The reality: Although the Communists presented him as a grandfatherly figure, an image still surviving today, he began the Soviet Union's descent into massive political violence. "You can't make an omelet without breaking a few eggs," as he put it. He wasn't nearly as bad as his successor, though if he'd lived longer he might well have been. His efforts at implementing goofy Marxist economics led to massive starvation.

Dirty laundry: Died of neurological syphilis complications

Superior meanie right-winger: Benito Mussolini, who among world leaders has a ridiculously high ratio of bad reputation to bad things he actually did

Superior leftist: Nikita Khrushchev

Mao Zedong

ROFL-MAO

Famous for: Dictator of the People's Republic of China, ripping off Hillary's wardrobe

The reality: Chairman Mao was a decent military leader, well-schooled in the Asian style of warfare, but he sucked as the leader of China. His first catastrophe was the Great Leap Forward. That involved starting iron foundries in farming villages, without giving them the proper training or equipment. As for actually growing the crops, he had some goofy agricultural notions that were supposed to quadruple output but failed miserably.

If he'd started small-scale experiments and not relied on ass-kissers telling him everything was going great, tens of millions of lives could've been spared. He got sidelined after this, but resumed power by stirring up the Cultural Revolution. Part of that involved orchestrating a factional dispute leading to great bloodshed.

Dirty laundry: Slept with hundreds of groupies and didn't get his venereal diseases treated. His popularity is surprising, since he had terrible hygiene. Other than that, his fourth wife was a vicious bunny boiler.

Superior meanie right-winger: Francisco Franco, who ended the Red Terror in Spain, and took baths

Superior leftist: Deng Xiaoping

Ernesto "Che" Guevara

Communism killed tens of millions, but at least we got a kewl T-shirt out of it

Famous for: His image on T-shirts and posters

The reality: Although his iconic picture is widespread, especially on college campuses, most people have no idea what he did. He helped Castro take over Cuba, and fought for Communism in the Congo and Bolivia. While in Cuba, he lived in a palatial house and gleefully executed hundreds or perhaps thousands of political prisoners.

Dirty laundry: Textbook sociopath, beginning with torturing animals as a child

Superior meanie right-winger: Otto Skorzeny, who radiated panache and led many daring commando raids

Superior leftist: Ho Chi Minh

Dr. Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Famous for: Civil rights martyr

The reality: MLK wasn't nationally known until Time put him on the cover of their magazine. (Thanks, mainstream media!) It's odd that his name is still prefixed with Dr., since he plagiarized much of his doctoral dissertation. As for the Reverend part, that too seems odd since his personal life made Bill Clinton seem like a monk. He partied with booze and hookers on the SCLC's dime. Sometimes he'd beat them—a "moral giant" indeed!

Dirty laundry: Recorded on surveillance tape saying "I'm fucking for God!" and "I'm not a Negro tonight!" while with three White prostitutes

Superior meanie right-winger: Father Coughlin, a fellow demagogue who had a squeaky clean personal life

Superior leftist: Jesse Jackson

Nelson Mandela

Winnie, Nelson, and their buddy Joe Slovo

Famous for: ANC leader, President of South Africa

The reality: Most people assume this grandfatherly teddy bear was a political prisoner; jailed only for protesting apartheid. Instead, he was a terrorist jailed for a bomb plot, yet he's been bestowed a ridiculous number of honors including the Nobel Peace Prize and the Lenin Peace Prize. Despite pleading guilty to 156 charges, the government later offered to free him if he renounced violence, but this "man of peace" refused.

Other than that, he was a closet Communist. After he assumed power, he fumbled the ball on the AIDS issue, leaving South Africa with one of the world's worst infection rates. Also, beginning with his administration, the New, Improved South Africa went from being an industrialized country to a crime-ridden Third World hellhole.

Dirty laundry: His wife, Winnie Mandela, was bestowed the Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights Award, yet endorsed "necklacing". This involved using a gasoline-filled tire to burn people to death for disagreeing with their politics. As she put it, "With our boxes of matches and our necklaces we shall liberate this country." Further, she was complicit to kidnapping. One of the victims—fourteen year old James "Stompei" Moeketsi—was hacked to death, but she got off with a fine on appeal.

Superior meanie right-winger: Augusto Pinochet, who saved Chile from ruin

Superior leftist: Ted Kaczynski

Barack Hussein Obama, Jr.

How objective the press is! Doesn't this just warm your heart?

Famous for: President of the United States, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize for not being George W. Bush

The reality: Huge chunks of the life of this tremendously overrated "community organizer" are shrouded in mystery, all the way back to his birth. Thus, all those low-information voters had little idea who they were electing. He has many interesting associates, such as Jeremiah Wright, Bill Ayers, Emperor Palpatine George Soros, and his buddies at ACORN.

While a junior Senator with an unremarkable legislative record, he entered the 2008 Presidential race and got sold by the media as a messiah figure. He broke a whopping number of campaign promises about what he'd do in his first year: heal the economy, halve the deficit, withdraw from Iraq and Afghanistan, close Camp X-ray, etc. He continued many of Bush the Younger's policies, but got praised for doing the same things that got the Shrub condemnation.

His major legislative triumph was a socialized medicine scheme which caused healthcare prices to skyrocket, even though all those politicians swore up and down that wouldn't happen. Nearing the end of his term, Wall Street is peachy again, but the economy still sucks for the real people.

Dirty laundry: Used to sell dope, which he's surprisingly honest about, but it's still not a great qualification for the Presidency

nobody deified him

Superior leftist: Jimmy Carter

How To Enjoy The Benefits Of Kratom While It’s Still Legal

September 6, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Island Lion Herbals

At this point, Kratom has become the butt of jokes in the comments section here at ROK. I can’t lie, some of them are pretty funny. Much ink has been spilled here on ROK, by me and others, touting the many benefits and uses for the Indonesian wonder-plant. Fortunately, (or perhaps unfortunately) this may be the last Kratom post on Return Of Kings for the foreseeable future.

By now, you all know that Kratom is to be classified on the DEA’s Schedule I list, effectively banning it in the USA for a minimum of two years. This ban begins formally September 30, 2016; after that, it will be, legally speaking, no different than cocaine, heroin, marijuana, and mushrooms.

That's right—much like cannabis has been classified as "having no medicinal value" (even though the US govt. owns a patent for its medicinal value), kratom is now officially scheduled to be considered a medically worthless drug in the USA.

We can debate endlessly the effectiveness (or lack thereof) of kratom, different techniques for how it is used, and different facets of your life that it can improve.

Loading…

The fact remains that within this community and the ROK readership, kratom has helped countless people with a myriad of different issues, from muscle soreness to depression to anxiety to insomnia. Looking past all of the jokers and comedians who poke fun at the nearly endless stream of kratom posts here, there are plenty of you for whom kratom has been nothing less than a godsend, and for whom this ban will causes a destavating reduction in quality-of-life.

Now is the time, while you still have the chance, to stock up on kratom and use it while it is still legal and you need not search for it on the black market. Some kratom stores online are going out of business completely; some are merely shifting their business model.

Island Lion Herbals will continue to sell kratom through September 30, 2016, at which point we will remain open for business but will be shifting our focus to other natural herbs and alternative medicines in our product line. In addition to the Phenibut we already sell, we will be adding Kava, CBD products, and other herbs to our product line.

Here is your chance. If you have never tried kratom, but wanted to check it out, you can do so inexpensively. If you are already a long time fan, you can buy large amounts at unprecedently low prices.

As a special discount for Return Of Kings readers, we are currently offering a 50% discount on all kratom products. Simply visit Island Lion Herbals at https://islandlionherbals.com and use coupon code ROK50 for 50% off through September 30,2016.

Stock up now, we are blowing out our entire stock and when it's gone, it's gone for good.

We won’t be restocking any kratom products ever again, and it will be nearly impossible to find any kratom at all in the US after September.

Thanks for everything, and we appreciate your continued support through these trying times.

5 Ways Feminism Promotes Misogyny

September 6, 2016 | by Mark Derian | Link | Original Link

Contrary to popular belief, misogyny isn't the hatred of women—it's the hatred of feminine qualities, like kindness, nurturing, and sensitivity. This is why misogyny often co-occurs with homophobia (you know, real homophobia, the kind we only find in the Muslim world).

A misogynist is someone who thinks only male traits—high-testosterone traits—like bravery, focus, and persistence are essential to society. Sweetness and empathy to the misogynist are an extravagance, a waste of time. This is why feminists are the true purveyors of misogyny. When they tell women to overcome the patriarchy, they implicitly tell them to hate themselves.

Here are five ways, specifically, feminism promotes misogyny by turning the feminine spirit in woman against herself.

1. Emphasizes women in the workplace

According to feminist scripture, homemaking and caretaking are inferior roles. I'd love to see a woman at a New York cocktail party say she's a stay-at-home mother without feeling the need to explain herself. So a woman needs a job to be valuable. The implication of this idea is women are not valuable in their own right—they must act like men to be valuable, and so they are metaphysically inferior. Men and their capabilities are the standard of measure.

2. De-emphasizes motherhood

The social value of femininity, beyond being attractive to men, is raising children. Human babies are born about two years premature in order to fit our huge brains through our mothers' loins. So we come out of the womb as glorified fetuses. These fetuses need to be nurtured. One way women nurture is by helping children regulate emotion. If the child skins his knee, for instance, the mother is there to let him know, through the innate expression of comfort on her face, that it's okay. This helps the child to see pain as something to confront and manage, not something to avoid.

I worked in a homeless shelter last year counseling drug addicts. The patients who were the most violent drug addicts all came from different backgrounds, races, religions, and socio-economic conditions. But there was one thing they all had in common: they weren't raised by their mom. Their mom either left when they were young, was on drugs herself and so psychologically absent, or at work and so left them with a nanny or daycare. Without moms, society would crumble faster than if there weren't marketing professionals.

A woman who eschews motherhood is eschewing the one job she is perfectly built for, the one job no one else in the world could even come close to doing well. Perhaps motherhood is boring, but God is probably bored a lot, too.

3. Empowers loneliness

Feminism tells women they don't need a man to be happy. This is a fantasy based on insecurity. No one is happy when they're alone. We may do okay on our own, but we're not happy on our own. Of course, if we cannot figure out how to get along with the opposite sex, then we convince ourselves being alone is fine as a defense mechanism.

The only reason our brains grew from the 30 billion neurons of chimps to the 100 billion neurons of humans in the last eight million years is because we began to form complex, social relationships—specifically, we began to form pair bonds. This is the nature of who we are, and it's imperative to bond with the opposite sex to assuage this nature. It's the same reason we go to the gym. For millions of years our ancestors were hunting mammoths and walking ten miles per day. So now we work out to trick our body into thinking we're still trekking and hunting our way across the African savannah.

4. Glorifies toughness

Feminism is about making out women to be like men—therefore, they can be as tough as men. But they're not as tough. Toughness is a high-testosterone trait. Can a girl be tough? Sure, but it doesn't make her less valuable if she's not. To say otherwise is to denigrate the value of womanhood.

5. Turns women into political fodder

The philosophical foundation of feminism is Marxism. Feminism preaches equality, yes, but only in the Marxist definition of what that word means—the subversion of the oppressive, ruling class. Instead of the have and have-nots, we now have the penis-havers and the penis-have-nots. This implies that women, by being inherently disadvantaged by the patriarchy, require the political ruling class for survival. For this purpose, women are pitted against men as if we had diverging interests.

An example of this is the myth that anorexia is perpetuated by unrealistic portrayals of women. Not only has this explanation of anorexia been disproven, it's demeaning to women—it tells them simply looking at images of thin women will make them want to hurt themselves. No woman I have ever met is this stupid, but feminism thinks women are this stupid.

The truth is anorexia is an anxiety disorder caused by the feelings of being out of control that come with menarche. But this truth doesn't blame the political opposition (men), and so it doesn't fit with the Marxist narrative. With women believing they're invariably oppressed by men, now there's have half the population ripe to be used for political ends.

Conclusion

The misogyny perpetuated by feminism is nothing less than thought control, which occurs when we believe we cannot do something while at the same time we believe we must do that thing. Women can't compete with men in the working world, but they have to. Women can't leave their child with a nanny, but they have to. Women can't be alone, but they have to. Women can't be tough like men, but they have to. It's obsessive-compulsive disorder on a cultural level.

The inherent value of women is undeniable; they create the soil in which a healthy oak can grow. The soil and the oak each play their part as long as they can work together.

Does Borderline Personality Disorder Cause Feminism?

September 6, 2016 | by Ricardo Sanchez | Link | Original Link

Feminists have consistent and pervasive ways of behaving, which facilitates our job to identify the underlying pathology. The clinical criteria of borderline personality disorder (BPD) resemble feminists in many ways. That is probably one of the reasons why BPD has become politicized and feminist lobbies try to force the American Psychiatric Association (APA) to remove it from further editions of the diagnostic manuals.

In fact, not only feminists, but most women fit the criteria for BPD. As a result, only women with an immediate risk of suicide are diagnosed with it (10% suicide rate, 80%+ suicide attempt rate). I am theorizing, along with other experts in the field, that BPD is an extreme of the female psychology.

This is much at odds with the claim that feminists are anti-gender roles, when they themselves embody the most feminine psychology. For instance, rumination and help-seeking are traits that differ between men and women, and no man has ever embraced the religion of victimology as much as feminists. Moreover, the BPD symptoms that feminists display are believed to be a result of excessive estrogen.

It is important to acknowledge the fact the most feminists are BPD, not to mock BPD, as it is a very serious phenomenon, but it is necessary to undermine the political credibility of the feminist demands. Girls with BPD are known to be pathological liars, and manipulate others by depicting themselves as victims (of rape, for instance).

Let's review a selection of the clinical criteria for BPD, and how it applies to feminists.

Unstable self-image or sense of self

The DSM-5 includes "sudden changes in sexual identity" that parallels the rapidly growing number of gender identities "discovered" by feminists. Often, they change identities within the same day. On another day, they will identify as a non-sentient inanimate object. Or, they get a different hair color. Or, they decide to grow armpit hair and shave their heads. Self-image disturbance is a deep-rooted issue in feminists. It has been theorized to be partially explained by a controlling mother, and—surprise—an absent father.

Another example is the rapid switch between victimized princess and heroic savior. The DSM-5 says "these individuals may suddenly change from the role of a needy supplicant for help, to that of a righteous avenger of past treatment." Just like feminists are strong, independent women… and helpless victims.

Ironically, this disturbed sense of self is believed to originate from a lack of nurturing and support, as BPDs need constant guidance. This contrasts with the feminist claim that all women should be seen as independent, competitive, and empowered. It's almost as if self-harm extends to destructive political beliefs…

Impulsiveness in binge-eating and sex

Binge-eating is often seen as a coping mechanism to deal with affective instability. As a result, those who are constantly triggered tend to use potentially harmful coping mechanisms, such as binge-eating. It is no wonder that borderline symptoms correlate strongly with Body Mass Index (BMI).

Impulsivity in sex is also an example. Yet, most of BPDs will regret most of their sexual encounters, and will typically claimed to have been raped. About 80% of those with BPD will claim to have been raped in their lifetime. However, not even once in my extensive examination of the psychiatric research have I seen confirmed reports of rape in people with BPD.

What is empirically proven, however, is that they are prone to make false rape allegations, and to be the type of person to benefit from the nurturing that would follow such accusations. Moreover, the claim that rape leads to anxiety, depression, or psychiatric problems is a myth, according to a meta-analysis of 59 studies published in Psychological Bulletin.

Affective instability and panic attacks

Much like women with BPD, feminists are constantly having panic attacks, or being triggered, as they call it. In an attempt to politicize their sensibilities, feminists try to silence opposition on the grounds of their panic attacks. If Trump 2016 written in chalk on your campus triggers a panic attack, there might be an underlying pathology that needs being taken care of, like a BPD symptomatology.

Paranoid ideation

This is without a doubt the symptom that led to the widely held belief that all men are potentially rapists, men have historically oppressed women, and that most women will get assaulted in their lives. The problem arises when the politicians give in to that perspective, and that it results in oppressive measures towards men, legitimized by the myth that without strong governmental interventionism, women would be oppressed.

Associated features

The appearance of feminists is also on par with those with a BPD diagnosis. BPD symptoms correlate positively with the amount of tattoos and piercings. In my experience with BPD patients, this also extends to hair dying frequency or hue saturation. Interestingly, BPD symptoms are also linked to a higher BMI.

Funnily enough, it appears that the APA are purposely preventing feminists to obtain a legitimate PTSD diagnosis. In the criteria of "exposure to traumatic events," they specify that it "does not include exposure to traumatic stimuli on electronic media, television, or movies, unless it is related to work." Just so you know, you can't get a PTSD diagnosis from misogynistic tweets.

Conclusion

In the end, I want to reiterate my stance that the purpose of this post is not to mock those with BPD. It is a very serious condition. However, those with BPD have disturbance of their sense of self and perception, which does not lead to constructive and prosperous political movements. Their paranoid tendencies should not be paid more attention more than any other paranoia resulting from psychiatric issues.

Their political beliefs may even be counter-productive, as BPD feminists promote an image of women that would lead all women away from nurturing and support (unless you're talking about taxes, only men pay taxes). It is therefore useful to acknowledge that feminists largely fulfill the borderline personality disorder criteria.

I am in the publishing process for an academic journal, in which I argue that the borderline symptomatology is an extreme form of the female psychology. You can follow me on social media (Twitter, Facebook and YouTube) to get notified when it is published.

Roosh Q&A: 24 Answers To Patriarchy & Tradition Questions

September 7, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The final Q&A video is on patriarchy and tradition:

Here's the index so you can jump around:

00:08
"Do you see mens maculinity further succumbing to public pressure or will there be a noticeable surge in masculine behavior worldwide?" (ALPHA HUNTER ZERO)

2:24
"Is there anything that can be done to make women feminine again or has the horse already bolted?" (BENHODGES62)

5:04
"Do you believe that technology has fundamentally altered the negotiation between men and women – with the advent of hormonal birth control (and lessening the need to screen all men for beta qualities prior to sex while also allowing a certain number/subset of men much greater access to sex) is Marriage 1.0 still a realistic ideal?" (RP THINKER 12)

8:50
"Where do you see the Manosphere/Neomasculinity going in the future? Will it ever be more than an online community? I know we had the meet-up that was cancelled, but are there any other plans or predictions?" (COREY)

12:13
"Do you conclude that it is not the country but a mere urban vs rural ideals. like would you pick a bride in small town utah over a kiev girl?" (SPLOOGE)

15:16
“Roosh, from your recent posts I gather that you are looking for a woman to bond with and start a family. You’ve already explained what you are looking for, but I am more interested in learning where (i.e. which country/region) you will start your search in and for which reasons you have chosen that specific country? Ideally I would like to have kids too, but I know that it will become increasingly difficult in our world to find a loyal and kind woman with whom it is worth taking the risks of starting a family.” (DER WELTENBUMMLER)

19:32
“You say that fornication ruins women, and makes them unfit to be wifes and mothers. But you sell how-to-fornicate guides. Why is that?” (NATHAN SCHUSTER)

22:14
“You have shown great loyalty to “biological” American nation which hosted your family of foreign origin. Yet, what are your feelings toward your ancestral country, Iran ? Did you ever think that settling there could be an option, given it’s quite traditional character and it’s growing sense of national confidence?” (ARMCHAIR GENERAL)

23:53
“Why dont you go to Armenia and Iran, by far the most traditional societies and girls are hot as hell. Do you speak local language?” (DAVID)

25:42
“How does one weigh the balance of ignoring the outside world, marrying the best girl one can and starting a family, or just permanently having short term sexual encounters feeding our sex drive, versus taking a stand and fighting the forces that are destroying the western civilized world?” (SPICY NUJAC)

28:52
“If you decide to have a family, how will you prevent modern culture, media, friends, and outside influences from corrupting your children?” (SPICY NUJAC)

30:33
“What is your view on Monarchy?” (CHRISTIAN)

31:27
“Do you view return to more traditional values as necessary for the continuing success of Western Civilization over its rivals, or more as a personal preference of what kind of world you want to live in?” (GGG)

33:40
“How would you advise a father to educate his children (both sons and daughters) to counter the narratives being pushed by society at large?” (NIL NISI OPTIMUM)

34:34
“You recently wrote an article about the necessity for the future mother of your children to be a virgin that believes in God. In which countries would one be most likely to find this type of girl/woman? (Ideally she would be Christian)” (WILLIAM R)

36:11
“Do you think neo masculinity needs to have a multigenerational approach – raising a family with the worldview and strong foundation – to have an impact in the next generation?” (ARMENIA 4 EVER)

37:50
“What advice can you give men in the manosphere to avoid a complete surrender to nihilism and pessimism?” (ARMENIA 4 EVER)

39:56
“Can you give your honest, brutal opinion on men who abstain from sex before marriage out of religious conviction (assuming that the conviction is sincere and that this genuinely isn’t the result of betadom)?” (MARCUS AQUILA)

41:01
“Do you think it’s necessary to fall in love to get married?” (ANDREA)

45:18
“If you ever got married, would you be faithful? Why or why not?” (ANDREA)

46:25
“Please explain why it is important for a woman to submit to a man and how to best train your woman to do as she’s told.” (STANNUM)

47:59
“How do we bring back the patriarchy? and how do we stop this real life calhoun mouse experiment?” (THE STEEL GUY)

51:33
“What are the steps you would take to minimize legal and financial risk from divorce/cohabitation laws?” (SIR TIMOTHY)

54:31
“You realize that to save Western Civilization – or Christendom – we need women to want marriage and to be fertile – raise kids. Yet “Bang”ing them seems to be counterproductive to that goal (as opposed to enjoying the decline into a new dark ages). At best you seem of two minds, but why not reform and go to the better angels of everyone’s natures – including and especially women – eggs are dear – than to damage women often reducing their Marriage Market Value?” (TZ1)

That completely wraps up the 2016 Q&A series. Check out my Youtube channel for all seven videos, which total almost six hours in length. I didn’t know what kind of time commitment I was getting into by doing this Q&A, but it came out great and it was a lot of fun to answer all 131 questions.

Filipino President Rodrigo Duterte Calls Barack Obama The “Son Of A Whore”

September 7, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> …we will always assert the need to have due process and engage the fight against drugs in a way that is consistent with basic international norms.
> — Barack Obama

An international spat has emerged between US President Barack Obama and his Filipino counterpart, Rodrigo Duterte, on the sidelines of the G20 conference in Hangzhou, China. Obama, who has taken a number of official and unofficial steps to strip male students accused of rape of their due process protections, has recently come out swinging against the human rights record of Duterte. The Filipino President’s signature anti-crime policy since taking office this year has been the extrajudicial killing of suspected drug dealers.

Anticipating even more criticism over the due process elements of his anti-drugs action, which has so far killed several thousand people, Duterte called Obama the “son of a whore.” He warned the American Commander-in-Chief against trying to interfere in the Philippines’ sovereign affairs. A planned meeting was promptly canceled after Duterte’s strident comments, but it had seemed unlikely to take place before the insult, too.

Can you see why Duterte is nicknamed “The Punisher”?

Barack Obama’s insistence on claiming the moral high ground has been a recurring theme of his contradictory Presidency. For example, his previous vitriol against the Bush Administration’s Patriot Act and targeted killings program has been overshadowed by Obama’s basic retention of Bush era anti-terrorism legislation and an unprecedented number of drone killings overseas, including of American citizens. The same goes for his supposed championing of women’s rights while embracing standout female empowerment performers like Saudi Arabia.

The most likely criticism of any stance comparing the Obama and Duterte Administrations on due process will be that Filipino drug dealing suspects are being killed, whereas men accused of rape at US colleges usually face expulsion and employment blacklisting. That said, the Philippines, a developing country with a history of serious corruption, is facing a deep existential crisis. The very safety of countless urban communities and townships is being undermined by powerful criminal networks, often on par or surpassing those found in drug-infested areas of Mexico.

By comparison, the United States, which pumps billions annually into all manner of programs to improve the “living standards” of tens of millions of people, often unreasonably so, cannot be bothered to invest the appropriate time, procedures, and money into ensuring that young college men accused of rape receive even a modicum of the due process measures found in standard courts.

All in all, Duterte’s approach is much more justifiable and defendable than Obama’s.

Obama’s woeful track record on college due process

Signing a piece of paper to help stop “sexual assaults” is hardly fitting if the sexual assaults you claim have not even been verified.

In recent times, the Obama Administration has been vocal in promising to cut federal funding for colleges that do not tackle sexual assault “problems.” Problems are basically defined as women accusing men of rape, without any serious inquiries as to the merit of these accusations, which are actually best left to the police and general criminal justice system. So, solving these “problems” becomes a question of securing an acceptable number of “convictions.”

Although one would hope that college administrators would take the harder, more noble option and refuse to countenance blackmail, in reality most do not have the stomach to defy Washington. They are also aware that any refusal to accept Obama’s diktats would result in their own removal and the instalment of a lackey.

Speaking of lackeys, Vice President Joe Biden has taken up the mantle of Obama’s Roaming “Anti-Rape” Ambassador, allowing his boss to avoid more serious accusations of disregarding due process. And rather than specific laws, most of the time Obama and Biden have contributed to the pernicious climate against college men very loosely accused of rape by ramping up unofficial pressure. Reported sexual assaults, gerrymandered according to feminist surveys, are cited as bonafide sexual assaults by the White House, for instance.

Evidence against drug dealer suspects is almost always far more concrete than “evidence” against college “rapists”

You might find a ledger with a drug dealer's illegal business records, but will be hard pressed to locate the confessing diary of a "rapist."

Another problem with Obama's hypocritical position on due process for Filipino drug dealer suspects is the nature of drug dealing as a crime. The production, shipment, distribution, market protection, and consumption involved with the drugs trade is extremely complex. A single batch of, say, cocaine might involve hundreds of people, even when the numerous drug users at the end of the line are excluded. This is particularly so if the drugs are originally manufactured abroad in places like Colombia or Mexico.

This complexity means that, among other things, countless text messages or other electronic messages are exchanged, corrupt officials or workers skirt rules whose non-fulfilment can be noticed by others, and people meet in streets or other crowded areas to exchange parcels or money. Communications like "When is the shipment coming?" are relatively easy to link to a narcotics operation and specific individuals, as are tightly sealed plastic bags hidden in terracotta pots.

Compare this to calls of "rape," concerning situations where there are no witnesses and young men certainly do not make a habit of texting "Hey, I had sex with that passed out girl last night" or "I muffled her screams with her pillow!" Rodrigo Duterte's vigilante groups, however distasteful you may find them, have better, more trustworthy means of determining who is a drug dealer than college kangaroo courts have in deciding who is a rapist.

Rape accusations invariably fall into the domain of he-said-she-said dynamics. At least in the First World, obvious injury after "rape" is consistently lacking. Furthermore, women often take many months, or even years, to report the "crime" and are continually reluctant to go to the police, opting instead for more indulgent college rape tribunals.

Consequently, I like Duterte's odds of stopping a real problem than Obama's chances of thwarting a largely imaginary, at best unproven one.

Worse is to come with Hillary

Remember that a Hillary Clinton Presidency is potentially just around the corner. In one breath, Hillary panders to sexual assault accusers by saying they must be "listened to and believed." In the next, she claims her husband is innocent of the rape accusations leveled against him. What we can expect, however, is that college men and men in general will be in her crosshairs if she is elected.

Sexual assault "reform" has been just one of many perverse ideas implemented by the Obama Administration. Inasmuch as his hypocrisy about due process has been immense, especially in relation to his current criticisms of Rodrigo Duterte, the post-Obama future portends even more of an undermining of the rule of law.

Men accused of rape, beware… things are going to get worse for you.

Byzantium Emperor Justinian Shows How “Gender Equality” Leads To Decadence & Mass Slaughter

September 7, 2016 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

Emperor Justinian I fought fiercely to restore Rome’s former glory. But in 532 A.D., he rounded up and slaughtered 30,000 of his own Byzantine citizens. How could such a strong and accomplished ruler commit such an atrocity?

After Justinian’s death, his top general published a scathing insight into the emperor’s life. Justinian’s fatal flaw was the woman he chose to be his wife, and that he granted her equal power. Despite expanding expanding and strengthening the kingdom, Justinian saw many failures because he put the wrong woman in charge.

Broken Women Do Not Reform

To understand how a woman undermined Justinian's glory, Procopius began with a description of Theodora's early life.

Theodora's parents got her involved in popular entertainment as a child, like a Hollywood celebrity today. As a popular actress, her mother got Theodora the position of suppliant at the hippodrome. Then, as we often see with daughters of celebrities today, Theodora turned to a life of stripping and became a prostitute at a very young age.

At 16, Theodora became a companion of a Syrian official. Procopius notes that sensible men avoided Theodora like a "bird of ill omen" from this time forward. Later, she converted to Christianity and met a fellow hippodrome colleague who had ties to Justinian. She moved to Constantinople, gave up her life of harlotry, and finally met Justinian.

But did Theodora really change? No, her lascivious lifestyle got much worse after Justinian courted her. She secretly murdered the queen of the Goths because she was jealous of how pretty she looked. She also had one of her slaves, Areobindus, killed for apparently no reason whatsoever, even though she was madly in love with the young man.

> No other tyrant since mankind began ever inspired such fear, since not a word could be spoken against her without her hearing of it: her multitude of spies brought her the news of whatever was said and done in public or in private.

Theodora became pregnant from one of her adulterous lovers, and when she proved unable to abort the child, the father stole the baby away to keep him safe. Theodora finally tracked the child down and had him exterminated. All motherly and feminine affection was gone from this woman.

Adulterous Women Ruin Men

Procopius notes that Theodora's adulterous behavior spread throughout the kingdom.

> The ladies of the court at this time were nearly all of abandoned morals. They ran no risk in being faithless to their husbands, as the sin brought no penalty: even if caught in the act.

Men who accused their wives of adultery were fined heavily, whipped, and imprisoned. The men then become "complaisant" to the adultery. This is what happens when you put a "reformed" harlot in power.

General Belisarius married a celebrity friend of Theodora, and predictably she cheated on him. After catching her in the act, he foolishly accepted his wife's flimsy excuses.

The adulterous relationship continued, and Belisarius finally became so consumed by jealous rage that his military career was almost destroyed and Byzantium lost precious ground in battle.

Gender Equality Leads To Genocide

Theodora already had a child from another man when Justinian met her, but he didn't care. For some reason, he overlooked her horrible behavior and gave her more and more power.

> Through him Theodora was able immediately to acquire an unholy power and exceedingly great riches. She seemed to him the sweetest thing in the world, and like all lovers, he desired to please his charmer with every possible favor and requite her with all his wealth.
> The extravagance added fuel to the flames of passion. With her now to help spend his money he plundered the people more than ever, not only in the capital, but throughout the Roman Empire.

Justinian was so enamored that he made Theodora practically equal to him in power. They were "two co-equal sovrans [sic], and some thought that Theodora had greater power than greater power than Justinian himself." Theodora stands as every feminist's dream of "gender equality."

School textbooks today praise Theodora as "a tough-minded and capable woman who added strength and resolve to the grandiose plans of the emperor. She was Justinian's equal, and perhaps more." The Guardian lists her "achievements in power."

But the truth is Theodora turned Justinian selfish and cruel. Political factions united in the opposition to Justinian's new oppressive policies, and in January 532, an uprising started during a chariot race in the hippodrome.

The hippodrome served as the traditional venue for nonviolent protests. But this riot spread like never before. Justinian was ready to flee from the city, but Theodora did not want to give up her power. She made a historic speech:

> My lords, the present occasion is too serious to allow me to follow the convention that a woman should not speak in a man's council. Those whose interests are threatened by extreme danger should think only of the wisest course of action, not of conventions.
> …for one who has reigned it is intolerable to be a fugitive. May I never be deprived of this purple robe, and may I never see the day when those who meet me do not call me empress… I agree with the adage that the royal purple is the noblest shroud.

At Theodora's direction, Justinian ordered his troops to surround the hippodrome and slaughter everyone. Over 30,000 unarmed civilians were killed.

Government Is A Two-Party Facade

Justinian and Theodora did nothing "without the consent of the other." But they put up pretenses of disagreement to make it look like they represented the factions of the people.

Much like the Republican and Democrat parties of today, they “gave the impression often that they were acting in opposition” to each other. This whipped up violent emotions among the subjects in order to maintain a “firm and mutual tyranny.”

Also as we see in today’s legal system, they took opposite sides in legal disputes and “robbed both disputants of most of the property at issue.”

Justinian and Theodora propped up useful idiots who were unqualified for their positions but provided personal loyalty to the throne, in order to “defraud the State to the limits of their ambition.”

When the puppets were no longer useful, they “would fall out of favor with Theodora, and straightway be ruined…. Then Theodora would use them shamefully, while he, unconscious as it were of what was being done to them, confiscated their properties and boldly enjoyed their wealth.”

Inviting Terrorism With Platitudes

Justinian and Theodora “set the barbarians all to fighting each other,” and “with idiotic magnanimity gave them large sums of money, alleging he did this to secure their friendship.”

This foreign policy proved foolish because other barbarian tribes soon sought inroads with Byzantium in order to collect tribute, and eventually all the tribes were either invading Byzantine villages or being paid off not to do so, or both.

> “Thus the Huns enslaved the Roman Empire, and were paid by the Emperor to keep on doing it…. Consequently no place, mountain or cave, or any other spot in Roman territory, during this time remained uninjured; and many regions were pillaged more than five times.”

Justinian further prevented his armies from going after the Huns when they invaded, as he sought diplomatic alliance with them, as leverage against the Goths and other tribes.

Some farmers went after the Huns anyway, “induced by longing for their children and wives who had been carried off to slavery.” Justinian arrested these men, and “beat and torture[d] them and seize[d] their property.”

Mask Of Generosity

Finally, Procopius notes the Theodora and Justinian put on a countenance of generosity to various factions. Even "those who confronted him improperly or noisily never made him angry," as we saw with Bernie Sanders who allowed Black Lives Matter to take over his rally.

But this was all lip-service. With a "a gentle countenance and unruffled brow" he "gave the order to destroy myriads of innocent men, to sack cities, to confiscate any amount of properties."

This speaks to the policy of gender equality to made Theodora the most influential empress in Roman/Byzantine history. Feminists make mighty promises and say that it is the only fair and compassionate policy. But the second they gain power, they only care about accumulating more power for themselves. Who does this describe today?

From Benghazi to Whitewater, she leaves a long trail of blood. She commits brazen acts of gross illegality, yet everybody is afraid to do anything about it. She raises whispers of scandal from her relationship with a close advisor.

Byzantium's quick decline after Justinian can arguably be considered the result of Theodora. What will happen if Hillary Clinton becomes leader of the United States? How high will the body count be?

What White Men Should Understand About White Women Sleeping With Black Men

September 8, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

A while back on ROK, my colleague Donovan Sharpe penned an article that shed some well-needed light on the phenomenon of white girls dating black men. The comment storm and reactions it created showed that it hit a nerve.

I personally found it thought-provoking and it helped me put words on many thoughts I had on the matter, bringing me the necessary and impartial point of view of a red-pill black man. I convey that, as for white men, we don't have it so bad. As Donovan justly points out: "The fact of the matter is that white dudes are pretty much every woman's type."

In his no-nonsense analysis, Donovan attributes the existence of this phenomenon to many factors, such as female low self-esteem, need for attention, the perceived image of black men and the expectations in that matter. All of that while remaining well aware and honest about his own capacities, the perks and the limits that being black brings to his game.

I observe a growth of this phenomenon and it would be a lie if I said that I find it positive. I myself had my fair share of pleasant sexual experiences with exotic girls but I want my wife and children to be white and look like me.

I circled around discussing the issue for a while and finally decided to give my take on what should be the reaction of your common white man to it.

1. One cannot alter the nature of women

Ah, the woman. This curious animal, half-hamster, half-lizard and never unicorn. It is common knowledge that their emotions are what matters and that long-term planning is not their forte. It is a given that the more the man sends the image of an alpha, whatever colour he is, the more women will want to sleep with him. Danger, social norms or logic do not apply to tingles.

They just cannot resist something forbidden and exciting. If there were today a hypothetical country with a majority of white women in its population and if being caught dating a black man meant public humiliation, torture and death row, women would still sleep with black men. Guaranteed.

If there was even a rumour among that female population, that a thousand years ago, a woman managed to sleep with a black man without being caught, however extraordinary or pathetic the sex was, you can bet your bottom dollar that the curiosity and the excitement of breaking the law to be special will push at least a few of them to taste the forbidden fruit.

2. One should focus on personal problems first

Like other occurrences such as feminism shoved down our throat or false rape accusations, if you have been spared, you would be tempted to think “so far, so good.”. One must think “Does this phenomenon immediately affect my personal life?

There is only so much influence you can exercise on the outside. You cannot have all the women in the world. Instead of only blaming external factors, you should focus on your immediate environment and start by protecting yourself from the sexual competition, black or otherwise by reaching the peak of you potential sexual value.

Becoming the best version of yourself should be the priority, by reaching high financial and social status, independence, family goals, high standards of physical fitness, learning more about game, red flags and surrounding yourself with high quality women.

3. One should just see it as another red flag

I would never see a woman that had many sexual partners, regardless of race, as a prospect for a long term relationship. But even with less than the current and highly debatable "good girl" total of two lifetime sexual partners (I agree on the fact that a virgin would be ideal), knowing that she has slept with a black man or is sexually attracted to black men would remove her from the LTR category in my book.

I want to know if she has slept with a non-white man, just as I want to see other red flags before I go any further.

Why?

It means that she is or was attracted and surrendered the goods, being seduced by possible traits of black man game:

- Buying into the natural alpha (or "near the extreme poles of the financial hierarchy") or big cock mix: She does not think ahead. She listens to the media, likes bad boys with dark triad elements or gangster aura. It makes her dangerous to become a mother and she would endanger my household and my progeny with her impulsive attraction for jerkboys.
- Enjoying the forbidden aspect of it: She has an independent, rebellious spirit and does not follow rules. I cannot trust her word or her judgment.
- Knowingly sacrificing her SMV for a fantasy: She does not care about what people think. She craves the attention and the drama more than she fears the consequences of her actions. She cannot control her urges and will not change with time.
- Following a possible genuine attraction for black men: She will always think that she is dating down by being with me. First opportunity and she will cheat.
- Pursuing the liberal virtue signaling: She thinks that being tolerant and morally superior is more important than tradition and that following fashion goes before the interest of her children (both groups will rarely totally accept them).

A woman that chooses to have children with a man of another race is turning her back on her heritage and nature to adopt the one of her mate. It tells a lot about her loyalty and feelings towards her own kind. The Current Year Cult and cucks of all colours can vociferate, it does not make it less true.

With this in mind, you can choose not to invest anything personal in her. You can just see her as a temporary vessel for your sexual enjoyment.

4. Male and female sexual behaviour cannot be controlled

"It ain't sad because I want my child to look like me, every intelligent person wants their child to look like them, you're telling me I'm sad because I want to blot out my race and lose my identity?" Muhammad Ali

Let's use familiar examples. Roosh is Irano-Armenian and ROK writer Donovan Sharpe is black. They both have slept, sleep and will continue to sleep with loads of white women. That does not keep me up at night. I do not want to harm Roosh or Donovan because they sleep with white women.

As men versed in game, possessing a good knowledge of the world and social dynamics, I am convinced that they bring a positive influence around them. I hope for their good fortune and that they will be happy with whatever woman they interact with.

But casual sex and procreation are two different things. It is common sense for a man to want children that will look like him. But saying this out loud is now a thought crime.

Nonetheless, every man has the sacred right to prefer one woman over another based on what attracts him. The people that are the angriest at white women consensually sleeping with Black men are usually the ones that blindly idealize white culture or do not believe in game.

This questions brought up by Roosh to determine your position on the matter are one of the most pertinent on the subject:

> 1. In your ideal nation, will white men be able to consensually sleep with non-white women?
> 2. In your ideal nation, will non-white men be able to consensually sleep with white women?

Ce qui est vraiment important

Black men that sleep with white women are merely the tip of the iceberg. The main problem comes from the elite that imposes this phenomenon to the masses as being the norm and the "right thing," which fits their agenda, as was displayed in Apple's iPhone7 event yesterday.

A population that is not homogeneous, without a strong common social fabric is easier to control. Promoting interracial relationships, depicting Whites as weaker men and mates or silencing its detractors helps you do that..

If you do not embrace it full force and celebrate it, you are the racist, the wrong thinker that must be eliminated. But here are some pressing issues that should matter more than your neighbourhood mudshark:

- The same elites that through mainstream media push the weak, racist white man versus strong, leading black man dichotomy
- Islam endangering Western civilisation and the migrant crisis, possibly the greatest Trojan Horse of our time
- Degeneracy and stupidity being promoted instead of intelligence, merit and talent
- The Left's agenda to soon push pedophilia and other depraved sexual orientations as acceptable

5 Powerful Masculine Quotes By David Deida

September 8, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

I've recently been re-reading Way Of The Superior Man for the 4th time (yes it's that good, I highly recommend it) and it never ceases to amaze me at how much wisdom is packed into this little book. Published in 2004, it's gone on to change the lives of hundreds of thousands of men all across the world—and for good reason. The novel struggles with the concept of masculinity, and how it applies to work, love, mindset, and most importantly, purpose.

The novel, despite being filled with countless gems of neomasculine wisdom, is so beautifully written that even women can appreciate it. It doesn't have the usual "I'm angry at the world" undertone that a lot of red-pilled material does (not that the anger would be unjustified). Thus, I've decided to share 5 of my favorite quotes from this epic piece of literature, so that we may all learn from it, and hopefully live a better life.

1. On Women Giving You Shit Tests

> Your woman knows your weaknesses better than anybody. She knows where you will falter and give up. She knows the degree of mediocrity you will settle for. And, she knows your true capacity as a full man, a man of free consciousness and love. Her gift, if she is a good woman, is to test you with her darkest moods, over and over and over, until your consciousness is unperturbed by feminine challenge, and you are able to pervade her with your love, just as you are here to pervade the world. In response to your fearless consciousness, she will drench your world in love and light.

It is no secret that women will constantly test you as a man to see what you're worth. It's also no secret that learning to effectively pass a woman's shit tests is one of the best ways to make her desperately want you. Yet despite this common knowledge within the manosphere, many men are still very uncertain as to why women test them.

Plenty of men get angry at the games that women play, the snarky little comments they make to try to undermine your confidence, and the sneaky tests that they throw at you to see what you're made of. But, as David Deida points out, a woman's shit tests are actually one of her greatest gifts to you, as a man.

Women don't reward weakness. They do not reward a man who is spineless, who lacks firm boundaries, or who refuses to stand up for himself. They do, however, reward strength. They reward a man when he is completely and utterly grounded. They reward a man when he is a megalith of confidence, completely unmoved by her tests. This is, in fact, the greatest secret of all.

She WANTS you to be a strong man. Secretly, she's hoping that you'll be the amazing man who she wants to sweep her off her feet. As David Deida says, any woman you grow close to is very aware of what you will settle for. You can bet that she's aware of where your weaknesses are, and unless you work on them, she will pound on them over and over again.

This is a woman's greatest gift to you, ironically enough: to harden you through testing you.

2. On Masculine Spirituality

> The way a man penetrates the world should be the same way he penetrates his woman: not merely for personal gain or pleasure, but to magnify love, openness, and depth.

As I've been saying for quite some time now, masculinity gets a bad reputation for being some sort of primal, ape-like essence. Yes, as others such as Jack Donovan have pointed out, masculinity is very much physical. However it doesn't stop there.

True masculinity is embodied in all "core four" areas of your life, as I have coined them: your body, your mind, your heart, and your spirit.

A man's body must be physically strong and his mind must be sharp. Everyone knows these things, however what most men are not aware of, is that masculinity is also part emotional and part spiritual. A whole novel could be written on the nuances of emotional masculinity, but essentially what it comes down to is this: men draw state from within, and women draw state from without.

