As disagreeable as it may be, anger is also a source of motivation, drive, and physical heat. If sublimated and channeled appropriately, it can give us exactly what we need to succeed. If shared, it can help to bond and express solidarity with like-minded fellows. Alas, if it overflows beyond the borders of publicly acceptable behavior or over petty objects, anger can also backfire and burn us more than anyone or anything else.

The double-edged nature of anger has long been used against us. The “far right” is basically nothing else than a Leftist labeling, used to finger point specific people, views, facts… as deserving public condemnation without reflection. For long, whites have been fleeing and bowing when they were threatened by labels such as “far righters,” “racists” and so on, out of fear to be the next victims of SJW anger and other whites’ cowardice. Conversely, the Left that uses SJW and “minority” anger against us loves to provoke us into getting publicly angry in order to represent us as negative and obnoxious.

It is time for us to outsmart whoever wants us shattered by making an intelligent use of our emotions. This applies both to our individual, personal lives, and to pan-masculine and pan-European solidarity. It is okay, fair, and even necessary to be at least minimally angry at the present world order. The pseudo-wise withdrawal from the world is often not much more than a legitimization of cowardice.

As long as neomasculinity does not have the upper hand, long live the “angry white male”! Just be careful to remain on top of your anger, as a rider on his horse, and never the opposite: if you don’t master your own anger, someone else will, and he will quickly turn it against you.

Read More: 30 Facebook Pictures That Confirm Red Pill Truths

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

7 Reasons Why A Male Cheater Is Better Than A Female Cheater

June 25, 2016 | by Nicholas Jack | Link | Original Link

Now, before I go any further, I want to make one thing clear. If you are in a committed relationship, even as a man, you have basically given your word to be with one woman. You have given your word and you should not cheat. However, human beings are not perfect and, if you do end up messing up and cheating on your girlfriend, you should be forgiven MUCH easier than if she were to sleep with another guy. Women will be screaming “sexist!”, but it’s not sexist, it’s just common sense and science. I want men and women to clearly understand why men should be forgiven for cheating before women. So, here you are, 7 reasons why a male cheater is better than a female cheater.

1. Sperm is cheaper than eggs

My first reason goes back to evolutionary science. First, understand that women create one egg nearly every month compared to men who create millions of sperm cells every day. Then, to multiply this affect ten fold, understand that once an egg is fertilized, it remains growing in the woman's body for 9 months. Then, the woman will most likely end up raising the kid for the next 18+ years of her life.

This is why women are much more selective with whom they sleep with. It is a woman's biological job to make sure that the man who fucks with the next 18 years of her life has the highest possible value that she could possibly obtain.

Now, if you look at men, who have MUCH less biological responsibility. It makes sense why their brains are wired to think about pussy all the time and chase after it all the time. It doesn't matter if the girl they sleep with is high value, because he will just make another couple million sperm cells the next day.

For an example of this, talk to a sexually active gay guy in a big city. You shouldn't be suprized to hear that his number of sexual partners is in the quadruple digits! Check out this quote from a study about gay men's sexual habits:

> 28% of homosexual men had more than 1000 partners – Link

That's right, according to this study:

"83% of the homosexual men surveyed estimated they had had sex with 50 or more partners in their lifetime, 43% estimated they had sex with 500 or more partners; 28% with 1,000 or more partners."

That is what happens when sex can be obtained easily by men, we really can't help but go for it. In the world of straight men, you can't just go talk to any girl you want and have a very good chance of sleeping with them because, even if they are attracted to you, sleeping with you could mean the end of their freedom for the next 18 years of their lives and the end of their youth. So they make obtaining sex much more difficult as they make sure you are a suitable sperm donor, all this subconsciously of course.

This is what causes men to have difficulty in monogamous relationships and this my first reason why women should be a bit more understanding if their boyfriend cheats on them. Backed by science.

2. Guys don’t get pregnant, girls get pregnant

I have previously mentioned pregnancy affecting women, much more than men, but my next reason has everything to do with this principal. If a girl cheats on her boyfriend, then get’s pregnant by that guy, no man with any self respect would ever accept raising the child of the man whom his girlfriend was fucking behind his back. Relationship over.

If a guy cheats on his girlfriend and gets that girl pregnant, the affect is not nearly is strong. If he is still in love with his girlfriend, it would be very dumb to try to start a relationship with the baby mama just because she is pregnant. It would, of course, lead to unhappy lives for the guy, the baby mama and the baby. If a guy messes up he may end up helping to financially support the kid and being a father figure to. In comparison to the necessity of having a mom (breast feeding and nurturing), the couple’s life would be affected much less by the guy getting a girl pregnant than the other way around.

3. Guys naturally desire multiple women

One thing that is very obvious is that it is much harder for men to have a monogamous relationship than it is for women. This was obvious to me in my church growing up (I grew up Mormon), where guys would leave the church much more often than women because abstaining from sex is so difficult.

Guys crave variety. They have this unending amount of sperm cells and their biology is telling them not to let them go to waste. Women's eggs, on the other hand, are telling the women to find the perfect guy to make the perfect child and help the child survive. Those are two VERY different messages being sent. It also goes to suggest that women will cheat mostly with guys they find more attractive than their current partner.

Men, on the other hand, can cheat with girls who they find less attractive than their partner. This is because the feeling of sleeping with a new girl is one of the most addicting feelings on the planet. My thoughts on it:

> The feeling of sleeping with a new girl is one of the most magical feelings on the planet. The whole process is a rush. You go and see a beautiful girl, you may imagine what she looks like undressed and you begin to start desiring her. She is the same temptation that a Christmas present is to a small child. Anything could be underneath the wrapping.
>
> When you are with this new girl, and you are carried by your hormones, everything else beyond sex with her loses it's importance. Every moment you feel good and excited. Desire clouds your mind and your focus is geared only towards your goal of sleeping with this girl.
>
> Once you finally sleep with this girl, the satisfaction is anywhere from so-so, to amazing. However, the process of desire is always the same and it's very strong. It's like gambling because sometimes it turns out to be amazing sex and you > hope you can find that again or maybe… better.

>
> The problem with us as men, is that when you sleep with that girl a second time, a huge percentage of that excitement is gone. The only way to get it back is to sleep with a new girl.

Women, don't get this special feeling from sleeping with a new guy, they don't feel this constant pull. Women don't understand that men constantly have this temptation all around them.

If you look at married couples who are "in love" you will also notice that the man will look at pornography. This has become accepted in our society, but basically he is mentally cheating on his wife. The reason it's accepted is because it is just too much to ask that a man only be sexually stimulated by one girl for such a long period of time. His body craves as many new girls as he could possibly have a day. Most guys who masturbate don't just pick one girl a session to masturbate to, they pick multiple and sometimes hundreds.

So, yes a man's desire to sleep with new partners is much stronger than a woman's and this is another reason they should be more easily forgiven for being a cheater.

4. Guys have a MUCH higher sex drive

It's just quite obvious to people with common sense that men, on average, have a much higher sex drive. There are nymphos out there who's desire for cock is unfathomable, but this is a very small percentage of women. And, if you are dumb enough to start a relationship with a nympho, you should have known going in that the chances of her cheating on you are in the 99% range. But the 2% of nymphos aside, men have a MUCH higher sex drive than women.

Don't believe me? Let's ask science.

> After months of reading and compiling results, the answer was clear. There is a substantial difference, and men have a much stronger sex drive than women.
> – Link here.

Check out that link and read that "men have a much stronger sex drive than women." One thing he points to is the frequency of masturbation of men. It is much more common than women and it is done by a much higher percentage of men than women. This goes to suggest that desire for sex is much higher among men.

Women may respond that men can just masturbate when they are feeling horny, so they can't use being horny as an excuse. I wish it were that simple, a commenter "Hey Ladies" answers this best when he said

> "Masturbating temporarily removes the physical desire (which is uncontrollable) but does not remove psychological desire (which is always present)."

You can read his complete comment at the bottom of the article.

Another obvious indicator of men's much higher sex drive is the prostitution industry. Only men are willing to spend trillions of dollars each year to pay somebody to have sex with them. Arguing that women and men have a similar sex drive is just ridiculous.

Men want sex more and they want it more often. This is another reason why men should be forgiven for cheating much easier than women.

5. It's MUCH harder for a guy to turn down sex than it is for a girl

This next reason ties in with guys having a much higher sex drive from my last reason, but I want to make the point that it is much more difficult for a man to turn down sex than it is for a woman.

First, you should look at how often women go throughout life turning down men for sex. How often do they do this? For an attractive girl they do this every day and this is before ever starting a committed relationship. As the author of The Key Logger, I got to see this first hand. The amount of sex the girls turned down before our relationships had started was just astounding. Women do not have to make any changes to themselves to keep turning down sex, but men do. It is MUCH more difficult.

Let me explain to you guys how it feels when I am horny and an attractive girl shows her obvious interest in something with me:

I glimpse her body and feel nothing, but strong desire. Tunnel vision makes everything else in the world disappear. I start to actually feel a sensation of being drunk. Your body is telling you that, more than anything in the world in this moment, you want to sleep with this girl in front of You. You feel an insanely strong desire for sex, desperate even.

Then, once you have sex, those strong hormones leave your body and you feel normal again. In that moment, you might realize you didn't desire this girl as much as you thought. If you have a girlfriend, you might start to feel guilty and start thinking about her. Then, you will just want the girl you just slept with to leave.

This feeling is probably the most intense thing I can remember ever feeling. The temptation caused by such a powerful feeling is something women can never understand, but it doesn't mean it's not reality.

6. Only higher value guys have the options to cheat

I don't want to hate on lower value guys, but a lower value guy (guy who rarely gets laid) who brags about being faithful to a girl, is like a man trapped on a deserted island bragging about quitting smoking. These guys just don't have the opportunities to be a cheater. On the other hand, when you are a successful, attractive man and you have young, attractive girls throwing themselves at you, staying faithful is at a whole other level of difficulty.

A reality of dating in the 21st century is that the top 10% of men enjoy sex with the top

75% of women. The men below this 10% can still have access to the top 75% of women, but they have to put in MUCH more work. This means that if the boyfriend falls in that top 10% of men category, he has 75% of women competing for him to fertilize their eggs (subconsciously of course). I can't tell you how difficult it is to ignore their advances, when you take into account the previous 5 reasons, but i'll try… it's very fucking difficult.

Most of this 75% of girls make it much easier for these top 10% to sleep with them. Let's look at what would happen if there weren't women deciding who they will and will not sleep with, instead people just had sex with people they are attracted to. It just so happens there is a group of people where this is the case… gays. When you look at gay relationships, check out this nugget:

> There is an extremely low rate of sexual fidelity among homosexual men as compared to married heterosexuals. Among married females 85% reported sexual fidelity. Among married men, 75.5% reported sexual fidelity. Among homosexual males in their current relationship, 4.5% reported sexual fidelity.
> – Link

Only 4.5% of gay men reported sexual fidelity. That's because when almost every person you find attractive, is willing to sleep with you, fidelity becomes much more difficult. This is what happens when your boyfriend is a higher value guy, the girls who he finds attractive are most likely willing to sleep with him.

So, if your boyfriend is one of these top 10% and cheats on you, at the very least you know that he had it a lot more difficult than a lower value guy had it. If he cheats on you, at least you know you are dating a guy who can actually get another girl. I know that alone won't make a hurt girl feel better, but maybe it will help.

7. Guys can keep feelings out of the bedroom

One of the biggest reasons why a boyfriend should be forgiven for being a cheater much easier than a girlfriend is because men can have sex without any feelings. It's one of the reasons why men get a bad rap, but men usually have very little emotional feelings towards girls they sleep with. This is bad news for girls looking for a guy, but great news for girls in relationships because it means that there is a good chance that the girl her boyfriend cheated on her with means very little to him. He just feels a strong sexual attraction and desire for variety. All natural feelings.

On the other hand, when a woman sleeps with a man she usually already has feelings towards him. If she doesn't have feelings for him, these feelings usually develop.

This is because contraception only became popular in the past 100 years and our feelings come from instincts millions of years old. So, when a woman sleeps with a man, she subconsciously accepts that she could become pregnant by this man and carry a piece of him for the rest of her life. This is why women can't help, but start to have feelings for a guy she is having sex with and this is why the balance of the relationship almost always changes once sex happens. It's generally when the girl becomes attached.

For the relationship, this is as bad as it could be because not only is the guy's girlfriend cheating on him sexually, but she is also cheating on him emotionally. Which, in my opinion, is much worse. And the chances of having feelings destroying the relationship is much higher than sexual attraction destroying the relationship.

Why men should be forgiven for cheating

To be honest, I don't see even one way that makes it more acceptable for a woman to be a cheater than a man. I know that it is considered the same in our society when a man cheats on a woman than when a woman cheats on a man, but it's ridiculous. They aren't even close to the same thing because they affect the relationship very differently. Imagine the heartbreak and disrespect a man would feel after spending decades raising a child only to give blood and learn that he has been raising and putting all his emotions and resources into another man's flesh and blood. Women (because they are the ones who get pregnant) never have to worry about this.

If you are a guy and care about your girlfriend, but end up messing up and sleeping with another girl, you aren't a bad person. You fucked up, but it should not be treated nearly as seriously as her cheating on you. The relationship shouldn't end because of this and, if she does end it because of this, it's because she doesn't understand or doesn't have strong enough feelings for you.

If a guy cheats it doesn't mean he doesn't love his girlfriend, it means he has nearly uncontrollable urges all the time and he was given an opportunity for sex that he wasn't able to turn down. Girlfriends breaking up with their boyfriends for this is just not logical.

I will end with an amazing comment left on Swoop The World

Now I will leave you guys who want more info on the subject with a comment from "Hey Ladies" in the Article How to Bang 3 Philippine Women a Day where he responds to somebody hating on the fact Fisto slept with so many girls. Excellent comment.

> Annihilating your argument is actually quite simple.
>
> You said yourself you don't understand what satisfaction we get from these "loathsome" acts. That's because you aren't a man, and to us these aren't "loathsome" acts.
>
> No, we can't be satisfied with fapping, duh. If we could then we wouldn't be putting in all of this work.
>
> Psychological stimulation is important for men during sex too. If it wasn't, then every man would only fap and not have sex. If any man had the choice, he would rather have sex with almost ANY woman than fap by himself. The only reason men fap instead of having sex is that it takes less work and temporarily removes the physical desire (which is uncontrollable), but does NOT remove the psychological desire (which is also always present). Men who are highly sexed are happier than men who aren't, and that's because they are satisfying this basic psychological desire that ALL men have. Many men will admittedly say that the physical sensation from masturbating is actually better than when having sex.. but the PSYCHOLOGICAL stimulation is so powerful that sex with a hot woman beats masturbation, every time.
>
> For the men who don't want a committed relationship, sex with multiple women is the only way to satisfy this most basic and powerful of male physical AND psychological desires.
>
> There are many reasons some men might not want a committed relationship. He might still crave variety (which is how men are naturally programmed, I'm sure you know that). He might not be at a point in his life that he's ready to take on > the responsibility of supporting another woman (many young men are in this kind of situation), or a FAMILY. Many men also just do not trust people, especially not women (and not without justifiable reasons), so why invite one into your private life? Men know also that a committed relationship with any woman in our modern world means that marriage is inevitable. Many smart and rational men with business sense (non romantic type men) know that marriage is a bad business decision, so they decide to just forget about relationships completely (or lead women on in a relationship knowing in the back of his mind that it won't last) because they know what they lead to – marriage. If this kind of man has the time and money to get sex from a variety of women to satisfy his most basic psychological and physical desire, then he probably will. If he has money, he might pay for it. If he doesn't (like most men), but he has the valuable currency known as time, then he will employ "game" tactics like the ones mentioned in this article to get these women into bed for cheap/free.

>
> There are many other reasons why many men wouldn't want a committed relationship, but I think you get the idea. And these men aren't bad. You have no right to judge any of them. You don't know their stories. You don't know their current situations. And finally, if you want to blame someone, then blame God for making men and women the way they are (if you believe in God, I don't).
>
> It's just life. Life isn't fair. It's not fair that a man should have to choose one woman and deny his urge for variation, because society propagates marriage in a serious committed relationship, and people just eat that shit up. Which forces men who don't want marriage to mislead some women who want marriage in order to get them in bed. That's just one example of how the inherent unfairness of life fucks everything up and causes men and women to disrespect and lie to each other. I could go on about this subject forever…
>
> And I hope you understand now why men can't just fap and be happy to make you happy.
>
> The world doesn't revolve around our whimsical wishes.
>
> And I hope you understand men a bit better now.

Read Next: The 7 Most Common Lies Women Tell in a Relationship

Nicholas Jack
AKA 20Nation. Join me on my adventures around the world as I bang my way through the local women by going to SwoopTheWorld.com. I've been doing this for the last half decade so there is tons of content. You can now get all my books for 60% off here.

Nicholas Jack the author.

How To Improve Your Situational Awareness From One Minute Of Effort Per Day

June 26, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

My job here at Return Of Kings entails teaching you how to improve yourself in physical terms—teaching proper nutrition, exercise techniques, and training regimens. However, the muscles and adipose cells are just two parts of the entity that is you that are capable of training and being made better than they were naturally made.

Many people in this side of the internet advocate things such as meditation as a method of training mind, body and spirit. While I am not as of yet versed in this subject (I'm planning on learning how to meditate at some undisclosed point in my life), I am familiar with a specific kind of mental training—more specifically, a method of training the eyes to "grab" more information than the average man, to train the mind to retain that information, and to train the entire body to have more situational awareness.

This idea has been posited by many people before-such as Bruce Lee in his Tao of Jeet Kune Do advocating "practice in concentrated seeing"—but the method that is most commonly used, including by spies and special forces soldiers to this day, is the time-tested "Kim's Game"

Typing in “Kim Cover” on Google gets you a lot of Kim Kardashian’s giant Photoshopped ass, and surprisingly little of this classic of English literature

A Literature Lesson

The game has existed for centuries, but the name of it that I am using is taken from the famous Rudyard Kipling novel Kim, in which the game is referred to as the “Jewel Game.” Set in the time of the “Great Game” (that game being imperialism around the Subcontinent and Central Asia) between Great Britain and Tsarist Russia, young Kimball O’Hara is drafted into being a spy for the British Empire by a Sahib who puts up a front of being a jeweler.

Early on in his spy training, Kim and the Sahib’s Indian servant are called into play what the spymaster refers to as the “Jewel Game”: the sahib takes 15-20 jewels and lays them out on a towel, has the two young men look at the jewels for exactly one minute, and then covers them up. He then challenges them to name how many stones there were, their locations, and give any further description they could be capable of giving.

The Indian servant is capable of naming all of the stones under the towel, and name the locations of all of the stones, while the eponymous character struggles and is incapable of accurately naming the locations or colors of any of the gems in questions. Protesting that the servant would be more familiar with the objects than him, Kim demands that the game be replayed, using a randomly chosen assortment of objects rather than gems. To nobody’s surprise—certainly not the reader’s—he loses this one as well.

Having been humbled, the young bravo decides to undergo tutelage in the arts of espionage with the Sahib, vigorously practicing over the course of two weeks to develop his powers of observation and situational awareness.

KIM GAME EXERCISE

NAME: BAILEY, WILLIAM DATE 7 APR 93

ROS # 06

TEAM # A

KIMS GAME # G-1

SCORE _____

	SIZE	SHAPE	COLOR	CONDITION	APPEARS TO BE
1	1"×8"×1"		BLACK/GRAY	SERV	STAPLER
2	1/2"×2"×1/4"		GOLD	SERV	MISC-SPECIAL BAG
3	4"×8"×5"		CAMO	SERV	BDU CAP
4	10"×3"×9"		BLACK	SERV	JUNGLE BOOT
5	2"×12"×4"		BLACK	SERV	PVS-4
6	1/8"×1"×1/8"		BLACK	UNSERV	E-5 PIN ON
7	1/4"×1"×1"		TAN	SERV	EARPLUG CASE
8	2"×2"×6"		GREEN	UNSERV	COMPASS
9	3"×2"×8"		GREEN	SERV	AMMO POUCH
10	2"×1/4"×50"		GREEN	UNSERV	PISTOL BELT

Figure 9-5. Example of suggested format for KIM game exercise score sheet.

How To Play

The game is best played with two people, if only for the competitive atmosphere forcing the two opponents to work harder at developing their skills, but you can sufficiently play the game by yourself.

The easiest way to do it is exactly like Kipling stated: Take a small handful of objects (I would start with 10 or so), and place them on a towel or some other flat surface. Intently stare at the assortment of objects for a minute, and then cover it up. Try to remember and recite what objects were in what locations, and then uncover them and check whether you were correct or not.

Personally, I would recommend keeping a pen and paper offhand, for you to record your progress. Write down the “contents” of the game before you begin playing, and then write down the guesses of objects that you made. Once you have completely mastered the array of objects, and are capable of naming all of the objects and their locations, you can be said to have “won” the game.

From here, you can make the game more challenging by increasing the amount of objects in the array, and decreasing the amount of time that you spend studying the assortment of objects.

Alternatively, there are many static images of the Kim’s Game that you can find on the internet, such as the one below courtesy of the Art of Manliness:

These are just as good as the regular game, and more convenient for those with a limited amount of space. For a real challenge, dig up a “Where’s Waldo” picture from your childhood and try to use that in the Kim’s game.

And most importantly, remember that, much like training your body, training the eyes and mind is a process that varies in length for everybody—some people will be naturals at it, while the vast majority of us (myself included) will have to struggle to make gains in the field. But they can be accomplished. I myself can vouch for training myself in “concentrated seeing” and improving my sense of situational awareness (to be fair, I was a pretty dumb child and teenager, so it’s not hard to improve that).

As Lurgan Sahib said, improvement can only come “by doing it many times over until it is done perfect—for it is worth doing”

Read More: How To Increase Your Sexual Prospects Before Even Using Game

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

3 Reasons For The Downfall Of Mainstream Journalism

June 26, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

As I'm reading Roosh's new book Free Speech Isn't Free, it strikes me how complicit the mainstream media (especially in Canada) was in spreading SJW lies about his speaking tour. Newspapers and TV news broadcasts practically worked as mouthpieces for the rabid feminists trying to shut down the lectures.

After the outrage over the international meet-ups we were trying to organize earlier this year, I did an analysis of the mainstream media's coverage. Swedish feminists went nuts when they they discovered that a "pro-rape rally" was being held in Stockholm. As you would expect, the media went along with their side of the story.

Out of the 20 articles I could find regarding the meet-ups, from six different outlets, 15 contained the false claim that Roosh wants to legalize rape. Ten articles had the claim in the headline, front and center. In seven articles, Roosh is described as a misogynist, and several more say there's something wrong with his view of women. Consequently, SJWs on social media expressed their wish to assault, rape and kill Roosh (they also thought he was coming to Stockholm in person).

So why did this happen? Why did formerly respectable news outlets stoop to spreading lies propagated by mentally unstable women and manginas hell-bent on destroying masculinity and men in general? I see at least three reasons for it: a failing business model, tabloidization and leftist bias.

1. Failing business model

Good journalism, like everything else, costs money. But fewer and fewer are willing to pay for it.

It's well known that the newspaper business is going through a crisis at the moment. You hear about big media companies laying off hundreds of journalists, trying to adjust to a new era where people can get their news for free on the Internet.

The negative trend has been ongoing for years, but 2015 was particularly bad for newspapers, according to Pew Research Center. Weekday circulation fell 7 percent and Sunday circulation fell 4 percent. Advertising revenue fell by nearly 8 percent, the greatest drop since 2009. The share of revenue from digital advertising is increasing, but only because the revenue from non-digital advertising is diminishing so fast. What the news media earn from their websites is not enough to cover what they lose on print.

The newspaper workforce has shrunk by 39 percent in the last 20 years. These numbers are only for the US, but the trend is similar all over the West. What this means is that fewer journalists have to do more work. The pressure of publishing the latest news online as fast as possible also means that little time can be spent on fact checking, or even getting out of the newsroom to do interviews and research.

In the case of the meet-up outrage, reporters clearly didn't bother to do more than a rewrite of what their colleagues wrote. For instance, Swedish media referenced British The Telegraph and Australian ABC. That way, the same lies were copy-pasted onto news sites all over the world. With less pressure to churn out articles at high speed, the reporters might have done their homework better.

2. Tabloidization

In times of dwindling readership, what do you do to gain more readers? You give them what you think they want.

A short definition of tabloidization can be found in an article on the subject by media scholar Frank Esser: “a downgrading of hard news and upgrading of sex, scandal and infotainment.” Apart from a decrease in journalistic standards, tabloidization entails an increase in soft news like scandal, sensation and entertainment.

To get advertisers interested in your particular news outlet, you need to reach a large audience. Taking a quote from Esser’s article: “Competition and the pressure to find stories sensational enough to make papers walk off newsagents’ counters encourage invention, exaggerations and the invasion of privacy.” In the digital age, it’s about getting views and shares. But the same rule applies as it has for more than a hundred years of tabloid press; you make up BS to get people’s attention.

A story about a man traveling around the world to lecture men about the benefits of raping women, is something that people are going to read. Never mind that it’s not true, and that you’re violating fundamental journalistic standards by spreading lies—you need readers and will do anything to get them.

3. Leftist bias

Probably the biggest and most obvious reason for the media’s reaction, is the fact that journalists in general are very left-leaning. There’s no real ideological difference between most journalists and SJW activists, they just put different labels on themselves.

One study of American media, both newspapers and TV news programs, showed that most of them have a liberal bias. Wall Street Journal was the most liberal, while Fox News was one of few outlets that actually leaned to the right.

There's a problem in Sweden as well with the mainstream media consistently framing news stories in a leftist way. As I showed above, a majority of the outlets chose to portray Roosh as a rape propagandist, not even attempting to appear the least neutral.

Several studies where journalists were asked about which party they would vote for, confirms the leftist slant. The results showed that 63.3 percent sympathized with one of the three major left-wing parties, compared to 47.2 percent of the general population. While I'm not at all surprised, it's nice to have some proof of what I already knew to be true.

Roosh and his neomasculine philosophy is a problem for these people. Actually, the truth in general is a problem for them. So they have to distort the facts in any way they can, and demonize those men who refuse to go along with their Marxist agenda.

I can't imagine how much worse the situation would be if we didn't have the Internet to communicate with each other.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The "Drunk Girl In Public" Scandal Makes Both Feminists And The Mainstream Media Look Foolish

John Hydenius

John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

Anti-fascist Protesters Try To Shut Down Neo-Nazi Rally In California, Get Stabbed

June 27, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via the Sacramento Bee:

A rally by a small group of neo-Nazi demonstrators at the state Capitol on Sunday erupted into a violent clash with protesters that left at least 10 people injured – five of them stabbed – and closed down streets as more than 100 police in riot gear and on horseback intervened to halt the mayhem.

Demonstrators battled with sticks, protest signs and other weapons as the Traditionalist Worker Party group – which said it wanted to assist supporters of presumptive Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump – began setting up for a scheduled noon rally on the west steps of the Capitol.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=niJsxXbYdc4

Even before the event began, clashes broke out at numerous locations around the Capitol grounds among the 400 people gathered for and against the rally, which had been heavily promoted – and denounced – in recent days on various websites. Injuries were reported on both sides of the altercation.

“We had some pretty dynamic and chaotic situations,” said Sacramento Fire Department spokesman Chris Harvey, who arrived as a public information officer and quickly found himself working as a paramedic.

“We had a number of times where we had a patient on the ground and crews were trying to do triage and take care of them and the chaos was enveloping them. They were surrounded by the CHP and police officers just trying to keep the general surge of people away.”

Witnesses said the violence erupted at different locations around the Capitol grounds, hindering the initial law enforcement response as confrontations began before the event was scheduled to start.

The first sign of violence came just before 11 a.m., when KCRA reporter Mike Luery and his cameraman were caught in an altercation with anti-fascist protesters shouting “no cameras” and demanding they leave.

“We’re not causing the problem; your belligerent people are causing the problem,” Luery told the crowd before someone knocked his mike from his hand and others tried to grab the camera. The pair were eventually shoved out of the crowd and crossed the street away from the protesters.

Damion Osborne, a Sacramento community activist who came out to join the anti-Nazi protesters Sunday, said more trouble erupted about 11:20 a.m. when a neo-Nazi with a stick, a sign and shirt with a swastika and the words “White Power” approached the crowd.

“He dodged a bottle and then a rock, then someone broke a rock over his back,” said Osborne, 26. “The organizer said, ‘Stop, let him speak.’

“Then some folks came up to take his sign away and he wouldn’t let go, so a girl from the anti-racist side punched him. As soon as he was getting beat down, the cops came and grabbed him and started shooting rubber pellets.”

By 11:40, an African American man had been stabbed in the left arm, and police formed a circle around him as he lay on the ground being attended to by Andrea Combs, a medical assistant from Sacramento who was part of the protests.

“He’s 25, he’s from Carson City, his name is Nate,” said Combs, 43. “The Nazis are after the black people. I saw the second stabbing victim drop, too.”

Sean Moore, 23, of Sacramento was bleeding heavily from his right side just above his thigh, and bystanders said he was part of the anti-Nazi protest.

By 3 p.m., officials said the total number of injured was at eight, including five people who had been stabbed. Three of them were considered in serious condition and officials said one victim left the scene in his car, then called for an ambulance from his home near 65th Street and Fruitridge Road.

Read the entire article

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Don’t Miss: Mexican Protesters Attack Trump Supporters In San Jose While Police Stand Down

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

8 Factors That Are Destroying Healthy Relationships Between Men And Women

June 27, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Most men, even if they're still swimming in ocean of blue pills, have some awareness that something has gone awry with the relationship between men and women. Statistics prove this as well as divorce has been epidemic for a while now with record-number of children growing up with single parent around the world while young people are having less sex than before. And whether you be a feminist or part of the manosphere, I think both sides can agree on one thing: that a war between the sexes have been heating up in the recent years.

Why is all this happening? While men and women tend to play the blame game to avoid taking any responsibility, there are greater forces at play. The fact is, the continuing transformation of our society is making the antagonism between the sexes inevitable. Feminism is just a symptom, not the cause of our problems.

Before we look at why today's sex relations are in a dismal state, consider the single factor that makes relationships prosper: Mutuality based on different but compatible roles.

All relationships work best when two parties have something different to share for their mutual benefit. For example, humans and horses have enjoyed a close relationship together throughout history (unlike, say, humans and bears). The relationship works because in exchange for food, protection, and care that humans provide, the horses offer themselves as transportation.

The relationship between men and women was also mutually beneficial for the entirety of human existence with men offering their services in exchange for having the women bear their children. But now, with the advent of modern society and its conditions, things have changed drastically.

1. "Equality"

At least these men had their male privilege.

“Equality” for women is the most abominable lie to have ever perpetuated on mankind.

Men have always provided for women. Men hunted for food, labored to build everything, and fought battles to defend their tribe. To say that men oppressed women throughout history is an insult to all those who sacrificed themselves in the factories, the coal mines, and the trenches. If women didn’t have certain rights that feminists like to cherry-pick, it’s because women weren’t drafted to fight wars. In exchange for their toil, the only thing men asked of women was to be supportive in their roles as wives and mothers.

But fast-forward to today, now that women have “achieved” social and political “equality” and even various advantages just for being born a female, many women today no longer feel that it’s necessary to exchange values with men for mutuality. It’s like when humans developed automobiles and didn’t need horses anymore. The difference is, humans and horses don’t need to be together; men and women do.

However, men’s sexual desire—which is greater than that of females—is still alive and kicking. So what we have today is a situation where women have gotten their social equality while sexual inequality persists for men (which is why many men choose to give up sex entirely to level the playing field). This is what happens when you standardize human beings into economic units.

2. Education and career over family

Stressed out from balancing between work and family? Yup, it's the men's fault that you tried to do both.

To maintain their advantage over men, women today are dedicating themselves to their education and career. Western women, in particular, have been so thoroughly sold on the idea of status and consumerist orgy that they are no longer interested in relationships. More and more women today are delaying marriage (if not outright rejecting it). And when they do get married, they are using it as a means to trap men into donating their sperm and cash, only to bail out when they want to.

3. Slut culture

Wow, what an achievement! I’m sure your failed parents are just as proud.

The advent of contraception and the decimation of whatever feminine decency that was left has turned the vast majority of young Western women into drunken sluts. The increasing number of sluts is diminishing the availability of quality women that men want to start a family with and has social implications for the society as a whole.

4. Government supplanting men

The only way women were able to “liberate” themselves from their supposed oppressors was by latching themselves on to a new alpha provider: the government. As said before, men form relationships with women by exchanging values, with his strength to provide and protect being his greatest asset. But now, the government (along with corporations and education system) fulfills those roles that men previously occupied. And not only that, but the government is deeply involved in the affairs of marriage, sending professional white-knights to extort and arrest men who’ve been used up and thrown away by women.

It also doesn’t help that the government is increasingly monopolizing violence, one of the most important value that a man possesses. And that leads to my next point.

5. Too few wars, too many men

I doubt these men had to think of ways to entertain women like a monkey to get their attention.

The recurring theme across patriarchal societies of the past and present are violence and warfare. And the most commonly associated traits of masculinity are also traits of warriors such as strength, bravery, aggression, discipline, and so on. It’s quite simple: the more violent the environment is, the more masculine men become. And the more conflicts and wars there are, the more the women depend on men—thus keeping the collective value of male population high.

It’s no coincidence that Western societies have started to feminize as they endured decades of relative peace since the end of WWII. The lack of warfare also means that there are now more young men per woman (practically 1 to 1) than there normally would have been under a warring society. Excess of men—who are also emasculated and feminized—means that the collective value of average men has dropped to a historical low, upsetting the balance of sexual marketplace in the process. Only the top 5-10% of men with the warrior traits and wealth are able to enjoy a semblance of a balanced relationship with women—and even they have to play the game.

6. The decimation of Western women

Declining marriage rates? Don’t worry, some simps will try to put a ring on their fingers.

Many Western women have been corrupted by our toxic materialist society. They are fatter, uglier, more narcissistic, more entitled, hedonistic, superficial, less faithful, and seem to think that having bitch attitude makes them hip. Women can afford to stoop low because their sex drive isn’t the same as men’s, while they couldn’t care less for love and companionship when they’re too busy with their travels and careers.

And because of all the thirsty men, women’s collective sexual market value hardly suffers while the value of those who are merely average becomes inflated beyond their real value. You only need to check out the gross discrepancies between the sexes in dating sites and apps to see how bad things are.

7. Anti-male culture

Men are all rapists waiting to be hatched out of their facade, men merely uttering a word to a woman is a harassment, men are always “mansplaining” to women, men are insecure cry-babies, men open their legs too much when they sit, men and their toxic masculinity need to be controlled, men have to do more for women, men are dominating in tech fields because of sexism, men shouldn’t say this, men shouldn’t do that, etc, etc… And of course, if men push back, they’re “misogynists.”

And we’re we still wondering why relationships are getting harder to form these days?

8. Lack of shared values

As social beings, we humans need more than economic incentives and passions to form a relationship for a family to prosper. There must be shared values.

With traditional family values under constant attack from all directions, the bonding between males and females have been reduced to mere hook-ups and economic unions. To make matters worse, many from both sides are resorting to predatory behaviors to exploit one another for either money (for women) or sex (for men), augmenting the distrust between the two sexes. Others, who either don't want to play games or have become overtly hostile to the opposite sex, have given up on relationships entirely. This is the end result of atomization and extreme individualism under a system that destroys all values for the sake of economic advancement.

Conclusion

The destruction of sex relationship is having a negative effect on society as a whole and is transforming the demographic landscape of many Western nations. Unlike what the aesthetically-challenged feminists and the man-children crying their own way believe, men and women are not adversaries. You don't have to be a traditionalist to see that the sex relations have gone awry due to the development of modern society and its destructive cultures.

Many Western men have already checked out or gone out to find traditional women elsewhere. But that is merely adapting to the situation; it doesn't solve the problem at a societal level. The continuing antagonism of the sexes will eventually spread around the world. Unless the current course is somehow reversed, we can only wait and see how far the damage will run its course.

Read More: Carl Jung Predicted The Catastrophe Of Modern Gender Relations

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

US Supreme Court Approves Racial Discrimination In College Admissions

June 27, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

In late June, the U.S. Supreme Court issued a 4 to 3 decision confirming that race should be a factor in deciding which students should be admitted to university. This was a somewhat surprise decision, with most pundits predicting that race-based admissions would be seen as clearly illegal.

U of Texas President Gregory Fenves, “thrilled and gratified” by the ruling

The Justices were separated along ideological lines. After David Souter left, the court has no reasonable members; all are ideologues from one side or the other. Justice Kennedy is perhaps the most reasonable centrist remaining. Justice Antonin Scalia recently died, and the US legislature has refused to allow a vote on Obama’s choice to replace him. Additionally, Justice Elena Kagan, an Obama appointee, recused herself because of a conflict of interest (she advocated for race-based admissions when she worked for the Obama administration, and kudos to her for honorably stepping aside). This left the court two votes short of its normal nine members.

In the end, Justice Kennedy was the swing vote. While he never voted to support race-based criteria in his career prior to this case, he was reluctant to completely rule out race as a factor that colleges can consider, and joined Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer, and Sonia Sotomayor in approving racial discrimination by college admissions teams.

Abigail Fisher had challenged UT, who denied her admittance

I do believe there is merit to being exposed to a wide variety of ideas, backgrounds, nationalities, and points of view in college. The college years are when we typically form many opinions about the world, choose our careers, and often build lifelong friendships or marriages. I benefited from a highly ranked campus on the east coast which had students from every state in the nation, as well as many international students.

I still remember tagging along with a hot Egyptian female who invited me to a rave, in my pathetic blue pill days where I completely ignored the brilliant opportunity she provided me, and I have good memories of a Moroccan suitemate who introduced me to different music, food, and culture.

I had friends from several countries, each with varying opinions about the world, differing religions, and plans for the future. Many of the most bizarre or different students made a far more lasting impression on me than if they had just been another “Biff the Frat Boy” character on my hall. So I see the value of diversity, especially in one’s formative years.

Diversity, in fact, is what stimulates me so much about foreign travel, and in large part, forms the appeal of foreign women. It’s why men are driven to “collect flags.”

However, opening the door to racial discrimination is a dangerous thing. When colleges are allowed to racially discriminate, they are allowing factors beyond the control of the student (the color of his or her skin) to become an important factor on whether he or she is an appealing enough candidate to be accepted into a competitive school.

Essentially, this is no different than admitting only abnormally tall or abnormally short students, regardless of their scholastic performance, because then that would create a “diversity of height.”

Not all diversity is valued, only the “right” diversity.

Diversity of ideas can still be achieved through other proxies besides skin color. For example, geographic diversity is a factor already used. A certain percentage of students are typically accepted from that state’s population, with the remainder coming from other states or internationally. And with international students, schools don’t accept only white, English speaking students from, say, England, but instead spread out their international student spots among a variety of countries.

I’m thankful for the social learning I was able to do in college, thanks to being exposed to and interacting with German, Russian, Chinese, Egyptian, and Persian students. And come to think of it, their skin tones did differ considerably from mine, even though they weren’t selected on the basis of their race.

One mental exercise I practice is to turn an argument on its head, and see if it has any merit when completely reversed. Imagine this same story was being reported in the 1960s: “Supreme Court confirms race should be a factor in deciding which students are admitted to college.” The obvious implication would be that whites were trying to preserve their fully white schools, and trying to use the law to prevent any minorities from attending college.

This of course, would be completely unfair and wrong, and the law should have been rightfully stricken down as illegal and bad. So why would it be allowed today, just because the races in question are reversed? Is there something inherently bad about white people (and Asians) that we should limit their access to education? If this is merely an argument that “diversity is good” then the same law which is good today (encouraging diversity) would have been bad in the 1960s (preventing diversity), which makes no sense.

Racism is Never OK

Another argument racial discriminating advocates put forth is that whites must be punished for the crimes of other people who are also white. In the past, white people owned slaves. And in the past those dark people that were owned, suffered and were unable to be economically and physically free. And therefore we must punish people who look the same as those past bad men, in order to make things right. What is ridiculous about this argument, is that it is exactly how racists in the past behaved.

"We got tired of explaining to everybody what 'affirmative action' means."

Racist hateful white men who lynched an innocent black didn't care that he was innocent of whatever crime they accused him of—they simply wanted him punished or killed because he looked like other black men. In other words, the innocent lynched black was judged on the color of his skin and not the content of his character. If racism is wrong, then race based affirmative action is wrong. It's just as wrong as if German Jews were allowed to tattoo crescent moons onto the arms of Christian Germans because their ancestors did bad things to Jews.

Discrimination does not somehow become magically good because the perpetrator becomes the victim. Any basic understanding of the law teaches this. It is no more justified to steal from the town rapist than it is the town preacher. Stealing is wrong, regardless of the circumstances or the background of the person doing the stealing, or the victim.

This supreme court ruling is just another step down the path of lawlessness and racism, sewing seeds of discontent that will likely one day grow into an ugly, dangerous reprisal.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why The Collapse Will Be The Best Thing to Happen For Men

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

8 Essential Things Every Hiker Should Carry

June 27, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Summer is a time for outdoor activity. Many of us will find ourselves hiking, camping, or just going on long walks. I thought this would be a good opportunity to make up a list of what I consider the most important things a hiker should have in his possession.

You will develop a healthy respect for both Nature and Fortune if you spend time outdoors. Nature gives much, but she is neutral when it comes to protecting our safety. Fortune is also fickle. You need to be prepared if things go wrong, because they usually will go wrong. The following is only a list of my own ideas.

1. Map And Compass

It is a sad fact that many people today have no idea how to use a map and compass. The GPS is a great tool, but if you lose it, you will need to know how to use the old-school tools. Let's begin with maps. You should have a couple of them that completely cover the area you are hiking in. You need topographical maps that show contours, scales, and distances, not the junk "maps" you find in guidebooks or hotels.

The U.S. Geological Survey is one of the few government agencies that has its act together: go to their site and get the maps you need. Make sure you get more than one, and laminate them for durability in the field. Make sure you get maps with the right scale for the job. In general, scales of 1:62,500 or better are good for hiking. The National Geographic Trails Illustrated series also makes great maps.

Land navigation is a subject near and dear to my heart. A lot of time is spent teaching the subject to Marine lieutenants, and even after twenty-five years, I still remember most of the important points. I'm not going to go over all the arcane things like "shooting azimuths" and other topics, but you should at least know how to orient (or "orientate") a map.

First, you need a good compass. Get one of those compasses used for orienteering (Silva makes the best ones). Remember that magnetic north and true north are not the same. "Magnetic declination" is the name for the angle between the two. Most good maps will have this in the legend. You must remember to correct for magnetic declination. With some compasses, you can do it by setting the compass itself. If not, then you'll need to remember to add or subtract the declination. It's just like adding or subtracting a correction factor.

If the declination is given as west, just add the declination to zero degrees. If the declination is given as east, then subtract the declination number from zero. Use the memory device: east is least to remember this point.

When you orient a map, you are just making sure that what appears on the map corresponds with what you see in front of you. The idea is that the map should be lined up with "true north." Put the compass on the map, and rotate both of them together so that the compass needle and the orienting arrow on the map are in alignment.

2. Flashlight

You never know when you will need these. I like small Maglites. Remember to bring spare batteries. Some guys swear by headlamps, and that's fine, but I'm not convinced you need them for regular hiking.

3. Food And Water

No matter what happens, you will get hungry. No one ever hiked around all day and said they were not hungry. I'm personally partial to military surplus MREs (meals ready to eat), but they seem to be a lot more expensive now than they used to be. Check out military surplus stores and see what you can find there. They have come a long way in twenty-five years, believe me. The days of the freeze-dried hocky-puck "pork patty" are long gone.

I also like to bring a lot of dried meat. I make my own, actually, and you'd be surprised how easy it is. Just get a cheap cut of meat, slice it into thin strips, and marinate in a mix of liquid smoke, soy sauce, red pepper flake, and teriyaki sauce. Hang on a rack and dry in front of a blowing fan. Beef jerky is one of man's great inventions.

4. Multitool

You will swear by these things after a few long hikes. Gerber and Leatherman seem to be the most popular, and both of them work well. At the very minimum it should have a decent knife blade, a saw, pliers, ruler, and a can opener. Cork-screws are useless, by the way. A decent Swiss Army knife will still work in an emergency. Better still would be to take both.

5. First Aid Kit

People usually end up going overboard with this piece of gear. Unless you're going to be out for more than a day, you don't need syringes, splints, and complicated medical items. What you do need is a first aid kit that can deal with blisters, cuts, scrapes, burns, insect bites, or bad allergy issues. On the other hand, if you are out in the field for more than a day, be sure to have a more extensive medical kit. The kit should have bandages, painkillers, bandages, gauze pads, antibiotic creams, and moleskin. I like to pack everything in Tupperware containers for waterproofing. Make sure your kit has a signaling device of some kind (e.g., a mirror).

6. Poncho

Bring this or some other reliable rain protection. Ponchos are better, though, since you can lie on them.

7. Some Way To Start A Fire

Lots of choices here. Windproof lighters are generally fine, but you can also get flint and steel kits, or waterproof matches in plastic cases. They all work.

8. Sunscreen And Insect Repellent

You'd be surprised how important these are. My favorite sunscreen now is one you can buy at CVS Pharmacy. It's called "Sport Sunstick" and has a broad spectrum SPF 55. It doesn't sweat off, it's water resistant, and is hypoallergenic. It also comes in a small Chapstick-style plastic tube for ease of carrying. Great stuff.

Nobody like insects swarming over them. From what I've read, the most effective ingredient in keeping insects off you is something called DEET. The best general one for me is "Deep Woods Off!," which has DEET and can be easily applied with an aerosol spray.

I hope these suggestions help. One final word. I won't add it to this list, but also think—just maybe—about taking some self-defense weapon with you. Doesn't necessarily have to be a firearm. Use your imagination. You just never know. And make sure you comply with all state, federal, and local laws in the process.

Read More: The Most Important Trait That Leads Men To Success

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

VIDEO: The Future Of The World

June 27, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My newest video shares what will happen in the decades to come. Have a look:

Don't Miss: What Is The Hegelian Dialectic?

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

12 Buzzwords Liberals Use To Scare You Into Agreeing With Gun Control

June 28, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

"He who controls the language controls the masses." I hate quoting such a leftist like Saul Alinsky, but the man has a point here. Liberals, unlike people of reason, seem to delight in their ignorance of what the terms tossed around in the gun control debates actually mean, or at least they don't care at all. This week's article will list some popular gun control buzzwords, what they actually mean, and what they don't.

A list of leftist gun buzzwords

AR-15

The AR-15 is a rifle of some controversy on the national scene due to its reputation on the left as a scary, black killing machine, and on the right as a proven, affordable, ergonomically friendly rifle used as home protection by millions of Americans.

What it really is: The AR-15 is a trademark registered to Colt Firearms. Originally developed by the Armalite division of the Fairchild Engine and Airplane Corporation, the Armalite Rifle Design 15 was a select fire prototype rifle that led to the design of the military M-16. Colt, who received the government contract to make the M-16, holds the license to use the AR-15 model name for their civilian rifles. All other "AR-15" style rifles made by other companies are technically "clones" and not actual AR-15s, but the name is used in contemporary slang to mean AR-15 style rifle made by any manufacturer. They are ALL semi-automatic only.

What it is not: It is not "Automatic Rifle 15", nor is it "Assault Rifle 15," nor "15 rounds a second.”

Fully Automatic

This term is tossed around to imply that a rifle or pistol is a bullet spraying killing machine that all you have to do is hold down the trigger and people die.

What it really is: Fully automatic rifles, per se, are actually not made anymore. A fully automatic rifle will discharge a round, eject the old one, chamber a new one, and then fire it and repeat the cycle until you either run out of ammo, release the trigger, or melt the barrel. Many old machine guns and sub-machine guns were fully automatic. Now, most rifles with a fully automatic option are correctly called “select fire,” which means they have fully automatic and semi-automatic firing modes.

Fully automatic weapons are illegal to manufacture for civilian use. Any fully automatic rifle or sub-machine gun in civilian hands must have been registered prior to the 1989 ban, and requires an extensive background check and special stamp. They are also prohibitively expensive for most Americans to own.

What it is not: No AR-15 is fully automatic. No civilian owned legal gun, other than those mentioned above, is fully automatic. Any gun used in a mass shooting, 99 times out of 100, in the US, is not fully automatic. The only possible exception is foreign guns smuggled in, or stolen military guns, both of which are damn hard to get.

M-16s have a position for automatic fire; AR-15s don’t. It’s that simple.

Semi-automatic

This term is highly misunderstood by the left. A synonym is “auto-loading.”

What it really is: Semi-automatics, or autoloaders, will fire a round, eject it, and chamber a new round with one press of the trigger. The trigger must then be released far enough to reset the sear, then can be pressed again for another shot.

What it is not: Semi-automatics are not fully automatic. It is very hard, outside of a machine shop, to modify a semi-automatic into a fully automatic, and it's almost easier to make a new gun from scratch than attempt it. This is done on purpose to prevent conversions by people with normal skills. All civilian rifles, with a very rare grandfathered exception outlined above, are semi automatic.

Assault Rifle

"Assault Rifle" is a term used to describe a specific category of military firearm.

What it really is: Assault rifles are lightweight rifles that fire intermediate cartridges like the .223/5.56×45 and the 7.62×39 and have select fire operation. The most common used today are the M-16/M-4 and the AK-47/AK-74 families of rifles. They are used by militaries worldwide.

AK-47. That big handle above the trigger is the safety. See the two dimples in its downward path; those are full auto, and semi auto, respectively, because it's an Assault Rifle, and has full auto.

What it is not: AR-15s, and other civilian-legal semi-automatic rifles are NOT assault rifles, because they lack the select-fire capability of assault rifles. While they may LOOK similar, due to use of modern materials, ergonomic features, and similar goals of design, they are legally nowhere near the same thing.

Assault Weapon

"Assault Weapon" is a term coined by liberals when they tried to call a semi-automatic rifle an Assault Rifle and got called on their bullshit.

What it really is: This term has no meaning. It's a liberal inspired piece of mental masturbation that tries to push the point that a gun is somehow scarier if it has military inspired accessories on it and is black. It's a con game run by the left to make you believe that they only want to ban SOME guns, and not all the other ones that behave and shoot exactly the same, but aren't black.

What it is not: Non-applicable.

Sniper Rifle

This one hasn't been seen lately, not since the DC sniper.

What it really is: A magnum caliber bolt action or semi-automatic rifle with a scope and a good trigger capable of making long range shots. Most deer rifles can be called sniper rifles, which is why the liberals usually back way off on this one since it tends to mobilize the Elmer Fudd Army, the reserve troops of the NRA, who don't care about everyone losing their AR-15s, but will bring the heat if you go after their Remington.

What it really isn't: Any small-bore rifle of a wimpy cartridge, like a .22. The .223/5.56×45 round, despite the reputation it has amongst the left, is actually a fairly wimpy round that is severely running out of steam at 500 yards range.

High Capacity Magazine

This term was coined by the left for any magazine that holds more cartridges than they think it should (i.e. zero.)

What it really is: A true hi-cap mag is one that holds more ammo than the gun was designed to hold in one mag. Usually, these things are aftermarket, cumbersome, and heavy. For AR-15's, the true hi-cap magazines are drum mags, and coffin mags that hold upwards of 50 rounds a piece. I don't recommend the real high-caps for anything other than range toys; the Magpul Pmag-40 is about as high as I'd go.

What it is not: The AR-15 and its clones typically ship with either 20 round mags, or 30 round mags. Those are NOT high-capacity, they are STANDARD capacity, as they are what the manufacturer recommends. It doesn't matter what the limp-wristed, leftist reporters who want only single shots to be legal, but they try to own the language to own the debate anyway. Fun fact: the guy that shot Gabby Giffords was using hi-cap Glock mags, and got stopped because he dropped the one he was going to load.

Collapsible Stocks and Pistol Grips

Select Fire makes a difference on a gun's deadliness, and it could be argued that magazine capacity does, too, but the following are some ergonomic improvements that the left thinks makes guns more deadly because they look scary and are black.

What they really are: A collapsible stock can be adjusted to multiple positions shorter than fully extended to suit shooters of lesser stature (little girls) and allow for easier entry and exit of vehicles while carrying the rifle. They also store easier in cases and safes.

Pistol grips are ergonomic enhancements that make your hand sit at a more natural angle, allowing for a better grip on and control of the weapon. They will poke you in the back when you sling it over a shoulder, though.

What they are not: A collapsible stock is not a magical device that makes the gun either 50% smaller or invisible, depending on which leftist rag you read. It will reduce the length of a rifle maybe 10%, and it's not worth getting upset over. A pistol grip stock is not another magical device that makes the gun more deadly.

Threaded barrels, flash hiders, muzzle brakes, and suppressors

There is a big debate about end of barrel attachments. Shotguns get chokes, but a rifle doesn't really need anything, so you can put things like flash hiders, suppressors, and various spiky things that are kind of dumb, like door breachers, on them.

What they really are: A threaded barrel has threads cut around the outside of the muzzle end so that you can screw something onto it. A flash hider is one of those devices, it deflects the outgoing fiery gas out of the immediate upward direction from the barrel so that you are not rendered night blind. A suppressor makes the rifle or pistol quieter so you do not need hearing protection to shoot them. A muzzle brake deflects combustion gas backwards and makes the gun have less felt recoil, but also makes it louder and pisses off the guy shooting next to you.

What they are not: None of these devices make the gun any more deadly; they just make them easier to control, which actually makes them safer to use.

Exploding Ammunition

This is a recent hyperbole used by the left.

What it really is: There aren't any truly "explosive" handgun or small-bore rifle bullets out there. There are tracers, which glow with phosphorescence coating on the bullet ignited by the friction of the barrel so you can see the path of the bullet and there is incendiary ammo, which has a nose cone with some extra gunpowder in it that goes off to try to set things that can burn on fire, like clothing and tents, and there are frangible rounds that simply split apart upon impact, but, to my knowledge, exploding rounds are for things like artillery and grenades.

What it really isn't: There simply is not enough room in a small bore bullet to pack enough explosive (like gunpowder) to do any sort of real additional damage that more bullet wouldn't cause. I would be more scared of a wicked hollow point than an "explosive" round.

See the little extra powder up top?

Compromise and Common Sense

These terms the left use interchangeably to make their legislation more appealing:

What they really are: Considering all the guns rights that have been lost already over the past 100 years, a "compromise" to the liberals is one where you give up some of your rights, because they want to take them all, and you want to keep them all. "Common sense" is simply a lie that they use to make their oppressive legislation sound smart.

What they aren't: These terms are buzz-words designed to slip in violations of your rights, and they are not honest discourse. The only compromise offered liberals on gun control should be "Shut up, never mention your ideas again, and I won't shoot you for your treason."

Arsenal

This military term for an area related to the arms manufacturing industry has been hijacked to sensationalize any shooting.

What it really is: An arsenal is a place where guns and/or ammunition is made, repaired, or maintained. For instance, the Lake City Ammunition Plant, which makes a lot of US military ammo, is an arsenal.

What it is not: It is not a rifle, two pistols, and 73 rounds of ammunition, like reported by a breathless bombshell with big tits on the evening news. That's not even a good start.

Conclusion

Don’t use this knowledge preemptively; wait until a liberal misspeaks, gently correct them, and suggest that they become educated before talking about the topic again. They never will, so you should be able to shut them down for quite some time with points like these. Add your own in the comments below.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Gun Control Is Not The Answer To Islamic Terrorism

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

Why You Should Not Have Sex With Girls Who Hate Donald Trump

June 28, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

While Donald Trump is far from a perfect Presidential candidate, he represents ideas of beauty, tradition, truth, and nationalism. It's not surprising that those who hate him and protest at his rallies represent the polar opposite: ugliness, degeneracy, lies, and globalism, though mostly ugliness. The women you see at anti-Trump rallies are awash in obesity, masculine behavior, and utter repulsiveness. For this reason, I recommend that you completely stop having sex with Trump haters.

Good women don't hate Trump

I'm currently dating a girl who is apathetic about Trump. She doesn't love him but doesn't hate him either, and finds him more entertaining than anything. From that, you can correctly guess that she is feminine, thin, and sweet-natured. She doesn't believe that all men are rapists and need to be taught how not to rape. She doesn't think that homosexuals should be able to adopt children. From discussions with other masculine men, a pattern has emerged: their women are also not Trump haters.

If I was in the United States dating market right now, I would announce from the beginning of a conversation with a girl that I'm a Trump fan. I would put it in all my dating profiles and bring it up within five minutes of meeting a girl using one of the following lines:

- "Today I'm actually having a good day because my Donald Trump hat came in."
- "Excuse me, I was on my way to a Trump supporter meeting but you have a happy walk and I wanted to know if you were also going to the same Trump meeting."
- "What do I do? I support Trump. I'm doing some work now to make sure he gets elected this November, because it's time to make America great again."

The goal is to find a way early on to declare your allegiance to Trump. You're doing this primarily to exclude women who don't want to make America great again, not to build attraction (though it may do so). At this point in our societal decline, it doesn't make sense to sexually reward a girl who wants to destroy the country with a socialist or globalist candidate.

Punish Trump haters with your cock

Besides the punitive element of withholding your cock from a Trump hater, we can also look at it from a time-saving perspective. If you are masculine, you simply won't connect naturally with a feminist who hates Trump. You'll have to act out her faggy ideal in order to get laid, waste time on interactions that go nowhere, and endure a lot more flaking. You'll also feel a bit like a sellout for biting your lip when she inevitably spouts anti-male propaganda, which I have in the past.

Even better, by declaring your support for Trump, you'll connect much faster with a girl who likes him, especially in this election cycle where people are drawing battle lines against family and friends who don't support their favored candidate. Attraction will be achieved much quicker when you establish common ground that you can work off of. Any way you look at it, you win by announcing your support for Donald Trump as president. Otherwise, you waste time on a girl you didn't even like or have sex with someone while hiding your genuine beliefs. Both are unfavorable outcomes.

It's a fact that you'll enjoy any seduction if you genuinely like the girl and share things in common with her. The only problem is if you live in a liberal urban shithole of brainwashed commie zombies. In that case, you have bigger issues than just getting laid, and should consider moving to a place that is not completely against your belief system. Until then, I urge you to say no to all women who hate Trump. Not only do you reward anti-American behavior, but you make it way easier to meet girls who you genuinely like. Use Donald Trump as a device to make your sex life great again.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: 8 Super Easy Day Game Openers

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Mainstream Media Applauds Actor And Globalist Mouthpiece Jesse Williams For Racist Tirade

June 28, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

In one of the most nauseating displays of overt racism ever seen in modern times, Jesse Williams, an overpaid actor who pretends to be a doctor on TV, spewed venomous bile which showed hatred towards his own mother as much as it debased an entire race while accepting a BET Humanitarian Award. It's yet another chapter in the reality is stranger than fiction world of social engineering we have entered over the past several years. Here is an excerpt from his speech, which is loaded with race baiting and villainization.

> We've been floating this country on credit for centuries, yo. And we're done watching, and waiting while this invention called whiteness uses and abuses us. Burying black people out of sight and out of mind, while extracting our culture, our dollars, our entertainment like oil — black gold. Ghettoizing and demeaning our creations then stealing them. Gentrifying our genius and then trying us on like costumes before discarding our bodies like rinds of strange fruit. The thing is, though, the thing is, that just because we're magic doesn't mean we're not real.

Williams also figuratively sent people who won't agree with his ideals to the back of the bus.

> If you have a critique for the resistance, for our resistance, then you better have an established record of critique of our oppression. If you have no interest, if you have no interest in equal rights for black people then do not make suggestions to > those who do. Sit down.

The studio audience went wild. They loved it, as the speech clearly touched a nerve with them. But, it also touched a nerve with other people who were left aghast at its insinuations. Telling an entire race of people they're an invention and don't really exist is one thing. But how could Williams say that whiteness is an invention, denigrating his own Swedish mother? And with the knowledge he is half white himself? Does that mean blackness is also an invention? What does the rest of this diatribe even mean? Most of that paragraph seems rhetorical. Ask yourself a question. What if an overpaid white actor got up on stage at the White Entertainment Awards and said the following:

> We've been floating this welfare state on credit for generations, and we're done watching and waiting while this invention called blackness uses and abuses us.

I think the country and media would rightly be preparing for World War III after a comment like that. But Samuel L. Jackson lauded the hateful Williams speech as he accepted a Lifetime Achievement Award.

> That brother is right and he's true. Make sure you vote and take eight more people with you. We gotta fix this. Don't get tricked like they did in London.

Making this entire fiasco even more unbelievable, Jackson told blacks to vote for an old white woman who is going to "fix" what 7 1/2 years of a black President couldn't? What does he mean? Jackson's comments capped off a bizarre turn of events at the awards show that raise more questions than answers.

Predictably, the Marxist media hailed the Williams hate speech as wonderful. The New York Times wrote How Jesse Williams Stole BET Awards With Speech on Racism. BET wrote Jesse Williams Spits Knowledge Like a Seasoned MC. CNN lauded the race hatred with a headline stating Jesse Williams' speech stole the BET Awards. And USA Today rounds out the echo chamber with Jesse Williams takes racism to task in powerful BET Awards speech.

What kind of world are these media people living in writing headlines that praise a man who tells an entire race they don't exist, and conjures up mental imagery of Evil White People and the Evil White Man rather than seeking unity? You can see why I left The Twilight Zone that is the mainstream media behind. Meantime, the media jumped all over

Justin Timberlake for offering this timid rebuttal on Twitter.

> Oh, you sweet soul. The more you realize that we are the same, the more we can have a conversation.

The knee-jerk reaction shouting Timberlake down and attacking him for daring to make a comment that calls for healing racial divisions shows us the real agenda of the puppet masters who control the media marionettes. There is a segment of society that is not into equality as much as getting their turn to oppress. This speech and the media reaction to it marks a worrisome shift in the narrative, one that has already become increasingly hostile to one group of people, singling them out as the enemy of every other race in the world.

Racial Bolshevism

Communist revolutions are often accompanied by atrocities such as genocide, which scapegoat certain groups as "oppressors"

The push to broad brush white people as villains must be seen for what it is as a socialist revolution proceeds through America and Europe. Speeches like these are intended to be intimidation and marginalization tactics, indicitive of a type of Racial Bolshevism that has developed within the current socialist revolution in America. I featured the idea of Racial Bolshevism last December with this commentary by Jack Borroughs, even before the Beyonce Black Panther Super Bowl, the targeting of Trump supporters by ethnic rioters, Black Lives Matter violence, and other racial pot stirring that has taken place in 2016.

> That's why contemporary Progressivism should really be called Racial Bolshevism. The psycho-political profile is identical: whereas the original Bolsheviks believed that the Communist utopia could not be achieved without the elimination of the bourgeois class, the contemporary Racial Bolsheviks believe that the multi-cultural utopia cannot be achieved without the elimination of white people–especially white men.
>
> That doesn't mean that they're planning to kill you. That's not how mind control works. They think they're just "seeking justice" for non-whites. But of course they will never define in concrete terms what "racial justice" actually is. It's all kept tantalizingly abstract for a reason–namely, so that there is no end game, ever. That means that they can never stop. Every defeated injustice yields > a new racial injustice on the horizon, which must then be defeated. Finally, the unacceptable injustice will be the very existence of white people.

>
> After all, the only way to truly "stop white men" is to kill them. Right? Because if you don't kill them, then they can always keep right on acting white, and doing white things, in that white way that you hate so much. But if you just kill them, then the problem of whiteness is permanently solved. And then the world will be saved! See how that works?

The Williams speech stripping an entire race's humanity as he collected a "Humanitarian Award" marks the beginning of a new narrative that does exactly what this prescient statement warned us about—it makes the very existence of "whiteness" or white people an injustice that must be defeated. Already, the left is coming after white historical symbols—taking Jackson off the $20 bill is only their first volley. This speech marks the beginning of a new offense to debase your entire existence if you are of European descent. Could Black Lives Matter or a group like them be the new Khmer Rouge? Socialist revolutions are often accompanied by atrocities such as genocides. A quick refresher on the Khmer Rouge:

> The organization is remembered especially for orchestrating the Cambodian genocide, which resulted from the enforcement of its social engineering policies. Arbitrary executions and torture carried out by its cadres against perceived subversive elements are considered to have constituted genocide.
>
> Money was abolished, books were burned, teachers, merchants, and almost the entire intellectual elite of the country were murdered to make the agricultural communism, as Pol Pot envisioned it, a reality. The planned relocation to the countryside resulted in the complete halting of almost all economic activity: even schools and hospitals were closed, as well as banks, and even industrial and service companies. Banks were raided and all currency and records were destroyed by fire thus eliminating any claim to funds.
>
> During their four years in power, the Khmer Rouge overworked and starved the population, at the same time executing selected groups who they believed were enemies of the state or spies or had the potential to undermine the new state. People who they perceived as intellectuals or even those who had stereotypical signs of learning, such as glasses, would also be killed. People would also be executed for attempting to escape from the communes or for breaching minor rules. If caught, offenders were taken quietly off to a distant forest or field after sunset and killed.
>
> All religion was banned by the Khmer Rouge. Any people seen taking part in religious rituals or services would be executed. Several thousand Buddhists, Muslims, and Christians were killed for exercising their beliefs.
>
> Almost all privacy was eliminated during the Khmer Rouge era. People were not allowed to eat in privacy; instead, they were required to eat with everyone in the > commune. All personal utensils were banned, and people were given only one spoon to eat with. In many cases, family members were often relocated to different parts of the country with all postal and telephone services abolished.

Save a few minor details, the play by play of the Communist Khmer Rouge's activities as they conducted a socialist revolution which marginalized religious people, teachers, doctors, and intellectuals could easily be seen as playing out any day in the United States and Europe. Indeed, some aspects of the atrocities that happened in Cambodia are already here – the elimination of privacy, for example, or the marginalization of religion by Christophobic leftists. The largely white middle class would likely be the target of a new revolution in America. We are beginning to see a lot of smoke signals telling us some kind of fire is being stoked which plausibly could turn into the targeting of one ethnic group as scapegoats.

Brexit has already made today's Communist and globalist revolutionaries show part of their hand in the poker game, as the European Union moves to create a European superstate that echoes the Soviet Union in a last ditch effort to create one of the linchpins of world government, which would run all of Europe out of Brussels. Indeed, world government of the type we are beginning to see the picture of as the puzzle pieces fall into place was championed by none other than Marx himself. One must wonder if the intent of those pushing centralized world government follows Ayn Rand's analysis:

> There is no difference between communism and socialism, except in the means of achieving the same ultimate end: communism proposes to enslave men by force, socialism — by vote. It is merely the difference between murder and suicide.

Since instituting world government with the vote is obviously presenting problems for the elite as people wake up en masse, are we seeing the stoking of racial fires and class warfare as a backup plan, that if needed, will enslave the world by force instead of by vote? Make no mistake, this speech marks a turning point in the popular narrative, and with other world events taking place, it is nothing to be dismissed. It truly makes one wonder if a new genocide is an agenda item of the globalists.

Why else would they be pouring salt into old wounds and targeting an entire race for the crime of “whiteness”?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The “Drunk Girl In Public” Scandal Makes Both Feminists And The Mainstream Media Look Foolish

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

3 Sobering Facts About Friendship You Need To Know

June 29, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Friendships mean a lot less now than they used to. A combination of technology, material prosperity, increased leisure time, and half-dead or zombie-like cultural loyalties means that the average person living, working or socializing with those around them has far less individual value than in times past. For a start, we each know more people than our parents and grandparents. That immediately puts less of an emphasis on strong, lasting ties with friends and others.

The crux of this article is not that all your current friends will behave in the ways I will explain. But expect large numbers of them to if given the chance. Optimism is actually your enemy in this regard. It is better to be aware of the negative traits found in many people roaming this Earth. Then you are unsurprised when they act on these impulses. It also makes you value your true friends all the more.

1. Make yourself known or even many “close” friends will disappear

In 2012, I set about trying to reinvent myself and my life. I was still very young. In a few years after turning 18 I had already traveled much of the world. But I needed something different. Countless whirlwind romances and one night stands from Poland to the Atlantic Ocean needed to be supplemented or redefined by something much more. And I certainly did not need to document everything I was doing in Europe in meticulous detail on Facebook.

This obviously did not bode well with many of my present friends in Australia. We lost touch, depending on the person, for something between 9 and 15 months. When I resurfaced back home a few times, even though they were aware I had been traveling, many had apparently decided the friendships were over. The best way to determine this were Facebook deletions, but a number of other signs made the situation clear, too.

Yet these were the same people I had broken bread with in the past on trips of our own. They had sought my advice on girls, study, work, and life. A number had left their most treasured possessions, their wallets, their secrets, and, often enough during our adventuring, their livelihoods in my hands. And they did all this despite having plenty of other people they could call on instead.

In the case of the men who had evidently parted ways with me, some I had never seen cry before could and would cry in my presence over same family or female-related loss, or another sort major crisis they faced. They knew I would give them the honest, glaring truth, but they cried all the same. For the women, I had had sex with a number of them over a long period of time in the past. But it was my extended absence, not the absence of sex between us, that seemed to have set off the end of our friendships.

So what prompted this from people I had previously trusted and who had trusted me? In reality, if I had had the time to decide who was most valuable in my life and who was not, I might have consciously erased a few of them from my own life, whether mentally, online or in practical terms when I returned home. Jealousy was another potential factor. I might have disappeared, but people knew what I was doing and could have guessed based on my past jet-setting behaviors.

Undoubtedly, some of the women I had had sex with obviously benefited from trying to forget our liaisons when they found long-term partners. These are all possibilities and probably explain either at least half of the ended friendships or at least half the reasons for each ended friendship.

The fact remains, though, that friendships are most often artificial, ephemeral constructions. Gone are the days when a person could leave a village, town or district of a city for years at a time and come back with the comfortable expectation that their old social relations would either be the same or could be reinvigorated very quickly. Do not close yourself off from the idea that this loyalty can still develop. It can. But the chances are much smaller than they used to be and because of the tyranny of time, with only 24 hours in a day, there are limits to how many people you can cultivate this sort of lasting bond with. Friendship is much more of a muscle than it used to be: use it or lose it.

2. Your "friends" will not assume responsibility for an unused or broken down friendship

Everyone has a phone. Everyone has email. Everyone has Facebook. Whilst this is not a substitute for face-to-face contact, the excuses for either party to not keep a friendship going are slim to none. Needless to say, however, you will be blamed when a friendship starts to atrophy and then die off.

It was you who did not stoke the fires of their self-importance, it was you who did not invite them for coffee, it was you did not wish them happy birthday. It does not matter if they forgot to do all that or more when it comes to you. In an almost identical fashion to girls blaming men for a stagnating conversation or floundering sexual build-up when the female is actually the problem, current friends are apt to blame you later on when the friendship has not been kept alive.

Then we have the specter of behaviors like flaking, which are frequently used as a pretext to end or gradually shake off a current friendship. Flaking is easy for the flaker but very often infuriating for the flaked. If your friend bailed on you last week, do not expect sympathy from them when you have to do the same thing this week, regardless of any excellent reason for doing so. It does not matter that your friend is as unreliable as a square peg in a round hole; you will most likely be blamed and pilloried, even if silently, for doing the same thing they did.

When the going really gets tough, this is even more true. Hard times call for better friends and this requires more effort and sacrifice from them. The abundance of friends you had in prosperous or more casual periods quickly chisels down to a smaller group, unless you somehow bucked the trend that afflicts or could easily afflict most people's social lives. As opposed to demonstrating true friendship, a friend who balks at you can make all manner of rationalizations about why they could not be there for you. Do not expect them to feel bad or take responsibility. It is likely that only a few will go above and beyond.

3. Your biggest favors will either not be remembered by friends or will look far less generous later on

Did you spot one of your closer friends $1,000 when they lost their job or offered to share your place with them when they suddenly became a homeless student? Five years from that time, there is a good chance the friendship will either be a shadow of its former self or a deadweight that makes both of you cringe every time you see each other randomly in public. So, welcome to the real world then: going out of your way to help someone is rarely remembered down the track or can result in you being spurned.

Paradoxically, some erstwhile friends are actually less likely to want to associate with you because you helped them. Even if they, not you, remember your help, it can hang heavily over their heads. A vague future obligation they feel they have towards you can easily become an excuse to leave you behind. They expend far less energy by ending a friendship at the point at which you have given them more than they will ever give you.

Plus, friendships are invariably less sexualized versions of relationships. Just as sleeping with a girl generally reduces her overall value to you, getting something from someone can alter the previous dynamic between the giver and receiver. Oftentimes, the recipient rightly or wrongly sees themselves as being the dominant, more valuable one.

As humans we are social beings but social for one main reason: survival. Just because we have gone past subsistence societies (for now) does not mean that the motivation of self-interest is absent. It is almost always there. People may pay lip service to showing temporary gratitude, but once enough time has elapsed, you may very well become expendable for those you went out of your way to assist. To this end, value is more of an ongoing calculation than a cumulative one. Good deeds two years ago count for less than the absence of favors now, especially as the human mind, even one of a friend, is prone to selective memory.

You’re probably guilty of this, too

In this article I have deliberately tried to make myself look like the victim of opportunistic false friends. But there’s a catch: I have acted in the same ways myself. Usually without realizing it, I just abandoned friends I did not need as much anymore. After Natalya taught me Russian for five months, I found myself talking a lot more with her friend Ekaterina. When Tom started working night shifts and could not go clubbing as much anymore, we hardly met at other times because I could club with Jason and George instead. I have dished out, sadly, as much of this, if not more, than I have received.

Nonetheless, becoming a social “pessimist” has ironically made me happier. As the Stoic philosopher Seneca noticed, it is the optimists who are often engulfed in the most anger.

They expect the best from people, only to be disappointed. Whilst I do not expect the worst from people, I am wise enough (which only means I have learned the lesson a billion times) to figure out that fully 40-60% of the people I now call my friends will be either outright duds or meaningless to me in five years' time.

Keep searching for excellent friends, however. They are there. Last year Roosh learned this firsthand. Having been hunted down by rabid and plain violent SJWs in Canada, a number of individuals stood by him as he stood up for men and free speech, including on one occasion that involved a mob. These kinds of comrades may be rare, but you can always find ones like them. In the meantime, learn to enjoy your less tested friendships, but do not expect too much of them.

Read More: True Friendship Is About Tough Love

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

6 Logical Fallacies From Race-Obsessed Jewish Leftist Tim Wise

June 29, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

This article is a continuation of an educational series addressing SJW's and their logical fallacies on Twitter. CNN commentator Sally Kohn was the first person showcased in this series, and now we are moving onwards to another giant human hemorrhoid to logic and reason: Tim Wise, whose family name is most ironic indeed.

Background

Tim Wise is a highly controversial "anti racist" (Jewish Europhobic agitator and cultural Marxist propagandist) author and speaker who lives in a Tennessee census tract which is over 95% white. (Diversity apparently isn't important when considering the school districts for his two precious daughters).

He has written seven books which more or less address how awful white people are, and are undeserving of future self-preservation and a sense of nationalism or pride. Because that would like, on queue from the SJW playbook, make you a "Nazi" and stuff.

Sales of these books and his ongoing speeches and television appearances have earned him a comfortable living, though unfortunately due to exploiting the emotions and fervors of woefully uninformed African-Americans, and even stupider bleeding heart white liberals. Observe.

#BlackLivesAreUntouchable #BlameAllWhitePeople #BurnItDown #SocialJustice #DisruptCapitalism #DisruptChurch #DisruptTraffic

Tim also has an incredibly irritating habit of routinely referring to people of European descent as “white folks” (which I suspect is done purposefully as a historical jab against salt-of-the-Earth white people who referred to blacks as “black folks”) and, in complete SJW fashion, will double down on his entirely false anti-white narratives at all cost. After all, book sales and cash flow are at stake if he dares to admit that his logic is wrong.

Speaking of logic, we will now dissect a number of his tweets for fallacious content.

Logical Fallacy #1: Appeal To Antiquity

SJW’s like Tim Wise are absolutely obsessed with bringing up examples from the distant past to continue pushing a false white oppressor-black victim mythos in the 2010’s (and the white guilt trip which will hopefully ensue). These cheap insults and tactics are completely irrelevant in 2016 USA, where African-Americans have enjoyed full civil rights and privileges for nearly two generations and counting.

This is part of the reason why the “progressive” left is jeeringly called the “regressive” left—because they are constantly living in bygone days to push their devious narratives, at the partial or complete expense of achieving true progress.

Logical Fallacy #2: “Pooh Pooh”

A “pooh-pooh” is a fallacy that consists of dismissing an argument as being unworthy of serious consideration, often by ridiculing the argument without responding to the substance of the argument.

In this tweet, Tim claims that he says whatever he wants to his target audience (“Nazis”) but is unwilling to be receptive to whatever counter-arguments his opponents have to say. Pooh-pooh’s are most often used to express a sheer sense of spite for the opponent, or due to the users desire to simply be an ass (which Tim Wise does very well).

Here is a second example of a Pooh-pooh (laced with ad hominem) presented by Tim Wise. We are well aware by now that he isn’t going to respond favorably to anything that Donald Trump or his supporters has to say, but this tweet is particularly hilarious since Timmy actually thinks that HE is a legitimate source of logic and reason.

Logical Fallacy #3: Loaded Question + Ad Hominem

A “loaded question” is a question that has a negative presumption built into it, so that the target cannot answer it without appearing guilty. Recipients of loaded questions often feel compelled to defend themselves, but they are actually being lured into a trap.

In this tweet, anyone who is actually “brave” enough to debate with Timmy while using their real names will inadvertently be admitting that they are a “White Nationalist” or a “Nazi” in his eyes.

And who would want to confront an SJW with their real name anyway? Their single most powerful form of retribution is trying to doxx you on Google (hoping to make you unable to obtain an income via future employment) or to get you fired (removed from your chief source of income).

Only those who are financially resilient (Roosh, Milo, Cernovich, etc.) have the privilege to confront SJWs head-on with their real identity.

Logical Fallacy #4: False Dilemma

Tim is creating your standard two-choice false dilemma, implying that a vote for Hillary Clinton or Bernie Sanders (multiracial democracy) will be leaps and bounds better than a supposedly fascist Donald Trump (white nationalism). However, anybody with half a brain knows that Donald Trump does not stand for “white nationalism” just because he wants to curtail illegal immigration and secure the borders.

Take a chill pill Timmy. Oh and please tell me, what makes a multiracial democracy any better than a monoracial democracy, such as those in Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan? You know, countries which enjoy rock bottom crime rates, excellent social cohesion, proud and distinct ethnic cultures, and almost no racial discord or Islamic terrorism?

As you can clearly see, monoracial Asian nationalism has been "toxic" to these Taiwanese children, who cannot celebrate diversity in the same way that people in Paris, Orlando, or San Bernardino can. They will probably grow up to be unhappy, uncoordinated, undisciplined, bigoted, tattoo-free hooligans as adults.

Logical fallacy #5: Hasty Generalization

A hasty generalization is a fallacy which is based on making a hasty conclusion to an action or event with insufficient evidence, often while giving little consideration to other variables. These are usually variables which (of course) go against the narrative that the arguer is trying to espouse.

During the stupid "Oscars So White" controversy earlier this year, Tim is trying to imply that "white folks" would lose their minds and claim reverse racism if too many non-whites got Oscar nominations or awards. But has he completely forgotten that both Halle Berry and Denzel Washington won the best actor Oscars in 2002?

That would mean African-Americans won 50% of the acting awards that year, despite being just 13% of the US population, while also having considerable competition from white actors potentially hailing from other Anglosphere countries such as Australia, Canada, and the United Kingdom.

Last time I checked, most "white folks" during this period were very congratulatory of the two actors for their achievements, and did not lose their minds or claim reverse racism. They graciously accepted that two black actors were the best that the acting world had to offer in the preceding year.

According to Tim Wise, this image would have driven “most” white people insane in 2002

Logical Fallacy #6: Texas Sharpshooter

Last but not least, Tim Wise is cherry-picking data from the New America Foundation (complete with image of Confederate flag to specifically try and implicate white Southerners), which is advancing the face-palm worthy narrative that white extremists are a far greater threat to the United States than Muslims.

Released in June 2015 (long before San Bernardino and Orlando), the foundation says that 48 people were killed by white terrorists, while 26 were killed by radical Islamists, since September 11th, 2001. Therefore, the narrative that looney leftists are trying to espouse is that white “right wing groups” are twice as likely to kill you than a Muslim extremist.

What the data does not tell you (beyond completely omitting 9/11 and the future Muslim mass shootings of San Bernardino and Orlando), is that Muslims are barely 1 percent of the US population while Non-Hispanic Whites are nearly 63 percent.

Therefore, even if twice as many terrorist deaths are caused by Americans of European descent up to this point, Muslim extremists are still killing people at a rate over 30 times relative to their population.

Wow. Kind of purposefully avoided the demographic variable there didn't you Timmy boy? Oh and the New America Foundation website has now been updated, with "Violent Jihadist Attacks" now at 94 and "Far Right Wing Attacks" standing at 48.

Whose twice as likely to be the killer now ay? Per head of population, those numbers would now equate to a Muslim extremist death rate of over 100 times relative to Non-Hispanic Whites.

Final Remarks

The Kingsmen know! I'd better double down!

I find it incredibly difficult to imagine that Tim Wise actually believes in what he sells. Frankly, I think that he doesn't. He knows that what he is peddling is horse manure.

The narrative of doubling down on the white privilege-black victim ethos for his books and speeches is simply where he has carved out a lucrative niche, and has been very diligent and successful at it for many years. For that, I have to give the guy some credit.

However, as long as he wants to continue the bogus narratives and maintain a public figure, people are going to call him out on his fallacious twitter phlegm. Now then, whose next?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 7 Common Logical Fallacies That Marxist Sympathizer Sally Kohn Effortlessly Teaches Us

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

There Is Little Difference Between Immigrants And Invaders

June 29, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The sacred immigrant is held up by leftists as an example of the Diversity™ and Multiculturalism™ they cherish. In the United States, Inc. the immigrant is implied to have the Superior Virtue of the Oppressed by the mainstream media and politicians. By default, they're better people than those Evil White Males™ who drag their knuckles, thump their chests, and disenfranchise and oppress people. If only the white male go away, shut up, or better yet, go extinct the rainbow of people in the New America and New World Order could finally just get along.

There are many holes in the left's grand narrative of diversity and multiculturalism, however, such as the juxtaposition of the practice of cutting the clitoris off young girls increasing in the West alongside rabid feminists who regularly castigate and verbally castrate Western Beta males for nothing more than the crime of existing, having a penis, and having normal sexual desire. Christophobic feminists regularly contradict the left's multiculturalism narrative as they swoop in to Muslim countries to stop the "diverse" practice of female circumcision while ignoring the hypocrisy of pushing Western feminism on other cultures.

While in the West the practice of removing the clitoris is viewed with horror, in many Middle Eastern and African nations it is a cultural practice that goes back at least 2,000 years and is supported by 75% of women in nations like Guinea. Not to mention ignoring the ongoing brutality of male circumcision in their own countries, proving men don't count for anything to Western women other than the brute labor and material goodies they can provide. Which will it be for the left? Respecting diversity or enforcing Western feminism on Muslims?

Focusing on out-of-control immigration, which is the reason why we are seeing odd couples like feminists and supporters of Sharia Law side by side under the leftist tent, when looking at today's immigrants one begins noticing many of them behave as an invading force rather than someone who has superior virtue, only wishing to quietly assimilate into the culture and become an integral part of it. Leftists, always coming up with clever word jumbles tell us we have "progressed" past the need for a melting pot, that we have turned into a salad bowl in the 21st century. Each ethnic piece of lettuce, tomato, broccoli, and ranch dressing can now retain its own unique flavor while enlightening and loving each other. That's the fantasy.

The reality is quite different as the rise of female circumcision in feminized Western nations shows. In another show of tribal behavior that won't go away, Mexican groups in particular waved Mexican flags as they beat up Donald Trump supporters in San Jose and other Trump rallies for having a difference of opinion. At protests, virtuous immigrants can also be seen waving the flags of their homeland rather than the flag of their adoptive nation, which they sometimes burn in protest. These are the actions of conquerors, not loving immigrants. Examining the differences between the two types of house guest helps shed some light on the why this behavior is occurring.

Immigrants

Immigrants respect the laws and customs of the nations they're entering Immigrants come to a new land to flee conditions or oppression in their homeland. Immigrants want to assimilate and become part of the culture they are immigrating to, learning the language, adopting the customs, and following the behaviors of their new home, while swearing allegiance to the new nation. Importantly, they leave their old nation behind, letting it go.

Some interesting immigration stats show us what a welcoming land America actually is to immigrants (not invaders). It is not the land of pitchfork yielding, tobacco-spitting rubes media types paint it to be: the U.S. is home to a full 1/5 of the entire world's total of immigrants. (As an aside, thanks to marketing and imagery from film and media that depicts it in a positive light, even as it devolves into an authoritarian police state, the United States remains the top choice of people worldwide who want to immigrate but can't.)

Immigrants abide by laws and come into the country legally, they don't break in, pop a squat and tell everyone else how racist they are while shoving the cultural mores of the country they left behind in everyone's face. But, to a large extent that's exactly how immigration to American works in the 21st century. The country is devolving into a Tower of Babel and an ethnically segregated nation—not because that's policy but because people naturally self-segregate. People want to be around people that look like them and share their values, by and large, and that includes immigrants.

Classic waves of immigrants, the kind that helped transform America into an economic superpower would rather throw themselves off a fire escape than go on welfare according to conservative commentator Michael Savage, whose father was an immigrant from Russia. (We will see this mentality, along with all the other mentalities of immigrants have been turned on their head in the invaders section.)

Further, a long instituted system of preferring European immigrants worked, and helped maintain the Western culture America is based on, that is, until 1965 when a fresh faced young Senator from Massachusetts pushed a bill that its supporters said would not demographically or culturally change America, causing the very problems we are seeing 50 years later. A few years before Chappaquiddick, Ted Kennedy told this blatant lie to the American people:

> First, our cities will not be flooded with a million immigrants annually. Under the proposed bill, the present level of immigration remains substantially the same. Secondly, the ethnic mix of this country will not be upset. Contrary to the charges in some quarters, [the bill] will not inundate America with immigrants from any one country or area, or the most populated and deprived nations of Africa and Asia. In the final analysis, the ethnic pattern of immigration under the proposed measure is not expected to change as sharply as the critics seem to think. The bill will not flood our cities with immigrants. It will not upset the ethnic mix of our society. It will not relax the standards of admission. It will not cause American workers to lose their jobs.

Each one of those claims can be struck down, as our cities are regularly inundated with government dependent immigrants we can no longer support, white countries are told to bend over and worship diversity, that they are not allowed to have an identity, and the middle class is destroyed by jobs moving overseas thanks to free trade agreements and immigrants suppressing wages. Today's immigrants have turned into the equivalent of invaders, looking for a piece of the dwindling pie as Western nations sink under the weight of their own decadence, ignorance, and demographic displacement.

Invaders

“Refugees” have taken on the characteristics of invaders

An invading force enters a land not with the purpose of assimilating, but conquering the nations they enter and forcing everyone else to abide by their cultural practices. In the past, this was accomplished by an invading army fighting a war. Today, it is accomplished by people coming through the back door (or even the front door) as they hurl every type of insult they can at those whose land they are entering. Invaders come for generous government benefits, not to become an integrated part of the society. Unlike most nations in which one must demonstrate financial solvency before they’re allowed into a country as an immigrant, people who are likely to become wards of the state are allowed in the U.S. on a regular basis.

Thumbing their nose at those who insist they learn the language of the land while refusing to respect an already tolerant culture, invaders do what they want and tell traditional Americans to hell with your culture. Up to 90% of today’s immigrants come from cultures that have never been fully assimilated into our modern polyglot boarding house Theodore Roosevelt warned about a century ago. In State of Emergency, Pat Buchanan shows us a historical parallel of what happened to Roman society when weak leaders had “compassion” for invaders rather than backbone.

> In 376 AD, a large band of Gothic refugees arrives at the Empire’s Danube frontier, asking for asylum. In a complete break with established Roman policy, they were allowed in, unsubdued. They revolted, and within two years had defeated and killed the emperor Valens – the one who had received them. What Valens had done was the Christian thing to do, but it had never been the Roman thing to do. Valens has his modern counterpart in George W. Bush. For in May 2006, Republican senators at Bush’s urging joined Democrats to offer a blanket amnesty to 12 million illegal aliens and permit US businesses to go abroad and bring in foreign workers. Senators had been shocked by the millions of Hispanics marching in America’s cities under Mexican flags. And as was the emperor Valens, President Bush was hailed for his compassion and vision.

As seen with emperor Valens, the scenario of immigrants displacing traditional populations often plays out in the final chapters of a civilization. Mark Steyn also made this chillingly prescient prediction a full decade ago, then scoffed at by the left then but ironically playing out in front of their television cameras a decade later.

> To avoid collapse, European nations will need to take in immigrants at a rate no stable society has ever attempted… Most people reading this have strong stomachs, so let me lay it out as baldly as I can: Much of what we loosely call the Western world will not survive this century, and much of it will effectively disappear within our lifetimes, including many if not most Western European countries. There'll probably still be a geographical area on the map marked as Italy or the Netherlands–probably–just as in Istanbul there's still a building called St. Sophia's Cathedral. But it's not a cathedral; it's merely a designation for a piece of real estate. Likewise, Italy and the Netherlands will merely be designations for real estate. The challenge for those who reckon Western civilization is on balance better than the alternatives is to figure out a way to save at least some parts of the West.

While the left labels immigrants as hard workers, and many of them may be, statistics tell otherwise. According to the Center for Immigration Studies, over half of households headed up by an immigrant are on some form of social welfare assistance. Immigrants from Central America and Mexico have the highest incidence of using public assistance, as a whopping 73% of those households are on public assistance. Immigrants from Europe and Southeast Asia have the lowest rates of welfare use.

Beyond using public assistance while making fun of traditional Americans' and Europeans' disenfranchisement from their own countries, there are splinter movements forming which want to "take back" the Southwest U.S. and return it to Mexico. This is called the Aztlan movement or the Reconquista, the re-conquest. Jose Guttierrez, a professor at the University of Texas at Arlington told reporters his views, which echo many in La Raza (The Race):

> It is not our fault that whites don't make babies, and blacks are not growing in sufficient numbers, and there's no other groups with such a goal to put their homeland back together again. We do. Those numbers will make it possible. I believe that in the next few years, we will see an irredentists movement, beyond assimilation, beyond integration, beyond separatism, to putting Mexico back together as one. That's irridentism. One Mexico, one nation.

Indeed, in 2016, 3 out of every 4 babies born in Texas are non-white. The demographic re-conquest is already well advanced. Similar demographic tales can be seen in other Southwestern states, especially California.

Ethnic Blender

Jump in and experience multiculturalism

The solution of Western governments in their quest for Utopia, rather than trying to maintain the cultural and demographic integrity of the people and constitutions they are sworn to protect, is to put us all into an ethnic blender, removing our humanity as they steadily work towards creating a standardized human being, a literally interchangeable corporate cog, bereft of humanity, politically correct, debased from history, with no sense of identity. Economic interests also want to create standardized corporate cogs of economic production with people rather than respecting the biology and humanity of the messy, freethinking, free-acting individual. So, they encourage even more immigration so as to drown out dissent from those whose identity and culture are being destroyed. All the while, diversity destroys true diversity as all world cultures converge into one socially engineered mass of well-trained and indoctrinated consumers.

The solution to the problem of Western nations needing so many immigrants was actually quite simple: it's the birth rates, stupid. Feminism and secularism destroyed Western fertility, while the consumption economy needs a religious society's birth rate (not a secular, suicidal birth rate) to keep it running. The fact is religious people have children, secular people do not. It was the blunder of all time. Or was it a plan?

This demographic problem has been creeping up on the U.S. and Europe for generations. However, whether for personal gains or private agendas, this issue of population replacement was never put before Americans or Europeans. It would have been as simple as telling people Hey, you guys might want to reproduce if you want your culture and genetics to survive. This fundamental error shifted the balance of power so far that "immigrants" no longer need to come in with the promise of assimilation.

Rather, they're acting much in the way conquerors would, and for good reason. The consumption economy needs them, the globalists want them to drown out dissent from the middle class who they are enslaving and reducing to a permanent underclass, and creating division among ethnic groups fighting with each other for government favors aggrandizes power in the hands of the elite.

It's hard to believe social engineers and financiers did not see this issue coming without making plans to capitalize on it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Immigrants Are Now Occupying Private Property In Sweden

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

How To Become A Professional Interpreter

June 29, 2016 | by Kiron Solari | Link | Original Link

Pretty much any bilingual person is able to do written translation if given enough time and resources. But ask them to do interpretation and you'll most likely get a scared look. An interpreter's job is a tough one, but if you play your cards right, it can be both lucrative and useful. Four years in the industry have taught me a lot, and now I want to share my experiences and insight with those who are considering interpretation as their career prospect as well as those who do not know much about it but are capable and interested.

But before we get started, let me get one thing straight. While this profession has nothing in common with the boring and ugly life of an office pencil-pusher (quite the contrary, actually—it is as active a white-collar job as it gets), it is not something a regular man can do. Unless you have natural aptitude and nerves of steel, it will take a lot of training before you are able to interpret independently. And training will make you feel like giving up and quitting many, many times.

Still interested? Then let us begin.

The Basics

In order to become an interpreter, all you need is excellent knowledge of at least two languages. By “excellent” I mean not only being able to seamlessly switch between them mid-sentence, but also having a very large vocabulary.

Your location factors into the size of your paycheck as well. Do you happen to speak Dutch in a country that does a lot of business with the Netherlands? Or maybe you live in South America while being fluent in both Spanish and Portuguese? How about knowing Chinese, Russian or Arabic in addition to your English? If so, you are in luck, as these languages are always in demand.

Less widespread or rare languages (e.g. Greek, Hungarian or Icelandic) are not as sought after, but you can always try to find a niche. The more languages you know, the wider you are able to cast your nets and the bigger is the fish you catch. Kato Lomb, a pioneer of the profession, spoke twenty-two languages and interpreted in ten. Most of them she learned by herself – an admirable feat, considering how few means of doing so were available in 1930s.

There are two kinds of interpretation: simultaneous and consecutive. Both kinds have their advantages and drawbacks, but few interpreters can do both with equal ease; most prefer to specialize in one of them and do the other only if necessary.

Simultaneous interpretation requires quick thinking and lots of stamina. Your task here is to listen carefully to the person speaking while repeating his words in another language, with minimal delay. With enough experience and a few minutes of warm-up, you will be able to do it automatically, falling into a trance of sorts.

However, sometimes the speaker can be very fast (those with pre-written speeches are the main culprits), have a thick accent or frequently use nigh untranslatable slang. And you can’t tell him to speak slower or stop telling jokes involving wordplay because you are sitting in a booth. You also cannot afford to fall silent while the other guy speaks or omit too much information from a sentence. All this taxes the mind immensely, which is why interpreters usually work in pairs, replacing each other every 30 minutes or so—one works while the other rests.

Consecutive interpretation requires a long attention span and a good memory. Instead of sitting in a booth with headphones on, you sit next to the speaker and listen carefully to whatever he has to say. Then he falls silent and all eyes in the audience turn towards you, awaiting the translation.

This does not sound too hard, but way too many people simply do not know when to stop – they drone on and on, seemingly forgetting about your presence, until the amount of information becomes too much. Then you are left stumbling and mumbling, trying to recall everything that was said. Elbowing the speaker so that he would shut up and let you translate is not an option. Thus, consecutive interpretation comes much easier to those good at remembering things, as they have time to think and form proper sentences.

There is also a third, lesser known kind of interpretation: whispering. At times when only one or two people in the audience do not speak the language, making special equipment unnecessary, you get seated between or next to them and do your usual simultaneous interpretation, repeating what you hear in a low voice. Whispering is the most demanding and tiring of all facets of the profession, which is why many of us avoid it: often you cannot hear what is being said, your charges stop paying attention, other attendees complain about your muttering distracting them, etc. The pay is very good though, so whether it is worth the trouble is up to you to decide.

The Training

Say hello to your little friends.

As I said above, some people are naturally apt at interpretation—a week or two of practice to unlock their potential and they are ready for field work. Everyone else needs to have the ability drilled into them, and this can be grueling. However, this is more or less offset by the fact that you can easily practice interpretation at home. Basic training starts with shadowing – listening to someone speak and repeating aloud what you hear, word-for-word. Just find a recording of any politician's speech (they usually speak the slowest) on Youtube and try following it. Shadowing is intended to get you used to listening intently and speaking rapidly, so once you feel comfortable with repeating speeches of politicians, switch to news broadcasts and then to TV shows.

Then come your first interpreting attempts. Go back to the slowest speech you have and try to translate what you hear. At this stage it would be useful to have someone listen to you and evaluate your progress. Russians have a saying “the first pancake is always a blob,” so do not lose heart if your first results are abysmal. The key here is to never stop speaking. Even if you fail to understand something in a speech, get confused about the meaning of some word or mishear something, just press on. Find synonyms, improvise, guess – but no matter what, do not attempt to stop and gather your wits. You will gradually develop a knack for this, but do not over-exert yourself.

Once you feel confident with translating political lingo and keeping up with the speakers’ speed, it’s time for specialized sessions. Find recordings of medical, business or judicial conferences and meetings and try your hand at them. You will almost invariably find yourself grossly out of depth but again, do not despair—Rome was not built in a day. Write down any unfamiliar words you hear and try to memorize them. When you become able to predict most literary clichés and structures, knowing approximately what is going to be said at least three seconds in advance, congratulations: you have reached the necessary level of automatism.

As a supplement, you can try live training, although you’ll need two rooms, two assistants and a laptop for that. The setup is simple—one room has a microphone and someone reading a text aloud, the other room has you wearing headphones and interpreting. The third person listens and rates your performance. This kind of practice is very useful, as you can choose the content and adjust the reading speed.

You can, of course, skip all that and just go to a school or university that provides far more thorough training and has all the fancy equipment, but this usually costs a pretty penny. Another stumbling block here is the lack of an international standard or any kind of worldwide certification. This is actually a good thing – interpreting is a very versatile field, and trying to hem it into some arbitrary framework would cause nothing but harm. It also leaves the profession wide open to influx of promising newbies. Hence, interpretation is all about your personal skill and building connections.

The Job

Welcome to the booth. Enjoy your stay.

So, you have completed your training and are now ready to take wing. Where do you start? Since you are new to the industry, the best course of action would be to find an interpretation company (make sure it is not a “language bank”) and sign up. The company, which is typically a loose network of freelancers run by a single person, receives commissions from clients and distributes them to interpreters.

I do not recommend declining any tasks you get assigned to, as your time with the company serves as a foundation of your career – aside from earning you money, it allows you to polish your skills, create a reputation (you’ll be surprised how many return clients specifically ask for “that guy who did such a good job the last time”) and meet many useful people.

What happens next is up to you. You can stick with the company if you like, or you can use your accumulated capital, knowledge and connections to break away, becoming a freelancer or starting an interpretation company of your own. Each choice has its own benefits and drawbacks.

Staying with the company means that you do not have to look for clients yourself but your personal reputation and income suffer slightly; being a freelancer means that you get to be picky about who hires you (for example, I refuse to work for feminists, Jewish or Muslim organizations and others with whose views I vehemently disagree) but commissions can get quite scarce at times; having your own business means a bigger income, but also more hassle with management and potential risks.

Pros

Money. For many interpreters, this is what brought them into the fold in the first place. A good interpreter makes from $250 to $750 a day. Few other professions can boast such an income. Besides, risks and rewards here correlate directly: the more commissions you accept and the thinner you spread yourself, the more you’ll make.

Connections. As an interpreter, you rub shoulders with businessmen, politicians and all kinds of movers and shakers. Like I, you will probably find most of them unpleasant and shallow, but do not deny the usefulness of making their acquaintance. Knowing a media mogul on a first-name basis can save you tons of money on advertising your future business, while drinking with your country’s president might secure you years of guaranteed, well-paying commissions.

Game. Whenever there is a conference or a meeting, there is almost always a bunch of sexy girls around running errands, shifting papers or handing out leaflets. They are usually bored out of their minds and readily respond to even the crudest game attempts. The amount of times when I left a meeting with one of them in tow for an amazing evening is getting too much to count.

Personal improvement. As your experience in interpreting grows, so does your self-assurance and composure. You shoulder a lot of responsibility and face genuinely difficult situations almost every day; overcoming them steels your mind and gives you a good endorphin rush whenever you walk away from a job well done. Fear of public speaking? Confidence issues? Anxiety? Psshh. You learn to master such feelings very quickly once you start ending up in situations where everything depends on you and there is no going back.

Travel. If you decide to become an escorting interpreter, you will have to accompany a fair amount of big cheeses on their meetings and conferences around the world. Since you'll rarely be busy for more than five or six hours per day, you will have a lot of time to explore, sightsee and do whatever tourists do.

Freedom. Interpreters have a lot of independence. Even if you work for a company, there is very little your boss can do if a client complains about your performance – you are too valuable an asset to lose. Unless you seriously screw things up, the most you're going to get is a verbal slap on the wrist. HR in interpretation companies is near-nonexistent—your skills speak for themselves and nothing else matters, thus removing a need for having some pink-haired ambulocetus hound your every step in order to make sure you are not being "toxic" or "intimidating." For honest opinions and genuine criticism, rely on your colleagues and nobody else.

Knowledge. Unless you choose to specialize in a particular field, you'll be surprised how many new things one can learn about the world as an interpreter. From the plight of industrial fishermen to latest breakthroughs in ophthalmology, every meeting lets you in on something you had no idea of before, increasing your erudition and broadening your horizons. Strange as it sounds, interpreting is very educational.

Flextime. An interpreter does not have a particular workplace or working hours – only assignments. You do not need to wake up early in the morning, drag yourself to an office in a zombie-like state and sit there every day until your ass starts growing roots. Even a moderately busy interpreter only works every other day or so, which leaves him with a lot of free time.

Company. Interpreters come from all walks of life and, due to their profession's rarity, frequently form tight-knit communities. By associating with your colleagues, you might not only make some decent friends, but also learn a lot from those more experienced than you. There is very little competition-induced tension, as demand for interpreters always exceeds the amount of interpreters themselves by a huge margin.

Cons

Stress. Both your main enemy and inseparable companion. Over-exerting your mental capabilities for a living leaves its mark on a person, and as time passes, this mark begins to show. Many veteran interpreters are heavy drinkers or pill-poppers; some become irritable and short-tempered, others sink into depression. My former mentor, a grizzled guru of the profession, is now showing early signs of schizophrenia. If you possess iron will, you will be able to resist the chafing effect of stress on your psyche for a very long time, but few people have such mental fortitude. Do not believe the stock images: interpreting is an overwhelmingly male-dominated profession, as only a miniscule amount of women can take the heat.

Emergencies. Always be ready for a force majeure. The subject of the meeting suddenly gets changed to something you did not prepare for, audio channels go haywire and you end up translating the wrong speech, your colleague gets stomach cramps and runs to the toilet, leaving you to fend for yourself… Dozens of unexpected things can happen during a session, and it will frequently fall to you to improvise and save the day. Unpleasant as they are, such situations teach you self-reliance.

Written translation. You'll be asked to do that a lot, and there is not a single reason why you should agree. Written translation is thankless and monotonous, eating up a lot of time and paying peanuts—the adjective "soul-destroying" applies to it perfectly. Unless you are starving, refuse all offers without regret. All it takes is a couple of accepted commissions for people to latch onto you like ticks—good luck shaking them off afterwards. Leave written translation to office drones.

Flextime. Many people view this as a drawback, as an interpreter does not live by proper weekdays, weekends and days off. Planning a family evening, a drinking night with friends or a date, only to have it cancelled by an untimely commission you cannot refuse can be extremely frustrating.

Seasonality. In many countries, midwinter and late summer are "dead seasons", as everyone is away on vacation. This dries up sources of income for many freelance interpreters; sometimes the "drought" is so strong that even interpreting companies run aground. Always be prudent with your money and have a sizeable sum laid aside for such occurrences.

Conclusion

As I said in the introduction, interpreting is not for everyone. However, in times like ours, when a poster boy for white-collar employment is a passive, metrosexual, coffee-sipping bean counter, interpretation is an excellent way for an ambitious man to monetize his mental capabilities and improve himself at the same time.

Don't Miss: How To Become A Commercial Fisherman

Kiron Solari
Kiron is a somber European man who devotes most of his time to making money, reading, working out and plotting revenge against the people who turned the world upside down.

7 Ways To Prevent Your Children From Becoming SJWs

June 30, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

It is done. You have found the least damaged and slutty girl you could find that also looks like you. She passed all the loyalty tests and the seed has taken root. But the future is bleak and many challenges lie ahead of your progeny.

Elites and media cannot wait to put their gender-fluid sausage-fingered paws on your children and format their young brains. It is your role to shield them from that peril and here is a non-exhaustive list that can help you in that task.

1. Be present

As simple as that. Be there. Listen to them. Spot the early signs of SJW friendly attitude and nip them in the bud. A girl with an absent father, like a ship with no rudder, will turn to an ocean of cocks. A boy with an absent father will turn to crime, or worse, feminism.

Keep them close in their formative years. You are a rock, an example. Live by what you preach. There is only so much you can do. The idea here is to create a strong, independent mind that will be curious, hard to manipulate and ready to question the pre-conceived ideas that the exterior world will feed them.

2. Find the ideal environment

It starts by choosing the right mate. More on that here. Avoid criminogenic urban hives. Make sure that you approve of the local community before you move in somewhere.

Don’t let them go to university. Make them learn something that will bring them a stable future.

Leave America if Trump does not make it great again. Find the fertile ground that will allow your children to grow well and safe. Pick a country that despises SJWs and outright mocks them.

3. Be direct but constructive

Tell them that life is unfair, that family is sacred and explain what death is, among other things. Explain clearly what are the concepts of hard work, merit, strength and beauty, that men and women are very different. That physical appearance and money are important, but that they are not the panacea.

No matter what they say, no man wants to hear that he is weak and no woman wants to hear that she is unattractive.

Tell them that a man has only his integrity and guts for him while a woman has only her fleeting beauty and sexual purity to rely on. Tell them when they have made a mistake and don’t tell them that they are the best if they are not.

While they should not laugh at people that are truly handicapped, when he asks “Dad, why is the lady so fat and smells funny?”, it is your sacred duty to answer: “Because she is lonely, has no self-control and is lazy, my son.”

4. Be the media master

Own a screening device but not the poisonous tube that goes with it. The tube is at war with what you are. Empowered tubs of lard and manginas are not welcome in the sanctuary that is your home.

If you have to make your little ones watch something, have a look at it first. Check the DVD cover, the plot, the signs. Aim for pre-2000 and Internet. Decide.

Provide them with a huge library. Read for them. Encourage them to read on their own. Never stop buying books. Do not allow their devices to have Internet until their minds can understand what is on it. No smartphones. No exception.

Phones are fine. No social network for you, no social network for them. Explain that the real life is out there. There can be a computer with Internet. In the living room, accessible to them during the day and when you are there. Child-proof the Internet and install parental control on your own devices, such as tablets, that are lying around.

5. Celebrate your culture without forcing it on them

Share it. If it is interesting, rich, exciting and beautiful, it will impress on its own and stick. It should be like a beautiful painting on the wall of one’s house. Always there, quietly hanging. It has been seen thousands of times but even away from it, every minor detail of it is memorized.

Bring them to museums instead of theme parks. Help them create a positive cultural identity for themselves.

Read them stories of the great heroes of old and ask them what they think of it. Share slices of life of your childhood and the moments shared with the ones that came before you.

6. Keep them away from the bad seed

The foe in your own backyard is as dangerous as the overlords that want your heirs to follow the herd. Neighbourhood kids, classmates. Keep an eye on the surroundings of your children. Birds of a feather flock together. Keep also an eye on teachers and neighboring adults.

The problem is that children are attracted by nature to what is forbidden. Do not yell and ban outright. Be subtle AT FIRST. Mock, belittle, display alpha traits, just like with game. Heartiste has an interesting point of view on that matter. If the problem persists, use fear, the universal equalizer. Nuke peer pressure. Let someone else's kid be a degenerate.

7. Give them brothers and sisters

A sibling is an ally. A second mind that can bring guidance as well as safety when the father is gone.

An extra root to a strong family tree and one more defender and carrier of your name. If unfortunately you messed up one, (no one is safe) you have a few others to save your line from vanishing into PC-approved degeneracy.

En résumé

Fathers of the previous generations could afford to be distant, god-like figures as family, religion and culture were on their side to look after their heirs. But today, the establishment is at war with us on all fronts. We cannot leave our children be and go with the flow while hoping for the best.

It will be hard and it will last for a while. But it is your duty to look after your own. Be strong and just. Keep going. Do not cave in. They are your children. They will not stop loving you for being strict. There is a reason why parents before us always said “You will thank me later.”

Read More: 12 Ways Famous Celebrities Are Like Little Children Trapped In Adult Bodies

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Western Man Is Now A Ronin

June 30, 2016 | by Jack Ronin | Link | Original Link

During the chaotic and tumultuous periods of feudal Japan, the samurai were the established class of warriors dedicated to serving their Lords. The meaning of the word samurai is “to serve.” If a samurai’s lord died he was expected to ritually disembowel himself in the act of seppuku to maintain his honor.

However, in times of constant war and uncertainty the samurai could easily find himself serving another lord.

Around 1598 the Tokugawa shogunate conquered the fractured nation and unified the land. With pacification and a lack of conflict there became less and less need for warriors. Samurai who chose not to commit seppuku instead became the wandering and disgraced class of ronin.

Due to the feudal hierarchy a samurai was not legally permitted to find work in other fields such as artisan, merchant, or farmer. Even so he would likely scoff because money was regarded as something for women and beneath him. This emerging group of “wave men” or rootless wanderers found employment as mercenaries to the wealthy. Still many chose a life of crime and banditry, operating protection rackets for illegal businesses.

For many the negative side effect of living for higher principles infected their psyche with shame. This was enforced culturally as well. No longer owing his duty and allegiance to his lord, the ronin found himself in unfamiliar territory.

He was trained to serve but never to be a Master himself.

The Modern Male

Killing himself for the system.

A similar situation does the modern male of the West find himself in. He has been trained his whole life to serve.

To serve women.

To serve his country.

To serve his corporation.

When he is no longer useful or unwilling to be a doormat for everyone else he is easily replaced by another more willing slave.

Males of this age unwilling to live a life of servitude for an increasingly hostile system choose to become a modern ronin. Much like the strange social and economic territory the ronin of feudal Japan found themselves in, so too does the modern male when he unplugs from the matrix. We have been propagandized, programmed, and indoctrinated ruthlessly into denying our most savage and masculine nature.

Every male is a target for the privileged victim classes to socially smear and shame without consequence. For most this has just become an accepted part of life. Many even cuck themselves and join the screeching howls of petulant poodles clamoring for their own extinction.

The mistake many of the ronin made before are the same ones a man makes when he realizes he can no longer be a lapdog for the system. He fears to be outcast. He allows shame and other people’s words to forcefully shove him off solid ground. He doesn’t even realize the great power and freedom he has now been given. So this gift goes to waste.

A Most Dangerous Freedom

The new class of modern ronin are completely masterless. They no longer serve the system or feed it's hideous tentacles. Instead of shame and despair they should delight in this blessing. Having no master to serve, no ungrateful lord to fight and die for, you now have the greatest opportunity.

To become the Master.

The modern ronin has nothing to lose. The undeniable power of this rule can make him extremely dangerous. Having been pushed to the fringes by our society, and told we are no longer needed, we are free to live as we please and exert our will to power as we see fit. This is true freedom. The inescapable choice the modern male must make.

Find your fulfillment from external sources of ego validation and compete with the rest of the weak to become the loudest crybaby. Or find contentment from within and become self reliant through outcome independence. This is the Master-Slave dichotomy.

Every male has the savage heart of his ancestors beating furiously inside. Ancestors who hacked their way out of the jungle and forced this bitch Mother Earth to open her fucking legs and give us what we want. We didn't ask her permission. We took it.

Master Or Slave

I have found that in nature and in human relationships as well there exists no such thing as the wispy phantom called equality. There is only the master and the slave. You have a choice in this life. To be the master requires great effort, training, courage and sacrifice. To be the slave just means you continue dropping trou and take it like a good little boy.

What do you think most people choose?

Indeed greater men in the ages past have noted that the natural state of man is one of slavery. You must expel from your mind any former notions of equitable treatment from the world you live in. You must accept the truth. The strong survive. The weak perish. For the modern ronin we can achieve the shape of formlessness. We can embody the ultimate power of mushin no shin.

Mind Of No Mind

This is the mental frame of mind whereby the practitioner has assumed formlessness. Dropping fear, anger, shame, and ego his mind becomes the essence of a fluid motion. This is most readily experienced through combat. Where in battle there is no time to think or even to feel, only to act.

For the modern man who has become a ronin he is in the perfect position to surpass everyone else. He can become his own Master. Leaving the death culture of a post modern world behind and forging ahead to a greater and grander form of living.

One of the greatest examples of a ronin achieving ultimate power is Miyamoto Mushashi, who is considered by many to be the greatest swordsman who ever lived. His Book Of Five Rings is necessary reading on how the modern ronin should think and act. He obeyed none of the rules and therefore became a rule unto himself.

Upon a feud with a rival clan Musashi agreed to a duel with a ranking member. Instead of showing up on time he made them wait. He let them question and wonder. Then at some point seemingly out of nowhere he appeared out of some bushes and immediately started attacking. This is the power of formlessness.

Achieve Mastery

Now there is no better time than ever to be exactly where you are right now. There is much you can do and become. If only you learn to trust your instincts and accept reality for what it is. Not what it should be. You are a man with only YOURSELF to rely on. Never let yourself get comfortable and never forget.

No one is going to help you.

No one is going to save you.

No one gives a fuck about you.

Choose to continue living a life of bitch boy submission for a hateful and poisonous system maliciously aligned against you. Or choose to transcend the modern cesspool of suicidal degeneracy.

That pounding fury in your heart? Listen to it. Trust it. Become the master of your reality. Become a Ronin.

Read More: The Western Male Is The Reason Why His Women Suck

Jack Ronin

Jack Ronin is a former professional MMA fighter. He swallowed the red pill nearly 10 years ago and has been floating down his own heart of darkness ever since. He desires to ignite the will to power in every weak male of the west. You can find his website at The Savage Lifestyle.

How Cicero's "On Duties" Can Help Your Decision-Making Skills

June 30, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Someone once said that our lives are the sum totals of the decisions we make. If this is true, and I think it is, then the next logical step for us should be to look for ways to learn how to make decisions. What is the right thing, and what is the wrong thing? Are there any metrics or standards by which we can judge what is good and bad, or expedient and inexpedient?

But our modern environments give us little in the way of help. We instinctively sense that society itself does not really have the answers. Having cut off the modern generations from the ancient moral code that has sustained Western social systems for centuries, the modern media offers little of substance to replace it. Or perhaps it does: a blind hedonism and a debilitating relativism, both capped with a corona of futility.

Modern man deserves better. Voices that have been suppressed for too long must be re-animated, dusted off, and pored over. One of those voices is Cicero's On Duties. I have had the pleasure of translating it, and thought I might offer a few thoughts on why the book is worth reading. I will also state why I believe my version is superior to the others currently available.

On Duties is meant to be a practical guide to conduct. In broad terms, the volume is separated into three “books,” which discuss the following subjects:

1. What is moral goodness, and how can it be attained?
2. What is expediency, and how can we make use of it?
3. How do we handle situations where moral goodness conflicts with expediency?

In specific terms, however, the book is a gold mine of practical guidance on a huge variety of topics. It’s one of those books you can open at random anywhere, and find actionable life advice in every sentence.

This is no airy disquisition on metaphysical labyrinths. It is firmly grounded in practicality. Just to point out a few topics (among a huge number), Cicero talks about:

- The laws of war
- How to choose a career
- Dealing with debts
- How to seek out a mentor
- The rules of commerce and commercial transactions
- Fraud
- Decorum
- Friendship
- Giving advice
- Real estate transactions
- Bravery
- Patriotism
- Handling ethical dilemmas
- Handling difficult people
- When to break one’s word

These are just a few of the dozens of topics discussed in the book. Most importantly, the book provides what is sorely lacking in today’s educational system: judgment. It tells us what is right, and it tells us what is wrong. There is no mealy-mouthed political correctness here. There is only the unvarnished advice of a man who has lived through much, and learned much.

Why Is The Book Important?

On Duties may be the most famous of Cicero's many philosophical works. After the Gutenberg Bible, it was the first printed book published in Europe after the advent of the printing press. Broadly speaking, the book is about ethics and conduct. It seeks to offer guidance to men on how they should conduct themselves, and how they should go about making decisions.

It is not difficult to see why the book has enjoyed such influence. On Duties is a very practical guide to conduct, responsibilities, and choices. And isn't ethics the highest sort of knowledge? It deals with how we should live our lives. It deals with which paths to take, which roads to follow, and which principles we should base our lives on.

We are never for a moment led into an arid wilderness of metaphysics or gratuitous speculations. Written at a time of great personal anguish for Cicero, the book has a sincerity that draws us in from the opening chapters.

The reader feels that Cicero is a man who has learned much from the battlefields of politics, the courtroom, and personal relations. We sense that this is a man who has managed to maintain his moral compass, and who now wishes to pass on some of that wisdom to us.

But perhaps what elevates On Duties to true greatness is its soaring and inspiring vision of man. This is no dry collection of Poor Richard-esque admonitions to do good and shun evil; this is a normative vision of human behavior that seeks to bring out the very best in us.

The work was written for his son Marcus, who was at the time studying in Athens.

Perhaps his grandest concept—one that lingers in the mind of the reader long after he has closed the cover of the book—is the idea of "greatness of spirit" (magnitudo animi). Cicero gives us an idea of what he means by greatness of spirit in I.20 when he tells us:

> A strong and great soul is altogether distinguished by two features. One is the contempt for the external things of this world. The great soul is persuaded that no man ought to wonder at, hope for, or seek after anything except those things related to goodness and virtue, and that he should succumb to neither another man, nor a disturbance of the spirit, nor a trial of Fortune. The second feature is > that, when you have molded your soul with this sort of attitude, as I said above, you perform great achievements of the highest utility which are extremely arduous, laborious, and full of danger to life and to many other things related to one's livelihood.

With his concept of magnitudo animi, Cicero thus takes the discussion to a whole other level. What we have here is an inspiring vision of man, something that penetrates the reader's heart like an arrow.

This, I believe, is the essential thread running through the book. It is this which makes On Duties such an enduring treasure. His sincere, earnest vision is timeless, and this is why we still read him today. Like any great orator (and was there anyone greater?) he aims far higher, for more universal and evocative principles. And he succeeds brilliantly.

When we put down On Duties, we feel imbued by this same greatness of spirit, and are prepared to renew the contest of life with optimism and fortitude.

How Is My Version Different From Others?

Despite the book's popularity and influence, there has long been a need for a new, annotated translation of this classic.

What may have sufficed for one century or generation may be found wanting for twenty-first century readers. Hence this work. My translation departs from its predecessors in three important respects.

First, most of the existing English translations were done many years ago. Such efforts, which may have been adequate for their era, unavoidably begin to show their age after a certain point. The modern reader wants something accurate and readable, yet which at the same time preserves the classic patina of the original.

Unfortunately, some of the existing translations confront the reader with such a hopeless mass of semi-colons, stacked clauses, archaic nineteenth century diction, and knotted sentences that reading them is a chore rather than a pleasure. Cicero was an eloquent stylist, always conscious of his audience, and this type of translation does injustice to the original.

We must remember that Cicero was always the lawyer, arguing his points with force, conviction, and clarity. When he repeats himself, he does so deliberately. When he castigates political opponents, he does so for a reason. When he tells us multiple times that nothing can be expedient which is not also morally good, he does so deliberately. These are not accidents.

He knows that juries, like book readers, need emotional connection, summary, and repetition. Some translators, because they are not trial attorneys by profession, entirely miss this point.

But those of us who have tried cases before juries—and I am not aware of any other translator of On Duties who was also a trial lawyer—see the method and purpose in Cicero's rhetoric. But the translator must not veer to the other extreme: while Cicero did not write like a Victorian or Edwardian novelist, he did not sound like Hemingway, either.

So when we update On Duties for the modern era, we must go about the task very carefully, keeping these points in mind.

As I see it, the most important duty of the translator is to find that balance between fidelity to the original text and the stylistic rhythms of modern written English. Every language beats with its own heart. What may make perfect sense in a Latin sentence may be anything but clear in a literal English rendering.

In such situations, we must use the grammatical tools available to give Cicero his proper voice. Labyrinthine sentences may occasionally need to be broken into parts. Latin pronouns may need to be specifically clarified. Cicero's love of the passive voice must sometimes be tempered with use of the active voice. We must know when Cicero really means "I" when he writes "we." He can be evasive and slithery one moment, and brutally frank at another.

At times, his meaning resides in his qualifications and obliquities. And so on. Modern, lucid diction should be the translator's default position, unless the context clearly suggests otherwise.

Secondly, it became apparent that a much better way of organizing the material was needed. On Duties deals with a great many topics and terms. Like all classical writings, the text long ago was separated into "books," chapters, and subsections by scribes and editors; but Cicero never gave his chapters descriptive headings or names.

Locating a topic or term easily can then present a problem. Some editors have made use of marginal notes, but these tend to clutter the text, and still require the reader to thumb through too many pages. I have thus opted to create a descriptive table of contents at the beginning of the book which lists the main topics of each chapter (indicated by Roman numerals).

This feature, together with the index, solves the problem of locating subjects and topics efficiently. This is a book that is meant to be used, studied, and discussed.

Thirdly, the modern reader requires descriptive footnotes that presume no previous knowledge of Roman history. A translator can no longer take it for granted that a reader in 2016 will recognize, for example, the names Regulus or Titus Manlius Torquatus.

As stated above, most versions of On Duties were produced for audiences early in the previous century who were assumed to have some knowledge of Roman history or Latin, and likely both. This translation presupposes no such knowledge.

It is accessible to all, not just to students of the classics. Several hundred footnotes explain every historical name and reference, as well as obscure terms, linguistic nuances, places, topics, or textual issues. Commentary sections at the end of each book highlight important issues raised in the text.

What On Duties gives us is a frame of reference for making decisions. We have at last a guide that presents us with a positive view of man that can help us take positive, specific action.

Click Here To Buy On Duties by Quintus Curtius on Amazon

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Pentagon To Allow Transvestites To Serve In US Military, Will Pay For Sex Change Surgery

June 30, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Associated Press:

Transgender people will be allowed to serve openly in the U.S. military, the Pentagon announced Thursday, ending one of the last bans on service in the armed forces.

Saying it's the right thing to do, Defense Secretary Ash Carter laid out a yearlong implementation plan declaring that "Americans who want to serve and can meet our standards should be afforded the opportunity to compete to do so."

"Our mission is to defend this country, and we don't want barriers unrelated to a person's qualification to serve preventing us from recruiting or retaining the soldier, sailor, airman, or Marine who can best accomplish the mission," Carter said at a Pentagon news conference.

Under the new policy, by Oct. 1, transgender troops already serving should be able to receive medical care and begin formally changing their gender identifications in the Pentagon’s personnel system.

A year from now, he said, the military services will begin allowing transgender individuals to enlist, as long as they meet required standards and have been stable in their identified genders for 18 months.

Carter’s announcement comes despite concerns from senior military leaders that the department is moving too fast and that more time is needed to work through the changes. He said he discussed the plans extensively with his military leaders and that, based on their recommendations, he made adjustments to the timeline. He said he has been told that the services now support the timeline.

Under the new policy, transgender troops would receive any medically necessary care including surgery, Carter said.

The new rules also give military commanders flexibility, noting that not all transition cases are the same. Commanders will have the discretion to make decisions on a case-by-case basis, including on job placement, deployments, training delays and other accommodations, based on the needs of the military mission and whether the service members can perform their duties.

For people coming into the military, the plan says that those with gender dysphoria, a history of medical treatments associated with gender transition and those who have had reconstruction surgery may be disqualified as military recruits unless a medical provider certifies that they have been clinically stable in the preferred gender for 18 months, and are free of significant impairment. And transgender troops receiving hormone therapy must have been stable on their medications for 18 months.

So beautiful!

The policy provides broad guidelines for transgender service members currently in the military. They will be able to use the bathrooms, housing, uniforms and fitness standards of their preferred gender only after they have legally transitioned to that identity, according to officials.

Over the next year, the military services will develop and distribute training guidelines, medical protocols and other guidance to help commanders deal with any issues or questions about transgender troops.

Last July, Carter said he intended to rescind the ban, calling it outdated. He has long argued that the military must be more inclusive to bring in the best and brightest.

Read the entire article

Read Next: Allowing Transsexuals To Pick Which Bathroom To Use Is Pure Madness

News Syndicator

This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

5 Victories Of The Patriarchy In 2016

July 1, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

While we certainly have our work cut out for us, I feel that we do not take enough time to acknowledge our victories and bathe in the tears of our enemies. It is in this spirit that I ask you all to raise a glass in a universal toast to some of the largest victories undertaken by the Patriarchy this year. Here's to many more.

1. Increasing Male Bathroom Access And Destroying Female Safe Spaces

One disturbing problem that has been on the rise lately is the terrifying prospect of having to wait in a line in order to use a public restroom. In my youth, this was a problem completely isolated to females, but in the past year I can count three distinct instances where there was a line to use the male restroom. The brilliant minds of the patriarchy came up with an innovative solution: Operation Full Stream Ahead. Open ALL restrooms up to men. We are busy, important, and need to piss, and there's no reason we should only have access to 50% of the restrooms. After all, we built 100% of them.

The solution, I must say, was quite creative. By picking an obscure and relatively unknown minority of mentally ill individuals known as "transgenders" we created the illusion that this group is of significant size that they should be part of public policy debates, and have special laws crafted around them. I admit, I thought it was an absurd plan destined for failure, but the evidence has shown otherwise. Restrooms around the nation are now open for us to urinate in regardless of signage posted at the door.

But when the patriarchy plans for change, we always double down. There is always a secondary, and sometimes tertiary goal in any of our actions. The female restroom was one of their remaining "safe spaces" they could retreat to during a date, gossip with friends, or just discreetly practice their anorexia. Well, all that is over now that men are able to maintain an active presence in female restrooms throughout America.

The tertiary goal of gaming women in restrooms is a path that will be forged by the next generation of brave men, and I look forward to their contributions.

2. Promoting Our Secret Agenda Of Male Physical Dominance

Our operation to infiltrate Hollywood and major advertising studios took several years of covert work, but has finally paid off. Last month, we were able to display the above billboard promoting the new X-Men film, which is only a cover for the real message—communicating to men everywhere that violence against women, particularly choking them with one arm while demonstrating your biological superior body strength—is sometimes necessary to maintain your dominance.

Operation Dark Triad had a two-fold attack: On the one hand, men everywhere were reminded of their physical power, ensuring the Patriarchy remains in power, while at the same time triggering special snowflakes. It was a real win-win. Some would say it's a minor victory, and that the above tweet is correct—we still have a long way before we could portray a human man choking a human woman on a billboard, and that in fact this ad was only created because it tells a fictional battle of a mutant with superhuman powers fighting another mutant with different and unique powers in an action film, but don't listen to those naysayers.

3. Subtle Rules For Gaming Chicks At The Pool

Operation Cool Breeze was a brief success. For the first full month of summer, we were able to propagandize the minds of millions of pool-going individuals throughout America with some reminders for summer gaming. For example, in the image above, clockwise from the girl on the diving board:

It’s cool to keep a fit, toned body that you show off at the pool.

It’s not cool for two dudes to chase each other while there are single attractive ladies around to game.

It’s not cool to game when you are not appropriately dressed for the venue. Always be ready to swim and get wet.

It’s cool to teach younger men the value of game.

It’s not cool to be awkward and socially aloof.

And finally, it’s not cool to chase after fatty gingers swimming in their t-shirts instead of appropriate swimwear.

Social Justice Warriors found some supposed racist message in our posters, something about how it portrayed white supremacy, even though two of the “not cool” labels were of white males, somehow the above was racist. This was an oversight on the patriarchy’s part, and we will make sure to make any secret propaganda materials more politically correct in the future so that their true purpose is not thwarted. Still, even the commenters of the HuffPo find calling this poster “racist” to be stretching.

This is a clear reminder of how we must always consider the most triggered and mentally weak among us, and remember to fool them by always portraying the white male as a dumbass and the overweight aging single female as the natural leader. If we had not been so sloppy in the message above, our posters would still be sitting on display at YMCAs throughout the nation.

4. Getting Feminists To Literally Piss Their Pants

This operation was a mere test of the power of our social media brain distraction devices that have now infiltrated the vast majority of the population. And it was a wild success. Patriarchal members of the 4chan community (I know, I know, but trust me, we are there too) created a false call to action, telling women that by urinating in their clothing they were somehow supporting equality of the sexes. Many feminists obliged, and hilarious photos and damp smelly crotches ensued.

This operation proved the ease with which we can control facile minds through smartphone monitoring and indoctrination devices. Humans have a natural instinctual resistance to urinating or defecating near food, shelter, or clothing, and we were able to override these natural instincts with a few keystrokes and a properly planned hashtag. #Pissforequality was a stunning success.

5. Operation KratOz

I'm pleased to announce that I have been given clearance to finally reveal the secret mission behind the mass outrage of early 2016. The patriarchy concocted a colossal plan of distraction and disinformation, which culminated in authorities diverting enormous resources from targeted areas so that massive quantities of pharmaceutical grade Kratom could be slipped in through normally patrolled areas that were left wide open.

While this was a worldwide coordinated operation, targeted at the largest 50 distribution hubs worldwide, the biggest successes were in Australia, which had yet to develop wholesale distribution lines. A massive distraction along the northwest coast of Australia diverted coast guard, navy, and municipal police forces to monitor this area, searching in vain for nonexistent speedboats full of roving rapists, leaving the southern border open to gargantuan shipments of the potent herb which are now being stored in underground undisclosed locations, ready for distribution in the near future for an undisclosed future operation.

What’s In Store For The Rest Of 2016?

What’s next, Max? Can I reveal plans that Laci Green is actually a double agent sent to destroy feminism from the inside out with sheer stupidity? Was gay marriage a clandestine attempt for men to grab state benefits without committing to women, while continuing to pursue our sexual relationships with females unabashed? Are our scientists and philosophers currently thinking up the newest insanities that will become 6th Wave Feminism, finally destroying it for good?

Alas, I am not at liberty to disclose at this time, but be assured, gentlemen, we are in for a wild and fun ride indeed.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Top 6 Acts Of Censorship In 2016

Max Roscoe

is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

7 Things A Man Must Never Do

July 1, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Here at ROK we usually give advice on what men should do, so now here's a list of things that you shouldn't.

1. Get Fat

Getting fat is one of the worst things a man can do. It makes you less appealing to women which is bad enough if you are married but even worse if you are single. It sets a bad example for your kids and destroys your self-confidence.

It makes it more difficult to move which means you'll have less inclination to exercise—which will make you even fatter. Your sleep quality will suffer. And you will be at more risk for a whole host of diseases that are caused by poor diet: heart disease, high blood pressure, diabetes, sleep apnea, low libido, and man boobs.

If you are already fat you must make it your first priority to drop the pounds. Start immediately.

2. Stop Lifting Weights

You are lifting weights, aren't you? Never stop. Once a man reaches his mid twenties, he will start to lose 1% of his muscle mass every year. At the beginning, the change is not noticeable but by the time a man reaches his fifties the weakness will begin to be apparent.

There is one sure way to prevent, and even reverse, this trend: weight lifting. In his book Muscle Up, fitness expert P.D. Mangan provides evidence that weight training is better than cardio for keeping the fat off and it has the added benefit of making you look good in the process.

You don't have to do a six-day bodybuilding split to get benefits of resistance training. Two or three short sessions per week of basic exercises like the deadlift, squat, shoulder press, and pull ups is sufficient to maintain your muscle mass on a busy schedule.

3. Be Passive

The symbol for man is a circle with an arrow pointing outward. Men are oriented outward by nature. We are meant to be active in the world fighting, trading, toiling, and ruling. It is not part of our character to be passive or to give up.

Compare the male symbol with the symbol for female.

Some speculate that the origin of the symbol for woman is a mirror, which women have used throughout history. Where men are oriented toward the outside world, women are directed inward. Women, by nature, are not meant to be out there trying to make a mark in the world. Their role is to be wives and mothers. Men and women are complementary.

Given the difficult environment that we live in today, lots of men have just given up. Men must always resist that temptation. There are times when you may temporarily withdraw from the heat of battle to regain your strength. Once you have, it is back to arms.

4. Experiment Sexually (With Other Men)

There is a huge push going on to persuade young men and women that gender and sexuality are fluid and that everything is along a continuum. Children as young as elementary school age are being indoctrinated. In our high schools and colleges, sexual experimentation is presented as being normal. This is a lie meant to destroy the young.

There is a reason that the elite are pushing this lie. Once a man engages in an unnatural activity with another man, he is more likely to label himself as being some sort of sexual deviant—one of the 71 possible Facebook genders. He will be a permanent member of the left and dedicate his life to fighting against all that is good.

This is the general rule: Sex is good. Food is good too but if you indulge inappropriately it will damage your health. Be moderate in all things and don’t go against the natural law.

5. Wear Sports Jerseys

Watching sports, like anything in moderation, can be a harmless diversion but it gets silly once you start buying overpriced swag from your favorite teams. Professional sports are dominated by owners who faithfully peddle the SJW line on every point. The NFL is the worst of these. It has been pushing feminism just as hard as Hollywood. Don't let your hard earned dollars go to fund these leftist fat cats.

Besides, why on earth would you wear a shirt with another man's name on the back?

There is one exception to this rule. If your son is a fan of a particular player it's obviously acceptable to wear matching jerseys—it is for a higher good.

6. Don't Father Bastards

About 40% of children born in the US are now bastards. In the black community it is 70%. This is a gigantic societal problem because children need their father living with them. Without a father girls tend to be sluttier. Boys who don't have a father lack confidence and may find themselves struggling to find their place in the world. The elites love bastardy because it creates a population that is easier to rule.

Can children overcome not having their father living with them? Of course. If the father is very dedicated to spending copious amounts of time with his children they still stand a chance of growing up healthy, but why risk it?

By the way, there was a time when siring bastards was highly discouraged. Bastard children could not even inherit wealth from their father. It was an unfair system but it was in place for a reason. It was a strong deterrent to men and women from having unprotected sex outside of marriage. We need to re-implement the stigma that is attached to having a bastard. Using the ugly word ‘bastard’ is one small way to begin bringing this deterrent back.

7. Make A Woman The Center Of Your Universe

A good woman is one of the greatest blessings you will ever find. For overall happiness, a string of one-night stands does not hold a candle to her. But even the best woman is a creature just like you. While she deserves to be cherished she does not deserve to be put on a pedestal. If that applies to the woman that you marry, it applies even more to women that you date.

The irony is that if you hold women in too high regard, they will treat you poorly in return. Make a woman your “everything” is a sure way to get dumped or cucked. This is because women were never meant to be a man’s reason for living. A man must have a higher calling—a higher mission—than just being Sally’s husband or boyfriend.

I can’t tell you what your mission is. For some, it will be ushering in the kingdom of God. For others it may be bringing about a sane political order, becoming a champion mixed martial artist, or starting a successful company. Whatever it is, never lose sight of your mission. The woman will come along as part of it.

Read More: 5 Things I Learned About Women This Week

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

What The Media Is Not Telling You About The Istanbul Airport Terrorist Attack

July 2, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

On this most recent Tuesday night at 10:30, I took a break from enjoying the sights and sounds of Istanbul. I sat down at an outdoor cafe, located in a quaint little alley just off of Istiklal Street, the main drag of Istanbul's center.

I had just landed on Monday evening, roughly 30 hours before. I was taking a break from my six weeks of living in Odessa, having always wanted to see the sights of Istanbul. Yes, I'd heard of all the "dangers" of the country, but I did my due diligence and decided it was worth it.

I pulled out my phone and had some 50 notifications between Twitter, texts, and emails. I felt like a hot girl the morning after she uploads a bikini shot to Instagram. All of them saying the same thing.

"There was an attack at the Istanbul airport, are you ok?"

I was fine obviously fine, and was told I should probably head home and away from any of the main areas—but I couldn't resist walking around. I had to see the truth about how our media would portray this attack on the other side of the world.

The fact of the matter is, it's not pretty.

The Night Of

You would think that in the immediate aftermath of the attack, people would head indoors, but that wasn't the case at all. It wasn't for a lack of knowledge, either. Every TV in every bar had the news of the attack on. However, that didn't deter people from having a good time.

There was a bit of a situation when police were investigating "fireworks" on Istiklal Street about an hour after the explosions at the airport went off:

Everything else was perfectly normal.

I went home and attempted to sleep, but between a bit of adrenaline and responding to all of my concerned family, friends, and blog readers—I didn't get to bed until 4am.

If you ever find yourself in a situation like this, understand that the most stressful part is really other people. Everyone else freaks out: wants to know how you're doing and is sending you different news articles and pieces of advice. It's the worst part of the situation. For many times during the next two days I just wanted to turn my phone off.

The Lies Begin The Next Day

Here is where the North American media has their own agenda. Some media outlets seem intent on showing that there is mass hysteria and panic in Istanbul, while others want to project the image of absolute safety and security.

For example, this article depicts the streets of Istanbul being a ghost town the next day.

> The greatest injury however may be what this attack has done to the psyche of the Turkish people. In a city of 20 million people, it's rare to see an empty corner, let alone a street, and yet in the aftermath Wednesday morning, the normally brimming thoroughfares were still.

The main drag was a bit quiet until the afternoon, as evidenced of this picture I took around 11:30am on Wednesday morning:

The rest of it? A complete lie.

Public transportation was still full. The main squares were still packed with locals and tourists doing their shopping. This was taken from the market square just off of Galata Bridge:

At night, nothing was different:

When I talked to a couple of local shop owners, they were very nonchalant. To them, this is just everyday life. It’s how it is. Many of the small attacks are not covered by our media, at least on a big scale. To me, it seems, we’re being portrayed a picture of absolute terror. That we should be frightened, and allow the governments who condemn terrorism to handle it.

They're doing everything they can to make it seem like it's under control. But it's not.

Returning To The Airport

This was the most shocking thing to me.

If you look at all of the various articles regarding the airport reopening, you'll see a common trend. They are always full of pictures of increased surveillance and security at the airport: policemen scanning cars in the roads leading up to the airport, bomb dogs, security with rifles patrolling everywhere.

I was shocked because there was none of that.

My taxi driver drove straight up to the departures drop off without a single person so much as looking at us. There was no pre-airport metal scanner surveying the underside of our car. No bomb dogs being walked through a line of cars checking things out. In the taxi line, I only saw two police officers patrolling outside.

Part of this outside area has been walled off and no longer looks like a war zone (but those images would never make the front page):

Inside the airport was the same.

Sure, they have metal detectors and a brief security system before you can check in for your flight, but many airports do. There was no armed security by these. Just a simple metal detector operated by a group of workers who hardly looked more enthusiastic or vigilant than TSA employees.

After checking in and going through real security, nothing was different than any other day.

From the moment I stepped into the cab at my apartment to the time I boarded my flight, I saw no additional security measures that would make me think that just two days earlier a couple of bombs had exploded in the world's 11th-busiest airport.

It Makes You Think

Why is the media showing the absolute terror of the situation (as well as in the city itself the next day), but then projecting an image of security and safety in the days after?

Do they do it with all terror situations, like the Orlando shooting?

I suspect their agenda is to show the terror to frighten everyone, and then project the myth that it's all under control in the days after. Their underlying message isn't something I fully understand at this point, but Roosh has some thoughts on it.

All I know is this: I saw what they showed regarding the Istanbul attacks, and it's safe to say–the North American media is full of lies.

Read More: 12 Buzzwords Liberals Use To Scare You Into Agreeing With Gun Control

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

How To Achieve A Harmonious Marriage According To Ancient Chinese Wisdom

July 2, 2016 | by Carl Linnaeus | Link | Original Link

I am an ethnic Swede happily married (to a non-Swedish woman) with children. I believe in a creator of the Universe and I am a traditionalist who believes in the nuclear family. These beliefs qualify me as ”extreme” in Sweden despite having completed advanced studies at University.

No matter how we look at our Swedish Marxist society the statistics are horrifying. Swedish nuclear families are now under threat of extinction and 47% of all Swedes are living alone. More than 75% of Swedish kids are born without two married parents. Kids are brainwashed from a young age with emphasis on LBGT, ”feminist” values, fame and gain, free sex, evolution theory, atheism, vaccines etc. They learn nothing about important things such as how to raise a family, how to respect others, spiritual belief, traditions, culture etc.

Marxists want to destroy nuclear families and its strategy is to teach our children to selfishly fight for themselves instead of fighting for a family. Let´s look at some statistics:

Marriage futures

We see three trends in these diagrams. Many people live alone, youngsters have poor mental health and they don´t get married and start families. I believe all these trends are connected. Why doesn't anyone in mainstream media talk about these facts? Aren't these important questions?

I have studied ancient Chinese culture and I believe it holds deep wisdom for how men and women should act in their daily life to achieve a harmonious family life with good health for all the family members.

Confucius said 2500 years ago:

> To put the world in order, we must first put the nation in order; to put the nation in order, we must first put the family in order; to put the family in order; we must first cultivate our personal life; we must first set our hearts right.

Ban Zhao – A Feminine Icon For Traditionalists

Ban Zhao wrote a book called Lessons For Women around 2000 years ago. She taught women five lessons:

1. Humility

2. The Way Of Husband And Wife

3. Respect And Caution

4. Feminine Qualifications

5. Implicit Obedience

Humility

To put a newborn baby girl below the bed (as they did in old China) plainly indicated that she is lowly and weak, and should regard it as her primary duty to humble herself before others. To give her potsherds with which to play signified that she should practice labor and consider it her primary duty to be industrious.

The Way Of Husband And Wife

This is intimately connected with Yin and Yang. These are the two basic elements of the universe: Yin, the soft and yielding feminine element, and Yang the hard and aggressive male element. Truly it´s the great principle of heaven and Earth and the great basis of human relationships.

> If a husband is unworthy, then he possesses nothing by which to control his wife. If a wife is unworthy, then she possesses nothing with which to serve her husband. If a husband does not control his wife, then the rules of conduct manifesting his authority are abandoned and broken. If a wife does not serve her husband, then the proper relationship between men and women and the natural > order of things are neglected and destroyed.

>
> Gentlemen only know that wives must be controlled…But they do not understand that husbands and masters must also be served… To only teach men and not to teach women – isn´t that ignoring the essential relation between them?..

Yin-Yang Balance

As Yin and Yang are not of the same nature, so man and woman have different characteristics. The distinct quality of the Yang is rigidity; the function of the Yin is yielding. Man is honored for strength; a woman is beautiful on account of her gentleness. Hence the old saying: "It is feared that a man born like a wolf may become a weak monstrosity; it is feared, a woman born like a mouse may become a tiger."

Respect And Caution

> If husband and wife habitually stay together… then they will lust after and take liberties with one another. From such action improper language will arise. This language may lead to licentiousness and from there will be born a heart of disrespect of the husband… If wives don´t suppress contempt for their husbands they will rebuke and scold them.

Feminine Qualifications

A woman should have four qualifications:

Feminine Virtue

- Feminine Speech
- Feminine Bearing
- Feminine Work

Implicit Obedience

Ban Zhao mentions that a woman should never talk back or argue with her mother-in-law. Even less so with the master of the house, her husband.

When I first read Ban Zhao I felt that even though her theories sounded extreme and unbelievable to modern people, she describes how humans can imitate nature and create a natural strong attraction between spouses. In old times they really wanted to create as strong opposites as possible to create as strong attraction as possible. She claims that if women learn to serve their husbands with their hearts they will get very strong appreciation from their husbands, hence increasing the attraction and power of the marriage.

This is not about suppressing women—it is all about creating maximum attraction between husband and wife. It doesn't matter which task you perform, what matters is if you put your heart into your task. Hence the man should be as protective as possible and respect his wife as much as possible.

So, where is the hope for a masculine man in our times? There must be something really good in this world to balance our Marxist culture. Perhaps you can achieve it by following this ancient Chinese wisdom.

Read More: Traditional Marriage Is How Past Societies Prevented Drama

Carl Linnaeus
Carl Linnaeus is a happily married Swedish father. Since Sweden is a marxist state he needs to stay anonymous. He believes that truth will soon prevail. He wants to inspire people to be good people with traditional beliefs. Love the Creator - Love Your Neighbour - Love Yourself.

-

Two Do-It-Yourself Methods For Training Your Forearms

July 3, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

The forearms were historically, and to a lesser extent still are, considered one of the benchmarks for a man's upper body physique. While the uninitiated will still pop a single or double bicep when told to "make a muscle," the discerning observer with a little knowledge will be more impressed with large, muscled forearms.

And why shouldn't they? While the biceps have their use in adducting the arm back towards the torso, the forearms and wrists will be used much more in any given day-by definition, anything that gets picked up has to be picked up with the hands (please don't flood the comments with pictures of yokes and back harnesses in an attempt to "prove me wrong"), and guess what muscles open and close the hands? More specifically, guess which muscles keeps the hands closed while encumbered with a heavy weight?

You will not have a heavy deadlift, overhead press, or bench press if you have weak hands. And for athletes, your punching, wrestling, grappling, throwing, and catching will be ineffectual without proper forearm training. In the words of Thomas Inch and many other pre-20th century strongmen, weak hands makes a weak man.

Thomas Inch

Bad Methods

Most of you were probably familiar with the necessity of training the forearms, and have already begun a program of forearm training. The problem is that most of the forearm isolation training you're currently doing is bullshit. Things like wrist curls. These are the biggest load of uselessness you can do for your forearms—namely because holding the weight up and against the palm takes away the element of fighting against gravity that other training methods use, and the clenched fist posture takes away any involvement of the fingers (training of the individual muscles of the fingers is a key element of grip training that is often overlooked). But if you want a flimsy muscle pump that doesn't affect functional strength and risks hurting the tendons in your wrist, be my guest.

The wrist rollers most people see in their gym aren't a bad choice, but they have the obvious disadvantage of having a fixed weight—you could untie the rope each time and use a progressive amount of weight, but this inconvenience method can be done better with a method detailed below.

Grippers like the Captains of Crush model are also a good choice, but expensive. And if you too are one seeking to "enjoy the decline" with a minimalist lifestyle, then you'll try to spend as little money as possible. And as luck would have it, there are several adjustable ways to train the forearms that can either be done without any equipment at all, or with easily obtained materials around your home.

Two Worthwhile Methods

Not counting the compound lifts like the deadlift, the first forearm training I mastered, for purposes of building a base of strength in static holds, is the one-handed fingertip pushup. I refer to this as a static forearm hold because while there is obviously movement, the fingers are stationary, only carrying the body's weight. Before you can do the one-handed fingertip pushup, you of course have to master the two handed finger tip pushup, as shown below.

Fortunately, the steps in this exercise series are identical to the standard one-handed pushup detailed in this article. Thus, there's no need to go over them in detail.

The next one is a variation of one you might be familiar with—the old version was to take a single sheet of your standard newspaper, and crumple it up solely using the fingers of one hand. This is a decent warm up, but the thin paper sheets will not engage the muscle fibers enough for sufficient strength building. Instead, what should be done is to take a hand towel (roughly equivalent to the size of a newspaper sheet) and crumple that up—the increased thickness and friction of the towel will make it a more difficult exercise. Plus, all of the fingers will be moving and working as individual units to compact the towel. You will feel a great burn in your forearm.

After a few workouts, this will become pretty easy to you, but it can be made more difficult: Poke a hole in one end of the towel (or get a golf towel which already has a hole in it), and loop a string through the hole. Then tie that string around a small bucket (the kind of bucket that kids bring to the beach will suffice). With that, you have created a forearm training device with adjustable weight.

The bucket alone adds weight and resistance, and this will increase difficulty. Once you can crumble the towel up with the bucket, you can gradually begin adding sand, rice, dry beans, water, or anything else to the bucket. It sounds minuscule, but it does make the exercise much more difficult. And if that becomes too easy, try with a full size bucket (bear in mind that I am incapable of doing this with a full size bucket, and the strongest men in the world likely would struggle with it).

Conclusion

The two exercises detailed here are hardly the only effective forearm/grip training methods—hell, they're not even the only forearm training techniques that I use. But these exercises have been chosen because you should already have the materials to do these highly effective exercises.

And while I will undoubtedly do more forearm related articles in the future (due to the forearms being in my opinion one of the most important muscles to train), these two alone will help all of your athletic endeavors.

Read More: How to Balance Intense Physical Training with Living Life

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Study: Homosexuals And Bisexuals Are More Likely To Be Mentally Ill, Drug Abusers

July 3, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

It's summer now, and in Sweden that means it's pride parade season. One thing that's different this year is that the very gay Milo Yiannopoulos is coming here to lead a parade on July 27th. The reason is that this particular parade will go through Tensta, a suburb comprised of mostly immigrants, a lot of them Muslim. We'll see how that goes.

In other gay news: a new survey has found excess health problems in gays, lesbians and bisexuals. These groups reported more health problems than straight men and women.

More prone to smoking and heavy drinking

The study was done in the US, with nearly 69,000 participants. The National Health Interview Survey has been around for many years, but in 2013 and 2014 it included a question about sexual orientation for the first time.

The researchers conclude that gay, lesbian and bisexual adults "were more likely to report impaired physical and mental health, heavy alcohol consumption, and heavy cigarette use, potentially due to the stressors that (they) experience as a result of interpersonal and structural discrimination."

The results show that lesbians, compared to heterosexual women, are 91 percent more likely to report poor or fair health. Lesbians are also 51 percent more likely, and bisexual women more than twice as likely, to report multiple chronic conditions, compared to straight women.

Gays, lesbians and bisexuals are more likely to indulge in heavy drinking and smoking. 26 percent of gay men and about 40 percent of bisexual men reported at least moderate psychological distress, compared to about 17 percent of heterosexual men.

In the case of women, about 22 percent of heterosexuals had at least moderate psychological distress, compared to about 28 percent of lesbians and about 46 percent of bisexuals.

Last year's parade through the immigrant neigborhoods.

Gilbert Gonzales of the Vanderbilt University School of Medicine in Nashville, who worked with this study, thinks so-called "minority stress" may account for health differences between heterosexuals and gay, lesbian and bisexual people. He thinks bisexuals have it worse than the rest because they may not always be accepted by gay, lesbian and transgender communities.

Right off the bat, you know the researchers aren't exactly unbiased in this matter, since they talk about "structural discrimination" of these minority groups in America, a country where they are constantly praised in the media and by the elites. But leaving that aside, their study does show some interesting results.

I can't say that I'm surprised. There are many possible reasons why the LGB (and likely also T) community is having more psychological problems than heterosexuals. One reason could be that some people do treat them badly on account of them being so strange (there's a reason why they're called queers). If they insist on acting act out their weird sexual desires in public, it's understandable that some will take offense to that.

This is the kind of sick stuff we have to deal with.

Some might even go so far as to discriminate against them. A business owner with more traditional values might deny them service—for instance, refuse to be the host of a gay wedding. That could well cause the gay couple to feel distress. (Although I would say that that's the business owner's right in a free country.)

But I would argue that there are other factors that affect LGBT people's mental health more than real life discrimination, which can't be that common in Western countries. The fact that their situation is often described as a lot more bleak than it is, is something that surely must affect them in a negative way. If they're constantly being told about how oppressed they are by white, cisgender men, and "the religious right" (but not Muslims, we can't say that), then of course they're gonna be worried about their safety and future.

In the same way, if you tell a black person enough times that the police are after him and want to shoot him to death, for nothing more than walking down the street, eventually he's going to believe it and start resenting cops and society in general.

They're here, they're queer, I can't get used to it.

Why celebrate sexual deviance?

But there's one other factor that I want to bring to this discussion. I'm not a scientist like Gilbert Gonzales, and I'm definitely going to sound like a prejudiced asshole saying this (although it wouldn't be the first time), but I think there's something fundamentally wrong with gays, lesbians and bisexuals. Wrong in the sense that they weren't created as they were supposed to be.

People are, like all animals, supposed to mate with each other, otherwise we wouldn't still be here. Hence, we're meant to be heterosexuals. Ergo, gays, lesbians and bisexuals were born with a faulty constitution. And since they're faulty, it's no wonder if that reflects on their mental condition.

I'm not saying that there's necessarily something morally wrong with being gay, just that they're a small minority of the populace for a reason. It's not something we should encourage people to be—the results of the study presented above support that case.

Should someone feel pride over being born faulty? Should it be paraded around in the street like it's something we should celebrate? Should we embrace a condition that impedes our species' ability to survive? I'm not sure I can agree with that.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Bisexuals Cannot Be Taken Seriously

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

15 Ways Masculine Schools Can Turn Boys Into Men

July 4, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Let’s face it, the education system today is a total disgrace. The boys who are forced into schools are socialized to behave like girls, their imagination and dreams are crushed, and they’re fed progressive propaganda in every step of the way. The SJWs we see today are the direct results of decades of social conditioning in these educational institutions.

So, as a counter, I propose a new education system that will revitalize masculinity and stabilize society as a whole.

1. Separate the sexes

They look more like men than half of the millennials.

Systemic emasculation of men begins in our schools where boys and girls are treated as equals. It’s time to abolish that and have different standards for different sexes. There’s no practical reason to keep boys and girls in the same classrooms.

2. Get male teachers for boys

If you’re going to separate the boys from the girls, you need male teachers to guide them. China is already doing the right thing by trying get more male teachers to make men out of boys. If you’re not teaching the young ones how to be men, what are you teaching them?

3. More physical education

The boys are growing and they're full of energy. But with modern technology, many are staying home glued to electronic screens. In fact, the majority in the UK are spending less time outside than prison inmates.

I don't think they need to be crowded into classrooms and given Ritalin for not sitting still; just let them be more active. Make them strong by teaching them to cultivate their body from a young age.

4. Teach boys how to fight

Bullies don’t pick on kids who are strong and confident; it’s always the weaklings who give off a loser vibe who get targeted. So I say teach the boys how to fight so that they’ll be strong. Boxing or martial arts should be a requirement. Bullying probably won’t stop, but it’s better than leaving the boys defenseless.

5. Start schools later

This was me in high school and university.

When teenagers go through puberty, their circadian rhythm shifts by three hours only to be corrected in adulthood. This means that it’s nearly impossible for them to sleep early as their melatonin production in the brain doesn’t start until late night. And the fact that schools start early only leads to sleep deprivation that damages their physical growth and ability to learn.

So I say start schools around 10 or 11am and let them get all the sleep they need.

6. Shorten the hours and give less paper work

Overload, the fastest way to kill motivation and the desire to learn.

There’s no need to waste money and time force-feeding facts into the mind. Teach only the essentials and let their own curiosity lead to discovery. Studying is not learning.

7. Teach them the fundamentals of life

Meanwhile in Russia…

A typical class today is like this: the teacher dumps facts for the students to copy and memorize, the students do their homework and tests for grades. If a student performs poorly due to whatever reason, the teacher blames the student for being dumb and lazy. It’s a moronic system.

So, instead of dumping useless knowledge in hopes that they’ll soak it up, why not teach the fundamentals of life? Teach them about discipline, perseverance, courage, honor, leadership, accountability, to not be discouraged by the critics, to never give up, and to stand up again after each failure.

8. Train them in physical labor and skills

Most of what boys learn at school are worthless and forgotten after graduation. Instead, they should be taught how to do physical labor and learn useful skills that they will carry for the rest of their lives. Today, far too many young men are losing out on opportunities because they don't have technical skills and refuse to work with their hands.

9. Teach them about money

Our current education system seems to be developed specifically to breed a horde of minimum-wage workers for corporations to exploit. It's easy to look at today's pitiful youth and blame them for their economic station. You can tell them that it's their fault that they're poor or don't have a decent job, but the fact is, most of them have been trained to be that way because of our education system. They were taught to be passive and obedient, and that they can have their dream job if they just believed in it. And they all fell for it.

So, instead of keeping a blindfold on them regarding finances, teach them how to save and make money. Let them know how money circulates around in our society.

10. Teach them how to start their own business

Speaking of money, there's no better way to teach the young how to become independent and responsible than by teaching them to be an entrepreneur.

Many people in the manosphere have a habit of simply telling someone to start his own business from ground up, but the reality is that today's youth are clueless because they've been trained to conform and not think for themselves. They've been taught to be safe and not take chances. I don't think there's a better way to solve the current youth unemployment and underemployment than teaching students to be their own boss.

11. Teach them values

Without values, boys will simply slip away into the culture of decadent consumerism and hedonism. I find it amazing that schools today barely teach anything that will keep the society's moral fabric together. When I went to school in Canada, the only "value" they taught me was multiculturalism and progressivism. (Yeah, thanks assholes. Looks like this one backfired badly and turned against you.)

It doesn't matter if it's Christian or Confucian values—teach the youth something. Any traditional or national value is better than nothing.

12. Make them pay for their education

I don't think it's healthy to teach kids from a young age that they can get freebies from the government courtesy of the tax payers. In exchange for their education, they should do volunteer work for their communities and clean and maintain their own schools. This way, they'll appreciate their education more and be better motivated to learn.

13. Destroy their egos

Today's parents are sickening with the way they spoil and shelter their children. The result of their piss-poor parenting and pandering is already apparent for all to see. The majority of adolescents now are narcissistic attention-whores who are lazy and entitled while being emotionally insecure and immature. To think that these whiny, self-absorbed gremlins will grow up and lead the future is truly frightening.

My suggestion is that kids today should have their egos crushed in schools and learn to earn the respect they desire. No more telling them how special they are, no more sheltering their precious feelings, and no more lies about how great they are. No, you kids all dumb and worthless sack of monkey shits until you can prove me otherwise.

14. Sex roles and dynamics

Sex relations is one of the most important aspect of human life, yet they're not even taught in schools. Teach boys how to be men and teach girls how to be women, then tell them how to get along. Is that really too hard? Yes, because today's society wants to androgynize the population into economic units while destroying families and sex relations in the process.

Besides general sex education, boys should be taught about the female nature and the dynamics of sex relationships. Even just one hour a week of red pill knowledge would make all the difference.

15. Let them be free

Once all of the above are accomplished, boys should be set free. They need to learn how to be autonomous and try new things for themselves. They need to let their own curiosities and imagination lead them to their dreams. They need to fail over and over without a net to catch them so that they will learn on their own. Let them make their own decisions and face the consequences. Let them fulfill their own potentials without anyone holding them back or holding them up. Let them be men.

Conclusion

Sadly, even though it will create a better future for everyone at a far less cost than all the money governments are wasting, none of this will happen due to political correctness, bureaucracy, and the general state of our decaying society. The best you can do is to train your boys yourself and minimize all the toxic influence of our current culture.

Read More: How Your Education Failed You

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Ambrose Bierce: An Influential And Underappreciated American Writer

July 4, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Before Stephen King, H.L. Mencken, and H.P. Lovecraft, there was Ambrose Bierce. He was without doubt one of the strangest figures in American literary history. His work straddled several genres, including supernatural fiction, journalism, and literary criticism; and much of his output foreshadowed the trends in fiction and journalism of our own time. Irascible, bitter, and quarrelsome, he could also be generous, loyal, and incredibly brave. He deserves to be better remembered, for he is one of the few nineteenth-century American writers who can be said to be truly visionary.

The story of his life explains much about his literary themes and inclinations. Born in 1842 in Ohio as the tenth of thirteen children, his father was an eccentric man obsessed by religion and politics. Most of his siblings led dissolute and wayward lives, variously running off to join circuses or do missionary work in Africa; we may get an indication from this of the high level of domestic instability he was subjected to growing up.

As a young man he was moody, withdrawn, and intense; and to this was added an true love of learning and literature. The outbreak of the American Civil War in the early 1860s saved him from historical oblivion. Enlisting in the Ninth Indiana Volunteers at the age of 19, he loved military life, perhaps because it gave him a purpose and structure that he had lacked.

By all accounts he was an extremely brave and competent combat soldier. He was so good, in fact, that he was given a battlefield commission as an officer, eventually serving on a general's staff. He fought in the brutal Battle of Shiloh, and the horrifying things he saw there would haunt him till the end of his life. He would never be able to expiate the hellish visions lodged permanently in his memory. His ghost and horror stories are, more than anything else, products of these experiences.

At the end of the war, Bierce moved out West to seek his fortune in the world of journalism. He eventually settled in San Francisco and began to churn out column after column of "social commentary" and criticism. This was the age of yellow journalism, robber barons, and gilded corruption; and there was no shortage of targets for "Bitter Bierce's" (for he soon acquired this moniker) pen. Bierce was merciless in his attacks on ignorance, pettifoggery, stupidity, and smugness; he always went personal, and he went right for the jugular.

His diatribes spared no one: suffragists, politicians, clergymen, bad novelists, educators, businessmen, even close friends and companions. He had a complicated and neurotic personality which made it difficult for people to warm to him; although he was personally handsome and charming, this pleasant exterior masked a soul awash in venom and despair.

He would eventually alienate most of his friends and family. His upbringing and war experiences had, it seems likely, permanently shattered his faith in humanity. And although this attitude made him a profoundly unhappy man, it produced some of the most incredible writing in American letters. Much of his "attack" journalism would foreshadow the bitter vitriol found in many corners of the internet today.

A big break came for him in 1887 when he met and befriended the young William Randolph Hearst. Their twenty-year relationship would be a fruitful one, even though it ended as did most of Bierce's relationships: that is, badly. Bierce reached a high point in his career when he exposed and thwarted the corrupt schemes of one of the worst of the robber barons, Leland Stanford. Standford had entered into a highly profitable arrangement with the federal government whereby he would obtain the use of public lands for railways for favorable loan terms.

The corrupt Leland Stanford

When it came time for Stanford to begin making payments on the loans, which came to about seventy-five million dollars, he balked; instead, he had corrupt politicians in Washington introduce a bill that would forgive the debts. Stanford, essentially, then would have successfully used public funds to enrich himself and his business. Bierce exposed this scheme to the public; when Stanford tried to bribe him, Bierce named his price as "seventy-five million, payable with a check to the US Treasury."

Although personally an unpleasant man, he had an unexpected sense of honor and honesty. And yet as he grew older, he became ever more cantankerous and acid. His temper, made worse by drinking, could flare up at the slightest provocation, whether real or imagined, with the result that few wanted to be around him. He divorced his wife, alienated his brother Albert, and lived to see his own children die in unhappy circumstances: one son was killed in a brawl and another perished from alcoholism.

The final act of his life was perhaps the best way it could have ended. In 1913, when he was 71 years old, he decided to go to Mexico to cover the civil war there. We are told that he tried to attach himself to Pancho Villa's retinue as a war correspondent; what is certain is that he disappeared in Mexico, never to be heard from again. Many theories have been advanced on Bierce's fate. It seems probable that he inevitably offended Villa in some way, and that he was either killed in battle or simply shot by bandits and buried in a shallow grave in the desert. It is unlikely we will ever know for certain.

Bierce denounced the greed and excess of the Gilded Age

Such was the strange life of Ambrose Bierce. But what of his work? In many ways it anticipated the dislocation, alienation, and conflicted morality of the twentieth century and beyond. His stories deal with themes that later, more famous writers would take up: incest, patricide, masculine alienation, the darkness of the human mind, ghosts, the revenge of the dead, and the idea that evil deeds would have consequences. If Bierce was a brutal cynic, he was not an immoral one: there is an undeniable method to his madness, but he concealed it under so many layers of bitterness that few had the patience to peel them back.

It is my opinion that his wayward youth, and horrifying experiences in the Civil War colored his outlook for the rest of his life. His best stories, indeed, deal with the effects of trauma and death on the human body; his ideas about the catharsis of suffering and combat were just too startling to be appreciated by his contemporaries. He was a twentieth-century writer trapped in the nineteenth century. Some of his most imaginative techniques (e.g., the idea of telling a story from multiple angles) had to wait decades before they were taken up by filmmakers and other writers.

“An Occurrence At Owl Creek Bridge”

Some of his tales are masterpieces of mental derangement and horror. “The Damned Thing,” “The Middle Toe of the Right Foot,” “An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge,” and “Moonlit Road” are all deservedly well-known. In their use of weird irony, surreal narrative style, and use of flashbacks, Bierce’s stories have a much more “modern” feel to them than anything put out by his contemporaries. He rejected the self-satisfied smugness of his era, and was never able to get over the things he had seen in the Civil War.

But great artistry springs from conflict and strife, and for this reason alone we should give Ambrose Bierce his due.

Read More: 7 Things A Man Must Never Do

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Gun Violence Cut In Half Despite Twice As Many People Owning Guns

July 5, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

If you listen to the hysterical mainstream media, you'll walk away with the impression that something just has to be done about gun violence, rights of the peons be damned. Those rebel flag waving hicks and people who "cling to their guns and religion"—to quote Barack Hussein Obama—are going to have to bend the knee to the stripping of one of their most fundamental freedoms, the Second Amendment, so we can all live in a hypothetical, perfectly safe socialistic bubble, and more importantly, so people won't have any defense against encroaching tyranny.

Sure, the American military has weapons beyond the wildest dreams of the simple gun owner, but the gun owners have strength in numbers. It's hard to send people to government work camps when there are 357 million firearms in the nation—more guns than there are people. At the very least, all hell will break loose when government agents come around to round people up, if indeed that ever happened. It won't be a neat and tidy transition to authoritarianism with a populace armed to the teeth.

Never is the fact mentioned by elites in the propagandist media that authoritarian governments from that of Mao Zedong to Hitler stripped their citizens of guns before instituting totalitarian governments that murdered millions, nor is the fact you have a near zero chance of dying in a mass shooting ever given the emphasis it deserves. Hitler knew the importance of disarming the citizenry before subjecting them.

> The most foolish mistake we could possibly make would be to allow the > subjugated races to possess arms. History shows that all conquerors who have allowed their subjugated races to carry arms have prepared their own downfall by so doing. Indeed, I would go so far as to say that the supply of arms to the underdogs is a sine qua non for the overthrow of any sovereignty. So let's not have any native militia or native police.

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

Beyond the fact citizens are disarmed before they are subjected to centralized power, despite the genuflecting of countless empty headed talking heads, the fact is life is much more mundane than they would like it to be. You are far more likely to die when you go hop into your box on wheels sedan (that you are probably in debt bondage paying for) and make your way down to your corporate job. In fact, twice the number of people die every single day in automobile accidents than died in the "biggest mass shooting in history" in Orlando. Yet, we haven't heard from the left about banning automobiles. (Yet, anyway. The global warming religion will push that agenda item at a later date.)

Here are things that really kill people in great numbers, but they don't make for compelling video to suit a news director's need to create drama so he, she or zhe (heh) can put asses in seats in front of the idiot box. Asses that your local propaganda outlet needs so desperately. You are more likely to die from falling out of a tree than you are at the hands of a mass murderer. Let's look at things that kill more people than mass shooters:

- Falling out of a tree: 100 deaths annually
- Falling inside your home: 13,000 deaths annually
- Suicide: 42,000 deaths annually
- Kidney infections: 48,000 deaths annually
- Stroke: 133,000 deaths annually
- Cancer: 592,000 deaths annually
- Heart disease: 614,000 deaths annually

The mass media also never bring up the fact that an increasing chorus of people, from Judge Napolitano to Steven Seagal are questioning the truthfulness of sensational news headlines the echo chamber foams at the mouth selling to a public that is, by and large, malleable and suggestive to thought control. Here are some bombshells that the media selectively avoided when they were trotting out their gun control narratives:

- Judge Napolitano revealed that nobody died until 5:13 AM in the Orlando mass shooting—that is until the FBI and SWAT teams entered the Orlando gay club hours after the standoff began. This raises a number of questions that were never even brought up, let alone answered. Napolitano is apparently the only mainstream media personality who bothered to read the FBI's report. He said: Here's whats news in the summary, nobody died until 5:13 in the morning, when the SWAT team entered, prior to that no one had been killed. The 53 that were injured, and the 49 that were murdered all met their fates at the time of, and during, the police entry into the building. This is a bombshell revelation, readily available in the official FBI report.
- Steven Seagal dropped this bomb on Russian television last fall: I believe that, and I hate to say this, a lot of these mass murders and all this funny stuff that's going on, I believe a lot of this is engineered.

Beyond questioning the official narrative and conspiracy theories, even if you think people who question authority are nuts, the representation of of gun violence as increasing—as half the public thinks it is—reveals the power of the corporate press to distort facts and create false realities as Congress' own statistics reveal. Gun crimes and gun violence have plummeted over the past 20 years, yet the public believes otherwise. As Einstein said: Blind belief in authority is the greatest enemy of truth.

Gun violence has tumbled over the past 20 years, despite what the media tell you

Gun Violence At Record Lows

Let's look at some statistics. The number of guns per person has increased from 0.93 to 1.45 over the last 20 years. There are more guns than people in the United States. That is a whopping 56% increase in the number of guns over a generation. However, the gun homicide rate has tumbled 49% in that same time. The gun homicide rate has fallen from 7.0 to 3.6 deaths per 100,000 people. Gun homicides have been cut in half while the number of guns has more than doubled! This is exceptional news, but chances are you have never heard of it unless you read alternative media. This fact gun crime is down is coming straight from the horse's mouth, the U.S. Government itself.

Despite the fact you are more likely to die of just about anything but guns in your lifetime, the fact gun violence is plummeting to record lows, and the fact people own more guns than ever proving there is no link between gun ownership and violence, politicians feel the need to take away the average citizen's capability to defend against criminals and tyranny. This reveals the gun violence narrative is pushed by politicians and the media for a reasons other than those stated by our "social betters."

- Politicians and social engineers need to create a gun violence issue to continue the Hegelian dialectic: spin up a "gun control" problem, have a preplanned solution (i.e. gun confiscation) in place, and direct all "solutions" towards that goal.
- The media makes their living and maintains their ivory tower by creating problems to create profit. There is nothing scarier to average people than the prospect of being mowed down by a nut with a gun, so the rational and responsible view that yes, mass shootings are an issue but do not deserve 24/7 attention is immediately discarded in favor of sensationalism. This also speaks to the lack of journalistic integrity to report on mass shootings but also to calm the public down with the fact that these are very isolated events and that gun violence overall is tumbling. They often excuse their hysteria with "human interest" in these bloody stories, pointing to the victims. This is nothing but exploitation of tragedy for profit and to push an agenda, as far more people die from other causes of death each and every day.
- Creating "sitting ducks" by pushing gun-free zones all over the nation is another way guns and gun owners are marginalized. The government doesn't need to ban the Second Amendment if they make the entire country a gun-free zone. Gun-free zones invite violence, as attackers know they're more likely to inflict harm on defenseless sheep than armed wolves.

Beyond gun violence and gun homicides being at historical lows, there are other facts the puppet masters don't want you to know.

A teacher and student guarding the entrance to their Delaware school in 1973 after a shooter called in a threat. No gunman ever arrived

More Hidden Information

Let's bust a couple more gun myths promulgated by the irresponsible and shameless mass media and look at a couple of important facts they ignore.

Myth: Children are at significant risk at school of being killed by a mass shooter.

After Sandy Hook, an impressionable and irrational public immediately pushed for schools to be gun-free zones, and to turn schools into the equivalent of prisons for children. However, only a couple of generations ago the above scene at a Delaware high school played out after a threat was called into the high school. Students and teachers went to their cars to pull out their guns at the school, and no gunman ever showed up. My, how times have changed.

Additionally, more children die each year on bicycles, from space heater fires, and in drownings than from guns. But, we don't hear calls for banning bicycles, heaters, and swimming pools because that doesn't make for good TV or good politics. Also, liberal mothers kill more unborn children than guns each and every year through abortion, yet women go into a hissy fit if anyone talks about taking away their right to murder a defenseless, voiceless human being.

Myth: Crime is lower in countries that have banned guns.

One need look no further than our neighbor Mexico, where guns are forbidden for the average citizen but every cartel and criminal has them. Many Mexican cities look like war zones and I personally witnessed two shootouts between the Mexican military and cartel members when I lived there. One has to think the gangs would not be as brazen if the average citizen had the capability to defend themselves. So, Mexico is an example of gun control nightmare. The CATO institute also dropped this truth bomb on gun grabbers.

> In Israel and Switzerland, for example, a license to possess guns is available on demand to every law-abiding adult, and guns are easily obtainable in both nations. Both countries also allow widespread carrying of concealed firearms, and yet, admits Dr. Arthur Kellerman, one of the foremost medical advocates of gun control, Switzerland and Israel "have rates of homicide that are low despite rates of home firearm ownership that are at least as high as those in the United States." A comparison of crime rates within Europe reveals no correlation between access to guns and crime.

Gun control disarms good people, as criminals will always find a way around laws.

Fact: SSRIs are strongly correlated with mass shootings.

Eric Harris at Columbine, Seung Hui-Cho at Virginia Tech, James Holmes at Aurora, Christopher Harper Mercer in South Carolina, Andreas Lubitz, the Germanwings pilot who killed 149 people, and Adam Lanza of Sandy Hook all were on high doses of SSRI anti-depressants. As Dr. Peter Breggin has warned, going to a psychiatrist has become one of the most dangerous things a person can do. Breggin also wrote this in his book Your Drug May Be Your Problem:

> Advocates of psychiatric drugs often claim that the medications improve learning > and the ability to benefit from psychotherapy, but the contrary is true. There are no drugs that improve mental function, self-understanding, or human relations. Any drug that affects mental processes does so by impairing them.

And more tellingly:

> Despite a hugely successful promotional campaign by drug companies and biological psychiatry, the effectiveness of most or all psychiatric drugs remains difficult to demonstrate. The drugs often prove no more effective than sugar pills, or placebos – and to accomplish even these limited positive results, the clinical trials and data that they generate typically have to be statistically manipulated.

The effects of these drugs are chilling, and a large number of people become agitated and manic when they take them.

> The newer antidepressants including Prozac, Zoloft, Paxil, Luvox, Celexa, and Lexapro commonly cause some degree of over-stimulation. The effects are not unlike those of cocaine and amphetamine, and both the Prozac-like drugs and the stimulants impair function of the neurotransmitters serotonin and dopamine. Some of the other newer antidepressants, including Effexor, Serzone, Cymbalta and Wellbutrin can have similar effects. No one knows the frequency of very severe reactions to the antidepressants. Some studies indicate that some degree of clinically significant over-stimulation and mania is caused in a startling 5%-10% of all patients taking these drugs. A number of clinical reports have also described a syndrome of obsessive SSRI-induced suicidality and violence that seems particular to these drugs.

Rather than calling for an investigation into pill-pushing prostitutes with medical degrees, as some doctors are, the media pushes a gun control agenda as the “magic bullet” that will fix everything. The correlation between SSRIs and mass shootings is never given proper attention because pharmaceutical advertising is a $5.17 billion dollar industry, and the media needs this revenue to prop up their sagging bottom lines.

Fact: Cops kill more people than mass shooters.

The very people who are supposed to protect the public kill far more people than mass shooters. Statistically, you are 9 times more likely to be killed by a police officer than a mass shooter. Are the cops acting in self defense most of the time? Probably. But there are also videos coming out by the truckload that show police are often acting inappropriately and an in abusive manner to the public they are supposed to protect and serve.

Last year alone cops killed 1,205 people. Were all those deaths justified? Most of them probably were. But how many people were killed that should not have been? Nobody is watching the watchers except for the web site Killed By Police, so nobody knows. Yet, the media never focus on this as they always push the public towards complete and total trust in authority, whether it be government bureaucrats or militarized police.

So, each of the gun grabbers' arguments can be destroyed through some basic research and logic. The argument that people don't need guns because there are police is the equivalent of saying people don't need fire extinguishers because there are fire departments. By the time the police arrive in their average 10 minute response time, the criminal is already going to be gone. And your house is already likely to be burned down from a small kitchen fire that could have easily been extinguished.

Once again we defenders of freedom are making the colossal mistake of letting the Marxist left and media control the narrative, then playing defense against their narrative. Gentlemen, the time has come to push back against the left. We have to find some way to put them on the defense about their insane policies and beliefs. Every time they bring out a new agenda item, they push and push until we fall back. Sooner or later the line must the drawn, and the authoritarians shown we will not be pushed any farther. Making them defend their insane positions instead of libertarians and traditionalists defending their positions, as we are doing now, is the most important move we can make.

