the points. A solid man of the right will disagree with all or nearly all of them, however. I ran into these articles on another man's blogs some time ago, and I'll share the comments I had at that time, here. I'll go somewhere further with this, in upcoming articles.

My tally:
Agree – 2; Agree w/Qualification – 2; Disagree – 30; Disagree Vehemently – 5.

This is the key difference between a partisan of the Left's Revolution, and a Reactionary: the partisans of the Revolution believe in "rights" irrespective of what is Right (i.e., you have "rights" to do things that may in many cases be morally wrong or irrational), whereas a Reactionary holds to the only logically coherent view, substantively present in Pagan philosophy and enshrined in the Holy Tradition of the Church: “error has no rights.” This is because a right is a claim based on justice, and there is no just claim for a blanket permission to engage in behaviours irrespective of their moral or rational quality.

Nevertheless, it will in many cases still be right to tolerate things that fall short of perfect justice, because this serves the greater good more effectively than an attempt to ferret out all imperfection in society. This is not only common sense, but is the teaching of all the Fathers and Doctors of the Church. But once you enshrine the idea that people have a right or entitlement to engage in behaviours that should at most be tolerated in some instances (and punished in others), you have exposed every good and decent thing to the corrosive influence of incoherent, Modernist, Liberal thought.

Take #34 (free speech), for example. Nobody is entitled by right to think or say, let alone do, whatever they please, irrespective of its content and quality, however much this is or should be tolerated in certain circumstances. Yet, we can truly say that our tradition strongly prefers that everyone have his say (I won’t say “her say”), in many cases. There is a difference between saying there cannot be a right to a wrong, and saying that wrongs must be outlawed; it is often praiseworthy to tolerate wrongs, but this must not lead us to accord rights to what is wrong.

In a sane society, there is no “right” for sodomites to publicly celebrate rectal abuse, or for socialists to demand that we should all be robbed and disinherited by the state, or for feminists to disobey their husbands and argue for their independence from male authority. They certainly have no right to speak so; indeed, it is we who would have the right, on our side, to compel their silence—even with force, in certain circumstances. Though, we may in certain cases do better to tolerate them (increasingly big emphasis on “may”).

What did I agree with? I agreed with the proposition that torture is wrong (if “torture” is a deliberate and calculated affair; beating the crap out of a detainee because you need the code to disarm the nuke that’s about to go off is not “torture,” it’s the only morally decent thing to do). I also agreed that, at present, Congressional Investigative Committees are likely to be dangerous, and require oversight.

I expressed qualified agreement with the notion (#6) that folk may revolt against tyranny – provided that the tyranny is actually immoral, and provided that one abides by the guidelines of Reason and the Church (esp. as articulated by St. Thomas), which discourage pointless bloodshed if there is little chance that armed conflict will succeed in its aims of abolishing the tyranny. I also feel a qualified agreement with #13 (that wealthy nations have a duty to the less fortunate), provided we understand that the duty is one of charity, not one of strict, legal obligation.

I disagreed with the rest.

I vehemently disagreed with notions #15 (compulsory desegregation) #28 (the state must ensure universal suffrage) #29 (allowing teachers to overrule even parents in the name of "academic freedom") #35 (the will of the people shall be the source of the state's authority) and #39 (people are owed a living). It seems to me that the common factor in my especially righteous indignation at these notions, is due to the fact that, in addition to having no rational basis (as with most of the other notions), they also go on to call for proactive violence against the reasonable view. I.e., it is already irrational to assert a "right" to free speech and "academic freedom" irrespective of objective morality; but it goes a step further to actually use these erroneous concepts as a weapon against parental rights, which actually do exist and are morally sound.

I used to think segregation served no purpose but giving vent to racism; reviewing crime statistics and recent events, and coming to realize that property rights and the right of free association are morally sound, I now see that business owners both have legitimate interests, and a positive right, for excluding anyone they wish from their property. Justice isn't about utopian ideals; it is about finding the equilibrium where no actual right is violated, however far this may fall from a moral ideal, in a very imperfect world. Or, as to #35, it should be obvious that all authority is vested in truth and exercised from above, so rooting it in the whims of authority's rightful subjects is itself the essence of stupidity and self-contradiction.