In other words, a man's emotions influence his environment, whereas a woman's emotions are influenced by her environment. Yes, obviously this is a gross oversimplification, but in general it's true. This is why women love to talk; vibing with their girlfriends puts them both in a good mood. It's why they love to dance; they draw good emotions from the music and their environment, much more so than men.

It's why men are the creators, the movers, and the producers of the world; their internal ambition acts on their external world. They have an emotion, and they make it reality.

This is precisely what David Deida is saying. As a man, it is your duty to penetrate the world with your love, and with your vision. Do not waste time over pettiness or frivolities. Seek to leave your mark on the world…"not merely for personal gain or pleasure, but to magnify love, openness, and depth."

3. On Fear

> Your fear is the sharpest definition of your self. You should know it. You should feel it virtually constantly. Fear needs to become your friend, so that you are no longer uncomfortable with it.

It is a common misbelief that fear is a bad thing. Fear, in excess, or should I say without courage, is definitely a bad thing. Even then, however, it points you to exactly what you need to do.

Many a poet, author, and motivational speaker, have lauded fear for its ability to show you the way. Fear is like a guidepost: it shows you what you must do if you wish to fulfill your destiny. Fear is that nagging little bitch in the back of your mind that's telling you to "wait another day," before you start that business.

It's that voice telling you to give up and just get a stable job, because you'll never be able to achieve your dreams. It's that voice telling you to give up on your purpose as a man. Ironically enough, however, you must do exactly what it is that you're afraid of.

I believe it was Stephen Pressfield who said that the more inner resistance we face towards doing something, the more vital it is for our personal growth…and this is so, entirely true. When you're afraid to do something, you're on the verge of a massive breakthrough in your personal evolution. When you confront your fear, and tell that bastard "fuck you," as you fly in its face and do what it is that you want to do, you take another step towards becoming the ideal version of yourself.

Whether it's learning game as a newbie, making an irrevocable commitment to yourself, or deciding to leave behind your material life to pursue a passion, if you're afraid of it, you can bet your ass that you need to do it. As David Deida says, “Fear needs to become your friend, so that you are no longer uncomfortable with it.”

4. On Living Life

> If you are waiting for anything in order to live and love without holding back, then you suffer. Every moment is the most important moment of your life. No future time is better than now to let down your guard and love.

This quote speaks to me on a very deep and personal level. For most of my life, I was afraid to just be myself. Years of dysfunctional relationships and abuse had left me a completely broken shell of a man, too afraid to live life on his own terms.

But something told me that this would not do. In the words of C.S. Lewis:

> To love at all is to be vulnerable. Love anything and your heart will be wrung and possibly broken. If you want to make sure of keeping it intact you must give it to no one, not even an animal. Wrap it carefully round with hobbies and little luxuries; avoid all entanglements. Lock it up safe in the casket or coffin of your selfishness. But in that casket, safe, dark, motionless, airless, it will change. It will not be broken; it will become unbreakable, impenetrable, irredeemable. To love is to be vulnerable.

The man who waits for something, as David Deida says, in order to live and love without holding back, will ultimately only suffer. I’m struggling to find words that can express my thoughts without having to resort to cliches…and I can’t do it.

I can’t do it, because everything that needs to be said has already been said a million times before. It’s all a cliche, but that’s the point…a cliche is something that everyone recognizes to be true, but that nobody really lives by. Everyone, on some level, knows that we only have one life. Everyone knows that they’re going to die some day, and that they would be happier doing something else.

But nobody fucking does that something else. They just take the path of least resistance and end up dying a miserable, meaningless life, without having left anything behind. I implore you not to be like them; do not leave anything behind. To quote another oft quoted cliche: “Dream as if you’ll live forever. Live as if you’ll die today.”

5. On Masculine Purpose

> Every man knows that his highest purpose in life cannot be reduced to any particular relationship. If a man prioritizes his relationship over his highest purpose, he weakens himself, disserves the universe, and cheats his woman of an authentic man who can offer his full, undivided presence.

I thought a lot about which quote to include as my final piece of advice. There’s a plethora of incredible quotes on having a purpose from this book, but I thought that this one was the most poignant, because I believe it’s a lesson that many men have yet to learn, and what’s more, I believe that many of us have had to re-learn this lesson a number of times before finally accepting it.

You. Must. Not. Make. A. Woman. Your. Purpose.

When you make a woman your purpose, you deny the universe the greatest gift that you can give it. As a man, being on your purpose is not only your obligation, but it is the only way that you will be happy. Why do you think that depression is such a widespread disease among so many modern men? It’s because they lack a strong sense of purpose.

For millenia, our purpose was given to us; we had not a choice. Our purpose was to defend the tribe from invaders, and to protect our women and children, as well as our brothers in arms. But now? We have no purpose. We have no great war, no impending doom…just a miserable existence in a world devoid of purpose. This is our gift.

“How can this be our gift, Jon? We have no purpose!” I can hear someone ask. Yes, you’re right. We do, in fact, have no purpose.

Now, it’s our turn to create one.

It’s our time to forge our own destinies, and charge down our own paths, carving out our places in the world, creating a ripple of positivity that will last for eons. It’s our time to delve deep into our own souls, and discover our life’s meaning. It’s time to take responsibility for our own destinies…and I hope that you’re all up to the task, because we’ve got one hell of a road ahead of us.

Summary

If these five quotes have been meaningful to you, then you need to read this book. I cannot stress how life-changing it was for me, and I’m thankful that I read it during a time when I was having a personal crisis. I would likely not be the same man that I am today without his guidance.

David Deida is one of my favorite authors on masculine spirituality; as I said before, he forcefully exposes red pill truths, yet he writes them so eloquently and beautifully, that even the most hardened feminist could appreciate them. If you are wise, you will get yourself a copy, highlight it, dog-ear it, and re-read it for years to come. That’s what I’ve done, and it’s served me well.

Barack Obama: Dreams From An Absentee Father

September 8, 2016 | by Jonatan Stamm | Link | Original Link

For most of the last decade after the onset of Obamamania, I was gas-lighted by the man. Don't get me wrong: I was always skeptical of the limits of soaring elocution and of the capacity of a pastor-in-chief to effect positive transformation in America. But following George W. Bush's neocon adventure in Iraq—which continues to make all our lives worse—I was not entirely opposed to Obama's rise.

Gradually, with the deadlock in Washington and the general mediocrity and legislative malaise of the Obama administration, I developed an apathy to him. I watched as he dug deeper into the moral trenches, grandiloquently casting everyone who disagreed with him as "on the wrong side of history." I saw that he was highly left-brained, unimaginative and predictable. It became clear that he didn't care what the average American thought about him, so long as the editors of The New Yorker or fellow Harvard Law alumni recognized his genius.

On matters of basic liberal policy, he was content with not getting his hands too dirty after the healthcare debacle, so long as historians recognized his unrealized potential. But it was only in the last year that I was jolted awake not just to Obama's operational failings, but also to his ideological ones. Through his catatonic auto-responses to terrorist attacks in Paris, Brussels, Orlando and Nice, he didn't leave me any choice but to replace years of apathy with real suspicion. It was impossible not to notice that the script he followed after the attacks was always the same:

1. Express condolences and solidarity to the victims.

2. Offer a comforting anecdote (e.g. “France is America’s oldest ally”).
3. Express a resolve to take the battle against ISIS to another level, with more intelligence-sharing and airstrikes, while downplaying any link to Islamic terror.
4. Expend great effort defending diversity and saying that if we turn on each other, the terrorists win.

This last step, in which Obama’s passions show most conspicuously, is where he overplays his hand. He insists, “We must keep doing what we’re doing or else the terrorists win” (translation: “Let’s uphold the cycle of Wahhabi–Zionist violence while inviting all peoples and ideologies to America”). But humans, though causelessly searching for new obstacles for themselves, need the veneer of progress and forward momentum. So telling Americans to simply carry on is a psychological dead-end. But that’s the least of Obama’s flaws, for his prescription for us to do nothing (as if more intelligence-sharing and airstrikes constitutes something) betrays his deeper motives at the core of his character.

The center cannot hold.

Obama Debates An ROK Reader

At this point, if you, a perceptive Westerner, could debate Obama, you might tell him that America should stop trying to be all things to all people.

“A country that strictly controls its borders and alienates major populations will be full of hatred and will be a prime ISIS target,” Obama might retort.

“But what about Japan and Poland?” you ask.

“Those countries are on the wrong side of history!” Obama says.

“Why can’t we be more like them? We’ll stop meddling in the Middle East and we’ll have a stronger identity at home.”

“No way,” says Obama.

“Why?” you say.

“But I need something more from this country, Obama. I feel no civic engagement. I feel like our identity’s been hollowed out and outsourced. This place is one big strip mall. I can’t even talk to my neighbors because we have nothing in common and they hardly speak English. Something needs to change.”

“What is the American dream in 2016?” you ask.

“My dream.”

The Distillation Of Obama’s American Dream

In speech after speech, Obama spends the lion’s share of time exhorting the world not to discriminate between peoples and ideologies, insisting that violent extremists are unrepresentative of the mainstream—a mainstream that he and his fellow liberals get to define and massage the parameters of. This Soros-like conniption at a selective society is the germ of Obama’s political impulses. By comparison, he cares little about healthcare, poverty, job creation, inner-city violence, the environment, or Wall Street.

Obama’s American dream, it can hardly be debated, is a society of mixed-race knowledge workers who retweet John Oliver videos and spiral out in virtue-signalling and quota-filling as the national religion—all while partaking of the cult of economic growth and projecting American military power abroad to spread the seeds of globalism. Contra popular wisdom, Obama isn’t the martyr of a liberated, selfless, post-tribal world. Rather, he’s the step-child of a new globalist tribe of bankers, armchair moralists, and hordes of ressentiment whose mandate is to shred history and turn the debris into money.

If only we could just outsource all our beliefs to John Oliver.

Flanked by Merkel and Clinton, Barack Obama is the modern face of liberalism, wherein so long as he waves the rainbow flag and self-righteously balkanizes the West through worship of Otherness (“it’s who we are!”) and aggressive equality policing, he has impunity from bankers, media masters and the r-selected electorate to accomplish nothing. Only the age of Obama could afflict us with Justin Trudeau, an airheaded drama teacher who’d rather lead a gay-pride parade or deliver a historic apology than do anything else in the world.

The Rise Of Obama

Obama's rise is often explained as an inevitability of history, an everyday miracle in America's march towards fairness and openness to the world. And yet Obama is more of a unicorn than that, is more a one-off event whose mutations are being disseminated in the American (and global) genome. Despite insistences that Everyone Is The Same,™ Obama has little in common, culturally or intellectually, with many of his high-profile minority hires, such as Susan Rice, Jeh Johnson, Loretta Lynch and Katherine Archuleta. These are hardly state-of-the-art thinkers whose contributions would have been tragically denied us if not for Obama. (Witness former Attorney General Eric Holder, whose post-Administration job involves helping Airbnb craft a better "anti-discrimination policy.")

Obama's backstory is both completely different from those of his peers, and completely explanatory of his political mores. He was born to a Kenyan father who'd made the intergalactic leap from goat-herder brushing up against British colonial authorities to Harvard student. Obama Sr. must have been absurdly intelligent, which he combined with an unsurprising resentment towards colonialism: a heady combo that might explain his conversion to Islam and his abusive, alcoholic, pilfering behaviour.

The man had at least five wives and had children with most of them, including with a Lithuanian Jew and various Kenyans, one of whom was pregnant with his child when he met Stanley Dunham, the white American woman he married, impregnated, and abandoned. Indeed, the most striking thread of Obama's origins is his sprawling, globe-trotting, well-educated, and well-connected yet highly broken extended family, for Obama Sr. was not alone in trashing the traditional family unit: Stanley Dunham, ditched by Obama Sr., later married, bred with and divorced an Indonesian man, Lolo Soetoro Mangunharjo, who also later married and bred with another woman.

Barack Obama, living fatherless with his mother in Hawaii and Indonesia, had no first-hand experience of the American nuclear family, and probably little concept of the American mainland. In Dreams from My Father, he recollects his first trips to Europe and Africa, giving two paragraphs to Europe and 140 pages to Africa. About Europe, he says:

By the end of the first week or so, I realized that I'd made a mistake. It wasn't that Europe wasn't beautiful; everything was just as I'd imagined it. It just wasn't mine. I felt as if I were living out someone else's romance; the incompleteness of my own history stood between me and the sites I saw like a hard pane of glass. I began to suspect that my European stop was just one more means of delay, one more attempt to avoid coming to terms with the Old Man. Stripped of language, stripped of work and routine – stripped even of the racial obsessions to which I'd become so accustomed and which I had taken (perversely) as a sign of my own maturation – I had been forced to look inside myself and had found only a great emptiness there.

Contradicting the narrative in which Obama is post-racial, he rejected his 50% European ancestry in favor of the lineage of his father—a father who'd abandoned him to a white mother and grandparents. Under no illusion, however, that he was a full-blooded or cultural Kenyan, Obama settled on his identity as a black American global citizen who loved America insofar as it was a vehicle of racial and socioeconomic levelling. No wonder, then, that he took up Saul Alinsky's Rules for Radicals and got to community organizing in Chicago.

How Did Obama Change The World?

The changes wrought during the presidency of this former community organizer, who no doubt had little prior managerial experience and will never develop a marginally functional relationship with Congress, are drastic and manifold. The full-scale colonization of Europe, previously a steady drip, is now a torrent under this Europhobe, who, despite allegedly clashing with Angela Merkel in the early days, now considers that continent-wrecker his "favorite ally."

In America itself, Soros-funded Black Lives Matters protesters extort and disrupt taxpaying citizens while trumpeting violence against cops, at whose funerals Obama uses the eulogy to lecture the bereaved about white supremacy, leading to more blue deaths. (Never mind that in many Western cities, these bastions of white supremacy, a stroll downtown often reveals more bi-racial than mono-racial couples—an outcome that Obama surely rubs his hands over.)

What's clear in 2016 is that we're not living in the age of facts, but of hysterical and hollow prostrations to a secular god. The liberal media and aspirational middle class, in contrast to much of the electorate, remains in thrall to Obama's moral imperialism, fawning over his words as the gospel of liberal egalitarianism, the dominant Western religion (and world religion, alongside Islam), whose main tenet might as well be, "If someone does a good deed and there's no one there to see it, then it doesn't exist," or, more commonly, "If someone has the right elite-ordained opinion and there's no one there to retweet it, then it doesn't exist."

In the thought dictatorship of the modern West, where the edgiest dissidents hide behind Twitter handles, Obama is free to issue transgender bathroom directives and Section 8 housing orders with no fucks given about the very certain fracturing of society or the metamorphosis of the Democratic Party from the workers' party to the party of big business and vice versa—no fucks given as he watches this landfill-sized dumpster fire that used to be American cohesion burn, because it was the type of damage he wanted all along: making us out in his image as people vibrantly broken and in no position to judge him.

Where Do We Go From Here?

The results of the election in the United States will change the world. The neo-liberal empire will either further entrench itself under Hillary Clinton, perhaps leading closer to a one-world government, or it will halt its expansion under Trump and try to retreat back to some fragile and palsied form of its republican roots.

The results of the former scenario are easy to envision (because we're living this reality now): unprecedented cultural strife, with America like a doctor strapping its nation-state patients (France, Germany, etc.) to the operating table and anesthetizing them in hopes that the seizures stop, that everyone just gets with the program of international culture and “The End of History.”

One patient, however, is too big and too cohesive to subdue—China—meaning the result of the Obama-Clinton-Soros doctrine, a generation or two down the line, could very well be a world split between a godless, consumeristic, terror-infested Gay-Muslim-Globalist federation (the West) and a powerful Chinese ethno-state (possibly allied with Russia and Iran). The result of a Trump presidency, on the other hand, might be a mere slowing and protracting of the latter dynamic, or it could be a splitting of the world into more spheres of influence—something Western power brokers absolutely do not want.

Is this the future we’re heading towards?

Learning From Obama

Whatever the outcome, men of influence would do well to recognize and internalize aspects of what made Obama so capable of universalizing his narrative: his statesmanlike eloquence, his seeming rationality, his seemingly encyclopedic knowledge, his camera-readiness. Influential dissidents like Roosh, Milo, Stefan Molyneux, and Mike Cernovich show some of these qualities as they go beyond simple statistics, essays and memes.

They know that in the cathedral of taboos and no-go thoughts that is the modern West, there’s an unmet black-market demand for people willing to tell the truth, a truth that is antithetical to Obama’s reason for getting up every morning. But whereas Obama, an offshore American, could fly in from Hawaii and ride the waves of decades of mass immigration, family disintegration, social programming and cat-lady liberationism to preach a feel-good (if naïve and insidious) narrative that even his opponents had to recognize and smile at, men willing to tell the truth in today’s world will be reviled and their livelihoods and safety will be threatened, no matter how well they present themselves. This is the conclusion of Obama’s age of hope: the age of heretics.

ROK Undercover: What It’s Like To Attend An Eastern Orthodox Church Service

September 9, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

This week we conclude the series on conservative religions in America. Parts one and two are here.

Eastern Orthodox Church

Moscow Cathedral – Architecture matters!

While relatively unknown to mainstream Western Christians, the Orthodox Church (Greek for “right belief”) sees itself as the original, and most accurate Christian faith, following the teachings, practices, and beliefs of the original Christians from the time of Christ. While there are only 6 million followers in North America, worldwide, it is the second largest Christian group with over 225 million members. They believe that since the time of the religion’s founding, nothing has been added to their faith, and nothing can be added.

For the first thousand years, there was only one Christian church–the Orthodox church. The Catholic church is an offshoot of the Orthodox church, separating in the East-West Schism of 1054. Since that time, the Catholic Church evolved and modified teachings, adding ideas such as a Pope who is above all other men, and priests which are restricted from marrying, purgatory, indolences, predestination, crusades, and original sin. These are strictly Catholic ideas, and not Orthodox ones. From the Orthodox view, these are perversions of the faith of Christianity.

The Protestant religions (Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, etc.) later split from the Catholic church in the 1500s, due to rebellion against these Catholic beliefs, which the Orthodox church did not follow. However, instead of returning to the original (orthodox) faith, new religions were created, which have further splintered Christianity.

This is primarily due to the fall of Constantinople in 1453, when the Byzantine Empire was defeated by the Ottoman empire, thus cutting off lines of communication between the Orthodox church and Western Europe. The church lost much power and influence, as well as priests to correspond with the west and reinvigorate an Orthodox movement. Without this support, Luther and his followers created new religions that they felt were better than the Catholic beliefs.

If one is a fan of history, then there is much to learn from the Orthodox beliefs, as indeed much of Western civilization was shaped by the ideas of Christianity, as practiced by the Orthodox faith (obviously the Catholic church played a huge role in Western civilization as well over the past 1000 years). If one follows the Christian faith, or is merely interested in this period of history, I strongly encourage at least a basic introduction to the ideas of Orthodoxy, if for no other reason than to understand your roots and history.

Icons

People are greatly influenced by what they contemplate (see: television and public degeneracy), and the Church, endeavoring to encourage its members to contemplate God, uses icons to visually proclaim what the Bible and Gospels proclaim in text. Icons often depict Jesus, saints or angels, typically in portrait style, and with symbols that encourage reflection on holiness and mystery.

Sacraments

Unlike some Protestant faiths which preach that you can simply make an acknowledgement that Jesus is the Son of God, and proceed as you were, knowing your position is secured in heaven, the Orthodox church requires moral behavior, and encourages one to live in a Christian manner. The church has major sacraments which include baptism, confession, marriage, holy orders, and anointing of the sick. There are periods of fasting, when one is expected to refrain from meat and dairy, followed by feasts, which celebrate important people or events in the church.

There are morning prayers (matins) and evening prayers (vespers) which a follower should observe. The celebration of sacraments is always led by an ordained clergyman, typically the local priest. The worship is focused around the Eucharist “thanksgiving,” also known as the Divine Liturgy, which originates from the celebration of the Last Supper.

The Eucharist is similar to, but more than, a mass or communion. This is a community event; one does not come and observe a sermon given by a priest as an isolated person; one comes to join his congregation in the celebration of the Eucharist through song, prayer, and experience with his church community.

Confession

Confession is the Sacrament through which sins are forgiven, and man’s relationship to God is restored and strengthened. The priest is seen as a spiritual father, guide, and counselor. In the event of serious sin, confession is a necessary preparation for Holy Communion.

Marriage

I would like to witness an Orthodox marriage. The Sacrament of Marriage publicly joins a man as husband and wife, as they enter into a new relationship with each other, God, and the Church. Marriage is not viewed as a legal contract, and thus no vows are made. Neither is marriage a social institution, but an eternal Christian vocation that allows the husband and wife to grow closer to God. The question of gay marriage to an Orthodox isn’t even a possibility–regardless of whether they view a gay person as a sinner or just “born that way”, gay marriage simply does not exist and the Orthodox are not in the business of making up new rules.

My Visit

Upon visiting a local Orthodox Church, I was immediately drawn to a young, feminine mother at the front door, who kindly welcomed me while holding her child. Upon entering, my senses were overwhelmed simultaneously with the smell of incense, the beautiful interiors of green and gold, and the angelic singing of the choir. The service is conducted mostly standing, and there are strict rules which are never going to be challenged, because the church has barely changed in almost 2,000 years and therefore has no reason to begin now. The male priest leads the service, which has not changed in its basic form since the time of Christ.

The Christian Church

MAJOR DISAGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC AND EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCHES

	ROMAN CATHOLIC Western Part	Eastern Orthodox Eastern part
CLERGY	No married priest allowed	Married priest allowed
ICONS	Veneration accepted	Veneration initially rejected. later accepted
LEADERSHIPS	Roman pope was supreme church authority	Reject supremacy of Roman pope over local leaders
TRINITY	Accepted the view that the Holy Spirit combines both Father and Son	Maintained supremacy of the Father in the Trinity

Patriarchy is extremely important to the Orthodox

Indeed, while the church was the most welcoming to visitors of any I attended in this series, it was clearly stated in print that

> Communion is for those Orthodox who have fasted properly and been to Confession recently. Please try to introduce yourself to the Father ahead of time. Otherwise, be prepared to provide answers about your jurisdiction, your bishop and the last time you went to Confession. We do not offer communion to those outside the Orthodox Church. You are more than welcome to stay for the entire service, but we do ask to respect this most Blessed Gift.

The implication was clear—we don't just take anyone. You are expected to put forth effort, presenting yourself a better man before God, and needless to say, the priest does not issue pussy passes.

The congregation was eager to meet a newcomer, and was especially interested in my name. I have a Christian name, and have never given it any thought before, but upon visiting, if you have a name such as Matthew or Christopher or Peter, expect several people to comment on it. Much of the congregation, while having no accent, came from Eastern European ancestry, and after the service there is an amazing spread of ethnic food provided by the congregants.

I enjoyed the service and people here the most, but my modern mind finds the old service boring and tedious. I did talk to a couple of guys my age that would probably make better friends than some of the hipster douches that I have known since high school. At least one grandmother is eager to set me up with her granddaughter, and has already given me a delicious recipe for borscht.

The Orthodox church is a conservative, pious, strict community, but its people are very kind and welcoming. They have an earnest desire to understand and live this "right belief". It can be said that Catholics have added to the New Testament, through indulgences, purgatory, papal excesses, and a church hierarchy, and Protestants have subtracted from it, by ignoring good works and discipline. The Orthodox church remains much the same as it was 2,000 years ago, and if any Christian belief is to be held, it seems to me the truest and most honest.

Pros

- Interesting history
- Strong beliefs and tradition of being patriarchal and resistant to change
- Intolerant of degeneracy
- Great food
- Grandmothers who immediately want you to meet their single granddaughters (if a white male)
- In this series, the most accepted in the west (though most will not know what Orthodoxy is)

Cons

- Long, somewhat tedious service, though beautiful
- Includes fasting, confession, giving up impure behavior
- Probably slightly lower odds of finding a chaste woman vs. Islam / Mormons (at least in the west)

Conclusion

The Orthodox faith, while requiring a belief in the supernatural that may be difficult for many to accept, is the faith that has driven Western civilization, and was the institution which established our ethical and moral framework during the period when the West prospered and grew more than anywhere else on the planet.

I believe that today, it is the belief system that is most congruent with opposing degeneracy, and living a stable, happy, fulfilling life. Until a better institution comes along (and one would do well to observe the pros and cons of each of these religions in creating a new moral institution), the Orthodox church provides a strong framework for a happy family, lead by a strong patriarch.

While I am out of range of the Amish, these are perhaps the three most common conservative religions in America. Each has the possibility of providing a high quality woman, and a set of rules for maintaining a strong, happy family. While I would strongly consider a woman from any of these faiths, the beliefs and practices of the Orthodox church, were most appealing to me. If you are considering marriage, or want to lead a more spiritual life, I strongly encourage visiting one of these groups. I also recommend interested readers to check out the writings of our resident theologian, Aurelius Moner.

September 9, 2016 | by John Kyrios | Link | Original Link

Traditionalism, the absurd notion that society isn't a meta-individualistic nucleus for the propagation of anomie, is quite upsetting and inversive to the globalist order.

Is it possible that we, as people, have a historicity that transcends material dialectics? Is it possible that our cultural heritage, despite all its ignominious shortcomings, is not a badge of shame but rather an unlimited source of pride and power? Is our lurid folklore, as a communication of our past, not a celebration of who we truly are?

In the last few decades, traditionalism is perceived as a form of atavistic collectivism, an idealism that's embarrassingly superannuated to anyone capable of criticism and cultural sensibility. Tradition is equated with bloodshed; it is seen as the foundation stones to militarism, or as an antiquated concept that endangers civil peace whenever it serves as a device for patriotic rhetoric.

Whilst traditionalism, when radicalized to the extreme, is undeniably a destructive force, destruction is far from being the totalized, utmost definition of traditionalism.

Traditionalism, at the rare times of rational societal functioning, is a moral essence that unifies people around the communion of ritualized identity; it promotes the preservation of a legitimate self-knowledge that goes beyond egotism and subjectified precepts. Therefore, purveying clarity and spiritual strength, traditionalism is antagonizing to the postmodern left. The left, debased in ambiguity and the ironies of empty-minded sophistry, cannot tolerate brotherly love unless it's homophilic or incestuous.

Traditionalist values, in that they yield stability and foster a sense of commitment and obligation, go against the left's transfixedly chaotic irresolution, as manifested through the left's cowardly position of non-involvement and its lack of wholesome alternatives. In this brief essay, we'll examine two of the ways the left undermines traditionalism.

Asymbolia

Language, as we well know, is the power to transform ideation, remold normative behaviors, and erect and uproot civilizations. Academic and learned language, being the paragon most thinkers (that is, most ideologic dominators and worldbuilders) aspire to, is responsible for more damage than we can account for.

Certainly, speaking in realistic terms, the average factory machinist, who grinds rust all day long, too exhausted and too exploited to have time for intellectual leisure, cares little for Naomi Klein or Judith Butler (and rightly so; if anything, he should dwell on Heraclitus and Parmenides). But he is, nonetheless, affected by feminist discourse.

If, for instance, he looks wrong at a female co-worker, he can be accused of sexual harassment and lose his job. If he says something out-of-place to that same female co-worker, he can be accused of sexual harassment and lose his job.

If that same machinist has an affair with a woman and he decides to discontinue their romantic affiliation, to dump the bitch, that woman can extort him with shaming (or a false rape accusation) and everyone will side with her because the victim is always right.

Feminism, that despicable cargo cult of necrophagic vampires, however, isn't the academy's worst criminal offense against society. Far worse is the nullification, encryption and subversion of language itself.

The left, with its monopoly over the media and our educational institutions, when not overtaken with the surplus obfuscation of dialogue, is trying to create a language of equality and mediocrity. The problem is, we don't need such a language.

If we are to progress anywhere, we need explicitness, and we need conflict, debate, digressions. Writing should aim towards greatness, and great writing brings about enlightenment and aggrandizement, not reductionism and confused abjection. Great writing should help men make sense of the world; it should inspire them to seek answers and better themselves.

Understanding this simple reality, the left made it its purpose to restandardize literature and philosophy and divest the disciplines of their high aesthetic principles. The result? People genuinely think The Stranger is a profound and well-written novel.

News flash: it isn't.

To compare Camus and Sartre with Montaigne and Molière, is to compare a pile of dung with one of Rodin's sculptures. What sets these authors apart, other than diachrony, political orientation, mere talent and intellect, is the presence of traditionalism.

Although they were dissenting insurrectionists, as writers ought to be, both Montaigne and Molière had a more traditional, rigorous instruction—no single-sex education, sociology or communications!—and both were tied to traditionalist authority for their whole entire life. Montaigne was a statesman, Molière was Louis XIV's protégé.

Camus is best-described by Nabokov (who knew a thing or two about books): "Second-rate, ephemeral, puffed-up. A nonentity, means absolutely nothing to me. Awful." In degrading literature to colloquialism and banalities, making it an all-populist profession open to every underqualified, borderline hypochondriac, the left had hurt the world's language and thus culture's capacity for critical thought.

The less words we express ourselves in, the less free-thinking we are. The more equality there is in language, the more it signifies nothing.

Asymbolia, according to dictionary.com, is,

1. A loss of the ability to comprehend by touch the form and nature of an object.
2. A form of aphasia in which the significance of signs cannot be comprehended.

Asymbolia, make no mistake, is the state we are in thanks to the left. Objectivity's obsolete and long gone is the scholarly code of conducting thorough, comprehensive investigations into the nature of things. Epistemologically, more than ever before, our hermeneutics are excised and cut separate from fact and nature. Instead, we have Marxist newspeak and cryptography for history.

Likewise, asymbolia is a correlative of anti-symbolism. The left, with its adversity towards status symbols and with its fear of nationalism and religion, is making us signifier-illiterate; it denies the basic human need for allegory and myth (just like Camus and Sartre's existentialism undoes heroization).

No longer are we permitted to relish the beauty of our emblems. Instead, we wear t-shirts with corporate logos to convey wry self-awareness. De Sade's invaluable manuscripts burnt so we can have 50 Shades of Gray. Tragic.

De-Identification

When we aren't equipped with the analytical tools to define the surrounding world, it shouldn't come as a surprise we are estranged from ourselves. Identity is the backbone of character and integrity. Consequently, identity loss or de-identification—the dispossession of identity—is a symptom of social disintegration.

The left, in pardoning everything save for whatever hallucinated ills its marginalized ingroups endure, is anti-identity. Its devalued currency of selfhood and respect, alongside the naive ideas of liquidity, disenfranchisement and universalized pluralism, reeks of de-individualization.

The death of identity, assailing man's security and amplified by the anonymizing influence of urbanization (not to go all Entfremdung), is one of the main struggles we face as modern humans.

Take me, your humble abstractor, for example. I'm a White, European, Eastern Orthodox male, but in a free-choice era of trans-ethnicity and transsexualism, I can declare myself an Egyptognostic hermaphrodite of Hawaiian/Austroasiatic ancestry and expect you to take me most seriously. What more, you should change the way you speak and adopt gender-neutral pronouns to accommodate my oversensitiveness. And dare you not appropriate my new culture.

(The fact I can do this and not get ridiculed to exile or quarantined in a psych ward is alarming.)

Conclusion

The battle against anti-traditionalism is a difficult one because it’s turning more and more into a battle against ourselves. To win it, we must know ourselves and our history. We must defend what is ours with dignity and an indefatigable resolve.

A Simple Way To Screen For High Quality Foreign Girls

September 9, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Something has come to my attention recently in regards to screening foreign girls. A lot of guys are (rightfully) worried that they may be taken to town by a gold digger. That their foreign girl may love them far more for their wallet and chances of opportunity than for whom they are as a man.

First off, it's important to remember that women love opportunistically, not for love. Maybe there are some exceptions here and there, but for the most part it holds true. Much like how Brad Pitt and George Clooney have women throw themselves at them for their status, fame, and money—the same applies to foreign girls. Part of your attractiveness is the power you exude simply from having a Western passport, and all of the opportunities that come with it.

Even if you don't take those opportunities by the balls, you inherently have more value because of where you were born.

Is it fair? Absolutely not.

But it's life, and it's not supposed to be. After living here in Eastern Europe for nearly half a year, I definitely think many men in the Western world are squandering opportunities to date foreign girls—most of whom will bring them infinitely more happiness than the typical vapid American woman.

But how do you screen a foreign girl for quality and ensure she's not just some gold-digging whore? I've found a pretty simple way that will tell you a lot about her.

How To Screen Her

Here is the extremely simple way to screen her for quality: If you're in her country and don't speak the language—see how far out of the way she goes to help you.

Is she always willing to lend a hand with the local language, or does she leave you on your own to just struggle? This goes far, far beyond letting her do basic things like negotiate a taxi (for the locals, not foreigners rate) while you're right there next to her.

If a foreign girl is of high quality, she'll do things like:

1. Translate The Menu

If you end up at a place that doesn't have an English menu, does she painstakingly go through the entire menu and translate every dish for you? Or does she just say, "What do you feel like?" and read you two or three choices?

Even worse, if she makes you sit there and look like a dumbass using Google Translate on your phone for 10 minutes, you can rest assured she's got no interest in making your life simpler. But I'm sure she'll enjoy her meal.

2. Makes Sure You're Taken Care Of

If you're out one night and trying to find a way home, does she offer to give you a hand? I was out with my friends the other night, and had been texting my girl. My usual taxi app and Uber were both failing me, and I told her so. She instantly offered to call her usual cab company (Russian only, and I don't speak well enough yet to communicate on the phone) and arrange for them to pick me up and take me home.

She coordinated the whole thing from start to finish: calling the cab company and letting them know where I was, calling me when they arrived, and making sure I got home okay.

Sure, I could have just hailed one off of the street and paid a couple of extra bucks, but her willingness to help speaks volumes. On top of that, always let girls do more for you. It invests them and builds attraction. Game 101.

3. Never Guilt Trip YOU About HER Language

Sure, she'd love to communicate in her native tongue—but does she give you a bad time because you don't speak it? This is especially true if you go to a smaller country where there is not a worldwide language present.

For example, it's not unreasonable for a Colombian girl to really hope you'd know some Spanish, or want you to make an attempt to learn some. But you can use Spanish in dozens of countries around the world, and it's relatively easy to learn for a native English speaker.

On the flip side, if a Hungarian girl asked you to learn her language, which is only used in one small country, and is damn near impossible–that's different.

For the record, I'd say Russian falls somewhere in the middle of that. It's used in enough places that it's incredibly useful, but very difficult for English speakers to learn.

If she shames you or complains about not being able to speak in her native language (other than the occasional frustration from being unable to express herself), tread carefully.

Conclusion

It seems really simple on paper. But I really think this is one of the best ways to upfront screen a foreign girl for quality. If from the get-go she's not willing to go out of her way to help you, kick her to the curb.

Ironically enough, I'm one of the guys who really preaches to blend into a culture when you travel. To appreciate new things in the world. This would mean learning a few basics in the language, and not just walk up to people and expect them to know English.

But this is an exception.

You are in her country and she has a great opportunity by meeting you. Her ability to make life a bit easier for you, even if only for an hour, shows who she really is as a person. Too many men feel "guilty" about using the power of our Western passports to date foreign girls. Some men overseas and still give women the pussy pass, despite them being the high value one in the dating market.

You should continue to screen foreign girls ruthlessly and have high standards. And when you do, you can really find the good ones.

5 Ways Men Can Use Technology To Unmask Cheaters And False-Rape Accusers

September 10, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Whether men choose to admit it or not, it is hardwired into a modern woman's DNA to cheat on her husband or boyfriend, and that's just the way it is, as most red-pill men fully realize. And it is also deeply ingrained in a woman's nature to make false-rape allegations against men on occasion—in some cases, shortly after the men in question discover that their wives or girlfriends have indeed been cheating on them.

In the spirit of attempting to kill two birds with one stone here, while adhering to that old adage, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," I have compiled an outline of some extremely clever devices and software programs, which will allow you to get the goods on nearly any cheating female, and minimize the chances that she might ultimately be successful when filing a false-rape charge against you as well…

Important note: Many locales have laws that might get you into hot water if you utilize some of these devices and techniques while busting out your intended target. However, the lawmakers within those locales increasingly pass ridiculous laws with a vengeance, designed to effectively cut off your gonads or put you in prison on trumped-up charges. As always, you should weigh the price that you might ultimately have to pay for utilizing the devices and software programs outlined below, and carefully scrutinize all of the trade-offs first, prior to drawing your own conclusions. (For some really good legal tips for avoiding liability when gathering private information, click here.)

If you use your head, and some of the useful suggestions below as well, while crafting that five-star, solid-gold, mega-winning game plan of yours, you're very likely to come out on top…

1. Stealth video-recording and video-monitoring devices

There are more of these truly ingenious, stealth-video-recording devices, available in today's marketplace, than at any time in history. From stealth clock radios, to stealth water bottles, to stealth video camera pens that actually write with real ink (Home Depot has a model which you can view right here), the list of available equipment that a man might utilize in order to bust out his own, personal, serial-cheating snake-charmer—or an insane, sociopathic, attention-seeking, false-rape accuser—is basically endless.

Stealth clock radios which record both audio and video on the sly, are among the most effective in my opinion, as they can be placed directly on your night stand without drawing unwanted attention, while providing wickedly effective cover by actually functioning as both a clock and a radio. Some of these extremely clever stealth cameras shoot crisp, clear videos, while capturing surprisingly good audio as well. (Amazon offers some additional, effective, cheap, stealth clock radios, some of which utilize night vision…)

With this mini-car-keychain camera, you can discreetly capture stealth video and audio. This compact video camera is cleverly disguised as an ordinary-looking keychain fob – which makes it easy to carry with you on sleep-overs at potential-rape-acccusers' houses, or when visiting your special snowflake's place of residence. This tiny camera captures 720 x 480 resolution video at a rate of 30 fps. It also captures JPEG images and records audio; recordings are time-stamped and directly stored to a microSD card with a capacity of up to 16GB (which is not included).

To facilitate playback and to charge the built-in lithium battery, the camera connects to your Windows, Mac or Linux-based computer via a supplied USB cable. It only runs for a couple of hours, but if you are in a pinch and far away from your personal stash of home-surveillance equipment, this little beauty might do the trick, provided you switch it on at the right moment and place it on a night stand or something similar.

For another potential go-to weapon, which you could use in any carry-it-with-you plan of attack, you might try this clever smart watch that contains a hidden video camera and a microphone; you can play the video back and view it on the watch face, or watch it on your computer using the 8 GB microSD card that comes with it.

Whatever you do, don't let that divorced single mother with the hideous face shrapnel and the unsightly sleeve tattoos—or that college hottie who received one too many hugs from her uncle and is currently up to 23,000 "friends" on Facebook—ruin your life with a charge of false rape. Purchase one of these inexpensive lifesavers, and do it soon. Get that peace of mind you so richly deserve. If push comes to shove, you'll have all of the video and audio evidence that you will ever need, in order to convince even the most rabidly skeptical SJW stooge, that your rape accuser is as phony as her blue-colored hair…

2. Stealth audio-recording and audio-monitoring devices

She might be sly…but so am I…and this plug-in, audio/video-monitoring device is as sly as they come. Sporting a 1080-pixel HD video camera, while operating undercover as a USB-device wall charger, it's the perfect gift for that special snowflake of yours who's been keeping you up at night, tossing and turning, as you agonize over every minute detail of her latest contradiction-filled excuse…

Simply plug this wickedly clever device into an unused electrical outlet near the spot where your wife or girlfriend does most of her talking on the phone, and you can review every single syllable she uttered – or view every single man she hung out with – once you remove the 8GB storage card, and pop it into your computer. You can set this ingenious device to motion-detection only, or continuous play. The device also supports up to a 128 GB macro card.

Yes, you can actually watch and listen to all of the action that might be going down in any room of your choosing, just by purchasing this very cost-effective gizmo, and your innocent little honey muffin will be none the wiser while you do it. And it actually does charge cell phones, and other USB devices. So this truly is one very special gift, that actually gives something back of enormous value to the buyer, in return…

In addition, there are numerous stealth flash drives that you might purchase, which plug into virtually any computer—or which you might innocuously place on a tabletop or desktop. Not only do they record audio (as well as video, depending on the model) which you can monitor from your cell phone in some cases, but they actually store data, just like a regular flash drive. This is another wondrous gift for your special snookie-wookie, that truly does keep on giving ("The pleasure was all mine, sunshine, happy birthday!")…

Here's a highly rated, very inexpensive, audio-recording stealth flash drive that you might easily hide under the bed, in order to capture all of those wonderful night noises that your special snowflake makes, while she is "having a gay friend from college stay at her place". If she finds it, she'll think it's a flash drive, at which point you can simply say, "Damn, I've been looking for that all over. Thanks…"

3. Stealth phone-monitoring software

Sign up for this cool monthly service (provided by mSpy) and install the company's data-gathering software on your special snowflake's cell phone, and you can log in whenever you want, and view all of her incoming and outgoing phone calls, complete with phone numbers and time stamps; track and read all of her sexually explicit text messages while viewing her attached naked selfies; read those racy emails she claims she never sends or receives; track her GPS location to find out exactly where she is having sex on her "lunch break"; and much, much more.

This sanity-saving service offers a second piece of software for use with computers only. Bust your special little princess out today, and do it the smart way, by gathering every shred of data you might need, in order to convince yourself—or your divorce lawyer—that there truly are no loyal, female, LTR unicorns.

The company's legal info page contains language that reads, "User agrees to install this software ONLY on a device that is owned by the User or on a device for which User has been given explicit permission by the device owner for such installation." Now I'm no lawyer, but husbands and wives often have shared cell phone plans, and I believe you could buy a new cell phone for that special snowflake of yours (if you get her a really expensive one, she'll probably jump on it), and so long as the phone purchase and the monthly bill are in your name, you should be good to go here. You can read mSpy's legal info page right here, for more information.

4. Stealth computer-monitoring software

I'll find out what you're doing, even if I'm not there at the moment, cupcake…

Stealth computer-monitoring software is as common as hypergamous hotties who have a major itch for massive piles of cash. You can select from an ample array of stealth computer-monitoring software—such as this monthly service offered for computers by mSpy—and find out every single keyboard "stroke" your loyal-and-devoted snickerdoodle is providing to countless beta orbiters and fuck-buddies in her truly charmed, self-empowered, orgasmically delightful sphere of existence.

5. Stealth automobile-monitoring and automobile-tracking devices

If mSpy is a bit pricey for your tastes, or if you don't want any recurring monthly expenses – or if you simply want to quickly find out where your perennially faithful female friend is actually going during her all-too-frequent "weekend getaways with her girlfriends" – installing this nifty little gadget into the OBD port of her motor vehicle might just do the trick. (The OBD port is the engine aperture that an auto mechanic plugs into, in order to test the functionality of the engine light, and every car manufactured after 1996 supposedly has one, according to the company's website.)

In addition, there are numerous ways to effectively bug your special snowflake's vehicle, so you can monitor every single word she utters – "Yes! Yes! Oh god! Harder!", etc. – as she's "driving across town to visit her girlfriend from college."

If you really want to get clever, you can use a high-tech bug and place it in any car of your choosing (not to mention any room in any building), and it will dial your telephone number and let you listen in on the conversation, whenever your sweet little princess is having a nice, X-rated chat with "that guy she's just friends with from work". You can also use it to listen in while she's actually in the process of getting banged by him. The company in question alleges that it will not ship this product to anyone living in the United States, unless they can prove they are a member of law enforcement, but I wholeheartedly believe that money still talks to pretty much everybody, so if you reside in the USA, you'll have to contact them in order to be 100% sure…

Conclusion

One way…or another…I’m gonna find ya…I’m gonna getcha-getcha-getcha-getcha…

If you are really determined to get the goods on your cheating wife or girlfriend—or throw a major monkey wrench into the plans of any predatory female who might eventually file a false-rape charge against you—all you have to do is allow technology to be your best friend, and let it rip.