Read More: 3 Things Cosmo Gets Wrong About Relationships With Men Who Own Guns

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Why You Should Beware Of “Inverted” Narcissist Women

July 5, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

While much digital ink has been spilled warning men to stay away from narcissistic women, there isn’t a whole lot of literature on inverted narcissist women. Inverted narcissists (also known as inverts, covert narcissists or codependents) share many traits with overt (regular) narcissists, with the biggest difference being how they interact with others. Regular narcissists are vampires who seek to draw adulation (narcissistic supply) from other people, while inverted narcissists offer themselves as supply. In other words, regular narcissists are predators and inverted narcissists are prey.

The main reason why codependent women are so dangerous is because they outwardly possess many of the traits that neomasculine men want: they’re feminine, submissive and deferential. What separates an invert from a genuinely feminine woman is that the former doesn’t simply seek to submit to a strong man: she craves psychological (and in many cases, physical) abuse. Not only that, codependents will themselves abuse any man who isn’t narcissistic enough to satisfy their masochism.

I have extensive experience with inverted narcissist women because my personality attracts a lot of girls who lean towards codependency. Here’s how you can identify covert narcissist women and avoid them.

The Origins Of Inverted Narcissism

The term "inverted narcissism" was coined by Sam Vaknin in his book Malignant Self-Love: Narcissism Revisited. Vaknin defines the invert as someone who seeks to subsume her identity into that of a narcissist's, a perfect fit as narcissists seek others to merge into them and provide narcissistic supply. In contrast to classic narcissists, inverts tend to be shy, emotionally sensitive, outwardly fragile, and self-deprecating.

Like classic narcissists, inverted narcissists have no self-esteem and lack a unique personality. However, while classic narcissists will construct a false reality and demand others acknowledge that reality, inverts seek to become part of a narcissist's false reality. An invert's existence revolves around attaching herself to a narcissist like a barnacle, constantly trying to please him and providing him with supply (which is her form of supply), until he gets bored and kicks her to the curb.

Vaknin identifies abusive, narcissistic parenting as one of the primary causes of codependency. Similarly, in her book Will I Ever Be Good Enough? Healing the Daughters of Narcissistic Mothers, Dr. Karyl McBride shows that narcissistic mothers often produce codependent daughters. Through their manipulations and antics (for example, McBride discusses one woman whose mother would seduce her boyfriends when she was a teenager), narcissistic mothers train their daughters to provide supply and sublimate their identities into theirs, preventing them from developing personalities of their own.

Inverted narcissists are incapable of sustaining relationships with non-narcissists, because they crave the drama and abuse that only a narcissist can provide. Indeed, codependent women will often act like classic narcissists when they're in relationships with non-narcissist men, similar to how classic narcissists will take on codependent traits when their false realities are shattered. For example, Tucker Max, a self-admitted narcissist, had a nervous breakdown following the collapse of his media empire in 2008.

How To Identify Inverted Narcissist Women

Note that there are degrees of inverted narcissism, so not all inverts will display these traits in equal measure. Additionally, some of the traits of inverts overlap with other personality disorders, such as BPD.

1. They have no boundaries. Inverts love to manipulate men by being inappropriately sexual or telling them extremely private information about their personal lives. If a codependent woman gets you alone, you'll probably be hearing TMI stories of her childhood while she tries to give you a back rub (even though you're just friends) within ten minutes.

2. They constantly insult themselves. While overt narcissists love to talk themselves up, covert narcissists love to talk themselves down. An invert will often call herself "crazy," "ugly," "loser" and other put-downs, reflecting her lack of self-esteem.

3. They're clingy to the point of becoming stalkers. An invert will never shut up about how she wants to be "married" or "meet a good man," even as she stumbles from one failed relationship to the next. She'll also use creepy terms that indicate her desire to subsume herself into a narcissist. Don't be surprised if she says she wants to "give [herself] to you" or wants you to "keep [her] until [you] die," or claims she's suffering from "relationship withdrawal" after she gets dumped.

4. They never take responsibility for anything. Covert narcissists always blame their problems on everyone else and love inventing fantastical victim stories. When her boyfriend leaves her for another woman, it's because he's having a "mid-life crisis"; when she gets fired from her job, it's because her boss is a jerk; when she cheats on her husband, it's because she was "drunk" and "horny." In her mind, nothing is ever her fault.

5. They're emotionally labile and engage in splitting. Codependents don't do nuance. One day, she'll say you're her "best friend" and the love of her life, and the next, she'll say you're an asshole who always treats her like shit. There's no middle ground.

6. They mirror men they're attracted to. Inverts often change their personalities and behavior to match the men they're dating, though not to the degree that borderlines do. For example, if you drum your fingers when you're bored or irritated, she'll start doing it too.

7. They have high libidos and orgasm extremely easily. A disproportionate number of codependents are squirters and almost all of them orgasm easily from normal, vaginal sex. In some cases, they don't even need or want foreplay: they'll just get naked and sit on your cock. Much how they lack interpersonal boundaries, inverts lack sexual boundaries: you can treat them like rented mules in bed and a disproportionate number of them are bisexual.

8. They're extremely promiscuous. Like overt narcissists, a covert narcissist will use sex as a weapon to get what she wants, whether she's sleeping around on her boyfriend because "he won't have sex with [her]" or blowing a drug dealer for a discount (because she's not attractive enough to get a freebie). But it's okay in her mind, because she'll hang her head in shame and call herself a "giant whore" afterwards, hoping for your sympathy.

9. They lack empathy. An invert only cares about pleasing you so long as you're narcissistically sucking her dry (and thus providing her with her form of supply). She'll think nothing of stringing you along in a loveless relationship so long as she's getting her jollies, and when you genuinely need her, she'll skate off and tell you you had it coming.

10. They're extremely passive-aggressive. If an invert is upset at you, she will almost never confront you directly. Instead, she'll spread rumors around, bait you into getting angry at her, and publicly gaslight you. (Hilariously, she'll accuse you of doing these same things to her.)

11. They constantly lie to themselves and others. Like borderlines, the invert has the ability to suppress and forget things that contradict her narcissistic narrative. This allows her to tell the most ridiculous lies with a straight face, an extreme version of George Costanza's maxim, "It's not a lie if you believe it."

12. They're often alcoholics or drug addicts. A codependent will often cope with the emptiness of her existence by self-medicating with booze, cigarettes or antidepressants. She may also try to get attention by making frequent suicide attempts.

Avoiding Inverted Narcissist Women

As a confident, masculine man, you'll attract codependent women who will mistake your confidence for narcissism, and being with one is like getting hooked on a drug. What kind of man doesn't want a girlfriend or wife who dotes on him constantly and thinks he's the greatest guy in the world? The problem is that the kind of girl who worships the ground you walk on is also the kind of girl who will arbitrarily decide you're the biggest piece of shit on Earth the minute your clown game isn't perfectly on point.

While it's possible to enthrall an inverted narcissist by adopting narcissistic traits yourself—as inverts are more like wind-up automatons than actual human beings—faking a personality disorder is untenable in the long run. A codependent woman treats her man like a nuclear reactor, inserting and removing control rods to get him to act the way she wants. Being with one is like being strapped to a roller coaster in which you're constantly getting splattered with other peoples' vomit.

At the end of the day, trying to heal an inverted narcissist woman is like trying to keep a skunk from smelling bad. Inverts inexorably crave narcissists; they’re incapable of dealing with men who aren’t trying to use them. If you meet one, run away from her and don’t look back.

Read More: Beware The Coming Breed of “Pro-Male” Women

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

You’re Homophobic If You Don’t Accept The New Gay Abbreviation

July 5, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

As we begin to enter a post-politically correct apocalypse of social justice fascism, we can see that freedom of speech is dead. Ostensibly, you can still say whatever you want, but, in any area of your life that isn’t anti-fragile, you can suffer retaliation from those who wish to punish you for saying things with which they do not agree. In today’s article, I will describe how the culture of the American workplace oppresses the majority of its workers by following the hyper-politically correct agenda of the homosexuals movement.

LGBTWTF?

June is “Pride Month,” and it is recognized by my employer by putting up all sorts of banners and flags and signs depicting the joys of homosexuality. It gets worse every year as it trends with society’s illness of recognizing every mental aberration and plea for trendiness as a legitimate “lifestyle choice.”

The anti-harassment training rolled out last year had been upgraded to reflect “identity” and the latest crazes, although the trannies in the bathrooms epidemic had not yet occurred. This Pride Month, however, featured a rollout on the new gay abbreviation.

LGBTTQQIAA

I'm not kidding, either; they took the somewhat long standing acronym for gay, kinda gay, and "had my dick inverted" and added a whole bunch of the latest hotness on it. Here's the list and some Red Pill style definitions.

Lesbian*: Gay female*
Gay*: Gay male*
Bisexual*: Half gay*
Transgender*: Gay, but on the other team*
Two Spirited*: Both gay and not gay*
Queer*: Hipster gay*
Questioning*: Trendy liberal who is possibly gay*
Intersex*: Gay by virtue of hardware deformity*
Asexual*: Going gay out of desperation from lack of success with opposite sex*
Ally*: Trendy liberal who is not gay*

You'll notice it's all some form of being gay, and some of them are redundant with others, or have very little difference between them. All of these were considered mental illnesses at one time, and I suppose some of them are still technically that way.

The race for the Attention Prize

I don't know of anyone with whom I work or interact that actually cares about the sexual habits of someone they know, and, being purposefully located in the conservative Midwest, I know very few flamboyantly gay people at all. Yet all you see in the media, and all you get out of the more "progressive" parts of the country is a push to constantly create new sexual preferences, expressions, and identities.

I don't know why what genitals people prefer to have and to encounter is such an important thing, but you are more "relevant" if you have the latest preference, and thus, more protected by virtue-signalling. Perhaps it's a method of defining a sense of self for people that have none, or a plea for acceptance and group membership, but I think it has very little to do with what people actually prefer sexually and, instead, is merely a form of social expression, like dressing in black all the time.

Regardless of why people are doing this, the problem is that the corporate world (what matters in a capitalist society like any western nation) is taking them seriously.

> When I was a child, I spoke as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child, but when I became a man, I put away childish things. —1 Corinthians 13

Like most problems, advice can be found in the Bible for this one. It's a plea for attention, it doesn't matter in a work environment, and the corporate answer should be "Good for you, we don't care, go back to your desk, please."

The persecution of Christians in the workplace

The problem with the tolerance of stupidity is that that stupidity eventually becomes widely accepted as the truth, and those who are not stupid are forced to accept it or face persecution for their non-belief. As the Overton Window inevitably shifts more and more left, behavior that was widely considered an execution worthy taboo in the past is now encouraged and desired today.

What if you march to a different, or additional drum than what society wants? What if your religion has something to say about the matter? If you're Islamic, you're good to go, as no SJW would dare question the word of Allah. I guess the true test of the strength of your SJW-ism is, if you're gay and a Muslim tosses you off a building for your heresy, do you scream on the way down, or just quietly accept your fate? After the Orlando shooting, LGBT gun purchases are really increasing, so it looks like they are rightfully choosing survival and the right to live over being politically correct. Good for them.

But, if you're a Christian, you're in for a world of grief. Unless you follow every single thing in both the New AND Old Testaments (proving that SJWs don't really understand what Christianity actually IS), expect to be called a hypocrite and have your views discounted. If you had sex before marriage or ever had divorce, you're not really a Christian, so you don't get a say on being gay or anything else, so goes their dismissal of you.

There's an inherent logical flaw in claiming that a core part of your movement's ideals is the acceptance of all opinions and views, then dismissing views and opinions that disagree with yours. A true believer of a legitimate philosophy should not be afraid to debate and defend his stance.

The ideological fallacy of speaking for many with a single policy

I leave it to my colleague, Br. Moner, for speaking of certainty, but I will apply an engineer's logic to the failings of HR policy here. There are two problems with proclaiming policy on such a nebulous and irrelevant thing as sexual identity, preference, and practice in the workplace, and either one of them should have been enough to persuade anyone with sense to never make such a thing in the first place.

Homosexuals and other people comprise way under 10% of the population, usually 3-5%, depending on your source. Christians are around 62% of the population. Despite varying beliefs and statements on homosexuality in Christianity, even if we took it as a 50/50 split, that's still 20% more of the population that thinks it's wrong than thinks it's right. This is not an argument for "Gay Is Not OK" signs at work, this is an argument not to get involved at all.

Second reason not to get involved is that times change, and what is legal or trendy today may have been taboo yesterday. Progressives like to think that everything new they think of is an improvement, possibly only because they thought of it, but a large percentage of people do not agree with the multi-gendered, multi-racial, out-of-wedlock, multi-partner sexfest fueled by abortion and the pill that romance in our day in age has become. There is no reason to endorse current societal thinking on such things as it WILL change and NOT necessarily for the better.

This may be the new “thing” soon. On a side note, do NOT look for images by googling “horse love.”

Conclusion

Dictating policy, even in the guise of acceptance and promotion of individuality, is contrary to the ideals of free speech and the freedom of expression. The only ideals that forcing the SJW agenda down peoples’ throats endorse are those of the SJWs. That’s not freedom, that’s fascism, and, even if it is cloaked in the righteous guise of equal rights, it’s only equality for those that they care about, which are women and minorities of racial, sexual, or religious nature.

When you buck the narrative, you interfere with their vision of how the new reality should be, and, rather than debate with you, they seek to eliminate you professionally, socially, and perhaps, one day, personally. If someone does not welcome your ideas and speech because they think it’s dangerous, it is their speech that is dangerous, not yours. Roosh’s new book is on such a subject, and I am currently reading it and enjoying it greatly.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How Human Resources Departments Are Ruining STEM Jobs For Men

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

Rigged: FBI Reveals It Has Evidence Hillary Clinton Broke Law, But Will Not Prosecute

July 5, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) director James Comey said Tuesday at a press conference that he will not recommend an indictment against Hillary Clinton, though he found "evidence" that she might have violated laws pertaining to the handling of classified information.

Comey announced a number of conclusions that support the findings of Breitbart News' coverage of the Clinton private email scandal, including that she sent and received information on her private server that was classified. Comey said that 110 of Clinton's emails were classified at the time they were sent.

Comey said that "although there is evidence of potential violations," no reasonable prosecutor would take on the case.

Comey at least shared details about that damning evidence.

He also said that seven of Clinton's email chains contained "Top Secret" information.

"That is excluding any later up-classified emails… None of these emails should have been on any unclassified system, but the presence of these emails is especially concerning," Comey said.

"There is evidence to support a conclusion that any reasonable person in Secretary Clinton's position… should have known that an unclassified system was no place for that information," Comey continued.

"There is evidence that they were extremely careless," he said, referring to Clinton and her aides.

Comey also noted that individuals in a similar situation would not necessarily be let off the hook with no charges, but would probably face penalties. “But that’s not what we’re deciding now,” Comey said. “We are expressing to Justice our view that no charges be made in this case.”

Comey said that “no outside influence of any kind was brought to bear” on the investigation, even though Attorney General Loretta Lynch recently held a secret meeting with President Bill Clinton.

Comey said the investigation was conducted in an “apolitical and professional way… I couldn’t be prouder to be part of this organization.”

Then he walked off.

Read the entire article

Don’t Miss: Why A Hillary Clinton Presidency Would Destroy The United States

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

5 Common Things Women Say On Tinder And What They Really Mean

July 6, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Like it or loathe it, Tinder has become a major component of people's dating repertoire in the past couple of years. For many people far removed from university, people who have moved to new cities and have limited social networks, people partaking in recreational travel across the world, or people who are just plain sick of nightclubs, the app is now their main tool for seeking carnal satisfaction.

Sexual dynamics within Tinder are exactly the same as pre-digital courtship. Or in other words, "the tools have changed but the trade is the same." Obtaining sex is easy for gay men and women of all sexual orientations, while it is a constant battle and struggle for heterosexual men to achieve intimacy (at least by comparison).

Tinder can take the battle a step further, with heterosexual women often using a variety of confounding statements in their biographical profiles which makes them "seem" to be less interested in sex than many men were hoping. This article will address five of these (lying) statements which particularly appear far too frequently, along with translations.

Do not be fooled by this language, and don't automatically dismiss these women as a result. Because if you are not going to sleep with them, some other guy who can read between the lines will.

1. "Not Into One Night Stands"

I am just putting on a facade in order to seem innocent and non-slutty (just in case my friends discover my profile), and hopefully to chase away as many “creepers” as possible.

Like any heterosexual female with hormones and desires, I will of course consider having a one night stand if we go on a date. However, you must be clean, smelling decent, and have a level of game which is strong enough to give me sufficient vagina tingles in order to agree going home with you.

When making the proposition to take me to your place, make sure you use subterfuge to mask your intention of wanting to have sex with me. For instance, say you would like to fix me some “tea,” just like in that The Wolf of Wall Street movie.

Therefore, I will not be made to feel so slutty after I have my one night stand with you. Because remember, you only invited me into your house to have “tea” before you made your move on me right?

Oh, and I will probably tell you that I’ve “never done this before,” even though it’s actually happened somewhere between 20 and 80 other times in the past.

2. “No Fuckboys”

YES fuckboys! While it may appear on the surface that the “fuckboy” label has negative connotations, you need to understand that us women in our early and mid 20-something sexual prime actually find the alpha male “bad boy” pump-and-dump types very attractive. We say we don’t like them, but we sleep with them all the time.

You give us ladies huge vagina tingles when we assume that you have options and are receiving sexual validation from lots of different women, even though we will never admit to this.

Therefore, provided that your game is tight enough, I will overlook this minor inconvenience and allow you to bang me while you also play the field with other women.

Just don't let me find out about them, ok? Oh speaking of which, I've got another annoying beta orbiter on the line… wish he could be more fun and exciting like you…

3. "Good Vibes"

"Good Vibes" = Good Vibrations

I'm looking for a "hawt" guy who can hopefully spit enough clown game to give me sufficient vagina tingles for no strings attached sex. Not being quiet, boring, or acting in a manner that I would consider "creepy" or "awkward" by my overly judgmental standards are vital components of giving off "good vibes."

Entertain me and make me laugh without fail. I demand those tingles!

4. "Don't Swipe Right If All You're After Is Sex"

Topsy Turvy that Muh' Fugga

Swipe right if all you're after is sex. That is, give off the veneer that you're not just after sex, both in you're text game and for at least the first two dates. If we have already had sex at least once (preferably twice), if I find you're company enjoyable, and I have become quite comfortable that you are not an ax murderer, we can just go on autopilot and you can have me around for a booty call when time permits.

Just use subterfuge like "I'm making you dinner" or "Netflix and chill" as your excuse to get me over to your house. That way I won't feel like a slut.

Also, every now and then I may occasionally shit test you with a "you're just using me for sex" kind of spiel. Don't worry, just maintain your frame and throw a topsy-turvy on me (witty comeback) and you will likely pass. Something along the lines of "are you just using ME for sex?"

5. "I'm Here For Friends"

I'm just giving off the veneer that I'm here for "friends" because I am actually in a "it's complicated" kind of relationship, and this statement gives me a good alibi to potentially avoid a lot of trouble just in case my significant other finds out I'm on Tinder. Pretty clever huh?

Here's the thing, I'm so unhaaaapy and bored that my partner is working 12 hour days for weeks at a time in the outback mines of Australia, while I'm all sexless and alone in the house he is paying for. Aren't us women so oppressed? Will you be the one to give me enough vagina tingles to satisfy my desires?

Conclusion

Get it? The instant a woman signs up to Tinder, she is voluntarily putting herself on the sexual marketplace. It doesn't matter whether she is single, taken, or just looking for "friends." Don't buy into her biographical shit tests.

Seeking intimate relationships, however casual they may be, is exactly what Tinder was made for. Deep down inside of her (pardon the pun), she knows this is true.

So maintain your frame, learn game, and develop that Eric Cartman sense of confidence before your dates. Because the "dating apocalypse" via smartphone applications has been around for several years now, and it's not going away anytime soon. Enjoy the decline.

Read More: 3 Sobering Facts About Friendship That You Need To Know

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

How The Government Is Robbing Men Of Good Wives

July 6, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There are many countries in Eastern Europe that have superior women than in America, but when you start to examine these women as wives and not only casual sex partners, you encounter a big problem: they value their education and careers above that of family. The reason? Education is offered for free or at a greatly subsidized rate by the government. Western governments are therefore programming women into becoming sterile office slaves and consumers instead of good wives and mothers.

I've met hundreds of Eastern European women from several countries, and because I've focused on living in cities, I've been unable to find more than a handful under the age of 25 who has shown eagerness into soon becoming a mom. Instead, the girls I've known have made their future employment the most important goal of their lives. Here is a conversation I've had several times:

Me: "Why don't you want to be a mom soon?"

Girl: "Because I have to focus on my career first."

Me: "Why don't you just find a good man instead? He will take care of you."

Girl: "Because men are bad. They cheat and become alcoholics. Insert horror story of an awful man who a friend of a friend got married to."

Me: "So your job is more important than your family?"

Girl: "I need a backup plan in case my husband becomes bad."

Men are bad, and because of that, she must spend years in university where she gets to experiment with different cocks and where she is firmly taken out of her natural role to learn how to serve a corporate master while her future kid goes to day care and her husband eats cans of tuna because his wife is too tired from work to cook, assuming she even knows how. A man's marriage with such an empowered woman is doomed before he knows it.

Women want to have their cake and eat it too. They want to be able to marry the man they are most attracted to, and if that doesn't work, still be able to enjoy an independent and comfortable life of Ikea furniture and Starbucks without having to put up with a man's reasonable demands to cook him dinner and make sure the children are taken care of.

To accomplish that task, she must spend thousands of hours studying a topic like law or international business relations and became an obedient office worker instead of learning how to obey her husband. And because of this desire, which is being fully supported by the government with free or subsidized education, usually in the form of interest-free loans, we are seeing the disappearance of the nuclear family along with high divorce rates and out-of-wedlock births where future degenerates of the state get to watch mommy get sexy matches on Tinder.

In this crooked game, women can't lose

Women win through this scheme because they are able to say no to their husbands without repercussions and the government wins because women are less dependent on men for their needs. These women then become dependent on the state and corporations, which can easily lead them to behaviors of their choice, such as not reproducing.

If you take the depopulation agenda to be accurate then it makes sense that you would want to train women to do anything but bond with men in a way that leads to reproduction. That is exactly what most Western governments have done, and it starts by essentially brainwashing women of the need to be free from their husbands by making them obsessed to earn money produced by central banks. Any country where the idea of female employment is seen as "common sense" is in the process of having their culture destroyed, if it hasn't already been done.

But do women really get a good deal out of this? In order to survive, they must obtain resources from corporate employment, the government, or an individual man. They cannot exist in the world on their own.

The less a woman has to depend on a man's resources, the less she will have trained herself on how to be a good wife and mother. She may still end up being a good wife and mother, but she been put on a path since her teenage years by the system to spend considerable amounts of time in corporate and victimhood training, not wife training. Therefore if you end up marrying a woman who places high value in her "empowered" job, and she refuses to quit that job when her presence is needed in the home, your misfortune comes not just from your mistake in choosing her, but in the fact that the government, through their education programs and directives, have ensured that very outcome. In effect, you're being actively cucked by your own government.

Foreign women are not necessarily a fail-safe solution

Even in Eastern Europe, it is very difficult to find a woman under the age of 25 in a big city who wants to soon be a stay-at-home mom, or at least a mom who places secondary importance in her career. The feminist ideas that have infected America first came to Eastern Europe in the form of Soviet communism, which—surprise—had the primary goal to destroy the family unit.

The fact that an Eastern European girl lives in the city while her parents remain in the village means that she has been seduced by the prospect of free education, city lights, and the ability to sleep around without consequences. It is unlikely that she will be able to provide you with the home life that you deserve above that of an American woman, especially since they both approach career and motherhood in a nearly identical way. Unless you start visiting villages or churches, you'll end up disappointed.

If you look at a map of fertility rates around the world, you can clearly see that countries with fertility under the replacement rate have fanatical programs about educating women. Doing so makes a woman's most fertile period of her life go to waste so that she can spend 5-10 years getting an education in obedience, consumerism, and selfie-taking while developing a bullshit career that will not make her happier than having a family.

If I were king of a land and wanted to destroy a neighboring kingdom, I'd simply implant the idea of female education within their culture so that they'd simply die out within a few generations. In the meanwhile, have fun trying to find a good woman who believes in the most basic of family values. The government already got to her, and put ideas in her head which will make it very hard for you to experience the simple act of having a family. Sadly, besides finding a magical unicorn, I see no way for us to fix this problem for our generation.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Soviet Defector Yuri Bezmenov Accurately Predicted How America Would Decline

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Sympathy For The White Devil: The Meaning Of The Stanford Rape Case

July 6, 2016 | by Pozwald Spengler | Link | Original Link

Now that the Brock Turner media blitz—and the accompanying lecture on white privilege, rape culture, and "the campus rape epidemic"—has wound down, it has made way for real news events like Hillary's email scandal. Though these events have prompted important "lessons" on right-wing Christian homophobia, toxic masculinity, white xenophobia, and the need for gun control—it's perhaps a good time to go over what we learned before we continue.

Brock Turner, a blond-haired, blue-eyed Stanford undergraduate, allegedly dragged a passed-out woman behind a dumpster and violently raped her. Worse yet, because Turner is a talented white swimmer with a name that seems taken from a Bret Easton Ellis novel, he was sentenced to an outrageously lenient six-month prison sentence. Let's use this miscarriage of justice to spark the long overdue "national conversation on sexual assault"—or in other words, why are privileged white men raping so many women?

Your average American sociopathic rape pack.

That's the standard intended takeaway from an event that enthralled and infuriated an entire nation, briefly reviving the campus rape panic that birthed Rolling Stone's "A Rape on Campus," and the discredited documentary, The Hunting Ground. Despite the level of media attention lavished on Brock Turner and this case, many essential details about the assault have been underreported and are not widely known. A more nuanced rendering of the central event is badly needed.

This is what occurred on January 17th, 2015

Brock Turner and his unnamed accuser—Jane Doe—attended a party at the Kappa Alpha frat house. Jane Doe consumed four shots of whiskey before arriving; while there, she had beer and two shots of whiskey. She and Brock Turner—also drunk after drinking seven beers and an indeterminate quantity of whiskey—were observed kissing and dancing before leaving the party together holding hands.

Yards from the house, Doe and Turner slipped near a dumpster (a focal point for much of the reportage on this case) and where, according to Turner, he and Doe kissed and Doe rubbed Turner's back as Turner "fingered" Doe, an act that Turner insists was consensual. At 12:55 AM—fewer than forty-five minutes after Doe last called her boyfriend—two cyclists heading toward the Kappa Alpha house noticed a fully clothed Turner grinding against Doe. Observing that Doe appeared to be unresponsive, the cyclists yelled to Turner, who ran from the scene.

One of the cyclists chased Turner, caught and restrained him until the police arrived. Jane Doe was largely unresponsive for the next three and a half hours. She would retain little memory of the night and virtually no memory of interacting with Turner. Turner was charged with six offenses, including rape of an intoxicated person and rape of an unconscious person. Turner was convicted of three of the six charges: assault with intent to rape an intoxicated woman, sexually penetrating an intoxicated person with a foreign object (his hand), and sexually penetrating an unconscious person with a foreign object (his hand), and was sentenced to a six month term in the county jail.

He is no longer enrolled at Stanford. He has been permanently banned from competition by USA Swimming. He will be on a sex offender registry for the remainder of his life.

Trigger warning: IT HAPPENED NEAR A DUMPSTER!! A DUMPSTER!!

That was the crime that inspired a torrent of outraged think pieces and a firestorm on social media, and resulted in a petition—signed over a million times—calling for the removal of a judge. That was the rape that was promoted in a “crime of the century”-style tabloid tenor, despite so insufficiently embodying the legal definition of “rape” as to have failed to result in a conviction of rape by name.

Needless to say, Brock Turner is absolutely responsible for his bad behavior, and “dry humping” a person who is passing out doubtlessly is a bad idea—but the more significant story is an ideology-obsessed media using an absurd and less than newsworthy case as the vehicle with which to manipulate a pliable public, an ambitious project that required the obfuscation and underreporting of many essential details about the crime itself, while emphasizing the irrelevant and sensational.

The New York Daily News claimed that Brock Turner “took an unconscious woman behind a dumpster and brutally raped her.” Most outlets opted for a weasel words-ish approach, encouraging their readers to imagine the worst as they described the assault tersely, choosing to instead focus on such essential details as his interest in swimming, his father’s politically incorrect use of the word “action,” or his appearance in various photographs, with the Chicago Tribune going so far as to write simply: “Brock Turner’s smiling school photo is what a campus sexual predator looks like,” a line that gives away the true purpose of the Brock Turner publishing bombardment.

Shaun King has called Brock Turner “a human piece of sh-t” and “the worst of America”

The media is no longer interested in presenting facts with impartiality (were they ever?), so much as taking useful cases and employing them to push a social agenda. Consider the levels of doublethink the media engages in so to sell this case. In an “age of mass incarceration” and destructive mandatory minimums, leftist journalists are happy to adopt law-and-order conservative arguments when covering an affluent white criminal: many decried that the defendant’s lack of criminal history was considered relevant in sentencing, and the possibility of Turner being released on probation before serving his full term has been written about with open alarm.

The mother of Michael Brown is paid to lie about her son in a well-received book, while the friends of Brock Turner are subject to coordinated media harassment campaigns for writing letters to a judge. The comments sections of hard-left outlets like The Atlantic and The Huffington Post filled with readers cheerfully discussing the possibility of Turner being raped by a fellow inmate. And less than a month after the media excoriated Donald Trump for questioning a Hispanic judge’s impartiality—this after the media aggressively sold the notion that most if not all Hispanics loathe Trump—it is considered perfectly credible and responsible for journalists to suggest that the Brock Turner judge adjudicated this case under the influence of extreme ethnic bias.

This is both an anti-white and ideological feminist project

The anti-white influence is partly an expression of journalistic laziness, a rare opportunity to write about an offender in a polemical and nakedly vengeful way, a luxury not afforded to journalists covering the rote urban and underclass violence that represents the bulk of American crime.

Writing a vitriolic article about a black rapist is too awkward, the racial undertones too uncomfortable. There is also a more extreme impulse at work: a way of controlling reality through the dissemination of media narratives. Most journalists are far-left progressives. They believe inequality and social stratification reflect only the degree to which whites have exploited people of color. Anti-white journalism—or conversely, absurdly sympathetic depictions of minority offenders—is an effort toward a correction.

This is likely both a conscious and an unconscious choice, motivated by the desire to fix an unjust society, but also reinforced by pure and intuitive anti-white bigotry, a kind of perfect inversion of the lynch mob mentality of an earlier era. In the way one imagines a racist white southerner filling with rage at the notion of a black rapist, while making excuses for a white offender, modern journalists obsess over mitigating factors and external pressures when writing about inner-city crime, as white spree shooters and rapists are presented as damning evidence of white male privilege and pathology.

Most journalists couch their anti-white proselytizing in subtly manipulative pieces that retain the flavor of impartial reportage. Increasingly, many do not.

Roxane Gay: “The boys who raped me were boys like Brock Turner”

Radical ideological feminists tend to share the anti-white outlook held amongst most radical progressives, but their promotion of the Brock Turner case was used to different ends. Their movement appears eager to open the definition of rape as widely as possible. That Brock Turner’s accuser had drunk herself into a stupor on her own volition, likely engaged in some level of consensual sexual interaction with Brock Turner before passing out, and ultimately retained no memory of the event is encouraging to feminists.

Rightly or wrongly, so frivolous a case would likely not have been prosecuted in an earlier age. Feminists are eager to see many more such prosecutions for rape, and some may see this case as another step toward a future when a woman can, after drinking herself into a blackout and engaging in consensual sex with a stranger, have her partner prosecuted for criminal rape, ideally anonymously and without having to answer and invasive questions about the nature of her interaction.

Sound ridiculous? If so, read this feminist think piece written in response to the Brock Turner case. Clearly to an ideological feminist—and very much in the postmodern tradition that undergirds much of third-wave feminist theory—rape is an act that has no basic characteristics, save for the degree to which a woman finds its memory painful or degrading.

Catherine MacKinnon: “I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated.”

More significant than the crime itself in the public’s imagination was Brock Turner’s six-month jail sentence, heinously lenient according to most professional commentators. Few bothered to acknowledge that Turner wasn’t found guilty of the most serious charges brought against him, or that he acted without malice and did not employ force or violence—in fact, it would be considered offensive and insensitive for a journalist to bring the latter point up, despite the unambiguous truthfulness of such an observation.

Feminists are not merely interested in stretching the definition of rape beyond any reasonable boundary; they seek to ensure that the public views rape, all rape, as perfectly equivalent in its horror and destructiveness. This is useful, as it would certainly be a boon to grievance feminism if all women with a memory of a bad sexual experience identified as “survivors” of the most heinous kind of male predation.

Campus rape survivor Lena Dunham made a video expressing solidarity with the Stanford accuser. So brave!

Many female journalists wrote about this case with a kind of naked fury and revulsion, rather incongruous with the unexceptional nature of the crime. This is curious, until one remembers who is writing: affluent and well-educated feminist journalists and thinkers, an extraordinarily privileged category of first-world women whose personal experience with “sexual assault” is likely limited to awkward and ambiguous alcohol-fueled university hook-ups.

Given their level of narcissism, radical ideological instruction, and delusions of oppression, that their “rapes” would not be regarded as such by the legal system or the general public is a likely motivation for many in pushing “the campus rape epidemic” canard—a crusade that created Mattress Girl, A Rape on Campus, the oft-debunked 1 in 5 statistic, and the Duke Lacrosse embarrassment—as those same feminists largely neglect authentic rape epidemics, such as the sexual violence sex workers are routinely subject to, or the horrifying rape culture endemic to the American prison system.

According to the Department of Justice, an estimated 216,000 inmates were raped in prison in 2008

The role of alcohol in these kinds of events is critical, despite the conspicuous silence on the subject when feminists discuss such assaults. Without binge drinking these events simply do not occur. As an ideological notion or rhetorical strategy, the “victim blaming” concept has been useful in the effort to reduce complex interactions to simplistic dichotomies of monster and martyr.

From a practical perspective, with the goal to prevent rape and destructive “gray-area” encounters that emotionally wound, it has been a disaster. Feminism could have used its influence to spread awareness of the degree to which binge drinking reduces female agency and is a precursor to degrading and damaging sexual experiences, but instead the movement opted to serve the narrative rather than its adherents.

Washington Post: “two-thirds of survivors said they had been drinking just prior to their assaults”

Brock Turner’s behavior was heinous and objectionable, but so was the histrionic response from a media that seems to prefer to create public events than report on them—a much more dangerous phenomenon than the absurd notion of a “campus rape epidemic.”

If we desire something like an impartial media, then we should view their excesses and abuses with a much greater level of scrutiny, even when it is politically incorrect to do so. In a nation where only forty percent of reported forcible rapes result in a conviction, The Stanford Rape Case is neither news nor a miscarriage of justice; it is a handy progressive case study and an effective vehicle for the spread of destructive and illiberal notions about women, men, and whiteness.

Read More: Revisiting The Duke Rape Case

Pozwald Spengler

Other work can be found at The Right Stuff. Pozwald Spengler is ready to Make America Great Again.

What Advice Would You Give A 17-Year-Old American Girl Who Doesn't Want To Be A Slut?

July 6, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I received an email from a female ROK reader who wants to stay off the carousel and be a mother before focusing on her career, but is not sure how to do it.

> I am a seventeen year old high school student who has been reading RoK and your blog for three years. My attention was first caught by the controversy surrounding the "Five Reasons to Date a Girl with an Eating Disorder" article. Most of my liberal friends were criticizing it, but I was intrigued by a site called "Return of Kings." As a result, I became a regular site visitor as a fourteen year old.
>
> Your sites have had a notable impact on my opinions and actions. Granted, I take many articles with a grain of salt, but I have found interesting and valid perspectives there (and opinions rarely voiced on my liberal, all-girls school campus).
>
> I find myself considering several options as to my future. I believe that all people, not just women, can have anything they want, but not everything they want. This is the apparent crux of the issues your writers discuss regarding women.
>
> I want a husband, children, and a career. Even looking at successful women with children (e.g. Ann-Marie Slaughter, Sheryl Sandberg), their hectic lives and cutthroat attitudes were less than appealing options for my future.

> However, I began consider an alternative route to starting a high-powered career in my twenties, getting hitched and having kids mid-thirties, and subsequently being stressed and miserable. I am considering getting married young (22 would be ideal) to an older, (approx 10 years) wealthy man, having children soon after, raising them, and then start my career in my late thirties.
>
> This way I would be young and healthy in order to have my children, have enough energy to raise them, and still have time for a career (given that my lifespan is estimated around 90 years, starting work around age forty is plenty of time for a career).
>
> I am not asking for advice on the career aspect. I can figure that out myself (I assume I would complete a graduate degree while raising my kids, work part time if possible, then transition to full time as my kids go off to college).
>
> I am asking for advice on if it's possible for me to find such a man (10 years older, wealthy, willing to marry me), and if so, how. To answer this you should probably know my vital SMV statistics:
>
> I am white;
>
> I am young (and intend to marry/have kids young);
>
> I am facially decent (I can send a picture if you would like, though I request total privacy);
>
> I have long hair, clear skin, and good teeth;
>
> I have a very good physique;
>
> I have excellent hygiene;
>
> I was taught domestic skills by my mother (cooking, cleaning, etc);
>
> I am intelligent (although a woman's intelligence is considered negligible on RoK, I still consider it an asset);
>
> I am a virgin (never gone beyond kissing).
>
> I'm also American, and will probably remain in America for college, if that information is of use.
>
> Thank you for your time.

Besides her fixation on having a career (albeit after having a family), she has the right idea. She's already made the right moves to maximize her value in the eyes of a man and has also held on to her virginity. The question that needs to be asked is where she can find an older man in America who wants to marry a virgin and start a family.

Outside of a church community, she has almost no hope. My answer to her would definitely involve joining a church that hasn't already been subverted by feminism. I'd advise her to go with the Orthodox Christians or the Mormons. And yet another option is for me to help "arrange" a marriage between her and an ROK reader who is ready to be an alpha provider. What say you, reader?

Even though we have been greatly maligned by the press for several years, our message is still having an impact on young men and apparently young women, too, who can see through the media distortions for the practical advice and logical arguments that we offer. While ROK isn't a huge outlet, it's definitely making a positive difference on many lives.

Read Next: Act As If Every Girl Were A Slut

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 European Countries To Emigrate To If The West Collapses

July 7, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

A growing number of our readers have raised the issue of which country to emigrate to if the total cultural collapse that some predict finally occurs.

The nations are reviewed on factors that are relevant for men believing in the values of neomasculinity and red pill philosophy. This non-exhaustive list takes into account the following criteria:

- Level of English
- Difficulty of the local language(s)
- Gun laws
- Quality of women (considering beauty, femininity, careerism etc):
- Non-native immigrant population
- Possibility of a long-term stay
- Male competition
- Importance of religion
- Culture of entrepreneurship
- Presence of masculine culture/traditional sex roles
- Quality of food
- Importance of physical fitness in the local culture
- Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse

1. Hungary

- Level of English: Low. The youth and the educated speak English. Low level as soon as you reach the countryside
- Difficulty of the local language(s): Very High. THE main issue with Hungary. Finno-Ugric branch, no common base with Germanic, Slavic or Romance languages. I speak seven languages and none helped me
- Gun laws: Restrictive. Member of the EU (for now), subject to European and local laws. Very hard to purchase a gun for home defense
- Quality of women: High. Some say they are the most beautiful in Europe. Stylish, sexy and with a fun vibe. They are fairly traditional. Definitely in my European Top 5
- Non-native immigrant population: Low. They still have about 4% of Gypsies. They did build a wall when the migrants were at the gates. Locals opposed to Brussels politics, strong nationalist leadership
- Possibility of a long-term stay: Likely (for Westerners). More here.
- Male competition: Medium. Hungarian guys do have game but usually aim at long term relationships. They are a few rich local men that present serious competition
- Importance of religion: Medium to high. Catholicism still present but not as strong as in Poland. Abortion is legal under request
- Culture of entrepreneurship: Medium: Money and success are quite respected. The local laws are generally friendly to budding entrepreneurs

- Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: Medium. Stronger than in Western Europe but definitely weaker than in Ukraine or Russia. Western culture slowly infiltrates the new generation. Hostile to homosexuals
- Quality of food: High. The products are usually local and the laws about food are quite strict. Easy to obtain supplements and good meat
- Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: Medium. Hungarian men are not particularly fit. Hungarian women are very fit and fitness is popular. Low obesity rate
- Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Possible. The European Union has brought money, but also the globalist influence of Brussels. Let's hope Hungary will remain politically close to Poland in their will to remain sovereign

2. Bulgaria

- Level of English: Low. The youth and the educated speak English. Low level as soon as you reach the countryside
- Difficulty of the local language(s): Medium. South Slavic. Easy to learn if you know Russian or Polish. Great base for learning Serbian, Croatian or Slovene. Macedonian is a variation of Bulgarian
- Gun laws: Restrictive (legally). Member of the European Union (for now) so subject to European and local laws. Hard to purchase a gun legally. Nevertheless, Bulgarians do not care and almost everyone has an illegal gun at home. You have contacts, you have a gun.
- Quality of women: High. Especially for brunettes' enthusiasts. Elegant but can be a tough nut to crack. Often prefer local men. Quite addicted to social networks

- Non-native immigrant population: Low. The highest number of Gypsies in Europe. Significant Turkish native population. Strong native nationalist sentiment
- Possibility of a long-term stay: Likely (for Westerners). More here.
- Male competition: Medium to High. Decent foreigner value. Bulgarians and Serbs probably have the highest level of game in EE. They know the power that money and status have on women
- Importance of religion: Medium to High. Orthodox Christianity is important but does not influence their daily lives. Abortion is legal under request.
- Culture of entrepreneurship: High: Corruption is rampant. Money and success are king. The local laws encourage entrepreneurs and everyone wants to be one.
- Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: High. Strong archetypes of man and woman. Girls want a man that will bring her security. Western culture has easily infiltrated the new generation. Very hostile to homosexuals.
- Quality of food: High. Good local products. Great fruits and vegetables. Mediterranean fresh food. Easy to buy supplements and good meat
- Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: Very high. National sports are wrestling and weightlifting. Almost every man goes to the gym. Fitness is very popular among girls. Low obesity rate.
- Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Low. The Bulgarians love their culture and 500 years under the Ottoman yoke have taught them how to hate invaders.

3. Ukraine

- Level of English: Very Low. Rare to find a Ukrainian that speaks English. Start learning Russian.
- Difficulty of the local language(s): High. No real way around it. Learn Russian. It will open you a lot of doors. Ukrainian is a lot more work and the Russians there do not speak it.
- Gun laws: Relatively lenient.

> Citizens are permitted to own non-fully automatic rifles and shotguns as long as they are stored properly when not in use. Handguns are illegal except for target shooting and those who hold concealed carry permits.
>
> A license is required to own firearms.

Also a high number of unregistered guns circulating since the fall of the Soviet Union.

- Quality of women: High. Highest level of beauty and femininity in Europe. But love and sex feels more like a transaction.
- Non-native immigrant population: Very Low. Small number of native Tatars, some Georgians and citizens of the FSU. Distrustful towards foreigners. Strong nationalist sentiment.
- Possibility of a long-term stay: Possible (for Westerners). More here.
- Male competition: Low to Medium. Excellent foreigner value if paired with Russian. The apex predators (oligarchs, celebrities) are very rare for the sheer number of women. Poverty plays a huge role in game.
- Importance of religion: Medium to High. Orthodox Christianity has seen a revival since the 1990s. Abortion is legal under request.
- Culture of entrepreneurship: High: Corruption is an essential part of the economy. If you do not have money, you do not exist. It is a jungle and scams are everywhere. Get some local advisors.
- Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: High. Strong archetypes of man and woman. Girls want a prosperous family. Western culture appeals to the youth. Extremely hostile to homosexuals.
- Quality of food: Low. The food industry can do anything they want with the food if they have money. Not easy to buy supplements and good meat. They use paper when they run out of meat for sausages.
- Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: High. Infrastructures are poor but people train regularly. Girls do not always train but have an excellent diet. Very low obesity rate.

- Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Low (if aligns with the West), Very Low (if aligns with Russia). Ukraine is like a boiling pot with a lid. The next few years will be crucial for its future.

4. Poland

- Level of English: Medium. People have a decent command of English, especially in the cities.
- Difficulty of the local language(s): High. Reaching conversational level in Polish will improve your value. Grammatical cases and word endings are a nightmare. It will only be useful in Poland.
- Gun laws: Restrictive. Member of the EU (for now), subject to European and local laws. Very hard to purchase a gun for home defense. Laws might change with the fear of a conflict with Russia or if they leave Europe.
- Quality of women: High. Attractive, friendly, carefree and love sex. But not a promise land to find a long term relationship prospect.
- Non-native immigrant population: Low. Recent influx of Ukrainians and Belarusians. Recently refused the refugee quotas that Merkel imposed. Can be hostile to foreigners. Strong nationalist sentiment.
- Possibility of a long-term stay: Likely (for Westerners). More here.
- Male competition: Medium to low. Foreigner value explodes in remote areas. Not an asset in large cities. Large numbers of beta men. Few overly aggressive football hooligan type and rich red-pill men.
- Importance of religion: High. Catholicism is omnipresent and many see it as an important part of their life. Abortion is illegal unless the life of the mother is at stake.
- Culture of entrepreneurship: Medium to High Money and success are quite important. Local entrepreneurs are favoured over foreign ones. Polish men largely prefer routine and security over ambition.
- Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: Medium. Strong culture of men. The Western culture challenges it. Women start to focus on careers. Hostile to homosexuals.
- Quality of food: High. The products are usually local and must comply with EU regulations. Easy to obtain supplements and good meat.
- Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: High. There is a strong culture of physical strength in Poland. The “tough guy” stereotype is the end goal for Polish men. Fitness is popular among girls too. Low obesity rate.

- Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Possible. Poland is for the Poles and they have said it loud and clear, but the Western culture is getting more and more present with the years. The Law and Justice Party (PIS) government, though not always popular, is quite nationalist.

Bon voyage

To maximize the chances of a long-term stay, the same solutions pretty much apply everywhere with slight variations:

- Get married to a local girl
- Have a child there
- Use family reunification laws if you have relatives in the target country
- Prove that you are financially secure for the duration of your stay
- Be a highly-qualified immigrant
- Get employed there as qualified labour
- Have no criminal record
- Hire someone on the spot to guide you through the administrative process (worth every penny)
- Cry like a bitch, make a fake Syrian passport, invoke religious/sexual persecution, racism and see where that gets you

See you around for our review of the next four countries for possible relocation…

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Is It Easier To Get Laid In Poor Countries?

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Patriarchal Nationalism: What Is National Identity?

July 7, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

One of the problems that Western nations are facing is a crisis of national identity. What do these nations stand for besides adherence to abstract concepts such as personal freedom and tolerance? Patriarchal Nationalism offers a distinctive answer to the problem.

Various types of national identity

2016 French football team

There are three different ways that national identity is understood today:

A nation is its people. For a nation like Japan, national identity is not based on a form of government. Japan is a democracy today, but it was still Japan when it was ruled by a feudal government. This is because the national identity of Japan is inextricably linked to the Japanese people. Most Asian nations have maintained this understanding of national identity.

A nation is its people and its religion. Other nations, such as Israel or the Islamic countries of the Middle East, base their national identity on a combination of ethnicity and religion. It would also be possible for a nation to ignore ethnicity altogether and self-identify solely with a particular religion. However, I am unaware of any modern nation that adopts this view.

A nation is a particular form of government and a set of people who agree with an abstract set of principles. In Western nations (Europe and those nations that have their origin in Europe), a different view of national identity now prevails. These nations do not view themselves as a people or followers of a religion. Rather, their identity is defined by a particular form of government and agreement with abstract concepts such as equality, democracy, freedom, and tolerance.

These nations do not recognize ethnicity or race as playing a role in national identity. The people within a nation are interchangeable with any other group of people provided they assent to the abstract principles. The inhabitants of a nation are viewed as economic units who buy and sell. It is irrelevant whether the economic units come from England, Somalia, China, or Mexico.

Patriarchal Nationalism rejects the idea that people are interchangeable. The identity of a nation must be something more than the acceptance of abstract principles or a set of economic policies. For a nation to cohere over the course of many centuries, it must also be based on culture and genetics.

Culture matters

E.B. Tylor defined culture as “that complex whole which includes knowledge, belief, art, morals, law, custom and any other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society.”

When we think of culture, the first things that jump to mind are language, cuisine, and modes of dress. The conventional wisdom is that if a person learns to speak the language and dress like the natives, they have sufficiently embraced the culture.

But this is a very superficial understanding of culture. It goes much deeper than that. Culture affects a person’s way of viewing and interacting with the world. For example, westerners view women as having a right to not being raped regardless of whether they are chaste or slutty. But some Islamic cultures view women who are not wearing the hijab as being “fair game.” This is why we see things like the mass sexual assaults that occurred in Cologne. Just because someone understands the language or dresses in a western way does not mean that they are western.

Most importantly for a nation, culture influences the voting patterns of people. Franklin Delano Roosevelt’s New Deal, which set the stage for the enormous federal government of today, was only possible because of a coalition of blacks, women, and Jewish and Catholic immigrants.

National identity is also dependent on genetics

While culture is essential to national identity, that identity cannot be reduced to culture alone. Genetics is inseparable from national identity. Japan would not be Japan if it replaced its people with Swedish immigrants, even if those immigrants learned Japanese and did their best to try to assimilate Japanese culture in every detail. This does not mean that the Swedes are bad people. Only that they could never replace the Japanese. Furthermore, if Swedes, rather than Japanese, had inhabited the island of Japan for several thousand years, the culture they would have produced would be nothing like Japanese culture. It would be a Swedish culture.

We know this intuitively even though it flies directly in the face of everything we have been taught. But why is this? Why does one group of people produce one unique culture while another group produces an entirely different one?The answer lies in genetics and selection.

Humans, like any other animal, adapt to their environment. What is successful in one part of the world, may not be a successful behavior in another part of the world. For example, ethnic groups that developed in colder northern regions also developed a very high degree of monogamous pair bonding. Babies who were born with a father who stayed on as a provider were more likely to survive. Thus, monogamy became a selected trait in these ethnic groups. To this day, northern Asians have higher rates of monogamy than any other group.

Pair bonding is not the only difference among ethnic groups. Researchers have noted other differences among various ethnic groups including intelligence, brain size, sexual behavior, fertility, life span, and maturation. I do not raise these points to pass judgment on any particular group—only to point out that different ethnic groups selected for different tendencies based on the region where their group developed. These tendencies have become part of the genetics of each ethnic group. They do not evaporate when an individual crosses a border into a region inhabited by a different group of people.

Applying the PN concept of national identity to Western nations

Most Western nations were originally based on a distinct culture and ethnicity. Poland has always consisted primarily of Polish Catholics, regardless of whether Poland was an independent nation or part of a greater Empire. For nations like this, the only thing that is necessary to implement the PN view of identity would be to reject the idea that a nation is based solely on abstract principles and affirm the role of its people and culture as the foundation for the nation.

Some nations are made up of several, smaller nations. The United Kingdom is made up of England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland. Each of these smaller countries has a distinct ethnic character.

The US is unique among Western nations in that even though it was founded by one group—the English—it was always open to all white immigrants. However, the US also included a large number of African slaves who were emancipated during the Civil War. The US downplayed the role of religion in the public life of the nation, but it remained a majority Christian nation for most of its history.

The racial and religious character of the US began to change in 1965 with the passage of the Hart-Celler Immigration Act. Hart-Celler removed the restrictions on non-European immigration. This, combined with massive illegal immigration from Central America, has dramatically altered the demographics of the United States. The change in demographics has been accompanied by a shift in the political orientation of the country. Whereas the US was once a center-right country, it has become a center-left country as immigration has turned conservative bastions like California into solid blue states.

If political change were the only effect, it might be tolerable, but racial tensions have been fanned to a fever pitch which is spiraling into violence more frequently. The tactics that have been introduced to ease racial tensions have only made life more unbearable. Political correctness was introduced as a way to make people feel more comfortable. It failed to achieve that goal. Instead it has become a noose that threatens to strangle free speech.

The current approach that the elites are using to solve the problem appears to be hybridity, the idea that all the different racial and ethnic groups should interbreed and form a single American people. As far as I know a deliberate attempt to fuse many races into one has never been tried before on such a large scale. The process is likely to take longer and be more painful than anyone expects.

One possible Patriarchal Nationalist approach, on the other hand, would be to decide that the national identity of the US is primarily a white nation that holds the unique American values of hard work, ingenuity, confidence, enterprise, freedom, and tolerance. Immigration policy could be reformed to gradually return the US to similar racial balance circa 1960 or 1970. Non-white American citizens would not be in any way second class citizens, but would fully participate in the life of the country. Everyone in the country would be expected to strongly adhere to the values of the nation.

This approach bears some resemblance to Vladimir Putin's approach to managing Russia. Russia is a highly diverse country with many large ethnic minorities including a large Muslim population. Putin's approach has been to be inclusive while simultaneously insisting that all Russian citizens fully embrace the values of the nation.

Conclusion

Please share your thoughts on national identity in the comments. The development of Patriarchal Nationalism is a collaborative process with the ROK readers.

Read More: Patriarchal Nationalism: The Only Societal System That Can Save The West

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

3 Ways To Be More Successful At Online Dating

July 7, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by Romance Compass

With technology making it both easier to connect with people around the world—and making it more difficult to interact with people on the streets—online dating has become a important part of every man's repertoire. But how do you make online dating work for you? Given that women can easily use online dating as a means to get attention–or hide unpleasant things about themselves, such as obesity or social justice—how can you avoid time-wasters, freaks and psychos?

Whether you're in cyberspace or meatspace, meeting girls is a numbers game, but there are a number of ways you can narrow down the field and find a girl who's right for you. Here's how…

1. Filter out girls who are politically incompatible with you

Politics go far beyond your actual opinions and voting habits: they're a reflection of how you view the world and how you behave. If you're looking for a feminine, wifely woman, you're not going to find her at a Bernie Sanders rally, crowing about muh free college tuition and whining about the "racism" of the right. Leftist women are more likely to be slutty, masculinized, mentally ill and have a host of other negative traits that make them unsuitable for love or marriage.

As Roosh has stated already, the best women to date and marry are those who don't hate Donald Trump. A woman who is open to conservative ideas is also one who will be more likely to grow her hair out and want to be a wife and mother. Life is too short to waste on tussling with unstable social network broads who go ballistic upon seeing you wearing a "Make America Great Again" hat in your profile.

While it's theoretically possible to convert a leftie girl into a conservative one, it's also theoretically possible to win the lottery and get struck by lightning. By concentrating on female demographics who already have the qualities you want, you make it easier to find the kind of woman you can spend the rest of your life with.

2. Focus on foreign girls

Out of the crooked timber of Western culture, no straight girl will ever be made. Women in the West are marinaded in a toxic soup of social media, male thirst, sexual perversion and institutionalized misandry. Any girl raised in this environment is going to be varying degrees of dysfunctional, even if she's purportedly a "good girl" or has an intact family. There is no escaping the cultural Marxist leviathan.

The best way to guarantee that your blushing bride-to-be won't pull an Eat, Pray, Love on you is to find one from a land that hasn't been corrupted. Healthy plants can't grow from poisoned soil, and the soil in eastern Europe and other lands untouched by Western cultural Marxism is still fertile. While there are no guarantees in life, wooing a woman from these lands gives you a better chance of success than the corrupt environment of the West.

The more time you spend abroad experiencing other cultures—whether you're in Europe, Asia or South America—the more you'll realize that Western culture is deeply sick and antithetical to forming healthy relationships. Meeting a woman from a culture that reveres family, patriarchy, and tradition will increase the likelihood that the two of you will have a happily ever after.

3. Don’t get too attached to girls right away

At its heart, online dating is speed dating for the slow and shy. Getting attached to a girl you haven’t met yet—or have barely spent any time with—is a recipe for disaster. The likelihood of meeting your dream woman on the first go is unlikely at best, and by becoming too smitten with one girl—nice as she may be—you’re ruining your chances of actually finding a girl you’re compatible with.

When meeting girls via the Internet, message as many as you can and don’t get serious about any single one until you’ve had time to see them in person and get to know them a bit. Remember that online dating is ultimately a numbers game—much like meeting women in general—and you can’t afford to put any girl on a pedestal at any stage of the relationship.

At the end of the day, online dating is like any other form of dating in that you get out of it what you put in. If you approach it in a lackadaisical fashion, you’ll get lackluster results. By learning how to screen girls and focusing on girls from intact cultures, you’ll decrease the number of bad dates you get stuck on and increase your likelihood of success. There are plenty of feminine girls out there looking for a masculine man, and by adjusting your methods, you’ll make it easier to find them.

Click HERE to visit Romance Compass, a dating website where you can meet the Russian woman of your dreams.

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Four Police Officers Killed By Snipers During Black Lives Matter Protest In Dallas

July 8, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via LA Times:

Eleven police officers were shot, four of them fatally, when two snipers opened fire with rifles during a protest over police shootings in downtown Dallas Thursday evening, police said.

Police cornered one of the suspects in a garage and were negotiating with him, Dallas Police Chief David Brown said.

He said authorities have reason to believe that the suspects had threatened to plant a bomb "in the downtown area," and police have reached out to the FBI and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives "to do a very thorough search" of the area.

"We believe that these suspects were positioning themselves in a way to triangulate on these officers from two different perches and garages in the downtown area, and planned to injure and kill as many law enforcement officers as they could," Brown said.

Authorities released a photo of a "person of interest" wearing camouflage and carrying a rifle.

"An intensive search for suspects is currently underway," Brown said in an earlier statement.

Police said that two officers were in surgery and three were in critical condition.

At least four of the officers belonged to the Dallas Area Rapid Transit agency, including one of those who died, according to the agency's Twitter account.

An agency spokesman said the officers did not appear to be together when they were shot.

A police department spokeswoman emailed a message to reporters asking them to “please be patient while we sort through all of this information as this is clearly still an active scene.”

Video shot by a Facebook user appeared to show officers ducking for cover as shots rang out.

A Dallas Morning News photographer tweeted footage that showed police ducking behind cars and an officer running with a rifle.

> This is a little bit cleaner clip. Shots fired at the #blacklivesmatter protest. pic.twitter.com/DAJVkCll32
>
> — G.J. McCarthy (@gjmccarthy) July 8, 2016

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read the entire article

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

5 Tips To Avoid A False Rape Accusation On Campus

July 8, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

After sharing my story on how I was falsely accused of rape on campus, I received an interesting email from a follower. He liked the article, and recommended that I share some advice on how college men nowadays can avoid false rape accusations.

If you do not think that you need to know these things, you are wrong. I didn't think that I would be falsely accused of rape, but I was—and dozens of men are falsely accused every day.

College campuses, however, are particular hot spots for false rape accusations. Why? Well, it's due to a number of factors. There's always alcohol involved, the parties are typically close-knit groups (so everyone knows one another), and girls are particularly immature and gossipy.

These three things create a recipe for disaster when it comes to false rape accusations. And since the campus police sure as hell aren't on your side, you need to protect yourself. But by just following a few simple tips, you can easily save yourself years in prison or thousands in lawyer fees.

1. Send A Day After Message

Or else this will happen

Text evidence is hard to dispute. I honestly wish I'd had known this with the girl who falsely accused me of rape, because I would've saved a good amount of cash on lawyer fees. I also could've pushed to expel her.

Regardless, I can't change the past—but you, the men of ROK, can arm yourselves with knowledge to save yourselves. One of these pieces of knowledge is to ALWAYS send a message to the girl you fucked the day after you fuck her.

Make sure it's something sexual, and get her to reply. Say something like "I hope you enjoyed last night ;)" or "You were amazing last night, I hope we meet again sometime." Even though they're kind of chode-y, they can easily save you a huge amount of heartache. If this girl decides to falsely accuse you of rape, so that she doesn't feel like a slut, you can whip out your phone and make the investigator look like a complete idiot.

Be sure to take pictures of these messages too, or at least don't delete them…which brings me to my second point.

2. Delete NOTHING

Save that shit

Nowadays, there's an avalanche of evidence to be found in our phones. Snapchat, Facebook, SMS, text messages, Tinder, and the list goes on and on. If she won't stop flirting with you via Facebook, take a screenshot and save the images. If she sexts you on Tinder, screenshot and save the images. And if she sends you nudes on Snapchat? Screenshot the shit out of them.

I learned this one the hard way. There was a girl that I met in my Sophomore year of college; I was a total newbie to game, but I had a few moments of glory. I saw this hot girl in my math class, and proceeded to isolate her, act like a bad boy, and kino her legs. It was pretty ballsy, but FUCK did it work.

She was snapping me nudes and sexual pictures for literally the next year. Me, being a scared shitless newbie, never pulled the trigger until my junior year. I guess she thought I was an "aloof bad boy" the whole time, but I digress. She invited me over to a party, and long story short, we were both alone in her bed.

She had literally pulled me to her bedroom, and kept going on about how she was completely plastered after like two shots. She dropped thousands of hints that she wanted me to rape her.

"I thought you would take advantage of me…" "You're really cute…" "I'm so drunk right now, you could do anything to me…"

In fact, she literally asked me: "Do you want to have sex?" and wouldn't stop making out with me. But I could sense the bitch was trouble.

Already having been falsely accused of rape, I realized the severity of what I'd gotten myself into. I kept trying to escalate with her, but she kept pushing me away and saying she was "confused." But then no more than 30 seconds later, she'd be grabbing my dick.

She literally wanted me to pin her down and fuck her.

If I had in fact decided to fuck her, even though it would have been completely consensual, if at ANY point someone found out or walked in on us, she would've yelled "HELP, HE'S RAPING ME," and I would've been fucked.

So I got the hell out of there questioning why I'd never saved her Snapchat nudes. "WHY?" I thought. Had she ever falsely accused me of raping her, because she felt bad that I didn't rape her (oh the irony), I would've had ample evidence that she was soliciting sex.

The lesson here is save every single naughty sext, picture, or message that you get from a girl.

3. Buy A Hidden Camera

As Roosh wrote about here, recording sex with a hidden camera is a very smart move for men nowadays. It's so sad that we even have to do things like this, but that's what happens when hyper-feminism runs amok.

I'm probably going to buy a hidden camera within the next few weeks for my room, because I've had way too many close encounters with women accusing me of rape, or at least spreading rumors that I raped them.

We at ROK cannot advise you to break the law, but if you do end up going this route, it is in your best interests to tell NOBODY about this camera. And after every single sexual encounter, be sure to put the video file onto an encrypted USB drive. This is not to jack off to, or to upload to pornhub, it's to cover your own ass.

Depending on your state, there may be laws against this. But it's far better to have yourself legally protected against a false rape accusation than it is to be completely vulnerable to the whims of any woman who changes her mind. Roosh recommended this camera here, so if you're either going to college, or your son is going to college, I would highly recommend buying one and giving it to your son or keeping it for yourself.

4. Don't Say Shit

I Plead The Fifth

Just say this

As somebody who was a pre-law philosophy major, I can tell you that literally 99% of people have no clue just how easily words can be manipulated with just a small knowledge of semantics.

Take, for example, a simple question: "So, roughly what time did you have sex with Miss Jessica?" Although it may seem completely innocuous, it's a complete death trap.

"Umm I think it was around 1AM?"

"Where'd she come from?"

"Uh some frat house down on-"

"So there was alcohol involved?"

"Well, yeah, but-"

"Did you know she was drunk?"

"Well I assumed she'd had a few—but wait that doesn't mean she's dru-"

"So you admit to taking a girl from a frat house, who was drunk, with the intention of having sex with her. That sounds a lot like rape, Mr. Smith."

"No! She wanted me to have sex with her!"

"So you did in fact penetrate her?"

"Yes, but it was completely consensual, she even gave me head!"

"So you think that her giving you oral sex is consent for you to penetrate her vaginally? I don’t think you understand what consent is, Mr. Smith. We’ll investigate this matter further and your trial will be held on June 3rd, 2016.”

“What, but NO she-”

DUDE. SHUT THE FUCK UP.

You men need to realize that literally anything you say will be used against you. If you are EVER falsely accused of rape, simply arrive at the office, ask them what you are being accused of, and get as many details as you can.

If they ask you questions, tell them that you will return with a lawyer. Yes, lawyers cost a lot of money, but it’s a lot better than going to jail. Pay for a lawyer and don’t say shit. Just this tip alone saved me from potentially going to jail.

5. Flush Your Condom Down the Toilet

This image was made by cucks

As Max Roscoe recently wrote about in his article here, there are plenty of women who are crazy enough to shove your used condom up their vaginas and impregnate themselves when you’re in the bathroom or something.

And do you know what she’ll do when she’s pregnant with your seed, to avoid social pressure? She’s going to falsely accuse you of rape.

“He raped me! But…I just can’t bring myself to get an abortion, I wouldn’t be able to live with myself.” Yeah, right. You just want an alpha male’s seed and the social support that comes with claiming you were raped.

You will be especially vulnerable to your seed being stolen if you have good game. Not all women, but a few crazy bitches might want to “tie you down,” since they perceive you as being such an alpha male. It’s a woman’s natural instinct to try to tame alpha males, so be careful with your seed.

Nearly every player I’ve talked to flushes his condoms down the toilet, and for good reason. All it takes is one crazy girl to completely and utterly destroy your life. Don’t get stuck paying $5,000 in child support every month for the next 18 years. Flush your condoms down the toilet.

Bonus: Avoid Sex And Work On Yourself

[image]
This could be you at age 25

Unfortunately, college is not the “anything goes,” sex haven that it was in the 1960’s. Nowadays, it may not even be worth it to have sex in college, due to the extremely high rate of false rape accusations.

So, consider working on yourself instead. Rather than trying to pull girls, spend some time hiking with buddies in nature. Or have a “man’s movie night,” where you share some beers with your mates and watch a badass movie like Gladiator or something.

Work out, supplement and eat right, read good books, invest in yourself, meditate, and get your financial future solid. Yes, it will be a tough four years without getting pussy, but that’s a choice you’ll have to make.

Either way, there’s benefits. If you can successfully avoid a college rape accusation, then the amount of young, fresh pussy you’ll slay will be worth it. But, if you’re not willing to take the risk, you can set yourself up for later sexual success. It’s up to you.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 3 Signs She’s Making A False Rape Accusation

Jon Anthony

Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Women Who Sell Their Bodies For Money Don’t Want To Be Called Prostitutes

July 8, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

One benefit of certain strategies of “game” is that men are allowed easy access to an endless supply of promiscuous women who can be rather easily bedded with an easily patterned set of vocal and behavioral cues that men can learn. And yes, if one intends to merely “enjoy the decline” there can be large amounts of hedonism and physical enjoyment to be had. But civilization, if anything, is looking at more than mere reaction to physical stimuli and western civilization developed the philosophies, art, architecture, science, religion, and culture that it did precisely by limiting and controlling primal urges and desires, and channeling them to proper areas.

What we have witnessed over the past 50 years is a rapid unwinding of centuries worth of civilization. Easy access to promiscuous women can be fun on an individual scale, but it is certain suicide for an entire culture or society. Indeed, much of the current decline can be attributed to our lack of social unity. As religions, families, men’s clubs, and social organizations have been destroyed, men in the west have become atomized, looking out for their own interests with no sense of group unity. ROK is one step in uniting men together for goodness and progress.

Control of Basic Desires is what separates man from animal

The internet age has provided new tools for women to act on their hypergamous sexual desires and to experiment with multiple men with relative privacy. As recently as the 1970s, there were strict social rules for relations between the sexes. At many universities in the U.S., dorms were strictly segregated, and indeed many entire schools were segregated by sex. When potential suitors visited, they were required to sign in, where they could then meet in a semi-public dating parlour to converse with their dates.

1970s Dating Parlor

Women interested in more racy activities would need to travel off campus (in a time where a woman traveling alone would have been questionable at the least, and most did not own their own automobile), and would need to invest time and effort into seeking out a discreet encounter. Often, the woman would need to obtain clothing that visually identified her as a person of loose morals, and travel to certain areas or establishments that catered to a certain clientele. Hotel rooms would need to be rented, and considerable time and effort was required by both parties.

Today, a woman can sit in the comfort of her dormitory or apartment, paid for by daddy or daddy government, and, using the recent advances made possible by the internet and smartphones, sort through hundreds of men in mere minutes by sliding her finger across a touch sensitive screen full of possible suitors. She need not dress up in any certain way– sweatpants and a dirty t shirt taken at a proper angle to minimize the appearance of her excess poundage (both literal and figurative) will easily attract one hundred thirsty men over a 24-hour period, who will inflate her ego and shower her with affections, gifts, and money in exchange for attention, and the possibility of sexual congress.

She has similar products to distort her mind and body

Beauty products, mood altering psychotropic drugs, contraception medication, and makeup, along with plausible deniability of a discreet encounter that was easily arranged with a few movements of her index finger, all conspire to hide the long list of dirty encounters she has in her past. Indeed, many men would be too disgusted to accept her offer of free sex if they truly knew her past.

Not an ad for prostitution

In addition to hookup apps and craigslist or backpage prostitution, which for the most part were used by the minority of women who throughout history occupied the World's Oldest Profession (an honest and useful one at that), rampant promiscuity has gone mainstream over the past few years. SeekingArrangement, a website connecting mostly young, attractive college girls to older men willing to spend money on them in return for intimate and sexual favors, had over 1.5 million student members in 2016. Considering there are approximately 17 million students in public and private 2-4 year institutions, including men and retirees, the fact that a single website promoting pseudo-prostitution attracts almost 9% of college enrollees is quite impressive, assuming the numbers can be trusted.

Those are NOT breasts, they are a purse for holding money from my J-O-B

Vanity Fair recently published an article examining the mainstreaming of the New Prostitution Economy, and interviewed many participants in this new sexual free-for-all. One 22-year-old Texan stated she wasn't attracted to any of the older men she started boning for pay, but it's a job, and not everyone likes their job, right? After all, as she says, "What right does anyone have to judge you for anything you do with your body?"

I will judge a woman for anything and everything she does to her body, including the kinds of food she puts into it, the amount of alcohol she consumes, the amount of exercise, the shape and genetics, the looseness of the sexual organs, and the mental damage done by a promiscuous past that she innately knows is wrong, or she wouldn't hide it.

Another 21-year-old who signed up for Seeking Arrangement, but claims she has not yet used it, was held back because of "the stigma if anyone finds out." In other words, she has no concerns about the health, safety, or moral and mental side effects of her actions, but merely doesn't want others to know the dirty things she has done. This confirms that without repercussions to their behavior, most women will behave in a wildly irresponsible manner. As the influence of their fathers, their church, and social shaming, all declining, women ramp up promiscuous behaviors that will leave them as poor wives, or more likely, single mothers, in the years to come.

Mainstream media articles further normalize prostitution

And in the past, where streetwalkers needed a specific wardrobe, a pimp, and a jurisdiction where prostitution would be tolerated, today women have all the tools they need to sell their bodies, without splitting the funds with anyone, and risk almost no social shaming or danger of police intervention. As one 22-year-old stated "I could always just get a sugar daddy. I guess I could just start camming… It's not like you need a pimp anymore. You just need a computer."

What's one of the early steps in legitimizing destructive behavior? Renaming it. A 20-year-old Canadian student stated "People don't call it prostitution anymore. That sounds like slut-shaming. Some girls get very rigid about it, like This is a woman's choice."

So Prostitution is no more. In 2016 anyone arrested for prostitution is simply Doing It Wrong (still using a pimp and using the wrong vocabulary).

NY Magazine explored the idea earlier this year in its article "Is Prostitution Just Another Job?" which documented several freshman girls who began selling their bodies on Backpage or Craigslist after leaving for college, and hearing about the exciting stories of other sex workers. A 22-year-old who recently moved to NYC and started sex work at the age of 18, grew up in a conservative family, who found out, cut her off, and no longer have anything to do with her. (Her response? "It was a big deal. It was hard then, but I've definitely gotten over it").

Any woman who can so easily write off her father and family as something she "just got over" is not going to make a pair bond long enough for the ink to dry on the marriage certificate. But these girls will marry. Thirst is high, and men who have no idea what kind of past these women have will wife them up just as their ability to extract money from men based on their looks is fading. And a side effect of servicing hundreds of men is she will know how to please him physically, and will know precisely how to lie and manipulate a man, after testing out little white lies on her customers for years.

As prostitution and fornication with hundreds of men becomes the status quo for the typical American teenager, an entire generation will be lost. As bad as the typical reader may think things are today, at least you grew up in a society where there was a stable family (even if it wasn't yours), where government maintained some minimal amount of ethical education in the public schools, and where the church enforced some amount of moral restrictions on unfettered sexual behavior. But the next generation is growing up entirely without these limits.

The single mother prostitutes of tomorrow will be unable to raise the next generation of children to be anything but weak, stimulus responding attention seeking hedonists. And all the past struggles, battles, ideas, philosophies and culture that we call western civilization will be thrown into the garbage bin.

Read More: 20 Signs We're Not Living In A Patriarchy

Max Roscoe

is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

Google’s Anti-White Sketch Of The Juno Mission Team Shows How Evil The Company Has Become

July 9, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

It’s probably a good thing that Google got rid of its longtime slogan, “Don’t be evil,” because the company’s been working around the clock on that front for years. Case in point: earlier this week, following NASA’s successful mission to send the Juno spacecraft to Jupiter, Google released a “celebratory” sketch that whitewashed (blackwashed) the ethnicity of the Juno mission team members:

Had Google depicted a group of non-whites as white, the left would have gone apoplectic with fury. In fact, right now there's a controversy brewing over the upcoming live-action adaptation of Ghost in the Shell, in which white actress Scarlett Johansson was cast as a Japanese character. However, falsely depicting a team of white men as a multiethnic, multigender team is apparently acceptable.

This is yet another example of how Google is using its power as the world's largest search engine to force a leftist agenda on all of us. Google has steadily worked to erode the privacy of Internet users while simultaneously trying to manipulate reality in order to boost support for the Democratic Party and leftist political causes. Anyone who uses Google's services in any way should be aware of their actions.

Examples Of Google's Evil

While Google has been a supporter of the left for years—both of Google's founders, Sergey Brin and Larry Page, are Democrats, as are much of the site's employees—the site's political advocacy has become ridiculously overt in the past year. For example, YouTube channel SourceFed discovered last month that Google had been manipulating its search results to favor Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton. Google's autocomplete would bury suggestions for searches on Hillary's various corruption scandals while working normally for her rivals Donald Trump and Bernie Sanders:

https://youtu.be/PFxFRqNmXKg

Additionally, Google and YouTube have been trying to no-platform Return of Kings contributor Davis Aurini for several months now. Back in March, YouTube shut down Aurini's channel for supposed "violations" of their Terms of Service, then reinstated him after a public backlash. He recently became the victim of a false copyright strike for his review of the film Tombstone, and has been banned from uploading videos longer than 15 minutes as a result.

Google has also been a pioneer in violating the privacy of its users. For example, if you're a user of Chrome, Google is surreptitiously turning on your microphone and using it to record your voice. Virtually every Google product, from Gmail to Android phones to Google Maps, secretly hoovers up all the data entered into it and spreads it to Google without your knowledge or consent.

More insidiously, Google has been steadily working to destroy online anonymity: former CEO Eric Schmidt has stated multiple times that anonymity on the Internet is "dangerous" and will soon be a thing of the past. Anonymity is the tool by which many dissident writers and bloggers can express their views without worrying about losing their jobs or being publicly pilloried by leftists. Anonymity is also an important tool for writers fighting authoritarian governments; Google's erosion of online privacy will aid tyrants and effectively make it impossible to advocate for conservative, neomasculine values.

The Online Hydra

Google's sheer dominance of the Internet—from email to video sharing to data analytics—makes breaking free of its clutches relatively difficult. I myself make use of Google's services extensively because they're convenient, easy-to-use and free. The problem is that Google's products come with a hefty price tag: empowering a corporation whose values are antithetical to your own.

I've extricated myself from the Google hydra in some ways; for example, I've switched to using Pale Moon as my browser because it's faster, hogs less resources and doesn't spy on me. However, we need to search for ways to get the Google monkey off our backs. We cannot continue enriching a corporation who uses its heft to advocate for everything we oppose.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How History Shows Us The Evil Of Western Masochism

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Dallas's SJW Mayor Blames Slavery For The Deaths Of Five Policemen

July 10, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> This is on my generation of leaders. It is on our watch that we have allowed this to continue to fester, that we have led the next generation down a vicious path of rhetoric and actions that pit one against the other…
>
> — Dallas Mayor Mike Rawlings

At a time when he was meant to be unashamedly defending law and order in his city, the Democratic Mayor of Dallas, Mike Rawlings, has referred to slavery during a vigil for five police officers slain by a black sniper, Micah Xavier Johnson. Instead of honoring the service and ultimate sacrifice of the dead and wounded lawmen, Rawlings has started the unsurprising process of legitimizing the grievances and actions of the black supremacist killer, who explicitly said he wanted to kill white people. No amount of his calling for everyone to appreciate the perspectives of both Black Lives Matter protestors and their critics can hide the excuse he is giving to future attackers.

Sadly, Mike Rawlings' disgusting justification of the killings, however implicit he tried to make it, shows how beholden many politicians have become to extremist, logic-blind groups like Black Lives Matter. Any hope of Democratic politicians resisting SJW rhetoric, such as former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley's apologized-for "all lives matter" comment, is fast fading. As we all know, the mainstream Republican leadership has already been infected by a quasi-deference to SJW beliefs, particularly when SJWs use violence against Trump supporters and GOP luminaries largely ignore it. Consequently, the bulk of each major party is continuing to create an atmosphere that enables depraved leftwing violence.

Plus, Rawlings is clearly savaging middle-aged white men when he refers to “my generation of leaders.” At a time when he is supposedly calling for an end to race-baiting and racial tensions, he is doing his best to make sure that an entire group of people, determined by gender and race, is made to apologize again for some made-up political crime. Meanwhile, the seriously criminal underbelly of Black Lives Matter has escaped any rebuke by Rawlings. So, too, has the recent condoning and even incitement of violence produced by zealous SJW “journalists” like Jesse Benn.

Do Democratic mayors have control of their cities?

Rawlings is only spitting on the service and sacrifice of the five dead officers, not honoring them.

The answer is clearly no. Otherwise they would not need to pander to violence-inclined groups like Black Lives Matter, only hours after five of their law enforcement personnel have been murdered. Although I called Rawlings a SJW earlier, a significant reason for his slavery remarks may just be his fears for his own tenure and the safety of his city. Any major city mayor who comes out against Black Lives Matter probably knows that their criticism will result in violent protests and wanton attacks on bystanders and the community at large. And then there’s that very personal element of probably losing your political career. All in all, metropolitan Democratic politicians are being held hostage to an even greater extent than their state and federal colleagues.

From Miami to Los Angeles, Dallas to Chicago, major American cities have become safe spaces only for the most fringe and mentally ill leftwing groups. A fake poop swastika on campus leads to a Hurricane Katrina-like excoriation of American masculinity and so-called white privilege, merely to assuage the feelings of SJWs and leftwing race-baiters. But the snuffing out of the lives of five cops doing their jobs, not to mention the pain of a number of others also hit by bullets, warrants only an attack on White America.

Expect only worse things to come

Domestic terrorists, plain and simple.

Twitter has been awash in recent days with SJW reminders about Philando Castile and Alton Sterling, the two black men whose deaths Dallas killer Micah Xavier Johnson said motivated his anti-white rampage. By focusing on Castile and Sterling, men with gang connections and very dubious backgrounds, the leftwing Twitterati is making a very loud statement that unrelated deaths in Minnesota and Louisiana somehow justify the deaths of police many hundreds of miles away in Dallas. Or, only moderately less cruelly, that white police lives matter a whole lot less than black lives, including black lives associated with gangs.

If the Dallas police deaths produce less than a murmur from mainstream politicians about the criminal nature of both Black Lives Matter protests and rhetoric, then America is in for a very scary and dangerous racial ride. If you do not feel unsafe now, the time for severely doubting your personal security is maybe just around the corner.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Is Civilization Just Another Name For Slavery?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Ancient Tactics For Modern Streetfighting

July 10, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

I don't think I need to tell anybody about the decidedly Weimar-esque events that occurred in Sacramento, California a couple of weeks ago, in which fascists and communists battled in the streets-with the rightists managing to win a 10-to-1 underdog victory that, despite my disagreements with Matthew Heimbach's political philosophy—to put it mildly—was frankly an inspiring and heartening one.

Seeing as we have apparently entered a cultural zeitgeist in which street fighting paramilitaries are going to affect political change through hand-to-hand combat, I thought it would be best to train ourselves in the event of attack (for purposes of defense of course, we at Return of Kings would never advocate aggression against our enemies). With that being said, the tips on general fitness and martial arts are just the first steps of forming an effective fighting force.

One has often heard the phrase "strength in numbers", but as the events of the "Battle of Sacramento" showed, having mere numerical superiority will not guarantee victory. Instead, what must be learned and trained is tactical superiority.

Tactics and Strategies

These are two terms that are commonly used in military, gaming, or sporting contexts, but are often misunderstood. To put it very simply, tactics are short term techniques for winning the battle that you are immediately participating in, whereas strategies are the techniques used to achieve a long term goal. To put it in Return of Kings-centric terms, disinformation was a tactic in Operation Medusa, wherein the long term strategy was to create discord in the ranks of Social Justice Warriors so Roosh could speak unmolested.

While the long term strategy for our victory over the Cathedral is perhaps in its embryonic stages at the moment, tactics for fighting the useful idiots don't need to be invented, for they already exist, and have successfully been used for thousands of years

In my opinion, if you wish to learn how to fight as a unit of modern day men-at-arms, don't learn from the Antifas, the black flag, and any other organization of pseudo-rebellious bourgeois manchildren. Instead, learn from ancient men whose lives literally depended on their ability to function as a team. Indeed, these tactics are still used by riot police today:

1. The Shield Wall

Probably the simplest of the tactics that will be discussed today—and that is of course a relative term—because it is a fixed fortification rather than a movement.

To start, you obviously need some shields, preferably ones that are uniform in size. Seeing as it is probably difficult to get proper shields (made either of iron or hard plastic), my suggestion is to create ad-hoc tower shields by cutting large cylindrical garbage cans or 55 gallon drums in half.

Once you and your motley crew have been properly outfitted, stand shoulder to shoulder and place your shields in front of you, each shield overlapping the one beside it. An example of this can be seen in the famous Mesopotamian Vulture Stele below.

As with most things, your group must practice this maneuver so you can draw your shields as one. With more practice, you will be able to move as one, and even swing blunt objects in united vertical swings (for obvious reasons, turning this into a phalanx with spears is to be frowned upon). But even without weapons, this provides a formidable defense—not to mention that the shield can be used as a weapon in its own right.

2. Flanking

Once you've figured out how to move as a collective unit, the question that arises is: where should you move? Preferably, towards your enemies, but the simple concept of "forward" can be improved upon with flanking. This is, as the name implies, maneuvering in a way that presents your front with the vulnerable side or back of the opponent (or, if you have the numbers, both sides of the opponent in a technique referred to as the pincer movement).

This is not a formation per se, but a movement that can be done in conjunction with formations such as the shield wall or the flying wedge detailed below. Speaking in hypothetical terms that assume a sufficient number of fighters, I would personally recommend the Zulu "buffalo horn" formation characteristic of Shaka's imperial reforms of the 19th century: it creates a pincer movement AND a shield wall below the "pincers", with auxiliaries capable of free movement wherever necessary

The major downside to this is that it will require much more drilling and training than the aforementioned shield wall.

3. The Flying Wedge

This is one you might actually see practiced today if you observe footage of riot police breaking up crowds of people. Or maybe you remember reading about it in The Gallic Wars by Julius Caesar. Or perhaps you are familiar with it being banned from American football and Rugby due to it having killed several players in the early 20th century-a grim reminder of its efficacy.

This formation is of a moderate difficulty between the simple shield wall and the more complex pincer maneuver, and the bulk of difficulty in training will involve getting each person into their proper place and forming the triangle shape. Once this is accomplished, moving forward will presumably be relatively simple.

This formation should best be done with the biggest, strongest man forming the point, with a commander in the back and various rankers in between. This champion will penetrate the lines while his sides are protected by the sides of the triangle. For added protection, you can link shields while on the run, or even link arms, as seen below in a picture of the 1896 Yale football team. Either way, the momentum of each person will push each other person forward and add to the power of the formation.

4. Auxiliaries

In ancient times, what would often support one of these formations were auxiliary fighters, typically peltists, archers, or general support, as seen in the svinfylking variation of the flying wedge

As slings and bows are classified as deadly weapons, I would refrain from bringing them. Instead, have auxiliaries to carry injured people out of the fray or deal with the police and media.

Conclusion

It goes without saying that I don't have much experience in team hand-to-hand combat- the closest I've come to it is playing football in high school. However, I chose the tactics detailed here because I have read of them being successfully used by men whose lives depended on them. As we enter turbulent times, this admittedly slightly LARPy article, combined with lots of practice of its insights, might give you an edge over a horde standing against you.

Read More: Does Ancient Muslim Wisdom Have Answers To Modern Western Problems?

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Is Antisemitism Genuine Bigotry Or A Practical Counterdefense Against A Powerful Tribe?

July 11, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Race, religion, and politics are uncomfortable topics in our political correct world, which is why the topic of Jews, Zionists, and Israel always seems to spark a flame war where everyone is either a flaming Nazi or the evil Jew. Even some readers here at ROK seem to be wondering why such sentiments are so prevalent as it's hard for most people to remain neutral or reasonable (I fully expect the shills and knee-jerkers to call me an anti-Semite and cry that ROK has turned into Stormfront without even reading this article—all because they saw few words that triggered them). So I will try to explore this topic for all to understand in this two part article.

And due to the nature of the topic, I will go through extraordinary measures to make my points here. I will also have to resort to generalizations for the brevity of this article, one of which will be to describe social currents in terms of general tendencies. Exceptions will be assumed, but not necessarily mentioned.

To start with, I'm not a Nazi, white-supremacist, Alt-Right or any of their other variants. I also don't consider myself a Leftist, Rightist, nationalist, or socialist. Next, for the purpose of this article, Jews will be considered anyone of Jewish ancestry. Whether they actively practice Judaism or not will be irrelevant. (Some people will accuse you of being an anti-Semite just for saying "Jews" instead of "Jewish people.")

Zionists, on the other hand, will be referred to as the Jews of prominent social status who are actively influencing the culture and policies of Western nations (especially the US) to favor the Jews and the state of Israel. A non-Jew with Jewish connections who shows exceptional devotion to Israel's cause may also be considered a Zionist (The "far-right" Geert Wilders of Netherlands, who once called other European nationalist parties “fascists,” is one example. The neo-con George W. Bush may also qualify as a Zionist).

The “Antisemites”

Now, before we even talk about the anti-Semitic sentiments, let us start by asking what qualifies a person as an anti-Semite. The answer is: it really depends on who you ask. “Anti-Semite” is one of those vague words that gets thrown around by those with political agendas, so there is no clear definition that everyone can agree on. Let us take a look at the different levels of antisemitism that are present today based on how it is used:

Level 1 – Shows insufficient devotion for Israel.

This is usually reserved for people in power who are expected to offer unconditional support to Israel but don’t. Obama, for example, would be considered an anti-Semite by some Zionists.

Level 2 – Is critical of Israel’s policy

I will discuss this more in Part II, but today’s surge of liberals who sympathize with the Palestinians has been described as a rise of “new antisemitism.”

Level 3 – Points out the profound Zionist influence on politics and policies.

Yes, simply using the word “Zionist” in politics without singing praise for Israel will also get you labeled an anti-Semite.

Level 4 – Talks about a conspiracy by the Zionists to alter the political and cultural landscape of the US and other Western nations for the benefit of Israel and the Jewish people.

You don’t even have to believe in the conspiracy. Simply talking about the subject to open a discussion will earn you the swastika branding. Roosh was called an antisemite by ADL just for reviewing a book.

Level 5 – Full Nazi. Similar to Level 4, but makes no differentiation between Jews and Zionists; believes they’re controlling everything of significance and are plotting the destruction of White race.

Pretty straight-forward. These are the individuals who have fully embraced the anti-Semite label.

As you can see, it doesn't take much to be called an anti-Semite by those who want to silence you by bringing up the Nazi connotations. Note I haven't said whether the above sentiments are true or not; I've merely pointed out what will get you labeled as an anti-Semite.

Reasons For Anti-Semitism

With the definitions of Zionism and anti-Semites cleared, I will now state simple facts that lead people to the various levels of antisemitism that I've listed above. And to keep the article concise and focused, I will only list facts that are current and relevant; Medieval history and some of the more outlandish conspiracy theories will not be mentioned.

1. Overwhelming Jewish representation in Communism and Leftism

Think this is a Nazi propaganda poster? It's actually Polish.

The big names in the history of Bolshevik revolution, including Marx, Lenin, and Trotsky, all had Jewish backgrounds. The other prominent Jewish Communists are: Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht, who were involved in the Communist uprising in Weimar Germany (which may have scared the German population into supporting the Nazis); and Béla Kun, the short-lived dictator of Hungary who unleashed Red Terror in the country. Even Albert Einstein, the Time magazine's "person of the century" was a Communist sympathizer.

For a complete list of Jewish Communists, refer to this link.

We are continuing to see the legacy of Jewish involvement in the Leftist movements with many prominent Socialist, Progressive, and Liberal Jews playing an active role in American politics. But of course, not all Jews were Leftists and many have switched over to the Right following the betrayal of the Left, which I will discuss more in Part II.

2. Overwhelming Jewish representation in feminism

Here is a list from Wikipedia, which has a strong bias against anything they consider anti-Semitic.

We even published an article last year on the same topic, so I won't delve further here.

3. Overwhelming Jewish representation in culture, finances, and politics

Jewish intellectuals of the past were pretty much the early SJW's who promoted progressive ideas in the West. Jews today continue to be influential in all areas of Western society, and especially the US.

Prominent historical family like the Rothschilds to the modern globalists such as Henry Kissenger and George Soros, just to name a few, are also Jewish.

Here's also a list of Jewish American politicians and actors.

4. AIPAC and US foreign policy that strongly supports Israel

Do I even have to lay this out? Both American parties are heavily dictated by Zionist lobbyists and every presidential candidate must prove their loyalty before the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) to be considered acceptable presidential material. Just look at what happened to Ron Paul in the last election. He was lambasted as an anti-Semite for suggesting that the US should cut foreign aid to Israel, which was something Netanyahu himself expressed when he said that he wanted to reduce Israel's dependency on the US.

5. Draconian censorship and attack against anyone critical of Zionism

Nobody likes being silenced. So if the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) and other Zionist organizations are trying to dispel the idea of Jewish-Zionist conspiracy, they're not doing themselves any favors with their extremely repressive efforts to censor and defame others (including other Jews). People will simply recall what Voltaire said about knowing who rules over you.

I can't even list all of these censorship and defamation efforts because there are too many, but here's one good example: According to ADL, simply mentioning significant Jewish presence in Hollywood is considered anti-Semitic, a fact one Jew was able to boast openly to the world while Gary Oldman had to apologize for a passing mention of it.

As another example, for all the complaints about the liberal media being too friendly to Muslims, and with many people defending Mohammed cartoons as free speech, no one seems to care about how draconian the laws are against Holocaust denial (I'm not making a commentary on the Holocaust, just the laws surrounding it). And remember Charlie Hebdo? The satirical magazine that had the balls to make fun of Muslims? Guess what, a cartoonist back in 2009 was fired for "ridiculing Judaism." Where are all the warriors for freedom of speech?

The Zionists even operate an army of internet trolls and shills called the Jewish Internet Defense Force, or JIDF, towards their cause. If the SJW's are an angry mob that attacks whatever gets their attention, the JIDF is an organized army for defamation and censorship.

Analysis

Again, the above points are just pure facts. How you interpret that information should be what matters; but no, the Zionists don't even want you to talk about them or know about them. By simply mentioning the above facts, you will automatically be marked as a level 5 anti-Semite. The fanaticism and the zeal to which they try to repress information and discredit you makes the SJW's look reasonable in comparison.

I could list much more information and elaborate on them, but that would turn this article into a book. I suggest anyone interested in the truth to do their own research and draw their own conclusions.

White genocide?

In Judaism, Jews are God's chosen people. In Christianity, everyone is equal in the eyes of God. Guess which group guards their identity more zealously.

You can't talk about Zionism and anti-Semitism without discussing the supposed white genocide and the destruction of the Western civilization. The oft repeated conspiracy is that Jews or Zionists are actively plotting to decimate the white population and destroy Christianity.

Honestly, I just don't see it. I will briefly summarize why.

First, it is true that historically, the Jews preferred the European societies to be multicultural and tolerant so that they themselves could thrive without persecution. The more influential Jews may have changed the course of the culture, but I don't see it as a white "genocide." Especially so today when multiculturalism is already achieved in all the major Western nations.

People use this short clip as a proof of this genocide conspiracy, but all I see is one old lady talking about Jews helping to spread multiculturalism. That's not enough to prove an insidious genocide. Presence of Jews in prominent positions in society doesn't necessarily translate to conspiracy; by using that logic, feminist idea of the "patriarchy" would also be true. Going from anti-white, multicultural propaganda to white genocide is just too big of a leap. But I guess it really depends on how you define "genocide."

Can it not just be that white population is declining because educated and affluent population prefer to delay marriage and have less children? Low birthrates are witnessed in Japan, where there is almost no Jewish influence and no multiculturalism. It's hardly a Jewish conspiracy to depopulate Japan. And compared to Japan, Europe was always relatively open to foreign cultures; the recent ethno-nationalism is a rather recent phenomenon.

Ethnic and religious tolerance in the Occident goes back as far as the ancient Rome (which later converted to Christianity and openly invited a horde of foreign invaders to their lands). Let's also not forget that Alexander the Great promoted race and culture mixing as well. Open-door immigration may be criminal incompetence on part of the European leaders, but if you think that's a white genocide, you're going to have to prove it.

The same goes for Christianity. The more that nations are industrialized and the more they embrace the cult of materialism, the less likely they are to be religious. There are exceptions, but that is the general trend that can be witnessed in other non-Christian nations as well. I fail to see how Richard Dawkins, Sam Harris, and millennial punks rebelling against their upbringing is a Jewish conspiracy to undermine the West.

Instead of obsessing over a specific group, it would be more productive to fight against the tide itself by looking after your own tribe. Because whether you believe in a Jewish conspiracy or not, that's how they operated to thrive as a group. As it stands, there are more white people engaging in the so-called white genocide than the "Jews" can ever hope to achieve—and constantly pointing to the Jews as the source of all problems will not stop that.

If you really care about the white race, you should have at least two white children; no one is stopping you. In Part II, we will discuss the current trend of Zionism as it relates to the Left and Right.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: One Journalist's Flawed Analysis Of The Migrant Crisis

Corey Savage

Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Why Is Obama Completely Ignoring The Dallas Shooter’s Motive Of Wanting To Kill White People?

July 11, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

America has a race problem. But it is not the typical race problem you hear about on the six o’clock news or in your social media news feed. Rather, it involves people like Barack Obama refusing to call deliberate attacks on white people racist. Despite Dallas police, including the city’s commissioner, outlining how the shooter Micah Xavier Johnson said he wanted to kill white people, especially white law enforcement personnel, Obama claims that the assailant’s motives are “hard to untangle.”

> President Obama on #Dallas: It's hard to "untangle the motives of the shooter" https://t.co/7dClE5Mjr6 https://t.co/YzdDnT3nDf
>
> — CNN (@CNN) July 9, 2016

Whilst trying to play global sheriff in Warsaw, Poland during a meeting of NATO leaders, Obama even went so far as to suggest Johnson was mentally ill and therefore not criminally culpable. Return Of Kings is trying to track down, so far without success, Presidential comments in which Obama described the police shootings of black men as examples of mental illness. And, contrasting with the premeditated, indefensible Dallas tragedy, the use of lethal force by police officers is almost always proven to be justified and/or in self-defense.

Compare this lukewarm response with the gushing solidarity Obama showed towards gays, lesbians, and transgenders after the Orlando gay nightclub shootings. He called the slaughter an “act of terror” and an “act of hate,” the latter description clearly indicating he thought it was a hate crime. But in the case of Dallas, we have a dual hate crime posited on the victims' profession and their race. So why is this not being emphasized?

Obviously, as SJWs have repeated to themselves for decades, whites cannot be victims of racism. The unemployed white guy in Michigan or the struggling white plumber in California is unable to call the race card whenever a certain percentage of other white men are in Congress or on the boards of Fortune 500 companies.

An ugly history of looking the other way

Similar to the Dallas police murders, the racial implications of attacks like the one unleashed on Carter Strange by eight black men are ignored by the mainstream media and political elites alike.

The hypocrisy evident after the Dallas police officer murders is simply the most recent example in a long-running campaign of selectively decided racism. Obama is by no means a trailblazer for glossing over the disproportionate number of violent assaults on whites. After the death of black youth Trayvon Martin, for example, a number of Caucasians reported being attacked by blacks claiming revenge for the African-American community. Most of these reports were unhelpfully dismissed by fearful and sometimes even obsequious police departments, despite incontrovertible proof of the actual attacks. Given the violence unleashed on Dallas police in recent days, it is perhaps understandable that law enforcement is unwilling to properly challenge the "only whites can be racist" thesis.

Even when black attackers admitted to unambiguously racist motivations, the stories of their victims received only the most casual treatment. Of course, the mainstream media has to sometimes pay lip service to the reality of two-way racism, but it only does so begrudgingly. Practically-speaking, major publications' general silence surrounding minority-on-white attacks supports the perverse idea that only minorities can be victims of racial animosity expressed through physical violence.

Going back further to the Rodney King incident and the riots that followed, the blood-curdling attack on white truck driver Reginald Denny was ignored as a hate crime, notwithstanding the “racism” attached to the earlier police beating of King, a black man. In addition, unlike Denny, King was actually a convicted felon and had led LAPD officers on a dangerous high-speed chase. Not even ninety-one different skull fractures could convince the court system and political elites that maybe Denny was as much a victim of racism as liberals alleged King was. Obama’s insensitive comments about the Dallas police murders can thus be traced back to a longstanding political indifference towards wanton racial attacks against white people.

Why should justice for innocents depend on the color of their skin?

Michael Brown, pictured here robbing a convenience store, and who also tried to grab a policeman’s gun, will continue to receive the status of victim while the racist killing of five white police officers is attributed to “mental illness.”

In 2015, when America ironically had a black male Attorney-General, Eric Holder, the Department of Justice released the findings of the Michael Brown investigation. Brown, an African-American who had just finished robbing a convenience store, had been fatally shot by Officer Darren Wilson in Ferguson, Missouri, an incident which resulted in savage riots in multiple cities. Forensic evidence blew away the ridiculous racism allegations of SJWs and demonstrated that Brown had tried to take Wilson’s gun. Yet Brown is still treated like a victim of anti-black police racism.

Do not expect anywhere near the level of victimhood to be given to the officers killed in Dallas. After all, America’s own President has refused to give it to the five individuals doing their jobs in white skin when they were slain. Our society’s notions of victimhood have crashed to the point where a fraudulent “victim” is elevated above the massacring of real victims, whose sickening deaths were apparently confirmed as racist in nature by the killer himself.

Welcome to America: home of the SJWs, land of the morally depraved.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Dallas's SJW Mayor Blames Slavery For The Deaths Of Five Policemen

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How The Assault Rifle Was Invented

July 11, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

During the First World War, the soldiers of all the belligerent nations carried rifles that were designed for accurate long-range fire. Germany had its Mauser; France its Lebel; Britain its Lee-Enfield; Russia its Mosin-Nagant; and the United States its Springfield. These weapons in general performed adequately for what they were designed to do.

But towards the end of the war it became clear that most infantry engagements took place at ranges that were well below five hundred meters. The accurate bolt-action rifles of the day were designed for accuracy at much longer ranges. Military innovators in Germany during the 1920s drew the obvious conclusion that other nations did not: it would be better to design a weapon that replaced long-range accuracy with a portable, higher volume of fire.

By the late 1930s the German armaments industry had succeeded in developing what it called the kurz ("short") round in 7.92-mm caliber. A basic design by Louis Schmeisser was produced to fire the new cartridge; this design was called the Maschinenkarabiner 42(H). This name was eventually changed to Maschinenpistole 43, or simply MP 43. Initial trials conducted with the weapon proved to be a brilliant success, and soon the German Army found itself deluged with requests for it from front-line units.

The Sturmgewehr 44

Apparently Hitler, who could be conservative in matters of infantry tactics, was initially opposed to the radical innovation that the new rifle represented. But he could also be pragmatic where results mattered, and when it became clear that the MP 43 gave a qualitative edge over the Soviets, he was quick to change his mind. The name of the weapon eventually became Sturmgewehr 44.

The Luftwaffe was also absorbed in the development of an “assault rifle” of its own. The fruit of its labors was the innovative and highly advanced Fallschirmjägergewehr 42 (FG 42), which looked something like a hybrid between a rifle and a light machine gun. It was a gas-powered weapon with a bipod, large plastic butt, and a side-mounted box magazine. The side-mounted magazine was not precisely a success; it allowed dirt to enter into the mechanism and was prone to jamming.

All in all, the weapon was effective but could never be produced in sufficient numbers to meet demand. It deserves a place in the story of the development of the assault rifle, however, because it did influence small arms design after the war was over, especially the gas-powered action.

The Fallschirmjägergewehr 42

Only about 7,000 FG 42s were issued by the end of the war. Tens of thousands of Sturmgewehr 44s, however, were manufactured, and it proved to be a great success on the Russian front.

One glance at the Sturmgewehr 44 makes it clear that this weapon is the father of the modern assault rifle. The sloping banana magazine ensures that the user can bring a large volume of fire to bear on his target. Mass production was the original goal here: the weapon is firmly constructed from sheet metal with pins and stampings. The legendary Russian AK-47 is—to be blunt—simply a mass-produced knock-off of the Sturmgewehr. German designers had wanted something that combined the best features of a traditional rifle with the automatic firepower of the submachine gun.

Submachine guns were widely used in combat in the Second World War, and they did what they were designed to do: that is, to deliver a large volume of lead downrange at an enemy. But they used pistol rounds (either 9-mm or .45 rounds) that could not deliver accurate fire beyond more than a very limited range. The assault rifle was intended to solve this problem.

The “assault rifle revolution” changed how infantry engagements were fought. No longer would squads of infantry have to rely on light or heavy machine guns for support at all times. They could load themselves with magazines and strike out on their own, freeing themselves from the tether of supporting fire.

The Soviet AK-47 copied the design of its German predecessor

There were even more innovations that came with the weapon. An infrared night sight

(called the Vampir) was made to be fitted to the rifle, but it does not appear to have been widely used. Small arms historians even tell us that designers experimented with a curved barrel for the rifle that would allow a rifleman to fire around the corner of a building from a position of safety. It was apparently made specifically for urban combat, but as far as I have been able to determine, it was never used in action.

What is certain is that the Sturmgewehr 44 was one of the most influential weapons to come out of the Second World War. As noted earlier, it was the model on which the Soviet AK-47 and SKS was based. Western nations were slower to accept the idea of the assault rifle, however. The reasons for this may lie in traditional military conservatism in the US and Britain, as well as the fact that existing production facilities were already configured to churn out old-school weapons like the M1 Garand rifle.

It was inexcusable that US forces were not equipped with an assault rifle during the Korean conflict. The Americans would have to wait until the mid-1960s, when the M16 rifle with its 5.56 mm round made its appearance, to catch up to what German engineers were doing in the 1940s.

Read More: Contemporary Art Reflects Our Cultural Degeneracy

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Society Has Awakened From The Collective Delusion Of The Television Age

July 12, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The dominance of television has obviously ended in the early 21st century. People still watch television, but they will never again believe it the way they used to. Television "news" and feel-good storytelling of the type that dominated from the 1940s through the 1990s has become laughable as the Information Age continues to destroy once dominant cultural myths. During this time, the media were able to create the illusion that powerful, elite interests were on our side even as they undermined the nation and laid the groundwork for today's socialist revolution. They were able to shape beliefs and control all the information the mass mind got to see and hear.

Media-driven myths were hugely successful in keeping people blindly participating in a consumption economy and government tax farm system for half a century, while keeping them largely oblivious as to what was really happening in the world and their government. For 50 years the entire population was essentially mind-controlled by a medium that provided them with sugar-coated fantasies and half truths about reality, and nobody seriously questioned the fact that big business and the government had Americans' best interests at heart. (Even if they did raise valid concerns, those concerns never entered the Overton Window of the mass mind.) Over this peculiar and interesting period in human history television's effects of society followed to this ideal, paraphrasing theologian and social critic Reinhold Niebuhr:

> Rationality belongs to the cool observer, but because of the stupidity of the average man, he follows not reason, but faith, and the naive faith requires necessary illusion and emotionally potent oversimplifications which are provided > by the myth-maker to keep ordinary person on course.

In essence, a centralized communication model was able to delude the masses through mythmaking, putting them to sleep as they blindly put their faith in a "system" that would only be exposed as totally corrupt and amoral after communication shifted online.

Network (1976) depicts a madman news anchor trying to wake up the masses from the delusion of television

The 1976 classic Network perfectly describes the mass delusion the public was under when television was dominant through the fictional news anchor Howard Beale, for which Peter Finch won an Oscar.

> But you people sit there, day after day, night after night, all ages, colors, creeds… We're all you know. You're beginning to believe the illusions we're spinning here. You're beginning to think that the tube is reality, and that your own lives are unreal. You do whatever the tube tells you! You dress like the tube, you eat like the tube, you raise your children like the tube, you even think like the tube! This is mass madness, you maniacs! In God's name, you people are the real thing! We are the illusion! So turn off your television sets. Turn them off now. Turn them off right now. Turn them off and leave them off! Turn them off right in the middle of the sentence I'm speaking to you now! TURN THEM OFF…

One need look no further than the top television shows of all time to see Niebuhr's observations and Beale's frustrations playing out in a business model that made the Big Three networks' fortunes. In everything from dramas to sitcoms to the nightly news, the plot seldom deviates from the good guys come out on top, the bad guys ultimately lose, truth and justice win the day, the American way is the light of the world, and our politicians, while not infallible are the "good" guys. And, of course, women are virtuous and morally superior to men was another lesson drilled into the American mind, even as men descended back into legalized slavery in a country that pats itself on the back for abolishing slavery. People thought this way for 50 years.

As evidence of how taken in the public was with the media propaganda of the day, the following NBC News documentary takes us all the way back to 1993. In A Day At The Clinton White House, Tom Brokaw hosts an hour long, warm and fuzzy special on the first 100 days of Bill Clinton's presidency. The sycophantic nature of the documentary is astounding by today's standards—but in its day nobody batted an eye as to its legitimacy as a piece of "journalism." However, even as this pablum showcasing Clinton as a demigod was broadcast and taken seriously by a credulous public, a new way of communicating was just beginning to show up in homes around the nation that would later destroy the power of the mythmakers to push propaganda like this down the throats of the masses.

Back in those days, the Internet was only in 10% of homes, and Brokaw makes a brief reference to it towards the end of his knob polishing session in the Clinton White House. But that humble invention would eventually destroy the centralized communication business model he was a part of as well as the dominance of corporate and government mind control in America and the world.

Just look back in awe as to what passed as legitimate reporting even as recently as the 1990s.

Waking Up

Even though one of today's alternative media majors, Matt Drudge, got his start during the Clinton regime and the genesis of alternative narratives was underway, according to Gallup, trust in the media peaked in 1998 and 1999, the era of Clinton. Despite the fact people started using the Internet en masse in the 1990s, there wasn't a lot of information challenging political and cultural narratives of the puppet masters in America at that time. People still tuned into and trusted television news and newspapers, and believed their government had good intentions, no matter if they were selling out American jobs via NAFTA, turning the White House into a "coke den" with mistresses running in and out of it according to Secret Service Agent Gary Byrne, and making shady deals with the Chinese.

But, the Clinton presidency would be the last to be able to fully leverage Big Media to control political and cultural narratives and keep the public in the dark about the reality of their political machinations. The end of trust in talking heads and network news was drawing near. Ironically, Howard Beale imploring the public to stop trusting everything they saw on television in 1976 has become reality 40 years later. That shift started in earnest during the Bush administration.

As Bush and his band of Neocons attempted to use their tried and true method of mythmaking to keep the military-industrial complex running in high gear, a major platform of his administration became selling a false narrative about weapons of mass destruction in order to invade Iraq.

The feat of creating myths in order to legitimize the war would have been easier to pull off in the Television Age, but unfortunately for politicians and their spinmeisters people were increasingly communicating online. Thanks to tireless work of bloggers and truth seekers, a mountain of evidence grew proving the Bush administration pushed the WMD narrative knowing they invented it out of whole cloth. As reported by Washington's Blog:

> Everyone knew the WMD claims were fake. For example, Tony Blair – the British Prime Minister – knew that Saddam possessed no WMDs. If America's closest ally > Britain knew, then the White House knew as well. And the number 2 Democrat in the Senate -who was on the Senate intelligence committee – admitted that the Senate intelligence committee knew before the war started that Bush's public statements about Iraqi WMDs were false. If the committee knew, then the White House knew as well.

>
> But we don't even have to use logic to be able to conclude that the White House knew. Specifically, the former highest-ranking CIA officer in Europe says that Bush, Cheney and Rice were personally informed that Iraq had no WMDs in Fall 2002. Former Treasury Secretary O'Neil – who was a member of the National Security Council – said: In the 23 months I was there, I never saw anything that I would characterize as evidence of weapons of mass destruction.
>
> The CIA warned the White House that claims about Iraq's nuclear ambitions (using forged documents) were false, and yet the White House made those claims anyway.

The truth is much of the information exposing the WMD fraud would have never surfaced—and more importantly persisted—if people were not communicating online. The media performed their usual drive-by reporting and glazed over the issue, giving it a half-assed treatment, then another sensation came up and the WMD fraud fell into the talking heads' memory hole. But, it was given new life by documentation and video people could call up years or decades later with just a few keystrokes. This type of information would have never been so easily available before. The exposure of the WMD fraud is perhaps the most important case of the internet causing a significant deviation from the "official" narrative as the Information Age replaced the Television Age.

So, why was the internet more important than the liberal media when it came to exposing the WMD fraud? Even though the media is 90% Democrat, one must realize "journalists" are typically intellectually lazy groupthinkers who do not challenge authority unless it becomes profitable for them to do so. The business runs on emotion as much as politics, which is why they grilled one of their own in the 90s with the Lewinsky scandal but glazed over a huge scandal that could have been much worse politically for Bush than the other scandals they tormented him with. The Intercept reported on the failure of the mainstream media to report on this issue properly in the article Twelve Years Later, US Media Still Can't Get Iraqi WMD Story Right:

> Thanks in part to the failure of centrist and liberal media to explain this clearly, it's now cemented as an article of faith on much of the right that Iraq was concealing weapons of mass destruction.

Without the internet, its reasonable to believe the WMD narrative could have been much more successful in influencing public opinion to this day. We certainly wouldn't be discussing it right now without the internet. The Bush administration nearly pulled the feat off anyway, despite the liberal press!

Newsweek and other leftist media have openly worshiped Obama from day one

As Obama replaced Bush, trust in the media continued to wane. During the 2008 campaign, it became painfully obvious the media was in the tank for Obama, from Chris Matthews' obsequious thrill running up my leg commentary to a complete and total failure to emphasize Obama's connections to terrorists like Bill Ayers, his Muslim upbringing, his shady association with Mr. Goddamn America, Jeremiah Wright, and call into question his lack of any significant legislative or political successes while Illinois Senator. All these counter narratives only survived because of the internet. Perhaps more than any other event, the 2008 Presidential Election exposed the Marxist media in the minds of the American public as the leftist hacks they are.

During Obama's 2008 campaign in which the media were least partially successful in turning him into the Messiah, two narratives—an "official" narrative pushed by mainstream media, and a popular narrative arising organically from free and open mass communication online—emerged and only grew further apart over two terms of a far left Obama presidency. The exposure of the mainstream media as nothing but propagandists who push Marxism instead of living up to their vaunted reputation as the Fourth Estate, horribly failing in their primary task of providing an unbiased account of events, was underway. From Obamacare to Fast and Furious to the latest fanning of the flames of racial division in the country, the "official" and popular narratives continue to grow farther apart.

The "official" and popular narratives have once again clashed in the 2016 Presidential campaign. The successful campaign of Donald Trump to with the GOP nomination would never have been possible in the days of centralized, one-size-fits-all communication. It's obvious the leftist media seethed at Trump and hated him from day one, but it did not matter because they had so discredited themselves their narrative was not the only one people knew of or had to listen to. They could just turn off the TV, download a podcast, or read a blog to get a more factual version of events rather than having a talking head read them something from the New World Order script.

The elite despise the fact the masses have awakened from the mass delusions they were spinning. Rather than try to balance their reporting, mainstream outlets have doubled down on their Marxist narratives. Despite what elitists in the media will say, as Ernest Hemingway said: The truth has a certain ring to it. The old media regularly tries to discredit new media, and even insinuate the people who subscribe to the new media version of events are everything from idiots to racists for not swallowing suicidal leftist talking points.

One group of mainstream media executives even shamelessly told two whistle blowers embroiled in a legal suit for making them report false stories: We paid $3 billion for these stations. We'll decide what the news is. Other possible media driven myths of the past 50 years, now being called into question by legitimate questions and facts include:

- A worldwide ban on DDT based on the book Silent Spring is being challenged by authors, scientists, and even journalist John Stossel
- A coming Ice Age pushed in the 1970s which encouraged countries to stop using fossil fuels failed to materialize
- AIDS was supposed to become a heterosexual pandemic, it remains confined to homosexual risk groups and CDC's own statistics say there is a nearly as low as a 1 in 10,000 chance of vaginal transmission through normal heterosexual intercourse—in other words more sex than some people have in a lifetime would be required to contract it this way
- The ozone hole over Antarctica was going to fry the world, a hole a number of scientists are now saying has always been there because of the way rays from the sun produce ozone and that oceans produce more chlorine annually than man ever did
- The coming global warming Armageddon is said to be caused by the gas that all life on earth needs to survive, CO2, and is only fixable by ludicrous tax on an element on the periodic table, carbon
- The current Bee-pocalypse narrative says the world will starve to death unless the world eliminates certain pesticides and some suggestions call for eliminating microwave i.e. cellular and other forms of communication, while other sources are saying bee numbers were manipulated to create another problem out of whole cloth
- The media continues to fudge gun statistics as pointed out last week with the fact gun homicides are at an all-time low while over half the public believes gun violence has increased
- The media operate in a way that creates profit by stirring up racial problems and hysteria as evidenced by its BLM narratives and facts which directly contradict the narrative of “racist white cops” such as a police officer is 18 times more likely to be killed by a black suspect than vice versa

These worrisome stories are only the tip of the iceberg of possible media myths that have been perpetrated on the American public. No wonder the establishment is up in arms, they need citizens to be pliable sheep that listen to their dictates and buy their products. They definitely do not want a public capable of figuring out how much they’re being lied to, but the internet has yielded just that. George Carlin put it best:

> You have owners. They own you. They own everything. They own all the important land. They own and control the corporations. They’ve long since bought and paid for the Senate, the Congress, the state houses, the city halls. They got the judges in their back pockets and they own all the big media companies, so they control just about all of the news and information you get to hear. They got you by the balls…They don’t want a population of citizens capable of critical thinking. They don’t want well-informed, well-educated people capable of critical thinking. They’re not interested in that. That doesn’t help them. That’s against their interests.

As proof the elite want to crush the popular narrative arising from the so-called unwashed masses the elite openly hate, a Harvard-educated propagandist, and son of a CEO James Traub of Foreign Policy magazine published It’s Time for the Elite to Rise Up Against the Ignorant Masses just last month, an article befitting a Mao or Hitler regime in that it openly calls for stripping the rights of voters to influence public policy.

Look for the two narratives to grow ever more disparate in the coming years and decades. The mainstream media will look increasingly disconnected from reality and ridiculous as they spew talking points from society’s puppet masters, while we the people talk amongst ourselves in a manner that produces a phenomenon seen in the book The Wisdom of Crowds: Why the Many Are Smarter Than the Few. Our version of reality may differ from that written by a small elite, but nonetheless an increasing number of people believe the “unwashed” and unvarnished truth over the elite’s sugar-coated myths. Importantly, the emergence of the popular narrative is credited with helping the Brexit movement successfully challenge an organizing Soviet…er…European Union.

That leaves us with this conclusion. The fantasies of the Television Age have been replaced with the harsh truths and nightmares of reality. It’s a cruel, corrupt, and often evil world we live in. The deal is, it always has been that way, even when we were collectively put to sleep and tranquilized by the mass delusion created by television. Where this new chapter in human history ends nobody knows, but the world will never be the same now that large numbers of people are awake, and they’re angry.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How Higher Education Feeds Female Delusion

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Does Life Have Inherent Meaning Without Belief In God?

July 12, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

How would you feel if you spent most of your life working, having children, and trying to make a difference, only to come to the conclusion in old age that it was all for nothing and that there was no meaning to your life at all? That's exactly what happened to Leo Tolstoy, who wrote a book called A Confession to describe his existential crisis and what he did in an attempt to resolve it.

> Today or tomorrow sickness and death will come (they had come already) to those I love or to me; nothing will remain but stench and worms. Sooner or later my affairs, whatever they may be, will be forgotten, and I shall not exist. Then why go on making any effort? How can man fail to see this? And how go on living? That is what is surprising! One can only live while one is intoxicated with life; as soon as one is sober it is impossible not to see that it is all a mere fraud and a stupid fraud! That is precisely what it is: there is nothing either amusing or > witty about it, it is simply cruel and stupid.

Back in his time of the 19th century, he saw four ways that people were handling this problem.

1. Ignorance. “It consists in not knowing, not understanding, that life is an evil and an absurdity. People of this sort — chiefly women, or very young or very dull people — have not yet understood that question of life which presented itself to Schopenhauer, Solomon, and Buddha.” Believers in God fit within this category.

2. Epicureanism and pleasure. “[This] is the way in which the majority of people of our circle make life possible for themselves. Their circumstances furnish them with more of welfare than of hardship, and their moral dullness makes it possible for them to forget that the advantage of their position is accidental, and that not everyone can have a thousand wives and palaces like Solomon.”

3. The “strength” to commit suicide. “Having understood the stupidity of the joke that has been played on them, and having understood that it is better to be dead than to be alive, and that it is best of all not to exist, they act accordingly and promptly end this stupid joke, since there are means: a rope round one’s neck, water, a knife to stick into one’s heart, or the trains on the railways.”

4. Weakness. “It consists in seeing the truth of the situation and yet clinging to life, knowing in advance that nothing can come of it. People of this kind know that death is better than life, but not having the strength to act rationally — to end the deception quickly and kill themselves — they seem to wait for something.”

Tolstoy came to a conclusion that many of us have realized, but forcefully pushed to the wayside by distracting ourselves with various goals and entertainments. We have erected walls around our minds that prevent us from asking the big questions and acknowledging life’s meaninglessness, and instead have embarked on an escalating hunt for satisfying pleasures and achievements. I did this myself for over a decade until I reached a limit of what pleasure could give me.

Tolstoy stumbled upon an interesting paradox whereby human reason is the rejector of life. The argument follows thusly…

1. There is nothing higher to a human than his reason. Without reason, a man could not perceive or sense life.

2. Reason is therefore the creator of a man's life, because it allows him to experience it.

3. Reason is also what allows a man to reject his life and commit suicide, thereby ending it.

4. Reason is both the creator and destroyer of life.

He concludes that the best way to prevent a man from prematurely ending his life is to believe in "irrational" beliefs such as God. Therefore man must trick his reason to believe in "myths" that allow him to continue valuing his life and existence. This suggests that having too much reason is harmful to your life, and may end it prematurely.

> Rational knowledge presented by the learned and wise, denies the meaning of life, but the enormous masses of men, the whole of mankind receive that meaning in irrational knowledge. And that irrational knowledge is faith, that very thing which I could not but reject. It is God, One in Three; the creation in six days; the devils and angels, and all the rest that I cannot accept as long as I retain my reason.

While Tolstoy portrays having faith as ignorant, he concedes that it appears to be a necessity for human life to prevent the suicidal tendencies that he found himself in.

> Faith still remained to me as irrational as it was before, but I could not but admit that it alone gives mankind a reply to the questions of life, and that consequently it makes life possible.
>
> […]
>
> Looking again at people of other lands, at my contemporaries and at their predecessors, I saw the same thing. Where there is life, there since man began > faith has made life possible for him.

Faith is therefore a requirement of life. If you reason yourself into forgoing faith, in which you scientifically conclude that there is no rock-solid proof of God, you will certainly face an existential crises that makes you question your own life and how to live in a way that doesn't cripple you, take you down the road of senseless hedonism, or motivate you to commit suicide.

Tolstoy argues that outside of faith, it's impossible to find meaning in your life that justifies existence. Many men have tried but have not come up with something greater than faith in allowing humans to live with purpose while being free of debilitating malaise and fatalism.

He decided that he was in no position to examine the meaning of life because he was actually an aberration, an absurd entity, for denying life in the first place. He was not qualified to arrive at the correct answer. In other words, if you are pursuing the sins and evils of life, it will be impossible for you to see life's true meaning.

> What if an executioner passing his whole life in torturing people and cutting off their heads, or a hopeless drunkard, or a madman settled for life in a dark room which he has fouled and imagines that he would perish if he left — what if he asked himself: "What is life?" Evidently he could not offer reply to that question than that life is the greatest evil, and the madman's answer would be perfectly correct, but only as applied to himself. What if I am such a madman? What if all we rich and leisured people are such madmen?

You would not ask a parasite, which he considered himself, what life is, because it is a parasite that tries to hurt others or steal from them. He then compares us to laborers who angrily question the farm owner (God) why a certain task on the farm must be completed without seeing the complete picture of how the farm works. We are only exposed to a tiny part of the farm, and after not liking what we see, or not doing the job the owner demanded, we declare the whole thing as a sham, jumping to conclusions from limited information and experience.

Tolstoy then made the conscious decision to seek out God:

> Though I was quite convinced of the impossibility of proving the existence of a Deity (Kant had shown, and I quite understood him, that it could not be proved), I yet sought for god, hoped that I should find Him.
>
> […]
>
> Every man has come into this world by the will of God. And God has so made man that every man can destroy his soul or save it. The aim of man in life is to save his soul, and to save his soul he must live "godly" and to live "godly" he must renounce all the pleasures of life, must labour, humble himself, suffer, and be merciful.

He was unable to suspend his reason completely, and had disagreements with the Orthodox Church for perverting Christ's teachings. This led him to eventually form his own sect called the Tolstoyan movement, which was based on passivity and lack of private land ownership.

Tolstoy's deus ex machina transformation into a believer will probably not be sufficient for atheists today who lack meaning in their lives. As a man who is in between atheism and faith, his arguments do not easily allow me to jump into faith, but at this point I wonder if I even need further justification.

I know that for the health of my sanity, my tribe, and my nation, faith will be required, especially since a strong and healthy nation without faith is a fantasy concept that history has not shown to be possible, at least not in the modern era. Whether God is the absolute truth or not, He seems to be a requirement for a sane and purposeful life. I want to believe, and maybe one day, I just will.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: "A Confession" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Germany And Sweden Redefine Consent To Put More Men On The Hook For Rape

July 12, 2016 | by John Hydenius | Link | Original Link

The German parliament has passed an new law redefining rape. “No means no” is the new ground rule which means that a rape could have happened even if the victim didn’t fight back. Saying no is enough.

Sweden is set to have a similar law in place very soon. The government’s investigator has announced that she will propose a new law where it will be enough that the person says no for it to be counted as rape. With our current self-proclaimed feminist government, it seems likely that the new definition of rape will find support.

Sometimes it’s necessary to change laws

Cologne on New Year's Eve.

Recent sexual assaults committed by immigrants have affected the debates in both countries. We've lately had several cases in Sweden where groups of asylum seeking boys molest young girls at music festivals. The attacks on women in Cologne on New Year's Eve have without a doubt brought the issue to the fore in Germany.

The MPs in the Bundestag stood up and cheered when the vote was passed by a large majority on Thursday. The new German law also classifies groping as a sex crime, and makes it easier to prosecute assaults committed by large groups. It also makes it easier to deport migrants who commit sex crimes.

It's certainly important to change laws that do not sufficiently apply to the crimes they're supposed to combat. In the new European reality, with immigrants enriching our societies with rape games like taharrush, we should do what's necessary to make them pay for their barbarism.

But the question is if this new "no means no" law will actually make any difference. The reason they wanted to change the law was that many men allegedly got away with raping because the evidence wasn't enough to convict them. Assuming that premise is true, will the new law put more criminals behind bars?

Won't bring new proof to the table

As many experts have pointed out, you'll still be left with cases of he said, she said. The woman will claim she said no, the man will say she did not. In some rare cases, there might be video or audio evidence confirming her story. But most of us don't videotape ourselves at every point in our day.

A new law won't magically bring new evidence to the table. We're still left with the problem of proving something that only two people, the supposed victim and perpetrator, can really know the truth about. That's why we've traditionally required physical evidence like bruises or a black eye. But even then, we can never know for certain what caused those injuries. A mentally ill woman might have inflicted them on herself.

I don't expect the new law to really make any difference when it comes to proving that a rape did or didn't happen. What I do expect is that it will make German and Swedish men more cautious and hesitant when they're going to have sex with a girl, especially one they don't know very well. Questions arise like, what if the girl says no first and then changes her mind? Does a yes after a no negate the previous no? What if she says no in a playful way, pretending she's hard to get, and afterwards claims that she was being completely serious?

You can't even expect them to fight back

Common sense will also tell you that a woman who doesn't want to have sex with you will physically resist you if you cross the line. If I was a woman being attacked by a rapist, I can't imagine simply laying back and taking it. I would do anything in my power to stop that from happening, including fighting and taking a beating. At least I could say that I did all I could.

But apparently you can't even expect women to fight back anymore. You can't expect them to really react in any forceful manner when a perpetrator tries to penetrate them. In 2016, women are so independent and strong that they let themselves get raped without fighting back at all.

My suspicion and fear is that more men will be convicted of rape under these new laws, regardless of whether they're guilty or not. Feminists have made it very clear that they want us to take a woman's word as fact. If she said she was raped, it would be misogynist to doubt her. With feminist ideas seeping into universities and curricula, it's only a matter of time before judges start putting these ideas into practice (if it isn't already happening).

That's why I'm calling this a trap set for men. I expect that there will be more cases in the future where the judge simply trusts the woman's testimony, not demanding any further proof. No need to show bruises or any other observable evidence—whatever she says, it must be true. After all, why would she lie about something so horrible?

If German women themselves don't kill your boner, this new law will surely do it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: All Public Rape Allegations Are False

John Hydenius
John Hydenius is a journalist living in Sweden. He would love to tell you more about himself. If people found out who he was, though, he would lose all of his Swedish friends and probably end up on a list of enemies of the state. He can't wait to move abroad. @johnhydenius on Twitter

Ask Me A Question And I Will Respond In Video

July 12, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s been a few years since I did a video AMA. I’d like to do one now to capture my current thinking and beliefs. Using the comments below or Twitter, ask me a question that you would like an answer to. No question is off-limits, and I wouldn’t mind some harder questions that make me contemplate a reasonable position.

I’ll collect questions this week, film my answers, and then upload a indexed video so you can jump around to individual responses.

Don’t Miss: VIDEO: The Future Of The World

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Narrative Of A Shooting Can’t Be Formed Until The Media Knows All Races Involved

July 13, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

This appears to be the summer of violence. After Islamic fundamentalist slaying of homosexuals in Orlando, and two police killings of indeterminate justification of black men in two different states in one week, we now have a sniper who has killed multiple policemen during a “peaceful” Black Lives Matter “protest” in Dallas. While it is a cynical—but perhaps accurate—view to take that there always seems to be a tragedy poised right after a political scandal to redirect our attention from their shame, what I’d like to focus on today is the different responses the narrative has for killings with guns in the United States depending on the demographic makeup of the shooter, and the target.

The devil’s in the details

When we examine the three big media shootings of the past month, we can see a profound difference in the media coverage and the political response of Barack Obama, Inc, and his chosen successor, Hillary Clinton. I become more convinced with each tragedy that the Democratic modus operandi to a shooting tragedy is one sympathetic tweet as soon as possible, one statement condemning the violence the next day, then unceasing calls for gun control until the next tragedy.

However, although these shootings were all senseless violence, and all resulted in lost American lives, and one should think that that would mean that perhaps a common thread of “we have a lot of unhappy people, maybe we should fix our narcissistic, autistic, overmedicated society into something resembling humanity once again,” we instead bear witness to how the political regimes in this country can either use, or not use, each of these tragedies to their best interest, and so we see a different response to each.

An Afghan-American and a Sig MCX

On June 12th, Omar Mateen shot up a gay bar in Orlando, Florida, using a Sig Sauer MCX carbine and a Glock 17 pistol. While there still remain many questions about his motives regarding how he could be a fundamentalist Muslim with allegiance to ISIS and supposedly gay at the same time, and also many questions about just how many people were killed by the Orlando Police Department as they stormed the place, one thing about which there was no question was that this was a prime candidate for the left’s gun control agenda, complete with clueless celebrity testimonial.

No threat to anyone, except maybe the singer without pants.

The AR-15 platform rifle was immediately blamed, even though that's not the right gun, and somehow the ubiquitous Glock on his hip and bombs on his back escaped notice. Even though sharp criticism and no yielded ground was given to the left, citing the fact that Mateen HAD been denied sales of guns and was reported to the FBI, and that he has also independently been investigated by that same organization, the gun control efforts continued until the media spotlight shifted to the poor souls in the Istanbul bombing and fizzled against the obvious point that gun control would not stop a bombing in a country where guns are already illegal.

STILL not an AR-15

The takeaways from this event's response is that the left can't tell the difference between guns, FBI investigations aren't worth shit, and they seem to be surprisingly OK with Islamic terrorism.

Some cops and their Glocks

On Tuesday, July 5th, Alton Sterling, an African American citizen of Louisiana, convicted criminal, sex offender, and allegedly a Bloods gang member, was shot and killed by police outside a convenience store where he sold CDs. Video from witnesses show Sterling, on his back, pinned by two officers, where he is then shot and subsequently dies.

Two videos exist of this shooting, both from citizens. The body cameras of both police officers fell off, either intentionally or not, and are expected to not provide good footage.Multiple witness reports conflict, but apparently Sterling had a gun, was not pointing it at anyone, and had surrendered, and was restrained, by the time he was shot.

On July 6th, Philando Castile, an African American citizen of Minnesota and apparently a Crips gang member, was shot to death by a policeman through the window of a car after he and his girlfriend were pulled over because he matched the description of a person suspected in a robbery for whom there was a BOLO.

Castile was shot as he ostensibly reached for his ID. His girlfriend uploaded video of the aftermath to Facebook, so what caused Castille to be shot is still unknown, although when the guy is a full on Crip, and resembles an armed robbery suspect, that's somewhat indicative. What's interesting is that the police snatched her phone, deleted the video, and it only came back later with a graphic content warning, and who knows how much of the critical part deleted.

These two shooting events, especially since they became shared online nationwide, sparked immediate BLM style protests in multiple cities protesting white cops shooting black men out of hand with multiple arrests resulting, further blurring the line of Black Lives Matter between activist group and domestic terrorist organization. Both of these men were shot while apparently surrendering, and both were killed by the police via their sidearms.

The response by the Narrative did not really have much chance to get up to steam before the events in Dallas less than 48 hours later.

A black man and an AK

On the night of Thursday, July 7, during a Black Lives Matter protest in Dallas, an African American man, Micah Johnson, opened fire with a "military style semi-automatic weapon" (per news sources) and shot 14 people, including the murders of 5 police officers, and was later killed by a bomb robot as he holed up in a standoff with the police.

Johnson reportedly had many magazines of ammunition strapped to his body, and the initial reports had him as using a SKS, which is a contemporary and slight predecessor to the AK47. Semiautomatic only, and rather hard to trick out, the AK outshines the Semiautomatic Carbine System of Simonev (SKS).

However, more recent information shows that the rifle actually used was a Saiga AK74 model. Saiga is the brand under which Izhmash, the Russian company that makes the actual Russian military rifles, and has for years, exports rifles and shotguns with the Kalashnikov action. Semiautomatic only, and in “sporterized” configuration, they typically lack pistol grips and come with small magazines. Due to legislation in years past, AKs are banned from coming in with “evil features,” however, US industry supplies the gap in parts to convert them.

Johnson’s AK seems to be a Century Arms conversion, using some Tapco, Magpul, US Palm, and other US accessories. Saiga’s come in a lot of calibers, most commonly being the 7.62×39 native AK47 Soviet round, and the AK74 5.45×39 modern military cartridge, although you can get 5.56×45, 7.62×51, rarely 30-06, and there’s even a 12 and 20 gauge shotgun line.

Saiga IZ-240 in original configuration as sold. Note the small magazine and lack of pistol grip.

That rifle looks like it shoots either the 5.45 or the 5.56, and, if it is a photo op, they did pick a lot of US gun parts vendors to smear. Interestingly though, the 5.45×39 was deemed “armor piercing and not suitable for sporting purposes” a few years ago, so the gun banners might’ve screwed the pooch as that ammo is already illegal to import.

Johnson holed up in a parking garage, where negotiations supposedly failed to get him to surrender, and he was blown up by a remote bomb robot. Subsequent searches of his home turned up large quantities of ammunition, firearms, body armor, and explosives’ material. He was a former Army veteran who had been to Afghanistan, and had taken training after returning in small arms' tactics. He also was involved with black supremacy groups and "wanted to kill white people."

What says the narrative?

It's interesting to see the narrative twist and turn to try to spin these events to their liking. Gay people are high up on the left's hierarchy of victims, but Islam (along with atheism) is the religion of the left, so radical Islam and ISIS, even though they were responsible for the madness of Omar Mateen, are either off limits to criticism, or already established as a non-newsworthy bad guy of the Middle East. (ISIS is not American, therefore the narrative doesn't care about them.)

However, we can blame the NRA, which is a logical deduction beyond the faculties of this author. How a group which has a majority of middle aged, white, Christian, straight men can have anything to do with a gay Islamic fundamentalist decries reason, but the left saw an opportunity for gun control.

The two shootings of the black men this past week were immediately painted as innocent black men murdered by whitey (even though Jeronimo Yanez, the cop that shot Castile, is Hispanic). Cops in the narrative, it seems, can be both the oppressor and the victim, as need be. Since they are all government employees, they can be controlled as need be, and the left doesn't need to worry about offending them.

Even a pedophile does not deserve summary execution.

The problem with all the televised shootings of blacks by white cops is that the victims are never law abiding citizens. Sure, initially, all of them Dindu Nuffin, and every one of them was turning their life around and going to go to college, or get a job, but, inevitably, the criminal record comes out, and the "traffic stop" turns out was actually much closer to a felony stop. It must be hard for the left to try to find a black martyr worthy of the title, but crime statistics like black men being a very small minority of the population, yet committing most of the murders kind of prevents that. Generally, the only time a "good" black person gets murdered, it was by another black person.

Went out of his way to proclaim his hatred of white people; it's almost like the SJWs aren't listening.

Although the narrative's response to the Dallas shooting is still developing, a few things stand out already. There is tremendous grassroots support for the police, and the Dallas Police Chief, David Brown is doing a good job in trying to keep a lid on the crazy, and it really helps that he, himself, is black, along with the required apologies from the Dallas Mayor for the city's whiteness.

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/753044139084742656

I think we are still in the spin-up window of the left's response and we can expect renewed gun control efforts by them in the next weeks while Hillary Clinton's latest scandal with the FBI slips further off the collective radar of the average American, along with a wholesale whitewashing of the violent, racist agenda of the BLM movement.

Lessons we can learn

By focusing on the guns, rather than the perpetrators and their motives, the left shows us that they have no concern for individual well-being and happiness of any American. They would rather the populace be disarmed, and thus their contentment and well being be irrelevant (as they couldn't do anything about it) than the populace be content and happy, with whether or not they were armed being itself irrelevant (as they would have no reason to shoot anyone.)

Also, by shifting perpetrators (Mateen to the NRA, and a snuffing of the Johnson's motives story), the left shows that it is OK for some people to shoot people in this country, but not others. It is OK for Islamic fundamentalists to shoot people, because it's the NRA's fault. It is OK for black people to shoot people, as long as they're white, because they had it coming.

It's not OK for police to shoot black people, because they're all innocent, even if they're criminals and acting like they're going to pull a gun, but apparently it is OK to perform a summary execution via a bomb robot and avoid due process of law.

Conclusion

People need to quit shooting each other and quit blaming the guns. The only legal killing in the US is self-defense, and that goes for anyone, Islamic, cop, or black person. Race, religion, or a desire to avoid the expense of a trial are not reasons to kill someone, and, just because someone else used a gun to kill someone, does not mean you get to try to push laws to take away mine.

Read More: Four Police Officers Killed By Snipers During Black Lives Matter Protest In Dallas

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

3 More Important Lessons I Learned About Civilization From Living In A Hippie Commune

July 13, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Last summer I had the opportunity to help build a miniature civilization.

As I wrote about in "3 Important Lessons I Learned About Civilization From Living In A Hippie Commune," every year there is an event called Rainbow Gathering, where roughly 15,000 hippies gather in the middle of the woods and set up a temporary civilization. Think a more "granola-y" burning man.

I ended up going with this cute hippie chick, and it was a blast. I really wanted to go, however, so that I could learn about civilization. I wanted to see how the bureaucracy evolved over the course of a couple of weeks, how the people would be fed, and if there would be a healthcare system or not. I wanted to learn how to build a society from the ground up.

The first three lessons that I covered were that most human beings are very lazy, natural gender roles emerged, and that women are attracted to power. The ROK community liked these lessons so much that they wanted a "part 2," so if you haven't read "part 1," I would highly recommend it (click here to read it).

So, without further ado, here are three more important lessons I learned about civilization from living in a hippie commune.

1. We Are Incredibly Oppressed and Repressed

After getting to my campground, the very first thing I was struck by was the amount of generosity and genuine happiness of several individuals. Yes, some people were very negative and conniving, but most people were incredibly genuine.

Upon arriving, I was immediately greeted by a dread-locked, hemp-pants-wearing hippie man. “Hey, dude! Need any help with your tent?” Yeah, I did, actually. He was more than willing to help me set up my tent, a deed that took around 45 minutes (it was a huge, two-room tent).

I was a bit surprised that he had been willing to help me out without even knowing me, but I figured, hey, everyone’s here relaxing on vacation, so that’s to be expected.

Then, no more than an hour later, I was trying to find a particular outpost. One of the men offered to walk me there. After a 25 minute trek through winding dirt paths and marked trails, we arrived. “Thanks man,” I shouted. “Any time, brother,” he responded. And like that, he walked away.

There are dozens of examples of little things like this happening that I could cite, but the point is, that people were genuinely happy to help one another. It wasn’t some fake guise, like the bellhop who gives you excellent service just to get a nice $20 tip. It was genuine.

I started to realize that this is the natural state of man; to want to build a community and help one another, so that as a whole, we may achieve greater things than we could alone. This is how man existed for years. It’s in our nature to be outgoing and helpful! I wondered why “regular society” wasn’t like this, and the answer became abundantly clear: the culture is different.

It is in man's nature to help one another.

We live in a manipulative, fake, shallow, back-stabbing, pseudo-third-wave-feminism-infested culture that completely robs us of our humanity. We have the passion and joy for life crushed out of us at a young age by our warped school system, and any sort of humanity that we express is quickly capitalized upon by the droves of sociopaths that lurk in the workplace.

I recall seeing two men greet one another on a dirt road. "It's good to see you, man," one of them spoke. The other looked deeply into his eyes and replied: "It's good to see you too, my friend." They embraced, as if they were two WWII soldiers meeting for the first time in years, and then walked down a dirt path together.

This type of thing would be seen as "gay," or "weird," in our repressed society. A beautiful representation of the power of male bonds that can span a lifetime, is belittled and twisted to be something that's "gay." This expression, then, was only "normal" outside of the brainwashed culture that we live in.

Our society is incredibly repressed—we cannot express emotions that were normal for 99.9% of history without social repercussions. And not only are we incredibly repressed, but we're also incredibly oppressed.

In the forest, there really were no rules. Just don't be a violent psychopath, and we'll pretty much be fine. And although America calls itself the "Land of the Free," the drastic juxtaposition of "forest culture" vs. "American culture," outlined the folly of such a title very quickly.

If a group of men wanted to start a campfire, share a bottle of whiskey, and hoot and holler all night long, they could. If a man was tired of walking so far to the latrine, he could just dig a giant hole and make another one. If we didn't like the way that somebody was acting or behaving, we could get a group of men together and tell them to stop.

In the “Land of the Free,” any one of these actions would be met with severe consequences. Oh, you’re out drinking in public with your mates? Sorry—doesn’t matter if it’s one in the morning on a Friday, it’s illegal. Here’s a $125 fine and you’re going to prison for the night.

Oh, a girl willingly goes home with a guy? “SLUT, WHORE, BITCH, SKANK!” yells the crowd of gossipy bitches. “Uh-no! He raped me, it’s not my fault!” Then the next thing he knows, he gets thrown in jail.

Oh, a man doesn’t like the chipping paint in his apartment and decides to paint it? Or he doesn’t like the lack of lighting in his apartment, so he decides to install several upgrades? “Sorry, sir—that’ll be a $1,500 fine.” “But I literally upgraded your apartment for you!” “Sorry, it doesn’t matter. We’re a massive bureaucracy and you have zero freedom to deviate from our cookie cutter apartments.”

We say that we are free, but we are not free.

2. Communism Isn’t Practical on a Large Scale

There were certain elements of communism within our civilization. Everybody got fed regardless of whether or not they contributed money or helped gather and prepare the food. Everybody had access to medical care if they needed it. There were a ton of activities and workshops to do, for free.

But do you know what made those things possible? The fact that there were rewards for doing these things. This is the essence of capitalism: you get rewarded more (whether it be through money, power, girls, connections, or social status) by doing certain things that benefit the group.

I talked about this concept in “part 1,” but it’s basically the idea that the men who put in the work to help the village are rewarded in some way. The men who collect and organize the food get first pick. They get to choose who eats what. If someone’s an asshole, they won’t get any food.

The Native American man who was in charge of the clinic got rewards, too. His students got to learn first hand and gain massive experience. His school (he had a natural medicine school out West somewhere) got massive publicity. He gained social status, and the respect of his peers for healing the sick.

The man who put on the yoga workshop for free? He loved doing it, got to network with people, and probably had a ton of girls invite him back to their tents to “chill.”

Do you see the point? Putting in work is rewarded, and this allows us to have a mildly communist system. The problem is that when the system gets too big, helping out your community is actually discouraged.This is the reason why communism does not work on a large scale. When it’s implemented on a large scale, you actually get PENALIZED for helping your community.

Oh, a doctor works really hard, goes to school for the first 28 years of his life, and then busts his ass for 90 hours a week, helping sick people get better? Haha, sorry mate! Gotta take 65% for the masses.

Are you shitting me?

Oh, you want to start a business? Good luck covering overhead costs when you'll be taxed twice and will have to jump through countless loops and holes in order to register with our corrupt government so that we can take even more of your money.

Policies such as exorbitant, progressive tax scales, and setting up barriers to entry, actually DISCOURAGE men from helping their communities. So, none of them do. Business and innovation stagnate, nobody is willing to put in any actual hard work, and the economy goes to shit.

3. Men Need Guidance

What do you mean I'm not a man? I'm 21!

Without male mentors, boys do not grow into men. Past societies recognized the importance of male mentors; from the Spartans to the tribes of South America, nearly every culture that has come before us encouraged male mentorship.

They recognized the importance of developing your masculinity, because without it, your life goes to shit. Boys need to be taught how to be men, because masculinity is something that's developed through struggles, through hardship, and through overcoming challenges. It isn't something that just randomly comes into your life when you're 16.

Despite the obvious importance of male guidance, our society gives none to young boys. They go to school where they're indoctrinated by feminist, man-hating teachers, and then they go home and play Xbox for the next 5 hours without ever going outside, exploring, or rough-playing.

It was quite refreshing to see how the "hippie culture" of the forest seemed to actually embrace masculinity, and the need that young boys have for male mentorship. The entire tribe had a small circle of elders (anywhere from 5-15 depending on if they could all make it to the yearly gathering or not), that was in charge of governing the growth of our civilization.

These were men that had put in their dues before; they had worked long and hard in their younger years, setting up countless kitchens, digging countless latrines, and sweating for countless hours helping build the tribe. Because they had to work their way up, they understood how to actually govern a society. They weren't some isolated aristocrats raised in a bubble. They know the common problems that Rainbow Gathering faces, and how to deal with them.

When two of the men in the village got in a fight over some girl, what do you think the elders did? They let them get in the fight. They didn't try to intervene, because they understood the importance of men confronting one another over many things (especially women). Rather than some stuck up feminist who thinks she knows exactly what boys need trying to raise boys, we actually had men raising boys.

When we were uncertain about the best strategic position for a kitchen, the sanitation of a particular water line, or how to deal with a particular criminal, whose knowledge do you think we drew upon? The elders.

The elders sought their best to preserve the natural, gender-role-based culture that we had by showering good deeds with praise. I recall at one point that a young man, probably around the age of 19 or so, was taken in front of everyone at dinner time. Thousands of hippies sat in the middle of a field as they chowed down on the soup that was served to each of them. The great elders stood up, and raised their hands to quiet us.

They brought this young man up, and congratulated him: "Last night, a man was caught breaking into this woman's tent. She cried for help, and the man that stands before you single-handedly apprehended this criminal, and saved a woman of our tribe from being raped. Thank you, my friend—you have earned our respect."

The crowd burst with applause, and the young man seemed to stand five inches taller. He was proud of himself, as he should be. By giving honorable men praise, the elders were able to perpetuate a culture of honor. That young man probably got laid more in the next three days than I've ever been laid in my life time, as he should be.

Men should be rewarded for strength and honor, not punished for it.

We live in a culture that forces men to repress their masculinity, but then in times of stress or violence, they're expected to somehow magically know what to do. The elders understood that this was ludicrous, and that if you want men to act a certain way, you must reward those men who act as such.

Every day, one of the elders would visit the "Kid Village," a designated safe-space for children, so that they wouldn't be exposed to the drugs and alcohol that most partook in. The elder would tell them a story about some noble warrior of the past; he would inspire them, and breathe masculine life into their little minds. And they thought it was the coolest thing ever.

The young boys would rough play. They'd tussle and fight one another, all in good fun, because that's what boys do. In fact, they were actually encouraged to do this. The elders, and the entire forest civilization, understood the importance of boys exercising their masculinity.

Now, in modern day society, we punish men for being honorable, and then somehow expect them to be honorable. Being genuine, helpful, and outgoing, will oftentimes get you stabbed in the back by a man-eater or a manipulative co-worker. And then we look around and wonder what happened to honor.

If we want an honorable culture, we must create it by giving young men guidance. The men of today create the culture of tomorrow, and most men of today are doing a pretty shitty job.

Summary

All in all, I learned a great many lessons on this journey. I gained insight into the emergence of civilizations that most men will never experience, and I'm very grateful for that. I hope that you can all learn from the lessons that I've brought to you today.

If you have any questions or comments, feel free to leave them below. I love hearing feedback on my articles and try to answer any and all questions that you might have. Until next time, friends.

Read More: 3 Important Lessons I Learned About Civilization From Living In A Hippie Commune

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Smile When They Call You A Villain

July 13, 2016 | by Jack Ronin | Link | Original Link

Today we witness the inverted moral system of a deranged clique of tyrants doubling down on their suicidal plans to enslave and enfeeble anyone who thinks for themselves. Men, especially white men, are the constant targets of pin the tail on the donkey. Most lack the fortitude to stand on their own two feet. They crumble under the assault and become the next neophyte in the post modern death cult.

What A Hero Is

Before we get into the Villain, let's discuss the Hero. What does it mean to be a hero today?

We see that it requires no lives saved. There are no violent battles and miraculous victories. There are no herculean feats attained. In fact today the proclamation of hero will be echoed across the world's bullhorns for no other reason than being a male who likes to have sex with other males.

Maybe you woke up one day and decided, "Hey I don't like this penis anymore. What I'm really craving is some tits and pumps!"

Not only will you be lauded a hero, you will likely be invited to the white house, visited by the pope and Skyped by the Dalai Lama.

The sight of a monstrously obese female wearing draperies as lingerie elicits the heartfelt pleas of adoration and praise from a coagulating mass of human entropy. Heroism has long been dead. The masses no longer have the upward striving of a young and energetic people. They languish fat and opulent holding their idols of greed and envy in fanatical devotion.

To be the best. To become the strongest. To go the farthest. These are called evil now. When a man accomplishes and succeeds in life, it must be due to some ism or archy. No one wishes to elevate upon their own merit. Everyone has an accusation to excuse their failures in life. Everyone demands special treatment in order to compete in the game.

Everyone fights for social status through virtue signaling and personal victimology. Whoever is the loudest whiner. Whoever cries the hardest has won the race.

The race to the absolute bottom.

In a degenerate and and loathsome society such as this, the new man shall embrace the label of the Villain.

Who A Villain Is

With such a perverse transvaluation of morality, you must defiantly smile when the weak label you a villain. Today you are declared such by our society if you prefer normal healthy, heterosexual relationships. If you wish to reproduce and have a large family you are a villain because, “Duh! The world is overpopulated dummy!”

You are a terrible and evil person if you were born having a certain skin color. Did you or your ancestors help to build Western Civilization? You should be sterilized and put in a concentration camp.

Did you accomplish anything today or excel above the complacent rabble of stray human animals begging for the government tit? You disgusting, twisted Villain! These people must never endure the systemic oppression of hurt feelings! You Nazi!

Males of the West, it’s time to grow up. It’s time you stop loading the guns that others are holding to your heads.

Outlaw’s Freedom

The suburbanite male and mommy’s basement dwelling brony are degenerate forms of life just waiting for the Reaper’s scythe to come cleaving through their dough boy skulls. For many a male, he exists as the cucked slave to his Matriarch. He has man’d up! He’s married that whore! Because it’s not her fault and bastards need a home too.

Oh you think they’ll call you a hero for that don’t you? Alas it wasn’t so, Johnny Fuckboy.

Now pay up.

There is no better time than now to cast off the idea that you should ever follow the rules. Or think this is what you're "supposed" to do. No better time than now to unburden yourself this demeaning yoke. No better time to become the Villain. The social contract is broken. Our societies have betrayed us and they no longer speak on our behalf. We are no longer under any obligation to a hostile ruling elite.

I was born near the beginning of the millennial generation. Our parents told us multitudes of pretty lies and falsehoods. They told us to be good white knights and play fair. To be the heroic emotional tampon for the fickle female. To be the whipping boy for the world.

Our parents did not prepare us for the wasteland of their horrible choices. They were drunk on materialism, hedonism and consumerism. In a hypnotic daze from drugs and TV they regurgitated what was told to them about right and wrong, good and evil. All they did was make us disgustingly weak.

We were left to find out the hard way. For many this has resulted in their feeble backs crushed under the weight of the Leviathan. But for the savage few it means they will surpass everyone.

We are outlaws now. Notorious and infamous villains. A freedom the modern male can know. Only if he stops acting like a little bitch.

A Man's Purpose

We brought glorious Order before. Now it's crumbling.

What men naturally do is bring order to reality. This is a polarizing effect that triggers attraction in females. Today the State has supplanted the male as father and provider to his women. The only way to take this back is to live by your own rules. To have your own system with brothers who uphold it. You must become a rule unto yourself. The only way to do this is to become the unashamed Villain of today's twisted satire called civilization.

This way of life does not belong to the weak and fearful. It belongs to the unrepentant. The bold and daring.

You must create your own order in your world. Do this and there will be no shortage of women. This was your purpose all along. As per usual, trust your instincts. If your heart naturally loathes something, hate it with all your heart and might. If it loves, love it furiously. Do not ever let anyone talk down to you. We built this world. When it burns to the ground we will build it again.

Do not suffer the weak to eat from your table.

Read More: How To Avoid Trouble When Living The Villain Lifestyle

Jack Ronin
Jack Ronin is a former professional MMA fighter. He swallowed the red pill nearly 10 years ago and has been floating down his own heart of darkness ever since. He desires to ignite the will to power in every weak male of the west. You can find his website at The Savage Lifestyle.

4 Signs That Modern Women Have Become Petulant Children

July 14, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

ROK has always carried a good number of articles on game, but I think the problem facing men today is not getting a woman, but being able to find one that is worth the bother. One of the biggest contributors to this phenomenon is the fact that modern women act like little children. Here are four things they display which prove that.

1. Attention whoring

Little kids want attention. My son can't wait for me to get home from work so that he can tell me about his day and so that we can spend time playing together. As we get older, we come to recognize that we are not the center of the universe so we don't mind if we are not the sole focus.

Well, at least some of us grow up. Lots of modern women never mature emotionally. They remain stuck in the phase where they are constantly struggling for attention. Women seek attention everywhere but it is most evident on social media. This takes many forms. It could be inappropriate photos, trying to puff up their lifestyle, or preaching on the latest leftwing (always leftwing) issue of the day.

> Last time I checked white ppl did not have Jim Crow laws, lynchings or random killings #BlackLivesMatter
>
> — ~Mika~ (@UluvmimiStyl3) July 12, 2016

In children, attention seeking can be endearing at times, but it is generally annoying. In grown women, it is always obnoxious.

2. Having your cake and eating it too

Svelte Lena Dunham eating ice cream.

Children need to be taught that sometimes they can't have it all. If I go to buy my three-year-old a toy car, he understands that he can only select one of them. It seems that young women were never taught this basic truth. The body positivity movement is one example. Everyone should know that if you overeat and avoid exercise, you will become an unattractive, unhealthy hambeast. Yet the body positive movement tells women that they are just as beautiful and healthy as fit women. And women believe it!

It's the same with "having it all" when it comes to work and life. Modern women have been indoctrinated to believe that they can work 10-hour days while climbing the corporate ladder while still having strong marriages and healthy children. The hard truth is that the first five years of a child's development are crucial and that expensive daycare institution that calls itself a school can't take the place of a dedicated mother.

3. Feeling like they are missing out

Free rides on the carousel

If you watch a bunch of toddlers playing, one kid will stop doing what he is doing because he sees another kid doing something else. He wants to do the same thing because he feels like that other activity might be more fun.

A few of the people I follow on Twitter were having a conversation about their ex-wives. One guy said that his mistake was marrying a slut. My colleague Donovan Sharpe has written about this mistake of trying to turn a ho into housewife. Another guy said his mistake was marrying a pre-party slut. A pre-party slut is a girl who might have a semblance of virtue when you marry her, but it is only by circumstance. Maybe her parents were strict or she otherwise didn't have the opportunity. In reality, she may feel that she is missing out by not riding the cock carousel.

A fellow co-worker of mine went through this type of harrowing scenario. While he was in his mid-twenties, he met a girl who had just graduated high school. She came from a devout Christian family so on the surface she had good values. But after a couple of years of marriage she started cheating on him with not just one, but several random men.

I've also seen this "missing out" effect play out in the life of one my wife's friends. As I wrote in an earlier article, this woman started to look outside her marriage for male affection, and is now in the process of transforming herself. She has become an attention whore on social media where she posts selfies of herself at the pool and advertises that she goes to concerts and bars without her husband. She dresses inappropriately for her age and body composition and she seems to be trying to erase all association with her husband and children.

This is all done to recapture the fun that she thinks she is missing out on. Modern women feel this way because they've been indoctrinated into believing that promiscuity is empowering. This flows from egalitarian doctrine: if some men sleep around, women too must be able to sleep around to be equal. Of course the feminist purveyors of this false doctrine don't care if their false narrative makes it impossible for these women to ever become fit wives and mothers. That is what the feminists intended all along—to destroy marriage by making women incapable of staying married.

4. Having no skills

Source: Alpha Reboot

Small children have no skills. Even when they want to help, they don't have the muscular coordination to do anything except the simplest of tasks. Like small children, most modern women have no skills.

Back while I was in the dating market, I noticed that most girls were useless. Men should not expect women to have the same marketable skills that men have. Women are supposed to be complementary. In the past, this meant that girls would have the skills necessary to be homemakers. But most modern women are not able to boil water, much less cook a meal. They are often slobs. They often do not want children and those who do want children think motherhood consists of laying by the pool while sipping Kahlua mudslides.

Most modern women don't have the skills that would allow them to earn a lot of money. They might have a degree, but it is in something useless like avant-garde poetry, or gender studies. On the other hand, the few women who do have marketable skills have jettisoned anything that made them feminine: charm, the capacity to nurture, and the ability to be receptive. In other words, most modern women, like very small children, have no skills. The only thing they bring to a relationship is their vagina. Unlike children though, they have no excuse.

Conclusion – What can be done?

There is not much that we can do to remedy the situation for the present generation of young men. Some of the childishness of modern women can be fixed by a strong husband. For example, a girl can learn to cook and clean house if she loves her husband. And while lots of women have bought into the whole "lardass is beautiful" messaging, there are still a large number of thin, attractive girls working in the city.

Even attention whoring can be fixed if you call your girl out on it. It has become so common that she may not even be aware that she is doing it. But if she has pictures of her cleavage or ass on Facebook, it may be time to move on.

Unfortunately, some things are not fixable. Marrying a seasoned carousel rider is never a good option. And the only way to remove the modern woman's feeling of "missing out" is constantly keep your game extremely high—even then, some women are so emotionally immature they will cheat on an alpha. The childish attitude of modern woman is one of the biggest factors in why it is so difficult to find and keep a woman these days.

Read More: Why Women Stopped Having Children

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

British Police: Men Who Try To Get Laid Are Guilty Of Misogynistic “Hate Crimes”

July 14, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Are you less than 100% certain a girl will accept your approach? If not, do not approach them in Nottingham and maybe soon a host of other British cities. Nottingham Police have declared that “misogyny,” which they say includes “unwanted approaches,” is now a hate crime attracting significantly higher criminal penalties. The girl alone gets to decide if the intention of your interaction was misogynistic or not.

> A police force revealed today it has become Britain’s first to recognise misogyny as a hate crime.
>
> Nottinghamshire Police is recording incidents such as street harassment, verbal abuse, unwanted physical approaches and taking photographs without consent within the hate crime definition.
>
> Unwanted physical or verbal contact or engagement is defined as exactly that and so can cover wolf whistling and other similar types of contact. If the victim feels that this has happened because they are a woman then we will record it as a hate crime.

According to the police instructions being distributed to frontline officers, when you use your cell phone to text a woman, she fails to reply and you text her back, this is now also a potential hate crime if she decides the messages are “unwanted” or “uninvited.” In fact, even the first message you send her can be classified as “unwanted” or “uninvited” and therefore a hate crime. By chance, have the feminist designers of the new law read and been offended by Roosh's free texting guide? Other interesting triggers for this perfect example of misandry will be wolf-whistling and comments like "Hey, cutie!"

The new law, which has essentially been constructed from the "interpretation" of an existing law without any democratic process, applies only to men dealing with women and not either sexual minorities or heterosexual women interacting with men. Nottingham Police are taking it so seriously that men deemed to be behaving in a "misogynistic" fashion are already having their "crimes" and details recorded.

The architects of this fascistically feminist experiment are, in order of appearance, Chief Constable of Nottingham Police, Sue Fish, and the manager of Nottingham's Women's Center, Melanie Jeffs:

The United Kingdom’s very muddled system

The Nottingham Police debacle is not an isolated incident. The National Police Chiefs’ Council head, Sara Thornton, announced last year that, Britain-wide, online “threats” would take precedence over violent crimes like burglaries.

Despite the conventional belief that the British Parliament at Westminster is supreme, in practice local authorities, including the police, have substantial, legalized leeway in defining what constitutes crimes defined either by legislation or the common (judge-made) law. Westminster could theoretically end the sort of farces we have seen with the Nottingham Police this week. Nonetheless, a betting man would probably have a better chance successfully putting money on Britain getting rid of the Queen in the next five years than county and regional authorities being brought into a more democratic line line.

Consequently, substantial elements of British laws are subject to the vagaries of local, sometimes rampantly feminist officials and the very undemocratic fiefdoms they have cultivated. This is in addition to the wide discretion that police already have in prosecuting certain politically correct crimes over others. As I brought you last year, British police have already begun prioritizing "online abuse," comprising often exaggerated internet exchanges that rarely result in actual harm, over far more violent burglaries and assaults. For all the criticisms that federal systems like the United States' are convoluted, they often give better formal and informal political protections than unitary systems like Britain's.

Why the law matters

Now illegal and a hate crime in Nottingham if the woman does not like it.

Game and its offshoots gained prominence because many men caught between the dating world of their fathers or grandfathers and a grotesquely politically correct "modern" world finally had a means for navigating through the apparent complexity of women. Oftentimes hypocritical female expectations, belief systems, and conduct became more manageable and less murky. Because game and related concepts expose women (and men) for the creatures they almost always are, they themselves and those who practice them are now in the direct line of fire from zealous feminists both within and outside government.

More generally, the new law reinforces the increasing subjectivity of bizarre attempts to criminalize decidedly non-harmful behavior. Rather than being based on a reasonable prospect of injury, especially of a physical kind, hate crimes like "misogyny" are being predicated on the feelings of already delicate individuals. Tellingly, a text message from a man to a woman, one that has zero evidence of any threats or violence, is being treated more severely than, say, fists and bottles being thrown in a nightclub or on the street (provided those being hit are not female).

The draconic move does not (surprise, surprise) include lesbians or straight women

"You have no right to look at the skimpy clothing that I have deliberately worn so everyone but you can see it!"

Unsurprisingly, given we are surrounded by a deplorably anti-male political climate, the criminalization of unwanted male approaches has not been extended to include either lesbians or straight females (or those identifying as starfish or attack helicopters).
As even LGBT groups have complained that gay and lesbian domestic violence is at least equally prevalent as the alleged figures for male-on-female domestic violence, such omissions are glaring. In fact, on a topic I covered last year, lesbians in particular were found to be more prone to domestic violence than straight couples.

At its heart, this Nottingham Police "law" is aimed at simultaneously vilifying and criminalizing normal male behavior. Paradoxically, this is behavior that even otherwise indoctrinated Western women still want from men, such as men approaching first, being confident, and making the first move in other contexts, too.

Put bluntly, it's really just a walking crime to be a man nowadays.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: British Police Chief Will Prioritize Online Abuse Reports Over Burglaries

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Additional European Countries To Emigrate To If The West Collapses

July 14, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

It is good to see that many of us here will stand their ground in case of a total cultural collapse. Among the many arguments backing this decision, was the possibility to purchase guns and get organised, coming from our mostly American readers.

As a Frenchman, I do not have this luxury, being surrounded by liberals that would rather take my hypothetical guns and join the invading hordes than being called "racists." Sadly, we are still waiting for Charles Martel to Make Frankia Great Again.

If the nimble navigator does not reach the White House, I would perhaps have to consider one of the following countries for permanent resettlement.

As previously stated in part I of this series:

> The nations are reviewed using the following criteria:
>
> - Level of English
> - Difficulty of the local language(s)
> - Gun laws
> - Quality of women (considering beauty, femininity, careerism etc):
> - Non-native immigrant population
> - Possibility of a long-term stay
> - Male competition
> - Importance of religion

> - Culture of entrepreneurship
> - Presence of masculine culture/traditional sex roles
> - Quality of food
> - Importance of physical fitness in the local culture
> - Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse

1. Serbia

Level of English: Medium. Serbians do speak English and have a keen interest in improving it.

Difficulty of the local language(s): Medium. South Slavic. Uses frequently the same etymology as Russian or Polish. Knowing Serbian, you can get around in Bulgarian, Croatian and Slovenian.

Gun laws: Lenient. Strong gun culture and second highest number of guns per capita worldwide.

> People over 18 are allowed to own guns, but must be issued a permit. People with criminal history, mental disorders, history of alcohol and illegal substance abuse, cannot be issued a permit. (…) background check prior to license approval. no court appeal possible if denied. At home, the guns must be kept in a "safe place".

Quality of women: High. The "Polish girls" of the Balkans. They like sex, give importance to their elegance and appearance but don't send the "ice queen" vibe that Ukrainians and Russian can have.

Non-native immigrant population: Low. Albanians as they are next door. Few Westerners apart from the occasional tourist or student (for now).

Possibility of a long-term stay: Possible (for Westerners). More here. Or be Steven Seagal.

Male competition: Medium to High. Decent foreigner value. As I said previously, Serbs probably have one of the highest level of game in EE.

Turbofolk culture and recent bloody conflicts give them a bad boy head start by treating women as replaceable commodities and war spoils.

Importance of religion: Medium to high. Orthodox Christianity is the second most important religion in Serbia after cold hard cash. Abortion is legal under request.

Culture of entrepreneurship: High. Money and success are revered. Corruption is omnipresent. You will need local advisers.

Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: High. Masculine Balkan culture. Feminine girls that have been exposed to what a society looks like without male order. Western culture appeals to the youth. Hostile to homosexuals.

Quality of food: High. The products are usually local. Tasty, fresh cuisine. Fairly easy to obtain supplements and good meat.

Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: High. Fitness is seen as an important part of life. Women are usually fit and fitness is popular. Fairly low obesity rate.

Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Low. In view of the recent events, their worst decision would be to join the EU. European and global culture has already brought a lot of damage.

2. Czech Republic

Level of English: Medium to High. Due to the high presence of tourists, it is easy to find an English speaker in Czech Republic.

Difficulty of the local language(s): High. Speaking Czech will improve your value but it is a commitment. Could help you in Polish but legions of words are false friends.

Gun laws: Lenient. Recreational shooting is the third most popular sport in the Czech Republic, behind football and hockey..

> Gun licenses may be obtained in a way very similar to a driving license – by passing a gun proficiency exam, medical examination and having a clean criminal record. Unlike in most other European countries, the Czech gun legislation also permits a citizen to carry a concealed weapon for self-defense.

Informative article here.

Quality of women: Medium to High. Love sex but less classy than Ukrainians or Serbians. Exposed to a lot of gringo seed since Prague turned into a tourist hell hole.

Non-native immigrant population: Medium. Avoid the capital. Especially if you cannot stand stag parties or pub crawls. Large number of foreign students. Weak nationalist sentiment.

Possibility of a long-term stay: Likely (for Westerners). More here.

Male competition: Low. Czechs are in majority low-T and beta. Girls love gringos but you will not be their first. No wonder it is a swingers (gateway to "cuck") hotspot. Still not close to Denmark, the Jante cuck Emperors.

Importance of religion: Low. Czechia is one of the most atheistic and religiously-tolerant countries in Europe. Religious vacuum creates ideal terrain for a aggressive, conquering ideologies and men.

Culture of entrepreneurship: Medium: The economy is in growth. The local laws tend to favour foreign entrepreneurs.

Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: Medium (in decline). Men become weaker and hipster weakling culture is on the rise. Girls love the carousel and their careers. Less and less hostile to homosexuals.

Quality of food: Medium. I was not impressed by the quality of the food. Products are of a reasonable quality. Relatively easy to buy supplements and good meat.

Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: Medium to low. Too much beer. Not enough sport. One of the Eastern nation where fitness is the least popular. Low to medium obesity rate.

Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Possible. The xenophilic nature of the Czechs and their placid character could be their downfall. They are worst off than Poland foreigner-wise.

3. Georgia

Level of English: Very Low. Quite rare to find a Georgian that speaks English outside of a city. Start learning Georgian or Russian.

Difficulty of the local language(s): Very high. You will have to learn a new alphabet for Georgian or Russian. Georgian includes sounds unknown to foreigners like the consonant clusters, which will give you the impression of playing with the noodle alphabet.

Learn Russian. It will open you a lot of doors.

The word “Saqartvelo” (Georgia) in Georgian

Gun laws: Relatively lenient. Georgia’s gun laws follow the FSU model where “only allows licensed gun owners may lawfully acquire, possess or transfer a firearm or ammunition.”

High number of unregistered guns circulating since the fall of the Soviet Union.

Quality of women: Medium to High. Rare to find a blonde. Quite stylish but smallish. They are expected to be virgins when they get married. They are always exceptions. One night stands are very rare.

Non-native immigrant population: Low to Very Low. Not many Westerners. Large minority of Russians and Armenians.

Possibility of a long-term stay: Likely (for Westerners) up to 360 days. More here

Male competition: Medium to High. Foreigner value but the women are hardly accessible. Definitely not player orientated. Men there have a reputation for being horny and having aggressive game.

Importance of religion: Very High. Orthodox Christianity guides their life. An unmarried deflowered girl brings shame to the family. Girls have strict rules to follow. More on that (bit of a beta point of view).

Culture of entrepreneurship: Medium: Corruption is an essential part of the economy. Scams are everywhere. Georgians are known to be cunning in business. Get local help.

Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: Very High. Very strong archetypes of man and woman. Western culture has only reached Tbilisi. Think that homosexuality is an anomaly and a disgrace.

Quality of food: High. Great fresh fruit and veggies. One of the best diet in the world. Relatively easy to buy supplements and good meat.

Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: Very High. Infrastructures are poor but people train regularly. National sports: wrestling, weightlifting, chidaoba and judo. A man has to be strong in Georgian culture. Girls do not always train but have an excellent diet. Very low obesity rate.

Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Very Low. Managed to preserve their culture and religion. Political situation is stable for now. Not a land ideal for players but for men looking for a place where to raise a family.

4. Switzerland

Level of English: High. High number of expats and good level of English among the Swiss.

Difficulty of the local language(s): Medium. Choose between German, French and Italian depending on where you intend to go. Those languages will be useful for the future.

Gun laws: Lenient. Fourth highest number of gun per capita worldwide. Strong militia mentality and gun culture. More here.

> Citizens of the following countries cannot buy guns in Switzerland: Serbia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo, Macedonia, Turkey, Sri Lanka, Algeria and Albania.

Well, well, how can it be?

Quality of women: Medium to Low. Liberal, Westernized, career-driven but there are sluts in good numbers. European Pay-For-Play hotspot. Find a foreign girl or bring your own for long term relationship.

Non-native immigrant population: Medium to High. High number of foreigners attracted by the local level of life. Recurrent problems with Muslims from Albania, Kosovo and North Africa that refuse to assimilate. Strong national identity.

Possibility of a long-term stay: Likely (for Westerners). More here.

Male competition: High. Like in the West, fierce competition. Tinder-sponsored all-you-can-eat cock carousel for the girls and clown/psychopath game for the guys. Country hosts the highest number of rich concurrents in the world.

Importance of religion: Low. No state religion. Morals are very liberal. Pro-gay and abortion.

Culture of entrepreneurship: Very High Money talks. But not too loud. Free for all. The world's piggybank.

Presence of masculine culture and traditional sex roles: Low. Religion is bad. Being manly is backward and being a slag is awesome. I am an attack helicopter anyway.

Quality of food: High. As in highly overpriced and sanitized. Easy to obtain supplements and good meat. If you have the coin.

Importance of physical fitness in the local culture: Medium to Low. The Swiss skies and hikes. That's about it. Highly sedentary lifestyle. Medium obesity rate.

Likelihood of 50-year similar cultural collapse: Likely. Would be like Germany and France if they did not have a highly armed populace and a great sense of private property. Liberal ideas, multiculturalism and islamisation are on the rise.

Fais tes bagages!

I hope that those suggestions bring some light on the factors that will influence a hard but necessary decision, if the time unfortunately comes. It is in the people that rise against the cultural decline that I see hope.

But even if the plane is a relatively safe mean of transport, the pilot always brings a parachute. A bientôt.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 4 European Countries To Emigrate To If The West Collapses

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

80+ Killed In New French Attack, Police Don’t Want Video Uploads To Compromise Narrative

July 14, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Only days after the French intelligence services were ridiculed for their systemic unpreparedness before the savage Bataclan murders of late last year, police are urging people not to post images of an Islamist truck rampage in Nice. Some 75 people are dead from the attack, plus a hundred or more reported to be injured (update: at least 80 killed).

As the French celebrated the national holiday, Bastille Day, a large truck appeared to accelerate towards a massive crowd. Dozens and dozens were hit by the vehicle and it seems many more were injured in the resulting panic. The Islamist driver is said to have been shot dead by either police or security officials. Shockingly, there were occupants in the truck exchanging gunfire with these officials, indicating a thoroughly planned assault.

The National Gendarmerie is one of France’s two main police forces. Unlike the other, it is actually a paramilitary arm tasked with policing duties. Its Twitter account posted messages in French and English begging social media users not to disseminate photos and video footage of the very violent aftermath in Nice:

> #Nice06 Don't propagate rumors and don't broadcast shocking photos or videos
> — GendarmerieNationale (@Gendarmerie) July 14, 2016

Although we can all sympathize with all the victims and their families, it is clear that France, a country housing Europe's largest Muslim population, has been under attack from within for years. With the Bataclan attacks only having occurred months ago, it is high time that the French people properly see the existential threat they are facing–one that French police and paramilitary forces have been very unsuccessful in combating. What's the bet that the driver and other occupants were also under police and intelligence service surveillance, just like the Bataclan killers?

The attackers are clearly trolling France, too. On the exact same day that these dozens have died, the French President had planned to end "emergency security measures." We have an unambiguous demonstration that Islamist terrorists are exercising a free hand when it comes to demoralizing and butchering the French people.

You must watch and spread this video and any others like it

> Extremely GRAPHIC VIDEO
> #Nice pic.twitter.com/3D8IDlayxx
>
> — News This Second (@NewsThisSecond) July 14, 2016

Want to help the Western world and help prevent attacks like this in the future? Then spread this video and all like it. It is time that the anger and awareness of Western peoples reached fever pitch. There is no point being constantly insulated from the violent truth, especially when tens of millions of people indulge in Game of Thrones and The Walking Dead, watch horror films, and play video games where players maim and kill others.

The video above and the suffering and death in it is what years of obscenely self-hating immigration policies, plus the inaction and political correctness of the security services meant to defend people, have wrought upon France. Using the leftist logic of peace and harmony, France should be the last place in Europe to be attacked by Islamists. It has by far the largest immigrant or recent immigrant Muslim population in Europe, both in terms of percentages and raw numbers. Yet it is still attacked! Meanwhile, basically Muslim-less or far less Muslim societies like Korea, Japan, Poland, and Ireland have none of this violence, violence which makes the Northern Ireland Catholic-Protestant conflict look like a children's tea party.

For years, France has turned the other way. In the interests of promoting "national solidarity," many important questions about race, ethnic identity and religion are not even asked by authorities collecting census data. "We're all the same!" is the quip made by every mainstream French politician scared for either their job or personal safety if they ever speak out. It has not worked and the blood is really on the hands of those who have ignored the problem for so long.

France recently voted not to clean itself up by rejecting the French National Front

France, other Western countries and the media did not want to ask the hard questions or deal with the difficult issues after the Bataclan murders. So they focused on how little boys and their daddies with flowers could make love and peace prosper.

Whether they realized it or not, every person who voted for leftwing parties in recent French elections, and even the "center-right" UMP, voted for the continuation of terror attacks. Every other competitive party but the National French have shown no interest in tackling the immigration disaster that is fueling terrorist attacks, ethnic minority crime and overall cultural capitulation from Paris to Nice. The Socialists and UMP were so scared of the National Front that they even banded together to make sure it did not succeed. That said, the main blame can be attributed to French voters themselves, who were too interested in idealized and fake happy narratives than preventing more of the attacks and social disunity that otherwise make them weep and complain.

To borrow and slightly alter the title of former German Socialist politician Thilo Sarrazin's book, France's immigration policies and negligent attitude towards social and terrorist threats are effectively abolishing France itself. Asking people, like the National Gendarmerie has, to refrain from publishing proof of the ugly truth France faces will only accelerate this bloody and self-inflicted capitulation.

We owe it to the victims to fight for a West that does not kowtow to political correctness after the most savage terrorist attacks.

Read More: France Allows Large Muslim Population, Rewarded With Most Sophisticated Terrorist Attacks Since 9/11

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

The Establishment Is Giving “Black Lives Matter” A Free Pass To Incite Violence

July 15, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Black Lives Matter “advocates for justice, dignity, and respect.” At least, that’s the Kool-Aid they distribute on their web site as they come up with such dignified and respectful chants during protests as Pigs in a blanket, fry ’em like bacon! after committing terrorist acts on U.S. soil like assassinating police while getting a press pass from Marxist media and encouragement to continue with sophistry from our President.

Meanwhile, showing their contempt for non-Marxists and non-self loathing whites, social media majors like Facebook, and tech majors like Google, Microsoft, and even Pandora came out in unified support of the radical BLM hate group right after five Dallas police officers were murdered by a BLM supporter, before the families even had time to put them in caskets.