Let me know your thoughts, and we'll go from there next week.

8 Circumstances When Anger Is Actually Good

June 25, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Lately ROK writer Corey Savage has penned a couple of pieces about the negative sides of anger. His pieces exude hard-earned, experience-based wisdom. It is very easy, when one is red-pilled and wants more than riding the tide of the dark age, to get angry at something: the daily news, the hegemony of cultural Marxism, how the so-called "far right" gets beaten down by the forces of the system at each election, the ever-increasing number of non-whites in the streets, the degeneracy of women… in a world as ugly as the current mainstream, sources of anger are potentially infinite.

The system knows well about the downsides of anger and mercilessly plays on them. It maintains a lax policy on black-on-white and anti-Trump violence in order to force whites into defending themselves, then points finger at their supposed "violence." It constantly demonizes innocent people and sacrifices them on the SJW altar, and if said people show a righteous anger against their attackers, this very anger will be singled out to reinforce the narrative that locks them down into the villainous role. In short, the system provokes in us an anger it is able to recuperate and turn back against us later.

Getting angry at people or things we have no power over, getting provoked into flaring up publicly at something and then being labelled the violent one, are important downsides. Anger is one of the most potent emotions we are capable of, and for this reason one of the most dangerous. Yet it has a positive aspect as well. If one is able to dominate one's anger, this burning emotion can prove immensely useful. Just like fire appears beautiful and warm when we cast it into a chimney or between small rocks, anger is part of our makeup because there are circumstances when having it—and using it wisely—can turn the tables to our advantage.

1. Physical prowess

Anger gives an energy boost and a sense of drive. During an athletic performance, the emotion can endow us with the extra momentum we need just when we need it. This is something I grasped firsthand. While swimming, at the end of an extended race, I would almost automatically think of a person who greatly disrespected me in the past, then feel the extra drive and pulse coming straight from the heart. Likewise, while running the last miles of a marathon, I became angry against the race organizers—for reasons that seem silly in retrospect, but it actually helped me to maintain the proper pace until the end line.

2. Need some heat?

Anger makes us hot, in the proper, physical sense. If you get really angry at something, even if you manage not to express it by words, you will feel a new heat growing into your body, perhaps making you red-faced. This can be useful in any situation when you actually need some heat.

For example, taking cold showers brings a variety of health benefits, including increased energy during the day, more resistance to cold in general and an increased testosterone, but is also really difficult if you are not accustomed to cold water. When I started taking cold showers, I quickly noticed that an extra dose of heat from the inside was necessary to withstand the thermal shock, and started to do some black metal-style singing to help awake the “inner fire.” This is not as silly as it may sound. Black metal-style singing is a surrogate of real anger, and it works even better when associated to real anger on the moment. So, summoning some bad memories and growling about them actually helped me to generate heat when needed and get past the initial thermal shock of cold water.

3. Present threats

When someone is actually threatening you, whether physically or for example by attacking your reputation, anger is a normal and spontaneous answer. The difficulty lies in modulating the externalization of anger as to express it in just the right way.

Sometimes looking at the other guy in the eyes and speaking with a slower, deeper voice does the job. Sometimes doing a coarse joke about a shameful flaw the attacker has is enough to dispel any stain from your reputation. Sometimes you have no other solution than punching hard—and perhaps running straight after. Just like when you are gaming a girl, the key consists in modulating, which implies an awareness of the situation. This is something one gains by experience, and here as always, anger ought to stimulate and perhaps determine what you look at, but ought not to compel you into doing something you might regret later.