Now, I don’t know for certain, but I’d wager a hefty sum that most of the available devices offered in today’s burgeoning spy-device marketplace, were invented by men. And even if some of them weren’t, you are still very likely to be much more creative than your special snowflake is, by sheer force of biological design. So utilize some of these widely available high-tech spying devices and software programs, as soon as you possibly can, and prove it to her…

Hillary Clinton Calls At Least 20% Of American Voters "Deplorables" For Supporting Trump

After her failed alt-right speech, which ironically saw her "extremist" opponent equal and then surpass her in the polls, Hillary Clinton has resorted to labeling half of all Donald Trump's supporters as a "basket of deplorables." These voters are allegedly "racist, sexist, homophobic, xenophobic, [and] Islamaphobic." Her highly unusual remarks, which buck an unspoken rule that politicians should not directly ridicule broad sections of voters, are being interpreted by many conservative outlets as a sign of serious panic within her campaign.

In recent months, a number of alleged scandals involving Donald Trump have either failed to dent his popularity or have seen that popularity bounce back very quickly. Only a few days ago, CNN, one of the media outlets which has most strongly and consistently predicted a Clinton election victory, acknowledged that Trump was now polling ahead of her nationally.

Hillary Clinton's two recent anti-rightwing speeches, her attacks on the alt-right and so-called "deplorables," have come during periods when Trump has seriously threatened to derail her campaign.

Even Time, hardly a repository for balanced political commentary, felt the need to point out that presently 43% of probable American ballot-casters are backing Trump. That equates to over 50 million people who currently will vote for him, which means that over 25 million fall into the "deplorables" category created by Clinton. And remember that this bloc is part of a much more heavily divided field than normal, as high numbers of voters are expected to vote either Libertarian or Green Party.

A very good cross-section of Libertarian voters and many of those not intending to vote at all would also prefer Donald Trump over Hillary Clinton, these groups being largely in agreement with many of Trump's signature policies, particularly on issues like border control, eschewing overseas nation-building, and tackling the national debt. The dig by Clinton towards Trump and many millions of his supporters is thus a dig at millions of others, too.

What about Hillary's own history as a "deplorable"?

"Beware of the black youth… I mean super-predators!"

The comments by Clinton about Trump supporters ironically came during a LGBT for Hillary fundraising gala. Like her old rival and later boss Barack Obama, she has a very chequered past of openly opposing gay marriage, the same stance conservatives are currently called bigots for holding.

Hillary's conversion to supporting gay marriage happened only in March 2013, just after she resigned as Secretary of State and as she could begin to organize her 2016 Presidential campaign behind the scenes. This switch was very, very convenient, as it would enable the former First Lady and New York Senator to widen her appeal, especially given the Clintons' reputation as relatively rightwing Democrats. The gay marriage backflip doubled-up as the perfect strategy for minimizing the popularity of a more progressive primaries and caucuses opponent like, you guessed it, Bernie Sanders.

A common trope used by gay marriage advocates is to attack non-supporters as being homophobic. Consequently, by these sorts of loose standards, Hillary herself belonged to the ranks of the "deplorables" she is now admonishing until only three and a half years ago. This is hardly the record on which a "champion" for gay rights wants to or should be campaigning.

Then there's her historical use of extremely charged racial rhetoric. Among other incidents, the "super-predators" language of the 1990s and the various pieces of legislation centered on this concept were respectively popularized (after their initial academic coining) and steadfastly supported by Hillary Clinton. The "super-predators" comments, involving thinly veiled generalizations of African-American youth, have never been renounced by Clinton and were defended by her and her husband during her abortive 2008 Presidential campaign. Yet speech by conservatives falling well short of this is routinely refered to as "racism" today. Once again, Hillary is on this count either still a "deplorable" or at best a recently changed "deplorable."

Will this be Hillary's "47% moment"?

During the 2012 Presidential campaign, GOP nominee Mitt Romney was derided in the media for his infamous "47% speech." More or less rightfully, he admitted to a private group of potential business donors that large groups of voters receiving government financial assistance were and remain wrapped around the little finger of the Democrats. Because the Republicans typically challenge the spiraling rates of government spending, it would indeed be nigh on impossible to sway them to the conservative side of politics.

Unlike Romney, however, Clinton has opted to savage the characters of tens of millions of voters, not merely point out their firm allegiance to her opponent. This could portend very badly for the Democratic nominee both for the upcoming election and into her first term should she win. Clinton is expected to severely clamp down on the alt-right if she succeeds in November and it seems this alt-right has now been enlarged to include half of all Trump supporters, not to mention non-voters or Libertarians with sizeable Trump sympathies.

Irrespective of whether she triumphs, Clinton may have just made more enemies than she and her leftist allies can deal with. Will winning the White House be just the start of her troubles? And then there's the damage done by the "deplorables" comments to her actual chances of winning. Time will tell, but this might very well be the moment we look back on and say, "This was the day Hillary lost the 2016 Presidential election."

How To Fight Politically Correct Language

September 11, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

As a fan of the English language—even with its quirks and inconsistencies—I really hate seeing it butchered. Political correctness has been doing quite a bit of butchering over the years. Their fetish for erasing differences between the sexes figures prominently, along with other ideological considerations, of course.

The Sapir-Whorf hypothesis states that a language's structure has an influence on how people think about the world. As Edward Sapir put it:

> Human beings do not live in the objective world alone, nor alone in the world of social activity as ordinarily understood, but are very much at the mercy of the particular language which has become the medium of expression for their society. It is quite an illusion to imagine that one adjusts to reality essentially without the use of language and that language is merely an incidental means of solving specific problems of communication or reflection. The fact of the matter is that the "real world" is to a large extent unconsciously built up on the language habits of the group.

Politically correct language is an attempt to engineer this effect. Orwell's addendum to 1984 concerning Newspeak is relevant here, touching on changing language as a method of thought control. Aside from mass surveillance, this is one example of how Orwell's predictions have become rather prophetic lately.

The cultural Marxists have quite a bit of terminology loaded with unstated assumptions meant to promote their views. For instance, many words ending in "-ism" or "-phobia" are shorthand to label something as bad without having to explain why these things are supposed to be bad. We can fight their linguistic brainwashing attempts by having fun with them and making their efforts look silly.

Politically correct butchering of the English language

Chill out, babe!

Beginning in 1976, there has been an alternative spelling for the delightful and beautiful people I love so much: womyn, or wimmin in the plural. This is done by some of the same who aren't quite so delightful and beautiful themselves! Rarely, this spelling is used by a handful of male feminists, the equivalent of chickens voting for Colonel Sanders. (If they're going to take "man" out of "woman," then how about if they fix "menstruation" and "menopause" too? We don't have anything to do with that, and we don't want to either.)

Since I've studied Anglo-Saxon, I could quite easily explain that man was a generic word for human being, and that wer and wif were the gender-specific versions. Instead, rather than casting my pearls before swine, I'll simply take this as a sign that she has a chip on her shoulder and certainly isn't worth taking seriously. If you have to interact with someone misspelling "woman", then start consistently spelling "woman" as "babe". That doesn't have "man" in it; everyone happy yet?

During the 1990s, politically correct euphemisms came into vogue. For just one funny example, I remember them twisting themselves in knots deciding what to call a "manhole." We can't let all those babes in hardhats feel slighted, now can we? All those pointless word games show the subjectivist goal of trying to change reality by changing the language. Still, all that goofiness was a waste of their time. Calling someone in a wheelchair physically challenged won't help that person walk. Anyone who thinks that makes a difference must be mentally challenged. (Oops, I just committed ableism!) Whenever you see things like that, have fun showing them that they're intellectually differently abled.

Then there's the usage of CE and BCE as substitutes for AD and BC. It means the same thing, just putting a fig leaf over its origins. I'm not objecting to this annoying calendrical bowdlerization on religious grounds, but rather because this is an assault on tradition and a proxy attack on Western civilization. No matter what one's religion is, it takes a special sort of willful ignorance to deny that Jesus was a very influential figure in the ancient world. Fine, let's start the calendar with Julius Caesar, the original JC. Whenever you see BC and BCE, start adding 100 years to the dates and continue to use BC and AD, but insist that this now means Before Caesar and Anno Dictatoris.

Many recent PC academic terms are based on Greek, Latin, or a bastardization of the two sometimes with English thrown into the linguistic meat grinder: kyriarchy, cisgendered, heteronormative, blah blah blah. Whenever you see a barrage of these made-up terms adopted from Greek or Latin because they make the speaker seem intellectual, then throw in some German phrases. For instance, das heißt (that is to say), Weltanschauung (world view), Wille zur Macht (will to power), und so weiter (etc.) German sounds cool and bracing, while using made-up Greek and Latin terms makes the speaker seem like a neckbeard who has a collection of vintage NPR coffee mugs autographed by Daniel Schorr.

Martian pronouns

Martians talk funny.

Lately, as part of a push to erase distinctions between males and females, we're now seeing an uptick in attempts to use made-up gender neutral pronouns. Whenever I hear someone say "they" instead of referring to a singular "he or she", it makes me cringe. I find similar efforts in other languages to be less irritating; if I see amigo/a or

Student|innen, it doesn't make me want to throw rocks.

Now we have a batch of made-up pronouns, "xe / xir / xirs" being the most popular lately as substitutes for "he / him / his" or "she / her / hers". It's not even consistent, since there are lots of variants, for example using 'z' in place of 'x'. Not only is the thought behind it annoying, it's just plain ugly. If an artfully crafted sentence is like an original Van Gogh, then using yucky made-up pronouns is like a kid in the museum "improving" it with a can of spray paint. It doesn't sound like English; it sounds like Martian.

We do not want this to catch on. Since Martian pronouns are starting to come into vogue with people who don't know what sex they belong to, we're probably going to see more of this in the future. Now is the time to stop this linguistic hideousness in its tracks before it becomes the next smelly little orthodoxy.

Showing its ridiculousness is the answer, and I have a solution. Whenever you see someone writing with Martian pronouns, then write back using Old Norse pronouns. If you prefer, Japanese or Swahili will work too. Still, I'll admit that I'm biased, since I've studied Old Norse in order to get in touch with my roots. Other than that, it does have a somewhat distant relation to English, unlike Martian. Finally, Old Norse has a certain vital spirit to it; the Vikings were cool that way.

Old Norse grammar is as tough as the winters in Aldeigjuborg. Still, it has a couple of interesting features. It has dual pronouns—like Anglo-Saxon had—for "us two," "you two," and "the two of them." Actually, it had a gender-neutral usage for plurals, without some dweebs trying to force them to do so. If referring to a group of both men and women, you use the neutral plural. Isn't that something everyone can be happy about?

So here's how it would go.

> SJW: "It's about time that we revise the Marxist slogan to 'From each according to xir ability, to each according to xir needs'. You see, 'his' is gendered and that can be very triggering."
> You: "If Leonid Brezhnev were still around to see þik, then hann would weep bitterly for hans cause. Hverar wasting time with politically correct pronouns need to get þau priorities in order."

Doing this will point out that if he/she/it won't use English properly, then two can play that game. I've done this before, and noted an amusing increase in snippiness. You might not win their hearts and minds that way, but at least they might quit butchering the English language, or hopefully shut up.

This is far from an exhaustive list, but consider it an example of what to do. Anyway, have fun mocking their silly word games and bizarre terminology.

The Stunning Accuracy Of The Book Digital Nomad

September 11, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Digital Nomad, a now somewhat forgotten book which was first published in 1997, was one of the first major books which explored and hypothesized a near-future world where office buildings, and the commuter culture which so many people despise, have been rendered obsolete by mobile technologies which allow people to earn a reliable income from anywhere on the planet they choose.

It is a dream for many young men in the west to be a digital nomad and become location independent, chiefly via running an online business. If it happens to become successful, they are free to escape the "feminism" (female superiority) and degeneracy of their homegrown countries, and instead set up shop in one of the world's premier love tourism destinations like Rio de Janeiro, Medellin, Poland, the Philippines, or the Ukraine among others.

Brasil – C’mon player, you know you want it.

The pull factors are certainly very enticing. Even though they have unique drawbacks like any other place, they are (mostly) modestly priced spots where women still act, dress, and carry themselves like women. In short, the antithesis of overpriced feminazi cesspools like Australia, New Zealand, Sweden, San Francisco, or Toronto for example.

Places like Chiang Mai in Thailand are very popular for Digital Nomads too, especially for people who are just starting out in the game or aren’t particularly concerned with chasing women or taking part in stupid (and exploitative) Elephant-riding tours all day.

But is the digital nomad lifestyle truly achievable for the masses as we are approaching the closing years of the 2010’s? And just how accurate was the pivotal 1997 book in predicting our world about 20 years down the line? Here I will review some important quotes from the book, with all occurring within the first 25 pages of the publication.

“Over the next decade, technology will deliver us a range of tools that will give us all the facilities of our homes and offices – in our pockets.”

Mostly correct. While smartphones did not really become ubiquitous until the 2010’s, it’s timing prediction was only a couple of years off. However, many people would argue that not “all” of the facilities of our home offices are suitable for a mobile phone.

“Governments naturally hate nomads. They are difficult to tax and impossible to control. Therefore to governments they have traditionally represented a threat.”

Absolutely correct. First world governments hate their citizens being taken out of the local taxation pool, and want everyone to be “on the grid” for social control. Unfortunately, this bureaucratic desire is why so many jobs, which could otherwise be completely location independent, require workers to be entirely on-site in super expensive cities like San Francisco.

“At the moment, we do not have the ability to communicate by video link between any two points on the planet. But we will have it, and it will generally be affordable, within ten years. We will be able to see people, documents and pictures wherever they happen to be, from anywhere we happen to be."

Correct. Video calls became more common and affordable by the late 2000s, and by the 2010's certain applications like Skype and Whatsapp have done away with the cost of video calling, texting, or sending pictures and documents completely.

"With a link into the internet, anyone can already access exactly the same information as a travel agent."

Correct. Websites like Expedia and Skyscanner have entirely killed off the need for travel agents, and they save yourself a commission fee while your at it. Good riddance to them.

"For some workers – those tied to the production line in a factory, or to a particular person, like a secretary – there will not be any benefit to be gained from the new technologies."

Correct. Only those who work with computers and communications technology can truly benefit from the digital nomad experience. Certain skilled tradesmen (like electricians or oil & gas workers) can take their skills globally, but they will have to be fixated at certain areas and they may require additional licensing that I.T. workers don't have to deal with.

"Universities could become 'virtual', setting courses and conferring degrees without the physical manifestations of buildings or campus"

Correct. Online degrees have become common in the 2010's, and with how ridiculously expensive and Marxist most American campuses have become, it boggles the mind as to why they are not ubiquitous. $40,000 a year is a lot of money to pay for white guilt indoctrination and "safe spaces".

"The technology, of course, affords both possibilities. It can create the ultimate 'couch potato', someone who never leaves the living room sofa, or the ultimate nomad, someone who is forever on the move."

Absolutely spot on. While those with discipline and drive can make the most out of being a digital nomad, the information overload and non-stop distractions of Youtube, Pornhub, Facebook, Instagram, Twitter, and Netflix are detrimental to legions of others.

"Women have always been seen as more inclined to settle down than men – would cheap, available nomadism lead to even more disintegration of family life in the west than we are already experiencing? Or will it be the women who take off?"

This is left open to interpretation since it's presented in the form of a question, but yes, digital nomadism has led to an explosion of travel obsessed women who wish to take endless narcissistic photographs and ride the cock carousel until they are in their mid 30's. At which point, they think they will still be entitled to a Beta male provider who will completely overlook her rapidly declining looks and sky-high notch count when she wants to "settle down".

This has been one of the single most unfortunate backlashes of modern technology, and it is indeed leading to the disintegration of family life.

Conclusion

Overall, Digital Nomad was an enjoyable (if somewhat archaic) read which very accurately predicted the not-too-distant future of mobile communications technologies. Unfortunately, the books sense of optimism has not really come to fruition for untold numbers of wannabe digital nomads.

It is extremely difficult to earn a truly GOOD living via nomadism alone, and the sheer amount of hours that many people have to put into their businesses can negate all of the gains of wanting to be a perma-traveler in the first place.

As much we love entrepreneurship in the manosphere, one should not necessarily have to feel guilty about holding down an office or engineering job from time to time, especially if you are clearing $100k or more (which most digital nomads aren't getting anywhere close to).

In closing, consider this book if you want to take a trip down memory lane and appreciate it's accurate foresight, but don't get discouraged if your digital nomad aspirations won't become a reality. This book assumes it will become the norm, but for at least 95% of people that's just not going to happen.

4 Ways To Improve Shoulder Mobility

September 11, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

I, and presumably most of the people reading my articles, are big fans of weight training and rigorous calisthenics. And who can blame us? Resistance training increases size and strength, makes you more physically capable, makes you more attractive to the opposite sex, increases production of androgens, and increases confidence and self-esteem.

But, like all physical activities, there is a risk of injury and long-term physical ailments-improper lifting technique can lead to blown out knees, rotator cuff injury, and slipped vertebral discs, but even relatively proper lifting can lead to repetitive stress injuries such as the ailment commonly known as "lifter's shoulder"

And even if you don't have pain, the shoulders also bear a risk of getting "gorilla posture"-this occurs when a novice weightlifter focuses too much on the front of his torso (doing bench presses, overhead presses, push-ups, etc.) without properly training his back muscles and/or stretching the muscles of the chest, giving him shoulders that hunch inward despite their breadth.

Many, but certainly not all, lifters will find themselves with cracking and popping shoulders at the very least, and lingering shoulder pain at the worst. Those same lifters will often “Grit through” the pain, a futilely valiant gesture that sometimes leads to long term injury.

I myself have never had any serious injury from weightlifting, but I have suffered from cracking and popping shoulders. And, seeking a way to resolve this problem, I came across a series of stretches (and one calisthenic exercise) that can reduce pain in your shoulders

1. The Stick Stretch

The stick stretch (dubbed the shoulder dislocation on the Art of Manliness where I found this picture) is one that seems to be making the rounds on fitness websites and in magazines as of late, but I have always been one to not dismiss something just because it has grown in popularity-simply put, this stretch is great for your shoulder and pectoral mobility.

To do this stretch, get a pole, cane, broomstick, pipe, or some other rigid object of sufficient length (4-5 feet long is what I would reconmend). Take a hold of the pole with your palms facing outward. Keep your arms straight, lock your elbows, and SLOWLY lift the pole up and over your head, touch the back, and back over the head and touch your stomach.

Do 10 repetitions of this to start with, and increase later on. I would start out with as wide a grip as possible, and once you develop more flexibility, you can move your hands closer together-but remember to always keep your arms straight. Moving your arms around can lead to pulling of the pectoral muscle, which of course defeats the purpose of stretching.

2. The Door Stretch

This is another stretch that targets the chest and shoulders, but in a different range of motion than the aforementioned stick stretch. For this stretch, stand slightly outside a door frame, straighten your arms, and reach them back behind you and grab the door frame.

Then, keeping the body straight and erect, shift the weight forward and lean, while keeping a hold of the door frame. You will feel a stretch in your pectorals and shoulders. Hold the stretch for 10-20 seconds, and then lean back. Repeat if necessary.

3. The Chest Stretch

This is a stretch that I have discussed before (As have other writers in this genre), but it's worth repeating-not the least because it requires absolutely no equipment whatsoever.

Stand up and put your feet together. Placing your hands on your hips, thrust the hips forward while looking up towards the ceiling. While keeping your balance, remove your hands from your hips and spread your arms out from your chest, keeping the arms straight and “opening” the chest as wide as possible.

The key to this stretch is to keep your arms straight while NOT locking your elbows-keep them “loose”. As usual, if you feel pain rather than a stretch, you’re doing it wrong.

Those three stretches are quite effective for shoulder and chest mobility-indeed, doing these stretches 2-3 times a week will make your chest and shoulders look a little bit broader and improve your posture, and many will stop at this goal. But if you really want to strengthen the shoulder girdle and ensure that you won’t have rotator cuff injuries in the future, you’re going to want to utilize the timeless art of gymnastics.

4. “SKIN THE CAT”

Skinning the cat is a gymnastic static hold, that actually represents the first, most basic step of the back body lever.

All of these holds will produce the same effect on your shoulders, but for the sake of ease, I will only instruct you on the easiest hold. Note that this is just a quick overview of the skill, and a full explanation of it (As well as steps to build up to it) will be for another article.

Grab a hold of a pull-up bar or a tree branch with the palms facing forward.

Then, using the strength of your abdominals, lift the feet up and pull them “through” the gap in your arms

From here, I rotated through to parallel. The picture consisted of my ass sticking out of a door jamb, so I didn’t include it.

Continue rotating until you can’t rotate anymore (you’ll feel your arms stop rotating.) Your stomach will be parallel to the floor

And hold. You will likely only be able to do a few seconds at first, just rotate back before you lose your grip and fall flat on your face.

The first time I worked any sort of back lever, I immediately noticed a reduction in shoulder popping and cracking. In addition, the next day I felt the proverbial “soreness in muscles I didn’t know I had”.

Conclusion

If cracking shoulders can be considered an inevitability of weight training, lifters around the world should know that they can be overcome (or at the very least reduced). These four exercises can make great inroads in doing so.

Media Reluctant To Question Hillary's Health After Her Rag Doll Collapse At 9/11 Memorial

September 12, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

On Sunday, just outside a memorial to commemorate the 15th anniversary of the September 11 attacks, Hillary Clinton spectacularly collapsed. Having been resting on a pillar by the road, she began wobbling and bopping like a robot or someone experiencing a seizure. Her aides and others had to literally drag her into a van that had just pulled up along with the rest of her motorcade. In spite of them, the media could barely be bothered to report on it.

> — Zdenek Gazda (@zgazda66) September 11, 2016

Secret Service members and other handlers appeared to be just as concerned with obscuring Hillary's medical episode as they were about keeping her safe from any external harms. Moments before, a woman believed to be Dr. Lisa Bardack was checking her pulse, trailed by that familiar burly man with medical training and a Diazepam-style injection pen:

The preliminary excuse by campaign officials for Clinton's exit in New York City was that she had felt "overheated" and needed to go to her daughter Chelsea's apartment to recuperate. Nonetheless, temperatures were hovering around just 80 degrees Fahrenheit (the mid-20s Celsius) around the time she left and before that had only been in the 70s. Significant suspicions were also raised because it took her campaign some ninety minutes to even give an explanation as to what had happened. None of the press corps were seemingly allowed to know what had transpired before this, let alone permitted to follow her. If the incident was so minor, why the veil of secrecy? This is all in addition to Clinton's refusal for nearly a year to hold an open press conference, as Donald Trump has many times.

In damage control, a statement by Clinton's team revealed she had been diagnosed with pneumonia two days earlier. Her ailment had not been previously disclosed. Prior to the pneumonia concession, The Washington Post's Chris Cillizza, a noted, ad hominem attacker of those questioning Hillary's physical capacity, finally admitted that her health was now a legitimate campaign issue. His mea culpa may not have been up there with someone petitioning Godfather Vito Corleone for assistance, but for a biased liberal reporter it was sensational. It has become increasingly difficult for the mainstream media to hide Clinton's punished bodily condition.

The media dropped the ball and gave it to Team Clinton, again

Chris Cillizza won back this much credibility for conceding that Hillary's health is now a reasonable campaign issue.

Wider and sufficiently responsive media coverage was completely lacking after very credible reports of Hillary Clinton's illness emerged. Despite a Twitter user by the name of Zdenek Gazda quickly making a video of a sick Clinton leaving available and Fox News' Rick Leventhal breaking the story, other journalists were sluggish.

Along with Fox, few other major media outlets bothered to cover the development at first, notwithstanding the ease with which Gazda's video was disseminated on Twitter. Those large concerns that did publish were disproportionately British newspapers, such as The Express and The Independent.

Other mostly US networks and publications often accused of bias in favor of the Clinton campaign deliberately tried to play down or ignore the footage. CNN was by far the worst offender. Its below-lukewarm headlines were "Video shows Hillary Clinton leaving 9/11 event early" and "Hillary Clinton not feeling well, leaves 9/11 event early." The second story in particular was originally much more threadbare and vague, before it was updated as Hillary's medical episode became almost impossible to obfuscate. In essence the reports became an opportunity to regurgitate the Clinton campaign's own talking points of her being "overheated" but now "feeling much better," words which CNN and other major companies like CBS had waited diligently for before they put fingers to keyboards.

Meanwhile, those questioning Hillary's health have been called "sexists" and even fired

Well-known conservative actor James Woods recently pointed out how Minnesota Senator Amy Klobuchar was admonishing those who questioned Hillary's health as "sexists":

> Well, one plus with #Hillary: #Dems can play the #sexist card now that the #racist card has been worn to the nub. https://t.co/qQBvfzYk0S
> — James Woods (@RealJamesWoods) September 5, 2016

A number of prominent leftist commentators, biased "journalists" and even celebrities, among them claimed comedian Sarah Silverman, have also come to the defence of Clinton in recent weeks, generally labeling the scrutiny of her health "conspiracy theories" and "gender-based harassment." Silverman went so far as to call the doubters "assholes." CNN's Brian Stelter did not hold back either in rebuking them as supposed misogynists and on the same network Dr. Drew Pinsky had his show canceled outright after discussing his views on Hillary's condition.

Simultaneously, a journalist for The Huffington Post, David Seaman, found himself fired last month and his articles deleted after he had the audacity to write about doubts regarding Hillary's health, which seem to be vindicated after yesterday's medical episode. In shock and fearing retribution from leftists, Seaman made it clear that he was not, among other things, suicidal. The mentioning of his non-suicidality is a reference to concerns that those who know or question too much about the Clintons, especially in the media, might be silenced or killed.

Hillary cannot be trusted

Is it a normal politician's van, a black ambulance or a hearse? Who knows when it comes to Hillary's health.

The significant delay in explaining her departure, the blanket restriction or exclusion of most journalists from being around her at the memorial, and the way she continues to hide and cover-up illnesses until incidents like this, regardless of whatever ailments she actually has, all indicate Hillary Clinton is unfit ethically, morally, politically, and now physically to hold office.

It speaks volumes about the serious worries centered on Clinton that I have not even spoken about her other scandals. From questions about her role in the deaths at Benghazi in Libya, the fourth anniversary of which was on September 11 as well, to her classified emails debacles and the foreign money, particularly from the Saudis and Gulf States, flowing into the coffers of the Clinton Foundation, Hillary represents the ultimate toxic candidate.

England Set To Ban Talking To Women In Public As "Misogynistic Hate Crime"

September 12, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Wolf-whistle or cat all at a woman and you could end up charged with a hate crime as the land of the Magna Carta becomes the land of abject despotism in the early 21st century. A pilot program in the county of Nottinghamshire making "misogyny" a hate crime, or more accurately a police state official's opinion that one is being a misogynist, is spreading to multiple other cities, like so many other malignant tumors in the body politic of the Western world.

Talking to women with anything but an attitude of supplication and deference could become a crime in the formerly free nations of England and Wales.

Dave Alton, the "hate crime manager" i.e. mouthpiece for the de-balling Western men agenda told the press a daily average of one "crime" of misogyny has been reported to his department since the program began earlier this year.

> The number of reports we are receiving is comparable with other, more established, categories of hate crime. We have received numerous reports and have been able to provide a service to women in Nottinghamshire who perhaps wouldn't have approached us six months ago. The reality is that all of the reports so far have required some form of police action.

So far, two men have been arrested under the new program.

Of course, misandry is still perfectly legal and there are no plans to make hating men a hate crime. Evil heterosexual, Christian males are the only possible oppressors in the Newspeak, Brave New World Order that Orwell and Huxley warned us about, but nobody listened to. The hour is very late to begin doing something about this before we end up on a prison planet in which all our words and activities are micromanaged by a growing electronic bureaucracy.

Anglo society exalts women and denigrates men at every turn

Melanie Jeffs, manager of Nottingham's Women's Centre told the press:

> Women are groped, or groups of lads shout abuse or very sexualized comments at them. We have incidents of sexual touching, women being grabbed and men trying to get women into a car with them.

No word on who was doing the shouting at women and yelling sexualized comments at them. My guess is it probably wan't Lily White English and Welsh men, but "refugees" and holier-than-thou immigrants yelling sexualized comments although it is becoming illegal to even report the ethnicity of offenders in cucked Western nations like Sweden. You wouldn't want to "offeeeeeend" anyone. Unless of course, they're white.

Jeffs continues with the boilerplate, victimization racket narrative that was worked for so long in the suicidal Western world. The "raising awareness" gnome is a staple of insane lefties.

> We know it's a big issue that happens on a daily basis – it's part of the everyday wallpaper of women's lives. This is about raising awareness, making women feel that they don't have to put up with it – and that's very empowering. Already women are ringing through to the police saying: 'I want this to be recorded as a misogynistic hate crime.'

When propaganda like this is spewed in a program that has led to only two arrests, you know forces are at work higher up in the food chain to further marginalize heterosexuality in an Anglo culture that has long pushed women to turn their sexuality into a commodity. Jeffs continues:

> We've had women say how proud they are to be from this city, and that this makes them feel like they're walking 10 feet taller.

Let's call this what it is: another shit test in a growing mountain of shit tests that Western men have failed. Women are practically begging for Western men to lash out and bring an end to this insanity. Each time Western women jump on the bandwagon of feminazi narratives Western men figuratively crawl into a corner with their head down and say "I'm so sorry I was born with a penis and have normal sexual desires." This must stop.

Better than you: women can do no wrong under new hate crime legislation

To show how insane the West is becoming, in contrast to the round of applause the proposal to making flirting with women illegal has received from the Marxist press (even though women prove time and time again they love, love, love uncouth assholes), it recently dropped a figurative bag of bricks on British politician Phillip Davies for daring to challenge the growing insanity of gynocentrism like this proposal in Anglo society. As detailed by Rookh Kshatriya, an English scholar who recently wrote about Davies' flogging by feminists:

> Above all, it demonstrates that men are still viewed as third class citizens by the mainstream media and the authorities at large. Simply put – and I have been saying this for years – WASP culture, being essentially Puritanical, automatically exalts women and denigrates men. Tradcon MRAs in Anglosphere nations like to think institutional misandry is exclusively the product of leftist, revolutionary agendas. In reality, they are expressions of 'traditional' Anglo-Saxon culture. This is why electoral politics never changes anything for men – at least, not for the better. Socialist or 'conservative', all governments in Anglosphere nations preside over societies where the legal, healthcare, welfare and education systems actively discriminate against men.

The new hate crime law is yet more evidence that on BOTH sides of the aisle men are viewed as nothing more than provider modules who exist to be exploited, dehumanized and desexualized in the West, and particularly in the Anglosphere – The United States, Canada, UK, and Australia – where these laws are destined to spread along with the other Stage IV cancers of liberalism and Marxism. And in the current cultural malaise, conservatives are mostly White Knight enablers of this agenda.

One question remains. Will there be a breaking point when it comes to men falling back in the West? Or will this type of insanity continue until men are castrated to atone for the sin of being born with testosterone and a functioning libido? If this law goes national and then worldwide, chalk another failure up in the long, long line of shit tests failed by Western men.

The Elites Have One Rule For Themselves, And One Rule For The Rest Of Us

September 12, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Regardless who wins the presidential election of 2016, it is certain that insider dealings and conflicts of interest (or, in plain English, corruption) will remain integral components of the Washington political system. Those who have been tasked with serving the people use their tenure in office to enrich themselves and their families, and care nothing about the fate of those they are supposed to be serving.

One needs only to glance at the revelations about the Clintons. According to a recent article in the Los Angeles Times, former president Bill Clinton "earned" an incredible $105 million from giving speeches between the years 2001 and 2012. And, of course, the checks were the largest during the time when his wife was Secretary of State. He received, for example, between $500,000 to $1.4 million for various speaking engagements to foreign corporations.

But of course, all of these engagements were cleared by ethics lawyers beforehand, so all is well. Of course they were cleared. The elites investigate themselves, and never find themselves wanting. Of course the outcome would be far different if ordinary mortals were concerned. The problem has been going on for some time. Ronald Reagan accepted $2 million in 1989 for a speaking engagement in Japan.

Contrast this with the ethic of Harry Truman, who left the office of president with no house of his own and in near impoverishment; he spent the remainder of his days in Independence, Missouri, eating sardine sandwiches and playing cards. Or consider Theodore Roosevelt, who nearly killed himself with exertions of all types after he left office, including the exploration of an Amazonian tributary.

Public officials are supposed to avoid even the appearance of impropriety. And there is no doubt that when a company is paying a politician hundreds of thousands of dollars, that politician is going to treat the company and its country favorably. If Hillary Clinton is elected president, control over the Clinton Foundation—which accepts contributions from foreign donors—will almost certainly pass to her daughter, thus ensuring that insider dealings with family members are added to the conflict of interest problems that already exist.

But this is how American politicians see themselves: they are the new royalty, and they need answer to no one, least of all us insignificant peons. Corruption has always existed and will always exist, but it is a matter of degree and scale. As things are now, the scale has gotten so far out of hand that drastic reforms need to be undertaken.

American politicians see the public as nothing but a source of contempt and derision. Clinton recently called half of the supporters of her rival Donald Trump “deplorable.” Which, of course, means that she views a large portion of the American public as “deplorable.” I can’t recall any similar example of a candidate attacking the supporters of a rival candidate. Attacking a rival candidate is one thing, and certainly expected, but attacking a huge segment of the population of one’s own country is something very different.

In the logic of the elites, there is one rule for them, and one rule for everyone else. They are entitled to enrich themselves and their families, and the rest of us are entitled to nothing.

Meanwhile, military planners take things one step further by openly preparing for armed insurrections in the United States. One of the most chilling articles to appear in recent memory in military circles—totally ignored by the mainstream press—was entitled Full Spectrum Operations in the Homeland: A "Vision" of the Future. The article argues that in the near future, the military must be prepared to respond to domestic disturbances and civil insurrections. The following hypothetical is proposed. We may call it the "Darlington Scenario":

> The Great Recession of the early twenty-first century lasts far longer than anyone anticipated….The United States economy has flatlined, much like Japan's in the 1990s, for the better part of a decade. By 2016, the economy shows signs of reawakening, but the middle and lower-middle classes have yet to experience much in the way of job growth or pay raises. Unemployment continues to hover perilously close to double digits, small businesses cannot meet bankers' terms to borrow money, and taxes on the middle class remain relatively high.
> A high-profile and vocal minority has directed the public's fear and frustration at nonwhites and immigrants. After almost ten years of race-baiting and immigrant-bashing by right-wing demagogues, nearly one in five Americans reports being vehemently opposed to immigration, legal or illegal, and even U.S.-born nonwhites have become occasional targets for mobs of angry whites.
> In May 2016 an extremist militia motivated by the goals of the "tea party" movement takes over the government of Darlington, South Carolina, occupying City Hall, disbanding the city council, and placing the mayor under house arrest. Activists remove the chief of police and either disarm local police and county sheriff departments or discourage them from interfering. In truth, this is hardly necessary….The militia members are organized and have a relatively well thought-out plan of action.
> With Darlington under their control, militia members quickly move beyond the city limits to establish "check points" – in reality, something more like choke points — on major transportation lines. Traffic on I-95, the East Coast's main north-south artery; I-20; and commercial and passenger rail lines are stopped and searched, allegedly for "illegal aliens." Citizens who complain are immediately detained. Activists also collect "tolls" from drivers, ostensibly to maintain public schools and various city and county programs, but evidence suggests the money is actually going toward quickly increasing stores of heavy weapons and ammunition…
> When the leaders of the group hold a press conference to announce their goals, they invoke the Declaration of Independence and argue that the current form of the federal government is not deriving its "just powers from the consent of the > governed" but is actually "destructive to these ends." Therefore, they say, the people can alter or abolish the existing government and replace it with another that, in the words of the Declaration, "shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

> While mainstream politicians and citizens react with alarm, the "tea party" insurrectionists in South Carolina enjoy a groundswell of support from other tea party groups, militias, racist organizations such as the Ku Klux Klan, anti-immigrant associations such as the Minutemen, and other right-wing groups…
> The mayor of Darlington calls the governor and his congressman. He cannot act to counter the efforts of the local tea party because he is confined to his home and under guard. The governor, who ran on a platform that professed sympathy with tea party goals, is reluctant to confront the militia directly. He refuses to call out the National Guard…

The article goes on to suggest ways that the chief executive can make use of the Insurrection Act of 1807. The Act has undergone some renewal and modification in recent years, and there is little doubt that this will be the choice legal mechanism to keep the restless masses under control when the expected civil disturbances begin in the near future. As the article explains, the Insurrection Act is so vaguely worded that almost anything can fall under the category of "insurrection."

What is interesting about the article is the choice of hypothetical used. Official "enemies" are those who have been denied economic opportunity and jobs, rather than the plunderers and parasites at the top who enriched themselves at the expense of their fellow-citizens. More than anything else, the Darlington Scenario provides a window into the mind of the elites: we exist to serve them and cheer on their policies.

Any expression of dissatisfaction with the current state of affairs will be seen as "rebellion" or "insurrection" and will be dealt with accordingly. Of course, certain protected classes and ideologies will not fall under such scrutiny. One would be hard-pressed to find an article in a military journal about using force to contain riots or civil disturbances caused by violent social justice warriors, for example. That would involve inquiry into forbidden areas of political correctness.

The message is clear: there is one rule for elites, and another rule for the rest of us. The function of the public is to accept its marginalization and impoverishment with cries of joy. Where this will all lead, we will leave to the reader's informed imagination.

16 Magazine Covers That Will Trigger The Feminists And SJWs In Your Life

September 12, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Due to the unsightly epidemic of beta-male behavior that is currently exploding all around us—the acceleration of which was largely caused by feminism and SJW's—I recently came up with the idea for a series of satirical men's magazine covers with the title, Modern Beta Magazine.

After putting them into the comments section of some articles here at ROK not long ago, and summarily being asked by various readers if they could look at them all in one place, I have attempted to comply with those numerous requests right here…

So here they are. All 16 covers.

1. Cooking for cucks

2. The winning play

3. Increase that beta sex drive

4. Earn extra holiday cash

5. 10 solid apologies

6. Rock her world

7. Pigeon-feeding tips

Vol. 7
Modern Beta Magazine
The Beta's Guide to Pigeon Feeding
Make Her Wet - Give Her Blood $$
Stealing Her Panties and Sniffing Them - Why It's Cool
How to Convince Yourself She's Still Loyal When You Catch Her in the Act
Why That DNA Test Proves Nothing - Love Conquers All!

8. No means no

9. Let your wife sleep around – sound wisdom

10. She’s not a slut

11. Tell her you are CIA

12. Should you fake bulimia?

13. Positive benefits of divorce rape

14. Shadow puppets and other cool things

15. Quenching beta thirst

16. Calisthenics for cucks

Summary

Well, gentlemen, at least for today, we are still blessed with freedom of speech. Tomorrow is another story, however, especially if the myriad betas, cucks and simps—and their SJW and feminist handlers—get their way. So please do whatever you can to fight back. Make every possible attempt to wake up those men who are still on the fence. Because if you don't, they might wind up exactly like the feckless fools on the above magazine covers.

You'll be glad you did. And you'll sleep a lot better at night, too.

Sharing this article with your friends and family members might be a good idea as well, if you feel these faux magazine covers have merit. And if those people should become irritated or shocked by them, well, consider it a blessing in disguise…because if that happens, you have just identified some serious beta males.

And as the entire manosphere already knows, they can definitely use all the help they can get…

How Men Have Made The Internet A Great Equalizer

It's often said the Internet is changing the world in more ways than we realize. It is without a doubt the most revolutionary development in the way our species communicates since the Gutenberg printing press. In the generation since its use became mainstream, the net has destroyed Big Media's authority and credibility as the corporate sponsored fantasies they've pushed from their Ivory Towers in New York since the inception of television have disintegrated.

We live in a jaded age, but we also live in an age in which a new way of thinking and decentralized way of creating cultural narratives is being forged. Spurious claims and rubber stamp credentials no longer create authority figures, as the Internet eats false idols for breakfast. A rubber stamp from an Ivy League school means nothing if you are only spewing nonsense or Marxist agenda talking points that make no logical sense. That's a big change from where we were just a generation ago, in which information was tightly controlled and heavily centralized.

The decentralization of information is so powerful it might just stop us all from becoming one with the "Borg" otherwise known as the New World Order. The Internet is truly messing up the Marxist narratives of its proponents. Expect globalists to try to take control of the Internet away from us as soon as the Presidential election is over. (Oh, and beware the Electoral College. Trump can win the popular vote and still lose the electoral vote. Population growth from immigrant communities is highest in the states that have the most electoral votes.)

Where would we in manosphere be without the web? We would be non-existent. Look at what we have been able to accomplish already even though the manosphere is just coming of age. Starting from a group of men figuring out how to game women in a culture that threw masculinity overboard—formulating opinions and hypotheses by sharing and exchanging information online—it has blossomed into a movement that not only instructs men in countercultural wisdom about the opposite sex, but one that has become source of true enlightenment as it is truly the pushing the envelope of free speech in the West. It is a way for men to know the unvarnished truth about women and the world in which we live.

As I wrote before, we have become the new Samizdat, so much so Time magazine is now doing hit pieces on us and Hillary Clinton is making speeches trying to get us to shut up.

Wisdom of crowds

The whole of human thought is now available online, and the wisdom of crowds can be used to take advantage of it

What gives us our strength? Thanks to a phenomenon known as wisdom of crowds many of the myths that give elites power over millions are now busted. Hillary cannot go on lying and expect the public to be lobotomized with a propaganda war on their minds by Lyin' Brian Williams and his ilk. Frauds are regularly exposed online. Government narratives are subject to relentless scrutiny and the true objectives of public policy rather than the stated ones are gleaned by free and open online discussion. Similarly, corporations can no longer lie to the public with impunity about the wonders of products they want to push on us. As Abraham Lincoln said:

> You can fool all the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time.

Make no mistake, the fact Big Media still exists and is a powerful foe (even though it is increasingly becoming a joke). The fact it remains is testimony to the fact you can fool some of the people all the time. The crucial difference is those you can't fool are now having our say. And, the masses are finally starting to listen to us, or at least hear our ideas bounced around as the wisdom of crowds has a slow but sure trickle-down effect across the nation and the world.

The great gift of the web to our species is seldom discussed. The Internet is The Great Equalizer. It is the most democratic, most free market and freethinking invention ever conceived. The Internet allows Joe Blow to have an equal voice to the president if his publishing merits it in some way. Conversely, the President can be exposed for the Marxist fraud he is and his voice trusted less than Joe Blow's voice. The people truly decide what flies and what doesn't online. Hierarchies are now determined by the crowd, and when it is a wise crowd superior choices can be the result.

(Yes, sometimes this phenomenon often results in nothing but idiocy as many viral videos prove. But it can also result in astonishing genius and world-changing ideas. The latter is what we should strive for.)

Feminism is not holding up to the scrutiny of the wise crowd

Already, feminism, Cultural Marxism, white guilt, and any number of ideologies that held sway for 50 years are now having some wind blown up their dirty skirts and the stench concealed underneath them is being aired out. To see the wisdom of crowds at work, read the top "liked" comments on Disqus or a news site or even Facebook following a post or a Big Media claim. One can often find genius and revel in novel ideas and analysis. Or, at least a valid counterpoint.

The lies of the spinmeisters are so regularly exposed you now have some mainstream media sites censoring or disabling comments! Why? A bogus claim often does not hold up to the scrutiny of the crowd. Even if it survives the first round, when the bogus claim comes up again in enough circles the rationals of society (we are only 10% of the population) eventually go to work deconstructing it.

If the Internet does end up saving the world from dystopian premonitions of Orwell, Huxley, and Bradbury, rational "wise crowds" are leading the way. When we are at our best in the manosphere, we are a wise crowd. This is why we must protect our access to the web, our unrestricted freedom to use it and our power of anonymity! According to James Surowiecki, author of The Wisdom Of Crowds: Why the Many Are Smarter Than The Few, a wise crowd forms when there is:

- Diversity of opinion
- Independence
- Decentralization

- Aggregation

In other words, the Internet is a breeding ground for wise crowds. Each person, using the power of true diversity of opinion (not the fake leftist style of diversity concealing an actual conformity) offers their own interpretation of events independently, even if that person is a nut job or an eccentric genius.