In the meantime, legacy media manipulates facts and stories to keep white people and police on the defense against Marxist narratives in a crusade against reality and common sense. (It also makes one wonder if ethnic cleansing, i.e. of white populations, is a globalist agenda item. More on that another time.)

Micah Xavier Johnson, the Dallas terrorist and murderer, was driven by the same divisive left wing politics as Black Lives Matter. However, an examination of his motives has been intentionally left out by the media as it would connect obvious ties to the rhetoric of Obama and his heir apparent, Queen Hillary. Hillary even went so far as to double down on Marxist rhetoric over the weekend, blaming whites and cops for murders that occurred at the hands of a black racist.

> I will call for white people, like myself, to put ourselves in the shoes of those African-American families who fear every time their children go somewhere, who have to have 'The Talk,' about, you now, how to really protect themselves [from police], when they're the ones who should be expecting protection from encounters with police.

The motives of Micah Johnson are "very hard to untangle" according to Obama

Black Lives Matter, which was formed by three homosexual women, has enjoyed a seat at the right hand of Obama (BLM leader Aislinn Pulley is pictured with the Messiah above) and even recently spent 90 minutes meeting with him in the White House. After the tragedy in Dallas, Obama laughably said it was "very hard to untangle" the motives of the shooter even though Johnson openly said he hated white people, he wanted to kill white people, and he especially wanted to kill white police officers.

It's hard to imagine the motives would have been "very hard to untangle" if the shooter was white and the victims black, especially since mass hysteria led to a historical symbol being torn down after a nut named Dylan Roof went on a rampage. It took no time at all to "untangle" the motive for Roof, which was clearly the rebel battle flag to the morons in the media and Racial Bolshevists on the left.

The evil genius Obama never lets a tragedy go to waste, and never misses and opportunity to figuratively stick a shiv in the white people of the U.S. he seemingly hates so much. Contrary to the left's rhetoric, it is not the white, heterosexual, Christian male doing the oppressing, he is being oppressed and is being targeted for destruction in the 21st century socialist revolution in America.

BLM’s False Premises

BLM is “hell bent on inciting riots” according to a Breitbart report

The narrative that black men are being targeted by police is nothing more than political rhetoric designed to steam people up. It steams the left up because they feel they carry the banner of Betrand Russell’s Superior Virtue of the Oppressed, and it steams the right up because they have to be shamed and retreat no matter if they have been wronged. Here are some facts that destroy the BLM narrative, exposing it as a Marxist propaganda ploy.

Blacks are more likely to kill other blacks than cops are to kill blacks. Nearly 5,000 blacks killed other blacks in recent years. 90% of black homicides are committed by other blacks, according to FBI data. Other numbers: 732 white people and 381 black people were killed by police last year, according to the liberal Chicago Tribune. It would take cops nearly 14 years to catch up with the number of blacks killed by other blacks just last year alone.

Black men are more likely to kill cops than cops are to kill black men. The FBI reports 40% of cop killers are black. Statistically, police officers are 18 times more likely to be killed by a black man than they are to kill a black suspect. This statistic supports the fact that blacks are killed by police in self-defense, not because of racism.

Cops killed twice as many white people as black people last year. In 2015, 50% of the victims of deadly police shootings were white, and 26% were black. Some claim this is racism since blacks only make up 13% of the U.S. population, but the FBI reports 62% of robberies, 57% of murders, and 45% of assaults are conducted by blacks in the most populated areas of the country. So, blacks are statistically proven to be far more likely to commit crimes which put them in the crosshairs of police.

Black and Hispanic officers are more likely to shoot at blacks than white officers. The Department of Justice confirms black cops are 3.3 times more likely to fire at a suspect than white officers. Similarly, Hispanic officers are more likely to fire at a suspect than a white officer.

These four facts alone logically destroy any justification of Black Lives Matter’s attacks upon police and white people. Black on black violence is a far greater problem for them to worry about. Apparently, black lives don’t matter to black people, using BLM’s own rhetoric and faulty reasoning. Blacks also murder at a far higher rate than their white counterparts and are involved in more criminal activity, which means they will have more run-ins with the police.

This twisting of facts to support a Communist agenda also illustrates why I grew to despise the American media before quitting and running away from a career I had aspired to since childhood. This type is disinformation is wrong, and it is evil. Rather than making Black Lives Matter justify its existence and its violence, the media continue to hunt down the Evil White Man™ as the reason for civil unrest. The media feed on emotional propaganda that has no basis in reality and twist reality it to fit a Marxist narrative. The media is as much to blame for the hatred and division in the United States as the "community organizer" President. The media is also once again shamelessly providing cover for far left demagogues Obama and Hillary as reported by Daily Wire.

> Left-wing media is attempting to exonerate President Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton, and itself from complicity in the deadly consequences of racial agitation. Five more police officers have now been sacrificed on the altar of protection for the left's political sacred cow. State of the Union's Jake Tapper likewise refused to examine ideological connections between the Dallas murderer and the broader left. Instead, time was dedicated to presenting Trump as racially divisive and incapable of mending racial divisions. Left-wing racial agitation as a driving force of the Dallas mass murder was ignored.

So, there you have it. The left has been given carte blanche by your government and your media to march through the streets terrorizing police officers, Trump supporters, and anyone who tries to provide a modicum of reason to the totally one-sided, politically motivated, fraudulent narrative. Since the Dallas case proves the media and politicians will continue to blame white people and police no matter if the groups stoking racial division like Black Lives Matter are operating under completely false premises, one can expect they will blame white people for defending themselves or taking action to stop Communist agitators from destroying another city like Baltimore or Ferguson.

"Riots are the voices of the unheard" according to one BLM member; BLM has been given carte blanche to destroy cities and attack police, like they did in this scene in Baltimore

As stated in my previous articles, this is Racial Bolshevism at its finest.

> Contemporary Progressivism should really be called Racial Bolshevism. The psycho-political profile is identical: whereas the original Bolsheviks believed that > the Communist utopia could not be achieved without the elimination of the bourgeois class, the contemporary Racial Bolsheviks believe that the multi-cultural utopia cannot be achieved without the elimination of white people – especially white men.

What is the end goal? Pushing white people until they break in a thinly veiled effort to bring about Martial Law and discard the Constitution? Hillary said we need even more "justice, dignity and respect" Black Lives Matter style. Her poll numbers quickly took a dump after she spouted this pablum and her acquittal last week.

> There is so much more to be done… we can't be engaging in hateful rhetoric or incitement of violence, we need to be bringing people together…we need more love and kindness.

Apparently, love and kindness Hillary style means loving the very people who are assassinating police officers, attacking conservatives and telling white people how evil they are. Things are only going to get worse as the left continues an agenda of ethnic cleansing and racial scapegoating in America. The Communist revolution is here. Dallas was only the opening salvo. The Black Panthers have already said they intend to be armed under the guise of "self-defense" at the Republican National Convention in Cleveland next week. That's a powder keg waiting for BLM to ignite it.

We must not let the left's and the media's appeals to racial division, disguised as progress win out. United, we can stop the fall of the U.S. government. Divided, as they clearly want us to be, we are putty in the hands of social engineers and elite puppet masters financing these mobs. We cannot heal racial wounds by pouring Marxist salt into them.

The first step in fighting back is untwisting the twisted narratives of hateful and degenerate leftist demogogues, a treasonous President, a treasonous Presidential candidate, and a Marxist media, exposing them as the inciters of violence they are. Once the public knows who is fomenting the violence and division, the next steps in refreshing the tree of liberty can be taken.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Four Police Officers Killed By Snipers During Black Lives Matter Protest In Dallas

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

How You Can Become A Millionaire

July 15, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

As late as 1970, almost half of all jobs had a pension—a guaranteed income you would receive upon retiring after working a certain number of years in your field. Combined with social security income, which is generally enough to provide basic housing and food needs, a man could retire quite comfortably, and without ever needing to know anything about investing. Times have changed, but I'm going to show you how, if you start early enough, you can become a millionaire by the age of retirement, even if you work at McDonalds.

Start Young

When I entered high school, my father took me to the library, introduced me to some books on finance and investing, and a service our library had called Value Line, a series of large books published by an investment research firm which reported data on thousands of companies and mutual funds. Being good in math, and interested in statistics (particularly books on gambling and statistics—side note: blackjack is typically the best game to play at a casino—roulette is among the worst), I was fascinated with the idea that one could save their money, and it would grow in value.

The Power Of Compound Interest

Compound Interest is the repeated effect of earning interest, and then adding that interest to your savings, thereby earning a greater amount of interest the following year. As an example, imagine I loan you $1,000 at a 10% rate of interest. In a year you must return $1,000 principle plus $100 in interest to me, leaving me with $1,100. That is simple interest. But imagine I then invest my $1,100 in a retirement account that earns 10% each year. By the end of a decade, instead of $100, I will now be receiving $259 in interest. This is off the same $1,000 investment I started with.

In order for someone to earn as much as me in year 10, they would need almost $2,600 in savings, while I invested only $1,000, and that was a decade ago. I never added another penny of my own money to my account, and already you would need almost 3 times as much money in savings just to keep up with me.

	Compound Interest		Simple Interest
	Principle	10% Interest	Principle	10% Interest
Year 1	$1,100	$110	$1,000	$100
Year 2	$1,210	$121	$1,000	$100
Year 3	$1,331	$133	$1,000	$100
Year 4	$1,464	$146	$1,000	$100
Year 5	$1,611	$161	$1,000	$100
Year 6	$1,772	$177	$1,000	$100
Year 7	$1,949	$195	$1,000	$100
Year 8	$2,144	$214	$1,000	$100
Year 9	$2,358	$236	$1,000	$100
Year 10	$2,594	$259	$1,000	$100

The effects of compound interest are exponential, and as time increases, the end result of savings increases more rapidly with every year. If you remember no other concept, remember this. The longer the time period, the greater the money.

When I was 15 I began working at the local grocery store. I worked 5 hours a day after school, plus weekends, earning a bit less than $250 a week. Now, a 15-year-old has little need for thousands of dollars, so I saved the majority of this money. That year, I opened a retirement account with $2,000 (less than 10 weeks of work, which was easy), and still had plenty left over to spend.

Retirement Accounts

IRA is gonna get you some money

You can use the basic concept of compound interest to make you money. But there are some extra things you can do to increase your returns even more. Most governments encourage saving for retirement, often with subsidized or tax-advantaged retirement accounts. The US Government offers Individual Retirement Accounts, which allow money to grow tax free. I recommend a specific type called a “Roth IRA” which we will discuss here.

Live Frugally

FRUGAL
ISN'T CHEAP

Spend Less, Save More, and Live BETTER

If one lives frugally, it is easy to save enough to fund a sizable retirement account. I had a great professor who told me that the year after you graduate college, you will make more money than you have ever seen in your life. Perhaps you have a part time job earning $5,000 or $10,000, and you currently live on a fraction of that. But next year, you will be likely earning $30,000 or more. Most of you will spend $30,000, or close to it. But you could also choose to live off $10,000 as you have been doing, postpone making your big purchase of a car or whatever for just ONE year, and save as much of your income as you can.

If one lives frugally enough, one can easily save enough to fund a retirement account, even off minimum wage income. This is an extreme example, as practically no one works for minimum wage for more than a couple of years at the beginning of their career, but it goes to prove a point: there is NO excuse for not being wealthy later in life. Today someone earning minimum wage at 40 hours a week earns just over $15,000 a year. By saving 20% (only $60 of each $300 paycheck, or roughly an 1 hour a day), one can invest $3,000 in a retirement account.

Saving 20% of your income is not easy, but it IS possible. If one starts at age 20, and earns the historical rate of return of 8% in the stock market, how much money will one have at age 65? Take a guess. The answer: $1,159,517. Think about that the next time you look at a McDonalds employee.

But most of us already earn well over minimum wage. What happens if you invest the maximum allowed every year into your IRA (currently $5,500, and increases over time)? With the same 8% return, you end up with over $2.1 million at age 65. If you really don't know how to live frugally, pick up a book on the subject. It's quite easy to find extra money by cutting out bad habits.

Long Term Low Cost Investing Through Index Funds

When I first started investing, I bought the stock of the company I worked for (bad idea—they later went bankrupt leaving me nothing). I then tried mutual funds, which did better, but I was paying exorbitant amounts in management fees to Wall Street Managers who were not performing any better than other options. The answer many have turned to today is Index Funds, and the champion of this is John Vogle of Vanguard Funds, one of the largest investment firms in the world.

For over four decades, Vogle has been pushing the idea of getting Wall Street out of the equation, doing no trading, and simply owning a basket of American businesses by investing in an Index Fund (a group of hundreds of businesses). As Vogle puts it, "then you are creature of the market, not of a casino."

These funds are much cheaper, because there is no active manager; they simply perform as the overall economy, or a defined sector of businesses, performs. The performance of these indexes as a whole is actually BETTER than managed mutual funds. One of the most popular funds in the world is the Vanguard Index 500, which mirrors the S&P 500 that is a mix of 500 of the largest and strongest companies in America. If you invest in this, when the news reports "The S&P Index was up 2% this month" they are talking about your return.

The Rule of 72

While there are many online calculators that can calculate projected returns for you, a simple way of gauging performance is by using the "Rule of 72." It's very simple. The rule tells you how long it will take for your money to double when invested at a compound rate. Simply divide 72 by the interest rate. The answer is the number of years for your money to double. 72 / 10% = 7.2 years. 72 / 5% = 14.4 years.

Risks

Unfortunately, this system doesn't work nearly as well as it used to in the past, and we are in for more financial turmoil and changing of the way investing works in the years to come. Here are some risks:

- Risk of loss: Your investments can lose money.
- Risk of reduced returns: Stock investments in the past averaged around 8% returns in the long run. If this does not hold true in the future, your returns will also vary.
- Risk of Inflation: Inflation destroys the purchasing power of your dollars. While a million dollars today would be a comfortable amount to retire on in many areas, by the time you are 65, a million dollars will buy far less than it does today.
- Risk of Government Regulation: Governments may renege on their agreements to leave retirement accounts free of taxation. Since most people do not adequately save for retirement, the masses will be in favor of taxing your retirement funds
- Risk of Playing Catchup: If you don't start early enough, you must save FAR more to end up with the same amount as someone who started just a couple of years before you.
- Opportunity Cost: If you are saving 10% of your income, you have 10% less income to buy the things you want today. You could get hit by a truck at age 64 and all the years of postponing gratification would be for naught.

Even with all these risks, you will be better off if you find a way to save for retirement, than if you don't. Get ahead of the game, and give yourself financial freedom in the future.

In summary, if you are not saving for your retirement, you should start today. Educate yourself, make your own decisions, and don't rely on any one source, including my advice here. Set up a monthly auto-pay where money is deducted every month into your retirement account, and get on the path to a stable financial future.

Nothing is guaranteed, but saving now will put you miles ahead of most others. One final bonus—retirement funds are excluded from many sizeable assets. They aren't counted towards college tuition funds, and they can't be taken by most creditors.

Read More: Expensive Woman Seeks Retarded Millionaire

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How Human Beings Will Choose To Enslave Themselves With Virtual Reality

July 15, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Pete was using his virtual reality device to explore a moon of Jupiter when a notification popped up on his display: “Dream Recorder is now here. Record your dreams. Limited availability. Touch here to learn more!” He moved his finger over the box and tapped.

The Dream Recorder was the most anticipated tech gadget of the year. It recorded your dreams while you slept, using a small electrode attached to your skull. Brainwaves were wirelessly sent to a special device and then analyzed to create a video segment that could be played on the dreamer’s VR unit. The playback was grainy and lacking in color, but it gave realistic depictions of dreams.

The first people to buy the Dream Recorder were those who had trouble remembering their dreams. Finally, they could see what their dreams were made of. Pete decided to buy the Dream Recorder for a different reason: he had too many dreams.

Every night, Pete had at least three dreams. After he turned 40, they became even more elaborate. Most people had dreams consisting of people they knew or places they had been to, but Pete had dreams of worlds and ideas he had never been exposed to. He tried to talk to other people about dreams, but could find no one who had his same dream pattern. Whenever he went to bed, he braced himself for what was essentially watching a new movie, with original characters and invented places. He even had a dream that seemed to predict a real-life event.

Pete was walking on the sidewalk when a beautiful young woman in a car tried to mow him down. He ran into the woods to get away from her, but her car was like a tank, tearing down trees to get at him. Pete reached a stone wall with no way to escape. He was certain he would die. Then the woman stopped the car right before he was crushed, got out, and reached her hand out to him.

Three weeks later, Pete absent-mindedly tried to cross the street without looking both ways. A woman to his right yelled “Watch out!” and pulled him back onto the sidewalk as he felt a speeding car nip against his pant leg. He looked at her and she was indeed beautiful. Startled, he didn’t even speak a word before she crossed the street and disappeared. He was distraught for the rest of the month, not because he almost died but because he didn’t make vocalizations to her.

Pete then tried to write down his dreams with a pen and notepad upon waking, but they took too long to write out, and he only clearly remembered the last dream of the bunch. The Dream Recorder was a perfect gadget for him.

On his first night with the recorder, he placed the wireless electrode on his head, leaving the receiver nearby. He went to sleep and after a few hours of continuous sleep he began his usual insomniac routine of unconsciously waking several times and trying to sleep again until his alarm would finally ring. He looked at the display on the receiver. “2 Dreams Recorded.” Excited, Pete plugged the receiver into his VR unit and hit play.

First dream. Brightly lit room. Long rectangle table. A man wearing a gold crown sitting at one end while a woman also wearing a crown on the other. People at the table wearing elaborate robes and jewelry. Careful mannerisms. A feast set on the table. “Would you like some more wine,” someone asks Pete. His goblet is filled and a toast is made.

Second dream. Country diner. Old waitress walks up to his table with a pot of steaming coffee. She begins pouring it into his mug but doesn’t stop. It starts overflowing. Pete instinctively hunches backwards to not get burned, but when the liquid falls on his legs, it’s cold. The waitress smiles at him.

The two dreams took only four minutes to play. Pete took off the VR unit and started to analyze them. Both dreams had a pouring component in them. What did that mean? This was the first time Pete was able to consider the connection between dreams he had in the same night. He wondered if the pouring signified someone giving him something that he may or may not want. He would be given a gift, perhaps. He played the dreams again, and noticed a detail he missed earlier. In the background of both dreams was a man nodding his head up and down as the pouring was taking place. Pete made a mental note to accept whatever was given to him in the upcoming weeks, even if it didn’t seem favorable at first.

Pete would usually jump into the shower after waking, but watching his dreams and then thinking about them took almost half an hour. He would be late for work. Only a week went by before he became so obsessed with analyzing his dreams after waking that he couldn’t leave the house. Within one month he lost his job, with no interest in getting another one.

Top floor of huge apartment building. Window view of a great metropolis. The loud city is too quiet. The lights in the room are flickering on and off. He looks at the peephole and sees alien figures covered in cloaks, going from room to room. He locks the door, grabs a knife, and hides behind the couch. A slight tap at his door. They insert a wand into the keyhole. A gas starts entering. Suddenly he is on his back, paralyzed. He can see, but can't move or talk. Three aliens stand above him. They bend down over him to pick him up.

Within two years, Pete had such a vast collection of dreams that he was spending hours a week organizing them all. This was on top of the three hours a day he spent watching old dreams and analyzing them, trying to decode their meaning. He was beginning to substitute his dreams for real life.

A new version of the Dream Recorder allowed you to trade dreams with others. Every fantastical human experience was now being recorded and shared. Some dreams were free but others, particularly sex dreams that broke the laws of physics, were priced steeply. Pete bought the dream "Amsterdam on a flying mattress pre-Caliphate" for one Ameripeso. While Pete couldn't control the bought dream, he was able to experience it as the dreamer did, evading buildings and waving at people below as he toured the city on the flying bed.

Soon came the dream engineers. They designed and programmed artificial dreams that fulfilled the needs of dreamers, though their work was generally seen as "inauthentic." Real dreams were always prized above fake ones.

There was one particular dream which shook him the most. He watched it several times a week, trying to understand its meaning by picking apart little details. He thought this dream was the key to understanding his future.

A woman leads him through a quiet fishing village, grabbing his hand snugly. Her long hair, down to her lower back, swings back and forth. Her step is happy. She stops to say hi to the villagers. He tries to get a look at her beauty, but is unable to. She walks to the water. He says he doesn't want to get wet. Her grip gets tighter as she pulls him into the water. He yells at her to stop but she doesn't. Just before the water submerges him, she turns around. Her face is a skeleton, with worms and maggots crawling out of her eye sockets. He yells as she pulls him down, his lungs filling with water.

Pete wasn't the only one getting addicted to the Dream Recorder. The heaviest users were spending more than half of their waking hours on it. Telling them that they were living their entire lives in a dream world had the same effect as telling a heroin addict that the drug was bad for them. While Pete mostly used dreams to understand himself and the future, most others used it because it was simply more enjoyable than normal life. This was especially the case when the VR units started to use body suits and olfactory simulators that blurred the line between what was real and not.

—

THE FIRST version of the Dream Recorder was released during a time when capitalism in the United States began to fail. Permanent unemployment hit 40%, mostly due to technological advances in robotics. Human labor was no longer needed to sustain society.

In fact, people began to get in the way.

The elite were getting nervous about how to keep so many idle human beings occupied. They approached the problem using a variety of tactics: increased spying to identify potential threats to their rule, depopulation in the form of childhood “vaccines” and cultural programs that preached the innumerable benefits of sterile lifestyles like homosexuality and trassexuality, and welfare for companies that produced and distributed mind-numbing entertainment.

When the American government saw how useful the Dream Recorder was, they poured money into a front company run by a college student named David Steinberg to create the Dream Pod. Many journalists lavished praise on Steinberg with a dorm-to-riches storyline without knowing that the government was behind his success.

The Dream Pod had three major features. The first was a full sensory suite. Smells, touches, kisses, slaps, punches, and even sex could now be reliably simulated in a way that a home version of the Dream Recorder could not. The second feature of the Dream Pod was providing biological nourishment through two IV lines. One pumped a saline solution for hydration and the other a slurry of insect protein and fructose syrup that was fortified with all essential vitamins and minerals. Lastly, urine and bowel exit tubes were provided so the dreamer could excrete waste while he was dreaming.

Steinberg started to offer a day package where users would be plugged into the pod for eight hours. During that time, they could access not only the company’s entire library of archived dreams but the libraries of other users who made their dreams available on Dream Pod’s network for a small royalty fee. In spite of this massive collection, dreamers complained of boredom towards the end of their “charge.”

To solve the problem, Steinberg came up with the idea of the Dream Stay, where hotel guests at major chains could stay for free as long as their dreams could be harvested with an electrode. Within one year, Steinberg had over three million dreams powered with an algorithm that auto-played dreams for its customers depending on their biometric responses and psychological profiles. Instead of being bored at the end of an 8-hour charge, customers were now demanding weekend stays of 48 continuous hours. Steinberg obliged and created dozens of dream centers throughout America that were converted from unused factory and warehouse space.

The number of dreams in the Dream Pod collection increased logarithmically, and with that came demands for even longer charges in the Pod. The first man to stay charged for one continuous week made international news and even got to meet the President of the United States, Muhammad Rodriguez, who said that the dreamer was a hero to the country and served as a shining beacon of what America stands for. As President Rodriguez praised the Dream Pod publicly, he privately pushed Steinberg into developing infinite stays. Steinberg didn’t need to be convinced by the government—the people were demanding it themselves.

Charging money for Dream Pod access became an unsustainable model because customers tended to get addicted to the pod and not maintain consistent employment.

They racked up huge invoices with Steinberg. The problem was solved through a special program where your pod charge was free if you agreed to have a government-sponsored public service dream (PSD) inserted into your dream rotation once per hour. The only catch is that you didn't know which dream was the PSD.

A handful of anti-pod protesters argued that this was a diabolical means of brainwashing the masses, but those masses didn't seem to care, and there was no way to prove that weird dreams where a dreamer was on his knees and begged for mercy from a uniformed police officer was actually a PSD. Free was a powerful draw, and within twenty years of the PSD program release, over 50% of the population were active customers on the plan.

Sitting in a classroom with other adults. The chairs and desks are too small. The alphabet is above the blackboard in bold type. He's wearing a necklace, and hanging from it is a pacifier. 'What did I tell you!' the teacher yelled, scolding a naked adult. 'We know best, so you must rest.' The adult began crying, and he begged the teacher to return to his desk. 'You know best, so I will rest,' he said.

Pete was now in his late 60's. He was on the quarterly pod plan, where he stayed plugged in for three months nonstop, and during that time there was no reliable way for him to tell whether he was getting a programmed dream or a genuine dream produced by his own brain. The quarterly plan required unplugging for a two week break period, and during that time Pete felt immediate pain and discomfort to any real world problem, disturbance, or even opinion that didn't fully match his own. Even normal conversations with people became unbearable. He would use his outdated Dream Recorder for most of the days on his break until he could be plugged back in.

Dreamers like Pete could no longer live independently outside of the pod. Even if he could afford real food, his stomach couldn't digest it without vomiting it all back up, so he manually fed himself with a bag of pod slurry. His body became emaciated and weak; he couldn't walk up stairs without holding onto the railing. Steinberg rushed to implement the permanent hookup, not so much to make more money, but because millions of Americans were becoming incapable of living real life, and would die unless they found a way to plug in or get cheap slurry.

Pete was one of the first dreamers to be permanently hooked up. He arrived to the pod wearing pajamas. Before slipping into his new home, he was presented with a contract saying that he would never be unplugged, and when he died, he'd be cremated and used as fertilizer for the slurry crops. With the little strength he had left, Pete signed and slipped into his new home, anxious for the attendant to turn on the switch.

Thirty years after the Dream Recorder was first introduced, seventy percent of the American population were permanent dreamers. The awake were composed of the technocratic class, blue color workers who methodically demolished empty metropolises, the anti-dreamers who lived in rural areas, and the ruling elite.

A big squeeze was put on the anti-dreamers to get plugged in. Jail had been abolished in favor of the pod and new laws declared that in the case of martial law, when the country was threatened by terrorists, citizens must be plugged in for their own safety as long as the threat remained. With over 25,000 pod centers, it would have been futile to shut the system down, and even if that happened, dreamers would revolt with whatever strength they had left to turn the pod centers back on. One anti-dreamer commented how pod centers resembled server farms of the early 21st century.

Pete survived for two years in his permanent pod before his body started to give way. Sensing his imminent death, the pod played the heaven dream of him walking towards a beautiful bright light to the sound of harp music before his body was flushed into an acid vat. The pod was then cleaned and readied for a new dreamer to be plugged in.

This story was originally published on Roosh V.

Previous Story: When Jethro Exposed The Computer Simulation We're Living In

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Reasons All Young Women Should Be Beach Body Ready

July 16, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Sadiq Khan, the pushover Muslim mayor of Londonistan, recently banned all "Are You Beach Body Ready?" advertising campaigns from public transit vehicles within the British capital, including the walls of the London Underground itself. This follows more than a year of on-and-off controversy over the advertisements from Protein World, which crybaby fatties complained about because it makes them feel physically inferior.

These ads experienced a similar backlash when they first arrived in the United States, but thankfully they have not been entirely banned from butt hurt eyes. Nevertheless, why do we live in Bizarro world, where what's desirable is scorned and what's slovenly and mediocre is tolerated?

This article will illustrate five very good reasons why all young women should be "beach body ready," no matter where they reside around the globe.

1. Competitive Advantage In The Sexual Marketplace

Young women who have a very agreeable weight and overall aesthetic figure (along with their youth and a decent set of teeth) have the best competitive advantage in the sexual marketplace for attracting the highest quality male suitors.

Men of power, wealth, social prestige, confidence, fitness, etc. will not be chubby chasers unless literally no other options are available to them at a geographic location (mining towns, Toronto, etc). Most importantly, chubby women can largely forget about these high-status men wanting to put a ring around their finger and sire children with them.

Even women in their 30s can snag a wealthy silver fox like George Clooney if they keep themselves in shape

2. Health And Mental Well Being

Being overweight or obese takes years off everyone's life expectancy, reduces their energy levels, diminishes their sporting and sexual performance, and greatly increases the risk of depression and other mental disorders.

Women who are physically active and have a healthy beach body weight, generally have much higher levels of self-esteem and have a far more positive and enjoyable outlook towards life. It's the "winner's outlook" if you will.

Women who enjoy life and have good self-esteem are highly unlikely candidates to become militant feminists (losers). Additionally, they are also less likely (but not immune) to destroy their bodies with massive amounts of gawd-awful tattoos or piercings, which greatly diminishes their sexual market value and marriageability.

Ad Lib Coach Translation (0:10 – 0:20): "You know why there are so many empty seats here? You know why you are losing? It's because some of you girls are too damn chunky! It boggles the mind and it's a disgrace to Argentina!"

3. Increased Access To High-Income (Or Easy) Job Opportunities

Women who have very fit and attractive beach bodies have much greater access to lucrative job opportunities in their prime years (18-26) than women who have chubby or overall dumpy looking aesthetics. It doesn't necessarily matter how "nice" they are, or where their education and skills set lies.

In the United States, female bartenders who work in busy and popular nightclubs and saloons are often fit as hell (in stark contrast to the general female population), and could routinely be pulling $300-500 a shift from thirsty customers, in more ways than one. Models, product promoters, and Youtubers are also all at a great competitive advantage to make more money while they are young.

Even while seeking jobs which don't necessarily correlate to directly flaunting their bodies (secretary, receptionist, etc.), fit women stand a very good chance at being on the short-list for employment opportunities compared to their fatter compatriots.

We got this job because like, we're really smart and stuff!

4. Increased Social Capital

C'mon. When in the course of human history was the fat chick ever the most popular girl in school? When was the fat chick ever a top priority to invite over to parties, or be accepted into the most sought-after sororities? Moving up exclusively to the modern era, when was a young fat chick ever the most followed girl on Instagram or Snapchat?

When it comes to social opportunities and popularity contests, and the frequent discharges of serotonin and dopamine they will bring, fit women have everything to gain while overweight women have everything to lose.

Probably is home alone on a Saturday night, wondering why nobody is calling

5. National Pride And Prestige

Finally, it should be a great source of pride for all people (men and women) in countries like Poland, Colombia, Russia, Ukraine, Brazil, Japan, etc. when men around the world are often very complimentary of the overall state of female waistlines when they visit these nations.

On the other spectrum, it is a source of shame and disgust for men in countries like the United States, Mexico, Australia, and many others where the nation is overflowing with obese and aesthetically horrendous looking women.

When you compare the average talent on a beach in the “redneck riviera” of the United States, with just about anywhere in Brazil, the Brazilians should pat themselves on the back while the Americans should just consider burying their heads in the sand.

“Man returns to Mississippi coast after holiday in Rio de Janeiro”

Conclusion

Fox News commentator Andrea Tantaros is absolutely correct. The only people who would be truly offended by the “Beach Body Ready” ads are people who have dumpy looking aesthetics and higher than average jealousy issues.

Our feminist society wants women to accept collective mediocrity in regards to excess body fat, and to tear down advertisements which encourage health, beauty, and self improvement. However, I’m sure they would be perfectly fine with an advertisement for bull rings and blue hair dye though.

So to hell with the feminist haters, and ladies (we know you’re there), get started with a gym routine if you haven’t already. Your quality of life will improve tremendously. Do it for America, more than anywhere else.

Read More: 39 Statements That Reveal Whether You Are A True Man Of The Right

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

The New Ghostbusters: Bad Politics Or Bad Cinema?

July 16, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

The new Ghostbusters, I am here to report, is not awful; it is merely bad.

With all the hubbub and controversy surrounding its all-female cast and almost chuckle-free official trailer, the film is expected to draw out a divisive motley of naysayers (justifiably, in my opinion) off-put by the reboot's gender gimmick, and swarms of progressives eager to embrace the girl power. Likely, it will split the expectations of fanboys who embraced Ivan Reitman, Harold Ramis, and Dan Aykroyd's 1984 original.

Some, myself included, may find it hard to buy the premise – even in the wacky, fictitious world of Ghostbusters – of three female engineers (plus one black female subway attendant–how liberal!– played by Leslie Jones) playing the heroes in a job sector (STEM) where women represent only a quarter of its work force. With this statistic in mind, Ghostbusters ought to be an underdog story – after all, genre movies always work best when they exaggerate yet reflect the real world.

For instance, you could tell a story where a ragtag group of women, underestimated by their work force, band together to best evil spirits from New York. This premise could serve as a credible form of "female empowerment," especially if the characters demonstrated a certain degree of intellectual and physical acumen.

Unfortunately, director and cowriter Paul Feig does not make this supernatural comedy about anything or anyone. Rather, *Ghostbusters'*s all-female vehicle openly comes off as a politically correct reboot we suspected it might be, manufactured to appease the fashion of the day: grrl power!

That said, one would not categorically dismiss the movie if it was, you know, fun. Ghostbusters, however, lacks wit, heart, and humanity; it is pure Hollywood product prepackaged for Millennials who are incapable of articulating an emotional response over 140 characters.

“The power of pain compels you!”: an uninspired “Exorcism” reference is a sure sign of movie mediocrity.

Good popcorn movies are meant to emotionally engage and entertain, which in turn make them ideal vehicles for propaganda: studios can cleverly insert social and political ideas in the plot, making them difficult to detect for the escapist-driven consumer desperate to be immersed.

These ideas are then processed as “entertainment,” which the viewer, therefore, unconsciously accepts (conservative author Ben Shapiro wrote about this in detail in his 2011 book, “Primetime Propaganda“).

Ironically, *Ghostbusters’*s dumbing down of plot and narrative cohesion harms its left-leaning agenda. Due to this screenplay’s lack of structure (which I will get into), *Ghostbusters’*s progressive politics inadvertently come off harmless and self-effacing.

Ghostbusters puts itself above basic cinematic rules

You begin to wonder whether Feig and his cowriter Katie Dippold tucked away the man-bashing handbook and genuinely tried to make a fun flick with narrative pull – just, in the end, didn’t. Thus, what discredits this nouveau Ghostbusters is not its bad politics, per se, but its bad cinema.

Granted, the first twenty minutes show promise. After a bizarre opener (without the lead cast) that sets the stage for ghostly menaces to come, we are introduced to Erin Gilbert (Kristen Wiig), a mousy Columbia University professor desperately trying to get tenure.

As fate would have it, a past book of hers, co-written with old colleague Abby Yates (Melissa McCarthy), surfaces online and destroys her credibility in academia. Disgraced, Eric hunts down Abby only to discover she is working with a zany nuclear engineer (*SNL’*s Kate McKinnon) to eradicate Manhattan of troublesome spectres.

A fish-out-of-water, Erin initially serves as a sympathetic vessel for the audience to follow. Because on one hand she seeks redemption, but on the other she is skeptical of Abby's supernatural beliefs – which should be a useful device as the story unravels.

But Feig, who directed other feminist fist pump flicks like Bridesmaids and The Heat, has no interest in character or story. Hailing from TV (Freaks & Geeks), Feig only knows how to craft a storyline by stringing together a bunch of loosely-improvised bits while piling a bunch of plot on top of them.

At 116 minutes, Ghostbusters pretends to have narrative drive – the ghostbusters must stop stubby, curly-haired occultist (Neil Casey) from breaking evil ghosts out of their (gender) barriers and letting them wreak havoc on downtown Manhattan.

Instead of using this as an opportunity to develop the characters, the script gets sidetracked with meaningless subplots and supporting characters who simply regurgitate laboured jokes and tired exposition.

Australian actor Chris Hemsworth joins the Ghostbusters as their clueless receptionist clearly hired as dispensable eye candy for the four female 'busters. Hemsworth's character is far too overqualified to be some sedentary receptionist – and that's the point: his bodybuilder physique makes him an object of this film's female gaze, set up as a feminist response to the traditional male gaze that predominates classical Hollywood.

Paul Feig's name will go down in movie history

This notion plays into the kind of gender irony Ghostbusters is hinting at. Sadly, Feig is not a sophisticated purveyor of battle-of-the-sexes comedy like the great Howard Hawks (Bringing Up Baby) or Billy Wilder (Some Like It Hot).

An opportunity is wasted when Ghostbusters drops a bunch of the 1984's cast – Bill Murray, Dan Aykroyd, Sigourney Waver, and Ernie Hudson – into its modern setting. The film, in fact, is full of secondary male characters, yet nothing clever is done with them. I would have liked if they all ended up being possessed spirits, to playfully riff on Hollywood's anti-male sensibility. Instead, most of these characters pass by in a flash, contributing to the hectic hollowness of this Ghostbusters plot.

“Bringing Up Baby” (1938): a better film to subvert gender roles and toy with notions of male supremacy.

In addition to comedy, Feig fails to demonstrate any ability for scale. It is hard to care about New York when it is portrayed in a series of bland aerials and establishing shots likely a product of second unit photography.

Feig does not properly build this world or explore any particular mythology of these ghosts. We have no notion of their nefarious abilities – suddenly, the ghouls drive cars, vomit goo, possess the bodies of humans? This is all done without any set up or consistency. Heck, these otherworldly villains are so ill-defined they barely fit into the universe of a film called Ghostbusters!

Ultimately, this type of careless filmmaking only harms the progressive agenda because we are not given characters or a world that is three-dimensional and, thus, relatable.

Even the four comediennes selected to replace 1984’s legendary cast are not well drawn. While their characters are set up to be a bit kooky, their behaviour becomes so erratic you sense this is a result of contrived and lazy screenwriting. At one moment, Erin, Abby, Jillian (McKinnon), or Patty (Jones) are smart, then all of a sudden they behave annoyingly childish – without explanation.

Yes, Ghostbusters is not awful, it is just not very good. There is one moment that summarizes it well: Leslie Jones leaps into a concert crowd only for the goers to back away causing her to plummet to the floor. Stunned, Jones’s character gasps, “Okay, was that a black thing or a lady thing?”.

With respect to Ghostbusters, one should respond: “No, it is just a bad movie thing.”

Read More: The New Ghostbusters Movie Will Be Ruined By The Feminist Agenda

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

Why You Must Raise Your Son To Be A Warrior

July 17, 2016 | by Leo Pryde | Link | Original Link

Every culture that ever held masculine virtues as the cornerstones of morality has been focused on the strength of the family unit, or clan. This unit takes the form of two parents and their children, but can vary from culture to culture in how much influence the extended blood family have within the unit. Grandparents often take the role of the clan elder, with the younger generations looking to them for wisdom and assisting with the transmission of norms and values to their children.

On the other hand, you might have found that horizontal family branches may have less direct contact with each other, instead revolving around a common ancestor for family gatherings. No matter what the peculiarities of the family unit structure, they have always been at their greatest in leading the youth to a functional role in society.

Your Family Is Under Threat

The globalist elite hate the power of a strongly bonded family, because they know that this cohesion is what prevents their victim-empowering, self-hatred encouraging propaganda from taking root in the minds of impressionable children. They struggle to overpower this with every institution. Schools ram their twisted ideology down the throats of children the instant that parents leave them at the gates.

Those children who do not begin to parrot the insanity back to their handlers fast enough are diagnosed with some form of disorder, and forcefully medicated to dull their minds and sense of independence. Signs placed in bus stations warn of the consequences of “hate crime” for those who would dare to defend their own kind against foreign invaders. No mention is ever made of what rights, if any, you have to protect yourself from unprovoked violence from minority groups.

All of this and more is thrown relentlessly at you, your spouse and your children. If you stand by idly, eventually you will begin to hear these same pathetic sentiments emerging from their mouths. If you are particularly weak, then you will join the chorus. As soon as you do, you will find yourself forced to your knees, and everything you held dear taken from you. Your money, property and actions are no longer your own to control. You are merely given access to these things in return for doing as you are told.

I understand this is a bleak image, but it is an image that is increasingly blocking out all others across Western Civilization as a whole. Thankfully, there is a way to fight back against this. You may be afraid to join mass protests for fear of retribution. You may be afraid to take a stand against the established political players that offer a choice between being robbed from the left or from the right. You may be afraid, but unless you want this to become a daily reality with no way out, you must fight.

Your Fight Begins At Home

I do not mean that you should slap your children if they mimic the other indoctrinated children they share classes with. Victory comes, not from violence, but rather from ideological superiority.

If you have heard of the concept of frame you will know that, in a debate or argument, the person with the strongest frame is the most persuasive. In order to hold a frame strong enough to protect your family from moral corruption carried out on a global level, you must build your family around masculine virtues. A patriarchal core, drawing inspiration from history, philosophy and warrior-ethics, insulates the minds of the next generation from the insidious propaganda machine blaring at them from every other angle.

Your home must be a safe space. Not in the sense of a safe space for women and their feminist allies. It must be secured against all angles of attack. TV viewing habits should be controlled in terms of content and also how frequently. An easy way to establish the expectation that TV should not interfere with family time, and therefore with family ties, is to ban any use of the TV during meal times.

Likewise, all other media, digital or otherwise, should be completely restricted during meals. You must lead this by example. You cannot expect your children to respect your law if you will not adhere to the same standards. It is your job as the patriarch of your family to stand as a shining example of what they can be if they embody the same principles.

Have you ever noticed how stunted and awkward social interaction becomes when everyone involved has half of their attention being sucked away by screens? Teaching your family that they can have meaningful existence without these distractions is beneficial on multiple levels. Your sons will be better equipped to deal with the complexity of human interactions. You may not wish to start introducing the concepts of game until your children are older, but being able to take part in face to face communication will put them at the head of the pack when their time comes, in both business and pleasure. Whilst you will be teaching your children valuable life lessons, the true benefits of this are immediate.

Bonding as a family is an intensely rewarding experience, and infinitely more so when each member of the family takes a genuine interest in each other. There is nothing worse than enthusiastically asking your son about his day, only to have him demand to play with your smartphone in response, and cry if refused. Do yourself, and your family a favour. Keep the damn screens away from your shared time, and don’t let them turn into spoiled princesses.

Don’t Hide Your Children From Harsh Realities

Many of the parents I know praise their children endlessly. By now, this should come as no surprise to you. This type of willfully blind parenting results in weak, narcissistic and “woe is me” adults that are incapable of taking care of themselves. Their children, if they are ever able to gather the balls to approach a woman, will likely be so damaged beyond repair that they will forever be dependent on others for the most basic needs.

If you value your genetic legacy, it is your duty to prevent things from ever reaching this stage. Let others destroy themselves if they are unwilling to open their eyes to the world around them, but do not let yourself shuffle meekly into the same inter-generational suicide that they have allowed themselves to be railroaded into.

Begin by teaching your children basic masculine values through the use of stories. They can be ones that you have crafted yourself if you possess the creative skills, or could be written by another (preferably from earlier times). The fundamental values you must show to be worthy of pursuing in a man's character are: honour, duty, and strength.

I do not mean these in their modern, corrupted understanding of the words. If you think of honour as being synonymous with putting the desires of others before your own, you are mistaken. It is essential you seek the truth of what these words mean first.

Praise Their Strength And Determination

When your children are older and are ready to begin competing with their peers in various ways, they will be driven forward to their own victories by these values. Those who gravitate towards the field and sporting achievement will make excellent members of any team, whether it be as a visionary captain or as a loyal, hard-working defense against their opponents. They will struggle in the face of adversity, and come out the other side standing tall. Whether they win, or lose, they will learn how to keep moving forward, whilst others cry at the first sign of hardship.

Later still in life, these same values and early scuffles will form the inner essence of the man that was once a young boy who needed your help to tie his shoes, and teach him the language of your people. This is the man who you will one day stand, shoulder to shoulder, against the hordes of leftist parasites that seek to take from you what you built. If you have raised this man in a masculine manner, and given him the mindset of a warrior, then neither your son nor yourself will be afraid of those who come for you.

With the whole of your clan standing beside you, you are untouchable.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How To Raise A Red Pill Revolutionary

Leo Pryde

Leo is a writer with a passion for helping other Patriarchs in the West to hold their heads high under the heavy weight of their responsibilities as fathers, brothers, and sons. To read more by Leo Pryde, check out www.plannedvictory.com

How To Do A Proper Bench Press

July 17, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

As I have alluded to in several previous articles, I feel that people should have a base in calisthenics before they begin lifting weights—in other words, if you can't lift your own body you have no business lifting a weight. And the numerous articles I have written on the Convict Conditioning series of calisthenics will have given you that base if you have done the exercises contained therein faithfully. And thus it is now time to begin a regimen of weight training.

Weights Versus Machines

Free weights are, simply put, better than machines. For not only do the free weights allow your body to move in its natural and full range of motion, it also trains the muscles and CNS to work as a cohesive unit (hence the name "motor unit" to describe the cooperation of neurons and muscle fibers), which will of course make you stronger than the man who has merely made his muscles big and strong. And it is here, with all this talk of motor units and multiple muscle groups working in unison, that we can begin to analyze the humble bench press.

A Bench Overview

If I had to do a workout consisting of just two exercises, I—and most fitness gurus worth their salt—would say "The deadlift and any sort of press." Those two combined will work the majority of muscles in your body. For today, I have deigned to do the bench press, mainly because it's the only one I already had footage of myself doing.

The bench press will develop the pectorals, triceps, and shoulders predominantly, with some auxiliary work done for the forearms and hands. While I feel it is not the be-all-and-end-all-of upper body workouts (mainly because the overhead press is more likely to be something you'll use in a practical real life situation), it is advocated by power athletes like Olympic level shotputters. Or, in the words of Pavel Tsatsouline, "For all the debate over the usefulness of the bench press, if you met someone with a 600 pound bench press, would you want to take a punch from them?"

The bench press, like any lift worth doing, is one that has a julienne of variations to it: close grip, wide grip, different types of bar, incline, decline, one handed, etc. But for our purposes today, this article will strictly deal with the standard, shoulder width bench press with a "closed grip." It will serve most of your pectoral training needs, particularly when done in conjunction with other upper body exercises (as a side note, I only do the standard bench press, since unlike your average "upper body day every day" gym stereotype, I have a day job and thus time is of the essence).

Like most exercises, there are a couple of constants common to all types of bench press regardless of the variation being performed. The first is that the bar must GENTLY touch the chest before going back up. Gentleness is the key for reasons that are so obvious, I don't think they have to be gone over.

Secondly, throughout any type of bench press, the feet should be pressing down hard on the floor, causing the back to slightly arch-and I emphasize SLIGHTLY. This will give you a little bit of a "boost" in your lifting and enable you to lift a few pounds more than you could have otherwise thanks to the previously detailed magic of proprioceptive muscular tension.

How To Do A Bench Press

With all that being said, this section will then go over how to actually do the standard bench press. The first step is, of course, to find a weightlifting bench, characterized by the little hooks for a bar, and likely a bar as well.

Once you have found the bench, place the bar on the top rung of platforms, and place yourself under the bar, approximately so the bar is directly over the top of your pectoral muscles. Placing the bar on its highest setting will make starting the exercise easier, rather than expending effort on something that is not actually part of the exercise.

Yours truly warming up with 205 pounds. My max is 225 (or rather, it was, before my car accident put me on the shelf)

The bar can be held with a variety of grips, but for beginners I would advocate just a regular fist grip, also called the “closed grip.” Just hold the bar naturally, with the four fingers around the bar and the thumb clenching the fingers. Let the hands find the position they want to find, push down hard with your feet to arch your back, and then push up with your arms and hold the bar over your head.

NOTE: The bench press is the only exercise that I would advocate having a partner or spotter with you, for the obvious reason that failing a bench press leaves an unliftable weight planted firmly on your chest.

An open grip bench, note that the thumbs are not wrapped around the bar and fingers

Once you’ve lifted the bar into the start position, keeping the feet pressing throughout the entirety of the exercise, lower the bar down in a smooth, controlled motion, touch the chest, and bring it back up to the start position.

The amount of repetitions and sets you do is your choice, but my personal preference is to use heavy compounds lifts to develop maximal strength, meaning: low sets, low reps, high weight (I feel that high repetitions of weights increases the risk of injury, particularly for beginners who haven't mastered proper form). In contrast, I choose to develop muscular endurance with calisthenics.

And of course, good form with a lighter weight is preferable to half-assing a heavy weight.

Regardless of how many repetitions you choose to do, the bench press is an exercise you need to have in your gym repertoire.

Read More: 5 Bench Press Mistakes That Will Stall Your Progress

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

How Zionism Has Strongly Influenced Both The Left And The Right

July 18, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

This is a continuation from Part I of the Article. Be sure to read that first if you haven't.

Left, Right, And Zionism

We are at an important transition point where the political spectrum of left and right is being reshaped and redefined. Along with populism, globalism, nationalism, and anti-establishment trends, Zionism is also changing and adapting. And I believe that the general movement of Zionism today is the shift from the left to the right.

Zionism And The Left

To understand Zionism's move to the right, we need a brief historical context.

In much of the 19th and 20th centuries, the left served as a useful vehicle for the Zionists to defy the white, Christian societies of the West that was often hostile to the Jews. The leftist ideas of progressivism, tolerance, and social equality was beneficial to the Jews who lived in Europe as aliens. In Russia, the Bolshevik revolution was led mainly by Jews (as mentioned in Part I) to overthrow the repressive Tsarist rule. (Again, I'm generalizing a trend. There were, of course, Conservative Jews in Europe like the British Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli).

In the United States, Jews became especially prominent after many fled Europe with the rise of Nazism. Stalin's rise to power and Trotsky's downfall also meant that the Soviet Union was no longer a haven for Jews that it used to be. America was the future for the Jews to thrive. After WWII, for the rest of the century, Jews continued to play a prominent role in the leftist movement of America including the civil rights movement, feminism, multiculturalism, etc. And at an official level, the Zionists influenced both parties of the US, but generally leaned more towards the Democrats.

But then, around the turn of the century, something happened.

The Left's Betrayal And The Zionist Move To The Right

Even though they were the ones that helped foment the modern leftist movement, a new generation of young liberals emerged that sympathized with the Palestinian cause against Israel. The leftist monster turned against its creator once again (the first being the Soviet Union). This also coincided with the rise of the Bush administration and Neo-cons who proved to be more than faithful to the Zionist interests. This was the first turning point.

I should note here that there are still many leftist Jews in America. But they are mostly remnants of the old left and are more of leftist Americans who happen to be Jews than Zionist Jews—a distinction many anti-Zionists fail to make. I highly doubt that some no-name liberal journalist with a Jewish background is actively collaborating with globalist Zionists even if their views overlap in certain areas. As prominent examples, Noam Chomsky and Glenn Greenwald are both leftist Jews who, to their credit, have been openly critical of both Israel and the globalist elites. And it is with this generalization and counter-reaction that is making the leftist Jews and anti-Semites feed each others' stereotypes.

More recently, Obama's administration hasn't exactly been too supportive of Israel (making him a level 1 anti-Semite) and caused great offense by signing a deal with Iran instead of destroying them like Netanyahu wanted (he of course wants the US to do all the dirty jobs for Israel). In Europe, the growing number of Muslims in the West, who have no love for the Jews—along with their leftist sympathizers—are also seen as a grave threat to the Zionists. These recent trends is what I believe is causing the Zionists to shift to the right.

Zionism And The Right

The Zionists are currently capitalizing on the right's hatred of Islam to re-establish themselves in their base—they can't afford to alienate both left and the right. They need to convince the dumb and naive among the conservatives that Israel is the greatest ally for the West in their fight against radical Islam (I'm not saying that anti-Islam sentiments are right or wrong, just that it is being exploited). And considering the number of "conservatives" who can't shut up about their undying love for Israel, I'd say the Zionists have been quite successful in their efforts.

But to say that having Israel as an ally is great for the West is a complete joke because:

(1) Zionists couldn't care less about what happens to the West as long as they get their financial and diplomatic support from the US. They want us to keep a straight face and nod when the same individuals are promoting strong ethnic identity for Israel while attacking Europeans who do the same. Even if Europe bans all Muslims from entering the continent, it will still be flooded with other non-Muslim migrants. The multiculturalism experiment (along with feminism and progressivism) will continue and Israel will not bat an eye as Europe's identity becomes erased.

(2) Israel has a history of telling the US to knock out secular Arab regimes that keep Islamists at bay. Knocking out Saddam and Ghaddafi while trying to destabilize Syria has led to massive number of migrants to flood Europe while giving rise to various Islamic terrorist groups. Do you think Israel and the Zionists really care if another terror attack happens in Europe? No, they'll see it as another opportunity for exploitation—they won't even wait until the blood is dry to tell you that Israel is also a victim of terror attacks that requires sympathy and support of the West. Their national interests always comes first before that of Europe or the US. Really, what has Israel ever done to be considered an ally?

(3) Even as the US government gives them billions of dollars in aid every single year and go to war with countries that Israel tells them to, Israel won't stop spying on the US and has already been caught few times stealing military secrets. Yes, they're the greatest ally the shills can't seem to stop praising. The entire relationship between the two nations have been extremely one-sided ever since modern Israel came into existence.

(4) Given their history, Zionists will most likely shift back to the left if white nationalism ever becomes prominent in the West. This will especially be true if the globalist Hillary Clinton becomes president after she practically gave the AIPAC a blowjob. A performance that was criticized even by her own supporters. The fact is this: the Zionists have no loyalty except towards themselves. Heck, they'll even help out Islamic militants if it means taking down a stable and secular Arab country. No one should be surprised if they suddenly decide to ally with Islam to defeat rising European nationalism. Divide and conquer is their favorite strategy that they've used effectively thus far.

The Pro-Israel Cucks

Pro-Israel "conservatives": They're all about freedom of speech until it's their Zionist overlords who are doing the censoring, then you won't hear a peep from them. Let's face it, these lapdogs will sell out their own country at a blink of an eye if it means pleasing their masters—and they do.

While I accept that Zionists are simply doing what is in the best interest of their group, I can't comprehend the listless pro-Israel "conservatives" who don't even realize they're being toyed as the useful idiots (and these are not just the Christians who listen to Pat Robertson religiously). These naive and petulant individuals are probably just going along with the enemy of my enemy (Muslims) is my friend logic after gobbling up some Zionist propaganda.

You can easily recognize these shills by the way they try to manipulate you into brown nosing Israel as much as they do—they essentially use the tactics their Zionist masters taught them. For example, if they sense that you're a Christian, they'll tell you that Israel is such a great country for Christians. If they sense that you have a thing against leftists and Muslims, they'll tell you to support Israel because Israel is such a sorry victim of anti-Semetic Leftists and Islamofascists. And we all know that Zionists and Jews in general would never do the same to defend these pawns who pedestalize Israel.

The degree to which these shills white-knight for Israel is actually downright pathetic. They'll jump on you on topics that barely have anything to do with Israel and accuse you of being "Stormfront" or white supremacist just for mentioning Zionist influence on US foreign policy. They will not stop in their efforts to appeal to your emotions by telling you what a victim the poor Israelis are.

At a fundamental level, the pro-Israel lackeys are no different from white people who support Black Lives Matter or the self-hating male feminist patsies in spreading victim narrative on behalf of another group. They openly mock liberals for screaming "racist!" and "Islamophobe!" but they don't seem to realize that they do the exact same thing to anyone who dares question the glory of Israel by crying "Nazi!" and "anti-Semite!"

These cucks for Israel are so brainwashed and out of touch with reality that you can show them proof of Israel supporting radical Islamists destroying secular Syria (which protects Christians and has Christian soldiers fighting for it) and they'll still parrot the same propaganda about how Israel is the greatest protector of Christians in the Middle East. And if you tell them that Israel is allying with Saudi Arabia, a brutal and corrupt theocratic state that spreads its radical Salafist ideology around the world, they'll come up with dozen excuses on behalf of Israel to justify its alliance with the "Islamofascists." Actually, the cowards probably wouldn't even acknowledge it. Just note how empty the Breitbart article's comment section is as these "conservatives" can't face the fact that their dear Israel would ally with the evil Muslims.

The pro-Israel shills must be called out and shut down like the lunatic social justice mob. In fact, both groups are equally rabid and damaging to Western societies as a whole: both are enemies of free speech, both support an outside group above their own, and both resort to defamation and hysteria to control other people's views. If the SJW's are puppets for the globalists bringing about disastrous cultural consequences, the pro-Israel zealots are puppets for the Zionists bringing about disastrous social and political consequences for the world.

The Future of the Right and the West

Along with the "Cuckservative"-"Paleoconservative" divide, I foresee a pro-Zionist and anti-Zionist conflict to soon arise within the right. The two are simply not compatible and there is not enough room in the right for both to co-exist. Whatever the outcome, the synthesis of that conflict will be crucial for the future development of the right-wing ideology. In fact, that conflict may have already begun.

I'm not really sure about Trump's stance on Israel, but I don't have any great reason to believe that he will be different from the previous presidents (assuming he even gets elected). America just can't seem to get loose from the Zionist grip. But if the people of the West want sovereignty and place their own national interests above that of Israel and globalism, they need to have an honest and open discussion about Zionism and decide whether its influence is positive or not—a discussion that is currently forbidden.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: American Cultural Trends And The Future

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

It’s Time To Make Men Strong Again

July 18, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If I were to describe neomasculinity in one phrase, I’d take a page from Donald Trump’s playbook and have it be “Make Men Strong Again.” Most of the work I’ve published in the past decade has had the common end of giving tools and knowledge to men so that they do more than before, whether it’s with meeting women, improving their health and physical stature, making more money, understanding reality in a more objective way, or having valuable experiences around the world. The rise of feminism and egalitarianism has fed poison to men with the goal of making them weak, emaciated replicas of who they once were. This must be reversed.

What Is Masculinity?

Masculinity is the connection between physical and mental strength. Physical strength is having the endurance and power to fulfill the will of the mind, which must possess knowledge, courage, hope, determination, and a truthful interpretation of reality. If you've been reading me for any length of time, you've already embarked on a journey of strengthening both your body and mind.

The problem we have today is that men shield themselves from all difficulty and even the experience of life. We now have 21-year-old male students crying on the shoulders of feminists in designated safe spaces on college campuses because they heard mere opinions they didn't like. Those safe spaces, whether literal or metaphorical, prevents men from becoming masculine. It would be the same as having a gym with only treadmills and no weights.

There's Only One Way To Become More Masculine

Do you remember the first movie that made you cry? For me it was E.T. I cried in the scene where the ugly alien had to get on the spaceship and leave behind his human friend. I saw E.T. many times as a child, and didn't cry again after that first time, because I fully expected the sad scene and was already exposed to it. If you want to become masculine, you must continually expose yourself to challenging situations and endure them in order to build strength.

The way to know if you're getting stronger is to recollect a past difficulty in your life and ask how you'd respond to it now. If it wouldn't even bother you today, you've gotten stronger. If it still gives you a similar amount of anxiety, you haven't gotten stronger.

In 2011, a few individuals gave multiple fake one-star reviews on my Amazon books. This caused me a lot of stress, and I worried about it for days and how it would affect my income. If this happened today, it wouldn't even create one minute of mental disturbance. I probably wouldn't even notice. Because of far harder events I've had to endure since, I no longer experience anxiety on things that used to trouble me before, simply because I've purposefully put myself through an escalating series of difficulties. I have increased my masculine strength.

6 Ways Masculine Strength Improves Your Life

1. You live more according to your biological nature. Men are animals that hunt, kill, fight, protect, and survive. Anything you do which increases your strength will be fully compatible with genetic coding that has evolved over millions of years. Being weak does not at all complement this coding, unless it's a temporary submission strategy that allows you to survive today so that you can fight tomorrow.

2. You will be more naturally attractive to women. Many aspects of game mimic the traits of men who are strong, but once you have genuine strength, you no longer need to role-play or consciously apply game. Women have a sixth sense for strength and will be drawn to the men who display it.

3. You will be more able to protect and defend your tribe and family. If those close to you are suffering, you will be better positioned to help them weather the storm as a strong man than as a weak one. Men who are weak can barely help themselves, let alone others.

4. You will be more able to successfully respond to problems in your own life. If you've been building strength by not shying away from new challenges and tough situations, you'll be able to handle a future problem that is many times more difficult. You won't panic, sob, or feel impotent to deal with your troubles.

5. You will be seen as a leader. Being a leader is not a conscious decision a man can make, but a side effect of the strength that he has been built up. When you become strong, people will begin following you. This can be used in all areas of your life, especially in business.

6. You will be able to transmutate your mental strength into physical defense. Can you imagine a weak man buying a gun to willingly face a group of home invaders? He would insist beforehand that "guns are dangerous" and hope the police will save him. Unless you develop courage, you won't be able to defend yourself in crucial moments.

If you're a man, becoming strong should be as natural of a drive for you as a wolf hunting deer. Unfortunately, propaganda from the media, government, and universities has shamed men out of pursuing this instinct while teaching women to be “strong” instead… strong consumers and strong complainers. The current order is unnatural, weak, and androgynous. Both men and women are suffering because of it.

The Critical Role Of Masculinity

Masculinity is the swimming pool that strong men train in. It’s a collective set of behaviors and beliefs that focus solely on increasing strength for men. If you’re strong, you’re most likely masculine, and if you’re masculine, you’re most likely strong, which is why masculinity is being criminalized by the Western establishment. Those with power fear strong, masculine men, because historically it was these men who challenged the rule of unjust governments and killed those who were corrupt and toxic to the nation.

In February 2016, I tried to organize meetups for masculine men around the world. You are probably already aware of the result: media in dozens of countries worked alongside politicians, local police, and hordes of disgusting feminists to get them shut down. Outnumbered, and with dystopian laws ready to lock us up for invented crimes, I had to cancel the meetups.

Many of us in the West live in an inverted society where strength is shamed and weakness is glorified, all for the purpose of ensuring that our globalist rulers never face a threat to their power. The establishment can stop our meetups, but they won’t stop our genetic desire for wanting to be strong men.

Conclusion

Neomasculinity is the ideological foundation for making men strong again. You don’t need to read dense texts or attend meetings in order to make that happen because the ability to be strong is already within you. All you need is the blessing that yes, being strong is in your nature, and yes, you are capable of succeeding even with the establishment trying to stop you.

I want you to do things because they are hard. I want you to stand up in the face of hardship and difficulty. I want you to fulfill what nature intended for you as a male of the human species. Our enemies will always try to weaken us and shame our efforts to becoming masculine, but I'm confident they'll fail. Let's make men strong again, and live our lives as righteously, naturally, and powerfully as we can.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: American Men Are Being Institutionally Oppressed

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Stage A Successful Coup

July 18, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The recent coup attempt several days ago in Turkey failed for several reasons. Chief among them were the inability of the coup plotters to secure the support of key military figures, as well as their failure to arrest the head of state himself.

But coups have succeeded in the Middle East many times before, and it may be useful for us, as students of history, to observe the differences between successful and unsuccessful coups. Almost exactly 58 years ago (July 14, 1958) the monarchy in Baghdad was overthrown in a coup that had significant repercussions for Iraq's future. Readers may not be familiar with the details, so we will review them here.

Iraq in 1958 was ruled nominally by a Hashemite monarchy. Its face to the world was Nuri Said, a British-backed politician who served eight terms as Prime Minister. As a practical matter, the country was a protectorate of Britain. But times were changing. Local nationalisms were beginning to assert themselves in the region and around the world. Former colonial dependencies were no longer content to move within the orbit of their patrons.

Abd al-Karim Qasim

In Egypt, the Arab nationalist Gamal abd al-Nasser was making waves and influencing the politics of all his neighbors. Both the United States and the Soviet Union vied with each other for influence in the region. In 1955 the US formed the “Baghdad Pact,” a loose coalition of anti-communist states along the Soviet Union’s Middle Eastern flank.

Among the people, the monarchy was widely seen as corrupt, ineffective, and as a foreign tool. A small group of military leaders calling themselves the “Free Officers” decided to remove the monarchy and establish a republic. Two men were significant: Abd al-Karim Qasim and Abd al-Salam Arif.

Planning for the coup began in earnest after the revolt in Lebanon against a pro-West regime there. The general plan was for Arif to move his Nineteenth Brigade into Baghdad and occupy key points in the city; Qasim was to hold back in reserve, in case reinforcements were needed. Early in the morning of July 14, 1958, Arif moved his tank units into the city and occupied the major government buildings. He also seized the radio station and all other communication centers to prevent the “wrong” stories from getting out.

Arif also personally broadcast a communique to the nation. The gist of his message was that there would be an end to imperialism and corruption, and that Iraq would move towards a more just society were everyone had more opportunity. He also promised that there would soon be elections for a new president.

Arif sent troops to the royal palace and to the residence of Nuri Said. It is not clear what his intentions were with regard to these people; he may have wished to exile them, as Nasser in Egypt did with King Farouk. The military guard units of the king and the crown prince did not resist. They had been told by the king to stand down; he lacked the will to fight for his throne, and likely expected to be treated with respect.

Abd al-Salam Arif

If so, he was mistaken. Arif's units dragged the royal family into the palace courtyard and shot them. Politics in Iraq have never been a gentleman's sport.

The plotters were less successful in capturing Nuri Said. He slipped away in the confusion, and was heading for the border. Disguised in woman's clothes, he made the mistake of stopping in a Baghdad marketplace before setting out on his journey. Someone recognized him on July 15, and he was shot; his body was quietly buried that night.

Qasim now (noon on July 14) began to move his own forces into Baghdad. At this point the plotters did not even have the support of most of the army. But their failure to rally to the side of the king meant that their passivity helped the plotters. Iraq's most influential neighbor, Jordan, also wavered, unsure of what to do. This paralysis of action by most of the army and by key foreign players worked to the Free Officers' advantage.

Things got uglier soon after. Arif began to encourage the public to hunt down spies and "traitors," and this was like pouring gasoline on an active fire. All sense of decency and restraint vanished as angry mobs sought out enemies real and imagined. Some ministers hiding out in the Baghdad Hotel were lynched by mobs; Nuri's body was dug up by zealots and mutilated, then dragged through the streets. A regent of the king, Abd al-Ilah, was murdered, dragged through the streets, and hung from a gate in the Ministry of Defense.

A curfew was soon imposed, but the damage to the new government's public image had been done. And violence usually begets more violence. Qasim became the new prime minister and withdrew Iraq from the Baghdad Pact.

Over time, divisions within the new government would become more pronounced. Ba'athists, Iraqi nationalists, and communist-leaning figures would compete with each other for influence. Qasim and Arif would eventually become rivals; in 1963 Qasim himself was overthrown and executed in a Ba'athist coup.

It seems clear that the 1963 coup was carried out with at least some help from the CIA. The coup plotters were conveniently provided with lists of communists and leftists, a fact that made their arrests and executions that much easier. In any case, Iraq's 1958 coup was the first in a series of coups that would not end until the advent of Saddam Hussein in 1968.

Read More: Sweden Showcases The War Of Two Nationalist Narratives

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Get Out Of Paying Student Loans

July 19, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Americans owe over $1 trillion in student loans, an average of $30,000 for every graduate. These loans, unlike any other form of debt, will not be dismissed—even in bankruptcy. Decades ago someone could work summers and put themselves through school. That's not feasible in modern times because the price of a higher education has risen 500% since 1985, as colleges have been turned into fiefdoms for avaricious administrators.

Ironically, an education system that used to be the gateway to the middle class looks outdated and like a ticket to bondage in the Information Age. It has been manipulated by bankers and politicians in such a way its now designed to turn young men and women into pliable debt slaves, selling them an education that is increasingly worthless as the market becomes saturated with rubber stamps from a magic piece of paper system. Popular media personality Mike Rowe has frequently discussed the insanity of such a system as he pushes the unpopular idea that maybe college education shouldn't be for everyone.

> If we are lending money that ostensibly we don't have to kids who have no hope of making it back in order to train them for jobs that clearly don't exist, I might suggest that we've gone around the bend a little bit.

Gone around the bend, we have. Nearly half of college graduates are underemployed. According to Rowe, there are 3.9 million blue collar jobs available right now that nobody wants. Jobs in transportation, commerce, and trades. Many of them pay well. The problem is, for generations students have been steered towards a one-size-fits-all idea of what a worthwhile career is while taking on enormous amounts of debt. The brainwashing about the miracles of a college education begins at age five and continues through elementary and high school, when adults pushing these fantasies on kids should know supply and demand economics well enough to figure out not everyone is going to end up with a great job—even if they follow the life plan being pushed on them.

The last couple of years in high school the big topic is college, college, college, pushed by amoral guidance counselors who tell students the only respectable way to make a living is to get a degree and then become a corporate drone for 40 to 50 years. Then, these former students turn 30 years old, deeply in debt and disillusioned before they realize they've been had by an education system that only is interested in its own self-aggrandizement.

When trades are looked down on in the education system, everybody wants a magic piece of paper

Market Watch laid out some interesting trends about today's education system fantasies. According to "journalists" the average college graduate makes about $78,000 a year. Pardon me while I clean up the tea I just spewed while laughing at that statistic….it goes without saying a LOT of students will never earn that much in today's decaying job market. Here are some numbers that reflect reality a little better:

- 19% of underemployed college graduates are making about $23,500 a year on average flinging coffee-themed milk shakes at Fivebucks, and in other low-skilled jobs like bartenders and cashiers
- 26% are making about $37,000 a year working in office and administrative positions, in other words, living life in Office Space hell

And, of course the numbers skew worse for younger college graduates, according to a report entitled Are College Graduates Finding Good Jobs?

> In all years, the underemployment rates is higher for recent college graduates than for college graduates as a whole, indicating that underemployment is consistently more widespread for this group.

So, what does the average man who drunk the "go to college" Kool-Aid do when he finds himself either underemployed or unemployed because the Evil White Male™ need not apply, or will be last in line for promotion? Or his company sold its soul at the altar of globalization? He fucks over and sells out a system that has repeatedly fucked him over and sold him out. In other words, he legally manipulates the circumstances to his advantage. He goes Galt. What does Going Galt mean? According to The Atlas Society:

- “Going Galt” means asking in the face of new taxes and government controls, “Why work at all?” “For whom am I working?” “Am I a slave?”
- “Going Galt” means recognizing that you’re being punished not for your vices but for your virtues.
- “Going Galt” means recognizing that you have a moral right to your own life, the pursuit of your own happiness, and thus to the rewards you’ve earned with your labor.
- “Going Galt” means recognizing that you deserve praise and honor for your achievements rather than damnation as “exploiters.”
- “Going Galt” means recognizing that you do not need to justify your life or wealth to your neighbors, “society,” or politicians, or bureaucrats. They’re yours, period!
- “Going Galt” means recognizing that the needs of others do not give them a claim to your time, effort, and achievements.
- “Going Galt” means shrugging off unearned guilt, refusing to support your own destroyers, refusing to give them what Ayn Rand termed “the sanction of the victim.” It means taking the moral high ground by explicitly rejecting as evil the premise of “self-sacrifice” that they sell to you as a virtue— in fact “self-sacrifice” is an invitation to suicide.

More than a great novel, Atlas Shrugged provides the blueprint for the Red Pill man to escape exploitation.

Action Plan

Didn’t get the memo? White males need not apply

For many of us, the reward promised to us since childhood for time served and good beta male behavior vanished as soon as we went to collect it. It wasn’t through accident that it vanished. The disappearance was by design of cultural Marxists and the corporate-government complex. A decent wife, white picket fence, decent work for decent pay, a new car every decade or so, and a few bucks in the bank for retirement has become a pipe dream as American workers are shamelessly sold out in the 21st century with everything from NAFTA and CAFTA to TPP to other “free trade” agreements, which are really precursors to global government. Not to mention feminism teaching women to hate men.

When “Neo” figuratively wakes up and realizes the reality of the incubator he’s been placed into, who can blame him for just wanting out of a system that sold him out and deceived him? Especially if he just wants his freedom back!

So, I came up with a plan. It’s not without sacrifice. Here are some pros and cons of the plan:

- Pro: Moves men to a life of minimalism instead of one of consumerism, after all it doesn’t take much for a man to live on.
- Pro: Stops men from turning themselves into meal tickets for women.
- Pro: Takes tax dollars and productivity out of a system that exploits and hates men.
- Pro: Punishes banksters and government officials who caused the price of education to soar beyond reach by inflating an education bubble with taxpayer money.
- Con: Some will be so enamored of the vision of a life of consumerism they will attack those who promote the plan. As Morpheus warns Neo: You have to understand. Most people are not ready to be unplugged. And many of them are so inured and so hopelessly dependent on the system that they will fight to protect it.
- Con: Forces serious lifestyle changes.
- Con: Cuts down on investment potential. (Can be mitigated through lower cost of living).

A little background on why I developed this plan: I made a solid effort to repay my student loans, making installments on a meager income for years only to see the balance really didn’t go down that much. I didn’t make much money, so even after college I was largely just paying interest on student loans for 10 years. Personally, in my chosen profession of television news I knew I wouldn’t be making much money the first 10 years, but I was assured that after a decade in the business I would have “paid my dues” and earn a decent salary.

But, there is no “paying of dues” anymore as media corporations have sold everyone out. Young, vacuous, just out of college girls now fill positions that required a minimum of 10 years of experience back in the day. HR harridans relentlessly punish disobedience to the female superiority agenda and heresy against Evil White Male™ doxy. TV news is a field has become miserable to work in, spouting Marxism (which I hate) 24/7, and is a revolving door with no sense of security and a higher than average suicide rate.

Suffice it to say I was on the chopping block because I was making “too much money” and they could get a just out of college girl for literally half price. Not to mention I had blonde hair, blue eyes, and a penis, the wrong traits to have in the 21st century. I refused to contribute anymore to broadcasts on which I was regularly being demonized as a white man. I was sold a false bill of goods without the possibility of a refund.

All the reasons I went to college in the first place rather than going straight into employment were stripped away—intentionally—by a collusion of corporate and government interests to sell out the American worker. I needed a way out. So, after paying off all my consumer debt and selling everything I owned, I devised this Going Galt plan to escape student loan debt—playing by the very rules the system made up.

- Step One: Quit your job and go for a lower paying job, preferably abroad where the cost of living is lower, the women aren't fatties, and there is still a modicum of freedom. Importantly, the total cost of living for a single man abroad is less than the average child support payment! Failing that, minimalism is an option if you want to stay stateside. As featured in numerous articles about minimalism on my blog, there are even tiny house living options for the fraction of the cost of a new house.
- Step Two: Call your loan servicer and get a temporary unemployment or economic hardship deferment. (Careful, only three years of these over the life of the loan are allowed.) Other alternatives include getting on a tiered repayment plan with lower payments until you complete a full year of a new, lower income lifestyle for your W-2 forms.
- Step Three: File taxes with your new, lower income the following year. For Federal student loans, you can earn 1.5x the poverty rate and not be forced to pay a dime—and without ruining your credit as long as you get on an income-based repayment. That's currently $17,820 annually or $1,485 monthly you can earn (on the books—heh) without paying a dime back. Submit income tax information to your loan servicer to be placed on an IBR. Re-certify your low income status each year.
- Step Four: If you wish to earn more than $17,820 your repayments will be capped at 10% to 15% of your income above that amount. The goal is to find the right balance between minimalism, investing, and finding a job you can live with.
- Step Five: For recent grads, the loans are forgiven in 20 years; for older grads they're forgiven in 25 years. Obama has capped the amount that can be forgiven at just over $59,000.

As alluded to earlier, it is recommended one pay off ALL consumer debt before attempting this plan. This will make the transition to a lower income, simpler life possible. The beauty of this plan is it doesn't take much for a man to live on once he's deprogrammed himself of the consumer fantasies put into his mind his entire life. Personally, if a government can't offer me anything but villainization for being a white man, a society can't offer a decent woman who is not a whore or a man-hating feminist, it breaks promises of gainful employment and job security through shoddy government and banking policies, it manipulates the supply of college degrees and cost of an education in a way that turns men into debt slaves, and further enslaves men with child support and alimony, why in the hell am I going to kill myself supporting that system?

Who is John Galt? Why, I'm John Galt

Inspiration to push back against exploitation of male labor and productivity, student loan ball and chains, misandry, discrimination against white men, and other assorted misadventures comes from the classic Ayn Rand novel. In Atlas Shrugged, Francisco d'Anconia, who blew up all the copper mines in the world, said this about John Galt:

> He had quit the Twentieth Century. He was living in a garret in a slum neighborhood. He stepped to the window and pointed at the skyscrapers of the city. He said that we had to extinguish the lights of the world, and when we would see the lights of New York go out, we would know that our job was done.

John Galt himself said it best:

> There is only one kind of men who have never been on strike in human history … the men who have carried the world on their shoulders, have kept it alive, have endured torture as sole payment … Well, their turn has come. Let the world discover who they are, what they do and what happens when they refuse to function. This is the strike of the men of the mind.

College graduates who get shafted as the system they invested their entire lives in changes the rules, these men of the mind, must stop supporting a system that sees them as nothing more than tax-paying pack mules for women and society. How do we do that? By going on strike and removing ourselves from a system that exploits us. Unless men take real world action, internet frustration is accomplishing nothing but hyperbole. If watching the world go by for over three decades has taught me anything, culminating in Hillary getting her charges dismissed, it's that rules and laws are for fucking losers. It's those who break the rules that win.

Or, in this case, those who manipulate a bureaucracy's own rules and regulations against it to escape a predatory education loan system and its debt slavery.

Read More: How To Know If You Should Take Out Student Loans

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Women Refuse To Protect Themselves From Sexual Assaults

July 19, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

As the saying goes, come to a man for a solution to a problem; sympathy is what your girlfriends are for. One of the predictable responses from the narrative, whenever a woman is a victim of a crime, is to treat her activities and behavior up to the moment of said crime as absolutely impeccable in order to magnify her victimhood and maintain the illusion of feminist power over all events, everywhere. Suggestions of taking responsibility for your own safety, on the other hand, cause the feminists to bring out the knives, and we're going to take a look at why that is.

Girls just "having fun"

The common story approved by the narrative is that one or two girls are either traveling abroad, or out partying, and they encounter a man, or men, who proceed to isolate them from their group, and take advantage of their inebriation, or at least their weaker physiques, have their way with them, and often kill them, sometimes even dismembering their bodies afterwards.

But she’s just having fun.

In the outpouring of grief from their friends and families that follows, any questioning of the details of what she or they were doing that led up to the tragedy is immediately condemned as “victim blaming,” as if there could only be one party at a time making bad decisions, and that abducting a girl from her bedroom in her parents’ house in Suburbia, USA and killing her is no more heinous than that same girl being snatched while she stumbled back to her resort after drinking in a not-so-safe part of Mexico and receiving the same.

Such is the psychology of the left. Instead of admitting that, perhaps, pretty women might want to take a little more care in the environs in which they associate, the victims are held up as yet another martyr to the feminist cause, and nothing is ever learned. Why?

A disclaimer

Before we get to why the above is what it is, I feel obligated to put a disclaimer in here. I don’t, nor do any of us at ROK, condone any sort of assault or rape, or any other violent crime on women, and certainly not murder, even if they made every possible bad decision they could possibly make before such a crime were to happen. If two college girls, on vacation in Mexico, were to decide, after a night of drinking, to streak naked through a neighboring slum controlled by a cartel at 3am, they would not deserve the bad end that would almost certainly befall them in any way. Poor judgment does not merit an execution or violent assault.

The real world

Men, and in particular the men involved in a real occupation where you do something to make the world go, know that no amount of wishing and engaging in mental navel-gazing will change anything in the real world. If a machine breaks at work, I cannot wish it back into operation, I have to go get a spare part, take the thing apart, and fix it before it will work again.

If you mountain-bike through a park that has angry grizzlies, no amount of panicking will stop one of them from eating you. If you are climbing a cliff, and you fall and your safeties do not work, no amount of wishing you can fly will make it happen. If you leave a bar with the wrong guy, and he takes you to his house where his roommate and he take turns on you, then kill you, no amount of screaming and writhing is going to stop a disparity of force. In all these situations, you're going to die.

Just like this guy, your time to make decisions and influence the outcome was before the attacker saw you.

People who take responsibility for themselves know that they do not control the actions of other people and things, and only can influence their own. I know, despite the fact that I am a big white guy in good health who usually travels around heavily armed and is cynical and suspicious to a fault, that there is a time and a place, and, for a lot of locations, that is not the time or the place for me to be there.

Simple things like, is this a bad area of town? Shouldn't I be home before midnight? Perhaps I should only have one or two drinks? Maybe I should make sure no one is following me. Is my gun loaded and ready to go?

Shattering of the illusion

The reason for the reflexive hatred of any woman taking responsibility for, well, anything really, but specifically for her safety is that it shatters her carefully constructed reality that she has built for herself over many years of painstaking social conditioning and artificial orders of society. Cognitive dissonance, the bane of all leftists, sets in as she realizes what she has been told, and what she tells others, is simply not so, and new, usually unpleasant, lessons are presented for her to learn.

The first lesson that a woman will learn upon threat or receipt of violence is that this world is not her world. She does not control it, and her wants and desires are really important only to her. An example would be a woman dressed to party, who, while walking to her destination, encounters a man intent on raping her. In her world, the man maintains his distance and does not encroach upon her personal space, let alone her body, and if he does look her way once too many times, she is confident the pepper spray she bought years ago, dusty and buried in the bottom of her purse, will be an effective deterrent.

This does not work.

In the rapist's world, he waits till she walks by, hits her in the head with a sap, and hauls her behind a convenient hedge.

Whose world is going to win out in this situation, do you think? Her worldview depends on the man in the situation respecting it, otherwise it is broken immediately. The rapist's worldview, on the other hand, only depended on her being attractive, female, and walking by; her respect for him is unnecessary and irrelevant. This brings us to the second lesson.

Not only is this world not hers, but she is not the baddest thing in this world, either. Woman are genetically smaller and less physically impressive in every category with the exception of longevity than men are. Although the modern woman has convinced herself that "she don't need no man," all women know that, in moments of violence, she either does indeed need a man, or she is going to lose.

While there are obvious exceptions like UFC fighters and mean redneck mountain girls, the average Western girl, with her sedentary lifestyle and diet-derived weak physique, will be no match for the majority of men out there, including the heinous ones bent on assault, violence, and murder.

No interest in stopping the violence

Aren't women opposed to rape? Don't they understand that, no matter how much they preach the Narrative, some men, especially those from cultures that mistreat women, are not going to care what they think and will rape when given the opportunity?

I don't think they do, but, more importantly, this is a culture war. I'm a realistic man, I accept that there are evil men in the world, and, while I try to help spread enlightenment, I also protect me and mine from the possibility of their visiting of violence upon me. The anti-rape movement does none of this, and I will show how that is by explaining what I do to protect myself from violence, and how it is the same they could espouse if they wanted to do so.

I carry a gun when I go places. I don't go places where I can't carry a gun. I practice with it regularly, and I know the laws of my area. Women can carry guns just as well as men can, but the idea of arming yourself is frequently not thought of until after a rape shatters their liberal illusions that pepper spray is good enough.

I don't go to bad areas, and I don't go much of anywhere at bad times. This works for women even better than it works for men. You should never go to unsafe areas, and you should not be anywhere other than where you're going to be for the night in the late evening, after midnight until about 4am. Oddly enough, it seems pretty safe after 4am, as the only people up are going to work or going hunting.

Lastly, I don't act the fool. Drinking is fine, but drinking to excess leaves you at a disadvantage. This, also, is better for women, as they tend to get drunk faster off the same amount of booze than men do.

Do you see anyone ever saying this to women? "Carry a gun, don't go to bad parts of town, go home early, and don't get hammered"?

Conclusion

I think women indeed want to stop rape crimes from occurring, but I think they want other people to change their ways and conform to an idealistic worldview, as opposed to taking sensible precautions and living in the real world. Any man here owes it to the women he cares about to make sure they are grounded in reality and take real precautions for their safety.

As for the rest of them, while they certainly didn't ask for it, they did nothing to prevent it, either.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Women Make False Rape Accusations

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

Limitless Brain: The Powerful Nootropic That Can Help You Become More Productive And Make More Money

July 19, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by SuperDrive Supplements

Many guys that read Return of Kings are no strangers to performance enhancement.

Whether it involves using compounds that help build muscle faster, improve sexual prowess, or decrease approach anxiety… most red pill men are comfortable 'cheating' and using whatever legal edge they can find to get the most out of life.

Let's face it- It's tough out there. If you want to kick ass and make bank in today's crazy world you need to set yourself apart by getting a huge amount of work done in the limited time you have.

For that exact reason, a class of supplements called nootropics have seen a huge surge in popularity over the past few years.

Young guys and older guys alike are using nootropics to maximize their productivity and get ahead in super-competitive industries and also build their own successful businesses.

Nootropics are the real deal and today we are going to tell you how they can help you make your biggest goals easier to achieve.

What Are Nootropics?

Nootropics are a type of supplement that work by enhancing the human brain. The name 'Nootropics' was coined in 1972 by Dr. Cornelius Girugea. He picked this name by combining two Latin words that essentially translate to 'change the mind's shape'.

Nootropics don't actually change the shape of any part of the brain, but they do have powerful effects on the key neurotransmitters and neurons that are responsible for our focus, energy levels, concentration, motivation, memory, learning ability, social skills, & much more.

Unlike prescription drugs, as we'll discuss later, nootropics are not addictive and are generally very safe and well tolerated.

What Are The Benefits Of Nootropics? Do They Actually Work?

With most supplements today, the actual noticeable effects are negligible. When was the last time you flexed in front of the mirror and said 'wow, all that glutamine turned me into a beast'?

The reality is that MOST supplements provide a very trivial benefit that you will realistically never notice.

Nootropics are in the small minority of supplements that are legit and can provide a very noticeable improvement in your mental performance.

For most users, the effects include a moderate to drastic increase in: focus, motivation, energy, alertness, concentration, mood, memory recall, and learning ability.

When using a high quality nootropic formula, the effects can be felt within 15 minutes and last for several hours. The most common benefits experienced are energy, focus, and motivation.

While nootropics are generally thought of as ‘smart drugs’, several users have also reported that they experience a significant boost in social confidence and mood when taking them. The science backs this up, since nootropics act upon the same neural networks that control these aspects of human behavior.

Who Uses Nootropics?

Nootropics are used by a fairly wide range of individuals. The most common are business owners, professionals, students, athletes, internet entrepreneurs, and professional gamers/gamblers.

Whatever your goals are, nootropics can likely help you. They’ve been well documented over the years to provide the benefits that are required to be successful in high pressure pursuits.

For the readers of ROK, using a high quality nootropic can help you build your own business and live life on your own terms. A lot of guys have also found them to be good for increasing energy and sociability, which makes it easier to go out and game hot girls.

Are Nootropics Safe? Is This Just Legal Adderall?

As nootropics are classified as dietary supplements, they’ve been the subject of years of rigorous studies and tests. Not only have they been found to be highly effective, but they’ve also been shown to be safe for human use.

A comparison is sometimes made between nootropics and prescription drugs like Adderall. Since high quality nootropics are powerful and actually work, we can understand why the two classes of compounds are often compared.

In reality, there are major differences between nootropics and prescription drugs. Adderall and similar compounds are much harsher on the body, tend to be highly addictive, and can have nasty side effects.

Nootropics are more relaxed and provide a consistent, highly effective stream of focus and energy. There is no crash, side effects, or feeling too wired up to get any work done.

How Do I Use Nootropics?

Nootropics can be straight forward to use or they can be a nightmare. Upon first discovering them, most users are overwhelmed by how many different types of nootropics ingredients exist out there. The reality is that some nootropic ingredients are excellent and others are just mediocre.

Making matters more complicated, there are many ‘synergies’ between various nootropics that only seasoned users know about. These advanced combinations, often known as formulas, are one of the biggest reasons why nootropics are the real deal.

Nootropics combine well together to create incredible cognitive benefits for the user, but the key is knowing which ingredients to combine.

You’re Probably Wondering: Should I Try Random Ingredients Or Buy A Formula?

This is a common newbie question and it leads to a common newbie mistake. A lot of newcomers to nootropics end up buying a ton of random nootropic powders and mixing and matching them. This often costs hundreds of dollars and can take weeks before a good combination is found. It is also super annoying to measure out tiny amounts of ingredients and keep track of what you’re taking.

A much smarter, faster, and more cost effective way to get the most out of nootropics is to buy a high quality premade formula.

You want to get a nootropic formula that contains the most effective ingredients that synergize well together.

You will save a ton of money and experience the best benefits of nootropics right away instead of multiple days/weeks/months down the road.

LIMITLESS BRAIN: Buy The Premium Nootropic Formula & Maximize Your Productivity

We’ve been using nootropics for a long time. Long enough to know what works, what doesn’t, and how to get the best bang for you buck with this incredible class of supplements.

We’ve spent a ton of money trying out different ingredients and combining them until we finally created our own custom formulation. We used it for a while and had a ton of success with it… and then we decided to make it available to the public.

It was a great decision, and we’re happy to tell you about it today.

Our premium formula is called LIMITLESS BRAIN, and it contains the 8 most powerful & synergized nootropic compounds.

It’s made in the United States, in an FDA registered fully compliant facility.

It’s safe, it’s cheaper than your daily coffee habit, and most importantly- It actually works.

If you're worried about being a 'cheater' – Who really cares. Give yourself an enormous advantage now with nootropics. The guys at the top already are.

Nootropics are the future of human performance enhancement, and LIMITLESS BRAIN is the gold standard.

Click here to learn more about LIMITLESS BRAIN and try it for yourself today

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

How To Create A Masculine Economy

July 20, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

I recently bought Roosh's new book, Free Speech Isn't Free, for a multitude of reasons.

First and foremost, I was very interested in learning exactly what happened to him in Canada. Like most of the ROK community, I've read various articles describing his experience, but there was no one, big compilation of all of the events; until this eBook.

The second reason, which I would like to be the main focus of this article, was that I wanted to support him. We are coming to a point in time where we have to start voting with our dollars. By buying Roosh's new book, I'm playing a small role in supporting him. A small, yet integral role, that will allow him to continue producing content, spreading neomasculine principles, and exposing the SJW's for what they are.

There are many ways that you can support the manosphere, but I'd like to elaborate a bit on why we need to support each other, first.

Why You Need to Support The Manosphere

I want to ask you a question, and hopefully it will send chills down your spine. If Roosh didn't make enough money to support himself from ROK, what would have happened when he tried to give those speeches?

Really think about this, for a second. What would've happened? He would've been fired from his job, the media would've absolutely ruined his reputation, and he would've LITERALLY ended up homeless on the streets where some SJW gang would probably beat him to death. This is not an exaggeration.

Women like this, most likely.

You men need to understand that we live in a time of unprecedented publicity. Any controversial idea or concept that you present can, and oftentimes will, be used against you. Roosh realized this harsh truth upon having the full force of the liberal, biased Canadian media come down on him.

This isn't just about Roosh, however—it's not even just about the bloggers and columnists here at ROK. It's about the man who gets fired from his job for tweeting jokes. It's about the man who gets sued for $18 million for flirting with a girl. It's about the man who gets falsely accused of rape and has his entire social circle isolate him.

In other words, we're all vulnerable. If you don't think you're vulnerable, ask yourself: if a feminist were to gain access to everything you've ever said or posted on social media, would you be fucked? Even if the answer is no, you're NOT safe from a false rape accusation, which I learned so very clearly during my first year at college.

If We Don't Help One Another, Nobody Will

I hope that I have made it abundantly clear that we are all at risk here. This isn't some isolated incident, this isn't just about the bloggers and columnists that encourage men to be masculine, this is about EVERYONE.

If the men of the manosphere don't start supporting one another, then who will? Nobody. And when the feminists come knocking on your door demanding that you compensate them for their "hurt feelings," what are you going to do? How will you pay for the lawsuits and irreparable social circle damage when you can't even find a job, because you have a false rape accusation on record?

As Roosh so eloquently put in this article, the first thing you should be doing is improving yourself. That's a no-brainer, and if you're not doing this you're fucking up big time. Work on your emotional health, learn game, work out, and study self-development.

The second thing you must do, however, is develop financial independence. And you cannot do this if the HR feminists at your job are crooning over your every movement, desperate to find some sort of "sexist" comment or action to attack. If your financial success depends on somebody else who isn't in the manosphere, you are not safe. Period.

Case in point: I was fired from my job about five months ago because I was too assertive. It isn't a coincidence that my workplace consisted of seven women and one other man (who was the boyfriend of the boss). Do you see the hypocrisy here?

How the fuck can a man get fired for being "too assertive"? And how can a woman hire seven women and only two men, but when a man hires three women and five men, he's subject to legal action.

It doesn't make sense, and that's the point—radical "revenge-on-daddy" feminists don't give a shit about the facts, they're just angry at men and want them to suffer. This is why you are not safe, no matter how safe you feel.

So What Do We Do?

First and foremost, you should be setting up passive income. I'll be writing more on my blog about this in the future, but I have several sources of passive revenue (including the stock market) that I'm working on, and when I was aggressively building them (back in February, before I began writing a lot of content for my blog), I was earning an average of $75 per day in passive income. You can do this too, if you put in the work.

But we need to go beyond just helping ourselves. How do we help one another, and speed up the process towards us developing financial independence? I propose that we create a "manosphere economy," of sorts. This will consist of us all supporting one another and our various financial endeavors to the point that we don't need to rely on feminists and over-sensitive HR departments for our jobs.

There's a few ways that we can all accomplish this goal. One of the most obvious ways is to start buying each others' e-books. You're going to buy books anyways, aren't you? So why not buy a book and support the manosphere at the same time?

This option is limited, however—it's only applicable to the bloggers in the manosphere. What can you do to help the every day man? How can you help yourself? How can you develop financial independence and support your brothers in arms in our quest for neomasculine virtues?

It's simple—if you have any sort of job that you require, have a member of the manosphere do it. That's it.

You need a plumber to come in and fix your sink? Check out your local plumber's offices and see which one is the least "SJW." Actually talk to the men and get to know them. Tell them that you want a "regular plumber," for any time something breaks down. Even if they don't actively read articles in the manosphere, it's better to support a hard-working, masculine man than some huge plumbing company with a giant HR department.

Who knows? He may be an avid ROK reader.

Not only will this give more money to men who actually deserve it and will use it responsibly (buying things of value, and not frivolous impulse buys like a lot of women partake in), but you'll also develop a business relationship with a hard-working, masculine man. I'm sure that he'd be willing to give you a discount if he's your regular guy, so you'll end up saving money, too.

Or maybe you need a graphic designer? Ask around on the manosphere and see if anyone does freelancing services like this. Whether it's for a logo for an e-book cover or for blog design, all of these services can be done remotely.

Even if you just want to buy food, don't buy it from Safeway, Giant, or some other huge "equal employer." Buy it from your local farmers' market, so that you can support the hard-working, masculine men of your community.

A Call To Action

I've had this idea for a while now, but I'm still working on integrating it. I want to start a networking forum for men of the manosphere to post jobs on and help each other out with various services.

You need a mechanic? Maybe there's one right down the street from you who reads ROK, but you don't even know it yet.

Or maybe you're a young buck looking for a job? Perhaps one of the more financially accomplished gentlemen of the ROK community owns a business in your area, and I'm sure he'd be willing to hire a young man who embodies the principles of neomasculinity.

Do you see the point here? If we can start networking as a community, just as the SJW's have been doing for the last several decades, we will become a powerful force to be reckoned with.

When men stand united, they become an indomitable force.

No longer will men have to worry about being in financial ruin over some stupid comment, or because you flirted with a girl and she got “uncomfortable.” Finally, men will be able to speak their minds and act as they want.

This will be the beginning of the end. Once men can start to reclaim financial independence and publicly speak their minds without fear of financial destruction, more and more men will come out of the woodwork, unafraid of also speaking their minds. We will set an example for all men to follow, and begin to bring back the masculine values that our nation so desperately needs.

We don’t just WANT this to happen. We NEED this to happen.

SJW’s Have Been Doing This For Decades

“Wait—you said that SJW’s have been doing this for the last several decades. What are you talking about?”

Yes, they have. And the fact that most men don’t even realize this goes to show you just how powerful their brainwashing tactics are. When a female boss only hires women, what do you think she’s doing? When a female boss only hires men who are effeminate and weak, what do you think she’s doing? When an SJW in the HR department screens every applicant for a hint of rationality, and fires them if they’re too logical, what do you think she’s doing?

She’s only hiring people who confirm to her political ideology. That’s what she’s doing.

“You’re a feminist activist, you say? YOU’RE HIRED!”

Men need to start doing the same. Once we start unifying, and helping other men with the same political ideologies as ourselves, we will be an incredibly powerful force to reckon with. In fact, I predict that once this happens (which it will, it’s just a matter of time), the feminist fortress that was previously impregnable will come crumbling down within a matter of two decades.

“But isn’t this illegal? Won’t I get sued?”

You may in fact get sued if you’re a major player in this game (as Roosh is), but anybody with a basic knowledge of the law can get around the majority of legal troubles that may arise from helping your fellow man.

You have a business, and want to hire young, masculine men to support the future patriarchs, but are worried about “equal employment” officers giving you shit?

Or maybe you want to only buy services from men who are members of the manosphere, but are worried about the ramifications?

Or maybe you even want to start an all male company, without an HR department (GASP).

All of these things can easily be done if you just understand one simple concept: independent contractor.

Companies have been using the “independent contractor” guise for decades now to get away with not paying their employees benefits, and a whole host of other things that are normally required by law.

In essence, being an independent contractor is when you aren’t technically “employed,” but you’re independently “hired” to perform a certain service. Even though there’s virtually no difference between these two concepts, if you file as an “independent contractor,” you can avoid 99% of legal troubles.

Why? Because independent contractors don’t fall under the equal employment laws.

“I’m an independent contractor!”

You own an all male company and some equal opportunity lawyer threatens to sue you? “Oh, sorry miss—these are all independent contractors. That means I’m not liable to enforce equal opportunity laws :)” “Haha, what? No, no, no – you don’t understand! They’re independent contractors!

Your business consist of only male clients? It doesn’t matter—you’re not required to perform services for people you don’t want to (yet). You only hire independently employed blue-collar men? Who cares? That’s not illegal. Once the manosphere starts to realize this simple legal loophole, we will accomplish amazing things.

Take Action!

Eventually, if we all start following the advice that I’ve outlined, the manosphere will become its own economic entity. Do you realize how powerful this is?

Now, all of a sudden, we’re impermeable—it doesn’t matter if we flirt with a girl and make her feel “uncomfortable,” (although obviously you should still try to learn game and not be creepy). It doesn’t matter if one of us posts a mean comment on twitter or even writes an entire article on hobbies that get you laid, because we’ll still be able to support ourselves.

Once this happens, it will be a beautiful thing. All of the men who were afraid of speaking out in their workplace, and who got fired for a co-worker who cried rape, will no longer have to suffer. We’ll be able to expose this hyper-liberal madness for what it is. This will be the beginning of the end of he cancer which has been slowly rotting our culture from the inside out.

When my blog gets big enough, I’m hoping to hire social media interns and affiliate program managers from the manosphere, so that I can not only employ like-minded men, but also teach them the lessons I’ve learned from my life. Roosh does the same—who do you think is the editor at ROK? Who do you think combs through the rough drafts that authors like I submit, and proof-reads them to ensure grammatical precision? Some feminazi bitch? No way. His name is Winston and he's a member of the manosphere just like me, and just like you.

I'm currently working on integrating a forum into my blog so that men of the manosphere can network more easily, but for now, consider posting jobs on the RooshV Lifestyle Forum or leaving a comment below. Every job that you give another man in the manosphere is a small, yet impactful step towards us having economic freedom and FINALLY conquering the scourge of third wave feminism.

I've done my part, now it's your turn.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 3 Steps to Prevent The Ignorant Masses From Voting

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

4 Reasons Why Black Lives Matter Protestors Are Domestic Terrorists

July 20, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Black Lives Matter needs to be listed as a domestic terrorist group that incites and perpetuates mass violence on the streets of America, not to mention condones the sky-high homicide rates inflicted upon black communities by other blacks. The following reasons explain both the danger of Black Lives Matter attention-seekers and why they are aptly described as domestic terrorists:

1. They throw their own kind under the bus

Much rarer white-on-black attacks are “racist,” but black-on-black crime is habitually tolerated and condoned by Black Lives Matter.

The overwhelming proportion of black victims of violence, those felled by other blacks, are pawns to be sacrificed by Black Lives Matter. Proper freedom fighters and justice campaigners fight for what is good and for the people they claim to represent. Yet Black Lives Matters operatives happily throw the vast majority of blacks killed by guns and knives under the proverbial bus.

90%+ percent of all black victims of homicide are killed by other blacks. Of the remaining black victims, only the smallest fraction are killed legally in self or community-defense by police, let alone killed illegally by white police. The propensity to murder blacks is squarely concentrated in black communities themselves, but Black Lives Matter refuses to stand up for the vast majority of all those violently killed and maimed within the African-American population.

And it gets worse. Breitbart poignantly pointed out that it would take 40 years for the number of blacks killed by police to match the number of blacks killed by other blacks in 2012. And police deaths represent an overall number that does not consider whether the use of lethal force was legitimate or illegitimate (it’s usually the former). Meanwhile, while they riot and abuse innocent people over the death of adult, mostly criminally-inclined men, Black Lives Matter terrorists forget the huge numbers of children murdered within black communities, notably in black-on-black violence hotspots like Chicago. Children like Tyshawn Lee:

Instead of going after people like Tyshawn's killer and the widespread mentality that motivated him (in this case, revenge on Tyshawn's father), Black Lives Matter thugs go after police, who almost always "kill" on justified grounds.

2. They ignore any and all facts and opt for a fantasyland of white "racism"

Just like the Islamist terrorists betting on 72 virgins in Paradise in return for blowing themselves up, Black Lives Matters activists come in with a preconceived idea that they refuse to reconsider in light of verifiable facts. Although we at Return Of Kings disagree with his other findings, the recent work of black Harvard economist Roland G. Fryer confirms that there is no bias against African-Americans when it comes to police shooting deaths. In fact, whites are more likely to be shot by police when they have not previously attacked police than blacks.

Even before Fryer's results were released, the facts and stories available could be deeply correlated with the notion that blacks are not fundamentally targeted in police shootings. Not that Black Lives Matters would give a damn about them. For a start, accounts of shooting deaths involving unarmed whites are routinely swept under the carpet.

Caucasian Dylan Noble, a 19-year-old, was gunned down by Fresno, California police before either Alton Sterling or Philando Castile were in Louisiana and Minnesota respectively. Yet full coverage of his death has largely been relegated to non-liberal internet publications perennially ignored by big corporate advertising dollars, such as Breitbart, or second-place metropolitan newspapers in the vein of The New York Post. CNN, The New York Times, Salon and other biased outlets are deliberately ignoring victims like Noble to maximize the attention being thrown at gangbangers like Sterling and Castile.

The situation is even more damning for Black Lives Matter terrorists when actual statistics are used. Just as blacks in a nearly 30-year period committed over half of all homicides, being just 13% of the population, blacks have more negative interactions with the police. Disproportionate numbers of black police shootings, relative to the total African-American population, only occur because blacks are more likely to commit serious crimes and pose a threat to the community in the first place. The publicizing of fake or even genuine individual examples of police shooting unarmed blacks simply cannot account for the greater criminality evident in black communities, criminality requiring significant police intervention.

3. They idolize compulsively violent, criminal and sadistic "men"

Alton Sterling showing the stock standard “victim” of police “racism.” Note the lack of good parenting skills, non-criminal persona, and non-provocative behavior.

Fact: Michael Brown was a thug and had violently robbed a convenience store prior to his “murder.” Fact: Alton Sterling was a convicted sex offender. Fact: Philando Castile was a Crip gang member. Black lives matter to the point where Black Lives Matter can only usually bring up examples of black men with serious criminal inclinations and/or convictions to make their point. Why the paucity of law-abiding, self-respecting black men being gunned down by police?

The inability of BLM terrorists to conjure up credible poster boys to further their “police racism” agenda has been a constant feature of their crooked, terroristic campaign. It shows no sign of abating, either. Enabled by an obsequious media, these race hustlers have had to selectively present the images of departed saints like Brown, Sterling and Castile, only using the nicest, rather than representative, photographs and anecdotes of them to frame their stories.

4. They use violence and intimidation to achieve their aims

Peaceful, huh?

Part of the reason why BLM terrorists have largely moved on from Michael Brown and similar poster boys is because of the memory of the Ferguson, Missouri riots. Local black man dies after committing a robbery and no charges are laid? “Let’s riot!” Liberal mediums such as the BBC were unable to avoid covering what were violent, indefensible rampages. Thousands were exposed to risk of death or injury, or had their property or livelihoods stolen, just to satiate the atavistic, impulsive urges of Black Lives Matter supporters.

The violence did not stop, however, when the attention shifted from Ferguson. And, in the end, numerous other incidents have isolated and marginalized all views that oppose Black Lives Matter precepts. A plurality of 44% of people (probably a conservative figure) believe that African-Americans receive equal treatment under the law. Where are these people? Obviously most of them feel silenced by the pathological violence of BLM and its supporters. Violence like this in Baltimore:

Furthermore, Black Lives Matter apologists have not only called for the deaths of police in their marches, they have also done so repeatedly online, where these threats and intentions are most easily observed and documented by the public. One need not wonder much why officers were recently gunned down in Dallas in light given these kinds of deplorable BLM attitudes.

Act now to help remove the social leech of Black Lives Matter

It is time for everyone to do their bit and challenge the lies and calls to violence that are at the heart of the Black Lives Matter terrorist organization. The White House has declined to proscribe BLM as a terrorist entity, but as more people are exposed directly and indirectly to its deliberate destruction, the forces opposed to it will only grow.

Presently, the best way to counter the Black Lives Matter disease is to ensure that Donald Trump is elected the 45th President of the United States of America.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: If Black Lives Matter, Blacks Need To Stop Killing Each Other

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

SJWs Retreat After Hairy Lesbian Feminist In Cleveland Threatens To Punch Roosh In The Face

July 20, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As leftists in denial descended on Cleveland to protest Donald Trump's Presidential nomination, one group of rabid lesbian feminists and some obsequious, effeminate white knights tried to "confront" Roosh—with hilarious results. After racistly telling him to go back to the Middle East, one blonde lesbian SJW in particular took an extreme liking to the Return Of Kings proprietor. With evidently hardened nipples, she threatened to punch Roosh in the face, right in front of local police monitoring the neighbourhood around the Quicken Arena, site of the Republican National Convention.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3iD_1_U8ETk

In typical SJW fashion, though, the lesbian feminist refrained from carrying out her threat. And, hopefully because of the gravity of the event and the potential presence of more serious violence elsewhere, the police did not arrest her, as they almost certainly would have if a male of one political persuasion threatened to punch a female of another one. Along with her fellow lesbian misfits, the blonde lesbian SJW then proceeded to falsely call Roosh a "rapist," despite earlier refusing to give her name.

There is a probably a good reason why the girl did not identify herself. After all, she could very well be aware that female author S. Jane Gari ran into a lot of trouble this year for making a similar spurious allegation, where litigation is pending. Conveniently, for a group that falsely called Roosh a rapist, the blonde lesbian SJW and her friends did a great job of deliberately hanging around him. So much for trigger warnings and the need for personal safety from supposedly big, bad men.

Lesbian showing off her hairy armpits.

Tellingly, like a bunch of mollycoddled kindergarteners, their libelous song of “rapist” quickly fizzled when they did not get the reaction they desired. In a world where fake rape accusations usually make a man drag a pretend tail through his knees, Roosh presented an example that others can follow. He simply lapped up the attempted taunts of the lesbian SJWs and their feminized male companions. The SJWs were subsequently stunned and distraught at his indifference. Bear in mind, too, that Roosh is a man who has been literally hounded, slandered and/or hunted by mayors of major metropolises like Toronto and Montreal, weak-minded celebrities like Jemaine Clement, mobs of bar-goers, and hundreds of newspapers.

The power of mindset and recorded video trumps SJW lies

Face down the barrel once and you can do it again.

Already schooled after the libelous chants, the lesbian feminist SJWs turned to displaying their prodigious underarm hair for the camera. How exactly a group of people who claim to be concerned about rape are able to switch the subject to their lack of feminine hygiene beggars belief. Oh wait, it doesn't, as this previous video of the lesbian feminist SJWs demonstrates. Akin again to schoolchildren, they use the "power" of clapping, bad dancing, tone-deaf chanting ("Trump hates kittens!"), and swinging around in circles to apparently change the world. The conservative preacher they want to face down merely continues his street sermon.

In addition to Roosh's recording of the epic SJW backdown, Mike Cernovich also captured the lesbian feminists' later pathetic retreat on Periscope. As he filmed the vanquished leftist cowards, Cernovich made the astute point that when cameras roll, SJWs are not whole. They cannot in these situations later make their typical false allegations of assault or sexual assault. Rather, they are exposed for the zombie, cowardly sheep that they are.

Points Roosh made during the main Periscope video need to be discussed as well. Just as he predicted within earshot of them, the lesbian feminist SJWs soon ran out of energy, folded their arms, and turned their backs to form a safe space. The best they could muster after the ill-fated chanting against him was to tell him and his companion "to go kill yourselves." When that failed, they had nothing else in their arsenal or womanly toolkit to use.

Another insight is the average SJW's inherent insecurity. Having been told by their compatriots that they're beautiful, calling them ugly, as happened in the video, immediately torpedoes their air-filled self-esteem. So does calling their bluff, such as when Roosh dared the threatening blonde lesbian feminist to strike him as she had vowed to. The final humiliation, filming them on camera after their retreat, probably caught them at the exact same time that they half-realized the stupidity of letting themselves be filmed whilst acting so childishly and stupidly. Having been challenged, they sunk back into their proverbial chairs, never to be heard of again.

Onwards and upwards for Roosh and Return of Kings–and our readers

The smirk of a winner.

We should not be complacent, but the inability of SJWs to keep their fury going shows that we can weather storms and come out fine on the other end. And even when the fury is long-term, we can keep going. Roosh's efforts against the SJWs this week is a microcosm of that reality. Plus, outrage earlier in the year against our planned meet-ups, inasmuch as they involved serious threats of violence, did not ultimately derail us.

Win or lose in November, the rise of Donald Trump augurs well for Roosh and Return of Kings, too. So does the continued presence of viewpoints like ours through other outlets, whether at Breitbart or via Twitter-banned anti-political correctness crusaders like Chuck Johnson. So, right now, you as readers are surrounded by positive examples of how to face down SJWs who attack you for who you are and what you believe. Of course, be careful to not expose yourself too much, especially in the workplace, but you can soldier on when the critics come after you.

Meanwhile, spare a thought for the butthurt lesbian feminist SJWs consoling each other amongst their puddle of tears. Hopefully they've shaved their armpits by now.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Feminist Jessica Lelièvre Assaults Roosh V On Street And Brags About It On Social Media

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

14 Answers To Lifestyle And Health Questions

July 20, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Last week I asked for your questions and received over 300 of them. It made the most sense to group the questions by topic. Here is the first video on lifestyle and health:

Here's the index so you can jump around:

0:13
"Roosh, we often laugh at the antics of feminists and SJW's but the focused effort against you from the ROK meetups must have still been withering. What mindset principles and practices did you use to stay mentally strong during that fiasco?" (UNABASHED)

4:01
"With workplaces becoming increasingly hostile to men, with women acting as the gatekeepers to employment, affirmative action being commonplace, etc., do you have any actionable insights or tips for men to prevent, deal with, or get out of poverty in a declining society that routinely denies them opportunities?" (CONRAD STONEBANKS)

7:58
How important are partners in business, teamwork or life in general?" (DWRD CFLA)

12:22
"What stack of skills do you think 18-30 year olds should begin to hone to live the best life possible? Do they change past 30?" (LIBERTAS)

15:16
"How to be true to yourself while living in a Leftist-dominated society like Canada or Western Europe where,oftentimes, people like us have to lead double lives out of fear of reprisal?" (NEVSKY)

18:09

“Hi Roosh, just read your latest book Free speech isn’t free – loved it, then bought your whole collection of books. My question is – If you decide to start something new, how do you push away all thought such as these “You should be doing something else, this is a waste of time”?” (TIMMAH)

20:05
“How did you support yourself while writing your first ebook? I’m writing some fiction. It will be a 5-10 year project. I’m not expecting to make any money on the first book and I am working in property to support myself.” (TOM)

22:45
“Considering what you’ve seen and to my knowledge accepted through the work of Marcus Aurelius, does the time spent chasing women for hedonistic pleasure seem worthwhile to you now, or do you now think there may have been better things to spend your time doing?” (STILBON)

27:45
“If you was send back in time to when you were 25, what would you then do?” (SCANDINAVIAN JAKE)

29:32
“How can we escape the system?” (MR. LEON)

32:03
“What tips would you have for starting a politically incorrect blog like this one? Would it make sense to hide my identity?” (PYRO)

34:40
“The more people I know, and the older I get, the more misanthropic I become. Have you also become more misanthropic with age?” (RK ROMA)

37:55
“You said awhile ago that you don’t cocern yourself with happiness, you’re just a man who has had experiences. Could you expand on that, and potentially give some advice on how to be like that?” (OCON)

42:33
“I remember in one of your videos or live talks you said you ate very little to maintain the figure you have.. Am a few years older and always experimenting with various habits and rituals to keep the diet such that one stays trim and toned. Of course exercise and weights too.. Do you have any tips for a man in his thirties for how to stay in form?” (STADTAFFE)

More videos are on the way…

This announcement originally published on RooshV.com.

Previous Video: The Future Of The World

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

MEETUP: Free Speech Happy Hour In Cleveland On Thursday

July 21, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm happy to announce that I've teamed up with Mike Cernovich to co-host a happy hour in Cleveland during the Republican National Convention. This is the first public meetup I've been involved in since the aborted attempt in February because of worldwide outrage.

> Free Speech Happy Hour!
>
> Celebrating free speech.
>
> Special guest @rooshv, Charles Johnson, and more.#RNCinCLE pic.twitter.com/YdlowYqXER
>
> — Mike Cernovich (@Cernovich) July 21, 2016

If you would like to attend, show up at the initial meeting point between 6:00-6:15pm as detailed in the above graphic then use the password "pet shop" in a sentence to identify other attendees and get the final location details. If you have green hair or look like you have AIDS, you will not be given the location.

Meetup location is at the bus stop on Ontario St & Prospect Av

Special guest will be independent reporter Charles J. Johnson, who today was bruised by Michelle I-almost-fell-down Field's wealthy parachute fiance, Jamie Weinstein.

The public nature of the meetup means that protesters may show up at the meeting point. That's within their right, but their impotent attacks, as you saw happen on Tuesday, will not prevent us from exercising our free speech rights. Follow me on Twitter and on Periscope for updates throughout Thursday.

Don't Miss: SJWs Retreat After Hairy Lesbian Feminist In Cleveland Threatens To Punch Roosh In The Face

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Popular Music Turns Men Into Beta Males

July 21, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Popular music is crap. Most of the singers can't sing and the music is dull and formulaic. But the lyrics of the songs make popular music really toxic to impressionable boys and young men. It is one of the reasons that so many men enter adulthood as betas. Here are some of the pieces of terrible advice perpetuated by pop songs.

Putting women on a pedestal

A lot of pop music paints women as beautiful, magically perfect creatures who merit more praise than the divinity. Bruno Mars is especially guilty of this in his sugary song "Just the Way You Are":

> Oh her eyes, her eyes
> Make the stars look like they're not shining
> Her hair, her hair
> Falls perfectly without her trying > She's so beautiful
> And I tell her every day

If you adopt Bruno's approach, it will guarantee that you will be spend your entire life in the friendzone of one woman or another—if you are lucky. If you are unlucky, you will marry the woman and she will cheat on you. Women know they are unworthy of worship so when they run across a man who does, they will naturally despise him.

Fortunately, most men have enough common sense to avoid this error.

Being a doormat

Closely related to putting women on a pedestal is the idea that women must be loyal servants of these wonderful, mystical creatures who possess a vagina. Surprisingly, a lot of men get caught in this trap. My youngest brother spent a year of college catering to every whim of a cute blond. She gave him enough attention to keep him on a string so that he would provide chauffeur services.

There are many songs that perpetuate this idea but one of the most egregious examples is the Beatles "Any Time at All":

> Any time at all
>
> All you've gotta do is call and I'll be there.
>
> If you need somebody to love, just look into my eyes,
>
> I'll be there to make you feel right.
>
> If you're feeling sorry and sad, I'd really sympathize.
>
> Don't you be sad, just call me to tonight.

Most of the early Beatles songs adopt the beta stance. This is because John and Paul were both giant betas—or gammas. John was completely subservient to his wife Yoko. On one occasion he taped tampons all over his body and walked out in public to humiliate himself to show Yoko his love. Paul married a one legged woman of dubious character with NO PRENUP even though he was a billionaire at the time. It is a warning to all of us that even if we are wildly successful in other areas of our lives, we might be betas when it comes to relationships.

Trying to hold on to relationships when the girl has checked out

While worshiping a girl is not common, almost all of us, at some point, make the mistake of trying to continue to pursue a girl even after she has lost interest. In some rare circumstances it is possible get the girl back, but most of the time the best course of action is to move on. After all, that is what dating is about—you are testing each other out for compatibility.

While rekindling a lost spark is the exception in the real world, it is the norm in pop music. There are tons of songs that are anthems about a loser male trying to get back into a failing relationship.

The 1980s Phil Collins song "One More Night" is typical of these sappy ballads. The song is about a man who has been cast aside by a woman and who is pleading for a second chance. In one cringe worthy lyric, the indecisive beta male is so weak that he can't even muster the balls to call the girl:

> I've been sitting here so long, wasting time, just sitting at the phone.
>
> And I was wondering should I call you.
>
> Then I thought: maybe you're not alone.
>
> Please give me one more night. Give me just one more night.
>
> Oh, one more night, cuz I can't wait forever. Please give me one more night.
>
> Oh, just one more night.

The song even sounds painfully wimpy.

Songs about leftist social causes

One of the most effective aspects of pop music is in getting people to agree with a leftist social message. There are lots of men who are not fooled by the bad relationship advice of pop songs but who are suckered into adopting ideas that undermine the patriarchy and thereby weaken the whole foundation of society.

I put Macklemore's gay marriage song above, but I won't bother to quote it. You already know its message. Suffice to say, whenever popular music has a "social change" message, it is always in a liberal direction.

Songs about alphas

While the vast majority of popular music is aimed at turning you into a beta, there are some songs that are about alpha males. Not surprisingly, some of these songs are written by women who are just being honest about what they want.

One example is Taylor Swift's Wildest Dreams—–a song about a woman who is having an affair with a man whom she knows is not committed to her. Of course she wants a long term relationship, but she'll settle for a fling if the alpha promises to remember her.

> He said, "Let's get out of this town, drive out of the city away from the crowds."
>
> I thought heaven can't help me now, nothing lasts forever but this is going to take me down.
>
> He's so tall and handsome as hell. He's so bad but he does it so well.
>
> I can see the end as it begins. My one condition is:
>
> Say you'll remember me, standing in a white dress staring at the sunset babe,
>
> Red lips and rosy cheeks say you'll see me again
>
> Even if it is just in your wildest dreams.

This song is proof of the Chateau Heartiste maxim: "For most women, five minutes of alpha is worth five years of beta." Girls don't want betas who tell them how beautiful and perfect they are. Girls want men who are masculine. As an aside, the video for this song evokes a more elegant time—–it is beautiful.

There are some older songs that also exhibit steer clear of the weak, cloying attitude of beta boys when it comes to girls. Take Elvis' "A Little Less Conversation":

> A little less conversation, a little more action please.
> All this aggravation ain't satisfactioning me.
> A little more bite and a little less bark.
> A little less fight a little more spark.
> Close your mouth and open your heart
> And baby satisfy me.

I should mention that we shouldn't take the lyrics literally. These are not pick up lines. Rather, they represent an alpha attitude.

Conclusion

As we get older and learn more about the world through direct experience, the insipid messages of pop music begin to lose their power over us. Thus, we may come to the conclusion that these beta-making messages are not powerful. But keep in mind that they wield a strong influence on the minds of boys who are probably listening to this stuff from the time they are ten years old.

If these boys don't have a strong father or older brother to guide them, they will waste years learning things the hard way. And some of them may never find the red pill.

Read More: 5 Things Wrong With Modern Music

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

5 Reasons To Boycott Pokemon Go

July 21, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

You have probably noticed them by now. Adults dressed like children, eyes rivetted on their smartphones, pacing with awkward and nervous strides around your local roundabout. Here they come, the Pokemon masters!

Pokemon Go has been released for a bit more than a week now and is already the most downloaded application in the history of smartphones. An experience so immersive that it feels like real life, according to the players.

It sounded positive at first. Millions of people sharing the same passion, a game that accomplishes the feat of bringing under direct sunlight the likes of morbidly obese recluse David “Diabetes” Futrelle, loads of fresh air, and so on, but the dangers of the phenomenon start to surface. Some will think I am stating the obvious but we do not need more mindless entertainment. Pokemon GO is just another Trojan Horse and here is why.

1. Gotta watch ’em all!

Oh, if they say it then it must be true

> But duuude! This game does not share my info!

They track you. You thought they had enough with Facebook trading your data? Not quite.

The game needs 24/7 global position. To get connected, you need to have a Google account that allowed (or still allows) access to your personal details (name, emails, photos etc.). They know which trainers you hang out with and where. A Holy Grail for a Police State.

Behind that project, Niantic Labs and its CEO John Hanke (a Google "Let Me See Your House" Earth veteran), the Pokemon Company, Apple (Champion of SJWs and Latte Activists) and PC Behemoth Google.

The usual suspects behind this intrusive game

2. Gotta distract ’em all!

Pokemon or my unborn child? Decisions, decisions…

> But duuude! This game is played outside and makes me walk!

It is simple. This application sucks your time and your energy for something that does not exist. It is an endless reserve of unproductive entertainment, designed to lock you into a comfortable, mindless loop.

Some will say that I am a killjoy with no Pokefriends and should join the Saudi imams and their anti-Pokemon fatwa. That what is written in books or found in art is equally imaginary.

Books and art bring reflection and knowledge. That game brings nothing of value. As useless and life sucking as those mass player games that have people locked indoors weeks at a time.

Unless you wear a 50 lbs weighted vest, it’s not very effective

Another argument trumpeted by fans is that the game is a good source of exercise as it makes you walk. It does but in a vastly insufficient amounts, cut with many breaks.

How do you do, fellow kids?

3. Gotta attract ’em all!

> But duuude! This game is just aimed at being fun!

Your flag and your history do not matter, you are a Pokemon Master. And if you are not with us, you are against us. It would be so great if we could join our great community and unplug your mind from real world issues, imminent threats or budding race wars.

This game sounds like catnip for SJWs. It would allow them to unite all their fellow social rejects and gang up on those who do not agree with their views.

"It is the current year. Nationalism is the real enemy!" Rings a bell?

A product that reaches so many customers cannot exist without an agenda. Many celebrities have already endorsed and showed their enthusiasm for the game. You know that when something receives Hollywood's stamp of approval, something is wrong.

The shares of Nintendo et all almost doubled their value in a bit more than a week. Loads o' money, private companies that will soon be able to buy their own Pokestores to bring more ~~sheep~~ customers around, underlying narrative… Winning!

We at Mac Donald's understand that our trainers must be well fed

4. Gotta castrate ’em all!

> But duuude! This game will bring plenty of guys and girls together

Ladies, watch out

Let’s face it. What is more attractive for a woman than a Pokemon trainer squealing “Yay! I caught insert word salad Pokemon name!” in a high-pitched voice while high-fiving his spectacled sidekick.

Pokemon GO is an additional step taken by those in power to turn men with limited time on their hands into unfuckable, digitally-neutered zombie consumers.

“People will meet more and betas will breed.” Indeed, people with socially awkward behaviour will meet others and think that they are normal. They will interact to discuss about pixels and finger swipes. But do the male players think that interacting via this game will palliate the lack of basic flirting skills and magically turn them into womanizers?

They could meet 1000 more girls, it does not matter. Betas are already exposed to legions of girls and do nothing. A man could be in a football stadium full of girls, without minimum game, he will still fail.

Girls were already stuck to the screen of their smartphone. If cold approaches don't become soon illegal, we will face episodes of "Don't talk to me. I need to catch this virtual creature."

Adding more interactions will not replace romantic skills and sexual market knowledge. It is calculated. The final goal is population numbers and reproduction control. People that play are too busy to reproduce.

Pokemon Go has seen less porn and Tinder consumption. Good, but it also shows a decrease of interest for sex

In an accurate allegory, the power wants men to catch monsters instead of attractive girls.

5. Gotta harm ’em all!

The border is safe. Pvt. Matthews caught one during his watch

> But duuude, this game is inoffensive!

The game was released a week ago. So far:

- Users were robbed after being lured in dangerous neighbourhoods
- Players fell from cliffs
- Hackers stole a gold mine of personal data
- Children got shot for trespassing at night on private property
- Users crashed their car as they play while driving
- Young Bosnians wander around mine fields looking for the imaginary monsters
- People were arrested for trespassing on military bases
- Other avoidable deaths occurred

People not paying attention and dying are as old as the world. We need candidates for the Darwin Awards.

But girls and children walking alone at any hour of the night to hunt Pokemons and “explore the neighbourhood” is not smart. When will there be a PokeMeeting in The Calais Jungle at night after migrants set a Pokemon Lure there ?

A terrorist downloads the app. A rare pokemon alert pops up. It is broad daylight. 2000 nerds at the same spot, all with backpacks. Guess what?

Un mot pour conclure

This game is for children. A grown man does not play with a child's toy. It is a waste of time, productivity and human interactions. It is addictive, invasive and a waste of resources and money. It promotes childish behaviour as the norm.

Video says it all:

> 2.33 Sharp dressed man "All the plebs gather. They just loiter in circles while I make money and live a real life."
>
> 3.03 Low T beta "Been here 4 days. I eat from hot dog trucks. I did not shower."

My predictions: more Pokemon Go-related deaths and a terrorist attack. I sincerely hope to be wrong.

Read More: How Human Beings Will Choose To Enslave Themselves With Virtual Reality

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Fake It ‘Til You Make It… But You Still Have To Make It

July 21, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A concept that is incredibly popular in self-development is “fake it ’til you make it”—that is, to affect the external trappings of success until it becomes second nature and you generate actual success. But too many people do the first part and not the second. If you pretend to have “made it” while not actively working to improve your core strengths then your results will start to decline over time until they become suboptimal.

Fake It ‘Til You Make It

Rather like “Feel the Fear And Do It Anyway,” “Fake it ‘Til You Make It” is one of those aphorisms that really requires little explanation. As soon as you’ve grasped the basic concept, it can feel incredibly liberating. In the field of seduction, for example, you might start to act as though you are a man with multiple girls, even when you’re just starting out and are chode-y as hell. Doing so not only works—if you give the impression you are a man in demand then women will believe it and will be drawn to you —but it also feels great. In affecting success or abundance in an area where you seek to excel you will start to get positive feedback from people that will bolster your confidence and reinforce your self-esteem.

Faking it ’til you make it has perhaps been one of the most important tools that I have utilized both in improving my skills with women, as well as in business and socially. When it became obvious to me that the easiest way to feel confident in a situation that might previously have made me feel uncomfortable—say, for example, entering a party and going around talking to large groups of people—simply pretending that I was already a confident guy made a world of difference.

In acting as if, I found that I quickly acquired the mannerisms and skills of the man i wanted to become. In doing so, as I received positive feedback from those I interacted with, so I felt corresponding spikes in my actual confidence. It was a virtuous cycle, until I no longer needed to pretend as I genuinely possessed the confidence I craved.

But Also Work On Making It . . .

Faking it is all very well, but you must also be sure that you are also spending at least an equal amount of time, if not more, working on actually making it.

I once knew a guy, Mike, who spent a lot of time out on the club circuit in London trying to impress girls by telling them he was a successful entrepreneur with a thriving company (which was always his ambition). While this approach did indeed work on occasion, and he was able to attract beautiful girls who were impressed by his apparent enterprise and commitment, he could never fully escape the sense of emptiness this approach gave him.

In the end, after having spent the best part of two years conning people that he was a self-made man, Mike suddenly found things falling apart around him. His parents were unceasingly unwilling to bankroll his lifestyle, Money was running short and he found himself in a downward spiral of alcohol and drug use as he struggled to reconcile his fantasy life with his true existence. Finally, after a particularly vicious three-day bender, he hit rock bottom.

After seeking help with his addictions, and achieving equilibrium, he immediately set about writing an actual business plan for the start-up he hoped to create. Now, through hard work and over a year later, he has millions of dollars of funding confirmed. His venture is shaping up to be a success and he no longer has to pretend. Tellingly, he has also stopped trying to impress girls and has been single for a long time.

Now that he has generated a modicum of genuine, authentic success, and is a man on his own mission, he has felt less need for external validation from girls. His project, and a sense of movement towards his higher goals, has been enough for him.

How To “Make It”

Of course, there have been countless books and articles written by self-help gurus and experts, as well as YouTube videos and TED talks and like, on the subject of making it. If you are interested getting a better understanding of the mechanics of success then I would recommend that you check some of these out. Some resources are better than others of course, but search and you are sure to find something that resonates with you.

As there are so many different ideas about how best to achieve success (in any given field) I really don’t have space to discuss them all here. There are, however, three fundamental principles which, if applied, are sure to set you on the right path. These are:

1. Decide what you truly want
2. Set goals to get there
3. Persist with massive action to achieve them

It makes sense that you should start by determining precisely what it is you want to achieve. Many men aspire to money, but some would prefer artistic success, or some other form of mastery. Decide what’s important to you, rather than what you think should be important.

You should then map out the precise stages that you need to go through to get there, and then attack these with persistence and massive effort until they are achieved. Sounds simple? It is—but executing is a whole lot more challenging.

As you work on “making it” in the background, you should by all means “fake it” on the surface. But just remember that is in only by doing both simultaneously that you will truly achieve success, fulfillment and happiness.

*To find out how to become successful meeting and attracting beautiful women read Troy’s bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. To learn more click here.

Read More: How to Get Laid in Ibiza

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How The Cultural Marxists Of The Frankfurt School Subverted American Education

July 22, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Perhaps you've wondered why so many college professors are so left-wing. In your freshman year, you might have noted with dread—as I did—some of your fellow students "going with the flow" and molding their beliefs to fit in. Perhaps one of them was you, before you grew up and snapped out of it! The Frankfurt School is the answer to why so many universities are Social Justice Warrior factories.

The origins of the Frankfurt School

The Institute for Social Research, associated with the Frankfurt School

They began as a Communist think tank at the Goethe University Frankfurt. They noted that the masses didn't rise up during the First World War to overthrow capitalism; instead, the citizens fought for their countries. Only Russia became Communist, a place they didn't expect Communism to take hold. Since they took the writings of Marx as gospel, all this was quite shocking. They decided they needed to prepare the way by breaking down traditional social ties—country, family, and religion—and afterwards the masses would embrace rule by a global Communist state. That's not working out too well lately, but all that's another story.

They found themselves unwelcome in Germany during the 1930s, and one of the two reasons was that all of them were Communists. They moved to the USA, settling down in Columbia University. How did they repay the country that gave them refuge? By subverting it, of course. If all this sounds like McCarthyist alarmism, note that the Communists themselves claim them.

Because the proletariat just wasn't interested in revolution, they rebranded Communism, taking out the elements of class struggle, and adding contributions from Freudian theory. This was a mistake; Communism emphasized hard work and heroism; that much is respectable even if the rest of the ideology is badly flawed. If you compare the Motherland Calls statue to Trigglypuff, you'll understand.

How cultural Marxism took root

"You see, what Antonio Gramsci called 'hegemony' is, like, the value system of the Establishment, man! So don't trust anyone over thirty, dig?"

They had two strategies: ensconcing themselves into academia, and the criticism of society (hence "critical theory"). Ultimately, this meant ideological subversion and basically badgering society to death. (It seems incredible that they did so much without picking up a single rifle.) They stressed moral relativism and the "question everything" atmosphere that became the 1960s counterculture zeitgeist. A few of their books, such as Eros and Civilization by Herbert Marcuse and The Authoritarian Personality by Theodor Adorno, have become classics in academia.

Many of their students graduated and became professors elsewhere, just in time for the 1960s. Young people are at the most impressionable time of their lives, so indoctrinating college students was a very effective strategy. It's little wonder that campuses became hotbeds of student activism! College draft deferments surely helped them reach more students sympathetic to their message.

Further, the ideological seeds of the Frankfurt School—along with the Communist Party USA—fell onto fertile ground. There were several groups that they—cultural Marxists and garden variety Communists—infiltrated and subverted, for instance:

- There was already a feminist movement, mostly moderate and mostly simply about equal rights (a goal which was nearly complete by then). Under leftist influence, second wave feminism began, which was anything but moderate and effectively about deconstructing society.
- There was already a beatnik counterculture. With a little encouragement, this became a much larger youth counterculture, the hippies. Having a significant toehold in academia put the Critical Theory folks in a very good position to influence the young Baby Boomers.
- There was already a civil rights movement, which the Communists had put a lot of effort into influencing. This included figures such as W.E.B. DuBois, Paul Robeson, Stanley Levison (MLK's top advisor), and Frank Marshall Davis (called "Pops" in Obama's autobiography).
- The gay movement was heavily influenced in the beginning by the Mattachine Society, founded by Harry Hay, of which most members were Communists.

Connecting the dots

KGB: the Committee for State Security

Earlier I had assumed that the Frankfurt School was an independent movement, with no particular encouragement or guidance from the USSR. Actually, it's a little more complicated than that. Franz Leopold Neumann, identified by the Venona decrypts as a Soviet spy, was in contact with leading figures Max Horkheimer, Theodor Adorno, and also the spy Hede Massing, the wife of Paul Massing (another Frankfurt school figure). Later, he became a professor at Columbia University, where all his buddies were. Does the picture look a little clearer now?

Here's another gem I found. KGB defector Yuri Bezmenov noted that only 15% of the KGB's efforts were spying; the other 85% went into ideological subversion; this is what he was assigned to do in India, until he got disgusted with it and escaped. He explained,

> It's a great brainwashing process, which goes very slow[ly] and is divided [into] four basic stages. The first one [is] demoralization; it takes from 15-20 years to demoralize a nation. Why that many years? Because this is the minimum number of years which [is required] to educate one generation of students in the country of your enemy, exposed to the ideology of the enemy. In other words, Marxist-Leninist ideology is being pumped into the soft heads of at least three generations of American students, without being challenged, or counter-balanced by the basic values of Americanism (American patriotism).
>
> The result? The result you can see. Most of the people who graduated in the sixties (drop-outs or half-baked intellectuals) are now occupying the positions of power in the government, civil service, business, mass media, [and the] educational system. You are stuck with them. You cannot get rid of them. They are contaminated; they are programmed to think and react to certain stimuli in a certain pattern. You cannot change their mind[s], even if you expose them to authentic information, even if you prove that white is white and black is black, you still cannot change the basic perception and the logic of behavior. In other > words, these people… the process of demoralization is complete and irreversible. To [rid] society of these people, you need another twenty or fifteen years to educate a new generation of patriotically-minded and common sense people, who would be acting in favor and in the interests of United States society.

Memetic warfare

Yersinia Pestis multiplying

Even though the Soviet Union fell apart twenty five years ago, the memes they launched are still out there. Many of the students the Frankfurt School taught became teachers and professors, who taught another batch of teachers and professors, and they're now indoctrinating our youth. Some others became ensconced in the media or in government positions. This is what Italian Communist theoretician Antonio Gramsci called "the long march through the institutions." Only a fraction identifies with Communism, but they still practice the party line even if few are aware of where their views originated.

If you've ever wondered where all of today's Social Justice Warriors came from, now you know the story.

Read More: How Cultural Marxists Distort Language To Achieve Their Goals

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

6 Behaviors That Are Making Men Unemployable

July 22, 2016 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

Social Justice used to only have an influence on the internet, where the weird kids who never had a voice could share their ridiculous opinions. The bathroom wall has now moved to the web. From allowing a bearded man named Jennifer inside of a woman's bathroom, to blatantly throwing all science and logic away for feelings and safe zones, the web has become a festering nest of absurdity.

Who would have thought it would ever leave the wild west of the web and enter reality? Who would expect that politicians would begin to take the beliefs of the misfits in earnest?

I didn't. Nor did I foresee that this kind of child think would invade the workplace. Now that it has, if you're a man you'll likely be unemployable. If not now, certainly in the future if things continue the way they're heading. Below are six actions you'll be ousted from the PC workplace you live in. If you don't leave on your own accord, you'll be removed at a time most unexpected. Take these as warnings.

1. Having a non-mainstream opinion

Disagree that Caitlyn Jenner is a beautiful, strong woman? Better keep your mouth shut. Having different opinions results in conflict. Conflict, while promoting growth and innovation, is frowned upon in the workplace. Differences of opinions reminds people that they aren't in their safe zone, and that bothers them. They feel shame, and don't know how to use it. Shame is actually one of the most powerful emotions at your disposal, if you know how to use it correctly.

Social cohesion is required when menial tasks are needed to be accomplished. Such is 80% of most general office careers. Bothering a social justice warrior will result in doxxing, and those Facebook pictures from high school being brought directly to HR. A simple disagreement can trigger another to bring all of your past conversations to today's light. Keep your opinions to yourself. Focus on extracting as many assets as you can while preparing an escape plan. Freedom is the only safety.

2. Speaking your mind

Your friend at work is just that: a work friend. In a corporate setting everyone around you will do anything to cut their way to the top. Telling Mike and the cool girl "Jenny" about your one night stand this weekend will eventually reach every other person in the office like a viral infection. Anything you say, can and will be used against you.

People need to feel important. Outrage culture has taught us that you don't have to be remarkable anymore to be special. Whining and complaining will create the same affect. Keep your head down, smile, nod "my weekend was nice thanks." Anything more, you'll risk losing your job.

3. Expressing masculinity

Doing almost anything masculine is a guaranteed way to make someone in the office feel uncomfortable. Think a few decades back—men would wear tailored suits, drink hard liquor, and work was done. There weren't emotions in the boardroom, there was action.

Now, everyone's feelings and thoughts needs to be accounted for. If anyone feels left out, or dominated, complaints will rise. The workplace isn't about getting things done. it's about casually moving towards a direction while carrying the slack and baggage of those below you. Now speaking of this would offend someone. Even if you think you're being safe, you still need to turn it down. Just existing can offend and trigger. If someone has a terrible idea, you can no longer say as such. Feelings must be accounted for.

4. A want to become wealthy

Have dreams of becoming an entrepreneur by creating a startup or app that becomes groundbreaking? Dreams don't belong in the workplace, compliance does. Having dreams in the workplace is like dousing a forest in kerosene. While nothing will inherently burn up, with one spark everyone catches on fire. Your employer does not care about your dreams. They care about your compliance with their own dreams. Having a job will not guarantee any of your dreams to come true. Large corporations do not want outside ambitious individuals; they want inside ambition.

What does that mean?

They want you to work for them, and achieve all of your goals within their ecosystem. Not yours. They want you to believe that the peak of your greatness is 70k a year when you know it's millions a month. The worst thing that can happen in a workplace is for employees to realize there is life outside of their cubicle. That their control can go beyond copiers and happy hours. Your goal, according to your employer, needs to be promotion. A dream of becoming self-employed is the owner's nightmare.

Why?

It may motivate others to achieve their dreams, instead of their bosses. Having a purpose is a threat.

5. Being Conservative.

PC culture is here, regardless of whether you want it or not. Don't agree with gay marriage or the Quran? Say a word of it, you'll be fired faster than you can say "but I respect your views too." Social media allows everyone to have a voice, even those that really shouldn't be speaking that often. Having conservative views has now become a liability in the workplace. Companies now fear a triggering. They fear a blue haired vapor gender becoming offended, then crawling to the Tumblr boards to flame.

Any conservative views you have can and will be used against you. Hilary used to oppose gay marriage. We can see fatal beginnings of PC culture here. If she muttered "no" in today's regime, she'd be falling from the polls like a comet hell bent on restarting the earth.

6. Having higher standards

Co-workers don't want to hear how you spent your Friday night working on a project, reading philosophy or learning how to woodwork. They want to hear how you went to some dive bar, got way too drunk and slept in too late. People who you work with do not want you to accomplish your goals. They want you to stay the same. They want to keep you in the exact position they are. A vicious cycle.

Why would someone do this?

Fear of being left out

Fear of being left out comes from tribal thought and primitive grouping. Since being seen as weaker than the rest of the tribe often ended with being excommunicated from the group. This would result in a loss of assets. Food, water, shelter, safety in numbers. It reminds those who want to pull you down that they have failed or, are in the process of failing their purpose.

The only way to be safe if you are in a hostile environment such as this is to shut your mouth. Remember this adage: "loose lips, sink ships." If you're working for another as your primary source of income, you do not want to sink your ship, regardless of how hostile it becomes. That is, until you find a new vessel that's more suitable for your tastes.

Stay vague. Kill your ego and don't bring it into an environment as destructive as this. When you're ready to jump, stay even more shrouded. No one leaves for something worse, and that target on your back will grow larger.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Privacy Is Completely Gone

John Doe
John Doe is the creator of Andreia Thoughts: Self Development through total discipline. He is a cult leader, artist, writer, and inventor. His work can be found at Andreia Thoughts. Connect with him on Twitter, and Instagram for more insight into greatness.

Who Are The Knights Templars & Freemasons?

July 23, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The first book I read after the meetup outrage in February 2016 was Sworn In Secret, which detailed how the Knights Templar and Freemasons operated through secret societies. Since the ideas that we hold are too dangerous to the ruling establishment, I wanted to see if it would make sense for us to go underground as well.

The book begins with the story of the Knights Templar. They were a secret group of militant monks who swore an oath to provide safe passage to Christians on their pilgrimages to the Holy Land after the first successful Crusade gave the Vatican control over Jerusalem. This group of men, often the second or third-born sons of noble families, grew to become a highly skilled army that only answered to the Pope. They quickly amassed incredible power throughout Europe as they implemented various banking and logistical innovations of the time.

> They swore to act in a more holy manner than many of their rough-hewn fellow Crusaders, and took vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.
>
> […]
>
> …instead of remaining isolated behind abbey walls their mission required them to be active in the world with sword in hand, fighting against any who attacked Christians in the Holy Land. This combination of religious peace and military > action was relatively new in the West, but not in the East. For many years Muslim warriors had already managed to combine devotions with annihilations to a significant degree.

In order to fund their operations, the group sought alms from the richest men of Europe in the name of defending Christianity. Kings, lords, and noblemen answered the call, giving the Knights Templar over 800 valuable estates that allowed them to raise significant amounts of money. It's in these estates, particularly in Jerusalem's Temple Mount, where it's claimed that the Knights Templar discovered numerous holy relics that gave them mystical powers. This further added to their aura of holiness and strength.

> Their vows did not allow them to enrich themselves personally. Nor could they establish a dynasty for their heirs, as others had done across the continent. These men used their formidable power only in the service of pilgrims and God. This endeared them to lords and commons alike.
>
> […]
>
> The Grand Master and brothers of the red cross showed on the battlefields of the Holy Land that they were prepared to fight to the last man and die in battle. It was the nature of their chosen path in life, and they accepted it. It permeated their entire brotherhood, even down to the person who only saddled the knight's horse. They seemed to feel they could do no less than their brothers who had already died keeping their vows. This was part of the Templar mystique that cast a spell on members of the public. There was the feeling that Templars were part of something worthy, something greater than themselves, and it was addictive.

They swore to defend each other in the face of danger in a "no man left behind" oath.

Many of their entire platoons were wiped out because they refused to leave a single Templar in harm's way.

> [Their] oaths were taken by all the brothers, from highest to lowest, creating the beginning of a bond between them. As the years passed and those vows were kept, even in life-and-death situations, trust would have deepened. By all accounts the Templars were notoriously firm about living up to their obligations. They did not leave a wounded brother upon the field, nor retreat while the battle was still being fought.
>
> […]
>
> If one knight's horse died in battle, and the man faced imminent death on foot with the enemy on every side, no other knight was allowed to leave the field of battle. The nearest knight was obliged by stubborn honor to fly to the aid of his brother, no matter the cost.

The Templars swore oaths of secrecy that kept their business practices and other plans completely concealed, not only from the public but even their own members. Unless you were high up in the organization, you only possessed a small picture of the group's activities.

> They believed that the lives of their brethren and the life of their Order hinged on keeping their secrets, even unto death. A leaked word about battle plans could kill a brother just as surely as leaving them alone on the battlefield.

The same institution that helped form the Knights Templar also lent a decisive hand in destroying them. The King of France, Philip IV, with support from the Vatican, launched a witch hunt against the Templars on a Friday the 13th using trumped-up charges (it is thought that Philip wanted to reduce their power and get out of debts owed to them). He captured and tortured 140 Templars in France. The Pope then rendered the group illegal, even though they were still beloved by the population. Members were forced to escape from lands controlled by the Pope or go underground.

> Given that there were approximately 4000 brothers in the Templar Order before the sudden arrests on the 13th of October— and only about 500 of those men appeared in the official records of arrests and trials in the East and West— what happened to the 3500 others?

The book then attempts to make the connection that the Knights Templar provided the seed for another secret society that still exists today, the Freemasons. While the Freemasons originally came out of the masonry builders lodges of England and Scotland, it is thought that they took inspiration, rituals, and relics from the Knights Templar.

The Freemasons would eventually come to wield massive power on their own, especially when you consider that the founding of the United States was guided by men who were Freemasons, such as Sam Adams, Paul Revere, John Hancock, Benjamin Franklin, and George Washington. This is why symbols of the United States government, like the dollar bill and the layout of Washington DC, feature Freemasonry patterns.

> During the course of the war, almost fifty percent of all the generals who served under Washington were Masons. That was an extraordinary number because the highest figure I have ever seen reported for Masons in the USA was about nine percent of the male population. In a similar manner, this society was well represented among the founding fathers of the United States. Thirty-three percent of the signers of the Constitution were Masons.

Over the years, Freemasons have developed a variety of rituals and beliefs that some may consider occult. Just like how the Knights Templar got their special “powers” from ancient relics, it’s thought that high-level Freemasons get theirs from praying to special deities.

Baphomet devil goat

Theories that they are a part of the “Illuminati” are common. The author of this book doesn’t dive into those accusations, probably because he’s a Freemason himself.

> Freemasonry had thrived for hundreds of years because it was based on bonds between men. Those bonds had enabled brothers to survive the many acts of excessive violence by leaders of nations and religions against them. This was the driving force that brought Freemasonry into existence, and caused it to grow stronger over the decades.
>
> […]
>
> …one of the hallmarks of Freemasonry was that its members joined together to protect themselves from the arbitrary acts of powerful men.

This book was an informative reminder that if you want to create a force multiplier among men who share the same beliefs, the best way to do it is organize and swear oaths of both secrecy and loyalty. If your beliefs go against those of the most elite members of your society, you may not have any other choice. I had to learn the hard way when I tried to organize rather innocent happy hours for me and my followers. Multiple institutions that back the ruling establishment made it clear that that wouldn’t be allowed. This book confirmed to me that operating in secret will be essential.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: "Sworn In Secret: Freemasonry And The Knights Templar" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

An Unsung Hero: The Legend Of Danny Roxo

July 23, 2016 | by Kiron Solari | Link | Original Link

People who distinguish themselves in battle are either hailed as heroes or reviled as murderers. Both kinds make frequent appearances on TV, either bedangled with medals or ruthlessly demonized. However, there also exist those who, while undoubtedly heroic, find themselves reduced to footnotes in history books and swept under the rug for a variety of reasons. Today I am going to introduce you to one of them.

The legend begins

Francisco Daniel Roxo was born in 1933 in Mogadouro, Portugal. An adventurous soul since early childhood, at the age of 18 he moved to Portuguese Africa and settled in Niassa province of what would much later become Mozambique. He started off as a railway administrator but got bored with the job very quickly, deciding instead to become a professional hunter.

Roxo took to the African bush like a duck to water. He quickly learned everything there was to know about this immense and untamed land, becoming a talented tracker. Such knowledge came at a cost, however: during one of his camps in the wilderness, he was attacked by a leopard. With both knife and gun out of his reach, he had no choice but to defend himself with bare hands. Despite suffering heavy wounds, he managed to strangle the beast, thus making the first entry in his list of legendary deeds.

Back then, being a professional hunter also involved protecting the land from poachers. Roxo handled the task with extreme prejudice – the only thing a poacher caught by him could expect was a bullet. At first he killed poachers regardless of the tribe or group they belonged to, but in the 1960s, guerrillas from “black nationalist” organizations started ending up on the business end of his rifle more and more often, making him an unwilling participant of the war that was slowly brewing in the region.

A bit of history

Map of Portuguese colonies in the 1960s, also showing two other important actors in the war.

In the aftermath of WWII, European empires started releasing overseas domains from their grasp. Rare exceptions notwithstanding, independence for an African colony meant an immediate and bloody struggle for power among its tribal chieftains and warlords, in which only the most ruthless survived. In a bid to secure a geopolitical foothold, USSR, China and Cuba actively added oil to the fire, supplying warring tribes with arms and military instructors in exchange for allegiance, while turning a blind eye to atrocities they committed. By the 1960s, the only major bastions of peace remaining on the continent were Rhodesia, South Africa and Portuguese colonies of Mozambique, Angola and Guinea.

Unlike most politicians, Roxo knew Africa and its people intimately, and could feel the fear gripping the local population from a mile away. Contrary to what modern historians would have you believe, most colonial natives wanted nothing to do with black “freedom fighters” who resorted to terror, abduction and mass murder at every opportunity in order to gain information and recruits. Roxo hated them all the more for what they were doing to his beloved bush – slaughtering a herd of elephants to “feed the revolution” was business as usual for the terrorists.

War officially came to Mozambique in 1964, and Roxo was among the first to volunteer in a fight against FRELIMO guerillas invading from Tanzania. He was initially tasked with gathering intelligence on their movements; for a man who knew almost everyone in local villages and could track like a bloodhound, this was child’s play. But Roxo’s scouting efforts proved futile – Portuguese command, fattened by years of peaceful life, was extremely slow to react to information he supplied, if it bothered to react at all. Reinforcements sent by Lisbon were worthless, so Roxo eventually lost his patience and applied to the command for a permit to create his own militia. Upon receiving it, he gathered under his leadership Niassa province's best hunters, most reckless hotshots and even terrorist turncoats – barely a hundred men in total. Thus, Coluna Infernal was born.

Hell unleashed

Danny Roxo mentoring his troops.

The training Roxo put his ragtag war-band through was utterly merciless. In order to teach them not to flinch at the sound of gunfire, he would unexpectedly shoot at the ground beneath their feet to build up tolerance. He forced them to jog, climb mountains and wade upstream through rivers for hours, all while wearing backpacks filled with heavy boulders. Accidentally making a noise during practice ambushes was punished by a vicious beatdown. As a result, Roxo's men could move in complete silence, cover huge distances at breakneck speed and still have enough energy to immediately attack the enemy upon arrival.

Roxo firmly believed in fighting fire with fire, and Portuguese generals were initially shocked by brutality of his tactics. However, their efficiency more than made up for it. Prisoners taken by Coluna Infernal only lasted as long as their interrogations, while militia members themselves laughed at the concept of surrender. "If you see anyone taking me prisoner, shoot me," Roxo would tell his troops.

When not conducting lightning-speed attacks on enemy encampments in the dead of night, members of Coluna Infernal would don rags and stealthily join the victims of FRELIMO mass abductions, only to later slaughter the unsuspecting terrorists in their own camps. Habitually wearing enemy uniforms and intercepting communications, Roxo's soldiers sowed chaos and confusion among the encroaching FRELIMO bands. The man himself did not miss a single chance to participate—for example, out of 36 enemies eliminated in one of the Infernal Column's attacks on terrorist camps, 15 were personally killed by Roxo. For his exploits, he was granted Cruz de Guerra, one of the highest Portuguese military awards—very ironic, considering that he was technically a civilian and his soldiers' kill-count exceeded that of all Portuguese regiments stationed in Mozambique.

The tide turns

By 1972, Danny Roxo had 10 years of fighting terrorists and rescuing hostages under his belt, along with the status of a living legend. FRELIMO commanders put a $100 000 bounty on his head—an astronomical amount of money by contemporary standards; however, nobody even dreamed of trying to collect it. The terrorists would rather be left naked in the bush among hyenas and lions than go after the White Devil of Mozambique, as people called him. Throughout its entire existence, Coluna Infernal sustained only three casualties; each was personally avenged by their leader. Unfortunately, the sheer number of enemy troops pouring into Portuguese Africa from neighboring countries was becoming too much even for Roxo and his daredevils to handle.

The breaking point came in April of 1974, when the Portuguese government was overthrown in a communist coup. The usurpers' plans involved a complete withdrawal from Africa and ceding power over the colonies to black "revolutionaries". Realizing that he would soon be under the thumb of the very people he fought against, Roxo took his men and left Mozambique for South Africa, where they volunteered to join the military. However, Roxo decided to punch even higher by applying for enrollment with the Recces—South African Special Forces. At the age of 41, Danny Roxo passed with flying colors the brutal entry trials that broke thousands of energetic 25-year olds, and got assigned to Bravo Group, which specialized in recon and sabotage. For a Portuguese speaker, this meant only one thing: missions in Mozambique and Angola.

By that time, both ex-colonies were on fire. Mozambique became a battlefield between a pro-colonial native resistance and FRELIMO goons who seized power there, while Angola was a massive free-for-all between three armed groups. One of them, named MPLA, was winning due to intense support from Moscow and Havana, which prompted South Africa to extend military assistance to two others in order to prevent the communists from seizing power in Angola as well. Codenamed Operation Savannah, it was to be the largest South African military campaign abroad, and Roxo had the honor of participating in what turned out to be its pivotal battle.

During the course of the operation, decisive advance of two South African battle groups became unexpectedly blocked by the overflowing Nhia River. The only way across was over a narrow bridge. Jan Breytenbach, Roxo's commander, ordered him to investigate it. Leaving most of his team behind to cover his back, Roxo went to the bridge alone, only to find it destroyed. Little did he know that on his way to the bridge he was spotted by an ambush of eleven. The guerillas expected the rest of the recon team to follow their leader into a kill-zone, but when they saw Roxo going back instead, they decided to capture him alive. This decision cost them dearly: Roxo almost immediately killed the Cuban sneaking up on him, with the ambushers opening fire upon hearing the gunshot. By the time Roxo's team arrived to the rescue, however, the remaining ten guerillas all lay dead by his hand.

The failed ambush was quickly followed by an enemy attack, during the entirety of which combat engineers worked on repairing the bridge. Eventually they succeeded, allowing the battle groups to advance. The skirmish left from 450 to 800 Cuban-Angolan soldiers and their commander dead, as opposed to only 4 South African casualties. News of a "mercenary butcher" who single-handedly killed eleven men spread among MPLA forces like wildfire, demoralizing them greatly. For his unflinching bravery in the face of danger, Danny Roxo became the first foreigner to be awarded Honoris Crux, the highest South African military award.

The sun sets

Upon returning from Angola, Jan Breytenbach convinced the South African high command to reorganize Bravo Group into a large counter-terrorist force, with Roxo in charge of its instruction and training. This is how 32 Battalion (aka Buffalo Battalion) came into existence, becoming the only Portuguese-speaking arm of the South African military, as well as the only one that admitted non-Whites. 80% black and 20% White. The battalion soon became a haven for all sorts of foreign volunteers, from Germans and Americans to Belgians and Rhodesians. Despite being rowdy and unruly by South African standards, the Buffaloes—utilizing modified Coluna Infernal tactics—proved extremely efficient, eliminating more enemies and sustaining less casualties than any other SADF unit until their disbandment in 1993.

Despite South Africa's official withdrawal from Angola, their sabotage groups remained behind to continue harassing MPLA. Roxo, of course, could not stay away from the action, personally leading a rescue mission there in August of 1976. Upon arrival, Roxo took sergeants Ribeiro and Sierra with him and separated from his team to blow up a bridge, their second objective. However, as they were nearing the objective, their open-topped truck triggered an anti-tank mine.

The blast was powerful enough to lift the truck off the ground and flip it, bringing it down on the ejected crew. Sierra suffered a grievous head wound, while Roxo got pinned beneath the fallen truck, his spine and legs crushed. The explosion destroyed the radio, so Ribeiro was forced to run to the rest of the team for help. However, the truck proved too heavy even for them to push off the trapped sergeant, while the pilot of a medivac helicopter they summoned refused to land close to the scene due to a Cuban plane patrolling the area.

By the time the medics arrived, Roxo no longer breathed. According to his comrades-in-arms, he did not utter a single word since getting pinned under the truck. Neither did he scream or groan, although the pain must have been unbearable. Eventually Roxo found enough strength to take out a cigarette and light it. Upon finishing it, he died.

Special thanks to Sergey "Tiomkin" Karamaev for providing data and historical context for this article.

Read More: General Robert E. Lee: American Hero Or Slavery Apologist?

Kiron Solari
Kiron is a somber European man who devotes most of his time to making money, reading, working out and plotting revenge against the people who turned the world upside down.

Why You Should Shave With A Single Blade And Brush

July 24, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

“Oh god, Larsen’s talking about fashion, this isn’t what I read his columns for!” is what I imagine you’re probably saying after reading that title. Before you go running off to WizardChan or Omega Virgin Revolt or some other website for sexless wonders, let me explain why I am deviating from my usual repertoire:

I am commissioned to write articles about fitness, health, and nutrition. In my not-so humble opinion, personal hygiene is encompassed within those topics-particularly “health”-and is thus worth investing time into. Or in layman’s terms, the biggest muscles and leanest proteins in the world won’t really avail you much in the sexual marketplace if you’re an unclean, foul-smelling troglodyte—and having a movement comprised of schlubby basement dwellers won’t help us create the change we want to see in society, either. We’re supposed to be returning kings, remember?

On a similar note to that last sentence, the name of my own website is “The Barbaric Gentleman,” and both of those nouns are operative terms. In addition to the controlled barbarism I advocate in writing about fitness, martial arts, and channeling your anger into the previous two things, I also advocate genteel skills and interests such as being well read. And now, this article marks the first of what will likely be several future articles on the subject of personal grooming and hygiene, and perhaps fashion as well.

And it is now I arrive at the point of this article: you are likely shaving with a disposable piece of plastic crap and some thin foam that comes out of a can and smells like medical supplies. You oughta to stop doing that, and instead properly treat your skin.

(In speaking of "properly treating your skin," and indeed in speaking about grooming and fashion as well, I am not saying you ought to be some perfumed ponce fussing over every enlarged pore and ingrown hair. I am speaking in terms of being in good health and not having skin that is dry, cracked, oily, or covered in acne—in short, a middle ground between being completely slovenly and being a dandy.)

The Tools

The first thing you'll need is a proper razor—I myself use a safety razor that was originally my grandfather's, but in the event you can't find an antique, these razor blades are still produced by companies such as Classic Shaving. Many of these companies also produce cutthroat straight razors. Both of these types of single-blade razors will produce a cut that is closer and cleaner than any of the disposable garbage men today typically use, but the one you choose to use will depend on how you weigh convenience versus financial and environmental impact: the safety razor is much easier to use (installing blade cartridges versus having to strop and sharpen the straight razor), but the straight razor produces no waste at all beyond the original packaging, as opposed to the cartridge boxes the safety razor uses-both, however, cost less than the typical razors.

If you do decide to buy the safety razor, I would recommend a brand a step above the pharmacy generics, such as the Wilkinson Swords, as I find that these are sharper and hold an edge longer.

Secondly, you will need a shaving brush-note that these brushes are constructed in a certain way, with a certain density and shape of bristles, so I would advise you to not use the paint brush you used to put a coat on your walls the other day

Shaving brushes are made with either boar or badger hair, in that order of increasing quality and expense. Naturally, I managed to obtain a badger hair brush some time ago, and you shouldn't have any problems obtaining one either—I purchased mine at a pharmacy, and if you can't find one there, try a company such as West Coast Shaving

Third, and perhaps most importantly, you will need shaving soap—NOT shaving cream in a can, but a cake or bar of designated shaving soap that is placed in a mug and used with the brush. You will likely not find this in your standard CVS or Walgreens—and frankly, I have had enough of fish-eyed liberal arts majors give me a dull "Huh?" when I ask for shaving soap.

Instead, this can be purchased online. These soaps are made with varying types of lipids and oils, typically vegetable fats (the one in the link, which is what I use, is based in cocoa butter, to cite one example). As a side note, raw hunks of suet or other condensed animal fats can be used as shaving soap if nothing else is available, as referenced in Henry Stanley's In Darkest Africa. No matter what you're using, the soap is placed inside a mug. Purists will insist that a specialized shaving mug be used, I don't think it's necessary. Just don't use a plastic cup.

The Technique

So, now that you have the tools for a proper shave, you have to learn how to use them. The first step is to moisten your face with hot water, and I don't think you need to be told how to do this. Then, soak your brush in the hot water, and fleck off excess moisture into the sink. Using the moistened brush, begin swirling it around on the cake of soap, developing a thick lather. Once the lather has been developed to the desired thickness, begin spreading it on your face in a similar swirling motion. This will cause the hair follicles to stand up straight, and also exfoliate and nourish the skin.

Once the lather has been properly applied, you can begin shaving-using what I can only describe as a feather touch, begin doing up and down strokes on the areas that have hair. The mechanics are not particularly difficult-stretch the skin if you need to, and do multiple passes over the area until it is sufficiently smooth. The reason this technique section is so short? It's simple—you likely won't need to do that many passes, and you are also likely to get close and smooth shave.

Finish it off with a rinse of water, and some aftershave (I recommend Pinaud's as an aftershave that both smells great and is dirt cheap). If you need more information on shaving, I recommend the 1905 book Shaving Made Easy which, much like the aforementioned In Darkest Africa, can be found for free by the good people at Gutenberg.

While the book is not really necessary, proper shaving absolutely is: for taking good care of your hygiene helps you make a better impression on people for all your daily doings. In addition, it instills discipline in you that can help you develop other skills and overcome problems in your life.

Read More:You Should Use Olive Oil To Shave Your Face

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

6 Reasons New Zealand Women Are The Worst In The Western World

July 24, 2016 | by Hamish Rangi | Link | Original Link

I summarized a lot of major problems in Australia in a previous article, and now some deep issues which are inherent to New Zealand need to be addressed.

As a native Kiwi (New Zealander), we tend to be inundated with a bit too much Joe Pesci syndrome (little guy who likes to beat up on the big guy) and always want to poke fun at Australia, our larger neighbor across the Tasman Sea. However, we need to look within to our own country's shortfalls as well. Because unfortunately we have a major one.

As an experienced traveler to all continents of the globe except for Antarctica, I can say beyond all reasonable doubt that our women are probably the least desirable among all Western countries. Explanations follow below.

1. They Are Painfully Average

Women in New Zealand are incredibly average looking overall. Ladies who would merely be rated a soft "7" have incredible power in the nation's sexual marketplace, while they wouldn't even bother getting a second look in countries such as Argentina, Ukraine, Russia, Colombia, Poland, the Netherlands, or Japan.

Hell, even women among fellow Anglosphere countries like Australia, Canada, and the United States are consistently better looking than Kiwi girls. The website World Tinder Women even commented about how sub-par the women were in Auckland, insinuating how often they needed a left-swipe before good enough talent was found.

Case in point, just take a look at some of the women on offer from the first season of “The Bachelor: New Zealand.” Producers of the show said that “the caliber is very high” and that “our first bachelor will be a very lucky man.” What kind of mind-warping drugs were they on? Datura?

Kiwi blokes gotta take what they can get…

2. They Are Sluts

New Zealand women are considered to be the most promiscuous in the entire world. A survey by the condom maker Durex has reported that Kiwi women had an average of 20.4 sexual partners in their lifetime. And remember, that’s just an average. It means that friggin’ Cruise liner loads full of New Zealand women are getting banged up a LOT more than that.

By comparison, the global average was 7.3 sexual partners per woman. Astoundingly, New Zealand was the only country in the survey where women had more sexual partners than their men, a reflection of the huge twentysomething backpacker culture this country has on top of their general sluttiness.

The long-term consequences of rampant female promiscuity can be serious, and any women who has a notch count higher than 10 is a major red flag, especially for men who wish to have a healthy long-term relationship or marriage.

The higher the notch count a woman has, the less likely they will be able to pair bond well with a single man, especially after they have been repeatedly plugged in every hole by dozens of obnoxious alpha male bad-boy cocks throughout their teens and twenties (or beyond).

This shows in the personalities and traits of a lot of New Zealand women, who simply lack warmth, outward compassion, and good old-fashioned tender loving care to a lot of their men. In short, New Zealand women make extremely poor marriage prospects. Don't say you weren't warned.

3. They Are Aggressive And Profane

Excessive and shameless use of profanity is what I would consider one of New Zealand's major social flaws. In fact, I would say it's a toss up squarely between the Kiwi's and Aussies who uses the word "cunt" per capita more than any other English-speaking country.

However, having traveled extensively in all of the six core nations which comprise the Anglosphere, I can say without doubt that New Zealand women have the worst language I have ever heard. Schoolyard insults like "fuck off ya dick" or "fuckwit" (a popular Kiwi insult) stay tried and true well into female adulthood, and it's amazing how often they use the C-word as well.

Profanity amongst women is one of the most unfeminine and ungraceful things they can do, and it has been mentioned before that profanity is quite frequently a precursor to physical violence, or at least threats of physical violence.

The following animated video captures the spirit of, unfortunately, far too many New Zealand women whose femininity hangs by an extremely thin thread. For some minor background info, a woman named Karen got the wrong number and left this message on a receptionist's phone who works for a large company, and the recording soon went viral in the country.

4. They Have Poor Style

New Zealand women, by and large, dress horribly. Teenage girls and even young adults often dress in ill-fitting attire, and many wear entirely unfeminine "wigger" style clothing such as hoodies and beanies for a greater part of the year.

Things don't improve significantly once women are past age 23, and women will rarely ever be seen out in high heels or attractive skirts outside of business hours. Quasi-fashionable slut attire is generally just reserved for Friday and Saturday night, when they are anxiously awaiting to add to their stratospheric notch count with another cock.

Lots of New Zealand girls are also wannabe hippie types as well. These chicks tend to be dressed pitifully and often have thick (and incredibly smelly) dreadlocks. With all the other options men have in the world, give em' a miss.

What happens when your country is the largest producer of Reggae music outside of Jamaica

5. They Are Too Masculine

What do you get when New Zealand women's poor fashion, sailor talk, aggressiveness, "meh" looks, and a little bit too much feminist indoctrination get all rolled into one? The absolutely horrifying sight to behold which is New Zealand Women's Rugby.

No other country on Earth pushes the most masculine of team sports, Rugby Union, onto it's female youth than in New Zealand. The results of this obnoxious feminist "we can be just like the boys!" experiment are truly hideous.

Who in the right mind would ever find short-haired and butch women who are blurting out the Maori Haka chant to be either feminine, graceful, or alluring? New Zealand would like to try and tell you so, but I'll see you on the next flight to Rio de Janeiro, Tokyo, or Miami. You know, places where women actually look and act like women.

Tēnei te tangata pūhuruhuru! Nāna ne I tiki mai whakawhiti te rā! (This is the hairy man, who caused the sun to shine again for me!)

6. They Are Feminists And SJWs

Finally, as the country who first (and therefore first in idiocy) gave women the right to vote in 1893, is it any surprise that New Zealand women have been force fed via butt-chugging so much feminist and "social justice" juice their whole lives?

Try bringing up the inherent lack of virtues of diversity, immigration, and multiculturalism with a New Zealand lady and see how much time passes before you are called the dreaded r-word, followed by a colourful Kiwi insult of choice.

Like many other Western countries, the cancer of anti-white and white-guilt rhetoric is also growing in New Zealand, and such sentiment was demonstrated in how the "Pakeha Party" Facebook Page creator, David Ruck, was lambasted in the media and even accosted in his personal life by a rambling and foul-mouthed female SJW.

(Note for Non-Kiwis: "Pakeha" is the Maori word for white people, and the Pakeha Party was founded as a counter-balance for far too many race-based parties in New Zealand who look out for their race only. But of course, only white people can be "racist".)

Conclusion

Women who come from literally anywhere else in the Western world are more attractive, more feminine, more graceful, more stylish, less profane, and less slutty than New Zealand. The only thing Kiwi women beat out on some of their contemporaries is on obesity rates, which is lower overall than in the United States. However, American women win out by being far more pleasant, feminine, and warm (can you believe it?). Especially the southern and mid-western girls.

It is truly eye opening for a lot of young New Zealand men to go abroad in their early 20s and find out that the overall quality of women is substantially higher than at home. This is quite sad, considering how New Zealand otherwise has astounding natural beauty and a quality of life which is squarely in the top 10% of the world.

In closing, for Kiwi men who believe in traditional masculinity and have more paleo-libertarian or conservative values, they are much better off finding a higher quality partner abroad. In fact, many men simply don't come back.

Read More: ROK Writer Threatened With Violence After Expressing His Opinion About New Zealand Women

Hamish Rangi
Hamish got sick of the overpriced feminazi cesspools of Australia and New Zealand and has been enjoying much greater personal freedom, respect for being a man, and the company of much more attractive, kind, and feminine women elsewhere.

13 Alternatives To Attending College Or University

July 25, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

So, you're about to finish high school and you're wondering what you should do next to start off your journey into adulthood. You look around at your peers and they're all preparing to head off to colleges and universities for higher education. Maybe you've already been prompted to apply for post-secondary education as it seems like the most logical next step towards securing your future.

But wait, unless you know what you're doing and making all the right decisions (highly unlikely considering you're still a teenager), you might be setting yourself up for a trap. What seemed like a good idea at the time can end up wasting your valuable years of youth and get you stuck in a pile of debt. Just look around you to see all the hapless young adults without proper jobs and still living with their parents after they've been handed their useless degrees. The student loan in the US alone is over $1.4 TRILLION. Do you want to be part of that number?

And let's not forget that college campuses today are hotbed of social justice degeneracy where you won't even be allowed to have your own opinion. These are institutions where you pay money to be indoctrinated with leftist thoughts, where you'll be on the hook with a false rape accusation if you're unlucky enough to cross paths with some mentally ill woman like it happened in UVA.

So, before you decide to take the plunge with the biggest money grubbing scam in history (really, it's criminal what these "schools" get away with), here are some alternatives to consider.

1. Take a year off

The number one regret. Note how number two is also directly related to number one.

If anything, take a year off after your graduation so that you have time to make the right choice. A single year is not going to set you behind too far in any meaningful way. It's far better than making an impulsive decision which you'll likely regret in the years to come. I've met far more people who either dropped out of school, switched majors, or ended up nowhere than anyone who actually gone through with their plans and made it to a career in the end.

With your free time, you can save money or try any of the below to see if further education is actually necessary or not.

2. Learn on your own

I've actually met people who said they were going to university not for future careers, but just for the experience of learning. When I heard that, I was completely dumbfounded and didn't know what to say.

If what you want is knowledge and wisdom, you can learn much more effectively at your own pace, and without all the indoctrination, through self-study. There is the public library, online courses, and so much more that you can use—and all for free or at a reasonable price than what you'll ever be expected to pay in institutions.

I could probably learn everything I remember from my five years in university within one year for free just by using the library and the internet.

3. Volunteer

Some of you may cringe by the idea of doing labor for free, but you can learn valuable skills and gain important experience that you'll never have by sitting through overpriced lectures—lectures starring professors who do it because they have to (I've had professors who were practically reading summaries of the textbook for two hours straight).

Just make sure you choose a volunteer work that will actually develop you and can later be translated into a job.

4. Go into trades

Everyone thinks they're too smart and precious to be working with their hands until they end up back with their parents or working in Starbucks. Do yourself a favor and get into trades.

5. Go into sales

Apparently there aren't enough people in sales because the youth today don't like to face rejections. Sales not only have high potential reward, but it will also teach you valuable interpersonal skills.

6. Join the army

I don't like the idea of risking my life for some globalist wars or be pawn to some feminist country like Canada, but I wish I had gone to join the military when I was younger just for the experience. It certainly would have been hell of a lot more rewarding than some soul-sucking school.

7. Start making money now

Why go through years of school only to get a minimum wage job? Just work now and save cash and think of ways to make money on your own. Go straight for success without taking a detour.

8. Explore the world

You already wasted years of your golden youth trapped inside classrooms. Get out and explore the world to gain a new perspective in life. Even if you insist on going for the higher education, it can definitely wait a year.

9. Teach English

Demand for English is growing around the world, especially in China where it is bound to become a huge market. You're practically traveling the world and making decent cash at the same time. Most of the time you won't even need a university degree to teach English, just a TEFL, TESL, TESOL, or CELTA. If you're lucky, you won't even need those either.

10. Go to the country

You obviously don't want to romanticize the country life too much, but I think living outside of city is something all men should experience at least once in their lifetime. And depending on where you are now, your countryside can be a wasteland or a vast stretch of corporate factory farms. But if you can find a place to live and work, it would be a nice welcome away from the urban insanity.

11. Join a monastery

Another option to escape from today's degeneracy is to join a monastery. You're not going to find austerity and spirituality in college campuses.

12. Stay home with your parents

Just make sure you're keeping yourself busy.

Screw it, it's not your fault that the economy is a mess. You don't have to prove anything by leaving home. Just stay and keep yourself busy by learning and figuring out ways to be financially independent. It's better than returning home in shame after you've graduated from college.

13. Try living without money

Mark Boyle, the moneyless man.

You'd be surprised by how many people are living (and traveling) entirely moneyless life. I obviously don't think it's something you should do permanently, but it's another idea if you're looking for something extreme. I know I'd rather live moneyless for a year than have more than $300,000 in student debt—and without a real job—like someone I know.

Bonus: Go to prison

Unlike college safe spaces, it's not going to turn you into a pussy. That's for sure.

I'm obviously half kidding here (maybe not), I know prison is a hell that no one wants to end up in—not to mention the criminal record you'll carry for life. But considering just how awful my five years in university was, I sometimes wonder if I would have ended up a better man had I spent my time in prison instead and gotten toughened up. Hypothetically speaking (and assuming I don't get raped or killed), had I spent five years in prison working out and reading books, I would have undoubtedly be in a better position than when I graduated from university as a weak and clueless man not knowing what to do in this world.

I did meet one man who was few years older than I who ran away from home and went to prison twice for selling drugs. After he got out, he went to get a job in sales. And by the time I met him, he reached a high position in the company making a six-figure income. Not bad for someone who never spent a day in higher education (not surprisingly, he was also the most red pill man I've met before I even knew what red pill was). In fact, he actually made fun of all the bumbling guys with university degrees who would line up at his door for an interview—they have a formal education and a paper to prove for it, but nothing else; no leadership skills, no people skills, and no confidence.

Conclusion

I’m not the one to dwell in regrets, but I know for a fact that my life would be much better now had I taken any of the above paths instead of pissing my life away in a horrible university. I’m just glad that I at least worked diligently and lived frugally to pay off all my student loan.

Now, I’m not saying you should completely reject formal education, but that there are other options out there that you may not have considered. You’re still young and we live in a volatile world, so be wary of your choices.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Women Refuse To Protect Themselves From Sexual Assaults

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

5 Things I Learned From My Brothers On How To Raise A Son

July 25, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As I get older, I've become more mindful about how to teach my brothers to grow up as strong men. I have been examining the environment they're in and trying to find ways to replace negative influences in their lives with positive ones. While I barely see them enough to have a huge influence, the time I have spent with them has given me a basic plan for how to raise my own son in the future. Here are five guidelines I will use:

1. Lead more by example than mandate

A lot of people think that having children is like possessing little slaves that do what you command them at all times, but humans by their nature have a resistance to being controlled and told what to do, especially children. Not only that, but when you force your son to do something he isn't sure is right, he starts building resentment against you. This resentment, if too high, will result in him becoming a rebellious teenager who goes completely against your wishes.

Instead of commanding your son on what to do, give him an opportunity to copy your behavior. Do you want your son to be athletic? Then be athletic with him. Do you want your son to read more? Then read with him. Do you want your son to study history? Then tell him interesting historical stories that capture his imagination. Monkey see, monkey do, with both negative behaviors and positive ones. Compare that to commanding your son to exercise while you watch TV, or telling him to read while you surf the internet. Why should he do it if dad doesn't?

Use the fact that children love copying their parents. If little Johnny sees his dad lift weights at home several times a week, it won't be surprising when he picks up a weight and mimics dad. By simply doing the activities you want your son to do, you may never have to command him to do anything. Be the role model that your son needs instead of a strict schoolmaster who just wants to dictate commands.

2. Instead of forbidding behaviors, create an environment where what is forbidden is not even desired

What are some things that you don't want your son to become? Fat, homosexual, lazy, or hedonistic. If you want your son to eat well, don't bring junk food in the house and don't get lazy—or enable a lazy wife—by taking him to McDonald's for a "quick" meal. If you don't want him to be homosexual, have an appreciation for feminine beauty, allow him to see the loving bond you have with your wife, and don't leave him alone with pedo-loving liberals. If you don't want him to be a bum, don't have television and video game systems in the house that enables his worst traits. If you don't want him to be hedonistic, show him the fruits of your hard work and how little rewards and pleasures in the right doses can lead to satisfaction instead of addiction.