4. Improving in arts and sports

Ever been shamed or ridiculed by a teacher, a trainer or some other specific field-related authority telling you that “you will never do [whatever practice] correctly, you lack the potential”? This kind of psychological blow usually results in two types of consequences: either you disengage from said field, feeling that dwelling in it would be a waste of time and energy, or you work twice harder to grow genuine abilities in the field and show the teacher wrong. In the latter case, you are usually angered against the teacher who rejects you and are motivated by the idea of growing such abilities that he will be forced to give you due recognition.

Now, if the teacher is really disagreeable and maintains a harshly critical attitude against his student, simply staying in the course might be an ordeal. But in the end, whether you succeed at obtaining final recognition or not, if you manage to better yourself in the field and/or maintain calm under a heavier pressure, you win.

5. Creativity

Some emotions are good at inspiring works of art. Many of these emotions are not agreeable and compel one into using art as a way to express them without getting (too) obnoxious. A lot of poems deal with inaccessible girls, tragic love stories, and so on. The motivational role of basically negative emotions is implicitly recognized into the dictum “stay hungry, stay foolish”—if you are too content with what you have, you won’t be motivated into having more or better.

Likewise, emotions that can be channeled into drive can also be used to fuel a work of art. How many rappers became so and blamed whatever they were angry at—often, but not only, the police—in their lyrics?

6. In-group solidarity and group longevity

This applies when the anger is not yours alone, but shared by a group of like-minded people you belong to. When shared, anger can fuel solidarity, motivating the like-minded to help each other. The basic condition for this to work is that everyone must remain in agreement on what to be angry at.

Groups that managed to use this feature of anger to survive, as it tightened the social bonding between their members and reduced individualism, might be found amongst the Jews. As the specialist of Judaism Kevin MacDonald put it,

> Non-Jews have a difficult time fathoming Jewish communal memory. For strongly identified Jews, the "vilely discriminatory" actions of immigration restrictionists are part of the lachrymose history of the Jewish people. Immigration restriction from 1924–1965 is in the same category as the Roman destruction of the Temple in 70 A.D., the marauding Crusaders of the Middle Ages, the horrors of the Inquisition, the evil of the Russian Czar, and the rationally incomprehensible calamity of Nazism. These events are not just images drawn from the dustbin of history. They are deeply felt images and potent motivators of contemporary behavior. (Culture of Critique, p.x)

After all, is there anything better than negative emotions targeting non-members of the group, or a specific enemy group, to maintain the cohesion of one's group? This trick seems to have been (perhaps subconsciously) used by Jews since long ago.

7. Politics

Shared anger works well in politics too. A dictum says that politics are mostly fueled by greed and envy, which might be a bit simplistic but certainly not far from the truth. During the eighteenth century, the English Whig party already had the upper hand over its Tory counterpart, and the Whigs were way more prone to political anger: they easily accused the Tories of being “traitorous,” “antipatriotic” or “against liberty”—which was one of their main totem poles—whereas the latter tended to submit or negotiate. Today, one can notice the same phenomenon, as the self-righteous cultural Left always pushes its agenda farther while the conservative establishment keeps bowing as long as its own income keeps coming.

SJWs are the prime users of political anger and self-righteousness. They will do anything out of mob mentality and hatred against “straight white males.” Notice in passing the Left’s double standard: for decades, it stirred anger at selected audiences—workers through “class struggle” and “class oppression,” later so-called “minorities” through identity politics—by constantly repeating a narrative where said audiences happen to be unfairly oppressed, but attack us if we show the least sign of anger.

8. Memories

Memories that are associated with anger tend to remain alive much longer than emotionally neutral ones. This feature of the human mind is used by groups that maintain a collective identity through a narrative where they play the role of a formerly persecuted minority. Their memories, even if more constructed than genuine, remain alive for a very long time, and can do so for centuries.

Men of ability who keep resenting their past tend to both remember it fondly and derive from said memory a constant sense of drive to succeed more and more. In a sense, traumatic, angering memories may show useful, whether we extract valuable lessons or maintain a sense of drive out of them: whoever has them might be advantaged, but should also be wary of not ending up consumed by them.