People also speak more boldly and originally when they're anonymous. Facebook is the first step in erasing online anonymity is it requires "real names" and regularly closes user accounts using pen names and aliases. Diversity of opinion is important because the readers – people from all walks of life and with literally millions of years of collective experience in different areas – decide if the argument makes sense, not a panel of "experts" or a Marxist newsroom meeting.

"Government central planning means overriding other people's plans." -Thomas Sowell

The Internet offers independence since everyone is able to give their own unique opinion rather than parroting what they hear when information is centralized. The flow of information is decentralized, giving it a huge advantage over information censored and vetted by those who want to shape messages to fit their agendas. About the only thing we haven't figured out very well yet is aggregation, or using the wisdom of crowds to form collective decisions.

We should be aware that homogeneity, or becoming opposed to new ideas and opinions, centralizing control of what we discuss and how we discuss it, curbing the spontaneous nature of our topics, copying old ideas without analyzing them first, and being overly emotional are the main enemies of the wisdom of crowds. We cannot become the mainstream media we are replacing.

Surowiecki says we can strengthen our arguments and the wisdom we provide to men by 1) Keeping our ties loose so as not to form hierarchies, 2) Keeping ourselves exposed to as many diverse sources of information as possible (i.e. know thy enemy and don't get locked into particular ways of thinking) and 3) Forming groups that have a wide range of opinions.

Using the power of the wisdom of crowds we can overcome the fascist plans of the elite

The manosphere has already been taking advantage of the wisdom of crowds phenomenon to produce an entire community of well-informed and awakened men who are no longer oblivious and in the dark about what is being done to them and their nations in the West. It has single-handedly exposed the Anglo-American cultural Matrix. What remains is finding a way to act upon this wisdom to create real change in the world, whether that action means taking down a corrupt political elite or finding other unique ways to restore balance to the West.

We have the power to help millions more men. The extent of our success will lie in the logical strength of our arguments and their entertainment value as we reach out. These factors and the scope of coming censorship as well as our response to it will determine how far we go as a movement.

We must figure out how to take the wisdom that is flowing from our collective cup and use it to form collective decisions to change the world. This is the next step in the four-step process. We are three-quarters of the way there.

How A Small Cabal Is Using Socialism & Cultural Marxism To Consolidate World Power

None Dare Call It Conspiracy details the overreaching "conspiracy" of elites pushing socialism and Cultural Marxism onto the masses while accumulating even greater centralized control over nations and their citizens. Feminists and social justice warriors are nothing more than the financed low-level soldiers in a vice to destroy the family unit and control human behavior while top-down pressure is being applied by forces who are above the law.

> "There are no accidents in politics." —Joseph P. Kennedy

History had a long line of power-hungry rulers and despots. We still have them, but they wear suits and ties and speak of "equality" and "human rights," mere covers for them to increase their power by using various -isms to centralize governments that can then be commandeered by the puppets they insert.

Socialism is their favorite tool to increase government power because a socialist state requires massive centralization. When something is centralized and top heavy, it's easy to control if you can put your man at its head.

What exactly is socialism? It's 1% or less of individuals at the top controlling the wealth and distributing rations to the bottom 99%. It is nothing more than an operating system for a small group to take control over a nation's resources while the sheep follow along, thinking they will have a better standard of living because of it.

> The idea that socialism is a share-the-wealth program is strictly a confidence game to get the people to surrender their freedom to an all-powerful collectivist government. While the Insiders tell us we are building a paradise on earth, we are actually constructing a jail for ourselves.
> …the policies of the government today, whether Republican or Democratic, are closer to the 1932 platform of the Communist Party than they are to either of their own party platforms in that critical year.
> Every proposal by our political leaders… carries us further leftward to centralized government. This is not because socialism is inevitable. Is is no more inevitable than Pharaohism. Is it largely the result of clever planning and patient gradualism.
> Doesn't it strike you as strange that some of the individuals pushing hardest for socialism have their own personal wealth protected in family trusts and tax-free foundations? …if one understands that socialism is not a share-the-wealth program, but is in reality a method to consolidate and control the wealth, then the seeming paradox of super-rich men promoting socialism becomes no paradox at all.

What a brilliant scam for the filthy rich to push feminism, equality, and all that nonsense on us when they are rigging the game to protect their wealth and pay less taxes than the middle class. If you keep moving up the institutional ladder into the central banks, you'll encounter men who control it all.

When banks loan to retail clients such as yourself, they usually get collateral through property or other assets. When bigger banks loan to governments, they get collateral in the form of gaining influence in policy decision making (e.g. having their officers being placed in influential government positions). If a government disobeys, they can simply finance that government's enemy.

Your government is therefore controlled by those they get money from, so to understand who is truly ruling over you, you only have to identify those who run the biggest banks of your nation. They have more power than your elected rulers.

The book states that banking panics are caused by bankers with the intent to put certain competitors out of business while creating a "crisis" that allows for "reforms" that give them even more wealth and power. The globalists at the top run up debts, collect interest payments, rig the markets, steal wealth from the sheep, and then force us into wars as perverse "profit maximizers." All major wars of the last 100 years were essentially get-rich-quick schemes of the globalists, which explains America's perpetual wars in the Middle East. These men are parasites who view the rest of humanity as a mere device for them to rule and dominate.

> The graduated income tax and a central bank are two of the ten planks of The Communism Manifesto.
> The establishing of the Federal Reserve System provided the "conspiracy" with an instrument whereby the international bankers could run the national debt up to the sky, thereby collecting enormous amounts of interest and also gaining control over the borrower.

> Since the keystone of the international banking empires has been government bonds, it has been in the interest of these international bankers to encourage government debt. The higher the debt the more the interest. Nothing drives government deeply into debt like a war; and it has not been an uncommon practice among international bankers to finance both sides of the bloodiest military conflicts. For example, during our Civil War the North was financed by the Rothschilds through their American agent, August Belmont, and the American South through the Erlangers, Rothschild relatives.

When it comes to politics and punditry, what's important is finding out who funds the politician or the think tank commentator, because if you know the source of funding, you know the agenda and which strings are being pulled.

> Radical movements are never successful unless they attract big money and/or outside support. The great historian of the 20th century, Oswald Spengler, was one of those who saw what American Liberals refuse to see—that the Left is controlled by its alleged enemy, the malefactors of great wealth.
> …[the] Leftist ideology and platform were made to order for the elitist Insiders because it aimed at concentrating power in government.

Those who had a hand in creating the Federal Reserve—a privately owned bank—through meetings on Jekyll Island also played a part in financing the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. This is why so many forces in America were sympathetic to Communist Russia and even Stalin, and why the end result of World War 2 was less about defeating fascism but handing countries over to centralized communist control (just as many countries that were "liberated" from Hitler went over to Stalin). They hoped the result of WW2 could usher in a world government controlled by a socialist republic in the prototype of Russia, all created, financed, and controlled by globalist interests.

To add money to the pot, Russia was made to be the big bad "enemy" to justify billions in defense spending in the US that also went into globalist coffers. They control so many angles of the game that it's hard for them to lose. Every time you use one of their bank notes, backed by nothing, you aid in justifying their power.

> Does it make sense to spend $75 billion a year on national defense and then deliberately increase the war-making potential of an avowed enemy? It does to Mr. Rockefeller and the Insiders.
> One of the primary reasons the Insiders worked behind the scenes to foment WW1 was to create in its aftermath a world government. If you wish to establish national monopolies, you must control national governments. If you wish to establish international monopolies and cartels, you must control a world government.
> …the cartel capitalist uses the government to force the public to do business with him. [Sound like Obamacare?]

The conspiracy includes being able to control who is elected as US President "in order that no candidate might be nominated whose views were not in accord with theirs." All information and ideas you consume from the establishment is controlled, along with the candidates you vote for.

> Although there are philosophical differences between the grass roots Democrats and the grass roots Republicans, yet as you move up the party ladders these differences become less and less distinguishable until finally the ladders disappear behind the Establishment's managed news curtain and come together at the apex under the control of the Council Of Foreign Relations.
> The landscape painters focus your attention on the kids in the street while the real danger is from above.

One particular passage caught my eye because it seemed relevant to the European migrant crises that started in 2015 (the book was written in 1971):

> …elite planners conduct exercises in what they call "the world game." For example: There are too many people in Country A and not enough people in Country B. How do you move people from Country A to Country B? We need so many males, so many females, so many of this occupation and so many of that occupation. How do you get these people from Country A and settle them in Country B in the shortest possible time?

Obama's campaign marketing for presidency was nothing more than the spamming an old socialist idea:

> [Socialist and liberal] groups chant that if we don't "change" America, we will lose it. "Change" is a word we hear over and over. By "changes" these groups mean Socialism. Virtually all members of these groups sincerely believe that they are fighting the Establishment. In reality they are an indispensable ally of the Establishment in fastening Socialism on all of us.

The book closes out by urging the reader to spread anti-socialist ideas further, similar to what I advise in the Global Information Warfare section of The Resistance Pyramid, since a bank robber isn't going to rob a bank if he knows the police is already there waiting for him.

I wish I read this book before I started getting into battles with feminists and their enablers, the most intense of which I described in my book Free Speech Isn't Free. For over ten years, I thought that feminism was more-or-less a grassroots movement propelled by uppity women to assert their superiority over men, and while that may be subjectively true for the useless idiot feminist who thinks she is fighting the patriarchy, she's actually part of a top-down socialist movement that attempts to collectivize and centralize nations to allow for seamless control over global wealth, resources, and power that hapless citizens go along with in the name of "progress" and "equality."

It's great to know what the elite's agenda is, but considering the powerful forces it stems from, the book doesn't give me much hope in putting a stop to it. Nonetheless, I highly recommend this book because it clearly explains the acts of subversion that is grinding us down, and who knows, maybe knowledge is power, and from that we can gain the wisdom and tools to defeat our masters.

The Fantastical Myth Of Gender And Race Being "Social Constructs"

When politically correct leftists, well-versed in cultural Marxist argumentation tactics, want to discredit a certain concept, they might say it's "only a social construct". The argument follows that it doesn't really exist, they're right, you're wrong, QED, case closed. Let's examine this rhetorical trick.

"Gender is only a social construct"

Believing something doesn't make it so.

Gender (excluding grammatical usages) means the behavioral, cultural, or psychological traits typically associated with one sex. As the argument goes, biological sex isn't the same thing as gender. Most men act masculine and most women act feminine. Still, some act the opposite. All right then, so some men are effeminate and some women are butch.

As for the "socially constructed" part, one example is clothing. Skirts are typically women's attire and pants are typically men's attire. Even so, women commonly wear jeans too, though it was a bit edgy in the 1960s. Further, the men's national costume in Scotland (likewise ancient Egypt) features a wraparound design roughly similar to a skirt. Pink and blue for girls and boys is an arbitrarily decided custom. Very well, so fashion is an agreed-upon cultural feature.

However, none of that disproves innate differences. When I was three, I observed that boys and girls act differently and have different interests. (It was ten more years before I decided girls aren't boring.) Advanced species have sexual dimorphism; humans are no exception. Leftists assert that boys and girls act the way they do because they've been taught this. Further, it's an injustice (the logic escapes me) and we must program children to be the same. However, even babies—uncorrupted by society—express different interests. So much for Rousseau's "blank slate" argument!

Typically masculine and feminine traits correlate to men and women. Granted, individuals differ in how much they match this, and some act the opposite. Still, on average, the correlation is true. (If only people who don't understand what an average is would just shut up!) Masculinity and femininity are real, and this isn't bad; these differences complement each other in a healthy society. Why not just let it be?

After muddying the waters, the big trick is making "gender" appear more real than biological sex. Today, believing male and female are distinct categories is "intolerance"; now there are literally dozens of bewildering descriptors. (The "genderfluid" claim to change gender as the mood strikes them; even leftists often find that unfathomable.) If a man puts on a dress and calls himself a woman, now everyone must go along with that, and even let him use the women's bathroom and presumably the women's locker room too. If anyone objects, hordes of people infected with politically correct memes will scream bloody murder. He still has male anatomy, though he might disguise himself with extensive cosmetic surgery, and all his cells include XY chromosomes, but supposedly all that matters is that he "feels like a woman".

However, feelings don't create reality, and they prove nothing. Believing something doesn't make it so. If a five year old believes he's Superman, he still can't fly. If he wears his cape to school, perhaps someone will helpfully teach him the difference between fantasy and reality.

"Race is only a social construct"

But the greater question is: why?

Nobody has a problem acknowledging differences in breeds of dogs. Noticing differences between genetically-related human populations is taboo. Leftists generally don't have a problem with the theory of evolution, but they seem to believe that it doesn't apply to the various branches of humankind. They go berserk if this taboo is challenged. Not only is a big cornerstone of their ideology on the line, their credibility is too. If it turns out that their social experiments and aid programs were based on some flawed assumptions, then this means that they recklessly and harmfully tampered with society and wasted an enormous sum of taxpayer funds over decades.

Those muddying the waters with the "social construct" argument will point out that there isn't universal agreement on where to draw the lines. For instance, Arabs are Caucasoid, but some consider them a different racial category than Europeans. (Clarity can be achieved by grouping families of nations as an interim classification between races and single nations.) Be that as it may, other areas—for instance, India and Latin America—are harder to classify because they're largely mixed. Still, purple doesn't deny the existence of red and blue.

Once you've got that out of the way, next they'll deny that these categories are meaningful. Societies built by genetically-related groups tend to be similar, increasingly different the further the genetic difference. Does culture really appear from nowhere? Leftists undergo great mental gymnastics denying other explanations. Part of this national character is how well-run the countries are. Some have attempted to say that various regions prospered, while others did not, simply at random. Is civilization an accident then? The more popular tactic, of course, is to say that wealthier regions got that way because they exploited other people. Usually, these arguments leave out many inconvenient facts.

A country's prosperity is increased by abundant natural resources and diminished by adverse events in recent history. Still, its population plays a formative role, and eventually countries find their own level. Sub-Saharan Africa is a mess. The pat answer is the lingering aftereffects of colonialism. (Oddly, leftists never bolster historical arguments with destruction caused by Communist "liberation movements", or kleptocratic misrule. Neither do they mention colonialism bringing infrastructure such as rail, highways, electrification, and modern medicine.) Still, let's examine the colonialism argument.

Ethiopia was colonized only by Italy, from 1936-1941. Afterward, Emperor Haile Selassie (Ras Tafari), recently restored to power, finally abolished slavery after dithering with the peculiar institution since the 1920s. This was slightly redundant, because one of the first things the Italians did in Ethiopia was free the slaves. (Strangely, Mussolini isn't revered like Abraham Lincoln.) Per the IMF's 2015 report, Ethiopia's nominal per capita income is $736. Did five years of colonization decades ago cause that?

Australia was a British colony from 1770-1942. Their lingering effect of colonialism is a per capita income of $51,642. I can hear it already—Australia doesn't count because the British ran the Aborigines off their land. All right then, we'll look at Hong Kong, still quite Asian. The British ruled from 1842-1997 (excepting Japanese occupation from 1941-1945). Hong Kong's per capita income is $42,437. Perhaps we'll need another explanation why Uganda, Zimbabwe, and Nigeria don't resemble former colonies like Hong Kong, Korea (a former Japanese colony), and Singapore.

A social construct that can kill you

Agreed-upon concepts can be very important. Ignore them at your peril.

Diabetes is a social construct, because a particular society—the medical profession—decided that an above-normal fasting glucose level indicates diabetes. (That's right, they label people like them as sick! How dare they decide who is normal, and label some people as abnormal?) A fasting result of 80-110 mg/dl is normal. A result of 200 or above means you are diabetic. (Below 70 is a different problem.) These problems are in increasing severity the further away from normality, from barely noticeable symptoms to death.

Some sources give the normal range as 80-100, with full-blown diabetes diagnosed beginning at 127. Therefore, there's some disagreement on where to draw the line. (I'm not a doctor, see one if you need one.) So you're okay at 110 according to some standards; by others you're hyperglycemic and at risk of it worsening. This disagreement doesn't invalidate the concept of diabetes. If you decide that it's not real because it's a social construct with a varying definition and fuzzy boundaries, and because of this you don't get it treated, eventually some very bad things will happen to you.

No values here, please

All beliefs are equal, but some beliefs are more equal than others.

Finally, a variant of the social construct dodge is used to justify double standards. It generally goes something like this:

> "I hate living in Utah. These Mormons so backward! They actually expect women to become wives and mothers. Would you believe it? They just want to keep us barefoot and pregnant!"
> "So what do you think about Islam then? Women aren't allowed to drive, or leave the house unsupervised by a male family member. They're expected to wear burqas. According to their religion, their husbands can beat them. In court, their testimony is only half as valid as a man's. The penalty for adultery is death."
> "Um, well, that's different. That's their culture."
> "Doesn't it give you more appreciation for living here?"
> "Absolutely not! Everything in Utah is so repressive!"
> "Don't you think reasonable expectations can serve a positive social purpose, making life better for all?"
> "You're one of them, aren't you?"

It never occurs to leftists that the society they live in can set its own standards too. Those who advocate neutrality are usually saying "shut up and do things our way." As Pat Buchanan wrote (though in a narrower context):

> Someone's values are going to prevail. Why not ours? Whose country is it, anyway?

Social standards can be debated in the free marketplace of ideas, but rejecting all standards whatsoever is usually a call for unlimited personal autonomy without responsibility.

Turnabout is fair play

Want to have some fun with leftists? Just say something like the following:

> Well, you see, ‘privilege’ is only a social construct; therefore your argument is invalid.

Simply fill in whatever buzzword they just threw at you, such as ‘patriarchy’, ‘microaggression‘, ‘intersectionality’, or some anti-concept ending in ‘-ism’ or ‘-phobia’. If they can’t clearly explain themselves from first principles, that’ll cause their SJW software to get a BSOD.

What To Do When She Stops Replying To Your Texts

September 14, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Many guys come to me looking for answers to problems that they have with girls. While these of course vary in their details, inevitably they all point to a much bigger issue: the guy who has sought out help just does not have enough options. Rather than look for quick, silver bullet fixes for apparent situational issues with this or that girl, what the alpha is doing instead is seeking out other opportunities elsewhere.

‘But she hasn’t responded to my text for 24 hours’

I’ve lost count of the number of times guys have asked me what to do in a specific situation like this. Recently I was chatting with my good friend Nick over WhatsApp. Nick had met a cute girl in a bar, chatted her up, enjoyed a quick make-out and then taken her number before leaving. The next morning he sent the girl (let’s call her Alice) a message and she responded, leading to several rounds of flirtatious WhatsApp banter. Then, just as he was about to go in for the kill and ask her to meet up with him she stopped responding. Just like that, the whole interaction was dead in the water.

Puzzled and perturbed by this turn of events, Nick contacted me and asked me what he should do to reignite Alice's interest and get things back on track. Now, while text game is a thing, and there are techniques you can try to pull back a situation like this, in the end Nick's problem is a macro one rather than a micro one.

Whatever the Question, Abundance Is Always The Answer

So why did Alice flake on Nick? Who knows—it could be for any of a huge number of reasons, many of them entirely unconnected with Nick. Perhaps Alice actually had a boyfriend or fiancé and was feeling guilty. Perhaps she had been horrendously drunk that night and couldn't remember what he looked like. Perhaps—and this is the killer—she had already hooked up with someone new who she felt more attracted to than Nick. Or perhaps she had simply lost her phone.

The truth is, in the majority of cases such as this you will never know the woman's reasoning for sure. Nor should you want to—what do you want, closure? Dude, closure is for girls.

Closure Is For Girls

Here’s the thing gents—the sexual market place is a cold, wild, barren and unfriendly place. When you interact with strangers (as the girls that you meet through pick-up inevitably are) then you run the risk of playing with emotional fire. Remember, everyone is out for what they can get, you included. You want to meet and sleep with the hottest girl that your SMV will afford. But girls have an agenda too. They also want to meet the ‘hottest’ guy that they can get—it’s just in their case the definition of ‘hot’ might expand to encompass things like status, influence, wealth or even ‘bad boy’ indicators.

You may have been in the frame for that hour you spent talking to her and making out with her in the club, but be in no doubt that she has other options, other guys blowing up her phone asking for a date. Now, that’s not to say that a clever piece of ‘text game’—a smart quip or cocky-funny line—could never help in such a situation. It is just possible that, delivered correctly, such a line could indeed prompt her reappraisal of you and make you a contender once more. But realise that the cards are stacked against you and that such a turnaround is unlikely.

It’s a Jungle Out There So Get Hunting

Here’s the thing—what you must recognise is that the modern dating arena is a ruthless place where everyone is out for him or herself. Don’t be fooled by a pleasant half-hour conversation with a girl at a lounge bar, or a make out at a friend’s party. Girls especially tend to act on their feelings in the moment. OK, so when she met you at 2am after she’d drunk three Sambucas you seemed to her like the perfect guy—that doesn’t mean she’s feeling the same way on Tuesday morning at work. Especially after that cute guy on Tinder has started messaging her again, on that model the subway passed her his business card. Life moves on very quickly, especially for hot young girls in their prime.

In truth, the only way you can insulate yourself from the vagaries of the market and ensure that you don’t leave money on the table is by constantly filling your pipeline with potential sexual and romantic prospects. In the sexual marketplace, just like in sales, the only way you can ensure a consistent ‘income’ is by opening new prospects every day. Remember, the more girls you approach, the more opportunities will open up to you. And the more opportunities you have, the better the chance of you having regular sex.

Next Steps

Rather than worrying about the minutiae of an interaction with this or that girl, you want to be in the position where you have so many girls ‘on the go’ on text, WhatsApp, Facebook, Tinder or whatever, that you really couldn’t care less if one or two drop out of the funnel every week or so. And it is only by systematically approaching every day that you will achieve this and sufficiently insulate yourself from today’s sexual marketplace. Of course, once you have a regular girl who you like, or several regular girls, depending on your preference, then—but not until then—will you be in a position to slow down and adjust this strategy.

Until quite recently, I thought social justice warriors were basically the online version of the campus radicals that I knew from my college days. I figured maybe the SJWs are a little more lazy, loudmouthed, herd-like, and fuzzy-minded. Being behind the keyboard 24×7 can do these things, as well as hinder one's self-development. However, I discovered that there's an essential difference between SJWs and the hard-line leftist ideologues I'd encountered in the past. That is, the social justice weenies are seriously out to lunch.

It's one thing to be faced by opponents with at least a bit of respectability, with arguments worth addressing. As things are now, SJWs—the True Believers of the religion of cultural Marxism—are like grackles attempting to peck society to death.

A textbook example of SJW mobbing began when someone posted a limerick about the Ferguson, Missouri riots:

> There once was a thug named Brown
> Who bum-rushed a cop with a frown
> Six bullets later
> He met his creator
> Then his homies burnt down the town

This set off the howling pack of hyenas. They posted the home address of the user who shared the limerick, resulting in threats of murder and arson, and even hassled her mother. After this classy and proportionate reaction, surely the forces of evil were thwarted and the universe was restored to balance.

The oppression olympics

You can't get much more open-minded than that!

The terminology of social justice weenies is quite illuminating as to their state of mind. I don't mean just the academic buzzwords they throw around, floating abstractions larded up with unstated assumptions like "privilege" or "microaggression." It gets far more interesting than that.

Some of them believe that they're non-human: plants, machines, shapeshifters (basically werewolves and the like), or even celestial objects. Sometimes multiple identities inhabit the same body, etc. I remember playing make-believe when I was a small child; these are young adults who still haven't grown out of that phase. I'll charitably assume not all SJWs are that far out in left field (if you'll pardon the expression). Even so, they keep company with people who believe they're not human, and apparently don't find anything particularly amiss about that.

Then they have a larger number of descriptors for their sexuality. Fortunately, this means many won't breed (either from lack of interest or lack of competence in opposite-sex relations), saving our gene pool from further degradation. Actually, a man believing that he's a woman isn't really all that odd compared to a man believing he's a parakeet, a fern, or a robot. However, that's only the beginning. Many of these sexuality-related terms are things seldom encountered in the real world, concepts that would have left Sigmund Freud bewildered. Once again, they're so open-minded that one suspects they've undergone trepanation.

Having disabilities is a special badge of honor, rather than a neutral characteristic or something they're stuck with but work around as best they can. An able-bodied SJW who isn't creative enough to make up some affliction can be "transabled"; for instance being able to see but believing deep down that he/she/it shouldn't be able to do that. Could all this be posing, along with not knowing what species they belong to, and the multiple variants of gender-bending? All this adds up to negative "privilege" points, which is currency in the SJW world. Most people have much better things about which to boast.

Wallowing in misery and loving it

Is he off his meds, or was he triggered?

One universal characteristic of SJWs is that they live for taking umbrage at things. They delight in opportunities to spout venom about anything in the world around them, be it real, trivial, or imagined. They like being constantly upset about anything; it gives them a sense of purpose. If they got everything in the world 100% the way they wanted, they wouldn't be happy; they'd be crushed by boredom. This is psychologically unhealthy. What kind of a way is it to live like this?

What injustices are they protesting? It's pretty much anything you can think of, and many more that will surpass your imagination. For one thing, if you like Mexican food (without being Mexican) that's "cultural appropriation". So it's a thoughtcrime to like enchiladas, and maybe support someone's family restaurant? The rabbit hole goes very deep. Recapping one page of postings from SJWs, we find:

- Going ballistic about a video game without a transsexual identity option (play something else, duh)
- Hating every last man on the planet except her fiance (I really feel sorry for the dude)
- The expression "communication is key to a relationship" is ableism (WTF?)
- Objecting to a pet's name (is Fluffy less triggering?)
- "There is NO such thing as a 'Vagina'" (that person certainly has never been near one)
- Someone disappointed at not being autistic (where do I even begin?)
- You're not allowed to speak Spanish unless you're Hispanic (46 million Europeans in Spain disagree)
- Saying "stupid" is ableism (that's stupid)
- Rant from someone wearing size 36 bottoms (too many cheeseburgers)

- Demisexuality is real (actually I agree; Demi Moore is sexy)
- Politically correct pronouns (seeing English slaughtered like this is triggering to me)
- Trying to persuade someone to be transgender (I thought being that kind of crazy isn't a choice?)
- Not sleeping with someone infected with HIV is discrimination (fine, I have discriminating tastes)
- Criticizing meth use is "drug shaming" (denial's not just a river in Egypt, you know)
- Men are not allowed to talk to women (these snowflakes have issues with freedom of speech)
- Preferring thin body types is "privilege" (I spent all those hours in the gym when I could've used that line instead?)

Is this the would-be revolutionary vanguard today?

Son, let me tell you, Communism was a force to contend with, back when I was your age!

The far left used to have some substance, backbone, and panache. Even the most far-out Trotskyist wouldn't dream of sinking to that level of blathering depravity. Many Jacobins were fruitcakes, but they were up in arms about real problems. They set up barricades and fought for what they believed in. The Chinese Communists trekked 5,600 miles through rugged terrain on their Long March. The thought never crossed their minds to try to take over China by bellyaching. The Viet Cong would stop at nothing. They'd fight even vastly outnumbered, carrying on even if they had to hide out in dark tunnels for days while suffering from dysentery. These social justice weenies, though, are simply big babies with no understanding of logic or proportion. If Leonid Brezhnev were still around, those losers would make him sick.

There are some moderate leftists out there who can have a thoughtful conversation. Some of them I admire even though we disagree on ideology. However, the most radical of the radical left are crazier than bedbugs. Up until now, I thought maybe there's a way to get through to them, or persuade them to do something constructive to make the world a better place. The only redemption for a spoiled crybaby like this is growing up and embracing reality.

Bill Maher Courageously Compares Donald Trump To Hitler, Pledges To Vote For “Dead Hillary”

September 14, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Following up a Donald Trump assassination joke on Saturday, liberal talk show host Bill Maher said Monday that he would rather vote for a “dead” Hillary Clinton over her Republican challenger Donald Trump in the 2016 presidential election.

In a tweet Monday afternoon, the host of HBO’s Real Time dismissed concerns about Clinton’s newly diagnosed pneumonia, arguing that he’d prefer a deathly ill Clinton to what he called the “tangerine nightmare” of Trump.

“Pneumonia? I’d vote for Dead Hillary in this race,” Maher tweeted. “She could be Patient Zero for Bubonic Plague, still better than #TangerineNightmare.”

> Pneumonia? I'd vote for Dead Hillary in this race. She could be Patient Zero for Bubonic Plague, still better than #TangerineNightmare
> — Bill Maher (@billmaher) September 13, 2016

Maher has increasingly taken to Twitter in recent weeks to post his thoughts on the election. The 60-year-old comedian has previously compared Trump to Nazi leader Adolf Hitler.

> To those who say #Trump spoke 2 diff messages to 2 diff audiences today, he says "Exactly." In a stupid country, that works. Be very afraid.

> — Bill Maher (@billmaher) September 1, 2016

During a stand-up performance in Washington, D.C. on Saturday, Maher suggested that with the 2016 race between Clinton and Trump “tightening,” somebody “is going to have to go out there” and remedy the situation, referencing the recent release of John Hinckley Jr. — the man who attempted to assassinate President Ronald Reagan in 1981 — from a psychiatric facility earlier this month.

“I’m nervous with this election,” Maher told the audience at the DAR Constitution Hall. “I saw the headline today: ‘Race tightening, Trump ahead in Ohio and Florida.’ If this race is even the week before the election, somebody is going to have to go out there… Why do you think they let Hinckley out?”

Concerns about Hillary Clinton’s health received renewed attention on Sunday when a video surfaced online showing the candidate apparently requiring help to get into her motorcade van.

A Summer Beach Trip Shows How Badly America Has Declined

September 15, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

This past week I took my children on vacation to the beach. While we had a great time, it also exposed me to an aspect of the United States I usually don't see—the decay that is eating away at the country.

I live a large city. All of my neighbors and co-workers are college educated. In my demographic, everybody is doing pretty well financially. The worst thing that I've seen is that when people are laid off, it is now much harder to find a job again. People wait months rather than weeks to get re-employed. But overall, my neighbors and co-workers are insulated from what is happening in the rest of the country.

My beach vacation exposed me to that portion of the country. Typically, when we visit the beach we drive a bit further and rent a beach house far away from the boardwalk. Because my youngest son is nine months old and travels poorly, we opted for a nearby beach that I had visited once before as a teenager and stayed in a hotel along the main strip. This gave me the opportunity to witness first-hand what is happening to lower middle class and the poor in this country.

Diversity

The most obvious change is that there has been a dramatic change in the level of diversity. When I was a teenager, the beach was nearly 100% white. The diversity, such as it was, consisted of a handful of blacks. Whites still comprised about two-thirds of the beach goers, but now there were also lots of Hispanics along with smaller numbers of Muslims, Asians, and Indians. Of course, there continued to be a small number of black families.

The Hispanics were notable because it was very apparent that they were poor. Many of the families did not have bathing suits—they were in the ocean in their street clothes. It was especially awkward for the women as a blouse and long skirt are less than ideal beachwear. While I am certain there were poor families in the beach in my youth, I don't recall anyone so poor that they could not purchase a bathing suit.

The Muslims were also an interesting addition. I noticed several women walking along the beach covered head to ankle in dark clothing walking on the beach in 95-degree heat. If they were wearing burkinis that allowed them to go in the water, I would understand but I can't understand how a beach vacation was pleasant for these ladies.

Body Transformations

It is no secret that Americans are getting fatter—the average woman today now weighs as much as an average man in 1965. But that change is as evident in the city as it was in the beach. What is more apparent at the beach is how tattooed Americans have become.

Gone are the days when women got small, unobtrusive tattoos on their ankles or on their butt. Virtually every woman is now heavily tatted. Tramp stamps are the norm and lots of women now have elaborate tattoos that run around their legs or abdomens. I saw at least two women who had serpent tattoos that snaked the entire length of their bodies. The sad part is that these women were otherwise attractive.

Drug abuse

Extreme diversity and abundant tattoos are one thing, but there is nothing that indicates spiritual bankruptcy like drug abuse. The most disturbing thing that I witnessed was the high number of people who were strung out on something. Everyone that I saw looked like they were intoxicated by something other than alcohol or pot. All of them were young. All of them were white.

I saw one young woman slowly rotating in circles with her hands on her temples in the middle of the day. There were small groups of people who seemed to have no awareness of their surroundings. I am not a drug expert so I have no clue what these young people were taking but my guess would be meth.

The fact that so many young people have lost hope and turned to drugs as an escape is an alarming phenomenon. It is an indication that nihilistic consumerism, the prevailing "philosophy" of our day, is unable to fulfill the deepest needs to people. As the family continues to be attacked and the last vestiges of the patriarchy stamped out, the number of people who take drugs to escape will only increase.

Carelessness

A final observation is how careless people have become. Every evening my wife and I took our children for a walk along the boardwalk. The boardwalk has a separate path on side for bicycles and skateboards. The idea being that the boardwalk would be used by pedestrians and the bike path would be used by vehicles with wheels for safety purposes. Some people choose to ignore this obvious rule, but they drove their bicycles slowly so they were not a safety hazard. But there were lots of exceptions. Lots of cyclists and skateboarders rode very quickly on the boardwalk.

Most of these were teens so they could be excused for their reckless behavior. After all, I did my share of stupid things as a teen. But there were also adults who should know better. One man in his late 20s decked out his bike with lights and drove quickly on the boardwalk weaving dangerously in between pedestrians. He was not collecting money or performing. Here a grown man was jeopardizing his safety and the safety of others merely to attract attention.

In another incident, we had to pass through a two lane tunnel on the way to the beach. I was in the left lane when a car in the right lane suddenly swerved into my lane almost crashing into our car. My wife glanced over to find out what was happening with the driver. It turned out that it was a middle aged woman who was snapping a selfie as she was going through the tunnel—no doubt to post on Facebook. Again, one could barely excuse a teen for endangering lives to take a selfie, but there is no excuse for a grown woman to do the same.

Conclusion

With the exception of diversity, which is a weapon used by the elite to divide, conquer, and rule the population, each of the things I saw on my beach vacation indicated that the foundation of America is rotting. Ancient Rome became great because of the vigor and austerity of its people. Once Romans lost their founding virtue, the Empire collapsed.

Similarly, the United States became great due to the unstoppable confidence, work ethic, and deep faith of Americans. However, after years of neglect, the rank and file of America has lost its way. Can the spirit of a people be restored once it is lost? I don't think so. Barring some sort of great upheaval, it is likely that the US is headed for the same fate that befell Rome.

Bayer Acquires Most Evil Corporation In The World, Now Has Monopoly On Food Market

Bayer, the pharmaceutical giant that rakes in roughly $47 billion dollars a year, recently acquired Monsanto for a whopping $66 billion dollars. My friends, I do not speak frivolously when I say that this could potentially be one of the most devastating acquisitions for human health of this century.

Monsanto is widely known as one of the most evil companies in the world—for reasons which I will soon discuss, however this is not what concerns me. What concerns me is that Monsanto owns a whopping 90% market share on soy and corn, which is used in virtually everything in the US (high fructose corn syrup or soy protein anyone?). Monsanto owns a gigantic 26% share of the seed market as well, which sets them ahead of all other competitors.

Coming in at 19%, Bayer owns the most share of the pesticide market out of anyone. It is not these gigantic market shares, however, that scare me. It is the fact that if one company owns a monopoly in BOTH the seed industry AND the pesticide industry, they could effectively force farmers to grow GMO's which have been shown to have a plethora of devastating ecological and human health consequences.

Before I delve into the disturbing economic and health-related ramifications of this new acquisition, I would first like to shed some light on the complete lack of ethics that these companies exhibit.

Monsanto: Shadowy Lawsuits Against Small-Time Farmers

Now I'm very aware that a lot of people might think that I'm going on about some sort of hippie bullshit. Believe me, I used to be the same way. If you look at the evidence, however, it is crystal clear that this company has no quandaries about whether or not to financially destroy innocent farmers, ruthlessly pursue unethical legislation, and create ungodly mycotoxins that could potentially serve as the next black plague.

Sound ridiculous? Let me explain.

Monsanto has been genetically engineering crops for decades which, due to their unnatural genes, spread like wildfire. They have an incredible resistance to mold, rain, snow, heat, cold, and… you guessed it, pesticides.

So when you have such a resilient seed, what do you think happens? It naturally spreads all over the place. Whether it's from animals carrying the seeds on their fur, or through the wind depositing seeds throughout the land, their seeds spread. This is the issue that farmers have with Monsanto.

Ever since Monsanto first created genetically modified organisms in the mid 1900's, it's been ruthlessly suing innocent farmers, claiming that they intentionally violate Monsanto patent laws and purposefully plant their GMO seeds for self-gain. Despite these completely unfounded claims, Monsanto has won hundreds of lawsuits against innocent, family owned and operated farms, just in the past decade.

And the worst part? The farmers can't do anything about it. They don't even WANT Monsanto's seeds, but they can't help it if Monsanto's GMO seeds get carried from a farm 50 miles away, since they're practically indestructible. But does Monsanto care? Of course not, it's a massive multi-billion dollar corporation.

Monsanto has repeatedly ruined farmers financially, destroyed small town communities, and they've even stalked and threatened to kill farmers that might speak out.

"Why don't they get together and sue Monsanto as a whole?" you might ask. Oh, you mean like the four Supreme Court cases that have been filed against Monsanto, by 82, yes, EIGHTY-TWO, separate organizations such as the Organic Seed Growers and Trade Association?

Or maybe the group of Nebraska farmers who were diagnosed with cancer after using Monsanto's popular pesticide, Round-Up?

Nope, doesn't matter. Monsanto won every single court case, because they have a platoon of shady lawyers and billions of dollars to spend in court.

Unethical Legislation, Ecological Disaster, and Disastrous Health Consequences

In addition to ruthlessly attacking innocent farmers, Monsanto also has a habit of buying off politicians. Just recently, Obama signed a bill which effectively prevents farmers from choosing whether or not they can plant GMO seeds, despite a petition with over 250,000 signatures pleading with him to repeal the bill. Well, too bad—this is America, where politicians can be bought. If the government wants to force farmers to plant GMO's, then they now have the right to do this.

In addition to this, it also prevents several states such as Vermont from labeling GMO's. Do you want to know what it is that you're buying and eating? Well, too bad. You have to call a 1-800 number, get put on hold for thirty minutes, and tell them the bar-code if you want to know whether or not that apple is GMO.

Don't have the time? Too bad. This is just another blatant of example of how humongous corporations can bend our laws to their will, simply because they have an endless supply of money. But if you think that Monsanto's legal actions have been shady, just wait until you hear about the ecological destruction that they're causing.

Despite an EU document claiming that the chemical glyphosate, a key ingredient in Monsanto's pesticide Round-Up, could cause severe ecological consequences, the pesticide continues to be legal, nearly two decades after the document was released.

In addition to this, their GMO corn seeds, which, by the way control 88% of the market, have been shown to be detrimental to soil fertility. In other words, in a hundred years or so, we may not even be able to use our soil to grow crops anymore.

Perhaps the worst ecological effect, however, is the creation of mycotoxins. You see, Monsanto's GMO's are ridiculously resistant to pesticides, so farmers drench them in Round-Up to kill any potential pests. There's two problems with this.

Aside from the fact that GMO's and pesticides have been linked to a swathe of negative health consequences (such as Cancer and Celiac's Disease), they've also been known to create super-resistant fungi, or mycotoxins.

This happens, because Round-Up is great at killing any pests and molds that could ruin a good harvest… well, at least 99.99% of them. That other .01%? Not only does it live, but it has what's known as "whole chromosome mutation," turned on.

In other words, rather than single genes mutating (normal evolution), entire chromosomes evolve (think evolution, but around 1,000,000x faster). And what's more? Fungi can swap genes with one another.

This is what has led to the new emergence of "super-fungi," or mycotoxins that can literally kill you. Here's a few of them:

- Fumonisins: linked to nervous system disorders.
- Trichothecenes which cause muscular disorders and death.
- Zearalenone which causes a massive spike in estrogen (any wonders why we're so effeminate?)

Oh, you don't want to have the testosterone levels of a little girl? Too bad, Monsanto has a platoon of soulless lawyers ready to destroy any and all opposition.

Things Just Got Worse: Bayer's Acquisition

As if things couldn't get bad enough, the pharmaceutical giant Bayer just acquired Monsanto on September 14th. What does this mean? Several things.

First off, it means that now Big-Pharma and Big-Agra are becoming one industry. Phenomenal. Now, rather than having two corporate giants trying to control our health, we'll just have one monstrosity that will end up raking in over $100 billion dollars a year trying to control us.

But it gets worse. Not only is more power concentrated into a smaller group of executives, but they have even more of a monopolization. Don't understand? Well let's review some statistics:

- Monsanto owns 93% of the corn seed market
- Monsanto owns roughly 35% of the entire seed industry (depending on which statistic you consult)
- Monsanto owns 90% of the GMO seed industry
- Monsanto owns nearly 80% of the canola oil market
- Monsanto owns 40% of the market for tomatoes and lettuce

I could go on and on, but the point is that Monsanto has a massive monopoly on our food market. This, coupled with Bayer's chokehold on American pharmaceutical drugs, is a complete recipe for disaster. In essence, what Bayer is aiming to do is to completely monopolize the farming industry, churning out health-destroying GMO's, while simultaneously patenting new drugs to cure the ailments that they will create.

In other words, they'll profit off of making you sick with GMO's, and then profit more off of selling you drugs. They own both ends of the market.

In addition to this, they will be able to slowly stop selling "regular" seeds, forcing all farmers to buy GMO's, which will in turn force them to buy Round-Up, which will in turn force us to buy more cancer treatment, and so on to infinity.

If you would like to know more about the evils that Monsanto and Bayer have done (and believe me, there's MANY more), consider watching the following:

- GMO Documentary
- Seeds of Death
- Aspirin: A Bitter Pill
- Monsanto: A Documentary

Oh, and did I mention that Bayer also owns a large portion of the pesticide industry, and that they're the culprit behind the droves of bees simply dying off? But hey, who needs bees in a world where farmers only plant GMO seeds that spread themselves.

What You Can Do

If we don't do anything to stop this ruthless conglomerate, it is only a matter of time before it will control the entire agricultural and pharmaceutical industry. No, I do not say this lightly. There has not been a larger monopoly to set foot on the earth since Andrew Carnegie founded the Carnegie Steel Company.

Mark my words, if we do not stop this company, in several decades we will all be eating GMO's, dying off from mysterious illnesses, and paying thousands of dollars a year for our healthcare. We must stop this company, there is no other option.

First things first, I urge you to sign this petition. A similar one was made for Kratom, and we were able to reach 100,000 signatures in 30 days, which forces Congress to make an official decision (it's the official petitioning website for the US government).

Second, we must boycott all Bayer and Monsanto products. Don't buy into the Big-Pharma bullshit; you don't need 99% of the medication they try to sell you. Most chronic illnesses and health problems can be avoided or entirely cured by simply living a healthy, active lifestyle.

Find a workout routine that suits your needs, eat a healthy diet, free of GMO's and high in vegetables and healthy, organic animal proteins. Don't buy Aspirin, Claritin, Miralax, or One A Day. Don't buy anything that's not labeled as organic, and try to buy food from your local farmer's market.

I realize that this is a lot to take on, but we the people must make change happen; throughout the course of human history there have always been wealthy elites who have tried to control us. But, as history has shown us, with perseverance, the people always come out on top.

Please, I urge you to make the right decision. My health, your health, our grandchildren's' health, and our nation's health depends on it.