While it's impossible to prevent your son from making mistakes later in life that hurt him, you can show him how his father was able to achieve a happy and stable life by leading a life of discipline and moderation. If you have vices or addiction problems, there's no way you can expect your son to abstain from them either. Your son will be a reflection of not just want he hears from you in terms of right and wrong, but what he sees as well, even when you think he's not looking.

3. Find what he likes doing, and then nurture it

You can’t make a boy practice a hobby or sport that he doesn’t like. If you do, he will resent you and soon come to hate whatever you forced upon him. Instead, expose your boy to a range of masculine activities and find what he insists on doing himself with hardly any encouragement. If your son, on his own time, is learning or practicing outside of the designated time, that means he has found a passion. As long as it’s not doll dress-up, you should encourage it and give him the space and resources to develop it.

My younger brother is in university. I’ve encouraged him to take on weightlifting and he has done it, but he’s reluctant to work out unless I’m on his ass about it or he has someone to work out with. I don’t blame him, because lifting weights is not as fun as playing video games.

My youngest brother is different. Once I taught him how to lift weights, he became addicted to it and worked out on his own, without anyone else’s insistence. For his young age, he’s becoming a monster, one of the strongest boys in his class, and even when he’s sick, he still wants to lift. Would it be smart to push the older brother into a new fitness hobby? Probably not, but my youngest brother would definitely respond to it.

Modern fathers want their sons to only do “useful” activities that could lead to a good corporate job. While that is understandable, it’s the wrong approach. Any passion that your son takes on will teach him the work ethic to apply to just about anything. Making money will be trivial to him after he’s spent his 5,000 hours on a hobby he loves and which he has taken to a high level.

When I was in university making basic web pages for fun, I couldn’t at all predict that that skill would develop into the web empire I have today, but it has and I’m thankful my parents didn’t forbid my hobbies as a “waste of time” when it allowed me to build the business I have now.

4. Don’t try to create a mini-me

While your son may be similar to you, he is not your little clone. Accept that he will be a unique person with different strengths and weaknesses than you instead of forcing him into a box of your choosing. Many fathers have been disappointed in their sons merely because they were not like them, but the fact that he has 50% different genetics than you and raised in a wholly different environment with different experiences suggest that you should be surprised if he is even a quarter the same.

A better method is to find who your son is by observing him in various situation and challenges. Maybe he's abnormally frightened of insects but doesn't get scared of heights. Maybe he's a sore loser in games but can deeply focus on difficult tasks. Maybe his general athleticism is weak but he has powerful strength.

Parenthood is less about shaping a mound of clay than identifying a person who already exists and who needs to find himself, his nature, and his place in the world. The answer may disappoint you, especially since not every man born will accomplish great things, but whatever his nature is, it's the father's responsibility to find it while blocking damaging influences that want to hurt him.

To understand your son means you already understand yourself. If you don't know who you are, and live life as a confused, conflicted man, chances are your son will be that way as well, and mentally suffer as an adult.

5. Spend face time with him

I'm seeing a growing trend of parents neglecting their children by giving them electronic devices to play with. Even worse is that I'm regularly seeing parents glued to their iPhone when a child was tugging at them for attention. I completely understand that children require huge amounts of time that gets tiring, but leaving your children to be raised by games, pedo Hollywood, and Gaysame Street means you're essentially outsourcing your parental duties and letting outside influences install beliefs into your child that will turn him into a degenerate faggot socialist who suffers from clinically low testosterone.

By default, your son will love you and his mother more than anything else in the world. You won't be able to tell when he throws a tantrum, but there is no one else he rather be with. So be with him. Include him in your daily chores. Tell him how your day went and ask him the same. Let him share his silly stories without your interrupting or breaking eye contact. Show him how important he is and that he has a father in life not just in name only.

Don't confuse my advice here with indulging all of your son's whims and sacrificing your own well-being to be some sort of clown to keep him constantly entertained. Instead, just be there for him when he wants to spend time with you and don't let him feel that he has to compete with your smartphone, because you will be hurt when he grows up and decides that he doesn't have the time or attention to give you. The type of man your son becomes will depend on the influences he's exposed to when he's growing up; you might as well be the biggest one.

Conclusion

I share this advice as a man who doesn't have children, but one who has thought about it deeply. I've examined the parental strategy of my own father along with my attempts to positively shape the lives of my brothers. What you see above is the strategy I will use if I have a son tomorrow. While I'm sure there are flaws in what I've shared, along with any other parental method, it's one that I confidently feel will allow a son of mine to hit his absolute potential, no mater how different he may be from his dad.

Just don’t ask me quite yet about what I would do if I were to have a daughter.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Don’t Miss: 5 Things I Learned From Becoming A Father

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Service Rifles Of The First World War

July 25, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The armies of the belligerents who went to war in 1914 carried rifles that today might be considered quaint. They had handsome wooden finishes, were designed for long-range fire, and were so robust that they could withstand all manner of abuse in the harsh trench environments in which they were used. Some of these rifles are well-known, and others less so. We will sketch a few of the principal services rifles used in Europe from 1914 to 1918. Readers will note here the absence of the service weapons of Italy and Austria-Hungary, but the requirements of space limit us to only the major designs.

Rifle No. 1 Mk III Lee-Enfield (United Kingdom)

We can do no better than to lead off with the "Short Magazine Lee-Enfield" or SMLE. This wonderful rifle is considered by many experts to the best all-around service rifle ever made. Designed in 1907, the weapon used a remarkably smooth bolt action that could, with practice, be operated at a very high rate. Its 10-round detachable box magazine could hold nearly twice as many rounds as other rifles of the period, and the weapon was sighted to about 1,000 yards.

Some models even had an ultra long-range sight used for volley fire to cover open areas; no doubt this was rarely used. In trained hands the rifle could fire off around 15 rounds per minute. Designers wanted a rifle that was shorter than the typical service rifle, but one that also combined most of its features.

The weapon was distributed widely over all parts of the British Empire, as well as to Australia and New Zealand. It was expensive to produce and was manufactured to a very high standard, and examples are still occasionally found in use today in odd corners of the world (e.g., Afghanistan). It may be the greatest bolt-action rifle ever made.

Caliber: 7.7 mm

Weight: 8.7 lb.

Length: 44.6 in.

Mauser Gewehr 1898 (Germany)

The venerable Mauser served Germany well not only in the Great War but also in the Second World War. And anyone who has actually handled and fired the weapon can easily understand why. This is a combat rifle, pure and simple. Chambered for Germany's 7.92 mm round, the Mauser was so robust that it could double as a war-club one minute, and a long range sniper rifle the next.

The bolt action used the front-lug locking system, as well as the "straight-pull" chambering action, which was less convenient than the Lee-Enfield. When the magazine was empty, the bolt locked to the rear and could not be closed unless a new clip was fed into the chamber. Its five-round magazine was not ideal, but in practice this seemed to present few problems with the front-line troops. The weapon was popular enough to be manufactured under license abroad in Spain after the war.

Caliber: 7.92 mm

Weight: 9.26 lb.

Length: 49.2 in.

Mosin-Nagant Model 1891 (Russia)

Russia in 1914 lacked the industrial base to churn out weapons in the same quantity as the other belligerents, but it did its best under the adverse conditions in which it was operating. Accounts exist of whole infantry units being sent to the front with no arms of any kind, and being told to scavenge them from the fallen on the battlefield.

Russia favored rugged weapons that could endure all forms of abuse. Her recruits were typically uneducated conscripts who would need a rifle that required very little training to operate. The Mosin-Nagant rifle fit this bill reasonably well. Its bolt was a two-piece mechanism that worked when it had to, and the weapon provided no luxuries or frills. The bayonet used on the Mosin-Nagant was the old-fashioned "spike" type that used an antiquated socket method of attachment. The Russians have always done things their own way when it comes to small arms design, and the Mosin-Nagant is a rifle that could have been found in no other country but Russia. Examples were in use well into the 1930s.

Caliber: 7.62 mm

Weight: 9.62 lb.

Length: 51.4 in.

Fusil Lebel 1886 (France)

France's Lebel rifle was probably the least effective of all the rifles mentioned here. The reason why is the rifle's somewhat dangerous tubular magazine: cartridges were laid out one after another in line, with the nose of one pressing up against the firing pin of the other. If the rifle were hit hard enough or dropped at the wrong angle, it was possible for the primer of a cartridge to go off and destroy the weapon or its user. The bolt mechanism was also not nearly as tough as the Mauser or the Lee-Enfield, and required constant maintenance.

The rifle was innovative in one way: it was the first rifle to use smokeless propellant cartridges. This hardly outweighed its other drawbacks, however, and in the final analysis the Lebel can be said to be little more than an adequate service rifle. When one considers that the French Army was also saddled with using the absolutely horrible Chachat light machine gun (probably the worst small arm ever invented), we can hardly fail to have sympathy for the lot of the average poilu.

Caliber: 8 mm

Weight: 9.35 lb.

Length: 52 in.

M1903 Springfield (United States)

The United States entered the war rather late and saw comparatively little action when compared with that of the other involved nations. But it was still an economic powerhouse, and wielded considerable influence over its allies. The M1903 Springfield rifle was a handsome, well-made weapon, somewhat mid-range in length between a rifle and a carbine. It was introduced to replace the obsolete Krag-Jorgensen rifle at the turn of the century.

It was very well-made, accurate, and could tolerate a reasonable amount of abuse and immersion in mud. It was not as good as the Lee-Enfield, but it was more accurate at long ranges; for this reason it was still being used as a sniper rifle as late as the Korean War in the early 1950s. As a collector's item it is highly prized today.

Caliber: 7.62 mm

Weight: 8.69 lb.

Length: 43.2 in.

Read More: The History And Evolution Of Rifles

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Join A Protected Class And Get Away With Insanity By Becoming A Male Lesbian

July 26, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Equal justice under law is a fine concept, but in reality leftist policies and rhetoric mean every sexual preference, ethnicity, religion, and sexual identity except being straight, white, Christian and male gets protection. This permeation of "protected classes" of people has ballooned during the last 50 years of Cultural Marxism in American and Western Europe as little more than a way of figuratively placing targets on the backs of certain people. While the civil rights laws of 1964 may have been well-intentioned, 50 years later their protections have devolved into a collective albatross around the necks of straight men everywhere, and especially those from Christian and white backgrounds. George Orwell wrote about this concept in his novel Animal Farm:

> All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others.

All an opponent has to do to gain an advantage over you and throw you under the legal bus is make claims of racism, sexism, genderism or Islamophobia, among other clever word jumbles, and as the penis-packing offender you will be promptly escorted out of your office, fired, subjected to a Social Justice Warrior swarming (i.e. a witch trial) and blacklisted. Of this type of behavior, astrophysicist Carl Sagan wrote:

> The theologian Meric Casaubon argued—in his 1668 book, Of Credulity and Incredulity—that witches must exist because, after all, everyone believes in them. Anything that a large number of people believe must be true.

Unlike the past, today's witch burnings are only conducted against subjects with penises

And so, today, because everybody believes men are evil and all white people are racists, it must be true. So, they get no protection from witch accusers. The ever-expanding confusion as to which people are and which are not protected now includes gay people who identify as conservatives, such as Milo Yiannopoulos who was just permanently banned from Twitter. (Read: This banning proves we on the alt-right and manosphere are being placed in the crosshairs of the next political witch trial.) As revealed by Breitbart:

> The [Twitter] platform has demonstrated an unashamed bias towards progressive causes like Black Lives Matter, ignoring open calls for violence against police officers that emerged following both the Dallas and Baton Rouge shootings. In further indication of its political biases, Twitter also let death threats against Republican Senators remain on the platform for months without taking action.

So, as Twitter turns a blind eye to more serious offenses like Ghostbusters flop-actress Leslie Jones' racist history including a post railing against "white people shit" while it targets certain groups of people, it shows a man can lose his "Superior Virtue of the Oppressed" membership card if he identifies with the wrong political orientation. In the early 21st century it is now okay to discriminate against conservatives in general as Faceberg, Twatter, Microshaft, and Skynet (Google) are already doing in their plots with the communistic European Union and the crooked U.S. government.

As we saw last year, as a business owner you can also be forced to bake a cake for a gay couple even if it goes against your religious beliefs, but apparently Twitter cannot be forced to accommodate gay men on its platform whose politics and free speech they disagree with.

Becoming Part Of The Protected Class

Only with the “Superior Virtue of the Oppressed” can you get your victim card

In order to receive equal justice under law, as the hated Evil White Males™ of the world we must find a way to make ourselves a protected class under the eyes of the law. So, I came up with a plan to assume the cloak of Superior Virtue in one’s daily dealings with a the political game and the corrupt media. Here’s a four step process to becoming a part of the legally and politically protected transgender and homosexual communities:

- Report being a cisgender male (male at birth) but now having a female “gender identity”
- Report you are a cross-dresser who likes to dress like men
- Become a lesbian
- Report being a Democrat while continuing our narrative

In other words, become a lesbian man who identifies as a woman but dresses like a man, who is a conservative Democrat, to boot. Once one untangles this twisted mess mentally, it illustrates we can remain heterosexual men who still dress like men but we use leftist gender identities and political affiliations to gain protection under the law. This is where the twisted world of Marxism has led us, gentlemen. The only way to beat the system is to infiltrate it and play along with its twisted and crooked narratives.

The blueprint for this idea comes from a Canadian transgender case. A girl who dresses as a man named “Trevor” had her breasts removed, but then decided to move in with a “gay” partner and got pregnant from her gay partner all while presenting as a man. Perhaps reading the full story will alleviate the headache that case probably gave you. Suffice it to say, when one untwists all the “gender identities” and “sexual orientations,” a straight couple went through an incredible amount of gymnastics to act like they’re not straight. So, if they can do it an get lauded by the press, why can’t we play a similar game?

Fabian Socialist Bertrand Russell detailed the problems with the modern leftist “victim” playbook in 1950

Meanwhile, the entire multicultural façade and the ideas about the “Superior Virtue of the Oppressed” are collapsing. Even Fabian Socialist Bertrand Russell who wrote the essay entitled “Superior Virtue of the Oppressed” knew the delusion about certain groups being morally superior to others could be maintained only for so long, and incidentally its collapse has coincided with America awakening from the collective delusion foisted upon the public by corporate media in the Television Age. Russell wrote:

> The idealizing of the victim is useful for a time: if virtue is the greatest of goods, and if subjection makes people virtuous, it is kind to refuse them power, since it would destroy their virtue. If it is difficult for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven, it is a noble act on his part to keep his wealth and so imperil his eternal bliss for the benefit of his poorer brethren. It was a fine self-sacrifice on the part of men to relieve women of the dirty work of politics. And so on. But sooner or later the oppressed class will argue that its superior virtue is a reason in favor of its having power, and the oppressors will find their own weapons turned against them. When at last power has been equalized, it becomes apparent to everybody that all the talk about superior virtue was nonsense, and that it was quite unnecessary as a basis for the claim to equality.

In other words, the world doesn’t work the way leftists want it to. More and more people by the day are waking up to the fact that implying the so-called oppressed classes had superior virtue to everyone else was total insanity, especially as these “virtuous” classes become violent, burn cities down, persecute conservatives, kill police, conduct SJW witch trials, and kick men out of society. This shows us they don’t want to be equal at all, they want have their turn being the oppressors. A twisted and unending cycle of oppression in the saga of the human species is thereby revealed. Just don’t find yourself on the losing end of that cycle.

Until the entire leftist narrative obliterates itself, and it could take a number of years or decades before this degeneracy is either cleansed from our society or causes a catastrophe, this is an actionable plan to gain protection under the law. Is this plan really just exaggeration and sarcasm? Maybe, a little. But when it comes down to tactics in a culture war, sometimes a man has to fight fire with fire. And if he has to protect himself by assuming the mantle of the victim, a mantle invented to bring certain men down in the first place, then so be it.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why Do Ivy League Schools Give Remedial Classes To Some Minority Students?

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Feminist Ghostbusters Bombs Despite Hysterical Attacks Against Its Critics

July 26, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Earlier this year, Return Of Kings introduced you to the terrible trailer for the all-female Ghostbusters 3. As we expected, the film has struggled terribly at the American box office. A conservative estimate of the film's budget, including marketing costs, is $250 million. As of me writing this sentence, it has not even made half that sum back.

In the event it manages to break even, it will nevertheless be a resounding slap in the face for the film's cast and backers, who include powerful forces in both Hollywood and the mainstream media. Given the unprecedented political capital being ploughed into promoting Ghostbusters 3, it should have been poised to make close to a billion dollars by the end of its theatrical run.

This financial defeat for a feminist cinematic mess is despite repeated SJW, mass media-enabled attempts to portray critics of the trailer and now the film as "misogynists." Rather than letting the promised entertainment do the talking, backers of the film have resorted to crude politics, effectively calling upon feminists and male white knights to buy tickets to support female-led films. Meanwhile, detractors are being labeled bigots. The Washington Post's Stephanie Merry was one of the first columnists to fire up the feminists cannons with a piece entitled "People hate the 'Ghostbusters' trailer, and yes, it's because it stars women." Countless other media apologists have followed suit.

"You have no right not to like this film!"

Stephanie Merry and other journalists have trumpeted in blanket terms that haters of Ghostbusters 3 are misogynists.

Instead of realizing that people found the trailer and then the film decidedly unfunny, journalists like Merry have opted to basically say that people do not have a choice but to find Ghostbusters 3 quality entertainment. Yet there are a number of stupid aspects to the film that these people have deliberately ignored. The first is the presence of a "street-smart," ghetto-style African-American character played by Leslie Jones. Years after these films were released, cinema goers are still tired of regurgitated big-ass black women tropes like those created by Queen Latifah in Taxi and Martin Lawrence in Big Momma's House.

Secondly, viewers do not need canned, contrived dialogue designed to serve as propaganda for women in science, such as "You're a brilliant engineer" and "No one's better at quantum physics than you." And thirdly (there's no "finally" here as I could go on and on), the jokes are just plain lame. Kristen Wiig's character commenting about how slime went into "every crack" of hers and was hard to remove, whilst much more preferable to Melissa McCarthy talking about her orifices, was literally the funniest thing in the whole movie. I will not even start with Leslie Jones' character's rip-off of lines from The Exorcist.

The sick kids stunt didn't work and now the critics' reviews aren't, either

The girl here clearly has no idea what's going on… but that won't stop feminist self-aggrandizement!

As I reported in March, the principal cast members, Melissa McCarthy, Kristen Wiig, Kate McKinnon, and Leslie Jones, were so desperate to shamelessly promote the film that they literally threw themselves upon sick kids in hospitals for photo ops. These children, exploited as living promotional props, had not seen the film because it had not even been released yet. They were born years after Ghostbusters 2 and the film series would have little, if any relevance to them. It might make sense (and it would be a lot more ethical) to have the stars of a well-known, already released film visit sick kids when there is no sequel due. In this case, the children at least know—and can like—the film.

With the failure of the milking juveniles with cancer option, the makers and cast evidently hoped for favorable reviews. Of course, many reviewers have let their politics do the talking and given Ghostbusters 3 the thumbs up. Hollywood is a leftist town, as evidenced by the revolving door of slavery and civil rights films (some of them actually very good, though), plus the sickening rehash of "warrior women" films in a world where men do 99% of all the fighting and dying for their families and countries. Even if a film happens to be good, browbeaten critics are apt to score it highly merely for its theme or subject matter.

That said, enough reviews have been scathing of the all-female debacle. Richard Roeper of The Chicago Sun-Times risked the fury of feminists and other SJWs by saying the actresses' performances, the story, and even the special effects, usually the sole redeeming quality for many cinematic failures, were subpar at best. He and voices like his have obviously been partly drowned out by the cacophony of sycophantic praise for the film, not to mention the monotonous slew of pieces condemning the alleged misogyny of almost anyone who does not adore it.

Leftist indoctrination is still far from complete

Image credit: Breitbart News

Think about the priorities of Hollywood, which continues, if it is even possible, to tilt further to the left. Staring down at these political goals, however, are audiences that can not only tell what propaganda is, but successfully resist it by keeping their buttocks away from cinema chairs. Many will sadly fall for the lies masquerading as entertainment, that much is true. Regardless, we should take heart from the great rump of people who can make their own choices in the absence of an organized countervailing cultural establishment to battle Hollywood for us.

The financial failure of Ghostbusters 3 must help build the foundation for more challenges to any SJW material leftists try to shove down the public's throat. Right now, though, we can bask in the frustrations of our enemies, ruing yet another indoctrination campaign gone awry.

Read More: The World Is Revolting Against Hollywood's Awful Feminist Remake Of Ghostbusters

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

10 Types Of Idiots You'll Find At A Gun Range

July 26, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Fueled by liberal threats, the desire to exercise a right to protect oneself, and the basic truth that shooting is a lot of fun, more people become part of the gun culture each day. This means that more people, and more types of people, will come to your local public range. Although part of being a man is knowing firearms, some people sadly don't know much, or have some really bad habits, and much comedy, drama, and even unsafe situations can result. Here's ten types of people found at gun ranges, and how you can avoid being any of them.

1. Boomshakalaka

Also known as "the guy with the unnecessarily loud rifle," this guy delights in corking off his non-magnum rifle with an unneeded and overly large muzzle brake at every given opportunity. Typically found under tin-roofed shooting structures, the blast from this dude's rifle makes every else go for muffs AND plugs.

Muzzle brakes do not make friends, and they are really only needed in three situations: you compete, you're shooting a really heinous magnum, or you're a medically documented recoil sensitive person. If you can't handle shooting .308 out of a semi-auto all day long without a muzzle brake, maybe you should take up crocheting; it really doesn't kick THAT much, and muzzle brakes on a 5.56/.223 AR is legitimate cause to point and laugh.

If you compete, and you need the recoil reduction to shoot faster, or shooting some massive magnum, then you're serious enough to come to the range at times when others aren't there for you to deafen. Muzzle brakes are the open headers of rifles; be judicious in their use.

2. The Crazy Militia Dude

Showing up in camouflage and looking a little crazy is not a crime, nor is shooting a whole lot of ammo off in a frenzied, scared manner. However, when you start waving your rifle around, sweeping people, and/or diving into firing positions with live rounds chambered and the safety off, you are putting yourself and others at unnecessary risk with your antics. Some people believe that our lives are worth nothing because the UN/aliens/men in black/foreigners are going to get us all tomorrow, but, here in reality, we want to leave the range with the same number of holes with which we arrived.

“If SHTF, they won’t have donuts. You may want to prep for that….them not having donuts, I mean.”

Most rifle lines are set up to shoot from benches. Shooting from field positions next to the bench is also ok for most ranges that aren’t overly fascist. Even timed transitions to shooting positions is usually ok, provided the rifle is not loaded, or at least the safety is on. Always keep the muzzle in a safe direction, and keep it, and only it, across the firing line, and you should be ok.

3. Mr. “Unnecessary Firing Line Commands”

This guy will loudly inform you that he is “going hot” before shooting each magazine he loads, despite the range already being in a hot condition. Some of these type will use other commands like “fire in the hole” (which means you’re using explosives, not shooting) or “SEND IT” or something macho he heard in a movie or Call of Duty.

Unless you're running one of these.

You should NOT be yelling anything on a firing line as you don't need to startle anyone for no good reason. The only exception is yelling "Cease Fire!" really loudly for a safety problem. Once a range is declared hot, you are free to shoot until it is declared otherwise, and that's a unanimous decision by all involved. Likewise, when a range is cold, everyone must be back across the line, notified, and agreed upon before it goes hot again. There's really no reason to say much else to other shooters other than idle chat if you both are inclined.

4. All Money, No Skill

"Don't worry about a man with 100 guns; worry about a man with one that knows how to use it." It's much better to spend 500 dollars on a pistol and 500 dollars on ammo than to spend 900 on the pistol, and 100 on the ammo.

A gun is a tool, and, like any tool, you need to practice, a lot, to be able to use it well, no matter what that intended use may be. I like my expensive guns, sure, but I also own cheaper ones, and I have a bunch of ammo for them, even though I've been neglecting my range time recently.

There is no shame in taking your one gun to the range for practice, even if it's nothing special. If all you can afford is a Taurus, then get that thing and practice; the first pistol I bought was a Taurus, and I still have it.

5. The Fondler

There's a time to handle your guns, and when other shooters are downrange dealing with targets is NOT it. Some people think they can do anything and everything with their guns any time they want, including preparing magazines, loading guns, and even pointing them downrange at people while the line is cold.

I hear he's an ROK reader.

Ranges vary with their rules, but a good start is not to actually be touching a gun when the line is cold. Cased guns are ok to move around, and you can usually always put rounds into magazines whenever you want, but a gun you are using should only be put onto the firing line, shot, or removed from the firing line when the line is hot.

6. Obnoxious Target Dude

Some people like to shoot odd things to add to the fun, and, while that's usually cool, if something is messy, hazardous, obnoxious, or unsafe, you probably shouldn't do it. Even if you intend to clean up the mess from shooting your old vacuum tube TV, people aren't going to want to stop and give you the time to do it.

Don't shoot things made of glass, or things that will cause ricochets, like rocks or metal. Dinger targets should always be designed to deflect so the bullet does not come back at you. Tannerite and other explosives should be used at at least the minimum safe distance, and should not be placed inside anything causing shrapnel. Any mess left behind should be biodegradable and edible by local wildlife, like pumpkins.

7. The "Range Safety Officer"

Many ranges have a person who is part of the staff fulfilling the role of Range Safety Officer. Unfortunately, other ranges often have a person who is NOT part of the staff fulfilling the role of Range Safety Officer via self-appointment. While it's cool to have a passion for safety, a RSO is there to be an RSO, and is there in an official capacity. Nothing makes someone look more foolish than assuming authority that isn't theirs.

Your job as a shooter is to make sure you yourself and those in your party are behaving safely. If you notice someone else breaking the safety rules, you can correct the situation gently at first and more firmly later, if necessary, but, if everyone is cool, then leave them alone. Ranges can be quite safely run without a RSO, just communicate before going hot to cold or vice versa.

8. The Target Whisperer

This guy likes to check his target … a lot. You aren't even through your first magazine, and he wants the range to go cold so he can go see where he hit before shooting again. Never having heard of a spotting scope or good pair of binoculars, he won't even accept yours, since he has to go mark his shots before shooting more, and he'll sit there, playing the passive-aggressive game of watching you and trying to make you stop shooting and safe the range solely by the power of his MIND.

Always hang enough target to keep you occupied, and bring along a spotting scope to check when you want without having to go downrange. If you're done with your group, find something to do, or put your feet up and relax, just don't hover over the other shooters. The one exception is when you are done for the day and want to leave; it is ok to ask for a cold range prematurely since you won't be bothering them any more after you leave.

9. The Pest

This guy won't leave you, or others, alone. He might be ogling your guns or gear, or talking when no one is listening or cares, or dispensing advice if you're doing something with which he disagrees. He really just wants to be nosy and see what you're doing, so the easiest way to deal with him is stop and talk to him, and ONLY talk to him, until he gets the hint that nothing is going to happen until he quits bugging you and goes back to his area.

Best way to not be one yourself is to meet the other shooters when you start, then leave them alone. A little bit of gun ogling, along with a discerning question or two, is ok, but, unless the guy really wants to talk, do your thing, and let him do his.

10. The Poor Host

The poor host is none of the above idiots, but his guests are. Private ranges are often club-based, with members and their guests allowed to shoot. The member may understand the importance of the rules, but the guests may not think that way, and they'll run around bothering other members by being one or more of the above.

If you take guests to your club range and they behave poorly, it reflects on you. Some people can handle shooting guns responsibly, others can't. Go over standard gun safety and any specific club rules before you even go to the range so that you know your guests understand them, or at least you know who not to bring.

Conclusion

Most of these can be filed under "be safe" and "don't bug the other shooters." While gun ranges, full of armed people, are usually a bit more formal and polite than modern society in general, it still helps to know what to do in any situation, and you'll still run into people who either don't know what they're doing wrong and the offense it generates, or that are pretending to not know and are playing off your generosity.

Always be safe, and grant the benefit of the doubt once, but, after that, you need to correct the unsafe or bothersome guy, and, if even that fails, get the guy's info , let your club kick him out, and leave the range in the meantime; it's not worth the confrontation. Be safe.

Read More: The Fundamentals Of Gun Safety

Luke Stranahan

Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

3 Predictions We Can Make About A Hillary Clinton Presidency From Analyzing The DNC Leaks

July 27, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The Democratic National Committee email leaks shared by Wikileaks highlight the extent to which Democrat political leaders and apparatchiks have become the same ruthless, rule-breaking fat cats they normally associate with Wall Street excesses. These revelations prove that the Democrats are not so much divided and fractured, but playing a game of bully and bullied. Unless you support the dominant position of the party head honchos, you must anticipate being on the receiving end of their wrath.

All this bodes terribly in the event of a Hillary Clinton victory in 2016. Those implicated in the DNC leaks have been firmly and squarely rooting for her. As a beneficiary of rule-breaking, unjustified, and plain personal attacks on Bernie Sanders by the DNC, there is no question that Clinton will continue such behavior and reward those who partake in it. And if the undermining has been awful against Sanders, what will happen when a Clinton Administration targets Republicans or, worse still, political positions like those of the alt-right?

Here's what we can guarantee if Hillary Clinton inhabits the Oval Office from the end of this year:

People with serious biases and conflicts of interest will be appointed to key Clinton administration positions, including to witch-hunt college men accused of rape

Debbie Wasserman Schultz.

Soon after Debbie Wasserman Schultz "resigned" her position as Chairwoman of the Democratic National Convention because of the DNC leaks, Hillary Clinton rewarded her with a new job. Wasserman Schultz will now serve as "honorary chairwoman" of Clinton's 50-state campaign to elect Democrats.

The fallen party executive, also a sitting Congresswoman, will additionally act as a "surrogate" for Hillary's own national Presidential campaign. All this after Wasserman Schultz and her cronies were proven to have denigrated, attacked, and outright sabotaged Bernie Sanders' campaign to become President. Given Hillary's support for the disgraced Wasserman Schultz, expect her to similarly bestow power on others who back her various agendas, from expelling college men accused of rape to inciting violence against the police in the name of placating Black Lives Matter.

Note the Orwellian approach to Clinton's statement about Wasserman Schultz: "…as President, I will need fighters like Debbie in Congress who are ready on day one to get to work for the American people." The only person Wasserman Schultz has shown any interest in going out to work or fight for, as the DNC leaks prove, is Hillary herself.

If she has been willing to undermine the rule-abiding campaign of Hillary's rival Sanders, and show contempt for all the many party faithful supporting him, in no sense will she be capable of working or fighting for the American people, whether Democratic Party members, non-card carrying Democratic Party voters, Republican voters, or independents. Hillary's interests are therefore being falsely conflated with the American people's.

The word "honorary" is also telling. One does not need to hold a formal or actual executive office to serve Hillary's interests. In fact, much of the time an unofficial representative would work best, as it allows political goals to be pursued outside normal rules, almost like how courts are being replaced by college "rape" tribunals bereft of traditional, time-honored judicial protections. There is no reason to even pay lip service to transparency, impartiality, and professionalism.

The kinds of things you will see: Professional liars like Emily Renda, who propped up rape hoaxer Jackie Coakley from the University of Virginia, will be appointed to outlandish positions like "Roaming Ambassador to Curb Male College Sexual Violence." The existence of college rape tribunals will be expanded and given very strong force in law, to the extent that they will be given some or many more of the powers of courts without a commensurate responsibility to ensure due process.

Even the most vocal leftwing critics will be bullied into submission

Cucked.

The DNC leaks kicked Bernie Sanders in the face–again. Not that he bothered to stand up against the bias he had long suspected but could now verify. Following his kneeling down to two truly savage Black Lives Matter protestors at one of his rallies months ago, you might have said that precious little fight was ever expected from Bernie Sanders. But you would have been proven wrong. Although he did it in some respects less than he should have, Bernie by and large savaged Clinton on the points that matter. He also persisted in his campaign long after most liberal commentators had told him to stop. All that ended after some time, though.

When Bernie Sanders went largely silent some weeks ago, that was one thing. But when he first started warming to Clinton and then endorsed her, things changed for the worse. As more than one critic opined, Sanders endorsing Clinton was like Occupy Wall Street endorsing Goldman Sachs.

The spilled secrets from the DNC email leaks should have caused Bernie to disendorse Clinton. Instead, he said he was "proud to stand" with Clinton in his Democratic National Convention speech, despite knowing she had rewarded the woman who had sought to derail his campaign against party rules, Debbie Wasserman Schultz.

What was said or done to Bernie Sanders behind the scenes, particularly when the DNC leaks went public? Or, more indirectly, did he come to fear some reprisal if he fell short of emphatically endorsing his once bitter rival? After all, by supporting Clinton in the open, Sanders has effectively legitimized his biggest policy-related target of hate, the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

Even for an oddball socialist, Sanders has been resiliently disparaging of the Establishment Left for almost his entire life. His falling into line behind Clinton is seismic and speaks volumes about the pressures being brought down on non-orthodox leftist figures who try to challenge orthodox favorites.

The kinds of things you will see: Corporatist-style compacts will be made between the Clinton Administration and big business. The new Democratic ideological orthodoxy and "widespread" support for proposals like the Trans-Pacific Partnership will be ensured by silencing or plain removing raucous elements like still disgruntled Bernie Sanders backers from political debates, let alone processes. Hillary Clinton will give credence to the idea of wealth redistribution, of course, but practically-speaking advance the interests of her corporate donors.

The dubious Clinton business model will endure

"Charity" donors from the Middle East with Hillary.

The DNC email leaks demonstrate the grotesque secrecy characterizing money flowing to Hillary Clinton. Clinton's campaign sought joint fundraising ventures with state-based affiliates of the Democratic Party, only to directly give them less than 0.5% of the total money received. Meanwhile, the email exchanges of DNC officials, including Debbie Wasserman Schultz, highlight how they desperately wanted to suppress these kinds of damaging details. Of any of the questions Wasserman Schultz should answer, ones about Hillary's financing efforts are the most urgent.

Combine this with longstanding doubts about the Clinton Foundation and you have what should be an automatic trigger for serious investigations. The Clinton Foundation has allegedly received over $100 million in donations from members of authoritarian governments from across the Persian Gulf in the Middle East, scuttling any image that Clinton could serve impartially as Secretary of State and can serve impartially as President. Other problems raised by concerned commentators are the poor dollar returns on the charity's ventures to help the needy, with inordinate sums being paid for "administrative costs" and the salaries of executives.

Plus, Hillary and Bill Clinton have amassed a mind-boggling fortune north of $150 million just from their speaking engagements over the last 15 years. It is very arguable that the great rump of these speeches have made them financially beholden to the same Wall Street and other big business institutions Hillary claims she will successfully hold in check. The active collaboration of DNC officials in suppressing information about the financial details of Hillary Clinton's campaign gives us no indication that the Democratic political class will ever question how and in what circumstances the Clintons earn or raise their money.

The kinds of things you will see: Criticisms of the funding arrangements behind Hillary's political campaign and the financial situation of the Clinton Foundation will be swatted away like flies. Those who call for anything close to an inquiry, even informally, will be severely punished and blacklisted.

We're in for a wild, not so happy ride

This photo is about 1% as crazy as any Hillary Clinton Presidency will be.

The cat is supposedly out of the bag. Poll numbers may have dipped for Hillary, but a Trump victory is by no means certain. Hillary's prospects are on the whole probably still better than The Donald's. This gives us all the more reason to ensure that Trump is supported to the hilt and that the skulduggery of Hillary and her DNC enablers continues to be exposed.

Between now and November, though, you should remain fearful. We have a lot to lose if Hillary wins. The Culture War is being waged like never before.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why A Hillary Clinton Presidency Would Destroy The United States

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Act As You Are Instead Of Worrying About Achieving An Optimum State

July 27, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

If you want to successfully attract beautiful women, either for short-term pleasure or long-term, serious relationships, then you must be prepared to take action in spite of how you are feeling. Failure to act is not masculine and will not serve you. Commit today to acting decisively in going for what you want today.

Perhaps you have seen a cute girl in line at your local coffee shop. Maybe a couple of hotties are buying drinks at the bar. In such circumstances it is very easy to make excuses for not approaching, such as “I’m too tired right now,” “I don’t have the energy after work,” or “I’m feeling a little unconfident today.” Scratch these feeble witterings from your mind immediately. They will not serve you. Instead, make a commitment to yourself to take action when you see a girl you like regardless of how you feel.

The Myth Of State

In the pick-up community there is a concept of “state.” You will most probably have experienced state. Imagine you are in a bar or club. You talk to your friends, maybe have a few beers, and start to feel lightness, confidence, even a little bit of bravado.

Perhaps started to chat to people you don't know, asked them how their night is. After a while, you start to feel an almost uncanny ability to speak to anyone and everyone. It is as if you are propelled by some mysterious social energy, protected by a powerful forcefield from shyness or embarrassment.

Now, don't get me wrong. State, or social momentum, is real and it will serve you. There are many times I've been out, hit a wave of state, and, in my mood of heightened confidence, gone on to attract a cute girl. When you go out, it is definitely worth trying exercises like talking to everyone you run in to (shop assistant, Uber driver, coat check guy etc.) before that first girl to heighten your mood. That way, when you're face-to-face with a hottie you will come over as calm and socially adept. But you shouldn't rely on it.

Why Relying On State Is Counterproductive

The most important aspect of game (and of any endeavour from business, to writing a novel, to learning to play the cello) is action. The difficulty with relying on state is that it gives the player an easy excuse not to act. "I could have approached her, but I wasn't in state." "I'm just not feeling it tonight, man – I'll pass on talking to her and have another drink instead." Let's be clear – if your goal is to get good with girls, then this sort of thinking will get you nowhere. In fact, it will be worse than that – it will set you back, because it is only by taking consistent action and learning from your mistakes that you will improve your results.

Resolve To Take Action Regularly However You Are Feeling

The British painter Francis Bacon led a famously debauched life in 1960s London, getting drunk most nights in Soho's bars and restaurants and spending most of his money in casinos. Despite this, he would get up early every morning to paint. Whereas many men would crumble in the face of a hangover, Bacon positively reveled in them, saying that they improved his work. Through this commitment to action Bacon became one of the most revered British painters of modern times, with his works now regularly sold for record-breaking amounts in galleries all round the world.

If you want to get good at something, you have to commit to taking action in spite of how you are feeling, for it is only consistent action taken over time that will yield solid results. This is as true for meeting girls as it is for painting or making a fortune as an entrepreneur.

A Mediocre Approach Is Better Than No Approach

As I say in my book The Seven Laws of Seduction, a mediocre or even poor approach is better than no approach at all. We've all heard the expression "you miss 100% of the shots you don't take," but how many of us apply this in our lives on a daily basis?

The truth is that when most men walk up to a girl they are looking for one of two things – her phone number, to contact her for a date another time, or a same-night lay. While the latter happens often enough, in the majority of cases you will be hoping for a phone number, particularly if you are doing day game. Now, the simple truth is, you don't need the poise of Jon Hamm or the swagger of Christian Bale to get a girl's number. What you do need to do is ensure that you are in front of her and asking her for it. These are very simple steps that anyone can take.

The truth is that game is unpredictable anyway. You might be in the best mood ever (your team just won or you got a promotion at work), walk up to a girl full of elation and still get blown out. Or you might be feeling a little shy and introverted, walk up and find she really likes you. The only way you're going to know for sure is by taking the action.

The fastest pull I ever achieved was with a girl I met very late at night walking down the street in London. I was tired, had work the next day and was "in my head" thinking about a big meeting I had to prepare for. No matter – I saw the girl, she was cute, and so I put everything out of my mind and approached. I just went up, introduced myself and said she was cute. No fancy lines, no sparkling with, no high-energy bravado. That girl ended up coming home with me.

Just Do It

The expression “fortune favours the brave” means just that. It does not mean “fortune favours the brave and also in a great mood with loads of energy and confidence that day.” In the end action trumps everything, and consistent action taken over time will get you results, regardless of how you feel.

So next time you see a cute girl, don’t worry about how you are feeling, just be in the moment and go up and talk to her. You never know what might happen. One thing is certain, though – if you don’t talk to her then you have 0% chance of bringing her into your life.

To find out how to become successful meeting and attracting beautiful women read Troy’s bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. To learn more click here.

Read More: How to Be Seen By Women As An Alpha Male

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Psychology That Explains How People Become Liberals

July 27, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

I've studied numerous psychologists, from Freud to Jung, and from Berne to Maslow, but one of the most interesting psychologists out there is Timothy Leary.

Despite being a Professor at Harvard in the early 1960's, his seemingly stable position was completely pulled out from underneath him, due to his controversial work involving LSD. At one point, the US government even hated him so much that they gave him 30 years in prison for a minor possession of marijuana, which he claims they planted on him.

Leary, after years of extensive studies, research, and experimentation, developed a framework through which to understand the human mind: the 8 Circuits of Consciousness. The goal of this article is to better understand how leftists think, and what sort of childhood events would lead to such a vehement position on social justice. First, however, I will give a brief analysis of the 8 circuits.

The 8 Circuit Model Of Consciousness

TEH GNOSTICS PERIODIC TABLE OF EVOLUTION
CIRCUIT	DENDRITIC FUNCTION (Input)	CELL BODY FUNCTION (Integrative)	AXONIC FUNCTION (Output)
8) Neuroatomic	Cosmic Consciousness	Cosmic Engineering	Cosmic Fusion
7) Neurogenetic	DNA Awareness	DNA Engineering	DNA Fusion
6) Neuroelectric	ESP Precognition	The Neurologician (the Shaman)	The Conscious Circle of Humanity
5) Neurosomatic	Hedonic Passivity	Hedonic Engineering (Yoga)	Hedonic Synergy (Tantra)
4) Domestic (Socio Sexual)	The Adolescent (Barbarian Bands)	The Parent (Patriarchal Civilization)	Centralized Socialism (Hive-Unity)
3) Laryngeal- Manual (Symbolic)	The Learning Child (Paleolithic)	The Skillful Child (Neolithic)	The Creative Child (Bronze Age)
2) Emotional-Territorial	The Toddler (trickster mammal)	The Fighting Child (predator mammal)	The Political Child (pack-bonding)
1) Bio-Survival	The Newborn (unicellular consciousness)	The Demanding Infant (marine consciousness)	Mother-Child bonding (amphibian consciousness)

A good introductory book to this theory, as I spoke about here, is Prometheus Rising by Dr. Robert Anton Wilson. Sadly the book is not in print anymore (it's a hidden gem that not many people know about), but if you don't feel like buying the kindle version you can check out an hour long YouTube video that I made about the 8 Circuit Model.

In a nutshell, the model claims that human beings have 8 circuits of consciousness, or 8 ways of interpreting external information. When a child is born, he only uses the first circuit. Then, as he gets older, he activates the second. Then, he activates the third, and the fourth.

Most human beings stop here; only a select few have ever activated the latter four. Buddha likely activated the 6th circuit, Jesus the 5th, and Beethoven the 7th.

Due to the complexity of the latter four circuits, I will not discuss them. I will, however focus heavily on the first four, because they have a massive impact in creating a liberal robot. Once a circuit is imprinted, it is extremely difficult to undo. This is why it is so god damn hard to convince liberals of their misguided ways. As I go through this psychological model, and explain why liberals believe what they do, you should start to see just how "robotized" some people really are.

Circuit 1: The Bio-Oral-Survival Circuit

This is what Carl Sagan would call the Reptilian brain and what Freud would call the oral imprint. This circuit is activated when a child is first born, and is imprinted all the way up until he becomes a toddler. This circuit interprets environmental stimulus in one of two ways: either it’s pleasurable, or painful. Good, or bad. Safe, or unsafe. Typically, the mother plays the integral role in imprinting this circuit.

If this circuit receives ample conditioning that the world is a good place, by receiving enough food, enough love, and enough pleasure, the child will grow up to believe that the world is generally a very safe place.

If this circuit receives ample conditioning that the world is a bad place, by being frequently hungry, not receiving enough love, and experiencing a large amount of pain, the child will grow up to believe that the world is generally a very unsafe place.

Liberals are almost always indefinitely imprinted with a negative world-view. This is why liberals, when they’re adults, tend to the view the world as being an unsafe place. They need “daddy government,” to take care of everything for them, because the world is scary.

They need the strong patriarchy to stop “hurting their feelings,” because the world is too scary for them to handle.

Circuit 2: The Anal-Emotional-Territorial Circuit

This is what Carl Sagan would call the mammalian brain and what Freud would call the anal imprint. This circuit is activated around the time that a child becomes a toddler, and is imprinted all the way up until around age 6 or 7. This circuit interprets relationships with other human beings in one of two ways: am I dominant, or submissive? Am I top-dog or bottom-dog? Am I alpha male, or beta male? Typically, the father plays an integral role in imprinting this circuit.

Have you ever wondered why toddlers are so god damn emotional? It's because they're starting to develop their ego—am I dominant (anger) or submissive (fear)? This is why toddlers typically go through a "mine" phase, as well. They're "claiming their territory," so to speak.

If a child's father is a strong, masculine man who is a good role model, the child will model himself after his father and be dominant in most interactions. Not in an obtrusive, egotistical way, but rather he'll view himself as an alpha male; as the leader.

If a child's father is very weak and if that child's mother runs the relationship, this child will inevitably have a "submissive," imprint in this circuit. He will typically be bullied in grade school, because others can sense his weakness.

Every single leftist has this submissive imprint, which is almost always due to an overbearing mother. Conversely, sometimes it can also be caused by an abusive father; regardless, this is the psychology of a liberal. This is why liberals typically need "top dog" government to help them. They feel the need to be submissive, and rely on someone else to take the lead (in this case the government).

This is why liberals typically dislike masculine men; it points out their own submissiveness and inadequacies. It's why leftists are typically very spineless and are afraid to stand up for anything that isn't the norm. This is also why they typically have a "mother-boy" dynamic in their romantic relationships.

Have you ever seen hyper-liberals with their wives? They typically act like a little boy afraid of offending mommy and her feminist ideologies. This is why. They're conditioned to be submissive from a young age, which allows a nanny state to easily come into play, breaks apart the family unit, and creates a man without a backbone.

Circuit 3: The Neuro-Semantic-Linguistic Circuit

This is what Carl Sagan would call the "human brain." Interestingly enough, Freud skips over this one, likely because, like a fish surrounded by water, Freud is so surrounded by his ideology that he can't even see it.

This circuit is typically imprinted from the ages of 7 to 13, when a child goes through rigorous schooling on how to write, how to read, etc. It's concerned with creating a map to better understand reality; in other words, it's your religion, your beliefs, your opinions, and your political ideology. It's your general world-view put into words. This circuit is not binary (only A or B) like the previous ones; it can have an almost unlimited number of "imprints."

The catch, however, is that because most people don't use logic to understand reality, this circuit is typically just an extension of circuits 1 and 2. For example, as I said before, most liberals have a negative first and second circuit imprint: they believe the world is very unsafe, and that they're bottom-dog/submissive. So, what do you think happens when they start to form a map of reality?

They become a socialist. Now, of course this belief stems from their deeply seeded feelings of inadequacy, fear, and weakness, which is why they want daddy government to take care of them, but they aren't even aware of this.

Their third circuit will come up with all sorts of justifications and logical fallacies to explain away these gnawing feelings:

- "Oh, but don't you know? Socialist countries are the happiest in the world!"

- “We need to help the poor! More welfare! It’s because I have empathy, unlike you, cis-scum!”
- “Don’t hurt my feelings! No, you can’t say that! WH-WHAT? No, it isn’t because I’m a weak bitch! It’s because you’re just an asshole!”
- “All men are assholes! That’s why the world is in need of feminism!”

Despite the obvious flaws within these statements, liberals literally cannot even comprehend why they’re wrong. As Roosh said before, it’s because liberals argue from emotion not from reason. In other words, their first and second circuits create the “reality map” that is their third circuit.

Their third circuit basically, then, does nothing but go back and justify their original imprints and emotions. They will selectively seek out information to confirm their biases, and ignore any and all information that contradicts them.

This is why hyper-liberals can claim that men are useless pigs, despite the fact that men are the very ones who are giving them the right to vote, protecting them in war, and paying taxes for their welfare. This is why Leftism is literally a mental disorder.

For the liberal, their third circuit is merely a logical extension and justification of their underlying fear, depression, feelings of inadequacy, and general victim-complex.

Circuit Four: Socio-Sexual Circuit

This is what Freud would call the sexual imprint. It’s much more than that, however—it’s when a child begins to develop deeper connections with those around him. This circuit is responsible for “tribal” information. What is the reality-tunnel that your local tribe, school, church, or community has?

This circuit is how religious beliefs, political beliefs, and other ideologies, are typically passed down from generation to generation. It's a survival mechanism that ensures we are able to "fit in," lest we be ostracized and end up starving to death.

This is why liberalism infecting our schools is so god damn insidious. Hyper-liberals take advantage of this critical period, when children are most vulnerable to being imprinted with various ideologies, norms, and sexual practices. It's why homosexuality is practically the norm now, why transgenderism is on its way, and why pedophilia and zoophilia are next up.

Prior to the internet and media, it was the local high school, the neighbors, and the church that imprinted a child with various cultural beliefs. Now, however, the brainwashing box right in front of our noses has been tearing these strong pillars of culture down.

What a child is exposed to during this time period is of the utmost importance; it will, for the most part, determine his lifelong sexual interests and cultural beliefs. Most Leftists, during this time in their lives, are exposed to homosexuality, transgenderism, and cultural Marxism by their schoolteachers, their peers, and the media. This only exacerbates their previous imprinting (circuits 1-3).

This is why leftists become pan-sexual, or any other weird deviancy. They believe that there's something fundamentally wrong with them; it goes so deep that it even changes their sexuality.

This is why once leftists grow up, they dye their hair and break social norms. They are so desperate to be bullied (and confirm their first circuit bias that the world is unsafe and their second circuit bias that they're bottom dog) that they go out of their way to dress up in a bunch of weird shit that they know will get them made fun of.

This is why leftists preach equality and become political activists. They use this to meet other like-minded degenerates and can all hide their feelings of inadequacy and self-hatred by trying to bring others down.

Leftism Is Literally A Disease (How To Create A Leftist)

“Feminism is cancer.”

I realize that this is all very complex and nuanced, and can be difficult for a psychology newbie to understand, so I’ll give a brief recap.
During a leftist’s early childhood, his mother likely doesn’t pay enough attention to him. He’s frequently hungry, in pain, and deprived of love. This creates the foundation of leftism; that the world is generally unsafe.

So then, when the leftist becomes a toddler, he is plagued by a chronic fear. This leads others to pick on him, which only further reinforces his first circuit imprint that the world is unsafe, and creates a new imprint: that he’s bottom dog (second circuit binary imprint).

These two imprints create what is known as a victim complex. Victims typically view the world as being very unsafe, and they view themselves as being very weak, and not capable of protecting themselves from the perils that surround them. Does this not sound exactly like a liberal?

Then, when the liberal hits the age of cognition, when his neo-cortex starts to develop further, he enters into the third circuit imprinting period. Here he forms a number of beliefs that merely serve to justify his prior imprinting, such as:

- The world is a very dangerous place!
- I need others to help me!
- I don’t have to step up to the plate; someone else will deal with the challenge or problem at hand.
- Most people are evil!

From here, they start to enter the fourth circuit, primed and ready to fully accept liberal social principles. They often times take on a “deviant” sexual imprint, or they hate themselves so much that they can’t even bear their own gender, so their fourth circuit effectively becomes an extension of their first two circuits.

From here, they go out into the world and get involved in social media and political activism, by grouping up with other like-minded individuals. This surrounding of themselves by liberals only enforces their fourth circuit imprinting that homosexuality, transgenderism, pansexualism, and whatever-the-fuck-else-ism is normal.

So What's The Cure?

It is extremely difficult to undo a liberal's imprinting without using unethical methods (LSD re-imprinting, brainwashing them, controlling their food and water supply to revert them to a childlike state, etc.). And even if these things weren't unethical, we don't have the resources to do them.

So, what I propose, is that we simply become aware of this phenomena and work to stop it. I know this sounds so cliche, and I've said it a million times, but we NEED TO start creating more masculine men in the world. And it starts with our youth. It starts with you and me.

Take a martial art, work out, and get your finances in check. Slowly we will start to undo the monstrosity that is modern liberalism. The most important thing, however, is that we take action.

Don't put up with your girlfriend treating you like shit. Instead, learn how to actually get girls, so that you aren't afraid to leave her. Don't accept bitchy excuses. Be a fucking man and do what you need to do to get what you want to have.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Analyzing The 5 Main Alpha Archetypes

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

Leaked Emails Show That NBC’s Chuck Todd May Be Taking Orders From The Democratic Party

July 28, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The recent leak of 10,000 internal emails from the Democratic National Committee reveal that popular NBC reporter Chuck Todd has ties with Democratic party members, particularly with former DNC chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz. The emails suggest that he has been amendable to altering his coverage to show the Democrats in a favorable light.

Former DNC chair commands Todd to “stop”

The most damning evidence that he may be a controlled asset of the Democratic Party is a leaked email from Schultz with the subject line “Chuck, this must stop.”

From:hrtsleeve@gmail.com
To: chuck.todd@nbcuni.com
Date: 2016-05-18 11:15
Subject: Chuck, this must stop

"Chuck, this must stop." - DWS

Chuck, see below. I would like to discuss this with you today. Can you reach out to Lois to schedule a call?
Thanks.
DWS

> MSNBC's Brzezinski: Wasserman Schultz 'Should Step Down,' Dem Primary 'Has Been Unfair' To Sanders > 0

>
> by CAM SAMUELSON May 20:40
> SIGN UP FOR OUR NEWSLETTER
>
> *
>
> On Wednesday, MSNBC's 'Morning Joe' co-host Mika Brzezinski called for DNC Chair Representative Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-FL) to "step down" over her handling of this year's Democratic presidential primary.
>
> After playing a clip of Wasserman Schultz, Brzezinski said, "This has been very poorly handled from the start. It has been unfair, and they haven't taken him seriously, and it stayed, quite frankly, with the person that we just heard speaking. It just does."
>
> Brzezinski added of Wasserman Schultz, "She should step down."
>

An unbiased reporter would respond with reluctance that his facts are being challenged, or resist taking orders from a party hack. Todd, on the other hand, responded slavishly to Schultz, giving a wide window of availability as if he was a cable guy.

Re: Chuck, this must stop

From:Chuck.Todd@nbcuni.com
To: hrtsleeve@gmail.com
Date: 2016-05-18 12:00
Subject: Re: Chuck, this must stop

Avail anytime between 1130 and 430

Sent from my iPad

On May 18, 2016, at 5:18 AM, "hrtsleeve@gmail.com<mailto:hrtsleeve@gmail.com>" <hrtsleeve@gmail.com<mailto:hrtsleeve@gmail.com>> wrote:

Chuck, see below. I would like to discuss this with you today. Can you reach out to Lois to schedule a call? Thanks.
DWS

While these emails don't offer bulletproof evidence of collusion, it strongly suggests that Todd wanted to at least placate and satisfy the Democratic Party. Such a relationship goes against journalistic ethics, where a reporter is supposed to serve in the public interest instead of to connected insiders.

A skeptical public rages against Todd

The public's reaction to Todd's behavior was explosive. Over 4,500 people retweeted my mention of the revelation and hundreds took the time to make negative comments directly to him.

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/756617381632417792

> He should have reported that they tried doing this 2 influence election!

> — Sean B. Grenier (@SeanGrenier) July 22, 2016

> @ChristiChat @chucktodd Chuck – you are an embarrassment to your profession. Sellout. Do they pay you to spin their stories?
>
> — Laura Marklin (@LauraMarklin) July 23, 2016

Todd was compelled to respond to me (screenshot), a mere five months after his friends in the media launched a full scale attack against us. The tables can be easily turned against the media if there is enough pressure applied to their wrongdoings.

> lots of misleading stuff on Twitter but this takes the cake. Total distortion. I receive coverage complaints daily from all over
>
> — Chuck Todd (@chucktodd) July 22, 2016

Even more intriguing is that an NBC publicist emailed me to rationalize the obvious intimacy between Schultz and Todd.

> Good morning Roosh –
>
> Hope this note finds you well!
>
> Between us, I wanted to follow up on Chuck Todd's tweet to you: he received a complaint about coverage, a common occurrence. Every campaign we cover complains. We listen, and only if there is evidence of bad reporting or misreporting, do we act. But Chuck never acted on any of this nonsense. The complaints were groundless in his opinion. Common occurrence.
>
> Shout with questions.

After I inquired to the publicist about the possible call that took place, she claimed that no call happened, and referred me to this media interview that Todd had with Schultz, insisting that it showed he "pressed" her on resigning from the DNC. But if you watch the video, which I took the pain to do, you'll see that Todd set up softball questions that allowed Schultz to stay on message as if she was conducting a press conference. He also fails to mentions on air the previous demands he received from an angry Schultz.

What would an honest reporter have done?

An honest reporter would have recused himself from the interview or at least mention to his audience that he was contacted by Schultz because of his prior reporting. Todd did not do this, meaning that no one watching at home would ever suspect that he may be changing his coverage based on Schultz' correspondence to him.

Another key piece of evidence that the emails hint to something improper is when Todd overcompensated in his most recent post-leak reporting about Schultz, calling her actions "stupid." It's as if he wanted to prove to the world that he is not biased and controlled by Schultz, going overboard in his insults to her.

While we may never know the extent of the collusion between Todd and the Democratic party, the emails do show that something improper is almost certainly taking place, and that the reporting we see from the big networks are clearly biased in favor of the establishment. It’s one thing to suspect that dirty tricks are occurring, but it’s another to have it so clearly confirmed.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Don’t Miss: 3 Predictions We Can Make About A Hillary Clinton Presidency From Analyzing The DNC Leaks

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What Is Fourth-Generation Warfare (4GW)?

July 28, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

We are living in dangerous times. Our governing elite has flooded Europe and the US with Muslims which has led to a sharp increase in the frequency of terrorist incidents. Meanwhile, in the USA, leftwing groups are agitating for a race war. Even mainstream pundits like John Bolton recognize that things could easily degenerate into civil unrest if not outright civil war. But there is something you can do to prepare—learn the methods of fourth-generation warfare (4GW).

What is 4GW?

When we think of war, we usually think of two or more countries battling it out in classical fashion. Good examples of this are the Battle of Waterloo where the French Army under Napoleon was defeated by allied Anglo and Prussian forces or the Allied fight against the Axis powers during World War II. While this idea of war will continue to be relevant, a new form of warfare has emerged.

The simple definition of this new form of warfare, named 4GW, is that a conflict involves at least one non-state actor. The jihadist war against the US in Iraq and Afghanistan certainly qualifies under this definition. But 4GW could also take place between two or more non-state actors. In a sense, 4GW is a return to the ancient way of warfare, before nations existed.

The difference between 4GW and ancient warfare is that 4GW makes full use of modern technology. 4GW can include the IEDs of the jihadists in Iraq, but it also includes the hacking of an enemy's information systems. The recent hack of the DNC's emails, which revealed that the media and the Democrats work together to shape a specific narrative, would fall under this category. Another example is the alt-right's "meme war" against the traditional conservative establishment. Through its nimble use of social media, the alt-right was quickly able to destroy the establishment's arguments even though it did not control the mass media.

All war tries to destroy the morale of the enemy but 4GW tries to do this not just to the enemy's military, but also to the enemy's populace. Creating mistrust of the government is a tactic of 4GW. It is theoretically possible that 4GW could be fought solely on the level of technology and morale. If this work is done exceedingly well, a 4GW conflict might be won without a shot being fired. However, that is very unlikely.

When it comes to actual combat, 4GW takes a more flexible approach than traditional military training. The man who came up with the concept of 4GW, William S. Lind, writes in his book, 4th Generation Warfare Handbook, that mindset of a 4GW warrior is that of a light infantryman:

> The light infantryman is characterized by his mental resourcefulness and physical toughness. Light infantry's inborn self-reliance, reinforced by hard training, convinces the infantryman that he is capable of overcoming the most difficult situations that combat presents. [He] does not feel defeated when surrounded, isolated or confronted by superior forces… This attitude of self-confidence and self-reliance provides light infantry a psychological advantage over its opponents.

Training

Lind outlines a number of different qualities that a 4GW combat warrior will possess. Here are a few of them.

Familiarity with a wide variety of different weapons. The 4GW warrior may have to rely on weapons captured from the enemy so he must be able to use these with ease.

Survival skills. 4GW warriors must be able to live off the land for extended periods of time. Hunting, fishing, trapping, and being able to prepare the game are necessary skills. The ability to purify water is necessary as well.

First aid proficiency. In modern warfare, soldiers are able to rely on being evacuated for medical treatment. This is a luxury that a 4GW fighter will not be able to rely on. Wounds and illnesses must be treated with what is on hand.

Ability to march great distances. The 4GW does not need to be able to run fast or hoist his bodyweight over his head. Lind calls these superfluous. What they do need to be able to do is march for hours carrying a load of around 45 pounds. This is because 4GW units must carry their supplies with them over long distances. At a minimum, a warrior must be able to march for 14 mile stretches.

Land navigation. 4GW warriors must be able to know where they are simply by using a map and a compass. Electronic equipment is nice to have but it relies on battery power and it is heavy to carry.

Demolitions. Demolitions can cause great damage to an enemy's soldiers, equipment, and supply lines. We can see how effective this can be by the jihadists' use of IEDs.

Lind discusses many other skills that 4GW warriors must possess but they involve group exercises that are not easy to learn outside the military. However, with the exception of demolitions, every individual can learn some of these skills without investing lots of time or money.

Winning hearts

Interestingly, Lind talks quite a bit about how the jihadists in Iraq and Afghanistan were better at getting the local population on their side than the Americans. If the US used a heavy hand in dealing with the insurgency, there was a greater likelihood that an innocent Muslim would be killed or injured. Naturally, when that happened, the victim's entire family would join the jihadists as a way to get revenge against the Americans.

I actually disagree with some of Lind's analysis on this topic, but he is right that in 4GW it is critical to get the populace on your side. Otherwise, any ruling state will find it difficult to control the populace over the long term. Chechnya, Iraq, Afghanistan, and the Gaza Strip are all regions that are difficult to rule because the large segments of the populace reject their current overlords.

The simple way to win hearts is to make people dependent on you. Lind mentions that some jihadi organizations pay the widows or parents of jihadis who were killed while warring for Allah. In this way, they build a strong devotion to the community who come to view the jihadists as "good guys."

While winning hearts certainly applies once open fighting occurs, winning hearts is something that we could start doing today by becoming pillars of our communities. This is a great need because we lack true leaders. Think about it—if the shit hit the fan, would you really follow a politician like Paul Ryan who's only loyalty seems to be to making himself richer?

There are three basic ways to become a leader. The first is to become a community leader through involvement with your church, a local club, or running for some sort of elected office—say councilman or school board member—and do good work without thought to enriching yourself. You will shine like gold amidst the corrupt politicians. The second way is to gain a following on the internet or other public medium. Many of us would rally around Roosh before Hillary Clinton. A third way is to build credibility with those who are closest to you so that they look up to you as a leader.

The time to start winning hearts is now. Maybe things will never degrade to the point where armed conflict is necessary but even if it doesn't, being a leader in your community will stand you—and your community—in good stead.

Conclusion

This is only an introduction. If you are serious about learning 4GW, it will take a lot of additional reading and training. The good news is that you do not need to quit your job and join the Marines. Much of skills necessary to wage 4GW are probably things you are already doing if you are a regular ROK reader.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The 7 Greatest Bodybuilders Of Our Generation

Michael Sebastian

Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why We Need Larry David And Curb Your Enthusiasm

July 28, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

Recently, HBO announced that Curb Your Enthusiasm, the premium cable network's longest-running scripted comedy or drama show, will return to the airwaves after a five-year hiatus. But now "It Is 2016", to quote pandering progressive Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, a time when political correctness has steadily wreaked havoc across the comedy scene writ large.

Comic luminaries Chris Rock and Jerry Seinfeld have openly disavowed political correctness, while the unfunny Sarah Silverman has cravenly embraced it by insisting comedians should submit to the thought control and "change with the times." Right.

Needless to say, today's comedy is in jeopardy. Due to the surge of identity politics, a leftist medium (and really an excuse) for self-declared societal victims to voice their grievances while silencing others in the process, comedy has been unable to breathe. Comics, satirists and provocateurs alike are now sued and made financially liable for their jokes, physically threatened, and, most recently, banned from major social media websites.

Comedy is craving a renaissance. With the upcoming return of Curb Your Enthusiasm, we may have an answer to all this speech policing. What I like to longwindedly call "the new show about nothing about the co-creator of the old show about nothing," Curb Your Enthusiasm is about the life and pratfalls of Larry David, the said co-creator of NBC's Seinfeld. Since Seinfeld ran for nine seasons, it is only fitting that Larry would want to attempt a season nine of this series and take one (?) more stroll along the Curb promenade.

Like with Seinfeld, Larry is known for taking his own real life experiences, harvesting their humorous elements, and applying them to Curb Your Enthusiasm's interconnected sitcom plots. Taking into account his conversation with Jerry Seinfeld on Comedians In Cars Getting Coffee and his stint on Saturday Night Live where he did a hilarious sendup of the finger-wagging Bernie Sanders and an idiot Donald Trump protester who can only parrot "Trump's a racist!", it is quite possible Larry is also privy to this assault on humor, logic, and common sense by the politically correct left.

Larry David is a rich white liberal… and he knows it

Let's not kid ourselves, though: Larry David is, indeed, a rich white liberal who golfs with "Nobel Peace Prize-winner" Barack Obama on Martha's Vineyard. But one of the many keys to Larry's brand of humor is his chronic self-loathing ("I do hate myself, but it has nothing to do with being Jewish!" he insisted in Season Two's episode, "Trick or Treat") and obsessive self-awareness. PC liberals, however, only have the first, which they project onto others via guilt and power tripping.

As a rich white Jewish liberal, Larry is as aware and bashful about his privilege and social stature ("Oh stop it, I have no stature!" he rebutted in the show's pilot) as he is confused by it—a Wandering Jew in high society. He is always curious, roving about and trying to decipher the purpose of the different yet equally bizarre social codes and phenomena that sheeple, typically the wealthy kind, tend to comply with and encounter on a somewhat regular basis.

Larry David donated nearly thirty grand to Obama's 2008 Victory Fund… the President better have paid the man's green fee.

After cashing in on Seinfeld, Larry became a liberal by lifestyle. His fame afforded him comfort and luxury, plus the ability to interact with Hollywood's uppity elites. But Larry is a misanthrope; this is apparent in his early career when he walked off the stage at the start of a set after getting a bad vibe from his audience. Now you have the same recluse—only rich and living in a liberal wonderland—whose occupants are likely the same type of snooty people Larry walked off from that long-ago night.

The magic of Curb is that Larry manages to ridicule liberal attitudes on HBO, a hugely pro-liberal television platform. He pulls this off probably because Larry's show is not political, per se; while Curb centres on Larry's rich white liberal lifestyle, it mocks the behavior and prejudices of all creeds and colors.

No one is spared: white people, black people, hispanics, the disabled, fat people, liberals, conservatives, Christians, Muslims are all thrown under the proverbial bus. Larry's humor is not at the expense of everyone but himself; instead, the "bald asshole" sticks himself in the middle of these antics, and whether he is on the right or wrong side of things is always up for debate.

Where Youtube essayist Nerdwriter called Louis CK a "Moral Detective", Larry David is a "Social Detective"—one who rarely solves the case. Curb episodes are riddled with unanswered mysteries: was Michael J. Fox pissed or was it just Parkinson's? Did Larry tip the waiter twice? Did Leon masturbate on those bedsheets? What was the Weatherman's Golf Tip?

"What a freak!" In "Curb", no one is spared from satire.

Putting question marks at the end of those running gags, Larry's lack of closure here is the punchline. He shows the absurdity of life and all these little social codes. That, at the end of the day, there is no absolute answer – our curiosity remains in suspension, tormented by our own assumptions.

Political correctness will suffer at the hands of Larry David

Political correctness's core flaw is that it discourages curiosity – it tries to shame it, control it. That is why political correctness is anathema to comedy: it inhibits comedians and comediennes from getting down in the muck of our own hypocrisies and deepest prejudices and, in turn, mocking and exposing them. Larry's comedy takes us out of our safe space. It has nerve.

Take Season Six's finale, "The Bat Mitzvah," where Larry pretends to be mentally handicapped to deter a potential tenant from renting a next-door office. The scheme works flawlessly and the freaked tenant tries to feign politeness and is then scared away.

Today, I can just see PC crybabies complaining about and obsessing on Larry's exaggerated imitation of the mentally disabled. They would take to social media and blogs and BuzzFeed castigating Larry David as ableist (or whatever new phobia they'd invent). Moderate leftists would then take cues from this and publish "impartial" think pieces like "Is "Curb Your Enthusiasm" Discriminatory To Disabled People?", thus inadvertently lending credence to these ridiculous claims. In response, Return Of Kings would be compelled to publish a piece titled ""Curb Your Enthusiasm Is Not and Never Has Been Discriminatory – Here's Why", etc. All this noise when, once again, the PC police would be missing the point.

Like the majority of Curb's gags, Larry's intent is not to mock a type of person or thing, but the behavior in response to that person/thing. Larry pokes fun at how the abled respond to the severely disabled: with disgust sublimated into pity and "compassion." Larry points to the fact that many able-bodied people are turned off by the disabled, so they act overly polite and courteous to them to absolve themselves of the guilt for feeling so.

Take "The Safe House" episode, where Larry asked a black man to watch a white man's laptop at a restaurant. When the surly laptop owner loses his device, he confronts Larry and blurts, "you gave it [my laptop] to a black guy!". Mortified, the man tempers his voice and corrects himself: "I mean… why wouldn't you give it to a black guy?".

That is what Curb Your Enthusiasm illustrates: people want to be decent but, deep down, we can be racist. We can be bigoted. We can be prejudiced. We can be angry. Most importantly: we can be confused–about ourselves and the way we think of and treat others. Larry David is confused like us.

Curb is so successful because it is relatable in that sense. It taps into the things we tend to think but rarely dare to say. It's unfiltered, uncensored, mercilessly funny and yet not savage. It pushes the envelope while remaining good-natured in its comic nudging. This is why we, or I for one, eagerly await the show's return to save us from today's humor-resistant political correctness.

Rest assured: Larry David and the upcoming ninth season of Curb Your Enthusiasm will Make Comedy Great Again.

Read More: ROK Podcast: Culture War Analysis With ROK's David Garrett Brown

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

10 Answers To Questions About American Politics

July 28, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The next Q&A video is on USA politics:

Here's the index so you can jump around:

0:13
"If you were a president or a influential congressional member, how would you encourage nationalism without neglecting minority groups such as blacks, latinos, asians, etc? Since those groups do have political and financial power. Also how would you keep nationalism in check to prevent another world war since keep in mind that nationalism and militarism were the primary causes of WWI and a factor (not the primary cause) of WWII." (JANE PETERSON)

6:52
"If Trump fails to deliver on what you expect and/or is a disappointment, what do you recommend we do?" (MERCENARY)

10:21
"If you became president, what executive orders would you make the first day in office?" (SAGETTAURUS)

15:17
"What is the actual end goal of causing division and chaos with BLM/Islamic "refugees" etc? Cause enough fear that they can implement martial law? What is the point? I see that the point of global trading, immigration, and feminism is economic due to cheap labor and increased tax revenue, but what is the point of causing racial division in the US? What is the end game of having sharia in Europe? Or are the powers-that-be just naive?" (SLIM SHADY)

20:26
“Cops quite readily violate probable cause and other such statutes, and lie to get their way – often supported by other cops and courts to charge especially young people with frivolous yet serious crimes. Yet, after the BLM bullshit we have forgotten about these violations and become “pro-cop”. How do you reconcile the real infringements on freedom by officers while not giving ground to race-baiting terrorists?” (SLIM SHADY)

24:44
“While organizations such as Black Lives Matter are dangerous and need to be stopped, it has become obvious in their inaction that the police are handcuffed by bureaucrats, while average citizens are being jailed for ludicrous offenses on a daily basis. What are your feelings on holding police accountable for 1) Their inaction when groups like BLM disrupt peaceful meetings (like the Young Republicans gathering at Depaul) and 2) Continuing to enforce immoral and unconstitutional laws that enable gun confiscation, seizure of assets, false rape accusations, and unfairly targeting and arresting men during domestic violence encounters?” (DJDJDJ)

28:23
“Do you think that any American leader (Trump or anybody else) can reverse this third-wave, toxic feminism or is America simply too far gone? Another way of asking this is: after the meetup outrage in Feb, have you given up on America?” (JOHN QUINCY)

33:30
“I have alleged that bringing men into the RoK-sphere is a step-by-step process. First we convince mainstream Republicans to the anti-feminist side, then expose them more and more to the RoK. I seriously doubt mainstream America will go from embracing the gender equality message to Roosh V overnight. And we need mainstream America to convert. Why do you antagonize female anti-feminists?” (JOHN QUINCY)

36:20
“What should be the #1 medium-term strategic goal of the nationalist/patriot wave? In my mind, it’s destroying the media. Do you have a different assessment?” (LIBERTAS)

39:11
“As a man on a college campus, how can I fight against feminism?” (JUSTIN)

This announcement originally published on RooshV.com.

Previous Video: 14 Answers To Lifestyle And Health Questions

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

9 Measures To Prevent Future Terrorist Attacks

July 29, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

On the 26th of July, two Muslim men entered a small church after mass in Saint-Etienne du Rouvray near Rouen, France. Armed with knives, they took the few nuns and attendees hostage and eventually slit the throat of Father Jacques Hamel, 86.

They recorded and probably live-streamed the event before being gunned down by police. Both of them were well-known criminals, jihad candidates, and one even had an electronic bracelet.

This could have been avoided

As our readers know, I come from Normandy where this happened. From a town just like Saint-Etienne du Rouvray. This could have well happened in the church where my grandmother goes every day.

This occurred after the Nice rampage and a string of terrorist attacks that happened worldwide, during and just after the month of Ramadan. These attacks are against two symbols: French people and Christianity.

If the justice and government had done its part, many more (not just French) people would still be among us.

The perpetrators

The guilt is shared by two factions: the terrorists and the incompetent politicians that do not manage to do what they are paid for: protect their citizens. Western lax governments do not want to intervene to the source, or they would have done it already. They have blood on their hands, plain and simple.

Islamic terrorism can be targeted on three main levels:

1. The source (ISIS, its propaganda, radical clerics)
2. The middle man (media propaganda promoting immigration, fake refugees sent by ISIS, economical migrant who acts)
3. The target (surveillance of churches, security screening, army)

There is only a limited number of blockades, cameras, and soldiers with which the target can be protected. It would be important to first apply measures to the source and the middle man. Here is how.

1. Stop immigration

Reinstate border control and abolish the Schengen zone. No open borders. Use a veto on the German decision to bring refugees in the country. Hungary did it, we need to follow the example.

"If Europe allows a competition of cultures, then the Christians will lose. These are the facts."
~ Viktor Orban, Prime Minister of Hungary

Legal immigration bans need to be studied individually. Not all citizens of “Muslim” countries can be banned, where the entry would be refused to Vassili, a 40-year-old Orthodox Christian worker from Kazakhstan, and granted to Abdel Karim, an unemployed 23-year-old male from the Djihad ghetto of Molenbeek in Belgium.

2. Remove the elites in power

The French government and others use a textbook ineffective anti-terrorist approach (some accuse them of doing it knowingly): an anti-terrorist "Ligne Maginot," where you barricade yourself behind patrolling soldiers (less operational forces) and spout more white noise like gallows candidate Manuel Valls' speech "Get used to live with terrorism".

More hand holding and unity where there is none. The old "divide and conquer" is recycled as they cannot reinvent the wheel. Recently, the government threatened the surveillance service of the city of Nice if they do not destroy 24 hours of video recording on the day of the terrorist attack. To hide their blatant mistakes, or cover their tracks?

Governments that act in this fashion cannot be trusted and need to be exposed and removed. Let's get rid of those clowns and install conservative, nationalist governments. Voters have to impose requirements to the candidate. He needs to say no to political correctness and efficiently fight the problem and put it in words: Islam wants us dead.

3. Target the terrorist's family

Souad Merah, Mohammed Merah's sister. After her brother's death during his murderous raid and even after she flew to Syria, she was still receiving 2000 euros a month in benefits

Let's use the counter-insurgency method that Russia uses in Chechnya by focusing on the families of the wannabe jihadis. They do not care about their own lives, it is clear. But they might think twice if the well-being of their parents and relatives are threatened.

Many of recent terrorists attacks involved siblings working together. The family must be considered by default as accomplices. They see them preparing an attack, they do not report, they are guilty.

Demolish their houses if it is their property or evict them as it is often done in Israel and Russia. Create a national file with internet providers, refusing them any web access on multiple devices, similar to national gun ownership databases or most wanted lists.

Children of terrorists are not responsible and under a certain age, should be placed in the custody of the state or deported with the mother if they have dual citizenship.

4. Control the source and their media

ISIS capitalizes on isolated elements in Europe and the West in addition of the trained agents that they sent from Syria to act. The native elements share common flaws: hate of the host culture, boredom, no solid plans for the future, sexual frustration.

They are sitting on their arse, fascinated by the well-edited videos of the Islamic State, thinking how they could make a difference. Remove this material and they will stay in their loop of inactivity, joint smoking and TV binge.

Conservative gay man Milo Yiannopoulos is censored on Twitter while ISIS-owned Amaq Agency still has a platform. We know why.

Legal decision must be taken by the government against firms such as Twitter, that still relay terrorists messages after investigation of their nature. They should be indicted for treason.

An attack on the brand that is ISIS is also a good start as Mike Cernovich details in one of his recent articles.

Active contributors to jihad-friendly sites could use VPNs, or public wifi where they could be monitored. The providers of public wifi should do their job and forbid the access to Islamic propaganda material like they do with porn or torrent websites (or the Roosh V Forum).

5. Cut the funding

Revoke the benefits received by potential terrorists and their immediate family and their internet connection. Publish the names of all the terrorists, those condemned in terrorism related trials (name, age, physical description, address).

See if there is any legal way to seize or freeze the money they send to their family from racket or criminal activities or the one they send just before launching their attack. Freeze the funds that the parent organizations send to the terrorist's family.

Expose and confront ISIS backers, point at powers like Turkey, the Saudis or your own government that support them and spread the word.

6. Create strong native men

Another root of the problem is our men being weak. ISIS explains it, they “need to inspire fear in our hearts.” We should reverse the situation.

Our men need to develop a sense of strength and resilience, in body and mind. It is much harder to intimidate someone that is armed, resourceful, well organized and can manage fear and act under pressure.

You can also not stand alone. You can be a highly trained soldier with state of the art equipment, enough stick-thin idiots with rocks will be able to kill you. You need to have a tribe to count on.

7. Reform the laws

We need an effective justice system with prison terms without remission, adapted specifically to radical Islam targeting the host culture. The laws need to condemn those who clearly have the intention to join terrorist factions overseas.

Reinstate the death penalty for convicted terrorists if apprehended alive. Adapt it in the way that according to Islam, the condemned won't reach Heaven. Lethal injection of alcohol and pig blood laced with cyanide after forcing them to sign a written statement where they renounce and disavow Islam and the teachings of the prophet could work.

We must allow law abiding citizens to arm themselves. Background checks should prevent people from purchasing weapons; especially if:

- They have a criminal record or have been institutionalized
- They have been affiliated with Islamic groups in any way

Dual citizenship criminals need to be deported and stronger requirements for acquiring citizenship should be applied, favouring jus sanguinis over jus soli.

8. Prevent radicalisation in prisons

Radicalism is often encountered in prison and is a global phenomenon—with less distraction and being constantly around the same radicalized people, budding terrorists assimilate and learn the trade.

Control access of inmates to Islamic material and imams visiting prisons. They are not required by their religion. It was imposed in prisons of the Western world to be more "compassionate."

Remove imams, separate inmates during prayer time as it would be materially difficult to prevent them from praying alone. Isolate them in cells with no windows so they cannot find Mecca.

Stop granting them privileges like allowing them to eat at night during Ramadan. Remove their special menus. Let them starve if they don't want to eat pork. Now even the terrorist who took part in the Bataclan shootings is allowed special treatment with a private sports room.

In places like France, prisons are overpopulated and over 70% of the inmates are Muslims. To separate them, we need more prisons.

9. Make the media accountable

We have to be ruthless with our lying media, exposing them and their agenda while proposing alternative sources of information.

Mainstream media constantly downplays the horror of the terrorist attacks to avoid a reaction of anger from the natives, by omitting barbarous acts, finding the terrorists excuses, rephrasing their headlines (like some left-wing French newspapers said that the Normand priest Jacques Hamel was just "killed" instead of having his throat slit like a slaughtered animal) or changing the names of perpetrators so they sound less Muslim.

Their dishonesty needs to stop. This method is efficient as we see that lying firms such as Twitter or Gawker cannot lie without suffering consequences. The brand suffers from bad publicity.

En fin de compte

Drawing by Ben Garrison

This set of measures is a double-edged sword. If the people that reach power have their own agenda and a community like the manosphere goes against it, such measures could be enforced on us. Hence the importance of choosing our leaders wisely.

A pledge incorporating this type of requirements should be signed by the leaders we intend to vote for. Choose the lesser of a few evils as eventually you can only count on yourself and the tribe you trust.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 80+ Killed In New French Attack, Police Don't Want Video Uploads To Compromise Narrative

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Industrial Revolution Has Led To An Incredibly Powerful System Of Elite Control

July 29, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Most of the problems that we have in modern society stem from the side effects of the industrial revolution. In exchange for conveniences, order, safety, and technological advances, we suffer from existential malaise, lack of genuine pair bonding, broken familial and tribal units, chronic disease, and having to be ruled by a small group of people who possess immense centralized power. While most of you would continue to live in a post-industrial age in spite of the downsides, it is arguable to say that we certainly live in a "better" time.

The industrial revolution has allowed for two key events:

1. The control of most economic and human output of the Earth by a relatively tiny group who control the minds and behavior of billions of people.

2. Explosion in population thanks to advances in agriculture, hygiene, and medicine.

The result is we have more people controlled by less people. The controllers have the power to essentially drive the face of humanity in a way that could not have been done before the industrial revolution. Globalization, multiculturalism, and socialism are the most efficient and logical ways for the elite to assert control over the planet, and since the dawn of modern banking, they have pushed exactly those ideologies throughout the world.

The elite have convinced us that we are living in a glorious progressive age, but it's more glorious for them than it is for us. They give us handouts through their welfare state, cheap electronics, and lax sexual morals while they gain immeasurable power and wealth, in what could be considered the most unfair trade that the common man has ever made. They put five dollars in your pocket while you relinquish your own agency and fabric of your society.

Here are nine conclusions we can make from observing how the current system works:

1. Life in a post-industrial revolution age is full of social ills and psychological suffering as humans live in sterile and unfulfilling lives, far away from what nature intended.

2. The elites have engaged in a depopulation agenda that first targets the strongest groups most capable of armed resistance against them. A superfluous population hinders their power and control objectives.

3. The demolition of our industrial system and a return to pre-industry and traditional life would increase the well-being and fulfillment of humanity, but result in the death of perhaps half the world's population from the lack of agricorp food, especially for those who live in cities.

4. The elites want to maintain the industrial system solely for their own ends. Some depopulation, or "population control" as they call it, helps them maintain their control as technology improves and much of the masses are no longer needed to work. Their end goal is to be the primary owners of mineral, economic, and human resources on Earth, with a decreasing need on humans.

5. The control of the elites can only be eliminated by destroying the industrial system, starting with modern finance and banking. Doing so would improve the lot of humanity for the ones who survive, because they would be pulled out of the matrix and experience existence closer to its natural biological intent, but only after billions who are currently dependent on the matrix perish. Many of us would not survive.

6. Anything that degrades the system but doesn't destroy it, while keeping the power of the elite cabal intact, along with their control on world governments and culture, will have a limited and short-term effect on improving the state of humanity, because the elite will simply use the surviving system to rebuild control. As long as modern finance exists, based on the usury and central banking format, humanity will always be controlled by a small group of merchants who can then corrupt all institutions of a society with the agenda that is most conducive to their business dealings.

7. The most harmful action to the elites in the near term is to have many children. They consider it acceptable if you embark on a life of fornication, atheism, homosexuality, consumerism, cosmopolitanism, liberalism, and cuckservativism, but they do not want you to breed those who are self-aware and may one day kill them. Unless your descendants go after the system instead of mere representatives of the systems (e.g. politicians, journalists, academics), they will not end up creating a better world for humanity, especially if they have been weakened by questionable vaccines, school propaganda, and agricorp food.

8. Having children that become pawns in the system is becoming a negative outcome for the elites. Human subjects were needed in the past to generate wealth, but technological advances are starting to make humans a net drain to their goals. It can be assumed that the mainstream promotion of homosexuality and transsexualism within a country is the signal that the population is being actively targeted for mass reductions. The immigrant agenda is more to weaken natives instead of serving for economic gain.

9. The system is currently showing signs of stress because a rapidly growing number of people are believing in ideas that threaten elite control. This suggests that the elite were too hasty in pushing the most degenerate parts of their agenda before their control programs were perfected.

From the above conclusions, we can propose three future outcomes within the next few centuries:

1. The system will be destroyed through a massive crash due to black swan events or human resistance that the elite is unable to put down. Humanity will proceed with a mass culling of the population as we re-enter a pre-industrial “dark” age.

2. The system will be fortified by the elite and humanity will be controlled even tighter. Eugenics programs will be more efficient and effective, and those living won’t even know their reproductive system is being tightly monitored and controlled (this could already be occurring). The future population will be a fraction of what it is now.

3. We will have a hybrid world of technologically advanced but depopulated countries in perpetual war with barbarian nations that reproduce strongly but lack advanced technology. Imagine a world where a few million elites in the West control military robots that try to eradicate billions of Muslims and Africans who won’t stop breeding.

The first step in defeating the elites is to understand where the battle really lies. It’s not in the left versus right debate, a controlled sideshow for public consumption, but globalism versus nationalism. It’s likely that some countries will see the successful rise of nationalism, but as long as the industrial system exists, and multinational banks and organizations can bide their time while they fund the enemies of nationalists (charging interest in the process), any nationalist resurgence would just be a short-term blip unless a determined sect tries to take down the entire industrial system. It’s clear to me, at least, that it’s not only the globalists that need to be crushed, but the very system that they created.

The only question is how you want the human population to be decimated: through the guiding hand of the elites or through the destruction of the system that most of humanity is currently dependent on.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: Ted Kaczynski's Manifesto Predicted The Catastrophe From Technology And Liberalism

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Reasons Why Men Do Not Belong In The Delivery Room

July 30, 2016 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

In 2016, it's normal for a father to be in the delivery room when his child is born. It's now become so commonplace that a man who refuses entry will be perceived as a failing father.

However, if we do a quick review of the topic, an opposite view becomes apparent. For most of Western history, as well as Eastern, it was unheard of for expectant fathers to enter a delivery room. The birth of a child was overseen by doctors and midwives. And a man's presence in the middle of this moment was seen as a dangerous intrusion.

This all changed in America in the 1970's during the feminist movement. In the name of ~~naivete~~ equality, women began insisting that their husbands enter the delivery room. The trend gained so much momentum that it is now practiced in many countries. The fact that this trend began with feminism should be enough to raise a red flag. But, for the benefit of the doubt, I did an objective analysis of the topic. I found that there is a growing body of opinion–from both liberal and conservative voices–that men do not belong in the delivery room.[1] [2] [3]

1. It makes the delivery more difficult

This is taking a long time and it hurts like hell…but at least we're adhering to the feminist narrative!

Michael Odent was a British obstetrician. He delivered children for over 50 years, and performed close to 15,000 births. In a 2008 article he wrote for The Daily Mail, Dr. Odent argued vehemently against the presence of expectant fathers in a delivery room. He points out the ways in which it can complicate a delivery:

> First, a laboring woman needs to be protected against any stimulation of the thinking part of her brain–the neocortex–for labour to proceed with any degree of ease…motivated by a desire to 'share the experience', the man asks questions and offers words of reassurance and advice. In doing so, he denies his partner the quiet mind that she needs.

Odent goes on to say the following:

> The second reason is that the father's release of the stress hormone adrenaline as he watches his partner labour causes her anxiety, and prevents her from relaxing.

And a third reason to boot.

> Their interference at this key moment is more often than not the main cause for a difficult delivery of the placenta, too.

Summary: Women need to relax during a delivery, and the doctor needs to concentrate; subsequently, having a father present will complicate the process.

Unfortunately, Odent insinuates that men are the ones to blame for the problem. His word choice is telling and it reeks of political correctness—the husband "denies his partner her quiet mind," "prevents her from relaxing," and he commits "interference" at a key moment. Apparently, Dr. Odent can write a pussy pass just as well as he can a prescription. Newsflash, good sir: it was the feminist badgering of soon-to-be fathers that led to the change—not vice versa.

His bias aside, the point still stands. A man's presence in the delivery room can prevent the woman from relaxing—thus making the delivery more difficult.

2. It Can Lead To Depression In Men

God, there he goes with his “feelings” again…Loser!!!

This one is ironic, because we so frequently hear of postpartum depression in women. The United States is filled with postpartum centers, meant to assuage female grief. But we never hear that men can—and do—suffer a postpartum depression.

Dr. Odent points out that it’s quite common:

> I have seen something akin to post-natal depression in many men who have been present at the birth…men often take to their bed in the week following the birth, complaining of everything from a stomach ache or migraine to a 24-hour bug.

If women are reading this article, I expect an avalanche of empathy regarding male postpartum depression. I expect a wave of hashtags, flooding the social media landscape. I expect hospitals, in the name of equality, to start opening male postpartum depression facilities in hospitals throughout the country. Most modern women are obsessed with equality, so they will be vocal in this fight for social change!

Wait…who am I kidding? The average woman is indifferent to male suffering. Notice how silent she is regarding the high rate of male suicides, incarceration, or prostate cancer. Remember that most women do not fight for male causes—they couldn’t care less.

3. It Harms The Sexual Intimacy Of The Couple

The solution to seeing her vagina part like the Red Sea.

I should have put this number one. This is age-old wisdom, passed down from our grandparents and their grandparents: When a man sees his wife giving birth, he could lose sexual interest in her.

Odent again confirms his firsthand experience with this phenomenon:

> When men first started standing at their partner's side during labour, I remember my mother's generation saying, very matter of factly, that the couple's intimate life would be ruined as a result… And, given that the key to eroticism is a degree of mystery, I am left believing they had a point.

*Manosphere Bonus: She is Preparing you for Twenty Years in Baby Jail

Let me add something that medical professionals have not mentioned. There are two reasons that a woman would urge a man into the delivery room.

- She is following the social trends of the day, unaware of its origin or potential harm.
- She is quite aware of the potential sexual damage that her actions will entail; but her ultimate goal is to destroy the relationship, so that she can pursue a partner with a higher SMV.

We no longer live in the 17th century, where a woman's moral character was monitored by the whole village. We live in feminist Bablylon, where females who divorce their husbands are celebrated. They receive book deals, public support, and have "divorce parties" thrown for them.

Once you realize this, you will understand why so many women want their beta-provider husbands in the delivery room. They are trying to destroy the intimacy of the marriage. What better way to do this than to have her beta provider (a man she has no passion for anyway) watch her vagina open bigger than the Holland Tunnel?

Remember, she never wanted to marry the beta provider in the first place. She was 38 and having baby rabies, so she grabbed the nearest shlub she could find. Deep down inside, these women know the marriage will not last. Their eventual plan is to cheat on him with alpha cock (perhaps Raoul, the personal trainer at 24 Hour Fitness). Then, they will hook him for eighteen years of child support and lifetime alimony if she is lucky.

She is betting that beta husband becomes repulsed in the delivery room, losing his sexual interest in her. That way, five years later, she can blame him for the demise of the marriage. She can say, "you lost interest in me" and that's why the marriage is over. Really, she planned the divorce all along, planting the seeds of destruction by insisting he enter the delivery room in the first place.

Let me repeat what I just said: inviting a man into the delivery room is a passive aggressive way to destroy a marriage.

Conclusion

For the few of you who have found a decent gal, let reiterate my advice. The wisdom of ages arrived at a universal conclusion—men do not belong in the delivery room. Only until the 1970s, and the feminist revolution, did this thousand-year old practice change.

It's time to turn back the hand of time. If you plan to have a child, educate your wife. Do not let yourself be trolled by second-wave feminism.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Brian Logan

Brian Logan is a writer that spends more than half of the year traveling abroad. He believes in self-improvement via hard work, reason, and creativity. And oh yeah, he has a thing for hot Latinas that know how to cook.

Will Neomasculinity Create A New Patriarchal Religion?

July 30, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

As neomasculinity is refined and polished, can we look to history to see if a new masculine and patriarchal religion may also arise for future kings to claim authority by?

The background needed to answer this question came to me in reading a book by an author that started the gay rights movement in the 60s and 70s. Yes, a gay man may have inadvertently written the very book that predicted the coming patriarchal renaissance in the West.

The God Of Ecstasy: Sex-Roles and the Madness of Dionysus was written by Arthur Evans, an early gay rights advocate who is best known for his book Witchcraft and the Gay Counterculture. The God Of Ecstasy is the Bible, in my opinion, of the entire Western feminist and SJW attack on Christian patriarchy and heterosexuality. If read with those eyes, one cannot help but agree with the author's conclusion by the last chapter.

> Planet earth has a male problem.
>
> Arthur Evans – The God Of Ecstasy (1988), p 176

Which is to say, a male HETEROSEXUAL problem.

If you read this book and replace patriarchy with heterosexuality, the author's entire argument would still be valid. This book confirmed for me my theory that it is not patriarchy, but heterosexuality that is the real enemy of SJWs, and yes, perhaps even the gays themselves. (A gay man saying there is a male problem is pointing directly at himself. Thus, his logical argument must be a male problem of a SEXUAL nature, i.e. heterosexuality.)

While Arthur Evans, a militant atheist, did an extraordinary job of tracing the historical, religious and political rise of "patriarchy," he failed to realize that if viewed from a religious conservative lens (God – truth – justice), what he has also done is trace the history of the rise and triumph of the heterosexual moral world view. Which, not surprisingly, gave rise to a heterosexual religion: Christianity. Thus, Evan's book is also a history of religious development in the West.

In short, what Evans has to say about patriarchy is as follows:

- There was a time when the mother goddess was worshiped going back to the stone age
- The mother goddess had a king, consort, or son who just happened to be an effeminate, gay, transvestite
- Everyone partied, got drunk (wine) and got high (drugs were added to the wine, not in this book but another I have read)
- Suddenly, these "war lust" patriarchal men came down from the north
- Over time, these aristocratic patriarchs first absorbed, them sublimated, then eliminated the loving mother goddess and her effeminate Son of God Dionysus (in many forms) from society and culture (No, I am not making this up, this is history.)

While Evans blames the destruction of the peace, joy, ecstasy and happiness of the mother goddess and her effeminate son on the war loving patriarchal invaders from the north, I believe the truth is far more simple than that.

The growing truth of male paternity, and thus of natural sex defined gender roles and identity

Thus, a new religious-political framework emerged to match the new, and scientifically accurate, understanding of the procreative process. Very quickly, children and wives became the property of the father under his protection and supervision. It took awhile, but in time, Christianity was the salvation religion that summed up the growing knowledge of man and God at the time.

- There is a single power in the universe
- This power governs over all humanity with truth and justice
- Man and woman are the foundational unit of society (i.e. children and family in heterosexual marriage)
- The state was created for the protection of the family unit
- Anything that threatened the family unit was to be eliminated (i.e. anything counter to the discovery of the male role in procreation)

This is what they gay author Arthur Evans truly laments about the patriarchal oppression of humanity.

The rise of heterosexual moral views on sex and gender

Paternity, to heterosexuality, to patriarchy.

In reading this fascinating book, I question popped up in my mind. Was there a religion for pure, heterosexual men in the past?

While there does not seem to be any evidence for this in Greece, Rome is another story. Evans points out that Rome and the Roman Empire was particularly patriarchal.

> The absence of such a thrust [a patriarchal God, Zeus, legitimizing Dionysus to be accepted by Greeks] on Shiva's part [the Dionysus equivalent in The East] and his [Shiva's] demand to be accepted as a god on his own terms imply that the victory of patriarchal [i.e. heterosexual] religion in India has not been as extensive as it was in Greece.
>
> Arthur Evans – The God Of Ecstasy(1988) p 134, my notes in braces and emphasis added

I have always wondered if there was something particularly unique about the West. There is. It is an acceptance and elevation of the masculine, heterosexual man, something you just don't find in eastern culture to the same degree. If this was the case, where did these men find religion, find salvation, in the culture of their time in history?

Mithraism

Mithraism was a unique and short lived mystery cult in Rome that was subscribed to mostly by the Roman soldiery. Its basic beliefs and practices were:

- A single God, Sol Invictus (the sun), the invincible one that never dies (life everlasting)
- Mithras born from a rock, not a God or Goddess
- Ritual meals of good food and drink
- Members were "united by the handshake"

- Met in underground temples apart from mainstream society
- A secret mystery cult open to men only
- Rome was its centre

While Mithraism draws on Persian origins, the debate is still on as to whether it is a direct copy. Much evidence does seem to hint that the Roman version is a distinct variant in the West and I would support this with the above observation by Evans that patriarchy (i.e. heterosexuality) was distinctly greater in The West than The East.

Evans does reference Mithras in his book (p 161), but makes the completely incorrect assessment on what the bull represents. Evans believes that the bull sacrificed by Mithra is yet more evidence of a past goddess and bull (i.e. Dionysus) religion being everywhere worshiped in the past. Technically, he is correct, but he is not able to connect worship of Mithra to worship of the bull because he can't. He is merely trying to point out similarity to Christ's birthday with that of Mithras (Dec 25th). Thus, he is arguing that Christ or Mithras is yet another form of Dionysus worship since the bull was sacred to Mithraism and the idea of a life after death salvation was central to Dionysus worship (especially the Orphic version).

What Evans fails to see, or does not want to, is that the bull, the symbol of the god Dionysus, is SLAUGHTERED by Mithras. Everywhere else, the bull is worshiped and if not, those that deny the bull god Dionysus are themselves driven mad and ritually slaughtered as punishment (cue Euripides Bacchae).

In Mithraism, the bull or Dionysus symbol is NOT worshiped, only Sol Invictus, the invincible one is. Another fact of separation is the birth, death, and re-birth cycle is broken completely, rejected, and a new everlasting life after death mystery takes its place.

Perhaps what we have here in Mithraism is reference to an underground male heterosexual revolution and rejection of the entire alcohol and drug crazed, goddess-and-homosexual worshiping nonsense of mainstream society?

In ancient times, where does a pure, 100% heterosexual man go to temple?

You really had only two options if you were not a Jew, hinting at an explanation for why Christianity was so widely embraced when Paul preached to Gentiles:

1) Some variant of a female goddess (usually a militant virgin), or a male god that merely took over the role once assigned to a goddess

2) The effeminate transvestite god running around dressed and acting like a woman demanding you worship him or get ripped to pieces for denying his divinity or his homosexual advances. (Evans skirts around this issue but I believe it is to be found if one reads closely enough.)

These were your religious options as a male heterosexual in ancient Rome. Is it any wonder the Roman soldiery came up with their own religion?

Thus, what we appear to have in Mithraism is:

- A bunch of heterosexual men (my hypothesis)
- Who fight in the army to protect their families and increase their ability to provide for them
- Who believe the state is the best form of protection for the family they are responsible for
- Meeting in secret
- To worship a single God or power that is never defined in any written orthodox scripture to get into arguments over
- Who greet each other as members with a simple and distinctly masculine handshake (So, just friends then right? You don’t want to butt-fuck me do you?)
- Then go about eating, drinking, socializing, carousing and having a grand old time without any women or faggots pestering or nagging them

Does that sound familiar at all to anyone here? As a Roman heterosexual male soldier, would you want to join that kind of mystery cult?

While the idea of a new patriarchal religion arising out of neomasculinity may sound absurd at first read, it is not when you look to the past 2000 plus years of patriarchal history.

Jesus Christ came into the picture at the time of Rome's collapse, when Dionysus worship was increasingly being practiced and women were gaining economic and political power and independence in Rome.

> The Roman Senate's banning of the Bacchanalia thus took place in the context of a patriarchal [i.e. heterosexual, my note not Evan's] and militaristic society at a time when it's official values were being undermined by new belief systems and practices originating from it's conquered neighbors and when power relations between the sexes in the ruling classes were changing due to economic causes.
>
> Arthur Evans – The God Of Ecstasy(1988), p 125

If that does not send a shock through your brain knowing the venomous and divisive rhetoric around feminism, LGBT, SJW's, ROK and the online masculine movement and Muslim immigration, nothing will.

While the banning of the Bacchanalia did not stop the collapse of Rome, what is clear is that the rise of Dionysus worship (i.e. homosexuals) and women in politics and economics (i.e. feminism) was a leading indicator that Rome's days were numbered. The irony is that instead of liberation from the patriarchal yoke of the Roman Empire, the pagans got an even MORE patriarchal system with the rise of Christianity.

Will neomasculinity usher in such a new patriarchal religion in the 21st century? If history is any guide, the future will be even more patriarchal than the Christian era of the past 2000 years.

And Return of Kings, the obscure rantings of a bunch of small penis, sexless, dateless, losers who advocate teaching men to rape while living with their mom in the basement, may go into the history books as the intellectual genesis for a new patriarchal religious and political system of thought for man for the next 2000 years.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Does Life Have Inherent Meaning Without Belief In God?

Maximus Decimus Meridius

Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

16-Year-Old Girl Portrays Post-Millennials As A Hopeless Generation

July 31, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Unless you have a younger sibling, you probably don't know what the generation after millennials (Generation Z) is like. The following email from a 16-year-old girl to ROK shows that they could be the most degenerate and dysfunctional generation of humans that the world has ever seen. Her analysis confirms what I already know about them based on the information shared to me by my two young brothers.

> I've been wanting to write this ever since I read your piece on an e-mail you received from a 17 year old girl. Reading what she said to you meant a lot to me because it confirmed in my mind that there are more people out there that don't agree with everything going on in our world right now, more than I thought.
>
> After reading the comments on it I spent a lot of time trying to decide whether or not I would say something and I decided that I would.
>
> My generation (I'm 16) is getting worse every day. As someone who has had Twitter for a while, I've been front row the last few years to the craziness of people who I used to consider my closest friends. The social justice movement is a sham filled with narcissistic people. You definitely already know this. However, I want to share with you further on some of my own experiences.
>
> Back in 2012 when I first made a Twitter, I talked to many different people, many of which still use their accounts. Just four years ago these girls seemed normal enough, happy, and content with their lives. Just as an estimate, I would say > these girls were around 12-13-14 years old back then. Early high school and late middle school ages. Back then, not a single one of them talked anything about having a different gender identity or sexuality.

Youth are increasingly identifying as pansexual and gender fluid

> Now, only four years later, it would be extremely difficult for me to even choose a small handful of those people who have not came out as something. Back in 2013, it was being bisexual. Now, pansexual is the new favorite "sexuality" among everyone on Twitter. These days, it is not "good enough" to be gay. The more "oppressed" you are, the better. People who identify as pansexual love it because they can on the outside seem "oppressed" while they can still date and be attracted to males publicly. This is how it works. Changing your sexual identity to one of these insane inventions is a fast, easy, and mess-free way for people to get rid of privilege points.
>
> Being "gender-fluid" is also another new popular trend. People saying they are gender-fluid can get away with being "oppressed" without actually having to go through the entire gender-change hormone thing that people with real mental dysphoria do. They can dress the same, adopt "they-them" pronouns and pretty much lead life exactly the same as before. Then, there are the genuinely confused and stupid (be careful using the word stupid, it's extremely ableist. I was attacked last week for saying it) people that identify as "male" because they don't like stereotypically girly things like wearing dresses and makeup. When did not liking to wear something become enough to believe you are something else than what you really are?
>
> I know for a fact these people are doing all of this for attention. I know you probably already have come to that conclusion, but I want to make it extremely clear that these people know exactly what they are doing.

Youth are faking mental illness for attention

> I also want to talk about mental illness. I vaguely recall someone on ROK or possibly somewhere else talking about how my generation is full of people who are depressed, suicidal, among others. Let me come out right now and say this is false. People on Twitter, while they preach against people "romanticizing" mental illness, are actually doing this themselves.
>
> An old friend (I no longer talk to her) once had an open conversation with me about how she was faking being depressed and suicidal on her social media. She was going to a therapist, took medication, and to anyone else might genuinely seem like someone with a problem. However, she opened up to me after feeling bad that she was lying to me about it. I wish I still had the messages, but I don't as this was about a year ago. But I can recall her saying that she did it because she didn't feel there was anything special about her and she did it because she > wanted to make friends.

>
> If this is not pure insanity I really don't know what is. This girl was taking medication for a mental illness she did not have. She knew she didn't have it. She was in no way confused about how she felt. She didn't directly say she was doing it for attention, but I think anyone with eyes could understand that was exactly what it was about.
>
> These people are manipulative and it will only get worse as time goes on. I've watched each of my friends of many years succumb to this madness and now I feel like the last one standing. I'm terrified that I'm going to be the next one to be brought into this absolute craziness.
>
> Living in a large city in the US it's hard for me to get away from all of this. I go to a public school and my only way to separate myself from these people is to not talk to anyone at school at all, but I don't think that's very healthy either.

14-year-old girl has neverending supply of "boyfriends"

> I also feel extremely vulnerable to all of this because I seem to be exactly what people on ROK believe is the makeup for disaster: I live in a single mom household. I still talk to my dad everyday, but he lives across the country from me. I look at my older sister and I see someone who has had nonstop different boyfriends from the age of 14. I don't want to think that I'm going to end up like that but sometimes I can't help wondering. But I've been doing everything I can to try and stop that from happening.
>
> Still, I've never had a boyfriend. Maybe that's because since moving out here a few years ago I have barely spoken to anybody in school, let alone guys. The only friends I have that I have known in real life are from where I moved from, and maybe 2 or 3 from the last school I went to here. So far this has been working out well for me. I don't have to see these people everyday so maybe that's helping me from being influenced by them. But I'm entering my senior year of high school now and I can't help but feel worried about it. I could be next.
>
> However, like I said before I've been doing everything I can to stop myself from going down a bad path. Over the last few months specifically I've made a few friends online who share the same thoughts as myself on all of this. It feels better to be talking to people that I don't have to lie about what I believe in. I remember about two months ago one of them mentioned that she read your articles too and I can't express how shocked I was that I wasn't the only one.

If you don't agree with social justice, you must hide

> I guess what I mainly want to say is that it's my personal belief now that there are many young people who don't agree with the social justice movement. They are hiding, but they are there. The girls I've become friends with are good people. Mainly I wanted to say this because the comments on the piece about > the 17 year old girl seemed all very discouraged that the girl sending you that e-mail was fake. Personally I think it was real. Maybe it was, maybe it wasn't. All I know is that even if it was fake, there are still real people out there because I know them.

>
> I know it says to add a photo, but I'm not going to because the threat of being found out is way too risky. The idea of existing the next year in school with people who know I've written this or that I read your website is terrifying and I don't want to risk it. Not to say that I think you would post it, but I think you understand well how dangerous it is today to put your information out there.
>
> Thank you for taking the time to read this. Whether or not it will mean anything to you, I don't know, but I just wanted to put it out there.

There should be nothing shocking in this email to ROK readers. Because the culture has yet to hit rock bottom, I fully anticipate the post-millennial generation to shock us with forms of deviancy and stupidity that we have never before seen.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Lena Dunham And The Hollowness Of Millennial Girls

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

When It’s Okay To Listen To Fat People For Fitness Advice

July 31, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

In addition to my interests in general physical fitness, I also like to consider myself something of an outdoorsman. While I do not profess to be any sort of an expert, a combination of a few years in the Boy Scouts—before the organization got completely neutered—and my parents showing me these activities has given me a lifelong interest in camping, hiking, fishing, and other woodsy hobbies.

Since woodcraft has become somewhat popular in recent years—indeed, you can hardly swing your arm without hitting five “preppers”—this has prompted me to ask a question that has been nagging me about alleged survivalists for quite a while:

Why are so many of these people so goddamn fat?

While having a small layer of fat is likely a benefit in a survival situation (indeed, ancient Roman Legionnaires would cultivate an extra 10-15 pounds of fat on their bellies in case they were lost without food), it seems pretty obvious to me that carrying a debilitating amount of flab on your stomach would only hurt your chances of survival. In other words, I have yet to see evidence of a Legion that encouraged its men to be so out of shape that they were incapable of marching more than 100 cubits before dying of heart attacks.

Something that is impressed upon you in the Scouts is the “rule of 3”: you can survive 3 minutes without oxygen, 3 hours without warmth and shelter, 3 days without water, 3 weeks without food. And from there you have the Maslow Hierarchy of Needs and so on and so forth. The stress of increased body weight, labored breathing, lowered stamina, lowered circulation, higher body heat and a higher degree of perspiration probably doesn’t help that whole “retain oxygen and water” thing, and probably negates the mild advantages one has in the other two categories (I admit that I am just conjecturing here, I don’t believe there have been any studies involving dumping people of various girths into the forest with no supplies. If there have been, please correct me). Clearly, in this case, being obese would be a major negative.

This started a train of thought in my mind: Was there any case where a fat person could give legitimate advice on physical activity?

I see idiots like this in sporting goods stores far too often

Function Over Form

While this problem is most notable in outdoors related fields (at least in my experience), I have noted that in other types of physical endeavors you will sometimes find people who appear to be out of shape giving advice on fitness. And while in an overwhelming majority of the time these people can be ignored, there are times where one has to put forth the age-old “function over form” argument. This article will try to posit a few instances when you can ignore your gut instinct and take Fatty’s advice.

The first instance is if you can prove that his affliction is, in fact, glandular or genetic. Certainly there are overweight medical doctors, who would obviously know what a proper diet is like. And while it is not likely that all of them have glandular issues, if you can prove that this is the case, his advice may be worthwhile.

Secondly, while the stereotype of fat people with overinflated senses of self-worth is one that is oftentimes founded in reality, if he or she (and by that I almost always mean “he”) can truly function despite his (rotund) form, then his advice can be considered to be even greater than that of a trainer with a trim physique. Speaking hypothetically, if you were to find a fat person capable of performing, say, gymnastics at an Olympic level, I would legitimately say that his advice would be worth far more than anything I could give, as the muscular strength and endurance necessary to perform at a high level with such ponderous weight would be, speaking non-hyperbolically, Herculean.

In a much more realistic context, I would also posit myself as a mild example of this phenomenon—while I am not remotely what you would call “obese”, I freely admit that I am on the smaller side of “burly”, and could likely stand to trim down 10-15 pounds—having a day job and bills to pay means that I can’t be as lean as I was when I was a college kid walking several miles a day. However, I am still capable of performing every exercise and technique that I instruct my readers on—hence why I will always use pictures of myself unless I am incapable of doing so for reasons that will always be explicitly stated.

Thirdly, somebody might have been a physical specimen in their youth, but have gotten out of shape in their old age-their body of knowledge is still formidable, and they are still worth deferring to in questions of technique and experience. This can be observed in former athletes-turned-trainers such as many World’s Strongest Man competitors after their competitive days are past.

And finally, some sports do indeed require a bigger physique—namely, sports that require quick exertions of maximal strength such as Olympic weightlifting. To put it bluntly, the strongest men in the world (i.e.: the heavyweight class of strength sports) are not men that are going to be running marathons as well. Lifting heavy weights above your head will create a thick, heavily muscled midsection without doing any supplementary work. In addition to this, their workouts require an enormous caloric intake. There is also some theorizing that having an extra layer of fat on top of the muscles also provides a layer of cushion for the joints when lifting large amounts of weight.

Ignore that this fellow failed his lift.

Conclusion

In general terms, I always advocate the state of being strong rather than looking strong, so the first way to critique a fitness trainer is to see if he is capable of practicing what he preaches. More specifically, the type of training that you are seeking will greatly affect your assessment of the person in question.

So, I will state the blindingly obvious: most occasions where a person appears fat and out of shape, that person is somebody who has no business giving fitness advice. But if you keep an open mind, and put them to the test, you just might find a proverbial "diamond in the rough."

Read More: Ancient Sparta Showed That Women's Rights Are A Function Of The Economy

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

4 Ways To Stop Being A MGTOW

August 1, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

When I wrote my last article on MGTOW, I was glad to see that many people saw the movement for what it was, including many former members who had decided to leave the group after realizing that it was poisonous to their drive for life. And I am encouraged to believe that there are many more men affiliated with MGTOW who will also realize that there is an alternative path once they're shown the way.

Man doesn't thrive with complacency that is indirectly (perhaps directly) promoted by MGTOW, he demands more from life. Once a man believes that he can improve his station in life instead of being stuck in it, I believe that he will get moving. If you are a MGTOW who is feeling disillusioned and dissatisfied with the group, here is a guide to get you started to a new life. As for any man who is proud to call himself a MGTOW, spare yourself the triggering and stop reading here; this is not meant for you. That is, unless you enjoy outrage reading like the feminists.

1. Recognize MGTOW for what it is

First, you must understand why MGTOW exists and what bring these men together. MGTOW may have started with the right intent of defying the gynocentric system that exploits men, but it has quickly turned into a congregation of young men who come together to validate each other's bitterness and frustration. Instead of doing anything to improve their lives, the majority of MGTOW feel the need to attack anyone who suggests self-improvement because it reminds them of their own lack of effort (just note how often they come to this site to spew their hatred instead of staying in their own sphere).

And for all the cries about society "shaming" them, the members of the MGTOW are the most vitriolic group today (along with the feminists) that constantly shames men for sharing tips on improving their lives. I can somewhat accept bitchy behavior from feminists as they're women, but to watch these "men" throw a hissy fit over articles on attracting women or becoming a better man (none of which they were forced to read) is both hilarious and cringeworthy at the same time.

2 ^ | v • Reply • Share ›

Hector • 2 months ago

The author of this dumb article is the best illustration of a beta slave to the vagina.

1 ^ | v • Reply • Share ›

Ask yourself: what compels a man who has supposedly "gone his own way" to come to a site they claim to hate, read an article on attracting women which they clearly don't care for, then leave a comment to "shame" and attack other men? Simple: jealously and insecurity.

MGTOW also claim that their group isn't about rejecting sex altogether, but as soon as another man makes even the slightest effort to have a relationship with a woman, they go apeshit about how he is a “slave to pussy” or a “PUA loser” (for some reason, they think anyone who has sex with a woman is automatically a “PUA.” I’m sure only a very small number of writers and readers of ROK are actual PUA’s).

Many of these men have a twisted worldview where all relationship between men and women are either slavery through marriage or a charade by men dressed like clowns who are desperate for sex. Some even develop more bizarre conspiracy theories where every word or action of another male group is an effort to force marriage or sell books on pick-up. Their mind is so warped that simply having a different perspective on man and society gets interpreted as advocating hatred or violence against the entire male population “just to get laid.”

To escape this men-rejecting-women-not-being-rejected-by-them club, you must recognize that the MGTOW inseminates damaging ideas about life and the world and poisons the soul with negativity. Just as feminism grew beyond from a movement for equality, MGTOW has grown beyond its original purpose.

There are couple of MGTOW contributers whose videos I’ve actually enjoyed, but the majority of their followers are men who are stuck and lost. Bitterness and even anger is normal for those who take the red pill, but perpetually staying in that stage is unnatural. If validation and venting out anger is all that you seek, sure, knock yourself out. However, if you want more from life, you need to get out of the bubble and see the world with different eyes.

2. Drop the loser mentality

MGTOW Logic 101: “Stop shaming men!” … “PUA pussy worshiper!”

All things considered, MGTOW, ROK, and other men’s groups have more things in common than the differences. We all recognize the disease that is feminism and we are all faced with the new realities that modern society has to offer for men. The main difference really comes down to mentality.

Most members of MGTOW suffer from a fixed mentality where they don't see the possibility of things getting better for themselves. Instead of making things work despite the odds, these men want to disengage and be complacent. That is fine if you want to settle, but for those who want more from life, you must choose to fight. To change, you must first fix your mentality so that you believe in your ability to grow and demand more from yourself.

Another thing would be to grow a thicker skin and not take general criticism of MGTOW personally. I thought MGTOW wasn't even a group or a movement? Why would you feel slighted if you've gone your own way and the criticism doesn't even apply to you? I suspect that many MGTOW members love to insult other men who they perceive as being better than they are because their fixed mindset doesn't allow for self-growth. Instead, they must bring others down to their own level with their toxic negativity just to feel better about themselves. Don't be like that.

3. Know that withdrawal and giving up isn't the option

Mr. Mean-Spirited • 9 minutes ago

An article-writer who assumes that it is advisable to adjust one's basic character to fit the current fashion has a very superficial understanding of the masculine mind. Where is the evidence that "self-improvement" is desirable or even doable? Trying to make yourself better is only going to make things worse. Trying to change yourself is only going to destroy your true nature.

If contentment is truly possible, serenity might be found in accepting your true personality, not in altering your persona to suit other people.

Reply • Share ›

If this is how they actually think, I'm not surprised they see MGTOW as a safe haven. These individuals are no different from the feminist fat-acceptance movement.

The best thing you can do for yourself is to strive for tangible results rather than moping about how bad the system is. We already all know what a raw deal marriage can be in the West, there's no point rehashing that fact over and over again once you are already aware of it. What matters is what you're willing to do in response.

You can either try to find a woman who is a wife material (and go abroad if you have to) or reject marriage and all other forms of relationship with women. But constantly reminding yourself and advertising to everyone else that you're a MGTOW—to a point of criticizing those who have successful relationship with women—is petty and unproductive.

4. Take steps towards changing your life

If you're a MGTOW who is already keeping himself busy with various activities, good, keep it up. But if you're the kind to trawl the internet for hours at a time, looking for things that validate your beliefs while attacking anything that challenges them, you should get off your computer and do something else. You must escape from your complacency. Try new things, do things you are avoiding, learn something new, travel and meet women who are not poisoned by feminism. Do something beyond the same old things that burn your time. Just don't get trapped in your own mental prison.

To conclude, I must stress again that I know there are MGTOW with the right idea keeping themselves productive for their own sake. I also couldn't care less for those who pride themselves in accomplishing nothing and feeling proud just for saying they're "going his own way." But those who've only been exposed to MGTOW without knowing that there are other available options out there should be aware of them so that they can make their choice.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why "Men Going Their Own Way" Is No Way For Men To Go

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

3 Ways The O.J. Simpson Saga Confirms Red Pill Truth

August 1, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Back in early June, ESPN released their most anticipated documentary in their 30 for 30 series, OJ: Made in America, directed by Ezra Edelman. Though it's been more than 20 years since the trial of the century, the O.J. Simpson saga is still among the most talked about stories to this day.

OJ: Made In America, for my money, is the final word on all things O.J. Simpson. It thoroughly and completely dissects every element of his life from his humble upbringing in San Francisco, to his stardom on and off the football field, to his murder trial, to his current stay in Lovelock Correctional Facility in Nevada.

Seeing the world through the lens of neomasculinity, red pill truth was confirmed at practically every turn of the 8 hour, 5 part documentary. So often, in fact, I had to pause it regularly to jot my thoughts down for this article. That said, here are three ways the O.J. Simpson Saga confirms what we already know here in the 'sphere.

1. Men hate on men who live better lives than they do

Throughout the documentary the underlying theme that was prevalent in all of Edelman's interviewees was the fact that his "whiteness" was the main reason for his downfall. Male after male, said things like "Being a sellout out cost him" and "I knew he was lost" were uttered by some of his closest friends and people who followed his life.

This was little more than men being envious of the life Simpson lived. O.J. had it all: Money, looks, and endless supply of women, and a trophy wife to boot. While famous black athletes such as Lew Alcindor, Cassius Clay (who later became Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and Muhammad Ali respectively), and Jim Brown were fighting for civil rights, Simpson was living it up in Hollywood and had no intention of getting involved and it rubbed them the wrong way.

Front row from left to right: Bill Russell, Cassius Clay, Jim Brown, and Lew Alcindor

This isn't to say that these athletes didn't have a gripe in terms of being perturbed with O.J.'s choice to distance himself from the civil rights movement. Being put off by a young black athlete reaping the benefits of their hard work without having contributed anything himself is understandable.

But at the end of the day every man is in control of his own life and decides what he will and will not do. A lot of sports fans seem to have this idea that professional athletes have an obligation to speak out on social issues but that's simply not true. Just because LeBron, Carmelo, CP3, and D-Wade use their platforms to talk about these things doesn't oblige other athletes to follow suit.

People have always outwardly endorsed the idea that every man can do anything he chooses to and be anything he wants to be. This is exactly what they fought for. O.J. made his choice and because of that choice he lived a much better life than they did and it pissed them and every other black man who suffered during that time off.

So statements like "O.J. didn't know who he was" or "He was in denial" by Joe Bell, lifelong friend, Danny Bakewell, a civil rights activist, and others are dead wrong. Simpson knew exactly who he was and wasn't in denial about anything. Furthermore, he sure as hell didn't care about what people wanted him to be. He was his own man regardless of what people said or thought about him. Any man with red pill knowledge these days acts much the same way and as a consequence, catch the same heat from other men like O.J. did back in his hay day.

2. Girls will be girls and hamsters gonna hamster

Female nature was front and center from beginning to end in this documentary. Let's get right to it:

Projection

Robin Greer (a post-wall blonde who was prominent in the film), one of Nicole's close friends laid bare her female nature for all the world to see. There were too many red pill nuggets to count from this chick but one that stood out to me was this statement:

> "There was something about Nicole that was almost unattainable to O.J....something that he couldn't quite control, and I think that was part of the attraction…

I literally laughed out loud when those words escaped her lips. Those in the know (read: neomasculine) know that nothing wets the panties of women more than a man who cannot be tamed, controlled, or kept. Female solipsism leads them to believe that sexual attraction is symmetrical. They consistently show their ignorance in these matters by describing what attracts them to men when talking about themselves or other women. I've touched on this in the past:

Blondie here wasn't fooling anyone.....at least not men who are unplugged. Women love men who are unattainable and they project this attraction by defining themselves or other women in this way.

I will also add that she talked about being cornered by O.J. several times (presumably for sex) but never gave in to his advances. Even if I hadn't seen the arousal in her facial expressions as she told this story, I still wouldn't have bought it.

Women will always favor strength

The lead prosecutor for the Simpson trial was Christopher Darden. The DA's office thought that pitting another black lawyer against the formidable Johnnie Cochran would even the racial odds in the trial.

Darden, by all accounts, seemed to be a solid lawyer but it was very clear from the jump that he was over matched by Cochran and his legal dream team. This was not lost on the jury, which was comprised of 10 women, and 2 men.

Darden and Clark were no match for Team Simpson…and they both knew it.

As most of us know, a pivotal moment in the trial was when Simpson tried on the gloves which, at the time, didn't come close to fitting. I'm not going to go into the details in terms of what lead to the decision and the aftermath. But when juror #2 summed up the fiasco and what it meant to her personally, she once again confirmed more crimson capsule truth (I'm paraphrasing here).

> I can't believe he [Darden] did it [let O.J. try on the glove]. You let him [Cochran] play you. You were the weaker one. And you didn't have to be.

She later said she felt sorry for him because he looked weak.

“If it doesn’t fit, you must acquit!”

Females pity weakness but more importantly they favor strength. That’s always the way it’s been and always the way it will be. Darden had enough evidence to lock Simpson up for life but because he, Darden, wet the bed when the pressure was on, the female jurors looked down on him which didn’t help matters in their deliberation.

Regardless of whether a man is a good guy or bad guy, has the truth on his side or not, if there’s no conviction, no strength, and no confidence, not only will women not respect him as a man, but everything they stand for is looked at as a joke.

Females love being owned by aggressive men

Throughout the documentary, Nicole’s friends and family members opined at length about how abusive Simpson was toward her and how possessive he was. The 911 calls and pictures of her bumps and bruises made it clear that their tales of his dubious dealings with his trophy wife were probably true.

Here's the thing: This is the reason she stuck around for so long. No, I'm not saying she liked getting her ass kicked by her 6'2″ 210lb ex-football star of a husband every other night. But I've written before that volatility and aggressiveness are both traits females are attracted to whether they admit it or not:

> …when a female is in a physically abusive relationship, there is very little boredom. No, there's no fun in getting her ass beat, but the adrenaline rush that comes with the unpredictability of her lover's volatile mood keeps her on her toes and for better or worse it keeps her around.

A couple of the many examples of this truth that stuck out to me was when Nicole "complained" in one of her letters that 'he [O.J.] hit me when he fucked me' and when she told an orbiter of hers "I think I like this guy" after she told him O.J. had been 'forceful with her' and ripped her jeans.

No, it is not okay to beat your wife for no reason. And no, Nicole didn't think to herself "Boy oh boy I hope O.J.'s in a bad mood so I can get my ass kicked and call 911 again!" But excitement, whether it be terrified excitement or not, is still excitement. And no matter how much she complained to friends and family members, no matter how many times she called the cops (who, more often than not, didn't file a report at her request), she was always going to love O.J. His abusiveness and volatility only deepened her feelings.

Few things in today's sexual climate make women more loyal than the threat of violence, being owned by a man who shows that he can and will resort to violence, and being reminded of that on a regular basis. Nicole Brown Simpson was just another in a long line of women who was no match for her biological programming.

3. Alpha males always live the best lives

O.J. Simpson was a bona fide alpha male through and through. To add to that, he was probably a sociopath who exhibited all three dark triad traits on a regular basis depending on the situations he found himself in. He took what he wanted without apology or remorse, and could charm the panties off of any girl he wanted (one woman described this “phenomenon” as being “O.J.’d).

The O.J. saga is well documented and before this documentary, the public at large probably thought they knew most everything about his life and trial, myself included. But I have to admit that even I was surprised by a few of the stories that were told about him.

O.J. stole his best friend’s girl and made her his wife

The friend he stole the girlfriend from? A.C. Cowlings, the driver of the white Ford Bronco in the most infamous police chase in U.S. history. The story goes that O.J. and his friend Joe Bell were on their way to a party in another part of town. When they arrived at Marguerite’s (A.C.’s girlfriend) house, O.J. instructed Joe to sit in the back seat so she could sit in the front next to him.

Young Simpson and Cowlings

The rest, as they say, is history. O.J. ended up marrying Marguerite, who had 3 of his children. But the fact that the man whose girlfriend he stole ended up as a ride or die comrade is what separates Simpson from most men. Dudes steal their friend's women all the time. It's not right but it happens. But to then turn that man into your closest ally to the point where he drives the getaway vehicle for you as a fugitive of justice is rare indeed.

There was also a story where A.C. jumped in front of O.J. to shield him from a friend pointing a gun at him (supposedly a joke) and said "If you want to shoot O.J., you gotta shoot me." Simpson's infectious personality affected both men and women alike and he was well rewarded for it.

O.J. claimed Nicole as his property before she even knew him

According to an acquaintance, O.J. was with a friend at an exclusive club in Hollywood when a drop dead gorgeous 18-year-old blonde who was waiting tables there caught the eye of the ex football star. Not 10 seconds after she crossed their paths he looked at his friend, pointed to Nicole and said:

> I'm gonna marry that girl!

O.J. knew he'd have her the moment he saw her

At the time he was still married to Marguerite but that didn't matter. He saw what he wanted, claimed it, and made it happen. This is what alpha's do day in and day out.

Unbreakable Frame

After he was acquitted for double murder, Simpson foolishly thought he would just move back into his Brentwood mansion and be loved and accepted back into the community as though nothing ever happened. Unfortunately for him, this was not the case.

People heckled him at golf courses calling him a murderer, holding up signs, and insulting him loudly. Anywhere he went he was ridiculed and persecuted by just about everyone. But through it all, as a friend said, he acted like he didn't even hear or see it.

Call it denial, call it coping, call it whatever you want. But the red pill truth is that O.J. simply maintained frame. I'm sure it wasn't easy and I'm sure there was a lot more happening beneath the surface than people saw as they hurled insults at him. But that's the point. No matter what's going on inside, never let 'em see you sweat. Simpson didn't.

Eventually he would move out of Brentwood because the IRS seized his home but no matter what people said to him or about him, his demeanor was as stoic as a statue. That is the very definition of rock solid frame.

He was instrumental in his own defense

Carl Douglas, an attorney on Simpson's legal team, regales us with a story about how O.J. took him aside after Douglas cross examined someone from the prosecution, looked him in the eye and said "Wipe that spit off your mouth!" Douglas obliged.

Douglas taking instruction from Simpson

According to Douglas, Simpson was in charge and made it clear early on. He'd tell his attorneys what to wear, how to wear it, which jurors to key on, and just about everything else. He was a control freak to the highest degree. He likely knew very little about the law, yet, he had no qualms with asserting his dominance over the men who literally had his life in their hands.

Simpson was keenly aware of everything

Anyone who watched the trial and observed O.J. mainly saw him sitting stoically and watching the proceedings. Little did we all know that he had complete control over his lieutenants and was pulling the strings behind the strings. One might argue he had almost as much to do with his acquittal as his legal swat team did.

Was O.J. guilty?

No. He was acquitted by a jury of his peers.

A better question would be: Did he do it? You know it, I know it, and O.J. knows it. All of the evidence pointed to Simpson and only Simpson as the killer. I talked about this in a column last March:

> Let's face it. They had O.J. dead to rights. All the evidence pointed to his guilt (except for these) but because of the exploits of Mark Fuhrman, an obviously tainted jury pool trying to "make up" for what happened to King, and the best criminal defense lawyer money could buy, Simpson walked.

Anyone who doubts whether or not he killed his ex wife and her friend even before watching this documentary is lying to themselves. People wanted him to be not guilty….and he wasn't. That doesn't mean he didn't commit double murder and get away with it…

…which is exactly why this confirms, yet, more red pill truth. Simpson was rich, which allowed him to hire a legal team that used the race card in the perfect city to do it in, at the perfect time just two years after the Rodney King incident, and was the beneficiary of an obviously biased jury pool (one of which was a former member of the black panthers who stood in the jury box and raised his fist in declaration of 'black power' after the verdict was read). In addition to an inept prosecution and racist cop who was made the focal point by the defense, it was the perfect storm that allowed O.J. to get away with murder.

This guy was made the villain and didn't help the prosecution

What's this have to do with the red pill you ask? Simple. Simpson should have been convicted. But he wasn't. Women should be attracted to good, honest, men, who don't abuse them, and take good care of them while giving them respect and providing them with a good life.

But they don't.

What should be and what actually is are two very different things and the O.J. Simpson saga shined a bright light on what most of us here already know.

Read Next: 3 Reasons Women Stay With Abusive Men

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Germany’s New Security White Paper: The Beginnings Of Change To Migration Policy?

August 1, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Beyond the depressing headlines, there may—perhaps—be grounds for cautious optimism that the German establishment is waking up to the fact that they need to change their security doctrine. Angela Merkel’s recent white paper on Germany’s national security challenges seems to indicate that her government is slowly becoming aware that major changes need to be made to both security doctrine and implementation.

While it is still too soon to tell if actions will match the rhetoric, one can at least detect quiet shifts in German security doctrine from a careful reading of Berlin’s most recent security white paper.

Europe in general and Germany in particular has been reeling in 2016 from multiple terrorist attacks. Chancellor Merkel, nothing daunted, has doubled-down on her pro-immigration position with the mantra of “We can do this.” Bavarians were less convinced. Horst Seehofer, the Bavarian premier, angrily attacked what looked to him like willful blindness coming out of Berlin.

“I cannot, with my best will, adopt this phrase [‘We can do this’] as my own,” Seehofer recently said. He went further in remarks to the news outlet Die Welt: “A ban on the full body veil—that is the niqab and the burka—is overdue. My impression is that we all underestimated a year ago what would come upon us with this big refugee and migration movement.”

While for political and statecraft reasons Merkel may continue to adhere to her line, her recent security white paper suggests subtle changes of mentality and direction. We will explore some of them here.

The purpose of the white paper is to discuss security policy and the future of the Bundeswehr. What one notices from the first is that this paper is at least free from the apologetic baggage that always seems to weigh down any German discussion of military affairs. This in itself may be a sign that we are finally starting to close the curtain on the post-Second World War era complexes of anti-nationalism and guilt.

In many ways the paper does not go far enough: most issues are couched in the framework of acting in conjunction with NATO allies, which may be seen as code that Germany continues to hesitate to act unilaterally. The following statement, for example, sends the message that the country continues (on paper, at least) to see the need to ask others for permission to defend itself:

> Our interests remain closely interwoven with those of our allies and partners. Germany values reliability and loyalty to its allies. It is only in cooperation with others that Germany can protect its territory and open society, make effective use of its profound but limited resources, and unfold its innovative and productive potential. Pursuing German interests therefore always means taking into account the interests of our allies and those of other friendly nations.

NATO continues to be presented as the indestructible linchpin of security policy, at a time when many believe that the country should be looking to more of an independent course. How much of this is just rhetorical genuflection, and how much of this is actual policy, will remain to be seen.

But there are some good things here. We must look to the subtleties, and realize that the true meanings lie in the obliquities of what is said. There is an awareness that, as the years roll on, it will be increasingly difficult to separate internal from external security. This is a clear reference to the refugee problem, and points to a realization that unrestricted immigration can be tied to security threats. The following quote, regarding mass migration, would never have been made even five years ago:

> In large numbers, uncontrolled and irregular migration can, however, entail risks both for the immediately affected region as well as for Europe and Germany. The ability to absorb and integrate migrants can be overstretched, which can lead to social instability. Refugee movements resulting from violent conflicts can also cause such conflicts to spread throughout a region.

We can also detect a willingness to move away from the traditional constitutional prohibitions on the military’s becoming involved in domestic affairs. The military will now assist the local governments to deal with threats, blurring the distinction between local and national security. The following statement is an important one:

> It is no longer possible to draw a sharp distinction between internal and external security. Disruptions and threats can frequently be found in the grey area in between. The vulnerabilities of our open and globally interconnected society are deliberately targeted. These circumstances necessitate an effective whole-of-government approach to security. This includes protecting the sovereignty and integrity of German territory and German citizens and rescuing German nationals in emergency situations abroad.

This is a major step, quietly pursued out of the headlines; it is one that would not have happened without the wave of terrorist attacks that has hit Europe in 2016. Much the same changes are happening in Japan, which after much agonized soul-searching is moving beyond the post-World War II mentality to something new and different.

With the advent of cyber warfare, hybrid warfare, and other types of non-traditional conflict, it is clear that the old rules no longer have the same utility that they once had.

The German Federal Security Council, composed of the chancellor and select ministers, will now have a greater role than before. It also appears that the chancellor will have enhanced capabilities to deal with real-time threats. The emphasis now is on prevention rather than on dealing with problems after the fact.

That is, there will be more proactivity, and less reactivity. In conjunction with this, the size of the army will grow to 185,000, which represents a modest increase of 7,000 persons. One would have hoped for a larger increase, and for a much larger commitment to defense spending. There is also a clear understanding that increased participation in foreign military operations will be required by new conditions:

> Germany must participate in the prevention and stabilisation of crises and conflicts as well as in post-crisis and post-conflict management, depending on the extent to which it is affected and its available options. A forward-looking, comprehensive and sustained approach is required for this purpose which also includes civil society and cultural factors. Prevention always takes precedence.
>
> Long-term prevention and stabilisation will only succeed if local and regional actors are enabled to assume responsibility for themselves. Strengthening good governance and respect for human rights in such states is therefore of paramount importance. The early recognition of crises is essential for effective involvement at an early stage. We must combine national and international, state and non-state expertise to create a clear overall picture.

German policy in recent decades has tended to be slow, methodical, and cautious. so it would be unrealistic to expect any grand, sweeping changes at this point. But, if we read between the lines here, we can detect the beginnings of what may become significant changes in German security policy. As always, the real test will lie in how the system responds to future challenges.

Read More: It's Time To Make Men Strong Again

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Hillary Clinton Supporters Are Attempting To Incite A Red Scare Against Russia

August 2, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Red panic has gripped America once again, though the people stoking it are far different and their motivations more sinister. Following Wikileaks' release of hacked emails from the Democratic National Committee—emails that revealed how the DNC rigged the party's primary to elect Hillary Clinton and showed the extent to which the mainstream media functions as their official propaganda wing—the left tried to distract everyone from talking about their corruption by blaming Russia. No, seriously:

> "We know that Russian intelligence services hacked into the DNC and we know that they arranged for a lot of those emails to be released and we know that Donald Trump has shown a very troubling willingness to back up Putin, to support Putin," Clinton said in an interview with "Fox News Sunday."

In the days after Wikileaks released the emails, leftists went berserk, claiming that the Russians were behind the hack (with no proof whatsoever), accusing Vladimir Putin of trying to influence the presidential election, and even accusing Donald Trump of being a Manchurian candidate for Moscow. Curiously, none of them have taken note of the multitude of other countries who are also sticking their hands into the American cookie jar, most notably Mexico, whose government has been funding riots at Trump's rallies.

It's quite telling that the only country that leftists don't want influencing the government is a white, traditionalist, Christian one. The left's anti-Russian hysteria isn't simply repugnant: it's a throwback to the anti-communist fervor of the early 1950's. The difference is that while Joseph McCarthy's claims that communists had infiltrated the government had validity, the left's hatred of Russia is rooted entirely in their paranoia and hatred of healthy, prosperous societies.

The Left’s War On Russia

Masha Gessen, lesbian activist who agitates against Russia

Before and during the Cold War, leftists were in love with Russia. The Soviet Union represented the end goal of leftism: total state control over every aspect life. Because of this—and also because the Soviets extensively funded efforts to infiltrate Western institutions—the American and European left sided with Russia at every opportunity. For example, during World War II, leftists promoted the idea of opening a second front in Europe with the goal of taking pressure off of the Soviet Union, when the militarily smart move would have been to let the Nazis and Soviets destroy each other. The Normandy invasion was completely unnecessary; all it did was enable the U.S.S.R. to colonize much of eastern Europe.

Similarly, in the 1950’s, leftists in the media and government smeared Senator Joseph McCarthy when he courageously pointed out that Soviet agents were deeply embedded in the State Department and other prominent federal agencies. The Venona Papers—a collection of decrypted messages from the Soviet Union’s intelligence agencies released in 1995—later vindicated many of McCarthy’s claims. Later, in the 1980’s, leftists vociferously opposed Ronald Reagan’s aggressive stance towards the U.S.S.R., claiming it would lead to war; Ted Kennedy even begged the Russians to intervene in the 1984 presidential election and help defeat Reagan (irony).

The love between the Western left and Russia died when the Soviet Union collapsed. Since the end of the Cold War, Russia has transformed itself from a failed socialist state into a patriarchal, traditionalist one, reasserting its place as a world power. Christianity has been revived and takes a central role in Russian life, open homosexuality is frowned upon, and George Soros-funded front groups have been banned from the country. The reason why Russian (and other eastern European) women are known for their femininity and beauty is because these nations resist the moral turpitude of the West.

All this naturally makes Russia an enemy of the degenerate left. Anti-Russian feelings among leftists exploded in 2012, when members of Pussy Riot, a Western-funded leftist agitator group, were arrested after they broke into an Orthodox church and disrupted a mass in process. Leftists began foaming at the mouth a year later when the Russian government formally banned homosexuals from distributing propaganda to minors. When Russia began attacking ISIS last year—and actually made progress towards dismantling the Islamic State—Barack Obama shit a brick and "moderate" Republicans such as John Kasich and Lindsey Graham began speaking of war with Russia.

The left's fear of Russia is simply their fear of normality, of white heterosexual men taking back what's theirs. They're aided by clueless cuckservatives who still think the Cold War is on and Russia is the Red Menace. Additionally, a large number of Russian Jews in the American political establishment, such as neocon Max Boot (a prominent #NeverTrump Republican) and radical lesbian activist Masha Gessen, have spent their careers agitating for more conflict with Russia. (Ilya Sheyman, another Russian Jew, is the head of MoveOn.org, which was behind the riot that shut down Donald Trump's rally in Chicago last March.)

World War Gay

Common Filth and other commentators have quipped in the past that the U.S. will start World War III with Russia over the issue of gay rights, and those predictions are disturbingly close to coming true. The left's irrational hatred of Russia combined with our constant meddling in their internal affairs (for example, see Ukraine, where we helped instigate an anti-Russian coup right in their backyard) ensure that tensions with Putin will continue to escalate.

This is lunacy. Beyond the fact that Russian society is one that we should aspire to emulate, Russia is a superpower with a nuclear arsenal. Vladimir Putin is not some tinpot potentate of a third-world hellhole; he’s a crafty leader with a strong military and a nation of hundreds of millions behind him. Hillary Clinton will almost assuredly escalate tensions with Russia, possibly bringing us to war, destroying what is left of America with it.

The left hopes to distract Americans’ from the Democrats’ corruption and malfeasance by ginning up a Red Scare 2.0, and we can’t let them get away from it. Leftists’ hatred of Russia, combined with the apocalyptic ramifications of war with Putin, are too significant to ignore.

Read More: Why Vladimir Putin Is Russia’s Proto-Tsar

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Buzzfeed Writer Gets Naked At Nude Beach, Becomes Angry When Men Look At Her

August 2, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

In a stunning, but predictable, display of female hamstering, Loryn Brantz, illustrator at large and Buzzfeed columnist, decided that she wished to partake in full participation at a nude beach while on vacation, and then got annoyed that men looked at her while doing such. Once back in her journalistic safe space, she decides to commit her harrowing ordeal of feminist triumph to the Internet, and that event, along with whatever accompanying train of thought it may or may not have had, will be our topic on this one.

Serial Exposer

This isn't the first time that Ms. Brantz has done something similar. She decided to celebrate her 30th birthday with a romp around New York City in a bikini to show off her body that she finally conquered along with her eating disorders.

Apparently her being-a-sex-object-while-refusing-to-be-a-sex-object was not satisfied by the bikini romp, so she decides to go to a nude beach, and NOT be a sex object there, while being totally naked and reading a book by Jessica Valenti titled what else but Sex Object.

The articles, both her nude beach “trauma” and her previous NYC bikini romp, read like bad hipster angst, where she desperately cares that you absolutely notice she doesn’t care at all. Her bikini story is some sort of eating disorder mish-mash that culminates in an extremely pale, plain girl in an ugly bikini eating cheese balls on a park bench.

Her beach encounter is a collection of anguished mental scenes, with “beautiful nude women” and different groups of men that all seem to oppress her somehow, including her husband, who does it by simply enjoying himself more than she is, although how he could enjoy himself at all being married to a Bat Shit Crazy Woman is beyond this author.

I wasn’t kidding about the cheeseballs.

Dual Motives

If you look at this “I wanna be a sex object, but I don’t want to be seen as a sex object” seemingly contradictory set of mental gymnastics hard enough, it’s enough to give any of us dudes of logic an instant declaration that “that bitch is cra-zy.” However, maybe it’s not enough sleep or the 16 hour work days I’ve been pulling lately, but I think I cracked her code and know what she’s doing.

Loryn’s an educated, feminist woman, and she doesn’t want to be a sex object, because feminist women are so much more than their feminine parts that, in order to do justice to her no-doubt formidable mental capabilities, she willingly denies being a sex object because she’s more than that, you know?

But, under it all, she’s a woman, and she’s believes she’s got this smoking hot body that she survived all these eating disorders with, and she desperately craves some validation to prove she’s still got it, and hasn’t run smack into The Wall and lost whatever it was she thought she had. It wasn’t enough to walk around the Big Apple in a bikini, which, even I (as someone who’s been to NYC a few times but doesn’t make a habit of it) get is fucking strange; she’s got to go a nude beach and get oppressed to make sure that her tits are still recognizable as tits.

Who takes pants to the beach?

See, it’s not enough to reject being a sex object when you’re not one in the first place. It’s not empowering enough to be more than your body when your body is relegated to romantic encounters that your partners will later begin to recount with the words “Well, I was REALLY drunk and hadn’t been laid in a long time.” No, it has to be her CHOICE to reject being a sex symbol.

It’s simple attention-whoring, with the only complication being that she’s trying to pull off being above it by reading a book about the subject while doing it, then writing about it, like she’s some sort of sociologist instead of a confused, insecure feminist.

She’s not fooling anyone.

Hot women KNOW they’re hot. They don’t have to go to some nude beach and get self-consciously naked just to make sure they get looked at to validate themselves. Hot girls don’t even go to nude beaches; they go to normal beaches and get naked there, and no one cares because they’re hot.

Hot girls also don’t post about their “bravery” and their “ordeals” on schlock sites like BuzzFeed, because hot girls are not feminists, either.

I wonder, as she descends further away from hitting the Wall, what will she do and write about for her birthday next year? Will she go be a stripper some place and collect a few dollars for “effort” via bad stripping and worse lap-dances just to prove she’s still desirable? Will she go hold down a street corner someplace and take a few dicks in an evening just to prove someone out there would still hit that?

Maybe she'll just run through the ghetto nude so she can get assaulted and be validated AND a victim at the same time.

You want rated as a sex object? We can do that.

Here at Return Of Kings, we know that the modern woman does not want to be regarded as a sex object, except when she wants to be regarded as a sex object. As Ms. Brantz clearly wants her SMV validated so that she can then be empowered by rejecting it, we must do our civic duty by helping her.

Based on the photos included in this article, and any others you want to locate and post up in the comments, let's get a classic "X out of 10. WB / WNB" rating from each commenter that is so inclined so that Loryn knows where she stands, even though too much knowledge is sometimes not a good thing, as I am fairly certain she'll find out, given how notorious we seem to be getting these days.

Husband is exactly what you'd expect

Conclusion

Notable only for the momentary shock value of "this is slightly more crazy than the average feminist of today," the attention-whoring desperation of a woman who is losing what little looks she had and is frantically trying to get men to notice her just a few more times so she can administer the final rejections is simply the symbol of today's woman. Why can't she be happy with only what her husband thinks of her? Why must she try so hard for approval just so she can deny it? What sort of amphetamine is her hamster on, anyway? We may never know.

Don't Miss: Female Danish Athletes Diminish Their Own Championship Victory By Taking Nude Photos

Rufus Winnfield

"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

The Truth About Black Slavery In The Americas

August 2, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The history of slavery tells us it was the entire world's economic system for thousands of years. It did not begin and end with Anglo America. Every major ethnic group has had its hand in the sordid past of this institution. At one time or another, every ethnic group in the world has enslaved another ethnic group. It's time the rest of the story was told, and that begins with revealing the long history of slavery in Latin America.

Since leaving Anglo America because feminism poisoned the well for traditional men, living in Latin America has shown me this area of the world needs to share the burden of the guilt of slavery. Not to mention, Africa also needs to share in the burden of slavery, where slavery and went on in most kingdoms and societies on the continent for thousands of years, and is still ongoing to this day in some African countries. There is a lot of blame to go around for this problem. It should never be used to shame and manipulate only one group of people to suit a political agenda as it is in the United States.

In Latin America, one need look no farther than the popular Salsa music genre to find the history of the brutal nature of Latin slave owners written in music. The lyrics, translated from Spanish, are eye-opening:

> In the 1600s, when the tyrant ruled
> In the streets of Cartagena, this history played out
> There came the slave traders, with Africans in chains
> They kissed the land, then perpetual slavery
> An African couple, slaves of a Spanish man

> He treated them very badly
> And hit the Black woman
> It was then, that the heroic black man rebelled
> He avenged his love
> And you can still hear him yelling at the gates:
> Don't hit my black woman!

The lyrics to this popular song tell a tale of a slave rebellion that happened in Cartagena, Colombia, a rebellion the puppet masters in the American media and education system would prefer never be told, as they tout the Superior Virtue of immigrants from Latin America over those WASPs they hate so much in America.

An abusive Colombian slave owner beating an African female slave doesn't fit the narrative of large numbers of immigrants from Latin American trying to overcome oppressive "whitey." Statistics help reveal more of the story behind the music.

Numbers

Notice most of the slave trade arrows do no point to the U.S.

It may surprise you to learn the United States was a relatively minor player in the slave trade. A full 99% of the white population never owned slaves. One could say blaming all whites for the sins of slave ownership is the modern day equivalent of blaming the entire population for the modern day sins of the elite 1% in the country. While most of use do not agree with what the elite are doing to Americans in business and in politics, those who have a disproportionate share of money, political influence, and largely control the means of production and communication make the decisions, not the rest of us.

Statistically, Mexico and Peru combined imported more slaves than the United States. Over the course of more than 350 years, of the 11.2 million slaves imported from Africa in the slave trade, only 4% of them, or 450,000 arrived in the United States. The other 96% mostly went to Latin America (including Portuguese and French colonies in the Americas), according to the highly-rated documentary Black in Latin America by Henry Louis Gates, Jr. A full one-third of slaves landed in Brazil and 60 to 70% landed in either Brazil or the Caribbean. This is easy to see when one visits the Caribbean, as on most islands the population skews heavily towards African ancestry. You would never know this from reading liberal history books.

The stereotype of the savage Southern hick acting alone as a sadistic abuser while slave owners in other countries supposedly were more humane to their slaves is also destroyed simply by reading history, rather listening to narratives designed to scapegoat one group of people. Going against the narrative that only Anglos are mean and vicious, U.S. slave owners were demonstrably more humane than their Latino counterparts, as much fewer slaves died in the U.S. than in Latin America and the Caribbean. From the Gilder Lehrman Institute of American History:

> Slavery in the United States was especially distinctive in the ability of the slave population to increase its numbers by natural reproduction. In the Caribbean, Dutch Guiana, and Brazil, the slave death rate was so high and the birthrate so low that slaves could not sustain their population without imports from Africa. The average number of children born to an early nineteenth-century southern slave woman was 9.2—twice as many as in the West Indies (Caribbean).
>
> Death rates among slaves in the Caribbean were one-third higher than in the South, and suicide appears to have been much more common. Unlike slaves in the South, West Indian slaves were expected to produce their own food in their "free time," and care for the elderly and the infirm.
>
> Access to freedom was greater in Latin America, but in many cases masters freed sick, elderly, crippled, or simply unneeded slaves in order to relieve themselves of financial responsibilities.

In addition to Latin America freeing more slaves but not freeing them unless they were used up and worthless, importantly, the Spanish and Portuguese colonies mixed with their slaves, making the black population not as visible as it is today in the U.S. These ethnically blended populations have helped in making the history of the practice less visible than in Anglo America, where populations did not mix. Continuing from the Gilder-Lehrman Institute:

> Another important difference between Latin America and the United States involved conceptions of race. In Spanish and Portuguese America, an intricate system of racial classification emerged. Compared with the British and French, the Spanish and Portuguese were much more tolerant of racial mixing—an attitude encouraged by a shortage of European women—and recognized a wide range of racial gradations, including black, mestizo, quadroon, and octoroon. The American South, in contrast, adopted a two-category system of race in which any person with a black mother was automatically considered to be black.

The practice of racial mixing was so common in the Dominican Republic that genetic studies have revealed a majority of the population to have DNA from white European fathers and black African mothers. Colombia also reveals a high proportion of admixture between European fathers and African mothers. In other Latin nations African slaves were "absorbed" into the larger population through reproduction.

According to Black in Latin America, the integration of African peoples was so pervasive that every Mexican has an “African grandma hiding in their closet.”

So, there were far higher numbers of slaves in modern day Latin America than anybody would believe unless they studied the numbers, yet the issue isn’t as visible because of a long history of racial mixing in this part of the world.

Political Motivations

The one-sided narrative of slavery is used as a political thumbscrew

So, why are these inconvenient truths about slavery never brought up or given the light of day? Because they would destroy the grievance racket, and the elite’s thumbscrew to keep people feeling guilty and under control would be taken away.

If one listens to leftists, Anglos invented slavery, all of them were complicit in it, the United States was the only evil country that ever used this system, and turnabout is fair play so now it’s time for whites to be disenfranchised and oppressed. And moral giants that we politicians and elites are, we would never allow slavery to go on—even though slavery and indentured servitude are still practiced in the American family court system with female privilege. (And, it can be argued predatory student loans that aren’t dismissable even in bankruptcy are a form of debt bondage.)

For well over 100 years, there have been racial demagogues constantly exploiting the problem for political and financial gain. Booker T. Washington, a leading voice of former slaves and their descendants wrote:

> There is another class of colored people who make a business of keeping the troubles, the wrongs, and the hardships of the Negro race before the public. Having learned that they are able to make a living out of their troubles, they have grown into the settled habit of advertising their wrongs — partly because they want sympathy and partly because it pays. Some of these people do not want the Negro to lose his grievances, because they do not want to lose their jobs.
>
> I am afraid that there is a certain class of race-problem solvers who don’t want the patient to get well, because as long as the disease holds out they have not > only an easy means of making a living, but also an easy medium through which to make themselves prominent before the public.

>
> My experience is that people who call themselves "The Intellectuals" understand theories, but they do not understand things. I have long been convinced that, if these men could have gone into the South and taken up and become interested in some practical work which would have brought them in touch with people and things, the whole world would have looked very different to them. Bad as conditions might have seemed at first, when they saw that actual progress was being made, they would have taken a more hopeful view of the situation.

In other words, exploiting the problem and framing it as Hollyweird and the corrupt media have is profitable and makes for a powerful political weapon to use against the masses, especially when one desires keeping a nation racially divided. All while the elite expects everyone to remain willfully ignorant of the fact slavery has been a worldwide institution for thousands of years – and is still ongoing in parts of Africa, namely Chad, Congo, Madagascar, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, and Sudan.

The history of slavery in Latin America—which has a far more expansive history than slavery in the U.S.—can no longer be ignored. There's a lot of blame to go around, and it's time to stop scapegoating one group of people for crimes that all of humanity participated in, and some countries are still participating in to this day!

Read More: Slavery Practices Throughout History

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

The Two Most Important Psychological Needs Of Men

August 2, 2016 | by Andrian Red | Link | Original Link

There are only two needs that matter the most to men: the need to belong and the need for appreciation. This should come as no surprise. We are hardwired to be social and to naturally seek connections with others. This connection, however, because of the sheer premise of society comes to us without a struggle.

What happens is that we spend our teens and 20s naturally surrounded by others. School, work, family and other social groups all play their role. Our need to belong and feel appreciated is satisfied, at least to some extent, almost organically. We grow up in these social environments without being even slightly aware of the effect they have on us and the dependency they are imposing on our reality.

I lived the last two years of my life as a digital nomad. I didn't work for anyone, I didn't join any office or co-working space and I did most of my work from home. Needless to say that these have been the two most productive years of my life. I was constantly reading and absorbing new knowledge in order to refine my reality and I was constantly trying to find ways to optimize every aspect of my life.

I was becoming the übermensch that Nietzsche was preaching in his writings.

At the same time, however, I was going crazy. During these two years, I changed apartments almost 6 times. I lost many friends because most of them had to be brutally ghosted.

> People from your past who don't respect the new you and want to keep you there should be brutally ghosted.
>
> You won't regret it one bit.
>
> — TheQuintessentialMan (@theQSLman) March 9, 2016

And finally, I struggled to make new friends because I was changing environments often and I couldn’t maintain rapport. While my personal growth soared, my social life slumped.

In 1889, at age 44, Nietzsche suffered a collapse and a complete loss of his mental faculties. He died one year later. Nietzsche wasn’t the most socially adept person. His aversion towards human nature led him to isolation. This isolation, in turn, led him to madness.

As I said before, we are not even slightly aware of the dependency social structures are imposing on our reality. You don’t really have to become a digital nomad to experience that. Most people, when they turn 30, realize that they have lost most of their friends, they struggle to meet new people and most of their relationships are empty and futile.

> They experience a tremendous paradigm shift that they weren’t really prepared to handle.

The consequences of this shift are quite brutal. Most of them end up satisfying their need for belonging through toxic relationships they can’t escape from and their need for appreciation through an absurd addiction to social media where they try to expose their lavish, but in reality empty, lifestyles.

The need to belong

The need for humans to belong has always fascinated me. I remember when I was a kid I would go and watch a football game with my dad or my friends and I would feel extremely satisfied afterward.

Regardless of the result, I would really enjoy the fact that I could partake in such a collective event. I was appreciating the fact that a simple event like a football game would allow me to be around “my people” and experience such a rich spectrum of human emotions.

Later on and especially since I started being active on Twitter and different online forums, I saw how much of an impact Internet had in satisfying this incredibly strong need. I saw how thousands of people around the globe are craving to be part of a movement or a tribe and purposely creating what is commonly referred to in the psychology domain as in-group favoritism.

In-group favoritism or in-group bias is a psychological term that describes the tendency of group members to favor the ones that belong to their group over the ones that don’t. This works because we build our self-esteem through belonging, and the presence of someone from an in-group reminds us of that belonging.

I saw how people are exploiting this fundamental need and I also saw how the need to belong can spark revolutions and even lead to the most interesting presidential election the US has probably ever experienced.

Aristotle in his seminal work, “Politics” has even gone so far as to say that:

> Man is by nature a social animal; an individual who is unsocial naturally and not accidentally is either beneath our notice or more than human. Society is something that precedes the individual. Anyone who either cannot lead the common life or is so self-sufficient as not to need to, and therefore does not partake of society, is either a beast or a god.

Either a beast or a god…

Social exclusion and its consequences

The opposite of belonging is called social exclusion or ostracism. Ostracism (Greek: ὀστρακισμός, ostrakismos) was a procedure under the Athenian democracy in which any citizen could be expelled from the city-state of Athens for ten years. The name is derived from the ostraka, (singular*ostrakon* , ὄστρακον), referring to the pottery shards that were used as voting tokens. Broken pottery, abundant and virtually free, served as a kind of scrap paper.

Back in 2007, a group of researchers from Florida and San Diego State University, published a study titled: "Thwarting the Need to Belong: Understanding the Interpersonal and Inner Effects of Social Exclusion." This specific research coined three very interesting findings with regards to social exclusion:

1. Given the importance of social relationships for human survival, the social attachment system may have piggybacked onto the preexisting physical pain system (instead of creating a completely new neural architecture), using pain signals to alert people to the dangers of isolation and thus impel them to maintain social connections with each other in order to ensure survival.

2. Rejection led to a large decrease in intelligent thought, as measured by different IQ and reasoning tests. It was discovered that ostracism chiefly impaired complex, higher-order mental operations such as logical reasoning, more basic cognitive processing such as simple learning and memory tasks did not seem to be impaired.

3. Social exclusion can increase aggressive behavior. Rejected people even behaved aggressively toward neutral and innocent parties as well as toward large groups of people, emphasizing a potential link between rejection and mass violence. Indeed, an analysis of school shootings indicated that almost all adolescents who shot classmates had felt significantly excluded by them.

I can attest to all three of the findings and here is why:

1. The pain of rejection on a physical level is universally experienced and I guess that this is the major impediment when it comes to breaking up with a person.

2. When it comes to intelligence, the cognitive abilities of the individual and the motivation to pursue further intellect are strongly related to the motives imposed by his social environment.

3. In many cities well known for their effective urban planning strategies, it is purposely attempted to mingle people from different social classes in order to reduce criminality.

When specific social groups are excluded from society, like it happens in Brazil for instance with the favelas, it is expected that in those cities criminality will soar.

The need for appreciation

A random google search for the term “why men cheat” reveals that the true reason behind men’s infidelity is emotional dissatisfaction, which in rough terms translates to lack of appreciation.

This need is strongly ingrained into the man’s psyche from a very young age. Not sure if this is a biological thing – the forager used to bring the food in the cave and he was appreciated for that – or if it is cultivated because of social conditioning and mother-son relationship – the man feels appreciated by his mother on an ongoing basis.

The point is that appreciation is a fact and is one of the primary forces behinds a man’s motivation to stay faithful and contribute to a relationship. Moreover, that need is not strictly confined to romantic relationships. The need for appreciation in the workplace, for instance, is today more prevalent than ever.

In an article titled “What Google learned from its quest to build the perfect team,” written by Charles Duhigg, it is explained that the ideal team is one that makes its people feel psychologically safe. That includes appreciation as well as sharing things that scare us without fear of recrimination.

Why do you think most millennials nowadays change work regularly and a pretty good percentage of them quit their job to either work as freelancers or start their own business? It’s not necessarily an ambition thing. It’s more like a combination of ambition and appreciation. When you are not appreciated in your work environment, there is no motivation for you to stay in that environment.

Unless you are that guy.

When you work for yourself, you envisage to obtain the appreciation you desperately crave for, either from your customers or from your potential employees. Personally, I was never a guy who wouldn't want to stay committed to an honest, professional environment that makes me feel involved and appreciated. It's just that those environments rarely exist.

In that respect, I would like to cite another interesting study titled "When inclusion costs and ostracism pays, ostracism still hurts." Researchers van Beest and Williams conducted an experiment back in 2006 in which they had participants play a variant of the multi-player computer game Cyberball. The game is played in such a way that each throw cost the participant money. In other words, it was beneficial for participants to be excluded, since they would keep more of their money.

The subsequent statistical analysis revealed that the excluded subjects felt worse despite being rewarded with money. In contrast, subjects reported being much happier when included, even when that brought about a monetary loss.

In closing

The more you grow older, the more you exclude yourself from effective social environments and the more you forget to show appreciation towards people who deserve it. You unconsciously think that by interacting with people online and by staying in meh relationships you are fine.

No, you aren't fine.

You have invested hours, days, months and years of your life in your personal growth. You know all the tricks required to optimize every aspect of your life. You most probably live in a city that offers you countless possibilities both in a personal and in a professional level. You are a man and you belong to a small group of people who know what this actually means. Act like it.

Read More: One Way To Defeat Your Social Anxiety

Andrian Red
Andrian is a lifelong learner, devoted skeptic and ethical hedonist. He is the founder of www.thequintessentialman.com, the only online community that offers a holistic approach to masculine self-growth. He is also the creator of "30 Challenges-30 Days-Zero Excuses", a challenging project aimed to help men take back control of their life.

How Patriarchy Evolves Into Matriarchy

August 3, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

It seems that there is a large number of self proclaimed feminists out there (particularly in the West) who hold the belief that men are actively, consciously preventing them from gaining any power in the world, and scheming, behind the scenes, to perpetuate the patriarchy that we've created.

As an ROK reader, you likely know that this is entirely false.

For the sake of clarity, however, I would like to explain just how patriarchy arises over time, and how it eventually evolves into a matriarchy. I will be looking to disciplines such as anthropology, history, and evolutionary biology, to make my case, rather than looking inside to the, oh-so-common cited "muh feels."

The Tribal Stage

Rather than trying to look at multiple civilizations and their evolution, which I believe has its merits, but would confuse the matter, let us look at how anthropologists think that ancient cities might have evolved over time.

As we all know, most civilizations started from a mere tribe—a collection of maybe 50 or so men, women, and children. This tribe would likely exist in a very dangerous environment, something which SJW's (and even us, to an extent) cannot begin to comprehend today.

I cannot overemphasize the danger that surrounded humanity for the vast majority of history; at any given moment, you may be killed by a lion, disease, a food shortage, or an enemy tribe may invade your little village and slaughter you all. So, faced with such dire consequences, what do you think happened? A PC-culture where feelings are more important than the fact that there's an enemy tribe 100 yards away that could kill you all at any time?

Fuck, no. I'll tell you what happened: the birth of patriarchy.

The Birth Of Patriarchy

Patriarchy evolved as a culture and political structure, due to its sheer effectiveness. When you're surrounded by a massive amount of danger, what do you think your tribe's priority will be? Protect the women. If you don't have any women, you can't reproduce, and your tribe will die off. It's that simple.

You can have just 3-4 men, but as long as you have 40-50 women, you'll be able to live on as a tribe. But if you only have 3-4 women? It doesn't matter how many men you have, you can only give birth to 4 babies a year (2 of which will likely die). Thus, patriarchy, contrary to modern belief, did not evolve to oppress women, but to protect women.

Now, of course, some modern day feminazi may say "WE DON'T NEED YOUR PROTECTION!" to which I would reply, no shit.

Modern day women don't need our protection, because we have daddy government, a system that MEN built, doing that for them. They don't need our protection, because we've busted our asses making a relatively stable civilization, which, ironically enough, they're threatening by creating a culture that values feelings more than facts.

Regardless, the men were tasked with the life-threatening work, because they understood that they were expendable, while women were not. The men were out hunting birds, deer, buffalo, gazelles, and whatever the fuck else they could find depending on their geographical location.

This is how the masculine virtues evolved—men needed to be able to rely on one another, so over time, a culture that praised honor, reliability, strength, courage, and loyalty, developed.

A lot of these noble men died hunting and in battle, but that was better than any of the women dying. The women were tasked with staying at the "home base," or their small village nearby, and doing less dangerous tasks, such as picking berries, tending to the children, and sewing clothing for the warriors.

Cultural Evolution

I really want to hammer home the fact that patriarchy is MUCH more than a “political system,” as most people might think. It’s an economic system, a culture, it’s a way of life.

And what’s important to realize, is that this “way of life,” that a smaller tribe of 50 people might have, will be passed down generation to generation, because the older men understand that this is how you preserve the tribe: by preserving patriarchy.

To emphasize the fact that patriarchy is a culture, let me give you an example. Let us say that all of the men and women are home, around a fire, eating dinner. One of the warriors, a man who the other men respect greatly, speaks up: “A friend from the tribe to the south has told me that the northern tribes are planning an attack.”

What do you think would happen nowadays if somebody brought up bad news at the work place lunch table, or at a corporate dinner? The women in the group, and the chodes of the group, would likely use all manner of social pressure to get him to shut the fuck up.

They’d ignore him, they’d berate him, they’d tell him to stop being so negative, or they’d just spout a delusional: “Oh, we’ll be fine! So anyways, yeah—Jenny we should go grab drinks after this! I heard that Icon has a great selection of cosmos!” This is because we have a “matriarchal culture,” but more on this later.

If a woman, in our previous tribal example, had said: “Oh the tribe from the north is fine, don’t worry about them! Why are you ruining the vibe?” or some other silly nonsense, what do you think would have happened? Definitely not what would happen today.

The men in the group would likely tell her to shut the fuck up, because this is a matter that concerns all of their safety and it needs to be discussed. This is the power of a patriarchal culture. In fact, if the alpha male warrior of the group brought up a serious concern such as this, the women would likely not even say anything, because they would have known it isn’t their job to decide on matters of war and alliances.

So, this culture of patriarchy, that values facts more than feelings (although it obviously still values feelings, it isn’t completely heartless), would be passed down through the generations. Over time, the tribe would grow. Alliances would take place, and sooner or later, we start to have a large village, or even a town.

The Large Village Stage

Now, due to the efficiency of patriarchy, we have a village that is comprised of 2,000 people. Because of patriarchy, there is ample food, shelter, and supplies.

Over time, the men started to realize that they don't all need to hunt. They can just task the best hunters with hunting, and they'll have more than enough food for everyone. And maybe some of the men are really great at making weapons, whether from rock, bronze, or iron, so they're tasked with making weapons to supply the warriors with a means to protect the village and hunt for food.

In other words, what happens is that the men start to specialize in more "rough" and dangerous jobs: blacksmiths, leather tanners, hunters, warriors, animal tamers, and the like. Women, however, are still kept safe: the general culture of patriarchy pervades. Women are still tasked with cooking, sewing, and tending to the children. That is, after all, the job designation that allowed this large village to flourish.

There are still occasional bouts of violence within the village. Maybe a marauding band of barbarians occasionally finds the village, and the men need to defend it. It doesn't have to happen that often, maybe once every decade or so, in order to keep patriarchy in place.

The problems start to happen when the large village becomes TOO affluent, and eventually starts to evolve into a series of large villages, or a small "nation," so to speak.

The Small Nation Stage

This is when, again, due to the effectiveness of patriarchy, we start to see the emergence of the third component of patriarchy: the economic structure. As the large village grows more and more, it starts either spreading out to various outposts strategically located near water or herds of prey, and it starts even making alliances with various other tribes of small villages.

Soon, a bartering system emerges—gold and other precious metals are accepted as currency, but there isn't an official currency…yet. The culture of patriarchy starts to weaken in the main village that we've been following, which at this point has evolved into a town.

Our nation now consists of roughly 30,000 people, and our main town is comprised of 10,000. As society has shown us over the years, the town will be the first to go. Why? Well, it's simple—the town isn't surrounded by danger. It's the epicenter of trade, and it's surrounded by various outposts and villages that will fend off invaders far before the town folk have to do anything. Thus, due to this newfound security, men start specializing even further. They become bankers, traders, merchants; some create boats, some are experts with wood, or with making jewelry.

Patriarchy still reigns supreme, but it's starting to weaken—the women in the town are starting to realize that there's very little danger surrounding them, but interestingly enough, they don't even care. They've been fine with the old system for their whole lives, because their fathers were good to them, and they were never given the "rebellious spirit" that so many women have today.

But…one day the town drunk has a young girl. Over the years, the men in the town do what they can to try to stop him from hurting her, but he's an asshole and they can't do much about it. Over time, more and more drunks and degenerates start to appear, mainly from the upper class, because not everyone is required to work. Most people are, but a few wealthy merchants and bankers can afford to have their children remain idle.

This is crucial to remember: the upper class is almost always indicative of where the middle class will be in several decades, and the middle class is always indicative of where the lower class will be in several decades.

Due to more and more absentee fathers and drunks (which again, arises out of too much safety), we have a bunch of young girls being raised that have severe anger towards their fathers (rightfully so).

The Birth Of Feminism

Now our nation is bustling along, with a large amount of commerce occurring between our town, the various villages and outposts, and even neighboring nations.

The young angry women that I mentioned before, however, are starting to become more vocal. They're angry that they were raised by evil men, and thus are afraid of men having too much power. They start to get it into the heads of the younger generation that they don't need men anymore, and that they should be able to own land, get jobs, and eventually…even vote.

There's a lot of resistance from the older generations, who still remember the patriarchal ways that allowed this nation to achieve its state of bustle and prosperity, but as they begin to die off, the new ideology creeps into the hearts of women like a cancer. Slowly, but surely, the tides start to turn: our nation is on the tipping point between being a patriarchy and a matriarchy.

Due to the safety of this nation, which, AGAIN, patriarchy created, there's a lot of idle time. People grow wealthy, and affluent. This breeds hedonism, a loss of virtue, and a valuing of feelings more than facts; of the short term over the long term. Even if it's only in a few people, that's all it takes—now, due to the dying off of the old patriarchs, women have the right to own land, work jobs, and even vote.

But in the major industries, patriarchy still reigns supreme: mercantilism, war, and trade. This is because anytime someone in these industries values feelings more than facts, they get slapped in the face by reality.

Oh, you just think it'd feel really good if you don't need to protect your ship loaded with goods? Okay, then you'll get raided by fucking pirates and lose a large portion of your wealth.

Oh, you just think it'd be really nice and sweet if you could make an alliance with one of the neighboring villages that's been showing signs of aggression? Okay, then they'll fucking attack you and you'll lose 500 civilians before you get your head on straight.

In the less dangerous professions, however, the culture of the matriarchy is spreading. Matriarchal culture values:

- Cooperation over competition
- Feelings over facts
- Equality over natural differences
- Agreement over disagreement

Obviously cooperation, feelings, equality, and agreement all have their place, but the key difference with patriarchy is that these things aren't prioritized, even in the face of an uncomfortable truth.

A Civilization Is Born

Now, again, due to the superiority of patriarchy, a civilization is born. Our once small tribe, has now evolved into a civilization spanning hundreds of miles, comprised of half a million people. Women were previously allowed to vote, to own land, and to work, but up to this point, these things haven't caused too much trouble. This is about to change.

Previously, plenty of women chose NOT to do these things, because they realized that it doesn't make women happy. Over time, however, as the insidious seed of feminism is spread, more and more women clamor for more and more power. At this point, our society is starting to lean much more towards a matriarchal society than a patriarchal one.

Patriarchy only exists at one place: the top. Politicians, business owners, investors, bankers…why? Because you can't become a rich and successful man if you're a completely effeminate pussy. Regardless, the spoiled women of the newer generation see a bunch of men in power, and they attack these men for "oppressing" women, rather than applauding them for having the virtues to rise above the rest.

Due to massive pressure from the younger women, and even men (chodes are starting to emerge), politicians are forced to implement more policies in favor of women. Now, more women are in the workplace. More women are politicians, more are bankers, less and less women are mothers, and it's even frowned upon to be a housewife (is this ringing any bells?).

Total Matriarchy

As our society becomes more and more wealthy and spoiled, and as the older generations of men who understand the importance of masculinity die off, the younger generations start to take over. Now, we have a full blown society that values feelings more than facts (not unlike today).

And you know what? They get along just fine—for a while. The patriarchy that came before them set up a huge moat. Because of the hard work of men in the past, our current civilization can afford to be frivolous, nonsensical, and overly-emotional…for a while.

Slowly, but surely, less and less innovation occurs due to female competition at the workplace. Wages plummet as immigrants rush into the country, because it feels good to let them in. Birth rates drop, as more and more women are working, too busy to start a family, and sooner or later, men who believe in masculinity become part of a fringe group (again, is this ringing any bells?).

But then, the men who still cling to the old ways, start to notice something: a nation to the north has been awfully aggressive as of late. They've been roaming our land freely, and have been attacking several outposts, unchecked. The feminist indoctrinated youth and politicians clamor that "Maybe we should give them citizenship! We need to educate them and help them!"

Again, this should sound eerily familiar.

The fringe groups of masculine men know that this is utter bullshit, so they're as vocal as possible, but nobody listens to them—the masses are far too many and far too stupid. The masculine outcasts do what they can to restore patriarchy, and they're successful in their own little pockets of life, but not on a broad scale. The indoctrination runs too deep; it's hard to undo the momentum of the last 5 generations passing down false knowledge to their youth.

The Collapse

Eventually the barbarian groups realize just how pathetic this civilization is, and band together to end it once and for all.

Side note: do you think the barbarian wanderers have a patriarchal society or a matriarchal society?

By the time that everyone realizes they're fucked, it's too late. There's no standing army, and even if there were, half of it would be comprised of women. They're economically weak, due to stupid, emotionally driven policies. Their entire internal infrastructure has been weakened by decades of feminism, which has made them susceptible to invasion.

The barbarians manage to rape and pillage all of the surrounding villages, outposts, and towns, until they reach the epicenter of our civilization, the once tiny tribe, that is now a huge city.

The once self-proclaimed feminists beg for help from the men, but because they've been brainwashed into being giant chodes for the last several generations, they're far too weak to do anything. They can't think rationally in the face of danger, they aren't physically fit, and they lack the decisiveness that men need to be successful. Our civilization is completely overrun by barbarians, and burnt to the ground—a true tragedy.

Several small groups of men and women managed to flee unharmed, however—who do you think these men were? The fringe groups, of course. They recognized the insanity of those surrounding them, so they were smart: they stockpiled supplies and weapons. They planned escape routes, and maybe some of them even built a little cabin in the mountains, miles and miles away.

Some 100 or so men and women manage to flee to these little cabins and huts that the smarter men had set up years ago, in case of disaster. Now, it's time to rebuild.

The Cycle Continues

We can predict, with almost 100% accuracy, that our new "tribe" will follow the EXACT same pattern as the first one. I hope that you men are taking notes, because what I'm about to tell you is perhaps one of the most important lessons of history. Society repeats itself.

Yup—society has always oscillated between being a strong patriarchy and a strong matriarchy, and so far, it continues to do the same. Patriarchy leads a society to affluence, which leads it to matriarchy, which makes it vulnerable to external threats, which leads it to collapse. Then, the survivors rebuild, and model a similar patriarchal structure as the very tribe that founded their once great civilization.

This is the great secret of ages; the lessons that have been passed down by men such as Will Durant and Sir Thomas Glubb. The wise men of the past have always known that society repeats itself, but their influence has been too small to stop it. All of this is about to change.

The Information Age

Although I'm not very hopeful for the future of America (it saddens me to say this), I believe that we are soon going to FINALLY defeat this wicked cycle. We live in the age of information; knowledge is transferring from person to person at a completely unprecedented rate, and this rate is growing exponentially.

I firmly believe that if enough men understand this concept of "cyclical civilizations," we will be able to stop it.

For now, there isn't much we can do except prepare for the upcoming collapse of America. Invest your money, so that you can afford to either withstand hard financial times, or leave the US entirely. Educate yourself and grow as a human being, so that you will have the understanding and skills necessary to rebuild society from the ground up.

And finally…get ready for the shit to hit the fan. Now is the time to buy a gun.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why We Need to Fight For The Patriarchy

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

3 Simple Rights You Should Have As A Businessman

August 3, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Once upon a time, the United States was a land of astounding entrepreneurial activity, relatively free from the shackles of government red tape and absolutely no social justice intrusion on the endeavors of men. This "republic of science" as the founding fathers desired, was exactly the kind of USA that allowed civilization-changing inventions such as light bulbs, telephones, and airplanes to come into being well over 100 years ago.