If Feminist Laurie Penny Was Serious About Stopping Rape, She Would Protest Outside Prisons

Of all the people I have heard or read about who depend on alleged high levels of rape to maintain their careers, British SJW Laurie Penny is amongst the worst. Her entirely asymmetrical views on stopping rape and other catch-cry causes echo the rampant inconsistencies found in countless other feminists-for-pay. Yet if Laurie Penny and her fellow SJW apparatchiks were seriously concerned about the impact of rape on society and genuine victims, they would be protesting and bellowing slogans outside prisons every day. Why? Because (male) prison rape is higher in per capita terms (and arguably higher in raw terms as well) than rapes inflicted on women overall.

Laurie Penny's silence or very muted criticism on "inconvenient rapes," from the Rotherham race rapes to prison rape, amounts to nothing but victim-blaming. Whilst I admonish anyone who claims that we live in a "rape culture," the strongest evidence one could muster to support its existence actually comes from male prisons. Even The Guardian, for which Penny unfortunately pens regular, incoherent columns, published a story about how, thanks to acts like prison rape, male victims of sexual assault outnumber female ones in the United States.

These figures are nothing short of astounding. Bear in mind that, despite the comparatively high US prison population, male inmates are vastly outnumbered by non-incarcerated women in the real world. If the raw number of male prison victims is so high, the per capita rates would be astronomical. For people so obsessed with the latest “reports” compiled after gerrymandered college surveys about “sexual assault,” Laurie Penny and Co. appear to be allergic to reading and acting upon information regarding rape against men.

Laurie Penny doing what she does best–promoting herself.

In Penny’s own country of England, a smaller number of prisoners relative to the population says nothing about the likelihood of inmates being raped or sexually assaulted. The 1-in-100 sexual abuse figure cited by Britain’s Commission on Sex in Prisons, apparently “small,” is still much higher than the officially documented level of rapes and sexual assaults reported in the general community. Other research suggests much more alarming rates of British prison rape and sexual assault occur, ones which cannot be accurately gauged due to a lack of research and funding.

And when are these prison rapists ever prosecuted? The offenders are at the fingertips of the powers that be and are guarded around the clock. The allegedly lagging conviction rates for real life rapists are dwarfed by what could be said is a glaring reluctance of the authorities to bring prison rape cases to court.

Compare this to the amorphous claims of “rape” and “sexual assault” at colleges and universities. With nothing but he-said-she-said testimony usually, we are informed that levels of sexual violence against women, by men studying to become lawyers, doctors, engineers, journalists and other professions, are apparently at “record” levels. What gives?

Why is Laurie Penny so silent on “inconvenient” rapes?

The television drama Oz shows the reality of prison rape, something Laurie Penny and her contemporaries have no interest in combating. Duh, because these victims have penises!

Prison dramas in which the proverbial lunatics run the asylum, media-promulgated stories of rare inmate escapes, and investigative reports on incarcerated felons' easy access to contraband like drugs may give the impression that the state has largely lost control of locked-up criminals. Nonetheless, this is almost always far from reality, at least in the Western world. Any victories your regular prison-based crime lord has over the system are outweighed by the number of times he must defecate in view of prison guards, get all his bodily cavities searched, or generally find his movement and activities thoroughly restricted.

Laurie Penny's silences on issues such as prison rape, plus her casual dismissal of ethnic minority-committed sexual atrocities in places like Rotherham in England, which were deliberately covered up, speak volumes about her belief as to who is really a victim. Because the implicit "perpetrators" of rape at colleges or universities are seen as white and "privileged" males from the lower middle-class and above, their alleged female victims (victimhood usually being determined by either self-reported surveys or a watering-down of what sexual assault is) are allocated the highest rung on the ladder of sympathy. Even though we have scant or no evidence to support these on-campus claims of sexual violence, they are then used for draconian policies like the very euphemistic "affirmative consent."

College and university dormitories have nowhere near the level of supervision and state control found in prisons. Nor should they. Until someone has been convicted of a crime, according to an appropriate and consistent standard of beyond reasonable doubt, people should be largely free to live in peace and exercise their own autonomy. This state control makes prison rape all the more unacceptable.

Why prison rape matters

But there's evidently no "rape system" deplored by feminists when it comes to prison rape.

Criminal punishment should be a) state-sanctioned and b) have a legitimacy that heavily depends on consistency. Rape has never been part of the toolbox for reprimanding offenders, whether by the state or individuals. In no sense should we accept cultural values in which prisoners, most often already extremely violent, are applauded or slapped on the wrist for raping and sexually assaulting other inmates. No one deserves to be raped, as feminists themselves say, so our outrage should not be smaller just because a victim has a criminal history.

Then there's the disastrous effects related to recidivism. Prisoners who rape or sexually assault within the prison system are likely to commit the foulest of acts, and not just sexual crimes, once they are released. After all, if you can get away with it when the state is ostensibly supervising you 24/7, you will fancy your chances of escaping justice for all manner of other sadisms in the less monitored real world. One of the overarching reason for incarceration is to prevent criminals from committing more crimes, not further habitualizing those sorts of acts.

It seems that the only way to barter with Laurie Penny and others about rape in male prisons would be to suggest that the infinitesimally small number of rapists in society are more likely to have raped fellow inmates during any prison time they served. Because many prison rape perpetrators are nominally heterosexual, it is likely that the male-on-female rapes committed in the community are disproportionately committed by prison rapists. Though she should be advocating against rape irrespective of victims' genitalia, these kinds of arguments are perhaps the only way to reach Laurie Penny.

Stand up for all actual victims–or shut the hell up

"Victims."

Grandstanding based on partisan or selective representations of rape and other violence is not rape advocacy. It is a very narrow channel for propping up a self-serving career or creating instant hysteria that generates quick-fire article views and book sales.

To be taken seriously, Laurie Penny and others like her must genuinely and unequivocally condemn all forms of rape, regardless of someone's genitalia or history. Yet they will not do this, which explains why they are perversely focused on men ogling women as expressions of "rape culture" and not real rape like in prisons and in Rotherham.

French Writer Reveals That Army Is Planning To Recapture Muslim No-Go Zones

Earlier this month, French writer Eric Zemmour released his new book titled "A Useless Five Year Term" dedicated to the failures of the Hollande administration.

During an interview on the French radio station RTL, host Yves Calvi and Eric Zemmour focus on this particular quote from the book (skip the video to 6:34):

> But the high command of the French army knows that one day will come when it will have to recapture those areas that have become foreign on our own soil. The plan is already laid out. It is called "Operation Bramble". It was developed in partnership with experts of the Israeli army.

He refers to the methods that the Israeli army used to recapture the zones of the Gaza strip that escaped to the control of the Hebrew state. The French army is supposedly plotting the retaking by force of Muslim "No Go Zones" that are scattered all around our large cities.

He declares that he obtained this tip from a high-ranking source in the French military staff.

Who is Eric Zemmour?

A conservative writer, historian and essayist, Eric was born to moderate Jewish parents, evacuated back to France during the Algerian War. He considers himself a perfect example of the French model of integration, despite being a Jew born in Algeria,

The most interesting part of Zemmour's analysis is that he knows well those zones as he grew up in one of them before they became Muslim ghettos.

He made a name for himself for the swings he took at the multiculturalist agenda and the incompatibility of the Muslim culture with the values of the French Republic. It is not the first time that Zemmour finds himself under the spotlights.

He is seen in France as a "political enemy #1" as he is a scholar, a patriot and a nationalist that is not afraid to expose the love of the French elites for multiculturalism. He is often attacked verbally and physically by the leftist hordes and Good Think "celebrities" that pollute the majority of French TV studios and radio stations.

Zemmour pissing off Communist and Open Borders enthusiast Jean-Luc Mélenchon

He is also a fervent adversary of the modern feminist narrative, criticised the feminisation of our society but also the elite's efforts to change our language to fit the principles of political correctness.

A public Trump supporter, Zemmour was one of the only journalists that publicly exposed Soros' world influence on French television, while the national media voluntarily ignored it.

Proof that he hits where it hurts, the large record of fines and penalties imposed to him by French courts for stating what he thinks. The CRAN (Representative Council of Black Communities) or the CCIF (Committee Against Islamophobia in France), both heavily financed by George Soros, were usually the ones filing the lawsuits.

One of the only aspects that saved Zemmour from total destruction by the state law and media is the fact that he is a Jew and is then situated quite high on the scale of people protected by political correctness.

Operation Bramble, a new Battle of Algiers?

Suspect being interrogated by French parachutists during the Battle of Algiers

Zemmour compares Operation Bramble to the “Battle of Algiers,” an episode of the Algerian War of Independence (1954-1962), where elite regiments of the French army were hunting down the rebel leaders responsible for terrorists attacks aimed at French administrative buildings and places frequented by French civilians.

This whole operation was a turning point of the war, with the French army struggling to drive their invisible enemy out of the countless tortuous streets and busy urban environment of Algiers’ hills.

I strongly advise you to read Quintus’ excellent article about the Algerian conflict or watch the eponymous film, a true masterpiece, to understand more about the context of this troubled period.

The concept of Operation Bramble

Different memos were released by the government and the army headquarters after the Muslim terrorist attack in Nice, aiming at creating a greater number of reservists soldiers (an additional 15,000 to the already existing ones), composed by volunteers who would be member of a new “National Guard.”

This contingent would join forces with regular soldiers and the Gendarmerie, participate in new military maneuvers such as counter-attacks in urban environment in case of “tension or civil unrest,” or directly intervene while being “backed by air support.” Even more interesting, those memos specify that these operations could take place on the “national territory.”

It seems that this operation has already been in the books for quite a while. In the town of Roubaix in 1992, the 8th Infantry Regiment lead a full scale military simulation entitled “Recapture of Roubaix if taken hostage by Islamic militias.”

Let’s remind that Roubaix is one of these French areas that are now almost entirely populated by Muslims and is one of the most prolific djihadi hotbeds of the nation. You can read more here about the “Gang de Roubaix,” this group of “Islamo-bank robbers,” who learnt the trade while fighting in Bosnia.

The fictional town of Jéoffrécourt, one of the areas of the CENZUB, used by the military to train in urban warfare

Another element should be added in this theory. In 2006, the CENZUB (Training Centre For Urban Operations) was created for 400 million Euros, and specifically prepares soldiers to neutralise “insurgents” in an urban environment, modeled on an actual French town, with its cafés, warehouses, housing estates and residential buildings.

Is this operation realistic?

It seems highly unlikely. They could only intervene in case of massive scale civil unrest, similar to the one of 2005, that paralyzed the state for many days. The institutions also remained motionless after all the terrorist attacks that occurred on French soil those last few years.

There would be many civilian casualties as the terrorists or targets would hide among the population, in the housing estates that they know like the back of their hand.

The cost of this type of operation would be astronomical. For the total number of Muslim "No Go Zones," multiplied by the number of regular and reserve soldiers needed, billions would need to be unlocked.

The French army is also known for its timeworn equipment. Having personally used it, some of our tools and weapons were relics from the 1960s. Operation Bramble would have to wait a complete refurbishment of our operational resources before being even remotely possible.

Is this plan another Trojan Horse?

Immediately after Zemmour's book was released, leftist Huffington Post lead the charge by calling Zemmour a conspiracy theorist and backing their argument by asserting that they also called a high-ranking official that denied the existence of Operation Bramble.

“Hi, this is the Huff Post. Any public declarations on your secret military plan? What? It does not exist? So we thought, thanks! Case closed, take that, Zemmour!

But in all seriousness, why would the French state intervene now, after so many years of deliberate inaction? Why would they get rid of their useful idiots, that keep the citizens divided and suspicious of one another?

The creation of those new positions in the French reserve army seems to be taken too little and too late. Many, like Roosh and I, suspect it to be a bait to attract patriots and establish a database of all of them for future prosecution.

The creation of this force could be used against the nationalist forces that might threaten the hegemony of the French leftist government in the case of an uprising after yet another large scale Muslim attack.

NFL Suffers Ratings Drop After Pandering To The SJW Narrative

September 16, 2016 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

The NFL has been a ratings juggernaut for years, a consistent cash cow for the major TV networks. However, last weekend, there was a notable decrease in viewership. The incident was discussed on September 12th in an article by the Barrett Sports Media network:

> When the NFL kicks off regular season play, television networks expect their ratings to soar higher than the previous season. Given the popularity of the National Football League, it's understandable to have those expectations. But for the start of the 2016 campaign, the ratings were less than what FOX, CBS and NBC had hoped for.

The NFL has been changing over the last few years, an issue I wrote about in a previous article. We are seeing the growing presence of an SJW narrative: we now have a pink field in October (Breast Cancer Awareness), domestic violence commercials throughout the season, and recently, players not standing for the National Anthem in protest of racial inequality.

For the first time that I can remember, there was a vocal backlash against this growing trend. A #BoycottNFL hashtag surfaced a few weeks ago, and it trended on social media. Most of the outcry was against Colin Kaepernick in particular, who refused to stand for the National Anthem to protest racism in America. Many fans made rebuttal videos to Kaepernick, going so far as to burn his jersey. Actually, so many people decided to burn his jersey that there's now a compilation video online of the best burns (110,000 hits and growing). Even Ted Cruz jumped into the fray on Monday, encouraging people to boycott, "rich, spoiled athletes."

Even Ted Cruz is now encouraging Americans to ban “Rich, spoiled athletes”

So now that week one of the NFL is over, and we can review the television ratings. Apparently, the fans stood behind their pledge! Let’s go back to the Barrett Sports Media article for a breakdown of the numbers.

All The NFL Games Showed A Decline In TV Viewership

Here is a brief overview of the numbers.

- Thursday Night Opener (Broncos vs. Panthers): Down 10% from last year
- Sunday game on CBS: Down 13% from last year
- Sunday game on Fox: Down 3% from last year
- Sunday game on NBC (Patriots vs. Cardinals): Down 11%
- Monday Night ESPN (Steelers vs. Redskins): Down 7%
- Monday Night nightcap (49ers vs. Rams): Down 25%

Many fans turned off the NFL in week one, particularly the 49ers game (Down 25%)

The one rating that should stand out here is the 49ers game. Colin Kaepernick stated that he would continue to not stand for the National Anthem. Well, the fans responded in kind. The largest drop in TV viewership was for the 49ers game (Kaepernick’s team)—down 25%.

Overall, these were the lowest TV ratings for an NFL opening day in a decade.

What Can We Make Of This Decline?

The NFL diehards will say the league is untouchable. The decline was just a blip on the map, and the ship will right itself in the upcoming weeks. 2009 had low ratings in week one, for example. The NFL's domination of TV ratings will continue unfettered. Americans are too lazy, too addicted to the opium of sports viewership, to change. And I have to admit, the pessimist in me is inclined to agree. This might be true… only time will tell.

However, there's an old biblical saying—pride comes before a fall. We're living in a different era: an interactive digital world, where people are able to exchange ideas like never before. People who are frustrated with the NFL can now have a platform to express their disapproval. And in turn, they can share their ideas with like-minded individuals. As a case in point, the sheer number of people who are protesting the NFL online is unprecedented. I've been following the league since 1978, and I've never seen anything like it. The NFL is not bulletproof—nobody is.

Also, it should be noted that national sentiment about a sport has changed over time. In the early 20th century, boxing was big; in the mid 20th century, baseball was king; and in the last forty years, football has risen in popularity. More recently, we've seen people turning to non-traditional sports, such as MMA and X-Games. In short, football is not the only game in town; it can be replaced, just like it is outside of the United States. Americans might not turn to watching soccer, like in Europe or South America. But it's quite possible that they will choose from a growing variety of options.

And finally, the future of football is in jeopardy; this is due to the rising number of head injuries. There was a movie in 2015 entitled Concussion, starring Will Smith, which highlighted the health problems that many former players are experiencing. The movie made waves across the NFL. Former star Troy Aikman commented on the message of the movie, stating that if he had a son, he would not encourage him to play football. How many other parents are out there like Aikman? Quite a few, I'm sure. In the future, we'll see fewer parents who encourage their children to have a passion for the game. The result will be a continued decline in TV viewership.

Conclusion

I didn't watch the NFL's opening day for the first time in many years. Recently, I've become increasingly disillusioned with the direction of the league. Moreover, I now realize that my support is a tacit form of approval. I am letting the league know, as well as its athletes, that I approve of their dysfunctional behavior.

The only thing a bully respects is a punch in the nose. And the SJW army is very much a bully, using their power to destroy the edifice of American tradition. The way that you can punch them back is very simple—turn off your television on Sunday, or find something else to watch.

Welcome To The Age Of Discouragement

September 17, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

There is a photo of my great grandfather wearing a suit, looking solemnly ahead. I never knew him, and have tried to learn as much as I can by asking family members who remember him. In the photograph, he appears as a grown man, wearing a well-fitting suit. He is neither smiling nor stressed, but appears a confident, masculine, man. I was shocked when I was told that in this photo he is actually 13 years old.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt at age 18

Permanent Adolescence

Many have observed that Americans are in a perpetual state of youth, with almost half of young men aged 18-34 still living at home with their parents. While some cultures (notably, Italy) encourage children to live with their families until the point of marriage, and this is almost certainly the best policy for single women, this American trend is not caused by a social desire to remain close to the family, but an economic necessity and a lack of any personal motivation or direction in life.

20 or 30-something Millennial

As I was sitting on a bus in Central America, I observed a small boy, around the age of 13, organizing luggage, taking money, asking passengers their destinations, mentally arranging the luggage in order of departure before loading it in a logical manner, and running a business, I thought of my grandfather. Were these men oppressed by the economy, or were they learning, growing, and perhaps enjoying themselves?

A Nation of Coddled, Weak Middle Aged Children

Who is better equipped to deal with life at age 30? A man who has spent the last 15 years conversing daily with a variety of women, tourists, and businessmen, who has learned to perform math operations in an instant in his head, who has observed thousands upon thousands of people, witnessed thieves, police, couples dating, families, tourists, locals, and workers, has developed a working use of multiple languages, and excellent emotional intelligence and street smarts?

Or a guy with a business administration degree who pours coffee into a cup for 8 hours a day, and then comes home and eats TV dinners before jacking it quietly to some camwhore and falling asleep in his parents spare bedroom?

Permanently Discouraged

What future does the 48% have? What hopes and dreams do they have? Perhaps some of our readers are in that category, and indeed, living with parents is a great way to be frugal. IF one has a plan, this can be a perfectly acceptable step along life's journey. But how many of that 48% have a hope or dream? How many of them have given up on any plan of change?

Considering that almost 95 million Americans are no longer in the workforce, the workforce participation rate is only 62%, while the government only considers 4.7% of workers to be “unemployed” (those with a hope of still being employed, and still actively looking for work), many Americans are giving up on the prospect of a real career, as well as a real woman or a real life.

What would the American sexual satisfaction survey look like? Maybe something like a 62% participation rate, meaning that slightly more than half of us are having sex. But how many are in a relationship with a thin, feminine, pleasant woman who is making is happier than not? I’d say a safe bet is around 4.7%. The sexual discouragement rate mirrors the economic discouragement rate.

There are many articles on ROK discussing why men are opting out of marriage. As I have pointed out, the average age for first marriage was always 20-22, until recent years. It’s no coincidence that this is the age that men find women most attractive and desirable, although modern men are being shamed for listening to their biology.

Source: OK Cupid data

But many men who have never left the country have never experienced a thin, feminine, pleasant, kind woman. What do they have to look forward to? They are permanently discouraged, and have given up on the dating market. They explain why men are living with parents until age 40 and up. These are men for whom society has failed them. Feminism destroyed an entire generation of females from which these men should have been able to date.

Peak Feminism

A society that has failed in giving half its workers stable, rewarding careers, that ends half of marital relations in misery, and that fails to provide happiness and sexual gratification to its members is a society that has failed. We are now at peak feminism, and there is nowhere to go but up. They have ruined the west, and out of this wasteland a neomasculinity will rise.

Whether Trump wins or loses, he is a sign of massive discontent with the status quo. It will not happen overnight, but there will be a backlash, and it will drastically change society, pushing us back towards our biology, logic, and order.

3 Things That Give Hope To Men In The West

These are dark times, gentlemen. No, this is not an exaggeration; it is not hyperbole, nor is it dramatic. The entire fate of the West hangs by a thread: as the liberal machine grows larger and larger, its power seems unending. But—alas, there is hope.

More and more men are starting to wake up. Men in positions of power, such as judges, doctors, lawyers, and police officers, are beginning to notice the unsettling commonness of false rape accusations. Men in positions of guidance, such as teachers, mentors, and coaches, are beginning to see the value in teaching young boys how to be men.

And, more importantly, a large and growing community of men is emerging; this is not a group with a leader, but rather a group united by ideology. Gentlemen, we are that group.

I propose that it is important to point out the folly of the West, and to shed light on the widespread corruption of politicians, however I also propose that it is equally important to maintain our morale. With this in mind, here are three things that I believe will give us hope.

1. More And More Women Jailed For False Rape Accusations

Just five years ago, jailing a woman for a false rape accusation would have been nearly unheard of. The beta males would scream and shout, proclaiming that all women are innocent little angels, and that all men are sexist, hateful pigs. The feminazis would be on a rampage, demanding that the men accused be thrown in jail.

Now, however, the tide is beginning to turn. More and more women are being jailed for falsely accusing innocent men of rape. Take this woman, for example. She falsely accused two soldiers—soldiers!—of trying to rape her, when really she was ashamed about cheating on her boyfriend in a drunken, cocaine-fueled threesome.

Or maybe this woman from Northern Island, who was sent to jail for nine months after pleading guilty to falsely accusing a man of rape. Or maybe this woman, who was jailed after her 11th false rape accusation in a decade. A fucking decade! And need I mention the UVA rape hoax?

There's a small, but growing list of women that have been jailed for falsely accusing men of rape over the past several years…and I know what you may be thinking. "9 months? 16 months? Are you kidding me, Jon? That's nothing! The UVA girl wasn't even jailed!"

And do you know what? You're right. They should be jailed for much longer, and Jackie should be thrown in jail indefinitely. However you must realize that change does not happen overnight. We are not going to go from being a completely castrated, beta-male-encouraging society to viciously condemning false rape accusations. It just isn't going to happen.

Change takes time. Did African American men get rights all at once? Of course, not. It was a slow, steady march. First it was the right to be free. Then it was separate, but equal. Then, the Harlem Resistance, education, the right to vote, and finally, increasingly equal economic opportunity.

Justice does not happen overnight, my friends. It takes time. And despite these disturbingly short prison sentences, we are slowly changing the hearts and minds of those in our culture. As more and more women are exposed for the liars that they are, more and more men will start to take note.

Suddenly, the idea that all women are delicate little flowers will start to erode. Yes, some loser beta males will still remain, but more and more men will start to awaken and shrug off their shackles of ignorance. More and more men will begin to weaken the social narrative currently in existence, and will help to usher in a new age of patriarchal justice.

2. The Rise Of The Alt-Media

I would argue that from the end of WWII up until around 2013, we were actually in a period of time that historians will look back at and compare to the pre-printing press era. Do you know why?

Well, who controlled the flow of information before the printing press? The state. All of the information that the peasants knew was fed to them by priests, politicians, and the elite. There was no other option.

Likewise, who controlled the flow of information from the 1940's up to around 2013? The networks. The politicians. The elite. They used a different medium, but the principle is the same: the flow of information was controlled by a small group of people bent on brainwashing the masses.

This is all starting to change. With the Alternative Media rising in the last several years, the mainstream narrative is beginning to crumble; and the elites could feel it. They were worried. That's why they tried to pass SOPA and PIPA in 2013, which would have effectively allowed a government agency to selectively shut down websites and order payment processors to stop funding them.

But, unfortunately for the elites, the people are too strong—flooded by literally millions of campaigners, crying for war if the internet were to be censored, the government was forced to trash the bills. This was the beginning of the rise of the Alternative Media.

Since then, their numbers have grown exponentially. Guys like Milo Yiannopoulos, Mike Cernovich, and our very own Roosh, are slowly erecting massive News Networks in the face of the elites. And they can do nothing to stop it.

As the older, brainwashed generation begins to die off, the younger, more aware generations will begin to take up its yoke. As millions of baby boomers slowly hit the grave, the major news networks such as MSNBC, CNN, and Fox, will start to do the same. Without millions of old-timers still regularly tuning in for their daily brainwashing session, the major news networks will collapse.

In its place, will rise a great and powerful thing: the Alternative Media. No longer will information be controlled by a handful of powerful elites. No longer will we be so cruelly lied to, as they profit off of our misery. And no longer will we be made prisoners of our own mind.

3. The Growing Manosphere

Roosh speaking during his “State of Man” tour.

Although one could categorize the manosphere under “Alt-Media,” I would actually disagree. The goal of the Alt-Media is to give truthful reporting on political, economic, and social issues. The goal of the manosphere is to arm men with the tools that they need to face the challenges of work, women, and life. The manosphere is what spawned the Alt-Media. A growing pool of men who see reality for what it is, demand news stations that tell the truth.

The manosphere has shown us that there is, in fact, an ideal way to live. No, not all ways of living are equal. Some ways of living will lead to greater pleasure and fulfillment than others. Cultivating certain skills, such as learning how to invest properly, or how to be a truly attractive man, will indefinitely lead to a better life.

All over the world, a growing number of men are taking their lives into their own hands. They're learning how to sculpt the body of their dreams, how to effectively talk to gorgeous women without shaking at the knees, and how to accomplish their goals and manage their lives.

But, what's more, is that they're starting to wake up. They're starting to cultivate a passion for living, they're starting to reclaim the humanity that the system crushed out of them long, long ago. They're starting to become men.

We are all a part of this community; whether this is the first article on ROK that you've read, or you've been reading since the start, we welcome you. We are a growing group of men who are dedicated to helping one another attain the highest of heights, the greatest of goals, and the deepest fulfillment.

Despite the massive amount of external resistance that the manosphere has faced, here we are. Thousands of feminists trying to shame us and warp our opinions, thousands of beta-males clamoring to throw Roosh and other pickup artists (cough: Julien Blanc) in jail, and the social pressure of an entire cultural narrative telling us that we're wrong….and yet, here we stand.

We have set the truth free, and it cannot be contained. The manosphere cannot be crushed, it cannot be beaten, it cannot be bullied, and it cannot be destroyed. There is no negotiation; we are here to stay.

Improve Your Weightlifting With A Video Camera

A camera, and more specifically, a video camera, can be a highly useful tool for all physical culturists, particularly those who have developed their muscles and peripheral nervous systems to a fair degree and want an edge beyond the common rabble.

Just to clarify, I am not telling you to waste your time at the gym taking selfies of yourself in the mirror—I've never felt any desire to prance about in my underwear with the goal of snookering Tinder sluts, and I wouldn't expect any of you do so either (frankly, a decent head-and-torso shot is all you need for Tinder, in my meager experience using the app).

No, I am referring to the use of video cameras specifically. Filming yourself working out can provide numerous benefits to all facets of training: one of which is training the proper form of a lift.

Most gyms have mirrors that are intended for this purpose, but I find these to be only partially effective at best for two reasons: One is that, when you are truly straining yourself on a lift, you likely won't be able to concentrate upon your form, and looking at a mirror might actually keep you from lifting to your full potential-the iron game has a lot more mental exertion than you would expect, and besides, when you're doing a squat, you absolutely do not want to look down to see if your knees are fully bending-angling the neck can lead to rounding of the back.

(In a marked contrast to the idea of mirrors, some such as Pavel Tsatsouline even recommend blindfold training to develop tactile response, but I've never tried it) good from the front, it might be a complete disaster from the back. Similarly to the squat example given above, there's really no way to explicitly know whether your deadlift is using proper form, besides the quick and dirty judging of "whether or not my back hurts." Besides, the human mind has a limitless capacity to delude itself, so you may be able to ignore any lower back pain as being "not serious"—I certainly did the first few times I deadlifted, before I managed to shore up my form. Part of said "shoring up" involved the use of a camera.

But a camera can be used in contexts other than mere weightlifting—it is also quite useful for martial arts practice: again, while you can do a "quick" and dirty judging of whether or not your techniques are effective by looking at how much and how violently the punching bag or dummy/whatever swings, you can still ensure that you are using proper form by recording yourself. This is perhaps more useful for those who practice grappling arts that can only be practiced against a human opponent-recording can show the both of you what you are doing right and wrong with your throws, joint locks, escapes, and all other aspects of the grappling game.

Similarly, several of my friends in high school would record themselves practicing for the track and field (athletics for the European reader) team—while the stopwatch can tell you whether you're fast or slow, you will need a visual representation to determine why exactly you aren't as fast as you would like to be: many runners, particularly novices, have poor mechanics in running, the least effect of which is a slow running speed-shin splints, fallen arches, and other painful ailments can result from poor running form, just as poor form in any other exercise can lead to mediocre performance and injury.

But it is in gymnastics practice and calisthenics that a camera has been most useful to me: The front lever and back lever are two difficult series of static poses that require, among other things, the back to be straight and locked. In practicing the front lever, I was always under the impression that my back was straight, until I happened to take camera footage of myself and realized that my form was improper, and my back was rounding.

For the back lever, the effect was even greater: I was under the impression that my back lever was completely in order, until I deigned to videotape myself and realized that I was not even rotating fully! Instead of having my stomach lie parallel to the floor, as it shoulder, I was in fact almost entirely vertical, with my feet pointing towards the ceiling. As one might expect, the inverted body position was a bit disorienting, and it is more difficult to judge body orientation in calisthenics such as back levers and handstand pushups then it is with other types of exercise.

If it weren't for recording on this day, I'd never have fully rotated

Within your home, video taping is quite easy: just set the camera up with a tripod and point it at wherever you want to record. You're not making an actual film here, as long as your whole body is on camera, you've been successful. However, bear in mind that in your gym you may need to get permission to record, as I usually do.

If you find yourself struggling with issues of form and technique, video recording just might be what you need.

Changing Demographic Tide Will Favor Democratic Party For Decades To Come

September 18, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Don't let the media fool you when they tell you Trump is up 5 to 7 points in the popular vote. Trump is still behind in many polls of the electoral college despite having such a commanding lead in the popular vote. Why? Waves of immigrants are changing the destiny of the United States forever. The Democratic party will be heavily favored in the 2016 election in the electoral college, and the math only gets worse in future presidential elections.

Look for states to increasingly swing to blue and stay that way.

All Return Of Kings readers should be concerned in 2016, and especially beyond. Democrats could have a virtual lock on the Presidency very soon, as white people scratch their heads and wonder why their voice no longer counts in elections. Demographic changes intended to dispossess whites from their homeland—a country in which they were 92% of the electorate in 1960, but will be 43% in a few short decades with their offspring representing only 38% of children under 5—means emboldened Democrats will likely move even farther to the left towards Communism as they have a lock on the Senate and House as well.

Despite Hillary's criminality and investigation by the FBI, despite the low turnout at her rallies, despite her image as a crook and a liar, despite her health issues, despite Trump being up in the popular vote—Hillary was still winning in the electoral college as of Sunday, September 18, though just barely. She had 274 electoral votes to Trump's 258 in this map from Electoral Vote, with Nevada and its 6 electoral votes up for grabs. 270 votes are needed to win the presidency.

270 to win: Hillary still has the edge thanks to demographic changes brought on by globalists

How is this possible? How can such a damaged goods candidate even be competitive, let alone WINNING in the electoral college? Call it the devious plans of globalists coming to fruition. Globalists have been flooding the country with immigrants for decades, and now the country is about to make a permanent electoral swing towards Communism.

Today's mostly non-white immigrants (i.e. reliable Democrat cannon fodder) tend to congregate in the largest cities of the country. States with the most electoral votes have a lot of electoral sway simply because they have the largest cities where all the immigrants – legal and illegal – happen to be. Even deep red Texas will swing permanently blue in the coming decades as Anglo whites only make up 25% of the population under age 5. (Whites thinking they don't have to have dirty little babies and families is catching up with them.)

The blue "Democrat" areas are mostly the Lily White (and clueless) Northeast, major metropolitan areas, the "Black Belt" in the south and areas with large Hispanic populations

The weight large cities carry in the electoral college is easily seen when one looks at a county by county breakdown of the vote. Generally speaking every area in the country except metropolitan and minority areas voted red Republican in 2012. This illustrates the devious brilliance of social engineers bringing in replacements at the ballot box. All they have to do is drown out traditional American's voices in the major cities. The "flyover country" people (i.e. whiteys) then have their preferences nullified at election time.

Taxpayers vs. Tax Takers

What if only taxpayers voted? The United States would have completely different leadership

Here are some maps that illustrate how debased you, the traditional United States worker bee has become from your own nation. If only taxpayers rather than tax-takers voted in the last election, the milquetoast turncoat Mitt Romney would now be president having been elected in a Reagan-like landslide. There would not be people waiting for Obama phones to be distributed.

Further, one must imagine in a nation that looked like the one above electorally Romney would never have been selected in the first place and a hard-assed conservative would have been running and elected in the last election instead of a compromise candidate like Mittens. Moreover, Barack Hussein Obama would never have been elected president in the first place back in 2008, and proceeded to “transform the United States” into a Communist worker’s paradise by destroying it from within.

People who bear the burden of enriching the treasury vs. those who filch from it vote quite differently. Letting people who contribute nothing to the system vote for freebies and social welfare schemes so transforms the electoral map that Obama was able to reverse this potential landslide and turn it into a defeat for the John Galts of America.

What if letting deadbeat bums vote (you once had to be a landowner/stakeholder to vote) had not been foisted upon the nation? The nation’s representation would be the polar opposite of what it is now. What if women didn’t vote? It may surprise you to know the current clusterfuck America finds itself in with female voters voting themselves more money at the expense of the Beta male taxpayer was predicted 100 years ago by those against women’s suffrage.

Immigration and Women’s Suffrage

What if only men voted? Without women's suffrage, the looting of the treasury would not be underway

If the country looked like it did in 1960, before the treasonous Immigration Act of 1965 was signed into law and feminism killed the flower of family, we would definitely not be on the road to Communism and on the path to have such a lying, sickly piece of crap like Hillary winning the electoral college. There's little doubt, a right-wing candidate would have won in an electoral landslide in 2012 rather than the overt Communist we got if the nation hadn't been so fundamentally changed by social engineers. Running the numbers, if the population was still 92% white as in 1960 the conservatives would have won by a 400+ vote electoral landslide.

What if there was no women's suffrage? The above map shows a similar conservative landslide would have played out last election. Moreover, the nation would surely not be one in which 70% of revenues are used in schemes of wealth redistribution, money that men are forced to pay to subsidize their forced removal from the family by Big Daddy Government.

The worst thing is realizing we were warned about this a century ago. A pamphlet published in the early 1900s warning against the social costs of granting women the right to vote (lampooned by modern media) has largely been proven true by the effects we are witnessing today. The pamphlet warned against voting for women's suffrage for the following reasons:

- BECAUSE it means competition of women with men instead of co-operation.
- BECAUSE 80% of the women eligible to vote are married and can only double or annul their husband's votes.
- BECAUSE it can be of no benefit commensurate with the additional expense involved.

How is that not an astute summary of exactly what has happened since the suffragettes won. Speaking of "additional expense involved" as RealSexism knows, women avail themselves of Beta male tax money, and even replace his utility by having the government forcefully extract his resources rather than dealing with him directly:

> Men earn 61.5% of all income but only account for 25% of domestic spending. Men only spend 40% of what they earn after tax. In contrast women make up

> Men pay over 70% of income tax but the vast majority of public spending is on services for women. There is more money spent on breast cancer than lung cancer and prostate cancer combined, despite the fact that lung cancer alone has 3-4 times more fatalities than breast cancer. A man's chance of getting cancer is 44% and 23% of men will die from cancer, 38% of women get cancer and 19% die. Yet there is vastly more money spent on cancer for women, this is lethal discrimination.
> Women pay 60% less tax despite spending 300% more in domestic spending than men. Women also consume two third of public spending, there are 3 times the amount of gender specific health services for women than men despite the fact that for equal increases in health spending a man's life expectancy rate increases nearly twice as much as a woman's.

Laughably, leftists claim to want to save the world environmentally while supporting policies that encourage rampant spending, materialism, and consumerism—all driven by women! These are all predictable consequences of a country that marginalizes and demonizes its men at every turn.

Female consumerism and environmental destruction illustrated by Harvard; they ironically brag about female "empowerment"

It Only Gets Worse From Here

So where does this all leave us? It leaves us in the middle of a situation that's almost impossible to turn around without a revolution. Men, and particularly white men have been asleep at the wheel for a century as their nation and their voice in it has been repeatedly and steadily undermined. We must begin righting the course of the ship of state by having discussions about our self-interest or be left to wither and die in foolish optimism that somehow our fortunes will be reversed by being Mr. Nice. The New Modern Man warned about where this road leads late last year.

> That's why contemporary Progressivism should really be called Racial Bolshevism. The psycho-political profile is identical: whereas the original Bolsheviks believed that the Communist utopia could not be achieved without the elimination of the bourgeois class, the contemporary Racial Bolsheviks believe that the multi-cultural utopia cannot be achieved without the elimination of white people–especially white men.

Make no mistake, you have very little voice left when it comes to choosing a president. Trump literally may be our last chance to stop America from turning into a grotesque parody of the intentions of the founders. You will effectively have no representation, but you will surely be expected to foot the bill for everyone else's wishes.

Oh, and if the demographic changes don't sway the election, voting machines that are designed to be hacked just might. We are in a fight for our very survival as the "deplorables" i.e. the resistance to the New World Order. Trump went around the corrupt system. But, even if he wins the presidency, our battles have only begun. And winning will be no cakewalk.

Insecurities are something people don't want to admit having due to the negative connotations associated with them. This is especially true for men as we know that it conveys the impression that we are weak and fragile, a sin that the opposite sex will not forgive us for. Other men, too, find it infectious and tend to avoid those who they believe suffer from insecurities. So while I think it's justified to hide them, I think it's more important to deal with them the right way.

The following steps will help you overcome your insecurities or at least greatly reduce their grip over you.

1. Know that it isn't necessarily a bad thing

Insecurity in itself is not a bad thing; it’s how you respond to it that matters. Like the much maligned stress, it is a necessity for your daily function—it keeps you in check so that you conform to the values of society and not fall from your potential. Like stress, insecurity only becomes bad when it is excessive and out of control. And you know what kind of people suffer from no insecurities? Slackers, degenerates, and sociopaths.

2. Avoid negative coping strategies

Insecure people tend to cope by covering their anxieties or releasing them in various ways that aren’t always helpful. See if you can identify ones you do yourself from the following:

- Being overly critical of others to a point where you spend more time putting others down instead of focusing on yourself.
- Avoiding situations that trigger your insecurities or just withdrawing completely.
- Obsessing over your real or perceived flaws and getting bitter and depressed about it.
- Trying to control others because you have no control over your own anxieties.
- Needlessly lashing out in anger.

3. Change your perspective

This is essentially a way of re-framing your thoughts around whatever you believe is your flaw or shortcoming. For example, I'm quite short, but I never really suffered from a serious insecurity around my height because I just joke to myself that I would make a good leader (or a dictator). And when I read about great figures in present and history who had their own share of flaws and misgivings, I see them as quirks that attribute to their genius. There have been many powerful and talented men who were shy, depressed, celibate, pessimistic, bad-tempered, suffering from ill health, and so on.

4. Know what you can change and what you can't

This is an age-old wisdom everyone should attain. Knowing the difference between the two will save you a lot of trouble and help you focus on improving in areas of your life that you have power over. Insecure about your weight and status? You can change those, start working on them. Insecure about your height or ethnicity? You can’t change those, so forget about them and focus on other areas of your life to make up for them.

5. Get rid of artificial insecurities

When I say artificial insecurities, I am referring to the ones created by our consumerist society. The most common of these insecurities are ones based on money, status, and success. I'm not saying that pursuing these three are necessarily bad in anyway, but our modern culture—especially American culture—tends to overdrive the desire for those three to a point of anxiety and obsession.

Pursue money, status, and success to all your heart's desire, but just know that you don't need to feel insecure about them to attain them. And this brings us to our next point.

6. Accept your current station in life

Andrew Carnegie started from being dirt poor and ended up as one of the richest man in America.

Acceptance of who you are at this moment goes a long way. Whatever may have happened to you in the past, no matter how unfortunate and "unfair," you must accept it. No matter what you may be concerned with, whatever flaws you perceive in yourself, whatever desires remain unfulfilled, you must accept them all. You must also be process-oriented rather than goal-oriented so that you derive your self-worth from the progress you're making rather than feeling bad about how far you are from your dreams.

To give you another personal example, I am poor. Besides what I saved up from years of slavery, I currently make peanuts. I earn just enough to get by and I don't see my situation changing anytime soon. I have already come to terms with my financial situation and I don't waste my time comparing myself with other more "successful" individuals. And because of that, I don't feel any insecurity about my wealth or status. This doesn't mean that I'm a slacker without an ambition who plans to continue living with low income; I have plans which I'm acting upon. It just means that I have accepted this as the inevitable stage of my life that I must go through—having anxiety about money will only make things worse.

7. Press on your insecurities

How many men complain about women when they don't even approach them?

People often repeat in many variations that you shouldn't care about what others think about you—that opinions of others shouldn't influence you. But simply reminding yourself of that mantra doesn't cut it. It isn't enough to tell yourself not to care about what others think about you, you have to constantly put yourself in situations that will challenge your insecurities. You have to face rejections, you have to face criticisms, you have to face failures, and you have to continue on and on until your insecurities are dulled.

Think about it. Who's going to overcome their insecurity faster: a man who tells himself a million times that "it's her loss" after one rejection or a man who faces hundred rejections without hamstering to preserve his ego?

8. Suck it up and improve

Hey, at least he’s trying.

With many things in life, you just have to push through to make it. Today’s people make far too many excuses for inaction when it really comes down to the fact that they’re lazy or afraid. For example, if you feel insecure in social situations because you’re introverted, shy, or whatever, the only way you’ll overcome your anxiety is by putting yourself in social situations over and over again until you become better. And yes, you will make an ass out of yourself until you get better. Expecting other people to cater to your personality or dismissing them as being “stupid” is not going to help you at all. I highly suspect that many introverts today are much more withdrawn than they normally would’ve been due to the fact that they just rationalize their personality as being innate and fixed rather seeing as something that can be changed. The plethora of electronic mediums and other diversions are not helping them go out and socialize either.

And when you go out to make the effort, when you are exposing yourself to your insecurities, expect people to ridicule, criticize, and discourage you in every way imaginable. Acknowledge that they will be there, but know that they do not matter. You’re the one striving to become better and overcome your weaknesses, you are the only one that matters. Haters are only there because it’s easier for them to attack you for your flaws than it is for them to fix their own. Like Teddy Roosevelt said, it is not the critic that counts. Don’t ever let others bring you down.

Conclusion

I won’t sugar-coat things and say that everything will be fine with whatever shortcoming you may be facing. Insecurities can be a bitch and they’re capable of eating you from the inside out. Whether you feel insecure about your appearance, wealth, competence, social acceptance, or the fact that you’re an incel, things will not likely improve in a short time even when you try. You just have to keep going by focusing on your efforts while relishing the little victories. Don’t let yourself suffer with regrets in five, ten, or twenty years in the future because you failed to take action now. Do what you need to do.

A New Red Pill Comedy You Have To See To Believe

September 19, 2016 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

This is intended as a public service announcement of sorts. There is a new red pill sketch comedy that readers would do well to check out. Million Dollar Extreme Presents: World Peace (MDEp:WP) began airing in early August as part of the Adult Swim programming block on Cartoon Network.

In an era of stifling political correctness, MDEp:WP is a welcome breath of fresh air. The sketch comedy is the brainchild of comedian Sam Hyde, who cut his chops doing controversial stand-up routines, creating scathing YouTube videos, and trolling college campuses.

With MDEp:WP, Hyde and his comedy troupe have achieved mainstream success with the show drawing nearly one million weekly viewers. However, the irreverence of MDEp:WP has not gone unnoticed by the establishment and the show has come into the crosshairs of BuzzFeed, which has already written two hit pieces: "The Alt-Right Has Its Very Own TV Show On Adult Swim" and "The Underground Neo-Nazi Promo Campaign Behind Adult Swim's Alt-Right Comedy Show."

MDEp:WP incorporates many references that regular readers of RoK will undoubtedly be familiar with: pick up artistry (PUA), game, peacocking, the wall, and female hypergamy. MDEp:WP is absurdist comedy at its finest. The show has a definite Kafkaesque feel to it that somehow manages to perfectly capture the ridiculousness, isolation, and hollowness of modern existence. The psychedelic camera work, vivid color effects, and ethereal soundtrack cleverly enhance the surreal dream-like atmosphere of the show.

Below is a brief overview of the episodes, with red pill truths and memorable quotes from each episode.

Episode 1: Your Vibe Attracts Your Tribe

Red Pill Truths:

Beta male, the myth of equality, leniency toward female offenders, gender double standards

Memorable Quotes:

"You've seen all these school shooters: pathetic beta males. Who have no girlfriend. Just imagine how many less there'd be, if they had been bullied early, and often."

"This closet is why David Bowie is dead."

Episode 2: Illegal Broadcast: John Hell Emergency

Red Pill Truths:

The wall, female hypergamy, female entitlement, lack of female accountability

Memorable Quotes:

“It seems like when you hit 30, that your partner count is considered something negative. Rather than being wild and free, it’s just you can’t find a man, so you can’t stop looking, and you can’t stop fucking.”

“Welcome back to ‘The Wall Show,’ the show where 30 stops being a number and starts being an unescapable way of life.”

“I say that stay in school a little longer, they get great jobs, they keep their bodies in shape, and they find a guy like me after all that.”

Episode 3: 3 Down 47 To Go Countdown To Mass Funeral

Red Pill Truths:

Birth control / estrogen in the water supply, low-T, one-itis, SJW control of the public school system

Memorable Quotes:

“They call me all kinds of things. They call me argon. They call me dark child. They call me night master. They call me P-body. They call me Peanut Arbuckle. They call me Doorway. They call me Pink Dress. They call me Sweezy. They call me Go-Go Nuts. They call me Pineapple Man.”

“It’s just the same things over and over. It’s bad when I’m not smarter than the students I teach. First three weeks, Holocaust. Next three weeks, Black History Month.”

“I didn’t make the kids stupid. That’s on the parents. That’s on the government. Not me.”

Episode 4: Mad At Dad? Gomad For Chad Mgtow

Red Pill Truths:

PUA, peacocking, game, single mothers, women marrying the government

Memorable Quotes:

“I’m a really nice guy. It just hasn’t gotten me anywhere.”

“I know literally everything there is to know about getting pussy. So even though you’re test-tube, gub-gub snail man, we’re gonna be getting you knee-deep in some gash.”

“I’m that gorilla dick pussy god. I make dyke pussy wet.”

“Once Uncle Sam stepped up to the plate and gave us our EBT, they started taking care, taking the place of daddy.”

Episode 5: Not Everyone Thinks You’re A Hero

Red Pill Truths:

Female careerism, Facebook censorship and suppression of dissent

Memorable Quotes:

“She’s got an associate’s degree. I know you may think she’s just a hot little package, but she’s educated.”

“When my field hockey wife asked me to marry her, I said yes.”

Link to full episode

Episode 6: You Hate This Show Because You Hate Yourself

Red Pill Truths:

Victimhood mentality, demographic replacement, female hypergamy, drugging of male students with ADHD medications, criminalization of masculinity

Memorable Quotes:

“It’s 2016, and if you’re not cool with homosexuals in your schools teaching your kids about butt sex … Peace, because hate is wack.”

“My race is done. You’re inheriting the Earth, along with some other undesirables, and that’s cool … but just remember who built this place, all right? Remember to pay homage to the white man.”

“We’re here because we need to find suitable genetic material for comingling with my own. Not necessarily using my husband’s DNA.”

“I want to feel tingles.”

Conclusion

It seems 2016 is the year that the Alt-Right enters the mainstream. Too large to ignore any longer, those on the right who are disillusioned with milquetoast conservatives and RINOs (Republicans In Name Only) have received recognition from both presidential candidates. And now the Alt-Right has a hit comedy series on a major network. So what can you do? Watch the show. Tell your friends and family to watch it. Share clips on social media. Incorporate phrases and quotes from the show into your daily lexicon.

The establishment is already trying to pressure cable providers to stop carrying MDE. We must all do what we can to make sure MDE is picked up for another season.

The Power Of Conscience: Oliver Stone's "Snowden"

The films of Oliver Stone have always been characterized by two features: moral passion and narrative power. His best work manages to balance these two qualities flawlessly. Salvador (1986), Wall Street (1987), Platoon (1986), Natural Born Killers 1989), and JFK (1991) all shared these features, along with a tendency to weave elements of his own personal history into some of his movies. At times his moral passion has gotten the better of him, and threatened to derail otherwise promising pictures: Born on the Fourth of July (1989), Alexander (2004), Heaven and Earth 1993), and World Trade Center (2006) all were handicapped to some extent by well-meaning preachiness.

But even on his bad days, Stone belongs on that very, very short list of American movie directors that really matter in the modern age. Even if Stone had stopped working in 1992, for example, after the release of JFK, his stature would have been secure for generations. Who can doubt that Platoon was not only the greatest war film ever made, but ranks among the greatest films of any genre ever made? We can't always have it our way: we have to accept Stone's vision for what it is, and remind ourselves that artistic genius makes its own rules.

It would have been surprising if Stone had not wanted to tell the Edward Snowden story on film. It has all the qualities that he loves: a man confronted with a difficult moral problem, the need to rebel against an oppressive system, and the unfolding of an international drama of conspiratorial intensity.

But Stone is surprisingly restrained: he does not beat us over the head with his message, but simply lets his character's life tell its own tale. That tale may not be as familiar to audiences as we might think. We follow Snowden's early years as a reservist and a special forces candidate; physical problems prevented him from completing the course, but he was able to find an outlet for his interests by pursuing a career in computing.

Various jobs in US government intelligence agencies followed. Actor Joseph Gordon-Levitt plays the elusive Snowden flawlessly, with just the right combination of frail vulnerability and seething moral outrage. We follow Snowden's progression in stages: the idealistic computer warrior gradually has seeds of doubt planted in his mind as he realizes the full extent of the NSA's surveillance. Over time, this doubt gives way to anger, and from then the decision is made to act.

What Stone does well is to explain exactly what it is that Snowden disclosed. Without going into all the technical details, the end result of the NSA's programs (PRISM, Quantum, XKeyScore, etc.) was essentially to collect everything on everyone. The so-called "FISA courts" were nothing but rubber-stamps who never saw a request they denied. It is hard to watch a film like this without feeling a deep sense of outrage that things could have come to this point, and perhaps that is Stone's whole point: unless we become aware of what is happening, no steps can be taken to rein in the threats to our privacy and personal identity.

Stone makes short shrift of the standard arguments in favor of the metadata collection programs: "It's a new world and we have to do this. The threats can come from anywhere. Those with nothing to hide have nothing to fear." But authoritarian governments in every age have always made these arguments. More than anything else, Snowden demolishes these comfortable illusions and shows us just how false these delusional premises really are. In the modern age, it seems that the threat is not just to our privacy, but to our very freedom of will.

This is not escapist entertainment, but a true rarity in modern cinema: a big-budget film that can generate philosophical debate on the issues that penetrate the heart of modern man's identity. And these are not really "new" questions. It is easy to forget that being free from unwanted intrusions in our lives has been a feature of the American identity since the founding of the nation.

The little-known Third Amendment to the US Constitution prohibits the quartering of soldiers in the homes of citizens. This amendment was born at least in part by the deeply offensive Quartering Acts that were passed by Parliament in the 1760s and 1770s, whereby American colonists were compelled to accept the presence of soldiers in their homes.

At least implicit in the Third Amendment is the idea that US citizens have a fundamental right to be free of unwanted violations of their privacy and personal spaces. If so, the NSA's surveillance programs cut to the heart of what the Constitution is supposed to stand for. Seen in this light, Snowden is nothing less than a hero and a patriot for exposing the rotten core of modern authoritarianism, as well as the anti-terrorist lies that it hides behind. Snowden reminds us that the individual has the power, by making use of his own conscience, to shape the course of events. But there is a steep price to be paid.

The film is crafted with great care. Stone interviewed Snowden in Russia in 2014 in preparation for the film, but he had no input into the script and received no payment for the movie. Ultimately, Stone also bought the rights to two books written by participants in the Snowden affair, and based his screenplay on that material. Filming was difficult: few American companies wanted to participate in the project for obvious reasons, and budget constraints meant that most of the filming had to take place in Europe.

But the end result here is a marvelous piece of work. Entirely lacking in the polemical tone of some of Stone's work in the 1980s and 1990s, this is the assured, confident product of a mature mind. As his great film Wall Street taught us, there are no short-cuts to being a good man, and nothing good can come from moral corruption. And as the view leaves the theater, he is reminded that, for all the advances in technology that have occurred since the days of Cicero, the nature of man has not changed.

Our efforts to gain total "security" at the expense of our privacy and freedom of will always come to nothing, because the desired end is itself morally wrong. We have never yet been able to improve on Cicero's counsel to us that "nothing can be expedient that is not also morally good." And this remains the most enduring lesson of all.

7 Ways My Body Has Changed After Hitting 30

September 20, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In spite of my best efforts, I have been unable to halt the effects of time upon my body. While I have no serious health issues, a crop of minor annoyances have popped up. I want to share them so the young men reading today have an idea of what to expect as they get older.

1. My sex drive has reduced

In my early 20's, I remember masturbating at least once a day. I used to think about sex constantly and be ready to fornicate with anything remotely decent. Today, I don't think of sex at all unless I'm in the vicinity of a beautiful girl or I haven't been laid in at least two weeks. Because of that, I've been far more productive when it comes to work and can think more clearly, but I do feel like I'm missing out on a primal motivator that drove me in the past.

I know many men who take various hormonal substances to re-gain their vigor, but I don't yet see it as a problem requiring medicinal supplementation.

2. My urine flow is more lazy

It takes me more time to shake off the remaining drops after urination, as if there is greater leftover still in the pipes. I'm aware that I could do reps of squeezing exercises that hit my PC muscles, but it's not yet a big problem

3. I'm more fatigued after working out

After a workout, my body wants to call it a day and rest. To combat this, I sometimes have to take an espresso shot to help get me through the remainder of the day, something I didn't have to do when I was younger. When I was boxing in Ukraine a couple years ago, some of the workouts were so intense that I had to go to sleep right after. Working out is supposed to increase your overall energy in theory, but you must account for long periods of rest.

4. My joints are getting stiffer

When I wake up in the morning, my spine, shoulders, wrists, ankles, and knees feel rigid, and I have to move around a bit until they are lubricated. I also have to stretch a lot more than when I was younger.

5. My kidneys are more sensitive to salt, caffeine, and alcohol

After eating a salty meal, I have to drink huge amounts of water afterwards to re-balance my system. My kidneys also go crazy if I go too heavy on diuretic drinks during the day, such as consuming coffee in the afternoon and then beer in the evening. During periods of drinking coffee every day, I feel like I'm in a chronic state of dehydration.

6. My eyes get so dry they burn

I've always had slightly dry eyes, but during the winter it's getting bad enough that I have to sometimes skip out on wearing contacts. I've been able to temporarily solve this problem with eye drops and heat compresses, but I'm not producing enough eye oil. My eye doctor thinks it's due to being on the computer so much, where blinking is less frequent.

7. My stomach sticks out slightly more

I haven’t put more fat on my stomach, but I noticed it’s a bit more distended than when I was younger, as if it wants to round out. My guess is that this is from lower levels of testosterone and just general aging.

The above changes aren’t debilitating by any means, but they are changes nonetheless. Based on what I see in my father, I’m guessing that my body will degrade slowly at first, and then a bit more rapidly after I hit 50 and all the little problems escalate further. As long as my dick works and I don’t need to hire a Filipina nurse to sponge bathe me, I think I’ll be able to adapt to the changes that come.

How To Spot The “Nice Girl” For A Potential Relationship

The word “nice” has become negatively connoted since it has been associated with being a nice guy. Before, niceness was a virtue, equated with gentleness, goodness, respectfulness. It was part of the courtship process, as a “nice” man would take his time to know the gal he was courting, organize dates and social activities with her—and this was legitimate as long as the gal cared about him, or bothered about looking as if she cared, as much as he did with her. Some conservatives have even claimed that niceness was a basic element of sociability.

Now, niceness has been ousted as a negative feature by almost everyone with a skin in the game. Feminists crucified nice guys as “hypocrites,” because, y’know, a heterosexual man cannot be nice, cishet are just a bunch of oppressors, and how do nice guys dare to have their own interests and desires at all, and so on. In the manosphere, niceness is often equated with betaness, inability to take action, living inside the illusions of the blue pill, and the surest way to loserdom.

Neither metapolitics in general nor the red pill in particular can be described as nice: metapolitics mean cultural fight, unmasking the mainstream worldview and ideas, pushing ours, all these often indirectly; and the red pill teaches us that negging girls, kicking their ego, escalating when we can, are part of being confident and getting notches.

Yet the very notion of niceness does not deserve to be universally condemned and rejected. In a normal society, people are nice or at least try to be nice to each other, if only to their closest friends and kin. In the world where courtship worked, having interests and desires did not mean one had to play the jerk in order to basically succeed. And though we cannot be nice to anyone, if at least some girls are, society ends up much happier and peaceful than if everyone must keep jerking around to pretend his life is a success.

This is what I want to talk about today: not about the nice guy—whom I would like to mention again eventually for other reasons—but about a far less acknowledged figure we might call the nice gal.

The quiet trad girl

Now I'm not talking about the so-called anti-feminist females who, although they may be helping us on the struggle for the cultural victory of neomasculinity, tend to use it for attention-whoring purposes. What I'm talking about is this kind of girl who, even if she does not say it explicitly and does not know it herself, is still somehow innocent, avoids getting knocked by new guys at every weekend and longs for something akin to the white picked fence dream.

This girl has been derided as a wilful slave by feminists who, like Betty Friedan, compared the privileged life of an upper middle class housewife to a concentration camp (!). She might be passed on by PUAs who will see her shyness and resistance as a loss of time for themselves. But, on the other hand, such a girl makes for an excellent long term relationship material, and though she is often hard to both find and fuck, she is also someone you can trust as a partner.

Though hard to have sex with, she turns (and remains) emotionally loyal and affectionate

At the beginning of the dates, she will block your escalation moves but also stays in touch with you, cares about your well-being, and does not fuck around when she does so. Her vibe is very different from the usual girl who pretends to be into you, but has no time to share your company, does not actually care about you and has sex with at least one other guy at the same time. The basic feature of the nice gal is that she cares—and not about her Instagram, Facebook, or getting invited to the next popular and fashionable party next door. With practice and disappointments, differentiating between the girl who actually cares and the girl who pretends to do so but is just another phony becomes easier.

She may be superficially a leftist, as most university girls are today, but will accept your politics

When you are still dating her, you can do some jests about, say, the good side of the dissenters (us) versus the ugly side of current power; she may say you are macho but won't go overdrive shrieking and screaming. Eventually, when you are nailing her on a regular basis, you can be honest about politics, teach her about the Jewish power, how native Europeans are getting displaced, or how feminism actually engineered a sex war and ruined families. She may argue a bit—just a bit—and, incrementally, will get convinced that what you say and believe is right and true provided your frame is strong enough.

Speaking with her is genuinely pleasant

Framing, bantering, escalating are of course on the menu, yet doing all this creates a good vibe and allows you to lead true conversations. The seduction process does not feel like a tedious struggle to keep her attention, escalating before she flakes or getting exposed to massive amounts of bullshit from another spoiled brat who thinks she knows it all.

She only slept with a few guys before

If she is young enough, she may be a virgin, and if she is, she will be quite shy given that a “late” virgin girl often gets mocked by other girls as “retarded” or unable to have fun. Here again, be careful not to confuse her with the typical Western girl who chronically lies about the number of guys she actually had sex with. A truly nice gal does not really want to have sex with numerous guys: she wants to reserve herself to one guy, and at worse practices serial monogamy, not random hookups.

She is physically average or slightly above

Most girls who grow hot early in life quickly know way too much about their power over men and other girls, and wielding such a power destroys niceness, especially in a world that celebrates irresponsible slutiness. Being physically average, the nice gal will sometimes be approached and complimented like almost every young girl, but much less than hotter girls, and she won’t be deemed interesting by the alpha males pursuing hotter and easier lays—a condition which restrains her natural hypergamy.

She’s got friends, of course, but is not too dependent on them and on what they say

You don’t have to be accepted by a mother hen inside her group to be able to approach her. Nor is she too dependent on fashion and entertainment culture. In her case, some shyness and distance from the mainstream sociability mean preserving her integrity. A nice guy living through such a condition will die off by failing to achieve anything meaningful, but a nice gal can preserve herself for becoming a housewife, and this matters a lot.

Sometimes, she has a personnalité empruntée

This means that she acts this or that way in front of her friends, but what she does has a strange vibe of fakeness. If you find a girl who seems to satisfy the aforementioned conditions and feels a bit strange or fake, it is up to you to dive deep enough—mentally and physically—if she can be considered nice or not. Often, the nice gal with such a personality won’t even know that she has one. The incongruent mask turned into a second nature. Fortunately, nature isn’t that plastic, and an incongruent second nature means contradictions and repression inside, which in turn reveal as explosiveness in bed.

She often has developed feminine virtue

For example, she knows to cook a proper meal or do a massage to a man who’s tired. She may have learned these virtues from her parents or has been spontaneously attracted to practising them: in any case, the very fact of having retained them is a proof of genuine femininity. Needless to say, she has no more than a few whore signs, or none at all.

Where can one meet such girls?

Nice gals are undoubtedly easier to meet outside the West. Everything else equal, the most traditional a society, the nicer the girls one can find there. As for myself, having lived a couple of years in Brazil, I have found some easy lays there, but also a variety of gals who still did not have sex with too many guys, enjoyed more the quieter events and definitely became attached after but a few time. One of these girls was a fake hipster whose problem glasses hid a refreshing gentleness and some political openness. Another one was a journalist who worked for a Leftist party, but accepted your humble servant for the outspoken libertarian he was before taking more of the red pill.

This may stem from the fact that Brazilians still have a strong family culture and that so-called “gender” roles are still quite clear to them. A decent amount of girls there prefer going back to their family home in the hinterland during weekends over partying at the city center. It won’t help the PUA to get his lays—although, in Brazil, there seems to be enough girls in most places to satisfy the PUAs—but is definitely good news for those who are looking for long term relationships.

Et alors?

If you happen to score a notch with a nice gal, you are technically free to pump and dump her, but seriously, avoid doing too much of that. As everyone knowledgeable enough knows, the more partners a girl has before marriage, the more likely she is to divorce, and to divorce soon. Thus, if a girl gets pumped and dumped by too many PUAs, she might be whorified for life and unable to support a family over the long term.

Concerning the nice gal, her shyness and reserve tend to protect her from the PUA, but some players are smart enough to get the notch before moving to other girls. If this happens too much to her, who deep down wants more than hookups and drunk parties, she may turn disillusioned and sour… and prey for the feminists.

A nice gal is part of a normal, today non-mainstream world. Look at your mothers, grandmothers, grand-grandmothers and you are more than likely to find women who once were nice gals. These were home pillars, and they are necessary to sustain a future, for a Brave New World humanity where children are engineered and grown out of the womb is barely human at all.

The path of the notches is, or has been, a necessary step for most of us. We gain experience, autonomy, ability, even dignity by achieving the opening of a girl's legs. But this is so because we live in an abnormal and somehow savage world. In a normal world, boys receive experience and modelling from their fathers, and girls are much more trustworthy and altruistic than they are today. In a normal world, a guy did simply not need to score many notches as to exist or pretend to be a success, and men could go to the brothels in order to get some extramarital pussy without endangering the whole social fabric.

Now, being precautious and "respectful" in general towards girls would amount to white knighting and be a failing strategy. But if you happen to meet a girl who is still more than an oil pit for sex, perhaps you should marry her and consider having children, especially if you can do so outside the US as to escape its repressive, anti-men divorce laws. As long as the nice gal remains nice and as you reward her for being so, she will likely be a good mother, lover, and householder.

Toronto International Film Festival: Raw Commercialism Behind A Veneer Of Progressivism

September 20, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

Every year as the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) gets more socially and politically "progressive" in its filmic offerings, the more commercialized it's become as a whole.

There was a time, up until about four years ago, when TIFF was predominantly a place for cinephiles and romantics. Then, the majority of screened films represented distinguished expressions of different cultures around the world (real diversity) or were smaller independent films searching for distribution. Most importantly, TIFF, even if with its varied lineup, was Canada's leading film festival.

To an extent, TIFF still caters to that niche and those causes (TIFF 2016 is hosting 397 films from 83 countries, a slight increase in the later from last year), but as the festival continues to grow in scope, scale and popularity, it has inevitably inflated into a more or less culturally vacant commercial enterprise that seems to privilege popular taste and fashionable politics.

While the TIFF street festival is a nimble way to jump venue to venue, it is also a hotspot for deluded protesters and pesky pedlars.

As Roosh and others have written, Toronto has become a progressive, multicultural nightmare–one that I've admittedly grown accustomed to over the years (is it Stockholm Syndrome?).

Now culturally pluralistic, the city is geographically checkered with disparate ethnic groups and subcultures that refuse to assimilate into one primary identity. Without interconnectivity, citizens are expected to seek out a sense of togetherness by participating in mass consumption and collectively accepting ideas of social "equality."

You can say this about a lot of American cities, too. But Toronto is a special case: as Canada is known to echo American pop culture–which the Left has a monopoly over–Toronto follows suit by souping up the most skewed aspects of leftist propaganda you see south of our border (Black Lives Matter, third-wave feminism, climate change, etc) and implementing it as common sense–or, worse yet, policy.

This foul leftism seems to evaporate in the air and rise north across the border, where the most harebrained aspects of the ideology distill and condense into Toronto's ethos. And our leaders lay down and accept it.

For instance, Black Lives Matter recently halted Toronto's Gay Pride Parade by setting off rainbow-coloured smoke bombs (note how the embedded article labels the stunt a "victory"? Our mainstream press is this deluded, too), this only a few weeks after a lunatic stormed in and shot up a gay Orlando nightclub.

Black Lives Matter, the pinnacle of race relations in this city. Or something.

Now what is the city of Toronto doing? It plans on giving the domestic terrorist group this year's race relations award (though I should note that this terrorism has occurred stateside; in Toronto, BLM is more of a "peaceful" nuisance). Further, Pride Toronto apologized today to BLM for "deepening the divisions" in the LGBT community. That's like the sheep apologizing to the wolf for having a big appetite. You get the picture.

How does this relate to TIFF? TIFF, while it probably means well, reflects all this leftist up-is-down, left-is-right inverted reality. As Toronto's flagship arts event, it holds itself up as a vanity mirror to Toronto's prevailing social and political beliefs.

Because Toronto is notoriously progressive, TIFF offers these workshops like "The 4%: Film's Gender Problem" (which you can watch here) and tagging almost every female-directed TIFF film on its site with "Feminism" or "Female Experience" or "Female Director". Because It's 2016.

You also now see Spoiled Children march down a blocked-off King Street screaming for censorship in movies. On the same block, you can witness crazies hoisting placards and judging all "idolaters, homosexuals, fornicators, liars, witches" (basically everyone but themselves) as sinners doomed to Hell. This thorny mixture of zealotry ruins what TIFF used to and should still be about: the intellectual enjoyment of watching culturally diverse movies that your typical multiplex may not show you.

Sighted! Religious zealots at TIFF ’16, judging not until they judge themselves.

Further, the Politics of Shame progressives know too well takes the fun out of movies. And when you can’t cross the street or enter a ticket line without peddlers trying to sign you up for the newest and hottest streaming service or sample the latest “naturally sweetened” beverage, you cannot help but notice that the festival is less about experiencing art and more about inciting mass consumption.

That mentality defines living in Toronto: you don’t need values or human relationships, just buy, buy, buy and support this company that’s endorsing the most current social justice cause Because It’s 2016.

Toronto, above all, loves “diversity,” thus explaining why Antoine Fuqua’s The Magnificent Seven (which, granted, I have not yet seen) opened the festival this year. A year prior it was Jean-Marc Vallée’s superb Demolition—a movie about a rich white male (played by Jake Gyllenhaal) coping with the death of a loved one.

Virtual reality was the latest distraction this year at TIFF's marketing-driven street festival.

Now it's a modern Western directed by a black man and starring an ethnically-mixed cast, none of whom hail from Canada (Vallée, meanwhile, is French-Canadian, as is Denis Villeneuve, whose new film Arrival screened at the festival to favourable reviews).

Diversity of skin colour can't hide the fact that The Magnificent Seven is also TIFF '16's most commercial film—minus, perhaps, Arrival, which stars big-name actors like Amy Adams, Jeremy Renner, and Forest Whitaker. Fuqua has outspokenly rejected the diversity argument applied to his film, insisting the varied casting of the picture "wasn't to make a statement […] [he] just wanted to see Denzel Washington on a horse."

Fuqua claims he made “Seven” to “see Denzel Washington on a horse”, not in the name of diversity.

Opening the festival with The Magnificent Seven falsely suggests one thing while truthfully demonstrating another: as TIFF claims to support the crusade against Hollywood’s diversity problem, it’s become more predisposed to populism and commerce—the two very things that drive Hollywood’s assembly line and perceived racial bias.

Take Nate Parker’s Birth of a Nation, probably the most interesting film to play at the festival. Not because it’s that good—I’ve seen it and it is merely decent—but because of the director’s history. Parker, a black man, was accused in 1999 of raping a white woman, but was found not guilty in 2001. Eleven years later, the alleged victim tragically committed suicide, putting Parker’s feet back in the SJW fire.

The American Film Institute promptly cancelled a screening of Parker’s new movie, and with TIFF only a few weeks away heads tilted northward in anticipation. TIFF’s organizers declared they would screen the film as planned since it told an “important story,” meaning one with a left-leaning bias.

Meanwhile, a documentary like Vaxxed presents an inconvenient argument about the MMR vaccine and gets bullied out of the Tribeca Film Festival, whereas a film that uses nineteenth-century slavery—a time of true oppression against blacks—to comment on today’s racial tensions brought on by misunderstood notions of institutional racism is fair game.

There is also a point to be made about Parker. If he had been wrongfully accused of rape, but was white and his movie did not reflect SJW fashion, I guarantee you, reader, TIFF would have cancelled the screening. Don’t get me wrong: I commend TIFF for keeping Birth of a Nation in its lineup, but not for why. TIFF is not doing this out of integrity, free speech, or belief in due process—it’s because the film confirms progressive thought, which is what festival organizers mean by “important.”

There is more to be said about Birth of a Nation (wait for my upcoming review when it releases this October) and Oliver Stone’s Snowden for that matter, which had its World Premiere at the festival and is now in wide release.

Snowden is the antithesis of social justice propaganda; while topical, Stone’s film is driven by tight dramatic structure and controlled pacing that lets the movie stand on its own as a compelling work of popular art taking a very unpopular stance. Snowden transcends partisan politics and the liberal grandstanding that is so commonplace in today’s Hollywood product.

Snowden shows that TIFF is not all progressive posturing and that there is, to some extent, a diversity of ideas on display at this eleven-day event, which ran this year from September 8-18th. Nevertheless, there is plenty cause for concern as the festival takes a noticeable nosedive toward promoting Hollywood product and corporate gadgetry, crowding out the intellectual space with an excess of ad space.

If that ends up the case, well, there is always Cannes.

Post-script: A reader accurately points out that film festivals like TIFF charge premium prices for tickets. This is another irksome aspect of TIFF's aggressive commercialism that must be addressed. While premium charges have been a thing for awhile at TIFF, this year it added Uber-like surge prices to high-demand screenings.

So in addition to minimum ticket prices going up (which is to be expected as the festival increases in popularity), you have to pay sometimes 7 dollars over the minimum, per ticket, to secure a seat. And if you want to exchange tickets and your original purchase was done through Ticketmaster, the service charges an additional 7-dollar exchange fee! Check your pockets; are they empty yet? God knows how TIFF will pilfer its customers next year.

10 More Magazine Covers That Will Trigger The Feminists And SJWs In Your Life

Here are 10 more Modern Beta Magazine covers that I recently put together for ROK readers…

I hope you will share them with your friends and family. Doing so will sure make it a heck of a lot easier to spot the betas, feminists, SJW's and cucks in your personal sphere of habituation, that's for sure. (And as the wise man once said, "Forewarned is forearmed…")

So without further adieu, let's get started.

1. Fake a brain tumor

2. Cuck lives matter

3. Bring out your inner beta bad boy

4. Notch count math for betas

5. Hot workout video

6. How NAWALT can prevent suicide

7. Hot bedroom talk

8. How to get an alpha male fired

9. Why buying your wife breast implants has its perks

10. Christmas cooking for cucks

Summary

An ROK reader asked about printing the first batch of 16 magazine covers out, and putting them in conspicuous places, like public restrooms. I'm all for that if anybody has a mind to do so.

By right-clicking on each image, and then selecting "View Image", you should be able to pull them up in a much-cleaner (and smaller) format, which will be suitable for printing.

I hope you enjoyed these latest magazine covers, and don't forget to do your best to wake up the men who are still on the fence regarding the red-pill perspective. We are facing a long, uphill climb, but every little bit of effort helps.

So wake up a few betas, SJW's and cucks today, by sharing these images with as many people as you can. If enough people do their part, who knows, maybe the current epidemic of mind-numbing SJW retardedness will soon be history.

And if not, we'll still be able to get a good laugh out of it. It's an ultimate win/win either way…

Return Of Kings Correctly Predicted The Demise Of Anthony Bourdain's Marriage

> Because of professional decisions we both have made, my husband and I have been for years in an unconventional relationship.

Television chef and culinary critic Anthony Bourdain has separated from his Italian-born wife Ottavia, only four months after Return Of Kings seriously questioned her behavior around other men. Earlier on, members of the Roosh V Forum in particular were noting the excessive cosiness and almost certain chemistry between Ottavia and her MMA "training partners" on Instagram over a long period of time.

The jaw-dropping frolicking included gems like this one at the family house while Bourdain was presumably away working:

Back in May I said that "Bourdain's politics are liberal, but we do not revel in his possible marital pain." I express the same sort of sentiment today about his most recent relationship news. However hideous his views are, including his over-the-top anger against Donald Trump (jealousy-induced, maybe?), it is hard not to feel some sympathy for him. Moreover, his marital woes provide some very important lessons for other men.

chariyaleeds Yeah I agree @ottaviabourdain I find his comments particularly disgusting because you're a mother... Jealousy & insecurity is pathetic. You keep doing your thing, you're a badass and a wonderful example of Unfortunately, Anthony Bourdain funded this lifestyle for Ottavia.

There is no doubt that Anthony Bourdain suffered a de facto cucking over a long period of time, even if his wife did not cheat on him with younger, more physically fit and virile men. For a start, Bourdain's millions enabled Ottavia to devote her time (read: life) to MMA training.

He was paying her to train with younger men and take copious numbers of Instagram photos with them. While he raked in the cash that propped up their lavish lifestyle, Ottavia remained free to basically pursue a hobby that gave nothing to Bourdain. Because many champion MMA fighters often earn peanuts, she herself, with much less fighting prowess than even other female competitors, was paying precious little to keep their luxury indulgences going.

Ironically, Ottavia, the one who did not contribute anywhere near as much to the marriage, appeared to resent him for the time he spent away working. So, on the one hand, women like this expect to be compensated for their presence in the form of material abundance, but invest their own energies into things that make zero difference to the relationship. This dynamic, especially as it features an overworked Bourdain, reminds me of the following red pill cartoon:

So what did Ottavia actually give to Bourdain in return? She might be a good mother, but publicly she seems far less enamored with family life and her child than MMA. People might say that privacy is the overriding reason her social media presence does not mention her daughter more, but if she was really interested in privacy, why would she have all the photos getting cosy with other men when she's married? That kind of behavior only leads to popular interest and questioning about infidelity, not privacy.

Then there's the vexed question of Ottavia's looks. She is far from a stunner. New York is replete with better looking women than her. The couple actually look like they are brother and sister. Even with the addition of make-up and other female beauty enhancers, the age difference here looks to be five years, not 22:

She also seemingly loved to rub it in his face that he was an aging, weak man, despite the fact that both her lifestyle and her rather salient public profile was all due to him:

Given all this, how was their relationship even a marriage?

Lessons for men

Always dig for the lessons beneath the pain and/or betrayal.

We can take three key lessons from the Bourdains' marriage implosion. Firstly, beware of idle women. Sure, Ottavia has been practicing MMA for a number of years. It is definitely exercise, something far too many women nowadays avoid like the plague. But it was definitely idle in the sense that the inordinate time she spent on it did not help or enhance her marriage, let alone give back to Anthony Bourdain. It generated comparatively nothing financially and did diddly-squat apparently to make Ottavia's husband's life easier or more pleasant. It also gave her the opportunity to meet countless younger men she could pose and spend time with, probably much more time than she spent in the arms of her husband.

The second point is that a woman's backstory matters. Ottavia, from Lombardy in Italy, quit her studies, purportedly in dentistry, and headed to the United States to chase an Irish rocker she was infatuated with. Whilst ending one life path and pursuing another is often the definition of personal happiness, I question her motives in making this choice. It is not as if she has carved out her own lucrative career in the following years.

Ottavia's current public profile and ability to train in MMA are the direct result of Anthony Bourdain's largesse. If Bourdain had pondered his wife's antecedence more prior to marrying her (assuming he had the information), he might have realized he was falling for an impulsive woman and not someone who would, commensurate to her abilities, contribute equally to the marriage. Almost any woman can pop out a child and give the obligatory level of care for it. Yet a proper woman should offer something more, most notably for a well-known and superficially successful man like Bourdain, who ostensibly has the option of being far more picky in mate choice.

Finally, and related to the other lessons, men need to ruthlessly count their relationship costs. One can do this in both gross and relative terms, and it is not simply about money. Whatever inconvenient truths such mental inquiries reveal, you need to ask the hard questions about whether a woman is giving her all to you or something close to it. For instance, how many hours did Bourdain work for Ottavia and how many did she work for him? If you find a particularly large differential in effort when you are already effectively funding a woman's wealthy lifestyle, you are more married to a prostitute than an wife.

Bourdain is in many respects a hugely successful man. When it comes to his soon-to-be ex-wife, however, he has all the faults, miseries, and pains of many other men. He may be a liberal, but he's a liberal you can feel sorry for in this situation.

4 Ideas For Men Trying To Break Free Of The Rat Race

Gentlemen, we live in an age of unprecedented rapidity of change. The West's infrastructure, culture, and technology have changed more in the past 20 years than they have in the past 100. It is not an overstatement to say that job security is a thing of the past.

So, what's a man to do in such uncertain times? Well, I propose that you must take your own financial success into your own hands. It will no longer do to trust a giant corporation to take care of you, and to be honest, this type of thinking is childish and entitled.

If you want to break free of the rat race and become financially independent, it is possible… if you're willing to put in the work. Very many men in the manosphere have not only left their day jobs behind, but are earning far more than they ever did before.

Roosh, Victor Pride, Mike Cernovich, Matt Forney, Stefan Molyneux, and more men all over the West have started to realize the pointlessness of working your whole life for a corporation. Instead, why not choose to become a self-employed man? If you don't think it can be done, simply look at the last five names that I rattled off. That's only a fraction of a fraction of the men who have escaped the rat race.

Escaping the grind is 100% possible, and in fact, will only take several years if you know what you're doing. So, with this in mind, here's four tips for men trying to break free.

1. Learn to Invest

One of the most basic tenets of being able to escape the rat race is not just to earn money, but to protect your money and make it grow for YOU. In fact, this is probably one of the most fundamental principles of wealth: the poor work for money, the rich have money work for them.

It only takes a modicum of thought to realize the folly of working for money. If you can only work 16 hours in a day, you are limited to 16 hours' worth of money. This is why it is crucial to shift your paradigm. Don't think of money and time as a linear trade (aka 1 hour = $15). Think of time as an INVESTMENT in money.

There are two types of investments: time and money. That's it. You can either invest time, or you can invest money…and I would argue that you should do both. Every time you're faced with spending your time to earn money, ask yourself: will this earn me money for JUST this hour? Or will this time investment continue to earn me money for the following years to come?

In other words, learn to create residual income. It is better to spend 1000 hours investing in a business structure, and earning $500 during this period, but then gaining $15,000 every month for the rest of your life. Again, switch your paradigm: don't TRADE time for money. INVEST time for money.

The second way that you can invest, is with money. Now, I'm not going to sugar coat this and bullshit you—it is very possible to lose money in the stock market, or in whatever investments you partake in. That being said, however, the stock market is not at all like "gambling," as some people think.

If you learn to read the signs and predict the upswings and downswings with even a small amount of accuracy, you will make a very large killing in the market. "But Jon," I'm sure you're asking. "How do I learn to trade the market?"

That's a great question—there's a lot of so called gurus out there claiming that they'll help you double or even triple your money in a year. But, when you ask them for proof, they completely shy away. Now, I'm not by any means claiming to be an expert on the market, but I did recently gain 268% in 5 months from precious metals investing.

Compare that to Wall Street's average gain of 10% per year, and it's pretty impressive.

All in all, the key is to get started. Consider reading the article that I just linked to, or maybe buying some books on the stock market (The Intelligent Investor is a great one). The point is to get started. If you're unsure of where to start and don't want to take huge risks, just invest in some simple, stable stocks or bonds; save ETF's and mutual funds for when you're more experienced.

2. Monetize Your Passion

As many others, such as renowned entrepreneur Gary Vaynerchuk, have said before, if you want to make it big you have to follow your passion. Now, I get that this can sound like complete hippie garbage to someone who has been in the rat race for the last three decades, but let me explain.

When you're stuck in the rat race, you don't see things the same way that an entrepreneur does; you only see the opportunities that are GIVEN to you. "Hmm, I could get this job doing something I hate for $150,000 a year or I could follow my passion as a teacher and get paid $35,000 a year…I think I'll choose the former."

Obviously you can't follow your passion if you expect others to just give you an opportunity to do so, but if you take the mindset of an entrepreneur it is entirely possible. Think about it: dozens of highly intelligent revolutionaries have told us to follow our passions. Steve Jobs, Bill Gates, Richard Branson, Sam Walton, George Lucas…why is it that they all say the same thing?

Because when you take a leap of faith, and learn to monetize your passion, great things happen. Rather than taking an employee's mindset and looking around to see who can help you, you take the mindset of an entrepreneur and look where you can SEIZE opportunities.

I know that this may not seem like a big shift, but it's massive: employees look for others to give them success, entrepreneurs look to CREATE it themselves. I don't care what it is that you're passionate about; whether it's creating the best flamenco guitar music in the world or traveling across South America and tasting expertly crafted artisan coffees.

If you're passionate about it, there's a way to monetize it. All you have to do is ask yourself a very simple question: how can I make others pay me to do what I love to do? I realize that this question may not be very helpful to a newbie entrepreneur, so I'll help you answer it.

Let's say you're passionate about lifting weights (like I am). Okay—so how do you get others to pay you for this? Well, you don't. Rather, you create a BRAND and get others to pay you for your KNOWLEDGE. Start a blog, a YouTube channel, a twitter, and a Facebook for your company. Start putting out content several times a week.

Over time, you'll get a following. People will see you as an expert for simply talking about what you love to do. Talk about the best pre-workouts on the market, the best bicep exercises, how to do intermittent fasting…talk about whatever you want.

Then, once you're getting around 1k viewers a day, launch an eBook…which brings me to my next tip.

3. Learn to Write eBooks

With the advent of the digital world, authors no longer have to go through broken, bureaucratic publishing companies to get their work out there. Prior to the internet, it was not uncommon for amazing authors to have their work turned down by 30 or 40 different publishing companies.

And then, on the off chance that they got their work accepted, they would only keep about 20% of the profits. But now, you can literally create and sell an eBook within a couple of weeks. and you get to keep anywhere from 30% to 100% of the profit.

If you don't have a blog, which I'm assuming most of you reading this probably don't, then I would opt to sell an eBook through Amazon's Kindle store. You keep a relatively decent percentage of the profits (I believe from 30-60% depending on how high you price it) and you expose your work to literally millions of book browsers every day.

If you have your own blog with a relatively large following, however, creating an eBook and selling it through your blog will allow you to keep 100% of the profit. This is what guys like Roosh, Matt Forney, Victor Pride, and I do. By selling eBooks through our blogs we can charge whatever we want for it, create a sales page, and keep 100% of the profits. Sure, it's more work—but it pays off in the long run.

"But Jon! What if I have nothing to write about?" I can hear someone ask. Trust me, you have something to write about. What are you knowledgeable about? All of that nerdy stuff that never got you laid is an opportunity to make some money now.

Do you know how to create a computer from scratch? Okay, then write about that. Are you an expert at cultivating your own garden? Then write about that. Or maybe you're an expert at banging girls that you meet during the day. Then write about that.

Whatever you write about, the point is that you need to be very knowledgeable about it. Guys can sense when you're bullshitting them, and that's no way to sell a quality product. If you're going to write an eBook, be sure that you have at least a few years of experience with what it is that you're writing about—preferably even more.

4. Utilize Freelancing Platforms

Over the past five years, tons and tons of online freelancing platforms have emerged. Sites like Fiverr, 99Designs, DogVacay, Upwork, and Elance, have created a new type of economy, where artists and skilled individuals don't have to rely on any sort of boss or location to get paid.

I actually decided to make a Fiverr around 2 years back as a joke; my friend told me that there were people who sold spells on eBay and made $100's of dollars a day. "There's no way anyone can be that stupid," I thought. "Look it up," he said.

After verifying his claim, I decided to make a Fiverr “removing curses,” for the low, low fee of $5 per curse. Within a couple of weeks I was earning around $20 a day, sometimes earning up to $50 a day if someone needed a very powerful, ancient curse removed (for an extra fee, of course).

I actually shut it down a while back, because I felt kind of like a dick for taking advantage of complete retards (although if you choose to do so, I won’t judge you), but the point is that there’s some good money to be made online if you’re willing to put in the work.

If you have any sort of skill or product that can be sold digitally, I guarantee you, there’s a market for it. Are you a good writer? You can get paid anywhere from $25-100 an hour to write high quality articles or proofread others’ work.

Can you use Adobe Photoshop? There’s guys out there who literally make $100’s of dollars a day just from photo-shopping abs into peoples’ pictures. Literally any skill that you have can be used to make money online. “But Jon, I don’t have any skills!” I can hear you say.

Can you talk? Okay—there’s people who will pay you to record testimonials or to record a few hundred words. And if you actually have a highly sought-after skill like coding or graphic design, you can forget about it. You’ll easily rake in a six figure salary.

Summary

Although this isn’t the “definitive guide” to making money online, it’s certainly a start. Remember, though: it all starts with your mindset. Learn to see the opportunities that others can’t see, and learn to believe that if you put in the work, you’ll get the results.

If you’re looking for a quick buck, definitely don’t go the blogging route—blogging takes a long time to make money from, but if you’re willing to put in the effort, it’s worth it. If you’re looking for slow and steady income gains, consider investing in the stock market as well.

For a much faster income, go with the freelancing option or consider writing eBooks and selling them on Amazon. There’s an infinite amount of opportunity out there, you just have to develop the confidence and drive to take advantage of it. I have, millions of other men have, and you can too.

Why The Overton Window Is The Key To Defeating Leftists

September 21, 2016 | by Brian Gerard | Link | Original Link

In my previous article, I examined the tactics that are employed by street level SJWs, with the hope that our community could understand and employ them in an equally effective manner. While keeping the street level SJWs in check is a good start, more must be done if we are to ultimately diminish their influence.