NO big daddy government, NO cancerous human resources, and NO shrieking SJW's required back in those days.

However in recent decades, as globalism was pushed, government regulations increased, and retarded leftist agendas began infecting the workplace, the United States started to fall behind while less "diversity" focused countries such as Japan, Taiwan, and South Korea were able to play a serious game of catch up.

So what can we do to help reclaim some of our former entrepreneurial glory? Especially for things which aren't directly involved in creating botched F-35 fighter jets or degenerate Silicon Valley smartphone apps which help people find threesomes?

Now forgetting about Donald Trump for a minute, one of the best possible ways we can "Make America Great Again" is to give more freedom and power back to the non-leftist entrepreneur, especially those who wish to create a brick-and-mortar operation that is going to provide a tangible service or product (i.e. not a "Buzzfeed" imitation website or impotent "awareness" non-profit organization).

This article will address three rights that all American businesses should have, without being subject to mass ridicule, boycotts, fines, or cease-and-desist notices for their implementation. It's just a few examples, but vital examples nonetheless for getting back on the right track.

1. No Virtue Signaling

You are in the business of innovation and making money, not partially kowtowing to some opportunistic social justice initiative which is the hottest thing of the hour. Focusing 100% of your efforts to maximizing profit, thus being able to provide the best possible quality of life for yourself and your family, is both your prime directive and your only directive.

You should not feel compelled to tithe a small percentage of your earnings to some kind of Western civilization destroying charity, nor give two shits about the latest eye-rolling "awareness" campaign. By all means, participate in such things on your own time and under your own free will if you feel compelled, but virtue signaling should not have to be tied into your creative mission.

Unfortunately, SJW's will pressure you about these things if you don't. I mean what are you, some kind of greedy "racist" or "bigot"? Or maybe you're just "ignorant"?

Whatever. As former President Calvin Coolidge (1923-1929) said, "The business of America is business." It is not about promoting homosexuality, cultural degeneracy, or some other "social justice" endeavor along with your services like Starbucks does.

2. Hiring Only The Best Candidates

The ability to hire only the best qualified candidates for available jobs in the United States exists in theory, but the practical reality is that if your business is overwhelmingly staffed by white males (or to a smaller extent a white male-Asian male hybrid like many tech companies) you are setting yourself up for an ongoing hurricane of bad publicity and SJW complaints.

News flash: "diversity" has absolutely no inherent value whatsoever. The Apollo Program which led to the moon landings, the greatest achievement in technology and human endeavor of all time, was staffed almost entirely by white male Ph.D's. They were the best possible candidates for the job, and they got the job done extremely well.

A successful failure: Apollo 13 ground crew (1970) worked day and night to help bring the astronauts back safe and sound in one of the best examples of workplace cohesion, ingenuity, and teamwork in human history. (Notice the lack of diversity)

Now fast forward to the 2010's, where technology companies have been under scrutiny for being overwhelmingly staffed by white and Asian males (and particularly Asians in relation to their overall population).

SJW initiatives to diversify tech companies with more women, blacks, and Latinos have come at a huge expenditure in time, money, and effort. That is, time, money, and effort which could have been entirely focused on creating new products and services to maximize financial returns for these companies.

Why should you have to be saddled with such a coerced affirmative action or diversity headache by HR and SJW's? Being able to hire only the best possible candidates, taking in zero consideration for race or gender, will help ensure that you will have the most cohesive and productive work environment possible.

Ok lady, now give me just one example of how a technology company achieved greater business results which was directly attributed to somebody's gender or race…

3. Full Bill Of Rights Protection

Thanks Thomas J!! Now it's time to make some rupees!

You as an entrepreneur should have the sanctity of the U.S. Bill of Rights apply to your business and your workplace.

The 1st Amendment (freedom of religion, speech, and association) should, for example, protect a baker from the butt hurt wrath of homosexual social justice warriors just because he didn't want to bake them a damn wedding cake.

(The customer is violating the entrepreneur's right to diligently follow his religious beliefs regarding traditional marriage, and express his non-violent opinion on the matter without retribution. Chick-fil-A ran into this same problem back in 2012).

The 2nd amendment (right to bear arms) should apply to all entrepreneurs, even in regressive blue states which put heavy restrictions on concealed carry permits. You should have the right to be able to protect your business, and your valued customers, from nefarious forces which may desire to empty your wallets or cash registers of every penny inside.

The 1st and 2nd amendments will be the most applicable in day-to-day operations, but all other constitutional rights should be there for your protection as an entrepreneur.

Unfortunately, most SJW's hate freedom of expression and gun rights (and often Christianity too). If you want your constitutional rights to work in your favor, you are going to have to fight for them in a regressive leftist world. After all, freedom of speech isn't free.

Conclusion

Nothing inherently wrong with this non-diverse Huffington Post staff meeting, if they weren't such flaming leftist hypocrites

In short, Human Resources departments and virtue signaling social justice warriors live to make life a non-stop migraine for libertarian or conservative minded entrepreneurs. That is, people who just want to run a smooth and successful business and then call it a day, without having to kowtow to a leftist agenda which is being permeated in all aspects of day-to-day life.

By applying these rights to all American entrepreneurs, which combine Austrian economics with masculine principles, they can be more diligently focused on product innovation, customer satisfaction, stacking papers, and providing a secure environment for everyone involved.

Addressing a make-believe workplace problem like not having enough peroxide-blond transsexual Muslim black females on the company payroll will simply be a non-issue.

Those who are "triggered" by these rights are free to leave the establishment and retreat back to their safe spaces and adult coloring books. We don't want your patronage. Now then, let's get back to business.

> The lesson I have to teach is this: Leave all creative energies uninhibited. Merely organize society to act in harmony with this lesson. Let society's legal apparatus remove all obstacles the best it can. Permit these creative know-hows freely to flow. Have faith that free men and women will respond to the Invisible Hand. – Excerpt from "I, Pencil". Leonard E. Read (1958)

Read More: Human Resources Have Absolute Power Over Male Workers

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

5 Answers To Religion & Spirituality Questions

August 3, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The next Q&A video is on religion:

Here's the index so you can jump around:

0:10
"1. Why is it that you seem to go against your fellow middle easterners and uncle tom for the whites. is it due to that they are your main readers.
2. Why do you hate Islam and immigrants from Muslim countries despite being the son of an Iranian immigrant?" (SPLOOGE & SOREN)

9:31
"1. Every intellectual has to pick a religion. They usually do it by now; you're almost 40. What is the holdup?
2. Are you contemplating joining an organized church/religion?
3. What is your current status with regards to religion and spirituality?" (SGT POG, PEARLBUCK, KOMATIITE)

14:25
"To what extent do religion or spirituality play a role in your daily life?" (THEBASSIST)

17:28
"Have you ever tried Meditation? If so, thoughts? If not, is it something on your radar?" (DASHER)

21:05
"1. How can one prepare for "the end" (death)?
2. Were you ready to lose it all for what you believed in?" (RONALD REAGAN REMIX)

This announcement was originally published on Roosh V.

Previous Video: 10 Answers To Questions About American Politics

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Reasons To Host A Feast

August 4, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Every civilisation around the globe has a tradition of feast. More than a vulgar meal, it is a celebration of life. In times when man struggled to find something to eat, a feast was something truly exceptional. Nature was generous enough to allow him to see another day and even going to sleep without feeling the cold bite of hunger, surrounded by his loved ones.

Sharing food for a moment of peace. A feast has usually two main goals: celebrate friendship and celebrate God.

Kings and peasants. Love and hate. Return of a son or farewell to a beloved elder. The feast was a concentration of what makes mortal life what it is. The greatest alliances were forged and strengthened in the mead halls. It is also under the same roof that plots and treason took place.

This habit disappears in our world. With parents drifting away from their roots and generations of children locked in their bubble, feasts become rare. It must be reinstated as a central element of a man's life. A man needs to be a fighter, a father, a creator but also a host. Among the many benefits that hosting a feast will bring to your life:

1. It separates friends from the rest

Oaths of friendships and insults resulting in blood feuds did not need to take place on battlefields or in the market place. Bring the wrong or the right men and women. Let the drinks flow and the mood evolve. Truth to many questions will soon emerge. Bear that in mind. A good host is a focused host.

You invest time, energy, and money into something that is not vital. Guests not showing gratitude should not be forgiven. True colours are revealed around bread and wine. Observe who among your guests comes empty handed. Do not remind them to bring something. It is common sense and a good test for the future.

I once organised a feast of my own after a long absence overseas, bringing new recipes and drinks for my childhood "friends" to enjoy. They did not appreciate it. "What is that shit? Let's watch TV" was the response.

It was a bad but necessary omen. I cut ties except for one of them and reconstructed a new tribe. A late toastmaster I knew always said: "Guests always please me. If it is not when they arrive, then it is when they leave."

2. It is a real as it gets

Sharing food, the source of life, is an important, almost sacred, gesture. The nations that respect the act of sitting down and taking the time to eat are usually the most stable and conservative ones. The “fast food” phenomenon is just another way to disconnect humans from their true nature.

It is a simple and effective way to meet in today’s artificial relationships. Too many friends meet up for drinks outside of their home, where they still put on an act for the outside world.

Even if it is necessary, the material, the setting, the decoration is not the most important. You are not a woman. What matters is to gather like-minded people and having good food served.

Feasts have always been a display of wealth, financial or otherwise. Spending too little or too much says a lot to the guests. The reaction of the guests to this display is equally important. If the feast is not as rich as in the past, friends will inquire where acquaintances will only criticize

3. It celebrates simplicity

We come back to the basics in this age of technology, virtual reality and white noise. The pillars of happiness are all present during a good feast. Friends, home made food and drinks, a pleasant mood and free time. The absence of bonding around a meal that has no professional or romantic context is another symptom of the cultural decline of a society.

There is an important rule in a feast, You must be the core and the main provider. It cannot happen under a roof that is not yours. You need to be in control of your surroundings. A man is the king in his house.

A modern feast is also cheap. Cheaper than an evening in an overpriced club, navigating between bitch-shields and thirsty betas. Cheaper than noisy restaurants with crying toddlers, where you have to tip poor service just because “that is the way it is.”

It can be organised anywhere. You do not need much. Without a roof, an open fire, a few crates, fresh food and the leaves of the trees as tiles will make anyone a cheerful guest.

4. It is useful spiritually and materially

Everyone loves free food, but above all every man needs a tribe. But hosting is a commitment. You said you will, and you will stick to it. Flakiness is a woman's trait.

It is good exercise for time and human management. You need to plan ahead, delegate tasks, monitor your guests so that their plate and cup are full and that they are in good spirits.

It is also the host's task to direct the debates, keep the conversation going and make sure that everyone is roughly on the same level of drunkenness. The host is a toastmaster, a referee, and a guardian.

There is no better way to consume alcohol than in a safe environment of a feast. Nothing is worse than getting drunk on an empty stomach.

Un dernier mot

One of the few drawbacks of a feast is that the host, by doing what he is supposed to: organise, has the less fun as he keeps an eye of everything. That is the price to pay, but only for an evening. Soon, he shall be a guest again, free of responsibility.

There are many ways to be a talented host, but the universal elements of a memorable feast have seldom changed since man invented the table:

- Don't improvise with dishes you do not know
- Have enough of everything but do not plan too big
- Give your guest a drink when he arrives
- Make a list of what you need
- Stay cool
- Play music in the background (not too loud)
- Host your guests after the feast if possible
- Bring enough cutlery
- Bring girls (assessing the risks before) for your fellow hunters if you can. What goes around comes around.
- No visual distractions (No TV, turn off the wifi, phones away)

If your feast is successful, it will stays in the memory of your guests for years to come.

Read More: The Feast Of The Ascension

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

Dutchman Hospitalized After Waiting 10 Days In Chinese Airport For His Online “Girlfriend”

August 4, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A 41-year-old Dutch man with diabetes has waited 10 days at an airport in Changsha, China for his online “girlfriend.” Alexander Pieter Cirk eventually required medical attention, including an IV drip, at a nearby hospital. The effects of sustained sleep deprivation, hunger, and his aggravated case of diabetes had put his health in serious jeopardy.

Meanwhile, Cirk’s “girlfriend,” surnamed Zhang, was apparently getting plastic surgery done in another city and claimed to have turned her phone off as he waited. She later cited “inconvenience” as the reason she could not visit him in the hospital.The Dutchman’s saga highlights the extent to which enough modern men are being driven to desperate measures to satiate their female-related thirst.

Cirk’s spending of a significant amount of money to buy a plane ticket to meet this evidently very mysterious woman is already bad. Yet his presence for ten days in a foreign airport in an authoritarian country notorious for its stringent treatment of those even coming close to falling afoul of entry laws is worse still. Regardless of any valid visa Cirk might have had, living in an airport for ten days could have easily landed him in prison. Plus, when you add the man’s serious medical condition into the mix, you have a truly epic case of pussy pedestalization.

He deserves your partial sympathy but also your brutal honesty

Did Cirk and/or other clueless Western men help pay for Zhang's purported plastic surgery?

As an ROK writer, I am so accustomed to penning articles that excoriate some crazy feminist, another sort of SJW, or a white knight. In this instance, however, I genuinely feel sorry for Alexander Pieter Cirk. But I also want to smack him over the head perhaps a thousand times. Here we have a man who has either been forever oblivious to hard truths about women, or has chosen to ignore them. The truth probably lies in a combination of the two options.

The truly saddening aspects of this story are Cirk's age and the fact that his generation faced only a fraction of the current ideological male-bashing as it grew up. If this member of Generation X does something like this, and lives in such female-derived desperation, we should anticipate the arrival of many more like him amongst the much younger Millennial male cohort. And, as weird as it sounds, their pussy pedestalization may lead to even more extreme measures than those taken by Cirk.

It is clear that red pill knowledge about women, not to mention something more substantial in the form of neomasculinity, is unknown to a huge number of men under 50. Cirk may be an outlier for what he is prepared to do to please just one woman, but plenty of other men are engaging in undeniably obsequious and self-destructive behaviors to try and land a mate. Despite the salience Return Of Kings has achieved in recent years, we have many, many more men to reach.

Cirk is also in danger of being misled in the future, like he has been so far. Why a young woman, particularly one so self-absorbed as to get plastic surgery, would have her phone turned off for ten days is about as big a mystery as what happened to Malaysian Airlines Flight 370 in the Indian Ocean. The foolishness of Cirk aside, it is unbelievable that she could not have texted him sooner to save him from himself, unless she really is the money-hungry manipulator of men almost any rational person would regard her as.

The BBC additionally reports that the woman Zhang is interested in maintaining their “relationship”. Of course she wants an ongoing relationship. Having spent ten days risking his life to wait for her, Cirk is even more malleable and pliable than he was in her eyes before. God knows what further misery Cirk will bring on himself financially, socially, legally, and emotionally in keeping links with this female.

An important note on online relationships

Not a substitute for real life or real skills.

Forget what the critics say: online communication, dating included, is an excellent way to find and vet women, especially for travels you make abroad. It enables you to expand your social network and avoid wasting time on the ground finding people you can do things with. Game honed by meeting new people for the first time in real life is massively important, but not your only tool.

Nonetheless, a problem emerges when you spend an inordinate amount of time chasing girls online, with little or no prospect of a return on your investment, let alone a guarantee. For very socially awkward men like Alexander Pieter Cirk, though, it is very easy to massively inflate one’s own chances. Loneliness and an exotic “opportunity” are simply too enticing for a growing number of well-intentioned but simultaneously greatly delusional men seeking to find “love” online. Internet-based courtship is no substitute for having real life skills, most notably when this courtship takes place on the kind of scam-associated matchmaking website Cirk is said to have “met” Zhang.

Cirk’s woeful experience in Changsha is a warning to all: being clueless is a disease and it will make you miserable. For the Dutchman, it nearly killed him. If the internet is your proverbial crutch to mask other deficiencies, beware. The same goes for any non-online clueless behaviors, such as paying for women to give you attention in the hope of getting a mere trinket like her name, phone number, a kiss on the cheek, or the chance of a future meeting.

Want to help your fellow men? Introduce them to Return Of Kings

Harsh truths need to be heard by men like Alexander Pieter Cirk. Whether they then embrace and use them is their choice.

Return Of Kings readers and contributors, and our proprietor Roosh most of all, have been hounded for their common sense, time-honored beliefs about women and fixing flawed male psychologies. That work continues and a lot of men are in positions of hopelessness at least roughly similar to Alexander Pieter Cirk's. We may not be able to save people, but we can point them in the right direction and let them help themselves with a new outlook.

You may be far from the desperate case represented by Cirk. That said, the time is ripe to take stock of your own potential weaknesses as you help others. Is chasing girls at least moderately damaging your work or study lives? You have a bad enough case of thirst. Are you breaking your own code to satisfy a woman's wants? You have a bad enough case of thirst. You put yourself in the best state to assist your fellow man when you start to iron out your own problems first, remember.

At the end of the day, real men don't wait ten days in an airport for a foreign woman they've never met.

Read More: Do Your Part To Stop The Thirsty Guy Revolution

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

10 Hollywood Films For Men That Leave Today's SJW Movies In The Dust

August 4, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

The following are personal reviews of some of my favorites films, covering the period of Hollywood cinema from 1992-2004, and there isn't a loser in the bunch—not a single SJW-themed film can be found, and the overall entertainment and educational value is uncommonly solid.

In no particular order, here they are (check 'em out if you have some free time on your hands; you won't be disappointed):

1. "Glengarry Glen Ross" (1992 – Alec Baldwin, Al Pacino, Kevin Spacey, Ed Harris)

Nobody writes dialogue like David Mamet. And nobody plays a ball-busting alpha male like Alec Baldwin; check out his monologue at the beginning of the film, and prepare to be knocked down a couple of pegs—no matter how macho you might think you are ("Always be closing. ALWAYS be CLOSING…this WATCH is worth more than your CAR").

Pacino is undeniably fabulous as super salesman Ricky Roma, who lies his way to staggering real estate commissions, while preying on various Beta males' emotions, hopes and dreams. Great cast, superb dialogue, intriguing plot, and a surprise ending.

2. “The Usual Suspects” (1995 – Kevin Spacey, Gabriel Byrne, Benicio Del Toro, Chazz Palminteri)

Arch-criminal Keyser Soze rules the world—but which one of the myriad human chess pieces that he’s currently moving around the board, is actually his alter ego? Kevin Spacey steals the show as Verbal Kint, a cheap, mouthy, crippled grifter who gets completely under the skin—and all the way inside the head—of clueless Detective Dave Kujan (played by Chazz Palminteri).

Benicio Del Toro is hilarious in the role of Fenster, a mumble-mouthed, babbling, oft-confused thief, and the talented Del Toro skillfully tosses away his lines like used snot rags. Great script, great dialogue, great scenes, an incredible cast, and a bang-bang, totally unforeseen ending that is guaranteed to stun. (This is truly a real man’s movie, and that’s for freakin’ sure. No blue-pillers allowed.)

3. “Training Day” (2001 – Denzel Washington, Ethan Hawke, Scott Glenn, Tom Berenger)

A story of corrupt cops in Los Angeles (is there any other kind?). The Three Wise Men rule the city, and everybody else just goes along for the ride—including rookie cop Jake Hoyt (played by Ethan Hawke), who tries to buck the system as he clings to his blue-pill beliefs and schoolboy morals.

Denzel Washington is right on point as the charmingly sociopathic Detective Alonzo Harris; the bathtub scene, featuring some frighteningly likable Hispanic gangbangers, as they coldly and menacingly prepare to blow Hoyt's ass away, is worth the price of admission. The delicious Eva Mendes is sperm-boiling hot in a partially nude scene, which rounds things out nicely—just like her perfect ass.

4. "L.A. Confidential" (1997 – Kevin Spacey, Russell Crowe, Kim Basinger, Guy Pearce, James Cromwell)

More L.A. police corruption at the behest of the super-rich players who pull everybody's strings in the City of Angels. Kim Basinger plays Lynn Bracken, a cock-loving, carousel-widened, has-been Hollywood whore, to absolute perfection, as numerous horny dudes bang her out—all while being surreptitiously photographed by slimy scandal-sheet publisher Danny DeVito for purposes of blackmail.

Great acting chops displayed all the way around, most especially by veteran character actor James Cromwell, who plays a police captain who is (surprise!) on the take—and then some. Russell Crowe is violently convincing as the anger-prone, white knight cop, Bud White, who falls hopelessly in love with Kim Basinger's hot-girl-who-hits-the-wall character, as he kicks ass, breaks skulls, and doles out street justice at every available turn. ("Hush, hush…")

5. "Breakdown" (1997 – Kurt Russell, J.T. Walsh, Kathleen Quinlan)

How would you handle it if your wife, who isn't your typical cock-carousel-riding, SJW cum-dumpster, suddenly vanished while the two of you were driving cross-country through good-ol'-boy, yahoo-infested, inbred-dipshit territory? Russell does what he has to do in order to find his missing wife and bring her back alive, and he's bottom-line great as the white-collar husband who finds himself forced to bring out his rabid, inner wild animal, in order to survive and save the woman he loves.

The now-deceased J.T. Walsh is understatedly menacing as the ringleader of the white-slavery ring that plucks Russell's wife (played by Kathleen Quinlan) right out from under his city-slicker nose. Unnerving tension, great action sequences, and solid performances by all involved.

6. "The Ninth Gate" (1999 – Johnny Depp, Frank Langella, Emmanuelle Seigner, Lena Olin)

This unsettling film is flat-out creepy. Johnny Depp comes on strong as the outmanned, outgamed, rare-book dealer Dean Corso, but Frank Langella steals his thunder as the metaphysically inclined—and undoubtedly unhinged—Boris Balkan. Throw in an understated, haunting performance by smoking-hot Emmanuelle Seigner as the girl of Dean Corso's recurring dreams (or is that nightmares), and a slutty, I-love-cock-but-I'll-rip-your-heart-out performance by Lena Olin as the ruthless Liana Telfer, and you're bound to be entertained right up to the extremely bizarre, highly inflammatory climax. No politically correct, SJW goings-on here: only greed, lust, betrayal and full-tilt horror.

7. "Things to Do in Denver When You're Dead" (1995 – Andy Garcia, Christopher Walken, Treat Williams, Steve Buscemi)

Nothing cracks me up like the line, "Give it a name," which basically pokes fun at scientists and other myriad "experts", who give names to made-up bullshit, at the behest of rich oligarchs, who tell them exactly what to say in order to protect their nefarious scams. And this gold-plated one-liner recurs throughout this entertaining film, as we take a very bumpy ride with some colorful, lifelong Denver criminals, who agree to execute what they think will be one final job, which has been forcibly dumped on them by quadriplegic crime kingpin Christopher Walken.

Check out Treat Williams' turn as Critical Bill, whose nickname stems from his unshakable habit of leaving nearly every single man with whom he bumps heads in critical condition. The seductive Gabrielle Anwar is hotter than Arizona in August, too, while maintaining a girl-next-door appeal that would make any Alpha male take a really hard second look.

8. "Seeing Other People" (2004 – Jay Mohr, Julianne Nicholson, Andy Richter, Bryan Cranston)

This film was widely bashed by critics, mostly because it was an independent film whose writers openly and mockingly made fun of liberal insanity. Around 2005, virtually all Hollywood movies started reeking of SJW chicanery, and, depressingly, that trend has only accelerated since that time. But this is a truly funny, richly dark comedy about real-life relationships in the age of liberal excess, along with its concomitant collection of ridiculous, self-centered, personal expectations.

Check out the scene where Mohr's character, finally free from his clingy fiancee, hooks up with two hotties for a three-way and one of them wants to do him in the ass with a strap-on (uh, no thanks). Features top-notch performances by Mohr, Nicholson and Cranston.

9. "From Hell" (2001 – Johnny Depp, Heather Graham, Ian Holm)

A psychologically pummeling look at the Jack the Ripper killings, from an entirely refreshing perspective—and with a heavily Masonic bent. Johnny Depp absolutely nails it as the opium-addicted Inspector Frederick Abberline, who has a curious talent for seeing the future, especially while chasing the dragon (a euphemism for smoking opium).

Abberline refuses to bow to his Masonic overlords, even when his investigation leads him right to their heavily guarded halls of power, and he pays a heavy price all the way through this vivid, nightmarish ride. Avowed SJW Heather Graham, despite her brainwashed, liberal leanings, looks wholesomely fuckable as prostitute Mary Kelly.)

10. “The Machinist” (2004 – Christian Bale, Jennifer Jason Leigh, Michael Ironside, John Sharian)

Lead actor Christian Bale lost a frightening amount of weight in order to play the part of Trevor Reznik, a skeletal, insomniac machinist who hasn’t slept in over a year. Slowly losing his sanity, Reznik posts reminder notes on his refrigerator door in a desperate attempt to compensate for his growing inability to remember things. His madness accelerating, Reznik comes to believe that someone—probably one of his co-workers—is out to get him, using a phantom employee named Ivan (played by John Sharian) as the point man.

This movie is a thoroughly riveting, totally harrowing ride, and Christian Bale is at the absolute top of his game, making most of his future turns in countless mainstream Hollywood schlock-fests, look absolutely lame in comparison.

Summary

Personally, if I have to watch one more promotional clip on TV for a god-awful SJW-themed Disney movie, or a childish superhero movie, or a lousy bathroom-humor comedy, I’m gonna vomit. (But thankfully, I wouldn’t be caught dead watching any of those actual films—and hopefully, neither would you.)

Hollywood takes its name from the wood of the actual tree that was originally used to make magician's wands, and smoke-and-mirrors deception and misdirection, is what it's definitely all about. Its current mission is obviously centered around the outright force-feeding of blue-pill concepts to naive moviegoers everywhere, while completely dumbing them down in the process

But you can fight back.

Don't watch today's mainstream Hollywood crap whenever you can avoid it, and start doing that soon. Ice down a few cold ones, rustle up some snacks, call up your hottest girlfriend (women will like most of these films, even if they are liberals), tell her to get the heck over to your place, and then kick back and watch a few of these 10, killer, lights-out, red-pill-male films instead.

Read More: The Role Of Modern Entertainment In Beta Indoctrination

Bob Smith
Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

Your Body Has Not Adapted To Modern Society

August 5, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The first signs of Homo sapiens date back to 200,000 years ago in Africa. This prehistoric man is called “anatomic homo sapien” because the skeletal structure appears similar to modern man, although the behaviors, actions, and socialization of this creature are far different than modern society, and it is only the modern homo sapien, who appeared around 10,000 to 12,000 years ago, that we would likely recognize as human. It was at this time when man began to farm and herd animals, spread out across the planet, form permanent towns and cities, and develop a civilization.

Modern Life Outpaces Biological Change

The history of man is typically divided into prehistoric (before written history, other than symbols or glyphs), Antiquity (776 BC-476 AD), the Middle Ages (5th-15th century), Renaissance and Age of Enlightenment (15th-18th century), the Industrial Revolution (1760-1840), and modern history. It is only in the era of modern history that the changes have outpaced nature’s ability to adapt.

The Body Slowly Changed For 99.9% Of History

For the first 5,000 to 10,000 generations, what didn’t kill us made us stronger, and our bodies slowly changed and adapted. Humans who traveled far from Africa to northern climates developed lighter pigmented skin that was more sensitive to the light, which was far scarcer than down near the equator in the fertile crescent. Societies that ate a diet strong in fish slowly changed in other subtle ways.

But since the Industrial Revolution, our bodies have been introduced, over less than 200 years, in a mere half dozen generations, to things never seen or experienced by the human body, like electricity, vehicular transportation, processed foods, and chemical medicine. Our bodies are not able to react to these rapidly introduced changes, which drastically alter our way of life.

Is this really any way to live?

Consider, for example, how a mere 50 years ago, only 12% of houses in America had air conditioning, and it wasn't until 1980 when the figure crept up above half. Today, I cannot imagine living without air conditioning. Indeed, I often ponder on a particularly hot and humid day, how my ancestors were able to do anything other than sit in the shade and suffer. And yet, they were able to not only live, but work, function, and survive.

Our bodies are less able to tolerate changes in heat when we live year in and year out at a constant temperature. I try to keep my house slightly warm in summer and somewhat cool in winter, so that my body recognizes that I am living in a different season, and I maintain some ability to tolerate extremes in temperature.

Maybe men shouldn't have invented sexist A/C in the first place?

Your Job Is Killing You

One of the most dangerous things one can do is work the typical corporate job, sitting in a climate controlled office and staring at a computer screen for 8 hours a day tapping your index finger over a mouse button. So dangerous, in fact, that sitting for eight hours a day has been attributed to increasing the risk of premature death by 60%, increasing the risk of cancer by up to 66%, increasing the risk of heart attack by 54%, and leading to obesity.

Recent studies examined more than a million subjects, and concluded that one hour a day of exercise was needed to counteract eight hours of sitting at a desk. That's a far more robust exercise schedule than all but the hardcore gym rats.

One of the riskiest jobs out there

If you must work in an office cubicle, consider getting up and walking around for five minutes every hour, taking regular breaks, stretching your body, and moving your eyes. I recently began using a standing desk, a desk platform which can be raised or lowered, allowing one to work standing or sitting, and therefore not statically working in the same position for hours at a time.

And sitting down is only one small minor change that has been studied. Consider what staring at a fixed electronic screen a few inches from your eyes does to your vision, which was designed to constantly scan the horizon for food or enemies. The eye was developed with the ability to change focus rapidly, but what happens when we focus on the same plane for hours at a time?

Likewise our bodies are not adjusted to ingesting contaminants produced from burning fossil fuels, chemical treatments used in mass produced products, and hormones and chemicals added to food produced in factory farms. All of these changes were introduced within the past 200 years, and with insufficient time to respond biologically, our bodies often shut down, become addicted, or develop mental illness or bodily disease (The rash of degenerate sexuality is certainly related to our abnormal lifestyles).

As author Leo Goldman states in his book Too Much of a Good Thing, these rapid changes have caused four major outcomes: obesity, high blood pressure, depression or anxiety, and heart disease, which are causing 40% of deaths. Goldman states that our bodies are well designed to survive and adapt in the paleolithic age, doing things such as storing fat in order to prevent starvation, but we no longer live in that environment, and our genes have not had time to adapt to these modern changes.

One reason dieting rarely works is because the body responds in defensive ways when insufficient calories are consumed—your metabolism will actually slow down, conserving energy until a new food source is found, because your body is preventing you from starving to death. Today, 2/3 of the population in the west is overweight, and 1/3 is obese. Food is plentiful and available, but in altered forms (low-fat or no fat foods are laden with sugars and chemicals, to replace the flavor that was lost by removing the fat).

There’s a reason he is 101 and counting.. and it’s not because he’s reptilian

Steve Jobs became a billionaire with the Iphone, but he did not allow his children to use it. Elitists Bill Gates and centenarian David Rockefeller (who recently admitted to being part of a secret globalist cabal, of which he proudly stands guilty as charged) eat strict diets free from GMO food. The elitists all have multiple homes, often in warm island environments near the sea. Meanwhile, the hordes of useless eaters are expected to live in compact, unnatural urban environments, where we are more susceptible to disease, crime, mental illness, stress, and dehumanization.

Indeed, feminism is a reaction, albeit misguided, to the abnormal environment women have been placed in, which is far from their natural role as nurturing mothers. If you are choosing a career, consider an independent job outside an office. The few red pill friends I have are electricians, plumbers, and the self employed. If you are working in an office, take steps to preserve your health, and make sure you get away on vacation to experience nature, and naturally feminine women.

Take whatever steps you can to reverse the stress, disease, and death that comes with living in the Matrix. Life is short. Enjoy it.

Read More: The Theory of Evolution Does Not Apply to Modern Human Beings

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

How Masculine Is Jason Bourne?

August 5, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

Action movie franchises, like the Bourne series, are meant to reflect the times they live in. As mammoth works of pop culture, they are designed to reinforce—and, ideally, challenge—popular tastes, aesthetics, and contemporary politics.

For example, with today's craze of third-wave feminism, is it any coincidence that James Bond is being criticized for his "misogyny"? While it is true that Bond, like Jason Bourne, is a "tough guy" who does not suffer fools–male or female–that is not an extension of a hatred squarely aimed at women.

Rather, since 9/11, Bond has been portrayed as a damaged antihero, embodying a rugged confidence and defiance that is condemned and, frankly, misunderstood nowadays. Wielding a firm set of skills and principles, Bond knows how to get exactly what he wants–qualities which women love (whether they admit it or not) and other men respect.

Jason Bourne is an interesting case of masculine ideals. He shares 007's physical endurance and mental sharpness that, with age (Damon is 45; was 29 in The Bourne Identity), has grown cynical and world-weary. Bags darkening under his eyes and wrinkles lining his face, Bourne moves through his environment with the same precision a horseback John Wayne acquired when he navigated Monument Valley in the Classic Westerns of the 1950s.

Jason Bourne: scrappy, bruised, damaged. But what's on the inside?

What separates Bourne from other action heroes, though, is his constant search for identity. While many action films put their leading man through an identity crisis (virtually every Christopher Nolan movie), Jason Bourne's existential struggle has been the impetus of the entire commercially successful franchise, which is based on Robert Ludlum's books.

In Jason Bourne, the fifth movie of the series (and fourth to star Matt Damon), Bourne's hunt for self is, on the surface, an apt analogy for the identity crisis of today's men pursuing masculine ideals against the politically correct wagging finger of "toxic masculinity."

Following this analogy, the Central Intelligence Agency is that authoritarian force that tries to dominate, control, and neutralize Bourne's said quest. Within the agency, counterinsurgency expert Heather Lee (Alicia Vikander) asserts herself in a male-dominated division by showing initiative to her male bosses in handling the mission to take out Bourne.

Heather is in search of an identity as well, only it is career-based: she wants to leapfrog from an already-plum position to become the eyes and ears of the CIA Director (a sour, mean-faced Tommy Lee Jones).

Bourne and Heather are complementary characters separated by their allegiances. A man on the run, Bourne serves his own cause, whereas Heather serves the Establishment (but, really, for her own benefit). Further, Bourne has no pretensions about his principles, whereas Heather feigns nobility and honor.

In one scene, she defends to a tech giant (Nightcrawler's Riz Ahmed) that her principles are "still there" after joining the unconstitutional intelligence agency. But in reality, she is selfish and out to career climb, which is confirmed in the film's final confrontation (see below).

Heather (Vikander) and Bourne (Damon) are each other's foils in "Jason Bourne".

Unfortunately though, Jason Bourne plays more for plot than story, meaning that these themes are undermined instead of underlined by the action. Narrative exposition and tricky twists are privileged over character building and catharsis. But that is Paul Greengrass for you; he is a director (Captain Phillips most recently) who specializes in shaky-cam action that strictly attempts to create the illusion of real time. Greengrass favours fluidity of plot, which helps the pace of his films but not their ideas.

Loading…

His scrappy style resembles Michael Mann's–Jason Bourne's cyber warfare premise mirrors last year's excellent Blackhat– only Mann's movies are also about character. As critic Matt Zoller Seitz wrote, "Mann is an action filmmaker even when his characters are standing still". In addition, Mann interestingly casted Hollywood beau Chris Hemsworth against type as a brainy computer hacker, which added shades of contrast to the hero's personality.

The boyish Damon is better when his "heroic" roles are tongue-in-cheek (The Martian, True Grit) or laced with cowardice (The Departed, Interstellar). While Damon has physical chutzpah, his heroism needs some irony or masculine flaw.

The Bourne movies give Damon a serious-looking leading character, but that male archetype is starting to exhaust itself and requires deconstruction, which this new film fails to offer.

This is likely why the curly-haired, sneaky-like-a-rat Asset (Vincent Cassel) is a fresher character. Bourne's arch-enemy, the Asset is a fresh addition to the series and is dependably slick and deadly. He packs punch. Bourne, meanwhile, needs a flaw, some sort of imperfection to test his will and give weight to his identity hunt (Damon's arguably hypocritical gun control stance would serve as a useful implementation, couldn't it?).

Lacking depth, Jason Bourne has little to say about its titular hero. While the film implies a socio-political allegory, it is not worked out in the plot. There is an opportunity in the film to highlight Bourne's connection to his father, but this is obfuscated by flashy flashbacks that merely function as jolts of "information". Greengrass repeats these flashbacks, not to identify with Bourne's fractured state of mind but to continuously prompt the poor memory of the average action movie goer.

007 – a masculine hero. And yes that's a gun in his hand, Lena Dunham.

Further, the plot is predictable. It follows the formula of the previous entries, so by the film's close it is easy to predict Bourne's next duck, step, leap, punch, and all of his other basic forms of tactical combat as he maneuvers through Athens, London, and Las Vegas. Bourne lacks his reliable elusiveness; it is interesting when that is because the CIA can track him easier due to advancements in modern technology, but his predictability is primarily borne out of familiar plot mechanics.

In Jason Bourne, the question "How Masculine Is Jason Bourne" is really, unfortunately moot. An informed viewer can project their knowledge of gender identity and past masculine heroes onto the film and surmise their own conclusions; from this writer's perspective, however, masculine identity is not examined or even reflected in Greengrass's direction or script (cowritten by Christopher Rouse).

Thus, Bourne has devolved into a hollow hero (and yet "we need to evolve," Damon ironically stated in a July interview promoting gun control); he's become an object of plot, meant to bait his audience along to the franchise's (inevitable) next film. Ultimately, Damon plays a hero that needs to discover "who he really is" simply so we will continue to buy tickets. A shill for Hollywood–not so masculine, you could say.

Read More: 8 Films With Masculine Virtue

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

How Society's Harridans And Succubis Are Crushing Masculinity

August 5, 2016 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

John C. Wright—the full-time science fiction author and part-time theologian—once noted that heresies often come in pairs. His focus was on church heresies of the first millennium, but it is no less true today. For every foolish idea, there almost always arises an equal and opposite form of foolishness, and despite their apparent opposition they ultimately wind up working together to oppose the truth.

Such is the case with "sex positive" and "sex negative" feminism.

The latter is the more obvious opponent of traditional masculinity; it demonizes the healthy male libido, and its ranks include censorious women such as the anti-porn advocate Gail Dines, and the anti-fun advocate Anita Sarkeesian. They promote a worldview where sex between a man and a woman is seen as inherently negative, all men are viewed as potential rapists, and consent is defined as how a woman feels after the fact, rather than what she did or said prior to the liaison.

Sex positive, on the other hand, is the friendly face of feminism; the smiling fox which seduces the moderate. It teaches young girls that pleasure can be empowering, that experimentation is liberating, and that beauty is something to reveled in. At first blush it seems highly advantageous, even compatible, with the goals of a man who pursues self-improvement, and who seeks out beautiful, feminine women… but make no mistake: both of these feminist schools are ultimately opposed to healthy masculinity, and by coming at a man from both sides, they batter and cajole him into becoming a pathetic, shambling wreck of a human being.

One comes as an enemy, the other comes as a friend, but both sides offer a poisoned chalice.

Porn And Feminism

Porn hurts children – because all men are potential rapists.

The most common battleground where the Succubi and the Harridans meet is the world of pornography, as well as its complementary issue, the pornified culture. The pro-sex Succubi point out that porn is consensual, profitable, and that any restriction on porn is tantamount to censorship; the anti-sex Harridans forewarn that pornographic imagery degrades the individual, and turns sex into a commodity.

They are both right, but for all the wrong reasons.

The Harridans are correct that the commodification of sex cheapens the coital act; that consumerism creates a "race to the bottom," where cheap and addictive pablum out-competes quality. We see this in the Standard American Diet: scientists perform chemical analyses on healthy and wholesome fruit, they determine which 3 of the 30,000 chemicals present are necessary to stimulate the taste buds, and then they refine it, simulate it, and inject it into snack cakes made out of gluten and corn syrup: cherry-flavored cancer, sold in grocery stores nation wide.

Porn is no different. Out of love's rich tapestry—courtship, romance, trust, vulnerability, compassion, comfort, and joy—they isolate the sex, distill it, enhance it, and package it in brightly-colored plastic for mass consumption by the proletariat. The human is degraded into a product; a surface patina; a replaceable part—and the result is extremely addictive.

The Succubi's response is to embrace radical freedom and the first amendment. Today they ban porn—what will they ban tomorrow? Prurient it might be, but what form of art isn't? Shall we demonize sexuality? Put a fig leaf on Michelangelo's David? Shame and guilt young adults for the very urges that create the next generation? The human form is beautiful; the expression of love is beautiful; the Harridans are nothing more than a bunch of neurotics who want society to protect them from their own debased nature!

Both sides accuse the other of promoting social decay. The Succubi promote hedonism; the Harridans, vicious legalism. The ensuing debate goes in circles. One side might gain a temporary advantage, but it will never reach a conclusion; when the Succubi prevail, it proves the Harridan's point; and when the Harridans take over, the sexual repression results in a new crop of Succubi.

Neither side can ever win, but through their conflicts they establish a battlefield which serves both sides. A battlefield based upon certain axioms and assumptions about human nature, which both sides hold in common… and which are fundamentally false.

His soul is lost to ideologies and false narratives.

A House Built On Sand

The Harridans critique social decay; but instead of accepting their conclusions at face value, let us examine how they critique it, and through that, the underlying why: we will discover that their motives are debased and foul.

Their objection to the pornified culture is not that it destroys the living institution of holy matrimony; rather, their complaint is that it objectifies women. They claim that porn is a result of the "male gaze"; a supernatural ability granted to men, whereby we exploit and degrade women merely by the act of admiring them for their physical beauty. We are the ones who isolate and distill them; we are the ones who crush their souls and turn them into harlots; we, therefore, are nothing but a gang of spiritual rapists.

The porn starlet is being exploited by her customers, who use her for sexual gratification, and then discard like used tissue. Her humanity is denied, her worth is measured by a sexual metric, and the shekels she receives define her moral worth… just as they define the worth of the stay-at-home-wife.

A sixteen year-old girl puts on a bikini; maybe she does it for the fanboys on Twitch.tv, or maybe she does it to find a boyfriend. No matter what the motivation, she has turned sex into a transaction wherein she sells herself to men. To the Harridan, this proves that she has no agency; she's just a commodity being sold on the market.

Thus they claim that all women are innately subjugated by the existence of masculinity. That male virility creates female objectification; that because men like beautiful women, women are forced to become decorative objects, and thus the only way to free womankind is to crush expansive masculinity.

Castration and lesbianism; only by this two-pronged approach can women finally be liberated.

The Succubi, meanwhile, love sex; they appreciate men (both aesthetically and functionally) and they enjoy the power of female flirtation. Thus are they opposed to the Harridans—but like the Harridans, they demand women's sexual autonomy.

The ranks of the Harridans are made up of sexual losers; women who are old, ugly, or so mentally damaged that they can't help but hate any sort of male authority over them. The ranks of the Succubi are filled with women who were gifted with good looks, a charming disposition, and material security. They take pleasure in the sexual act—as any healthy woman should—but they demand that the act occur on their own terms. They declare their agency over themselves, over their sexuality, and ultimately—over the very men they sleep with.

They enjoy sexual congress, and they enjoy the attention they are able to command. For the Succubus, sex is not only a source of pleasure; it's also a source of power.

They value the masculine principle – but only so long as it is subservient to them.

Unlimited Sexual Freedom

Feminism is entirely focused on sex, specifically the female sex (it's right there in the title, after all) and thus all of its arguments eventually reduce to the sexual act itself, the most basic and intimate relationship which differentiates man from woman. All other matters which feminists concern themselves with—income, employment, education, cultural representation, ad nauseum—are simply second order effects.

They focus on sex, but exclusively from their own side; they view it as transactional and combative, a zero-sum game where one side's profit is the other side's loss. To the feminist, sex is not seen as collaborative or generative. They fail to realize that, through the mutual sacrifice of primordial instincts to a higher cause, both male and female create a whole which is greater than the sum of its parts—and thus they attempt to claim as much of the transactional capital as they can get away with.

Loading...
Their ultimate goal is unlimited sexual freedom, without any sort of responsibility.

The traditional form of marriage, which is present in all cultures with only minor variations, assumes male headship and male responsibility. The husband is the executive officer who is nonetheless responsible for the family unit. Feminists, taking a cue from the Marxists who inspired them, ignore the responsibility that comes along with leadership, in the same way that a communists ignores the enormous risk taken on by the capitalist. They demand access to the sexual means of production, while eschewing the duty of using their sexual power responsibly.

The Harridans try and achieve this power by crushing masculinity. They lecture boys on the oppressive nature of their sex, they censure imagery that is pleasing to men, and they twist the legal system so that man is presumed guilty whenever a woman accuses him. As noted earlier, they employ these methods because they cannot compete against the Succubi in an open market; they wish to bring all women down to their level.

But the Succubi are no less totalitarian in their demands for unlimited freedom. They want abortion on demand, they want to eliminate "slut shaming," they want their depravity to be celebrated and affirmed. Traditionalism demands that men act with honor towards women – that they do not make false promises, that they take responsibility for their offspring, and that they keep their woman in safety and security. Women's complementary role is that of fidelity; they are to remain faithful to their husband, chaste outside of marriage, and respectful of his headship. These are the duties which the Succubi eschew.

They desire the dominance of the Mistress; a caricature of male headship. Men are to be thankful for whatever sexual scraps these women throw at them. The Succubus thinks of herself as a goddesses, entitled to male devotion and supplication. Men should buy her drinks at the bar, and be gratified with whatever she gives them in return. They are not entitled to her attention, let alone any sort of sexual commitment, not even to basic civility. She, on the other hand, is entitled to their tithe, she has a right to it, with no sorts of responsibility attached; her rights and entitlements are greater than any feudal lord, because her femininity places her above the mortal plane.

> Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou?
> Isaiah 45:9

In the world of the Succubus, men should act with virility when ordered to do so – and so even this virility becomes a form of obedience. They are forever to remain boys, obedient to mommy dearest, who will praise them for sending her donations as she tells them about her new bull, who himself is but another slave to her whims.

Whenever you watch porn, you are chaining yourself to a slut.

The Crux Of Heresy

A heresy isn't a heresy merely because it disagrees with the establishment's view; at the center of it is an oversimplification, a distillation of life down to a single element, a lusterless metric by which all things are judged. John C. Wright describes it thusly:

> There is a pattern to heretical ideas. A heretical idea is always the brainchild of one man, so it is always one simple idea, something that can be repeated on a bumper sticker. Heresy is impatient with quibble, qualification, and precision. It is always a flat idea, something that seems more like a diagram and less like a family portrait. And it is always an unbalanced idea, like a wild cook finding that a little ketchup makes burgers and fries taste better concluding that a lot of ketchup will make everything from eggs to ice cream taste better. This is because the truth is a balancing act, and a heresy is a stumble and a fall.

When considering the Harridans and the Succubi, we have two bumper stickers: Porn Hurts Women! and Sex is Empowering! Both trace their roots to a single idea: women's agency.

The Harridans claim that women have no agency, so long as men are allowed to exist; ergo they shame men for their virile instincts, and claim that women can never be held accountable. Whenever sex goes bad, it is inevitably the man's fault. The Succubi embrace absolute agency; they claim that anything a woman does must be celebrated and encouraged, because she chose it out of her own free will. Both sides view women's freedom as the highest moral calling; the former want freedom from men, while the latter want freedom over men.

The modern conception of rights and freedoms traces its roots back to the rights and entitlements granted to the nobility by the King, who himself was anointed by the Church. A noble would be granted the right and entitlement to a certain tract of land and the peasants who lived thereon, but his claim remained dependent upon him fulfilling his duties and obligations to the King, who was himself charged with providing just rule for all of his citizens in Christ's name. Over the centuries we have expanded these rights to larger and larger groups, we are presently trying to grant them to all who walk upon the Earth, but somewhere along the way we forgot that rights are dependent upon responsibilities.

The freedom which the feminists celebrate is a good thing; a free market will create more wealth than a controlled economy, free speech allows bad ideas to be challenged so that good ideas win out, and freedom of conscience allows allows each citizen seek out God and develop spiritually, rather than remaining stymied by fiat superstition. But freedom should not be an end in itself; if freedom is not balanced with responsibility, justice, erudition, and loyalty to kin and country, it becomes the enemy of civilization. It becomes a vehicle for moral depravity in the name of self-actualization.

This is the sort of freedom that the Succubi and the Harridans demand. Original sin is put entirely onto the masculine, rather than being shared equally by both sexes. The Harridan defines the man as either a castrato or a beast; the Succubi, as a cuckold or a stud. Do not mistake the latter's pat on the head, or sexual congress, for masculinity; the roles offered by the feminist psychodrama are roles fit for boys, not men.

The Feminists would make themselves goddesses; beings who are able to create and define reality through words and emotions. In this, they are nothing new; man has always sought to become his own god.

Feminism must be resisted, but not by resorting to an inversion, some sort of "male feminism" where we blame women for all our problems, and claim that all male instincts are beyond reproach. To do so would be to trap ourselves into the exact same dynamic which the Feminists are propagating; mutual animosity and exploitation between the sexes. Rather, it is our calling to rise above such petty vanities; to find our place in the hierarchy of existence, somewhere above animals, but not in the role of gods who declare this true or that beautiful by our own divine fiat. Men are granted the right of dominion over the Earth as its stewards, and a steward is responsible for taking care of that which is entrusted to him.

We must not worship women; but neither should we despise them. We are called to husband them; to love and cherish them, to guide and protect them, as we reject self-serving conceits and empty hedonism. To find women worthy of our love, we must become men worthy of their respect, and by doing so we will come to fulfill our rightful place in God's creation.

Marriage is more than just a comfortable compromise; it is a Sacrament, and a divine calling.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The Marriage Paradigm

Davis M.J. Aurini
Davis was trained as a Historian at McMaster University, and as an Infantry soldier in the Canadian Forces. An author, strategist, Catholic medievalist, and an entrepreneur, his writing can be found at Stares at the World.

It Doesn’t Matter If Women Win Gold Medals At The Rio Olympics

August 6, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

The U.S. mainstream media is hailing the record number of female athletes which are heading to Rio de Janeiro for the Olympic Games, with a total of 292 out of the 555 American competitors being women. Because you know, gender gaps are worthy of congratulations and applause just as long as there are less men and more women stepping up to the plate.

In truth, this is actually a sad state of affairs. It means that the U.S. Olympic team will have less than a 50% chance of seeing a real champion, rather than a 2nd rate gold medalist from the weaker sex, achieving athletic glory on the world stage.

I’ve said it before in my previous article “Anything Women Can Do, Men Can Do Better,” and I’ll say it again in 2016. The best females can never outclass the best males in sport and athleticism.

Denial Is A River In Lefty Land

Feminists always love to espouse that women can be “just as good as any man” in sports, but this has always been a preposterous falsehood. The average women only has roughly 60% of the strength and muscle characteristics of a comparable man, and the greatest gender difference in upper body strength can probably be attributed to the fact that women tend to have a significantly lower proportion of their lean muscle tissue distributed in the upper body.

In other words, women will NEVER reach the stratospheric heights of the best male boxers, weightlifters, javelin throwers, hammer throwers, rowers, swimmers, pole vaulters, and a host of other Olympic events where upper body strength is pivotal to reaching the podium.

But what about feats of agility and stamina where upper body strength is not quite as vital? Such as Association Football (Soccer) and most running and jumping events at track and field? Well grab your adult coloring books and head to your "safe space" SJW's, because the best male runners at the marathon (the biggest combo test of speed and stamina) are routinely faster than the best women.

> "At every distance up to the marathon, the gap between men's and women's world record times is nine to 10 percent—and it's a similar or even higher percentage among recreational runners." – Runner's World, April 2015 Edition

Get it? Due to irrefutable biological characteristics, women just don't have the strength, speed, and physical fortitude to run faster or perform better at the same sport than the best men. Case in point, the Australian national women's soccer team (which is participating at this Olympic games) was absolutely humiliated earlier this year by a 7 – 0 loss to the Australian national under FIFTEEN's boys side (which is not participating).

Even in Olympic events which do not require overt displays of speed, stamina, or brute strength—such as gymnastics—denial dwelling SJWs and white knights may resort to saying that female gymnasts are more "graceful" and agile than their male counterparts.

Oh really? I beg to differ. Just watch British freerunner Will Sutton take a stroll around the Isle of Man, combining incredible acrobatics, athleticism, speed, stamina, and landing dangerous jumps that not a single woman has been able to emulate thus far.

(Note: Just watch between 1:30 and 3:15 if you are pressed for time. Any woman with half of this skill and daredevil would be showered with endless praises of "Goddess!" and "You're such an inspiration!")

Loading…

Authoritative Quotes On Male And Female Physiology

> 'Agility depends upon the ability to decelerate and accelerate fast, and men – because of their larger muscles – will always have an advantage,' – Harry Brennan, Exercise Physiologist

> 'There was a period in the Seventies when women equaled or broke more world records than men, but that was before the fall of the Berlin Wall.' – Harry Brennan, Exercise Physiologist

(Translation: this was the era when Eastern Bloc coaches were feeding female athletes steroids like sweets. They were outright cheaters.)

> 'The male skeleton is bigger and gives them an inherent advantage – larger bones are generally stronger,' – Ignac Fogelman, Endocrinologist Professor

> ‘Faster men’s times for 100 to 800 meters are mostly due to men, on average, having greater muscle mass—and a larger portion of it is fast-twitch, which allows them to generate greater force, speed, and anaerobically produced energy’ – Chris Schwirian, Biological Sciences lecturer at Ohio University

World Athletic Records Men Vs. Women

100m Dash World Record

9.58 s – Usain Bolt (Men’s)

10.49 s – Florence Griffith Joyner (Women’s)

High Jump World Record

2.45 m – Javier Sotomayor (Men’s)

2.09 m – Stefka Kostadinova (Women’s)

Hammer Throw World Record

86.74 m – Yuriy Sedykh (Men’s)

79.58 m – Anita Wlodarczyk (Women’s)

Event	Men	Women	Performance Ratio
100m Free	46.91	52.07	90.1%
100m Breast	58.46	64.45	90.7%
100m Butter	49.82	55.98	89.0%
100m Back	51.94	58.12	89.4%
200 Medley	114	126.15	90.4%
400 Medley	243.84	268.43	90.8%
1500m Swim	874.14	942.54	92.7%
100m Race	9.58	10.49	91.3%
400m Race	43.18	47.6	90.7%
1500m Race	206	230.46	89.4%
5k Race	757.35	851.15	89.0%
Marathon	7418	8125	91.3%

NO woman is better than the best man

> We Thought Female Athletes Were Catching Up to Men, But They’re Not – Leftist News Outlet ‘The Atlantic‘

Conclusion

Whenever female athletes are awarded a “gold medal” at the Olympics, it should just be a giant knockoff of that cheap Hanukkah gelt (chocolate gold coins) that Jewish children get for the holiday season. After the brief surge of excitement that they have won “gold”

(and attention whore themselves with it on Instagram), they can peel off the tin foil and feast on the chocolatey goodness inside until it's all gone. "You go girl!"

Yummy Cheap Chocolate Candy!! Omm Nom Nom Nom!!

After all, since women are ultimately just big children, they merely deserve to have big children's candy. The REAL gold medals should be allocated to the real champions of a sporting discipline's top tier, which will always be men.

Unfortunately, "equality" obsessed feminists and SJW's will be absolutely thrilled when women take home gold medals at the Olympic games, even though their competitive talents and event completion times will be noticeably worse than many male athletes who will return home with nothing.

So best of luck to all the male athletes in the Games of the XXXI Olympiad! Go for gold! (And I do mean the real kind).

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

John Carver
John Carver is a four year ROK veteran with over fifty articles of SJW-triggering truth bombs on archive. You can follow him on Twitter if you are so inclined.

10 Words And Phrases Girls Habitually Use That Prove They Are Mindless Robots

August 6, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Have you ever noticed that most liberal Western women utilize the following 10 words and phrases as the mainstays of their vocabulary? They utter these words and phrases in the exact same ways, using the exact same vocal inflections:

1. Amazing

(Spoken as, uh-MAYYYYY-zing)

2. Oh my god

(Spoken as, OHHHHH my god or OH. MY. GOD.)

3. So good

(Spoken as, SOOOOO good, or SO. GOOD. – as in, “That chocolate dildo tasted – SO. GOOD. – right after I banged myself with it.”)

4. Thank you

(Spoken as, THANG-cue, or THANG-kuh yoooo-WUH)

5. Like

(Typically utilized in conjunction with the other four words above, such as in the following sentence, “OH. MY. GOD. – like, that orgasm was…SO. GOD. It was uh-MAYYYYY-zing! THANG-cue.”)

6. Really

(Spoken as, REEEEE-lee, and typically utilized in conjunction with the other five words and phrases above, such as in the following sentence, “OH. MY. GOD. – like, that orgasm was…SO. GOOD. It REEEEE-lee was uh-MAYYYYY-zing! THANG-cue.”)

7. Right

(Spoken as, righ-EET?, and typically utilized in conjunction with the other six words and phrases above, such as in the following sentence, “OH. MY. GOD. – like, that orgasm was…SO. GOOD. It REEEEE-lee was uh-MAYYYYY-zing! Righ-EET? THANG-cue.”)

8. Cute

(Spoken as, CUE-wut, or KEE-ute, and utilized in conjunction with the other seven words and phrases above, such as in the following sentence, “OH. MY. GOD. You’re so CUE-wut. Like, that orgasm was…SO. GOOD. It REEEEE-lee was uh-MAYYYYY-zing! Righ-EET? THANG-cue.”)

(Thanks to ROK reader Andrew, who pointed out that I had forgotten to include No. 8 above, in my original list of words and phrases.)

9. Awesome

(Spoken as, AWE-sum, and utilized in conjunction with the other eight words and phrases above, such as in the following sentence, “OH. MY. GOD. You’re so CUE-wut. You’re so AWE-sum! Like, that orgasm was…SO. GOOD. It REEEEE-lee was uh-MAYYYYY-zing! Righ-EET? THANG-cue.”)

10. No

(Spoken as, NO-wuh, and typically utilized separately from the other nine words and phrases above; such as in the following, extremely common man/woman exchange – Man: “Did you get banged last night while you were supposedly visiting your sister, Sunshine?” Woman, pouting: “NO-wuh.”)

The 10 words and phrases above are often utilized whenever a woman is trying to deflect attention away from her sexual shenanigans. By strategically utilizing them at critical junctures, she maintains an innocent, teenage-girl vibe, while pretending to be really into you—above all other men.

This greatly appeals to your nurturing, protective side, not to mention your ego, and might allow her to distract you from the curious matter that exhibited itself only a few moments earlier.

She will often bust out the above words and phrases if she suddenly exhibits new physical skills that she didn’t used to possess, such as snapping a bath towel, or being able to play a brand-new type of card game, which are overt signs that she is a cheating slut who has picked up new tricks from some random dipstick she has been banging on the side.

These robotic, mindless, incessantly jabbering sluts are as common as crotch crickets and are literally everywhere, and you can quickly replace one with another, just by going down to the corner bar and telling some other vacuous broad that your great-uncle left you $10 million dollars which you will be collecting in 12 short weeks.

At which point, your newest bimbo-of-the-week will utter the same 10 words and phrases listed above, while simultaneously complimenting you on your good looks, your sense of style, your incredible scent, and your great sense of humor, shortly before whisking you off to her place.

Like, amazing!

Read More: 4 Ways To Stop Being A MGTOW

Bob Smith
Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

8 Rules Of Gym Etiquette

August 7, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Going to the gym is, contra to what the Telegraph says, an enriching experience, particularly for the masculine man, but also for women and men who are not masculine, but wish to be. In addition to training your body to be stronger, faster, and more dexterous, the gym is also a place that implicitly trains your mind to be more goal-oriented. This can even be repurposed into forming the masculine tribe that most of us lack in today's de-gendered world.

Some would also argue that gyms are a good place to get some strange for the evening: while nubiles in yoga pants are certainly a welcome distraction, I can't help but feel that people who go to the gym primarily to have sex and secondarily to actually exercise are people that are half-assing their workout—or are the prototypical gay "gym bunny," neither of which should be your reasons for going to a gym.

So, assuming that you are a novice to the gym who is going for the purpose of bettering yourself as a man, here are a few tips on how to properly conduct yourself in the gym. These will help you get the most out of your workout and turn yourself into the "local paragon" of fitness.

1. Keep your shirt on

Not that I doubt that you have the physique of a Herculean Adonis, but keeping your shirt on serves a variety of purposes—not the least of which is hygiene–leaving sweat and body oils on the bench or chair can lead to a variety of dermatological problems such as groin irritation, fungal infections, dermatitis (commonly referred to as cradle cap), and general rashes and hives.

Plus, leaving your myriad greases on the equipment makes it more difficult for the next person, which is just plain inconsiderate (I have actually seen a guy slip right off a machine because it was covered in the last guy's sweat).

While we're on this topic, I'd also like to say: please stop wearing those shirts that have no sides. While this will sop up the majority of the sweat from your chest and back, it still leaves about 30% of your torso exposed and sweaty. In addition, these just may make you come off as more of a douchebag than just taking your shirt off completely. Is it just me, or do these shirts look more like a bib than anything else? Well I suppose that it's only fitting you wear a bib if you're going to catch cradle cap and diaper rash as well.

2. Wipe your station down

This is related to the previous one, and it's pretty simple: Wipe down the stuff you use, particularly any exercise that requires you to be in a supine or seated position. Any halfway decent gym will have a bottle of disinfectant and a hand towel hanging from the wall to use.

In addition to this obvious advice, might I also advise you to moisten that same towel and wipe any chalk that you use off the bar. While it won't cause skin disease, it's still fairly irritating to the next guy to get your chalk on his hands.

3. Use headphones

We all know that the music they play in most commercial gyms is, to put it bluntly, dogshit. My gym plays the most bland, interchangeable top 40 "music" you can imagine. Luckily, this can be easily remedied by using headphones—a memo that a few people who go to my gym didn't seem to get. These people instead chose to bring speakers and blast their music—and their music was the worst sort of butt-rock that was only marginally better than the bubblegum pop on the loudspeaker.

4. Don’t stare at the yoga pants clad asses

Yes, they’re very nice. Don’t stare, don’t make little suckling motions with your mouth, and for god’s sake don’t start masturbating in the gym—it increases blood pressure and causes a drop in testosterone, which will ruin your workout. If you want the girl, go up to her and get her phone number like a proper man.

5. Don’t scream, grunt or drop the weights

First of all: Yes, I’m fully aware that screaming and grunting can have a positive effect on your strength for the same reason that martial artists use kiais—it forces the muscles of the back and abdomen to constrict, giving you an extra burst of power due to that proprioception stuff I’m always talking about. Regardless, don’t do it.

Secondly: By grunting and screaming, I’m not referring to the involuntary snort or grunt you’ll do when you’ve properly inhaled before the lift and the weight literally forces the air out of you—that’s the proprioception that I have repeatedly mentioned. I’m referring to the guys who will scream and holler before they’ve even lifted the weight, and keep up a continuous stream of vocal gibberish during the lift.

“But the guys in the World’s Strongest Man competition do it!” Yes they do, and they’re competing for huge cash prizes and sponsorships from every supplement company on the planet. YOU, in contrast, are not them. Of course, I freely admit I’m not nearly in the category of those WSM competitors either, but I don't draw attention to myself by acting like a howling simpleton.

Also, if you're really doing a heavy lift, you won't be capable of forming multisyllabic words (And yes, I've seen and heard this), so stop doing fake screaming to help you with that oh-so-heavy 100 pound overhead press.

And stop dropping the weight on the ground, Ivan Drago—it's distracting to the other gymgoers, it's dangerous, and the owner of the gym ought to smack you upside the head for increasing his insurance premium.

6. Use a squat rack and power cage for their intended purpose

I'm hardly the first person to point this out, but: your double bicep curl does not need the use of a rack and Olympic bar. The rack is for men who want to do real exercises like squats, overhead presses, and deadlifts, exercises that absolutely need the rack to be done properly. Frankly, I have much greater esteem for a guy who uses these apparati to do body levers, v-sits, and other gymnastic static positions: while they could easily do these on a pull-up bar, parallel bars, or on a tree branch outside the building, these are at least useful and functional exercises. If you want to do bicep curls, use a smaller bar, dumbbells, or go find a bathhouse to join instead of a proper gym.

On that note:

7. Don't do a million pointless exercises, use compound lifts

Many people when they start working out, will putter around doing a julienne of isolation exercises. Don't do this—boil your workout down to 10 or so compound exercises that will work your entire body. It'll make you bigger and functionally stronger, and save you a lot of time.

And finally:

8. Don’t walk around in a shower cap and nothing else

This is an affliction that seems to affect the elderly more than anything else, which has led to me seeing more pockmarked elderly penis than I’ve ever cared to. Perhaps it’s just that they’ve long since ceased giving a damn, but I still feel that for courtesy’s sake you should at least wear a towel. Plus, hygiene!

The tips enumerated above are simple and effective tips to help you get the most out of your workout, and ingratiate you to your fellow gymgoers.

Read More: 5 Questions To Identify Who Really Rules Over You

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Is Islam Really The Biggest Threat To The West?

August 7, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

I understand this will be a sensitive topic, especially with the current election cycle in the United States and the recent (weekly? daily?) attacks now being carried out by ISIS in Europe. My purpose in writing this post is to a) expose truth and dispel ignorance and b) be a voice of dispassionate reason on a very emotional topic.

I think it is best to start off by making two points clear on my part as author. First—Islam is a problem, but in the same way as guns are a problem. It is people that kill people, not guns, and I believe the same argument can be said of Islam. This is not to dismiss the real threat of radical Islam, which I am not doing. That said, there are millions of Muslims living in America and Europe today who are not running around killing anyone. I know this will unleash the rage trolls in the comments, but this is simple fact. If Muslims truly wanted all us kufar dead, we would be.

Second—ISIS has been proven to be a creation of the CIA and thus has backing and support from western allied NATO nations. America Created Al-Qaeda and the ISIS Terror Group is an excellent introduction to why all this terror is being unleashed on the world in the name of Islam.

> There are essentially three wars being waged in Syria: one between the government and the rebels, another between Iran and Saudi Arabia, and yet another between America and Russia.

Never forget. When “they” want you to hate someone, it is because it is useful for them. Again, I am not as author dismissing the real threat of radical Islam. I am merely asking you to suspend your anger and look behind the curtain to the wizard pulling your emotional strings.

With these two points made clear, let's get to the heart of the problem that is Islam's threat to the West.

A Western existential crisis that has nothing to do with Islam, and everything to do with the West itself.

Islam has forced the West to ask itself two very uncomfortable questions. What do you stand for? What do you believe in?

> So when we say we are living amongst Islamist, fanatical sharia driven scum… who wish to completely destroy this nation… you just met one of them.
>
> ~ Tommy Robinson

The above video is just one of many you will find on Muslim no-go or exclusion zones in Britain and Europe. Islam is clearly a force in Europe and a growing one in the Americas. To deny this is to be completely blind to reality. But is the West so blind now with rage we can't see what Muslims and Islam are trying to open our eyes to in order to see?

If we adjust our lens on Islam but a fraction of a degree, we could phrase the fundamental question it poses to The West from another perspective. A question Tommy Robinson alludes to in his quote above.

What "culture," what "way of life," are Muslims threatening to destroy?

An unshakeable and deeply held belief in God, His moral teachings and the potential judgement of an afterlife in hell or heaven? God and Christianity is now permanently expunged from Western consciousness, especially in the media, education, workplace and political spheres of life – i.e. the cultural mainstream of society.

From the end of the Roman Empire through a 1000 years of medieval darkness, to the middle ages of the Renaissance and finally the Enlightenment, Europe (and then America) was a Christian culture, society and people. After 2000 years, it no longer is. Getting angry about it is not going to change this fact. For America or Europe to be Christian again is going to require a miracle. One I don't see coming anytime soon.

What about traditional marriage between a man and a woman? Please, we know the answer to that one.

What about patriarchal gender roles based on masculinity and femininity? You know, husband and wife, father and mother? Provide and protect, home and hearth? The family as the foundational unit of a just, peaceful and happy society?

Top comments

Emily Legault 5 months ago
I LOVE IT
Reply · 1

Johnny Jacobsen 1 month ago
The only flaw with this show was that the mother went back to the father.
Reply ·

Po A. 2 months ago
BRING THIS SHOW BACK!!!!!!!!!!
Reply · 3

JkJQU 4 months ago
THIS SHOW IS SO GOOD WTF!
Reply · 1

Leslie Young 6 months ago
I miss this show. I really wished it had been picked up.
Reply · 1

ROK and our community of traditional, masculine and proudly heterosexual men, now being threatened with banishment from the whole of the EU, answers that question. Do I need to even say one word about the current status of democracy and its institutions in the West?

Again I ask you. What culture is Islam threatening to destroy in the West if it takes over? What values and beliefs are Germans, and many other Europeans, now finally starting to stand up and defend as “our way of life?”

Fully Nude Woman Protests Muslim Rape Gang In Germany

> Milo Moiré held up a poster reading “Respect us! We are no fair game, even when we are naked!!!” in Cologne, Germany to protest the 1,000-member Muslim rape gang that ran amok on New Year’s Eve.
>
> “I stand for women’s freedom to move freely. For the things we’ve achieved in the past 50 years – for women’s emancipation,” Moiré said.

Swedish Liberal Party Youth Wing Calls for Legalization of Necrophilia, Incest

> The Swedish Liberal party’s youth wing proposed legalizing necrophilia and incest Sunday during the group’s annual meeting in Stockholm.
>
> According to the motion filed, two consenting siblings 15 years of age and older should be allowed to engage in sexual intercourse while sex with a human corpse should also be legalized so long as the deceased gave written permission prior to passing.
>
> Speaking with Swedish news site Aftonbladet, Liberal Youth leader Cecilia Johnsson painted the move as a progressive step forward for the Scandinavian country.
>
> “We are a youth organization and one of our task is to think one step further,” Johnsson said.
>
> Johnsson stated that although most of society views the practices as “disgusting,” such acts should not be outlawed by the government.

While I do not condone whole areas of Europe becoming Muslim exclusive zones where no native European can walk without being assaulted, including the police trying to enforce the laws of the state, in consideration of all the above, can you blame Muslims for wanting to isolate themselves to protect their families and children from European and Western culture, values and way of life?

Whatever the West was, it may no longer exist to be threatened or destroyed by Islam

ROK has been documenting the collapse of Western civilization now for years. I don't want to end this piece on a sad or negative note, but this video encapsulates I think what all Westerners are feeling right now.

What the West is feeling is not simply anger and fear, but sadness and grief at a loss of culture, of values and of traditions that we in the West have allowed to let go. We have no one to blame but ourselves for this loss. Muslims and Islam are simply a reminder of what we once were—proud, distinct and morally grounded in a belief in God, truth and justice.

You can hear this sadness and grief ring out clear in Tommy Robinson's voice. He makes some excellent points calling out the real dangers of immigrant Muslims that Trump is raising the alarm on in the US election right now. If The West and Europe is paralyzed in it's response to Islam and Muslims, it is because we no longer have a cohesive value system that anyone wants to rally around and defend. The modern, Western, secular, liberal, safe-space, gender-fluid, do-as-thou-wilt values embraced and enforced by the minority cultural dictators that are our feminist, SJW and LGBT overlords… are empty, vapid, dissolute and ultimately of no meaning to the heterosexual majority of men and women who are being asked to stand up and defend this “way of life” from Islam.

Tommy accurately points the finger of blame at those responsible for this mess, but both he and Watson fail to make the connection between ISIS, radical Islam, Saudi Arabia and thus the CIA’s deep, deep, deep influence on Islam and Muslims in the spread of radical Sunni Wahhabism.

US Sponsored “Islamic Fundamentalism”: The Roots of the US-Wahhabi Alliance

> The alliance between the United States and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia helped spread the ideology of fundamentalist Sunni Islam all over the globe. The majority of its victims are not citizens of Western countries, but citizens of countries that U.S. elites consider a threat to their economic and geopolitical interests. Many victims of Sunni extremism (often called Wahhabism or Salafism[1]) are in fact Muslims (often with a secular leftist or nationalist political background), moderate Sunni or members of Shiʿite Islamic faith.

Tommy’s voice is a lone voice, but his voice would ring more clear if he also raged and exposed WHY these young Muslims are being radicalized by large political/financial/military Western elites for a specific objective. If radical Sunni Wahhabism is strong in immigrant communities, you need only look to the destruction we, the West, have wrought in Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya and Syria, with Iran in the cross hairs as the last Muslim land left still intact by Western, cultural “enlightenment.”

The threat that Islam poses to the West can be a wake up call. Not a call to anger and hatred of the other that threatens us, but to look behind our own walls to the enemies within the gates that have allowed this to happen.

The threat of Islam is also an opportunity for the West to once again define itself. What values beat in the heart of the West today? What do Western hearts ache to express and believe in? About man? About life? About our purpose and reason for existence?

Islam has answers to these existential questions that are, I believe, the very real root cause for the West’s malaise, anger and fear of Muslims. If Islam poses any threat to the West, it is fundamentally a religious, philosophical and metaphysical one. The West can’t answer Islam’s threat to “our way of life” because we believe in nothing, and have nothing we stand for anymore that is of any real value or based in any way on truth and justice.

The West once had a dream for itself and its people.

Islam’s presence in the West is reawakening that dream that was Rome

But will the West, in its undisciplined anger at Muslims and Islam, directed to that purpose to serve the divide and conquer plan of the elite, simply play the part of dumb animal once again and go raging into Muslim lands as the crusaders did in the past?

Or, will the West actually take a moment to breathe, to look at the other, and realize that the person I am being told is my enemy is actually my ally and friend.

I am not asking you to change your mind about Islam and Muslims based on my words alone. What I am asking you is to be sure, 100% sure, that you are not being played the fool.

> O mankind, indeed We have created you from male and female and made you peoples and > tribes that you may know one another. Indeed, the most noble of you in the sight of > Allah is the most righteous of you. Indeed, Allah is Knowing and Acquainted.
>
> ~ Holy Quran 49:13

I will completely understand your natural reaction to continue to respond with anger toward Islam and Muslims. But if you could do me just one single request… ask yourself this question. Cui bono? Who benefits from your hate and rage toward Islam and Muslims?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: British Police: Men Who Try To Get Laid Are Guilty Of Misogynistic "Hate Crimes"

Maximus Decimus Meridius

Maximus is a Man, capital M, period. Love. Truth. Justice. Liberty. Respect. These are the lodestones pointing true to magnetic masculinity in a polarized feminist west. His goal for writing on ROK is to be the gadfly that provokes thought and counters groupthink. You can find more of his writing at A Dream That Was Rome . Com

9 Types Of Feminists And How To Counter Them

August 8, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

If you want to fight the disease that is feminism, you should know that there are different strains with their own characteristics. And depending on their form, you must counter them the right way for maximum results.

Oftentimes, it's best to simply ignore them for these losers are simply seeking ways to provoke you and drag you down to their level, but there are some actions you can take to counter them. First, know what you're trying to accomplish. If you just lash out in hostility, you'll simply confirm their beliefs that masculinity and men in general is something toxic that needs to be controlled. It might feel good in the short-term, but it offers very little in terms of results. If defeating feminism is your goal, then you must aim for these three results:

1. Make the feminists question their own beliefs, weakening their resolve in the process.
2. Bring those who are neutral to your side or at least make them repudiate feminism by exposing its lunacy.
3. Stop feminism from spreading by tainting its reputation so that only most deranged individuals will cling to it.

If you're unable to do any of the three, you're likely wasting your time and energy. You wouldn't get angry and waste your time insulting a dog shit on the sidewalk, so why would you do the same for some harpies desperate for male attention? In those cases, it is just better to avoid contact and carry on.

Now, the following types of feminists are the more visible and dominant ones you'll encounter. Of course, one woman may possess traits that overlap these types, in those cases simply use your judgement on how to deal with them.

1. Bitter "feminists"

Trust me, no one can mistake you for a girl or rape you even if they tried.

These hapless women are barely even feminists. These sad individuals have only just jumped on the feminist wagon so that they can blame men for their own miserable (single) lives to feel better about themselves. These women are usually obese, ugly, and have terrible attitudes which prevents them from finding a male partner that will cure them of their man-hating. They're essentially the female version of the MGTOW.

Counter: Ignore them and let them drown in their own misery.

2. Fat-acceptance feminists

They're fat, they're ugly, they're disgusting, and they know it. They also know that they can't compete with women who are thinner and more attractive (not to mention being tormented with envy), so they must distort what it means to be beuatiful and healthy so that they can at least safe-guard their petty self-esteem.

Counter: Never let being a fat pile of lard become the new normal. Mock them while encouraging healthy lifestyle.

3. Rabid feminists

They love attention and they get turned on by being manhandled.

These are the mentally unstable radical feminists. They're the most aggressive, violent, and repulsive of the feminists listed here. If any men behaved the same way as these degenerates, they'd be locked up and the media circus would have a field day reporting on a violent misogynist group that had gone wild. (You can also tell that the "moderate" feminists implicitly support them by the way they keep quiet like the cowards they are).

Counter: You should avoid these human garbage completely. As tough as they pretend to be, as soon as a finger is laid on them or if someone says something mean, they'll immediately act like a helpless little girl to play the victim. The best thing to do is to use them to taint the feminist movement in the eyes of those who are neutral.

4. "Moderate" feminists

Actually, much like yourself, girls are more likely to pretend they're smart and brag about their education to impress a man.

Believe it or not, most feminists are not blue-haired orangutans that screech at your face. We just get that impression because it's the freaks that make all noise. I've actually met quite a number of pleasant (and feminine) women who called themselves feminists. I get the impression that these women only decided to associate with the movement because they bought into the all the lies of feminism without ever hearing any counter-arguments. If you approach them calmly and explain things in facts without getting emotional, many will actually listen to you.

How we deal with the moderates will determine how many of them will see the truth and convert or at least distance themselves from the feminism label. Of all the types of feminists, this is where our battle should be fought.

Counter: Start by throwing out small tidbits of facts that go against the feminist myth without any emotion or opinion to see how they react. If they're receptive, continue on and dismantle the feminist ideology step by step in a rational manner.

5. Naive feminists

Many young and impressionable people, especially when they're in college, want to feel like they're making a difference in the world. Some take up cause for the environment, some decide to help the poor, some volunteer to contribute to society, and some end up fighting for social justice and feminism.

These naive kids literally believe that feminism "just means equality for women." They don't have any opinions of their own and they simply parrot the lies they've been told to believe.

Counter: Assess their level of fanaticism. Many are emotionally charged and will not listen to counter-arguments no matter what. Seek out the moderates among them and bombard them with cold facts. You might be able to salvage some from going full radical.

6. Privileged feminists

These feminists are the women's rights version of champagne socialists. They live luxurious lives thanks to their fathers or their supplicating lap-dog husbands, yet they complain about the invisible patriarchy. They're extremely condescending and seem to believe that they are intellectual powerhouses.

Counter: These women are so out of touch with reality that you'll be able to find many lies and double-standards in everything they say. Expose them for the public to see so that those on the fence will know how ridiculous and sanctimonious they are. These con-artists are also very thin-skinned, so it won't be too hard to make them shut up by challenging them.

7. Celebrity feminists

A special subset of privileged feminists, celebrity feminists only wear the feminist label to boost their sense of self-importance or to appear hip to the fans with their virtue signaling. Most of these entertainers are actually completely clueless and are blind to their own hypocrisy, often more so than the average feminists.

Counter: Use these tools to your advantage. Point out how ridiculous and hypocritical they are to the masses so that they'll see how inane the entire feminist movement is.

8. Disgusting feminists

These feminists are sick in the head, plain and simple. They have no value to speak of and they hate themselves almost as much as the people they're trying to provoke. These leaches thrive from the attention they get by making others feel disgusted. These are people who deliberately make themselves as disgusting as possible by growing armpit hair, vandalizing their own bodies, getting fat, and by smearing their menstrual blood on their faces. You must understand that this is not just an act of insanity but a deliberate attack on your senses to force a reaction out of you.

Counter: Ignore them and use them as the poster child of feminism. Force the moderates to either acknowledge them as one of their own or to disown them.

9. Male feminists

I almost feel sorry for these losers who don't even realize that they're being used as pawns. These emotionally and sexually underdeveloped man-children hate themselves so much that they supplicate to feminism in hopes of gaining female acceptance. They feel so guilty about their own existence and sexuality that they rage against other men and accuse those who are actually enjoying relationship with women of being misogynists and rapists. You should also know that many of these individuals are severely unstable and exhibit paranoia and stalker behavior.

Counter: Male feminists are their own worst enemies, you have nothing to gain by interacting with them. Don't give them the attention they desperately seek (remember, they're immature) and just continue being the better man—nothing will enrage them more.

The real battle starts with yourself

Above all, the best way to defeat feminism is by continuing to be a man while supporting others doing the same. You should take pride in the fact that your very existence is a thorn to the feminists and a defiance against the establishment. In the future, a path may unfold for an open and active resistance, but for now, you must keep steady and solid and wait for the time to come.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why You Should Not Go See "Mad Max: Feminist Road"

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

If Donald Trump Doesn’t Win, We’re Screwed

August 8, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the past year we’ve been the target of establishment attacks. Since then, I’ve had the privilege of speaking with insiders who understand the globalist master plan. Combining my own analysis with those discussions lead me to conclude that if Hillary Clinton wins the 2016 Presidential election, attacks against us and ideologically similar right-wing groups will explode in number, with the goal of shutting down our counter-narrative platforms and ensuring a Donald Trump figure never gets populist support again.

It’s easy to stay apolitical as long as political forces leave you alone, but the second you become a threat to the existing order, politics will become a painful part of your daily existence as pressure increases on your speech and behavior. Many young men in universities are finding this out right now as false rape and harassment charges ruin their lives before it gets started while men working in corporate America are already aware that they are one “sexist” or “homophobic” statement away from losing their livelihoods. The fact that many men are now recording their consensual sex encounters shows how badly men are being targeted.

Hillary will attack us on multiple fronts

If Hillary Clinton wins, there will be a huge increase in “acute” attacks against individuals and groups. At the same time, there will be a rapid introduction of dystopian new laws that serve as the leading edge of the “chronic” front. All men will be negatively affected under a Hillary presidency in one way or another, meaning that the globalist boot is fast approaching our faces.

The acute attacks will be witch hunts from the media, local politicians, and the Federal Government. They will target us, the alt right, alternative media, patriot groups, survivalists, traditionally conservative groups, and anyone else who strongly supports Donald Trump, tradition, or masculinity. The purpose of acute attacks is to psychologically break down, impoverish, and imprison those who have a powerful ability to counter the narrative or those who have the strength and organizational skill to resist tyranny with arms.

If the media can’t take someone down through their focused lies and distortions, like with what happened to me in February with the meetup outrage, the task will then be handed off to the Federal Government to pursue bogus “hate speech,” “extremist speech,” and “incitement to violence” charges, as is already being done in Europe (1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7). The IRS will be involved to wear down groups with targeted audits, like they did with the Tea Party, while the FBI will infiltrate and subvert groups that are meeting physically using COINTELPRO tactics.

The chronic attack phase will include passage of unconstitutional hate speech laws (or malicious interpretations of previously banal laws) that a compromised Supreme Court will not stop. A stricter variant of “Yes means yes” laws will be passed nationally, making every man who has consensual sex guilty of rape until he can definitively prove otherwise. Just as globalist insider Ezra Klein stated, the goal is for you to feel a “cold spike of fear” when interacting with women. So it shall be done.

Talking to girls in public will be illegal harassment or “hate crime,” and be enforced any time you make a girl feel bad for whatever reason, even if you merely stare at her the wrong way (such laws are currently being beta tested in the UK before wider rollout). Blatantly discriminatory “gender equality” laws in the workplace will lower the incomes of all men so that less qualified females can receive job positions and promotions at male expense.

In addition, the law will be selectively applied to maximize pain against men. Those who break the law against you will be allowed to walk, just like Hillary did after the charade of her FBI investigation, while you will be prosecuted for the most minor of missteps that the other side gets away with. The veneer of justice will be removed and only raw power will remain.

Hillary will be far worse than Obama

Obama was the “race” president, and look how badly he has damaged race relations in only eight years. Hillary will be the “gender” president. The future we have in store should be absolutely clear to you if she happens to defeat Trump.

Not only will she move to establish a techno-matriarchy where men are second-class citizens to any female, but she will ensure that no movement or organization will be able to challenge her or her establishment cronies ever again. This isn't a trivial matter of getting banned from a web site like Twitter or Youtube—many of you will be forced to escape the country for no other reason than you happening to be a man who found himself on the wrong side of the establishment.

Many men say that Trump is controlled opposition. The evidence to that has been wholly uncompelling based on the genuine establishment attacks he's received, but even if he's lying about all of his policies, including building a wall, the one guarantee we can make about him is that he won't attack men. There's absolutely nothing in his candidacy or behavior in the past 40 years of his life that suggests it.

If Trump happens to win and does attack us, I will proudly wear egg on my face, with the depressing realization that our last hope for some semblance of normality has been destroyed and the dark age will be brutal for us all.

A vote for Trump is a vote for self-preservation

My vote for Trump is based on self-preservation for myself, my brothers, and all the men who support me. If Trump wins, I'm confident that we will be able to exercise our free speech without unfair persecution and not be wrongly tried in courts for masculine behaviors. If he does only a scrap of what he promises, we'll be able to pursue our constitutionally given freedoms without fear of destitution, imprisonment, or worse.

I predict that a masculine renaissance will occur upon his victory, where men can once again focus on their own individual goals with Trump as a patriarchal role model. I would devote more of my energy to helping men successfully pair bond with women, like I started my writing career with, instead of having to play political defense as masculinity becomes retroactively classified as hate speech.

But if Hillary wins, we're doomed. I'm not saying this out of emotion but out of careful consideration of the globalist master plan and the increased speed of their advancement in the past ten years. What you saw against us in February is just a warm-up of what will come to hundreds of individuals and organizations on the right, all while the justice system pushes genuinely insane laws that force all men to prove they are not rapists after their sexual encounters. I do not look forward to how my life will be like if Hillary does win, or having to wake up every day to see if the "big" attack has started against us or not.

I therefore urge all American readers of mine to vote for Donald Trump on November 8, 2016. While I am skeptical of some of his promises, and wonder if America is too far gone to make it great again, Donald Trump must win so that the pause button can be pushed against this nightmare of insanity that is already crushing men. He will allow us to regain our footing after being forced to watch in disbelief at all the negative changes that have been recently forced upon us. Let us all breathe a sigh of relief if he wins, and pray to God for safety if he doesn't.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: You're Either A Globalist Or A Nationalist

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Life Goes On, Even In The Worst Disasters

August 8, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I received an email last week from a young man who has been worried about the headlines in the news. He was wondering where all the daily diet of disasters, negativity, and upheaval would lead. I wanted to respond to this concern. We tend to underestimate the ability of the human mind to cope with stress, hardship, and disaster.

It is a well-known fact that Europe in the fourteenth century was decimated by the Black Plague. All across the continent, population centers were assaulted by the disease; and mortality rates, although somewhat a matter of guesswork, were very high. But what is most amazing about the plague is how quickly it was forgotten once it burned itself out. There is a resilience in humanity that is far too often underappreciated.

The life of the people went on, despite all what was happening around them. One historian, Philip Ziegler, writes in his influential study The Black Death that "One of the most striking features of the Black Death in England attested to in the court rolls of innumerable manors and those borough records that are still available, is the way in which communal life survived." There was no social breakdown, no revolution, no mass panics threatening the rule of law.

Not only was there no social breakdown, but the plague did not impact literature and folklore as much as we might suppose. Chaucer mentions it in passing as a backdrop to his Canterbury Tales; but we find few references to it in the literature of the day. There are no substantial descriptions of the plague's assault on London, for example.

Boccaccio describes it in Florence, and Petrarch laments the loss of a relative; but in England such accounts are absent. For a contagion that killed off an estimated one-third of the populations it infected, one would expect something more. It seems people were not tormented by the gloom and doom that some historians would have us believe. Chaucer himself was anything but a "gloom and doom" poet; in fact, his work radiates a positivity, sensuality, and a muscular zest for life.

If we fast-forward a few centuries to 1665, we find the same plague hitting London. Daniel Defoe's Journal of the Plague Year is an excellent chronicle of a disaster; in fact, it still makes compelling reading today. Yet life went on. Things returned to normal within a few years. One of the few reminders that the plague even happened is a bit of childish verse:

Ring-a-ring o' roses,
A pocket full of posies,
A-tishoo! A-tishoo!
We all fall down.

The 1665 London plague killed off at least 100,000 people, probably many more. And yet nothing more substantial than a few couplets survives. If we get in our time machine of the imagination and fast-forward another few hundred years, we arrive at 1918, the year of the great Spanish influenza.

Alfred Crosby's 1998 study America's Forgotten Pandemic: The Influenza Epidemic of 1918 noted this strange ability of the human mind to forget great tragedies. The afterword of his book was called "An Inquiry into the Peculiarities of Human Memory" and contained the following comments:

> An important and almost incomprehensible fact about Spanish influenza is that it > killed millions upon millions of people in a year or less. Nothing else—no infection, no war, no famine—has ever killed so man in as short a period. And yet it has never inspired awe, not in 1918 and not since, not among the citizens of any particular land and not among the citizens of the United States. This inaptitude for wonder and fear cannot be attributed to a lack of information.

In other words, the mind has the ability to process tragedy in ways that we cannot predict.

The flu epidemic swept the entire world, leaving a huge death toll in its wake. Yet in 1918 and 1919, there was no panic or social disaster in the United States that resulted from the pandemic. This matches the reactions that European populations had to the Black Death epidemic of the fourteenth century, and the 1665 London plague epidemic.

It seems that the human mind, despite all contrary expectations, is able to compartmentalize extreme suffering to an extent that we cannot fully appreciate. The mind knows what is within its control, and what is not. Who now barely remembers the 2004 Asian tsunami, which killed many thousands?

To become tormented by the headlines, to be filled with anxiety and depression over news events, is pure folly. Even in the worst catastrophes, people find ways of coping and surviving. Life goes on; people continue with their patient labors; and the world does not collapse.

Read More: How Peru Defeated The Shining Path Guerrillas

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

5 Half-Truths Women Regularly Tell Their Significant Others

August 9, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

We've all heard stories about how husbands and boyfriends are blindsided by the revelation(s) of past sexual debaucherous escapades of their wives and girlfriends. We hear about the hurt, the shock, the pain, and the confusion that ensues when he finally realizes his snowflake wasn't who he thought she was. At some point we hear the crestfallen schlub say "How could she not tell me?"

She did. She just didn't tell you the whole story. She's been telling you half-truths. Or as she'll tell her friends, "little white lies." Rather than get into mental gymnastics or complicated explanations I'll use a quick example:

You're on a date with a woman who tells you her husband cheated on her so she filed for divorce. Is it plausible he cheated on her for no reason which caused her to up and leave? Sure. Nothing's impossible. But here's a better question: Is it likely?

In 2016, not a chance. Odds are she cheated first, stopped having sex with him, and when he finally had the stones to step out on her she finally had her reason to cut him loose (if he even cheated at all which, conveniently for her, there's no real way to verify). The story she gave you was only partially true.

All women do this on some level to give themselves an escape hatch lest their husbands and boyfriends learn the entire story and call her out on it:

You: "You lied to me! You didn't tell me you cheated too!"

Her: “I didn’t lie to you. I told you he cheated so I divorced him. That was the truth.”

See how that works?

“You’re the first guy I’ve ever had anal sex with”

Over the years I’ve heard dozens of lies like this. There are different variations and degrees to be sure, but I continuously hear the same ones over and over. That said, I’m going to give you the five most common untruths females tell, what she’s trying to convey, what it likely means, the escape technique she’ll use if you learn the truth, and the follow up question to avoid getting got in the first place.

Let’s get to it.

5. “I haven’t been in a relationship in over a year”

What she's trying to convey: She wants you to believe two things: 1) That because she hasn't been in a relationship in a while, she hasn't had sex in a while which leads to 2) She doesn't have sex unless she's in a relationship.

What it likely means: She's been hooking up and doing one-night stands with randoms by the truckload.

Escape technique: "I told you I hadn't been in a relationship. I never said I hadn't hooked up with anybody or went out on dates. There's a difference." Then when you angrily ask:

"Why didn't you tell me?!"

She'll simply reply:

"You never asked."

You can be as pissed off as you want to be but guess what player…she's right. Being in a relationship is different from going out on dates or hooking up with random dudes. But she didn't want to tell you the other half the story so she told you the half she wanted you to hear.

"You never asked if I've ever had a train run on me"

Follow up question: "So you haven't been out on a single date or even hooked up with anybody?? :::pause::: for an entire year??"

Ask that question with a confused, yet skeptical look on your face to a girl who tells this particular half-truth and you've essentially checkmated her. She can't answer no because she'll think you're thinking "What's wrong with this chick if not a single guy has taken her out or even fucked her in a year?" (Because that's what she would think if you told her the same thing.)

If she answers yes, she's knows she has some 'splainin to do. Either way, she knows you're not gullible which will make her think twice about lying to you down the road.

If you choose not ask the follow up question and take her at her word, then find out she was the town bicycle during the time she lead you to believe she was wearing a chastity belt then that's your fault. Never believe what a woman tells you. Ever.

4. "I just came out of a bad relationship"

What she's trying to convey: The reason for her relationship coming to an end was her boyfriend or husband's fault. Women know the phrase "bad relationship" implies physical or emotional abuse or infidelity (to gullible betas anyway) without actually having to say it out loud.

What it likely means: The relationship was “bad” because her ex failed too many shit tests, put her on a pedestal, and eventually became unattractive to her.

Escape technique: If you find out she was banging her baby daddy on the side, this is where she’ll actually tell you her ex physically abused her and called her names. Whether or not it’s true is irrelevant. You have no way of knowing for sure and she knows this so she’ll tell you whatever story she wants.

“Then he yelled at me and called me names. It was horrible!”

As far as girls are concerned any relationship they leave is a “bad relationship.” They’ll tell you and themselves whatever they have to to justify the bad behavior you find out about

Follow up question: “What happened?”

This simple question, again, pins her in a corner. Not only does she have to explain her situation in a way that completely absolves her of all responsibility, she has to do it on the fly. Women rarely expect you to ask them anything after they play the ace of spades known as the “just came out of a bad relationship card.” She assumed you’d just take her word for it.

Now if she’s a pro (and a lot of them are) she’ll give you the “I don’t want to talk about it” which ends the conversation. But, again, in the back of her mind she might think you won’t take whatever she says at face value. Besides, women can’t help but tell on themselves. At some point she’ll inadvertently start to trickle out the real story at which point you’ll have a better understanding of what really happened.

If she really has been in an abusive relationship, you know it’s only a matter of time before she goes running back to him or starts sleeping with him behind your back if you’re stupid enough to commit to her. Your only move in this scenario is to have fun with her for a few days and cut her loose.

3. “I have never cheated”

“I’ll just dump him, have my fun tonight, then call him crying tomorrow and beg him to take me back”

What she’s trying to convey: That she is a faithful woman.

What it likely means: She hasn’t cheated… well not technically. She broke up with her boyfriend via text while out on a date from a dude she met on Tinder. Ten minutes in she knew she’d sleep with him that night but because she wants to have her cake and eat it too, she sent the breakup text fully intending on getting back with him after she’s had her fill of her new guy.

Escape technique: Now you’re confused because she just told you about a guy she hooked up with during her time with her ex boyfriend:

You: “Wait a minute….you said you never cheated.”

Her: “I haven’t.”

You: “But you hooked up with so-and-so while you were with so-and-so.”

Her: “We broke up for a couple days then got back together. It’s not cheating if we’re not together.”

Damn, bitches are sneaky aren’t they? Once again she’s right. She dumped him so technically she was free to do whatever she wanted with whomever she wanted. To get to the bottom of this untruth before the confrontation….

Follow up question: “Ever get back with an ex after hooking up with other people?”

This query cuts cuts right to the heart of the issue without putting her on the spot. On its face, it seems like a harmless question which keeps her guard down. If she has ever pulled the ‘breakup to cheat then get back together the next day’ trick, she’ll probably answer yes without hesitation because she thinks you’re unaware of this 24 hour alpha fux-beta bux trick females have been pulling for quite a while.

2. “I got married young”

What she’s trying to convey: That because she was young when she tied the knot, her notch count was low.

What it likely means: She either got knocked up and walked down the aisle to avoid having a bastard kid, or she saw The Wall approaching quicker than she expected as a result of sleeping with exorbitant amounts of men and locked a man down before her looks started to fade prematurely. Whatever the reason, it’s not because she was a virtuous, traditional woman who didn’t want to waste her fertile years riding the carousel.

Escape technique: So you foolishly ask her how many men she’s slept with (as every blue pill boyfriend or husband does at some point) and you’re shocked when she tells you 32 (which probably puts the real number closer to triple digits).

It’s all fun and games until you find out your 21 year old wife has slept with 21 guys…..since high school

Her: “Why is that so surprising to you?”

You: “You said you got married when you were twenty!”

Her: “I did but that doesn’t mean I didn’t have a little fun during my teens.”

Any time a female refers to anything as “a little” it usually means a lot… a whole lot. Especially when it comes to sex. Girls in their mid-twenties will often use this half truth to give men the impression that she’s a good woman who believes in the sanctity of marriage and proved it by marrying young. But girls are losing their virginity and much younger ages so by the time they’re out of high school, their notch count has long since been out of control.

To cut through this attempt at snowflaking, drop this on her:

Follow up question: “Well I’m sure you had a few boyfriends, though didn’t you?”

This, again, keeps her guard down. Every teenage girl has boyfriends so she’ll have no problem answering truthfully which is “yes.” After that ask her: “How many?”

Now this is a little more direct, but her guard is still down. In her mind, having sex with her boyfriend was normal and certainly didn’t make her a slut because every girl has sex with her boyfriend.

Whatever number she gives you multiply it by 7. That is, if she tells you she had 3 boyfriends before she graduated from high school, her notch count before she tied the knot is somewhere north of 20.

1. “I was in an open relationship/marriage”

What she’s trying to convey: She’s had sex outside of her relationship but her boyfriend or husband was aware of it and was okay with it because he was doing the same.

What it probably means: She cheated, got caught, promised it wouldn’t happen again, got caught again, proposed an “open relationship” giving him permission to sleep with other women so she could feel better about sleeping with other men and he accepted.

Escape technique: None needed. The moment you accept her “open relationship” explanation, calling her out on slutty behavior is useless. After all, she was in an “open relationship” which gave her carte blanche to sleep with whoever she wanted.

Translation: Keep calm. I cheat on my boyfriend all the time.

Follow up question: “Did he sleep with other women?”

This is easily the most effective follow up question and literally puts her in a no win situation. If she answers yes, she's indirectly admitting she wasn't sexually appealing enough for him to want to have sex with her and only her. If she answers no, her arrangement turns from an open relationship to her cheating on her boyfriend or husband all the time. Regardless of whether or not she had his blessing, she knows this makes her look like a slut.

I've heard this from more women than I can count and when I laugh in a way that says in no uncertain terms that I know there's more to the story than just an "open relationship" the hamstering goes into overdrive. "He was there when he fucked me," "I set him up with a female after I had my fun," and "He said it was a turn on that I slept with other men" are all things I have heard with my own ears.

The bottom line here is that any female who says she's been in an open relationship is just another slutty female. Characterizing it as an open relationship is just one of many ways they can talk about their infidelity without actually calling it cheating.

The bottom line is…

…women never tell you the whole story. Especially when it comes to their sexual pasts. They'll never tell say "Our relationship didn't work out because I slept around" or "Yeah, I fucked a lotta guys when I was single." Deep down, they know what slutty behavior is which is why they hide it in the first place.

There are many, many more half truths women like to tell to make themselves look better than they really are. Though they're all different in terms of context, timing, and purpose one thing remains a constant: Always ask a follow up question to get more of the story.

[image]
The look of a woman who has it all: A husband and a boyfriend.

Letting her get away with blanket statements like the ones above without probing for more information then indicating to her that you're buying the bullshit she's selling will end the relationship before it starts. She will have lost respect for you and it's all down hill from there.

At that point it's only a matter of time before she's telling her next beau she just got out of a "bad relationship" with you.

Read More: 6 Slut Tells Every Man Needs To Be Aware Of

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

The Future Mother Of Your Child Should Be A Virgin Who Believes In God

August 9, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Six months after publishing 7 Things I Require In The Future Mother Of My Child, I wanted to make two minor adjustments that refine the list even further.

If you haven't read the article yet, here's the original seven points:

1. She must be between 18-25 years old
2. She must have less than three prior sexual partners, though I prefer a virgin
3. Her physical attractiveness should hover around the 7 range
4. Her skin tone should be within two shades of myself
5. She must be feminine
6. She must want to be a traditional stay-at-home mother
7. She must believe in a god

Stronger preference should be given to virgins

I'm increasing the importance on finding a virgin. Sluts will often share the myth that virgins are a bad mate to choose from because she will get curious and cheat on you, but the studies don't at all bear this out (1, 2, 3, 4). If you are serious about creating a family with a girl, you should heavily weigh her virginal status, because it acts as an insurance policy—though not a guarantee—against impulsive female behavior.

Even if you have found a girl with a low notch count, there is the danger that a part of her heart is still set on another man from a previous relationship. Even though she is firmly in a relationship with you, dealing with an emotional widow will cause you problems down the line, especially since it's common for a girl to keep "in touch" with exes.

It is ideal to have a girl who is clean both physically and emotionally, without any lingering baggage that can hurt your future family. Only a virgin can provide this.

A nominal belief in God is not enough

I thought that a girl believing in God was sufficient in having a girl with a strong moral code, but I have discovered that it is not. Your future wife must get beliefs and behavioral guidance from her book of worship. In other words, she must opt out of certain acts solely because God commanded her to.

There are millions of girls in Europe who "believe in God" but do drugs, lie, cheat, and have countless sexual partners. Don't let her "spiritual but not religious" belief system fool you into thinking that she actually allows the word of God to tame her destructive female nature.

Unless a girl can tell you that she rejected a behavior because it went against God, she is lacking a moral code and will make decisions in the future which will cause harm to you and your children.

Beware of very beautiful women

I wanted to stress point number three on my original list that a girl should not be too beautiful. Now that the leftist anti-beauty cult has ravaged so many women into looking like disgusting beasts, the remaining beautiful women are getting unfathomable amounts of attention, more than legitimate female celebrities from a generation ago. The wolves will always be circling your beautiful girl, and while tight game can prevent her from straying, at least in the short-term, a non-virgin without a strict moral code will eventually succumb to the call of excitement and novel pleasure. She is human, after all.

I've come to learn that even in medium-sized cities, a girl of high beauty is hit on constantly and persistently by a replenishing supply of players and orbiters. Short of moving to a little village or locking her into a dungeon, there isn't much you can do to prevent it. The more beautiful your girl, the more you'll have to trust her, but this is close to impossible if she has a loose past and a lack of morals.

Conclusion

It may be obvious to you that I've thought about having kids. My focus is not so much on her aesthetics or token behaviors but her history and values. The problem is that very few women have values that exceed even prostitutes of old, especially in the West where the dominating institutions are helping shove slime and rot into her very core. If you meet a girl who hits all seven items on my list, you potentially have a great mom on your hands.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: How To Apply Neomasculinity To Raising A Child

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Can Too Much Sex Lead To Dissatisfaction With Women?

August 9, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

I have had unmitigated success with women since learning the harsh truth about women featured here on Return Of Kings. Through the collective wisdom of men on this site, I've gamed and bedded women all over the world, and enjoyed some real stunners along my path of debauchery.

However, as my notch count reaches well over the century mark, I am finding that the more I know about women and the more of them I have flings or short term relationships with, the less I like women overall. I am not the first man to feel this way, in fact a highly-rated novel was published by one of the great red pill authors (before the term was even coined) in 1978 about this very phenomenon.

Here are some of my favorite lines from the book, and how they have helped me deal with my dissatisfaction with women. They may be of help to you, too, if you've found success with women and are drowning in ass but have come to the realization there are no unicorns. We can start our discussion by letting it be known that even 40 years ago the decline in the quality of American women was being chronicled by one of the great writers of the day:

> American women drove hard bargains and the ended up looking the worst for it. The few natural American women left were mostly in Texas and Louisiana.

Today, they drive impossible bargains and are destroying the society. This is common wisdom in these parts of the internet, so let's move on to the dissatisfaction that ultimately comes when a man has more women than he knows what to do with. Reflecting the real-life circumstances of Charles Bukowski, his novel Women reflects the fictional success of his character Henry Chinaski. Much like the real-life Bukowski, at age 50, Chinaski finally sees his star rising, and right on cue here come women out of the woodwork ready to help him spend his newfound cash and revel in his newfound status and power as an author.

After a lifetime of low-rent living on the bad side of town, Chinaski is finally about to embark on a new chapter in his life as his success means more booze, bitches and lifestyle accoutrements than ever.

> Where did all the women come from? The supply was endless. Each one of them was individual, different. Their pussies were different, their kisses were different, their breasts were different, but no man could drink them all, there were too many of them, crossing their legs, driving men mad. What a feast!

"The blondes with the tight pussies came too late, I'm too strong." -Bukoswki

Indeed, once a man realizes success or simply learns how to game women, he can find himself going from famine to feast in an instant. He morphs from being totally invisible to having sexy women throw themselves at him. And, it's like a cascade. The more women a man has, the more women want him. However, the same man may find that he is dissatisfied in some way, sooner or later, with every new woman he encounters. In his experience sleeping with and studying the mentalities of countless women, Chinaski summarizes female psychology with one astute paragraph:

> Women: I liked the colors of their clothing; the way they walked; the cruelty in some faces; now and then the almost pure beauty in another face, totally and enchantingly female. They had it over us: they planned much better and were better organized. While men were watching professional football or drinking beer or bowling, they, the women, were thinking about us, concentrating, studying, deciding – whether to accept us, discard us, exchange us, kill us or whether simply to leave us. In the end it hardly mattered; no matter what they did, we ended up lonely and insane.

This realization, once a man has it, leads to dissatisfaction more than any other, as well as the fact most relationships end in disaster. In addition to the secret plotting and planning women do, and record keeping of every actual and perceived slight a man does to her that will be released in an explosive tirade of venom and vitriol when the relationship ends, the following paragraph alludes to the fact women are very good at putting on an act when meeting men.

They will tailor their act according to the man they're trying to lure (Schopenhauer called this dissimulation). I personally call this the "tuning the radio" phase of the relationship, and it's fun to make women jump through a few hoops as they try to find which frequency you are on as a man and adapt their act accordingly. Bukowski writes:

> Human relationships didn't work anyhow. Only the first two weeks had any zing, then the participants lost their interest. Masks dropped away and real people began to appear: cranks, imbeciles, the demented, the vengeful, sadists, killers. Modern society had created its own kind and they feasted on each other. It was a duel to the death—in a cesspool.

Once the real woman appears and the sex and fun phase has passed, thus begins the downswing portion of the relationship. I have been here many times, as have many men, I suspect. It's when you just want to get rid of the bitch but she wants payment for services rendered, be it material things or your very soul. Another great line from the book describes how women will attempt to take everything of value from a man, including his soul. (Usually, before placing him into the discard pile.)

> And yet women—good women—frightened me because they eventually wanted your soul, and what was left of mine, I wanted to keep. Basically I craved prostitutes, base women, because they were deadly and hard and made no personal demands. Nothing was lost when they left. Yet at the same time I yearned for a gentle, good woman, despite the overwhelming price.

No Woman To Run To, Nowhere To Hide

Indeed, prostitutes or whores make the goal of fulfilling sexual desire much less bothersome, since a man pays for the interaction one way or the other: by either turning himself into a clown, paying for her McMansion and SUV under the guise that marriage isn't legalized prostitution (when in fact, it is just that), or just avoiding the sophistry inherent in today's society and paying her up front for intercourse. "Sophistry," i.e. the use of fallacious arguments, especially with the intention of deceiving when it comes to our base desires like sexuality and dominance, I feel has become much to big a part of our daily lives. Bukowski touches on this "game-playing" in all areas of our lives in the novel.

> I was naturally a loner, content just to live with a woman, eat with her, sleep with her, walk down the street with her. I didn't want conversation, or to go anywhere except the racetrack or the boxing matches. I didn't understand T.V. I felt foolish paying money to go into a movie theater and sit with other people to share their emotions. Parties sickened me. I hated the game-playing, the dirty play, the flirting, the amateur drunks, the bores.

Another failed relationship, Linda still talks shit about Charles in the documentary about his life “Born Into This”

Of course, it’s hard for a man not to become disillusioned with women once a man has seen the dark side of the female psyche repeatedly.

> Once a woman turns against you, forget it. They can love you, then something turns in them. They can watch you dying in a gutter, run over by a car, and they’ll spit on you…

After a while, and repeated abuse from women, a man just stops giving a fuck. He goes through one woman after the other because he has seen, perhaps, they are all the same and he will never find that unicorn he desires so much.

> Then I gave up trying to please her and simply fucked her, ripping viciously. It was like murder. I didn’t care; my cock had gone crazy

As hard as it may be to believe, Bukowski’s character Chinaski touches on a situation many men will find themselves in after a surfeit of tight, young, nubile ass has spread its legs before him. Knowing what women are psychologically and how they view men is enough to take the steam out of the whole interaction when you’ve had more women than you even care to remember.

> My cock was hard, but my spirit wasn’t in it.

That’s quite a feeling, when you just don’t care anymore.

Hopefully, these lines have been therapeutic for the man who has pushed through to the other side and had too much pussy and too much female attention. This is usually the point self-medicating with alcohol, tobacco, and narcotics comes into play, when a man that knows too much just wants to forget what he knows and enjoy the moment.

Even great authors have found discontentment in success. Which is why a man must have higher goals for himself than women. They may be fun to screw around with, but never look for contentment from a woman. That’s a lesson I’ve learned, and apparently Bukowski learned it, too.

Read More: Charles Buwkoski: Literature And Poetry For Men

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Why Men’s Lives Get Ruined From A False Rape Accusation

August 10, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, it should come with no surprise to you that when a man is accused of rape, the odds are immediately stacked against him. As has been made so abundantly clear by the UVA Rape Hoax, police officers speaking out, and the stories of numerous ROK writers (including yours truly), women have the upper hand when it comes to false rape accusations.

But why exactly is this? I believe that it is paramount to cultural improvement for us to understand why these things happen, for if we understand why they happen, we can mitigate them. Ultimately, the reason why men get fucked over when it comes to false rape accusations, is due to the startling difference between the “social narrative,” and actual reality.

The Social Narrative

For those of you who don't know, the social narrative is essentially a collection of beliefs, opinions, and thought patterns possessed by the vast majority of human beings. This social narrative changes, depending on the region of the world that you're in, but for the purposes of this article, I will focus on the social narrative of the West, and the many lies which it passes off as truth.

But first: some groundwork. As you all know, women cannot physically stand up to a man. Men are bigger, stronger, and faster; for a woman to confront a man head on would simply be folly. So, as an evolutionary mechanism, women have unconsciously evolved to use social paradigms to their advantage. This is what gave birth to the social narrative.

A woman can't physically confront a man? That's fine—she has a plethora of options. She can choose to make the man feel guilty for hitting her (even if she was acting like a complete cunt), and cry to make herself look like a victim. She can publicly shame the man for being "abusive," while simultaneously being a complete bitch in the personal arena. She can even leverage the stupid beta males that every civilization has to fight the man for her, or to even get him thrown in jail.

Our Social Narrative

In countries where patriarchy reigns supreme, the social narrative is typically skewed in the favor of men. In countries where feminism has spread, the social narrative is typically skewed in the favor of women.

In the West, as I'm sure you know, the social narrative is EXTREMELY pro-women and very hostile towards men. Here are a few of the beliefs within our social narrative:

- When a man and a woman get into an argument, the woman is always right.
- Men should never hit a woman, even if she acts like a brat and attacks him.
- Men are all sexually aggressive and are potential rapists.
- If she wants sex to happen, she'll verbalize it.
- Men and women are equal.
- Women want a sweet, kind, man who's a doormat.

Now, obviously some of these beliefs are unconscious, but even so, this actually makes them more powerful, because they cannot be attacked directly.

The Social Narrative vs. Reality

Women unconsciously change the social narrative to suit them whenever it feels best. This is why the social narrative is not based upon logic, but rather feelings.

This is why women can simultaneously expose themselves, butt-naked, yet be angry when men look at them. This is why women can yell at men for all being rapists, yet expect them to be sexually assertive and do the escalation. This is why women can complain that they don't get paid enough money, yet insult men who don't pay for their dates.

Do you see the point here? The social narrative is in women's favor.

If we look at actual reality, however, we will come to a completely different conclusion:

- If a woman exposes herself completely, it's normal for men to be sexually attracted to her.
- If women expect men to be sexually assertive, then the idea of affirmative consent is completely retarded.
- If women want to get paid the same as men, then they should be expected to carry half of the financial burden of a relationship.

As you can see, however, saying any of these points in the public arena will essentially label you a sexist, making you a social pariah. For the sake of this article, I would like to focus on the second point above: how men are expected to be sexually assertive. This is the true reason why false rape accusations are so twisted against men. We're simultaneously expected to be assertive and sexually aggressive based off of a woman's body language, yet when we do this, we're framed as sexual predators.

How The Social Narrative Destroys Men

As you can imagine, whenever the vast majority of society accepts this social narrative to be true, men start getting fucked over. It’s why most men are complete beta-male chodes, it’s why most men (and women) are unhappy, and it’s why men get fucked over in false rape accusations.

“But just how are they fucked over, Jon? Isn’t the legal system unbiased?” I can hear someone ask.

Unfortunately, no—the legal system is extremely biased in favor of women for reasons which I will soon explain.

The legal system is merely an extension of the social narrative. If you have a bunch of judges and congressmen growing up believing that men should be strong and confident, yet genuine and kind, then we will have a legal system that encourages these things.

If, however, you have a bunch of judges and congressmen growing up believing that men are all potential rapists, women are always right, and masculinity should be crushed out of children, then we will have a legal system that encourages THESE things. And unfortunately, our legal system does, in fact, encourage these things.

Our Crooked Legal System

A generation of men raised by feminists has led to, quite possibly, one of the most pussified, beta-male legal systems in the history of the world. The West is the only place that I can think of to have ever existed, where if a man and woman have completely consensual sex, and it's PROVEN to be the case, he can get thrown in jail, because she had buyer's remorse the next day.

As I said before, the most fundamentally important social narrative talking point that nearly all false rape accusations revolve around, is how men are sexually aggressive. This is the primary reason why men are so vulnerable to false rape accusations; I haven't even got my numbers into the triple digits (yet) and I've been formally accused once, and implicitly accused more times than I care to share.

The reason for this is that our beta male judges don't know game. They don't know that, if you're a man and you want to get laid, YOU are expected to be the mover in the interaction. You're supposed to be the one who's aggressively passing her shit tests, plowing through resistance, and taking her by the hand and leading her.

Now, of course, while you're doing this, you should be aware of any subtle changes in her body language. Is she uncomfortable? Does she not want to do this? Should you stop? But the beta male judges have no clue about how to seduce women; they don't understand the nuances of body language and of emotional sub-communication well enough to see the trap that men have been put into.

The Trap

Here is, essentially the trap: have ample sex, but risk getting falsely accused of rape, or simply die a virgin. It's really that simple. Talk to anybody who's been in the game for a while (even just longer than a year should do it).

They've likely encountered some form of a false rape allegation. It can be a formal one, like I've encountered, or it can be a "she spreads rumors behind your back," type one, which I've also encountered. In both situations, however, I found that the odds were against me. Again, it was for a very simple reason: beta male authority figures don't recognize the necessity of sexual assertiveness if a man wants to get laid.

This is why she can say things like "A-And then h-h-he…he went put his penis in without asking me! RAPE!" When in reality, she sucked his dick, pulled her panties off, and grinded her vagina against him, biting her lip and moaning. Any man with half a god damn brain KNOWS that these body language signs mean that she wants you to fuck her. But again, to the average beta male chump who doesn't have game, he'll only see the verbal side of things, and assume that the man raped her (when he clearly didn't).

And Then There's This

And to make matters worse, some women even WANT you to “rape” them. This is a well-known phenomena to many of the players in the manosphere. It is not at all uncommon for women to respond extremely favorably when you pin them down, smack them, and choke them.

In fact, as others have alluded to on ROK, sometimes women even say “NO!” but when the man backs off, she asks him “Why did you stop? I wanted you to keep going!” Combine this with our 50-Shades-of-Grey culture where every young, stupid girl who’s even slightly literate is reading this pathetically written dribble, and you’ve got a recipe for disaster.

Ever girl nowadays thinks she’s into “rough sex,” because that’s what all her friends are doing, and it’s what sexy romance novels talk about. That’s why it’s very common for girls to regret having sex the next morning; they feel ashamed that they asked a man to smack her and call her a slut, like they read about in 50 Shades of Grey.

Alpha Males Can’t Speak Up

Ironically enough, even the people who KNOW these things can’t say anything, because again, women control the social narrative. It doesn’t matter if you have a job as a doctor, netting you $150,000 a year. If you speak out against the social narrative, you’ll lose your job. It doesn’t matter if you’re a charity worker; if you speak out against the social narrative, you’ll lose your job. And if you’re a politician or a judge? You’ll not only lose your job, but you’ll lose your entire reputation.

Why is this? Well, it’s simple really: the beta males are far too many. For every man who’s aware of the truth of false rape accusations, there’s at least a dozen who think that women would never lie about such a thing, when in fact, it’s the thing they’re most likely to lie about. The fundamental problem here is that there are too many brainwashed beta males.

The Importance of Beta Males

Interestingly enough, however, there's an ideal number of brainwashed beta males that we need. Why? It's simple—if all we have is alpha males who just go around fucking hoes left and right, we wouldn't be able to have a civilization. In order to have a civilization, we need a certain number of beta males to believe in "true love," and whatever other nonsense the mainstream media promotes. This way, they'll settle down, and take the "well trodden path," of getting a degree and working for a corporation. This makes a society stable.

The problem is that when there's TOO MANY of them, they start infiltrating every single area of our society. No longer is the beta male confined to menial tasks and labor, but he's now the district attorney. He's now the mayor, the president; he's now the news anchor. The beta males now have influence.

So What Do We Do?

Men, I would like to propose a two part strategy: part reaction and part action. On one hand, we can't be foolish; the social narrative still has an enormous amount of power, and so do the judges that enforce it. On the other hand, however, we have to take action to stop this madness or else it will never end.

So I propose that we prepare ourselves for the worst. Read this article on how to prevent false rape accusations. Learn how to screen women that are likely to falsely accuse you (I wish I'd known this earlier). In addition to this, start taking action. If you're EVER falsely accused of rape, and you have the financial means to do so, COUNTER-SUE.

Stop sitting around complacently and start standing up for yourself; encourage other men to be more masculine by working out, taking a martial art, or going clubbing together. Our number one weapon in this war is information. The feminists fight facts with feelings, but all of the feelings in the world don't change the bitter truth of false rape accusations.

Start spreading the word, but be extremely careful—don't you dare say any of this if there's women in the group, or a single beta male. Conversation about the prevalence of false rape accusations should be limited to close buddies who you know aren't chodes. Start getting the word out to more and more men.

Share articles about the UVA rape hoax, support alternative media sites like ROK, Danger and Play, or Breitbart. Show the feminists that you will not tolerate their bullshit. This is the only way out, men. There is no going back. We either fight our way out of this hell, or let it consume us. The choice is yours.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 3 Signs She's Making a False Rape Accusation

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

The 10 Hottest Girls Of The Olympics

August 10, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Return Of Kings wishes to interrupt its normal program of male self-improvement, exposing criminally-inclined SJWs, and hard-hitting news to bring you the ten hottest girls of the 2016 Rio de Janeiro Olympics. Continuing its reputation as the most red pill major social media network, Reddit users have steadily compiled a sub-reddit called "The Oh-lympics." This showcase of some of the Rio Olympic's best female "sporting talent" promises to give male fans a much better return on their investment than actually watching women's sports.

Although you should feel free to compile your own top ten list, here is Return Of Kings' for your perusal and general enlightenment:

1. Darya Klishina

Although not blessed in the mammary department, the thought of the 25-year-old blonde long-jumper would keep almost every man on the planet warm during the coldest Russian winters. Her middling international performances over the years aside (this is just her first Olympics), ROK is thankful that Klishina even got to Rio. Why? Because all her teammates on the Russian athletics team were banned from attendance due to the recent doping scandals. There must be a God if Klishina was spared in order to grace our television screens.

2. Rossella Fiamingo

The Italian fencer may have the goal of piercing her Rio rivals with an épée, but many men watching her at home would love to pierce her with something! Another 25-year-old, Rossella appears to like chilling out at beaches with her perky cleavage on display. That's a big plus, because no man really wants to watch fencing, especially when said perky cleavage is always covered up. Sexually fertile Italian women seem to have been forgotten in recent years and this supple athlete gives us every reason to check them out again.

3. Amina Kajtaz

Bosnian wimmer Kajtaz actually competes in the butterfly, but I'm sure you'd all rather breast-stroke this 19-year-old. In addition, she's the greatest thing ever produced by the Yugoslavian Wars. If not for these conflicts, her parents would not have had sex when they did to produce her. So thank you, militantly racist Serbian, Croatian, and Bosnian Muslim militias!

4. Shelina Zadorsky

Zadorsky, a 23-year-old Canadian, is one of the best reasons for us to take women's football seriously. She still doesn't push us over the line into becoming fans, but no worries. We'd just be willing to pretend we liked it for a chance to tackle on her "pitch." No one on our writing staff will be keeping track of how many goals she scores; all that matters to us is that she scores highly in pleasing our eyes.

5. Anouk Vergé-Dépré

Pictured on the left embracing her chest-impressive partner Isabelle Forrer, 24-year-old Vergé-Dépré violates the 200-year Swiss tradition of neutrality by making us want to invade the territory below her navel. If you hadn't wanted to experience Switzerland before, you certainly want to experience this Swiss volleyball player. Imagine her asking you to "frolic" with her on that sand?

6. Kassidy Cook

Dogs may be man's best friends, but you would rather be 21-year-old diver Cook's best friend with benefits. Whether or not the American wins a medal is immaterial; she's already won gold for getting our blood to rush towards a particular place. With a buoyant ass like that, there's no chance of her hitting the bottom of the diving pool and injuring herself. Phew.

7. Antonija Sandrić

28-year-old Sandrić should remind us that Croatia isn't just a location for wonderful beachfront parties, yacht cruising, and Game of Thrones sets. The basketball player's lack of head-turning height is more than made up for by her ability to get a certain part of men taller. Female basketballers, most notably Western ones, are not known for their beauty, so Sandrić is one of the biggest surprise packages on display at Rio this year.

8. Ellen Hoog

The 30-year-old Dutchwoman is definitely hot enough for American readers to accept field hockey as a sport alongside ice hockey. Winning gold with her team is likely her definition of Dutch sporting glory, but our version is waking up to her in a bed during tulip season in Amsterdam. A place at the top of a podium is deserved by any man who gets with this fine specimen.

9. Paraskevi Papachristou

Natural hair color or not, 27-year-old Papachristou rocks the dark-eyed, light hair contrast. She also provides us with a stellar opportunity to replace the disastrous Greek economic stimulus package with our own form of a stimulus package. The triple jump and long jump are two of athletics' least popular sports, but that wouldn't stop you from rolling around in the dirt with her for two weeks in Rio.

10. Amalie Iuel

Thank the Lord for Danish-Norwegian interbreeding. 22-year-old hurdler Iuel may represent Norway, but she can choose whichever of her two ancestral countries she wants. The only condition we insist on is that she keeps baring her skin and advertising her svelte figure. Any TV producer who cuts to commercials while she is on screen should be stoned in the same manner advocated by those extremist imams in Oslo.

Read More: The 25 Hottest Girls Of Ok Cupid Los Angeles

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

3 Easy Ways To Attract More Women Into Your Life Today

August 10, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

OK, we all know that today's dating arena is tipped in favour of women in many ways. That doesn't mean that you can't buck the system, however, and start attracting cute girls into your life for relationships or more temporary affairs. Put the three tips in this article into practice consistently and on a daily basis and over time you will see your results improve significantly.

1. Look Out For Opportunities

It hardly needs to be said that hot women are not just to be found in the confines of luxury lounge bars and nightclubs. In fact, as the seasoned player knows, these locales can be some of the worst for meeting women. In 2016, if you're not doing daygame at least some of the time then you are a fool.

In major cities like New York, LA and London there are hot women literally everywhere—in the coffee shop, on the subway, on the way to work, working out at the gym and so on. Living in central London, on an average day I will see five women that I find attractive enough to date. Over a year that's 1825. If I approached all of these girls and only slept with 1% of them that would still be 18 hot girls a year—a wildly better result than that achieved by most men.

Bottom line: You should always be scanning your surroundings for cute girls to approach, whether you're on your way to work, at the dry cleaners, or out on your morning run. Fortune favours the brave and you must be ready to approach.

2. Be Bold

Once you've spotted that cute girl, then you must be bold in approaching her. Not only do you need to be bold in order to differentiate yourself from your competition (beta guys), but you should also recognise that boldness in itself creates attraction. So why not start talking to that sexy brunette in the packed tube carriage? Or chat up the barista in front of her colleagues at the coffee shop? Or run up to the girl who's out shopping with her friends?

Bottom line: You only live once, so you might as well put yourself on the line every so often. The worst that can happen is she rejects you. 99% of the time rejections are polite and along the lines of "I already have a boyfriend"—nothing to be scared of. So get out there and demonstrate that you are the kind of man who isn't afraid to take action and go for what he wants.

3. Always Be Closing

OK, so you've approached her, it's gone well and you have her phone number or, even better, you're out on a date with her. That's great—what next? What you must never forget is that it is your responsibility as a man to move things on to the next level. It is masculine to take charge and make things happen and that is what you should do.

What this means in practice is that you must "always be closing"—or at least, you must always be taking some action that will drive the interaction forward, wherever you are in the seduction process.

Don't have her phone number? Ask for it. Have her phone number? Send her a teasing, cocky-funny text like "Hey bad girl, are you always so forward with strange men?" She responds? Banter back and forth then set up a date. Be assumptive and commanding—"Meet me at XXX cocktail bar, 8pm."

She's out on a date with you—have you initiated physical contact yet? No? Then touch her. Go for non-intimate areas first, like the forearms, the shoulder, before progressing to the lower back, legs etc. Remember, touch (or "kino" as it is often called in game) is one of the most powerful ways of preparing the ground for getting a girl into bed and you must do it. Too nervous or scared—screw it, pretend you're not and do it anyway.

You're touching her and she hasn't slapped you round the face yet? Great—now you need to kiss her. No excuses. Just place your hand on her jaw, position her face so it's looking at you and go in for the kiss. If she gives you the cheek then don't worry—carry on chatting for a while, and then try again later. [Disclaimer: if she pours a drink over you then you need to give it up. Have some social calibration. If a girl is truly 100% not interested then say goodnight and move on to the next one. Otherwise be assumptive and go for the sale]

You've kissed her and she's receptive? Great. Now you need to get her back to your place. When you've finished your drinks simply take her hand, stand up and say "We should get going." Then lead her into the street, order an Uber, and take her back to your place. She resists? Fine. Just relax, chat and give her more time. But be persistent and don't give up unless you get an unmistakable red card.

Bottom line: Always be looking forward to the next step. Always be closing.

To find out how to become successful meeting and attracting beautiful women read Troy's bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. To learn more click here.

Read More: How to Be Seen By Women As An Alpha Male

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at

Troy Francis.

26 Answers To Game & Travel Questions

August 10, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The next Q&A video is on game and travel:

Here's the index so you can jump around:

0:10
"What is a good rule-of-thumb number of notches and flags, beyond which a man can safely settle for a nice girl? And what to do if he meets one before hitting the target?" (ZBYSZEK)

4:27
"How do you combine an outgoing, social lifestyle with a very time-consuming career (e.g. academic research)? I know that you endorse free entrepreneurship, but maybe you know guys who have managed to do so and have some tips?" (ZBYSZEK)

6:29
"Have you experienced any bad consequences from all the unprotected sex you've had with random hoes from the club?" (JONATHAN ROSELAND)

10:32
"What advice do you have for men that have been raised with a beta mindset, but is trying to learn, develop, and create a dominant and confident mindset?" (NICK)

13:10
"In 2013, I asked "if you had to live in one city for the next 5 years, what would it be?" The answer then was Kiev..what would your answer be now?" (TEEDUB)

17:15
"Which city from your travels do you think back to most, whether from good or bad experienences?" (CORTES)

19:12
“To what degree is it necessary for a man to live in a developing country in order to have his needs fulfilled? (in terms of women and freedom).” (LEIGHTON BLACKSTOCK)

21:54
“Would you pass up what so many people now want but cant find (a good girl) to solely pursue personal / financial development in 20-30 age (unstable future) , or start a family young (stable future)?” (JACK)

25:44
“If you already have an established career in the west, would it be worth to give it all up to relocate to Eastern Europe? I don’t feel happy in my own country, and would like to move to Ukraine / Russia. I already spend a long time there, but my education would be useless there, but I’m still young (I’m 25) so I have time to learn something new.” (SCANDINAVIAN JAKE)

28:42
“How do you find a conservative girl in a slut-ridden country?” (ANON)

31:39
“How do you convince normal men that the manoshpere is relevant to them and that they have a part in it?” (TUSKEGEE51)

33:43
“What’s your approach to game nowadays? In which way has it changed since you wrote your BANG and DAY BANG? Do you still go out at night to meet women? Is indirect daygame still your favorite?” (MRREMI)

39:42
“When player burnout occurs, what is the best way for men to find an additional purpose and focus in their lives?” (AREMENIA 4 EVER)

44:15
“How can men in their player stage guard themselves against becoming too damaged from sleeping with too many women if they decide they want to find a wife, but not consistently struggle with the desire for variety of women?” (AREMENIA 4 EVER)

46:58
“Since the outrage of the meetups and all the things to do to counter it plus the book, how many daily approaches (if you are still doing them) are you doing those days, roughly?” (JB POQUELICHE)

48:44
“Will you consider writing a Bang 2.0 to reflect the multiple ways in which game has changed as a whole since its intial release in 2007?” (HIGHSPEED_LOWDRAG)

49:51
“What is your average monthly expenses when you are living in Central/Eastern Europe excluding travel costs like flights and hotels?” (BACON)

50:52

“Sex has lost its appeal. I don’t care to pump and dump, cause it doesn’t seem worth the time and effort. I’m not sure what to do. I don’t want to just go back to porn and jerking off, but even if I wanted sex I don’t think I could find someone I’d want to do it with. What do you think I should do?” (MODE RIGHT)

54:22
“Do you ever miss Latin America?” (GOPNIK)

57:05
“How do you satisfy your sexual needs now that sex is not paramount in your life and the years of chasing women are over?” (ANDREA)

57:57
“You previously mentioned that your top 3 countries where you like to live are Poland, Russia and Ukraine. I’m from Romania and I’m just curious what have you found in those countries and haven’t been able to find in Romania ? What are the top points that make those 3 countries better overall than Romania ?” (DAYROOSH)

59:37
“Since your best books are all memoirs don’t you consider planning some wild trips in areas that you haven’t been yet and write about these accounts ?” (DAYROOSH)

1:00:16
“What advice can you give to us shorter guys for gaming taller women?” (MIKHAIL)

1:02:28
“Should a guy focus on game or money first?” (MIKE)

1:03:57
“You have written a great deal about banging western girls, but what are your thoughts on the east? Do you plan on visiting China, Japan or South Korea?” (QLASS)

1:06:15
“What do you think about Wall street Playboys and the guys that think Lifestyle is more important than game?” (CENTURION)

Previous Video: 5 Answers To Religion & Spirituality Questions

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Arrests Of Two Olympic Boxers In Rio Shows How False Rape Hysteria Has Gone Global

August 11, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The opening ceremony flag bearer for Namibia, Jonas Junias, has been arrested for allegedly attempting to rape (by kissing!) an athletes' village cleaner during the 2016 Rio de Janeiro Olympics. Junias, a former Commonwealth Games silver medalist, joins fellow pugilist Hassan Saada of Morocco in having his Olympic dreams quickly ruined.

Saada, too, stands accused of trying to rape by kissing one housekeeper and groping the breasts of another. The Moroccan, arrested before the opening ceremony, has definitely lost his chance to compete and the same outcome is 99% likely for Junias. The two men's ordeals demonstrate how "rape" hysteria has truly gone global.

Irrespective of whether the allegations are proven to be unfounded, insufficiently supported by the evidence (irrespective of any later conviction), or outright malicious, the men have inexcusably lost their right to a fair trial and the presumption of innocence. Perhaps the most troubling aspect of this news out of Rio is the farcical nature of Brazilian sexual assault and rape legislation.

Under the country's perverse criminal laws, any "sexual" act without consent is considered within the ambit of rape or attempted rape. Return Of Kings is unambiguously against rape, but nonetheless supports (1) the bringing of hard evidence that fully accords with the standard of beyond reasonable doubt and (2) the proper separation and weighting of specific acts found within sexual assault allegations, especially between obviously different concepts like kissing and penetration.

Because men are almost always expected to escalate sexual activity, whilst women retain plausible deniability, “sexual assault” laws like those found in Brazil are sure-fire ways to convict men of acts that should not even be considered crimes. Comparatively benign moves such as holding a girl’s hand (before she has made it clear she does not want it) can be considered “sexual.” Combined with courts’ willingness to believe women without a shred of objective evidence like video recordings or clear proof of injury, it is now decidedly easy to either ruin the reputations and livelihoods of innocent men for life, or get them incarcerated for alleged crimes they did not commit or were not adequately proven to have committed.

A “positive” publicity boon for Brazilian police

Like his fellow boxer Junias, Hassan Saada is in a world of trouble for allegations that probably have no zero supporting, valid evidence.

Given the high-profile incidents involving serious, violent crimes in Rio over the last few weeks, the arrests of the Namibian and Moroccan Olympic competitors is something close to a godsend for local law enforcement. Instead of actually having to solve crimes where evidence exists, such as violent and/or bloody muggings or the theft of US$30,000 of photographic equipment caught on camera, authorities in Rio can make themselves look good merely by arresting two guys on the basis of women’s separate testimonies.

Olympic athletes, tourists and even Rio’s own residents are nearly completely vulnerable to dangerous crime. The police, despite the efforts of the majority of good officers in Rio, are at a loss in being able to crack down on local troublemakers, miscreants and sociopaths. What better way to shift the attention by arresting and imprisoning two guys in situations where the “evidence” comes down to a pathetic he-said-she-said dynamic?

The arrests make all the more political sense when we consider the parlous state of both the Brazilian economy and society. Under Dilma “Love me because I’m a female politician” Roussef, Brazil has suffered the worst economic downturn in living memory, senior politicians are under the pump for endemic corruption, and violent crime has spiraled completely out of control, leading to most Brazilians living in an outright or constant back-of-the-mind fear for their safety.

Evidence, evidence, evidence… where is it in these cases?

If someone is said to have stolen $50,000 from a bank, the police do not simply transfer someone to jail to await trial. They may interview them for some hours and go through the necessary checks, yet unless the money is found in the suspect's possession, they have been caught on CCTV during a robbery, or something similar, continued detention and a trial, let alone a valid conviction, are not likely. The same goes for those accused of murder, serious assault, or other serious crimes.

With sexual assault and rape allegations, however, this general principle is easily and most often punted. I cannot get you put on trial usually for theft or assault just on my testimony, without supporting evidence or injury, but close to any woman nowadays can achieve this by crying sexual assault, rape, or even just "he kissed me!" Standards for making arrests, imprisoning suspects, initiating trials, and convicting defendants are watered-down and plain gerrymandered when it comes to men accused of sexual assault, rape, or attempted sexual assault/rape.

Another telling problem is why two Olympic boxers would be targeting athletes' village cleaners and housekeepers. Rio de Janeiro's crime and problematic living conditions for many aside, the city is home to some of the hottest women in the world. The influx of athletes and tourists has only added to Rio's status as a mecca for hot women, as evidenced by my article this week about The 10 Hottest Girls Of The Olympics. Junias and Saada may not have the most ripped bodies of the male competitors or the best sporting pedigrees, but as Olympians they would be more than capable of getting at least some semi-quality tail consensually.

And what about the prospect of the two men having been extorted? Accusations against both of them mentioned the Olympians having offered “money for sex.” There is a distinct possibility and even the probability that the men were asked to hand over money and refused, leading to a dishonest counter-argument from the women that they were offered money for sex by the men and then “assaulted.” Most of the village cleaners and housekeepers for the Rio Olympics are poverty-stricken, after all.

The “rape culture” narrative must go on Rape allegations + art project = man guilty!

Men are prone to rape and therefore the accusing woman is always right. This is what the “rape culture” narrative, now endorsed by enough police officers and prosecutors, boils down to. Just as kissing is now equated with penetration in jurisdictions like Brazil, looking at women, including those wearing basically nothing in order to get attention, is also part of the overall rape culture for feminist SJWs.

Even if we stopped criticizing the “attempted rape” charges leveled at Jonas Junius and Hassan Saada, there were measures that could have been taken to allow them to compete and respect their right to a fair trial. Their passports could have been easily seized and the Namibian and Moroccan Olympic Committees would have been able to provide strong guarantees for the athletes’ compliance. Rather than this kind of much more reasonable option, the men have been imprisoned based on women’s words.

If you thought vague, illogical notions of rape culture were merely part and parcel elements of college campuses, you have been proven decisively wrong. Rape hysteria has gone global and will continue to do so markedly in the coming years. Watch your back.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: The 10 Hottest Girls Of The Olympics

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

8 Images That Hillary Clinton Does Not Want You To See

August 11, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

It is no secret that the mainstream media and the main players on social platforms are in the Clintons' pocket. Hillary is the champion of globalism and political correctness and a hypothetical victory would create juicy contracts and even more influence worldwide.

But hardly a day comes by before news that create cracks in the narrative emerge, before being quickly censored to sap the work of independent investigators.

A ray of truth is piercing through the thick veil of lies. In a battle against all odds, the work of thousands of small voices manage to destroy the narrative, one proof at a time. Here are the latest lies about Hillary:

- She is physically fit to be President of the USA
- She runs for the people, not the bankers or special interests
- She won't break the law to win

And here is what she did not want you to see and escaped global censorship:

1. The stairs

This picture was taken in February and is one piece of evidence about Hillary's severe health issues and the storm of questions that followed after it went viral. It really looks like a fragile elderly lady, not a candidate for the most stressful job in the world.

What kind of debilitating condition does she have that she can not climb a few steps? Some say that those are the remains of the damages caused by a blood clot between her brain and skull, diagnosed in 2013. A lack of balance is usually one of the remaining symptoms of people that suffered strokes or other head trauma. Imagine how her health has deteriorated since February.

Meanwhile, El Ágil Navegador strolls around deserts and highways

2. The seizures

Probably the most unsettling element of the list. Whatever seizure or not, it is not the reaction of a person in sound health.

Hillary still recurrently suffers from seizures as recorded above. One of the triggering elements of such a seizure can be an unexpected external stimulus, such has having to process questions coming from different sources at the same time

The seizure could be a reaction to the multiple questions coming from the reporters, plus the camera flashes and the noise. Many patient suffering from seizures often become masters at playing it off, to make it seem less serious than it is. Hillary Clinton seems to blame it on the cold drink in her hand (which she has not touched for a few seconds) or the seizure caused a blackout that makes her forget the question and she tries to change the subject, focusing on her drink.

Here she is again.

> And improve it and get the costs… out of… uts… upward spiral

What kind of sentence is this?

In another rally, after the intrusion of a protester, she completely shuts down. This is an expression of total panic, an unnatural reaction to a low-level threat. The most disturbing part is the man rushing to her aid, calming her down and telling her to “keep talking.” Her mind is completely confused and she goes on autopilot, repeating his words.

This can not be the reaction of a leader. We are far away from the amused reactions that various leaders like Trump or Putin have when it comes to protestors.

Come at me, sugar tits

3. The “handler”

Let’s talk about what seems to be Hillary’s handler. He is the one that comes to her aid when the “short- circuits” occur. He speaks to her like a therapist would, not a security specialist. He his part of her entourage and can be seen on the previous picture near the stairs

Mike Cernovich @Cernovich · 7 août
How many secret service agents are overweight? #HillarysHealth

Good point

He can be seen here holding what appears to be a Diazepam pen, which is injected in case of intense seizures. Many sources agree that this man is not a Secret Service agent, but neurologist Oladotun Ocunola, who seems to be by Hillary's side 24/7

Oladotun A. Okunola, M.D.

Dr. Okunola joins the prestigious Neurology group, Neuroscience Center of Northern New Jersey, to provide a variety of specialized care. He specializes in epilepsy, clinical neurophysiology, and sleep medicine.

Dr. Okunola completed medical school at Howard University College of Medicine. He stayed and completed his internship and neurology residency at Howard University Hospital, Washington, DC. He received fellowship training in epilepsy and clinical neurophysiology at Georgetown University Hospital, Washington, DC. He also completed a sleep medicine fellowship at Norwalk Hospital, Connecticut.

As part of his fellowship training in clinical neurophysiology/epilepsy, he focused on intraoperative and epilepsy monitoring; EEG and EMG. As a sleep specialist, he diagnoses and treats sleep related disorders such as daytime sleepiness (hypersomnolence), insomnia, narcolepsy, obstructive, central, and complex sleep apnea, etc.

Dr. Okunola is board-certified in both adult neurology and clinical neurophysiology. He is a diplomate of the American Board of Neurology.

4. The coughing fits

This has been going on for a while and has been extensively documented. It can be attributed as a side effect of her medication or a recurrent problem left by the brain injury she sustained.

5. The face of Seth Rich

Seth Rich was a possible source of the DNC email leak.

> A few days later, Rich was found dead after being beaten and shot in the back twice as he walked home from his girlfriend's house early on the morning of July 10. He was on the phone with his girlfriend at the time of his murder, and had told her not to worry as she heard noise on his end of the line.
>
> The police stated that it appeared to be a botched robbery, but his family has argued that his wallet, phone, and watch were left on his body. His mother, Mary Rich, has also confirmed to the media that he was found with bruises on his face, knees and hands, leading them to believe that he had fought for his life.
>
> Source: Wearechange.org

Seth could be another addition to a long list of mysterious deaths that all come back to the Clinton circle. Luckily, voices have raised to investigate beyond the official version.

6. The hole in her tongue

Most sources attribute it to a scar left after a cancer biopsy:

> Increasingly, base of tongue cancers are associated with human papillomavirus (HPV), which has a profound effect on the prognosis and treatment of the cancer.
>
> Treatment for tongue cancer typically involves surgery to remove the cancer
>
> Source: Mayo Clinic

> You can get HPV by having vaginal, anal, or oral sex with someone who has the virus. It is most commonly spread during vaginal or anal sex.
>
> HPV can cause cervical and other cancers cancers including cancer of the vulva, vagina, penis, or anus. It can also cause cancer in the back of the throat, including the base of the tongue and tonsils
>
> Source: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

Could she have contracted cancer through Bill, her sex addict of a husband?

7. The face of Seddique Mateen in her rally

An endorsement that she would gladly avoid.

There he is. Pro-Taliban, Sharia law enthusiast Seddique Mateen, comfortably seated at one of Hillary's rallies. No one forgot that he is the father of Orlando shooter, Omar Mateen.

Hillary pretends to be the candidate of tolerance but wants more people like him and his son in the country. She also claims to be defending gays after Omar Mateen killed 49 people and wounded 53 in Orlando. She also supports gun control, one of the main reasons why Orlando victims were so numerous.

8. The tainted money

Millions Raised and Spent So Far

Some candidates who dropped out and some PACs have not yet filed complete reports

	TOTAL RAISED IN MILLIONS	CANDIDATE RAISED	CANDIDATE SPENT	CANDIDATE CASH ON HAND	SUPER PACS & OTHER PACS RAISED	SUPER PACS & OTHER PACS SPENT	SUPER PACS & OTHER PACS CASH ON HAND
Hillary Clinton	$334.9	$238.2	$195.7	$42.5	$96.7	$44.9	$52.6
Bernie Sanders	229.1	229.1	219.9	9.2	<0.1	0.1	<0.1
Donald J. Trump	67.1	64.6	63.3	1.3	2.5	2.0	0.5

She is Wall Street's puppet but pretends to be a candidate of the people. She tells what she is told to say, as she has since the beginning of her career. The big money says "jump" and Hillary answers "How high?"

Contributor	Total	Indivs	PACs
Citigroup Inc	$782,327	$774,327	$8,000
Goldman Sachs	$711,490	$701,490	$10,000
DLA Piper	$628,030	$601,030	$27,000
JPMorgan Chase & Co	$620,919	$617,919	$3,000
EMILY's List	$605,174	$601,254	$3,920
Morgan Stanley	$543,065	$538,065	$5,000
Time Warner	$411,296	$386,296	$25,000
Skadden, Arps et al	$406,640	$402,140	$4,500
Lehman Brothers	$362,853	$359,853	$3,000

Contributors to the Clinton family

Howzat for the voice of LGBT, religious freedom and women's rights? A pawn for her Arab masters. Voting against her is truly about self preservation.

Enfin

Another gem by Ben Garrison

The media covers it up again. We need to keep exposing those inconvenient truths and a professional, public assessment of Hillary's health must be conducted.

Clinton-backed leftist strongholds such as the Daily Beast were quick to react, posting a try hard unoriginal response, involving unrelated extracts of Donald Trump's speeches. As much as they try to deny the obvious, readers are not fools.

If physically unfit Hillary gets elected and applies gun control laws, terrorists won't need guns to neutralize the President. They'll just bring 20 strobe lights, Halloween masks and air horns.

Like anyone in a state of physical weakness, she must stand down. Let her finish her days somewhere quiet. A prison cell comes to mind. She is not fit to rule and should not endanger other lives by being in a position that involves power.

Read More: If Donald Trump Doesn't Win, We're Screwed

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

The Type Of Man Who Reads Return Of Kings

August 11, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Back in the 1960s, Playboy magazine ran a campaign to encourage advertisers to buy space in the magazine. The campaign was entitled “What Sort of Man Reads Playboy” and it highlighted one aspect of its reader base every month. In this article, I take a look at some of the most popular articles on ROK to discern what sort of man reads ROK. It will also serve as a good reminder of the basic principles of masculinity.

A man who is physically fit

The starting point for any self-improvement program is to focus on the physical. This is because the state of our physical body provides the foundation for how we feel. Without a good physical foundation, you will look terrible and your confidence will suffer. If you are fat and eat poorly, you will have lousy energy and not be able to achieve anything.

This is why articles on training have always been popular at ROK. The modern world has the side effect of making men soft. Spending nine hours a day working in a cube then going home to play video games is not life that nature intended for men. All men should be spending some part of their week exercising to counter act this effect.

But what type of exercise? ROK has been consistent in preaching the message of pumping iron. Lifting weights is the fastest way to get strong and to build an impressive physique. The emphasis has always been on building functional muscle. Whether you want strategies to lose weight or build strength, ROK has you covered.

Lifting weights is indispensable, but if you truly want to be a mutant when it comes to strength, you also have to do a lot of body weight work. Our own Larsen Hallock has unlocked some of the underground secrets to superhuman feats such as the one-arm pull up and pistols.

A man who knows how to defend himself

If you've been following my writing here or at my blog, you know that I believe that we are entering a very uncertain time when civil unrest is becoming increasingly likely. Therefore, it is imperative that every man learn how to defend himself.
This message is not new to ROK readers. They are only interested in martial arts that provide practical self-defense benefits. ROK writer Jean-Batave Poqueliche has met this need with an outstanding series of articles that describe the most effective submissions, throws, leg techniques, and hand techniques.

But ROK readers know that while unarmed fighting is a necessary skill, it is only a part of what man needs to know to defend himself and his family. That's why ROK has always carried articles on firearms. Most recently my colleague Luke Stranahan has guided readers on what to look for in a handgun and a rifle.

A man who has a realistic view of women

ROK readers love women, but they know that a woman can never be a man's ultimate purpose. We have a realistic view of women. We don't put them on a pedestal and imagine that they are pure, perfect creatures that are worthy of nothing but praise. On the other hand, we don't make the opposite mistake of assuming that women are demons in human form whose only purpose in life is to divorce rape their husbands. The men who believe the latter often end up retreating from women entirely and embracing some form of MGTOWism.

Modern culture wants us to believe that women are smarter than men and that they have better values than men. Part of the argument for Hillary being elected president is that she is a woman, and that as a woman she is inherently more stable, competent, and peaceful than a male president. At the same time we are told to venerate women as superior beings, society also asks us to protect them as the weaker sex. For example, girls need to be fed a steady diet of “grrrl power” or their self-esteem will plummet. In short, modern women want to have their cake and eat it too.

If you are single, you’ll find solid “game” advice on ROK (check out Troy Francis’ continuing series of articles). But my position on game has always been is that if you do the the hard work of self-improvement, you’ll only need to know the basic principles of game to be successful. Woman are naturally attracted to successful men.

A man who is focused on success

We live at a time when all the rules have changed. In the not so distant past, the formula for success was simple: get good grades in high school, get into a good university, get a marketable degree, get a job at a large corporation, and climb the corporate ladder. While some can still take advantage of this path, it is closed off to most young men who are graduating now as more jobs are being outsourced or filled by cheaper immigrants.

The men who used to work in the so-called blue collar jobs have it even worse. Most of their jobs have been moved to foreign countries leaving thousands unemployed. The advice of our elite is worthless. Displaced workers are either told to go to college, which is increasingly a fool’s errand, or to move to follow a job. But what if the job was moved to Vietnam? Are we really going to expect American workers to learn Vietnamese and relocate their families?

ROK readers have been among the first to understand that the game is rigged. The first step to becoming successful is to realize that the economy is designed to make us perpetual consumers. Rejecting consumerism frees a man to focus on what is truly valuable. Saving money thus opens the door to financial freedom.

A man who who understands the system

One of the first things that struck me about ROK is the readers' opinion of politics. Long before Donald Trump announced his candidacy, ROK readers were already aware of the fact that the conservative versus liberal divide in the country amounted to little more than kabuki theatre for the proles. In reality, conservatives have been a fake opposition all along. Their only purpose was to give the appearance of democracy.

ROK is one of the first places—maybe the first place—that pointed out that the real divide in the country is between globalism and nationalism. While this might be old news to ROK readers, it is still a truth that has not sunk into the consciousness of wide swaths of conservative movement. The people who cling to the outmoded dichotomy are now known as cuckservatives.

Finally, ROK is the one place that has proposed a realistic solution to the problems of the system in Patriarchal Nationalism.

Conclusion

Regardless of what happens in the US presidential election in November, there are going to be big changes in the future. ROK will remain in the forefront of those changes with advice that will allow our readers to flourish.

Read More: Need Advice? Ask The Men Behind Return Of Kings

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Why The Media Disinformation Campaign Against Donald Trump Will Fail

August 12, 2016 | by Dirk Pevensie | Link | Original Link

2nd Amendment. Babies. Purple hearts. The NFL. Breastfeeding. Immigration law. EB-5. H1-B. Iranian press footage. Endorsements. Deli meat. As someone who is involved in the Presidential election, I couldn't be more confused as to the types of comments I've received in the past week. Here are a few of the best:

- "Is it true Donald is dropping out?"
- "Which side of the feud are you on, Lewandowski or Manafort?"
- "Donald needs to control his erratic behavior."
- "Why won't Donald listen to anyone on the campaign?"

To say I didn't know how to answer would be understatement in the least. At one point on a concall, I muted and turned to an associate and we each had to shrug our shoulders and carry on, explaining what sarcasm is—all in attempts to mollify certain members of the media who have the stunning ability to find fault with every single thing Donald did this week. If he crosses his arms and looks to the side, then "Aha! He's Mussolini!" If he furrows his brow at a reporter, then "Aha! He's Rudolph Hess!"

Trump Speaking in New Hampshire

To say the media onslaught is brought on by a pack of blithering idiots would be an insult to blithering idiots. The simple fact of the matter is that this is still a very close race and the media is falling over themselves to try and trip up Donald. The same tactics were employed in the primary by 17 very qualified opponents, and all I really need to say is—where are they today? (Jeb Bush spotted this week carrying a box down a dark cobblestone street in Boston.)

Jeb Bush Walks Alone in Boston

It is interesting that the media is now taking an “All of the above” approach to their endless attacks, and this is rather noteworthy. Gone are the blanket recitations of “Trump is a racist” or “Trump is a sexist.” Instead, the media is employing a tactic the Marines refer to as “spray and pray.” They don’t have any specific targets, but they know they are cornered, so they are wildly swinging about with their finger down on the full auto trigger. Hillary herself seems like an inexperienced boxer flailing about looking for an early K.O. since she knows she will not last the 15 rounds.

The further rumors of the dropout of the race or dissension within the campaign are, in a word, slapstick. The mood within Team Trump is full-steam ahead, with any sign of a feud or rift within our ranks as pure media artifice. Sure, people have differences of opinion on tactics for a specific issue, or timing and roll-out of a specific announcement or endorsement, but nothing that would be any different from a group of friends trying to decide what kind of pizza to get or what movie to see on the weekend (though none of us would ever choose this new Ghostfrumpers monstrosity).

The team remains laser-beam focused on long-term strategy and while the media of course refuses to report on it, many of the statements Donald are making now are laying the groundwork for things to come later in the Fall. Little nuggets of foreshadowing, we call them.

Disinformation is out there.

Some of the team has prior military service, and its interesting the parallels they draw between what the media is doing to Donald and a military disinformation campaign. Essentially, good disinformation plants seeds of doubt in the mind of your opponent, demoralizing them, and causing dissension in their ranks. On the flipside, the same disinformation should serve to energize and enliven your own side. These are the same tactics the US military has used in conflicts from Germany to Vietnam to Afghanistan. Demoralize, Disrupt, Discredit. Without firing a shot, your enemy can become so fractured and anxious that internally, they have already defeated themselves.

The clearest example of this is the (widely ridiculed) Reuters and CNN polls which are practically sampling Democrats over Republicans at a 2:1 ratio. Such a high ratio is not reflective in any reasonable nationwide accounting of party registration, but hey, who cares? Let’s just run it anyway since it makes for endless grumbling and gnashing of teeth!

The biggest single factor working against this narrative is social media. In 2016, 78% of Americans have at least one social media account. Americans spend on average 3 hours a day on social media. Contrasted with that is what more and more people are referring to as The Death of Television. Mobile viewing, cord cutting, online video, and yes even torrents, are all cutting deeply into the traditional TV market. The majority of millennials (who are voting for the first time in 2016) do not own at TV. Overall, 18 to 34-year-olds spend nearly as much time using digital devices (smartphones, tablets and computers) as they do watching TV.

All of this has massive implications for the Hillary Clinton campaign. She is spending millions on TV ads that simply do not move the needle. Donald is not. Her Twitter posts are ridiculed and her messaging is amateur. Her main slogan has our candidate’s name in it and not hers. Repetition is the key to retention, that’s Marketing 101. Even more importantly, the media narratives do not survive on social media as well as they do for TV-only watchers.

Instead, CNN, NY Times, WaPo, etc are merely only one of many voices twittering about, and fact-checking is easier to do than ever. Hillary and her media dogs spend millions on messaging, while all Donald has to do is send a tweet and his narrative is immediately absorbed. Furthermore, in terms of numbers, she has a gang of bullies on social media, while we have amassed an army. Take a look at Reddit sometime if you don't believe me.

The media is run by extremely clever people who know what they are doing. Their onslaught against Donald will almost certainly have some scratching their heads about what is going on with the campaign, and why Donald seems, for once, to be on the defensive.

All I will say to that is, there is a plan. There is a strategy. There is a method at work here. When the enemy has you surrounded—that only means there's no way for them to escape. We are right where we want to be in August.

Read More: The Slow Merging Of Government Disinformation, Propaganda, And Censorship

Dirk Pevensie
Dirk Pevensie is a known political operative stationed deep within the swampy bowels of the Washington Beltway. He has worked in politics since the Bush era for a variety of candidates, elected officials, and firms.

Woman’s Magazine Elle Puts Tranny On Its Cover

August 12, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Women’s fashion magazine Elle has decided to stop focusing on its four letter title, French for “Her,” and has placed Hari Nef, a 23-year-old man who graduated from the theater program at Columbia University last year on its September, 2016 cover. Hari was not available for comment, and therefore I am unable to confirm whether this is masterful acting by the cunning theater major Hari, able to troll photographers, makeup artists, editors, and publishers into believing he is a hot woman, or the staff of top selling Elle magazine forgetting what their nameplate means.

Who is this Hari Man?

More photoshop needed on the adam’s apple

Hari grew up in a single parent home in Massachusetts. His mother was a saleswoman, and he expressed some discomfort as a teenager, and after moving to NYC to study drama at Columbia, began dressing in “genderless clothes” and upon graduation landed a modeling gig and performed his first catwalk in 2015 during New York Fashion Week.

Clearly a man in makeup

Apparently, Hari still has most of the associated cues of being a male. He states:

> “I could have hidden in Boston and lived at home for 3 years, gone through my transition, taken voice lessons to make my voice more feminine, gotten gender reassignment surgery, and spent time to complete my transition, but I didn’t want to wait. I wanted to be in the world,”

He states that he still sounds, acts, and looks like a man, and likely has kept the frank and beans like role model Bruce.

Surprise, Surprise!

I am woman, hear me.. haha oh I can’t even finish it

Hari is attracted to and dates other men, stating

> “in an ideal world, I wouldn’t have to change my body. I wouldn’t have to do all this stuff. I wouldn’t have to be pretty, or feminine, and people would respect that.”

Well, I wouldn’t go so far as to respect anything besides your privacy, but yes, if you just shut up and quietly lived your gay life without calling attention to yourself, and without the theatrics of pretending to actually be female, or “gender shifting” or any of the other 31 flavors of the month, then many people wouldn’t have a problem with you.

The Quickening

As recently as 15 years ago, this would be 100% pure humor. While I did chuckle at this story, and several of the photos are rather humorous, the fact is, today, this is taken seriously by much of America. As the film Zoolander parodied, models are not always dressed in the most feminine of clothing, and indeed many models have an androgynous look.

But the culture is changing so rapidly, that a post-millennial kid today would be confused by the plot of many top films of recent memory, such as Silence of the Lambs, which purposefully made the mass murderer Buffalo Bill a cross dresser, reinforcing his depravity and mental illness.

Zero humor at all in this scene if you are under 25

Feminism: Always The Enemy of Fun

But today, a man dressing as a woman is not seen as silly or humorous, as it has throughout most of Western history, but a Proud and Strong and Brave Womyn Expressing Her Inner Strength and Spirit. While 2001's Zoolander was a critical and box office success, earning over $30 million in profit from theater sales alone, 2016's sequel Zoolander 2 was a commercial failure, only barely covering its costs of production. Add humor to another item in the long list of things feminism has killed.

The Letters are apparently still too small for some staff to see

Where Does It Come From?

Elle Magazine (“Her” Magazine) is owned by a French conglomerate, and the American version is published by Hearst Media, a privately held and controversial publisher founded by William Randolph Hearst, that once held a monopoly on major media and today owns interests in hundreds of magazines, newspapers, and TV stations reaching 20% of US viewers, including ESPN, who has worked closely with the NFL in turning football gay. One can look into the history and background of the major media and see the common source which creates this garbage.

Some days I feel like a woman, others like livestock

While there will certainly be backlash as elites attempt to define to us what is beauty, what is female, and what is good, the end result is that the vast majority of post-millennials will succumb to this propaganda and never know the truth. When the majority of their classmates are fat, gross, prepubescently-sexually active, and genderqueer, they will never be exposed to real beauty.

While corporations like Elle can save money by employing mentally ill workers that don't have to be told to "look confused and depressed", they are destroying the basic biological imperatives of humanity. Hari Nef has already been hired for television work and will be coming to a network near you soon. Throw away your TV and tune out the offensive degenerate media.

Read More: The Theory Of Evolution Does Not Apply To Modern Human Beings

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

The Criterion Of Certitude

August 12, 2016 | by Aurelius Moner | Link | Original Link

Greetings to the men of ROK! I'm sorry to have been on such a long sabbatical—and, unfortunately, I doubt I'll be writing much longer. While I am sorry that my contributions have to be sparser for the forseeable future, this is due to some very good news for myself. Head over to the hermitage's website to read about it.

This week, I want to wrap up our discussion on Epistemology/Criteriology, and Certitude. I will have to conclude it in a somewhat more peremptory fashion than I would like, since my good news requires a lot of preparation for an imminent deadline. But, I think this conclusion will be good enough to get the main gist across. I will provide a bibliography and links to other resources in an upcoming post, so that interested men can pursue matters further.

A Brief Recap

Criteriology is the study of man's certitude, i.e., what and how he can know certainly. This is called "Criteriology" from the Greek κριτήριον (kriterion), meaning "standard of judgment," and λόγος (logos), meaning "reckoning." This is because certainty is present when the mind has made a judgment, in which there is a true correspondence between his thought and the thing being evaluated. Thus, the Scholastic maxim: Veritas est adaequatio intellectus et rei ("truth is the adequation of a thing and a thought"). Or, put otherwise, truth is when the objective and subjective elements of man's judgment correspond.

Certainty is not an emotive feeling, but an awareness of knowing the truth; feeling strongly about something has nothing to do with certainty. It is produced when, upon sufficient reflection on the evident facts, the mind realizes that a certain thing is true, producing a compelling intellectual adherence. But this leads man to the question: "what is evident?" Cardinal Mercier, whose Manual of Scholastic Philosophy we were following, mentions that, since the time of Descartes, the question is usually posed: "Is human reason able to know things as they really are? Or, in other words: can we attain to a consciousness that our ideas are conformable to things as they are in themselves? How can the mind arrive at an assurance of this conformity?"

He points out that this formulation is incomplete and incorrect; trying to know what a thing may be in itself, considered apart from our perceptions of it, "is, as far as we are concerned, as if it did not exist, a pure non-entity." This is because it is an absurdity to talk about what we can know about a thing in abstraction from our knowledge about that thing. Rather, as the Scholastic dictum says: cognitio est in cognoscente ad modum cognoscentis ("the thought is in the thinker according to the thinker's own manner") – i.e., every perceiving agent must of necessity perceive things in accord with its own nature. My human mode of perception, based upon the eye, its rods and cones, the retina, the nervous system, etc., perceives a red ball in a certain way. Surely an angel, for example, perceives the ball in some other way; but our perceptions correspond to the real thing, whatever it be in itself. Or, put another way: I can use my eyes to see that a ball is round; a blind man must perceive it in a different way, by touch, but perceives the same quality under a different manner of sensation.

Aided by deifying grace, Saint Benedict perceived all existence in a single ray of divine light; the saints understandably explain that such visions cannot be adequately explained to others by any analogy of human perception.

We can discuss the truthfulness of the mind's perception of exterior things ("the objectivity of our conceptions"), or of the mind's perception of abstract concepts ("the objectivity of the ideal order"). In examining the mind's initial state of knowledge, Cardinal Mercier was careful to point out two equal, opposite errors: 1) the theory of universal doubt (which is an unwarranted and even irrational prejudice), and 2) exaggerated dogmatism (he affirmed the logical necessity of this view's assumptions if the mind knows anything true, but rejected the attempt to take them for granted). The Cardinal was only willing to admit two things, a priori: 1) we subjectively experience spontaneous assent to various perceptions; 2) we are able to reflect on these.

Resolution Of The Problem

Cardinal Mercier points out that the resolution to the problem is actually quite simple. If the mind's perceptions do not correspond to actual objects, whether of the ideal or actual order, the mind would be arbitrarily certain or doubtful in regards to the same object; instead, we see that the mind moves from doubt to certainty in regards to the same object, as it reflects upon what is evident about it. When the evidence is understood sufficiently by the intellect, it attains a certainty which remains for as long as the evidence is fresh to the mind, and understood thereby. This purely internal knowledge is also confirmed by conferral with other persons, whose intellects behave in the same way with regard to the same object of thought. Take this statement: "the degrees of the four angles produced when one line intersects another, always add up to 360 degrees." Perhaps at first I don't understand this. But upon reflection – measuring, reflection upon axiomatic truths of geometry and mathematics, etc. – it becomes clear to me. My mind will not fluctuate once this is understood and the evidence is before me. If my thoughts sprung from myself without any connection to this object's real nature, one cannot see how this would be the case.

At first, I was unsatisfied with the Cardinal's answer; I asked myself: "but what if it is the nature of the mind to produce these convictions, despite the fact that they do not really correspond to any real 'truths?'" A great deal of reflection, and an helpful essay by the Church's last truly fine theologian, Fr. Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange, helped me to reduce the matter to an even plainer level.

Many, taking Descartes' statement slightly amiss, think that that first thing the intellect perceives is its own cognition ("I think, therefore I am"). Now, it may be true that the first thing the mind spontaneously reflects upon, is its own cognition; but in fact the mind must perceive being itself before it perceives cognition, for cognition involves the existence of the subject and object of the cognition. Thus, "I am, therefore I think." We may not reflect upon this fact, however, until we have reflected upon our cognition, and this is why Descartes deduced his existence from his thought.

When the mind is making a certain judgment, it is doing nothing other, than perceiving being and judging that the subject and object of his judgment involve the same being. For example, Euclid knows what a line is; he perceives the nature of the angles formed when two lines meet perfectly perpendicularly; he perceives that there are four such angles in a perfect square. All he is doing in each case, is affirming that he perceives the same quality of being from one thing to the next. This is but the first, indemonstrable certainty cited by Aristotle in Metaphysics IV:iii – "A thing is not affirmed and denied at the same time," the principle of non-contradiction. Everything else is based upon it.

Hortus Deliciarum: Seven Liberal Arts, German Romanesque ca. 1170
(engraving after original) Strasbourg (now destroyed)

Philosophy penetrates to the first principles of things, by which all other principles can be accurately derived.

We find that the evidence of this fact impresses itself upon our minds. We perceive that other men see it, and see other principle truths, as we do. Only with disgust, can we force ourselves to imagine that if x is equal to y, y may yet not equal x. Nothing interior or exterior to ourselves contradicts it or gives cause to question it; quite the opposite! To doubt our first and most basic certainty, then, is to will to doubt, not only without cause, but in spite of all causes to the contrary. The crisis of Modernity is based in this perversion of the will when it comes to pursuing certainty in important matters.

Essentially, this is at the bottom of it: in finding ourselves able still to will to doubt, in literal spite of ourselves and of everything, we have simply discovered that we are contingent beings suffering from a defect of will, who require the approbation and confirmation of the Necessary Being before we can escape the possibility of the brute, stubborn, irrational will to doubt. Moreover: if we insist that we cannot really affirm our perception of being, of the principle of non-contradiction, etc., with certainty, we find ourselves in a logical paradox: we would be affirming certainly that we cannot be certain. And we would be doing this based upon a (rash and erroneous) judgment that relies upon the same criterion of evidence which we deny and which, if we affirm it, compels us to affirm the possibility of certitude. Thus, we cannot even argue against certainty without affirming certainty and implicitly approving of all the evidence for it.

So: if we are willing to step away from the suicide of doubting simply because we find that we can, contrary to the necessary affirmations which the principles of this irrational and unwarranted doubt would require us to make in favor rather of certainty, we find that we can say with certainty that we perceive being; we perceive that existence exists; we find that what exists is not simultaneously affirmed and denied.

The Consequences

One may not think that this is a particularly outstanding thing. But, one would be surprised at how quickly the human mind, infallible in itself, begins perceiving the inevitable connections that arise from this perception of being (and non-being). For example, we perceive that insofar as we perceive being, we perceive it in act. We perceive that an act is directed towards an end; and that whatever begins to act, has a cause. We perceive that an agent acts with the goal of some good – and indeed, that an effect cannot be greater than its cause, so that the Good is necessarily itself the first cause and the final aim of all things.

In other words, with metaphysical certainty we perceive the existence of being, of the good, of act, of cause and of effect, of the natural and moral law, and even of God Himself, though of course the specifically revealed dogmas of the Faith are not able to be deduced from natural reason in this way. Yet, St. Thomas Aquinas points out that the immortality of the soul is at the far end of the spectrum of truths which can be demonstrated with certainty from natural reason.

I will soon tie this in to some of the political, social and moral points I had been making in my more recent articles. But in short: when a man thinks clearly, he will find that many truths, which are regarded by most Modern Westerners as unscientific, religious matters (and hence, mere opinions), are in fact able to be known with greater certainty, and with far greater ease, than most of their pet doctrines (on “rights,” “social justice,” even “Global Warming,” et al.). Indeed, in the aforementioned article of Fr. Garrigou Lagrange, he is keen to show that what we call “common sense” knows all these first principles of reason without much reflection; the entire purpose of modern schooling and media, is to destroy our innate common sense and to inhibit our powers of reflection, perverting the will towards the preference for doubt and for negation both of being and of the good.

While the Globalist Psychopaths affirm their own delusions with dogmatic fury, they will slander a proper, religious or moral truth as though it were simply a matter of your (bigoted) opinion. You can know certainly that 1) they are wrong; 2) even if they were right – which is impossible – they would have invalidated all their own opinions, equally; so, screw ’em.

The day is fast approaching, I believe, when Western men will have to stand up for themselves with more force and conviction than our age prepares us to have. But the coming battle will require us to rise to that challenge, and I would like to see you fight with the boldness and conviction of a clean conscience and a keen mind, with only humility and prudent pity to slow your sword-hand. Before that day comes, let us leave ignorance and unwarranted doubt aside.

Until next week!

Read More: 4 Reasons To Host A Feast

Aurelius Moner
Br. Aurelius Moner is a Catholic monk who was has left the "nice" philosophy of Liberalism behind, having come to understand that the judgment, authority and strength of the Patriarchy is necessary to save civilization from "nice" people. He is a man of many imperfections, but he is confident that Christ will perfect the work He began in him. He has an inchoate blog: Ascension Hermitage If you are so inclined, you may contribute to his hermitage-building project here

10 Ideas For Starting A Business If You Don’t Have A Lot Of Money

August 13, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

With the price tag for a college education climbing to ridiculous new heights, and with the glut of baristas sporting college degrees clogging up the traditional job market, it really pays for any red pill male to think outside the box and acquire vital, high-demand skills which will set him apart from the herd, while giving him a solid foundation to weather any and all financial storms that might assail him in the future.

Here are 10 solid ways you can navigate outside the box very quickly and acquire invaluable skills, great-paying jobs, and vitally important connections, while spending very little (or zero) money in the process.

1. Web Design

This is a huge field, and once you get it down, you’ll have a skill that virtually every businessperson can use, including yourself. You can buy website-building software to get started, no need to learn to write code initially. Writing code is something you might do down the road, although it can become completely unnecessary once you become proficient with the software-building program of your choice. Just follow the instructions that come with the website-building software, and get busy.

2. Writing

Write anything and everything you can possibly write—and do it often. Good writers are in high demand and knowing how to express yourself is a vital skill, even if you don't get paid for it.

3. Videography

Buy a decent HD digital camera for starters, and learn how to shoot and edit films by yourself, using the readily available instructional material that you can read for free online. (Google this—"no film school"—for starters.)

You can use that website you learned how to build to market your wares, and you can start by shooting your buddies' weddings, and you can parlay that within your own town and shoot property videos for real estate agents, as just a couple of examples.

There are tons of businesses that need the help of good videographers and filmmakers—industrial films, for example, are big business.

4. Film And TV Acting

Acting is reading lines exactly the way that you would say them if you were in the character's shoes, and nothing more. It's a great way to have a part-time job that pays extremely well, and occasionally you can actually find a non-SJW role to play; the myth here is, "Acting is so competitive." True, but so is plumbing. And if you are a good plumber, you can always find work—same with acting.

I suggest anybody and everybody try this one, no matter what their age and no matter what their look or body type. It all boils down to being yourself, despite what you might think. And there is high demand for actors in films (both commercial and industrial, especially the latter) of all ages, and all body types, and all looks.

Getting an agent is easy. You can either compile a resume of fake acting credits, which about half of all actors do, or play it straight and admit you have no experience (prepare for a long wait for that first job if you play it on the level—hint, hint); then go and get a headshot photo taken or take one by yourself, and have about a hundred 8″ x 10″ black-and-white prints made up.

Then go agent shopping, using the following search engine query to locate them in your neck of the woods: "theatrical agents" +"your city"; or "talent agencies" +"your city."

An agent is nothing more than a pimp who gets around 10% of your eventual action, for sending your resume and head shot out to casting directors. They could care less who you are, or what you are, and they will submit your credentials to every project in town that needs an actor fitting your description.

Legitimate agents will not ask you for money. If you encounter an agent who charges an up-front fee, walk away—it's a scam.

Practice reading lines at home. And use that HD video camera I suggested you get in No. 3 above, to record yourself while you practice. Then, just go out on auditions whenever your agent lines one up for you, maintain your frame, and get the job.

Getting an acting job is exactly like getting laid—the cocky guy with the attitude, an outgoing manner and no fear usually wins.

5. Voiceover Acting

You can practice this at home by recording your own voice as you read advertising copy. If you have a decent speaking voice, you can find voiceover work once you get the agent that I suggested you get in No. 4 above.

Most radio and TV spots are 30 seconds or 60 seconds. After you record a few commercials (audio only), play them back and write out the lines. Then practice the 30-second or 60-second voiceover pieces. If you do this long enough, you'll get good at it.

This mean extra money on the side for you, once you start working, and women love actors and voiceover dudes—you'll get more pussy than you can shake your stick at.

6. Stand-Up Comedy

Work the kinks out of a three- to five-minute routine at home, and then go practice it at any comedy club that allows comics to perform for free (the typical length for a bit at open mic night is between three and five minutes).

You can eventually make some decent money traveling the country once you get it down. And most comics suck, which is a very good incentive. And women love fucking comedians, too, even if the comedians aren't that good (an even better incentive).

(Warming up the audience is the key to success here—interact with phantom club-goers as you practice your act. "Hey, blonde in the front row, have you ever dated a guy who smelled so bad you wanted to puke?" Once you recruit them to your cause, they'll laugh at anything.)

If you get good enough at it, you might wind up writing comedy scripts for TV or movies, or being a headliner at comedy clubs.

7. Bartending

This is pretty easy to do, and you can memorize drink recipes and practice at home; use colored water in bottles to represent different liquor types, and make labels for different liquors and paste them on the bottles; once you can jam and make drinks quickly, go get a job. You might need to attend bartender's school to get a certificate, but that's no biggie.

Once you get good at your craft, you can work at better and better establishments. Some bartenders make really great money and the hot women you can ultimately bang are legion.

8. Mentor Advice Extraction

Ask every single accomplished older male with whom you come in contact, what the single best piece of advice is, that he might give you. You'll be amazed at how this can turn into instant job offers, especially if you single out men who look successful, and you do this wherever you can hoist a glass of beer or have an alcoholic beverage.

In addition, you will reap tons of hard-won insider wisdom that you can't get at school—and that, my friend, is worth its weight in gold. Most older man enjoy passing hard-won knowledge to inquisitive, respectful young dudes—it's hardwired into their DNA to help mentor the next generation.

If you are polite and respectful when you approach them, and if you offer to buy them a drink right after you start chatting, most of them will not only roll over and spill their guts, they will start taking an interest in your future. And that can lead to instant opportunities.

9. Specialized Food Service

Select a small number of recipes you really like—perhaps a few that your grandmother or mother passed along to you—and go and get a food cart along with a food vendor's license.

If you are getting $8 for a sandwich, and it only costs you $1.50 to make it, the profit can add up fast, and this is especially true when it comes to beverages, which is where you can really make a profit (let's say you buy a can of Coke for 20 cents apiece, and you sell it for $1.50, or whatever—the profit adds up quickly).

You might just wind up with your own restaurant, or your own online food service, with specialty foods that you can market using that website that you know how to build if you followed my advice in No. 1, above. (As an example of this, I have an ex-girlfriend who makes designer cupcakes and ships them all over North America—I'm still friendly with the ex, in case you were wondering. She's hot and smart, why burn the bridge…)

Everybody has to eat and you can damn well take advantage of that fact…

10. Specialized Niche Development

Think outside the box and dream up additional niche ideas for yourself. The overall goal here is to become as indispensable to as many businesses and people as possible.

Nobody has any more potential than you do – they just might have better connections or a better head-start.

So outwork them…and above all else, believe in yourself. And don't second-guess yourself – just man-up and do it. Fear is definitely the prison…

In my humble opinion, No. 10 above is the most important…but they are all solid ways to raise your game and stay ahead of the snarling pack.

To my way of thinking, sharing your own personal advice on this matter, will only serve to help any man who longs to break free from the misery of being a hamster on the Traditional Employment Treadmill. I’m sure that many readers here at ROK will be able to add a few of their own tips and ideas to this list, and I hope they will do so.

Always think outside the box, young squires, or the box will indeed suffocate you.

Read More: The 10 Hottest Girls Of The Olympics

Bob Smith
Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

How To Meet Women Through Sugar Daddy Dating Sites

August 13, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

As dating becomes more and more difficult in the West, men are turning to new methods to meet women. One of the biggest kept “secrets” these days is the utilization of sites traditionally reserved for ~~gold-diggers~~ girls in need of financial aid.

It’s become referred to as “sugar dating”, or “splenda dating”. In a nutshell, you pay the big bucks to join these sugar dating sites, where women traditionally are looking for men with a net worth of over a million dollars. Then, you exaggerate your status to get responses and dates.

Finally, when you get them on a date, it’s as simple as this: trick them before you get tricked. These are not honorable or traditional women, and so this is not a game for the faint-hearted. If you’re willing to take these risk, then this guide is for you.

1. Pick The Website

By far the biggest sugar dating website is Seeking Arrangement. And truthfully, it’s the only one I’ve personally experienced with. I’ve had such success with it, I never found a reason to stray away from it.

There are plenty of other websites that out there, so do your due diligence before you pony up the money to join them.

2. Pick A Schedule

With sugar dating websites, the fees are very high–Seeking Arrangement will cost you $70 for just a one month membership. Compare this to something like Tinder Plus, which you can get an entire year of for less than that.

Why pay that price? Because the quality on these websites is out-of-this world.

If you have any doubts about that, make a profile and browse for yourself (you can do this for free, just not message the girls).

The current prices for Seeking Arrangement are:

- 1 month: $69.96
- 3 months: $59.95 ($179.85)
- 6 months: $49.95 ($299.70)

Sure, you can save money with a site like Seeking Arrangement by paying for more time up front–but can you actually get enough use out of a site like that for six months?

If you're any good at online dating, probably not. The number of girls to message simply won't be high enough to entertain you for six months. Instead, it's far better to completely blitz the site for one month, take three months off, and then sign up for another month. As a result, over a year long period you'd only end up paying $210 instead of a full $600.

And you'd probably get the same results.

The best thing to do is to sign up, and blitz the site hard for a couple of weeks. Then take a week off. Finally, during the last week of your membership being active, go hard again. You can potentially get several dozen leads, which you can then try to meet up with over the course of the next month.

2a. Be Aware Of The “Come Back To Us!” Scam

While they’ll never admit it, many premium dating sites that cost money have a little trick to get you to sign up, or come back.

Have you ever noticed that when you first register your account on a site, you get dozens of messages–yet, you can’t read or reply to them? Ever notice that when your membership expires that you get another flood of messages in the week after your account has been downgraded from a premium membership?

Simply put, they’re dangling a carrot in front of your eyes in the hopes that you’ll sign back up (many of those messages come from fake profiles).

Don’t fall for it. Have discipline. When your time on a sugar dating site is up, shut it down for a while until the real population of girls has been replenished.

(As sugar dating gets more and more mainstream and popular, the amount of time for this is going to decrease.)

3. Crafting Your Profile

Sugar dating sites have very similar profile criteria to traditional dating websites, but with one exception.

They’re going to ask for things like your annual income, net worth, and “lifestyle budget”–i.e. how much money you’re willing to spend on these girls.

So the question becomes… how much do you lie?

Truthfully, you need enough of a cover story to give her plausible deniability about it. I was only 24 when I started utilizing sugar dating, and I found that I could get away with saying that I had a net worth of a million bucks, and made around $300k a year. This was backed up by the apartment I had (5 minutes to the beach in Los Angeles), the job and company I worked for, as well as the way I dressed.

The reality is that neither my net worth or my income were nowhere near this, but I gave enough of the illusion that it didn’t stop girls from meeting with me.

4.. Bring The Money Issue Up ASAP

I was a big proponent of making it clear to girls that I wasn't going to be forking over any money for them to spend time with me. I made the argument that having a successful guy who they could have a lifestyle with was worth the trade off of getting a monthly allowance (which is what most sugar daddies pay their babies).

Because I wanted to screen girls I went out with hard, I added this tidbit in my profile for them to clearly see:

> I'm not looking to pay an allowance. I'm not old like most guys on SA. I'm more than happy to share my lifestyle with and whatnot but I wouldn't buy a car without test driving.
>
> So, I'll let you decide if getting to spend time and do cool shit with me, who is about your age, is worth the trade off. Also consider I don't care if you have someone who DOES do that for you as long as you are present with me. The end.

My profile basically subconsciously portrays this: I'm not paying you anything, and I expect sex before things get serious. I'm young, cool, and charming. You'll get perks of the "sugar dating" life but with someone you don't have to be ashamed about.

Now, you could call me a cuck for adding that last bit in–but you must realize that these girls are ruthless. I didn't want to lose girls who would be down for sex with me–but truly needed the cash. Would you ever consider being in an LTR with a girl you found on a site like this? Probably not.

Most men on these sites are paying women simply for their time, not their vaginas. So no, I really didn't care if a girl I was dating off the site had an older gentlemen who paid her $500 a week to have dinner with him.

5. Messaging

Here is where you must keep a key game lesson in mind: when you are already high value, you do not need to overgame!

Remember that these girls think you are a millionaire. They expect you to be busy, aggressive, and to not waste time. Millionaires don't have time to waste playing endless text games with girls.

Something as simple as, "Hey, your profile intrigued me. If the interest is mutual send me a message back with your number and ask me anything you'd like to know about me."

This message consistently got me a 50% response rate with their number. Some of them needed another message or two to give it out.

Confident, straight to the point, and best of all–cuts through all the bullshit. If she's interested, you've got a new lead and potential date and bang. If she's not interested, she's simply not going to respond. An often-overlooked aspect of game is just filtering through all the white noise. This messages completely filters girls into the yes or no category.

Once you've got her number, keep on the same path.

There is no need to spike attraction or do anything too much over text. Banter for a bit and ask her out. Keep it simple. "Let's meet for a quick drink for an hour and see if we click."

Your perceived status plus your "normalness" (most men on this site are old and weird, remember) will result in her not being able to say YES fast enough.

6. The Date Itself

Here's where it gets tricky, but as long as you've set the frame up appropriately from the start (the disclaimer in your profile, and not mentioning money over text), you should be good.

Simply treat it as a normal date and escalate as per usual. Don't take her to a fancy restaurant or let her order food–drinks in a classy lounge are enough. You should expect to pay for those drinks.

Under no circumstances should you pay her actual money. I don't think there needs to be any discussion about that. Sugar dating is really just legal prostitution. These girls will hamster it to themselves, but you needn't do that too.

If it gets to a point where she is really pressuring you for money, or is giving off strong gold digger vibes–simply walk away. When you're experienced with game and have a high abundance mentality from being on a site like that, it's easy to walk away.

There are plenty more fish in the sea.

7. Conclusion

I heard so many stories from girls.

There was the one who was paid $3,000 a month to go out to dinner once a week and hold hands with a guy.

There was the other who was paid $500 an "outing", which mostly consisted of riding around town in his Ferrari–until he crashed it.

There are so many girls on these sites, but not enough men with game to satisfy them. Sure, these girls are looking for money, but deep down they're all rooted in the same biologically. They will respond to game and charm. If you give them this, there is no telling the possibilities that they will go to keep you around.

You certainly shouldn't go wife hunting on Seeking Arrangement, but who doesn't like a little (free) sugar from time to time?

Read More: How To Write An Online Dating Profile That Gets You Laid

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Rioters Yelling “Black Power” Burn Buildings And Target White People In Milwaukee

August 14, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Late on Saturday afternoon police in Milwaukee, Wisconsin shot an armed suspect fleeing from a car on the city’s North Side. Not long after the shooting a large group of residents initiated a confrontation with police that included at least one squad car being burned. A gas station and other autos were also torched.

> #BlackLivesMatter rioters target whites: "They beating up all the white people." #Milwaukee pic.twitter.com/G85jnYtd3k
>
> — Paul Joseph Watson (@PrisonPlanet) August 14, 2016

The officer-involved shooting occurred at around 3:30 PM and involved two MPD officers who had stopped a car near the 3200 block of N. 44th Street. The two suspects inside fled on foot with the officers giving chase. In short order one of the suspects pointed a semi-automatic pistol at the officers and was killed, according to CBS.

In the hours after the shooting groups of residents in the mostly African-American neighborhood gathered near the crime scene and soon began taunting police officers investigating the incident.

The taunting continued for some time and then turned violent, with police cars being swarmed and pelted with bricks and rocks as a small-scale riot broke out.

Some 100 protesters engaged in a standoff with police, some of whom had responded in riot gear. As the riot grew in intensity cop cars were stoned and one set aflame.

The conflagration grew from there with other cars being set on fire. A local gas station also became engulfed in flames.

The MPD said that someone in the crowd began firing shots, perhaps in the air, according to the Milwaukee Sentinel. There have yet to be reports of anyone being hit by gunfire.

> VIDEO: Rioters chanting "black power" as gas station burns in #milwaukee pic.twitter.com/wQJ45WOocm
>
> — Tim Pool (@Timcast) August 14, 2016

Police also reported on Twitter that Milwaukee fire fighters were kept from extinguishing the flames because shots were being fired by some of the rioters.

> Gas station at Sherman and Burleigh set on fire. MFD cannot extinguish fire as gunshots are being fired.
>
> — Milwaukee Police (@MilwaukeePolice) August 14, 2016

Officials added that thus far one officer was injured by a brick thrown through the windshield of his squad car.

> MPD officer undergoing treatment at local hospital after brick thrown through squad window, striking officer in the head.
>
> — Milwaukee Police (@MilwaukeePolice) August 14, 2016

Milwaukee Police Assistant Chief Bill Jessup told the media on Saturday evening that the 23-year-old man shot earlier in the day had a lengthy police record.

Read the entire article at Breitbart

News Syndicator
This account syndicates news from other media outlets.

Why Free Speech Isn’t Free

August 14, 2016 | by Kalos Kagathos | Link | Original Link

Free Speech Isn’t Free by Roosh is the firsthand account of a live education in what freedom of speech precisely entails, how to safeguard it, and where the threats to it will be coming from and why.

There are costs when one wishes to speak freely and he describes the price of admission, the grit and the conviction required in our collective pursuit of freedom of speech and its natural corollary—freedom. We might be defamed, scandalized, and mobbed with an end towards frightening us back into submission, however through Roosh’s struggles we are provided hope that resistance is not pointless.

I can offer some preliminary words here and say that this book is an enthralling read, one that covers events that I was reading about and following in real-time last year through the Roosh V Forum and Return Of Kings. Roosh’s candor is at times unexpected, moving and enlightening; and it is always appreciated.

The points that are driven home throughout the work are correspondingly informed by the events leading up to and incorporating Roosh’s World Tour in 2015. This lecture tour (whereby Roosh attempted merely to speak to like-minded men and field their questions) actually turned out to be a life-changing experience for himself at every city he visited.

"The Idea"

In the first chapter, we see Roosh's battle with a slight speech impediment that has been with him since childhood. He describes himself as being more of a writer than a speaker. Roosh seems to imply here that before speaking freely, one should first learn how to speak properly.

He takes a Toastmaster's course to improve his public speaking and learn about the principles of creating a coherent and cohesive speech and how to deliver it in such a way that the audience is receptive to his ideas. We not only see what Roosh has learned, but we're shown what it takes to improve one's self and 'tend the fire;' a fire, that is, which burns towards an ideal of perfectibility in spite of innate shortcomings.

"Berlin"

At the first stop on his tour, Roosh is confronted with a wide variety of men in attendance. He witnesses the vastness in the range of demographics he speaks for and to—from younger men full of spunk who are mainly interested in attracting women, to older gentlemen who have had their lives turned upside down by divorce (sometimes multiple times).

Here Roosh learns that he speaks for a wider audience than he had previously imagined, and that his words may have consequences beyond some specific target he may have had in mind. Indeed, what we say while exercising our right to free speech often has an effect beyond our initial reckoning. In a touching moment of humility upon realizing the scope of his power, Roosh declares, "I vowed never to take the influence I have with these men for granted or use it in a way that leads them down the wrong path."

“London”

Here Roosh allows the media (“Vice” with Reggie Yates) into his lecture and in addition he allows a seemingly sympathetic woman to work for him as a hostess for the event. The media, it seems, would prove to be just as conniving as the hostess who later wrote a hit-piece for the Huffington Post about her experience at the lecture.

Any pretensions that the media might have towards an unbiased statement of fact or non-emotional reporting of events goes out the window with Vice’s slanted reporting here and the hostess’s unbecoming behavior during and after the lecture. Reggie and the hostess both had one thing in mind: try to make Roosh look bad. Roosh listened to the Vice’s reporter’s lies that concealed her background and the woman’s plea for a hostess gig, and he generously accepted. Their attempts to ingratiate themselves and then backstab Roosh were seemingly successful, yet Roosh is quick on the turn.

What does Roosh learn? “Don’t invite leftists who cause men to speak through a filter. It’s pointless to have a private event where men can speak freely and then bring feminists and media who put the filter right back on.” Roosh’s insight might seem facile, but what he is actually affirming is his preference for ingenuousness amongst his brothers at the cost of shunning potentially lucrative media exposure. These events foreshadow the development of Roosh’s volcanic hatred and distrust of the media, something that fully blossoms later in Montreal and Toronto.

“Washington D.C.”

After a successful speech without incident, Roosh chats with all of the attendees but most notably Jeff. Jeff “connects the dots” for Roosh on certain points that have been floating nebulously in his mind.

Roosh describes Jeff’s ideas as being the stuff of “conspiracy theories,” yet after hearing it, Roosh describes his “jaw hanging,” and states that “[Jeff] provided the missing link… Birth control, abortion, female education and employment, rape culture, sexual harassment, homosexual marriage, transsexual acceptance, open-borders immigration, welfare, and multiculturalism.”

What's the link? "Depopulation And Human Control… The one common end goal, whether accidental or deliberate, is to reduce the reproductive rate of the native-born population as a means of controlling them." The entire chapter is an exploration of this revelation and something Roosh later elaborated on here:

> The End Goal Of Western Progressivism Is Depopulation

In the end, Roosh states, "I used to seek out men who had high ability in meeting the opposite sex for the purpose of fornication, but lately I've been seeking out men for their intellectual ability in order to help me further my understanding of the world. Because of this, I have surrounded myself with some of the smartest men in the West."

Roosh is obliquely referring to his media creations, which he has learned to view as somewhat of a feedback loop (rather than megaphone) whereby information is freely shared and incorporated by commenters and contributors alike in symbiotic fashion: the students learn from the professors and vice versa.

"New York"

It's not so much what Roosh learns here that is striking, but rather his uncanny ability to explicate the nature of his appeal to Western men. Before the lecture he's asked, "What do you think are the problems for men today?" His answer:

> Men have no voice. The entire establishment is bending over to cater to the needs of women, gays, and immigrants, the latter of which don't even want to assimilate or adopt Western ideals, and now they've started pushing transsexual acceptance. Huge amounts of media air time, financial resources, university regulations, and social policies are now going to these groups… with the goal of > making [Western men] subservient to every other identity group but his own… No one has the backs of men except a few lone voices like myself, and that's shameful.

"Men have no voice." It's simple and it gets right to the heart of the matter. We feel robbed of our freedom to speak our minds and express our opinions. The leftist bullies, the violent antifas, the overzealous forum moderators and the affected fragility of feminists in the workplace all have one aim in mind—to shut down the free speech of men and thereby paralyze us into subservience or run us out to the woods. By fighting back, Roosh exemplifies a third-way.

Roosh goes on to give his prognosis of what the future has in store, a development that reflects the desperation of men who feel threatened and cornered at every turn. "What I believe will end up happening is that a more white nationalist element will take hold, because they will speak to men who are actively being disenfranchised. It becomes a matter of self-defense and self-preservation. These men are getting angry and more determined to protect their rights and their race. There will be dark times ahead." This is beautifully and tragically stated. These leftists, feminists and multiculturalists are creating the very things they presume to oppose.

"Montreal"

Here Roosh's lecture is canceled by the venue he had scheduled. Roosh later makes a powerful statement about conviction and how it bolsters the passions that make life worth living. "Some men will encounter a battle during their lifetimes where the decision to not fight will make him feel ashamed and weak for the rest of his days, and where the pain of defeat can't be worse than the shame of not fighting at all. When this battle comes, he will be ready to sacrifice everything… Before Canada, I had not encountered such a fight, but it finally arrived and I was not going to back down."

This type of conviction and willingness to sacrifice is the stuff of leaders. Roosh thus learns an important lesson about leadership: be willing to make personal sacrifices, especially for the men who follow you. For any leader, all successes of a movement rightfully belong to them as the victor and all failures belong to them too. Roosh comes to embrace the weight of this responsibility during the Battle of Montreal and he chooses to make his stand. Against overwhelming odds, he took on a hostile media establishment with politicians and feminists in tow, and he seized a great victory.

At the end of his victory speech, Roosh says:

> Here's your movement… Here are the men who sacrificed their identities to come hear a talk that was trashed by the entire establishment. Imagine if there were one million men like this in the country, men who are fearless, strong, masculine, and think for themselves. This is why the ruling class is enabling those freaks outside who wish to emasculate men, to make them weak, because weak men are not strong enough to fight and not strong enough to stand up to authority.

While accepting personal responsibility for successes and failures, any true leader worth his slat ultimately empowers the men that follow him. While I used to cringe when I read that Roosh's contributors and readers were referred to as "followers of Roosh," I think I get why now. It's because Roosh has become the spokesman, supporter, and inspiration for a movement of men who collectively pursue a life of their own choosing for themselves, their families, each other, and a future that seems at times too dim to imagine.

In the end, Roosh describes an important lesson he learned about the collusion that occurs between the various tendrils of a system when it is forced to confront the spread of an idea that is antithetical to its corrupt persistence. "I needed to see this… I got to see how the media, government, and non-profit organizations collaborate when they want to neutralize an enemy, and how they enable the foot-soldier class of students and unemployed losers to do their bidding."

"Toronto"

During his final stop on the tour, Roosh again must confront the threat of hysterical protests and a hostile media and political establishment (including a city councilman and the Toronto mayor).

After being backstabbed once again by a reporter who Roosh thought was at least somewhat sympathetic and willing to tell his side of the story, he truly earns his stripes when it comes to hating the media. It's not that he senses the affront of being lied to as most of us might, it's that he has experienced the lies being told about himself.

Hatred is born of such things and the mainstream media is now a thing of scorn for Roosh. If he ever again indulges their requests, it will most likely be to mock or berate them as he does after the 'ROK Meetup Outrage' in his D.C. press conference:

For the readers wondering what Roosh's speeches were all about on his lecture tour, he sums it up pretty well later in the chapter:

> I described the problems men were facing… I listed the sacrifices they must > make to have a good woman in their lives. I described why practicing game is so important, and how it serves as the gateway drug to greater truths. I gave seven practical tips for getting laid that took me years to learn. I told them what I believed was necessary to enjoy life. I gave them tips on what to do when they're at a down point of their lives… I had a right to give that speech and they had a right to hear it, and so it was done.

If you want to learn more, the full transcript of his lecture is included at the end of the book in addition to a number of other bonuses (viz. "Epilogue 1: The Aftermath," "Epilogue 2: The Worldwide Meetup Outrage," "Transcript 1: The State of Man Lecture," "Transcript 2: Washington, D.C. Press Conference," "Appendix 1: How To Survive An SJW Attack," "Appendix 2: What is Neomasculinity?")

At the end of the Toronto speech, Roosh and the audience are affected to the point of tears by another man's speech about how Roosh had previously helped him. Roosh comments, "A lot of people have an image of masculinity of a man killing bears with his bare hands, but for me it's becoming more about brotherhood, a form of love that a man and woman can never feel for each other. It's not based on emotional connection but mutual goals and compassion that make men feel as if they belong to the same unit—the same tribe."

He later states, "Courage is contagious." This is the nut of it all, isn't it? This is why the book is so important and perhaps why Roosh wrote it in the first place. We are inspired to become courageous after reading about Roosh's stand and our courage in turn inspires Roosh to keep going, perhaps confirming for him that his courage and victories serve a higher purpose. I wouldn't doubt that Roosh's sense of grandeur comes not from his personal victories but rather the thousands (if not millions) of victories he inspires every day within the lives of his readers. Our own sense of rising towards great things is the ultimate testament to Roosh's courage, his victories, and his life's work.

"Homeward Bound"

Pondering his tour in the end, Roosh considers that none of it was without meaning. He affirms his life's ambition and his desire to lead others towards the truth. It is this cascading sense of purpose that has driven him to write the book, "Not just as a monument to me and my supporters' victory, but to educate men on how the system is actively working to harm them. You have now experienced what I've experienced… If I am meant to accomplish something bigger in life than just getting laid and making money, Canada was the first step in finding out what that is."

To get your copy of Free Speech Isn't Free, click here for the PDF copy or click here to order directly from Amazon.

Read More: SJWs Bomb Free Speech Isn't Free With Fake Reviews Because It Hurts Their Feelings

Kalos Kagathos

Kalos is an amateur Classicist with a penchant for bodybuilding

7 Reasons Why Self-Improvement Is Not Working For You

August 15, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Self-improvement in all its manifestations has been the rage for years now, becoming a huge industry on its own. Everyone is on the race to become better, resolve their insecurities and desires, and be successful as much as they can. But because of the sheer volume of self-improvement materials out there along with all the people who approach them with the wrong idea, the whole movement has turned into just another form of consumerism. Your never-ending journey towards self-mastery must now be done with the right mindset and implementations to get the most out them.

So, if you've been spending a lot of money and time without seeing much results, check out the following reasons to see where things might have gone awry.

1. You care too much about motivation

Motivation has to be—by far—the most overrated aspect of achieving success and also the most often used excuse for lack of effort. I also notice that young people, especially, tend to whine most about motivation as they've been trained to do what they're told all their lives instead of being motivated by their own volition.

Here's a tip for beginners: forget about motivation. If you constantly monitor yourself to see how you feel before you start something, you'll never accomplish anything. You can read some blog by pathological narcissists and watch lame Youtube videos to get "fired up," but that emotional high isn't going to last long enough for you to get anywhere. Instead, the ingredients for success are: organization, discipline, and perseverance.

But if you still insist on chasing motivation, I have a piece of good news for you: you can gain motivation by taking action. Yes, sucking-up and doing the plain old hard work will motivate you more than any amount of motivational garbage you entertain yourself with. Always remember that action must come first and that it's all that matters in life.

2. You don't differentiate between interests and dedications

When people are young and dumb, they feel invincible as though they can conquer the world tomorrow. I've met my share of individuals with delusional goals who thought they could achieve it all because they've been conditioned to feel entitled to all their heart's desires. These people typically jump from one area of interest to another without sticking to it, giving up as soon as their fickle emotions fizzle out or when they realize just how much time and work is necessary to master them.

To avoid this mistake, understand that your time in this world is brief. You don't know how short your life is until you get older and the reality hits you. So, learn to differentiate between what's actually important for you to dedicate yourself to against all the things that you simply feel is important or interesting. Just because you find something cool and exciting it doesn't mean that it is something worth jumping into.

3. You want quick results

We are living in quick times. People don't want to be told that they have to work long and hard for what they want; they want easy solutions and see results NOW. Marketers know this, so they'll deliberately exaggerate potential results and promise them in a short period of time to lure customers who gladly dish out their cash. I personally thought I was too smart to fall for this trick, but I gave in more times than I want to admit.

As a counter, remind yourself that nothing worthwhile ever comes fast and easy. Quick result might be possible for the gifted few in specific circumstances, but don't aim for it. Go at your own pace and focus on the process and your efforts rather than the end goal itself; results will come in when they're ready. And this brings us to the next point.

4. You are too goal-oriented

The surest way to be unhappy.

Being goal-oriented and constantly imagining how great things would be once you realize your desire is the fastest way to demoralize yourself. This is the reason why people quit the gym after few months or give up on learning a new language or a musical instrument only after cursory effort. They see the process as something horrible that needs to be overcome to realize their dream—and that's the wrong attitude to have.

Instead of being goal-oriented, you must be process-oriented and enjoy every step of the way—your desire to learn and grow must be greater than the dream of having reached the end. To put in other words, have the goal as a guidance towards where you want to go, but don't focus your attention on it. Another method to counter this goal-oriented thinking is to break down your project into smaller steps for the little victories. This is especially useful for those who have difficulty getting "motivated."

5. You believe in bullshit

Guess which demographic is most likely to use feel good bullshit as a means of "self-improvement."

Unfortunately, there are too many junk information floating around in the self-help industry disguised as the real thing. Even popular and well-established guru like Tony Robbins and others are prone to making outlandish claims and believing in their own bullshit, leading to dozens of people with burn injuries (but I guess those people just lacked "faith" in themselves).

Here are some rule of thumb to screen self-help material that is most likely bogus:

- It focuses too much on your feelings, self-esteem, and positivity (there are actually studies that reveal how people who are grumpy and pessimistic end up being more successful in many areas of life).

- It tells you to lie to yourself until you believe it (i.e. “affirmations” like the one you see in the above picture).
- It uses a lot of unscientific information and concepts.
- It emphasizes mental masturbation over taking action by facing up to challenges.
- It makes outlandish promises and tries too hard to sell you.

If anything, just remember that if it sounds like bullshit, it probably is.

6. You read too much and do too little

The elephant in the room regarding the self-help industry is that far too many people are buying and reading self-help materials without actually applying them in life. These people read the books and blogs the same way they do with novels: as mental stimulation. They jump from one book to another hoping that all the information they absorb will magically permeate into their lives while they barely (if at all) take any action to make things happen.

Your knowledge means nothing without action. It’s far better to read ten books and dedicate yourself to applying the knowledge to your life than to read 100 books and do nothing except fooling yourself into thinking that you’re wise and all-knowing. To pick the right materials, choose ones that help you organize your life and offer you practical ideas and guidance that you can follow through. It’s much better than going through materials that merely try to hype you up with emotions.

But above all, the best way to learn is through trial and error. The great men of past didn’t need any self-help mumbo-jumbo to achieve glory. Know that it is folly to overload yourself with information in hopes that you won’t ever make mistakes or experience failure. Mistakes and failures are process of learning. This is not to say that you should reject preparation: be prepared as much as necessary, but just not to a point where it impedes your ability to get started. I think a good ratio of time spent reading to doing is 20:80. If you happen to read more than you are doing, then you definitely need to get out more.

7. You have misguided goals

If you're still having great difficulty achieving the goals you set for yourself and being satisfied with them, you should probably ask yourself why you wanted them in the first place. Why do you want more money, more sex, more strength, more knowledge, more travels, or more status? What is the core motivation behind your desire? Is this something you truly want for yourself or is it something that you've come to believe is important because the society told you so for years? Do you want to achieve greatness for petty and superficial reasons or to actualize your strive to assert who you are in this world? Are you being idealistic or practical?

Once you get your motives straightened out, it just might be possible for everything else to click in place and set you in motion. Sometimes, a burning purpose above all other mortal desires is all that a man needs in this world.

Read More: Self-Improvement Is Not Just For Young Guys

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Ugly Minority Girls Are Winning Beauty Pageants To Satisfy The Diversity Agenda

August 15, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Toxic SJW notions of "beauty" (think awful role model and alleged scammer Tess Munster) are well-known. Sadly, it appears that the need to appease certain groups has now filtered down to giving beauty pageant titles to girls based on their race or ethnicity. Two recent "winners" of state-based national beauty pageants, Magnolia Maymuru (Miss World, Northern Territory, Australia) and Arianna Quan (Miss America, Michigan), are so unbelievably plain and even ugly that the "beauty" in beauty pageant should have been removed from the contests they each entered.

In the case of Quan, the biggest criticisms came from her ancestral homeland of China. Chinese netizens need not fear the kind of racism accusations that would be leveled at white Americans questioning whether she deserved the Miss America title for one of America's most populous states (Miss America's national event will be in September).

Media coverage of Maymuru's crowning was ecstatic, namely because, in the words of many racial quota-leaning commenters, "it was about time" that an Aboriginal Australian won such a title. Few online respondents dared to call her unattractive due to the near certainty of them being labeled as racist bigots. She eventually placed in the top 10 for the Miss World Australia final, "beating" much more attractive competition.

Here's a picture of Miss Michigan Arianna Quan, who became the topic of a Roosh V Forum thread, after her victory:

And here’s another shot of Miss World, Northern Territory Maymuru, whose other photo features as the main image for this article:

On the street, neither of these girls is going to turn heads. Another test, whether women would want to look like them or straight men would want them, would also result in very few takers.

Perceptions about female attractiveness may vary, but Maymuru and Quan’s wins are ridiculous

Fashion model Molly Bair is far from my ideal girl, but she fits the bill of worthy beauty pageant winner far better than either Magnolia Maymuru or Arianna Quan.

I, probably like you, have long noticed a moderate looks discrepancy between glamor models and general fashion models. With the exception of, say, Victoria's Secret girls, who look a lot more like their glamor or bikini counterparts, the attractiveness of fashion models seems to be somewhat lower or more elusive. Scouts seem to be more preoccupied with a "unique" look, rather than conventional attractiveness, for fashion models compared to other models.

All that aside, there comes a point at which certain agendas of the political, racial and ethnic variety try to determine who wins what. Magnolia Maymuru's "triumph," for example, resulted in a media that could not contain its delight about someone of a certain race winning a beauty pageant title. With all the fanfare regarding her minority status, it is hard to see how she won on merit. Shouldn't a win like this speak for itself if it is deserved? In the end, what SJWs say should be treated as a normal thing is actually treated completely very abnormally, as if to justify it. The exact same thing happened with the laudatory coverage of Tess Munster for being "fat and beautiful."

When real "beautiful women" win pageants, journalists do not usually feel the need to reiterate how dazzling the girl is. Maymuru's winning of the Miss World, Northern Territory title resulted in tabloid soliloquy after soliloquy. Just in case you did not already know, she's beautiful! Miss World's mantra "beauty with a purpose" is meant to soften criticism about the looks of a winning state, national or international entrant, pointing to, say, their charitable or community involvement. But is it a beauty pageant or not? If the answer is yes, attractiveness is the overriding factor.

As for Quan, her academic major, Transportation Design, immediately raises suspicion. Is her win just a nod to “women in science or engineering”? Furthermore, being the great state of Michigan, surely there could have been at least 20,000 (or more) very decent-looking Asian-American girls capable of plausibly winning a beauty pageant like this. If Quan can win, no wonder many hot girls do not even enter these contests.

Who did they beat to win?

Two Northern Territory models selected for the top 100 of a recent series of Australia’s Next Top Model (source: NT News). Though not sex symbols, they are much better-looking than Magnolia Maymuru.

Quan’s competitors in Michigan were not the biggest stunners to ever grace a beauty pageant, yet almost all of them markedly or substantial outdo her in physical attractiveness. Maymuru’s fellow Miss World, Northern Territory entrants have been harder to track down. But, in addition to the sisters in the picture above, here are just two of the Northern Territory girls who have featured in the top 100 or better in an edition of Australia’s Next Top Model:

The redhead on the far right.

What exactly were the Miss World, Northern Territory judges thinking this year?

“Fat is beautiful” is only the tip of the iceberg

Trigger warning.

Eat your heart out, Tess Munster. New girls have arrived at the “beautiful because we say so” party. After obesity apologia comes race apologia (one which conveniently ignores the very attractive minority girls out there). Soon physical beauty will be a product of one’s political beliefs. In fact, celebration of the ugly has long been an integral element of feminists trying to first rationalize and then redirect their boiling self-hatred.

Despite its culture-poisoning effects, at least the world of celebrities in large part continues to allow people, especially men, to reward truly good-looking women with attention. Beauty pageants are clearly falling into the abyss, strangled by their own need to call someone beautiful based on the color of their skin, their university major, or some other unrelated, even farcical factor.

Read More: 35 Pretty Girls Who Became Fat And Ugly

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Should There Be Laws Against Platform Businesses Like Airbnb, Fiverr, and Uber?

August 15, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

"Platform businesses" have been all the rage for years now. The general idea of a platform business is that it provides an opportunity for a buyer and a seller to meet and perform a transaction. Airbnb, Fiverr, and Uber are examples of such businesses.

On the one hand, platform businesses have been a godsend to people by making all sorts of services easily accessible at very low cost. But this benefit comes with a hidden cost, as all such things do. Critics have noted that quality can be eroded, performance standards undermined, and accountability and safety often ignored.

Take the example of Airbnb. I'm very grateful for this business, as it allows me to stay where I want in nearly any city around the world. I don't have to deal with the high prices and often restrictive policies of hotels. But there are some downsides, as I was recently made aware by reading a recent BBC article.

The basic problem, as the article notes, is that Airbnb hosts have realized that they can make a great deal of money in a very short amount of time by renting out extra rooms or even whole houses to visitors. That may sound fine in theory, but in practice it creates problems: everyone wants a piece of the action, and this means that everyone wants to get into the short-term room rental game. When that happens, the overall supply of houses for sale or long-term lease goes down, and this means that costs go up.

Locals may suddenly get a notice from their landlord that they plan to convert their space to an Airbnb room. It's simple economics: landlords have realized that they can make far more by renting short-term than by keeping a space occupied year-round with a local resident. In many cases, an Airbnb host can make more money in a few days than in an entire month if the space is under a long-term lease.

It may sound reasonable, but the problem is that some cities have housing shortages, and that means costs can skyrocket when someone is forced to look for another place to live. Sometimes, the landlord will simply raise the rent on a long-term tenant, as a way to take advantage of the increased number of options he may have. Renting is not always the panacea that it's made out to be. Owning your own property has its merits, too. We would do well to remember this.

Berlin seems to have taken the lead in dealing with the realities of the new situation. Beginning on May 1 of this year, a new law called the Zweckentfremdungsverbot came into effect. It prevents owners from renting out entire houses; only individual rooms can be rented. The law also imposes a major fine for violations (up to 100,000 euros).

Critics, of course, will point to two arguments: (1) the new law is an indirect way to help the hotel industry; and (2) the government should not interfere in allegedly "natural" economic processes. That may sound fine in theory, but it is doubtful to be a sentiment shared by locals who are furious to be facing steadily mounting rents costs. Hotels also hate Airbnb for the simple reason that it has seriously cut into its profits. For decades—perhaps centuries—hotels were the only option available for most people who traveled. Now there are other options.

The same argument has been made in support of the platform business Uber. Some say that it is the natural outgrowth of the laws of supply and demand, and that no regulation should interfere with its workings. Taxi drivers who may have spent significant amounts of money and time to get licenses see the situation quite differently, of course. They point to the fact that Uber is a way for a few people to get rich while impoverishing a legitimate trade (the taxi service).

As I said earlier, I am a frequent user of Airbnb and have no plans to stop using it. I actually began using it only in response to hotel policies I thought were demeaning and inappropriate.

For example, some hotels I have stayed at felt the need to mandate restrictive policies on female guests that came to visit guests. In order to protect guests “safety,” these hotels argued, they needed to have female visitors sign in at the front desk, and would prevent them from staying overnight. I found these policies to be insulting and unnecessary.

Airbnb is driving up rents in many cities

Platform businesses are here to stay, like it or not. Every profession will be affected, whether you are an accountant, doctor, lawyer, banker, or whatever. With regard to Airbnb, the projections are that it will be doing over half a billion nightly bookings by 2020.

No one expects Uber or Fiverr to be going anywhere any time soon, despite the grumbling coming from some quarters. The reality is that we all have to adapt to the new landscape. No one who gets into an Uber vehicle feels guilty about hurting taxi drivers: cost trumps concern.

In the same way, no one who uses Fiverr to perform some service wrings his hands over the fact that he might be denying business to someone in his city. Even if he does think this way, the regret quickly vanishes once he realizes his cost savings.

All of us should be thinking about how these changes in the economic landscape will affect our employment and living situation. Adapting to the new changed landscape will mean the difference between survival and economic failure.

Read More: 5 Half-Truths Women Regularly Tell Their Significant Others

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

4 More Half-Truths Women Regularly Tell Their Significant Others

August 16, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Last week I wrote the prequel to this column. I rarely look at comments from articles I write but every once in a while I'll peruse a bit to see if our readers can offer additional ideas, anecdotal or otherwise.

As usual, our readers came through and pointed out a few half-truths I'd forgotten about as I hadn't heard them in a while (or I just tuned her out after she tripped my bullshit-o-meter). The format will be the same as last week's but this time around I'll add my own stories as they apply.

4. "I was raped"

What she's trying to convey: That a man forced himself on her and had sex with her against her will.

What it likely means: She got buyer's remorse the morning after a hook up.

Escape technique: You find out she dated the dude she accused of rape…after the alleged rape:

You: "Wait a minute, didn't that guy rape you?"

Her: "Well, yeah but I was drunk and couldn't consent so legally that's rape."

Follow up question: "How much jail time did he get?"

[image]
"…and when I woke up and saw I was taller than him, I realized I had been raped."

This question puts her on the spot and immediately forces her to start giving details. If the man who allegedly raped her didn't get any jail time, she'll have to explain why he didn't which opens up a can of worms she'll wish had stayed shut.

This is a no-win situation for females if the words "I was raped" comes out of her mouth. If she's lying, she's radioactive meaning get the hell out of there asap. If she's not, she's damaged beyond repair meaning get the hell out of there asap.

3. "I was with a friend"

Hey, fuck friends count as friends too……right?

What she wants to convey: That she was with a female friend, meaning nothing (hetero) sexual occurred.

What it likely means: She was at her fuck buddy's place getting banged out.

Escape technique: You find out she was with a guy, and not her girlfriend on the night in question.

You: "You said you were with a friend!"

Her: "He is my friend. But one thing lead to another and it just happened."

Follow up question: "Which friends?"

This simple query forces her to either lie, or come clean. Since we know she's not coming clean (if your frame and game are both extremely weak) she's probably going to give you more detail than necessary to convince you she's telling you the truth. She'll give you exact prices of drinks, colors of outfits, exact times, and a slew of other particulars in her attempt to kill a fly with a sledge hammer.

It's also good to pay attention to other stories involving her "friends." She'll purposely avoid identifying the sex of her company saying things like "They came and got me" or "I'm gonna hang out with them again." Carla did this routinely and even as a blind beta, I knew she was talking about another man.

The bottom line is that if your girl tells you she's with friends without identifying them by name or sex, chances are, she was with someone she wasn't supposed to be with (read: another dude).

2. "I was a late bloomer"

"I grew my boobs late so I was a virgin for like 3 decades!"

What she wants to convey: That she was an "ugly ducking" so she got a late start on the carousel meaning her notch count is much lower than "all those other sluts."

What it likely means: She was an ugly duckling. But when she turned into a swan she opened her legs for as many men as she could to keep validating to her sexuality to herself and others.

Escape technique: After about the 40th "hilarious hookup story" she's regales you with….

You: "You've hooked up with a lotta dudes. I thought you were late bloomer."

Her: :::laughing::: "Oh I was but I've made up for lost time!"

Follow up question: "So you didn't have sex until you were 22 because you were ugly?"

Similar to the follow up question when she claims she was in an "open relationship," you've badly sharp angled her. She can't tell you she didn't lose her virginity until she was 22 because she'll think that you think something is wrong with her if men didn't want to sleep with her until then (typical inverse projection) but she can't tell you she's a raging slut either.

She'll attempt to tell you a story that puts her directly in the middle, but again, if you're wearing your neomasculine spectacles you'll see right through her lies.

Personal anecdote: An older woman with huge tits tried to drop this on me a few months back. Apparently she didn't become as well endowed as she is today until after she turned 30 (which I didn't completely believe either). Here's how the conversation went:

Her: "I was a late bloomer."

Me: “And?”

Her: :::giggling::: “And what?”

She’s giggling because she knows I don’t buy the story she’s trying to cover up which lies just beneath the surface.

Me: ::sarcastically::: “So because you had small tits for 30 years you must have lived in a convent, is that it?”

Her: :::laughing::: “No…I…”

I interrupt her

Me: “Look…just because you didn’t grow boobs until you were 30 doesn’t mean you were a nun. We both know you were doing what everybody else was doing.”

Her: :::still laughing::: “Damn you’re harsh!”

Which is code for “Damn, you saw right through my feeble attempt at making you think my notch count was low!”

Nice rack or not, most girls hop on the carousel at some point regardless of their aesthetic beauty. We as men need to understand that just because there are no fat ugly studs, that there are no fat ugly sluts…and there are plenty waddling around. And if ugly, fat chicks can be sluts, then any female can. Including “late bloomers.”

1. “He kicked me out”

What she’s trying to convey: That her evil boyfriend or husband came home one day and decided he didn’t want her in his house anymore and kicked her out without cause.

What likely happened: She cheated on him and didn’t stop so he finally kicked her out after he had enough.

Escape technique: You find out why she got kicked to the curb after a friend of hers tells you the real story.

You: “You got kicked out because you were sleeping with so-in-so. You lied to me!”

Her: “I told you he kicked me out. That was the truth.”

Follow up question: “Why?”

This forces her to fabricate a long and drawn out story that paints her ex as an evil sadist from the very start of the relationship. Even men who are still plugged in to the matrix know there are two sides to every story. But he doesn’t press her on the facts because he’s afraid to foul up his chances of sleeping with her.

Personal anecdote: A while back I wrote about the experience that finally taught me once and for all that saving women never lead to having sex with them. I didn’t get the whole story until someone else filled me in:

> According to her sister, the father of Carla’s youngest son (whom she had custody of) had been released from prison a few months back and she’d started fucking him behind her live-in boyfriend’s back. Her boyfriend got wind of it and told her to end it. Carla said she did but kept fucking the baby daddy anyway, and when her boyfriend learned she hadn’t kept her promise he finally kicked her out.

Dudes don’t kick women out for no reason. In fact, most women get away with all kinds of shenanigans and still manage to have a roof over their heads. So when a man actually has the balls to put a female out of his domicile, you can bet your ass he had a damn good reason.

Conclusion

As I stated in the first installment, there are many more half-truths females tell their significant others. The bottom line is that you must always assume that what a woman is telling you isn’t the whole story. Believe everything she says as the gospel truth at your peril.

Read More: 5 Half-Truths Women Regularly Tell Their Significant Others

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

How American Airports Are Used To Indoctrinate The Masses

August 16, 2016 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

CNN is currently in 47 airports throughout the United States (in gate and boarding areas). This means that many travelers–from Atlanta to New York—are bombarded with a left-wing narrative. Looking to get away? Too bad. You'll be forced to watch the media's propaganda in the boarding area. Thanks to CNN, the US airport is now an indoctrination facility that's designed to keep travelers in a state of despair.

The CNN Airport Operations Center in Atlanta–the epicenter of airport propaganda.

I've traveled to over 75 countries. In all those airports, I've never seen the news on a television. Moreover, many international airports don't even have televisions. This occurrence is, unfortunately, now an American disease. These televisions are like left-wing leashes; no matter where you go, you're always "there"—in the control room of CNN, being targeted by their provocateurs.

As it turns out, CNN pays for the placement. In Philadelphia, for example, they pay the airport $90,000 a year. Good luck trying to change the channel. Gate agents don't have a remote control, and the sound is controlled by CNN from a remote location.

Where do we begin with this travesty?

CNN Has A Blatant Liberal Bias

The fact that CNN has a liberal bias should come as no surprise. The amount of commentary on this has been numerous, with members of CNN admitting as much:

- CNN's Zucker Admits Network Is 'Too Liberal'
- CNN Admits Liberal Bias Against Israel
- CNN Journalist Criticizes Liberal Media Bias in Jana Winter Case

Broadcasting CNN shows a blatant disregard for conservative travelers. You don't agree with our perspective? Who cares! Sit in the boarding area, shut up, and listen to our divisive narrative. Ever heard of "The customer is always right"? Well, that doesn't apply in American airports.

If you're conservative traveler, you'll be exposed to left-wing journalism against your will. On that level, the airport has become like many other American institutions: colleges, human resource departments, etc. Left-wing leaders abuse their positions of authority by forcing their narratives on the audience.

Have a great time in Cancun! But before you go, let us mock your traditional values.

And for the record, I would say the same thing if Fox was being played. People have the right—liberal or conservative—to have their personal views honored in the public arena. They came to catch a flight, not to hear partisan politics.

What Can We Do About It?

This is a huge problem and a solution is not easy. However, if we look at the SJW playbook, we see how effective organized complaints can be. Therefore, I think that voicing our displeasure is a good start. I welcome other suggestions in the comment section, since our readers might have some excellent advice. At any rate, here is some helpful information to get the ball rolling:

Step 1: Contact CNN's Airport Network and lodge a complaint. Their email is : Use a burner email if you don't want your real name attached to it.

Step 2: Lodge a complaint with your local airport, or the airports you frequently use. I've included a list below of airports that currently televise CNN (basically, this includes most of the major US airports). I've also included their customer service emails, or links to contact pages. I encourage you to contact them, express your displeasure, and state that you will be voicing your complaints across a variety of social media platforms.

1. Albany International: http://www.airport-albany.com/ContactUs.cfm
2. Anchorage International: http://www.dot.state.ak.us/anc/commentForm.shtml
3. Atlanta Dekalb-Peachtree: http://web.co.dekalb.ga.us/pdkairport/contact_us.asp
4. Atlanta Hartsfield-Jackson International: http://www.atlanta-airport.com/contactus.aspx?to=cs
5. Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall:
6. Boston Logan International: https://www.massport.com/about-massport/contact-us/
7. Chicago Midway:
8. Chicago O'Hare International:
9. Cincinnati/Northern Kentucky International: http://www.cvgairport.com/about/contact
10. Dallas/Ft. Worth International: .
11. Dayton International: http://www.flydayton.com/contact-us/
12. Detroit Metro Wayne County International: http://www.metroairport.com/ContactUs.aspx
13. Houston Bush Intercontinental: http://www.airport-houston.com/
14. Houston William P. Hobby: http://www.fly2houston.com/contact/
15. Huntsville Madison County: http://www.flyhuntsville.com/contact-us/#.V7CbwJgrKhc
16. Jacksonville International: http://www.flyjacksonville.com/ContactUs.aspx?sMP=JIA
17. Kansas City International: http://www.flykci.com/contact-info/contact-us/
18. Ketchikan International Airport: http://www.borough.ketchikan.ak.us/Directory.aspx?did=4
19. Knoxville McGhee Tyson Airport:
20. Los Angeles Ontario International: http://www.lawa.org/commentsLAWA.aspx
21. Memphis International: http://www.flymemphis.com/contact
22. Miami International:
23. Minneapolis/St. Paul International: https://www.mspairport.com/contact-us.aspx
24. Myrtle Beach International: http://www.flymyrtlebeach.com/contacts/
25. Nashville International: https://www.flynashville.com/contact/Pages/commentsandquestions.aspx
26. New York John F. Kennedy International: http://www.panynj.gov/contact/contact-us.html#cAirports
27. New York LaGuardia Airport:

28. New York Islip MacArthur: www.mcarthurairport.com
29. Newark Liberty International: http://www.panynj.gov/contact/contact-us.html#cAirports
30. Oakland International: http://www.oaklandairport.com/contact-us/
31. Orlando International: https://orlandoairports.net/contact/
32. Pensacola Gulf Coast Regional: www.flypensacola.com
33. Philadelphia International:
34. Phoenix Sky Harbor International: http://comments.skyharbor.com/hc/en-us/requests/new?ticket_form_id=14449
35. Sacramento International: http://sacramento.aero/smf/contact/
36. Saint Louis Lambert International: http://flystl.com/AboutLambert/CustomerService/ContactUs.aspx
37. Salt Lake City International:
38. San Diego International: http://www.san.org/Travel-Info/Contact-Us
39. San Francisco International: http://www.flysfo.com/contact-sfo
40. San Jose International:
41. Savannah Hilton Head International: http://savannahairport.com/contact
42. Seattle -Tacoma International: https://www.portseattle.org/About/Contact/Pages/Contact-Sea-Tac.aspx
43. Spokane International Airport:
44. Tallahassee Regional:
45. Washington Dulles International: http://www.flydulles.com/iad/comments-dulles-international-airport
46. Washington Reagan National: http://www.flyreagan.com/dca/comments-reagan-national-airport

Conclusion

CNN alleges that most people love their programming in the airport. According to their Airport Network website, "90% of viewers feel CNN Airport Network enhances the airport environment." They add that, "82% of viewers say watching CNN Airport Network makes the time spent at the airport more worthwhile." I find these statistics very hard to believe. Moreover, it makes me question the validity of their polling—keep this in mind for the current election, when they tell you in October that Hillary is winning by 27%.

Some people might argue, "Why not just ignore the news?" That might sound logical on the surface. However, remember that a thousand little strokes can fell a great oak. Cultural decay does not happen overnight; it's done with consistent attacks on the edifice of a country. One day, the edifice crumbles to the floor and the pedestrians ask, "I wonder how that happened?"

CNN's intrusion into the American airport system is unacceptable. And honestly, I don't know if we can change the growing tradition. But I do know that if the tradition continues, America will continue to circle the drain.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Two Feminist Sluts Indoctrinate America

Brian Logan

Brian Logan is a writer that spends more than half of the year traveling abroad. He believes in self-improvement via hard work, reason, and creativity. And oh yeah, he has a thing for hot Latinas that know how to cook.

How I Launch My Books For Amazon And Direct Sales

August 16, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I want to share my strategy for book launches to help fellow indie authors. While no book launch is the same, what I'm about to explain applies to my most recent book launch for Free Speech Isn't Free.

Understand which audience you're marketing the book to

I segment audiences for my book into four groups:

- Those who know me and think the book is relevant to their interests
- Those who know me and think the book is not relevant to their interests
- Those who don't know me and think the book is relevant to their interests
- Those who don't know me and think the book is not relevant to their interests

For book launches, I mainly focus on the first group with slight targeting on the second group. After the book launch, I can target the second group by highlighting reviews or excerpts that make them realize the book is indeed relevant to their needs. I do not target the third or fourth group. This would require SEO work for the book's keywords, advertising on Google or Facebook, or working with affiliate marketers to sell the book for a commission. I see that as an entirely different set of business skills.

Create pre-launch buzz

Before your book launches, put it in the news by sharing what it's about while allowing readers to shape the final product. I asked my readership for help on a title and also had them vote on the cover. The title and cover I ended up going with was heavily influenced by their opinions, so not only was doing that a way to let them know a book was coming, but it improved the final result.

Next, be generous with giving review copies to bloggers and readers. Share their reviews with everyone on your blog and social networking accounts.

Add bonuses or discounts to sweeten the deal

A new book is coming out… so what? Why should someone dive into reading something new without waiting to more carefully evaluate if it's a quality work or not? Personally, I see no need to buy a new book when it's released, because it's not like the book is going to be taken off the shelves. But if you give me bonuses or a discount with a deadline attached then that may light a fire under my ass to buy it sooner than I had planned.

For Free Speech Isn't Free, I included two written bonuses and a 30% discount. Some readers will buy because of the bonuses and others who are more budget conscious will buy because of the discount. You should include both in your launch.

I have experimented with both 3-day and 7-day launches. It's clear that 7-day launches will improve sales, but it takes far more work since you need to keep pumping out book-related content and sales messages for longer.

"Spam" your audience with news of the book

I hate to use the word spam but that's what it felt like from my perspective. I put out multiple posts here and on ROK, mostly highlighting reviews or aspects of the book. I sent countless mailings to my email list. I made dozens of tweets. I added page alerts, modified sidebars, and sent messages to forum members. I structured the promotions so that it would be impossible for a reader of mine to not know that I have a new book out.

It's important to understand that not all of your readers come to your blog or Twitter every day. Most of them are casual readers who only stop in every now and then, so you must use every available channel to bombard them with the news, right up to the point where they get sick of it (you don't want to piss them off).

In spite of my relentless promotions, I didn't receive one complaint, so I probably could have done more (my Youtube efforts were especially weak, with only one video published). Readers understand that you're trying to make a splash with your new product, and will give you a pass as long as it doesn't last too long.

Since most of my launch efforts involved promoting the book to readers who are interested in the topic and story, I didn't "sell" it with marketing language. The reason is that I'm not particularly skilled or interested in "internet marketing," especially if it's not a self-improvement work like a game book, which lends more to that style of marketing.

Ask for (genuine) reviews

You will get a lot of feedback from people who read the book. Since their feedback is already a written "review," ask them politely to leave it on Amazon or whatever platform your book is selling on. For me this was essential because SJWs bombed the book with fake reviews.

If you're selling on Amazon, the goal is to give your book a big sales push so that it's listed in the "Customers also bought" section of others books that have high sales ranks. Otherwise, you'll see very little benefit of being on Amazon's platform.

I also sell books directly through BangGuides.com. I receive a higher percentage of the sale price, don't need to worry about fake reviews, and can offer combo specials that greatly increase the transaction price while giving large discounts to readers. For example, I would have to sell 10 books on Amazon to make the same as roughly 1 USB card that I sell directly. If your business credibility is high, like mine is, it won't be difficult to sell higher priced products.

After the launch

Some books sell at higher levels post-launch and others do worse. For example, sales of my books like Poosy Paradise and Why Can't I Leave A Smiley Face? didn't maintain high levels after launch, while Bang and Day Bang surpassed launch sales. You will need to hope that your book goes "viral," and one way to help that along is to continually plug your book in related articles or videos you publish in the months ahead. From this point on, whenever I write a culture war article, I will plug Free Speech Isn't Free at the end.

So that's my general strategy. As long as you have a readership, no matter what size, you can participate in a launch. Simply identify all the channels where your readers congregate to receive your content and then go through the above steps. The more readers you have, of course, the more books you will sell. My launch of Bang in 2007 resulted in less than 100 copies sold while my newest launch was over 1,100. I expect future launches to equally well as long as I continue to give great value to those who follow my work.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read Next: 18 Self-Publishing Tips That Have Helped Me Sell Over 25,000 Books

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Beginner’s Guide To Cutting And Bulking

August 16, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

“Bulking” and “cutting” are terms that a lot of burgeoning fitness enthusiasts (and let’s be honest, the people interested in these terms are almost always men) will hear in their research, but will often be clueless as to what they actually mean; their understanding will be a rough one of “rapidly gaining and losing weight for some reason.” This article will explain why bulking and cutting are done, the different types of bulking, and the results of doing all of this.

Why Bulk?

Bulking is defined as deliberately packing on poundage with the intention of simultaneously stimulating muscular development through exercise, with the end goal of later slimming down and having larger and more impressive muscular definition. Cutting is the previously mentioned act of slimming down for purposes of having a trimmer physique.

The reason that this works is a simple one: Should you want to build muscle, you do so in the same way you build a fire—the more wood you put on the fire, the bigger the fire will be. Similarly, having a surplus of calories and various nutrients (proteins, amino acids, vitamins, fatty acids, etc.) will create bigger muscles. Or, to use the proper term, will keep the muscles in a state of anabolism, literally metabolic functions of creating large molecules from small molecules—most notably the formation of protein strands from amino acids.

From Wikipedia: “The surplus of calories relative to one’s energy balance will ensure that muscles remain in a state of anabolism.”

While eating a nutritional surplus will create an optimal internal environment for building muscle, it will by definition also be an optimal environment for increasing the size of adipose tissue as well-in short, an optimal environment for putting on fat. This is why Olympic weightlifters and strongmen tend to be fairly rotund, despite clearly having muscle underneath their flab.

In addition to this, extra fat tissue will also serve as a sort of cushioning for the joints that will have to bear the enormous weight brunted by an Olympic-class weightlifter, another specific benefit of having more fat on your body-and one of the few benefits of having an excess of fat (the negatives are well-documented, and don’t need to be discussed here).

Dirty And Clean Bulking

Now that we have established that bulking is simply eating more than you usually would to pack on pounds of both muscle and fat, we can further subdivide this broad concept into “dirty” and “clean” bulking, in increasing order of complexity.

Dirty bulking is, as is probably implied, the act of eating as much as you can without any pre-planning or portioning of nutrients. This is the easiest type of bulking to achieve-just increase your portions of food. Ideally, you would largely be eating food with actual nutritional value (ie: the “Dont Eat Shit” diet) rather than just eating cake and fast food-such food tends to give one the runs, which kind of defeats the purpose of eating more calories. However, in a dirty bulk you can make some concessions for desert after eating proper food.

A clean bulk is, in contrast, one where every calorie, vitamin, and gram of protein is deliberately calculated for maximum effectiveness—i.e., how to put on the most amount of muscle while putting on the least amount of fat to make the eventual cutting easier. While it is easier to describe when comparing it to the dirty bulk, the clean bulk is much more complicated.

If you’re going to be doing a bulk at all, I would recommend what I like to call the “half dirty half clean bulk” for beginners—as implied above, this is increasing your caloric intake without deliberation and planning but still eating halfway decent food (i.e., no fast food, junk food, etc.)

How To Bulk

As mentioned before, the dirty bulk is a fairly simple process: Just look at your daily intake of food, and increase it to whatever degree you’re comfortable doing. I would recommend eating all of the proper nutrients you should have learned in grade school, just more of them-to cite a few examples, you could have a couple more eggs and strips of bacon in the morning, some more meat and cheese in your lunch sandwich, a second hamburger or porkchop for dinner, and all the fixings on the side (don’t neglect vegetables and starches like rice either). If you’re still hurting for extra calories, try a protein shake with milk and oatmeal and yogurt in addition to the meals. Or have some snacks in between meals.

While you’re eating these extra nutrients, continue to work out strenuously. You will likely notice that your lifting is stronger than it was before. That’s the anabolism mentioned above in action. You will be building muscle at this point to a greater degree than you were before, but you will likely not be able to see it due to your also gaining fat.

It is worth pointing out that a person in the midst of a proper bulk is certainly fat, but more in the sense of “burly” rather than the standard type of fat. It’s sort of hard to describe, but is visible to even the untrained eye:

Observe this fat guy. Clearly, he's not much of a physical specimen despite his size-his belly and waist are clearly wider than his shoulders and chest.

A Sample Bulking Diet

The bulking diet below is more or less one day on my "dirty-clean" bulk, as the foods enumerated here are more or less healthy—or at the very least, are things your great-grandfather would recognize as food. This is essentially what I ate to gain weight, with no deliberation beyond the quick and fast rule of "don't eat shit." In contrast, a dirty bulk has been described as "eat everything under the sun".

Breakfast: 6 eggs cooked in any style, 6 strips of bacon, toast and butter, piece of hand fruit, and a glass of milk. Alternatively make yourself a bowl of oatmeal in cream with all of the side fixings detailed before.

Snack: Two peanut butter and jelly sandwiches on toast, glass of milk, and perhaps some cottage cheese on the side.

Lunch: A sandwich made with a quarter pound of meat, cheese, and other ingredients (some estimation might be necessary), with a side of French Fries or brown rice. Drink fruit juice or milk for their nutrients and calories.

Protein Shake: There are many recipes that can be found, but the one I like, taken and amended from Bodybuilding.com, is: 1 cup of dry oatmeal, 2 scoops of Greek yogurt, 2 scoops of protein powder, 1 teaspoon of cinnamon, 1 tablespoon of chopped almonds, 1.5 cups of milk.

Dinner: 2 homemade cheeseburgers with whatever trimmings you'd like on buns, with a side of leafy green vegetables cooked in whatever style you desire. Once again, drink fruit juice or milk.

Snack: A bowl of nuts, a piece of cheese, or something else that has good fat content.

As you can see, there's nothing exotic or fancy about this diet, it's really what the average person would be eating in their day, just greater quantities of it. Obviously, you don’t need to eat this exact meal every day, I cite this day of eating as an example of what to do: Just take what you would have eaten anyway, and have more of it. Throughout each week you bulk, be sure to continue exercising so you build muscle in addition to fat. If you’re really serious about gaining weight, I would reduce cardio to some degree: Instead of doing cardio twice a week as I usually recommend, just do it once a week and do another day of weight training.

Cutting

You probably have already assumed what cutting is, and your assumption is correct: It’s reducing calories and shedding your blubber. And since dirty bulking was theoretically simple, so is this. Just cut your portion sizes in half-or whatever fraction you desire-while continuing to exercise at your normal rate, if not increasing your exercise. To cite a previous article of mine, you can do your formal exercise routine (running, weights, etc.) as usual, while increasing your informal rate of exercise (I will once again advocate walking to and from places as a great way to burn calories without even thinking about it).

So, a day on a cutting diet would look something like this;

Breakfast: 2 eggs, 2 pieces of bacon, 1 piece of toast. Drink fruit juice, low fat milk, or water.

Lunch: A sandwich made smaller than the bulking sandwich, drink water with it.

Snack: 1 peanut butter sandwich with water, juice, or milk, and cottage cheese on the side.

Dinner: Filet of fish in olive oil with leafy green vegetables and brown rice.

Bearing in mind that you will experience some small degree of strength loss on a cutting diet, continue exercising as normal. I kept up my schedule of 2 days of resistance training, 2 days of running, and 2 days of martial arts, while also walking to and from any place that is within a round-trip distance of 5 miles-ie: if the trip to and from the destination combined is 5 miles or less, walk there. You don’t need to walk to and from casual sex like I did in school, but it certainly couldn’t hurt!

Within a month or two, you will lose your blubber and have the trim physique you desired. The only downside to this, as mentioned above, is that you will likely not be as strong as you were while fatter, due to eating a caloric deficit.

In conclusion, cutting and bulking are not really necessary for the person who just wants to get fit, get stronger, or lose weight. However, if you desire improvement of the purely aesthetic, I’d consider a regimen of this dietary technique.

Read More: 4 Fitness Myths That Are Pure Bullshit

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

5 Tips To Raise A Strong Son

August 17, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

It’s no secret that in our hyper-feminized world, young boys are having masculinity crushed out of them at a younger and younger age.

What was once considered normal in young boys, is now being labeled as aggressive behavior. Boys who rough play and fight with toy swords are now being told that they’re violent, and they’re being shuffled to the nearest psychiatrist to give him his daily dose of pharmaceutical drugs meant to “help him.”

Boys who express their sexuality are often chastised and punished. In the 90’s this was popular in high school and college, but over the years, it’s crept down even into middle school. Boys can’t even talk to women without being considered potential rapists, and if they try to seduce a woman by being assertive and decisive, two traits necessary to doing so, they risk a false rape accusation.

Raising a child in our eerily Orwellian world, where nearly every aspect of a child’s growth is determined by the state, is a very difficult task, indeed. Several authors have hinted at this idea before, but I would like to present an additional five tips for men struggling to raise healthy, happy boys in our modern world.

1. Be Aware Of Mother-Son Time After 8 Years Of Age

Women are afraid of their young boys growing up into men, because it's a part of her nature to want to be the nurturing mother; you must do your job as a man, and monitor this connection when your boy hits the age of around 7 or 8. If boys spend too much time around their mothers well into their boyhood and teens, they do not develop into the men that they need to be.

Boys must be exposed to your masculine wisdom from this age on wards, lest they become too much of a Momma's boy. Great cultures of the past knew this; this is why most boys' initiations start around the age of 8. This is also why it is a common theme for the men of the village to literally rip away the boys from their mothers and take them on a journey into the wild.

This ripping them away from their mothers, is symbolic for the boys leaving the nurturing, warm "mother-world," and entering into the self-reliant, sometimes cold, "father world," where they will eventually become a man.

2. Expose Him To The World

This is somewhat of an extension of tip #1, because naturally the question is “what do I do once he’s 8 then?” I recommend that from the time that your boy hits the age of 8, you take him on various trips.

This doesn’t have to be anything expensive or luxurious. Simply spend time doing things with your boy. In order for the “split” from mother-world to father-world to be effective, you must be in frequent isolation with him so that he cannot run back to the comfortable mommy world.

You see this a lot when families go camping together; the men try to teach their boys how to fish, how to set up a tent, and all of these other valuable things, but due to the presence of women, the boys never fully grasp the lessons that are being passed down. As an example, I was camping a while back, and I saw a man trying to teach his boy how to skin and cook a deer that they’d caught.

Despite this man’s noble attempt to teach the boy valuable lessons about the circle of life, where food comes from, and the practical skills to survive in the wilderness, his mother ruined it all in one fell sweep: “EWW! GERALD YOU CAN’T TEACH MY BABY BOY THAT!”

He looked at her, angrily, and said that she should stop meddling in father-son affairs, but it was too late. The boy had run to his “mommy” and hugged her legs; she shielded his head with her hands, and just like that, the boy was denied entry into the masculine father-world.

Do not blame women for this; again, it’s in their nature to want to keep their baby boys in a perpetual state of boyhood. But as a man, you must recognize this when it happens, and STOP IT lest your boy grow up into a giant pussy.

Take your boy camping, take him on trips around the world so that he can see how women act in other cultures, and if you can, take him to work so that he can see what his father does when he's gone during the day.

3. Position Yourself As The Guide

"Son…bitches ain't shit, but hoes and tricks."

Too often do I see young boys running to their mothers for advice on women and life; for although their mothers have good intentions, they almost always give advice that is completely based out of emotion rather than out of reality.

"Mom, I have a crush on this girl at school…how do I get her to like me?" the young boy asks. "Oh, well sweetie, be really nice to her! Buy her flowers and chocolates, complement her on how beautiful she is, and appreciate her every day!" the mother says.

Unfortunately, advice like this is a monumental heap of bullshit, but the boy is too young to know it. He'll probably end up following his mothers' advice and come off as a completely needy, creepy weirdo. The girl will then never want to talk to him again, and he'll come to believe that there's something inherently unattractive about him.

Let's contrast this, with if the young boy asked his father for advice (assuming that his father actually has game). "Dad, I have a crush on this girl, how do I get her to like me?" asks the young, budding neo-masculine boy.

"Son," replies the neo-masculine father, "women like men who don't make them their purpose. Don't ever sacrifice who you are for a woman, and don't ever put up with her treating you like crap. She'll not only be more attracted to you if you do this, but she'll respect you more, too."

Then, the boy follows his advice, focuses on his own hobbies and passions, and ends up fucking a third of the girls in his high school class.

This is only possible if you position yourself as a guide; you must be the one who provides your son with neo-masculine wisdom if you wish to raise a neo-masculine son. Don't rely on your wife to do it, because as many have said before, women cannot raise boys into men.

Guide your son in the right direction over finances, work, and most importantly…women.

4. Encourage Him To Work Out

Looking back on my life, I can't imagine how different it would be if my father had encouraged me to start working out when I was 13 or 14. I would have been very strong by the time I was a sophomore or junior in high school, but more importantly, I would have developed discipline and strength of mind.

Working out not only develops a man's body, but it also develops a man's mind. Constantly following a routine, not only in the gym, but in what you eat, and how much you sleep, builds the foundation for real mental discipline. You cannot get to a five plate deadlift without some serious discipline in your life.

Not only will your son's increased physical strength garner him much attention from the ladies, but it will also garner him more respect from his peers. Don't buy into the feminist propaganda—men respect other men who are strong. It's in our nature to respect strength, as Jack Donovan pointed out, because without it, a man in our tribe would be literally useless.

Your son's mental strength will give the real benefits, though. His increased discipline developed in the gym will also translate into more self-respect. He'll end up getting better grades, due to a better work ethic, he'll probably want to get a part time job to get some extra money, and most importantly, he'll learn the value of putting in hard work.

I recommend that you put your son on a compound lift based routine, such as Mark

Rippetoe's Starting Strength, for several reasons. First off, it's the best way to maximize his time in the gym. Second off, when you're a beginner, you shouldn't be doing a split, because you don't have a solid foundation of muscle.

When you're a beginner, you should be doing compound exercises to build up a solid base of strength. Then, maybe when you've been working out for 1-2 years, you can switch over to a split if you want more aesthetics. And lastly, having your son do compound lifts from the time he's 14 will shoot his testosterone and growth hormone through the roof, ensuring that he develops into a tall, strong, broad man which will help him in nearly all areas of his life.

Also, as a side note, use this as an opportunity to get closer to him. Go to the gym with him and you can knock out tips #1, 3, and 4 at once. Who knows, maybe you'll even end up being that badass dad who can bench 3 plates, and your son's friends will all want to work out with you, since their fathers are probably pussies and they crave masculine guidance.

5. Don't Home School Him

A lot of men are resorting to homeschooling their children, and I totally understand this. I've written an entire article on how our school system is utter hogwash, so I understand the desire to protect your children from it. Unfortunately, however, homeschooling children often does more harm than good. It prevents them from having the opportunity to socialize with peers, learn about group dynamics, and practice game on their female classmates.

Your job as a man isn't so much to teach him facts (school will do plenty of this), but rather to instill in him a sense of logic and reasoning so that he can discern for himself whether or not his schoolteachers are correct. Instill in him a weak, but functioning bullshit detector by the time that he goes off to school, so that he can slowly, but surely, see the folly of our culture's thinking.

You can do this by extending his education outside of the home. Get him into the habit of reading from a young age. Buy him good books that talk about valor, heroism, and that kindle a fierce spirit into the young boy's heart. Teach him about great men of the past who overcame incredible odds: Andrew Carnegie, Alexander the Great, Socrates, and the Founding Fathers.

Don't just shove lessons on him, but actually understand his view point, and with a few well-thought-out questions, try to get HIM to discover why he's wrong. This is key. Nobody wants to be flat out told they're wrong. If you do this, you're a dick. Instead, try to see things from his perspective, but remain firm in your stance. Politely ask some well targeted questions that will get him thinking, and you'll have a neomasculine boy in no time.

Summary

Our children are attacked from every angle: schoolteachers crush masculinity out of them, the media discourages healthy sexual expression, and law enforcement has been siding against him ever since the day he was born. It's your job as a father to help your young boy navigate our fucked up modern world, so that he can live a happy, healthy, and functional adult life.

Teach him to work out, expose him to the great minds of the past, teach him the lessons of history, and teach him about women. Most importantly, however, spend time with him. None of this is possible without a genuine connection with your son; if he never sees you, it doesn't matter how right you are…he'll be too angry at you to accept any of your lessons.

Spend time with him, teach him the skills that he needs to live in our post-modern world, and give us all the greatest gift possible: a noble young man ready to change the world.

Read More: How to Raise A Red Pill Revolutionary

Jon Anthony
Jon Anthony is a world renowned dating coach and the founder of Masculine Development, a website specifically dedicated to helping men improve their personal, dating, and financial lives. After years of training men how to attract women, build muscle, and make more money, Jon created the 7 Strategies Program to help kickstart your journey to dating success.

Operation Eyes Wide Open: Expose Lying And Hoaxing Journalists

August 17, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Today I'm launching Operation Eyes Wide Open, a wiki project to expose lying and hoaxing journalists. Through Kings Wiki, we will create permanent pages on journalists to display their hoaxes, lies, and lack of credibility for the public record. The archive will persist beyond the end of their lives.

As you already know, media outlets are full of activists who are masquerading as journalists, serving their billionaire masters instead of the public. Many people are waking up to this fact, but there's still a large part of the population that has not yet realized that the media produces news that fits their pre-determined globalist narrative. ROK readers saw this first-hand when we were slandered as pro-rape activists in February.

To topple a building, attack the bottom-most foundation

While it’s quite difficult to hurt the owners of media outlets, it’s easy to put the squeeze on the lowly journalists at the bottom, whose reputation and livelihood is sensitive to public perception. By using a wiki platform to truthfully show their misdeeds, we can erode public trust in them over time, an attack method that is slower but deadly.

Right now there are hundreds of journalists and reporters who are deliberately misleading the public about the upcoming 2016 Presidential Election, as the recent DNC leaks show. I’d like to begin the operation by exposing 250 of them who are trying to swing the election in Hillary’s favor by showing a clear neglect and bias for truth towards Donald Trump. I hope we can accomplish this goal by September 26, the date of the first debate. The process has been started by creating pages on these four journalists:

- Katy Tur
- Chuck Todd
- Lloyd Grove
- Megyn Kelly

If you encounter wrongful and untruthful anti-Trump reporting in the mainstream media, I ask that you take a few minutes to expose that journalist on Kings Wiki by sourcing the article, interview, tweet, or image that contains the violation(s). Here are step-by-step instructions on how to do so.

How to expose a journalists in 10 minutes or less

1. Create a Kings Wiki account by clicking this link.

2. Go to Kings Wiki and type the full name of the reporter in the search box. Press enter.

3. Click the red link to create the page.

4. Put the reporter's name in bold using the following formatting: "'Reporter Name"'

5. Write a few sentences about the reporter, including the bias, hoax, or lie that has been documented about him or her.

6. To add a web site reference, simply enclose the URL within <ref></ref>. Example: <ref>http://www.returnofkings.com</ref>.

7. Add the reference listing to the end of the page by pasting this code:

```
==References==
{{Reflist}}
```

8. Paste one of the following category codes to the end of the page. You can add both if it's relevant.

```
[[Category:Reporters who have demonstrated an anti-Trump bias]]
[[Category:Reporters with a globalist agenda]]
```

9. Other useful formatting codes

- Bullet point: *Text
- Header: ===Text===
- Link to another Kings Wiki page: [[Name of page]]
- Blockquote: <blockquote>Quoted text</blockquote>

10. To insert an image, click the “Upload file” link in the left column and then insert it by enclosing the full file name.

> [[File:Chuck-todd-dnc-email-2.jpg]]

That’s it! Even if you have no wiki experience, you’ll be able to create your first article quickly with the above steps. Bookmark this link for fast access to this guide.

Why we’re starting with journalists who are attacking Trump

Besides the urgency of the upcoming election, Trump is the representation of a masculine and nationalist standard. If a journalist has bias against Trump, it’s an absolute guarantee that they’re also against us, and probably even participated in the meetup outrage earlier this year. Selecting anti-Trump journalists is simply a shortcut for finding liars, hoaxers, and cheaters. You are free to expose other journalists as well.

The point of this operation is not to go after honest journalists who merely disagree with our views or are rightfully critical on politicians or anyone else, but it’s clear that most mainstream journalists vehemently despise Trump and are doing everything they can to prevent him from winning the election in November. They are attempting to be the deciders instead of doing their jobs by displaying the truth to the voting public.

In spite of their blatant corruption, we must be honest on the wiki by citing our sources and not making up false claims. If you’re unsure of a reporter’s intentions, use phrases like “it seems” or “it appears.” We also will not allow anyone to publish private addresses and phone numbers.

Cockroaches hate it when you turn on the lights

Staff meeting at NBC News

When you see journalists pursue bogus attack angles against Trump or participate in contrived “scandals” that all other outlets seem to coincidentally parrot, it’s safe to reasonably conclude that they have an agenda, especially if their reporting history doesn’t show them applying the same critical standard to Hillary Clinton.

ROK has put truth on the first page of Google results for several journalists, such as Rosamund Erwin, Phoebe Moloney, Sarah Lacy, Sara Nelson, Geoff Mulvihill, and Emily Eveland. Now it’s time to take that to the next level through Operation Eyes Wide Open. Next time you see a journalist with an anti-Trump bias, or any other journalist who has shown themselves to be a liar, I urge you to expose the individual on Kings Wiki. It’s time to turn on the lights and watch these cockroaches scatter.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: 5 Shocking Things I Learned From Working In The Mainstream Media

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Simple Manosphere Comic Generates SJW Hate Fest

August 17, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

My original plan was to do an article on the criminality of the Clinton family stretching back to the 1980s, but I'll do that next week. I feel like I earned a mansophere badge of honor the past few days as I witnessed a full-fledged Social Justice Warrior swarming descend onto my blog and Twitter page over a simple comic entitled Take This Job and Shove It, depicting an American guy getting frustrated with HR tyranny at his dead-end job and taking a trip to one of the most beautiful parts of the world only to find love and share an innocent kiss. That simple narrative was enough to make certain corners of the internet descend to DEFCON 3. It was one of the most swift and stunning displays of feminist intolerance I've ever seen.

The Thought Crime Incident

I would like to begin by thanking some guy named Josh Fruhlinger (Alexa rank 156,992—heh) for driving a spike in traffic my way with his very literate critical analysis of my comics series. It is a personal badge of honor to have this manlet call my series the "worst comic ever" in true Simpsons Comic Book Guy fashion. This was his exact Tweet:

> oh god i found the worst cartoon ever, literally, in the world.

Josh and his cat

Before I could click onto his Twitter page and use some of the ensuing comments and SJW hate fest to further promote my comic book by showing people exactly what miserable "comic curmudgeons" Josh's followers are by airing out their vitriolic comments, he preemptively blocked me from accessing his page. Josh, my Twitter page is still open to you because I'm not nearly as thin-skinned as you are. Bring on the fire and brimstone.

Josh and the gaggle of people who follow this Twitter page seem to me like the type of douchey Left Coast liberals that made me flee America in the first place. Apparently, comic aficionados (who also have a thing for cats) aren't keen on comics that challenge established Hivemind, Culturally Marxist narratives and were designed only to piss people like him off.

Apparently, I succeeded on that front considering the rage that ensued. So, mission accomplished. The incident drove thousands of rabid SJWs my way, all of them vivisecting my comics and hurling spittle-addled insults my way. Thanks for the traffic, assholes. Perhaps even more enjoyably, some comments actually defended my series pointing out Josh and his ilk hate it only because they doesn't agree with its politics.

Gentlemen, we in the manosphere are the new counterculture. This incident confirms that.

The Swarming

The innocent kiss from my Be Like Dirk and Other Politically Incorrect Comics that sparked a firestorm; also, gently poking fun at the masculinity of feminists "triggered" even more of their ire

Only hours after Josh shared the comic, it happened. A full-blown Social Justice Warrior swarming. They were seething with white hot rage. On a Friday night no less, a bunch of losers with nothing better to do started in right around sunset and continued masturbating each others' egos all weekend long, taking some of the cheapest shots imaginable to mankind. Over a fucking comic, no less!

It was simply a sight to behold for about 30 minutes until I saw they weren't going to stop and had no lives. After responding to a few of the initial (and very racist) Tweets, I ducked out and went down to the beach to talk with a few ladies and ended up getting high and banging two of them in probably the best menage a trois I've ever had. When I came back the next morning, the losers were still posting hate on Twitter.

Gentlemen, no fighting, please for the honor of dating this SJW prize, one of my Twitter haters

It was their typical, boilerplate, character assassinating, self-flagellating playbook. I was a virgin. I was a loser. Then someone made the baseless claim that I sexually harassed someone. Worse, Social Justice Warriors apparently think all Asian women come from Thailand, as the comic that sparked the outrage is set in Phnom Penh, and Angkor Wat (clearly depicted) is in Cambodia. But they relentlessly attacked Thai women.

Their stereotyping of all Asian women as coming from Thailand only proves how incredibly myopic and ignorant SJWs are. Then there was the racism, to use their collective favorite term. Many of them then went on to imply the only reason an attractive, feminine Asian girl would want an American guy is "to escape her third world cesspool" implying all Asians are destitute and all Asian women are nothing but green card seekers.

> what happens when the lady degrading herself to escape a third world existence finds out Dirk is broke?

This was my reply before I got bored and left to enjoy my Friday night:

> You people have some serious issues. An Asian girl acts sweet in a comic and you people have a meltdown? Holy shit.

Then, another Twitterer brought up going to Mexico and having organs harvested, in such a way that implies all Mexicans harvest organs. In essence, SJWs become everything they claim to hate when conducting a swarming. These people hold themselves up as warriors against injustice then go on to lump not one but two races into stereotypical groups while simultaneously denigrating both groups! So, apparently Josh Fruhlinger (isn't that name German?) has some Nazi Twitter followers who do not like Asians (particularly Asian women) and Mexicans, based on the hate posted to my Twitter account after he threw up the link. Other comics they roundly hated, much to my delight were Be Like Dirk, Episode 5, Beat It, Loser and The Vortex of Hell.

Just a few more biscuits and Josh can turn that half-assed belly into full Comic Book Guy girth – the resemblance is uncanny!

The vitriol continues this week, as a tatted up columnist named Robyn something or other on Wonkette continues bashing the comic. Feminists are apparently terrified of women from traditional cultures and an innocent kiss shared between a man trying to escape the toxic culture they've created, and a traditional woman. Her tone in the article is one of if you men want to go get those dirty foreign bitches, then go them! It's very offensive, to use one of the leftists' favorite terms. The Wonkette columnist was also incensed over my illustration of Big Daddy Government and women figuratively marrying him instead of a Beta male in the comic Infinite Resources.

What to do in a swarming

So, What have I learned from this? As Vox Day points out, if you are ever the target of a SJW swarming, realize nobody gives a damn about what they're saying except them. In a very useful useful article he created about how to defend yourself against a SJW swarming, the best advice is to rely on the three R's.

> Rely on the Three Rs: RECOGNIZE it is happening. REMAIN calm. REALIZE no one cares.

Just let it go, and let themselves work themselves into a frenzy over the violation of narrative thought crime.

Turnabout is fair play, and even though Fruhlinger blocked me I was still able find some real gems among his great works of art and offer up my own criticism. Listening to his effeminate voice read his own book is enough to put me in stitches laughing. If this doesn't make you want to buy his novel, nothing will. Josh says: "The Enthusiast is my first novel. It's about trains, comics, stealth marketing, capitalism, and joy."

Look for this novel to go right to the top of the New York Times Bestseller list. It's a sure thing. Apparently, it took him four years to write and a chapter from the book has yielded three “hearts” on Medium. You can purchase it from such well-known vendors as TopatoCo. Additionally, if you are interested in reading more dreck, Josh’s reviews on The Comics Curmudgeon are typical of snarky, nihilistic, navel-watching weak Beta male genetic dead ends that have infested and are killing the United States. In other words, nothing new from the typical, culturally suicidal cesspool found in the lamestream media in America.

By the way, if you want to buy the Politically Incorrect Comic Book that generated bellyaches, explosive shits, and foaming at the mouth among Social Justice Warriors, I’ve cut the price on it by 40% in honor of the occasion. I so enjoyed seeing these losers get mad I may even have to work this incident into Season Two of the series. It’s really a good time pushing liberal fascist buttons. Publish a comic about a man taking an innocent trip then finding love overseas, and watch them turn into rabid, racist hate mongers. Who ever knew it was so easy to trigger them?

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How Working At Comic-Con Showed Me That America Is A Nation Of Cucks

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach,

helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Here’s Why You Don’t Deserve That Perfect 10

August 17, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

We all know that rejection is a big part of game. Many game writers like to pretend that rejection is ‘not personal’. This is bullshit. Rejection from a woman is always about you and you alone. Suck it up, learn from it and then move on.

Reality Bites

Perhaps you are new to the game, or maybe you’ve been out of it for a long while, due to a long-term relationship or marriage. Either way, even if you’re the world’s most insecure guy, the chances are you will overestimate your SMV (sexual market value) – by five points.

Yes, that’s right. Most guys new to game think they are a whole five points higher than the women they approach rate them.

If you’ve sat in your bedroom for a decade reading game articles online, watching YouTube videos and masturbating without talking action then you’ve never challenged yourself. You've never collected real-world data to test your hypothesis about your worth.

It is only by going out into the real world, approaching real-life women, hitting on them (and making it obvious that you're doing so) that you will get feedback that is worth anything.

And the chances are, unless you're a natural, that feedback is going to say 'sorry, you're not good enough.'

Why Rejection Is Always Personal

Bullshit game writers who want clicks will tell you that a woman rejecting you is not personal.

This is irresponsible misinformation.

If you stand in front of a woman for more than five seconds and make it clear that you want to have sex with her, and she refuses you, and doesn't even flirt with you or seem a little bit pleased, then the one thing you can be certain of is that it has something to do with you personally.

How could it not?

I'm not saying that other factors don't come into play. Of course they do. Perhaps she is in a bad mood. Perhaps she feels ill. Perhaps her dog just died. Perhaps she has a boyfriend. Here's the thing though. Imagine you were Ryan Gosling, George Clooney, Justin Bieber. Think she'd turn you down then? Or do you think she wouldn't at least giggle, blush, and act a little bit flattered?

Of course she would.

You're Not Triggering Womens' Hypergamous Natures

In love and sex as well as in business the cold truth is that men and women want the best deal possible for themselves. As a guy, you naturally want to sleep with the most attractive girl you can. If you had a choice between two girls, one homely and the other a Sports Illustrated model then any man, being honest with himself, would pick the model.

It's the same with women. They want the best return they can get in the market for their worth (determined by their looks and age).

This tendency doesn't go away just because a person is married or has a partner. In some cases it intensifies. Once a woman has settled down with a guy it is only natural that she will scan the market from time to time to check that she's made the best investment possible.

This being the case, if you approach, set out your stall, and don't even get a flicker of warmth back, then you need to have a look at yourself and what you might be doing wrong.

I'm not saying you'll get every girl. Of course not all married women will go with you. Neither will all girls with partners. Yes, a girl might just have been passed over for a promotion at work and not feel like chit-chatting with a random in her local coffee shop. But think about it like this—everyone has a price. If someone came up to you in the street and offered to give you $1m then you'd take it, right?

If you were displaying enough value then she would be flattered at least, and might even allow things to go further. That she didn't must, in part at least, be a reflection on the way you are presenting yourself to the world.

The Sexual Marketplace Is Real

People in the manosphere talk about the sexual marketplace. Evolutionary psychologists like David M. Buss (The Evolution of Desire) talk about the sexual marketplace. It's not pretty, it's not romantic, but it's real. Every human being has a sexual market value that is apparent to others around him or her.

Granted, a person's SMV goes up and down throughout their life. Look at Denise Richards now compared to ten years ago. Or look at men like David Beckham who become more handsome with age.

Your SMV will also vary depending on where you are in the world—I got loads of attention from women in Moscow, for example, probably disproportionate to other places. But everywhere you go you will be judged, and women, having a biological imperative to ensure the best possible genes for their offspring, have a razor-sharp antennae for male SMV. It's a value exchange—your looks, status and power for sex. And the harsh fact is that if you're not showing enough value then you won't get even a sniff of sex.

Improve Your Value

You can read all the articles about game you like. You can learn techniques. All of that is great. But you need to improve your value at the same time.

Luckily for guys, male SMV is based on things other than looks. Dress sense, body shape, power (as communicated through social savvy, business ability etc) are all extremely important.

It seems strange that in 2016 I am still banging the drum for very very basic self-improvement for guys who want to go out and meet girls. And yet men still come to me for advice on how to pull tens who have bad haircuts, shitty clothes, and nerdy demeanours. Get that stuff sorted—it's important and you won't start making real progress until you do.

Remember, if that perfect ten you approached doesn't think you're good enough for her then chances are she's probably right.

To find out more about how to improve your value and attract beautiful women read Troy's bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. To learn more click here.

Read More: 3 Easy Ways to Attract More Women Into Your Life

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why You Should Shun Girls Who Support Abortion

August 18, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

When it comes to the abortion issue, there's enough squid ink being squirted in our faces on a daily basis to blind an elephant. I'm politically agnostic on abortion and always have been: if it were banned tomorrow, I wouldn't lift a finger in either opposition or support. However, I've decided in the past year that I will not date any girl who supports abortion, whether she's a wishy-washy "pro-choice" type or she actively brags about killing her own children.

My argument for shunning girls who are pro-abortion is based in self-preservation. Regardless of her other (apparent) qualities, if a girl is in favor of abortion, there is evil dwelling in her soul. If you let her into your life, she will do her best to ruin you and bring you down to her level. Here's why…

Killing Yourself To Live

Despite what the leftist media tells us, moral beliefs and personality traits don't exist in a vacuum: they bleed out into other aspects of your persona. There's no such thing as a "hooker with a heart of gold": a girl who behaves abhorrently in one portion of her life is likely to be an abhorrent person in general. I call this "Degeneracy Magnetism," where people indulge in multiple, seemingly unrelated forms of deviance at the same time.

For example, overweight and obese girls have more sexual partners on average than girls who are in shape, because the same lack of impulse control that leads them to stuff their faces with food also leads them to hoover up cocks left and right. Similarly, homosexuals and bisexuals are more likely than heterosexuals to be mentally ill: their malfunctioning sexual impulses lead to their entire personalities being dysfunctional.

Along the same lines, girls who get tattoos, piercings or dye their hair unnatural colors are harming their own bodies, the very essence of their material existence. They're on the same spectrum as emo kids who cut themselves. A girl who has such little regard for her body that she'll stick painful metal objects in her most sensitive areas for fun will have an equal lack of regard for her boyfriend/husband, family or friends.

How does abortion fit into all this? Simple: aborting your own child is an act of self-mortification one step below suicide. A baby consists of half of its mother's genetic material and is the result of sexual intercourse, an act whose very purpose is to create new life. If a girl is so revolted by a lifeform that is genetically 50 percent her that she'll go to Planned Parenthood to get it flushed out, she will treat everyone else in her life with the same level of cruelty.

You don't even have to take the view that life begins at conception to realize what's wrong with girls who abort their own offspring. Sex's central function is to propagate the human race: anything else good that results from it, from orgasms to marital bonding, is secondary. When you sleep with someone else, you are consenting to the creation of a new life, whether you realize it or not and whether conception actually occurs. If you're repulsed by the natural byproduct of that union, there's something seriously wrong with you.

The reason why female pro-life activists tend to be more attractive than pro-abortion ones is because a girl's stance on the issue is one of the many things that reflects her soul and personality. Similarly, the reason why lesbians—who don't have to worry about pregnancy by definition—are some of the loudest supporters of abortion is because they're twisted human beings. I found all this out the hard way.

"Don't Worry: If I Get Pregnant, I'll Just Abort It!"

A long time ago, I was involved with a girl who was militantly opposed to having children. Our on-and-off relationship was anchored around her depressive episodes, where she would get drunk for days on end and talk suicide, hoping I'd drop everything to make sure she was okay. During the final bender I nursed her through, I had to recruit her sister to help me get into her apartment. After we talked her down from her despair and her sister left, she cajoled me into hooking up with her before we both passed out.

The next day, I was working on my computer and helping taper her off when she suddenly came to. She was still naked from last night and drunk beyond the point of sanity.

"I wanna have sex," she whined. "That's what you're here for, isn't it?"

"No, I'm here to make sure you get better," I dismissed her.

"C'mon, c'mon, c'mon!" She sounded like a little kid begging her parents to buy her a toy. "Make yourself useful, dumbass!"

"Okay," I slowly closed my laptop and glared at her as she convulsed on the bed. "Can't you say something sexy? Be sexy. Motivate me."

She gaped at me like I'd asked her to fellate a dog. She then rolled over; I could practically see the gears in her head sputtering and throwing off sparks and smoke.

"C'mon," she repeated, "gimme some sex."

I didn’t want to sleep with her, both because I’d become increasingly disgusted by her behavior over the past few months and because at that moment, she was as attractive as a sidewalk diarrhea dump in August. While she was skinny and cute enough, she hadn’t showered, shaved or eaten in days. She reeked of ketosis and cheap gin, and not only was her leg, armpit and pubic hair growing back in, hair was sprouting on her nipples and stomach.

“Fine,” I grumbled, hoping she would go back to sleep after I banged her.

“Yaaaaaay!” she cheered and clapped like a seal.

I pulled out my wallet and rummaged around for a spare Trojan. No dice.

“I don’t have a condom,” I remarked with barely-contained glee. “Oh well.”

“Wait! I have condoms!” she barked.

Of course you do, I thought.

Like she was being chased by a grizzly bear, she leaped off the bed and sped towards her dresser. She opened the topmost drawer, stared at it for five seconds, then slammed it shut.

“I can’t find the condoms,” she sighed. Then her face suddenly contorted into a freakish smile, like a snake preparing to scarf down a mouse.

“Oh well,” she exclaimed while shrugging her shoulders. “An abortion is only $600, and my period ended two days ago!”

Keep in mind that this was a girl who was so disgusted by the idea of giving birth that she insisted on condoms every time we had sex. During one of her previous drunken episodes, I was lubing her up and she freaked out because she mistook my middle and ring fingers for my dick. Another time, she had blurted out, “Don’t worry: if I get pregnant, I’ll just abort it!”

At that moment, I wanted to do nothing more than knock her up. Not because I wanted to have a baby with her—believe me, she's doing America, the white race and existence itself a favor by not breeding—but because I wanted to make her suffer for a few weeks. She'd have tons of fun begging for the money to get an abortion and explaining to her friends why she was acting even weirder than usual. Fortunately, I stopped myself before I could actually carry out my plan.

Lest you think this was an isolated example, this girl had been riding the crazy train long before this point:

- Her alcoholism was so severe that her ex-boyfriend's parents had forced her to join Alcoholics Anonymous a few months before. Half-a-year and three benders later, she gave up on sobriety and started drinking again, even after she'd told me that "[she] could feel [her] brain isn't working as well" and "[her] heart isn't working as well" due to her nonstop boozing.
- She had been in and out of mental institutions her whole life, most recently a few months before, when she had tried to commit suicide by walking into traffic after her previous boyfriend dumped her.
- After promising to marry another man, she cheated on him repeatedly, first with me, then with her drug dealer, and then (possibly) with a black lesbian who followed her home from a bar. She justified it by saying "he doesn't expect [her] to be a monk" while he figured his life out.
- Despite claiming to be close to her sister, she repeatedly lied to her about the extent of her psychological and drug addiction problems. I had to explain to her sister that she'd been going on benders and threatening suicide for months.
- Despite her supposed love of animals, she was neglectful of her pets, letting them go hungry while she wallowed in self-pity and drank herself stupid.
- During a period where I was being stalked and needed support from my friends, she started fighting with me over something I'd already apologized for months before, all because she needed to redirect the spotlight back onto herself.

I'd stuck with her for so long because I genuinely liked her (we had similar personalities and interests) and she was my physical type. It took me a couple months of being away from her to realize that I'd dodged a huge bullet. Even as she claimed she wanted nothing more than to get married or told me how "sweet" and "handsome" I was, she proved she was a self-destructive, callous individual through her beliefs and actions.

Love Of Life

Children are the weakest and most vulnerable members of the human race, so what does it say about the character of those who abuse and kill them? Answer: they're monsters who care only about their own gratification and place zero value on human life. For example, in one of his recent podcasts, Common Filth discusses a girl who whined on Reddit about her boyfriend leaving her over her decision to abort his baby.

Leftists have pushed the "pro-choice" narrative to obscure the reality of abortion and the girls who indulge in it. We're lead to believe that girls only get abortions after being violently raped by their own fathers, when the reality is that the average Planned Parenthood client is a slut who gets baby after baby sucked out of her uterus because putting on a condom is just too much effort. For example, in his book Black Passenger Yellow Cabs, Stefhen Bryan discusses how Japanese girls use abortion as their primary method of contraception, because they're afraid of losing "face" by buying condoms or birth control pills.

While girls are free to make their own decisions, I'm also free to avoid the ones who make decisions that are morally abhorrent. Regardless of whether I have children, I'm not going to shack up with a girl who treats her own flesh-and-blood like a tumor to be cut out. Girls who kill their own children despise life itself and will do their best to destroy yours. Don't let them.

Read More: 6 Reasons Why We Should Support Abortion

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Instagram, SoundCloud, Twitch, VK, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice, Affirmative Right, and other sites.

4 Types Of Losers Who Hate Donald Trump

August 18, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

There are lots of different groups that have a visceral hatred of Trump. Here are a few of them.

1. Women who cannot score an alpha male

Let's face it. Humans, like other mammals, have a pecking order. Everyone knows that sometimes a person is "out of their league" when it comes to romance. Although every woman wants to be married to an alpha male, alphas are by definition scarce. So most women know they will have to settle for a beta or a gamma if they want to get married.

Everything about Trump triggers these women. He is everything that they want but know they cannot have. He is tall, fabulously wealthy, and even at 70, still pretty handsome. He's a man's man. Even though he has an Ivy League education, he can converse comfortably with plumbers and construction workers. He's virtually fearless and he's knocked off 16 of the GOP's best candidates while fighting an unfriendly media.

What is worse is that Trump is married to a gorgeous model who is 24 years younger than him. In other cultures, a 24-year age difference is not scandalous, but it is in the SJW-controlled United States. This is enormously triggering to dowdy women because they know in their hearts that even if they were able to marry an alpha, he would eventually leave them for a younger, more beautiful woman.

Trump's entire family is an affront to these women. His daughter Ivanka is a reminder that a woman does not have to be fat, even after they have children. And his handsome sons are painful reminders to a dowdy woman of what her children would have looked like if she had been able to score an alpha.

What recourse do these women have? The best revenge in the world: Trump's opponent is a fellow dowdy woman. That's why they will support her even though they know she is corrupt.

2. Overweight Nerds

My wife and I were in a wedding party a couple of years ago. At the rehearsal dinner, another woman in the wedding party—the overweight, late-30s girlfriend of one of the groomsmen—dismissively called the bride and groom and my wife and me "cool kids." High school kids divide their friends into cool and uncool, but adults typically do not. Why did this woman persist to view the world with a high school mindset?

The answer lies in this woman's background. While she was in high school, she felt left out because she was overweight. She adopted the identity of being a nerd in opposition to her more popular peers as a protective mechanism. For her, being a nerd means that you are intelligent, sensitive, genuine, and creative. Non-nerds, on the other hand, are superficial, dull, mean, and phony.

Smart people know that what they were in high school does not set an unalterable course for their future. The jock can become a successful business man. The introverted nerd can become a highly successful motivational speaker. But others think that adult life is simply high school on a grander scale. For these people, being branded uncool in high school consigns them to a lifetime of unpopular. Unfortunately, it becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Guess which one is more likely to appeal to people who self-identify as nerds?

Nerds hate Trump because he is the very epitome of the cool kid. As a young man, Trump was fit, handsome, wealthy, and popular. He dated tons of beautiful women. Like the cool kids in high school, Trump is able to destroy his opponents by calling them names as he did when he said Rubio was a “choker.” His brusque manner is more of an indication that he is an insensitive cool kid. Therefore, most nerds will vote for Hillary who better fits the nerd stereotype.

3. Neocons

Neocon and inveterate Trump hater Max Boot

Neoconservatism is a political ideology that developed during the 1960s among certain Democrats. Many of the first neocons were Trotskyites who were opposing Stalinism—that is they were a milder form of communists. One of the founders of the movement, Irving Kristol, described a neocon as “a liberal who has been mugged by reality.” As liberals, neocons favor a liberal domestic policy. Most of them are social liberals who favor gay marriage and abortion. What sets them apart from other liberals is their foreign policy—neocons favor aggressive interventions to foster democracy.

It is no secret that most neocons are Jews. This is so true that if you say “neocon” on social media, many people will read “Jew” whether you intended that or not. Unfortunately for the neocons, much of the foreign policy that they recommended directly benefited Israel. The best examples of this were the neocon inspired interventions in Iraq and Libya that toppled dictators who were opposed to Israel. Even the US-aided ouster of Egyptian leader Hosni Mubarak removed one of Israel’s enemies. All these interventions yielded chaos or an Islamist government. As long as its neighbors are in a state of chaos, Israel benefits.

Were the neocons deliberately influencing US policy to benefit Israel? I have no way of knowing their true intentions, but I do know that the current batch of neocons, people like Max Boot and Bill Kristol, are agitating for the US to topple Bashar Assad in Syria—who just happens to be another enemy of Israel.

Neocons hate Trump because he has come out against getting the US involved in wars that do not involve a direct threat to the country. Wars for “spreading democracy,” the term neocons used to justify military interventions, have been explicitly rejected by Trump. Because of this, most neocons have thrown their support behind Hillary Clinton, who promises continuity with the disastrous foreign policy of Bush and Obama.

4. Conservatives

True Conservative and #NeverTrumper Tim Huelskamp practicing what he preaches. He lost his primary but at least he is not a racist.

During the 1960s, conservatives were against the liberal reforms that the Democrats were proposing. Among these was the Civil Rights Act which set into action much of the affirmative action that we take for granted today. In the eyes of many people, opposing the Civil Rights Act branded the conservative movement as being intrinsically racist—something that continues to haunt conservatives to this day.

During the late 80s and early 90s, conservative intellectuals and politicians sought to change the image of conservatives from being racists to anti-racists. Congressman Jack Kemp fostered the idea that the reason for racial disparities between blacks and whites was the result of bad economic policy. Kemp noted that failing (and mostly black) cities like Detroit were lead by Democrat mayors and city councils. He reasoned that if we could just implement laissez-faire capitalistic policy and low tax rates, these cities would once again flourish. For some reason the analysis neglected to account for some mostly white cities such as San Francisco and Seattle were successful despite also having had years of Democrat leadership.

In response to Kempism, the Republican Party began to focus on attracting minorities. The Republican National Convention was stacked with minority speakers. Minority Republican politicians were given pride of place in the new, anti-racist Republican Party. Republicans avoided any rhetoric that could be racially inflammatory. On the topic of race, the conservatives adopted the left's idea that diversity and immigration were unmitigated goods and that immigrants were "natural conservatives."

During this time, Republicans began to note that while the Democrats get a lot of minority support, the Democrats are not a particularly diverse bunch. To point this out, Republicans started to say that the “Democrats are the real racists.” To this day, conservative pundits use this phrase without irony even though it has been completely ineffective with minorities who still vote overwhelmingly Democrat.

Liberals believe that the Republican embrace of anti-racism was insincere, but they are wrong. Conservatives are genuinely anti-racist. Many of them, such as National Review writer David French have even adopted black children to demonstrate their sincerity. Thus, when Donald Trump announced that illegal Mexican immigrants are often criminals and rapists, the conservatives were horrified.

These conservatives quickly came together to denounce Trump. They said he was not a true conservative and that “he does not share our values.” These true conservatives hate Trump because they really believe that if they hold to their failed Kempism for just a few more decades, all those immigrants they let in will finally realize that the the Democrats are the real racists.

Conclusion

Most of these people hate Trump unjustly. It is not Trump’s fault that a woman was not able to land an alpha or that Kempism is a false ideology. Still some people might have a change of heart before November. A recent piece by True Conservative Brad Thor gives me hope that more of them will realize that allowing Hillary to get elected would be hell on earth.

Read More: Why You Should Not Have Sex With Girls Who Hate Donald Trump

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

How Serbia's Slobodan Milošević Was Framed By The West

August 18, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

This article originally appeared on Fortress of the Mind on August 9, 2016.

Those of us who had some involvement in Bosnian peacekeeping efforts many years ago might be astonished to learn that, after all the propaganda, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) finally exonerated Slobodan Milošević of wrongdoing in the Bosnian War of the early 1990s. This result is nothing less than shocking. The full text of the judgement can be found here.

The Western press–chiefly that of the United States, Britain, and France–were united in painting Milošević as a new Hitler, plunging Europe into the worst carnage since the Second World War. He was portrayed as the architect of ethnic cleansing, a monster, and a sadist who needed to be destroyed at all costs. The truth, although it arrives decades too late, is something quite different.

The following quote sums up the general conclusion of the tribunal:

> With regard to the evidence presented in this case in relation to Slobodan Milošević and his membership in the JCE, the Chamber recalls that he shared and endorsed the political objective of the Accused and the Bosnian Serb leadership to preserve Yugoslavia and to prevent the separation or independence of BiH and co-operated closely with the Accused during this time. The Chamber also recalls that Milošević provided assistance in the form of personnel, provisions, and arms > to the Bosnian Serbs during the conflict.

>
> However, based on the evidence before the Chamber regarding the diverging interests that emerged between the Bosnian Serb and Serbian leaderships during the conflict and in particular, Milošević's repeated criticism and disapproval of the policies and decisions made by the Accused and the Bosnian Serb leadership,the Chamber is not satisfied that there was sufficient evidence presented in this case to find that Slobodan Milošević agreed with the common plan. [Para. 3460]

In other words, Milošević was just one of several leaders who was involved in the Bosnian War, and he actually tried to limit atrocities, not provoke them. He quarreled frequently with Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic, according to the findings of the report, over Karadzic's indulgence in brutality. Without doubt atrocities were committed during the war, but they were done by independent, local militia leaders who were not taking orders from Belgrade.

Both Milošević and Karadzic wanted to maintain the Yugoslav state, but Milošević always was careful to take a more cautious line in dealing with Bosnian Muslims and Croats. Far from seeking confrontation, he tried to achieve his goals through ways short of extreme violence:

> The Chamber found that based on a conversation between the Accused and Milošević on 24 October 1991, it was also clear that Slobodan Milošević was attempting to take a more cautious approach while the Accused was adamant that the goal of the Bosnian Serb leadership was to ensure that they would establish full authority in their territories and that they would announce their own Bosnian Serb Assembly.
>
> The Chamber also found that while Milošević expressed reservations about excluding Bosnian Muslims, the Accused was adamant that there were not even 10% of Bosnian Muslims who supported Yugoslavia and that they could not take such a risk. [Para. 3277]

Milošević even spoke out against ethnic cleansing, and sought to prevent it as best he could:

> At a meeting in Belgrade on 15 March 1994 attended by Jovića Stanišić, Martić, Mladić, and the Accused, Slobodan Milošević stated that "[a]ll members of other nations and ethnicities must be protected" and that "[t]he national interest of the Serbs is not discrimination." [Para. 3288]

These findings are totally at odds with what the American and European public were being told at the time. He was clearly against ethnic cleansing, as this quote from the tribunal's findings shows:

> In March 1992, in a meeting with international representatives, Slobodan Milošević described the situation in BiH as similar to "dynamite", and if anyone > favoured one of the parties, there would be hell but he had called the Accused and told him to "cool it." Milošević also said that Yugoslavia hoped for intensive links with BiH. Later in the war, in meetings with international representatives, Milošević also made assurances that he would speak to the Bosnian Serbs, that he continued to condemn "ethnic cleansing" but that the world was "satanizing" the Serbs without condemning actions by the other parties. [Para 3280]

Has the mainstream press picked up this story, and publicized it with the same vehemence that they once sought to vilify Milošević? Has former President Bill Clinton, the man who led the drive to bomb Serbia, made any public statement about these new revelations?

Of course not. That would violate one of the cardinal rules of superpower behavior: never admit any wrongdoing, and never trouble oneself with the facts.

Clearly, Milošević was no choir boy. But he was only one of many tough actors in the region, and he was pursuing what he believed to be in his country's and people's best interests. In the 1990s, Russia, Serbia's traditional ally, was too weak to offer Serbia much more than rhetorical support. There was no power that Serbia could turn to for help as a way to counter-balance the open-handed and generous support that the other belligerents were getting from Europe and the United States.

This gave the United States and other meddling powers the excuse they needed to intervene in the conflict and extend their spheres of influence in the Balkans.

Even more disturbing, perhaps, are the circumstances under which Milošević died. He had spent years in confinement and feared he was being poisoned. His requests to be flown to Russia for medical treatment were denied.

The official 2006 report on his death confirms the presence of Rifamicin in his blood, a chemical that would have neutralized the effects of the heart medications he was taking at the time. The Tribunal knew of the presence of this drug in his system, yet never told him about it. Yet it was discussed with US officials at the time, behind Milošević's back.

The vilification of Milošević continued even after the mid-1990s. A script was already in place in the public mind, and it could be counted on to serve its purpose when a pretext was needed to launch a war.

When the US wanted to bomb Serbia over the Kosovo crisis, it drew on familiar themes of ethnic cleansing (which we now know Milošević disliked and actually tried to stop.). The video below gives an idea of the kind of self-righteous moral posturing that, by now, has become the stock-in-trade for American leaders in their dealings with foreign nations. The moralizing is made even more grotesque by the fact that we now know the US and its allies were deliberately lying about Milošević's role in the Bosnian War.

It seems it was in everyone's best interest to see him quietly pass away from the scene. A public trial might expose uncomfortable truths.

The Milošević story is not unique. The same propaganda techniques are being used today to other official "enemies" whose only crime is to refuse to turn their countries and economies over to US multinational corporations. Other criminal acts include refusing to obey orders from Washington, or simply any manifestation of independence that conflicts with the interests of the sole superpower.

The same sorts of lies were used to justify the invasion of Iraq, although in that case it was "weapons of mass destruction" that was the useful pretext.

When we look to the Syrian civil war, for example, we see the same tactics of vilification being used against Bashar Al-Assad. The propaganda lies have been continuous, and need not be repeated here. What matters is that the same techniques are in play: media propaganda campaigns combined with the corruption of international organizations to advance US interests. This combination is effective, and has been used over and over.

Time will tell whether the public learns anything from its experience with past manipulations.

Read More: "Sleepless Night" Is A Nonstop Adrenaline Rush

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Beguiled: A “Sensational, Misogynistic Nightmare” That Has An Important Warning For Men

August 18, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Upon the release of the movie The Beguiled in 1971, New York Times film critic Vincent Canby referred to this in-your-face, red-pill masterpiece as, “…a sensational, misogynistic nightmare.” The truth is, they just don’t make them like this one anymore—probably because the gay, Commie, SJW censors in Hollywood would pee their little Calvin Klein panties, throw a tofu-tossing hissy fit, and faint dead away to the floor, shortly after viewing this powerful, Don Siegel-directed film as a rough cut.

The script for this must-see film for men was written by Albert Maltz, and is based on the 1966 Southern Gothic novel, “A Painted Devil”, written by Thomas P. Cullinan. According to director Don Siegel, “The Beguiled” was largely based around, “…the basic desire of women to castrate men”. (Quote taken from “Clint: The Life and Legend”, by Patrick McGilligan, 1999, Harper-Collins London, pg. 186).

Released just five months before “Dirty Harry” in 1971, Clint Eastwood portrays Union soldier John McBurney, a stone-cold, most-decidedly alpha male, who quickly begins pulling more pussy than a Beverly Hills gynecologist, while convalescing at a girls-only seminary situated in the Mississippi back country, shortly after being injured in a nearby Civil War battlefield and summarily being rescued by one of the seminary's students, 12-year-old Amy (played by Pamelyn Ferdin).

Eastwood's alpha-male character actually gives the pig-tailed, wide-eyed preteen a long, deep kiss, shortly after she finds him bloody and battered in the woods near the seminary—a scene that was probably included in the film solely to enrage the SJW critics of the time (like Vincent Canby).

Only two of the eagerly available Southern belles at the school are on McBurney's "Might Bang" sexual radar, as he proceeds to attract most of the young women who cross his path, not to mention a couple of the older ones, too, who are just as horny and competitive as their younger counterparts (as all red-pill males fully realize).

A Quaker by faith, McBurney spots a seminary staff member named Edwina (pictured above, and played by Elizabeth Hartman), and he mistakenly believes that she is a bona fide, virginal, LTR unicorn; in a fit of pre-copulatory passion, he promises to marry her immediately after the war is over.

But at that point, Edwina stops him dead in his tracks and doesn't let him seal the deal (having already gotten exactly what she wanted), and McBurney's resultant sexual frustration eventually leads him to the bed of 17-year-old hottie, Carol (played by Jo Ann Harris), who has continually thrown her pussy at him, from the very first moment she laid eyes on him.

Today's SJW's and feminists would have a field day with this film: "Creeper! How dare you bang that 17-year-old hottie, when you could have my flabby, cottage-cheese-dimpled thighs, and the rest of my 45-year-old, projectile-vomit-inducing body. Pedo!!!"

Never mind that they all have "pedos" in their extended family trees, and most likely within their direct matriarchal lineage—yes, many of their great-grandmothers or great-great-grandmothers married much older men, when they were as young as 13 years of age (or even younger, in some cases), and if that hadn't happened, these bitter, used-up bitches wouldn't even be here.

But we're not talking about logic at the moment, even though young females, as a rule, mature much faster in a physical sense than do young males, and older men typically make great providers and mentors for younger females who haven't been stretched out on the cock carousel.

We're talking about hurricane-force, serially rejected, bitterly raging feminazis here, and the resultant malicious hamstringing of any men who exhibit sexual behaviors of which they disapprove (but usually only non-wealthy, heterosexual men, of course).

This film is very, very good—and Eastwood's performance ranks right up there with anything else that he has ever done, especially in the film's more horrifying sequences. Personally, I think this is Clint's best work in a dramatic role, if perhaps a hair short of his turn in the already-beaten-to-death "Unforgiven."

This darkly compelling film explores subject matter that wasn't even widely considered to be taboo at the time—but most definitely is today—and it effectively demonstrates how an alpha male in a house full of young, horny sirens and older, jealous harpies, can quickly become the cock-of-the-walk in a matter of seconds…and then get knocked off his pedestal just as quickly, and with a resounding boom.

Clint Eastwood's co-star, Jo Ann Harris was 21 years old at the time filming began, and she and Clint allegedly had a love affair that started at some undetermined point during the making of the movie, and lasted for a brief while thereafter, according to the International Movie Database.

The typical feminist's response to this horrifying revelation, regarding the couple's age disparity, might play out as follows:

"Oh my gosh. She was, like, 21 years old when shooting started and he was four days shy of being 41 when shooting ended – that's cray-cray! Ewwwww. Like, if my carousel-riding, 41-year-old best friend hooked up with a hawt, 21-year-old pool boy, she would be like, so empowered, right? But Clint's a total pervert…"

After voicing her displeasure, said feminist might waddle off in her flip-flops and sweat pants, and eagerly chug some Prozac…and then proceed to masturbate furiously, while fantasizing about Clint's alpha-male, hot-bodied, Union-soldier character, as he comes a-courtin', and bangs her hard and fast on the veranda, until she drifts off in blissful satisfaction, as she happily dreams that she, too, is a 17-year-old Southern belle, and wearing a billowing, taffeta dress—just like Jo Ann Harris's character, in this wickedly accurate depiction of how women are very likely to behave when fighting over alpha cock.

The headmistress at the seminary, Martha Farnsworth (played by legendary stage and screen actress, Geraldine Page), has a major thing for Clint's character, John McBurney, and some of Martha's most lurid sexual fantasies surrounding McBurney are showcased in the film via dream sequences—including a kinky, three-way sex scene that features Page's character, along with McBurney and his bride-to-be, Edwina.

We are also privy to some flashbacks of the headmistress's real sexual encounters, which feature her very own (drum roll)…brother. Yes, this killer, full-throttle, red-pill film brutally and accurately hacks at the root of what “normal” sexual fantasies are really all about, when it comes to the fairer sex, and I believe that Don Siegel and Clint Eastwood pushed hard to make it for the following reason—to serve as a major red-pill warning for all unsuspecting males who were a few notches north of average in the desirability department.

One of the other titles contemplated by Universal Pictures for this truly beguiling film, which was allegedly director Don Siegel’s personal favorite of all the films he directed during his prolific career, was “Pussy-footing Down at the Old Plantation”.

(I got that straight from IMDB, and I wouldn’t lie to you, unless you were a really hot female of consenting age with major daddy issues and I couldn’t figure out another way to bang you.)

The seminary’s headmistress has an intimate conversation with John McBurney, late one evening, that is laced with sexual innuendo, in the latter portion of this film. As she exits McBurney’s room, she leaves his bedroom door unlocked (it had always been kept locked prior to that point, in order to prevent his escape), and she fervently hopes that McBurney will find his way into her bed.

But McBurney gets waylaid by the 17-year-old Carol, who makes him an offer he just can't refuse. Their ensuing sexual encounter results in McBurney being shoved down a flight of stairs by his enraged bride-to-be, Edwina.

The headmistress, after discovering that McBurney has failed to fall into her man-trap (double entendre intended), hatches a devious scheme in order to fulfill her long-term, fervent desires—because Martha fully intends to keep McBurney around as her personal cock-carousel stallion for as long as is humanly possible.

Even though what follows is a seriously twisted bit of medical mutilation, maliciously devised by Geraldine Page's heartless, sexually frustrated character, it pales in comparison to what ultimately awaits McBurney in the film's bizarre and horrific climax, which I won't spoil for you, because…well…that would just be wrong.

But let me put it to you this way, because it's a bona fide, red-pill truth that all alphas-in-training really need to learn at some point, so you had better bind this one around your heart, right here and right now—hell hath no fury like a group of women scorned.

As a final note, a remake of "The Beguiled" is currently in the pre-production stages and is scheduled for release in 2017, featuring Colin Ferrell as John McBurney, and Nicole Kidman as headmistress Martha Farnsworth. This remake is being directed by Sofia Coppola, who also wrote the screenplay, so it might be fair to anticipate a complete and total diversion from the novel on which the original film was based—a diversion with a decidedly feminist perspective.

Read More: A Politically Incorrect Film That Offers A Ringside Seat To A Futile War

Bob Smith
Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

Words Like “Man” and “Chairman” Are Being Censored On College Campuses

August 19, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Summer is ending and students are returning to campus. Wait, that should read: We are approaching the 9th menstrual period of the year, and special snowflakes are returning to their indoctrination centers.

The Age Of Trigglypuff

After the feminist student uprisings of last year, several incidences of loud angry yelling, culminating in Yale students throwing a tantrum from fear of being triggered by extra-scary insensitive Halloween costumes, administrations around the nation have created new language for students to use.

University of North Carolina Chapel Hill has issued a fatwah banning the use not only of the word man, but any compound words that may be built on the word man or father, such as mankind or forefathers.

GENDERED NOUNS

"Man" and words ending in "-man" are the most commonly used gendered nouns in English. These words are easy to spot and replace with more neutral language, even in contexts where many readers strongly expect the gendered noun. For example, Star Trek writers developing material for contemporary viewers were able to create a more inclusive version of the famous phrase "where no man has gone before" while still preserving its pleasing rhythm: Star Trek explorers now venture "where no one has gone before."

Here's a list of gendered nouns and some alternatives listed below. Check a thesaurus for alternatives to gendered nouns not included in this list.

Gendered noun	Gender-neutral noun man	person, individual
mankind	people, human beings, humanity
freshman	first-year student man-made	machine-made, synthetic, artificial the common man	the average person
chairman	chair, chairperson, coordinator, head
mailman	mail carrier, letter carrier, postal worker
policeman	police officer
steward, stewardess	flight attendant
actor, actress	actor
congressman	legislator, congressional representative
Sir (in "Dear Sir," etc.)	Dear Sir or Madam, Dear Editor, Dear Members of the Search Committee, To Whom it May Concern

UNC Chapel Hill Diktat

The neutering of our language is accelerating, and already the above is reminiscent of the genderless "particular individual" dialogue in Ideocracy. Recently, Princeton University added its contribution to the castrating of the English tongue with a publication from its HR department titled "Guidelines for Using Gender Inclusive Language." (TRIGGER WARNING: It reads like a Communist industrial factory diktat). Here are a few tidbits:

Gender ~~Inclusive~~ Exclusive Language

"Gender-inclusive language is writing and speaking about people in a manner that does not use gender-based words." Well, that's a big fuck you to the multicultural movement. How insensitive is that to foreign exchange students who were taught an "inferior" language that has gendered nouns? Examples of appropriate language include the following:

Each employee is expected to turn in his annual disclosure form by the deadline Becomes…

The incumbent is expected to edit a variety of documents and must also prepare a weekly update.

Way to welcome the incoming class of ~~freshmen,~~ particular individuals, and make them feel like mindless automatons! George Carlin, a man far ahead of his time, warned of the dangers of soft language.

A good comedian is a master of language, and already Jerry Seinfeld, Chris Rock, Dave Chappelle, and Bill Maher have stopped performing at campuses where a young adult may be so personally damaged by the humorous words of one of their jokes, that they Just Can't Even because It Is The Current Year.

GENERIC TERMS AND EXPRESSIONS
Don't Use	Use
average man	average person, ordinary person
best man for the job	best person for the job
layman	layperson, non-specialist
man (when referring to humanity)	human beings, humanity, humans, individuals, people man and wife	spouses, partners man hours	person hours, work hours
mankind	humankind
man made	artificial, handmade, manufactured, synthetic manpower	personnel, staff, workers, workforce
to man	to operate, to staff
workmanlike	skillful

What Is Language?

Words have meanings; their definitions are as fixed as our genders, and do not waver on a weekly basis. The goal of redefining language and banning words is simply to elevate women and vilify men. The UNC guide makes this obvious, when it states that in cases where “men and women” must be used, to reverse the order and state “women and men.”

Plato debated the meaning of language in his 5th century BC work Cratylus, pitting the ideas of conventionalism, where local feelz determine what the meaning of a word is, and naturalism, which holds that words cannot be arbitrarily chosen, because names belong naturally to their specific objects.

Some Helpful Suggestions

I can’t help but notice that the revisionists have failed to come up with a gender-inclusive word to replace the repressive “actress”–instead forcing female thespians to accept the male “actor.” I propose that male and female actors from here on be known as Imaginoids. In that vain I have several other suggestions to help keep college students out of trouble.

Shitlord Term	Extra Double Plus Good Term
Man	Particular individual
Manhole	Poo-river-portal
Manage	Bossify
Manacles	Wedding Ring
Mandate	Femsplain
Manipulate	Speak
Mandatory	Freedom
Manifest	Femmipoof
Mandibles	Pie-hole-guard
Ombudsman	Muh-Feelz-Woman
Maniac	Man
Manners	Queefdom
Manicotti	Bobbits
Month	Menstrual Period
Manicure	PettiPaw
Manatee	Stunning and Brave Cow
Manual	Pre-Herstory
Forefathers	Dead White Male Cis Scum I Can’t Even!
Germans	Literally Hitler
Manhandle	Rape
Sex	Rape

Example: It’s so great to finally bossify some changes around here. I mean it’s menstrual month 9 of the current year and I’ve already been raped once this semester, but thanks to the Muh-Feelz-Woman’s freedom femsplaining, we have finally femmipoofed utopia into existence.

Learn The Above or Else…

Organized higher education in America is a dangerous gauntlet for men, growing more deadly with every year. When this group of children is let out into the workforce, to HR departments around the country, this language will spread to every large corporation. Consider wisely your future path.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Australian Male Senator Shuts Down Female Colleague for Accusing Him of Mansplaining

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

The Moral Tales That Have Helped My Life

August 19, 2016 | by Kalos Kagathos | Link | Original Link

It is my belief that moral reasoning is an art rather than a science. This means that one must seek to develop their innate sense of beauty, proportion, and meaning before attempting to consistently act with moral purpose.

Above all, one should turn towards their own experience of the world in order to inform their understanding of the whys and wherefores of proper action. In lieu of experience, however, the tales of others can serve as an aid to one's understanding. In this vein, I offer these tales and experiences, which might lend themselves to your own edification.

Tale 1: Spectator

My grandfather once told me a story about his childhood. He always wanted to play football with his friends, but his mother wouldn't let him because it was too dangerous. One day he decided to got to the park with the others, but he had determined not to play, just to watch from the sidelines. The other boys mocked his timidity, but he insisted that he had his orders from above.

As it would happen, someone was driven into him while he stood there watching and his leg was broken. While being carried home by a policeman, the only thought on his mind was this: "Mother, while I may have been injured, cheer up, because I did not disobey you, I did not play." His mother laughed ironically when she heard this, and she still punished him.

Moral: If you are standing on the sidelines you cannot win or lose, but you can still get hurt and you will certainly be judged.

Tale 2: Narcissism

I woke up to a tragedy one day. I saw on the news that a massive earthquake had shook Chile and would go on to threaten tsunamis for the surrounding coastal regions and far-off littorals. I watched for a bit and then decided that I should eat something. I began to prepare my breakfast and came back to the TV to watch some more, hoping to feel something that would remind that I had a connection to these people who were suffering. I did not feel sad or distraught, I did not feel like helping, nor did I feel hopeful that others would help. I was enervated by the images of rubble; all I felt was indifference.

After some time I heard something, the sound of splashing water coming from the kitchen. I leapt up to see what it could be. The coffee maker was jammed and the liquid was spilling everywhere on the counter and floor. I unplugged the coffee maker and began to consider the clean up, all that bending and wiping and drying, all that effort with no payoff but a return to where I had begun (wanting a cup of coffee). I cursed the coffee maker. Before I could clean however, I had to investigate that smell. Something was burning, and I quickly discovered that it was my toast. I released the lever and angrily watched the smoking briquettes.

I punched the counter in a rage, then I took a bite of my toast to confirm its bitterness. I tried to savor its char but I realized at that moment that I hated everyone in Chile for ruining my morning.

Moral: A personal annoyance and momentary delay can be perceived as a greater disaster than the annihilation of distant peoples.

Tale 3: Arrogance

The greatest swimmer in all the lands of ancient Greece once proclaimed that he could conquer the unconquerable, and that he would do so by swimming across the Aegean Sea faster than Odysseus could have contrived. The people of his city became enamored with the man's skill at navigating perilous waters without the aid of ship and oar, and so they deemed his proposed feat to be fit for a god, to which they gladly likened him. His retort was none too humble either, exclaiming, "When you witness my triumph, you will then know of what gods and men are capable."

On the appointed day of his setting sail for Troy (believing it most fitting for him to swim from Troy to Ithaca in mockery of Odysseus), a storm could be seen over the horizon. In spite of admonitions from knowing merchants who could see that the season was not ripe for such a venture, the hero reasoned, "If the sea will dictate the manner of my departure now, how shall I ever make a show of conquering her in my return?" The hero feared too much the passion of his spectators, not enough the unconcern of the sea.

So, the hero departed for Troy to great fanfare and heightened expectation, fearing nothing from the mighty Aegean. Not even a day had lapsed when the sea began to violently rock his ship. The man stood confidently at the prow and egged on Poseidon to do his worst. Before the words finished leaving his mouth, the shipmen watched in horror as he was swept away by a rogue wave. Being lost in the darkness and confusion of the storm, the captain decided it would be best to leave the man to his own special craft while the rest of them sought refuge. The next day the ship returned to port, short one man. The hero had drowned, succumbing to the very forces he presumed to have mastered.

Moral: Nemesis punishes Hubris with Irony as her consort.

Tale 4: Motivation

While extracting a tooth, the dentist accidentally created a gap between two of my molars when he released the tension provided by the bad tooth that was pressing the others together. Within this gap, food is regularly and painfully lodged. In order to remove the obstruction, I am forced to floss after every meal. Whereas I now floss regularly and pay much heed to the taking of my meals, I was before reckless in the caring for my teeth and the filling of my belly. The painful gap has thus been turned into quite a prize.

Moral: One minor flaw can effect a more perfect whole.

Tale 5: Distinction

In high school, I never used drugs or drank alcohol. My senior year, I stayed up all night before the last day of school finishing my final term paper. It was the paper I had placed the most effort into writing and the one I was most proud of producing. Naturally, I was exhausted during the final school day. It was a tradition at my school for all seniors to destroy their textbooks and throw them into the middle of the quad area while celebrating and howling like buffoons. It could be taken for granted that half of these students were either drunk or high on some illegal substance.

Now, I never had a taste for the bacchanalian, and I was tired anyways, so I sat motionless and watched my classmates with lazy eyes. Of all the students acting out, I was the one approached by the school counselor and accused of being on drugs. He grabbed my arm and stared at me as if I were the embodiment of everything terrible happening at that moment. Through gritted teeth he said, “I know what you did, and you’re stupid for doing it. If I brought you into my office and gave you a drug test right now, do you think you would pass?”

I was shocked more by his aggression than his question, and answered, “I don’t know what you’re talking about. Of course I would.” He maintained his grip on my bicep, stared at me for a few more seconds, then thrust my arm away and left. From the look of him, he walked away before indulging an impulse to punch me in the face.

Moral: Go with the crowd and your reputation is secure; be your own man and you must fight for what you deserve.

Tale 6: Humility

On a number of occasions, I have told people who cared about me that I did not care what they thought about certain decisions of mine. This brought them to tears, and it caused them to care less about me.

Moral: When asserting your freedom of conscience, use tact if you are offending the affection of others.

Tale 7: Savior

When my brother was young, he saw a yellow jacket caught in a spider's web. He wanted to save the frantic insect, but instead of poking it with a stick, he tried to free it with his finger. My brother was stung for his kindness.

Moral: While helping those in extreme duress, keep a safe distance.

Tale 8: Disease

I spent years making my hands calloused and strong so that they would be fit for use whenever I might need them. One time I had to demolish a concrete wall with a hammer. By the end of the day my hand was a bloody mess; I had gotten blisters in between all of the calluses.

Moral: If inoculation leads to false confidence, then it will disease the rest.

Tale 9: Cure

I had previously suffered a knee injury that limited my motion for years. While hobbling down the stairs one day, I slipped and felt my knee buckle and pop during the fall. Afterwards my knee swelled and I became frightened that the prior injury would be exacerbated. When the swelling went down, I discovered that my knee had actually been fixed.

Moral: Hardship can lead to its own cure.

Tale 10: Prudence

A young man read these tales and drew contradictory lessons. He determined to live in the following ways:

- To never spectate nor play, but instead to withdraw himself completely
- To never care enough about his own needs since others were certainly fairing worse
- To never extend himself beyond his weaknesses for fear of the consequences when grasping too much
- To use his flaws as an excuse to rest merely with his revealed strengths
- To never stand out from the group for fear of becoming a target
- To always tell people what they want to hear so as not to offend them and to stay in their good graces
- To never offer aid for fear of being dragged into the melee

- To never rely upon a unique strength when danger is on the fringe
- To always wait for pains to subside on their own

This man ended in disaster—dying old but with much to regret. He allowed his fears to rob him of the vigor and passion that make of life something more than merely not dying.

Moral: The key to all moral application is prudence. You can draw contradictory lessons from most experiences, however the art of moral reasoning is jurisprudence: knowing principles but also knowing when and how to apply them.

Read More: The Lives Of Great Men As Moral Instruction

Kalos Kagathos
Kalos is an amateur Classicist with a penchant for bodybuilding

How To Clean A Rifle

August 19, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

A man must own his tools, or they'll own him. The two enemies of firearms are rust and politicians, and we've had enough of gun politics lately, so we'll deal with preventing rust. The way to keep rust and other bad situations from befouling your guns is to keep them clean, dry, and lubricated. Today we'll talk about basic rifle cleaning practices with a special guest: you love it, they hate it, give it up for the AR-15.

Safe Rifle

The first and foremost thing about firearms is always safety, and the first rule is always point the muzzle in a safe direction. I never look down the barrel of a gun unless it's disassembled or I am physically holding the action open, so there will be no muzzle shots today.

The second rule being always treating firearms like they are loaded, we will unload the rifle from the condition in the title picture and take off the sling, being the only accessory.

Disassembly

The most important thing to clean in a rifle is the rifling in the barrel and the firing chamber, including the bolt face. For semi-automatic rifles, especially direct impingement rifles like a classic AR, you need to get everywhere combustion gas goes to clean that up as well. Equally, if not more important than being clean is being lubricated and free of moisture, so you need to oil and grease there, too.

Firstly, you want to get the bolt out of the rifle so you can have access to it, the receiver, and the breech end of the barrel. It’s really hard to clean a rifle well without getting the bolt out. For an AR, you pull the two captive disassembly pins, drop out the lower receiver, and pull the bolt out with the charging handle.

I'll have a more detailed article on the AR and its features and component parts soon, but let's focus on the general technique here.

Cleaning

You're going to need three liquids to clean a gun, and some cleaning utensils. You can get a good set of brushes and rods and such going for under a hundred bucks that will last you forever, and the basics will run you twenty or so total.

First you'll need solvent to dissolve the grime. Some people like harsh stuff, I like a milder solvent like Hoppe's, and I do have their copper solvent if needed. Solvent takes some time on bad grime and fouling, sometimes you may need to let it sit. You'll need oil for lubrication and rust prevention, and grease for lube on high friction points that you want to stay lubed (oil travels, grease doesn't.) I like a higher viscosity oil, a lot of guys will swear by better car oils, and some use actual axle grease for grease. I like the oil in the picture, and I like a monolithic grease like RIG, as opposed to a suspended grease like white lithium.

Nylon toothbrush, otis cable with slotted tip, a jag, some patches, a Hoppe's Bore Snake in .22, a bore light, Hoppe's 9 solvent, and Shooter's Choice FP-10 oil.

A variety of patches helps, a nylon toothbrush helps as well. Get a three pack of nylon, copper, and steel toothbrushes and toss the steel one. Copper or brass brushes can be used safely on guns, steel is too hard and only for extreme problems. A cheap ass bore light is nice, too.

You have some choices when it comes to rods. The best rods are one piece and either not steel at all, or coated steel. You are trying to avoid gouging your barrel bore here. I like the OTIS cable seen in the pictures as well, as it allows you to pull a brush through, then thread it in again without taking the brush off.

Top down: TICO Tool (for shotguns), 3 piece shotgun rod with shotgun slotted tip, 3 piece shotgun rod with O-ringed 12 gauge jag, 1 piece steel rifle rod, 3 piece steel rifle rod, and lastly a carbon fiber rifle rod. OTIS cable to the side.

Tips for cleaning have different purposes. The slotted tip is for dragging a soaked (either with solvent or oil) patch through the bore. The jag is for pushing a patch through the bore hard up against it to either sop up the extra solvent and grime, or really work some bore polish in there.

Bore brush to left, jag in middle, slotted tip to right with solvent soaked patch.

The brush is for PULLING through ALWAYS starting from the BREECH end and out the MUZZLE end to dislodge heavy fouling. Never push a brush, and never put it in at the muzzle, you can damage the crown that way. if you have a rifle that you cannot run a rod from the breech end, use a muzzle crown protector, ease the bare rod down the bore, connect the brush inside the receiver and pull it out.

Always rod a gun from the breech end whenever possible.

Start by running a soaked solvent patch down the barrel and then let it sit while you clean other things. If you happen to be some crazy Russian ammo enthusiast and like shooting cheap shit down your rifle, then you need to deal with the problem of corrosive primers. I limit my corrosive ammo to my cheap and inaccurate Chinese SKS, and my even cheaper and less accurate Mosin Nagant. Get some ammonia based window cleaner like Windex, put the gun muzzle down, insert the nozzle in the firing chamber, and liberally hose that thing down until a whole bunch has gone out the muzzle, safely washing away the corrosive salts. Continue with the solvent patch as noted above.

Take your rifle's action down to component parts, like the firing pin and such, and swab them clean with solvent patches. The AR is an easily stripped rifle. Be aware that some rifles are a pain in the ass, and some also loosen up the more you take them apart. Know when enough disassembly is enough, and know what level of cleaning you're doing (storage over the winter, or will be shooting it next month) and take it to the right level.

The AR bolt strips fairly easily, so I usually take mine down to this level. Other guns require acts of Congress to get this far, so act accordingly.

Once you've cleaned all parts of the rifle, return your attention to the barrel. It may need some brushing, so pull the copper brush through a number of times, then run another solvent patch. You will notice that most grime will go away. Once satisfied, run dry patches through it to absorb everything until they come out as clean as you care to go for, then run an oiled patch down the bore to prevent rust.

You should have a pile of dirty patches when done. Let them dry out, then toss them.

Lubrication

The amount of oil and grease you want places depends on your use of the gun, how much you like the gun, and your personal preferences. I oil the holy hell out of my safe queens, less on my carry guns, and my crap guns are lucky to get any. You don't want to POUR oil down the bore, you just want it lubed, not dripping. Liquids in the bore actually blocking the bore will hydrolock the gun upon firing and blow it and you up.

Oil does two things, lubrication and rust prevention. Grease will also protect against rust, but is a little messier. There is also wax, like car wax, for when you want to preserve a gun and not shoot it. Oil should go everywhere there is metal for rust prevention. Friction points with moving and sliding metal should also get hit for lubrication. I like to use grease on the hardest hit points, the hammer, the bolt rails and lugs, and the magazine catches.

Oil on the bolt lugs and their recesses in the barrel, and on the bolt cam as well. There are two holes on the other side of the bolt for oil as well. Hit the receiver rails inside the rifle, as well as a general coat around the inside, and get under the gas tube better than I did.

After you shoot and get to know your gun, shiny wear spots will show up places, and that is where the gun will want the grease. A little dab will do.

Once you have the inside all cleaned and lubed, button the rifle up and do a function check. Make sure it dry fires, the safety works, and a mag will chamber (use an unloaded one). I like to leave all my centerfires with the hammer down to save the springs, so I'll dry fire it and leave it uncocked.

Wipe down all outside metal surfaces to get all the fingerprints off, and put it in the case or the safe. I don't think you should store a gun in a soft case, and a safe or cabinet is preferable to a hard case. Locking the gun up is good for safety, but, for air circulation, there's no problem with leaning it up in the corner of the closet, either.

Conclusion

Gun care is something you should absolutely practice. It's ok to leave a gun dirty for a while, as long as it is dry, especially if you plan to shoot it again soon. But, at some point, the gun needs to be cleaned back to its original condition, and then properly stored. Remember to check on it every few months, run a new oily patch down the barrel, and check to make sure the action is still lubed, and also do this if you're taking it shooting and it's been a while since its last trip. Be safe.

Cleaned and lubed.

Read More: 3 Things Cosmo Gets Wrong About Relationships With Men Who Own Guns.

Luke Stranahan

Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

3 Things We Have Learned A Year After The Battle Of Canada

August 20, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

August marks the one year anniversary of Roosh and Return Of Kings' defiant stand against Canadian SJW violence and social terrorism. As part of his lecture tour across North America and Europe, Roosh expected the usual leftist opposition to his work, which this time consisted of giving speeches to fellow men about how to navigate a perilously anti-male Western world. What developed in Canada, however, soon surpassed all expectations.

Roosh's planned lectures Montreal and Toronto were the catalyst, especially in the former city, for a wave of SJW and media lies, threats of violence, and, in the end, actual violence. Whilst the lectures took place at secret locations, we were left in no doubt that a number of crazy feminists, sympathetic pseudo-journalists, and even politicians did everything they could to endanger Roosh and get him thrown out of Canada.

So here the three biggest learnings from these pivotal days, which have become known as the Battle of Canada:

1. Media outlets and politicians need really good hyperbole to make people believe—and they failed miserably in Canada

Previous articles of mine have mentioned the so-called “CNN comments phenomenon.” Leftist media outlets like CNN and The Guardian, which form the majority of all “news” coverage, have plenty of narrative-guzzling fanboys and fangirls. All in all, though, surprisingly large numbers of readers and viewers refuse to take their biased journalist-dispensed medicine. Roosh’s Canadian stand was no exception.

Dozens of defamatory articles falsely accused Roosh of being pro-rape and organizing illegal harassment against feminists. Yet control of the predominant media narrative did not result in SJWs and their journalist enablers getting thousands, let alone tens of thousands of protesters out onto the streets against him in either Montreal or Toronto. It additionally failed to prevent Roosh from entering Canada (and there was much time to do so), failed to get him removed, and failed to stop the lectures in Montreal and Toronto.

For instance, when a Montreal café owner surreptitiously photographed Roosh and tried to organize another real-life lynch mob, the backlash against him and his establishment was significant. Irrespective of the depraved souls supporting the vilification of and violence against a paying customer, many people and even some media outlets called out such behavior for what it was: the condoning of violence and a desire to physically intimidate those you disagree with. Noted critics of Roosh, including Marni Soupcoff in The National Post, ended up rebuking the mentality of the SJWs trying to undermine Roosh’s lecture world tour.

SJWs also grossly overestimated the support they would get for violent acts, such as when a mob used assault and the threat of violence to falsely imprison Roosh in a building. Naturally, the mainstream media initially delighted in what occurred on this night in Montreal. But the coverage was ephemeral and instigators of the violence, including Katie B. Nelson and Jessica Lelièvre, either went underground on social media or tried to quickly delete comments linking them to the mob acts. Efforts to whip up hatred and physical confrontations with Roosh and his lecture attendees, as serious and malevolent as they were, fell far short of what SJWs and their media allies really wanted.

Then there was the array of compromised or plain pathetic local politicians trying to ride the anti-Roosh gravy train. Toronto Mayor John Tory, suffering from a serious case of relevance deprivation syndrome compared to the more well-known late Mayor Rob Ford, wanted to cash in on the free media attention to elevate his electoral prospects. Politically and arguably biologically senile Toronto Councillor Norm Kelly aimed for the same thing. The worst by far, however, was Ontario provincial parliamentarian Cheri DiNovo, a former drug smuggler, who expected that her anti-Roosh vitriol would help her later disastrous bid to become the national leader of her awful ultra-leftist party, the NDP.

All this thrown at Roosh, Return Of Kings and the lecture attendees… and the lectures still happened. If anything, what transpired in Canada raised Roosh's profile ten times more than the lecture tour otherwise would have.

2. The Canadian media abandoned their mentally ill, criminally-inclined poster girls (and who can blame them?)

Jessica Lelièvre was the gift that kept on giving in ROK's discrediting of the Canadian SJW rage.

Professional agitators and attention seekers Aurelie Nix and Katie B. Nelson represented the more mentally ill corner of the SJWs Roosh faced, while Nelson, Jessica Lelièvre and the mob of white knights in Montreal showcased the rather criminal side. At first, media outlets both inside and outside Canada were positively gleeful about the SJW violence and threats of violence, jovially covering the mob antics on the streets of Montreal especially. Even before organized violence was arranged, people like clearly inactive and unfulfilled, would-be schoolteacher Sara Parker-Toulson were praised as "heroines" for starting defamatory online petitions against Roosh. That said, serious cracks in the stories and backgrounds of the lead SJWs began to emerge.

Aurelie Nix in particular was a loose cannon and the Canadian media, who had ridiculously portrayed her as a victim, quietly dropped her "story." For a start, she foolishly acted as if she had been the victim of "revenge porn," decrying how links to publicly available nude photos she published online were shared. Secondly, she falsely and very slanderously claimed Roosh had made a rape threat against her, before insisting that the menace was actually coming from ROK supporters, an equally farcical assertion. Again, the supreme irony of Nix's false allegations was that she is on record insisting that spurious sexual assault allegations against men are rare.

Plus, enough of the female SJWs were simply far too privileged for the media to continue using them. Assault-loving Jessica Lelièvre, now surprisingly studying to become a lawyer, was outed as a young woman with more privilege in her little finger than 98% of men have across their entire bodies. Her father owns a very profitable construction business, which he had inherited from his own father and grandfather. All three of these very white men have thus allowed poor Jessica to live the life of luxury she suffers today. Without even entering the full-time workforce (she was too busying criminally attacking Roosh), she has a property in the United States in her and her sister's names, courtesy of her parents' wealth. As you can imagine, my little violin just broke from over-playing.

Haley Yael Firkser, working in a cushy "business development director" job for her hardware store chain-owning father (with no normal qualifications for the position), was another anti-Roosh feminist who tried to court media attention. Presenting herself as a poor oppressed female at the mercy of the patriarchy, her glorification by the media was short-lived. Together with Katie B. Nelson, who must have had a very good way of supporting herself financially in between her violent acts towards police, history of drug abuse, and other forms of delinquency, Firkser underscored how women with too much time on their hands and an insufficient work ethic were leading the charge against Roosh. This did not make for a sustainable campaign by the media.

3. Armed with so many advantages, the SJWs and media backed down because of low energy and lack of conviction

Lacking sane poster girls, the Canadian media was forced to jettison liabilities like crackpot Aurelie Nix.

Media outlets such as CBC possessed an enviable arsenal with which to attack Roosh before, during and after his Canadian lectures. CBC alone is publicly funded to the tune of at least hundreds of millions of dollars annually and when all its financial sources are counted, it rakes in ten figures' worth of revenues every year. And what about all the various private media corporations who went after Roosh in Canada?

Journalists are already infamous for being overwhelmingly liberal in their political outlook and whilst this did translate into a tidal wave of very unprofessional and false ad hominem attacks against Roosh, the lack of success against him meant the targeted media hate eventually sputtered. Writers paid to vilify him and Return Of Kings went for cheap attacks that at best barely scratched the surface of why his world tour was taking place.

Canadian media outlets have spent an inordinate of time trying to legitimize infantile, preposterous theories like "rape culture," but cannot explain why, if this culture supposedly exists, those (falsely) called "rape advocates" by feminists and journalists are invariably the recipients of violence, threats, and very organized campaigns to remove them from particular jurisdictions. This is the kind of glaring inconsistency that CBC and other platforms could never really touch on in dealing with Roosh, lest the flimsy facade of "society institutionally oppresses women" fall away. Superficial broadsides fired at Roosh were one-dimensional and soon crumbled.

Another big reason for the death of the anti-Roosh campaign was an unwillingness or inability of the journalists to critique Roosh's own points in detail. Roosh's lecture world tour argued that men were being silenced throughout the Western world and the nature of the media crusade, used as it was to inflame SJW violence, proved this very argument. Convinced that the world should be a particular way, the journalists and crazy feminists involved in the public hate did very little to appropriately explain their positions and rationalize how Roosh's were wrong. Once the initial fury had subsided, there was little else they could do except retreat and forget their campaign occurred.

The SJW hate and violence will reemerge

Just six months after the Canadian hate, Roosh faced another targeted campaign against the ROK meet-ups.

The sensationalized and patently false stories about the ROK meet-ups at the start of this year illustrate how Canada-style hate campaigns against us will continue to appear. Inasmuch as I have pointed to a lack of persistence from our SJW and media enemies, we should not underestimate the risks to Roosh and others in the crucial days when SJWs resort to serious threats and violence. The type of mob that tried to seriously injure or kill Roosh in Montreal can and almost certainly will materialize again.

Despite the deranged groups, media interests, and political ideologies who desire our demise, the lectures Roosh gave in Canada and the extraordinarily hostile environment in which they took place constituted a significant victory. The danger was real, but the message was delivered loud and clear.

With the publication of Roosh's book about his Canadian experiences, Free Speech Isn't Free, thousands of new men will be positively introduced to both him and Return Of Kings. And that's an outcome SJWs did not anticipate when they tried to take Roosh down in Canada–and failed to do so.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Sex With Animals Is Now Legal In Canada But Speaking Your Mind Leads To Persecution

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

5 More Hollywood Films For Men That Leave Today's SJW Films In The Dust

August 20, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Here are five additional reviews of some epic, red-pill-only Hollywood movies, which shovel ample portions of mouth-watering truth directly at the viewer.

Unlike today's SJW Hollywood garbage-fests, each of these top-drawer films reveals practical life lessons and winning strategies for men—especially when it comes to how they might best deal with women.

We get one truly scintillating lesson on that very subject, from Paul Newman's alpha-male character, Hud Bannon, in the very first film that I review below. ("The only question I ever ask any woman is, 'What time is your husband coming home'…")

1. "Hud" (1963 – Paul Newman, Melvyn Douglas, Patricia Neal, Whit Bissell)

Hard-living Hud Bannon (played by Paul Newman) works long, arduous days in the hot

Texas sun, while banging scores of hot, eager females by night; Melvyn Douglas is stoically perfect as Hud's disapproving rancher-father, Homer, who holds a malevolent grudge against his oldest boy, based on a long-held grievance.

From a purely subtextual standpoint, this movie subtly describes how beta males greatly admire, and eventually grow to hate, top-rung alpha males. Newman's brilliantly played Hud overpowers every woman in sight, while not really wanting any of them, and his obsessively jealous brother and father ultimately show their true colors by attempting to destroy Hud's sense of self-worth, in an uncontrollable, envy-fueled rage—all while secretly wishing they were packing that special je ne sais quoi that Newman's unapologetic alpha-male character is packing…

If you're an alpha male, well, you already know how that one goes, and it's something you simply have to accept, while learning how to deftly sidestep all seethingly jealous, beta-male obstacles.

Sparklingly acted and skillfully directed, you can't go wrong by watching this unpolished gem of a film; it's absolutely cram-packed with vital, red-pill truths. Based on the novel by Larry McMurtry.

2. "The Grifters" (1990 – Anjelica Huston, John Cusack, Annette Bening, Pat Hingle)

Another brief glimpse of red-pill reality here, as Hollywood lowers the veil and lets you take a quick peek at how things really go down in the big, bad world…

Grifter Annette Bening pays her landlord with sex; grifter John Cusack scams bartenders and other unsuspecting saps out of their hard-earned cash; and grifter Anjelica Huston rakes in huge profits for the local crime kingpin, Bobo Justus (played superbly by wily character actor Pat Hingle; note the sly, tongue-in-cheek last name of his character here), by dumping large sums of Mob money at horse tracks on nags running at high odds, in order to drop down the eventual payouts to the suckers.

Do human mothers sometimes eat their young? Hmm. That's a really interesting question. Watch the final scene featuring Cusack and Huston, and you'll have your answer; this is an intriguing film with slick plot twists, clever dialogue and killer direction, and you can't go wrong by watching it at least once.

(Ever try passing a 10-dollar bill off as a hundred, while paying a cashier at a store? It actually works—but only if you know how to do it. Yes, this and other fine life lessons, most of them centered around taking exactly what you want from unsuspecting blue-pillers, are readily abundant in this highly informative, must-see, RPO film.)

3. "The Hidden Room" (aka "Obsession" – 1949 – Robert Newton, Sally Gray, Phil Brown)

A cucked husband keeps his wife's lover chained up, within the hidden sub-basement of an outbuilding on his property, as he prepares to murder him and dispose of the body in a gruesomely novel way; this eyebrow-raising film has basically vanished from the late-night rerun scene on cable TV, probably due to its letter-perfect portrayal of a hot, upwardly mobile young woman who uses men for attention, sex and money and then discards them like yesterday's outdated fashion statements.

This largely unknown film is a great primer for any open-minded male who is still teetering on the fence about going all-in and pledging his mind, body and spirit to red-pill concepts.

Do yourself a huge favor and take a hard look at this extremely revealing RPO film as soon as possible (that is, if the SJW censors haven't completely buried it) and you'll quickly learn some vital life lessons regarding the true nature of females—and how ultimately self-destructive and pointless it is to chase them.

Sally Gray sizzles as the hypergamous hottie, Storm Riordan, who knows exactly what she wants, and very ruthlessly (as well as very sweetly, without giving away a hint of her true motives) proceeds to take it, no matter who it might ultimately destroy.

4. "Bonnie and Clyde" (1967 – Warren Beatty, Faye Dunaway, Gene Hackman, Michael J. Pollard)

If you don't instantly pop wood the moment you first lay eyes on the stunning Faye Dunaway, in this brilliant, Depression Era film's opening sequence, you are either gay, impotent or dead. Because in my unapologetic opinion, Dunaway's signature turn as bank-robbing Clyde Barrow's impossibly gorgeous, pistol-packing sidekick, Bonnie Parker, has provided the manosphere with the most compellingly fuckable female character in the entire history of Hollywood cinema.

And if you think "In the Heat of the Night" deserved to win the 1967 Academy Award for Best Picture, over this undeniably superb RPO film (or the equally brilliant red-pill-only film from 1967, "Cool Hand Luke", which I may be reviewing at a later date), you are a clueless, leftwing, brainwashed, SJW sock puppet—end of story.

Warren Beatty is flawless as the legendary Clyde Barrow, whose loyal gun moll sticks with him to the bitter end, largely due to her favorite gangster's alpha-male arrogance and charm.

Gene Hackman is raucously affable as Clyde's big brother Buck, and even the perennially miscast Gene Wilder gets big laughs in a brief but humorous sequence. Estelle Parsons won an Academy Award for best supporting actress in this film, and it was well-deserved, as she plays the role of Blanche—a whiny, shrieking, it's-all-about-me, irreversibly damaged harpy—to absolute perfection.

5. "Heat" (1995 – Al Pacino, Robert De Niro, Val Kilmer, Jon Voigt)

I dropped the ball and failed to include this excellent, red-pill-only film in my first group of movie reviews for ROK, which covered 10 films from the period spanning 1992-2004. Being a man who typically tries to rectify his mistakes—unless it's a mistake that a woman, or some clueless, blue-pill male thinks I made—I will correct this egregious oversight right now.

I'm not normally a big Michael Mann fan, but this riveting, action-packed, tour-de-force film is about as slick as they come. From the opening bell, this stylishly crafted thriller grabs hold of the viewer and won't let go, as we enter a fascinating subculture of alpha male criminals that takes whatever it wants—cash, power, and ultimately, any woman it desires—no matter the risks involved.

Robert De Niro (as master thief Neil McCauley) embodies the true physical and mental characteristics of an alpha male who is fully committed to going his own way—most especially if the suckers think it's the wrong way—and Al Pacino deftly counters with his relentless, burned-out-cop-with-numerous-flaws portrayal of Police Lieutenant Vincent Hanna, as the two of them face off in a final gunslinger showdown that continues to propagate the same old tired, blue-pill crap that Hollywood unerringly propagates: namely, that the good guys always win.

In reality it's the bad guys who own everything, and Val Kilmer (as Chris Shiherlis) and Jon Voigt (as the ultra-cool Nate) convincingly portray two underworld crew members who firmly realize this fact while harboring not a single shred of doubt about the matter.

Be sure to check out the scene where De Niro's character, angered at being strong-armed by greedy beta mortgage-banker Roger Van Zant (played by William Fichtner), strides directly up to the floor-to-ceiling windows of the unsuspecting simp's hillside mansion, and blows him away. (No courts of law needed when you're playing the game at this level. "Fuck you – pay me. No? Okay…)

This film is a must-see for every man who doesn't think it's wrong to act like a real man; non-stop action, brutally graphic violence, and deep-seated, red-pill truths abound.

Modern-day Hollywood's perpetual bombardment of the human psyche, via its unending series of mind-numbing SJW films, can really get to a guy after a while. One surefire way to effectively fight back is to stop watching Tinsel Town's current social-engineering bullshit.

Rent some of the RPO films listed above and start getting your mind right; it's a war, and you're either in it to win it, or you're in it to get brainwashed. The choice, as always, is ultimately yours.

Read More: 10 Hollywood Films For Men That Leave Today's SJW Movies In The Dust

Bob Smith

Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

7 Game Principles I Personally Verified During My Trip To The Ukraine

August 21, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

This spring, I stayed a week in Ukraine. I teamed up with Sery, a Ukrainian friend of mine I used to box with. The man just came out of a six year-long relationship and needed some action. He is an athlete with decent game and looks while having a “purple” pill mindset.

He was settled in France for last sixteen years, lives in the capital with a high-income job and has a French passport. Quite the catch for a Ukrainian girl.

But as you will read, you will see that the laws of game always apply, even in a “relatively non-Westernised” country. It was an eye opener, showing me that this country was far from the Promised Land (in terms of women) that I pictured.

1. Tattooed women are damaged

I had just got off the plane after spending the flight shooting the shit with another RVF guy. We exchanged tips on the city and were pretty excited about raiding Ukraine. We parted ways after he reached his hotel and I walked towards mine.

I did a few approaches, direct and indirect, to get in the mood, without much success. I suddenly crossed path with a slutty blonde who looked like she just jumped out of a porn set. Fake blue lenses and eyelashes, platinum blonde weaves, fake round tits with no bra, a transparent top and trashy high heels. The picture would not be complete without a tattoo on her forearm and neck. Almost a caricature.

I stopped her and her brunette sidekick, using an indirect opener. Just off the plane, with my headphones and my weekender on the shoulder, I looked like a tourist. The conversation died out and there went the potential strippers or professional sponsorettes.

WBBWNAAHTTD (Would Bang But Would Not Ask About Her Trip To Dubai)

A bit further down the road, I notice another blonde near a fountain with very high red heels and a black miniskirt.

A few seconds in the conversation, red flags keep adding: She asked me if I was a player, told me that she is not religious and explained that she works with the Weapons Department of the Azov Battalion (all-male environment). Plus a giant bird tattoo on her thigh. Unstable but I took her number anyway.

Not her but pretty close to what that abomination on her thigh looked like.

Saw her the next day and she came dressed in jeans, sneakers and a loose white T-shirt. In three words: dressed like shit. I thought about leaving but she smiled warmly and I decided to give it a shot.

Wrong move. Turns out she was mean-spirited and apathetic. One red flag after the other. When she told me that she stabbed someone once after a drunk argument, I stood up and left. Red flags exist for a reason.

2. Alpha fucks, beta bucks

Sery arrived after visiting his family in his hometown for a week. The situation was dire there. No jobs, no future, and when he described it, it reminded me how good the folks have it back home and how they choose to throw their opportunities out the window.

A girl wanted to go home with him that week but he refused, as she gave Hepatitis to a friend of his some time back and the dude almost died. Wise decision. He picked a spacious, central flat for us and was ready to raid.

We decided to try our hand at Tinder, in addition to other approaches. The talent was good, almost too good to be true.

He matched with a girl that looked decent. We set up a date and she brought a friend along for me. They turned up well dressed but at least a point below what they looked like on their picture. The conversation was painfully slow and they would refuse any escalation. No attraction whatsoever. We left empty handed

It was like trying to escalate with this

Ignoring my advice, Sery wanted to see these girls again. He brought them to a venue that served food next to our joint. I told him that it was a bad idea as it should be a place that only serves drinks.

Once again, the girls did not have any active part in the conversation. They also decided to order sushi even if it was four in the afternoon. Why not? They grace the stupid foreigners with exquisite company, the gringos should foot the bill. I was fuming and told my friend in our language to eject, as they had it planned and that I did not come here for sub-par, entitled slags.

I did not sign up for this

He tried to calm me down. I still paid my share out of friendship. They refused to follow us anywhere after that (surprise) and we never heard of them again.

I could not help but having a talk with him about what happened. We spent a tiny amount of money but it was a question of principle and common sense. We are not walking wallets. His answer disappointed me a bit:

> JB, I am not like you. You would fuck a girl seven times in the arse until she bleeds and maybe after that, would consider buying her a glass of water. I enjoy having girls around for the sake of it. It’s part of the game.

3. Male thirst is the root of all evil

Later that evening, we met up with a childhood friend of Sery, Chiapik (which is usually the name given to small, rat-like dogs). He left their town for the big city and they did not see each other for seven years. We bought some drinks and walked back to our place.

Chiapik did not chip in a kopek and decided he would crash at our place. The guy was speaking very fast, laughing about nothing and flattering us on different levels. Something was odd.

On the way, we noticed that all the benches of the street were taken by people drinking in public and enjoying the fresh air. On one of them, four girls were drinking and laughing.

I came over to start the conversation and we sat together. Being uni students, they were intrigued by our personalities and between jokes, Sery and I were giving them dancing lessons in the street.

Our situation

We agreed on which girl we were after and told them to carry on the party at ours. Soon everyone was quite drunk and I isolated mine on the balcony before kissing her.

Sery has already kissed his girl and had her sitting on his knees. As I came back in the main room, there was Chiapik, kneeling next to them, caressing the girl's thighs, almost under her dress.

There were two additional, single girls and the thirsty bastard went for Sery's one.

I advised my wingman to make things clear with the cockblock. He agreed and I carried on with mine, bringing her to my room to show her pictures. We lied down after a few minutes, kissed, undressed and I took her. She was a sweet girl and it felt good to take the poison out.

I got dressed to check the situation in the living room. They had all disappeared. I went to sleep and learnt the next morning that Sery had to physically kick Chiapik out of his room to isolate the girl.

But the rat kept barging in their bedroom all night long, with lines the likes of "Hey guys! What you up to?" She probably would have slept with my friend if males fighting for her attention did not flatter her ego.

She just gave Sery an awkward handjob that night. Early next morning, after he enjoyed our girls, our drinks and our couch, the rat vanished in thin air with "Got some things to do, see you guys."

Doing the splits a couple of days later

We brought over our respective girls a few days later. We isolated them pretty quickly and Sery managed to bang his prospect in peace.

4. Always escalate

I met a 19 year old brunette, while she was walking with a large group. I stopped them, asking for bar recommendations and I felt that she was into me. I took her number and left.

Two days later, we had a coffee date next to my place. She was really smiley, innocent and had a nice, round arse. She did not move back when I touched her and held her hand.

I did a test by bringing my face close to hers. She did not retract. I kissed her and she proceeded to eat my face. We went at it for ten minutes. “I don’t usually do that” she said “I have been two years without a boyfriend”. Her innocence was very convincing.

I was split between two decisions: waiting for another date to bring her to my place or go for the kill. I chose the latter and brought her for a little walk towards mine. I invited her over to show her cool pictures of my native region. “So beautiful, it would be a shame to miss it.” She agreed.

Always with a radiant smile and high heels, even under the rain

We went to my room. The bed was the only place to sit. A bit more kissing, then she puts up some last minute resistance. I go back one step. Minutes later, I plow on and her top comes off. “We are not going to have sex” she said “But I can do it with my mouth.” Fair enough.

I carried on playing with her body and off come her jeans, revealing her great arse. “Okay, but not without a condom” followed shortly after. I took one out and railed her like a bricklayer. A very satisfying notch. We talked a bit then she got dressed and left.

Zero games played. Zero time wasted as the attraction was present. Good times.

I had to leave as well. We had another Tinder date planned and I rocked up an hour late. It was a hot day and I was still sweating bullets from the intense sex. We had a drink with those Tinder girls but they went cold the following day.

5. Girls fear the wall more than anything

I had met a local tall brunette two years ago during my holidays on the Black Sea. The connection was instant and during those two years, not a week passed without her sending me nudes or asking how I was.

I reached the meeting point an hour late. She was all smiles and forgave me. She looked really good and was a genuinely nice person. She told me that she bought a new dress and lingerie just for me.

I brought her to our flat after two drinks and smashed her like there was no tomorrow. I went at it until falling asleep in a sea of bodily fluids.

She bought food the next day and prepared us (my friend included) lunch. All of that in a dress and high heels

The night after, Sery went to bang an old flame of his and my girl invited me over for dinner. She cooked me a nice meal while pouring me wine. We had great sex and she was very upset that I had to leave in the early hours of the morning.

Face and bodywise, this girl would be an 8 in the West (7,5 considering that she is 31). But she is damaged goods in her homeland. Why would she cling on me like this and shower me with affection? Because men do not even see her there with all the feminine competition around. She might think of me as her last chance to secure a mate.

6. All women are like that

We spent the last two days exploring the huge city and we got lost looking for a park that apparently was worth seeing. I spotted a hot blond girl with very high heels, a white outfit and asked her for directions.

She noticed my accent and switched to English, asking where I was from. She was very friendly and her skin and hair were so light that I thought she had albinism. It was not the case.

She missed her bus in order to show us the correct way and was constantly giggling, saying that she found French guys very sexy.

I took her number easily, even kissing her goodbye as she left. She accepted it and we parted ways after she declined visiting the park with us. Contacting her the following day this is what I got:

Those albinhoes ain’t loyal

Radio silence since then. No mention was made of a boyfriend during the interaction. Igor probably caught her red-handed. I will soon learn that Ukrainian girls are masters at extracting resources from men and managing their own.

Later in the park, a blonde 8 caught my eye. I walked over, telling her to take a picture of Sery and me near a monument. The foreigner factor was working in my favour. She was warm and the interaction was pleasant. She was a student at the local medical university but was dressed very elegantly.

I asked her about the good places to hang at in the city and she recommended me the central sponsor spot that we visited a few days back. I answered that I was more interested in seeing the places where “the Ukrainians go. A student place, maybe?”

Moments before the incident

In a fraction of a second, she turned into a different person. Her smile vanished and her face turned icy. She cocked back and here is the translation of her words, verbatim:

> For fuck’s sake, man! Did you come to Ukraine without money?

Such a brutal display of venality and crude sexual reality stopped me in my tracks, I walked away and carried on with my day.

7. Feminine girls are the most attractive thing there is

Those few warm days in Ukraine were just a festival of beauty. Everywhere you could look, there were feminine, slender girls strolling around.

It was beneficial for my libido, making me feel that I would regret it if I did not approach constantly.

The day I flew home. I really did not want to leave.

It is beneficial for their society that those girls are the norm. When it happens, the ego of women is not inflated and their attitude is much friendlier. In that kind of difficult economic context, women know that the concurrence is brutal, that if they miss their chance with a high-value man, he could find another pretty girl immediately.

Men do not act beta and thirsty when they see that this kind of specimen can be found everywhere. Their abundance mentality is much stronger than in the West. It makes it a balanced and healthier society when it comes to the sexual marketplace.

Ce qu’il faut en retenir

I went home happy but with a pinch to the heart. Sery stayed in contact with the rat-episode girl. She told him that she would visit him in Paris… if he bought plane tickets for her and her girlfriend, plus a hotel. And maybe they will catch up. He cut ties shortly after.

Brothers. In Ukraine, steer clear from sponsor venues and be very clear about the fact that you are not a chump here to spend his dollar solely on the company of girls, without a return of investment.

Bear in mind that Tinder has a strong transactional vibe there. It would be an option if you have time ahead of you. Day game is far better than night game, which that was ruined by thirsty Turks long ago. Learn Russian, approach a lot, be bold but friendly.

For those having any doubts about the reality of game, traveling is one of the best opportunities to observe its relevance in a different environment.

Read More: 2 More Flaws I Have Discovered In Conventional Game Principles

Jean-Batave Poqueliche
Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

4 Esoteric Methods For Increasing Your Grip Strength

August 21, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

If you will recall, a few weeks ago I published an article on how to train the grip. In that article I stated:

> You will not have a heavy deadlift, overhead press, or bench press if you have weak hands. And for athletes, your punching, wrestling, grappling, throwing, and catching will be ineffectual without proper forearm training. In the words of Thomas Inch and many other pre-20th century strongmen, weak hands makes a weak man.

And I stand by that statement. I feel that training the hands and forearms is of such importance, that another article on training the grip is necessary. More specifically, this article will deal with other methods of training that are slightly more esoteric than the DIY techniques discussed in the last article, but can be done in conjunction with those techniques to truly create awe-inspiring forearm strength.

The Techniques

A muscle group that is often neglected by those wanting stronger hands and forearms are the hand extensors, the muscles that lift the fingers up as shown in the picture below:

These muscles can be trained in two ways: The first are the fingertip levers lay your hand flat on the floor, and put a weight plate on top of your fingers. Then lift your fingers up, lifting the plate slightly up. Lower and repeat for repetitions. This can be done with all fingers, or one finger, or any combination of fingers depending on what your training goals are.

A variation of this is to hold your hand in the air with fingers down, and then applying pressure to the fingers with your other hand, lift the fingers up. Do a few repetitions of this for each hand. Then do this for each thumb as well.

The next series of exercises that can be done will require a set of the Chinese iron balls. Perhaps you already own a pair of these for reducing stress or meditation. Or you can borrow a pair from your parents or a co-worker (it's likely somebody in your life owns one). If you can't get of these for free, you can go to a local Asian foods market and pick up a pair for somewhere in the ballpark of 10 dollars. And if all else fails, you can buy a set from a martial arts supply company such as the ones in this link.

Now that you have a pair of them, take the two in your hand, with your palm up, and begin circling the balls around in your palm using your fingers.

That's pretty easy, right? Anybody should be able to do this. "How is this supposed to make me stronger?" you might ask-and to that I would say-try turning your palm down and circling the balls in your palm.

As if you didn’t think I was cool enough, I play guitar too!

This is much more difficult-indeed, you will most likely not be able to do this on your first try. As an intermediate step, take the balls and turn your hand 90 degrees, and circle the balls. If you still can’t do this, start with the palm up and slightly rotate your hand more and more until you can hold the hand at a 90 degree angle from the palm-up position.

From here, continue rotating the hand more and more until you can hold the palms down and circle the balls. Once you can circle the balls with the palms down, you will notice that all fingers are straining greatly in this exercise. Do this for both hands.

Observe the flexion in my thumb and fingers

When this becomes too easy (ie: When you can do at least 10 rotations of the balls with palms down), try doing it with three balls. If that becomes too easy, do four balls. And if you still need harder exercises, grip world record holder John Brookfield suggests buying 5 pound shotputs and starting the process all over again. Bear in mind that I can only do three balls with palms down—if you are capable of doing this exercise with the shotputs, you are likely a world record holder.

Now that we are on the subject of the hoary Orient, another forearm training technique they have invented is sand blasting. You have likely seen this done in martial arts films such as Enter the Dragon: standing above a bucket of sand, explosively thrust your fingers into the sand as deep as possible, until you can touch the bottom. In traditional kung fu schools, the buckets are filled with mung beans, sand, and finally Iron BBs. While this thrusting technique will condition your outstretched fingers to take impact and build up calluses on them, this will not specifically develop the grip.

To develop the grip with sand blasting, once your hand is in the sand, clench and unclench your fist—you will be surprised at how difficult this is, particularly if you bury your hand up to the wrist. If this is too difficult, bury your hand up to the big knuckle and gradually work up to the wrist. As the explosiveness is not really necessary for developing the grip, you can “worm” your hand into the sand rather than thrusting it in with one move.

And finally, a deceptively simple method of training the grip is bar twirling. Have you ever twirled a drum stick? Imagine doing that, but twirling a long piece of iron rebar. The aforementioned John Brookfield recommends a 4 foot long, 3/4 inch thick rebar. Just twirl the bar slowly and deliberately with all fingers.

If you cannot do the rebar, just a curtain rod and build up to the thick bar. Once the 3/4 inch thick bar becomes too easy, work up to a 1 inch thick bar, and so on and so forth.

Conclusion

It may seem that two articles on grip training is redundant, but having two articles just emphasizes its importance. Now that you have sufficiently trained your grip to a high degree, you can begin learning “Tricks” that will both show off your strength, and develop your hand strength further. But perhaps that will be for another day.

Read More: Two Do-It-Yourself Methods For Training Your Forearms

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Roosh Q&A: 33 Answers To Personal Questions

August 21, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The next Q&A video answers questions that were directed to me specifically. After you watch the video, scroll down below to see bonus text answers.

Here's the index so you can jump around:

0:10
"I'm curious, in say, 50 or so years, how do you want to be remembered? For your game work? Or the push against the narrative pushed by the elite?" (INSIDE U O M)

1:20
"I also notice that you have more posts which hint that you're more open to fatherhood and settling down. How realistic is this for you now? Do you think your writing over the last decade in regards to game, sex and women is a barrier to settling with a good woman and having a family?" (INSUIDE U O M)

4:00
"Do you regret using your real name?" (EVIGT REGN)

6:09
"If you do not marry and have children, how will you spend your remaining years?" (LAGUNA BEACH FOGEY)

7:42
"After the DC shitstorm, how are your mother and sister doing? Do they plan on staying in America or quite possibly relocating to Europe? How has their life's change?" (KRATISTOS)

9:34
"What are your short term career plans(5+) years would you be interested in starting a podcast like Infowars, films that promote masculine values or a neomasculine magazine with short stories. How do you plan on moving the movement forward?" (KRATISTOS)

11:41
"When did you feel you made it as a PUA? Was there a specific instance where you felt all the theory coming together and it becoming easy for you to get laid?" (KRATISTOS)

13:08
"What does your mother think of ROK and your body of work?" (OCEAN SON)

15:09
"When in your 30's did your chief pursuits change from slaying endless poosy to becoming a full-blown modern day masculinity sage / anti-SJW fighter?" (HUBERT CUMBERDALE)

18:42
"If you could go back in time what would you change? What was your biggest mistake? Where do you see yourself in 10 years?" (RAASH)

20:47
"What is your greatest fear?" (ANDREA)

21:55
"What has been the biggest difficulties or most time consuming aspects of running your online projects, i.e. RVF, ROK?" (PHOENIX)

22:47
"What's next with this whole movement you've started? How will you recruit more people to the cause?" (COMTE DE ST GERMAIN)

24:23
"How has worldwide infamy affected your day to day life especially in regards to women or something as simple as walking around in the street?" (COMTE DE ST GERMAIN)

26:38
"With your shift from romance to sociopolitics over the past couple years, do you feel the things you have said and done have made a positive difference in the world for men like yourself? If that sounds broad allow me to rephrase: do you think your recent writing and things you've said and done with your public-figure platform have been making a positive impact on society?" (GENERAL STALIN)

29:42
"When you reflect on the books you've written over the years, how do you feel writing has affected you and how much of a different person do you think you would be if you hadn't written your books?" (FIGHTERSWORD)

32:26
"Who are the five males (either personally known or famous men) who have contributed the most to your views and current position in life today? What ideas, values or knowledge did each specifically contribute to you?" (GENERAL ZHUKOV)

35:44

“Why should men listen to you? And how much faith should they put in your words?” (TOM ARROW)

38:20
“What were you like before Roosh, before you became renown?” (VINCENT MENNITI)

39:54
“If your income didn’t depend on it, do you think the world was better before the internet?” (TEEDUB)

42:29
“Who are your favorite prose authors and your favorite poets?” (TOKYO JOE)

43:29
“Do you believe that we will live to see radical life extension?” (TYSK KILLE)

44:46
“What is your current relationship with a large contingent of the DC blog community that you socialised with back in your DCB days?” (HIPSTER STINK)

45:32
“What was your need of expose in public yourself like this ? Marketing ? Sell your books ? Because I saw that even you appeared in talk shows of eastern countries like Ukraine and Romania.” (JOSE LOPEZ)

47:54
“Return of Kings has many great, supportive articles for Republicans and Donald Trump. In which ways do they repay you for them, or is it fully non-profit and based only on internal beliefs?” (SENIOL)

49:15
“When can we expect your next book from your most successfull series Bang?” (SENIOL)

49:34
“Do you use any sort of beard oil/conditioner, and if so what brand?” (LUCKY)

50:14
“How do you react to those who are against you; those who are against your progress and your well being?” (SOUNDBYTE)

52:28
“Do you try to plan your life years ahead, or do you take it one day at a time?” (SOUNDBYTE)

53:30
“What can you say about how your compassion towards the Social Justice Warriors changed since they rose up against you?” (SOUNDBYTE)

55:12
“Have you thought about when your parents get elderly and they can’t look after themselves, Will you help with looking after them?” (ONETOUCH)

56:26
“Assume the global outrage over the tour and the meetups hadn’t happened, everything fine and without the media noticing – what would you have done afterwards?" (BENOIT)

57:41

"Do you browse 4chan's /pol/?" (EDGY EDGELORD)

Bonus text answers

"In light of all that has happened, are you planning to get more involved in the culture war of the west (media/public appearances) or pursuing more EE/SA/Asia ventures and blogging from afar as you get older?" (MICKEYD)

I'll be doing more blogging from afar. I rather be the idea man for young revolutionaries than the guy leading the charge on the battlefield. I want to focus on big ideas more than daily tactics.

"Will you ever do another tour, conference, or summit similar to last year?" (THE CITY BACHELOR)

Yes, possibly in 2017. Last year's tour was tons of fun, especially being able to meet so many men in a short amount of time.

"Do you see yourself spending more time in the States/returning to live permanently in the future? And if so, why?" (NASCIMENTO)

I don't plan on returning. There are lots of reasons, but the main one has become money. I can easily achieve my ideal lifestyle outside of the United States for a fraction of the cost. If I didn't have family in the USA, I'd never come back, since it doesn't have anything that I can't find elsewhere.

"Do you ever get bits of food trapped in the hairs of your beard?" (CAGGYBEAR)

Yes, all the time. If I eat a meal with sauce or grease, like a cheeseburger, I pretty much have to take a shower afterwards to clean it.

"Given that you're Europe-based, what is your plan regarding the inevitable future civil conflicts that will erupt in Europe? I.e. leave/stay, move further east, fight etc. " (PHOENIX)

Unless I am rooted to the land and have an ideal survivalist setup, I'd probably leave to safer lands. If I have a family and home in Europe, I'd be more inclined to stay. My backup plan if I leave Europe is Colombia.

"Do you intend to grow ROK into a more active alternative news source, i.e. having reporters/correspondents as well as opinion pieces?" (PHOENIX)

No, it will not become a news site, because that's a different ballgame. I want to stay focused on the gender issue and male improvement.

"What do you see as your next step(s) in life?" (YOSARRIANS RIGHT)

I'd like to make myself more resilient to media attacks, prepare for future world turbulence with more survivalist prepping, be on the lookout for a woman to possibly create a family with, and understand the "relationship game" knowledge that that would require.

“Does your fame or notoriety cause you to be recognized publicly in your day to day life. If so are they usually negative or positive experiences from haters or fans?” (JOSH BAR)

Haters never approach me alone. Either they yell from a distance or try to get a mob to confront me, like recently happened in the DNC. Getting recognized comes in spurts. It’s more common in the USA than Europe. It doesn’t happen enough that I’m tired of it.

“Would you ever seriously consider getting involved in politics in the US, in the next ten years?” (KAII)

No, because that would require me to live in the USA and re-enter an aspect of the rat race, though I’d consider it if Donald Trump calls me to serve in his administration.

“What is a skill you’d like to learn and why?” (DARIAN FREY)

I’d like to learn more about home improvement, wood working, carpentry, and gardening. I figure these skills will be easier to learn once I move out of the city. I’m ready to build my own castle.

“What are your long term writing goals? Dabbling a bit more in fiction or sticking primarily with non-fiction?” (2WYCKED)

Nothing in particular, but I will focus mostly on non-fiction. For ideas that are too dangerous, such as challenging the government, I will package them into fiction.

“Since the media outrage about the meet ups, has this exposure helped you to sell more books and being recognized by the girls in a sexual way?” (DR COTARD)

The increase in book sales and attention came in a wave and then went back down. For me to really take full advantage of exposure, I’d have to be in the middle of the news cycle regularly to constantly expose myself to mainstream audiences, similar to what Mike Cernovich is doing. That’s a job in itself.

“Since your newest book launch, have you experienced a renewed interest in your other books?” (DR COTARD)

Not too much since they’re so unrelated, but at least now I have an offering for men interested in more free speech and political issues than only game.

Previous Video: 26 Answers To Game & Travel Questions

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How The Establishment Will Shut Down Donald Trump

August 22, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Skewed polls aside, “the people’s choice” Donald Trump has a serious shot at wining the Presidency, especially if Clinton’s weaknesses appear in the debates in a month’s time and his ongoing re-tooling of his campaign is a success. People really don’t like the old harridan, and there’s still a lot of campaigning left. Despite media smear campaigns running in overdrive from day one, Trump is still competitive with Crooked Hillary in most polls.