Specifically, we must first take back the initiative in the culture war that we are currently engaged in with the left, and then win it for good. This is an objective that is even more important than winning elections because, as Andrew Breitbart once noted, politics is inextricably linked with culture. This is because every boring policy or unoriginal political position adopted by a politician has some basis in that individual's world view. This means that to only fight the left at the political level, like mainstream conservatives do, results in an uphill fight that the left usually wins.

Although the tide is beginning to turn against the left, due in part to intellectual and cultural dissidents such as ourselves, there is still more work to be done. Accordingly, it is necessary to discuss the most important tool that the leftist and globalist intelligentsia uses to manipulate public perceptions and opinions. This tool is the Overton Window, and once it is fully understood, it can become another tool that we can use against the SJWs.

The Overton Window Explained

How ideas are deemed “extreme”

First created by Joseph Overton, a former senior Vice President of the Mackinac Center for Public Policy, the Overton window is a mechanism used by the SJW intelligentsia and political elite to determine the viability of a movement or idea. If something is within “the window,” it is seen as a “normal” or “respectable” position or belief that a citizen is allowed to possess. If a belief or movement is placed on the outside of the window, it is deemed “extreme,” “outlandish,” or “foolish” by the powers that be.

This is an incredibly effective tool that can be used to subjugate an entire population because it only requires a powerful individual or small group of individuals to first decide what is acceptable or extreme, and then use the government, religious institutions, and the media to push ideas that are deemed “acceptable.” It is especially potent because this “window” is never fixed in one place, meaning that it can be moved in any direction based on both external factors and the user’s beliefs.

The Overton Window in Action

Only became “popular” after a few court cases and favorable media attention.

A great example of the Overton Window in action can be seen in the Gay, Lesbian, Transsexual, Bi-Sexual, or Pan-Unicorn rights movement. In the 1990s, and even in George W. Bush’s second term ten years ago, this movement had very little political power behind it. Even with the heavy artillery provided by Hollywood elites, and leftist strongholds like Massachusetts and California, most Americans were either apathetic or opposed to gay marriage and the gay lobby itself was never able to portray themselves as a mainstream part of American society.

This all changed in 2008 with California’s Proposition 8, a ballot referendum where a majority of the Californians voted in favor of defining a marriage as between a man and a woman. Even though the gay lobby lost the popular vote, they were able to overturn the will of the people by appealing the vote and ensuring that the case ended up in the hands of a leftist judge. Their legal victory over Proposition 8 signaled a shift in the window, in which homosexuality and other similar identities were now mainstream, and any criticism of them was now "bigoted" or "extreme."

Because of this, we have now seen stories of executives being fired from their jobs for believing in traditional marriage, businesses being boycotted and banned from cities because they wouldn't kowtow to the gay lobby, and even Christian bakers being fined six figures and slapped with a gag order because they refused to bake a cake for a gay couple. Such a change would not have been possible without moving the Overton window in a direction favored by SJWs.

How we can manipulate the Overton Window

The political elite hates it when someone like Trump turns the window back on them.

Just because the SJW intelligentsia has had greater success in using the Overton Window than us, doesn't mean that their enemies can't use it as well. One key example of the potential that shifting the Overton window would create, can be seen with Donald Trump's run for President. Before Trump announced his candidacy, the race was going to look very much like a repeat from 2012, where a Republican and Democratic candidate that were both anointed by the media and the political class would pretend to have major disagreements over policy and ideology, but would really disagree over one or two minor issues.

This all changed when Trump declared his candidacy, at roughly the exact same time that news surrounding the shooting death of Kate Steinle at the hands of an illegal immigrant began to circulate. With this incident, Trump saw an opportunity to make illegal immigration and border security his primary issues, and since then has expanded to include a variety of pro-nationalist positions and policy objectives. As a result, his candidacy has garnered widespread support amongst a wide cross-section of the American public because of both his positive message and the fact that he has turned back every leftist attack that has been leveled at him, thereby making him one of the strongest candidates that non-leftists have been able to produce since Reagan.

His candidacy itself is solid evidence of our side's ability to move the window in our direction as well, because Trump's candidacy and the issues he discusses on a regular basis have resulted in the window being moved further to the right than it has been in decades. Even ten years ago, a modern border wall and a ban on migrants from countries compromised by terrorists would've been unheard of, yet Trump has succeeded in making these proposals mainstream.

Final Thoughts

Understanding the Overton Window, and its importance in shifting public opinion is a critical element of any political revolution. This is especially true with the Alt-Right, whose efforts in their free speech war with Twitter, culture war with campus radicals, and exposés concerning Hillary's health or other dirty secrets; have helped to shift the window further in our direction.

North Carolina Declares State Of Emergency After Black Rioting And Looting

Via Breitbart:

Police have closed portions of uptown Charlotte on Wednesday night after a series of gunshots were fired. One man has reportedly been shot. There are conflicting reports as to whether the protester who was shot is dead or alive.

The protests are the second night where the North Carolina city has erupted after a man, Keith Lamont Scott, was shot by police after he allegedly was carrying a gun. Some have–mistakenly according to police–believed that Scott had a book, not a gun, in his vehicle when a police officer shot him. But authorities have said that they confiscated a gun–and didn't find a book–in the vehicle.

The first night of protests saw many police officers injured, and now this second night has seen a protester shot–according to police by another protester.

The crowd is protesting the Tuesday, Sept. 20 police shooting of Keith Lamont Smith. Police say he was shot and killed after he produced a gun during a meeting with police.

Local activists say Smith was shot outside his car while holding a book, and that he was no danger to the police because he was disabled.

This is the second round of street protests, which broke out Wednesday night. Breitbart News is reporting the news from protests as it happens.

Why Are So Many Women Liberals?

September 22, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Women are more liberal than men. This is so true that the only thing that a person needs to do to get more liberal political policies enacted is to get more women out to vote. But how did it get this way? And is there anyway of reversing it?

The liberalism of women voters

Woman cries upon meeting her savior

It is no secret that our current liberal welfare state is only possible because women vote—and women overwhelmingly favor liberal policies. For example, If Hillary Clinton wins the election in November, it will be mostly due to women voters. Women consistently support Hillary by a 17-point gap. This gap has proved to be impervious to facts. Even hardcore liberal men started to question Hillary's physical stamina after her shocking collapse on September 11th, but Hillary's female supporters remained dedicated to her. To them, Hillary's loss of consciousness made her seem "more human."

Women are such reliable liberal voters that our elites don't even need to persuade voters to support liberal policies. The only thing they need to do is get more women to the polls. The documents that were published as a result of the hacking of George Soros reveals that this was exactly his strategy in Europe. To support his plan to flood Europe with Islamic "refugees" from the Middle East and Africa, Soros' organizations only had to focus on persuading more women to vote. Apparently, they view women as robots who are unable to think for themselves.

But why are women so liberal?

There are two reasons why women are so liberal. The first is that liberalism is the ideology that our globalist elite want us to accept. If we reject traditional marriage and family, we are left with nothing but consumerism to fill our lives. Consumerism means more money in the hands of the elite, so they are always promoting it. Liberalism also steers us towards being rootless cosmopolitan atoms with only very weak bonds with other people—the opposite of a tribe. If you are an unconnected individual, you are much less likely to pose a threat to the elite hegemony.

Women are especially the targets of this indoctrination because civilization passes by mothers. If women can be filled with Marxist ideas, they will raise their children with the same Marxist ideas. Over the long term, this creates a race of materialist sheep who will try to fill their spiritual emptiness with the gadgets and baubles that the globalist elite sells.

To accomplish this indoctrination, women are subjected to non-stop programming from schools, television, movies, and magazines. From a young age, girls are trained to associate marriage and motherhood with bondage, while working as a cubicle wage-slave is linked to ultimate freedom. I have yet to meet a girl, even a generally conservative one, who has not been infected with at least a few of these liberal ideas.

The second reason flows from the nature of women. Women are naturally programmed to seek out a stable life. In the past, this served the function of women seeking out a strong man who could protect her and her offspring. However, once women got the right to vote, women were able to shape governmental policy through their votes. The government they created is one where there are safety nets to provide for a woman and her children in the event that her man leaves her. In other words, they have come to view the government as a substitute for their husband. Kellyanne Conway, who is now Donald Trump's campaign manager, put it this way:

Loading…

> More married women did not vote for Dole because of a widespread sense of societal insecurity: It is not that they distrust their husband, but they have seen divorce all around them and know they could be next. Women see government as their insurance.

So at least some women are voting for governmental policies that will be a substitute for a husband. Because this tendency to seek out safety nets is in-born, allowing women to vote will always create a more liberal social order than one where only men can vote.

Not all X are like that…

Tomi Lahren

Of course, not all women are liberals. A woman's family plays a huge role in whether she will be liberal or traditional. My wife happens to come from a conservative family. Somehow, she ended up being the most conservative member of her family. After she met me, she quickly adopted my more reactionary views.

But I'm sad to say that conservative parents are not always successful in handing on their conservatism to their daughters. I believe this is because the mainstream conservative movement is inherently weak. In the US, the only constant in the conservative movement is the desire for a smaller government. On every other point, whether that is same-sex marriage or Obamacare, mainstream conservatives are always willing to capitulate. They may moan about their losses for a long time afterward but they are never able to mount a strong resistance. Most of the time, they just quietly adopt their enemy's position as their own and get ready to lose the next battle.

Children notice the futility of the mainstream conservative philosophy. After all, a healthcare savings account (a popular proposal among conservative policy wonks) may be a good thing but it is not the sort of thinking that will capture the hearts and minds of young women—or young men for that matter.

Despite the feeble nature of mainstream conservatism, some girls do become conservatives. Given their willingness to swim against the strong currents of our culture's liberalism, conservative or traditional girls are rare. If you catch one, think twice before you throw her back in the water.

Can liberal women be changed into conservatives?

I just had to work a picture of tired Hillary into this article

Turning someone's ideological orientation is almost impossible for both men and women. That doesn't mean that most people have finally reasoned arguments in defense of their positions. Rather, most of us get our general political orientation from our parents or, as the role of parents in raising children continues to shrink, from our peers or teachers. Once we enter adulthood, we are likely to be on the same political end of the spectrum that we were on when we got our first full time job.

While that is the norm, I have witnessed a couple of cases of women who changed their political orientation for their husband or boyfriend. Unfortunately, both cases involved conservative women who turned liberal. Neither one of these men is handsome, powerful, or wealthy, but they both possess strong personalities. In their own little circles, which they are careful to control, these men are alphas. By the way, I do not advocate this approach of appearing to be an alpha by limiting your social circle.

I also know men who have failed to have any effect on their wife's political ideology. One of these is a friend of mine who is a very knowledgeable mainstream conservative. He can make a convincing argument for his conservatism yet his wife remains just as liberal as the day he met her. Even before he was married, he was unable to influence the political views of his prior girlfriends. While he is a nice guy, he has a very passive personality.

Thus, the rule is that liberal women will change their political ideology only if they hold the man in very high esteem. This even applies to religion. Well-reasoned arguments are not necessary. If the man is a leader, his woman will follow.

Conclusion

From the perspective of society, if you want to have a more conservative government and still maintain democracy, the only way to do it is to limit the voting franchise. Specifically, prevent women from voting.

If you happen to be a traditional man looking for girl who has traditional political views, the best course is to find one who already holds these views thanks to her parents or religious beliefs. If you can't find one of those, it is still possible to change the political persuasion of a liberal girl, but you will need a frame made out of titanium to be successful.

Donald Trump Uses The Same Game On The Media That Works On Women

Future President Donald Trump's established record of success with women is no secret. The guy has game and it is a given. Supermodels, Playboy centerfolds, you name it, The Don banged it.

Take away his money, what is left?

It cannot be denied that his fame added to his large financial resources are an aphrodisiac for women. It is simple biology in action. But in addition of his status, Donald can count on other traits like confidence or insane self-love.

Game denialists would be prompt to say " Well, he only scores because he has money." But people like Mark Zuckerberg are billionaires but still cannot bed beautiful women, why?

Because Zuckerberg is a doormat. Even with billions, he is an effeminate lab rat with poor posture that can only bang an Asian 5 to prevent his genes from vanishing from the surface of the Earth. His perceived fragility and his palpable weakness can magically turn any vagina dry.

Trump's past as an entrepreneur and businessman refined his frame to turn it rock-solid. He is in excellent health (compared to his opponent) but his mindset is even stronger and the undeniable key to his victories. He has been through trial and failure and this made his resolve and drive exceptional, hence his success with the ladies.

A short reminder

His three wives. Obviously the shortest union of the three was with the American one. Let that be a warning. Her are some notable examples which confirm that DJT is a game natural:

1. Between wives, he met Sandra Taylor (pictured above), a Penthouse Pet of the Month, took her out for pizza, banged her, gave her a signed copy of the Art of the Deal and told her to change her name, for better career prospects.

2. He dropped the nuclear "Neg of the Century" on aging and now irrelevant ex-model Heidi Klum with the savage "She's great, but no longer a 10," giving her and her white knights daily seizures. She tried to defend herself as he knocked her off balance, counter attacked in a poor and predictable fashion, but the blade did hit the bone. She has not slept since.

3. These gems:

> In an interview with Vanity Fair, while he was still married to Ivana, Trump said:
> "I would never buy Ivana any decent jewels or pictures. Why give her negotiable assets?"

> Trump: The Art of the Comeback on prenuptial agreements:
> "There are basically three types of women and reactions. One is the good woman who very much loves her future husband, solely for himself, but refuses to sign the agreement on principle. I fully understand this, but the man should take a pass anyway and find someone else. The other is the calculating woman who refuses to sign the prenuptial agreement because she is expecting to take advantage of the poor, unsuspecting sucker she's got in her grasp. There is also the woman who will openly and quickly sign a prenuptial agreement in order to make a quick hit and take the money given to her."

A winner mindset

This is the same drive and mental solidity that helped him deflect all the blows that the establishment directed at him, which allowed him to surge in the polls and in real life, coming from the status of political farce to possible President of the US.

He is banging the media and his opponents silly just like he does with his previous lovers. And what is interesting is that he uses almost the same approach in both cases: he does not give a damn and plows through.

He shows us that game not only helps you bed pretty girls but also ensures you greater success in business and status related activities like politics. He proves that it is all in the mind. DJT assumes the sale before it takes place which is one of the pillars of inner game.

Whatever the amount of flak her receives or the curved balls his enemies throw, it rolls on him like rain drops on a raincoat.

Game applied to the political arena

Two of his recent stunts royally pissed off the mainstream media and serve as a reminder that his romantic skills, transferred to politics, still find the mark.

Last week, Donald Trump used the whole “Birther” controversy, not adding any comment on the issue but tipping a journalist that “they had to keep the suspense going,” letting them craving for more information.

It brought the media in droves to witness what he had say during his Washington conference, hoping for a juicy statement that they could then exploit against him. They all eagerly turned up but the whole event was entirely focus on Donald’s support from veterans, Medal of Honor winners and retired flag officers.

Through this, he managed to bring the spotlight on the unfair treatment of veterans under the Obama administration, a cause that does not interest America's traditional media.

Nothing was said about the whole "Birther" issue and the coyotes of the mainstream media left enraged and empty handed. In the words of CNN, it was one of the first, if not the first, political RIck Roll. Just like with women, anticipation was cultivated and brought to climax before the coup de grâce.

He also responded brilliantly to the "basket of deplorables" label that Hillary Clinton used to describe the Trump campaign and its supporters.

In a textbook example of "Agree and Amplify", sporting his trademark shit eating grin, The Donald entered the stage of his Miami rally with the "Can You Hear The People Sing" soundtrack of the famous musical “Les Misérables,” assorted with a huge banner featuring the name “Les Deplorables.”

He embraces the notion of Deplorables, showing that just like the used and abused “racist,” a buzzword has no power and no weight. It is only used to silence a fragile opposition.

Just like the millennial girl that was teased and says “OMG you are such an asshole. I can’t even”, to which the panty wetter answers “And you love every minute of it”, Trump tells Clinton: “Deplorable”? Nice ring to it. Is that all you got?”

Artist’s impression of Trump’s “Les Deplorables” move and its effect on the Clinton camp

Donald J. Trump, président du game

Amused Mastery.

His whole philosophy can be narrowed down to this fundamental aspect of game. Trump uses Jerkboy-Asshole game because the American media reflects the image of a majority of American women: slutty, vulgar, leftist and only good for one thing: being pumped and dumped.

In the presence of a neutral, receptive and honest media, Trump would tone down the asshole game and would not be as aggressive as he is now. Exactly like a game-savvy man would use light game when he is not on American soil.

Despite his apparent qualities, it is a fact that Trump is not the panacea to the totality of America's problem. But among the great measures he could take as acting president of the United States, observing his masculinity and game techniques alone could act as a great inspiration for the next generation of men striving for romantic and political success.

How Hillary Lost The War On Pepe

September 23, 2016 | by Erik Miller | Link | Original Link

Back in March I was talking with a couple of friends about the election and we came upon the topic of memes. We all agreed that memes would be an important factor in the race, but they insisted that the major benefactor would be Bernie, whose supporters would use memes to proselytize young people into a massive wave of supporters that would carry their candidate to victory. I'm not sure they really believed that, but I had to disagree. Trump, I told them, would skillfully lead an army of diligent soldiers already well versed in the art of memetic warfare, who would end up playing a major role in the outcome of the race.

I don't think I have to tell you which one of us was right.

We're also going to deport SJWs

The Attack On Pepe

A few days ago, to distract from the fact that she's a corrupt, war-mongering globalist who may or may not be clinging to life as we speak, Hillary has decided to call our attention to the evils of… Pepe. Now, we all know and love Pepe, so I see no point in wasting time detailing his rich history or subtle, nuanced significance. The point is this: of all the issues of critical importance to our nation—immigration, trade policy, foreign policy, healthcare etc.—Hillary has chosen to focus her attention on the evils of a cartoon frog drug up from the bowels of the internet.

Coming off of her denouncement of the alt right, Hillary even went so far as to post an explainer on her official website detailing the horrors of Pepe and his deplorable counterparts. Making vague allusions to the KKK and white supremacy, Hillary's indictment of Pepe is a rambling, nonsensical piece of work without a shred of thought or context. It is abundantly clear that whoever decided this was a smart thing to make into a campaign issue had absolutely no idea what they were talking about. Needless to say, it didn't end well.

Why The Attack Backfired

In focusing on Pepe, regardless of his affiliations, Hillary has shown us all how small-minded she really is. By lashing out at something that she doesn't even begin to understand, we see that she is badly backed into a corner, a corner which her handlers see no viable way to escape. It is the beginning of the end for her, and we owe it all to a smug cartoon frog with a garish red hat reading "Make America Great Again" in stately white letters. It's entirely possible that as she lies on her deathbed sometime this October, Hillary will with her last breath whisper "…curse you, Pepe…" as Huma Abedin and Bill look on helplessly.

Suggestions that Pepe might literally meme Hillary Clinton to death notwithstanding, addressing our resident smug frog was an utterly pointless endeavor that will have no positive consequences for her, but probably some for us. The message of her attack was "Pepe is associated with racists, and Trump is associated with Pepe, therefore Trump is racist." This is a grotesquely simplistic understanding of Trump, racism, and more importantly Pepe, but I digress.

Even if that line of reasoning weren't filled with misconceptions, what it reduces to is this—"Trump is racist." This is said literally every day, usually by Hillary herself, and if not, by one of the many mainstream media outlets that openly supports her. This line of attack was used by Trump's Republican opponents during the primaries, and has been consistently hurled at him since day one. It hasn't worked, it isn't working, and it won't ever work.

Calling Trump racist is nothing new, and it won't have any kind of impact on the race. What will change things, however, is Pepe and his introduction to the mainstream. Pepe seeks to broaden his influence over the realm of men as much as possible. He's like the One Ring—he wants to be found. And now, he has been.

Pepe's exposure to the public will only drive people's curiosity about the shadowy, villainous "alt-right." People will start to wonder. They have a clever symbolism, they'll say, they're a secretive, nebulous collective that defies simple categorization, no one seems to understand them… people exposed to Pepe won't be able to resist learning more about our ideology and our culture. And of those people, there are many who without a doubt will find that we give voice to the things they have been silently thinking and feeling but have never found the will to say out loud.

People, especially young people, will always take the side of Pepe when it comes to an aging, out-of-touch, establishment politician versus a clever, smug, iconoclastic creation of genuine internet culture for one simple reason—Pepe is funnier, and to be funny you have to be smart. What Hillary doesn't realize is that a good amount of Pepe's popularity comes from the fact that there are a lot of jaded, nihilistic young people out there who see Pepe as the perfect expression of their quasi-sadistic need to defy and humiliate.

The arguments of the left are accusatory—bigotry, racism, Islamophobia, sexism, etc, because as we all know, they have nothing else. Those criticisms are based on the assumption that their opponents will take the defensive and deny these accusations. The virtue-signaling of the Left is a way to establish an epistemological framework in which conservative arguments can be picked apart. Pepe circumvents that framework by treading the line between satire and serious political posturing. He makes a statement, but he also reveals the propensity of his political opponents to react emotionally, which exposes the fact that manufacturing faux-outrage is the foundation of their strategy.

The God-Emperor in all his glory

The Genius Of Pepe

The intention of Pepe is not only to inject humor into serious statements—it's also to get a rise out of people. Let's not deny that trolling hypersensitive liberals has been an integral part of what the alt-right has accomplished over the course of this election. But trolling in itself is somewhat of a political statement. If you can get someone to react by prodding them, you've shown that their frame was weak to begin with. In the court of public opinion, the person whose frame is shaken is usually judged most harshly. The only thing that Hillary can say in response to Pepe, who after all is nothing but an internet meme, is "stop being mean." And just by looking at Pepe's smug fucking grin we can tell what his response is.

Pepe in and of himself perfectly encapsulates why the alt-right has risen to prominence and why Trump is going to win the election—because people have stopped buying into the left's twisted worldview of guilt, shame, and thought control. As extremely insecure, unstable people, leftists define their whole perspective based on the response they anticipate from others. They are desperate to show other people how tolerant and free of hate they are, how dedicated they are to the cause of equality and fairness and whatnot.

This is why Pepe is so fundamentally antithetical to Hillary—the smugness of his expression indicates that he just doesn't care what anyone thinks and he doesn't care what happens to anyone else. By addressing Pepe, Hillary has shown the country just how emotionally based her entire rationale really is.

Hillary has, for the millionth time this election, shot herself in the foot. With her increasingly unhinged attempts to connect Trump to various boogeymen (Putin, the alt-right, and now Pepe), she has revealed herself as a candidate out of options and out of ideas. The only thing she has accomplished is driving impressionable voters towards our ideology, and there is no doubt that some of them will be swayed by the honesty and reason of our message. Pepe, on the other hand, is fulfilling his function both as a means of expressing political ideas and of conveying ridicule. By treading the line between seriousness and satire, Pepe has not only helped to spread alternative views but to expose the necessity of sympathy to the left's strategy.

Taking on Pepe could not have worked out any worse for Crooked Hillary Clinton. She fought the frog, and the frog won.

5 Examples Of The Mainstream Media's Extreme Bias

September 23, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Face it, the mainstream media is not only full of contradictions, but deep-seated, institutionalized biases. When a male or conservative does something, it is often considered horrendous. Yet when a female, liberal or a member of another "special" group does the same thing, passes are given or journalists' eyes are averted.

Social media users with common sense political opinions have already started to compile these glaring double standards. Return Of Kings and its supporters should continue doing the same thing.

So here are five of the most egregious recent examples of hypocritical mainstream media madness:

1. Use of dead veterans' families at political rallies or conventions

When Khizr and Ghazala Khan appeared at the Democratic National Convention to lambaste Donald Trump for his views on Muslim immigration and supposed behavior, commentators and journalists went wild with fanfare. Their son Humayun, a Muslim soldier, had died in Iraq. Trump was attacked for allegedly grandstanding about and minimizing Humayun's death.

Meanwhile, many of these same newsmen and women, including Rachel Maddow's stooge Steve Benen, derided the Republicans for featuring Pat Smith, mother of Benghazi fatality Sean Smith, as a speaker at their own Convention. Mrs. Smith had laid into Hillary Clinton over the latter's role in and perceived indifference to her son's death in Libya. So one family became heroes to the media for going public after their tragic loss, while another was portrayed as so weak in their grief that they were manipulated by big, bad Republicans into talking.

Moreover, Trump had nothing to do with Sean Smith's death. Compare this to Clinton, who was the Secretary of State at the time of the American deaths at Benghazi and whose State Department had received numerous calls for assistance. Considering that Sean Smith and others died alongside U.S. Ambassador Christopher Stevens, the first American ambassador to be killed whilst serving since 1979, the woefully insufficient security precautions taken by the Obama Administration and Secretary Clinton should not have transpired. But this spotlight on Clinton does not make for good (liberal) news.

2. Psychiatric records for a war hero vs. medical records of a pathological liar

Medical mudslinging: Right wingers reach a new low with their smears about Hillary's health

The right-wing smear machine is working at warp speed to convince the nation that Hillary Clinton has brain damage

SALON NEWS POLITICS ENTERTAI MAY 22, 2008

THURSDAY, MAY 22, 2008 05:56 AM MST

What's in John McCain's medical records?

He'll be releasing everything about his repeated cancer surgeries. But he won't release his psychiatric records, which hold clues to the effect of his Vietnam captivity.

Countless liberals, both in the media and within other leftist cabals like mainstream Hollywood, have attacked those questioning Hillary Clinton's health as "misogynists," "sexists" and other undesirables. When these tags are unable to be used, leftists claim that even piecemeal doubts about her physical condition are nothing but conspiracy theories on par with Roswell UFOs and lizard people running the world.

Yet eight years ago, these same people were frothing at the bit to out John McCain for his supposedly poor health. Most perversely of all, they homed in on his decorated military service, suggesting he had Presidentially disqualifying mental health conditions from his service in the Vietnam War and the multiple years he spent as a prisoner-of-war. "Where are his psychiatric records?" bellowed one piece from Salon, in addition to a number of other articles that more than hinted at the same topic.

Whilst I, like many of you, revile his putrid, watered-down "Republican" policies on many issues, McCain had gargantuan balls in Vietnam. Here is a man who spent more time as a tortured prisoner-of-war, including a stay in the notorious Hanoi Hilton, than Barack Obama spent in the US Senate. As the son of the commander of US forces in Vietnam, McCain received numerous offers of repatriation from the North Vietnamese. He refused and would only accept being returned home once fellow American soldiers captured before him were released. By contrast, Hillary lacks the mental fortitude to tell the truth most of the time, not even after she's had seizures, coughing fits, and dramatic collapses on camera!

3. Sexualizing political candidates (and removing their genitals)

When an artist by the name of Lushsux painted a mural of a scantily-clad Hillary Clinton, a local Melbourne, Australia council and numerous global commentators derided it as "misogyny" and "sexual objectification." "Take female politicians seriously!" was the crux of their shrill arguments against the rendering. Lushsux then trolled his critics by repainting the mural so Hillary was dressed in an Islamic burqa. Soon after, multiple statues of a nude and testicle-less Donald Trump appeared in American cities. Unlike the Hillary artwork, the proliferation created huge fanfare and delight amongst both prominent leftists and run-of-the-mill liberal voters. Why is one act so offensive and the other so funny, particularly in age where body-shaming and mocking someone's appearance is meant to be so taboo?

Most of the critical commentaries about the Trump statues that appeared in the mainstream media, of which there were few, failed to take into account one glaring significance of the testicle-less Trump. Short of them being violently taken or hacked off, how exactly could Trump have no balls? Imagine the furore if a statue, mural or other representation of Hillary Clinton had lacked breasts or shown her vagina circumcised/mutilated. "They're condoning violence against women!" would be the stock-standard answer from liberals and their even more deranged SJW cousins.

4. Lesbian's Olympic marriage proposal vs. heterosexual male's Olympic marriage proposal

This is bad and misogynistic:

This is love and should be applauded:

Leftists rejoiced when Olympic official Marjorie Enya asked her partner, rugby sevens player Isadora Cerullo, to marry her using a microphone. Love wins, right, especially when it's gay love? But when Chinese athlete Qin Kai asked silver medalist He Zi to marry him, the knives from the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) came out. The BBC, unfortunately taxpayer-funded, published an article insinuating that Qin Kai was attempting to control He Zi with the very public marriage proposal. Not only could it be control, it could be awfully pernicious "male control." Coverage of Enya's proposal to Cerullo, however, got the broadcaster's tick of approval.

If either of the two proposals is a form of control or narcissistic, it was the lesbian one.

Unlike the Chinese diver, who was competing individually, the lesbian proposed to was part of the Brazilian team, which had not even been awarded a medal. Brazil had come ninth and that night Australia had beaten New Zealand for the gold medal. He Zi may not have won the gold medal, but she had actually participated in the final. But do not let facts get in the way of a good male-bashing.

5. Objectifying men vs. objectifying women

Cosmopolitan has established itself as a dual enabler of both ditzy female airheads and SJW political freaks. Over time, the magazine has come out strongly against countless normal displays of male sexuality, admonishing men who appreciate female breasts and buttocks for being “horrible.” Of the many Cosmopolitan pieces to take this line, an article in mid-2014 takes the cake for its ridiculous shaming of harmless, healthy behaviors. Ironically, though, covers for this publication feature the same sorts of thin, healthy women that men desire most in the first place.

Fast-forward a mere two years and Cosmopolitan went to the extraordinary effort of cataloguing 36 men whose crotch bulges tickled their fancy. Of course, numerous other articles during that time had objectified men in a way considered misogynistic when males do it to women, but the timing was amusing. After so much talk of valuing female athletes, whose physical accomplishments are far less than men, for their work and not their bodies, Cosmopolitan celebrated the years of sacrifice of male athletes by effectively taking photos of their barely clothed genitalia.

We could keep on going

Many other hypocritical pieces were penned about these situations, not just the ones I have referenced. Then there's the great number of other articles we could assess and critique on separate issues. You may be convinced, and rightfully so, that the mainstream media is inherently biased. But we need to take this to the next level and disseminate the proof to wider audiences.

Journalists and commentators will continue their bad habits, that much is clear. What matters now is fighting back. Complaining about double standards only goes so far. Exposing them in an organized fashion stands a better much chance in helping us to arrest and then reverse this institutional bias.

As Return Of Kings readers, you are our extra eyes and ears. If you find more examples of extreme leftist media bias, bring it to our attention.

Is Living In The Philippines Good For Men?

September 23, 2016 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

I moved to the Philippines just over 18 months ago now, and since living here I've come to some realizations about the place that I want to share with the readers at ROK.

It takes a while to adjust to any culture you transport yourself to, and it's easily a good year or so before you begin to understand what's going on around you. Although I wasn't a huge fan of the Philippines to begin with, the place has grown on me, and perhaps because I am leaving again to relocate to an island off the coast of Morocco, I've come to appreciate much about the Philippines.

These are some reflections on this 7000 island archipelago that's emerging into the new world, but which is still very much part of the old.

1. The Philippines Is Staggeringly Beautiful

You'd never guess it from the polluted, filthy cities or the endless traffic jams and beggars in the streets of Manila, but this country is unbelievably beautiful. There are endless islands to explore, there's thick, dense jungle full of life and rare creatures, there are traditional people living completely untouched by the scourge of Western materialism who have refused to integrate into modern society, and there are waterfalls, canyons and underwater world's galore.

Every country is beautiful in its own right, but the Philippines will bowl you over when you see it in all its glory.

2. Filipinos Deeply Value Freedom

I am lucky to have a Filipino friend who lived in the USA for 12 years, who is able to understand my Western mentality and help me understand some of the more complex, confusing elements of life here.

For example, I once complained about the lack of driving rules and the fact that nobody seems to follow and rules here. My friend schooled me. What I perceived as a lack of discipline and laziness, he saw as freedom. “We do what we want because we fought a war for our freedom, and we don’t let the government tell us what to do” was the essential element of his reply.

It makes a lot of sense when you think about it. In the West things are a lot more orderly and efficient, but then again we can be arrested and fined or jailed for just about anything.

Libertarians will love the Philippines. You can pretty much do whatever you want as long as it isn’t an act of violence towards others.

3. Filipinas Make The Best Girlfriends And Wives

Now I know this is a touchy subject on ROK, and many would argue that the best wife is no wife. I can feel that, and there’s some merit to that perspective.

That said, many men also wouldn’t mind having a beautiful, smiling female companion who brings them breakfast in bed literally every morning and who stands back and gets in line when major decisions for the family have to be made.

There’s no such thing as a perfect wife, and there never will be, and there are also plenty of soul-destroying, horrid Filipinas who will make your life hell, but if you meet a good one, she will blow you mind with how feminine, traditional and attentive she is.

A great place to start is by trying to meet Filipinas online to see what they’re all about before coming here. The Philippines is definitely still a firm and strong patriarchy and women value it and can’t understand why women in the West would want it any other way.

4. The Philippines Is All About Family

I'd say the central institution which governs most of Western life is work. Perhaps it's education early on in life, but it's work for much of the rest of it.

Not so here. Family is number one, and work can wait if the family needs help. At first this was deeply confusing to me and I genuinely thought there were just a lot of unemployed people, but I later learned that these people often take days off to help a sister around the house when her baby is born, to visit their grand kids and grandparents, and to do small things like gather for lunch and remember the dead.

This kind of family ethic simply no longer exists in either Europe or America. It's a crying shame, because it is something special. Sure, it can be overwhelming to begin with when you first encounter it, but it is better than the vacuous, family destroying culture we have created in much of the West.

When's the last time you told your boss "I'm not coming in today, it's my kid's birthday." If that sounds like your kind of deal, the Philippines is worth a look.

5. The Philippines Is Tragic but Changing

This is my final reflection on this amazing country I have come to enjoy. The Philippines is a real-life tragedy, unfolding in the living flesh.

It's full of colorful characters, battling against the forces of corrupt evil that oversee it, and the current president is one of them. At first I was taken aback by his crude style and the fact he is allegedly having people killed in the street, and the social justice warrior childhood indoctrination in me wanted to cry out "Human Rights abuse!," but when I saw the first new electrical pylons go up, the brand new trash trucks that now collect the waste, the fresh off the assembly line ambulances that weren't even conceivable 6 months ago, and the statistics that crime has dropped 50% in 3 months, I see him in a new light.

Yet the Philippines has a long way to go. This country is bursting with potential, but it is squandered by the greedy and the thieves who run it.

Will the Philippines make it? I don't know. One thing I do know is that the current president is having a damn good go of ridding it of the cancerous lesions who feed off the people, and whether or not he turns out to be another chapter in the tragedy or a new beginning, we'll have to wait and see.

Summary

The Philippines is a great place to check out if you're looking for something different. Even if you don't end up relocating here, it's definitely a place you won't regret visiting and spending a little time in.

As I prepare to leave and head back West, I wish I could bring some of these things with me. It isn't a perfect place to live, but it definitely has its bright-sides.

5 Machiavellian Tactics That Women Use On Men Every Day

September 24, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Recently I've been re-reading The 48 Laws Of Power By Robert Greene. In this phenomenal book, Mr. Greene scours history for examples of men and women ruthlessly seizing power without any regards as to who may be hurt.

As I was re-reading this excellent work, I started to realize just how many of these tactics women use on men…every day. In fact, it's so common place that most men don't even notice it happening. Whether she's using sex as a way to make you perform all sorts of ridiculous favors, or viciously taking advantage of your lack of masculinity, you can pretty much guarantee that she's following one, or many of these laws of power.

Women are masters at manipulating men; after all, they can't beat us physically, so they have to rely on something else. Whereas our battlefield is the physical realm, their battlefield is fought in the emotional realm. And, as is the case in any battle, you must arm yourself with knowledge.

Here's 5 Machiavellian tactics that women use on men every day.

Law #3: Conceal Your Intentions

> Keep people off balance and in the dark by never revealing the purpose behind your actions. If they have no clue what you are up to, they cannot prepare a defense. Guide them far enough down the wrong path, envelop them in enough smoke, and by the time they realize your intentions, it will be too late.

"I'm just looking for a really sweet guy to be in a relationship with me," AKA she wants some beta chump to shell out the dough while she bangs some bad boy alpha male on the side. I recall reading a study that showed 35% of children were had from an affair. This does not surprise me.

Women are absolute masters at concealing their intentions. They want to use you for money, but say that they want a relationship. They want to use you for validation, but act as if they're sexually interested in you. They want to use you for power, but act like they love you for your charming personality.

Women are like chameleons; they can blend in to whatever environment they're thrown in, and can easily manipulate men by acting as if they have the most innocent of intentions. The solution: realize that women aren't angels. As simple as this revelation is, most men don't ever come anywhere near attaining it. Sure, if you confront them about their views on women they may SAY they don't think women are angels, but if you look at their behavior, it begs to differ.

Learn to establish firm boundaries. When you know exactly what you will and will not tolerate from women, they step in line real quick. Don't ever invest time or energy into women who claim they're into you, but don't prove it by sleeping with you.

I personally rarely take women on dates, and when I do, it's something quick and cheap, like coffee. If we don't bang after the second date, I'm out—this isn't mean, it isn't cruel, it isn't "using women," it's just realizing that they're using YOU.

Law #8: Make Other People Come to You—Use Bait If Necessary

> When you force the other person to act, you are the one in control. It is always better to make your opponent come to you, abandoning his own plans in the process. Lure him in with fabulous gains—then attack. You hold the cards.

Women, of course, are natural masters at using the most alluring bait of all time: sex. Without this one little card to play, they would be completely powerless. But, alas, this card is not going to vanish anytime soon.

Women have always used sex to lure men. Whether they're luring you into a relationship, luring you into marriage, luring you into chasing them, or luring you into paying for them, you can pretty much guarantee that they're luring you in for something. Solution: learn game. When you learn game, rather than you desperately wanting her, SHE desperately wants YOU. There are only a handful of men out there who can accomplish this radical switch of roles, but those who can are not lured in by women promising them sex.

Rather, they're the ones doing the luring. They're not chasing women, women are chasing THEM. So, go out and learn game. Learn how to properly pass a woman's shit tests, learn how to make women wet just by talking, and learn how to babystep them from the bars to your bedroom.

Law #11: Learn to Keep People Dependent On You

> To maintain your independence, you must always be needed and wanted. The more you are relied on, the more freedom you have. Make people depend on you for their happiness and prosperity and you have nothing to fear. Never teach them enough so they can do without you.

Most guys out there follow a very, very similar pattern. They start off as completely socially awkward virgins, and slowly go through the process of learning game. Then, much to their surprise, they end up with a girlfriend.

But, unfortunately, most men then stop practicing game. Their skills grow rusty, and she can sense this. Soon enough, she's got you completely dependent on her for sex, since you haven't gone out and practiced game in a while…and she loves it.

The second that a woman senses you can't find another girl, she will completely walk all over you. She'll make you buy her expensive earrings, take her out to fancy dinners, rub her feet, watch romantic comedies with her…and eventually, she'll cuck your ass worse than Anthony Bourdain.

The solution? Live in abundance. Don't ever stop practicing game. Always be out learning, flirting with women, and improving your skill set. Get good at talking with women, get good at teasing them, and practice hobbies that will get you laid. Do whatever it takes to always have a steady stream of women in your life.

When you depend on a woman for sex, without her depending on you for money, terrible things happen. This is one of the reason why our society is so ass-backwards nowadays. Men need women for sex, but women need men for nothing. The government (through welfare and alimony) is effectively creating a one-sided dependency of men on women.

Law #20: Do Not Commit To Anyone

> It is the fool who always rushes to take sides. Do not commit to any side or cause but yourself. By maintaining your independence, you become the master of others; playing people against one another, making them pursue you.

"I think I'm free later!" "Maybe! Text me later and I'll let you know." "I kind of just got out of a relationship, but I like you."

How many times have you heard women speak these seemingly innocent comments? Whether it be the coyish girl who's keeping her options open, or the classic gold digger who wants you to shell out the dough for her, virtually every single woman uses this tactic on a regular basis.

As others have pointed out, there is an epidemic of flakiness in the Western world due to a complete lack of female accountability. Women constantly use men like tissues, keeping them on the hook so that she can have a shoulder to cry on, or someone to pay for her dinner when she pleases. Despite what you may believe, you are not "so close" to sleeping with her. If she's flaked on you more than once, she isn't into you. But, girls are aware that you might catch on, so they throw you a little bait. "I'm sorry I've been so flaky, I'm just super busy! We should grab lunch some time!" Haha, yeah right.

The solution: become an alpha male. A lot of guys might say that you should flake on women in retribution, or ignore her texts for a certain period of time, or learn to tell the signs that a girl is using you. These are all great approaches, but in my opinion, they're hacking at the branches rather than the root.

When you simply focus on becoming an alpha male, women take a back seat. You focus on enhancing your life, your business, and your body, rather than chasing women. And, naturally, they'll sense this—women can sense when they aren't your number one priority, and it drives them crazy.

You've got to hit the gym, but she wants to hang out? Tell her to come over later. She's inviting you out, but you've got an important business meeting the next morning? Tell her it can wait. Or maybe she's trying to get you to chase her? Just ignore her.

Trust me, boys. If you do these things, soon enough, women will be flaking on other guys for YOU.

Law #46: Never Appear Too Perfect

> Appearing better than others is always dangerous, but most dangerous of all is to appear to have no faults or weaknesses. Envy creates silent enemies. It is smart to occasionally display defects, and admit to harmless vices, in order to deflect envy and appear more human and approachable. Only gods and the dead can seem perfect with impunity.

Not every single woman uses this tactic, but the ones who do should be avoided at all costs. It is very typical of women to reveal some seemingly deep, terrible flaw as a way to make you view her as a victim. This is a big mistake.

It took me quite a while to figure out that most of the time when women tell me that they were "horribly raped," really they're just trying to gain my sympathy. In reality, they banged some dude in the bathroom, don't want to feel like a slut, and so they lie about it to make me feel bad for them.

Again, this is a big mistake. Women constantly lie to gain your sympathy. They act weaker than they actually are, as a way to make you protect them and fight their own battles for them. They act tired, hoping that you'll clean the house "just this once." They act dumb, as if they don't know how to properly cook your dinner, so that you'll do it for them.

Solution: DO NOT fall for these traps. Yeah, sure, some women genuinely do have a lot of flaws, but here's the key: those that are manipulating you won't ever learn. For example, say that a girl you're dating doesn't know how to cook very well, so she asks you to show her. Okay, cool. So you show her how by preparing a meal in front of her. Now, what does she do the next time around? Does she try to cook the meal, but occasionally ask you for advice or help? Then she isn't manipulating you. But if she acts like a complete retard who never heard anything you said? She's using you.

Women are masters at taking a mile when you give them an inch. This doesn't mean to be paranoid—again, sometimes women actually do want to help you and be a good girlfriend, but they just weren't taught by their mothers so they need some guidance.

But, other times, they're using the shit out of you. Learn to tell the difference. If she doesn't improve, or demands more of you, she's using you.

4 Types Of Women Within The Femininity Matrix

September 24, 2016 | by A.M. Petros | Link | Original Link

This femininity matrix identifies women worthy of your time, effort and resources and those that will lead you to ruin. It provides practical strategies for maneuvering each female archetype towards wife material. This follows on from the 4 Types Of Men Within the Masculinity Matrix.

In a well-known but largely misunderstood Biblical verse, God commands each man to love his wife and the wife to submit to her husband. Ironically, these tasks are the hardest for each gender to perform respectively. Loving women is not the idealization of women. It does not equate to praise, presents or platitudes. True love includes chastisement for character improvement and appreciation for good behavior.

Female submission is respect and reverence for her husband. Critical for success, this requirement is rarely seen in modern relationships. We have it backwards. Women say "I love you," hoping to hear it back. After introspection, which would you rather hear from your wife or girlfriend?

(a) I love you
(b) I respect you

Now, which of those statements is harder for a woman to say? I propose the following dynamic:

Man: I love you
Woman: I respect you

Respect is not just the key

Respect is central to judging a man's character. To establish if a woman is worth investment or is for divestment ask yourself (i) Can this girl respect men and (ii) is she capable of respecting my God ordained authority? Beyond her mid-20's she is likely incapable of respecting men, but instead is contentious and will attempt to usurp your authority and power. Remember, man's greatest weakness is woman and woman's greatest weakness is the desire for power.