Trump is our “Hail Mary” pass as we watch the nation, our freedoms, and our culture melt down. Our fingers are crossed as we inch on towards decision day in early November. However, there are four ways Trump could be eliminated from ascendance to the Oval Office. Here are a few ways the globalists’ dirty trick book could stop Trump from fulfilling his stated mission to Make America Great Again.

1. Assassination

Lord Jacob Rothschild David Rockefeller

Trump’s assassination would be convenient for the globalist elite

Whether by CIA Jackals doing the job at home they’ve been doing for 50 years abroad, i.e. killing presidents and other world leaders and then making their deaths look like accidents, or a “lone gunman” mowing him down in RFK fashion, an assassination is a distinct possibility if Trump is the real deal.

His presidency could make Brexit look like a sneeze in terms of his capacity to be a wrecking ball tearing down the elite’s well-laid plans for world domination. Reaffirming America’s sovereignty flies in the face of plans to flood the country with so many immigrants it will be unrecognizable in a generation, and to redistribute its wealth to other nations while forcing its citizens into unending debt servitude.

Trump’s campaign represents a repudiation of 30 years or more of globalist policies. The Silenced Majority is finally having their say, and globalist psychopaths do not like it one bit. Why? Trump’s presidency could mean an end to the military-industrial complex gravy train that runs on endless, imperialistic wars brought to us by the neocons, an end to the fiscal policies that are ruining the middle class and creating a greater divide between the rich and the poor, an end to insane immigration policies that are really a program of ethnically cleansing native citizens from their own countries, an end to trade policy that suppresses wages at home and shifts manufacturing abroad, and the transformation of an economy in which people either work their asses off and have nothing or lay around and wait for a government check and get everything handed to them.

Perhaps a more likely scenario would be the easiest to pull off with just the right sleight of hand.

2. Voter Fraud

Many nations – including Mexico – require voter identification but not the U.S.

Make no mistake, the demographics of America are being changed with an end goal in mind. If it weren't for those pesky white males the Democrats would already have a lock grip on political offices in the country, and no doubt would move the nation even farther to the left towards Communism. Changing demographics are how leftists take one state after the other out of the red column—permanently—and put them into the blue column.

We've all heard the accounts of everyone from illegals to dead people voting. But this is only one way democrats tilt the table.

Outright voter fraud has been common in much of the world, even though the sanctity of the ballot box has been taken for granted in the U.S. until recent years. In the last Presidential election, news emerged of a company called Scytl in Spain counting American votes from Barcelona. Imagine, the leader of the free world someday being selected by a little known company in another country. The company brags about how it has "transformed the global elections industry in only 15 years" and is gaining influence

In the U.S. As anyone with common sense knows, when vote counting is consolidated under one corporate entity all sorts of fraud are the likely result. Just this year, "Scytl successfully supported 3 states and 24 local jurisdictions during the 2016 Presidential Primary in February and Super Tuesday." The company recently put out this press release about a conference it had in Florida to push its wares:

> The conference presents an ideal opportunity to exchange best practices, discuss the future of elections and leverage how the voters across the US continue to benefit from the ramp up of the successful deployment of Scytl election modernization technology, proving the use of more secure and scalable technology is the way forward for a more efficient 2016 Presidential Election in November 2016.

The company is actively working to gain more even influence over U.S. elections. The press release reads like typical PR pap designed to fog the mind as they move to put your vote in their hands. In short, Scytl wants electronic voting, and the problem with that is algorithms can be devised to surreptitiously sway elections to the outcome desired by the vote counters in much the same way slot machines screw gamblers out of billions of dollars.

“Those who cast the votes decide nothing. Those who count the votes decide everything.” -Joseph Stalin

News also emerged of a computer programmer and former employee of both NASA and ExxonMobil testifying under oath before Congress about “election hacking.” Clinton Curtis told members of Congress how he was hired by Congressman Tom Feeney to build prototype software that would secretly rig an election to sway the result of a close election to one side. He built the software in 2000. Imagine what coding has been written since then.

In more recent years, hackers even proved Diebold election machines can be remotely hacked. Then there are stories of people selecting one candidate but the election machine changing it to another candidate in the booth. This could especially be a concern for older voters, who are not as tech savvy as younger voters.

Vote rigging is a real possibility, especially in a close election.

3. Right Wing “Terrorist Attack”

The media used the Dylan Roof shooting to take down a historical symbol

Could an October Surprise from the elites and their marionette Hillary come in the form of a False Flag “terrorist” attack from a crazed “right-winger”? It is plausible a false flag from one of the “patsies” of undercover operatives could be an effective public relations maneuver to destroy Trump’s campaign. Especially if the gunman happened to be a flag-waving, patriotic American, and a Trump supporter, or labeled as such in the media. We’ve all seen how quickly the mainstream media was able to get the rebel battle flag torn down because of young gunman Dylan Roof going on a rampage in South Carolina.

Logic matters little in the media echo chamber. It’s all about emotion, and generally what they sell is fear.

Right-wing groups will not get the carte blanche far left groups like Black Lives Matter did when they burned down cities and killed police officers. All it takes is one nut to ignite a firestorm the media will use to label all conservatives and Trump supporters on the alt-right as racists and every other pejorative in their boilerplate playbook.

4. Getting Bill Cosby’d

Character assassination is a convenient political tool that happens to work

Character assassination is a favorite of the left and the drive-by lamestream media. Regardless of his innocence or guilt, one must realize Bill Cosby was a convenient target for the Marxist left since he regularly promoted family values and criticized young African American men who didn't appreciate the values of education, self-respect, and self-improvement. He encouraged African American families to teach their children moral values at a young age.

In short, Cosby was promoting the very things that go against the left's playbook, as he railed against black crime and degeneracy in certain segments of the population. He frequently spoke about the breakdown of the family being responsible for many of the problems in the black community (problems that are now making their way into white communities as the family continues to break down and fathers are banished from society).

When rape charges surfaced, it was convenient for his enemies that his credibility on these issues was destroyed, and that women began to dogpile him with spurious accounts about sexual encounters from decades ago, perhaps seeking settlements on par with the large, undisclosed amount of money one women got out of him in the case of Andrea Constand v. William H. Cosby, Jr. When speaking of the events, Cosby told the press:

> I have been in this business 52 years and I've never seen anything like this. Reality is a situation and I can't speak.

An incident from Trump's past could be dug up and used against him in a similar manner. He surely has a lot of enemies being a successful businessman who has been involved with so many deals. Big media smears have little to do with reality and a lot to do with semantics and agendas. Everyone has a person lurking in their past with the desire to see them brought down. The difference with a figure like Trump is there could a a lot of money and power in the deal for a woman who comes forward with a similar account, whether true or totally fabricated.

Stand Guard

The psychopathic thirst for wealth and power cannot be quenched by a mere country, only the entire world will do

Whether it's these four means used to bring down Trump or another dirty trick from the globalist playbook, rest assured these or other calculated moves will be made against him the closer he gets to winning. There are those who stand to lose fortunes and stature if he becomes president. Worse, their plan of dominating Europe from Brussels and later the world from Washington is at risk. We are at a crossroads in human history. From here forward the world will continue with the nation-state, or the entire world will be bound together by "democratic" socialism, all true "diversity" and culture sacrificed in service of enriching an elite who will treat the rest of us like cattle on their world plantation.

If Trump goes down either in a rigged election, by character assassination or a literal assassination, we will be headed into uncharted territory. We can say goodbye to the America we once knew and loved, forever.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Did The Anti-Donald Trump Riot In Chicago Help Trump Cruise To Victory On Tuesday?

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Girl Plagiarizes Fifty Shades Of Grey To Falsely Accuse Her Father Of Rape

August 22, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> "His daughter had given a compelling interview to the police and my client had absolutely no real defence other than 'I did not do it.'"
>
> — The barrister, Cathy McCulloch, of a man falsely accused by his daughter of incestuous rape

Even as feminists claim that "rape survivors" are not believed enough by society, a British court has nearly convicted a man of incestuous rape, based solely on the testimony of his daughter. What saved him? His lawyer's knowledge that the daughter's story had essentially copied passages, if not the overarching plot of Fifty Shades of Grey.

After the man revealed to Cathy McCulloch that his daughter's favorite book was Fifty Shades of Grey, the barrister noticed the almost identical use of words, phrases, and passages from E. L. James' infamous novel. Armed with this discovery, it took only seven minutes for the girl's fabricated story to be demolished in court. Following this, I am yet to read or hear about any criminal charges or punishments to be meted out against the fabulist of a daughter. Undoubtedly, given the farcical "women are almost always victims" mentality of the British legal system, this vindictive false accuser will spared any sanctioning whatsoever, in addition to the lifetime of official anonymity she will be guaranteed.

The man's account is yet another chilling reminder that often the only thing saving innocent men from significant jail time and a life of undeserved social and even physical abuse is pure luck. Moreover, his plight should help us remember how the bar for sexual assault and rape convictions has been set so woefully low in the modern world. Rather than being dependent on the testing of proper, objective evidence, a man's fate is usually left to he-said-she-said calculations that automatically favor any emotional woman crying rape.

Look at the pathetic excuse she gave for her spectacular crime

"I hate you, dad, you're a loser, and I'm going to falsely accuse you of raping me!"

In a nutshell, she was angry with her father, found him strict, and wanted to teach him a lesson. If we take this as a basis for making false allegations, pretty much every prepubescent child and teenager, male or female, should be accusing their parents of sexual abuse or rape. As a teenager, in instances both justifiable and unjustifiable, I found my parents overbearing, restrictive, and unfair. Perhaps we could all get revenge on our parents, most notably our fathers, by inventing such trash?

As a society we have become so indulgent towards children, whether of the real or the adult but emotional kind, that people can not only make these claims, but essentially get away with making them when they are proven to be false. For example (and this is just one of dozens of similarly covered hoaxes in Britain alone), badly aging hag and thankfully bit-part Game of Thrones actress Souad Faress got away with a false rape accusation after video evidence conclusively demonstrated she made up the encounter. The Crown Prosecution Service in Britain not only went along with her madness and prosecuted innocent man Mark Pearson, it also refused to go after her when the fantasy was exposed in court for what it was.

The current system rewards good or eloquent actresses, not the presentation of evidence

Men falsely accused of rape face false accusers who have time to craft their fabulist stories and a legal system that has watered down the burden of proof and arguably reversed it.

I use the term “actors” here loosely. This does not mean that anyone alleging a crime, or defending against one, should not be able to testify. The basic aim of fair systems of criminal law, particularly once proceedings reach a courtroom, is to test whether someone is guilty or not and the respective claims of those taking either side. But this is not where determinations are supposed to end.

The whole point of the mandated “beyond reasonable doubt” standard in criminal trials is to put the onus on the state and its witnesses to prove a crime occurred. For crimes outside of rape (e.g. murder, armed robbery, serious fraud, or significant acts of vandalism), this does require objective evidence, whether CCTV footage, multiple witness statements observing the exact same event, recorded injuries, or something similar. Unforgivably, rape and sexual assault trials are treated as judicial anomalies that do not demand this form of conclusive corroboration.

The British man falsely accused by his malicious, evil daughter consequently faced an uphill battle from the start. His daughter’s tears and emotions obviously swayed the investigating officers, who lacked solid evidence anyway, and almost certainly made a very significant impression on the court (before her claims were blown out of the water). A man falsely accused of rape or sexual assault is indeed in the worst of positions legally-speaking. Even when “exonerated,” he is exposed to a lifetime of public hate and still regarded as guilty.

The stress that comes with realizing his situation and the very good likelihood of being falsely convicted is naturally going to make the average man far less effective and assertive in defending and saving himself either in a police interview or on the stand in court. Added to this is the time accusers have to prepare themselves for accusations–the male accused, by contrast, is usually blindsided and surprised. Considering the propensity of many in law enforcement to believe accusers and charge suspects with almost zero evidence, a large number of men are going to half-sense that their "guilt," however innocent they really are, is sealed.

Plus, the British daughter falsely accusing her daughter was not even the best actress. What happens if she had actually bothered to change certain words or phrases to make her accusations less like the passages and plot of Fifty Shades of Grey? This brings me onto my final point:

Even his lawyer thought his case was hopeless

The state of various Western legal systems is so parlous nowadays that even the British man's lawyer originally thought his position was unsalvageable. As the quote above shows, barrister Cathy McCulloch regarded the girl's police interview as "compelling" and the father had no recourse other than to say "I did not do it." Like McCulloch, others employed in the profession of criminal defence are more than aware that the de facto legal standard for those accused of rape and sexual assault is that they have to prove they are not guilty, rather than the state having to prove they are guilty.

Only McCulloch's delving into E. L. James' novel spared the father from a horrendous existence rotting in a prison cell. This amounts to a game of chance that no legitimate, let alone robust legal system can afford to countenance. It is time for rape and sexual assault trials to be treated in the same time-honored fashion as every other crime.

A lawyer should not have to read Fifty Shades of Grey to save their client from a false rape accusation.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Fifty Shades Of Grey Proves Women Want Male Dominance

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Anti-Vaccination Documentary “Vaxxed” Exposes The Medical Establishment’s Lies

August 22, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

“Oh my god. I cannot believe we did what we did…but we did.”
– Dr. William Thompson

Of all debates—the political, social, and the personal—the subject of vaccine safety is the one I broach the least with friends and colleagues. It’s a conversation that so few, even many of the most informed people I know, want to have.

For many, the subject immediately strikes a sharp chord that begets the reaction of conspiracy!, that maternal reflex of how dare you question what I put into my child’s body, or the classic you’re not a doctor, you don’t know! Nevertheless, the same people and I talk passionately about the transparent greed of Big Pharma, how it is the biggest lobby in Washington, and that it makes billions of dollars a year at the expense of overmedicated adults, the young and the old—yet when it comes to vaccines, the conversations falls to silence.

Big Pharma stands to make 3 billion dollars a year per vaccine added to the schedule… and yet Dr. Wakefield was questioned for his "financial incentives."

The new documentary Vaxxed: From Cover-Up to Catastrophe is like a shot in the arm (excuse the pun, but here the description is too apt) that turns up the volume on a pretty close to mute conversation.

Directed by the controversial British medical researcher and gastroenterologist Dr. Andrew "Don't Believe His Wikipedia Page" Wakefield (more on him later), Vaxxed is an impressively concise and affecting 90-minute exposé of the mercenary Medical Establishment. The film is refreshingly replete with fact-based skepticism, intellectual nerve, and yet free of reductive sensationalism and rhetoric—which is a difficult feat given the urgency of the issue.

The exonerated Dr. Andrew Wakefield, writer-director of "Vaxxed: From Cover-Up to Catastrophe".

Vaxxed advances the findings of Wakefield's 1998 research paper that there was a possible link between the MMR (measles-mumps-rubella) vaccine causing autism in young children. Unsurprisingly, the 1998 paper was aggressively disputed by vaccine manufacturers and "public health" institutes in the U.K. and United States.

In response, Dr. Wakefield and Dr. Walker-Smith were (wrongly) accused of ethical violations and falsifying data and, in turn, were discredited by the General Medical Council. The study's publisher, The Lancet, had to retract it; fortunately though, one of the study's coauthors Dr. John Walker-Smith—and Dr. Wakefield by association, though not officially—were later exonerated by the High Court of all counts of misconduct.

Now vindicated, and in a perfect stroke of irony, Dr. Wakefield lays the same claim against the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC): falsifying and manipulating data in a 2004 study that tested if there was a prevalence in young black males for developing autism after taking the MMR vaccine. Further, Wakefield asserts that the CDC destroyed documents thereby leading to an obstruction of justice.

How does Vaxxed argue this case? Extremely well via whistleblower accounts and recovered documentation that strongly suggests something shifty went on in this CDC study. The key whistleblower is Dr. William Thompson (quoted above), who was the CDC's senior scientist of vaccine safety and one of the four doctors that participated in the study. According to Thompson, the study revealed a prevalence but the CDC altered the data.

The CDC then buried the documents, but Thompson kept his copies and stayed silent for nearly ten years. In 2013 he contacted Dr. Brian Hooker, a PhD scientist and long-time critic of the CDC. It was to him whom Dr. Thompson shared his secrets, chief among them being that the CDC study did, in fact, determine an increased risk (3.36 times, to be exact) in black males developing autism when receiving the MMR vaccine before the age of 36 months, while male infants were 4 times as likely to develop autism than females.

Considering that 15 years ago only 1 in 10,000 children had autism and now that statistic has increased in terms of odds to 1 in 50, it is amazing more people don't get angry or even ask why?.

A CDC study showing a steady rise in Autism Spectrum Disorder in Atlanta, GA from 1991-2010.

In fact, the opposite happened: two disparate movements emerged, where you have the “pro-vaccine” versus the “anti-vaccine” camps. Similar to the left-versus-right mentality in American politics, a false paradigm has been created out of this issue to shut down productive, truly progressive scientific thinking.

Those who stand by the integrity of modern vaccines dismiss the opposition as “quacks” and “anti-science” and typically pull the “lack of evidence” card (even though this documentary shows that there is some) in attempt to silence opposition.

On the other hand, thinkers like Dr. Wakefield insist they are not anti-vaccine but merely “pro-vaccine safety.” It is incredible how the “anti-vaxxers” seem so alive in their interviews here, whereas the bureaucrat drones like CDC’s Coleen Boyle (shown only in archival footage as they refused to be interviewed) exhibit sunken, soulless expressions and dryly regurgitate rehearsed platitudes.

From archival footage in “Vaxxed”: CDC drudge Coleen Boyle testifying to congress.

Vaxxed makes this point repeatedly throughout its duration, while also offering solutions to keep the vaccine industry alive and well. Dr. Wakefield argues that single monovalent vaccines (meaning the ones that contain a single strain of a single antigen) would be a much safer option and avoid the risk of viral interference, but Merck has taken those vaccines off the market. Why not change it? Medical journalist Del Bigtree, featured in the film, explains that Merck would lose the patent.

Like the 2011 documentary The Greater Good, Vaxxed uses anecdotes of families whose children suffered a vaccine injury. Dr. Wakefield smartly begins with this footage to contextualize the issue in juxtaposition with an earlier barrage of news clips that show pundits and billionaires like Bill Gates shucking off claims that today’s vaccines are dangerous (even though the inserts of actual licensed vaccines make plain a list of possible side effects and neurotoxic additives like mercury and aluminum).

Vaxxed has been broadly labelled “anti-vaccine propaganda” by its critics. But any piece of media that seeks to make a social and political point is, to some degree, propagandistic as its aim is—and should be—to influence or question your present ideology. The film may agitate the stubborn-minded because Vaxxed does not equivocate on its position or make needless concessions.

Vaxxed is very clear with its intentions: predicting a 1 in 2 epidemic of autism by 2032, Vaxxed implores the viewer to take action, to write to your local congressperson, and stand up for your informed consent when it comes to vaccinations.

Tribeca Film Festival cofounder Robert De Niro publicly regrets banning “Vaxxed” from the festival’s lineup and insists it’s a movie people should see.

When a documentary like Vaxxed is bullied and banished from a major film festival (Tribeca Film Festival, though its cofounder Robert De Niro stands by the picture), one should have an instinct for knowledge and seek it out. Come away with your own conclusions, question the Medical Establishment and Dr. Wakefield’s narrative, just do your research, then follow the evidence and go with your gut.

Any reasonable person would agree that Big Business and Big Government do not always have the people’s best health and interests in mind, so ask yourself—why should that line of thinking end with vaccines? Is the science truly “settled” or are your own preconceived notions responsible for that settlement?

Agree or disagree with Vaxxed, but this much is true: it thrusts itself forward into the middle of a debate that needs to be happening now.

Vaxxed: From Cover-Up to Catastrophe* is now playing in select theatres. Visit vaxxedthemovie.com to check for local showtimes and to set up a screening in your area.

Read More: Florida Medical Students To Receive Important Training In LGBT Pronouns

Harry Lime

Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

3 Easy Ways To Eat And Cook With Bones

August 22, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I love meat, and I love bones. And we should try to pair these two things together whenever we can. Professional chefs will tell you that the things always taste better with the bones left in. But due to the increasingly sanitized society we live in, we're losing touch with the beauty and taste of bones. I wanted to write this article in praise of bones, in the hope that you consider making them a part of your culinary rotation.

I think my love for bones began when I read stories about how primitive humans would roast huge leg-bones of prey, and then smash them with stone tools to extract the rich marrow contained inside. Scientists tell us that bone marrow is packed with fat and nutrients, and that these things helped the human brain to grow.

My goal here is to present my favorite dishes involving bones. Finding bones is not difficult. My recommendation is to seek out a good butcher in your area and develop a rapport with him. These guys love it when customers take an interest in their trade, and will be more than willing to help you get what you need.

If you are in the United States, I also suggest going to butchers at Hispanic meat markets, if you can find them. Every large city has them. Traditional ways of cooking meat are still common in Hispanic communities, and you should take advantage of this.

Steak Fiorentina

There no way to top this recipe for simplicity and rustic power. Porterhouse steak is expensive these days, but every now and then you should try to treat yourself to this specialty of Tuscany. You have mouth-wateringly good steak coated with herb-infused olive oil. Make sure you get a steak with a good-sized bone in it. Here is how you put it all together.

1. The first thing you want to do is make the infused oil. Heat about 1/3 cup of good extra-virgin olive oil. Then add some herbs: rosemary, marjoram, sage, and garlic. Stir this for a few minutes and then set it aside.
2. Grill or broil a large porterhouse steak on a grill or a broiler, to the degree of "doneness" that you like. I like mine medium-rare. You will want the steak to be a thick one. Two inches thick, and about three pounds in weight is a good goal.
3. When the steak is done, put it on a plate and immerse it in the herb-infused oil. Let the steak rest in the oil and soak in all that goodness.
4. Cut the meat off the bone and drizzle some more of the infused oil on all of it.

Roasted Bones

Eating bone marrow is about as primeval and Paleolithic as you can get. For this dish, I would go to my Hispanic butcher and ask for thick marrow bones. Believe me, these guys know exactly how to cut bones up.

The nations of Central and South America are not squeamish about bones at all. Neither are the French, who love their bones. When you feast on this dish, remember that you are reaching across the millennia to what our ancient ancestors feasted on after a glorious hunt. This is not a light dish: it is very fatty and oily, as it should be. Wimps and wussified vegetarians need not apply here, it goes without saying.

Here are the steps to make good roasted marrow bones:

1. Have your butcher cut the marrow bones into pieces that are about 3 inches long.
2. Soak the bone pieces in cold salted water for about 12 hours. The idea here is to remove any impurities or blood. Change the salt water a few times during this process.

3. Drain the bones, pat them dry, and coat them lightly with cooking oil to prevent scorching, and to give them a nice brown color when they roast. Stand them up on end, and then roast them for about 15 minutes in a pre-heated oven set at 450 degrees F.
4. Serve the bones with a long, thin marrow spoon. Sprinkle with Kosher salt before serving. Some people like to eat marrow on crackers or spread on bread.
5. In England it's customary to eat marrow bones with a parsley salad, which is something relatively easy to prepare.

Beef Stock With Bones

Beef stock made with bones is one of those kitchen fundamentals that everyone should know how to make. You can use stock for nearly anything: stews, soups, cooking rice, whatever. You can even sip it straight. I don't know all the chemistry behind it, but there are great things in beef stock cooked with bones. Weightlifters, take note of this. My butcher has told me that veal bones are better for this recipe because they have more collagen.

Personally, I prefer what is called a brown stock: that is, the beef bones are roasted before you boil them. The end result is darker and stronger flavored. Making stock is flexible, and you can adjust the portions below to suit your needs.

1. In an oven set at 425 degrees F, roast about 3 or 4 pounds of bones cut into 2 or 3 inch pieces. You should roast the bones in a pan that also contains some sliced carrots, onion, celery, leeks, and garlic.
2. Put the bones and vegetables in a large stock pot. Make sure you deglaze the roasting pan with some water, and add all this roasted goodness to the stock pot as well. Toss in some herbs: thyme, bay leaf, and parsley work well.
3. Pour in enough water to cover everything, and bring to a boil. Let it simmer on low for about 4 hours.
4. Add salt to taste. Let the stock cool then put it into containers and either freeze or refrigerate. You can skim off the fat before you use the stock.

So these are three of my favorite bone recipes. There are literally dozens of recipes I could have chosen, but these were the ones I thought were most useful. I hope you'll find a way to incorporate bones into your eating habits. You can do it not just by trying these recipes, but by going out of your way to choose meats (beef, chicken, even fish) that have the bones in them.

It’s the way things ought to be.

Read More: How Jeb Bush Destroyed The Bush Dynasty And His Own Campaign

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Hillary And Bill Clinton Are Criminal Masterminds Wielding Incredible Power

August 23, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

One has to detest and at the same time admire the criminal genius of crooked Hillary "Rotten" Clinton and former President Bill Clinton. Consummate political game players, they went from backwater Arkansas all the way to the White House, and thanks to a Marxist media covering Hillary's rear flank, she has a real chance at becoming selected (not elected) for the office of President for the next 8 years.

The stories surrounding the couple's criminal activity stretch back to the very beginning of their rise to power, in 1980s Arkansas. Arguably, Bill fits the model of the sexually promiscuous psychopath perfectly, and Hillary fits the profile of the power obsessed psychopath perfectly. Together, they have repeatedly and literally gotten away with murder if emerging reports of their crimes are to be believed. The revelation of this criminality is thanks to the internet, not sycophantic journalists who won't do their fucking job.

These stories are only a briefer on the mountain of dirty dealings involving this power-seeking couple. They involve allegations of everything from Bill fathering a son with a prostitute, a son he abandoned, to hanging out with a pedophile dozens of times on his private island, to trafficking cocaine then killing numerous people who witnessed and had knowledge of a cocaine drop in rural Arkansas, to killing nearly 50 people who had incriminating evidence against them, among countless other scandals you may not have heard of.

Bill and His "Peaches"

Danney Williams still claims to be Bill Clinton's illegitimate son to this day

Monica Lewinsky was only the tip of the iceberg when it comes to former President Clinton screwing everything in sight. Even in his early days as Attorney General of Arkansas, Little Rock was awash in rumors about Bill's sexual mania. When he became governor twice, according to the testimony of Arkansas State Troopers and body guards he couldn't keep his pants zipped. These officials would later testify to witnessing Clinton's sexual escapades with hundreds of women. Trooper L.D. Brown testified he personally drove Billy to hundreds of extramarital affairs on state time and with state cars.

Trooper Larry Patterson also testified he witnessed a department store clerk performing oral sex on Clinton in a parked car numerous times, including in a parking lot close by Chelsea's elementary school and near the Governor's Mansion. Patterson even went so far as to say he often felt like Clinton's "pimp" who procured women for him to have sex with when he gave speeches as governor and was on the campaign trail.

> I saw, on several occasions, Bill Clinton engaging in sexual acts. While I was either blocking the road or working security at the Governor's mansion, I saw it with my own eyes take place, so it's not a rumor, it is firsthand. I was told by Bill Clinton that this was part of my job, to keep people from finding out about his affairs… It was probably the most bizarre time I've spent in my tenure with the State Police. I would be required to go out into the audience and get women's telephone numbers and their names, and to block streets and sit in women's driveways until the wee hours of 3, 4, and 5 o'clock in the morning…that's what I was required to do. I was told, when I protested about that, if I didn't like it to find another job.

Officer Roger Perry also corroborates Bill's sexual appetite, and details how he would use different troopers for hookups with different women.

> The entire conversation inside a vehicle in a two-hour drive from one point to another would be totally about sex and women or jokes. He would actually ask people how they performed oral sex on women in cars. I've been in that conversation. He would ask if you had ever had two to three women at one time in one bed; things like this. Bill Clinton was obsessed with that. And he had certain troopers that he used for certain women. And Larry Patterson and Danny > Ferguson were used for two women in particular.

Clinton and Alan Dershowitz took flights on the "Lolita Express" to Epstein's private island

And then, there's one of the biggest sex scandals of all, with claims that Clinton fathered a son–Danney Williams—with a black prostitute, who to this day claims Bill Clinton is his father and to many bears a striking resemblance to the former President. According to Bobbie Ann Williams, the former prostitute, the pregnancy happened after a cocaine-filled weekend of partying. (Bill's own brother, Roger Clinton, is seen on DEA undercover footage saying he had to get some cocaine for Bill because "he's got a nose like a vacuum cleaner.") The former prostitute, along with many other women who Clinton banged have reportedly been threatened, told to dummy up and keep their mouths shut by Hillary.

More recently, Bill was connected to convicted pedophile Jeff Epstein. As reported by The Daily Mail:

> Bill Clinton spent enough time aboard disgraced Wall Street mogul Jeffrey Epstein's 'Lolita Express' airplane that he should be eligible for frequent flyer miles, according to a shocking new report that reveals how often the former U.S. president road along with with the convicted sex offender. Flight logs reviewed by Fox News show Clinton took 26 trips aboard Epstein's Boeing 727 jet, more than double the 11 flights previously known. Epstein's jet was reportedly set up with a bed where guests had group sex with young girls.

The story of the Clintons goes well beyond banging half of Arkansas and spending a curious amount of time with a pedophile. (How convenient that legalizing pedophilia is emerging as an agenda item and is making its appearance in pop music!) Lamestream media featured reports on Bill's sexual dalliances in 1994, but the bombshell went nowhere in the overall narrative, perhaps because the troopers revealing the sexcapades were being threatened.

Threatening Troopers

Once Bill had screwed half of Arkansas, and threw his hat into the ring for a Presidential run, several troopers came forward telling tales about what he had been doing in his more than a decade as governor. In the ensuing scandal the media dubbed Troopergate, State Troopers Larry Patterson and Roger Perry spilled the beans about Clinton's "Cheatin' Heart" to journalist David Brock.

Brock's story caught fire, and started to spread. However, during Troopergate, Clinton reportedly threatened the police, saying their careers would be destroyed, and they themselves would be destroyed if the stories didn't stop. Patterson, who was no less than a State Trooper being threatened, even received a handwritten note expressing concern about his health. He told interviewers:

> I was not physically afraid of Bill Clinton, I was afraid of his power… He had some people [surrounding him] who were quite scary.

In addition to threatening law enforcement officers (and with a long trail of "Arkancided" bodies behind them already, as we will see in a moment), both Crooked Hillary and Bill referred to police as "ignorant son of a bitches." Hillary was openly hostile towards law enforcement officers, to the extent many Arkansas State Troopers would work double shifts and overtime just to avoid traveling with her. One Trooper is quoted as saying:

> Deep down that woman really hated Arkansas, the people in it, and almost everything else except being top dog.

Brock later apologized to Clinton, but did not retract any of the facts in his story. Maybe he was afraid he'd end up dead of two gunshot wounds to the back of the head in an "Arkancide"?

Mena, Arkansas

The Mena scandal was even covered by local news stations and implicated the involvement of three presidential administrations

The Troopergate scandal pales in comparison to all the stories surrounding the tiny town of Mena, Arkansas.

Reporter Gary Webb of the San Jose Mercury News broke a huge story that alleged when Bill Clinton was governor, the Mena airport was a CIA Drop Location for cocaine being smuggled into the United States from Latin America. (Additionally, three presidential administrations have been connected to Mena, AR drug smuggling including Reagan, Bush I, and Clinton).

There is little doubt it was the center of a multibillion dollar drug running and money laundering operation. Reports also surfaced the airport was used to transport arms to Nicaraguan contras during the Reagan administration. Loads of cocaine averaging 300 lbs and worth millions of dollars were parachuted into remote locations in Arkansas in the single largest cocaine smuggling operation in U.S. history. Trooper L.D. Brown testified Governor Clinton was aware of all this in 1984, but did nothing to stop it. Perhaps because he was profiting from it.

A few years later, two young boys, Kevin Ives and Don Henry were found dead on train tracks in rural Arkansas after some say they witnessed one of the police-protected drug drops of the type detailed above. Arkansas State Medical Examiner Fahmy Malak, who by many accounts was falsifying death reports regularly, under the protection of Clinton's power (in one case reporting ulcers had killed a decapitated man) ruled the deaths of Ives and Henry as "accidental," the result of falling into a "deep sleep" on the train tracks after smoking marijuana.

However, forensic evidence showed their deaths were the result of foul play before they were put onto the train tracks for the next train to run over. Their deaths were only the beginning of a reign of terror once rumors of government-involved cocaine smuggling surrounding the case began to catch fire. Each time a witness came forward who claimed to have knowledge of what really happened during the botched drug drop and subsequent murders of two young boys, they wound up dead—usually from a shotgun blast.

Kevin Ives and Don Henry were only the beginning of a long list of casualties connected to the Mena drug smuggling operation

People close to the case started dropping like flies. One witness, Keith Coney said he knew too much about the murders and feared for his life—and indeed, he was later found dead. Coney had been slashed in the neck by an assailant, and fled on a motorcycle only to crash into the back of a truck, a crash that killed him.

Boonie Bearden, another witness who claimed to have information in the case disappeared, never to be seen again. Keith McKaskle, who also claimed to have knowledge of the crimes died from 113 stab wounds. Next, Gregory Collins claimed to have knowledge of the murders, and was found dead of a shotgun blast to the face. Jeff Rhodes also claimed to have knowledge of the murders, and was later found dead in a dumpster of a gunshot blast to the head.

Richard Winters claimed to have knowledge of the Ives/Henry case and was also killed by a shotgun blast. Jordan Ketelson was killed before he could testify, also from a shotgun blast. How these people dropping like flies in rural Arkansas surrounding a double homicide never made it to the Nightly News only shows what a lock grip on information the media had over the nation for 50 years.

Jean Duffey, an agent with the drug task force went up against the machine to try and fight the drug smuggling. She later said:

> I didn't understand the power of the political machine back then, but after being persuaded by the FBI to assist in an investigation they opened in 1994, I learned of connections to the CIA, Mena, and drug-smuggling. I finally understood; to solve the train deaths case would be to expose the crimes of Mena, and no government agent who has come close to doing either has survived professionally.

Or literally survived, it would seem. Just when the Mena scandal was gaining momentum and even mainstream media coverage during the 1992 campaign, a Time hit piece came out and quashed the issue. Unfortunately, the rise of the internet was in its infancy, and in these days the mainstream media reigned supreme, so the huge scandal was quickly forgotten.

During the Clinton presidency, accusations resurfaced (most notably in the film Clinton Chronicles) that Clinton, during his time as governor of Arkansas, and other high-ranking state officials were involved in some way with illegal cocaine importation, money laundering, and drug use centered upon the airport in the tiny town of Mena. The claims never gained the traction with "journalists" they deserved.

Clinton Body Count

The Clinton Body Count has even received mainstream newspaper coverage this year, although usually with a derisive tone

It freaks me out to even cover this. If I am found dead, I DID NOT commit suicide. All jokes aside, this is without a doubt the most serious of the possible Clinton crimes. Mysterious deaths have followed Hillary and Bill from Arkansas through their years in the White House, and mysterious deaths have started happening all over again in Hillary's 2016 campaign.

Three men with ties to the DNC—one of which Julian Assange insinuated was the man behind the DNC email leak scandal—have all wound up dead this summer. Seth Rich was the email leaker, reportedly "robbed" then killed in the wee hours of the morning, even though his wallet and personal items were still found with his body. Rich was a data analyst, so it's obviously he would have access to sensitive DNC computer systems.

Then there was Shawn Lucas, found dead on his bathroom floor after serving the DNC with a summons for fraud on behalf of Bernie Sanders supporters. Finally, John Ashe apparently dropped a barbell on his throat a few days before he was scheduled to testify about shady financial dealings involving a former Clinton crony.

But wait, there's more. These deaths are only the most recent on the growing Clinton Body Count list of convenient deaths. Earlier this month, author Victor Thorn perhaps became the latest victim on this growing list of bodies of people who either crossed the Clintons, wrote unflattering things about them, or had incriminating evidence.

> American Free Press contributor Victor Thorn, 54, a long-time researcher and critic of Hillary and Bill Clinton, has been found dead. Police reports indicate he died of a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

"Self-inflicted gunshot wounds" are the standard cover story for most of the 50 deaths on the Clinton Body Count list. Apparently, there are a lot of people inflicting gunshot wounds on themselves, often several gunshot wounds at the same time or numerous gunshots to the back of their own head. All in all, there are around 50 bodies of people who were close to the Clintons found dead under mysterious circumstances, most of them in the prime of their lives.

A few were either unbelievable strokes of luck or planned hits for the Clintons, like a plane crash that allowed them to wash their hands of two men at the same time: Ron Brown, former Chair of the DNC and Cabinet member who was facing a corruption investigation and threatening to expose the White House's yet unrevealed Asian fund-raising scheme, and Charles Meissner, assistant secretary for international trade who faced federal charges for campaign finance fraud, a scandal that enmeshed the Clinton administration. These threats went away when their plane took off from mujahideen-infested Bosnia and crashed into a mountainside.

Hillary with Foster, who some say was her lover before she had him executed

The most infamous name on the lengthy list is Vince Foster, found dead in Ft. Marcy Park in Washington, a lawyer who had intimate details of the Clintons' financials in dirty dealings like Whitewater. Foster made a call to Hillary hours before his "suicidal" death. The following day, in what looks like a huge coverup, Bill Clinton fired every U.S. attorney in the country and also fired the head of the FBI William Sessions, an unprecedented move in which all officials in those offices were replaced.

There's even a White House Chef on the list who worked under the Clintons found dead in a mysterious drowning in New Mexico. Then there's Mary Mahoney, killed in another botched robbery (same playbook as Seth Rich) who would have been a star witness in the Clinton impeachment trials, who refused Clinton's sexual advances. Were these dozens of convenient deaths accidents? Or do these deaths reflect FDR's prescient quote:

> In politics, nothing happens by accident. If it happens, you can bet it was planned that way.

Murdering people surely goes well beyond the Monica Lewinsky blowjob scandal. But, as usual the media didn't do their job in informing the American public what was really going on in the 1980s and 1990s.

Even More Scandals

The dirty dealings and deaths surrounding Hillary and Bill rival a horror film

The Clinton Foundation. Whitewater. Emailgate. Benghazi. Foggy Bottom. Sidney Blumenthal. The Chicago Mercantile Exchange incident, in which Hillary made a statistically impossible $100,000 profit off a tiny $1,000 initial investment. ADFA. Dan Lasater. Don Tyson tax breaks and DEA linked cocaine trafficking. The list of possible Clinton-involved crimes goes on and on and on.

To me, what is most telling about all these scandals is not that they happened, as it is coming to light that most people in government are totally corrupt sons of bitches, but what adept game players the Clintons are, and just how dirty they are. As Michael Corleone says in The Godfather III just as his own family is becoming involved in politics:

> The higher I go, the crookeder it becomes.

The story of the rise of the Clintons is rivals the story of the rise of the Bushes. Here we have the two top political families in America, the Clintons and Bushes, who have been either President, Vice President, Secretary of State or running for the office since 1980, running the country like an oligarchy and involved in criminality that would make a mafia don blush. What is amazing to me is what sheep the American people have been, believing these people have their best interests in mind when really they're playing the dirtiest game known to man to rise to dominance in a government that does nothing but waste taxpayer money, and in which they engorge themselves and their friends.

Gentlemen, the Clinton saga is proof political games have never changed since Greek and Roman times, but what has changed is how masterful politicians have become at fooling the masses, concealing their crimes and having the media play cover for them. Realize, when Trump uses the moniker "Crooked Hillary" it is not hyperbole. This duo has been involved in criminality most of their lives.

Read More: Crooked Hillary Accepts Democratic Party Nomination In Ravishing Chairman Mao Outfit

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

American Girls Are The Papa John’s Of Women

August 23, 2016 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Fast food has its purpose. But I don’t know anyone, given the choice, who would pick a Big Mac over a gourmet meal from a fancy restaurant–or, better yet, a nice home-cooked banquet. Like it or not, women follow the same rules. My business has recently taken me on some pretty extensive travels around the world. And like so many men I’ve talked to, spending time away from the United States opened my eyes to a few things. But on those travels, one agonizing fact kept nagging my thoughts: sooner or later, I knew I was returning back to my country—and its Papa John women.

And, sure enough, the moment my big toe touched American soil, I confirmed every single one of my fears. We’re serving up fast food, and of the worst kind.

Why Papa John’s?

My beef with Papa John goes back a few years, but is encapsulated by one occasion when I was throwing out my garbage and spotted a greasy Papa John’s pizza box jammed in between the Hefty Cinch Saks. It couldn’t have looked more unappealing, with its greasy back, and it reminded me of the Papa’s thin, watery sauce and undercooked toppings. What might have been a passing moment was etched into my brain with one thought: somebody is keeping this place in business.

This might be controversial, but Papa John’s is the least edible of the fast food pizzas. I’d take a Domino’s and, to a lesser extent, a Pizza Hut pizza any day of the week. Pizza Hut may have that thick, butter-laden crust but the toppings don’t slide off of it the moment you don’t keep it at a perfect horizontal angle, or choose not to eat it with a fork and knife.

They're greasy.

American girls' fatness is so well-documented, it's almost absurd to repeat it. To make matters worse, people all over the world know this about them—making them a national embarrassment of Starbucks-milkshake proportions. I was frankly shocked at the extent of laughs I could get at the expense of American women abroad. I felt a little unpatriotic at moments, but saying something as simple and factual as "an American girl could eat that whole thing," would bring the house down. Reliably.

They're unhealthy.

It's one thing to be fat, but American girls are also mental wrecks. Medicated to oblivion, and—even the best of them—harboring bizarre attitudes towards sex and relationships, American women are nutritionally bankrupt. You don't eat Papa John's for the vitamins, and you don't feel great after having finished one. While I'm left in a strange funk after spending any kind of time with an American girl, I was sighing at the loss when I'd drop off a foreign girl back at her house or put her in a cab.

They’re cold and sloppy.

Papa John’s may be convenient, but it comes at a roughly body temperature and makes a mess if you so much as try to lift up one of those soggy slices. That’s your American woman in a nutshell. Emotionally damaged, they’re apprehensive and terrified of showing the slightest hint of affection, thinking icy bitchiness is a replacement for polite disinterest. And they’ll almost certainly make a mess if you put your thirsty hand in that box. Getting involved with an American girl these days is a near-guarantee that you’ll be paying retail price for something that’s internationally known as being low quality–can’t cook, clean, or dress. I had forgotten flip-flops existed until just a few days ago.

They’re discarded.

Crushed between two garbage bags in the tank, American girls are the greasy remnants of the meal we ate in desperation last night. You may have gotten the box out of your house, but the effects remain: you’re that much more undernourished, unsatisfied, and depressed as a result. But on a street full of nicer restaurants, your best bet is to pick a better place to eat.

Returning to America after an extended hiatus has reminded me just how much men are being robbed blind here. Abroad, I’d see guys proudly holding hands with a pretty girl and both of them showing heart-felt affection. It took all of 10 minutes for me to spot the American equivalent: a miserable-looking dude with a dumpy girl—who was edible, if she was delivered to your house—in a contorted death grip that looked like someone had put a gun to their backs. As my bags came off the carousel, I knew one thing: I was back to eating Papa John’s.

Read More: 24 Signs She’s A Slut

Tuthmosis Sonofra
Tuthmosis is a Columnist-at-Large at Return of Kings. His work has been covered by major media outlets such as The Huffington Post, Cosmopolitan, Vice Magazine, The Daily Mail, and Yahoo Shine. He's also been profiled by BuzzFeed and The New Statesman. You can follow him on Twitter.

What To Do If You're Accused Of Sexual Harassment At Work

August 23, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

A man is beholden to the circles within which he moves. We are all obligated to obey the laws of our societies, and we are sometimes bound by additional rules of groups within society as well. Whether that be your social organization, your school, or your place of work, behavior within the law, but outside the code of these places, can get you into serious trouble.

Sexual harassment is one of those acts, and today we'll talk about what you can do and should do if you are accused of sexual harassment at work.

> Sexual harassment is defined as:
>
> Unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature when:
>
> - Submission to such conduct is made either explicitly or implicitly a term or condition of an individual's employment, or
> - Submission to or rejection of such conduct by an individual is used as a basis for employment decisions affecting such individual, or
> - Such conduct has the purpose or effect of unreasonably interfering with an individual's work performance or creating an intimidating, hostile, or offensive working environment.

There’s a list of some 56 different things that can be defined as sexual harassment, and we could spend the entire article talking about what is, and what is not, sexual harassment, but a working red pill definition is “anything that is unwelcome to someone based on sexuality.” The key word is “unwelcome;” in order for sexual harassment to actually be illegal, it has to either create a “hostile work environment” or result in something adverse happening to the victim, like being demoted or fired.

Neither of these conditions are cut and dried. Your employer, having received a complaint from a woman against you, might not wait for a court of law to determine that a hostile work environment exists because of your actions and may just fire you out of hand, especially if you are in a US “right to work” state (where you can be fired for any reason at any time.)

Similarly, adversity to an employee is also not always strictly defined; I just got demoted and a female co-worker promoted in our company’s reorganization into the spot I should have had, but I have no recourse, being a man, as it doesn’t fit the narrative for a man to be a victim of corporate discrimination over sex.

Now that we have as precise of a handle on what it is, let’s make a plan for dealing with an accusation of sexual harassment.

Decide if you want to keep your job

The first thing you have to decide is whether or not you want to keep your job. With many corporations being required to only say “Yes, he worked here from X to Y” because they are so scared of lawsuits, getting fired for sexual harassment may have no different effect from being laid off, because your references won’t be able to say anything differently. The upshot of this is to decide how happy you are with your job, and how acceptable the idea of changing jobs is to you then and there.

I see three situations. You can give not one single rat’s ass if you keep your job or not; you can view keeping your job as essential, or you can take it or leave it depending on the outcome of this harassment complaint. This is the first point in determining your strategy.

Were there witnesses?

Sexual harassment is often punished without proof. It is literally “he said; she said” a lot of the time. If there is no evidence (like emails or texts) or if there are no witnesses; it’s going to be a lot easier to cast doubt on if anything at all actually happened than if someone witnessed it and is backing the complainant up, or if she’s whipping out the dick pic you texted her work phone. Evidence and witnesses are going to be the second point in your strategy.

Did anyone hear you say this?

So far, I have yet to hear of much cyber-framing going on with people doctoring up emails and the like to turn you in. This is, incidentally, the biggest reason to lock your damn computer whenever you get up from it, it’s very easy to send an email from your account, from your computer, that will ruin your career before you can get back from taking a piss.

The main problem is going to be false witnesses. If you’re being set up for the fall, if whoever saw it go down is a friend of the complainant, she’ll say whatever the two of them cook up together and you will now have to fight them both.

Can it be explained away?

That same co-worker I mentioned above has a torture survivor’s flinch to being touched. She’s yelled at me before for tapping her on the arm when I’m trying to get her attention in a meeting on the floor because I need something, after calling her name multiple times. While I have done the safe thing and already relayed this behavior to my manager just in case she pulls anything in the future, my point in this example is that tapping someone on the shoulder is not sexual harassment and can be explained away by showing that this is behavior commonly accepted in society and that she's neurotic.

There's a difference for being taken to task for slapping a chick on the ass versus asking her out on a date and causing her to be offended by your temerity. What actually went down is the third point in your strategy.

The plan

Chances are, the first you'll learn of this is at a meeting where they will haul you in and shock you with the fact that you are being investigated for sexual harassment. Harassment is one of those odd things that is illegal only if proven to cause all that stuff written at the start of the article, so it isn't illegal before it is proven by court. However, it is also one of the only not-explicitly illegal acts that can get you immediately fired. Most big companies have some sort of "penalty volcano" with escalating punishments for repeated infractions, but sexual harassment can be a one-and-done sort of thing.

First thing you must do is shut up, do not say anything that will incriminate you. You, unfortunately, do not yet have the right to remain silent, but you do have the right to control what you say. If the HR people say "It was said you touched her intimately," you do not say "I touched her on the shoulder," because they will then bust you for touching her at all. Instead, just deny whatever is said; "I did not touch her intimately." Don't admit to anything, every sentence should be "I did not do X."

Second thing is lawyer up with an employment lawyer. Ask to stop the meeting so that you can arrange representation. If they claim you will not need a lawyer and it can be handled internally and will not let you go get one, sit through the rest of the meeting then go get one that day anyway.

Follow your lawyer's advice; it could well be that, by getting a lawyer, your company will back off and try to make it all go away. In that event, the lawyer may get your HR department to give you a letter stating that you are under no investigation for this alleged incident by threatening a defamation lawsuit.

Lawyering up is not going to win you any friends in HR, which is why many people are against it. However, if you got accused of sexual harassment and they're serious about it, you don't have any friends there anyway, and you may be money ahead by getting legal help before you get fired, as opposed to afterward. Everything from suits for defamation of character to monetary compensation for damages from being fired, as well as forcing your rehire is on the table.

Third thing is to write everything down as it happens, and as you remember it from previous events. This information is for you and your lawyer, not HR.

Variations on a theme

How much you want to keep the job is a factor in how brash you want to be. On one extreme, there's the "Oh, yeah? You can't fire me, I quit!" and, provided you get those words out of your mouth before they actually fire you, you technically resigned before getting sacked.

You could take the approach of the line in the sand; if they cross it and insult your dignity, you're out. I've gone to a meeting with a resignation letter before; I didn't use it, but it was there.

However, if you really want to keep your job, your best bet is to get out of the initial accusation meeting as soon as you can, without saying anything that can incriminate you, and get an employment lawyer immediately.

If there is a witness, or if you are uncertain that there is a witness or not, be doubly careful. Confirm things that are part of your job, only. “Did you meet with her?” deserves an answer. “Did you arrange the meeting?” is leading, and only deserves a “I met with her” response.

I would save the explaining away for later. You can always back off, but sex harassment is serious business, and an accusation of it, even for something innocuous, is something for you to go straight to the carpet with them on. It is not for you to say to them “a reasonable person would not consider a tap on the shoulder to be sexual harassment;” that line is your lawyer’s.

Conclusion

Say as little as possible, get out of there, lawyer up. The best outcome is that your employer backs off, and a letter is put in your file that anything you even remotely could construe as retaliation against you in the future would result in litigation against the company and they then leave you alone for the rest of your career. Companies never do what is right; they do what is easiest. You want to make it so that the easiest thing for them to do is leave you alone.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How Human Resources Departments Are Ruining STEM Jobs For Men

Rufus Winnfield

"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

Does Might Make Right?

August 23, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Might Is Right attempts to make the social Darwinist argument that the human natural order only rewards strength and power, just like in the animal kingdom, and those who do not understand this fact will always get trampled on by groups who are more powerful.

Written in 1890 by anonymous writer Ragnar Redbeard, it includes a scathing attack on Christianity for fostering weakness in European-derived people. In spite of the questionable morality of its Darwinist position, the book's predictions about how the West will be weakened has been quite accurate.

> The natural world is a world of war; the natural man is a warrior; the natural law is tooth and claw. All else is error.
>
> […]
>
> The victor gets the gold and the land every time. He, also, gets the fairest maidens, the glory tributes. And – why should it be otherwise? Why should the delights of life go to failures and cowards? Why should the spoils of battle belong to the unwarlike? That would be insanity, utterly unnatural and immoral.

Redbeard argues that only a society built upon the principles of strength can avoid the crippling social problems that our generation is currently fighting against. The promotion of egalitarian ideas, which the author states originated with Christ, have elevated the weak and degenerate as beacons of what is right and true.

> What is your “civilization and progress” if its only outcome is hysteria and down going? What is “government and law” if their ripened harvests are men without sap? What are “religions and literatures” if their grandest productions are hordes of faithful slaves? What is “evolution and culture” if their noxious blossoms are sterilized women? What is “education and enlightenment” if their deadsea fruit is a caitiff race, with rottenness in its bones?

When strength is not seen as a virtue, mean become weak and lost, mere slaves to the system that now has them solidly controlled.

> Everything that a corrupt civilization can do, is done to compress the growing intellect into unnatural channels. Thus the great mass of men who inhabit the world of to-day have no initiative, no originality or independence of thought, but are mere subjective individualities, who have never had the slightest voice in fashioning the ideals that they formally revere.

Redbeard anticipates that a strongman type of leader will reassert the natural order. From him will come untold destruction as the system is overturned. Perhaps the man that Redbeard envisioned was Hitler, who did rise to power forty years after the book was written.

> Mankind is aweary, aweary of its sham prophets, its demagogues and its statesmen. It crieth out for kings and heroes. It demands a nobility – a nobility that cannot be hired with money, like slaves or beasts of burden. The world awaits the coming of mighty men of valor, great destroyers; destroyers of all that is vile, angels of death.

Absolute truth that stems from nature must be identified and obeyed. Everything else can be discarded. Otherwise, egalitarian lies will ingrain itself into a people and destroy them to the point of extinction.

> Whatever alleged “truth” is proven by results, to be but an empty fiction, let it be unceremoniously flung into the outer darkness among the dead gods, dead empires, dead philosophies and other useless lumber and wreckage.
>
> …when a lie has gone too far—when it has taken up its abode in the very tissues, bones and brains of a people, then all remedies are useless.

A man who doesn’t believe in using violence to achieve powerful ends is a slave to those who do, for violence is the only way to overthrow a tyrant.

> Strong men are not deterred from pursuing their aim by anything. They go straight to the goal, and that goal is Beauty, Wealth and Material Power. The mission of Power is to control and exploit the powerless, for to be powerless is to be criminal.

> […]
>
> He who is afraid to risk his life must never be permitted to win anything.
>
> […]
>
> During the whole course of human history, there is not upon record, one authentic instance wherein a subjugated people has ever regained property-holding Liberty, without first butchering its tyrants.

The author's attack on Christianity is one of the harshest I've seen. He argues not whether Christ exists or not, but that he's weak, incompetent, and has led European people astray for centuries.

> Behold the crucifix, what does it symbolize? Pallid incompetence hanging on a tree.
>
> […]
>
> 'Love your enemies and do good to them that hate you and despitefully use you' is the despicable philosophy of the spaniel that rolls upon its back when kicked.
>
> […]
>
> If we lived as Christ lived, there would be none of us left to live. He begat no children; he labored not for his bread; he possessed neither house nor home; he merely talked. Consequently he must have existed on charity or have stolen bread.

I've long argued that practicing game is a way for man to reach his potential, since it forces you to improve many other areas of your life. Redbeard states that war is the true mechanism that fosters the best of men and nations.

> If men lived 'like brothers' and had no powerful enemies (neighbors) to contend with and surpass, they would rapidly lose all their best qualities; like certain oceanic birds that lose the use of their wings, because they do not have to fly from pursuing beasts of prey. If all men had treated each other with brotherly love since the beginning, what would have been the result now? If there had been no wars, no rivalry, no competition, no kingship, no slavery, no survival of the Toughest, no racial extermination, truly what a festering 'hell fenced in' this oldglobe would be?

The author interprets equality as a poisoned idea that has been allowed to spread by inferior individuals who should have been destroyed by the strong, and that the struggle for existence will soon commence anew, more vicious than before.

> Neither the machinery nor the raw material of equality has ever existed, only the dream, the idea of it. Equality! Equality! In that one word is summed up the accumulated dementia of two thousand years! The thought of it was born in the brain of an inferior organism, and the brains of inferior organisms nourish it still.

> […]
>
> …the easiest way to enslave a Race is to wheedle it into or impose upon it counterfeit Ethics, that is to say, fraudulent standards of morality.
>
> […]
>
> Foolish and blind (or mad) are they who think the struggle for existence ended. It is only begun. This Planet is in its infancy, not in its decrepitude. The "end of all things" is afar off. The kingdom of heaven is not at hand. Incessant is the rivalry for supremacy among men, and manifold are its metamorphoses. Not for a single hour, for a single second, is there an armistice. Night and day the combat rages.

Redbeard correctly predicted the sterility that would result if our countries were taken over by "social justice" and other ivory tower propagandists.

> Overt action is not always needful for the drastic removal of lower organisms. Very often, if left alone, degenerates cremate themselves. If given control of governmental mechanisms, they immediately commence to grind one another into mincemeat (that is to say, into dividends) – crying Holy! Holy! Holy! Mentally, physically, morally, they are past redemption. Doomed souls are they, miserable sinners!
>
> […]
>
> As the Old Man of the Mountains trained his fanatical Assassins and sent them forth to slay, so Civilization trains its Fiendling Intellectuals and sends them forth to assassinate Human Nature.

You won't win if you follow prescribed rules of law or morality. Redbeard advises you to break the rules in order to accomplish your goals. Violence, thieving, and immorality can be seen as justified and even celebrated if does on a large enough scale.

> Great animals (whether man or brute) never operate in strict accordance with prearranged rules of procedure. If they did do so, they could never prosper and would die of hunger. Their greatness lies in springing surprises, in doing exactly what their antagonists (or intended quarry) doesn't expect them to do, in being beyond and above all moral measurements whatsoever.
>
> […]
>
> Slay one man (in order to rob him) and you are a murderer. Slay a million men (in order to rob them) and you are a renowned general. Annex from one person and you are a felonious ruffian, but annex from the whole population or from rival nations, and you are made Chancellor of the Exchequer, Chairman of Ways and Means, or decorated with the grand cross of the Legion of Honor.

Women want a virile, strong man, not a vegetarian weakling.

> Strength, energy-of-character, ferocity, and courage, she admires in her possible husband, above all other qualities combined. Even to be carried-off by force, is > not repugnant to her feelings, if the 'bold bad man' is in other respects acceptable. She pines to be 'wooed and won,' (or as it were) she likes to feel that she has been mastered, conquered, taken possession of—that the man who has stormed her heart is in all respects, a man among men.

>
> […]
>
> Wherever soldiers conquer in war, they also conquer in love—after the first paroxysm of revengeful patriotism is over. Women of vanquished races are usually very prone to wed with the men who have slaughtered their kindred in battle.

Redbeard states that feminists are absolutely useless because they cannot provide strong men with sons.

> There is nothing particularly inviting about baren, dyspeptic, bluestocking, 'New Women,' in pants and spectacles; talking idiotic snuffle through their noses; with busts made of adjustable india-rubber; with narrow or padded hips, and 'wheels between their legs,' scorching across the curbstones like mad. When such women are 'captured' what good are they? They won't even breed; or if they do so (by accident) their puny embryos, have to be delicately nurtured into life with steam-heated incubator – mechanism and afterwards fed and weaned on 'the bottle.' The sons of such women – bottle fed abortions – of what good are they?

If you happen to be weak and a man who is strong wants to kill you, here's the advice the author has for you: "Woe unto those who stumble! Woe unto Ye who fall!" At this point one has to wonder if Redbeard is actually serious that you deserve to die if you happen to slip once in the presence of a man stronger than you, who should not be bound by any type of ethical code in order to slay you on the spot if he is able to do so.

Imagine a man on the street bends over to tie his shoes. Another man, seeing that he is in a vulnerable position, slits his throat with a knife and steals his money. Redbeard's philosophy could find justification for this behavior, simply because the killer was "strong" at the critical moment while the victim made himself "weak." For that reason, it is almost impossible to defend his ideas on an individual level, though it may have more application when pitting one society against another. While I doubt that many of you want to be the type of man who kills others in the name of strength alone, at the very least you must be able to defend against other men by maximizing your own strength.

Might Is Right ultimately makes an anti-religious and anti-tradition argument for human organization, providing justification for the extermination of societies or peoples based solely on strength. Whatever allows you to gain ultimate power over the lives of others is the correct answer regardless of its morality or effect on the social aspects of society.

How would the author interpret ISIS, who is implementing his model of strength to take over lands, killing and executing along the way? I don't suspect that the author wants Western society to look like present-day Iraq, but he definitely had in mind the fact that Islamic forces have been using strength to wage jihad on European lands. In that respect, Might Is Right can be seen as a self-defense manual for European people against Islam. After noting the many anti-black and anti-Jewish outbursts within the book, my best guess is that Redbeard envisions a homogeneous Europe that retains Viking-like strength against its enemies. A hint of that is the pseudonym he chose.

I'm in full agreement with Redbeard that if you are weaker than those who wish to take your land, you will lose, and no Christian idea or egalitarian slogan will save you when men who are ready to kill for their beliefs arrive on your doorstep while you hold a "Refugees Welcome" sign. Teaching societal passivity and meekness while other violent groups exist among you is suicidal and will result in slaughter.

In the end, might will eventually subjugate the weak, even if the weak is intelligent, moral, or do-gooding. It may take centuries for that to happen, but it will, and unless you can properly fight against groups who are strong, who truly believe that might makes right, you will be eradicated. Even if you don't believe, morally, that might makes right, there is always a human group that does, and unless you can stop them, they will kill you and rape your most beautiful women. Therefore if you are ready to conclude that strength is what's essential for victory, it wouldn't hurt to develop that strength yourself.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: "Might Is Right" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What To Do If You Were Just Falsely Accused Of Rape In College

August 24, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

If you're reading this, let me first tell you that all is not lost. I've personally been accused of rape while in college, and although it is definitely not a fun experience, it is something that you can get out of if you're smart.

Unfortunately, due to a multitude of reasons, false rape accusations are becoming increasingly common, especially in colleges. Universities are breeding grounds for feminists, alcohol is almost always involved at parties, and social reputation is king. This coupled with the fact that most administrators are either complete beta males or hyper-feminists means that if you're a man, you're at a disadvantage right off the bat.

This is the first thing that you must realize: the odds are stacked against you. Some might go so far as to say that you're guilty until proven innocent in false rape accusations, and while this isn't always the case, there's definitely some truth to this statement.

This in mind, however, if you follow the advice that I'm about to give you, there's a very high likelihood that the case will be dropped, or at the very least, you'll be found not guilty.

Step 1: Plead The Fifth

This is perhaps the most important thing that you will ever do. Realize that law enforcement is NOT on your side. Yes, they are supposed to be unbiased, but the reality is that there's always a political agenda that they're encouraged to enforce, and in this case, the agenda is that all men are rapists.

Remember these words like your life depends on it, because it does: "I plead the fifth, I don't consent to searches or seizures, and I want a lawyer."

Again, repeat after me: "I plead the fifth, I don't consent to searches or seizures, and I want a lawyer."

Out of all of the advice that I will give you today, this is by far the most important step to minimizing the damage caused by a false rape accusation. What this does is it basically prevents officers and lawyers from later twisting your words against you in court, which is extremely easy to do if you have even a modicum of knowledge regarding frame control and semantics.

DO NOT fall into the trap of thinking that "Oh, I'm just talking with the officers…they can't convict me for saying this!" If you do this, you are a fucking moron.

A good lawyer can twist literally anything against you in court, and police officers are extremely familiar with using a combination of intimidation and sympathy to get people to talk and talk until they reveal something that can be used to self-incriminate.

If, however, you plead the fifth, this can all be avoided.

The key is to be as polite as possible. These officers have the ability to make your life very difficult, very easily, so be very kind to them. Tell them that you respect what they're doing for our country, but that you have to plead the fifth, because you know your rights.

If you can bring up the fact that you have a family relative who's an officer, or how the media makes all cops look bad, that's great, too—you want them walking away questioning the girl who's accusing you, because you just seem like such a nice, well put together guy. This will make them far less likely to push the girl to press charges (which yes, police officers frequently do).

Step 2: Gather Intel

A large part of this battle is figuring out what your enemy is planning. In this case, your enemy is the girl who's falsely accusing you of rape.

Ask the officers what you're being accused of; get them to be very specific. Are you being accused of sexual assault? When did this supposedly happen? What were the circumstances? The more questions you can ask, the better.

The reason for this is that you want to give your lawyer the best damn shot possible at getting the charges dropped, and the more that you know about what you're up against, the better he can adapt his case to your advantage.

If possible, ask the officers for a list of questions that they would like you to answer. Tell them that you hope they understand, but you'll have to consult with your lawyer first. DO NOT answer any of the questions that they ask you, because as I said in step number 1, this is a surefire way to get convicted, despite your innocence.

Step 3: Keep Records Of Everything

Text messages, Tinder conversations, and even Snapchats… do not delete a single piece of evidence relating to this girl.

In a legal system where you're practically guilty until proven innocent, every little bit of data that you have to support your case helps. Did she ask you if she could come over? Good—save that shit. A girl who was afraid of you raping her wouldn't ask to come over. Did she tell you how she had a good time last night? Fantastic—save that. No girl would text this to a man who raped her. Did she send you nudes via Snapchat?

Perfect—take screenshots. No girl would send nudes to her rapist.

I recommend that you email records to yourself, so that in the event of your assets being seized (if it happens), you will have everything stored on the cloud.

Step 4. Get The Best Lawyer

I realize that when you're in college money is tight, but getting a good lawyer for a false rape accusation is NOT something that you want to skimp out on. The quality of your lawyer will literally determine whether you go to jail for five years and have your entire life ruined, because you can never find a job, versus if you get to walk free a few grand short.

Personally, I'd take the more expensive option if it'll help me stay a free man. Do some research about the best lawyers in your area; you want someone with a lot of experience. Ideally they should be around the age of 45 or 50, because by that point a lawyer has a lot of experience, but he's not so old to be soft-spoken and lacking energy.

If you can get a lawyer who used to work at the District Attorney's office, PAY WHATEVER IT TAKES. This is absolutely crucial. A lawyer who worked at the District Attorney's office will not only know the ins and outs of how prosecutors think, how their bureaucracy works, and how they typically approach cases, but he'll also have incredible connections to the very people who are trying to prosecute you, which is something that you want.

Don't even talk to the police until you have a lawyer. When I received a call from my campus judicial department, I asked them what I was being accused of. They said sexual assault. So I went to their office, got as much information as possible from them, got a list of questions, and told them that I would draft some answers with my lawyer.

Were they pissed? Yes, but who the fuck cares—they're trying to convict you. I paid my lawyer $500 for literally 30 minutes of helping me answer questions, but it didn't matter. I was able to get out alive and unscarred, even if it cost me a bit of money.

Step 5. Cease All Contact

One of the most tempting things for a guy who was accused of rape to do is to contact the girl who's accusing him. DO NOT DO THIS.

Maybe you can do it if you're sending text messages under the guidance of your lawyer, but anything otherwise would be folly. Here's why: anything and everything that you've ever sent the girl can and will be used against you in the court of law. So what do you think the prosecutor is going to do when he's in court trying to convict you?

"Your honor, it seems that this man here wouldn't stop harassing Miss Smith. He contacted her multiple times over the past month, despite the fact that she wants nothing to do with him. Is this the type of man, one who so blatantly disrespects women, that we want on our streets?"

Do you see how conniving lawyers can be? Even if your intention is to genuinely inquire as to why she's accusing you of rape, a good lawyer can twist this into you being a harassing pest who won't leave her alone. Do not text, call, or contact the girl who's accusing you in any way.

6. Win The Case

The most difficult part about a false rape accusation isn't even the actual trial; it's the anticipation that comes with waiting. Every time I get a next-day text from some girl regretting having sex with me, I always have trouble sleeping for the next two weeks, because I know it could be another potential false rape accusation.

Realistically, due to our bureaucratic, ineffective legal system, you could have to wait up to three years before your trial. Don't look at this as a bad thing, however. It will give you ample time to prepare yourself financially and emotionally for your impending court date.

If you follow the advice that I've laid out in this article, and your rape accusation is in fact false, you will more than likely win; do not take this lightly, however. There's plenty of men who've been falsely accused of rape who've ended up in jail.

In summary, follow each and every one of these steps. Don't skip a single one. Don't you dare get a cheap lawyer, give into her demands, or play into the police officer's hands. Do your best to get out of this hell that you've entered, be thankful that you've stumbled upon this article, and hopefully, I'll see you on the other side.

Read More: Meet The Man Who Apologized After Being Falsely Accused Of Rape

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

How To Register To Vote For Donald Trump

August 24, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

On November 8, millions of Americans will cast their ballots for president, as well as numerous other down-ballot races. Given how hostile America has become to men in the past eight years under Obama—as well as Hillary Clinton's openly anti-male, anti-white platform and demonstrable mental and physical health problems—the stakes have never been higher in a presidential race. While he's far from perfect, Donald Trump is the only candidate who has the potential to turn the tide against leftist degeneracy, or at least hit the pause button.

Because of this, Return of Kings is urging our readers to register to vote and cast their ballots for Trump. To help you do this, we've assembled this guide showing you how to register in every state, as well as Washington, D.C. To help do your part to elect President Trump, read on…

Alabama

To vote in Alabama, you must register by October 24. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Alaska

To vote in Alaska, you must register by October 9. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Arizona

To vote in Arizona, you must register by October 10. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Arkansas

To vote in Arkansas, you must register by October 10. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

California

To vote in California, you must register by October 24. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Colorado

To vote in Colorado, you must register by October 31. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Connecticut

To vote in Connecticut, you must register by November 1. You can register online by going here and following the instructions. Please note that the online registration system is not available between the hours of 11pm and 6am Eastern.

Delaware

To vote in Delaware, you must register by October 15. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

District of Columbia

To vote in Washington, D.C., you must register by October 11. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Florida

To vote in Florida, you must register by October 11. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Georgia

To vote in Georgia, you must register by October 11. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Hawaii

To vote in Hawaii, you must register by October 10. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Idaho

To vote in Idaho, you must register by October 14. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Illinois

To vote in Illinois, you must register by October 23. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Indiana

To vote in Indiana, you must register by October 11. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Iowa

To vote in Iowa, you must register by October 29. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Kansas

To vote in Kansas, you must register by October 18. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Kentucky

To vote in Kentucky, you must register by October 11. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Louisiana

To vote in Louisiana, you must register by October 11. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Maine

To vote in Maine, you must register by October 18. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Maryland

To vote in Maryland, you must register by October 18. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Massachusetts

To vote in Massachusetts, you must register by October 19. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Michigan

To vote in Michigan, you must register by October 11. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Minnesota

To vote in Minnesota, you must register by October 18. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Mississippi

To vote in Mississippi, you must register by October 8. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Missouri

To vote in Missouri, you must register by October 12. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Montana

To vote in Montana, you must register by October 11. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Nebraska

To vote in Nebraska, you must register by October 21. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Nevada

To vote in Nevada, you must register by October 18. You can register online by going here and following the instructions. Please note that the online registration system is not available between the hours of midnight and 2am Pacific Tuesday through Saturday, 4 and 6am Pacific Thursday, 8pm and midnight Pacific Saturday, and 9pm and midnight Pacific Sunday.

New Hampshire

To vote in New Hampshire, you must register by October 29. New Hampshire requires voters to register with their local election officers; click here for more information.

New Jersey

To vote in New Jersey, you must register by October 18. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

New Mexico

To vote in New Mexico, you must register by October 11. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

New York

To vote in New York, you must register by October 14. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

North Carolina

To vote in North Carolina, you must register by October 14. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

North Dakota

North Dakota does not require you to register to vote; you simply need to show up at your polling place on Election Day with a valid state ID. Click here for more information.

Ohio

To vote in Ohio, you must register by October 11. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Oklahoma

To vote in Oklahoma, you must register by October 14. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Oregon

To vote in Oregon, you must register by October 18. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Pennsylvania

To vote in Oregon, you must register by October 11. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Rhode Island

To vote in Rhode Island, you must register by October 9. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

South Carolina

To vote in South Carolina, you must register by October 8. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

South Dakota

To vote in South Dakota, you must register by October 24. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Tennessee

To vote in Tennessee, you must register by October 11. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Texas

To vote in Texas, you must register by October 11. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Utah

To vote in Utah, you must register by November 1. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Vermont

To vote in Vermont, you must register by November 2. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Virginia

To vote in Virginia, you must register by October 17. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Washington

To vote in Washington, you must register by October 10. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

West Virginia

To vote in West Virginia, you must register by October 18. You can register online by going here and following the instructions.

Wisconsin

To vote in Wisconsin, you must register by October 19. You can register in person or by mail; click here for more information.

Wyoming

To vote in Wyoming, you must register by October 25. Wyoming requires voters to register with their local election officers; click here for more information.

We strongly urge you to register to vote as soon as possible so that you are ready to go by the time early voting begins (if your state has it) or Election Day rolls around. With the threat that Hillary Clinton poses to American men, you cannot afford to sit this presidential race out.

Read More: How You Can Cast A Vote For Donald Trump

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

4 Leftist Propaganda Videos That Had Their False Narrative Called Out

August 24, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Virtue-signaling leftist corporations frequently use the Youtube platform to bombard our eyes and ears with an endless assault of painfully bad propaganda. In many cases, we are forced to sit through at least a couple of seconds of these cry-me-a-river garbage videos, precisely because these moneyed corporations have purchased far-reaching and expensive advertising campaigns we are compelled to (partially) sit through.

Some irredeemable leftist idiots buy into all this propaganda hook, line, and sinker. However, the red pill is growing ever stronger with the general public, and the voices of reason and logic are speaking louder than globalist narratives and "feewings" (feelings).

Here are four examples of videos which were designed to "move" people towards a leftist narrative, but utterly failed in the process. (Note: Apologies if the text copy comes out too small for mobile devices, it should be a little better on desktops).

1. "Raising An Olympian: Ashton Eaton"

Narratives: White "racism" & promotion of white guilt, Black/mixed race victimization and overcoming white "oppression", promotion of single mothers as virtuous and noble

2. “Always #LikeAGirl – Keep Playing”

Narratives: Male shaming, Female “empowerment”

3. “79% Work Clock: The Daily Reminder That The Wage Gap Is Real”

Narrative: Female workplace oppression / the “gender wage gap”

4. “#ProudToBe: Coming Together To Celebrate Identity”

Narratives: Promoting homosexuality & transgenderism, promoting acceptance of perverse mental illness, promoting the destruction of traditional values and family units

Comments are disabled for this video.

Too many high-ranking comments of “D-E-G-E-N-E-R-A-T-E!” and those coming out overwhelmingly in favor of traditional (ie. non mental patient) values, identities, and family units was simply too much to bear for Youtube.

Conclusion

We’re winning. Slowly but surely.

The power and scope of leftist corporations, globalists, and their nefarious agendas can seem absolutely daunting to the casual observer, let alone just a regular reader of Return Of Kings. However, the common man has clearly had enough with progressive agendas which have been disproved time and time again (gender wage gap, rape culture, systemic white racism, etc.) and are rebelling against disgusting globalist agendas which seek to promote sterility and the destruction of the traditional family unit in developed countries (deifying homosexuality, transgenderism, female careerism, etc).

We have much work to do yet, but the left is clearly being put on ever more intensive damage control, not to mention incredible embarrassment. The recent hacks of George Soros’ Open Society Foundations will only amplify the revolt against all this progressive and globalist vomit. So keep your heads held high boys, we’re on the truth rampage.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: What Will Be The Next Great American Perversion?

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

6 Helpful Tips To Increase Your Physical Endurance

August 24, 2016 | by Reda El | Link | Original Link

Over the last decade or so, obstacle course races and endurance events have gained popularity, with more people now signing up to take part in these events than ever before. On top of that, we all know how popular marathons are, and have been for so many years now, so the number of people taking part in marathons each year is also rising pretty sharply.

The main issue with marathons, obstacle courses, and any other type of endurance race or sport for that matter, is the fact that you need to be extremely physically fit in order to complete the race safely, and hopefully record a respectable time in the process. For these reasons, people often wonder how to increase endurance safely and effectively, and if you're one of these people, make sure you read on as we'll be providing an answer to that very question.

In reality, improving your endurance and your stamina is beneficial for a number of different reasons, and it is certainly about much more than simply running a race. By improving your endurance, you can potentially improve your entire life, so it is certainly well worth knowing what you're doing, and how it can be done.

To make your life easier, and healthier, here is a look at 6 helpful tips based upon how to increase endurance.

1. Perform Cardio On Lifting Days

Most individuals who are regularly involved in sports and fitness, will have days dedicated solely for lifting, and days dedicated solely for cardio, and it is certainly rare that they will combine the two.

Because of this, most people will perform 2 – 3 cardio sessions per week, and 4 – 5 weight lifting sessions per week, which, whilst beneficial, is perhaps not necessarily the most beneficial way of training if you are actively looking to improve your endurance.

Basically, the idea here is that the more muscles you are working per workout, the more endurance and stamina you will be able to build. Also, remember, the heart is a muscle, so by performing cardio, you are actually working a very major muscle group in your body, which in turn, will help ensure that you build plenty of endurance as time goes by.

After performing a weight lifting workout, jump straight into your cardio and see how you get on. You may even wish to combine the two in a type of circuit-based workout, or perhaps even via Crossfit.

2. Take Less Rest Between Working Sets

When it comes to lifting, in between working sets, most people will rest for anything from 90 seconds, up to 5 minutes in some cases. However, studies have found that, when it comes to increasing your endurance, ideally you should reduce the amount of rest that you take in between working sets.

Ideally you should rest for 30 – 60 seconds max between sets, which will mean sacrificing the weight and using a slightly lighter weight. Don't worry, however, because by the time you're done with that exercise, your muscles should be on fire, and you should be struggling to catch your breath.

Again, circuit-based workouts are ideal in this instance, as you will constantly be moving from one exercise to the next, getting very little rest between sets.

3. Increase The Intensity

Another sure-fire way of helping to boost your stamina and endurance, is to ramp up the intensity levels of your workouts. It doesn't matter whether you are lifting, playing sports, running, cycling, or anything else, when you are actually working out and training, you should have the intensity of a thousand angry men.

Okay, perhaps that is a little extreme, but if you are calm and quietly coasting through your workout, barely breaking a sweat, something will need to change pretty sharpish, otherwise you simply are not going to get anywhere fast.

Obviously you don't need to scream the gym down and run around like you've been possessed, but you should try to perform each rep/exercise as quickly as you can, making sure to maintain a constant mind-muscle connection for the duration of the exercise. If you feel that an exercise/workout is too easy, find ways of making it harder.

4. Practice Endurance Events

They say that practice makes perfect, and if you're looking to build and increase your endurance and stamina, you are going to have to ensure that you get plenty of practice when it comes to endurance training and events.

Rather than going for a short jog at a relatively fast speed, why not slow down the pace, pace yourself, and place much more of an emphasis on the distance, rather than the time.

As time goes by, you can consider covering even further distances, or perhaps simply increasing the speed at which you perform the activity at. You can try your hand at cycling, long-distance running, swimming, or even endurance-based gym workouts and exercises.

The bottom line is that, providing you practice endurance events, the more practice you get, the better you will become.

5. Mix Things Up

In terms of how to increase endurance, routine is your arch nemesis if you wish to truly test yourself and ramp up the stamina and endurance. After around two weeks of performing the same workout, the human body will quickly adapt to it and you will suddenly find yourself making less and less progress with each passing week, if you choose to attempt to stick to the same routine that is.

So, if you are always cycling a certain route, why not ditch the bike for a few weeks, and go for a leisurely jog, or even for a walk perhaps?

Failing that, you could hop on the treadmill and have a gym-based cardio workout instead, or you may even wish to ditch the aerobic activity altogether for a few weeks, and focus on circuit-training using weights and your own body weight. Studies have found that resistance workouts can be just as effective as aerobic workouts for increasing stamina and endurance, so don’t be afraid to mix things up and try something new that you’ve never tried before.

6. Focus On Performing Compound Movements

When it comes to training in the gym, if you’re used to using a lot of machines as opposed to free weights, again, you may wish to switch things up and to try something new instead.

Most exercise machines will allow you to perform what is known as ‘isolation exercises’ due to the fact that, due to their construction and design, these machines work perfectly at isolating specific muscle groups and body parts. However, for increasing stamina and endurance, research has found that compound explosive movements could be far more beneficial, as they result in a greater energy expenditure.

Compound exercises/movements, are exercises and movements that target multiple muscle groups and parts of the body at once. Standing military presses, for example, are great examples of compound exercises because, although they primarily work the deltoids (shoulders) they hit different parts of the deltoid head, plus they work the upper and lower back, and they even engage your core.

By performing exercises which work multiple muscle groups at once, again, your body is working harder because more muscle groups are being used, so your endurance and stamina will begin to increase as time goes by.

Explosive movements, which require you to perform sudden movements to complete the exercise, are also beneficial as they recruit more fast-twitch muscle fibers, which result in increased oxygen transportation, resulting in greater endurance levels.

For anybody wondering how to increase endurance, explosive compound exercises and movements are vital.

Read More: Helpful Tips For Men Who Want To Take Their First Overseas Trip

Reda El

My Name is Reda El, entrepreneur, and fitness fanatic for 8 years, and also BJJ blue Belt, I've gathered both my experience and the information I've read throughout these years on my website Shredded Physique .

A Heterosexual Man’s Reaction To Seeing Leaked Nudes Of Leslie Jones

August 25, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

In another display of “hacktivism,” heretofore and currently anonymous hackers penetrated actress Leslie Jones’ cloud storage of what is presumably her personal phone and downloaded photos including some of an explicit nature. The hackers then took over the Ghostbusters-remake and SNL actress’s promotional website, JustLeslie.com, and replaced the content with the photos and, as an additional touch, a tribute video to Harambe, the slain Cincinnati Zoo gorilla that was shot in May during an incident with a child falling into his pen.

Originally covered by TMZ and then by many other news outlets, the SJW outrage and narrative about how this poor woman is being punished for her race, her gender, and her bravery in taking down the patriarchy by rebranding a pillar of dude culture into a feminist flop.

The challenge

My colleague, Mr. Brown, brought the news to ROK's attention, and a discussion with Roosh prompted me to try to find these pictures and write a reaction article, and so off I went, wading through pages of Google searches of sympathetic rebroadcasts of the original article in hopes that someone, somewhere, had mirrored the images. I had thought that all was lost, until I found ageofshitlords.com.

I wholeheartedly approve of that domain name. This link may or may not work ; this appears to be the only site that actually had the pictures up and it went offline either through attack or sheer overload shortly after I viewed the page, although it seems to be back up as of this writing.

The reaction

The content that I saw on the mirrored site had some celebrity photos and six NSFW explicit pictures. I don't follow show-biz in general, nor black or other minority entertainment in particular, so I had no particular reaction to the celebrity shots of Jones and other people, with the exception of I noticed that even the men in the pictures with her are more attractive than she is, and this is coming from a straight man.

The two nude full frontals were uninspiring. Especially if you are a comedienne and a silver screen actress, when you are obese, you should not be sending nudes to anyone, even privately. Although she had the sense to blur her face in one of them, what is with people taking nude selfies with a commode in the picture? I get that you may want to use the bathroom mirror for the, um, spread, but try not to have the shitter in the shot with you, and the other picture is no better in what seems to be a janitor's closet, or maybe the bathroom in the Ghostbusters' fire station of the version in the 80s cartoon.

It gets worse. There's a thoroughly unappetizing topless shot with a facial expression of presumably horniness, and then, my friends, we move on to the X rated, where I saw a picture of Leslie showing intense sexual hunger.

Since we try for a somewhat professional atmosphere here, I will summarize with the statements that one shot belongs in a gynecological textbook, and the other two belong in a porn movie involving anal sex.

My reaction went from null on the celeb shots, to turned off on the full frontals, scared by the topless sex pose, and just about lost my dinner on the last three. Roosh came very close to owing me a gourmet meal of Taco Bell (it was a cheat day, what can I say?)

The lessons to be learned

Firstly, the cloud is vulnerable, in a big way. Any media is at risk, even an air-gapped USB stick in a bank's safety deposit box vault, just because it exists, but, when you are no longer in physical control of the media, your risk factor just went to the level of the clouds, along with your data. It's hard to hack something not connected to the internet at all (air-gapped), and it's still pretty hard to hack a device connected to the internet yet not set up to share files.

However, when incriminating media of you is online and protected only by a login and password, it's the equivalent of parking an expensive car in the hood and relying on the door locks.

Secondly, when you're famous, this goes double. As people should have learned from the Fappening, where the cloud got penetrated and hundreds of celebrities had their racy photos and videos leaked, uploading saucy stuff to the cloud when you are a recognizable, at-least-somewhat attractive person is even dumber than when you're a nobody, and it's even worse when you're NOT attractive.

I'll take this Ghostbusters girl, thank you.

Lastly, it is trebly bad when you are not only famous, but infamous. The hackers of today are today's and yesterday's nerds. There is not a single nerd in the USA today who has not seen the original Ghostbusters, imagined cracking wise with Bill Murray, frying ghosts with Dan Aykroyd, and rescuing and banging the shit out of Sigourney Weaver in the back of that 59 Caddy Ambulance. That is their childhood that these SJW actresses are fucking with; did they not think that these guys might hit back?

Conclusion

I'd rather write gun articles than hit pieces, but, my fellow kings, this is a culture war we are in here, and sometimes a little instructional shame is a good thing. Quit ruining good movies by remaking them with a SJW agenda; have the damn creativity to come up with your own screenplay, or accept the consequences. If you must remake a movie, pick something horrible like Masters of the Universe and give us some She-Ra action already.

Read More: Buzzfeed Writer Gets Naked At Nude Beach, Becomes Angry When Men Look At Her

Rufus Winnfield
"You know, walk the earth, meet people... get into adventures."

Hillary Is Planning To Attack The Entire Alt Right At 1PM EST—Here's What To Expect

August 25, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Today at 1PM in Reno, Hillary is planning to marginalize and hurt the alt right. While we are not officially an alt right site, we share much overlap with them in the general alternative sphere. An attack on the alt right by an establishment force such as Hillary will have repercussions at ROK since the mainstream media is grouping us all together.

Hillary's alt right speech comes only eighteen days after I stated that Hillary will try to shut us all down if she wins the election. She has moved up her timeline because of the damage that the alt right is doing to her campaign. This morning I was on Pat Campbell's show talking about Hillary's speech and what it will mean for us and Donald Trump (the recording is now on Soundcloud).

Last night I gave an overview on my Periscope of what will be in Hillary's speech and how we should respond (click here to watch directly on Periscope).

Hillary's speech will be streamed live here:

We will report back after her speech is complete.

Don't Miss: What Is The Alternative Right?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Gawker Is Officially Dead—Good Riddance

August 25, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Gawker, gossip rag about media and celebrities and a pot-stirring, bottom-feeding blog, is dead.

It made its last blog post Monday. Hulk Hogan delivered a $140 million body slam to the nice boys and girls who run the company for posting portions of a sexytimes tape featuring Hogan and some chick named Heather Clem (Bubba the Love Sponge's ex-wife). Clem videotaped sex with the wrestler without his knowledge way back in 2006, and by 2012 Gawker editor AJ Daulerio decided it would be cute to post excerpts of the video on their web site. That decision led to the demise of one of the barnacles on the ass end of the internet.

Daulerio was later asked if the video had any news value in court and was forced to respond "no." Daulerio was then asked in court:

> Had you known that Hulk Hogan would be emotionally distressed by this publication, you would have still published it, correct?

And he replied with a cold answer that is totally unsurprising to those of us who have worked in vicious, sociopath-laden newsrooms.

> Sure, yes.

Hulk Hogan body slammed Gawker into Chapter 11

He then went on to say he might draw the line at what makes the cut to get published and what doesn't at the rape of a child under age four. Along those lines, the web site pioneered manufacturing outrage among its audience members to drive traffic and clicks, often on spurious claims or downright maliciousness. Daulerio is quoted as saying he couldn't "give a fuck" about the veracity of any story that got published on the blog.

Karma is a bitch. For once, the company took a dump on the wrong person. The Hogan lawsuit alleged invasion or privacy, infringement of personality rights, and intentional affliction of emotional distress, and of course that lawsuit was enough to financially devastate the company. Gawker filed for bankruptcy only three months after the verdict was handed down, despite desperate attempts by its CEO Nick Denton to keep it on life support. When Gawker was sold to Spanish media company Univision, one of their first decisions was to shut it down.

But Hogan was not the only victim of their slack-jawed brand of gawking. The gossip rag, typical of many mainstream media outlets, pissed off many people with its voyeurism, rumor mongering and character assassination. Peter Thiel, co-founder of PayPal was outed for being gay by the blog back in 2007, and the expose on his private life was enough to make him vow revenge for the intrusion. He worked to fund lawsuits to take money out of their behinds.

Gawker also posthumously reported on a former Toronto mayor smoking crack on video. It showed Tom Cruise preaching in the Church of Scientology. It claimed the married CFO of Conde Nast solicited gay sex. To me, it's not that these things were published, but moreso who gives a fuck? People read this and get worked up about it? Incredible. But the mean-spiritedness of the publication, scoring points while airing other people's disgraces before the world makes its demise all the more sweet.

Trickle Down Effect

Gawker CEO Nick Denton getting sued in court

Perhaps what is saddest about the blog's legacy is Gawker's shameless publishing influenced media outlets of all different kinds: BuzzFeed, Vox, CNN, Fox News, The New Yorker, The New York Times and other household names all moved towards a business model like Gawker's. This means web sites, television channels, and newspapers that already catered to the lowest common denominator downgraded their standards and became even more tabloid.

This was noticeable for those of us who worked in the mainstream media as standards went down every year and the "news," already left-slanted and driven by sensationalism, became little more than a coffee klatsch designed to gather as many fat-bottomed women around the TV set as possible and get them started clucking.

Statistics showed Gawker's audience was nearly three-quarters female, proving the female predilection for gossip and mean-spirited character assassination runs deep psychologically. Women get off on this stuff. So, only a few years later, Jezebel was launched in by Gawker 2007. Unfortunately, Jezebel will survive the bankruptcy. Jezebel's founding editor, Anna Holmes, brags that Jezebel feminized mainstream news even further.

> The relentless assault we made on traditional women's media had an effect. There was a gradual process, but it was undeniable after a while that they were responding to and really mimicking what we were doing.

Kara Swisher, another online "journalist" talks about how Gawker moved mainstream news reports further down the road of editorializing and sensationalism.

> As reporters, while we try to be fair and ethical, I think we err on the side of not calling things out for what they were. They did that beautifully — and it sort of emboldened the rest of us.

The Old York Times wrote about how the blog sped up the already fast pace of gossip and made it even more insidious than it already was.

> Gawker opened a Pandora's box, too. It sped media up to an insane pace. After Gawker, you didn't take nights and weekends off. You couldn't publish once a week. The internet was a beast that always needed feeding, and it demanded > ever-hotter, ever-more-outrageous takes.

TVs should come with these warning labels, and the content has only gotten worse thanks to the influence of sites like Gawker

Tellingly, the founder and CEO of Gawker, Nick Denton was a former Financial Times journalist before striking out to do his own thing with Gawker. This is important because in my opinion (through over a decade of experience dealing with media people and working side by side with them) it illustrates the mentality of many in the media. They don't care whose lives they're destroying or if the public interest is being served as long as they can make a buck off it.

It's easy to see Gawker and its bastard children Jezebel and Wonkette (self-proclaimed nasty vile little snark mob) feed female intrigue and mean-spirited, nihilistic criticism with anything they can sink their teeth into. In that way, it is a case study in female psychology and sociology since the vast majority of their readers are female. Men, if you want to know what's on women's mind, go read this dreck. Women lap it up like kittens lining up for a milking. Just prepare to be shocked and awed at what women really want when it comes to online "news." Gawker was about nothing but pure, unabashed depravity. In many ways it made the National Enquirer look like a children's magazine.

At least for a little while, the internet will be a better place until its replacement arises from some other dank corner of the internet. Women love gossip and they love tearing people down, so there will always be a reliable market for unscrupulous publishers to turn a buck. More than anything, Gawker was a reflection of just how mean spirited and vicious some people (especially women) can be. It was a reflection of a fully feminized culture that has no moral compass or sense of decency when it comes to dealing with other people. Good riddance.

May Hulk Hogan laugh all the way to the bank.

Read More: What Will Be Gawker's Next Move After Being Ordered To Pay Hulk Hogan $115 Million?

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Hillary’s Alt Right Speech Bombed

August 25, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Hillary Clinton’s long-awaited alt right speech in Reno was a failure. Although she peddled the same ad hominem insults and falsehoods expected by Return Of Kings, her focus on a supposedly fringe rightwing conspiracy centered on the alt right was glaring in its holes. After connecting herself with renowned influence expert, Robert Cialdini, we had anticipated that her lies would have been a lot more believable, internally consistent, and less tenuous-sounding.

After a significant two-hour delay, Hillary finally made her way to the lectern at a local community college. From higher rates of schoolyard bullying to Brexit leader Nigel Farage appearing on “Russian propaganda” outlets, Clinton endeavored to link Donald Trump to so many nefarious happenings in America and the world that one would need a team of full-time accountants to keep track of them.

Clinton copied the Wall Street Journal‘s inherently vague definition of the alt right in her speech:

> … a loose but organized movement, mostly online, that “rejects mainstream conservatism, promotes nationalism and views immigration and multiculturalism as threats to white identity.”

She then took immense artistic liberty in throwing the alt right alongside basically any policy or group she did not like.

Ridiculously, Vladimir Putin has been blamed for Trump-style nationalism and the alt right

For someone who claims to oppose Trump's "hysteria," Hillary Clinton does a good job of generating her own. Particularly after Trump made a joke about Russian hackers going after the DNC, Hillary Clinton has gleefully sought to reduce The Donald to the status of Vladimir Putin's stooge. The Reno speech went one step further, alleging that Putin is one of the primary impetuses for the ideology of Donald Trump and the alt right.

Lacking any evidence to make these kinds of assertions, Clinton claimed that Nigel Farage, who had appeared with Trump at one of his rallies in the Deep South this week, was appearing in "Russian propaganda" pieces. A clear reference to Farage's appearances on RT, formerly known as Russia Today, Hillary's scathing assessment of the Brexit leader ignores how Bernie Sanders and countless other Democrats have appeared on that same network. Fittingly, neither Sanders nor his time speaking with this "propaganda" mouthpiece was mentioned in the Reno speech.

No discussion by "racism-hating" Hillary of her love for ex-KKK leader Senator Robert Byrd

Robert Byrd, late Senator and serious KKK leader and recruiter, also a great friend of Hillary's.

We are meant to believe that the alt right is a hotbed of racism, all while ignoring Hillary Clinton's own chequered racial past. Clinton has been obsessed with linking Donald Trump to ex-Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard David Duke, who endorsed the Republican Presidential nominee. Her speech in Reno continued this pathetic theme. Tellingly, Trump has had no working relationship with Duke, unlike Hillary Clinon's fawning admiration for the late West Virginia Senator and senior KKK leader Robert Byrd. Clinton described Byrd as a "mentor" and was inconsolable when the long-serving legislator, responsible for recruiting well over a hundred people, if not more to the KKK, died.

Roosh gives his analysis of Hillary's alt right speech

Hillary claims Trump will deport "millions of immigrants," without mentioning that they're illegals

It is now racist to ask that US border laws, flouted for decades, are finally enforced. Donald Trump and the alt right are racist according to Hillary because they want to deport so-called immigrants, without her bothering to mention that those targeted by any Trump Administration would be illegal arrivals.

Trump is "increasing" schoolyard bullying, even as anti-Trump supporters practice real-world violence

Hillary was lightning quick in describing how American youngsters are apparently amping up their bullying at school, most notably against children of "color," all because of Trump and the alt right! Another massive stretch she indulged in was referencing a group of high school students in Indiana, who had allegedly used Trump banners and shouted "Build the wall!" during a sporting game, and tying it directly to Trump's "racism."

Meanwhile, here are some examples of the real violence that has followed Trump supporters in recent times:

Why wasn’t the alt right branded a criminal conspiracy?

The failure of Hillary to come out all guns blazing was a surprise. It seems likely that she is going to try to deal with Trump first and then directly go after the alt right once in office.

One thing's for sure, though: Trump has no reason whatsoever to feel threatened by Hillary's half-hearted attack on him and the alt right today.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Hillary Is Planning To Attack The Entire Alt Right At 1PM EST—Here's What To Expect

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

Powerful Men Who Were Undone By Weakness

August 25, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

One of the best ways to improve your own life is to study the lives of the great men of the past. By emulating their virtues, we can accomplish mighty works. But an equally profitable study is to examine the lives of great, or nearly great, men who failed so that we can avoid making the same mistakes.

Mitt Romney

By looking at his resume, any unbiased person would conclude that Mitt Romney had what it takes to succeed. He was born to a wealthy, powerful family. His father was an automobile exec and later became governor of Michigan at a time when that state was still a manufacturing powerhouse. Romney attended Harvard where he received a joint J.D./M.B.A. His resume also includes starting a highly profitable investing firm and serving as governor of Massachusetts. But to me, his most impressive achievement was assuming leadership of a failing Salt Lake City Olympics and turning it into a success.

Not only was Romney a success at politics and business, but he is also a man of deep faith and strong morals. He is still married to his high school sweetheart, and he is a longtime leader in his Mormon faith. Fit, handsome, smart, and highly trained, Romney's background should have prepared him to become a new type of American nobility. Yet Romney blew it all because of weakness.

When Romney was running against President Obama in 2012, it looked like Romney would be the easy winner. The US economy was doing poorly, having experienced the slowest recovery of any recession. Race relations were degenerating thanks to the Obama's administration's policy of fanning the flame of every racial incident. And the world was a mess due to Obama's inability to understand any problem that doesn't involve white on black racism.

Romney got off to a good start. In the first debate he showed that he was sharper and had a better grasp of facts and policy than Obama. The debate was a clear win for Romney and he saw his poll numbers rise because of it. Obama worshipping liberals were on the verge of suicide having seen their idol humiliated. Romney only had to repeat his performance in the next two debates and he would have sealed the deal.

But Romney let weakness get in the way. For some reason he decided to hang back in the next two debates and let Obama pound him. Obama's attacks went unanswered and Romney lobbed few of his own. The media joyfully declared Obama the winner of the last two debates and Obama went on to win the election by a large margin.

Romney also exhibited weakness in the run-up to the 2016 election. Romney reportedly wanted to run but he learned that Jeb Bush has already gained the support of most of the large donors. Rather than try to run an unconventional campaign that appealed directly to Republican voters, he tucked his tail between his legs and yielded to Jeb who was later destroyed by Donald Trump. Romney continued his losing streak by his last ditch effort to stop the Trump nomination by a long speech arguing that Trump was immoral.

Romney's weakness stems from his over reliance on "experts" and a lack of boldness. It was experts who advised Romney to soften his tone in the debates as that would have stoked sympathy for Obama. It was experts that told Romney that it was impossible to win an election without the backing of big donors. To avoid Romney's weaknesses, consult experts but trust your gut. Bold action often wins even when the odds are against you.

Mark Antony

The weakness of Mitt Romney kept him from achieving true greatness. Our next example achieved greatness, but then let weakness destroy him. Mark Antony was a Roman politician and general. He didn't have the best childhood. He came from a plebian family and Plutarch tells us that his father was incompetent. Antony's youth was spent drinking, gambling, and chasing girls. He accrued such an enormous debt that he had to flee Rome to escape his creditors. Luckily for him, he made the wise decision to move to Athens to study philosophy and rhetoric—a skill that would later serve him well in politics.

After a year of study, Antony enrolled in the military under Aulus Gabinius, the Proconsul of Syria. As part of this service, Antony participated in a campaign in Egypt where he met the 14-year-old daughter of King Ptolemy XII—Cleopatra. The princess must have been something special because Antony was instantly smitten and remained so for the rest of his life.

Antony's excellent service eventually got him a position with Julius Caesar, with whom he formed a life-long friendship. Antony benefited from Caesar's goodwill. Caesar appointed him to the College of Augurs, a religious position that granted Antony prominence in Rome. This led to Antony to the office of Tribune in the Senate.

After Caesar was assassinated, Antony made an alliance with Octavian, Caesar's adopted son, and Lepidus, another Caesar ally to form a triumvirate—a dictatorship by three men that was supposed to last for five years. The three men divided the Empire between them with Antony receiving the largest share. As part of this division, Antony received Rome's eastern vassal states, including Egypt.

At the time, Egypt was being ruled by Cleopatra. Antony summoned her, ostensibly to cement Rome's alliance with Egypt and to proclaim Caesarion, Julius Caesar's son by Cleopatra, to be king of Egypt. Of course, Cleopatra used the meeting to seduce Antony who fell completely in her thrall.

Cleopatra and Antony started a torrid love affair. Cleopatra was a brilliant strategist and she used Antony to eliminate her political enemies. Unfortunately, because Antony was away from Rome, it allowed Octavian to stir up the Roman public against Antony. The Romans began to think that Antony had more loyalty to a foreign power than he did to Rome.

Cleopatra wasn't an Egyptian. She was a Greek, like this girl.

Antony was so bewitched by Cleopatra's charms that he made a critical error: He declared her son Caesarion to not only be king of Egypt but also Caesar's rightful heir. This was a direct attack on Octavian's claim to authority. Octavian used it as pretext to attack Antony and Cleopatra.

At one point during the battle, Antony came to believe that Cleopatra had been killed by Roman forces. In true omega male fashion, Antony committed suicide by stabbing himself. As he lay dying, he found out that Cleopatra was alive after all.

Unlike the biblical King David who allowed lust to drive him to make bad decisions, Antony's weakness was that he let the woman he loved dominate him completely even to the point where he did stupid things that destroyed both of them.

Cicero

The final example is another great man who was ultimately undone by his weakness. Marcus Tullius Cicero was a Roman lawyer, philosopher, orator, and statesman who was a contemporary of Mark Antony. It would not be an exaggeration to say that Cicero's excellent prose indirectly influences writers to the present day. But the biggest gem for modern men is his practical philosophy. I've been reading Quintus Curtius' masterful translation of Cicero's On Duties, and I can attest to its usefulness in daily life.

Cicero lived at a time of great change in Roman politics. The old Republic was governed by two consuls who were elected by the citizens and advised by the Senate, which was appointed. But the Republic was dying. While there were many factors for its decline a significant reason was that voters had figured out how to get free stuff from the political system—in the case of the Republic it involved taking away land from the aristocrats and distributing it to the plebs. This led to chaos within the Republic.

The only hope for an effective government to restore order was a dictatorship. Julius Caesar was one of the first of these dictators. After his assassination, this role was assumed by the triumvirate of Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus. One of Cicero's weaknesses was that he was unable to discern that times had changed. He was still attached to the old Republic and its unwritten constitution. In a way, Cicero was like the "true conservatives" of today who stubbornly hold erroneous ideas that undermine there own opportunity to assume power.

Cicero had an aversion to the dictatorship because he saw it as the demise of his beloved Republic. He opposed Julius and he later opposed the triumvirate, especially Antony. He set off to write and speak in the Senate against Antony. During the course of a year he delivered 14 speeches, entitled the Philippics, condemning Antony.

Here we see another weakness of Cicero: He didn't know when to quit. There is a time and a place for criticism and there is a time for keeping one's mouth shut. Cicero's tirades earned Antony's ire, and Antony got the triumvirs to issue the death penalty for Cicero. Antony was so incensed by Cicero's opposition that he had the statesmen's head and hands (because he had used them to pen the Philippics) nailed to a door in Rome. There is a story that Cicero's widow drove a nail in the dead man's tongue to express her sadness at how much trouble his speeches had caused her.

Thus, even wise men such as Cicero must be on guard from being overly passionate and from being overly attached to outdated ways.

Conclusion

If there is one lesson we can learn from the lives of all three of these men it is that we cannot be too attached to anything whether that is a woman, the advice of experts, or a particular political institution.

Read More: 3 Men Of The Bible Who Were Undone By Weakness

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Dr. Drew’s Show On CNN Canceled After He Questions The Narrative On Hillary’s Health

August 26, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Dr. Drew should consider himself lucky for only having his CNN Headline News show canceled a week after not tip-toeing around Hillary Clinton’s obviously questionable health. Why? Because people have a way of turning up dead when they commit offenses against the Clintons, usually with strange suicides, plane crashes, or car accidents that nobody witnesses.

Only a week before his show’s cancellation, Dr. Drew, along with another medical expert, Dr. Robert Huizenga, said they were “gravely concerned” about Hillary’s health after looking over some of her medical records:

> We evaluated the medical record that she had released [and] were gravely concerned not just about her health, but her health care. Both of us concluded that if we were providing the care that she was receiving, we’d be ashamed to show up in a doctor’s lounge. She’s receiving 1950s-level care. She’s been treated for hypothyroidism with something called Armour Thyroid, which is very unconventional and something we used back in the 1960s. Armour Thyroid sometimes has some weird side effects.

Their opinion was based on a convoluted statement released by her doctor, Lisa Bardack, detailing Hillary’s hypothyroidism, allergies, a thrombosis she had in 2012 which resulted in a fall and a concussion, and her use of Fresnel prism glasses. The statement goes on to say Hillary is in good health after detailing a litany of health issues. Drew said on a KABC radio interview:

> [The use of Fresnel prism glasses] suggests brain damage. That’s profound.

Interestingly, even though the KABC interview raised legitimate issues and went viral it was pulled off the web site only hours later. The incident has all the markings of a coverup and Pravda-like shoddy journalism.

The Coordinated Response

Unexplained coughing fits have plagued Hillary throughout her campaign

What did the mainstream media do in lockstep after Drew and another medical expert expressed concerns about her health? Why, they ran hit pieces, of course. An independent thought alarm sounded as soon as the words came out of Drew's mouth, and immediately the keyboard brigade went to work to discredit him with smarmy yellow journalism. The Daily Beast turned on him, saying "Dr. Drew Leads the Hillary Clinton Health Truthers." Yahoo News came out with a damage control article "Fact Checking Dr. Drew on Hillary Clinton's 'Medical Records'." PuffHo said "Speculating About Candidate Health is Mudslinging, Not Medicine."

The coup de grace in the move to discredit Dr. Drew was his removal from the Clinton News Network a week later, a surprising and sudden cancellation of a show that has been running for five years on the low-rated network. CNN said removing Dr. Drew On Call is part of a so-called "revamping" of its lineup. (Dr. Drew survived the last "revamping" of the lineup). That's PR speak for we're firing your ass because you challenged the power structure, Jack. The head cheese of CNN Ken Jautz said:

> Dr. Drew and I have mutually agreed to air the final episode of his show on September 22.

Some chick named Ashleigh Banfield will be his likely replacement, posing as a Social Justice Warrior. She promises to deliver her own craptastic blend of CNN-style Communism on a show that will be a "unique brand of social and legal issues."

CNN has been running regular cover for Clinton, in one case doing a shameless hit piece on the people whose critical thinking skills have not yet been destroyed. They labeled people who have legitimate questions about Hillary's health as everything from tin-foil hat conspiracy theorists to sexists. Who were their sources for telling them Hillary is in excellent health in the report assailing people wanting to know if Hillary is sick or not? Why Hillary herself, Syphilis Bill, and one of their long-time employees. What journalistic integrity! That report wouldn't have passed muster in an entry level journalism class, but it was good enough for CNN's lightweight talking head Randi Kaye to expect you to believe it.

Hillary had to be carried up a flight of stairs as she sports Chairman Mao attire

We serfs aren't supposed to notice Hillary's bizarre coughing incidents, the seizure-like head bobbling, her being carried up a flight of steps, her cover story about her health that's weak as water, and we are supposed to ignore an increasing chorus line of doctors saying something is wrong with the old harridan. It's not just Dr. Drew and Dr. Huizenga. Rutgers University Professor of Medicine Bob Lahita came out saying concerns over Hillary's health are no conspiracy theory. Dr. Jane Orient, executive director of the Association of American Physicians and Surgeons also called into question the mainstream media narratives about Clinton's health. Are we supposed to believe these medical experts are all crazy conspiracy theorists, too?

Interestingly, Wonder Woman (Clinton) hasn't held a campaign press conference in over eight months and shuns the spotlight whenever possible, increasingly living the life of a recluse rather than a presidential candidate.

To make matters worse as the left attempts to tighten the noose around the necks of those who don't follow their dictates, The New York Times is calling for Google to censor search results that call into question the increasingly bizarre narratives that claim Hillary is as healthy as a spring chicken.

What we are witnessing is the internet doing the job journalists won't do, and as people get closer to the truth of an issue the media's actions and inactions become increasingly ridiculous. Chalk Dr. Drew's cancellation up to a desperate move by a desperate Hivemind fighting to stay relevant in an age when they're increasingly shown to be shameless, lying propagandists.

The closer we get to the truth about any topic on the internet, the more outrageous and shrill the calls will become to censor and silence us. Blood has been drawn when it comes to a sickly Hillary.

Read More: 14 Answers To Lifestyle And Health Questions

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

ROK Undercover: What It Was Like To Spend A Day At A Mormon Church

August 26, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

It's often said that the west is full of garbage and that men should seek high quality women elsewhere. While I agree, it's also true that most of the ROK readership currently lives in America. While I'm here in between trips abroad, I mostly avoid local women. But if there is a place where acceptable women may be found, it should be in religious households.

In my first column, I acknowledged religion has been infiltrated and undermined, and described my fruitless attempts at finding a decent woman at a religious retreat, but there are those who still cling to the idea that an extremely conservative religion could produce a decent American female. In the interest of you, dear reader, I have attended services at three conservative religious groups. Part 1 of this series follows.

Mormons

Mormon Tabernacle, Utah

My knowledge of Mormons originated from three sources: the socially awkward prudish Mormon girl I knew in middle school, South Park, and the HBO series Big Love. The Mormon church was founded in the 1800s by Joseph Smith, and Mormons follow the holy text of the Bible, as well as the Book of Mormon, a revelation by Joseph Smith. Mormons believe that Jesus Christ was resurrected, as told in the Bible, and then reappeared in ancient America, where he visited white-skinned Native Americans before Heavenly Father turned them red.

Mormons are extremely family oriented. They are very clean, and often talk like Ned Flanders. They use cute-sy words in place of regular profanities like Darn, Baloney Sandwich, Fudge, Dangit, Heck, and Oh Golly!

HBO’s Big Love depicts Mormon plural marriage, and the pros and cons of being the breadwinning patriarch

Despite Mormons being a very evangelical church (members are expected to devote periods of their lives to a mission, where they are sent to work full time for the church at no salary, and currently have over 74,000 active full time missionaries), it was the one place where I was not greeted as a visitor. Nor did their web site offer any helpful information to visitors, other than an address and time of service. Perhaps they are simply not used to people showing up uninvited.

The church is somewhat secretive, and there are certain rules one must follow. There are regional temples, which only certain members can enter, and I would not be allowed in. Then there are several wards, which are very similar to Protestant church sanctuaries. I attended service at one of six or so wards in the area served by my temple. The service consisted of a couple of hymns, a brief message by the Priest, and the majority of the time was Testimonies given by the congregation.

The congregation is seated in pews, and there is a small group of older men dressed like conservative bankers sitting at the front. They are leading the service. The implication is a very strong message of patriarchy, and respect for elders and authority. The Bearing of Testimonies included about 45 minutes of men, women, and children coming up and describing the ways their faith was playing out in their lives.

Around 90% of these people were on the verge of tears, whether it was a sad story or not. At first I found this quite odd and somewhat weak, but Mormons are extremely passionate about their faith and attribute this to the Holy Spirit touching their hearts. This was not as boring as it seemed, and I actually found it more interesting than hearing a guy drone on in a sermon for half an hour.

Date night with a Mormon girl

The stories were from a diverse group of topics. One woman spoke about how she had kept herself busy in the days that the temple was closed to the public, and how excited she was when it finally reopened so she could visit it. Another woman plead with the youth to not fall to temptation and have premarital sex because you will regret it for the rest of your life, along with stories about how her heathen friends were slutting around and were very sad and embarrassed in their lives.

A man stood up and talked about preparing a spare room for a fellow friend facing bad times, and they prepared the best room in the house for him. A thin attractive feminine girl who appeared to be 16 came up and announced she and her husband had just moved to this ward from Utah and were excited to rejoice with Heavenly Father.

Mormon Temple Garments

Another woman got up and talked about how she was so happy to be a mother and grandmother and how it's bad that some women are beginning to question the patriarchy and demand priesthood for females. There was one moment of cringe when a parent brought her child up and whispered things into her ear to repeat verbatim "I love Heavenly Father and Joseph Smith is the true prophet."

Typical Mormon Temple (different from regular service in a local ward)

The stories reinforced the faith quite well, and indeed if one was a member of this group, I think it would be relatively easy to reject many of the sinful traits. There is a lot of quilting and genealogy research and singing and playing board games that Mormons do together. I had a Mormon boss once, and he was a super swell guy. Many finance companies set up offices in Utah because the Mormons are renowned for their honesty.

One of the principle beliefs in the faith was plural marriage, with the holy texts damning you to hell if you did not believe and practice it, and though the church did fight this, they eventually caved in to US government pressure around the time Utah became a state, and stated that God told them this was no longer important. The church splintered, with fundamentalists continuing to follow this teaching, while others fled the US oppression to Mormon settlements in Mexico and Canada. The US government oppressed this religion with many laws targeting the church, and even unseated Mormon elected Senators to the US Senate purely because of their religious beliefs.

Marriage is taken extremely seriously, and is referred to as “sealing” which has a very permanent connotation. There are church-led Young Single Adult Family Home Evenings which are designed to pair up young single Mormons so they can marry and procreate.

Mormons are a great example of people looking after their tribe. I’m not sure I would want to be Mormon, but the world would undoubtedly be a better place if there were more Mormons. However, the Mormon story is somewhat dubious and the fact that they changed vital church doctrine like polygamy, combined with a short history, makes me wonder if they will not cave to demands of the corrupt outside world at some point.

Also some of their beliefs like the inherent goodness of white skin, magic pajamas, and some cult-like behavior don’t hold up to scrutiny. I saw a Spanish service advertised, which I may return to in the future. Mexico was exposed to Mormonism and I have a strong affinity for Hispanic women; a chaste latina would make for an interesting mix.

Pros:

- Very patriarchal
- Very positive, happy religion
- Value purity and strongly reject promiscuity
- Nominally Christian; moderately accepted in West

Cons:

- Dubious beliefs
- Prohibitions on alcohol, caffeine, and other intoxicants
- Caved on some of their major principles (LDS in USA)
- Somewhat unaccepted in mainstream culture
- Probably the most hostile to the ideas of “game”

Conclusion

The Mormons are a very conservative family oriented community. Mormons take the teachings of Jesus to heart, and are quite kind, helpful, happy people. They shun alcohol, tobacco, caffeine, or anything else that comes between you and Heavenly Father, which includes sloots. Get ready for lots of board games, bible trivia, PAX TV, trips to Utah, and hanging out with the extended church family. Your friends will likely be other homeschooling Mormons.

But the payoff is an extremely submissive wife who knows that her eternal salvation depends on fulfilling her motherly and wifely duties so that one day you can have endless celestial sex among the gods. Expect a Mormon girl to barely know what a penis or vagina is, but to do anything that her Priesthood holder (you) tells her. Don't expect to casually date a Mormon if you are not Mormon. Also, the only single women I saw were in middle or high school.

Read More: What To Do If You're Accused Of Sexual Harassment At Work

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

5 Reasons Why She’s Acting Desperate

August 26, 2016 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

I recently brought a woman home that was a little bit of a hipster. It’s not my usual pick but why not. Variety is the spice of life and all that. Red flags fell from the sky like rain when she began behaving desperately. Within one interaction she was ready to come to my place. It didn’t feel like it was because of an immediate urge to sleep with me. It felt like something else; like I was an opportunity in this girl’s game. Somehow I was being played. I couldn’t figure out why. It was enough that upon bringing her back, I didn’t sleep with her.

She didn’t want sex, she wanted something else. It felt like she was using sex as a weapon of some kind. That alone made me choose not to sleep with her. I called an Uber for her that night, and waited. I was not going to text her first. Two days later she texted me. She told me, "I can say three words right now that will make you never speak to me again." My response was, complete curiosity. I had to know if her behavior correlated with this. I told her to tell me. She responded with:

"I have herpes".

I hung up the phone, blocked her number, cleared my call history. She wanted to sleep with me so I would get herpes. Then I would be forced to love her. That's what I believe she thought anyway. If I had given in, I'd be writing this post out of shame, not education. I was safe because it felt like something was wrong, and I didn't ignore it. I listened to my gut, even though I wanted to get laid that night.

A desperate woman is an issue. It goes against female programming, and always has some sort of agenda attached to it. Below are five reasons why she's acting desperate.

1. Secret STD

Herpes. Not a good look.

My story above. If she's acting desperate, it's because there is something about her that's broken. If you aren't escalating and she already wants sex, it's a cloak and dagger. Even if you don't see anything, you aren't safe. Herpes and other diseases often can't be seen, but can still be caught. Condoms can protect you, but the risk still exceeds the reward. There are seven billion people on earth. You can find one that isn't afflicted with a lifelong condition. She wants you to become what she is. That way it cuts your options down from everything, to almost nothing. That almost nothing of course includes her.

If you begin to have apprehension about a woman because of a potential std, stop and head to google. One image search for "Male Herpes" will have you out of her house faster than if it was engulfed in flames. Remember the risk and think with your brain, not your head.

2. Biological clock

When the alarm begins ringing, there’s nothing she can do to stop it. It’s often too late. Feminism empowers the career woman while science teaches her she can have a kid later. This leads to women doing anything they can to become pregnant when the wall finally hits. This can surely happen in earlier years when her value is higher, 18-24, but tends to explode when the realization registers that she is close to losing the gift of a healthy child. You can assume anything after 27 is the danger zone. Women want to have children and a family at any cost. Sleeping with one of these woman has many dangers, but below are a few of them:

- Throwing a condom away, then using it to become pregnant. Always flush your condoms. Even if she says her plumbing can’t handle it. It’s a trap.
- Lying about being on birth control.
- Accidentally forgetting to take the pill.
- Poking a hole through her condoms. Always use your own.
- Says she would get an abortion, so you don’t need to wear a condom. Example Below.

3. She isn’t the online profile

I’m a typical beach girl

If you’re on Tinder or any other dating app you’ve surely came across this. You see a woman’s profile, then you see the angles. All of her photos advertise one angle. This is usually the face, the least disturbing feature. It’s hiding the true person that is morbidly overweight. If you’re gaming a woman online and the number comes far too easy, be cautious. Nothing is ever too good to be true.

A woman that looks like a model, and gives her phone number to you in the early stages of the interaction with almost no attraction built should concern you. It goes against all of women’s biological concerns to find the best mate at any cost.

Women screen men, compare them against other lovers, and discuss them with the hen pack. There is an entire television program that speaks about this issue known as catfishing. Remember, online you can be anyone, even if you’re an obese land whale. Seeing someone in person will always be better. There’s no guessing game that the girl you meet downtown is different than she appears. Emotionally, yes because everyone puts up a front. Physically you’ll be fine. The best way to protect yourself is to stay mentally agile through a proper morning routine. Here is the best routine I’ve found.

If you’re being aggressively pursued by a woman you’ve never met, it’s probably too good to be true and she’s lying to you.

4. She’s broke and in debt

I like him for his personality.

Men’s value comes from assets, and achievement. Therefore, when you drive to pick up your date in your nice Mercedes, you become a knight in shiny green armor. Green, because of your bank account being able to fix her problems. Women want money, but don’t have the drive or ambition to get it as strongly as men do. Men want money for the sake of accomplishment, women want it for merchandise.

This isn’t an inherently bad thing, it’s biology and where us as men have value. You should keep in your mind, that when you do become wealthy, women will be attracted to you for this alone. They are amazing at rationalizing their tastes for your money. She may hate redheads, but can deal with it if you have money. This can be used as a strength if you have work to do on yourself, or be led into spending your money for a woman that only wants an extra comma in her bank account.

A simple test to see this: take a woman out for drinks. You get the first round, ask her to get the next. It’s not about the money, it’s about her reciprocating value you give her. Watch how she reacts. If she throws a fit about it, drop her. You know why she is with you. If not, that’s a good sign. More tests will be needed however. Women are good at understanding when they’re being tested or evaluated.

5. Ex issues

My boyfriend moved away.

Issues with an ex-boyfriend can put your life into serious danger. Women love to be safe and secure. This is why a strong, muscular physique can increase your attraction substantially. If she pushes for you to become official too quickly, it could be a sign she wants you to feel obligated for her protection, or her offense.

She may have an ex that's dangerous to her and even more to you when photos of you begin to dominate her Facebook. Some women look at men as tools. You may be recruited to make another man jealous. This is not a safe place for either of you to be. You do not want to find a woman who only wants you to fight her battles. Those that put your life into danger even more so. Because it can most definitely happen to you.

If she's acting desperate, you must protect yourself. In order to be safe you have to develop your self-control. You're playing with a Venus fly trap. Keep your guard up, listen to your gut, and don't ever betray the trust you have within yourself. It doesn't hurt to ask other men for advice as well.

Read More: Facebook's Newest Change Shows That Older Women Are Getting Desperate

John Doe

John Doe is the creator of Andreia Thoughts: Self Development through total discipline. He is a cult leader, artist, writer, and inventor. His work can be found at Andreia Thoughts. Connect with him on Twitter, and Instagram for more insight into greatness.

6 Tips For Avoiding Burnout

August 27, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Any endeavour you undertake in life, whether it be writing a novel, starting a business, or learning to get good with girls will require that you make a massive effort in order to be successful. Be in no doubt – massive effort is a great thing. A man must have a mission in life and true happiness comes when you work hard at it. But a very real consequence of having a singular vision is burnout and this is something you must strive to avoid.

The Need For Massive Effort

The requirement for '"massive effort" will be familiar to anyone who has read or listened to motivational speakers like Tony Robbins, or business and sales gurus such as Grant Cardone. Cardone in particular writes very inspiringly about the topic in his book The 10X Rule, which I would recommend not only to those who work in sales, but anyone who has an interest in improving their life generally.

Cardone's premise is that in order to achieve any given goal in today's frenetic, fast-paced business environment, you need to give every aspect of your endeavour 10X the effort that you might originally envisage.

Such a degree of dedicated effort, for Cardone, is the difference between success and failure. But there is another strand to his theory. To be truly successful you must also ensure that you set your goals ten times higher than required. So if, for example, it is your ambition to make $10,000, you must make it your goal to earn $100,000.

This is a familiar concept. By aiming high, even if you don't end up pulling in the whole $100,000, you are likely to finish up with a whole lot more than had you shot for less.

The Appeal Of The "Work Hard" Ethic

This idea of putting in enormous effort to achieve goals will be familiar to many. From Michael Gladwell's famed 10,000 hours theory, which states that mastery of any discipline only comes about after 10,000 hours' effort have been expended, to Angela Duckworth's book Grit, which describes how success is a product of pushing doggedly through setbacks, there is no shortage of writers and thinkers telling us to put a rocket under our ass if we want to achieve anything worthwhile.

I wholeheartedly agree with them.

For me, there are two important elements to working hard—first, that it will indeed raise the probability of your achieving success, and second, it is good for the soul. As David Deida notes in his seminal The Way of the Superior Man, men in particular need a mission in life that is unconnected with women. Whether it is a movie script, a sport or a microbrewery business, you need to have something that obsesses you that you are inspired to work on day and night. Not only are you more likely to be successful through sheer intensity of effort, but also you will lead a happier life.

My Mission

My mission is writing. Aside from contributing to ROK I have several blogs, write journalism for other titles and have written novels and non-fiction books. Writing for me is both a business and an art—it is my intention that 100% of my income will come from my writing (in whatever form) within the next twelve months and I am working to make that a reality now.

The work itself is pleasurable—that's not to say that I am ecstatic every time I sit down at the keyboard. As anyone who has tried it knows, writing is hard, frustrating, and time-consuming. It also requires you to make thousands of micro-decisions every second, which can leave you filled with self-doubt.

Nevertheless, I can honestly say that I love it. Writing gives me a sense of flow and freedom that few other activities do. I love the poetry of language, and the challenge of wrestling with it on the page, of marshalling it for my own purposes. I have sat indoors writing while the sun has been high in the sky and others have been out enjoying themselves and these stints have been some of the happiest times of my life.

But, Burnout Is Real

Having said all of that, burnout is real, something that was brought home to me recently by the experience of a close friend.

This friend of mine had spent countless hours working on his start-up to the exclusion of almost everything else. He would work from early in the morning until late at night, determined that his dream would become a reality. All was going well and he was on the verge of securing a multi-million pound venture capital injection. But he was stressed out and found it hard to sleep at night. He visited his doctor to no avail. Then, over a single weekend, everything unraveled and he was admitted to hospital suffering from exhaustion. The damage to his mental health was great enough that he has been compelled to take time off and put his business plans on hold.

His story causes some difficulty for me as someone who would otherwise unreservedly advocate massive, determined effort in pursuit of your goals.

But just because burnout is possible, I wouldn't advise anyone not to work hard. Instead, I would caution you to be aware of the dangers, and to temper your efforts with a few simple strategies.

1. Keep in mind the bigger picture.

Okay, so your business, novel, or sporting achievement is incredibly important to you. But try to keep things in perspective. Even if it doesn't work for you this time, it's not the end of the world—you will always have another chance, even if you have to amend or tweak your goal slightly. Work hard on the tasks in hand, but don't let them consume you—try to take a "whatever happens is for the best" approach. This is much more healthy and takes the pressure off so you can do your best work.

2. Write A Gratitude List And Believe In Abundance

Every night you should write a list of five to ten things you are grateful for. This could be anything from your education to readily available food to having a place to live and work.

It sounds so simple as to be asinine, but remembering—and actually writing down—all the things that make your life great is another useful way of putting things in perspective. It may seem like the end of the world when you've sent out 100 prospecting emails to potential clients and no one’s responded, but the truth is there is still a lot in your life to be thankful for.

At the same time, you should also believe in abundance. Again this may seem a little hokey and new age, but always remember that another person’s success will not preclude yours. So if it’s your aim to get good with girls and a friend is successful every time you go out then don’t be jealous—instead, congratulate him and realize what is possible, and that there are literally billions of women out there. Some of them will like you too.

3. Stay In Contact With friends And Family

An obvious point, but one that you need to remember. Your family and close friends are your bedrock. You need to maintain regular contact with them no matter how busy you get. If you have to, schedule time in your calendar to call your mum and dad. This is something I don’t do enough and I should.

You are not alone on this planet—maintain regular contact with those closest to you and be grateful for them.

4. Help Others

This sounds counter-intuitive but the best way to help yourself, particularly if you’re going through a period of stress, is to help other people. Doing so will take you out of yourself and remind you that you are not the centre of the universe. This could be as simple as mentoring someone, or volunteering to help people who are ill or otherwise disadvantaged.

This is not some happy-clappy pseudo-religious dogma, but a very practical way for relieving stress and living a good life. Try it.

5. Keep It In The Day

We live our lives in increments punctuated by sleep, and no human being can live more than one of these at a time, so learn to live 24 hours at time. The past is gone—whatever has happened cannot now he changed, so don't sweat it. The future is beyond your control, subject to a myriad of unforeseen factors. So it's not worth worrying about.

Instead, do yourself a favour and focus on what is in front of you right now. Keeping it in the day is a great way of narrowing your focus to the one thing you have at least some control over–the present.

6. Hand The Outcome Over

You may succeed, you may fail. Of course, you would rather succeed, and I would encourage you to do everything you can to make that happen, but in the end some events are out of your control. So try not to tie all of your happiness to a specific outcomes. Ok, if you don't get that publishing deal then you'll be disappointed, but as I said earlier, you'll always have another shot. The success or failure of an entire lifetime is rarely founded on a single outcome, so don't take things so seriously. Instead, hand it over to the universe, your higher power or to a god, if you believe in one, and concentrate on the work in hand instead.

Remember, if you're fixated on a particular goal then great, but don't let it consume you. Try the simple tips I've outlined to get some much-needed clarity and distance. If you put the work in on the tasks in front of you then the results will take care of themselves.

Interested in reading more about the stress-free way to meet and attract beautiful women? Buy Troy's bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. To learn more click here.

Read More: Why You Don't Deserve That Perfect 10

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

What To Do If Police Are Questioning You About A Sexual Encounter

August 27, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Women often lie to seek vengeance against men, and false rape accusations are a serious problem in our society. Women will even make up total fabrications about sexual encounters to ruin a man's name and reputation. Crime statistics prove this. If you want to get more philosophical about it, a great philosopher from a century ago called it women's innate instinct of dissimulation. The capacity to dissemble, or lie, is stronger in some women than others. Remember this term when dealing with the repercussions of a false rape or other sexual encounter you had with a woman. That's the term Arthur Schopenhauer used to describe women and their natural gift of lying:

> For as lions are furnished with claws and teeth, elephants with tusks, boars with fangs, bulls with horns, and the cuttlefish with its dark, inky fluid, so Nature has provided woman for her protection and defense with the faculty of dissimulation, and all the power which Nature has given to man in the form of bodily strength and reason has been conferred on woman in this form. Hence, dissimulation is innate in woman and almost as characteristic of the very stupid as of the clever. Accordingly, it is as natural for women to dissemble at every opportunity as it is for those animals to turn to their weapons when they are attacked; and they feel in doing so that in a certain measure they are only making use of their rights. Therefore a woman who is perfectly truthful and does not dissemble is perhaps an impossibility.

Hell hath no fury like a woman's scorn, Bukowski knew and wrote about this

It also pays to remember this sage wisdom from author Charles Bukowski in his highly-rated book Women.

> Once a woman turns against you, forget it. They can love you, then something turns in them. They can watch you dying in a gutter, run over by a car, and they'll spit on you.

Some will even drag you through years of legal system torture just to get back at you. As Bukowski knew, men are dead to women once their utility value has been consumed or they feel they've been wronged in some way. This is what you are up against. The good news is, you are not the first man to be falsely accused by a woman, nor will you be the last. The numbers show this is a daily occurrence.

Statistics

Fake Duke Lacrosse Rape Accuser Crystal Mangum later murdered her boyfriend and will spend 14 years in prison

Statistics are all over the place when it comes to how many rape reports are false. Low estimates say 1-2% are false and high estimates say 90% are false. Just know, many studies gathered in the center of the Bell Curve say false rape accusations average as high as 25% when "no crime" committed statistics are included. As a good rough estimate, that's 1 in 4 reported rapes being false. What a risk we run as men! The Harris and Grace study also reported a full 1 in a 10 or 10.9% of rape reports were purely malicious in intent! These numbers jive with an older study from the 1970s in which scientific, medical evidence showed 3-31% of rape reports were false.

A 2008 survey of law enforcement officials across America showed the majority of cops believe at least 11% and as many as 50% of rape allegations were false reports. To me, this confirms the maliciousness of Anglo women in today's society, a topic illuminated by Rookh Kshatriya, an English anti-feminist scholar.

> The Anglobitch Thesis contends that the brand of feminism that arose in the Anglosphere (the English-speaking world) in the 1960s has an ulterior misandrist (anti-male) agenda quite distinct from its self-proclaimed role as 'liberator' of women. This derives from a distinct component in Anglo-Saxon culture, namely Puritanism. This puritanical undercurrent gives women an intrinsic sense of entitlement and privilege as 'owners' of sex in a cultural context where sex is a scarce commodity (we call this sense of entitlement The Pedestal Syndrome). Because of this, the advance of women's 'rights' across the Anglosphere has not been accompanied by a corresponding reduction of their traditional privileges – indeed, those privileges have only broadened in scope and impact, leaving men only with obligations and women aglow with rights plus privileges. This has been accompanied by an obsessive vilification of men in the Anglo-American media, and across the Anglosphere generally.

So, we've established you are up against the natural tendency of women to dissemble, and rape statistics that show a good number of sexual crimes are based on false pretenses, and that you live in a gynocentric, misandrist society. What do you do when the jaws of the metastasizing American police and prison state are looking at you for one of its next meals?

Know Your Rights

A New York man spent four years in prison out of a 20 year sentence after a false rape charge

Just a woman's word that you raped her is enough to land you in jail with charges until you bond out. Know that the burden of proof that you did not force a sexual encounter with a woman rests on your shoulders, and her identity will be protected while yours is sullied. That's the breaks in the injustice system. However, the evidence usually does not hold up, which illustrates how ruthless, vindictive and dissimulating women can be.

Remain calm. Collect yourself. Know you do not have to answer any questions from police without the presence of an attorney. Cooperate with police, but tell them: I am happy to help you, officer, but I want to do that in the presence of my attorney. Even if you are telling the truth, it's recommended you do all communicating with police about such a serious matter through while your legal counsel is present. A misstep or a misstatement on your part could lead to a false conviction. Those with experience in the law will be able to safely guide you through all the potential landmines. Know that only 7% to 13% of reported rapes end up in a conviction in the U.S. Trials require evidence, and the odds are on your side if you committed no crime.

Unfortunately, in its continuing war on heterosexuality, the U.S. (especially states like California) are further backing normal sexual behavior among men into a corner. A "yes means yes" law was recently signed by Jerry Brown, and states:

> Lack of protest or resistance does not mean consent, nor does silence mean consent.

Basically, in the insane American legal system you must ask a female every time you have sex, "Can I fuck you now?" Even if it is a steady girlfriend. This only places another potential legal noose around men's necks.

Get an attorney before any questioning takes place

In some cases, false reports about sexual encounters have ruined men's lives. A man from England named "Nick" graduated from University with an engineering degree, completing school only after years of legal system hell. He was later acquitted of the crime, but that didn't stop his name from being drug through the mud and him suffering several years of false accusations because of some girl who wanted to get back at him. His advice is to fight false rape reports like a raging tiger:

> The moment you stop fighting is the moment you lose. You could protest your innocence for the rest of your life if you had to. It doesn't matter if they don't believe you, keep fighting. It's horrible. I wouldn't wish anyone to go through it, not even my worst enemy. The thing is, if someone knew enough about me they could Google and find out all my case details. If this helps one more person through it then that's worth it.

Don't give up, and don't let a false rape accusation stand. Some jurisdictions allow the falsely accused, once acquitted, to bring civil action (i.e. sue the hell out of) the false accuser. But, depending on where you live your mileage may vary on that form of recourse. There are some cases in which men have gone on to financially devastate false rape accusers. A Maryland man was recently awarded nearly $1 million after his wife falsely accused him of raping their daughters. The man lost his job and went through 5 years of hell for false accusations invented out of whole cloth.

In another case, a New York woman was sentenced to one to three years in prison for perjury charges. As reported by the New York Post:

> The woman whose false rape claims put an innocent man behind bars for nearly four years was sentenced to one to three years in prison on perjury charges. After pleading guilty to making up a story that she was gang raped in Upper Manhattan in 2005 to elicit sympathy from friends, Biurny Peguero Gonzalez was hit with jail time. “I question myself every day as to how I could have done this,” she told the judge at her sentencing hearing. Gonzalez’s false accusations lead to a 20-year prison sentence for Bronx construction worker William McCaffrey. That conviction was overturned after Gonzalez underwent a religious conversion and admitted she made up the story.

This, gentlemen, is only one of the many risks of dealing with women in a society that pedestalizes them and villainizes men.

We’ve seen how much the media and women like to toss around the rape card these days. The data in this article can be your lifeline when facing this evil in the legal system.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: My Encounter With Washington D.C. Police

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

A Gentleman’s Pleasure: Collecting Pieces Of History

August 27, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

In a normal world, every generation inherits something from its fathers and forefathers. The inheritance may consist of traditions, cultural identities, abilities associated to a particular work, and actually so many things it would be near impossible to make an exhaustive list of what we take from the past. As the elder brother amongst his siblings, my uncle received a gold signet ring with his initials written on it when he finished high school with honours.

Today, it seems hard to spot any potential inheritance from our parents’ generation. Many baby boomers rent their flat, work in a cubicle—which means they usually have no trade to teach and no example of fatherhood to give—own 60s rock n’ roll vinyl records or other cultural products that have neither moral nor financial value. Behind their flower power and party culture looms a striking lack.

Americans may think they do not really need to inherit anything. After all, the American dream is about making oneself, working one’s ass off and becoming rich. Yet, now, a growing number of red-pilled youths know that the market is already full, too competitive, and even if they managed to get ahead of the competition, they would be punished through taxes and media shaming. The Constitution is less of a true inheritance than a holy scrap, and entrepreneurship, though meritorious, does barely count as inheritance at all.

If we want to live in a healthy world, we have to create it again. Likewise, if we want inheritance for both us and our future children, we will have to make it too—not out of the blue but at least by reclaiming and owning again what is rightfully ours. One way to do it is through collecting pieces of history. In a deregulated world, where everything tends to go away or get merchandized, owning solid remnants of our ancestors' deeds feels good, and not merely for the financial value of these pieces.

As for myself, I enjoy bibliophilia, i.e. collecting venerable old or rare books, but you are obviously free to adapt the present piece to whatever gentlemanly purpose such as collecting spades, militaria, or homely furniture. Just make sure you do not ruin yourself in uninteresting DVDs, Pokemon cards or other material that will fall apart and turn worthless over the next years.

Rewarding yourself (without complacency)

Just add a glass of scotch and that's it.

By definition, what is well-made, well-conserved and comes from a more or less distant past is estimated, which means it is also more or less rare and expensive. Buying something like that is not as easy as it sounds. Someone may sell rare books in an excellent state, yet you can't understand the language these books are written in, or their topic is not relevant to your interests. Someone may sell a rare book relevant to your interests and endowed with a beautiful leather cover, yet when you receive it you notice the poor state of the pages. Someone sells a rare book with every part in a fair state, a book you can read and could proudly display in our interior, but the seller is clever, wants to squeak every penny he can from the book, and his product is damn too expensive.

Finding something you can buy or negotiate and that is actually interesting can be a challenge. When you succeed at this and receive the interesting object at home, you can think of it as a fair reward for your curiosity and research, let alone the money spent.

Becoming knowledgeable about whatever you own

To the point when your bookshelf starts attracting random cats.

The objects we are talking about come with a history. I have seen a book from the 1890s, widely sold in paperback, bought by a wealthy man who paid a craftsman to make him a fully leathered cover with gilt letterings and dentells inside. This now unique book was later bought by an academic who eventually died and then back on a now world wide market.

Whatever you set your sights on, if you stick to it long enough, you will by necessity become knowledgeable about it. A genuine bibliophile knows about the ex-libris, half-leather or signature. More importantly, you are able to touch and maneuver the objects, which gives you a direct knowledge of them. You know a book is old enough when the ‘s’ are written as ‘ſ.’ Is that snobbery? Perhaps a bit, but I would better see it as picking up the torch of a high part of culture and making it alive through ourselves.

A direct and independent access to history

Ah, the sweet pleasure of reading a book written by a Scot yet translated in French because said language was then the European lingua franca.

Usually, if you want to know about the history of something, you need to go through official specialists, take courses or visit museums. While this is all a normal part of life, having some of the thing between your hands changes completely the relation you have to it. Suddenly, this is not a mummified artifact that had something to do with your ancestors and has been bought by the State or some banker to be arrogantly displayed, but something you can relate with at a much higher degree.

Cutting some never-folded pages with a sharp knife, cautiously enough to let the page borders straight. Cracking open an eighteenth-century book directly without having to go through Google books or some library. Reading a book that would hardly be printed in a Western editor today, or perhaps into some political ghetto, and that was printed at a major editor to be openly sold and read… These are some of the pleasures afforded by bibliophily.

They entail relating to a past that may be more or less distant in time, but somehow still close and perhaps not finished at all. In a museum, these things are dead artifacts that make money for a bunch of soldouts. In my hands, they become lively again and are more where they actually belong.

A supplement of soul

Bum bibliophilia: when your precious eighteenth century books look like an old, worn bunch of paper… to the uninitiated.

Collecting artifacts that are valuable on your eyes is cool. It says something about you. Whatever you choose to collect, this says something about what you care about, enjoy using and learn to be good at. In game, these artifacts may bring you a “supplement of soul” and personality by their sheer historical value and help to relate with girls who might have at least some consideration for said objects. Be careful though, because the line between being passionate about something and being a braggart is sometimes all too easy to cross.

Market knowledge and intuition

To a bibliophile this looks like a treasure trove. Is it?

Like anything that can be exchanged, bought and sold, valuable objects of any type have their own market. And market prices and stocks change constantly due to a variety of factors. When you check constantly the prices of various interesting objects, and how some get bought off or appear on the market, you grow an intuitive sense of what's of value or not. And you learn to spot the true opportunities there too. This market sensitivity is analogous to the new sense one acquires through game practice: after getting used to spot the beautiful and/or available girls around, these girls "appear" to one's look without effort. Experience is about going from a sheer desire or fantasy to a realistic assessment of various situations—and it shows that different domains tend to follow the same dynamics. (Actually, everything has been turning into more and more of a giant market, and this is something we ought to master if we want to take some of these things away from a ruthless, globalized capitalism.)

Sometimes the good stuff is cheap and just requires someone able to sense it before seizing it. Sometimes average stuff is incredibly expensive and overrated, as if all sellers had been tacitly agreeing to maintain high prices. Which, as in any market, can actually happen, especially around very rare books that require a great deal of erudition to be acknowledged.

Recently, a bookseller going bankrupt has been selling his stock at half price. I had sworn to myself not to buy more books for a while but the occasion was too good to miss. Finally, I managed to get 13 books for 100 euros including rare, old, out-of-print and interesting books that would have been 200-300 euros had I bought them to other sellers.

Of course, things are not always that easy: remember the special one with a unique cover? I would have been glad to buy it… except that it was expensive (even considering the pedigree) and disappeared after a few weeks. Definitely, your humble servant was not the only one interested.

Speculation

Definitely, this aspect is neither the most elegant nor appealing of the trade, but being gentlemanly does not prevent one from needing money at times. If you really need to, being able to sell high what you bought cheaply is always good—as long as what you are trading is more important than making money and exploiting the others. I once found an original letter from the great intellectual Lothrop Stoddard, to my knowledge neither reprinted nor copied anywhere, sold 30 euros. Rather cheap, isn't it? That letter I would not sell for less than 150 euros, a price in line with the prices of many letters from celebrities and "great men," yet selling it would be but a last resort option. A relic from a genuinely outstanding intellectual has a moral value that can't be boiled down to a 120 euros margin.

Something to pass on your children

These books (which I highly recommend) can be read for free on the Internet, but having them at hand and on a bookshelf 'feels' immensely better.

Neomasculine children will know quite early how resilient and autonomous they will have to be for merely surviving in the world of tomorrow. They will start doing what we do earlier on. This does not mean they have to be overly individualistic, thinking of themselves as mere atoms inside a big market where everyone tries to take money away from others: instead, they should be awoken from the so-called American dream and keep gaining back what is rightfully theirs, without squandering it on the altar of perpetual growth.

The point here is not to make big bucks, though you may acquire a tremendous knowledge of the market, but to gain something you can pass on your children or other culture-sharers instead of abstract customers.

Indeed.

Those of us who have been conservative or have classical “conservative” leanings tend to break from their blue-pilled, leftist families, in spite of their own family values. Inheritance is still there, but it has to be remade or reconquered first. A Catholic friend of mine once sold a whole stock of vinyl records from the Beatles, the Doors and others 60s-70s leftist references from his father in order to buy a Vulgata—the Latin Bible—printed in 1870, and he plans to use it to teach his son about Jesus Christ and the sacred language once used by a once genuine church. And now, this once dead pile of papers jammed between two leathered backs will come to life again and shine before the eyes of a young child.

Read More: American Girls Are The Papa John’s Of Women

André du Pôle

André is a young European who left his decaying country in 2012 for greener pastures. He enjoys exploring subterranean places, reading about a host of interconnected topics, and yearns for Tradition.

Moneyball Is A Parable Of Masculinity

August 28, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

If you do not know the story of Billy Beane, here is a preface: played in the 2011 movie Moneyball by Brad Pitt, Beane was the General Manager (and is now the executive vice president) of the Oakland Athletics major league baseball team.

Back in 2002, he changed the methodology of the game by adapting some far-out, newfangled strategy called “sabermetrics,” which took a mathematics approach to a perceived game of instincts and savvy. Sabermetrics was ahead of its time; where scouts believed a hitter’s potential came down to force of character and pure athleticism, sabermetrics proposed that the key to a good hitter was, in fact, in his ability to get on base, be it a walk or a hit.

Peter Brand (Jonah Hill): Billy Beane's assistant and brain trust, who advises, "your goal should be to buy wins".

As Beane's Assistant GM Paul DePodesta (known as "Peter Brand" in the film and played by Jonah Hill) stated, "your goal shouldn't be to buy players, your goal should be to buy wins." Taunted, dismissed, at times blatantly threatened, the Beane-Brand partnership prevailed in applying this controversial approach to the A's 2002-2003 season's lineup.

What does this cinematic tale mean? Specifically, how does Moneyball add up as a great "parable of masculinity"? Well, many reasons, but first, it helps to have context: Moneyball was directed by Bennett Miller, who crafted the masterful 2014 wrestling film, Foxcatcher. Both films, respectively, wrestle (Foxcatcher literally) with masculine ideals and centre on male characters who are naturally competitive and have a strong will for greatness.

Where Foxcatcher resembles a Greek tragedy, Moneyball is, mostly, a success story. "Mostly" because, like real life, stories should not be relayed as black-and-white and sweet-or-sour. True, the A's lose in the AL Elimination Game. True, Beane declined the general manager job for a team that won the World Series two years later (and broke its perennial Bambino's Curse). And true, by the film's end, Billy "is still trying to win that last game of the season."

In “Foxcatcher”, Dave Schultz (Mark Ruffalo, right) is the Billy Beane character–resolute, skillful, intelligent–and the centre of the film’s tragedy.

But throughout the course of the film, in spite of all his opponents and obstacles, Beane never loses track of his individuality and integrity. He stands by his decisions, even in the absence of light, and stays true to them until they hold true to all of baseball.

One of the greatest obstacles for all men is overcoming those pangs of self-doubt. That often unshakeable insecurity of questioning your thoughts, convictions, and actions, and wondering if you should cave at the behest of a brash majority or vocal minority. When it comes to principles–something this decadent modern era seems to lack–one should look to what Thomas Jefferson said and “stand like a rock.” Billy Beane, indeed, stands like a rock—his unwavering flag of audacity planted firmly in the ground.

As GM, Beane was already regarded with a certain amount of respect by his colleagues. He had experience as a pro baseball player (played for the Mets, Twins, Tigers, and A’s), where most managers did not. But when Beane presents the eccentric idea of sabermetrics (pioneered by pork-and-beans worker, Bill James), his credibility is put at stake. Still, Billy keeps his cool, spits tobacco into his paper cup, and deduces to a table full of fogey scouts: “If we try to play like the Yankees in here, we will lose to the Yankees out there.”

The real Billy Beane, executive vice president of the Oakland Athletics.

Firstly, that is one of Billy's great (and manly) strengths: he is an expert purveyor of logic. Sitting at the end of the boardroom table, Beane reminds his scouts if the Athletics try to "play like the Yankees in here, [they] will lose to the Yankees out there." As harebrained as sabermetrics first sounds, Beane explains himself calmly, but not without some sardonic wit to boot ("there are rich teams and there are poor teams… then there's fifty feet of crap… and then there's us").

Repeatedly, Beane experiences confrontations that, if dealt incorrectly (that is, with irrational emotions), could damage his integrity or reputation as GM. But Beane handles it like a champ, never conceding points or cowering to low-blow character attacks. While Beane does come off a little carefree, that is more of a defence mechanism against the swaths of in-house skepticism. In reality, he is firm, strong-minded, and respectful of his associates' views. He listens, so he can properly deal with objections from the coaching staff.

For instance, Beane's initial conversation with head coach Art Howe (played by the late, great Philip Seymour Hoffman) about his shaky one-year contract is dealt with supremely. Billy explains that he can't look at Art's short-term contract until he puts the players on the field. Until then, Beane affirms, everything is "on" him. Beane is essentially warding off a nagging kvetch using sound logic, while being fair—he puts all the onus on himself, giving Art no further course of argument.

“There’s fifty feet of crap… then there’s us”: Beane breaks down reality to a room full of skeptics.

This is what makes Beane not only a true man, but a true leader (should they not be one and the same?). He is always willing to assume responsibility – i.e. when the responsibility is truly his. At first, he makes some excuses. He whines to A’s co-owner Steve Schott about the team’s low budget, but gets up off his butt and owns the reality of his predicament.

He acquires Peter Brand, a Yale economics graduate who has an uncanny way with numbers and codifying player performance. Together, they dump expensive players for cheap underdogs. Originally in a tough fix, Beane pulls through by making personal, calculated decisions that ultimately alter the landscape of baseball.

An important subplot of Moneyball shows Beane as a divorced father. There’s an interesting scene where Beane waits for his daughter at his ex-wife’s home. Her new husband (played effetely by Spike Jonze) sits across from Beane, asking him inane, uninformed questions about baseball. We can’t help but wonder: “did Billy’s ex-wife hedge her bets or something with this beta?”

The Billy Beane-Peter Brand partnership that turned the whole MLB right-side up.

As the conversation sputters, Beane learns that his ex and her boytoy gave his daughter a cell phone. When the boyfriend sheepishly says Billy can be part of that decision (even though it's obviously too late), Beane dominantly replies "her mother and I will discuss it, but thank you."

That's another one of Beane's masculine virtues in this film. He handles bullshit, fakery, and macho hostility with a Stoic's acuity. Consider the scene below where head scout Grady Fuson criticizes Billy's new crusade with "Google boy" Brand. When Grady asks to have "a word," Beane knows the scout has a major gripe and immediately decides he won't succumb to the tension.

Before Grady can say anything, Billy slaps his hands (a good, though kind of theatrical, way of commanding an opponent's attention) and inquires, "you're not happy, Grady… why." Immediately, Beane has called out Grady's agenda, disarming him. Beane is direct with his opponent and pulls no punches (literally): "adapt or die," he asserts. Frustrated, Grady aggressively puts a hand on Billy's shoulder, which he immediately shucks off. Notice how Beane doesn't physically escalate and buy into Grady's macho theatrics. Instead, he calmly fires the incensed Grady–not simply because he can but, with this physical threat, Beane now has every right to.

Following this code of conduct will help you win in life and overcome the many, many conflicts you will face as a man in a system that wants you to fail. It is what separates the alphas from the betas. You should face these conflicts head-on, because if you don't that means you have not been a challenge to the powers that be and you are just another pawn in the game of life.

Billy Beane is the opposite: he represents the struggles of a man in a powerful position, who uses his authority to challenge the system from the top-down. He accepts that "it's a process" to stand out from the crowd and separate yourself from the status quo, all while staying true to his principles. That is the basic parable of Moneyball: it is not about the joys of playing America's greatest game and staying in "the show," but about changing the way it should be played. Billy Beane's achievements should be a guide for every man who challenges an existing flawed system.

Read More: The Parable of Aepyornis Island

Harry Lime
Writer. Filmmaker. Lover of cuckoo clocks. Email: harrylimerok @gmail.com.

A Guide To Both Types Of Overhead Press

August 28, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

The shoulders are often considered to be a short-hand for the masculine form in particular—and rightfully so for the simple fact that men do, on average, have broader shoulders than women. And the variety of aphorisms and folk wisdoms pertaining to the deltoids: “Carrying other people on your shoulders”, “Standing on the shoulders of giants”, and (obliquely) Atlas Shrugged allude to the nature of men to bear tremendous weights upon their mighty shoulders. Any cartoonist will differentiate males and females by giving the former a broad chest and shoulders.

A broad and powerful upper body is useful for a variety of tasks, not the least of which is lifting things over your head. While having strong shoulders will help you with all of your upper body exercises, I would argue that of the two main types of upper body press (bench and overhead and all their permutations), the overhead is the more practical and useful of the two.

While my appreciation of the bench press has already been established on this website, I will acknowledge that you're not likely to be in a position outside the gym where you'll be on your back lifting things upwards. However, you will undoubtedly have to lift a heavy object over your head while standing on your feet at some point in your life—whether it's moving a box into an attic or lifting a nubile young lady over your head in a ballroom is for you to decide.

Exercise Overview

There are several exercises that involve standing on your two feet and lifting a weight over your head. Like all exercises worth doing, this basic concept has a julienne of variations that can be done—two hands, one hand, wide grip, narrow grip—but the two variations that I will discuss today are the push press and the military press.

These two exercises are the best things you can do for development of shoulder strength, and the push press is one of the most practical exercises you can do for training for the rigors of daily life.

Both exercises involve lifting a loaded barbell from the chest to over the head with arms locking out, with the main difference being that the military press locks the back and legs and strictly uses the arms and shoulders, while the push press, as the name implies, uses the legs as a boost. The push press is also known as the "jerk," as in the second component of the Olympic lift known as the "clean and jerk" (the Olympic lifts are a discipline that are even more about technique than they are sheer muscular strength, and they do require an immense amount of strength. As such they will require a separate article).

For your purposes, I will allow you to use a rack or power cage, rather than demanding that you clean the weight up from the floor to your chest. This is because an improperly performed clean is a fast way to throwing out your back or blowing out your knees.

Place the barbell on the level of the rack that is comfortable for you to lift to your chest, and load it with the amount of weight you want. As usual, I will advocate that you start light and do the exercise with proper form.

Take the barbell and hold it to your chest. This is the start position.

Some lifters prefer to keep their wrists locked and forward as seen on the left, and some prefer to roll their wrists back slightly and roll them forward on the lift. I will advise you to just do whichever feels natural to you (I find that rolling the wrists back forces the collarbone to bear some of the weight, and thus makes me lift slightly more, but if you choose this, don't roll them back too much!)

This, the two exercises have in common, but it is of course here that they deviate from each other. The military press is the simpler of the two: Keep your back tight, and your legs locked, and lift the weight up with your arms and shoulders

I will emphasize that for both of these exercises, you must keep the back tight and straight, and look forward. Looking up at the ceiling risks having your back bend backwards (the neck is part of the spine, after all), and bending your back with 100+ pounds over your head is a very bad idea. Note that your back may bend slightly, but as long as you don't feel pain, this is tolerable.

In addition to this, make sure that you keep your arms either level or slightly in front of your head, as keeping the arms behind the head can lead to some nasty rotator cuff injuries if you fail to lift properly.

Lock the arms out, and then lower the weight down in a controlled manner.

The Push Press

The push press is considered by some to be not as "pure" as the military press, but as it will enable you to lift more weight than the military press, I would advise doing both. Plus the matter of practicality for daily life I discussed above.

Beginning in the start position, bend the legs about 25-30 degrees. Then, keeping your neck and back straight, explosively push up with your feet and simultaneously push up with the arms, lifting the barbell over your head.

Yours truly with 205 pounds. Note that my head is forward

Do both of these exercises, and get the broad shoulders that your woman wants to snuggle up to, lest she find another guy who can provide them.

Read More: How To Do A Proper Bench Press

Larsen Halleck

Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

Roosh Q&A: 19 Answers To Globalism & Politics Questions

August 28, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The next Q&A video is on globalism and world politics:

Here's the index so you can jump around:

0:06
"Why do you care about what happens to Western civilization, or Europeans for that matter? Is it a disgust for injustice, source of intellectual stimulation, you're mostly attracted to white chicks, or is there a deeper conviction than that?" (CLARK KENT)

2:43
"The outcry against the world tour in Canada last year, and the strong opposition to the Tribal meetups in February 2016 was a clear sign the establishment see us as a real and credible threat….how can we regroup and become stronger together to bring about the changes in society that we want to see?" (MERCENARY)

4:33
"Do you think Germany and Sweden will look like Latin America in the future? With a extremely racially mixed population and no dominant culture?" (KRATISTOS)

7:35
"What do you think are the odds of stopping the globalists?" (THOMAS)

10:39
"Hey I see that they are growing tensions in Europe to the point where there will be civil war and mostly in France Germany and Sweden because of the high rates a sexual assault and sexual molestation that the immigrants are doing, how do you think it will turn out will the local population win if there is a civil war or will the government beat them and have the migrants completely take over and demoralized the local population? Do you think the outcome will be?" (DARRIUS)

12:44
"Do you think the West can turn itself around and prevent the major collapse, or will the West have to fall apart entirely before we can rebuild our civilization?" (BARTLEBY THE SCRIVENER)

15:32
"You constantly refer to the elites and the establishment (i.e. as a specific group of people) as the cause of the west's ills. In your opinion, why is it that the elites of the 21st century west are destructive, whereas in the 17th,18th&19th centuries (i.e. enlightenment onwards until WW1) they were constructive?" (PHOENIX)

18:43
"Do you think there is an agenda involving the genocide of white/Caucasian people?" (JAKE THE MUSS)

21:35
"Of all the propaganda out there, which method have you found to be the most interesting and/or surprising?" (SNOWPLOW)

23:59
"What do you think about Milo and the other attention whore that kissed him publicly?" (BETTER DEAD THAN RED)

25:50
"Are there any arguments from feminists that you do agree with? Do you have any sympathies for the 20ish American girl? How does that contrast to the perspective they have?" (COSINE88)

28:47
"What can we do on our everyday life for changing the current course taking place in western civilization? Your bang books showed us how to take a profit out of it, and your last book freedom of speech isnt free showed us what's wrong with the world. How can we find a healthy place in the middle of those two worlds you've been mastering in the last decade, Roosh?" (DAVID HANS 3344)

32:00
"How are we going to prevent The Male Happy Hour disaster from happening again? How are like minded ROK member suppose to meet in public without being lynched by angry mobs and lose our jobs?" (BENDER BENDING RODRIGUEZ)
"I just would like to know what you think we can all do to get the meet-ups started again, safely and successfully?" (NICK BLACK)

34:15
"Do you believe in the Holocaust? I know you are Iranian so I know you don't but anyway I'd like to see if you answer this question."
(SUBAL SAKHA DAS)

35:20
“Why are we making the Jews an enemy? If anything, Netanyahu and the Jewish ‘tribe’ are an example to follow to preserve our traditions, but not stagnate ourselves in a neo-luddite anti-technology binge.” (FITZ ROY SOMERSET)

38:11
“Your theory of depopulation by ways of immigrants makes sense. I always believed the world was overpopulated, however. But it has a possible hole, people equal taxpayers. Do you believe this means that the “lower population” then simply pays more taxes?” (TYKO STEAMBOAT)

40:06
“What makes you think that Yuri Bezmenov is telling the truth now? (Meaning up until his death.)” (DEBEGUILED)

41:33
“Now that you know the massive Jewish influence behind Western culture nowadays, do you still believe “White nationalism is another term for White knighting”? (If it was you who said that, don’t remember for certain) Should White guys white knight white girls so that White civilisation doesn’t go down in flames?” (CENTURION)

44:39
“Your latest video, the future of the world, suggests that the future may not be so peaceful and prosperous. My question is what should we do to protect ourself and the people around us from the worst case scenario?” (IL SORPASSO)

Previous Video: 33 Answers To Personal Questions Asked Of Me

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

20 More Degenerate Cultures Of Our Dystopian Society

August 29, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Our society is declining so fast that there seems to be new form of degeneracy popping out every week. In addition to the twenty degenerate cultures I've listed in my previous article, here are twenty more that you should be aware of for your enjoyment. Really, we're living in a special era that will be studied by anthropologists or aliens in the distant future when all this madness leads to its eventual conclusion. So, instead of getting all flustered, try to enjoy the show when you still can.

1. Electronic Screen Addiction Culture

You don’t realize just how much we worship the electronic screen until you see others do it. How long do you think it’ll be before the screens get permanently attached to our heads or even our irises?

2. Internet War Culture

I’m also guilty of internet jockeyism.

The internet has become the safe-space battleground for the plebs to fight amongst one another while the elites are robbing the people blind and destroying nations in the real world. But forget that, let’s go back online to insult someone for having a different opinion!

3. Pleasure Uber Alles Culture

“Oh, eating this “food” is going to make me fat and give me diabetes? Who cares, it’s delicious.”

“Bored? Life sucks? Oh well, I’ll play video games all day. Screw the real world.”

“Marriage, family, and children? lol, I’m too busy drinking like a whale and riding the cock-carousel.”

4. Attention At All Cost Culture

Speaking of pleasures, attention is the easiest way to fire dopamines in your brain without having to give up anything (and unlike food or drugs, you can't crash or wreck yourself). It's no wonder that attention today is the most highly sought currency in our world of Facebook, Tinder, Instagram, and more.

5. Assault Through Disgust Culture

Being disgusting on purpose to get attention is exactly what they're aiming for.

The best thing about attention is that it doesn't have to be positive; it can be won just by being disgusting enough for people to notice. Some people turn it into a game where it is both a weapon and a competition to see how much reaction can be provoked.

6. Celebrity Worship Culture

You know the civilization is due for the reset button when these skanks are put on television instead of going on the guillotine.

Serious question: Why do people even worship celebrities? What do they even get out of it? Are the stars supposed to be surrogate gods and heroes in a world without any? Are people today so stupid and inane that they have to look up to entertainers to feel good about their own worthless lives?

7. Spectator Culture

Judging by his reaction, he appears to have just accomplished something profoundly valuable for the advancement of his own life.

No one wants to accomplish anything for themselves anymore. People are spending more and more time watching movies, sports, porn, television shows, news, and so on so that they can go on the internet and talk about them as if they're actually important.

8. "Get Rich" Culture

GET RICH QUICK !

We Can't Offer You a Return of 5 Per Cent Per Week in Cash on your investment, but if you invest $35.00 in a RUGBY or $40.00 in an IVER-JOHNSON we will offer you QUICK RETURNS. Ride a good Bicycle and you will soon get

Rich in Health
Rich in Strength
Rich in Solid Satisfaction

The Bicycle game is NOT dead and NEVER WILL BE. No man ever rode a good. easy runniug Bicycle but what he was made better mentally, as well as physically. Don't grind your life away day and night in the office or shop. Get out in the air and look on the bright side of life. Remember above all, get a GOOD BICYCLE.

SCHOLLENBERGER BROS.

Agents for Good Bicycles.

Phone 545. We'll Treat You Square 230 North Main

We all know that life's only purpose is to make money and get rich. If you don't like that, you're just a loser who can't make it. Now, click this link within the next ten seconds to learn my secret on how to make money FAST—but you first have to buy my books and products that show you how awesome my life is.

9. “It’s so hard being me” Culture

“Oh, boohoo, you don’t know how hard it is to be a [woman, black, homosexual, Jew, Muslim, trans-whatever, etc.]. Now give me your tears and cash you oppressor scum.”

10. Supplicating Male Culture

Men are becoming increasingly domesticated in a world that tries to subjugate and exploit them. The white-knights and male feminist chihuahuas among them will bark at you and defend the man-hating feminist pukes just because they have a vagina. I wonder if these rag dolls even realize that the “misogynists” they hate are having sex with the women they’re defending while they themselves are getting nothing for picking up the tap and throwing themselves down as doormats.

11. Letting Yourself Go Culture

Why make any effort in the world to be decent when the society itself isn't? When you see someone who just seems to have lost any and all sense of shame, it's their way of saying, "I don't care about anything. I have no control over my life." This is what happens to a dying civilization with no values and no standards.

12. Reaction Formation Culture

This is what Freud calls the slip of the unconscious.

Reaction formation is a way of covering your true nature by behaving the opposite way. It shouldn't be a surprise for us to find out that there are many feminists who secretly crave being dominated and have fantasies about getting raped. I'm also certain that most male feminists are secretly perverts or closet rapists. The MGTOW's do their part too by screaming about how they don't care about women via bitching about them non-stop.

13. Victim Faking Culture

Woman, 24, accused of falsely claiming she was the victim of a sexual assault appears in court

- Defendant is accused of committing perjury in a 2012 trial in south London
- 24-year-old also charged with attempting to pervert the course of justice
- She has not entered pleas on the charges and her case was adjourned

By RICHARD SPILLETT FOR MAILONLINE
PUBLISHED: 12:58 GMT, 28 April 2016 | UPDATED: 13:18 GMT, 28 April 2016

Share 97 shares

A woman accused of purjury over allegations she falsely claimed she had been sexually assaulted appeared in court today.

Jemma Beale, 24, allegedly committed perjury while giving evidence at a trial at Isleworth Crown Court in 2012.

She is charged with two counts of perjury in relation to saying that an act of Wishful fantasy gone too far or an unbelievable lie for attention whoring?

As I've said in my previous article, being recognized as a victim is a privileged honor. It is so precious that people will go as far as to fake it by lying and committing hate crimes against themselves to achieve it.

14. Social Justice Culture

Follow

Ordering a happy meal and the cashier asked "for a boy or a girl?" And then I explained how damaging it is to enforce the gender binary

RETWEETS 1,610 LIKES 2,528

2:02 PM - 2 Jan 2016

How dedicated you are to social justice is directly co-related to how little self-worth and discipline you possess. In other words, the less accomplished you are and the less self-control you have over yourself, the more you need to compensate by being an “activist” and the more you need to control other people’s behaviors to relieve your anxiety.

15. Give Up Culture

Give-up-itis is a disease that comes in several forms:

“I’m so used to getting everything from my parents and the government, don’t make me make an effort in life!”

“If I talk to women I’ll automatically get divorced and go to jail for rape, so I’m going to bitch at other men who are more successful.”

“People should just accept me for the fat and disgusting pigturd that I am, I don’t live my life to please anyone except my stomach and my taste buds!”

16. Internet Witch Hunt Culture

“Hey, look! Someone has a political opinion we don’t like, let’s ruin his life!”

17. Technological Serfdom Culture

“It’s okay, no one’s forcing us.”

More technology means less freedom. Every new invention will become normalized and you’ll be forced to choose between “getting on with the times” or cutting yourself off from the society. I can’t wait for the sheeple to start telling everyone who resists that we can “moderate” or choose not to use technology when they become requirements for jobs, communication, and basic social function. They’re already trying to ban cash and are employing surveillance in every technological device we use, where are we supposed to run away to?

18. Virtue Signaling Culture

I think virtue signaling is a side-effect of today's education that is more interested in spreading degeneracy than actually teaching the youth something useful. The kids who were trained to be "good" for listening to the teachers are now adults doing the same thing to get praise from the society. The people who engage in these shenanigans want to get the figurative pat on the head for expressing opinions that the current culture tells them to have. It's also a form of attention-whoring for those with low self-esteem.

19. Self-hate Culture

"Look how progressive I am! Isn't it hip that I hate my race so much?"

It's now not enough to just feel guilty about your own identity (ie. cis-gender, white, male) while propping up the "oppressed" group, you must now show off how enlightened you are by actively hating your own identity for the public to see.

20. Using Children As Culture War Cannon Fodders Culture

Guess which societies of the past indoctrinated children for ideological battles?

In a dangerously bigoted world like today, children need to be ~~brainwashed~~ educated from a young age to become the foot-soldiers for social justice lest they grow up and start to think for themselves.

Conclusion

Degeneracy doesn't just stop on its own; the rot will continue on because it can. And whatever you may hope for, there has never been an instance where social degeneracy was reversed by a counter current without vehement force or a full collapse. Know that the societal decay of today cannot last much longer—you must brace yourselves for what is to come.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 20 Degenerate "Cultures" That Have Formed The Dystopia We're Living In

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Milo Yiannopoulos Devastates Time Magazine's Joel Stein And His Pro-Censorship Position

August 29, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Time magazine just published an alt-right hit piece by Joel Stein entitled Why We're Losing The Internet To The Culture Of Hate: How Trolls are Ruining the Internet, effectively calling for internet censorship to assuage hurt feelings of leftists on the internet. Gay conservative Milo Yiannopoulos recently had Stein on his podcast (Youtube link), revealing Stein to be no more than a barely competent typist emotionally pushing the leftist agenda.

No sooner than Stein comes on Milo's podcast, Milo levels this blow, calling into question Time's obvious bias:

> Why are all the victims liberals in your piece? …because I have a theory about this.

Stein then offered this poorly reasoned rationalization:

> I think they are more upset and more hurt. But I could have [put conservatives in the piece]…lefties get trolled more effectively.

Leftists might be overly emotional, but even Journalism 101 teaches "journalists" to get both sides of the story. Right away, Milo reveals the biases of Time.

Stein pushes leftist talking points in his shit piece on the alt-right and manosphere

Indeed, every single one of the victims in the Time piece are leftists, feminists, and other political opponents of the alt-right. Milo then goes on to expose feminists and other leftist "victims" everything from professional grievance mongers to whiny provocateurs who can dish it out but can't take it. Milo says the grievance mongers actually love the hate they get online because that's their currency—it gives them fame and fortune.

As the podcast plays on, Milo continues to assail Stein, running over him with a freight train of logic. He throws out some names that would have at least balanced the article a little if one wants to talk about women being trolled and having their names drug through the mud—Michelle Bachman, Sarah Palin, Ann Coulter, Margaret Thatcher. All these women were victims of hateful leftists who are never challenged by big media about their internet trolling and flat out lies. Milo says:

> Conservative women get the worse abuse in the world…you made some partisan choices in the victims you chose for this piece. Everybody gets trolled on the internet…but you chose a particular side of the political divide to characterize as victims. You decided you were going to choose women and feminists…

Predictably, Stein had no rebuttal except to say he "should have" put conservatives in his story in a tone of voice that made him seem like a deer caught in the headlights of unrelenting logic from Milo. He then couldn't resist playing the victim card himself saying "it's very easy to troll me because my last name is Jewish." Huh? Apparently, it never occurred to Stein that in writing a cover story for a supposedly unbiased national magazine he might need to try and balance his coverage a bit. Milo goes on:

> [Michelle Malkin is] a very prominent conservative blogger in the United States wrote a book about [being trolled] and yet you didn't interview her, you chose feminists. Put me through the reasoning.

Stein again had no logical comeback or reasonable excuse. It's thorughly enjoyable to hear a leftist from Time magazine speechless as his tower of lies and half-truths comes crashing down all around him.

The Media Velvet Glove Conceals The Government Iron Fist

Milo peels back the velvet glove of the media and reveals the iron fist in this interview

Beyond astounding bias, make no mistake Stein is playing his role setting up the narrative that we need government intervention to protect us from the internet so Hillary can take control of it, if God forbid she wins this year's election. His piece uses the tried and true Hegelian dialectic model of proposing a preconceived solution to a "problem" the media invents out of whole cloth. Let's take a closer look at the hit piece in question. Stein wrote:

> It would be smarter to be cautious, because the Internet's personality has changed. Once it was a geek with lofty ideals about the free flow of information. Now, if you need help improving your upload speeds the web is eager to help with technical details, but if you tell it you're struggling with depression it will try to goad you into killing yourself.

Always remember media propaganda is usually based on spurious claims like this one. If someone is that emotionally sensitive that internet trolls push them to the edge of suicide, they might not need to be on the internet in the first place. Or they might not need to be alive because people are mean whether they're online or not. Just look at how mean Stein is stereotyping the entire alt-right and manosphere as nothing but evil trolls.

One must understand, as Milo obviously does, the media and government work hand in hand. The media is the velvet glove concealing the government's iron fist. The media constantly pushes campaigns of fear, and in response an increasingly tyrannical government is only too happy to come up with all sort of new laws and regulations designed to "protect us" when in reality our freedoms and our money end up getting taken away and the "problem" never gets solved but it does get forgotten about by the scandal sheet writers. This is the case with pushing the "hate speech" narrative. The idea the government needs to "fix it" will come later, after the narrative has been established.

One of the leftist women featured in Time article's victim parade is feminist Anita Sarkeesian, who made her name by using the victim card. From the Time article:

> In 2012, after feminist Anita Sarkeesian started a Kickstarter campaign to fund a series of YouTube videos chronicling misogyny in video games, she received bomb threats at speaking engagements, doxxing threats, rape threats and an > unwanted starring role in a video game called Beat Up Anita Sarkeesian.

Milo nuked this claim:

> Feminists don't do anything, they don't write books about it. They're lazy…[feminists] whine professionally to journalists and get all kinds of press about it and donations for their fundraising drives. These people don't produce very much, they tend to be primarily famous for whining about harassment on the internet particularly when their careers start stalling. The way Sarkeesian got famous was she went on a round of interviews claiming she was getting abused and harassed, and she was getting all these death and rape threats. She wasn't at the time but then she started getting them…and she got all this round of nice press from credulous journalists.

He then uses the Sarkeesian example to destroy the liberal victim narrative:

> My reasoning is that the reason people always go with these liberal victims is that feminism is capitalizing on men's natural chivalrousness and instinct…from all the journalists like you whose natural instinct is to protect women. Love them. Cherish them. Nurture them. I think you're being abused by opportunistic gender activists. I think what's happening is they're coming to you with sob stories that you and other journalists in the media we don't like very much, the "mainstream" media…we would say that you guys are credulous. We would say that you guys don't check your facts. We would say that you guys don't look into these [feminists].

Attention feminists and other leftists: Your victim card is about to expire

Whining indeed gets feminists political power and attention as they play victims and the media bends over to kiss their fat asses. Check out this excerpt as Stein attacks the alt-right and manosphere while implying Big Daddy Government needs to step in and police online speech. The implications of his proposal are frightening:

> The alt-right's favorite insult is to call men who don't hate feminism "cucks," as in "cuckold." Republicans who don't like Trump are "cuckservatives." Men who don't see how feminists are secretly controlling them haven't "taken the red pill," a reference to the truth-revealing drug in The Matrix. They derisively call their adversaries "social-justice warriors" and believe that liberal interest groups > purposely exploit their weakness to gain pity, which allows them to control the levers of power. Trolling is the alt-right's version of political activism, and its ranks view any attempt to take it away as a denial of democracy.

Attention, Mr. Stein. The First Amendment was not written to protect polite speech. It was written to protect offensive speech, particularly offensive speech of the political type. That's exactly what "cuckservatives" is, offensive (if truthful) political speech. In case you didn't get enough of Stein's victim card playing, here's some more:

> When sites are overrun by trolls, they drown out the voices of women, ethnic and religious minorities, gays–anyone who might feel vulnerable. Young people in these groups assume trolling is a normal part of life online and therefore self-censor. An anonymous poll of the writers at TIME found that 80% had avoided discussing a particular topic because they feared the online response.

Once again Stein falls back on the old gnome of women, ethnic and religious minorities having the Superior Virtue of the Oppressed, victimized at the hand of evil white male conservatives.

Another interesting exchange had Stein labeling multimillionaire actors and actresses as "sensitive, emotional" people. Milo once again slices through the bull:

> You're kidding, right? We probably know as many people as one another, right. 75% of them…pure sociopaths. They don't do things by accident.

Stein, obviously backed into a corner and bleeding, then tried to laughably use the conspiracy theory claim on Milo for claiming most people in the media are self-serving assholes. It didn't work. As someone who has worked in newsrooms all over the country, Milo is right. Most people on TV whether small time or big time are pure sociopaths and consummate game players.

Quite honestly, one would expect more from a man writing the Time cover story than this feeble reasoning.

We Finally Have a Voice

In the Crossfire: Milo on the right, one of the growing chorus of voices challenging Cultural Marxism and its narratives

The Time article was obviously nothing more than hit piece on the alt-right, in what is a coordinated effort to have us shut up. Hillary attacked us last week. Time did a hit piece on us. Facebook and Twitter are banning people for speech they don't approve of. (Milo knows all about that). The genius of this interview is in the fact Milo reframed the argument and put leftists like Stein on the defense. This interview is a case study in screwing up the left's narratives. Gentlemen, we must relentlessly reframe and put the left on the defense as Milo so masterfully did if we are to mark a turning point in the culture war.

The beauty of the internet is the Silenced Majority is now having our say. And the power structure does not like it one bit. Expect more hit pieces, character assassinations, and labeling of the alt-right as evil oppressors in the coming months and years. We are the last bastion of truly free speech in the country. We have two choices: uncontrolled speech that might hurt someone's feelings, or Pravda. Stein obviously prefers the latter. Remember: reframe, and put lefties on the defense. Works every time. Listen to this interview. Remember it well. It plays like an instruction manual on how to devastate blowhard lefties.

Globalists and the power structure obviously want to shut us up. Which is why we need to get even louder.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: University Of Manchester Bans Breitbart's Milo Yiannopoulos From Debate On Censorship

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Most Commonly Used SJW Subversion Tactics—And How To Defeat Them

August 29, 2016 | by Brian Gerard | Link | Original Link

As many of our readers at Return Of Kings understand, SJWs and their ilk represent a formidable foe that interferes with our ability to enjoy lives based on neomasculinity. As Roosh's meetup controversy demonstrated, we cannot hope to save the West unless we nullify their power, because they will never stop until we cease to exist. We can not just simply ignore them in the hopes that they will go away, as they will continually intrude on every sphere of private life possible.

This situation poses both a challenge and a question for us here at ROK. The challenge lies in making the SJW's so worthless and toxic to the globalists, that they will no longer protect them with government agencies, courts, academia or Hollywood. The question is how to make that a reality. My solution to this query consists of understanding the tactics they use against us, the reason being that to defeat an enemy, one must understand them.

In this article, I will be discussing the tactics used by Code Pink protesters, Antifa thugs, and BLM hooligans. These are the SJWs' street soldiers and their tactics are effective but predictable.

The Origin Of Leftist Street Tactics

Some people just want to watch the world burn.

In the case of leftist street tactics, they can be traced to one person: Saul Alinsky. Born in 1909 to Jewish Russian immigrants, Alinsky spent the majority of his life in Chicago, organizing groups he saw as politically disenfranchised, with particular emphasis being devoted to the South Side of Chicago, a neighborhood which would eventually produce Barack Obama.

In 1971, he wrote a political primer in which he used his years of experience to set out a series of rules that any group of political agitators should use if they sought to overthrow the established order. This work, complete with a dedication to Lucifer himself, was known as "Rules For Radicals," and it guaranteed that Alinsky would be forever known amongst hardcore leftists as the "father of community organizing." Today, virtually every leftist political action group uses his tactics, and Rules For Radicals has even profoundly influenced the likes of Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama.

Because of this, it is necessary to begin our understanding of leftist tactics with Alinsky's rules. Because there are 13 distinct rules, each of which requiring a detailed analysis to fully understand, it is necessary to limit this discussion to Alinsky's three most important rules for brevity's sake. These particular rules were selected over the rest because of how much SJWs rely on them to conduct their campaign against us.

Rule 1: "Power is not only what you have, but what the enemy thinks you have."

Of all the rules that Alinsky developed, Rule #1 is the one that our readership at ROK will have the easiest time understanding and implementing. This is because it is a politicized and weaponized version of the "frame" rule that is well understood in terms of game. The underlying philosophy behind this rule is to always give off the appearance of power and strength, regardless of the political movement's true level of popularity. This rule exists not to fool the opposition, but to trick undecided and low information voters into believing that your cause is stronger than it really is.

A prominent example of this rule in action can be seen at virtually any leftist protest held in a major city. If you observe these protests long enough, you'll notice that protesters of all types will be participating. If the protest is for environmental causes, you'll probably see minimum wage advocates, anti-prison advocates, Antifa thugs, and possibly Black Lives Matter types carrying their signs as well. At this point, it's reasonable to ask why protesters for so many different causes would be at an environmental rally, and the reason is simple: they were paid for and brought in by organizers to make the protest appear bigger.

Protesting for their "right" to jump on cars.

This is an example of Alinsky's rule #1 in play, because the organizers of the protest are not only aware of the fact that they comprise an extreme political minority, but also that their beliefs are largely repulsive if explained in plain terms to most of American society. Their solution to these problems consists of packing as many warm bodies in a small space as possible and getting the media to film only them and interview the organizers only.

If the strategy succeeds, then their protest will appear legitimate and mainstream. The drawback to this strategy, however, is that it requires an organizer to be good at successfully reigning in their people and keeping them on message. It is very easy to troll, trigger, and otherwise throw SJW protesters off message, as the following clip demonstrates:

In summation, this rule involves using basic human psychology and manipulation to trick society's lemmings into believing that a cause is more popular than it is. Even Hillary Clinton's organizers are using this tactic themselves.

Rule 3 and 4: "Never go outside of the expertise of your people"—"Whenever possible, go outside the expertise of your enemy"

I combined these two rules for discussion because the left always uses both of them simultaneously when pushing an agenda. In order to galvanize their ranks, they follow rule #3 by framing EVERYTHING in the context of the group's past experiences. If the protesters are black, the SJWs will bring up segregation or slavery as a rallying cry, if they're Hispanic they'll use comments made by Donald Trump on deportation.

This is the reason why the left has a stranglehold on minority communities for voting purposes, because every aspect of their messaging is focused on victimhood and past injustices, and devoid of objective discussions.

To avoid or not avoid the trap? That is the question.

Contrast this with rule #4, which involves leftists doing everything they can to force any non-leftist or SJW into a political catch-22, in which any answer the victim gives will cost them in the polls. This happened at the tail end of the DNC a few weeks ago with Kazir Khan, the Muslim father of a Muslim son who was killed in 2003 while deployed as a part of Operation: Iraqi Freedom. The DNC used Mr. Khan, who is an ardent supporter of Sharia Law, maintains ties to Saudi Arabia, and runs a law firm that benefits from open borders, to launch a broadside of personal attacks against Donald Trump.

Trump was forced into a difficult situation: either he fails to defend himself from criticism and appear weak to his supporters and the world (thus making him no better than Mitt Romney), or he defends himself and is accused of attacking a gold star family. He ultimately chose the latter, which was a painful choice but also the lesser of two evils given the Catch-22 he was in.

The Khan incident is a perfect example of Rule #4 in action: Republicans are used to being the party that supports the military, whether they do in practice is another issue completely, therefore an effective tactic to use against them is to force them into a situation where they are portrayed by the media as “anti-military.” The Khan incident demonstrated how effective the tactic of forcing your opponent to stray from the political areas in which they’re experienced can be.

Rule #13: “Pick the target, freeze it, isolate it, polarize it”

This rule was saved for last because it represents the left’s deadliest tactic. Even though their ideas are morally bankrupt and produce failure and suffering wherever tried, the left is usually able to succeed in implementing them by placing extreme pressure on their opposition. This rule is simple to apply in practice, because it involves the left finding a member of their opposition that appears vulnerable, assessing their weaknesses, and exploiting their weaknesses until that individual breaks down and gives in to them.

This tactic is evil and insidious in nature because the left will even cause fear and distress in the victim’s family if it means that they’ll succeed. It doesn’t matter whether their target is part of the vast right wing conspiracy or a leftist that’s been found guilty of not being left-wing enough, leftists and SJWs will apply pressure on this one individual until they cave and concede to their demands, which they will then claim as a victory.

The inevitable price of surrendering to SJWs.

The only way to overcome Rule #13 is to never EVER give in, and to turn the heat back on those applying pressure. Dan Bongino, who is running for the House of Representatives to represent Florida's 19th Congressional District was able to do this to CNN's Don Lemon, when the latter tried to box him into a corner concerning Trump's recent 2nd Amendment Comments.

Final Thoughts

These rules, and the others created by Saul Alinsky, are extremely effective because they incorporate human psychology and require exploiting weakness wherever it exists. That said, they are also apolitical and predictable, meaning that they are very easy to spot when being used, and can also be used for devastating effect against SJWs as well. All one has to do in order to see this reversal in action is to watch a Milo Yiannapoulos clip on youtube, or one of the many clips or articles hilariously ripping on SJWs such as "trigglypuff."

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Understanding The Ideology Behind The Islamic State

Brian Gerard

Brian a.k.a "Philosophus Velociraptus" is a refugee from the legal profession who has hidden in plain sight in the banking world. Having spent his college years triggering SJWs, he now enjoys lifting, shooting guns, occasionally employing game, and planning his eventual exit from the West.

Interview With Maverick Traveler After His Sojourn In Southeast Asia And India

August 29, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

It has been a while, but I finally had a chance to catch up with James Maverick, the proprietor of the site Maverick Traveler. I've done interviews with him before here at Return Of Kings, and always found him to be congenial subject. There are a lot of travel and lifestyle sites out there, but James is one of the few who truly has practiced what he preaches. He's spent significant time in more than 80 countries around the world, so to say that he knows something about living abroad is an understatement. I've corresponded with him for a few years and have always respected his no-nonsense views on life and travel.

Since he's just completed a major sojourn in Southeast Asia and India, I thought that this might be a good time to find out what impressions his recent travels made on him. True travelers not only like to travel for themselves, but also enjoy listening to the tales of others.

Quintus: James, it's great to catch up. It's been a while since we spoke. From reading your tweets and articles, it looks like you've been in Southeast Asia and India this past year. Where exactly did you go?

James: Great to see you too, Quintus. Yes, it's been quite a while. This year I decided to do something completely different and visited Southeast Asia. I left cold and freezing Eastern Europe and flew to warm and tropical Bali. After that I visited Thailand and India.

Quintus: How did you get the idea to visit these places?

James: That's a fantastic question, and honestly it just sort of happened. The truth is that I was a bit burned out of Eastern Europe. The winter was especially tough in Ukraine (it got as cold as -30C/-22F), the lack of sun, the depression, the poverty was too much. I knew I needed a break and get away. But where to?

I wasn't yet ready for Latin America because I'd already spent many years living there, so I decided to go somewhere new and exciting. I heard great things about Bali, so I figured it was worth a shot.

I flew to Bali, and lived there for three months. Following that, I flew to Thailand where I also lived for three months (Chiang Mai, Bangkok and the tropical islands in Southern Thailand).

Quintus: What sorts of things did you do while you were there?

James: I basically rode a scooter and worked out of co-working places. If you haven't tried it, it's the best form of transportation out there. It only costs like $50-60 per month to rent and you can drive it anywhere. The gas is only about $10 per month.

Southeast Asia is also huge on co-working. It's basically a building where you come in and rent a desk by the hour, day or month. They have superfast Internet, coffee and some snacks. It's a fantastic place to meet other nomadic entrepreneurs.

Apart from that, I went to the beaches and had all kinds of great, international food.

Personally, I found Bali to be more interesting and exotic than Thailand. I feel Thailand is losing its edge as a tourist destination. There are too many tourists and people aren't as friendly, as say ten years ago, when I first visited the country.

Quintus: How would you compare Southeast Asia with some of the other countries you've lived in?

James: Two words: safe and cheap. Southeast Asia is one of the safest regions in the world. It's much, much safer than Latin America, Europe or America. It's not uncommon to be approached with a knife in a country like Brazil or Colombia (even in broad daylight as has happened to some of my friends in Rio), but this is practically unheard of Southeast Asia.

Bali is one of the friendliest regions I've been to in the world. Everyone smiles. Everyone is super helpful. It's also super exotic. Beautiful scenery, architecture, places of worship, that kind of thing.

Southeast Asia is cheaper than Latin America and Western Europe, but a little bit more expensive than Eastern Europe. In Chiang Mai, Thailand, where I lived for two months, you can rent a decent apartment for $200-250 per month; in Bali it's more like $350-400/month. A decent lunch or dinner will set you back about $2-5. If you want something nicer, it'll be around $10.

One of the downsides of Southeast Asia is that it's very difficult to connect and integrate with the locals. Both Thailand and Bali are practically overflowing with tourists, so the locals don't really make any effort to get to know or talk to you. I've met many expats in both countries, and almost all of them live in expat communities without mingling with the locals too much.

Quintus: Let's talk about India. Where did you go in India?

James: After spending several months in Thailand, I decided to go for a short trip to India before returning to America. My first plan was to go to Delhi, but a friend who'd been there advised me to go to Mumbai instead. He told me that Delhi isn't the best destination for someone who's never been to India because the culture shock might be too much to bear.

Quintus: The country seems to get overlooked a lot by Western tourists. Is there a reason for that?

James: Indeed. India is one of the most polarizing countries on the planet because it's a country of extremes. Lots of people everywhere. Lots of poverty. Lots of garbage. You can get really sick from badly cooked food. Lots of people try to rip you off, from taxi drivers to street touts to store owners. Coupled with the fact that Indians have different customs than Westerners or Asians (spitting water out on the street or defecating in plain view), and you have a perfect recipe for a serious culture shock.

If you get into any of these bad situations (e.g., get sick from the poorly cooked food or get ripped off by an unscrupulous store owner), you'll develop a certain level of jadedness about the country. I've seen this happen to many people that visited India and vowed to never return.

When I told people that I would be traveling to India, the reactions were mostly of disgust and disbelief—in that order. This included my close friends and even family. Nobody could understand why I would go there. And then they began telling me all these things that I should protect myself against, even though none of them have been there.

Personally, I didn't harbor negative stereotypes towards Indians or India. During my career as a software developer in Silicon Valley, I worked with many Indians, and all of them were very cool and friendly guys.

Quintus: What were your feelings and sensations like the first time you walked around an Indian city?

James: India is exotic. As someone who's been to over 80 countries, I thought I'd seen it all. I was wrong. All of that changed once I walked out of an airport in Mumbai.

There's a certain "orderly chaos" in Mumbai. The drivers are constantly honking, producing a certain melody that you get used to really quick. Lots of people everywhere. Tons of street food and various kiosks. I even saw a cow walking on one of the main streets.

Since Mumbai is one of the richest parts of India, I didn't see much garbage or poverty, at least compared to where I had just arrived from in Southeast Asia. I also didn't have a culture shock that pretty much everyone strongly warned me about.

Don't get me wrong. Bali is also exotic and Thailand is exotic too, but where India is different is that the people are approachable and, for the most part, they speak good English. So, whereas in Bali or Thailand, you'll always be an outsider, in India, you can immediately connect with people and have a normal conversation in English. As far as I'm concerned, Indians are Southern Europeans with darker skin.

Quintus: In your articles, you seemed to use the adjective "rich" when you described India (food, culture, etc.). Tell us a little more about that.

James: Yes, everything about India is rich and colorful. The food is colorful and replete with various interesting spices. Then there's Bollywood where people dance and sing wearing beautiful clothes. The fact that there's a movie scene known world over is itself a testament to a rich culture. Name any other country besides America that has that? Finally, there's the Indian architecture. Beautiful colonial buildings (a relic of British and Portuguese colonizers) mixed with modern buildings.

Quintus: What were some of the big lessons you learned from India?

James: That there are other amazing countries besides Brazil. [Chuckles]. No, seriously, India is so different than any of the other countries I've been to, so the only thing on my mind now is returning and exploring it further, preferably for several months in order to really understand it. Maybe I'll go there this winter and spend 3-6 months exploring it.

Quintus: Do you have any plans to write a travelogue about your Southeast Asia and Indian experiences? I'm sure guys would love to see that…I know I would.

James: I've been contemplating doing that, you know real travel writing. Perhaps it'll be setup on a different site and linked of my main site.

Quintus: So, what's in the future for James Maverick?

James: For someone who was tired of traveling, India reignited my traveling spirit. There's no country out there that I'm excited to visit and explore. Eastern Europe is calling me back, but that's only because I'm from there and speak Russian fluently. If I wasn't from there, I probably wouldn't come back.

So, India it is. I'll probably return there later this year. My tentative plan is to fly into Mumbai, and then work my way north, checking Delhi and Taj Mahal. Then perhaps fly south to Goa, and see some of the Portuguese architecture and beaches. They say it's really nice there in the winter. I can't wait.

I'm glad I had the chance to catch up with James. One of the best things you can do when you're not traveling is actually talk to someone who has just come back from a long trip. There is just something about the immediacy of the experience that shows in the person's speech and demeanor. The fraternity of travelers is a tight one, linked by common bonds of curiosity, tolerance, and incomparable discovery.

Read More: The Sacred Heart And Masculinity

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Women Would Rather Be Raped By Invaders Than Stuck With Beta Males

August 30, 2016 | by Michael Augustus | Link | Original Link

She is dying for you to put her in her place, beneath you. A woman wants to be conquered, she wants to submit to power, she wants to give up control, but first she has to test to see if "it" exists within you. To submit to a lesser man is rape, to submit to a superior man is harmony. Feminism and other female SJW endeavors are societal shit tests. If you fail, they'll push the boundary again, and again, and again… If you give them an inch, they'll take a mile.

The female imperative was never supposed to be 100% successful, though. Eventually, some man somewhere is supposed to not put up with her shit and put her in her proper place: beneath him and one half-step back. A woman's job is to see you fail. For if you fail, you were never "worthy" in the first place. Western culture is now embracing that very failure.

The Beta That Broke The Western Cultures' Back

Betas occur naturally in the wild, but over the past several decades, governments, corporations, media, and academia have attempted to artificially manufacture them en masse beyond natural levels with the assistance of female nature (stated earlier). They've indoctrinated man into believing blue pill sexual strategy that women despise. They've stripped fathers from the home and had females infiltrate male spaces containing masculine role models. And they've legally restrained a man's ability to discipline and properly set boundaries in the home, the very same discipline and boundaries that women instinctively seek. All with the proud help of women.

So what's left? A whole generation of men raised by women and the state, taught to be pussies and supplicate to females and authority.

Now, the feminization of man has hit critical mass and women's amygdalas notice. Women are unknowingly witnessing their own creation and are left disgusted, wondering, "Where have all the 'good men' gone?" Now women are seeking another tribe…

The Invaders

> "[…] women actually want strong male authority figures in their life.
>
> But will deny it until the day they die.
>
> If they admitted to it, it would allow non male authority figures (beta men) to emulate alpha qualities.
>
> They want men that just get it. Even if that means takeover of Western European / u.s. Culture by Islamic militants."
>
> — /u/antariusz (Source)

Europe is currently witnessing female nature being expressed freely on a societal level without a civilized, masculine balancing factor. The truth of the matter is, women have no in-group loyalties. Whoever the powerful are in that moment, women drift their way with their asses bent over, knees quivering, and legs dripping with tingle juice. They want to be conquered, but they don't care by who. Whether it's daddy government, her father, a boyfriend, Chad Thundercock, violent criminals, or a horde of rapefugees doesn't matter.

In times of war, women are constants. Men and boys are killed off, but women are simply transferred and assimilated into the new tribe to be the sperm receptacles of the victors.

Observing the weakness of many European men, women want a different set of male suitors. They call this initiative "diversity" or "multiculturalism." In plain terms, women want to import men they perceive to be powerful and masculine to replace the weaklings they are stuck with. Women LOVE playing multiple men against each other to battle for her vaginal affections. It's basically the plot of a every rom-com and romance novel.

Thanks to the 1984 police state, politicians and social media titans like Angela Merkel and Mark Zuckerburg, that new tribe so happens to be the biggest group in history to never reform itself to Western society: Muslims (over 2 billion of them). They give absolutely zero fucks about Western Civilization and their inhabitants. They never back down. These people are not just willing to die and be imprisoned to defend their beliefs, but kill: "There is no law, but that of Allah."

This is attractive to women. Women LOVE violent males. Women love their conviction. It's extremely arousing to them. The fact that it's backed by a mental illness doesn't matter. These Muslim immigrants are violent, they don't break frame, and are becoming powerful. That's seen as masculine. That's sexy.

Most modern Western man doesn't stand a chance. Rape and sexual assault has skyrocketed since immigrants have been allowed to settle into Europe, yet women and feminists were silent on the subject. Why? Because they would rather live under the threat of rape by invaders than settle with skinny beta manginas protesting at slut walks and minoring in gender studies. There are even instances where European girls refused to report their immigrant sexual assailants in the name of multiculturalism and fighting Islamophobia or just because they felt bad for them. But that's bullshit. The power of the rapists gave her tingles and then she tried to rationalize it.

Conclusion

You see that, betas of Europe? That's your future.

The only thing saving North America from being Cologne, Sweden, or Britain is that there are two oceans separating us from Africa and the Middle East. But Obama seeks to change that by importing thousands of Syrians into small traditional family towns (view: Roosh's video). Not to mention the education system, specifically the colleges here, are getting brainwashed to the max with ~~anti-white~~ "diversity."

Betas of the United States and Canada? Keep it up, and women will encourage the same thing to happen here, embracing the enemy with open legs.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Germany And Sweden Redefine Consent To Put More Men On The Hook For Rape

Michael Augustus
AKA dr_warlock My Blog: RedPillDoctor.com My Email: Trp.Red: dr_warlock Youtube Channel: dr_warlockTRP Twitter: @dr_warlockTRP

5 Signs You're Suffering From A MGTOW Mindset

August 30, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Before I read Corey Savage's An Open Letter To The Men Of MGTOW a couple months ago, I admittedly had zero clue as to what the MGTOW community actually stood for. I've always known there are different factions of the manosphere such as the PUA sect which focuses on seduction, the philosophical clique that explores the historical and religious angles as they apply to the red pill past and present, and the health and fitness branch that gives men guidance on how to achieve peak physical fitness.

I'd seen the term MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) in different articles here and there but I never really delved into it. I just assumed they were under the same umbrella as the rest of us were. But after reading Savage's article and doing a little research I began to realize that the "MGTOW community" could be labeled as, dare I say…..male feminism.

No thanks….I'll pass.

Below are five tendencies that "MGTOWs" and wannabes alike possess that hold them back from grabbing life by the balls and thriving as a man. I'll be the first to admit that even I fall prey to some of these penchants every once in a while. It happens. But so long as you check yourself and nip these occurrences in the bud, you won't start thinking it wouldn't be so bad to live in your mother's basement playing video games all night with cheeto dust on your fingers.

5. You're all talk, no show

[image]
"I fucked 6 chicks last night!"

You can quote all the pickup lines, know all the answers to shit tests, and all the red pill lingo. You constantly tell your buddies all women are like that and you're never getting married or having kids.

I talked about this brand of wannabe neomasculinity in a column I penned last summer:

> Wannabe PUAs who buy into the "all these bitches get is my dick" notion are kidding themselves and everyone around them. They think scoring one night stands with 5s and 6s is the pinnacle of playerdom and like to brag about "this bitch I fucked then I just got up and left" or "I don't give a fuck what she does I kick her the fuck out right after I nut."
>
> Any man who regularly sleeps with beautiful women knows that unless she's a hooker, it doesn't work this way—especially if you want to keep fucking her.

Funny thing is, when the rubber meets the road and you find yourself sitting next to an HB8 at the laundromat you freeze like a deer in the headlights. You can frequent as many sites on the ‘sphere as you want but if you don’t apply what you’ve learned, it’s pointless.

Stop debating pickup theories on 17 different blogs and for the love of God stop bombarding your buddies with red pill jargon. They may still be blue pill but they also know you’re just piss and wind. Until you get off your ass and start talking to girls on the regular, you’re not changing their minds.

4. You dismiss new ways to meet girls

Get with the program

You’re the guy who talks shit about Facebook, Tinder, and even text game. You claim to only approach girls face to face because that’s what “real men” do.

Wake up, it’s 2016. There’s more than one way to skin a cat and if you’re not taking advantage of technology to score easy pussy, you’re doing yourself (and all those sluts) a disservice.

I’m as guilty on this one as anybody. Granted, there’s nothing like the rush that comes from approaching a complete stranger, striking up conversation with her, number closing her, and banging her that night. There’s something to be said about the excitement of putting your balls on the line and going for broke with a female.

That said, I know that at some point in the not too distant future I’m going to have to get online if I want to keep adding notches. Girls these days are becoming increasingly difficult to talk to as a result of their ADD on account of looking at their phones most of the day. It’s as though they’ve forgotten how to have a conversation with an actual person in the flesh.

The other reason is that the older I get, the busier my schedule gets. So why not skip the bullshit and start swiping for ass like everyone else? It saves money, frustration, and most of all time which is a man's most valuable commodity.

Get with the times and take advantage of the desperate girls who are dying to take a selfie wearing your shirt the next morning.

3. You're always looking for an easier way to digest the red pill

Quick staring at it and take it already

You're the dude who's been on the fence about the red pill for years. You know sexual relations between men and women are fucked up but when reading sites like ROK you think to yourself, "He makes a good point but there's gotta be a better way!"

You think you can compromise and be "purple pill." You think you can give girls "the best of both worlds" but you know it's not working for you because you're not getting laid. And yet, you still want to delay completely digesting the red pill.

Look, I get it. I really do. It's hard to change your mindset and actions when you've been brainwashed your entire life to treat girls a certain way and think of them in a certain light. But we've all been burned on multiple occasions and at some point you have to realize that being yourself and treating her like a princess ain't cuttin' it.

The hard truth is there is no purple pill. You can't be the alpha male girls want to sleep with and the sensitive, attentive schlub at the same time. It's either one or the other. And if you aren't unplugged, you're still plugged in. There's no in between.

Make a choice, gentlemen. You can either digest the red pill or spit it out and ignore the truth. It can't just rest on your tongue for the rest of your life.

2. All you focus on is girls

Stop chasing girls all the time and hit the gym

The beauty of neomasculinity is that it teaches men how improve their lives in all aspects. Financial shrewdness, physical fitness, style, and mental strength are a few the main tenets of the crimson capsule we've drilled into your skulls since 2012.

If a man makes good financial decisions, keeps himself in good shape, dresses well, and isn't easily rattled by nonsense, his romantic prospects increase as a natural side effect.

When you're new to the 'sphere and focus solely on picking up chicks, you're putting the cart before the horse. Sure, you'll have a little success but before long you'll plateau (meaning you're only banging 5s and 6s) because you haven't improved in other, more important areas.

Again, I fell prey to this when I first took the red pill. All I concentrated on was girls and nothing else:

> I'll never forget the first time I approached a girl with red pill game. She was a sexy little red-headed number with a pert ass and great legs. She was in the produce aisle trying to pick out the perfect grape fruit. When she reached for one I noticed a tattoo on her inner wrist. "So much for an LTR," I playfully joked with myself. I obviously wasn't thinking about our honeymoon but she was as good a girl as any to christen my post red pill game with.
>
> I'd practiced, drilled, and rehearsed all the PUA techniques, body language and positioning. I was ready. I took a deep breath, walked up, looked her right in the eye with something of a cross between a smile and a smirk on my face and said "Hi, I'm Donovan."

> She bit.
>
> She pleasantly told me her name and politely shook my hand. We ended up having about a 10 minute conversation about juicing (I'd recently purchased one and steered the conversation in that direction). I passed a relatively easy shit test, made a joke about green juice, and got the digits.
>
> "Holy fuck!" I thought doing my best to compose myself as she put her number into my phone. "This shit actually works!"
>
> The girl ended up flaking but I didn't care. I was hooked.

It's been years since I approached that hot red head. Since then, I've gotten myself into much better shape, my financial outlook is stronger, and my frame is rock solid. Had these things been in place when I opened her, she may not have flaked on me.

The point is that focusing on the acquisition of pussy and leaving everything else by the wayside will eventually come back to bite you in the ass. When you hit a slump (and you will) you'll sink into depression, start doubting yourself, and a slew of other mental problems that end up stunting your growth as a man.

But if you're lifting, reading, writing, and making smart financial decisions a temporary dry spell in the bedroom won't faze you. If anything, it helps you focus even more on these areas which will, in turn, lead to more success with women in the long run.

1. You bash red pill assertions for the sake of bashing them

"NOT ALL WOMEN ARE LIKE THAT!"

This is where you start to fall into the MGTOW category. You read my article on O.J. Simpson and disagree with my assertion that he's alpha because he killed his ex wife for slutting it up with a fellow USC alumni. Nevermind the fact that he was literally swimming in pussy before, during, and after his marriage to Nicole. As far as you're concerned, Simpson had oneitis which makes him a sniveling beta despite living a life most men can only dream about.

No, we're not all going to agree with every little detail of neomasculinity (which is a good thing, actually) but the countless lives that have been changed (mine included) from the ideas discussed on forums like these speaks volumes about its accuracy and effectiveness.

GhostOfJefferson, a frequent commenter on ROK, has told countless keyboard gangsters that if they so vehemently disagree with what we talk about here, then write an article about it.

I couldn't have put it better myself.

Conclusion

At the end of the day we're all on the same side. As I said before, we're going to disagree on a few things here and there but by and large we're all striving for the same thing. But if you find yourself falling into any of the above traps on a regular basis and not course correcting, you may need to start to question whether or not you're truly unplugged from the matrix.

Read More: How Masculine Is Jason Bourne?

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Quarterback Colin Kaepernick Fights White Privilege By Not Foregoing His $114 Million Paycheck

August 30, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

During his last NFL game against the Green Bay Packers, quaterback Colin Kaepernick created controversy by remaining seated during the national anthem. It is part of the traditions of the game to stand up while the “Star-Spangled Banner” is played.

Kaepernick during the anthem

Responding to his critics, this is what Colin had to say:

> "I am not going to stand up to show pride in a flag for a country that oppresses Black people and people of color. To me, this is bigger than football and it would be selfish on my part to look the other way. There are bodies in the street and people getting paid leave and getting away with murder."

The background

It is clear that he acted in support of the Soros-backed Black Lives Matter movement. The NFL is increasingly turning into a political arena to impose PC-approved themes. This phenomenon can not be ignored when we observe the recent events occurring during the season:

- Beyonce's pro-Black Panthers Super Bowl Half Time Show
- The NFL's refusal to let the Dallas Cowboys honour fallen police officers

Kaepernick often jumps on the BLM "every white is a white supremacist" and rape-culture mangina train on Twitter and it has been going on for quite some time. His account only displays news of police shooting minorities, an obsession for white privilege and the celebration of slave rebellions when they kill whites.

It is being a recurrent remark among sport experts that he should focus more on training than tweeting. Being European, I will let our American readers decide of his quality as a player.

A bit of history

- Colin Kaepernick was born of a black father and white mother, Heidi Zabransky (née Russo).
- His father never aknowledged him (even after his rise to fame) and ran away. His mother put him for adoption when he was six weeks old.
- The Kapernicks, a white family from Wisconsin, adopted him. By Zabransky's account, the Kaepernicks were "giving, wonderful people. Colin himself confirmed that he had a happy childhood with a loving family.
- Colin's biological mother never told him or her parents anything about Colin's father.
- His adoptive parents never treated him differently from his white siblings. They said clearly that he was adopted but that they were nevertheless his family.
- Colin was never raised by a black parent but says

> My racial heritage is something I want people to be well aware of. I do want to be a representative of the African community, and I want to hold myself and dress myself in a way that reflects that

- He has a $114,000,000 contract with the 49ers and an average salary of $19,000,000.
- Kaepernick, coming from a Christian upbringing, also converted to Islam last football season and is engaged to a Black Lives Matter activist and hip hop radio host. (Sources and further information)

The motivation behind the decision

It is quite strange to see a half-white, wealthy quarterback from a white background with a good education and what many could see as the pinnacle of privilege, stand up against those who “oppress Black people and people of color.”

Well-documented data related to race and based on crime statistics, police fatal shootings, household income and many others confirm that the black community is currently in the best situation it has ever been in American history.

> Blacks killed by police – 1%
> Blacks killed by whites – 2%
> Whites killed by police – 3 %
> Whites killed by whites – 16%
> Whites killed by blacks – 81%
> Blacks killed by blacks – 97%
>
> Blacks represent 13% of the population of the USA
>
> 2015 US crime statistics (crime statistics bureau)

Kaepernick behaves like a last-minute religious convert

The convert is always the most zealous as he works harder to fit in the new group he chose, in order to be accepted by the more “naturally determined” members of the group.

The example of Westerners with a Christian or neutral religious background that convert to Islam comes to mind, especially the ones that look like the polar opposites of the “naturally determined” followers of Islam.

They make up for their late start by being more aggressive or more invested in the “cause”. Through this process, they seek validation from their new peers and distance themselves from the group they originate from. They harbour the feeling that if they do not go the extra mile, they can be seen as a potential traitor instead of a safe ally.

The case of Kaepernick reminds me of neckbeard ginger jihadi Jordan Horner.

It appears clear that the quaterback’s stance on racial issues betrays a desire to seek revenge on the white mother that abandoned him, even if all the love he received afterwards came from his white family from Wisconsin.

The expression of this deeply rooted issue is hardly understandable. The hatred should be directed towards his black father instead of his mother who, at the very least, gave him to a loving, stable family instead of dragging her infant into a future single-mother hell.

The total absence of a strong father role might explain why Kaepernick chooses the role of the victim instead of being a role model for the youth (as he shortly did before) through talent, hard work or athletic excellence.

The aftermath

It is a fact that sitting during the anthem before games is not forbidden by the NFL. Kaepernick had the right to do so even if one can disagree with his motivations.

But in those times of division, symbols and tradition such as standing up for the anthem are one of the few left that allow the American population to unite.

It is an unnecessary provocation, a recuperation by a brat with daddy issues popularised by the domestic terrorist group know as Black Lives Matter. It can only be seen as a maneuver to earn some credit from the black community.

His teammates and the whole franchise of the 49ers are the one that will pay for his selfish choice. They have no power apart from voicing their disapproval over the situation but the brand will lose in popularity and suffer financial consequences. There have been multiple reports of fans burning their Kaepernick jerseys or canceling their season tickets following his decision.

The San Francisco 49ers public representatives, faithful to the liberal self-flagellating tradition of their host city, decided to support Kaepernick in his decision. But many of his teammates and 49ers staff made a point of showing their disapproval regarding Kaepernick's choice (1,2).

It boils down to attention whoring

Are the "problem glasses" a coincidence?

Colin says it himself. He is not looking for approval. But his gesture brings nothing productive or groundbreaking. The only "positive" impact of what he did are a few retweets by black activists but nothing has changed in essence.

His public involvement in the “cause” is extremely recent. Noticing that his fame was in decline or stalling, he finds an opportunity for virtue signaling and tries to catch some light through race baiting.

Qui vit par le glaive périra par le glaive

Kaepernick impulsive stint might cost him more than a few boos. In addition to dwindling possibilities of future contracts, his popularity is in free fall now that the BLM movement has been exposed for what it is.

Contrary to “Look at me” Colin, many prominent figures of the black community try to dissociate themselves from Black Lives Matter, seeing their growing propensity to violent acts and the bad publicity that follows.

We simply witness the tantrum of a self-hating Jesse Williams clone, sticking it to his white mother on a football field. It could also be a maneuver to make the public forget about the incident where he called his opponent Lamarr Houston the N-word during an altercation on the field.

Karma is a bitch and the victim card is a double-edged sword.

Read more: Mizzou “White Privilege” Hunger Striker Jonathan Butler Is From A Family Worth $20 Million

---

Jean-Batave Poqueliche

Jean-Batave is a martial artist from the viking stronghold of Normandy, France. He travels the world looking for new fighting techniques and new beautiful women. Eastern Europe taught him everything he knows and is his second home. His column runs every Thursday.

What Every Young Man Should Know Before Going To College

August 30, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

This time of year is when people go back to school. I wrote the below over ten years ago for my brother as he started college, and it covers what a man should expect from academic and dorm life in college.

Academics

Your purpose

GPA is the magic acronym that will rule your life for the next four years. Unlike high school, where it is all the same, in college, people get varying degrees. This is significant because it dictates what you have to do for the degree and makes the whole “let’s take impressive courses to look good for our next school” argument rather irrelevant.

You need to select your degree and then plot out, with the help of the school catalog, what courses you HAVE to take, what courses you COULD take, and what courses you SHOULD NOT take. What every modern college kid needs to understand is that undergrad college is NOT about learning things, it’s about getting a degree of your choice and maintaining a good GPA while doing it.

Employers or grad schools don't care about your carefully crafted interdisciplinary custom degree to make you the perfect rounded person; they care about whether or not you have the degree they want, and what grades you received while earning it.

Degree. Grades. Then maybe, if possible, learn something along the way.

Don't reinvent the wheel

In your quest for a good GPA, there are some people you need to cultivate. First, you MUST find some upperclassmen that has been there, and done that in your major. Try to find him (or her) this fall, and buy them a meal or something. Bring your course catalog and a notepad. They will tell you which of the required courses are pains in the rear and which are cake, which professors are closet Nazis and which ones are still part of the human race, and what electives to take and to avoid.

Your faculty advisor does not understand the point of college (outlined above.) He or she will think you need to take challenging courses to make you grow, and interesting courses to expand your knowledge. This would be true if the GPA was not the holy grail that it is. But, since it is, you want to get your chosen degree with the EASIEST course load possible.

An example. Student A takes Required Course 101 with Professor Himmler. Student B takes the same course, but in a different section, and has Professor Buttercup. Both students give it the good effort, and Student A gets a D while Student B gets an A. Both students get credit for the same course, even though the courses were obviously much different in difficulty.

Difficulty, however, does not matter. All that matters is 'Required Course 101' and the grade on your transcript. All sections are supposed to be equal, even though they are taught by different profs. However, this is almost never the case, and you MUST find out which sections with which profs to take beforehand and register appropriately. Once everyone finds out what a Nazi Himmler is, they will all try to transfer out to Buttercup's class and very few will be successful; the rest are boned because it is too late. The most they can do is drop the course and waste a slot in their schedule, and that's only if you don't drop below the minimum hours required.

Furthermore, arrange for some one section class to occupy the same slot as Himmler's section so that they cannot pull bullshit on your scheduling because you would not be able to take that one section class. The registrar thinks all sections are equal; they are not, as outlined above.

Find the upperclassman, and get the info on the department's faculty and courses and then don't spread it around. Write it all down and make sure you get the right profs in the right sections. It could mean the difference between an A and a D for the same effort.

As for electives, sometimes names sound overly impressive when they actually are not. "Direct Energy Conversion" was easier than "Heat Transfer," although it sounds meaner. Think "Which elective will fill this slot and give me the easiest A?" Ask your senior friend about which ones to take.

You need study buddies. Doing homework in groups is much better than doing it by yourself; you can split the work up, check each other's answers, and learn more, faster. Go to review sessions, go to office hours, look like you care, and you might get a bump up to the next letter grade for a good effort. Many profs will drop obvious hints about what will be on the tests to folks in their review sessions.

"Aren't you TEACHERS?"

Most of any given school's faculty and administration don't care about whether or not you do well. You're just a number, and if your TA can't speak English, or your professor gave you a test on a chapter that hasn't been covered yet, no one will really care.

Some teachers DO care, and there should be ONE dean that will actually listen to a student who needs help. If you find yourself getting screwed, refer to the catalog, prepare your case, make an appointment, and walk in there confident and polite and make your case.

Your Dorm

The room

Respect your roomie's stuff and privacy, and he should respect yours. Lock the door. Thievery will be rampant, and the targets will be laptop computers, wallets, cd wallets, and anything else that is small, expensive or valuable, and ubiquitous. If the thievery gets really bad, take your keys along with you in your shaving kit. I don't know how your laptop will lock up, but I'd pick up an Action Packer (plastic container, lock on each end), two padlocks, and a chain. Lock the Packer with the laptop (and other goodies) in it and lock the chain to one of the locks after you looped it through your bed frame.

Your room is not a place to throw parties. Any party, for the next year and some for you, will almost always have alcohol. Underage drinking is a way of life at college, everyone does it, and only the stupid get caught. I won't tell you not to drink; I will tell you not to be stupid. Let your friends throw the parties in their rooms, you won't have to clean up the mess, stuff won't get dirty or stolen, and you can leave when you're tired or, more importantly, when the five-o shows up. The quieter, cleaner, and more safe your room feels, the more comfortable you will be living in close quarters with people. Having a couple friends over is different from a party, obviously.

….is that THE mattress?!?!

Your room is not a place to study. Your desk will be small, and taken up with stuff, you'll want to play music and be distracted by things; it just doesn't work. Find some area, like at the library, get a big table, and do your homework there. You will be able to do much better work much more quickly. You don't go to class in your dorm room, you really shouldn't do homework there either. Writing papers is different; figure out what works for you.

Your room is not yours. The university can come in there any time they want, and do anything they want. If it's not during business hours, you can be as rude as you want, but they might call the cops. Hide anything you don't want noticed by the school, like illegal software or weed, in that action packer. The room might be theirs, but they would need a search warrant to break and enter your locked container. Likewise, don't leave beer in the fridge until you're of age.

Get to like your roomie, and agree on things like hours, who to let in, and make things work, or apply for a new roommate or a single.

Community bathrooms

Never go into the bathroom barefooted, especially to take a shower. Risking bare feet on the floors of a dubiously cleaned bathroom stands a great chance of getting the funk. Get a pair of sandals and use them for bathroom shoes.

Figure out the showers and use them accordingly. Pressure, hot water capability, and the tendency of condensation to drip cold water on your head all vary from stall to stall.

The proper response to walking into a bathroom and hearing a woman with a guy in the shower or something, or seeing female feet or something, is to quietly walk out. The proper response to seeing or hearing two men going at it varies on your acceptance of that sort of thing.

Be advised, although a man should be allowed to be sick from drinking in his own bathroom in peace, dorm bathrooms are university property, and the paramedics, cops, area residents, resident assistants, and whoever else feels interested, can sit there on your sick self and threaten to take you to the hospital or jail. Be sick in your dorm room into the trash can, especially if you're underage. It might piss your roomie off, but it's better than attracting attention.

Put paper down on the toilet seat…same reasoning as rule 1.

Use a bathrobe. You don't have to worry about the towel falling off your rear, and that IS something to worry about because there WILL be fellow dorm residents of the sort of persuasion that shamelessly stare at guys wearing only a towel in the bathroom there with you, and they'll start screaming oppression if you call them on it.

If someone heaved and missed the toilet, it's a biohazard. Stuff a note under the RA's door and make that guy work for his money.

Bonding BS and other Dorm stuff

You're there to go to school, not to participate in stupid dorm activities. Unless they have free food, don't bother with any dorm bonding activity. The first dorm meeting is mandatory and you'll learn important stuff. Anything after that is somewhat optional, and, if you miss something that they consider important and they bitch you out, say you were working on a group project or something similarly impressive.

The RA is just a student. Keep your music down and your trash out of the hallway and otherwise ignore him. If you make friends with him, make sure he's your friend first and your RA second. Don't have a beer with your "friend" and then get busted by him for underage drinking.

The RA, and the head resident have NO power on their own; all the juice they think they have is derived from staff housing directors and the local police. If either of those authorities show up, show respect, but don't feel you have to defer to the RA. An RA is like student government; it matters to the people that do it, and everyone else thinks they're just another tool. If the RA wants you to do unreasonable stuff, tell him to kiss your ass or something equally insulting, and it should end there. Powertripping RAs are very common and they can be dealt with by not buying into their BS; if they report you to their boss, and you get hauled in, make him look foolish.

Fire drills. They like to do fire drills early on, and they will schedule one for some evening. Be elsewhere at that time, lest you have to stand around like a schmuck outside the dorm, or leave and get food or something.

Women RAs are REALLY scary. Try not to be alone walking down some girl's floor (if they divide by floor), even if you are just leaving from some visit. According to modern female college doctrine, any unescorted guy on a female floor WILL rape, pillage, and burn if left alone. A guy I knew got MACEed for just walking down a hallway in the middle of the night in a girl's dorm.

Conclusion

Other than the opening and closing, I only edited the 2006 original for length. It'll be interesting to see if its lessons still are valid.

Read More: What To Do If You Were Just Falsely Accused Of Rape In College

Luke Stranahan
Luke Stranahan is an engineer by trade and an armed patriot by inclination. He writes for Return of Kings as a leisure pursuit and an attempt to do his part to help reverse the slide into moral decrepitude of modern society. Follow him on Twitter.

5 Things I've Learned From My First Year Abroad

August 31, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

It seems like it was just yesterday I was running off the plantation in search of a life in a beautiful, sunny, libertine paradise.

Already, I'm just about to cap off my first full year of living abroad. I selected the Caribbean for my first experiment in living abroad for several reasons. First, it's close to home, being only a two hour flight away from the U.S. Second, it's Latin America so it's still wild and free and I speaky the Spanish. Third, the women here are hot as hell and insatiable. Fourth, it's warm and sunny with an average high of 85 degrees year round. And fifth, the island of Hispaniola has some of the most beautiful beaches in the world.

What are my conclusions after living here for a year? Am I homesick? Hell no. Am I happy? Absolutely. This without a doubt has been the best experience of my life so far. I've done more living and living on the edge in the past year than the previous thirty some odd years of my life before.

I have also been living on a fraction of the cost of my former corporate drone lifestyle. In all honesty, $500 covers housing, food, electric, and Internet, the basics. I will have to admit my partying budget for booze and other recreational consumables has soared. Here are five conclusions I came up with on the motorcycle ride back to my house from a hot girl's apartment this morning.

1. I don't want to come back to America.

A government of wolves is exactly what the U.S. has become

I look at Anglo America as a figurative prison of sorts. The entire society is geared towards nothing but consumption for consumption's sake, and creating problems with people's lives to create profit. When I think of my future I always see myself either being here on an island or in any number of exotic locations. (Some more adventures in Southeast Asia are definitely on the agenda). The worst nightmare I have is going back to the lifestyle of working 50-60 hours a week to keep up a bunch of deadbeat bums and illegal aliens with my tax dollars and the sweat off my brow.

2. I have gotten used to true freedom.

Freedom is not worth having if it does not include the freedom to make mistakes. -Ghandi

I can do just about anything here. Literally, I have never felt this kind of freedom before. There are no checkpoints busting people for DUIs on Saturday night. The police by and large leave people alone. Many small infractions can be taken care of with a $20 bill. Quite simply, this island is a Libertarian's paradise as almost nothing is illegal and those things that are illegal are loosely enforced. You have to be quite an asshole to win up in trouble with the law here.

I imagine the intent of the Founding Fathers was something like I enjoy here: freedom to do just about anything you want within reason. Where did this ideal get lost and a micromanaging nanny state become the norm? It's totally insane and upside down.

3. I feel more masculine than ever.

Motorcycles are transportation here, not controversial “death traps”

Almost nothing scares me anymore. I don’t go around watching what I say or how I say it like I did when I worked in the news industry. I drive a motorcycle as transportation daily, as does most of the rest of the population. A man either sinks or swims here pretty quickly.

In contrast to rabid feminism, women expect me to tell them what to do. I was having a conversation with a neighbor just yesterday and she commented that she expects her husband to be “the man of the house.” Why the West felt the need to reinvent the wheel, changing a cultural and familial practice that has worked for thousands of generations is a mystery. Under men leading the family the human species has prospered. It was the blunder of all time to abandon this model, and women as well as men are happier when feminist boilerplate is not adhered to.

By the same token, I realize that I must be able to stand up for myself and carry myself like a man. A weakling will get taken advantage of in this environment. You can’t be a bitch here. If you are strong inside and outside you will get respect. If you aren’t, you will get fucked.

4. I have more women than I can handle.

What is love? What is this longing in our hearts for togetherness? Is it not the sweetest flower? -Leon Phelps

I go through several women a week. It’s amazing to compare and contrast this experience with the experience of putting in so much effort for so little return back in Anglo America. A libertine culture is a wonderful thing in my opinion. Threesomes, all but unattainable back home are easy to come by here if you have the right connections and the reputation of being a bad boy.

I realize a lot of my success is due to not only game but hypergamous female instinct. If it ain't broke, don't fix it is my motto.

I have had so much success with women I can't drive through town on my bike without some girl I've banged shouting at me or waving at me. It's really incredible having this much access to twenty-something flesh, and a reminder that contrary to what we are told sex will often cure what ails ya. A man can even have so much sex he occasionally gets burned out on it. But too much is better than ain't enough. Maybe Americans are angry and hateful online because they aren't getting laid on the regular in a sexually repressed culture? The thought has crossed my mind.

5. I realize what it means to feel alive.

…all you have, see, is the experiences. That's all there is. Everything! The experiences!

I have never felt more alive in my life. Whether it be playing pool and dancing with one hot girl while another hottie you've been banging walks in and both of you have to hide your feelings for each other, or learning how to have a backbone when conducting negotiations for housing or buying things (everything is negotiable here), this corner of the world has a way of bringing out the best in a man.

That's what makes Latin America great to me. A man is still expected to be a man and can be a man. The rewards for a strong-willed man can be almost limitless. This can be summed up in two general themes: Possibilities and experiences. A man is not alive if he only exists to create profit for other people and has no life outside his job and career. One of my idols, Charles Bukowski, said it best:

> How in the hell could a man enjoy being awakened at 8:30 a.m. by an alarm clock, leap out of bed, dress, force-feed, shit, piss, brush teeth and hair, and fight traffic to get to a place where essentially you made lots of money for somebody else and were asked to be grateful for the opportunity to do so?

A man is alive if he wakes up everyday wondering which avenue of possibility he will pursue that day and what exciting experiences (and stories a man will carry to the grave) those possibilities will bring. The great Burgess Meredith flawlessly explains this concept in Grumpier Old Men:

> Well, let me tell you something, Johnny. The first 90 years, or so go by pretty > fast. Then one day you wake up and you realize that you're not 81 anymore. You begin to count the minutes rather than the days and you realize that pretty soon you'll be gone. And that all you have, see, is the experiences. That's all there is. Everything! The experiences! You mount the woman, son. Or else…send her out to me.

Indeed, experiences, not things. That's where it's at.

Is Living Abroad is Right for You?

My optimal situation would be bouncing between the Caribbean and SE Asia…what's your dream?

What do men do when their government turns into a tyranny and their women become repellent? They either look for greener pastures or overthrow such a system, or both. The critical mass has not yet been reached to overthrow the current tyranny. In the meantime, the man looking for adventure will surely find some, and in many cases it may be closer than you think. There's a whole other world burning just south of Anglo America.

My advice for those who want to pursue this avenue of personal fulfillment: Get out of debt, stay out of debt, limit interactions with women to fun and games, become a minimalist, and dive in. You won't miss the mall, McDonald's and loud, obnoxious women as much as you might think.

Read More: 3 Things We Have Learned A Year After The Battle Of Canada

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt,

and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Why You Should Definitely Approach Hot Girls Wearing Headphones

August 31, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

This week dating blogger Dan Bacon hit the headlines after he posted an article on his website The Modern Man called How To Talk to A Woman Who Is Wearing Headphones In his innocuous article, Bacon presents a series of tips for how to engage the attention of an attractive girl who happens to be listening to music when you meet her. The article so enraged feminist commentators that it has attracted a slew of excoriating Tweets and articles. But Bacon's article misses the mark for a reason his detractors have not identified—he hasn't gone far enough. Men should ALWAYS approach hot women wearing headphones.

Dan Bacon's Article

Let's be honest, if there is a canon of pick-up literature that includes Neil Strauss's The Game and Roosh's Bang, How To Talk to a Woman Who is Wearing Headphones will not rank highly in it. Here is a sample of his 'advice':

> What to Do to Get Her Attention
>
> 1. Stand in front of her (with 1 to 1.5 meters between you).
>
> 2. Have a confident, easy-going smile.
>
> 3. If she hasn't already looked up at you, simply get her attention with a wave of your hand. Wave your hand in her direct line of vision so she can see it.
>
> 4. When she looks at you, smile, point to her headphones and confidently ask, "Can you take off your headphones for a minute?" as you pretend to be taking headphones off your head, so she fully understands what you mean.

Stand in front of her and motion for her to remove her headphones? Hardly groundbreaking behavioural science. And his example conversation strains credibility:

> You: [Smile in a friendly, confident manner] Hey – I know it's not normal for people to talk to someone with headphones in, but I was walking along and saw you and thought – wow, she's hot, I have to come over and say hi. I'm Dan, what's your name?
>
> Woman: Jessica.
>
> You: [Add in some humor to get her smiling and create a spark between you] Cool…nice to meet you Jessica. I don't normally talk to girls with headphones, but your big green headphones were just calling out to me.
>
> Woman: [Possibly smiling or laughing].
>
> You: [If you're in a shopping mall or city street, let her know that you have something else to do besides talk to her, so she understands that you're not going to stand there talking to her for 30 minutes] Anyway, I'm just out doing a bit of shopping at the moment. How about you?

I particularly like "I don't normally talk to girls with headphones, but your big green headphones were just calling out to me." With that brand of 'humour', Mr Bacon will not be troubling Jonah Hill any time soon. Also, as anyone who has ever tried day game will attest, suggesting that a direct approach will go as smoothly is at best naive and at worst misguided.

However, it is unfair to paint Bacon as some kind of rabid sex fiend who advocates harassing women as some commentators have done. In fact, his article merely encourages men to be confident, approach girls in a light and friendly manner, flirt and only continue with the conversation if it is clear that she is interested:

> Of course, not all women who wear headphones are open to being approached or hoping to be approached. However, you can only find that out by starting a conversation and seeing what happens.
>
> Who knows, she might just be your perfect girl, so go ahead and talk to her.

What's Really Wrong With The Article

Where Bacon's article falls short is that he doesn't go into detail about how to spike up a conversation to facilitate the kind of chemistry that attracts women. Detractors will argue that chemistry is either there or it isn't and there is some truth in that. No-one can 'make' a woman be attracted to them. However, there are certain personality traits and behaviours that are more attractive than others and it is these that you must foreground every time if you want to increase your chances of success.

To be fair, confidence and the ability to lead an interaction are two of them and Bacon pays lip service to this, but he doesn't tell his readers precisely how to demonstrate them.

Differing Strategies

The fact is that men and women have different objectives and strategies in the mating market (read David Bus's excellent The Evolution of Desire for more on the evolutionary roots of our varying impulses).

Broadly speaking, men are programmed to meet and have sex with a wide variety of different women with a view to impregnating them, while women are programmed to be more choosy in order to secure the best genes for their children.

No gender is right or wrong, they merely have differing requirements and methods. But my suspicion is that women (and feminist men) are offended by the article as it seems to take the power of choice away from women (who want the best 'alpha' genes they can get) and place it in the hands of men. Understandably, no woman wants a bunch of beta nerds hassling her for sex—they want to choose the best alpha stud they can secure for themselves.

But here's the thing—women ALWAYS retain the power of choice anyway. All men can do is present themselves as effectively as possible (i.e. confidently and flirtatiously) giving girls the opportunity to select them based on their qualities. At no point does Bacon's article state or imply that coercion of any kind should be employed. On the contrary, all he is doing is advocating approaching to have a friendly chat and to see whether there is chemistry before moving on if there isn't.

Why You Should Always Approach Hot Girls Wearing Headphones

Here's the thing—girls don't approach men. Well, very rarely anyway. Even if a girl swipes right on Tinder she still expects the guy to start the conversation. In general, most romantic and sexual relationships are initiated by men, and actually, most women prefer it that way. If it wasn't for men approaching girls then the whole dating market would grind to a halt overnight.

The articles that rebuff Bacon imply that men should not approach girls unless the girl has given some signal that she is interested. Wearing headphones, we are led to believe, proves precisely the contrary. These girls wants to be left alone. Actually, this is nonsense. Few girls on their commute to work in the morning are wearing headphones to prevent guys from approaching them because most guys are too scared to do so and it doesn't often happen, even in big cities like London and New York.

Girls are not wearing headphones to deter guys, they're wearing headphones to listen to music.

I have approached a great many girls who had not given me any positive come-on signals at all. I met a former girlfriend at a bus stop in London and she hadn't even looked in my direction before I approached. Even though she was wearing headphones when I spoke to her she was delighted, we had a flirty little chat, exchanged numbers and later went out together for over two years.

Had I not given her the opportunity to get to know me by approaching her then we would never have got together, denying us both a lot of fun and a long-term relationship.

On this basis, not only is it possible to approach girls while they are wearing headphones, but you absolutely should. Remember, approaching a girl can have benefits for both sides, not just the guy. There are many times that girls have thanked me for coming up to talk to them in the daytime. Of course, if she is not interested and brushes you off then tell her to have a nice day and walk off immediately. But if it turns out there's a spark of attraction between you then by approaching whether she's wearing headphones or not may just be doing her a big favour.

Want to find out more about how to approach hot girls wearing headphones? Buy Troy's bestselling book, The Seven Laws of Seduction. To learn more click here.

Read More: Why You Don't Deserve That Perfect 10

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How I Made A Feminist Call Me Daddy

August 31, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

“I’m here,” she texted me. I’d been flirting over text with a bright-green-haired, black-lipstick-sporting, self-proclaimed feminist that I met off of Tinder. “Be there in a second,” I texted her back.

I let her in the front door, and immediately gave her a hug. I grabbed her by the hand and led her upstairs to my room. As we walked up the stairs, she spat out the oldest shit test in the world: “You’re a player, aren’t you?”

Most guys would’ve panicked, but I simply amplified the frame, which is one of the best methods to pass a shit test, and told her: “Yeah, you’re the 12th girl today.” As expected, her eyes grew wide, she tried to contain a laugh, and told me to “shut up!” with a giant smile on her face.

We walked into my room and I slyly shut the door behind us, while grabbing a bottle of vodka in seconds flat. Rather than trying to impress her or get her comfortable with me first, I simply plopped down onto the faux bearskin blanket on my bed, and invited her to sit right next to me. She did.

After about 5 minutes of solid verbal game and sub-communication, she was attacking my face like a grizzly bear in heat. Another five minutes later, and she was screaming: “Fuck me, Daddy! Harder! Please, sir!”

To most guys, getting a regular girl, let alone a feminist, to have sex with them would seem like an impossible task. Interestingly enough, it’s actually a lot easier (and more common) than you’d think.

A Primer To Women's Psychology

Anyone with even a modicum of game knows that women (and people overall) have two "minds," so to speak: their conscious mind, and their subconscious mind. You can also liken these two components to the neo-frontal cortex (the human brain) and the limbic brain (the animalistic brain). These two brains can help us understand why people frequently say one thing, but mean another.

The neo-frontal cortex is essentially what deals with logic, reasoning, and in this case, social conditioning. This is the part of a woman's brain that is responsible for her general hatred of "fuck boys," and other super modern feminist beliefs. Then, however, there's her limbic brain. This is responsible for her attraction to characteristics such as decisiveness, assertiveness, and confidence. It's also responsible for her being attracted to "fuck boys" (a sign of pre-selection).

Whenever you have a question about women, you can generally get it answered by referring to these two minds, which often create conflict with one another. For example, have you ever had a girl totally into you, then at the last second she doesn't want to have sex? This is a very popular phenomena, and it's also known as last minute resistance in the pickup community.

Essentially what's going on here, is that you've made her "limbic brain," attracted to you by exhibiting alpha male characteristics, but you haven't appeased her social conditioning, or her neo-frontal cortex. Even though she wants to sleep with you, she can't do it, because she's afraid of being labeled as a slut. Now obviously keep in mind that she may genuinely just not want to have sex with you, but there's plenty of girls who really want to be sexual, yet are too afraid of society's judgments. I'll talk more about this later, but keep this "two brain" model in mind.

What Women Are Fundamentally Attracted To

When you ask most guys what women want, they typically say something like:

- “A guy who’s tall!”
- “A guy who’s rich!”
- “A guy who’s handsome!”

And while these things will certainly not hurt you, women actually care very little about looks. Yup, that’s right—women really don’t care that much about looks. Why?

Well, entire books could be written about this, but it’s essentially because women evolved to be attracted to men that could keep them alive in the primitive, pre-civilization world. And because our bodies still think we’re in this world, we’re still attracted to things that would’ve helped us survive then.

“So then wouldn’t women be attracted to jacked guys?” I can hear you ask. Yes, definitely—being muscular helps you with the ladies, but it isn’t as important as your personality. Masculinity is more than physical… it also has a spiritual component responsible for your drive to achieve great things, and your will to succeed, which are FAR more important to women than how you look.

To put it bluntly, women are primarily attracted to personality characteristics such as decisiveness, assertiveness, and confidence. Back then, if a woman didn’t have a man who was decisive, assertive, and confident to protect her, she’d get killed by a lion or gang raped by a rival tribe or something. Yes, women obviously respond favorably to good looks, wealth, and social status, but in general these things matter much less than your personality characteristics (aka your game).

So, as you can see, we are the product of literally millions of years of evolution. Now do you think that just because some girl picks up a copy of “The Bell Jar,” and takes a class on Karl Marx that she’s going to completely undo millions of years of evolution? Of course not. And this brings me to my point: feminists are literally just like every other woman. They’re still sexually attracted to all the same things… their social conditioning is simply different.

A Feminist’s Neo-Frontal Cortex

Inside the feminist mind

What does an emotionally healthy woman’s neo-frontal cortex tell her? Well, she was probably raised in a traditional household, as these are the only places that produce emotionally functional women nowadays, so what does that tell us?

It tells us that her “social conditioning,” or her human brain, believes that she’s “attracted to gentlemen, who are manly, but gentle,” or something like that. Is this 100% accurate? Probably not; she likely still feels some tingles for bad boys, but in general, women who are emotionally functional can appreciate it when a man is masculine and takes the lead.

If you’re a modern college campus feminist, however, what would your social conditioning look like? An SJW’s neo-frontal cortex flutters about with thoughts such as these, a million miles a second:

- “Men are all pigs!”
- “I hate men!”
- “Men are all misogynistic rapists!”

BUT, and here’s the key to remember, her limbic brain is still turned on by the same things as every other girl. Feminists can complain and whine all they like, but they cannot deny their nature. This is why she wanted a man who is confident, strong, and assertive.

Step-By-Step Breakdown

Okay, so now that I've laid out the groundwork here, let's break down what I did step by step. First things first, if you recall, what did I do the second she came in the door? I gave her a hug. This is key, men, so listen up. The sooner that you initiate physical contact with a woman, the better. Why? Because this conveys the fact that you're a confident, assertive man who isn't afraid of being sexual around women. Now don't be a retard and act sexual around every single girl you meet, but if a girl comes over to your house alone after you get her number on Tinder, she's probably expecting you to be a little bit sexual to say the least.

Then what did I do? I grabbed her hand led her upstairs. I didn't ask like a faggot: "C-can I h-hold your hand?" I just fucking took it. Now, if she tensed up or became visibly uncomfortable I WOULD HAVE LET GO, but in general, you want to assume attraction instead of ask for it.

Then, again, if you recall, she gave me the grand-daddy of all shit tests: "Are you a player?"

Well, yeah, I am. But that's kind of a lame answer and it doesn't pass her shit test. "What's a shit test, Jon?" I can hear the newbie to game ask, and I'll tell you. A shit test is basically when a woman wants to see what you're made of. She's testing you to see if you're congruent. So what do you think she's testing when she asks a question like this? To see if I'm going to be a bitch and get embarrassed over my sexuality.

How would most guys respond to a question like this? "UHHHH-NO! I'm not a player, really! I've only had sex with three girls before!" This is probably the worst way to pass this shit test, because it shows that you're insecure about your sexuality. So what's the best way to pass this shit test? To simply amplify the frame. This accomplishes three things:

- It shows that you're not afraid of admitting that you're a sexual man
- It doesn't directly answer her question, so that her neo-frontal cortex is satisfied
- It redirects a logical question to her limbic brain, or her emotional side, by making a joke

This is critical: when she asked that question, this was her neo-frontal cortex talking. But me, being relatively experienced in the game, saw that she was testing me, and gave an answer back to her limbic brain (the emotional, primal side).

Sexual Escalation

Now, when we got into my room, if you recall, I was sure to shut the door. This is huge. If you forget to do this, and then start making out, when you get up to shut the door it completely breaks the mood and often times makes it harder to get back to square one. Don't forget to shut the door behind you. If she asks why (as if she doesn't know) just say that you like privacy or that it's just a habit. Yes, of course you should be aware that she may get nervous, and if she does tell her you can open the door if it will make her feel better. Don't be a social retard.

Then, I didn't mince words. I made it very clear that I was interested in her sexually. I plopped myself on the bed, and invited her over. Simply telling her that she can sit down next to you will suffice; you don't need to be overly sexual to the point of being a caricature. Then, once I had her on the bed, I talked with her a little bit before going in for the kiss.

Gentlemen, ALWAYS maintain a conversation before you go in for the kiss. Again, what is the reason for this? Let us refer to the two brain model. When you're talking with her, you're occupying her neo-frontal cortex, so it can't object to your sexual escalation (which her limbic brain wants). Do you see what's going on here? Think of it as short-circuiting her logical brain. It's too occupied with thinking of a response to the conversation to think of "I'm not a slut," comments such as: "I'm not that type of girl," or "Can we take it slower?"

The Actual Sex

The actual sex was great. In fact, I find that sex with feminists is better than with "normal" girls, because they're so sexually repressed that they just let it all out in the bedroom. Remember the characteristics that women are all attracted to? Like decisiveness, assertiveness, dominance, and confidence? The same goes for feminists…especially in bed.

That's why this feminist, let's call her Susie, wanted me to do her from behind, pull her hair, spank her, and call her a slut. It's why she called me Daddy, too. Fundamentally, some women just like being objectified, as other authors have written about before… and feminists are no exception.

In order to make the experience great for both of us, I was sure to give her amazing sex. I pounded her for 45 minutes straight and made her squirt several times. This is absolutely critical if you want to build a connection with girls and have them come back around for more.

Summary

I hope that this helped to clarify some of the misconceptions of game. After reading this article, you should have a basic, but practically-applicable understanding of shit tests, female psychology, and sexual escalation. If not, re-read the article.

Feminists are just like ordinary women. They're attracted to the same things as ordinary women, whether or not they want to admit it. And do you know the best way to convert a feminist? Be a strong, confidentt man who provides order and guidance in her life. And the best way to do this, is to make her realize that she is sexually attracted to strong, dominant men (such as yourself). When a feminist starts to realize her nature, the social conditioning that's been put into her head by the elites starts to crumble.

Men, if we ever want to see an end to this onslaught of liberalism, it's important that we show these feminists what they're actually attracted to. I've done my part, now it's your turn.

Read More: 5 Signs A Girl Has Daddy Issues

Jon Anthony
Jon enjoys helping others evolve into their best selves on his blog: Masculine Development and recently launched his eBook on How to to Develop Your Masculinity.

An Inside Look Into The Life Of Mike Tyson

August 31, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm fascinated by the life of Mike Tyson. He started at the bottom as a criminal thug in New York City, raised himself up as heavyweight champion of the world, and then lost it all in part because of drug use. Either you hate him for being a rapist criminal or you love him for beating the odds with genuine heart. The book Undisputed Truth shares his side of the story.

Your view of Mike Tyson is undoubtedly shaped by the media. They found him guilty of rape before the courts did and insisted on showing the worst parts of his life that fit the narrative of him being a monster. Tyson will be the first to tell you that he does have violent tendencies, drug abuse problems, and an abnormal attitude towards women, but the media insisted on sharing the most outrageous details. "Pro-rape," "rape advocate," "rapist," "misogynist." I've had to go through the same grinder. Whether or not Tyson and myself deserve any sympathy for our media portrayals, I understand what he had to endure.

Undisputed Truth starts off when he was growing up in New York City. He was raised by an unstable single mother and fell into robbery and other crimes before he was a teenager. During one of his stints in a juvenile facility, he turning to boxing, led by trainer Cus D'Amato.

> Everybody thought I was up there with this old, sweet Italian guy, but I was there with a warrior. And I loved every minute of it. I was happy to be Cus's soldier; it gave me a purpose in life. I liked being the one to complete the mission.

Cus wanted one last chance at creating a heavyweight and saw Tyson as the answer while Tyson just wanted a father figure. Cus showed him how to be lethal in the ring and also taught him the rules of life.

> Cus was a strong believer that in your mind you had to be the entity that you wanted to be. If you wanted to be heavyweight champion of the world, you had to start living the life of a heavyweight champion.
>
> […]
>
> You think you know the difference between a hero and a coward, Mike? Well, there is no difference between a hero and a coward in what they feel. It's what they do that makes them different. The hero and the coward feel exactly the same but you have to have the discipline to do what a hero does and to keep yourself from doing what the coward does.

Cus died as Tyson got started with his professional career. Cus' teachings stayed ingrained in Tyson long enough for him to be the heavyweight champion of the world, but then influence from the vultures surrounding him began to take hold.

Tyson had no natural resistance to all the women, drugs, and partying that a life of fame and fortune gave him access to.

> Once I started, I couldn't stop. I got too self-indulgent. I'd have ten women > hanging out in my hotel room in Vegas. When I had to go down for the press conference, I'd bring one and leave the rest in the room for when I was finished. Sometimes I'd get naked and put the championship belt on and have sex with a girl.

>
> […]
>
> Most celebrities were afraid of their stalkers. I fucked mine.

The music stopped when he was accused of rape by a black beauty queen contestant. The case was weak from the beginning, but Tyson's legal team, hired by Don King, made several mistakes and Tyson was found guilty. After being in prison for some time, he was up for parole. All he had to do at the hearing was to plead regret for the rape to be released early, but as a matter of principle, he refused to admit to the rape. He served an extra year because of it.

> So they brought me to Judge Gifford's courtroom in June of 1994 for a sentence reduction hearing. I was dressed in denim pants, a light blue work shirt, and work boots. The new prosecutor asked me if I had anything to say.
>
> "I've committed no crime. I'm going to stick with that to my grave. I never violated anyone's chastity."
>
> That wasn't what anyone wanted to hear. They sent me right back to jail. [Fellow inmates] hugging and kissing me when I got back.
>
> "Fuck them motherfuckers," they said.
>
> "Chill out," I said. "I'm cool. Another year. Let's just do this shit."

He began to lose his hunger for boxing, but continued to do it for the money. His training consisted of piles of cocaine. That's not enough for the highest levels and he started to lose or perform poorly in matches.

> [The drug use] got so blatant that I'd be carrying my bag of coke openly with a straw coming out of it like it was a milkshake.

Once his boxing career ended, he went bankrupt and had to hustle for cash to fund his drug use. It took him several years to lift himself out of it, and from that he began to see the beginnings of wisdom.

> I knew that God didn't pick on any small animals, that lightning only struck the biggest animals, that those are the only ones that vex God. Minor animals don't get God upset. God has to keep the big animals in check so they won't get lofty on their thrones. I just lay on my bed and thought that I had become so big that God was jealous of me.
>
> […]
>
> People want to break you and make you like you're nothing.

He also had learned some lessons from sleeping with so many women:

> All that rage and energy that propelled me to fuck all those women, where did it all go? Why have I lost that sexual growl? Is it just a function of getting older and losing hormones? I might see a girl and think "Wow" but I don't have the desire to say "Hey, baby." And don't tell me about Viagra or Cialis. That shit ain't the same thing as natural desire. It doesn't make the mind function. It's like having a gun with no bullets. It doesn't give you the fantasy you need in your mind.
>
> […]
>
> People often ask me what I regret in my life. I regret sleeping with all those women. I used to brag about that but now I'm so embarrassed by my conquests. I'm so happy to be with one woman.

I view Mike Tyson as a tragic figure. He was born into a toxic environment and because of that he developed habits and demons that would haunt him for most of his life, causing him to make poor decision when it came to dealing with his career, money, women, and health. In spite of that, he maintained self-awareness of it all and has made the steps to improve his life and that of his wife and children.

While I wouldn't necessarily rush to call him a "good man," it's clear to see that he is not the devil that the media made him out to be, and his intentions mostly come from a good place, especially as he got older and was able to look back at his life and the mistakes he made.

His autobiography was entertaining and interesting. Even if you know most of his story, I still recommend you check it out. If there's one thing you'll get from the book, it's to know that no matter how down and out you are, there's always a way back up.

This article was originally published on Roosh V.

Read More: "Undisputed Truth" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

If SJWs Were Comic Book Characters

September 1, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

You are no doubt aware that Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) are turning the comic books of your youth into Marxist propaganda. Thor is now a girl. Marvel has a character that was created specifically to demonize Trump (and, by association, his supporters) called Modaak. The only thing that prevents the SJWs from turning every comic book hero into a transsexual is economics—no one buys degenerate cultural Marxist comics.

But what if money was no object? What if Marvel could create the SJW comic book characters it really wants to create with no thought of losing money? This article takes a look at the kind of comic book characters SJWs would create if they had no limits.

Ideally, I would have provided drawings of each of these new super heroes and villains. Unfortunately, the Muses have not blessed your humble correspondent with the ability to draw or paint so I've provided pictures of real-life people who could play these characters in a movie. By the way, EYE BLEACH ALERT. Proceed at your own risk.

Heroines and Heroes

Emperor Sauron

Emperor Sauron is a male so he is not your typical SJW hero. But Sauron is special because he has funded virtually every cultural Marxist cause known to man. Whether it is open borders, felons voting, abortion, defending planned parenthood, or encouraging the Islamification of the West, Emperor Sauron is behind it.

Super powers

- Ungodly levels of wealth.
- Concentrated evil.
- Highly intelligent.
- Complete absence of good.

Weaknesses

- Mortal, we hope.

First Woman President Woman (FWPW)

First Woman President Woman can be distinguished by her lack of ability to coordinate colors

First Woman President Woman is historic because she is the first woman who wanted to be President. She has spent a lifetime keeping lists of her enemies. The goal of FWPW is to become President so that she can sell political favors to corrupt individuals and amass more wealth than God. To do this, she is willing to completely drop US borders and turn the US into a third world shithole. She will also take your guns away.

Super powers

- Woman.
- Expert in Saul Alinsky societal destruction tactics.
- Pant suits with long jackets that obscure catheters.
- Extraordinarily vicious and vindictive. Her enemies die mysterious deaths.
- Completely devoid of mercy or ethics.
- She meticulously tracks all her enemies.
- Unbelievably wealthy. Her “charity” takes millions of dollars of “donations” from backwards nations and corrupt individuals in exchange for political favors.
- The Media is completely in the tank for FWPW and will viciously attack anyone who stands in the way of her quest to turn the U.S. into the next Brazil.
- Favored daughter of Emperor Sauron.

Weaknesses

- Cankles.
- Incontinent so requires a catheter.
- Prone to seizures.
- Falls frequently.
- Low energy.
- Unable to stand for extended periods without a stool.
- Being opposed by a racist, anti-Semitic, shadowy internet Nazi organization known as the alt-right.
- Her sidekick has a raging sex addiction.

Degenerate Sex Woman (DSW)

You were warned

The mission of Degenerate Sex Woman is to kill off any particle of traditional femininity that remained after the onslaught of the HBO show Sex and the City. She does this through a combination of popular cable television shows, books, social media, and politically liberal social causes.

Super powers

- Portray the vilest degenerate sex acts as normal and healthy.
- Portray grotesquely out of shape bodies as normal and healthy.
- Portray degenerate, slovenly lifestyle as normal and healthy.
- Similar to Medusa, but instead of turning men to stone, her visage is able to destroy men's ability to reproduce.

Weaknesses

- Can be stopped with a large pizza.

Empowered Beautiful Black Woman

Empowered Beautiful Black Woman (EBBW) is beautiful. If you disagree, you are a racist.

Super powers

- Comic genius. Or so I am told.

- Beautiful. If you disagree, your social media accounts will be banned.

Weaknesses

- Nobody went to see the feminist ripoff of Ghostbusters that she starred in.

Super Cuck Man

Super Cuck is a true conservative. He will fight heroically to preserve the status quo of ten years ago. The mission of Super Cuck is to sit in his watching chair as western civilization is destroyed. His primary weapon is to call his enemies racists.

Super Cuck Man receives his livelihood from wealthy donors. He doesn't realize that he is just being used by the elites to provide the appearance of a real opposition. These wealthy donors despise Super Cuck Man, but find him to be a useful idiot.

Super powers

- None

Weaknesses

- His whole life is nothing but weakness.

Peaceful Muslim Man

Peaceful Muslim Man is for peace. Islam is peace. Implement Islam and there will be peace. Submit and there will be peace.

SJWs think that Peaceful Muslim Man is their staunch ally, but as soon as he has the upper hand, he will slit their infidel throats.

Super powers

- Skilled at bomb making, knife fighting, driving trucks over toddlers, flying planes into buildings, raping.
- No matter what he does, it is not in the name of Islam. Even if he says it is.

Weaknesses

- Would be removed in an instant if Western men had any balls.

Villains

There is only one real villain in the SJW universe…

Toxic Masculinity Man

Yes, I know Henry Cavill is probably an SJW in real life. But he would be my choice to play Toxic Masculinity Man.

Toxic Masculinity Man (TMM) is the arch villain of the SJW comic book universe. TMM lifts weights and eats meat. He knows how to defend himself. He is physically fit and has a body fat percentage that hovers between 10 and 15%. He has high testosterone levels. He reads Return Of Kings. He has traditional values.

The SJW pantheon fears Toxic Masculinity Man most of all. To stop him, they use many forms of attack:

- Distractions: sportsball, movies, video games
- Financial and spiritual drain: porn, consumerism
- Physical attacks: High carb foods, corporate food, chaining TMM to a cubicle.

Super powers

- Impervious to SJW programming.
- Does not allow thirst to turn him into a white knight or a beta orbiter.

- Able to focus on his mission.
- Able to father strong sons and virtuous daughters.
- Born to lead.
- Decisive.
- Strong problem solving skills.
- Ability to think independently. Unplugged from the Matrix.

Weaknesses

- TMM has a tendency to overestimate the power of SJW forces.
- Tendency to being passive.

Conclusion

These are only a few of the super heroines and super heroes of the SJW universe. I am sure that readers will be able to provide additional ones. And if we are lucky, we might even have an artist lend us his services.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: How Working At Comic-Con Showed Me That America Is A Nation Of Cucks

Michael Sebastian
Michael is the author of Staying Married in a Degenerate Age. Follow him on Twitter or Facebook. You can read more of his writing at Honor and Daring.

Kratom To Be Banned In The United States

September 1, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The Prohibition wing of the U.S. government, the Drug Enforcement Administration, is about to ban the pain-relieving dietary supplement kratom. Think of it as the government mafia eliminating competition for its client, the medical-pharmaceutical complex. After all, as wrong as Bill Maher is most of the time, even a stopped watch is right twice a day. He knocked it out of the park when he said this:

> Fifteen years ago, cancer drugs cost an average of $10,000 a year. Now it's $10,000 a month because this [Big Pharma] cartel owns the U.S. government every bit as much as Mexican drug lords own theirs.

Make no mistake, drug company lobbyists use your elected politicians as their employees. Big Pharma wants the sheeple buying its drugs. Kratom is a cheap and effective herbal supplement native to Asia that users say does everything from alleviating pain to helping with opioid addiction to providing an energy boost. The Libertarian Republic grasped that concept when it wrote about the coming ban on kratom.

> The real losers when the FDA went after kratom were the ultimate consumers: people who are in pain and looking for an inexpensive, natural and effective remedy.

Big Pharma wants the money you've been spending on kratom

The DEA will classify this supplement as a Schedule I drug, the same schedule on which such drugs as heroin, LSD, ecstasy, and yes, that deadly marijuana are listed. As usual, the "it's for your own good" and "public safety" and "Big Daddy Government knows best" PR lines were pushed. Oliver Grundman, a pharmacologist at the University of Florida couldn't decide if he wanted the government to continue to micromanage people's lives or if he was remiss about yet another drug being added to the taboo list.

> There needs to be some oversight as to what kind of products are being sold in the interest of consumer safety, not necessarily saying that everything related to the plant should be put in Schedule 1. We have seen the damage that that can do to a drug with promising pharmacological properties… For me it's a death sentence. Once you put a plant and its ingredients into DEA Schedule 1, it's very hard to do research on it, and it will become very hard to move forward with any positive developments because there is such a stigma associated.

Physicians claimed they're worried that users of the drug will use it as an opioid replacement without seeking professional help. Let's translate that: They want to sell you their drugs and bill you for their services rather than letting a much cheaper alternative do the same thing.

Failed Drug War

Armed thugs have done little to cut illicit drug use since the 1970s

Importantly, as revealed in the documentary American Addict, the drug war in America is only pushing drug users away from street drugs and towards getting prescription narcotics from pill pushing prostitutes with medical degrees. It's simple economics. Think of drug-seeking behavior as a balloon that has not changed in size. When the balloon is squeezed on one side, the demand shifts to the other side.

America has only 5% of the world's population, yet consumes 80% of its prescription narcotics. The overall percentage of the population using drugs regularly never changes, no matter how Draconian police and punishments become. Drug users only shift suppliers. When the DEA cracks down on substances like kratom, it shifts the money away from small, herbal supplement producers and into the hands of Big Pharma.

The issue—the psychology of addicts and a culture that causes drug-seeking behavior—is never addressed. On purpose. You have to create problems to create profit, you know.

The U.S. government spends $51 billion a year on the drug war in a system that favors punishment and jail time over treatment and support. Nearly 1 in 100 people are behind bars in the U.S. and most of those that are incarcerated are there on drug charges. This means the U.S. has the highest per capita incarceration rate in the entire world. And now, people will be going to prison for yet another drug, kratom.

Deaths from illicit drugs plummeted after Portugal decriminalized all drugs

Gabriel Sayegh of the Drug Policy Alliance lays out the insanity of the Nixon-era prohibition the DEA represents.

> We're turning to the criminal justice system to solve problems that are ultimately about health and well-being. We're using entirely the wrong tools to address a very substantial and very real problem.

Even Big Daddy Government admits rates of illicit drug use have remained the same or even gone up slightly.

> Illicit drug use in the United States has been increasing. In 2013, an estimated 24.6 million Americans aged 12 or older—9.4 percent of the population—had used an illicit drug in the past month. This number is up from 8.3 percent in 2002.

What if the DEA stopped terrorizing people and allowed them to do what they want with their bodies? (Ironic the my body, my choice gnome works when a women wants to kill an unborn child but not when someone wants to take kratom to alleviate pain). Portugal did just that, it decriminalized all drugs back in 2001. The results? Drug use is down, drug deaths are way down, and people are getting the help they need from medical professionals rather than being thrown into jail and slapped with a life-altering criminal record.

Other than threatening the future of ROK because of our connection to powerful kratom interests (just kidding, sort of) the kratom ban is yet more evidence that we are nothing but human cattle on the corporate-government tax farm. Can't have the cattle doing anything else but producing profit for the establishment. Surely we can't let them medicate themselves with an herbal supplement.

Read More: 3 Supplements That Will Make Your Smarter

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

The Truth About Six Pack Abs

September 1, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Henry Tran.

*Editor's Note: Henry teamed up with Return Of Kings to give you a huge discount at the six pack shop. Use your custom code: kings20 HERE for 20% off your entire order.

Hey guys,

My name is Henry, and I'm one of the head trainers at the #1 Fitness Channel on YouTube.

No matter where you come from, there seems to be a universally set standard for attraction and respect: A ripped physique, complete with six pack abs.

Now, I'm not saying that every guy with a six pack is respectable, nor is every respectable guy fit enough to have a six pack… But let's be honest…

Typically, our first impression of a man with a six pack is that he is an Alpha male; a hard worker, and women are naturally more likely to flock to him with girlish excitement and deep sexual desire.

Moreover, having a trim, ripped waist makes the rest of your body look bigger – especially the shoulders – which is yet another masculine trait that separates us from women and beta males.

Now, I realize we've gotten to a day and age where having this physique SEEMS extremely tough – a lot men work obscene hours, are conditioned to unhealthy diets, and don't get enough physical activity…

These men often look disdainfully upon a guy with abs because they assume that guy is a meat head, and all he does is work out, or he probably takes steroids. But truthfully, most guys have just been mislead to believe all the wrong things about getting abs… And that's what I'm here to tell you.

You don't actually need to exercise 24/7, starve yourself, or do 100 crunches a day to get six pack abs. In fact… I'm here to tell you that you need to do the exact opposite.

Check out these crucial mistakes you need to avoid so that you can actually get six pack abs faster…. no matter what your current lifestyle is like.

Avoid These Common Mistakes If You Want Six Pack Abs…

- Thinking crunches alone will get you abs: This train of thought is pervasive in beginners – and even many athletes who haven't had formal training. I myself thought it would work in high school and even college. Guess what? It didn't. You have to lower your body fat levels enough to see your abdominals – and then you can do crunches and other ab exercises to help define and increase the size of the muscles… which brings me to my next point….
- Relying on cardio to lose belly fat: This idea has invaded people's minds. We see a lot of very fit professional runners, swimmers, and cyclists… But really, cardio is great for one thing: Your cardiovascular system. Your heart, lungs, and arteries will all benefit from cardio…. But your body fat and muscle mass likely won't. In fact, there are ample studies to suggest that long, steady cardio is almost completely ineffective in reducing body fat.
- Thinking you need an infomercial gadget or special device to get abs: You've seen it. Maybe you've even bought into it. I wouldn't judge you if you did… However, the weird ab gadgets that are sold on late night infomercials usually aren't much more effective for getting you six pack abs than just crunches… And glorified plastic wraps or new-age corsets are also not going to trim your waistline and remove body fat.

"Well then… what WILL help me get abs, if not cardio, crunches, or a "get ripped" gadget that I bought from an Instagram Fitspo?"

It's honestly pretty simple…

Try these 3 tips now to see defined six pack abs:

1. Start losing your belly fat with a basic, healthier way of eating.

○ Avoid restrictive, low calorie diets that make you feel hungry all the time, and eat 4-5 meals per day.
○ Eat carbohydrates ONLY from whole grain sources (quinoa, oatmeal, brown rice, etc), and only eat them in the morning and around your workout.
○ Instead of avoiding low-fat products, eat MORE healthy, high fat products like nuts, avocados, and yogurt….and add more protein into your diet.
○ The switch to more fats and fewer carbohydrates will turn your body into a fat burning machine!

2. Accelerate your fat loss with simple, high intensity, full body workouts.

○ Forget bicep curls and hours on the treadmill. Do movements that involve more and bigger muscle groups like squats or deadlifts.
○ Take shorter rest periods and combine them with a high intensity movement like burpees or high-knees in between sets.
○ No more steady state cardio – These workouts should take you 20 minutes MAX. Push harder for less time, which yields far superior results.

3. Add in a basic ab workout to make your abs more defined once you have a flat stomach

○ Hanging leg raises – Hang from a bar, and simply bring your knees as close to your chest as possible. Once you're good at this, take your toes all the way to the bar with legs out straight.

- Plank exercises – Play around with different plank variations like plank side dips, alternating knee-to-elbow, or side planks to hit all areas of your abdominals.
- Add weight to continue getting better results: Try doing leg raises with a dumbbell between your feet, planks with a weight plate on your back, or kneeling cable crunches.

I know what you're thinking… "Wow Henry, you must really be a genius to come up with these steps – as if nobody has ever said this before!"??

Well, yeah, it's surprisingly basic. We, as a society, have over-complicated this whole "how to get six pack abs" thing. You've had crazy lies spun all around your head to convince you that you need very specific (maybe even weird) things to lose body fat and see your abs. I'm talking about bizarre ingredients in powdered shakes, vibrating bands that you wrap around your waist, and some wrap that sends electrical impulses through your abdomen to supposedly make your muscles contract and get you abs…?

No. Screw all of that…

If you want research-proven, high quality products that can help you reach your fitness goals, then you need to check out what actually works.
You'll see exercise programs just like I mentioned – Full body, high-intensity resistance training, which will allow you to build muscle and drop body fat simultaneously.

…Nutrition programs that aren't restrictive, that teach you how to eat healthy portions, prepare an entire week's worth of meals in less than an hour, and give you all other necessary guidelines to eat for a six pack.

…Supplements formulated only the with top-tier, research-backed ingredients and full transparency of those ingredients, with the research right there on the page so you can double check this proven data for yourself.

And on top of that, you'll be joining the biggest fitness team in the world. (There's a reason why millions of guys flock to us for these proven methods every single day.)

When it comes to fitness, if you have the basic tools to drop your belly fat fast and develop that lean six pack, then you don't really need much else. That's why I teamed up with my friends here at Return Of Kings to get you and all the readers an exclusive discount.

Head over to the six pack abs shop right now and use the code: kings20 at checkout to get 20% off your entire six pack order right now.

Now you can set yourself up for success by creating the custom plan that's best for your goals, without breaking the bank.

Train smarter, not harder.

Henry Tran

Advertise Your Product Or Site On Return Of Kings

Sponsored Article

Sponsored Article is ROK's official account that publishes sponsored articles from advertisers. If you are interested hiring a sponsored article for your site, product, or service, visit our advertising page.

Chris Brown Gets Arrested After Accusation By Unvetted Woman He Allowed In His Home

September 1, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

As you may already know, Chris Brown was sensationally arrested this week after a woman alleged he pointed a gun at her head in Los Angeles. Self-declared beauty queen Baylee Curran claimed to have still been "in shock," but immediately found time to speak to Entertainment Tonight, TMZ Live and Us Magazine.

Yet even as the media rules that Brown is guilty because of his past legal problems involving Rihanna, far less attention has been paid to Curran's long history of general deceit. For a start, she was stripped of the beauty pageant crown she says she retains, Miss Regional California 2016. Another beauty title purportedly on her resumé, Miss California USA Ambassador 2016, is one organizers assert she never even entered to win. She is also wanted for questioning in New York for a very serious allegation of larceny concerning a stolen $1,000 purse with additional cash, credit cards and other items inside.

As for the night in question, Baylee Curran has claimed that Chris Brown's associates began to verbally abuse her after she looked at expensive watches and jewelry items being laid out at his mansion. It was then that she says Brown pulled the gun on her. A veritably massive police response followed Curran calling 911, including a helicopter presence and a SWAT team. Brown ended up posting a mammoth $250,000 bond to obtain bail.

While Chris Brown has again exposed himself to the status of pariah, especially based on his standoffish and volatile video response before being arrested, if his background is being used against him, it is only fitting that Curran's is explored, too.

Oh wow, another aspiring actress/singer/music video girl/celebrity

Duck meets horse.

Witness reports, albeit currently hard to confirm, tend to support Chris Brown's story. Brown himself insists he was asleep at the time he is meant to have aimed the gun at Curran's head. For her part, she has said that she was there to secure a role in one of the singer's upcoming music videos. Because her beauty pageant experience has only given her a limited public profile, despite her dethroning as Miss Regional California coming after a nude photo scandal, the woman has a lot to gain from allegations against Brown, proven or unproven.

The speed in which Curran sought media attention is troubling, to say the least. She could be definitively outed as a shameless fabulist before too long and nevertheless escape with whatever money she has accumulated so far from media outlets. Plus there's the fame she has achieved from her "ordeal." As I will outline, Brown undoubtedly worsened his situation. Regardless, a very savvy Baylee Curran has seized her opportunity to seek fame, rather than "justice," which would have been better served by her allowing a criminal investigation to take place by either remaining silent or not talking to purely tabloid outlets like Entertainment Tonight, TMZ Live and Us Magazine.

Some Serious Mistakes Chris Brown Made Or Might Have Made

1. He barricaded himself in his house.

This mistake is certain, as the rambling video Brown made of himself makes clear. Irrespective of the overkill most people would associate with the SWAT and helicopter arrivals, the singer had no chance in hell of avoiding the police once they arrived. He may have every right to be angry, but that anger led to an incredibly stupid decision to hole himself up inside his mansion for so long.

2. His language only insulted and would have infuriated police, in addition to alienating much of the public.

Another confirmed error. There's a difference between vociferously fighting an unfair charge/false allegations and completely flying off the handle at authorities. Brown chose to do the latter, at least verbally when he barricaded himself in at home. "Fuck everybody," "fuck the police," "Black Lives Matter," and "the worst gang in the world…[is] the police" were just some of the very, very non-erudite (and totally unhelpful) phrases coming out of Brown's mouth. Moreover, countless people already, even if unfairly regard Brown as guilty because of his previous criminal history involving Rihanna. A rant like this only solidifies people's perceptions.

3. He and/or his entourage likely did no simple background checks on the girl in question.

This one is harder to assess. Curran's problematic personal story is an immediate giveaway and she says she had met him before. If true, Brown would have benefited from knowing about her lying, namely about having titles she was either stripped of or had never competed for. That said, he could not have reasonably found out about her alleged crime in New York. At the end of the day, party girls and groupies can be fickle at the best of times, let alone when they're very public liars and you're a man who has faced previous male-on-female violence allegations that can be easily exploited by a calculating, self-serving individual. A man with Brown's history needs to be relatively cautious about his company and the risks of being taken for a ride in the media or legal system.

4. Brown or members of his entourage probably went over the top with their anger

This is without even countenancing the gun to the head allegation. I can readily believe the girl acted like a brat, touching or getting too close to things she should have avoided, but oftentimes situations are best defused with an absolute minimum of fuss. It's perfectly possible that Brown or someone else inflamed the situation with words or emotions, and they figuratively kicked a viper who ended up calling 911 to attention-whore to the world. People may deserve rebukes from you. These rebukes are, however, frequently not in your best interests to deliver. They can suddenly and very momentously create trouble.

Be very careful about who you associate with

All that glitters is not necessarily gold.

Other news circulating around centers on Baylee Curran being in cahoots with the mother of Chris Brown's child and a text message Curran might have sent, saying Brown was "going down." The baby mama angle is particularly relevant, as his ex was schooled recently in court for her antics in a custody dispute. These even more sensationalized elements of the scandal are best to left to the side for the time being. Right now, Brown has enough to process and learn from, as do we as observers.

The moral of the story is that rich, phenomenally famous men are not immune to female accusations. In fact, they are sometimes far, far more likely to attract them. A man is vulnerable to a female trying to tear him down, no matter what his station in life.

Read More: Why Does Jay Z Still Get A Celebrity Pass Compared To Chris Brown?

David G. Brown
David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

4 Types Of Men Within The Masculinity Matrix

September 2, 2016 | by A.M. Petros | Link | Original Link

This matrix was conceived and refined through social fire after 18 months of debate with my local Return Of Kings brothers, wife and friends. It is a simple method for understanding what type of man you are and thus your social standing. None have disagreed with its underlying premise.

Female judgement is unkind and unrelenting. Identification of both personal flaws and the deficiencies of those around you is critical to your success with women. These unpleasant truths derived from honest introspection should impel you towards self-improvement. Readers should note the advice provided is inherently biased towards marriage. If you are a PUA, this matrix is still useful for self-appraisal.

Respect is key

Everybody knows men and women are judged by different standards. Women judge men on one criteria alone. Respect. Can she respect you or not? A woman will determine this within the first few minutes of meeting you. Disrespect entails being regarded as an insurance policy, an understudy to the preferred man, or as a continuous line of emotional and financial credit.

Next, you must decide if you respect women to determine your position. Respect for women involves truly caring about their wellbeing. Do not be fooled! Respect does not equate to female idealization. Instead, men who raise their daughters and mold their wives into virtuous women, forsaking feminist harlotry, uphold the ultimate respect for women. Desiring the degradation and downfall of all females is the ultimate disrespect.

The visual representation of these concepts enables personalities to be mapped. There are two extremes on the horizontal axis, respected by women and disrespected by women. The vertical axis contains respects women and disrespects women. The resulting quadrants represent the four main archetypes: (1) white knight, (2) loser, (3) player/PUA and (4) husband material.

So where do you stand? The rationale for each archetype is outlined below. Remember, your current position is not fixed and movement between categories can occur through conscious effort.

The masculinity matrix. Forget Myers Briggs Type Indicator (MBTI) testing, this will get you further in life.

1. White knights (respects women, disrespected by women)

The primary goal of the white knight is to please women in the hope of getting into their pants. A commonly employed but fruitless tactic is being overly permissive. Women capitalize upon this ‘nice guy’ attitude. You are described by women as nice, sweet, cute but never sexy, hot or manly. Women identify white knights as boys or worse still, girlfriends. Men see them as manginas, male feminists or beta orbiters.

The world has lied to us. Being an attentive sympathetic ear or emotional tampon will never garner respect from women. You serve instead as a pseudo girlfriend or call bitch. This deception is promulgated by movies, TV and beta orbiter songs. The storyline where the hot girl finally realizes the beta’s worth after she’s had her ‘fill’ of bad boys has no basis in reality. This only occurs after she has no further options. Disrespect leads to immediate rejection as a potential sexual partner.

White knights: she says she is talking to her mother, but she is really laughing at you with one of her lovers.

This upper-left quadrant is a trap for many young men. Fortunately, there is great potential for positive change. To overcome this disability, I offer the following advice;

Be a benevolent dictator: Be loving but in charge. Decide on the small things, such as where to eat and what she can wear. This includes defining the relationship early and common goals. The following applies to long term relationships. Quickly resolve differences in outlook since future problems don't disappear. You decide if and when you want kids, how many, what you both value and wish to focus on (lifestyle, God, family, work and money). Stick to your principles and be uncompromising!

Become the best version of yourself: Girls want guys they can esteem privately and publicly. Having a good job and financial security is great, but not everything. Confidence and other intangible characteristics are of higher value. No girl wants to show off a passive, emotional, skinny man-boy (who doesn't lift), regardless of wealth or profession. Don't sacrifice your individual character to suit her demands. Become the best version of yourself and she will want you more.

Be direct: Always be direct about what you want physically and emotionally. Girls want you to lead. If you fail, you will be taken for a ride (and not a sexy one).

Set boundaries: Have relationship rules. Make actual, literal rules. Punish bad bitch behavior accordingly. All girls will 'shit test' you to gauge your boundaries. Be firm and resolute. If she doesn't have daddy issues, be like a loving yet stern father and she will respect you. If she disrespects herself, she will feel undeserving of love and will reject you. In that scenario, act like a bad boy with a heart of gold. Accomplish this and your future capability as a father will be undoubted. Exploit her father figure issues if your goal is casual dating. She searches for love and will attempt to please you to obtain it. If seeking a husband, she will evaluate if you are fit to be the father.

Do not fear: Girls sense fear. They see it as weakness. Girls want a protector, both physically and intellectually and a provider who is resilient in stressful times. They are relieved they can rely on you rather than their 'careers'.

Do not be lukewarm: God did not call men to be lukewarm. Choose a side and accept both the resulting animosity and praise. You are probably a fence sitter or doing something wrong if people don't hate you. Be on fire ideologically, romantically and physically. Tone down that personal filter. Don't see life as the mitigation of risks, but decide what is worth risking.

White knights: Pack up your crap, you need to move out of this quadrant.

Losers (disrespects women, disrespected by women)

The bottom-left quadrant is a devastating category to be in; a hole from which few escape. These men are typically here by default. They include the nauseating stereotypical '30 year old basement dwelling virgins'. They are intellectually blunted, physically weak and immature (think the herbivore men of Japan). They disrespect people in general and certainly do not deserve respect. They are characterized by their sheer enjoyment in seeing women (and to a lesser extent men) suffer. They brood in hatred, much like Elliot Rodgers. He felt the world owed him so he killed several women because they 'deprived him of sex'.

Elliot Rodgers, right before he went his own way.

It is my belief this group has polluted the MGTOW and MRA movements. Their misguided hatred stems from an external locus of control, placing blame on others rather than themselves, where it truly lies. It is the few from this group that casts a spectre of weakness upon the MRA and MGTOW movements. My advice is simple;

You are your own enemy: Instead of blaming the world for your problems, take a look in the mirror. After which, follow all advice previously mentioned. I won't hold my breath.

Losers: Unless you get off that couch you are not going anywhere.

Players and pick up artists (disrespects women, respected by women)

Players understand how to gain a woman's respect. A good physique, confidence and smooth execution of game yields results. Why are women drawn to these attributes? Women are psychologically split, the most common being the virgin/whore complex. They long to be protected and cherished like a virgin but treated like a whore in the bedroom. This fracture is widened further through psychological issues stemming from childhood, such as abandonment or mistreatment from a father figure. The previous quadrants are unable to satisfy both sides.

Women want to be Ariana Grande, Britney Spears or Madonna, depending on which era they were teenagers. These female 'artists' began with an initial virginal phase which progressed into overt harlotry. An example is Taylor Swift's gradual metamorphosis from princess to a mentally borderline slut. White knights are able to satisfy her virginal side by treating her like a princess. PUA's are also able to satisfy this superficially through offering alpha male protection. Her inner whore then emerges through various psychological PUA techniques. The white knight is too nice to be able to bang her in accordance with her self abusive desires, leaving her slut side unsatisfied.

The inner female psyche is split into virginal princess and slut components. Crazy connects the two.

Players/PUA's do not or cannot respect women. Some may legitimately hate women. This may be due to longstanding experience in witnessing and taking advantage of their debauchery, eroding trust in them.

Knowing this, players have no compunction in using women. Although respected by women, they take advantage of women who cannot respect themselves enough to keep their legs shut. My advice is this;

There is more to life: At some point you will need something more fulfilling than banging gullible/broken girls. You might be content with your current lifestyle, but this desire may creep up upon you later. Luckily, you have 80% of what it takes to manage a wife and family. You possess confidence, power and leadership, which take time and effort to develop. Men, like women, also have a peak. Women peak in their early 20's but men peak in their mid 30's. Don't waste your opportunity and fall off the proverbial cliff.

I haven't personally experienced this transition, having left the white knight quadrant myself. However, I've been given sound advice by those who have. Ensure you keep your head, act slowly and cautiously when you make this change. The overwhelming euphoria associated with growing past banging dirty whores places you in danger of jumping head on into the first relationship. Resist this urge and keep your game, but play for keeps.

Act early: Find a young woman and STAMP out her inner feminist. Deprogram her from years of propaganda and lead her into becoming a virtuous, self-respecting mother and wife. Young women today avoid marriage, being seduced by false independence from a 'career', TV apartment lifestyle and rampant consumerism. This continues until they hit a watershed at 30-35. Young women are malleable up until approximately 25. Any older and they're almost destined for the reject pile due to ingrained feminist ideologies.

Players will encounter less resistance transitioning to husband material.

Husband material (respects women, respected by women)

These men are leaders in their own right and command respect within their family and also the community. This archetype is also identified as the alpha provider role. This is the ultimate version of the man all husbands and fathers should strive to become.

Understand that being married doesn't make everyone automatic husband material. PUA's are superficially dissimilar to husband material, but not much separates the two. Both groups are respected by women and understand game, but each apply it to different ends. Those looking to be a husband use it to find and maintain a virtuous partner compared to short term physical gains. Articles on ROK offer seemingly contradictory advice, endorsing banging stupid sluts while simultaneously condemning promiscuous women. This is because ROK caters to men from both of the right quadrants.

This role requires reflection and self-improvement. The transition will be easier for PUA's to achieve, being already respected by women. White knights will find it excruciatingly difficult to overcome potentially decades of feminist brainwashing. It will feel unnatural to place a woman into submission, but it is central to their success as future fathers and husbands.

Not naturally occurring, but man made. Men naturally lean towards White knight-dom or the PUA/player state.

Respect, respect, respect

Honestly appraise your own position. Personally, I spent too much time deteriorating in white knight territory. Transitioning to the top right quadrant took years of introspection and self-motivation. I advocate for men becoming the alpha provider, but being in any right quadrant improves all aspects of life, from your career to success with women. Whichever path of self-improvement you take, don't languish in any left quadrant. Be seen as a man, be respected as a man and be the leader that women need.

Read More: Should Men Strive To Become An "Alpha Provider"?

A.M. Petros

A.M. Petros: benevolent dictator, explorer, libertarian. After being emancipated from hypnopaedic delusion, Petros sought wisdom. He is a purveyor of insights into social engineering, its purposes and implications. Petros continues to anger then awaken the masses from loving their servitude.

ROK Undercover: What It Was Like To Attend A Muslim Service

September 2, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Continuing the series on conservative religions, our second part takes us to the always controversial Muslim faith.

Muslims

I attended an “open night” at a local Muslim worship center during their holy period of Ramadan. I have not attended a regular religious service here, and have no desire to be added to any more government watchlists than I am already on, but will share my Ramadan experience.

Separation of the Sexes

Muslim men and women worship separately. I was surprised at what a huge difference this made in the worship. I will casually ogle most women in a public setting. Even if I see a happily married, conservatively dressed woman in a formal setting, my biology compels me to examine her body visually. In Islam, the women are behind you in a different room, and when they are seen, their bodies are completely covered except the face. This is a highly effective manner of removing sexual thoughts from the mind, and allows one to focus on worship. It makes me consider the idea of separate sex schooling in a positive light.

Abrahamic Religion

Comparison of Religious Beliefs

	Judaism	Christianity	Islam
Type of theism	Monotheism	Trinitarian monotheism	Monotheism
Name of God	Yahweh/ Elohim	The Holy Trinity (Father, Son & Holy Spirit)	Allah
Character of God	Non-physical, Non-gender	+ Physical, Male (Jesus)	Non-physical, Non-gender
Human nature	Two equal impulses, one good and one bad	"Original sin" inherited from Adam - tendency towards evil	Innately good, equal ability to do good or evil
Means of salvation	Correct belief, good deeds	Correct belief, good deeds, faith in God, baptism	Correct belief, good deeds, faith in Allah

Muslims believe Jesus was a prophet of God, and honor and respect him, but don't believe he was the one and only Son of God. They believe he was another prophet, along with Abraham, Moses, etc. They believe in strong patriarchy and women are not given any visible roles in the church, and they are expected to always respect and be subservient to their father, husband, or brothers.

You Need A Lot of Free Time

While the basic faith itself is somewhat similar to other Abrahamic religions, Muslims have practices which I found extremely time consuming and difficult to integrate into modern life. The purpose of existence is to worship God, and one is expected to do so throughout the day. One must face the direction of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, prostrate oneself, and pray 5 times every day. Alcohol and pork are prohibited. Male genitals are circumsized.

There are some interesting economic ideas, such as prohibition of usury (earning interest without being exposed to the risk of the investment) and taxation of wealth (which is rarely taxed in the west) but not trade (which is highly regulated and taxed in the west). Hoarding for speculation is prohibited. Polygamy is allowed with a maximum of 4 wives.

OCD Handwashing Rituals

The right hand is given priority (which seems a bit unfair to lefties). There is a ritual of handwashing that must be done in a certain order, and special rules for using the bathroom that seem to foster obsessive compulsive disorder. One must enter the toilet area with the left foot first, then remain silent. Use only the left hand to touch the genitals, wipe and wash the penis or anus (using an odd number of wipes only), say a small prayer for relief of the filth and exit with the right foot first. Oh and make sure one's genitals are not facing Mecca.

To wash, which must be done before each of the 5 prayers, as well as after going #1 or #2, passing gas, getting a cut, sleeping, touching the opposite sex, or touching a dog's saliva, one first washes the left hand, then the right, then the face. While there are strong hygienic reasons for this behavior, I can't imagine living that way, and much of it in modern society is unnecessary, although I like the idea of never shaking hands with something that has touched an anus or penis.

Indeed, so OCD are the rules that there are actual scriptures regulating this behavior.

However, Muslims take the virginity of their women so seriously that the daughters can face threat of death for committing premarital sex. The patriarch has unquestionable authority. Women are to dress conservatively, and promiscuous behavior is harshly and rapidly shunned by both male and female Muslims. Likewise, homosexuality is brutally repressed.

Washed with his right hand first

In Saudi Arabia, there is a government agency charged with preventing degeneracy and promoting the sacred, called the Committee for Preservation of Virtue And Prevention Of Vice

Pros

- Strong patriarchy and value of the family
- Stick to principles at any cost
- Women taught to unquestioningly obey husband
- Harsh opposition to degenerate behavior

Cons

- Not highly acceptable in the west
- Very time consuming and many rituals to follow
- If a white male, you will probably be viewed as a government spy
- And your government will in turn spy on you
- Not easy to casually join
- Dubious beliefs and practices
- Reflects and magnifies the negative traits of men (slavery, sexual repression, raping, etc.)

While I could accept a Muslim wife, I cannot see integrating this religion into my lifestyle. There are some good ideas in the religion, and it is perhaps the only remaining bastion of patriarchy in the world today, but it focuses a little too much on the men.

The religion requires odd and outdated rituals, which to some degree, are a part of any system of control, but in this case are excessive. Some of the practices one would either need to ignore, thereby being a bad follower, or publicly reveal, which would subject one to ridicule and suspicion. If you are living in the west, I would think a conservative sect of one of the other Abrahamic religions would be a better fit.

Read Next: ROK Undercover: What It Was Like To Spend A Day At A Mormon Church

Max Roscoe
is an aspiring philosopher king, living the dream, travelling the world, hoarding FRNs and ignoring Americunts. He is a European at heart, lover of Latinas, and currently residing in the USA.

What To Do If Your Wife Is Cheating On You

September 2, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The dreaded moment becomes reality. You come home early from work, much to your wife's surprise. You quietly walk in to surprise her as you're going to take her out for pizza, only to hear noises come from the bedroom. She's moaning. It couldn't be. Something has got to be wrong. You take off your tie, place it on the counter, then walk down the hallway to your bedroom. The moaning gets louder as you approach the door. Then you walk in, only to find another man pumping the shit out of her. The guy jumps off her in a daze and they both cover up.

"This isn't what it looks like!"

What do you do? Double homicide? Beat the fuck out of both of them? Quietly slink away down the hallway? Burst into tears like a bitch? Okay, maybe this example is a bit extreme. But one way or the other many men find out their wife is having an affair during the course of their marriage one way or the other. Realize women are VERY good at keeping their cuckoldry hidden. Dr. David Holmes, a psychologist reveals:

> The biggest difference is that women are much better at keeping their affairs secret. If you look at the studies into paternity, even conservative figures show that between 8% and 15% of children haven't been fathered by the man who thinks he's the biological parent.

That's a lot of men—millions—being cucked into paying for other men's children. (Just imagine how many times women have affairs if that many women lie about who the real daddy is!) Yet, we hear nothing from politicians and the legal system about "fixing" this enormous problem, i.e. with paternity fraud criminal and civil charges.

To illustrate how one-sided Anglo American culture is becoming, ABC (unaffectionately referred to as Always Bolshevik Communism) ran a report defending women's infidelity as some sort of harmless sexual adventurism. Just listen this gem of an excuse from a woman who had an affair, from a report featuring hot to trot wives who look up flings on the internet.

> I was feeling very lonely one night," Katherine said. "I was bored, on my phone in the parking lot, sitting in my car, pulled up AshleyMadison, and decided to open my first profile to see what would happen.

Next then you know, she trips, falls and lands on some guy's erect penis. What are the chances?! "Oh well, while it's in might as well enjoy myself." The female capacity to lie has no bounds. Some men literally have to walk in on a sordid scene like the one detailed above in order to be clued in about the realities of female infidelity.

For others, maybe the gossipy neighbor clues them in. Maybe you see sexual text messages on her phone or Fakebook account. But, you know she's having an affair. What do you do? It all depends on what kind of outcome you are looking for. Just know you are not the first man and definitely won't be the last this happens to.

Gather Evidence

Get a lawyer and gather evidence if it will help you in court

If you live in a state where fault can be found in a divorce, fault that may save many of your assets from the divorce court meat grinder, by all means GATHER EVIDENCE. If the affair is ongoing, and you have a cool and aloof enough personality, use your rage to talk to an attorney and get his recommendation on how to build an airtight case. However, DivorceInfo lays out the craptasticness of the legal system in most states:

> Increasingly, states shift toward disregarding marital misconduct by either spouse, focusing instead on a dispassionate analysis of what each party needs and what each party can afford, or fairly rigid application of defined guidelines.

In other words, you will be paying no matter what she does. As Charles Dickens wrote, the law is an ass. Unfortunately, in most states men are seen as little more than walking ATM machines, and poor little women can't do anything wrong. At least, in the eyes of the injustice system they can't. So, evidence may or may not help you. There's always another alternative.

Leave Her Ass

Don't listen to any of her bull, just leave

Be the bold motherfucker that has balls enough to simply walk off and leave the bitch. And most importantly – don't come back to her! Ever! Women are gifted with the innate ability to deceive men, and men are hardwired to believe the lies. Some of the cruelest jokes I've ever heard have come from predatory females who have just taken their discarded Beta male husbands for an expensive ride.

If she's cheating, don't listen to her excuses, especially the tired old gnome "I was bored" or "I wasn't happy" or "You don't treat me like you used to." Would these excuses work if you told them to her? Hell no, they wouldn't. Don't let women play on your sense of emotion or sense of duty.

Even if you are married and think you can trust your wife, never let your guard down and be prepared for all circumstances, including the possibility of an affair. Have money stashed away somewhere, and a plan ready to spring into action in a moment's notice if the inevitable happens.

In the office space where I worked I saw women turn into total sluts around certain men when their hubbies were away. These clueless men must have believed their precious wife wouldn't ever cheat on them. In one memorable case, some buddies of mine and I saw a blonde coworker constantly orbiting this tall black guy. It was so insidious that those of us who were paying attention (and who had a modicum of Red Pill knowledge) secretly called them a "couple" even though she was married. It was painfully obvious the black guy was wearing it out while her hubby, the Beta white boy professional was out working to pay for her expensive lifestyle.

There are things a man sees in his life he can never forget when it comes to women and how naturally gifted they are at deception.

Don’t Get Married in the First Place

Avoid having a figurative trap close around your ankles

Save yourself the trouble in the first place and just don’t get married, especially in a society with legal guillotines hanging over your throat. Think slavery ended after the Civil War? Slavery still exists in the family court system. Men are regularly saddled with lifetime alimony payments and a generation’s worth of child support, under threat of imprisonment if they don’t pay up. This legal chicanery was foisted upon men for two reasons—it is intended to break up the nuclear family, and it has led to enormous profits for lawyers and private investigators.

As long as men are throwing their bargaining chip—commitment—around like it is worthless, women will continue to rake hapless Beta males over the hot coals. Whenever I see photos of most Beta males with their smiling wives, the men have the “I’m getting fucked and don’t know what to do stare.” Don’t be the poor bastard that ends up with that stare.

Until the legal code is lit afire and begun anew, perhaps the worst advice there is is to get married. Once the deal is sealed, most men will notice a complete and total change in personality among their wives as they know they have you by the ball sack. Even the best game players among us will be altered by this master-slave legal relationship. It messes with a man’s psychology, and most importantly it has the potential to devastate his finances.

An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Read More: 10 Best and Worst Countries for a Man to Find a Wife

---

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Double Standard: Male Victim Says Men Shouldn't Walk Alone, No One Yells "Victim Blaming"

September 3, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A victim of an atrocious physical assault, Robbie Stirling, has claimed that men should not walk home alone after nights out. The young man was set upon at the age of 19 and his physical and emotional wounds, including the requirement of grave surgery, continue to impact on his life some four years later. And, surprise, surprise, after he made his strongly-worded call in the British media, none of the usual do-gooders called him a "victim-blamer."

Stirling's terrible experiences, first enduring the assault and then recovering from it in the long-term, highlight the intense double standards facing male versus female victims of crime. Whilst no reasonable person is going to say that victims of serious physical assaults or rapes ever deserve their suffering, the fact remains that men are expected to take precautions and women are encouraged to do whatever they wish, even if it results in higher odds of being sexually attacked. And are these higher odds exactly what "rape culture"-obsessed feminists want in order to perpetuate their own lies?

Robbie Stirling should be commended for his commonsense prescription for helping men evade violent attacks. Although he in no way deserved the cruel assault thrown his way, he has offered other men, who receive but a fraction of the sympathy given to females whenever they are attacked, the opportunity to minimize their risk of being harmed. Meanwhile, any constructive advice for women given by those dealing with violent crime on a regular basis, such as police officers, is twisted as "victim-blaming" by feminists.

Examples where you use caution to avoid being a victim of crime or negligence

“Help! The Australian Government is victim-blaming David G. Brown by telling him to take precautions to avoid being mugged or attacked while overseas!”

Robbie Stirling’s astute advice is actually a microcosm of the rituals we engage in every day to stop ourselves losing property or being injured by others with a malicious intent.

For instance, I have traveled extensively, more than my grandparents, parents and most of my siblings combined. I know my way around certain foreign cities better than many of the locals do. Yet I must be aware of my surroundings, both at home and overseas, and be prepared to take sensible precautions to keep myself safe. Otherwise I may end up in the local hospital or, more sinisterly, bleeding out on the street. My experiences,though not foolhardy, have still been adventurous even with these precautions.

Just as I take sensible measures to evade criminals, most of you, because you’re men, do all or some of the following on a regular basis:

- you lock or double-lock the door of your inner city or suburb home to avoid being burgled;
- you lock the door of your car, even in the carpark of a well-protected, electronically monitored apartment complex or hotel, to avoid having it stolen;
- you put your wallet in your pocket when on the street to a) avoid attracting would-be thieves and b) make it harder to steal;
- you avoid the worst neighborhoods in your cities or other metropolitan areas, e.g. the South Side of Chicago;
- you walk home in a group or take a taxi after a night out, just as Robbie Stirling now counsels, to avoid being assaulted;

- you eschew dark alleys or derelict streets when traveling, especially in countries with lower living standards than the West, to avoid being attacked or mugged;
- you use safes or take your valuables with you to avoid having them taken from your hotel room;
- you buy bottled alcoholic beverages on foreign vacations in poorer countries to avoid methanol or ethanol poisoning from illegally manufactured spirits or beer;
- you watch your drinks at nightclubs or bars and, if strangers buy for you, are present when they're poured, particularly when overseas;
- you look for cars at pedestrian crossings to avoid being mowed down by a driver illegally preoccupied with his or her phone or accelerator; and
- you exchange your money for other currencies at reputable businesses when abroad, not with the guy asking you to meet him round the back or one street over.

Importantly, women do most of these things, too. In the realm of mitigating the risks of sexual assault, however, the tables are turned. Suddenly any recommendation for reducing the risk is perversely called victim-blaming. What utter claptrap.

Contrast commonsense with the absolute nonsense peddled by feminists

Feminist academic Lauren Rosewarne has previously lambasted police for suggesting women should not walk alone in parks, especially at night.

Compare the non-existent personal attacks following Robbie Stirling's advice for men with the shrill drum-beating of feminists when a woman is attacked or killed and precautions are mentioned…

When a 17-year-old Melbourne schoolgirl, Masa Vukotic, was unforgivably murdered at a time of 7pm last year, a local high-ranking policeman faced the usual but nonetheless unacceptable ad hominem attacks for reminding women of the importance of walking in groups, namely at night.

Vukotic had been alone and was also unable to hear her attacker's approach due to music from her headphones. This policeman, an Inspector, would have been exposed to hundreds of dead bodies or cases involving dead bodies in his career. Without taking away from the deplorable act of the offender, the Inspector was only seeking to prevent more tragedies, tragedies he has more intimate knowledge about than 99.99% of the general population. Contrary to the implicit expectation of publications like The Guardian, the police simply cannot preempt every terrible murder, physical attack or rape, nor should they be expected to. Bad people have always existed and always will.

One notably vocal dingbat, University of Melbourne academic Lauren Rosewarne, lashed out at the Inspector and police for their "victim-blaming." Forgetting that police spend 1,000 times more effort solving and responding to crimes than advising the pubic about how to avoid them, Rosewarne said that the conversation needed to be about offenders not committing attacks, as if the 0.1% of people hellbent on rape and murder are going to use some sort of academic or moral tool to evaluate and then reconsider their behavior.

Crime is inexcusable, but it will be overwhelming committed in places where offenders perceive a potential victim is either alone or outside the immediate assistance of the authorities. If people know the hotspot situations of physical attacks or sexual assaults, they empower themselves to steer clear of danger.

The position of feminists on the subject of female self-protection is untenable. On the one hand, they say that "rape culture" exists in a society that supposedly normalizes sexual assault (but when was the last rape you saw in public, unlike the ubiquitous serious assaults in every nightclub precinct?). Yet on the other hand, this pseudo-culture is not ever threatening enough for feminists to encourage women to take reasonable precautions to avoid the very bad individuals whose opportunism makes them prey on those isolated from others in locations like dark parks. The need to preserve the rape culture narrative is why SJWs actively try to prevent the dissemination of helpful advice, similar to Robbie Sterling's, for women.

We do not live in Pleasantville, nor will we Violent crime is the lowest it has ever been. That sad, enough bad eggs live amongst us. If a person, male or female, has a choice between taking reasonable precautions to stop themselves from becoming a victim or not taking them, the former course of action always makes the most sense. The plight of Robbie Sterling shows we can offer others ways to escape victimhood without claiming that victims deserve to be attacked.

It is the saddest indictment on feminists today that they will take more precautions to protect their cars (i.e. locking them) than the precautions they advise women to use in avoiding violent crime.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: British Rotherham Investigator Gets Obscence Payoff For Doing Nothing, Then Plays The Victim Card

David G. Brown

David is a lifelong dissident and intellectual rebel. He despises political correctness, which replaces real, needy victims with narcissistic leftists out for a free meal. Though still a young man, he has watched society descend into its present morass with great sadness, combined with a determination to help make things better. He tweets when there's something worth tweeting here.

How The Porn Industry Uses Psychological Warfare On You

September 3, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

You see it on your computer screen whenever you watch porn… it's huge, it's frightening, it's absolutely unreal, and it makes you feel like your own equipment is the genital equivalent of sporting a sub-100 IQ. It's the monster penis.

Well, as I'm about to flesh out for you here, that monster penis that you continually see in porn movies actually is, in many cases, absolutely unreal, because in many cases it's a prosthetic.

That fishy smell (no, not that one)? It’s coming from Hollywood

The San Fernando Valley produces a massive number of porn films, and since it’s only a hop, skip and a short jump away from Hollywood, it isn’t a stretch for anyone to realize that the porn moguls have access to the best special effects, and makeup artists, that Hollywood has to offer. And Tinseltown’s best special-effects men and makeup artists can make an average-sized penis look like a porn star’s, as easily as you and I can cross the street while checking out three different girls’ asses and eating a sandwich.

In the 1997 film, “Boogie Nights”, actor Mark Wahlberg gave us a glimpse of the red-pill truth here when he unfurled his massive member at the very end of the movie. And in this case, the con artists in the San Fernando Valley were being outed, as Hollywood slipped the truth into the end of one of its mainstream films, knowing full well that very few people would get the gist of the joke.

Now, I’m no urologist, but that penis of Markie Mark’s looked big enough to gag a blue whale. And it looked real as hell, too – but it wasn’t. Wahlberg himself admitted he wore a prosthetic for the film’s final “money shot”…

An insider spills his guts

A couple years ago I read an eye-opening interview, shortly after I first began to pull at this particular thread and dig for clues. That interview has since been scrubbed from the search engines, so far as I can tell, but in the interview, a porn industry insider admitted that many male porn actors wore some type of prosthetic. This was especially true of male porn actors who were black. A black man's dark skin tones can more effectively hide the seams of the prosthesis, which are more readily apparent when contrasted against the skin tones of a lighter-skinned male.

The production companies also allegedly utilized optimum camera angles and special lenses (and in some cases, CGI – computer-generated imagery) that made men's members look larger than they actually were. The insider being interviewed, who acted like he was afraid he was about to get whacked (which he probably was), also said that porn stars signed non-disclosure agreements about this issue. It was big-time, secret, hush-hush stuff.

After reading the entire article, and thinking about the whole thing for a while, it all began to make sense to me. So I started to dig for other clues, and where best to go looking for those clues, than in actual porn movies.

It didn't take long to find some ridiculously obvious evidence. Right out of the gate, I spied a porn clip featuring a tiny white chick in the center of a giant sea of waving, humongous, impossibly long, black phalluses. And after I slowed the film down, I saw the smoking gun – an abnormal-looking penis in mid-thrust…

Mine doesn’t bend like that, is that sucker made out of polyurethane?

Even the best special effects men and makeup artists in the world can’t make all prosthetic penises look 100% real in porn movies. And in the cases I spotted, after I slowed a few films down, many of the members in question all had the same features—they tapered down in width at the midsection, whereupon, if you looked closely enough, you could clearly see the head of the actual penis, encased within the prosthetic sheath. And from that point on, the prosthetic widened abnormally and continued upward to well, you know… practically to infinity.

In addition, time after time, I spotted bendable erect penises, which would jut off at right or left angles at nearly 90 degrees, while the cowboy in the saddle pounded away with his fake rhythm stick. Now I don’t know about you, but if I bent mine at a 90-degree angle, while banging the crap out of some chick, it would not only hurt like hell and cause serious internal hemorrhaging, severely torn muscles, and massive nerve damage to boot.

Upon closer inspection, all of these cleverly altered, black penises looked like cardboard tubes, the kind you find at the core of a roll of gift-wrapping paper, which had gotten flattened out in the middle and coated with skin-tone-matching paint, and the 90-degree angle of the dodgy dongs was clearly evident when the humping started approaching warp speed…

I emailed some screen-captured images from a few of these films, to a friend of mine who’s an acclaimed artist; he specializes in human portraits. He’s also a world-class photographer and he can spot a phony paste-up photo or an out-of-proportion body part from a mile away.

He emailed me back a couple of days after I’d sent him the screen caps along with my hypothesis, which was that most of the extremely large penises that we see in today's porn movies were phonier than a hypergamous hottie's breasts.

The official analysis by an expert in photography and the human form

"Bob of course most monster penises are fake," he wrote back a bit wearily. "The screen shots you sent me there is no doubt about those. But you can tell that most of these are fake if you know what to look for no matter what precise type of fakery might be in play. Most of them are very long and the width doesn't match the length. They are not proportional.

"Have you ever seen a man's arm that is really long and really slender like those aliens you see in science fiction movies – no. How about a man's leg – no. His neck – no. For the male unit to work right and to support itself for a full-on erection (I was really glad he kept putting these italicized words in for me, to emphasize my own denseness – author's note) it has to be symmetrical. Most of the extremely large penises you see in porn are not symmetrical.

"Sure there are aberrations and there are some very large penises but real penises just don't look like that. I mean if you saw them in a flaccid state and they were really that large they would look like long strands of thick spaghetti and they would hang over halfway down to the guy's knee. A man's penis is at its longest before it gets fully erect, it is longer when semi-erect and stretched. So yes there is no doubt about it most extremely large penises you see in porn movies are just fake prosthetics."

Now, why would the porn moguls want to do things this way. Well, I can think of one main reason – for purposes of psychological warfare.

You've been had… and so has she… and so has he

The uber-rich own everything, porn-production companies included. And we already know they use mainstream Hollywood films to fuck with your head. And if they can get inside your head, and make you feel bad about yourself, while you watch porn movies, they win again. Doesn't matter what the battlefront is, they are in it to win it. They do it all the time in today's SJW Hollywood films. Why not in porn?

If most men believed that their equipment was substandard, well, that would definitely have a negative psychological effect on them and white men in particular, who always seem to come out second-best in today's porn films. And come to think of it, this would mess up the average black man's head, too, because the average black man isn't packing anything close to what the black porn actors appear to be packing.

With the average erect penis measuring in at exactly 13.21 centimeters (5.2 inches), according to what many scientists refer to as the most exacting study ever conducted on the subject (mostly due to the fact that many penis-size studies undertaken over the years, which were considered to be "accurate", were conducted by men who self-reported their own sizes, and, well… enough said about that), this would mean that any guy seven inches in length is still going to feel like Lil' Wally Wiggly Worm in the face of those monster porn penises he sees online, even though at seven inches (17.78 cm), according to the aforementioned study, his equipment puts him in the top 1% of all men on the planet. (Score one for the elitists.)

And what about women? How might this affect the average female?

Well, women are visual creatures, too. If they see it, they start wanting it. And this is especially true if their female friends constantly proclaim their ardent desire for it. And, of course, all women brag about the big penises they've had, to which they undoubtedly add three or four inches while describing the length. I'm suddenly reminded of this stripper I knew a few years ago, whom I rejected several times; she once spat at me, quite venomously, and with vindictive spite, "My boyfriend has a nine-inch dick and it's pierced."

So women go looking for those gigantic porn phalluses out in the real word, because most young females today are raised on Internet porn as well as the Bunyanesque tales regarding massive penis sizes, told to them by their exaggerating girlfriends, and then they can't find them. So they feel like they are not getting the very biggest and the very best that the world has to offer, and consequently, they feel unsatisfied.

They also feel inadequate, after being bombarded with images of the near-perfect assets of female porn stars, celebrities and models. Add it all up and it's a devastating blow to male and female psyches alike…

The super squirter and Santa Claus get together for lunch

So now we come to the myth of the female squirter. Do some women really possess the ability to produce mass-quantities of female ejaculate when they orgasm?

A few years back, an online acquaintance of mine sent me a video that she had taken of herself in the bathtub. She sucked water into her vagina, and power-squirted it out, about eight feet into the air, and all the way across the bathroom. It was stunning. This chick had muscles that were so on point, she could basically mold clay figurines with them, or maybe choke out an anaconda.

Could this be the secret of the super-squirting females, who were becoming so ubiquitous in porn movies? Or could something else, such as forcibly expelled urine, be the secret here? To find the proof, I didn't have to dig very far into my favorite search engine.

Porn star Veronica Avluv, who is known as a super-squirter in the industry, spilled part of the beans during an interview, which you can read right here (scroll down, fourth exchange from the bottom of page), regarding the methodology employed during her mega-squirting scenes.

In the interview, Avluv admits that she "drinks a lot of water." And she also claims that her ejaculatory fluid "comes out of the same hole" (meaning out of her urethra), and is "odorless and colorless". But she insists that it's not urine. (Hold that thought, because we're going to come back to it in a minute.)

Cosmopolitan magazine once did an interview with a porn star named Tara Lynn Fox, in which she claimed that the type of squirting featured in her own porn movies was accomplished by inserting large amounts of water directly into her vagina before the scene. (You can read that Cosmo article in its entirety right here; forcibly expelled urine is also discussed in this article, as a standard means of female squirting.)

So it's starting to look as if there are two major ways that the porn industry fakes its "squirting scenes"…

You're much more likely to find an LTR unicorn than a "real" squirter

In an article found at the website, The Sex MD, which you can read right here, the author claims that the geyser-like liquid expelled during "normal" female squirting (whatever the hell that is), is typically urine-based: "Women who experience squirting are simply learning to release one set of muscles while contracting the bladder so they can release urine." (And this is very similar to the explanation given in a portion of that Cosmo article, if you happened to read the whole thing.)

In addition, porn actor/director Seymore Butts openly discussed in an interview for Men's Health, how women either urinate when shooting the squirting scenes for the films he directs, or their vaginas are filled with water using a turkey baster, of all things.

And now for the kicker: according to Wikipedia, "Female placental mammals use their urethra only for urinating, but male placental mammals use their urethra for both urination and ejaculation. The external urethral sphincter is a striated muscle that allows voluntary control over urination."

So unless porn star Veronica Avluv has some sort of secondary, liquid-blasting pipe that is somehow connected to her urethra in a physiologically mystifying way, it's fair to assume that she might be just a little bit off-base with her somewhat dubious assertions.

The end game: destruction of sexual confidence and satisfaction in men and women alike

As the above evidence clearly points out, women simply do not possess anything within their bodies which would account for the voluminous displays of liquid that are blasted out of vaginas in today's porn movies (other than urine or copious injections of pre-squirt-scene water). So once again, what purpose might all of this serve?

For starters, it adds yet one more item to the huge list of inadequacies perceived about themselves by females. If a woman sees a mega-squirter in a porn movie, and she thinks it's on the level, she feels like she is inadequate, she feels substandard.

Since studies have shown that only about 25% of women can actually orgasm while having sexual intercourse, this makes them feel even less adequate than they already feel.

And on whom, exactly, are they going to take out that frustration? That would be us. That would be men. Psychological warfare.

Likewise, if some unsuspecting male thinks squirting is on the level, it makes him feel like he’s not up to the mark, if he can’t make his women shoot a Super-Soaker blast out of her honey pot, and completely lather the opposite wall, directly across from the bed, at the local Motel 6. (Score another point for the elitists.)

Conclusion

It’s wise to watch those porn movies with a grain of salt, young squires. Hollywood is indeed the land of magic, the land of smoke and mirrors, and it’s just down the street from Porn Central, the San Fernando Valley.

And they both utilize interchangeable parts.

And what you are seeing, in any film that emanates from Tinseltown or its affiliated neighborhoods, is usually not what you are actually getting.

Especially when it comes to porn films.

Read Next: The Psychological Sexual Desensitization Of The Modern Man

Bob Smith
Bob Smith is a man in search of the truth. His favorite quotes are, "We're all fools on this earth, and I can be no different"; "I know it's true, I read it at the LIE-brary"; and "The truth is not misogynistic, it's just the truth".

7 Reasons Why 1969 Was An Awesome Year For America

September 4, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

We often think of the late 1960s as a time of turmoil and strife. In many ways it was. The Cold War was still going on. There were race riots and other forms of civil unrest happening. Cultural changes were being unleashed, leading to just about everything wrong with how things are today. Even so, the snowball had just started rolling; recent events and conditions make the late 1960s seem innocent and charmed in perspective.

I hereby nominate 1969 as the best of those years. It wasn't all bunnies and roses (the Manson murders kind of threw cold water on the decade of peace and love, for one thing) but I'm going to focus on the positive here. Looking back forty seven years later, things were pretty good, all told.

7: Apollo 11

Definitely no green cheese here.

On July 24, the USA won the space race and landed on the moon, a triumph of engineering and a first like no other. Later that year, we did a repeat performance on November 14. After the Apollo missions were cancelled, this feat has never been attempted again thus far. What could have resulted if we had kept up the tempo on space exploration will be a great “might have been” in history.

6: The women were cute and friendly

Normally I don’t AMOG, but sometimes the situation demands it.

The hair was long, and the skirts were short. Figures were trim on average. Altogether, the women of the 1960s had a certain unique charm. Although feminism had metastasized into the Second Wave by then, much of the public hadn’t yet been poisoned by their propaganda memes. They didn't have unrealistic expectations either; they were down to earth. Finally, a dinner date was a quid pro quo, not an interview.

5: We only had one spit-in-your-eye war going on

Always look on the bright side of life.

The Vietnam War was a dragged-out affair. It's one of those things we ask ourselves, "Why did we bother getting lassoed into that in the first place?" Still, things were just beginning to wind down in 1969, a de-escalation process that concluded with the Paris Peace Accords in 1973. After the North Vietnamese pinky-swore with Henry Kissinger to a mutual withdrawal, there was peace. That is, until March 10, 1975 when Hanoi delivered a Shit Test, but all that's another story. As for recent times, the USA ends up getting lassoed into multiple spit-in-your-eye wars simultaneously. Really, one at a time is more than enough.

4: Television was okay

It wasn't quite as bad, way back when

TV isn't exactly the height of culture, but back in the day it was fairly original, not too terribly bad overall. The "Rural Purge" hadn't yet happened, so hits like Green Acres, Hee Haw, Petticoat Junction, and The Beverly Hillbillies were still running. Other than that, I Dream of Jeannie was in its fifth and final season (though by then they censored Barbara Eden's cute navel). Dragnet, Hawaii Five-O, and Bewitched were still putting out new shows. None of that was exactly Shakespeare, but hey… Star Trek TOS finished its final run. I do have some quibbles with their preachy social messages. Still, I've got to hand it to them for doing all they did with a limited special effects budget; they had to be creative. You can enjoy lots of the above cheesy classics today if you have a cable subscription for your idiot box.

3: The economy was pretty good

Twenty five cents in 1969 is equivalent to $1.64 in 2016.

For the most part, 1969 was a good year. However, inflation was nosing up a bit, and the stock market was slowing down. A recession began in December. The worst that happened, which played out in 1970, was a 6.1% unemployment rate at the highest. These were the days before they were dummying up the statistics to make the government look better. It was all over in exactly a year. They sure don't make recessions like they used to! Come to think of it, didn't Obama say he'd fix the economy in his first year in office? It still makes me laugh thinking of all the rubes who believed that one! He also said he'd cut the deficit in half in his first year. Maybe The Lightworker meant to say "double" rather than "half"—oopsie!

2: The music was great

I sure hope the Lord gave you that Mercedes-Benz in heaven. Peace forever, Janis.

The rock and roll of the late 1960s was legendary. For the sake of brevity, I'll hit a few highlights for 1969 at random. The first Woodstock concert was held, of which almost all the performers are well-known to this day. Santana cut their first record. Creedence Clearwater Revival issued three albums. British acts were quite popular with American audiences as well; Pink Floyd was bursting into brilliance, the Beatles were still going strong, it was the middle of the golden age of the Rolling Stones, and Led Zeppelin released their debut album. Country & Western was doing quite well too. As for rap music, the performers either were kids or didn't yet exist, and it would be another fifteen years before their sonic blight began to make America more vibrant.

1: We had a real President

All too often, we don't appreciate what we have until it's too late.

On January 20, Richard Nixon took office, one of the most effective yet underrated Presidents ever. Although history knows him as the guy who got caught, this was back in the good old days when the reporters actually did their jobs and called out Presidents for things like using the IRS to punish their opponents. These days, the media played "see no evil" over the Fast And Furious scandal; Watergate was small potatoes compared to that. With our recent batch of Presidents, Tricky Dick just keeps looking better.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Hillary And Bill Clinton Are Criminal Masterminds Wielding Incredible Power

Beau Albrecht

My father was a high-ranking student radical poobah and still thinks Castro was the bees' knees. Although I'm technically a red diaper baby, I've rejected all that baloney. I write off-the-wall fiction, and Righteous Seduction concerns next-generation game. My blog concerns "deplorable" politics, game, and my writing projects.

How Gymnastics Can Improve Your Total Body Fitness

September 4, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

"Jesus H. Christ, Larsen!" you're probably exclaiming in horror. "Gymnastics? Why don't I just wear a man-corset and sashay myself around the town square while I'm at it?" But before you swear off fitness forever, angrily storm off Return Of Kings, and go hang out with the "migtows," allow me to explain why I am bringing this ancient sport to a website explicitly for masculine men.

I am fully aware that, yeah, gymnastics are kind of fruity-particularly rhythmic gymnastics and floor routines. But since those last two things suck, I will never be showing you them. Instead, this article will be the first of several articles discussing various techniques involving the bars and rings. And while those are still a bit effete, I will ask you to ignore that gut feeling for a moment.

"But why?" It's simple: if you're on a budget, there's no better way to build awe-inspiring strength. Take a look at this front body lever:

The amount of total body strength you need to pull off a maneuver like that is nigh mythical in our age of weakness-indeed, your average Olympic class men's gymnast is quite capable of deadlifting twice his own bodyweight, in addition to having world-class levels of agility and dexterity. Such strength and dexterity is also needed to use the pommel horse or (my favorite) the rings.

Just to make something clear, I am not an Olympic class gymnast—I'm 6 feet tall and I currently weigh 210 pounds. Even when I cut the fat and get to my absolute leanest, I'm still somewhere around 175-180 pounds. Clearly, a career in elite level gymnastics is not in my future. With that being said, I feel that I have been made stronger by my use of gymnastic training (mostly referring to the static positions that represent the fundamentals of the sport), especially since I have unfortunately been laid up these last few months. And there is no reason that you couldn't use these equally as well.

One of the most basic techniques, a fundamental primer in developing the core strength for future endeavors, is that of the L-Sit and it's sister, the V-Sit. I have briefly discussed these in a previous article, but today's article will go over each individual step to attaining these difficult maneuvers.

The L-Sit

Before you start training the L-Sit, you will need parallel bars or something that can approximate the parallel bars: Paralletes are great if you have them (I don't, and I doubt you do either), but two chairs or even one chair with arm rests will suffice.

The first step in the L-Sit series is the knee raise: Securing yourself with your hands on the parallels, lift your legs up and off the ground as seen in this picture of Thomas Inch, who I have referenced previously in these pages.

The second step is the straight diagonal leg hold: Keeping the legs straight and down, lift the buttocks off the chair while also keeping the feet off the floor.

Note: This image was taken from the second convict conditioning book

The third step, the N Hold, is the first step where you are flat on the floor. Sit down on the floor, plant your hands by your hips, and push off them. You can keep your hands flat or your use fists—I find that the flat hands are a little more difficult for the hip flexors, but the fists allow you to get your feet higher and thus work the abs harder. I would recommend doing both.

As is this picture

From here, you can try doing the true L-Sit. If you can’t, try to extend one leg and keep the other bent, and gradually unbend that leg. Once you have achieved that, it is time to try the true L-Sit: Sit down on the floor with your legs fully extended in front of you. Plant your hands down hard by your hips, and push through. Keeping your legs straight, lift them up off the floor.

Yours truly. I couldn’t have you people thinking I was incapable of doing an L-Sit.

You will likely not be able to hold this for very long-just a couple of seconds is acceptable for beginners.

The L-Sit is a technique you’ll likely not see amongst the curlbros in gyms-mastering it will make you stand out in your training establishment. But should you want to advance further, there are options-namely, the V-Sit.

This is me holding a V-Sit while hanging from a bar. While I can hold this for 30 seconds, I admit that I cannot do a V-Sit on the floor. But thanks to the very helpful book Building the Gymnastic Body, I know the intermediate steps:

Once you have mastered the L-Sit, you are likely capable of doing the V-Raise. This is essentially a sit-up where you bring your legs and upper body up simultaneously, making the body look like the letter V.

When you can do that easily, try to hit the V-Sit: Start in the L-Sit, and slowly pull your legs upward until you have hit the V-Sit. I can hit a higher range of motion than the standard L-Sit, but the true V-Sit still eludes me.

Conclusion

With these techniques, you can develop truly functional core and hip flexor strength, and form a good base for both weightlifting and future gymnastic techniques

Read More: How To Work Out The Lower Half Of Your Body Using Isometric Exercises

Larsen Halleck
Larsen Halleck is a licensed personal trainer, martial artist, musician, writer, and (barely) a video reviewer and cartoonist. He blogs about a multitude of subjects at The Barbaric Gentleman, where he offers a free fitness PDF to subscribers. He is also the writer and publisher of The Oriental's Guide to Sex, Strength, and Satisfaction. You can follow him on Twitter, on Gab or on his Youtube channel.

7 Ways Modern Women Treat Men Like Dogs

September 5, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

For all the feminist criticism of men supposedly treating women like dogs, it is actually today's feminism-infected women that are treating men like domesticated animals.

While the majority of women still prefer masculine men for relationships, I've been noticing how more and more women today are defying their biology for ideological reasons and are pursuing long-term relationship with men they're not even attracted to just because they are supplicant and effeminate. If this trend continues unabated, I expect the entire male population to turn into weak and feckless bonobos who grovel around to serve female interests.

Observe the following comparisons to see how men are being turned into dogs for both women and the state:

1. Dogs are optional

Dogs as pets are optional. People get a dog only when they want one; it’s not a necessity. Men today are also increasingly becoming an object of utility for a woman rather than a man whom she forms a bond with for a nuclear family. She will marry a man when she wants to (if at all) and she will dump him when she feels like it.

2. Once attached, dogs offer unconditional loyalty

If you want a picture of what the feminists want from men, just imagine a world where all men are male feminists.

Once dogs have a human to call a master, it doesn’t care whether he is a scumbag, loser, criminal, or homeless. Dogs are faithful no matter who their master is and what he does.

In fact, they're so loyal that they'll even remain with an owner that mistreats them. And that's exactly what feminists want men to be.

If you observe the rhetoric of the feminists, you'll notice two general themes: first, the desire to be free from all criticisms. And second, for men to believe them and "support" them no matter what. Feminists want their prospective low-testosterone boyfriends and husbands to fully accept them for who they are no matter how disgusting, slutty, crass, and toxic they are. They want their men to show unconditional loyalty so that they can openly cheat on them and brag about it. And men, if they don't want to be called a misogynist, must never question their partner's past or present behavior and remain faithful even if they're treated like garbage.

3. Dogs do what they're told

Once the owner has secured his dog's loyalty, he can train it to behave on command. Some owners enjoy the power they have over their companions and they will order their dogs around for fun.

Western women today have discovered that there are truck loads of desperate men who will do just about anything for them to win an ounce of female approval. These women have successfully used men to take them out on expensive dinners (only make fun of them on their blogs afterwards), buy pizza for them for free, shovel snow for them, and so on. The women who order these men around like dogs didn't even have to train them as they've already been conditioned from birth by the society to do what women tells them to do.

4. Dogs are treated for good behavior

Doris says
July 16, 2016 at 1:22 am

(Edit)
Ok so this article is nonsense! Men if you do this you will be single for sure. I'm married and I do not go for selfish behaviour. In fact when my husband tries it, I become selfish as well. I don't do what I do because he acts I'll towards me? In fact I left him over it and he in turn made changes to his attitude! I am not to be dominated over, but rather to be respected. A man with selfish attitude is a turn off for me, ask my ex who wants me back badly! My husband cooks, cleans washes for me. How's that for being Alpha? In fact he gets some crazy sexual desires fulfilled by me when he doesn't act horrible. So take it from me love and respect your woman. Care about her feelings and treat her how you would want to be treated. You'll be surprised how much blowjobs etc. you'll get for doing it!

Dogs need to be treated to reinforce good behavior; the same is true when you want to domesticate men as second-rate citizens.

Women understand just how desperate the general male population is for affection and sex. Women today are leveraging this power over men to make them behave the way they want them to, rewarding these simps with faked compliments so that they'll continue being good boys.

5. Dogs defend their masters

One serves a man, the other serves the government and its harem of women.

Besides companionship, the main roles dogs play is to defend their masters. In spite of all the calls for equality, the reality is that women still expect men to defend and save them. The men suffering from white knight syndrome will go as far as sacrificing their own lives to rescue women they don't even know.

Feminists also don't mind that many men are serving the police and military force to serve their alpha boyfriend: the government. Women are innately attracted to power and the government is the new protector and provider of women that grows bigger and stronger each day while ordinary men are becoming weaker and irrelevant.

6. Dogs are neutered

Although men aren't getting physically neutered the way dogs are, other methods are being employed to psychologically castrate men. This includes the epidemic use of ADHD drugs to tame boys, ridiculous laws aimed at controlling men's sexual interactions with women, and the overall cultural currents to shame masculinity while promoting all sorts of degeneracy that dilute it. Today's wives don't even want to get sexual with their husbands.

7. Dogs that are not domesticated are pests

"Masculine men are organizing a meeting? They must be rapists!"

When a dog is not owned by a human being, it is considered a pest that needs to be controlled.

Men today who do not submit to the feminist agenda are constantly attacked as being losers, sexists, misogynists, rapists, and so on. In today's feminist society, you either serve the female imperative or you're a Neanderthal who is out of touch with the times. Steps are already being made to control every aspect of male behavior in public.

You should also remember that dogs are natural pack animals (think of their cousins, wolves). By being removed from the pack, they become isolated and dependent on their masters. Can you see how the same applies for today's men?

The Differences

In addition to being dogs, men are also expected to serve as drones to keep the feminist nanny-state running.

In spite of all the similarities, there are differences that need to be addressed.

First, unlike dogs whose owners house them and feed them, men are not supported by women. Women are free to throw men away like used tampons or divorce their husbands to extract their cash. If anything, men are usually the ones who must provide for their wives.

Second, whereas dogs are under the responsibility of their owners, men are expected to be fully responsible in all their interactions with women. It is the man's job to ensure that a woman is giving consent even if both parties are drunk; it is men who must watch over their own behavior to ensure that what they say is non-offensive and conforming; and it is men who must ensure that women feel perfectly safe and comfortable in all their interactions. If you so much as walk past a woman in the wrong manner, you'll be accused of rape. Again, it is the man's responsibility to ensure that he is acceptable enough to share the same space as women, not the other way around. Feminists want "equality" without accountability.

Are men becoming collectively domesticated?

The domesticated cows we see on farms didn’t end up the way they are now naturally. It was through thousands of years of herding and selective breeding that they became smaller, more passive, and accepting of their conditions. But the fact is, it doesn’t take thousands of years to transform entire species. In this article which I recommend you read, a Soviet project to domesticate foxes have shown that it only takes several generations of selective breeding to transform wild foxes into effeminate and tamed versions of themselves.

The global testosterone level around the world has been mysteriously dropping for the past few decades. While chemical toxins in all the products we consume and come in contact with has been given as one possible explanation, I wouldn’t be surprised to find out that we as species are gradually becoming emasculated at a genetic level through the selective breeding process. In other words, we are becoming socially engineered to be effeminate. It’s not something impossible when you consider that easily tamable beta males, the sperm donors, are usually the males women select as their mates after they themselves are done riding the cock-carousel. I think it’s a factor we should consider besides the emasculation through cultural degeneracy that we’re already familiar with.

Men are supposed to be men unleashing their primal energy through raw adventure instead of getting tamed into submission. I have no doubt that the systematic domestication efforts of today is what is causing collective male nihilism, depression, and frustrated energy. Men who are awake must allow themselves be men.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Why Women Are Like Cats And Men Are Like Dogs

Corey Savage
Corey is an iconoclast and the author of 'Man's Fight for Existence'. He believes that the key to life is for men to honour their primal nature. Visit his new website at primalexistence.com

Why Donald Trump's Immigration Speech Was A Massive Success

September 5, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Ever since the end of the Republican and Democratic National Conventions last month, the mainstream media has been leading an unprecedented assault on Donald Trump. Rigged polls that oversample Democrats have consistently shown him trailing Hillary Clinton by double digits, and a succession of fake stories have alternately implied that Trump is either planning to quit the presidential race or the GOP is planning to oust him in a party-room coup. At the same time, the media has engaged in an extensive cover-up of Hillary's increasingly obvious health problems, from her coughing and seizures to her reliance on stools and possible use of a catheter.

However, Trump's immigration speech last Wednesday might mark the turning point of the general election. In two televised events—a visit with Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto and a speech in Phoenix later in the day—Trump managed to break through the Great Wall of media bias and speak to the American voter. Trump's immigration speech was a strong recovery for his campaign and will likely signal his victory in November.

The Persuasion Dimension

Writers such as Mike Cernovich and Scott Adams have emphasized that a large part of Trump's success comes from his ability to persuade and influence others. While numerous conservative presidential candidates have tried to win the public over with facts and figures, Trump has sold his nationalist platform through his charisma and charm, using the same strategies that he's utilized in his business career.

In the case of his immigration speech, Trump set the stage perfectly by meeting Peña Nieto earlier in the day. His willingness to speak one-on-one with Mexico's president—the country on whose border he wants to build a wall—defuses the left's narrative of him being a crazy, irrational bigot. In particular, the optics of Trump shaking hands with Peña Nieto, who is both smaller than Trump and was unable to make eye contact with him, made him look presidential. Contrast this with Hillary's increasing unwillingness to make public appearances and her continued refusal to give a press conference.

The speech itself was noteworthy for Trump's use of rhetorical techniques to drive home the threat illegal immigration poses to Americans. The centerpiece was the Donald introducing the "Angel Moms," mothers whose children have been murdered by illegal aliens. While many people might have a hard time processing statistics about the ruin that illegal aliens bring to America, the image of mothers grieving their dead children is one that hits almost everyone in the gut:

Leftists were unusually triggered by Trump's speech, singling out the Angel Moms for particular derision:

> This was Trump's most hateful speech. As a US Jew, I'm shaking not just from anger for the state of our nation, but from legitimate fear.
>
> — David Harris-Gershon (@David_EHG) September 1, 2016

> As an immigrant, I'm absolutely horrified and shaking right now.
>
> — igorvolsky (@igorvolsky) September 1, 2016

> I can't believe the number of seemingly honest journalists calling this a "POPULIST ALT-RIGHT" speech. It's racism. It's fascism. ENOUGH.
>
> — Elliott Lusztig (@ezlusztig) September 1, 2016

> I can't watch anymore. I'm shaking.
>
> — Armando (@armandodkos) September 1, 2016

It's worth noting that even with the polls slanted towards Democrats as they are, Trump's numbers have improved considerably. FiveThirtyEight, beloved by the left for its supposedly "accurate" political forecasting model, now gives Trump a 28.5 percent chance of winning the election, a massive increase from August. Some pollsters have also begun publicly acknowledging that Trump supporters are massively undersampled in polls, due to the fact that many of his supporters did not vote in the 2012 election.

Sick Hillary, Dangerous Donald

While Trump is busy retuning his image and hitting the campaign trail, Hillary Clinton has all but vanished from the national stage, making only a handful of appearances in comparison. Her speech attacking the alt-right was roundly mocked for its toothlessness and wild conspiracy theorizing, and most recently, she shockingly announced that she would go to war against Russia in retaliation for supposed cyberattacks on the DNC (there is zero evidence linking Wikileaks' DNC leaks to Russia).

There's also continuing discontent within the Democrats themselves. Party insiders are angered by Hillary's outreach to moderate Republicans and cuckservatives, because her overtures are making it more difficult for the party to win down-ballot races. There's a growing view inside the party that Hillary is throwing the rest of the Democrats under the bus for the sake of her own election.

While many things could change between now and November, Trump's continued successes and Hillary's missteps suggest an easy win for him. The media and pollsters can be expected to prop up Hillary, but reality is breaking through their shroud.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Why Donald Trump's Veterans' Rally In Des Moines Was A Resounding Success

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Why Measuring “Demand” Isn’t Paramount When Planning To Start Your Own Business

September 5, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I was talking to a friend the other day about business. We covered a lot of different subjects, but the conversation mostly revolved around how people start businesses. I thought it might be useful to offer a few of my thoughts on this subject.

“Demand” For Products Or Services

It has been said that a person looking to start a business should make sure that there is a “demand” for the good or service that he wants to sell. And I would certainly agree with this statement. Who would not agree? The purpose of a business is to generate revenue. No one is going to pay for something that is not needed.

Try, for example, to sell snowblowers in Miami. I doubt you would find many takers. Why? Because there is no demand for snow removal services in Miami, Florida. I think you get my point.

All right then, fine. We can agree that “demand” is a necessary prerequisite for a business to succeed.

But when you think about this a little bit more, you realize that this doesn’t help us as much as you might think. Demand is something that’s easy to talk about, but there are a lot of nuances to using it in practice. This is really the question: How do you identify where the demand is? And what if the “demand” is in a work field or area that you hate?

People don’t really start businesses based on a mechanical, robotic identification of “demand.” Very few (if any) people get in their cars and drive around a city looking for an unmet “demand” that he might be able to meet with a potential new business. No one says, “Gee, I was driving around today and noticed a lot of unpainted houses. I think I’ll start a house-painting business.”

Maybe there are people who make big life decisions purely on a perceived supply-and-demand equation. But those are very few people indeed. I can say this because not only have I started a business, but I’ve dealt with many, many hundreds of business owners. Not a single one of them ever said that they made the life-changing decision of starting a business based on coldly investigating “supply and demand.” It’s not how the real world works.

Want to know the truth? The majority of people who start businesses do it in one of these ways:

1. They inherit it. You’d be surprised how often this happens. Of course, the people who have done this very rarely admit that they were born into it or had it handed to them.
2. They have worked in some field, and after learning their trade, they then decide to go out on their own. This is perhaps the most common way people get into their own business. The advantage of doing things this way is that you get a chance to learn the field, learn what works, and how to go about doing things. In business, the learning curve costs money, and the more efficiently you can do things, the better.
3. They stumble into it. A person might simply enjoy doing something. He keeps doing it. He attracts the attention of a wider and wider audience. Suddenly he realizes that there are a lot of people who want the same thing. He realizes that he can generate income by offering his product or service to a larger audience.

I don't want this to sound like I'm minimizing "demand." There are, of course, some people who actually do make decisions based on demand. I remember one nurse I dealt with who had an ingenious moment of inspiration and used it to launch a new business. She told me she had worked in the health care field for many years, dealing with all sorts of issues. She said that she noticed that no one had ever thought of creating a truly mobile blood-testing lab that could would meet the needs of doctors and paramedics. So based on her experience in the field, she designed such a mobile lab. And it was a great success.

But even here, she would never have made such a decision unless she had been working in a field she loved in the first place. To identify demand, you have to know your field. Stated another way: you won't be able to identify demand unless you know what to look for.

This brings me to my second point, which is:

You Need To Work At Something You Love

If you aren't working in a field you like, you're going to be hating life. You'll miss opportunities to identify demand. You'll be miserable all the time. You spirit will sag, and your frame of mind will be negative.

This is why it's important to point out that you can't make big life decisions (like starting a business) on purely mechanical grounds. A business takes a maximum effort over many years. If you're doing something you hate, you'll never be successful. So you need to be picking something that you like doing. Making a decision based purely on "Oh, I see a demand for XYZ" is setting yourself up for failure.

People rarely make big life decisions based on looking at numbers and abstractions. And when they do, it is because they already know a lot about the field or the subject matter. They already have a "feel for the street." And they usually got this "feel" by working in the field for someone else for a while.

No one just goes off and leaps into some profession with no experience based on some charts and tables about "demand" that he found on the internet.

You have to like the subject matter. And this is why it's not bullshit when people say: follow your passion. Starting a business is in many ways a leap of faith. You will be working your ass off. So you'd better be doing something you have at least some interest in.

Another corollary to this is that you'll never be able to spot "demand" if you are in a field you hate. You'll miss all those little nuances, those little "tells" that make bring a good idea to fruition.

Don't take this too far, of course. I'm not saying that you should just blindly follow some dead-end passion and hope for the best. No. I'm not saying that. But what I am saying is that you need to have some strong interest in some area in order to be successful.

You Can Create Your Own Demand

And here's another point that people often miss in discussions about "demand" for a business. They obsess and obsess over demand, without realizing that they can actually create their own demand. There are some practical limits on this concept, of course, but the point is to remember that your energy and action can drive events. You are not a passive observer: you are an active creator of reality.

Even if you know an area well, you can never be entirely certain that your idea will succeed. Chances are, someone has already thought of it.

But that should not concern you. You can create your own demand. If you are doing something well, and are entering a crowded field, you can still be successful. And this is the thing that few people really understand about "demand." Demand is not an absolute, static concept. It is very, very fluid.

If you are doing something well, or doing something in a way that has not been done before, you can create your own demand. People often don't really know what they want until you show it to them. I think Steve Jobs said this, or something close to it. And I think this is true in many situations.

So those are few of my thoughts about "demand" when it comes to business. It's a lot more complicated than people think. Don't be demoralized or feel discouraged if you find it difficult to know if there will be a demand for your proposed business. No one can really tell you.

My point here was to point out some nuances to the idea of demand in business. Starting a business is a mix of rational, cold calculation with visionary, inspirational energy. You need both.

As I said, there is an element of faith involved in starting and running a business. Do your due diligence, of course. Make your preparations. Arrange your plans. But at some point, you've just got to do it and see what happens.

Read More: Did Ellen Pao File A Baseless Lawsuit To Hide Her Own Job Performance?

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

An Introduction To The Old Testament

September 5, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I started to read the Bible to see if it could offer me answers beyond the “logical” explanations I already hold. I went into this endeavor with an open mind, ready to change my belief system if it was sufficiently challenged.

The Bible contains two books: the Old Testament and the New Testament. The Old Testament is a book for Jews that includes Genesis and the stories of Moses and King David, among others. It sets the stage for the New Testament and the arrival of Jesus, a Jew who came from David’s ancestral line. I started reading the King James Version before moving to the New Living Translation, which uses modern language to make reading easier (I’ll quote from both versions). This article only covers the Old Testament.

The Old Testament (OT) primarily contains rules for Jews, many of which are followed by Christians, such as the Ten Commandments (Jews also get many of their rules from the Talmud and other texts). If there’s a rule in the OT that Christians don’t have to follow, it was “fulfilled” by Jesus and his ultimate sacrifice. The larger rules such as not killing or bearing false witness apply to both religions, which is where a term like “Judeo-Christian morals” come from.

What I quickly realized is that the legitimacy of Jesus depends on the accuracy and truthfulness of the OT. If the OT is false then Jesus did not come from the line of David and any prophecy he fulfilled is also false. This means that you must believe in the story of the OT to also believe in Jesus being the son of God.

Christians have a special place in their hearts for Jews, because Jesus was a Jew and they accept that God originally chose them as His people, but if the OT is not real then the New Testament (NT) is at least partly a work of fiction.

A woman ruined paradise on Earth

Count on a woman to not be happy with living in literal paradise. The first woman, Eve, is seduced by a serpent creature to eat from a tree she was explicitly told not to touch.

> And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat. (Genesis 3:6)
>
> And the LORD God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. (Genesis 3:13)

Her husband, Adam, failed in his masculine duties to prevent his wife from eating the forbidden fruit, and also for being manipulated by her into eating it as well. For this "original sin," Adam and Eve, along with the rest of humanity, were no longer allowed to live in paradise and were destined to experience pain, sin, misery, suffering, and death.

Even since Biblical times, men knew what would happen if women were not prevented from doing what they wanted. One of the most important stories of the Bible was intended to control the amount of free will that they now have.

The first false rape accusation

The Bible has the first written record of a false rape accusation. It was levied against Joseph by the wife of Egyptian military leader Potiphar. The reason? He refused to sleep with her.

> And it came to pass about this time, that Joseph went into the house to do his business; and there was none of the men of the house there within. And she caught him by his garment, saying, Lie with me: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out. And it came to pass, when she saw that he had left his garment in her hand, and was fled forth, That she called unto the men of her house, and spake unto them, saying, See, he hath brought in an Hebrew unto us to mock us; he came in unto me to lie with me, and I cried with a loud voice: And it came to pass, when he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out. (Genesis 39:11-14)

He was put into prison to rot, and would have died there unless he was able to successfully interpret one of the Pharaoh's dreams. Modern men, unfortunately, do not have this get-out-of-jail-free card.

Not bearing false witness is a recurring rule in the Bible. The punishment for the liar should be the same that their victim would have suffered had he been found guilty.

> Thou shalt not raise a false report: put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness. (Exodus 21:1)
>
> If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong then both the men, between whom the controversy is, shall stand before the LORD, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days. And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false > witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother, then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you. (Deuteronomy 19:16-19)

Morals and law

The morals laid out in the Bible were straight-forward. Things that we now believe as “common sense” are based on Jewish morality principles, which amount to taking responsibility for your actions and those under your control, such as your farm animals. If you or they cause harm to others, you must rectify the problem or be punished in an equal manner.

> Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot. Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe. (Exodus 21:24-25)
>
> Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses: but one witness shall not testify against any person to cause him to die. (Numbers 35:30)

The OT was not at all lenient about sparing punishment. Christianity greatly softened this approach with Jesus instructing his followers to love their enemies.

God is usually angry

The OT God is a furious god. He is always ready to enact death and destruction on those who stand against the Jews. More commonly, however, his fury is directed at the Jews themselves when they stray from Him and worship other gods or idols.

Overall, God makes hundreds of threats in the OT, including against women and children, and performed some actions that today could be called genocide. If you stand against him and his plans, you will not escape his wrath.

> Then the LORD said, “I have seen how stubborn and rebellious these people are. Now leave me alone so my fierce anger can blaze against them, and I will destroy them.” (Exodus 32:9-10)

If you somehow manage to escape punishment from God, he will punish your children and grandchildren:

> But I do not excuse the guilty. I lay the sins of the parents upon their children and grandchildren. (Exodus 34:7)
>
> I lay the sins of the parents upon their children; the entire family is affected—even children in the third and fourth generations of those who reject me. But I lavish unfailing love for a thousand generations on those who love me and obey my commands. (Deuteronomy 5:9-10)
>
> Kill this man’s children! Let them die because of their father’s sins! They must not rise and conquer the earth, filling the world with their cities.” (Isaiah 14:21)

If you follow God, he will grant you victory over your enemies:

> The LORD your God will drive those nations out ahead of you little by little. You will not clear them away all at once, otherwise the wild animals would multiply > too quickly for you. But the LORD your God will hand them over to you. He will throw them into complete confusion until they are destroyed. He will put their kings in your power, and you will erase their names from the face of the earth. No one will be able to stand against you, and you will destroy them all. (Deuteronomy 7:22-24)

If God decides to destroy you, chances are he will do so by empowering your enemies:

> And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the LORD: and the LORD strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against Israel, because they had done evil in the sight of the LORD. (Judges 3:12)

There is no afterlife in the OT. If you stand against God, you will be punished in this life, but it's quite common for bad people to prosper for extended periods. This fact is referenced several times in the Bible by the faithful but downtrodden. How could people have faith in God when they follow His rules yet are worse off than pagan worshipers?

Christianity solved that problem by describing an afterlife where you can be rewarded with entry by following Jesus. Your neighbor sins continually and happens to be rich and healthy, but rest assured that he will be punished after he dies with eternal damnation.

The afterlife/hell reward-punishment system would be effective at allowing the poor to accept their lot and not rebel against their richer neighbors or rulers. Similar themes of acceptance are found in the OT:

> It is better to be godly and have little than to be evil and rich. For the strength of the wicked will be shattered, but the LORD takes care of the godly. (Psalm 37:16-17)
>
> Better to be patient than powerful; better to have self-control than to conquer a city. (Proverbs 16:32)

Whether deliberately or not, the Bible push faith in God as a way to accept your disadvantaged lot. I imagine that the poorer you were, the more you looked to faith to explain how your hard life was a preliminary stage before being graced with God's goodness.

There is little in the Bible about taking the initiative to start a revolution, overthrow your corrupt rulers, and take their wealth. You're supposed to wait for God to take care of evil-doers instead of addressing the problem yourself.

God has a hard time getting the Jews to follow Him

Not long after God freed the Jews from bondage in Egypt, they went against Him and worshiped a golden calf. In moments of fatigue from traveling through the wilderness on the way to Israel, they even begged Moses to return back to slavery in Egypt. The OT has countless examples of the Jews behaving badly and God having to enact vengeance upon them, in spite of all the miracles He performed for them through His prophets.

> Ye have been rebellious against the LORD from the day that I knew you. (Deuteronomy 9:24)

God comes across as a parent who has trouble establishing authority over his petulant children. His threats are clear and numerous:

> If you ever forget the LORD your God and follow other gods, worshiping and bowing down to them, you will certainly be destroyed. Just as the LORD has destroyed other nations in your path, you also will be destroyed if you refuse to obey the LORD your God. (Deuteronomy 8:19-20)
>
> Just as the LORD has found great pleasure in causing you to prosper and multiply, the LORD will find pleasure in destroying you. You will be torn from the land you are about to enter and occupy. (Deuteronomy 28:63)
>
> Israel is a foolish and stupid nation, for its people have turned away from God. Therefore, the one who made them will show them no pity or mercy. (Isaiah 27:11)

He has moments where He tries to understand why the Jews don't listen after all that He's done for them:

> And the LORD said to Moses, "How long will these people treat me with contempt? Will they never believe me, even after all the miraculous signs I have > done among them? I will disown them and destroy them with a plague. Then I will make you into a nation greater and mightier than they are!" (Numbers 14:11)

>
> "How can I pardon you? For even your children have turned from me. They have sworn by gods that are not gods at all! I fed my people until they were full. But they thanked me by committing adultery and lining up at the brothels. They are well-fed, lusty stallions, each neighing for his neighbor's wife. Should I not punish them for this?" says the LORD. Should I not avenge myself against such a nation?" (Jeremiah 5:7-9)

At other points, it seems that God throws up His hands in utter despair:

> "Did I not rescue you from the Egyptians, the Amorites, the Ammonites, the Philistines, the Sidonians, the Amalekites, and the Maonites? When they oppressed you, you cried out to me for help, and I rescued you. Yet you have abandoned me and served other gods. So I will not rescue you anymore. Go and cry out to the gods you have chosen! Let them rescue you in your hour of distress!" (Judges 10:11-14)
>
> "O my people, what have I done to you? What have I done to make you tired of me? Answer me!" (Micah 6:3)

The problem may lie in the fact that God moves too slowly. Jews know that if they disobey Him, they can "get away" with the sin and possibly escape punishment, possibly for the duration of their lives. Maybe their children or grandchildren will be punished instead, but God's punishment won't be swift or even guaranteed.

In addition, God's punishments aren't obvious. Is the bad you're experiencing in life due to just a random event or from God's hands? There is no way to link your actions in this life with that of a Godly punishment or reward. This is why the Jews would worship a fertility God like Baal, who would give them more immediate benefits.

At the end of the Bible, in the Book Of Zephaniah, we complete a full circle and arrive right at the beginning, with the Jews failing to listen to God.

> "I have wiped out many nations, devastating their fortress walls and towers. Their streets are now deserted; their cities lie in silent ruin. There are no survivors—none at all. I thought, 'Surely they will have reverence for me now! Surely they will listen to my warnings. Then I won't need to strike again, destroying their homes.' But no, they get up early to continue their evil deeds. Therefore, be patient," says the LORD. "Soon I will stand and accuse these evil nations. For I have decided to gather the kingdoms of the earth and pour out my fiercest anger and fury on them. All the earth will be devoured by the fire of my jealousy." (Zephaniah 3:6-8)

The end of the Bible suggests that God failed to achieve any sort of change upon His people.

Did God want the Jews to be Central Bankers?

The part that raised my eyebrows, and made me question the OT in its entirety was when God granted Jews the ability to lend money at interest to non-Jews, but not to Jews.

> Do not charge interest on the loans you make to a fellow Israelite, whether you loan money, or food, or anything else. You may charge interest to foreigners, but you may not charge interest to Israelites, so that the LORD your God may bless you in everything you do in the land you are about to enter and occupy. (Deuteronomy 23:19-20)

In effect, God wanted Jews to be merchants with the end goal of enslaving the world with centralized banking and finance as perfected by the Jewish families like the Rothschilds and Warburgs. This is such a specific exemption that it’s hard not to suspect that it was inserted there by man and not God.

What to think about all the miracles?

The OT had a lot of miracles. Some prophets sent by God performed substantially more miracles than others. The first question you wonder is why don't we see miracles today? A possible answer is that we simply rationalize positive events as "good luck" when in the past they would just attribute it to God's hands. Then again, people today aren't exactly being raised from the dead like they were in the OT.

Conclusion

The OT is long but the storyline is basic:

- God has rules that he wants Jews to follow
- If Jews obey God, they are rewarded
- If Jews disobey God, they or their descendants are punished

This repeats hundreds of time throughout the OT, sometimes in a chronological history and sometimes in a sort of time vacuum, with constant reinforcement of the lesson that you must obey everything God wants in order to escape His punishment.

I started reading the OT with openness, but it turned to skepticism early on. The logical part of me couldn't fully accept what appears to be a compilation of writings meant to direct or control a small group of people from stepping out of line and questioning their human rulers (kings and priests). I never felt that I was reading anything but the words of mortal man, though I do agree with the general wisdom and morality that the OT provides, along with its take on human behavior.

If you've spent your whole life guided by the scientific method, it's hard to completely accept at face value the stories that the Bible provides. I moved on to the New Testament less eager that when I started reading the Old.

Read More: “Holy Bible: New Living Translation” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Reasons Visible Tattoos Will Negatively Impact Your Life

September 6, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Tattoos do not “rock.” Tattoos do not make you “edgy” or “cool.” Tattoos are not a cornerstone to being a successful musician or sports star. In fact, for Mr. Average Joe and Ms. Average Jane (about 99.9% of the population), tattoos are only going to be a handicap on your life prospects, rather than an augmentation.

You need look no further than all the degenerate feminists, SJW’s, gang bangers, extreme metal heads, or other bone-headed leftists to come to the realization that their must be something in how they present themselves as to why they are constantly J.O.B. (just over broke) and not exactly killing it in life.

It has a lot to do with tattoos my friend, and the cuckoo mentalities of all the people who would purposefully go out of their way to pay money for something which has a negative return on investment.

This article will explore five major ways in how paying a visit to your local tattoo parlor is going to set yourself up for nothing but a world of hurt in life. Don’t say you weren’t warned.

1. Lowered Employment Prospects

How many six-figure business executives or high technology workers do you know who are covered in tattoos? Not many (if any). Now how many minimum wage underachievers have you witnessed slinging sugar shakes at your local Starbucks who are teeming with tats? Probably a fair few, and they should consider themselves lucky to even have that job.

Tattoos are extremely detrimental to your employment prospects, especially for any kind of decent paying white-collar or customer facing work. You act as the "face" of the company you are employed with, and most major corporations will avoid blue-haired or tattooed freaks (like the lady above) like the plague.

Ask yourself, would you want to do business with a real estate agent, a stockbroker, or a financial advisor who looked like that lady? Especially when there were plenty of other clean-cut and professional looking options you could choose from? That's what you'll be up against in the working world.

So unless you're 100% certain you will be a successful entrepreneur or play in a popular musical act like Blink-182, your Travis Barker body is going to seriously impede your money-making potential in life. Think of your income, and say no to the ink.

(0:28 – 0:56)

> "Have tattoos in the workplace lost their taboo? As it happens, no. Tattoos still signal rebelliousness. An asset for rock stars, but not for customer service employees. Visible tattoos make employers nervous. A survey from Career Builder, a recruitment and job site, found that 31% of employers say that visible tattoos is the top personal attribute that will make them less likely to promote a candidate."

2. Increased Public Perception Of Criminality

Don’t worry, I’m sure he won’t steal anything…

If you want to distance yourself from any perceived involvement in the criminal justice system in most western countries, avoiding any kind of tattooing is an excellent way to go about it. Hell, you don’t even have to do anything!

The close association with tattoos and jailed convicts is VERY REAL. The percentage of prisoners who have a minimum of one tattoo (but often many more) is substantially higher than the general population in any country, and tattoos are empirically associated with deviance, personality disorders, and criminality.

Want to present yourself to the world that you are an approachable, respectable, employable, and criminally unsuspicious looking character? Don’t get tattoos.

Want to purposefully degrade yourself and be given “the look” as you browse through stores and shops by concerned proprietors thinking you are just the type of guy to resort to shoplifting? Go get inked up like the guy above.

Loading…

3. Increased Friction With Your Girlfriend’s Father

Simon Says “NO” to your tattooed carcass going out with his daughter

Time to face facts. NO self-respecting father, even if he was a bit of a bad boy himself in his younger years, wants his daughter to be having sexual relations with an inked up human canvas. If your arms, legs, torso, or neck has exposed tattoos, you are setting yourself up for resounding disapproval from your lady friend’s father right from the start.

Every good-natured and self-respecting dad simply “didn’t raise his daughter to be this way,” and your mere presence will metaphorically cast off a giant stink on his fathering skills. It will be very difficult to ever truly get on his good side after laying eyes on your needle work.

Now of course, hardly anybody truly gets on great with their girlfriends dad or their father-in-law to begin with (they are first and foremost an obstacle), but why make these interpersonal relationships any worse than what they have to be? Get covered in job-killing and biker gang tattoos, and watch the inter-family friction quickly turn sour.

4. Social Ostracism In Asia

While tattoos have “achieved” a relatively modest degree of social acceptance in the 21st century West, our Eastern neighbors continue to routinely look upon the bearer of exposed tattoos as low-rent, deviant, and often criminal.

Eastern societies highly value all forms of respect, including self-respect, and you are setting yourself up for a slew of negative looks and behind-the-back talk in many Asian countries after the locals gaze upon your tattooed frame.

Visible tattoos may also be an automatic barrier to many employment opportunities in Asian countries. At the very least, exposed ink is going to hurt your chances of landing more prestigious jobs in the region, and especially if you are in direct competition with other westerners who are a lot more clean-cut.

Want to be a pariah in Asia? Go throw down some cash and ink yourself up mate.

5. Lowered SMV (Sexual Market Value)

So much potential… destroyed by their own hand…

This applies to both men and women, but this is especially detrimental to females. While tattooed men can ensnare a sizable percentage of Western sluts who have a penchant for body art (or if they are wealthy and famous), heavily tattooed women are routinely avoided by men of status, wealth, power, and prestige.

Such men will almost always prefer the romantic company of a woman in full possession of her natural skin, particularly if they have a vast array of options. So ladies, want to metaphorically shoot yourself in the foot and make yourself far less appealing and sexy in the eyes of quality men? Be like the women above.

Conclusion

Here at Return Of Kings, the vast majority of readers and contributors tend to have a strongly negative perception on tattoos, and for very good reason. Their normalization in western society has greatly contributed to cultural decline and social degeneracy. Furthermore, they uglify once attractive bodies (especially for females), and they convey a lack of self-respect for one's own natural being.

After taking in the previous five points in this article, along with other relevant anti-tattoo knowledge, you'd have to be a special kind of stupid to actually consider getting one if you haven't already. Be smart. Respect your being, respect your wallet, and say no to cultural degeneracy. Say NO to tattoos.

Read More: Science Confirms Tattooed Women Are Indeed Broken

John Carver
John Carver is a four year ROK veteran with over fifty articles of SJW-triggering truth bombs on archive. You can follow him on Twitter if you are so inclined.

The Ugly Truth Of Leftist “Heroes”

September 6, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Leftist politics is basically a religion these days, including a litany of saints. Many had cults of personality, some ongoing. Criticizing them gets the same reaction as telling a fundamentalist that a Biblical prophet was a nut.

Many have been greatly over-hyped, their flaws often overlooked. As usual with the leftist worldview, fair is foul and foul is fair. You’ve heard of the accomplishments of these plastic idols ad infinitum, but now we’ll cover the truth your professors and the mainstream media neglected to mention. Standard disclaimer: not all the people I compare them to were spotless either. Now let’s barbecue some sacred cows in approximate chronological order.

Jean-Paul Marat

One less demagogue, a positive population adjustment

Famous for: Martyr of the French Revolution

The reality: He's not so famous today, but people were sure crazy about him earlier. He began as a doctor with an interest in optics. He became a demagogue who fanned the flames of the French Revolution. He published a radical paper called The Friend of the People (L'Ami du Peuple), where he regularly incited violence, for example:

> Why haven't you renounced your vain babbling and followed the advice of your friend, armed yourself with rope, with daggers, and ended the days of those of your defeated enemies who would have the audacity to rise up again.

When heads started rolling, Charlotte Corday whacked him to stop the demagoguery. She explained, "I killed one man to save a hundred thousand." After that, his cult of personality ascended into orbit. During the goofiest days of the French Revolution, his image replaced crucifixes in the churches of Paris. Two years later, though, everyone got sick of it and decided he was a nut.

Dirty laundry: Acquired a very smelly chronic skin infection while hiding in the sewers.

Superior meanie right-winger: Napoleon Bonaparte, who quickly turned this mess around and brought forth France's finest hour

Superior leftist: Voltaire

Karl Marx

Would you trust this man to be an expert on economics?

Famous for: Founder of Communism

The reality: He was basically a bum, mooching off his pal Engels, and a frequent flyer at the pawn shop. Four of his children died of starvation because he wouldn't man up and support his family. (Still, his followers were far more effective at starving people.) Apparently plotting global revolution from a London pub was more fun than working. This isn't exactly the best qualification for economics expertise. Disasters followed wherever Marxist policies were applied. Groucho was a better theoretician.

Dirty laundry: Probably knocked up Helene Demuth, his unpaid servant, though his long-suffering buddy Engels took the fall

Superior meanie right-winger: Joseph de Maistre, a theoretician with far more substance and clear thought

Superior leftist: Jeremy Bentham

Mohandas "Mahatma" Gandhi

With His Feet In The Clouds

Not too bad, but massively overrated

Famous for: India's independence from the British Empire

The reality: He's the best one listed. Still, all the hype is pretty cloying. In the 1982 biographical movie, he practically walked on water. (Have any Bollywood movies deified George Washington?) He did live by his principles, including nonviolence. The problem is that only works with opponents who won't take the opportunity to stomp on you. Always being peaceful is as problematic as always being warlike.

After India seceded from the British Empire, Pakistan and Bangladesh soon seceded from India. That sparked massive rioting, claiming perhaps as many as two million lives. His response was to go on a hunger strike. Rioters must be dealt with harshly before things really spiral out of control, a lesson quite relevant today.

Dirty laundry: Drank his urine, slept with girls to test his chastity (including his grand-niece)

Superior meanie right-winger: Ian Smith, whose only faults were trusting the British government to stand by Rhodesia and listening to Henry Kissinger

Superior leftist: Mustafa Kemal Atatürk

Vladimir Ilyich Lenin

Marx sucked, but Lenin swallowed

Famous for: Dictator of the Soviet Union