Like Eve, modern princesses are seduced by the promise of power derived from forbidden fruit. These women are deluded, believing it doesn't bring death, metaphorically or spiritually.

This article was written for men to characterize women, not the converse. Women cannot accurately judge themselves, being exceptionally prone to denial. Four character types exist. The two attributes dividing quality women from standard issue are respect and independence. From this, four main subtypes arise, (1) the lazy housewife, (2) loser, (3) feminist and (4) wife material.

So where does your wife, girlfriend, mother, sister or co-worker stand? Use this guide to identify and subsequently exploit vulnerabilities in each female archetype.

Women mistakenly believe they are judged by the exact same criteria as men.

1. Lazy housewives

The lazy housewife is the most debated label of all archetypes. Suggestions such as “gold digger” or “trophy wife” have been thrown around in debate. The lazy housewife is an archetype with some level of respect for men. These women search for an easy life and to be taken care of.

They believe they deserve fortune, status, a respectworthy man and also a free ride. Problematically, she is dependent. This may be dependency on her support network, family, friends, or the state. She is not naturally inclined towards initiating any meaningful enterprise. Further training is necessary for the acquisition of skills to become a good homemaker and raise morally sound children. Don’t throw her out yet! She is still capable of respecting you if you are worthy. She has the potential to become a decent wife.

In this age of degeneracy, all a man requires is respect.

There are limits to your return on investment since any forecasted profit margin diminishes with ageing stock. To increase your ROI on the "lazy housewife":

Foster proactivity, responsibility and purpose: The overriding goal is to transform your lazy housewife into a woman deserving of bearing and raising your children. This is not in exclusion to biological requirements of youth, fertility and health. Proactivity is unnatural to the lazy housewife. A princess mentality fostered by permissive parenting has resulted in dependency. These women can find purpose in raising children. Being thrust into adulthood may possibly help her overcome this.

She may resist engaging her pre-frontal cortex. Force her to think abstractly. Replace celebrity gossip with substance. Register her in a course that enriches rather than degrades her mind. Topics such as child care or education are recommended. You may have to reignite her natural instincts for childbearing and rearing after years of feminist propaganda.

You may decide to keep her even if she isn't inherently intelligent, but is an honorable, caring mother and decent homemaker. In this case you should be responsible for your children's education. Raising morally sound children is critical, compared to education alone. Skills and knowledge can be acquired at a later date but a stubbornly depraved heart leads to destruction.

Control her social circles: She is fallible. Like lost sheep, women blindly follow trends within their social circle. She is easily influenced by her newly divorced, promiscuous, adulterous or overly materialistic female 'friends'. They will encourage her to be equally miserable by partaking in their corruption. Threats to your partnership must be eliminated. Preventing someone's ruin is to love them. It is not logistically or emotionally easy, but it is right.

Micromanage her: Lazy housewives are prone to morph into slovenly daytime TV addicts. This cannot happen because she is your child's role model. Due to her lack of initiative, you need to make plans for her to follow. Break up tasks and command the execution of each sequentially. Want a roast chicken dinner? Write a shopping list, give it to her and tell her to buy the ingredients. Give her the recipe a few hours before dinner and tell her to get cookin'… You will have a halfway decent homemaker if you accomplish this. As they say, "winner winner chicken dinner".

Only for winners.

2. Losers

Unless you are a sucker for punishment, don't venture there. These women have either been dealt a bad genetic hand or they have eaten too much cake. Their primary failure is their inability to respect men. Some choose to hate and disrespect men in response to a paucity of male attention, even pre-wall.

Post wall, there are less takers and some choose to self-mutilate to carve out a niche presence within the market. They have a low capacity for change due to a high external locus of control, blaming the world for their predicament. They won't go to the gym, eat healthily or even take shortcuts through cosmetic surgery.

Why? As an alpha you have better options. Loser women were never locked away in the tower but were the ugly cock-blocking stepsisters to the better-looking princesses.

Don't Bother: Seeing the damsel in distress, the white knight desires to rescue her from herself. Understand that the damsel won't fit through the tower door. This is life. A majority of these women have no chance of rehabilitation because of their inability to accept personal responsibility. You may have to leave them in the trash heap.

Fun game: one is a BuzzFeed 'journalist'/harbor seal the other is Marjory the Muppet Trash Heap. I forget which is the correct answer.

3. Feminists

MRA's, MGTOW's, neomasculinists and self-respecting women love to hate feminists, but why? Feminism has been a major contributor in the devolution of society, corrupting the workplace, relationships and the family. Rockefeller Foundation funding, George Soros and CIA subversions have advanced this ideology. Even so, these disastrous outcomes would be impossible without female supporters and activists. These may not be the ugly banshees with odd colored hair we find humorous. Rather, they are also superficially feminine women who have prioritized their 'career' over family. Many incorrectly self-identify as anti-feminist.

Young feminists inherently desire a man to respect and submit under. They believe their prince will come. Older feminists have given up hope.

Feminists are not all intellectually challenged. They have successfully subverted language, influenced workplace and reproduction law reform and have massacred education; replacing quantitative measures of outcomes with emotions. This insidious movement has distorted the definitions of masculinity, femininity and also their true development. This is demonstrated by disagreement with the "husband material" label by readers of my previous article.

The word "husband" has been corrupted, now synonymous with being a cuck, chump, or weak. Unapologetically, I do my part in reclaiming its true definition. It denotes a man who is strong in mind, body and character, who is masculine, a leader and protector and provider for his wife and family. A weak, effeminate man unable to lead his household is not a husband. He is a failure.

Feminist beliefs are illogical and cancerous. This malignancy is spreading due to the lack of male authority in society. Feminists do not respect male authority and scheme to subvert this. In a previous era, independent women made great wives and mothers. Cue outrage Hear me out.

The difference between wife material and feminists is an attitude shift. Instead of respecting men, they choose not to. These women need security. In this world of unstable marriages and weak men, feminists sought security in themselves. This act of self-preservation resulted in a self-fulfilling prophecy.

In replacing femininity with masculine trappings to survive the corporate wilderness, she became less appealing to the alpha man she desired. These women require strong traditional male leadership under a man worthy of respect in order to submit. Under the right conditions, they make proactive hard working homemakers and mothers. Their natural initiative and intelligence have been misappropriated for the workplace. Societal conditions favoring the formation of leadership in men have been broken. We need to relearn what our forefathers-forefathers knew. A return to kingship, so to speak.

The princess can only be saved if she is young: If you are a teenager or a man in your early 20's, there is hope. Find a younger girl and stamp the feminist out of her. Parts of her will continue to cling to feminist propaganda. Convince her of her inevitable destruction following the life script she has accepted. Give her an alternative life plan. Submission under your alpha dominion is what she truly desires. You need to gain her respect to even begin to break her. Use hypnopaedic repetitions of your support of motherhood. Make her feel secure in your leadership.

She must understand your provision is dependent upon her submission. There is no room for compromise. Your job is made harder if she has already entered the workforce. She has initiated her plan B and will be resistant to liberation, unless you prove yourself to be worth the risk.

Play upon her fears: Fear is the feminist's greatest strength and weakness. Fear drives her towards career success. She amasses social and financial capital, an insurance policy in case she fails to attract an acceptable mate. Exploit her weakness. Do not underestimate her fear of losing social and financial capital, beauty and power. She will typically repress these fears until one day she is confronted by her post-wall unfiltered selfie.

An effective strategy is repeating anecdotes that expose these fears. One example could include, "I have noticed that women lose their youthful spark after 25. After this, they find it harder to get married". She may verbally disagree, but this will plague her mind unless she has a great capacity for repressing truths. Avoid directly referring to her failings unless previous attempts have only furthered her denial. Wear her down. Once you provoke an existential crisis, insert your solution.

Her greatest fear. Exploit it wisely.

4. Wife material

Not naturally occurring. They are designed, sculpted and maintained for this very purpose. Men delude themselves in believing they possess naturally occurring wife material. All women suffer from this same delusion, believing they are worthy to be the wife of any man. They also believe they should be treated as wife material without personal effort. Upper-right quadrant women forged from the nuclear furnace are even more rare than upper-right quadrant men.

The perfect wife must be virtuous. This cannot be trained, but safeguarded. She submits to her husband's authority. She must not bend to societal norms, but do what is right instead. She critically evaluates decisions based on their benefit to her household and not herself. Foster a hard-work ethic. Teach empathy to keep her heart kind. Keep her aligned to your values in order to raise morally sound children. Keep her in line and your children will follow. You are the leader, so show her the way.

Like unstable isotopes, the wife material archetype requires energy to keep things from blowing up.

Don't be deluded: If you believe you have found a woman that is wife material, ask the questions: (i) does she respect men? (ii) is she capable of completing a common goal independently? (iii) has she ever been a harlot? (This one is a deal breaker). If you happened across wife-material, think again. No woman can attain this position without refinement. Don't be easily fooled. Some women utilize red-pill knowledge to create the perfect wife facade. I've seen it happen, the results ain't pretty.

Men have to lead change

Remember, nobody has a perfect wife. If you think you do, you are delusional and she will only disrespect you for it. Take responsibility for her improvement. They are incapable of accomplishing this by themselves. Use the carrot or the stick accordingly. If they are dependent, use the carrot of purpose to help them learn responsibility. If they disrespect you, 'beat' them with the stick of submission.

Women who respect men are a severely endangered species. Their dwindling populations are caused by the destruction of their natural habitat, the nuclear family. Their forced journey into the wilderness for provisions is due to the emasculation of the male population. The lone alpha provider gains respect from lost females. Their strong leadership fosters correct female behavior through providing purpose and drive, guarding their genetic legacy from self-destructive degeneracy.

5 Companies To Boycott If You Want The West To Survive

Gentlemen, it is no longer effective to simply voice your opinion; that era is gone. If we wish to be effective now, we must vote with our dollars.

We must stop buying goods from any company which does not support our goals, for to do so would only make them stronger. And let me tell you, there's PLENTY of companies that are actively fighting against our goals. Whether it be the massive conglomerate with an HR department the size of a small city, or the corporation that donates 15 million a year to LGBTABCD1234 causes, there's a plethora of organizations that are incredibly financially powerful, that are actively trying to ruin masculinity and the West.

But, we cannot simply give into their demands—we must begin to take our country back, and this starts by ceasing to fund evil companies, while simultaneously redirecting your cash flow to companies that support hard work, masculinity, and traditionalism.

Here's five companies to avoid if you want the West to survive:

1. Google: Actively Censoring History, Censoring Negative Hillary Searches

Despite Google's sketch, the team was actually all white.

Perhaps the worst offender on this list, Google is also one of the most powerful conglomerates in existence. Not only do they own YouTube, Android, and Motorola, but they're also the single largest search engine in the entire world.

Google has been hungrily snatching up companies since 2001, and currently shows no signs of slowing down. In fact, not only have they been gaining more financial power by purchasing various companies and establishing monopolies in several digital markets, but they've also been actively filtering search results to wage a war of information.

Yes, that's right—Google is ACTIVELY filtering search results to influence elections and censor history. Don't believe me? Go search "European people art" in google images. You will be shocked and appalled at the results that come up.

They've also been slowly, but steadily pushing a multi-culturalist agenda by actively race-censoring the Juno Mission Team and supporting various globalist causes. They've been teaming up with Twitter to censor freedom of speech, working with the US government to collect your data, and censoring Hillary dissenters in an attempt to help her win the election.

I firmly believe that if we do not stop this entirely amoral corporation, we will enter into a world not unlike Orwell's. It's terrifying to think that Google controls 95% of the information traffic in the US, but it's true. If they wish, and believe me, they do, they could effectively wipe the internet of vast swathes of history, in order to push their agenda.

The solution: switch over to Firefox browser. Their former CEO has been very outright in his disgust with gay marriage, they don't collect your information, and best of all, it's far faster than Google Chrome. Switch over to a search engine that doesn't wipe out white history, such as Duck Duck Go, and consider getting a phone other than Android.

I realize that this shift is massive—Google is a gigantic corporation that permeates nearly every aspect of our lives, but we must do something about it. Even if it's the little rebellious act of using a different browser or spreading the word, just do something. We cannot afford to have the internet censored.

2. Starbucks: Supporting Degenerate Causes, Donating To Transsexual Activist Groups

Ah, Starbucks—the home of basic bitches, Toms-sporting hipsters, and pumpkin spice lattes. I will admit that they have some damn good coffee, but I cannot in good conscience support them.

As Roosh has said before, not only does Starbucks openly support gay marriage, but they also openly support transsexualism. As most men of ROK already know, I don't need to point out that in 5 or 10 years they may be supporting pedophiles as well.

In addition to this, they also fund Planned Parenthood. Now, I don't know about you men, but I firmly believe that when a society widely accepts abortion it's only a matter of time before its collapse. It encourages slutty behavior that breaks apart the family unit which supports a nation.

The solution: don't buy coffee from Starbucks. There's a billion other places that you can get coffee from; two of my favorites are Red Coffee and Onnit's Dark Roast Coffee. Need coffee on the go? Then either brew it at home and put it in a thermos (saving money) or stop at Peet's instead.

I've personally driven out of the way many times just to support Peet's, because I cannot in good conscience buy coffee from a company that supports men and women who mutilate their genitals and undergo hormone replacement therapy, because they "feel like they were born in the wrong body." I simply cannot condone this.

3. Apple: Tax Fraud, Child Labor, And LGBT Rights

The days of Apple being an innovator are long gone; now they're simply riding off of the success that Steve Jobs, the genius that he was, earned them. Think about it—when's the last time that Apple came out with a revolutionary product? They've been rehashing old technology since the iPhone.

Apple's CEO, Tim Cook, has said several times that he is a gay man and that he supports gay marriage. And not only this, but they've also been ordered to cough up $626 million dollars for infringing upon other companies patents. Oh, and by the way, they use child labor, have committed tax fraud, and in case you haven't noticed, iTunes is a giant pain in the ass to use.

The solution: rather than using iTunes, consider using Foobar 2000. This is, by far, my favorite music organizing software on the face of the earth. It's highly customizeable, to the point where you can literally change the columns, move the various boxes and organizational tools around, and change the text and background colors.

I'm not going to lie and say that there's a good company that can replace the iPod, because I really don't think there is. But, hey—doing something is better than doing nothing. Instead of using iTunes, which has slowly been increasing their prices, frequently creates duplicates, and gets more glitchy with each update, use Foobar 2000.

4. Bayer-Monsanto: Destroying Our Ecosystem, Lowering Testosterone Levels, and Making Men Sick

As I wrote about before, Bayer recently acquired the agricultural giant Monsanto for $66 billion dollars. This is, perhaps, one of the most terrifying acquisitions in the history of the West.

For those of you who don't know, Bayer is evil enough as it is. They've been known to continue selling drugs that spread AIDS, their pesticides are responsible for destroying gigantic droves of bees, and need I remind you of how many young girls Yaz and Yasmin have killed?

In addition to this, Monsanto has been steadily decreasing testosterone levels with their GMO's and chemicals, they've been creating new, drug-resistant super-strains of fungi, and they've been knowingly increasing the cancer rates in the West at an exponential rate.

Bayer is effectively Big Pharma, owning a whopping 23% share of the pharmaceutical industry (depending on the estimate you consult), and Monsanto is effectively Big Agra, owning an ungodly 90% of the GMO seed market. Together, these two titans would create a monopoly unlike any since the Carnegie Steel Company.

And that's just what Bayer plans to do—they want to make you sick and lower your testosterone levels with GMO's, pesticides, and phyto-estrogens, and then have you shell out $1,000 a month for their "medicine," that will only mask your symptoms, and end up giving you 10 other side effects.

The solution: buy food from your local farmers. Not only do farmers markets require the produce sold to be organic, which means that you won't get any cancer-causing, testosterone-lowering GMO's or pesticides, but buying at farmers markets also creates a stronger local economy.

Take your hormones into your own hands—look into ways to boost your testosterone levels naturally, don't shop at stores like Walmart that are typically loaded with GMO's, and use natural remedies and healthy living to avoid getting sick and having to buy "medicine."

5. Nestle: Denying The Right To Water, Pressuring Mothers To Stop Breastfeeding Baby Boys

No, that quote is not a lie—Peter Brabeck, the CEO of Nestle, has been actively snatching up water supplies around the US for quite some time now. He has previously stated that his goal is to control all of the water in a world where water is a diminishing resource.

If you ask me, the man is a psychopath and has no place leading a massive global conglomerate. No man who would so ruthlessly seize and monetize a vital life source such as water deserves to be on this planet, let alone leading the largest food company in the world (by revenue). Now, of course he'll claim that he's doing good, like he did after buying off an entire town's water supply just days ago, but he is not doing good.

Nestle is callously seizing water supplies all over the world, but their evil doesn't stop there—they've indirectly murdered thousands of babies by lying to mothers about the benefits of breast milk. "Oh, no! Breast milk doesn't contain probiotics, micro-nutrients, and healthy hormones for your baby boy! Buy our artificial, factory-made formula instead!" says the Nestle sales rep.

And what's worse is that they've been known to dress their sales reps in white doctors' scrubs to fool mothers into believing that their profit-motivated advice is in their babies' best interests. It isn't. In fact, dozens of activist groups, such as the Council of Canadians and Baby Milk Action, have spoken out against Nestle's completely unethical tactics, calling for a boycott. Despite this, the $88 billion dollar a year conglomerate seems to be growing in power.

The solution: boycott Nestle products. Don't buy bottled water from Nestle. Don't buy San Pellegrino, Poland Spring, Perrier, or Nestle Pure Life Water. Instead, if you're worried about phyto-estrogens and fluoride in your water supply, consider buying a reverse osmosis filter. Not only will you be removing money from Nestle's pocket, but you'll be getting water free of Fluoride (which Harvard has linked to lower IQ), dissolved pharmaceutical drugs, and other garbage.

Don't support any of Nestle's acquisitions, either. For a full list of their products, click here.

Conclusion

I realize that this is a lot to ask, men, but it's time that we start taking back our country. It does no good to simply vocalize our opinions if they aren't backed by action. What does a corporation care of our words, if we're still giving them our money?

We must hack at the root of evil; we must stop indirectly funding our own demise by boycotting these companies. Again, I realize that this is a lot to ask, but at least do something. Even if it's only for your own good, buy healthy food from your local farmer. Avoid candy and junk food (which are half of Nestle's products), switch over to Firefox, if only because it's faster. Just do something, because if you don't, we may be living in an Orwellian nightmare in a few decades.

How To Begin Hardening Your Bones, Tendons, And Flesh To Endure Monstrous Punishment

If you pay attention to pop culture at all, you are likely familiar with the image of an expert martial artist breaking bricks and boards with a blow from their hand. Delve a little bit deeper into the rabbit hole of inanity and you'll find dubious claims of self-proclaimed masters claiming to be able to break a specific brick in a stack or claim to be able to smash bricks without any physical contact at all.

I am here to tell you that while concepts such as the No-Touch KO are nonsense, standard breaking is quite accessible, even to those who are not taking formal martial arts lessons. But breaking is just one facet of the overall discipline that is known as body hardening.

What is Body Hardening?

Body hardening is defined as a form of conditioning and strength training specific to combat sports. Unlike what the average person would think of "strength training," body hardening does not entail strengthening the muscles to lift heavier and heavier weights, but rather it trains the bones, tendons, and flesh to withstand tremendous external forces. This prepares the trainee to both deliver harder blows with the limbs, and withstand the same from a combative opponent.

As with most things in martial arts, there are many ways to go about doing it, and some of them are rather dubious. Obviously, things such as the infamous "Dim Mak" linked above and other such frauds will not be discussed here. However, more than perhaps any other martial arts topic, I am more amenable to the traditional, more “esoteric” styles of martial arts when applied to body hardening then I am with other aspects of these arts (such as the forms/kata, which I and many people find largely ineffectual).

As usual, I do not profess to be an expert in the field, but I have had experience with the various types of body hardening enumerated below, been taught these techniques by experts, and have found them to be effective.

1. Sandblasting

If you will recall, in one of my grip training articles, I discussed how you can do a variation on this kung fu training technique to develop a mighty grip. When done in its traditional way, it also develops the strength of the fingers, hands, and wrists, although not in the sense of being able to generate a lot of force through crushing, punching, or pulling.

No, this technique is specifically for developing the strength of the hands so that they can withstand the tremendous force that will be transmitted through them when the fingers are used in attacks (as is typical of some schools of martial art such as both types of Praying Mantis), typically in attacking the soft tissue of the face or neck and various pressure points.

Before you begin sandblasting, you should develop some modicum of finger strength—I recommend fingertip pushups to do this, and you can read about that here.

Once you’ve at least become capable of doing two handed finger-tip pushups, you can start sandblasting. Ironically, this first step will not involve sand at all, but rather dried beans. Martial arts suppliers will sell mung beans specifically for this purpose, but you can use any sort of dried kidney bean in bulk for this.

Fill up a decent-sized bucket with said beans, stretch out the fingers, keep them taut but NOT hyperextended, and jab them into your big bucket of beans. The aim of this exercise is to reach your fingers to the bottom of the bucket.

These fingers have been hyperextended, and jabbing with these fingers can cause injury

These fingers are taut and extended, but the knuckles are not hyperextended. This is the proper finger posture.

Once you have accomplished that, fill the bucket with sand, and repeat. You will notice that the exercises will get easier and easier regardless of what's in the bucket, due to the bones and tendons of your fingers hardening and becoming accustomed to the force. Once you've reached the bottom with sand, fill the bucket up with pebbles. And once you've done that, use steel shot.

2. Bottle Rolling

Bottle rolling is one of the first techniques that I have informally grouped into the "Iron Body" category—while this is likely not the proper term, all of these techniques entail applying force to your own body in with the aim of deliberately conditioning and hardening them for future use. There are many ways to go about doing this in many different styles of martial arts, but bottle rolling is the easiest and least painful one, and is thus the most appropriate one for the beginner.

It can be done on the feet, but is most often done on the shin

Taking your standard glass beer or soda bottle, press it hard against the shin, and roll it up and down. Repeat for both shins. This will dull the nerves and allow you perform shin kicks harder than an unconditioned shin. Bear in mind that once you have developed some tolerance for pain in the shins, you should begin other forms of body conditioning such as actually practicing shin kicks on a bag. Bottle rolling subdues nerve endings to a much greater extent than it actually conditions the bone, which can lead to injuries down the road.

And those techniques will be for another day.

7 Hollywood Classics That Would Not Be Made Today

September 26, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

During the past few decades Hollywood films have become more about making money through their cookie-cutter formula than about creating drama that is artistic and meaningful. And not only that, the themes too have been degenerated to both reflect and direct the cultural trends. The films they propagate today are rife with “progressive” ideas on race, sex, and culture that attempt to undermine the existing values. It is sad really, because things weren’t always like that with Hollywood. If you watch films from the not too distant past, you’ll discover that they were much more different and in touch with true human nature. And to illustrate, I present the following classic films that would most likely not be made today.

1. Double Indemnity (1944)

This is a classic film-noir which I've enjoyed far more than the other films from that era with bigger names including Casablanca and Citizen Kane. It's about an insurance salesman who falls for a married woman wishing to get rid of her rich husband. They both plot to secretly murder him and make it look like an accident after tricking him into signing a life insurance. The story that unfolds will shock even the most hardcore redpiller.

Why it won't be made today: The film reveals far too much of how a toxic woman can destroy men by her using her feminine power to lure them—a truth that women don't like men knowing. Besides, today's Hollywood is working hard to erase femininity from the females characters in general, preferring to turn them all tough and masculine. Even the few female villains that appear on screen today are violent, aggressive, and domineering like men. You'll be hard-pressed to find any bad woman in today's movies who uses her feminine wiles to ruin a good man.

2. Taxi Driver (1976)

Has there been a film since the Taxi Driver that so accurately portrays raw male vexation and alienation? (I think Falling Down is the only one that even comes close). Alone, depressed, and angry, suffering from insomnia and possible trauma from the Vietnam war, Travis Bickle works as a taxi driver in the urban filth and degeneracy that is New York.

As the movie progresses, three things happen: one, he grows more and more disturbed, two, he meets a young teenage prostitute, and three, he becomes infatuated with a gorgeous upper middle class blonde volunteering in an election campaign. When the relationship with the woman fails—the only thing that seemingly gave him hope and stability—he finally starts to spiral down to madness.

Why it won't be made today: People today don't want to watch depressing films that depict loneliness, cynicism, and dejection—especially that of a man who's been abandoned by the society. No. People don't care for a man's pain and destitution. Instead, the movie-goers want to enjoy the vicarious thrill of watching the lives of affluent heroes who have it all. They want to sit and see beautiful people getting their guaranteed happy ending. The audience today just want to be sedated in a dream world where they don't have to face up to their own problems and that of the world.

3. Once Upon A Time In America (1984)

An epic gangster film by no other than the great Sergio Leone. It's a story of crime and friendship in the early 20th century America. The film is both gripping and real; it's strange how a crime film can make you feel so human. By the time the movie is over, you will feel as though you just lived through an entire era.

Why it won't be made today: Films like this and Stand by Me won't be made today for the simple fact that they're not inclusive enough. Besides, when is the last time Hollywood made a film about true friendship among men? If and when they do appear once in a moonlight, it's usually goofy comedies like Harold and Kumar or The Hangover. Also, Once Upon a Time in America features scenes of raw violence against women including two rape scenes (in the first one, the woman clearly enjoys it) that will be derided by the triggered harpies.

4. Fatal Attraction (1987)

Truth be told, I haven’t watched this film, but I’ve heard about it enough to know what it’s about. A married man has an affair with a post-wall career woman who turns out to be a batshit insane BPD psycho from hell (the term “bunny-boiler” originates from this film). She becomes increasingly obsessive and starts to stalk him, only to become more erratic in her behavior as she’s pushed away.

Why it won’t be made today: For the straight-forward reason that it is now politically incorrect to show that a woman can be emotionally unstable and “crazy”—especially an aging one who is unmarried with a proud career, attempting to destroy a man and his family. I guess the film would remind the feminists too much of their own nature.

5. Misery (1990)

A novelist gets into a car accident in middle of nowhere and is rescued by an obsessed female fan who keeps him at her remote cabin. As he recovers, he finds out that she's a sick and disturbed woman who gets more controlling and more possessive.

Why it won't be made today: Same reason as Fatal Attraction: women on screen today can no longer be seen as deranged, possessive, or two-faced. The way Kathy Bates's character dies would also be considered too misogynistic although I doubt any man or woman would hesitate to do the same when forced in the situation portrayed in the film.

6. One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1975)

I don’t think you have to be an expert film-goer to see that the nut house in the film symbolizes a matriarchal society that keeps men under control. In the story, Nurse Ratchet is in the ultimate position of power even though the (feeble) male doctors are technically on top. She clearly enjoys her dominance and sees Jack Nicholson’s character as a challenge to her rule.

Why it won’t be made today: A lowly man challenging female authority? That is absurd in today’s political climate. Why would Hollywood try to incite male insurrection when they’re too busy making films about masculine women fighting against the Patriarchy?

7. A Boy And His Dog (1975)

This lesser known cult classic was one of the more bizarre films I’ve seen. This is a story about a boy and his telepathic dog who scavenge the post-apocalyptic wasteland in search of a girl that will satisfy his sexual urges. If you watch the film with red pill scrutiny, you can see the male-female power dynamic playing out throughout the film.

Why it won’t be made today: In a savage world where civilization is no more, women are depicted as being only good for sex by the roaming young men. With no more government to cater to their needs and no air-conditioned corporate buildings left to hide in, it is a true nightmare for the modern women. I won’t say too much to avoid spoiling the film for those who want to watch it, but the ending is also something unprecedented in the history of films.

Worthy Mention: Films starring Steve McQueen

"They call me a chauvinist pig. I am, and I don't give a damn."

I don't like idolizing actors, but if there's one man in Hollywood history whose aura that I would love to adopt for myself, it is Steve McQueen. He is unapologetically masculine and his movies, including The Getaway, Papillon, and Thomas Crown Affair, reveal too much red pill truth. I don't think Hollywood would completely avoid making his films today, but they would definitely shy away from them or at least water them down with correctness. The Getaway and Thomas Crown Affair already have remakes and apparently they're planning a one for Papillon as well (I can't imagine how awful it will turn out.)

The Continuing Hollywood Agenda

I expect Hollywood to continue pushing the feminist and diversity agenda, turning the female characters butch and unfeminine while reducing the male characters to goofy betas or sidekicks that follow women around like dogs. I avoid most of their new releases, but the problem comes when the men and women who watch these films internalize the messages and start thinking, talking, and acting accordingly—the culture will change even if we choose to disengage. The Hollywood of today must be recognized as the cultural cancer that is spreading its decadence around the world, which is why I urge other men to boycott them.

Why Is Hillary Clinton Silent About Saudi Arabia's Illegal Invasion Of Yemen?

September 26, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

President Obama's stated public aspirations all seem to follow a predictable pattern. First he makes grandoise statements of principle, and asks that we hold ourselves to these high standards. Then a test to apply these principles will come along, in the form of a legislative or political event. At that point, difficulties will arise. And then the President will gradually retreat from his position, until almost nothing left of it remains. Weary and disheartened, he then abandons the field, wringing his hands about the failure of the system to live up to his high ideals. This pantomime has been played out a number of times during his presidency.

Consider the current war in Yemen, for example. Most in the West know very little about this conflict. Saudi Arabia is currently using air and ground forces to try to dislodge the Houthi rebels who control various parts of Yemen. In Riyadh's paranoid world, every Shia sect (the Houthis are Shias) is an Iranian proxy, out to subvert and destroy the Wahabi kingdom of Ibn Saud. This is the obsession that keeps them awake at night, and the one that has caused them to pour billions into supporting terrorist "rebels" in Syria in an effort to install a religiously correct leader in Damascus. It would be sad, if the results were not so murderous.

Not satisfied with causing death and carnage in Syria, Riyadh has been begging the United States for more and more weapons. And the United States has been obliging. Once the Houthis forced out the Saudi-backed Yemeni president Abd Rabbou Mansour from power in 2015, the Saudis intervened militarily. But we should call it what is really is: an invasion of a neighbor, the type of thing that the West went into paroxysms of righteous moral outrage over in 1990 when Saddam invaded Kuwait.

Once the Saudis were in with both feet, Washington concluded a “support package” whereby the US would share intelligence and supplies to help the Saudis with their war. Since then, the US has given them more than 40 million pounds of jet fuel, as well as intelligence and weapons systems. The Obama administration has already approved over $100 billion in arms sales to the Saudis. A new “aid package” was recently debated in Congress that would provide about 150 Abrams tanks and another $1.15 billion in weapons.

And what would all these weapons and ordnance be used for? Why, to bomb and invade some Yemeni tribesmen who have never done anything to anyone, of course. It all makes perfect sense. Never mind that Egypt in the 1950s and 1960s poured tens of thousands of men into Yemen in an attempt to make it a satellite state, only to see all its hopes come to nothing. Never mind that Saudi Arabia lacks the military capability to do anything more than fire rifles at stationary targets; this is all about placating a nest of snakes in Riyadh, for fear that saying no to them may cause them to get angry. (And I’m sure that the President’s recent vetoing of the bill that would allow victims of 9/11 to sue Saudi Arabia had nothing to do with politics.)

Meanwhile the US public knows almost nothing about these events. How likely that this video will be shared on the American mainstream media’s nightly news outlets? In it, a Yemeni girl reminds us of the Saudi terror currently underway there.

There have been some dissenting voices. Kentucky Senator Rand Paul and Connecticut’s Chris Murphy have roundly criticized more military aid to Saudi Arabia, questioning the wisdom of getting involved in yet another regional war. Nevertheless, it is likely that the chief executive and the arms industry will continue to have their way, despite the cost to US credibility and the human toll on the ground in Yemen. It came as no surprise that ultra-hawk John McCain–who never met an imperialist war he didn't like—would say this about the Saudi arms deal:

> Blocking this sale of tanks will be interpreted by our Gulf partners, not just Saudi Arabia, as another sign that the United States of America is abandoning our commitment in the region and is an unreliable security partner. That's what this vote is all about.

It's not like the President doesn't know what's going on. He does. As he enunciated what Jeffrey Goldberg called the "Obama Doctrine," the President pointed out how senseless it was for the United States to allow itself to be pulled into Mideast wars. His essential point was that the sects and nations of the region have to learn to live together, and that constant outside interference does not advance this purpose. In his recent address to the UN, the President voiced these lofty ideals:

> Sometimes we take one step forward and then two steps back. In countries held together by borders drawn by colonial powers, with ethnic enclaves and tribal divisions, politics and elections can sometimes appear to be a zero-sum game. And so, given the difficulty in forging true democracy in the face of these pressures, it's no surprise that some argue the future favors the strongman, a top-down model, rather than strong, democratic institutions.

But high ideals are one thing; implementation is another. In practice, the US has done just about everything it could to undermine "democratic institutions" in the Middle East. In the real world, the US funds Sunni terrorist lunatics to fight in Syria, so that they topple one of the few remaining secular states in the region. But of course, all of this passes without comment by the mainstream press.

In practice, the President seems unable to exert the kind of moral courage that would allow him to stand up to regional players like Saudi Arabia and tell them no. Instead, he retreats into hand-wringing and complaining, while the money and weapons continue to flow. The act grows tiresome, after a while.

And where has the US's Secretary of State been, all this time? She likes to style herself a foreign affairs expert, but a look at the record shows one foreign policy disaster after another on her watch. She presided over the destruction of Libya; the ruin of Syria; the inundation of Europe with refugees; and now a vicious, immoral war in Yemen. This writer can’t even recall he heard the word “Yemen” come out of Mrs. Clinton’s lips, as the press has never dared to bring up the issue.

One hopes that the Yemen question will come up at least once during the presidential debates. And at that time, the Secretary of State can explain to the world exactly what her position and policy is on the matter.

6 Things You Should Know If You Want To Visit Ukraine

September 26, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Having spent the majority of this year living in Ukraine, here are the pieces of advice I would give to those looking to travel to this great Eastern European country.

1. Yes, It's Perfectly Safe

Let's get this out of the way first.

The media lies. A lot.

It's natural to be a bit nervous of apprehensive about traveling to a country you haven't been to. Especially once that has had somewhat of a checkered past. Add in the hysteria that the news likes to show, and it's easy to be a bit intimidated of traveling. The media prefers to show drastic photos like this one instead of giving an accurate portrayal of the safety:

Never mind that those photos were three years ago. A lot has changed since then. There's a new president in power (Pro tip: He owns a chocolate company—refer to him as Willy Wonka to Ukrainian girls and watch them giggle like schoolgirls). There's a new police force in the capital, Kiev.

As long as you have basic street smarts, you will be just fine in Ukraine.

2. Late Spring And Early Summer Are The Best Times

Late spring signifies the coming of summer. This means that clothes are being shed, and everybody is in a happy mood. You haven't lived until you've walked down a major Ukrainian street in the first few weeks of sun.

Dresses, heels, and a complete disregard for bras are the norm.

As fall comes, the students return to the major cities. In addition, the fast-approaching winter weather means that girls are looking for their winter cuddle buddies. The fun (and sluttiness) of summer is passing by, and girls are looking for someone to fall back on during the cold winter months.

This means that they are more receptive to going on dates and are (a little) less likely to play games with you. Summer isn't bad, but you will have to deal with school holidays and sex tourists stinking up the cities with bad game.

3. Ukraine Is Currently… Confused

Ukraine is really at a crossroads right now. They desperately trying to join the Schengen Visa agreement for visa-free travel to the EU. At the same time, many of the Former Soviet roots are still present in the culture.

Many of the people love Western culture. There are definitely some very slutty girls. McDonald's are popping up at an alarming rate. At the same time, many of the Former Soviet traditional values and customs are still alive and well. Most girls are still very feminine, and will cook and clean to your heart's content.

Frankly, it could go either way at this point. However, if it goes the way of the West—you'll want to get there sooner rather than later.

4. Plan On Three Dates

Of course, what kind of article on Ukraine would be complete with talking about the girls?

Despite the issues raised in #3, the girls are still mostly very traditional. They are not likely to hop into bed with you on the first date, and many of them will try to secure some form of commitment prior to giving it up. The best way to tackle this is to plan on three dates. It's such a rare thing for it to happen on the first date, that it's simply better to be a little less aggressive at first.

The first date can be as simple as a coffee and a walk. While you can kiss her, this is the best advice I can distill: If you don't kiss a Ukrainian girl on the first date, it doesn't matter. She will still want to see you (provided you are an attractive guy). Contrast that to the West, where if you don't kiss a girl on the first date, she thinks you're a coward and won't see you again.

You have sky-high value in Ukraine, so she will go out with you again regardless. For a second date, you can just do another walk, or grab a meal together. For a third date, you can cook her dinner (or have her cook for you—if she likes you, she'll likely have offered by the second or third date to do this).

Then go for it.

As a final note, remember that Ukrainians don't really make plans in advance. So, if she texts you out of the blue at 4:30pm and asks if you want to meet her for a walk at 6:00—DO IT!

Face time is important in moving the relationship towards the bedroom, and you'll find many of the girls here are sharp and charming enough that you genuinely enjoy talking to them.

5. Ukrainian People Need To Be Warmed Up

My first month in Kiev, I frequented the same coffee shop every morning. At this point, my Russian was non-existent. At first, when I spoke English to order my coffee, the baristas serving me were quite skeptical. It was very much a, "Why on Earth are you here?" kind of vibe.

However, near the end of that first month (before I moved to Odessa), those same baristas were greeting me with open arms. They were giving me free snacks, making my order as soon as I walked in the door, and having a blast speaking broken English (them) and Russian (me) with me.

Simply put, they just needed to get to know who I was to feel comfortable. Once we reached that point, they were very friendly.

6. Just. Keep. Going.

Ukraine is a country that you need to put some time into. I've met several forum guys here who struggled with the dating culture for three weeks, and then it all just CLICKED. It's a place that you need to get some reps and experience in, then it all falls into place.

Ukraine is simply not a place that land in, and have three girls in your bed in the next 24 hours. Some guys think that is the case, then come here and are sorely disappointed. You have to put some work in, and when you do—the reward are great. But you do have to do that work. This applies to all areas of life—not just the dating scene.

There will be times that you're just feeling beaten. Perhaps another four hour date which led to nothing more than holding hands. Maybe another bad night out, where no girls wanted to speak English to you. Another restaurant that couldn't figure out your order.

When this happens, just keep going. Eventually, the culture, girls, and way of life will start to make sense. And when it does, you may never want to leave.

Hillary Clinton Pulls Out The Lie Book To Try And Stump The Trump At The First Presidential Debate

September 27, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Monday night's first Presidential debate, held at Hofstra University in New York, lacked some of the rhetorical fireworks between Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton that many had anticipated. Still, the performances of both candidates confirmed earlier assessments made by Return Of Kings. Republican nominee Trump highlighted how America is continuing to lose out economically, socially, and in terms of its national security to other states and organized groups, including ISIS. By contrast, Clinton deployed a series of diversions and straight-out lies to bait again those perennial victims brainwashed by Democrats over decades: millions of blacks, Hispanics, young people, and non-SJW women.

(starts at 26:00)

The problem with Clinton's performance is that she relied on "zingers," as the mainstream media calls them, which are considered factual and superb just because she says them. They are either inaccurate or, just as bad, banal platitudes about "justice," "fairness," and "equality." These feel-good lines are devoid of either context or proof. Compare this to Trump, who zoomed in perfectly on the cancers afflicting the US: deference to rivals and enemies, failing to ask allies for proper support, and a basic refusal to act in the ways that are best for America.

Here are three key areas in which the Trump-Clinton divide was most prominent during last night's debate:

Hillary can’t shake off her globalist past—and future

Trump astutely homed in on Hillary Clinton’s previous “gold standard” description of the toxic Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) “free trade” proposal, support which the Democratic nominee claimed to have backtracked on only months ago. He linked this praise to her fawning endorsement of NAFTA in the 1990s. NAFTA, as Trump pointed out, has led to the erosion of American manufacturing and the strange situation where Mexico is allowed to export its goods into America with much smaller financial barriers than the reverse. The TPP promises to do the same and, when it comes to US based-interests, will only benefit transnational corporations.

Clinton was unwilling to categorically rule out backing the TPP again if elected President and avoided criticizing Barack Obama for wanting it implemented. She also said nothing of substance in relation to combating China’s extremely anti-free trade behavior, most notably the constant devaluation of its currency. In the context of a $20 trillion US national debt and trade deficits that balloon ever more, the likely Democratic inaction on this front is alarming and only surrenders national, rather than corporate interests. What she did do was to try to placate those wanting a welfare state, promising things like “debt-free college” and a minimum wage rise. But how can those she will get the money from, “the wealthy,” pay for both these shopping items and simultaneously pay down the debt?

When the topic switched to terrorism, the Democratic nominee refrained from discussing how ISIS began its rise when she was Secretary of State, an inconvenient truth she was quickly reminded about. Expanding on this bad judgment point, Trump alluded to a related national security failure of the “experienced” Secretary Clinton: the United States’ persistent bankrolling of other states’ safety at the direct expense of its own. The whole point of NATO is that it is an alliance, but America always seems to foot the bill, just as it does in its relationship with Japan. In response, Hillary Clinton was unable—or simply refused—to articulate how this is either a desirable or affordable state of affairs. This is telling as nationalist vs. globalist arguments grow more salient within the current American political discourse.

Gender pay gap madness

Hillary Clinton unsurprisingly brought up the gender pay gap, a long-discredited myth that ignores how women, even those employed full-time, work on average less hours than men. This political fiction, one perpetually drawing in millions of self-victimized female voters and emasculated white knights, fails to acknowledge the greater presence of men in higher-skilled and therefore higher-paying industries as well.

Despite the certainty that this kind of argument would be raised, Clinton took it to a new, far more delusional level by suggesting that women deserve the same pay for inferior work. She claimed that Donald Trump "said women don't deserve equal pay unless they do as good a job as men." He actually did not say this, as a fact check used in a USA Today article illustrated months ago.

Yet even if he had made the statement, this is perhaps the least controversial soundbite, real or imagined, that anyone has ever used to try and discredit Trump. The falsely attributed words are one hundred percent in line with the idea of "equal pay for equal work." If your work is not of the same quality as your peer, you should not get equal pay. How, for example, is a junior female lawyer who brings in less clients and billable hours than her male counterpart deserving of equal pay? What Trump did say is that he favors paying employees based on performance.

Necessary corrections aside, Hillary Clinton's line is merely a prelude to the affirmative action she will unleash upon the American economy if elected. Having already implied that women deserve equal pay even if their work and performance cannot be described as equal, expect concrete legislation that will force employers to hire women over men, irrespective of their credentials, socioeconomic backgrounds (preferential treatment allows many Middle American men to be leapfrogged by women from privileged families), and the real requirements of the job.

Hillary Clinton reverted to re-peddling the tired old fantasy that 2016 is the new Jim Crow laws era. Forgetting that countless non-blacks are in jail for non-violent offences, too, she falsely portrayed African-Americans as the victims of police harassment and racist hysteria over crimes that are not murder, rape or serious assault. To boot, she pushed aside the higher involvement of blacks in violent felonies. Clinton further outlined how outright (white) racism, not certain cultural values and black-on-black brutality, purportedly explains almost every conceivable problem confronting African-Americans today. Plus, she did not ever call out the truly deplorable rioters in Charlotte, nor condemn overall the opportunistic troublemakers that comprise Black Lives Matter.

Trump absolutely schooled his opponent, however, when it came to the astounding rate of violence in Chicago, Clinton's city of birth. In a metropolitan area where gun laws are amongst the most restrictive in the nation, black-on-black crime especially has decimated African-American communities. Clinton's crude racial politics quickly became stuck and the candidate herself appeared to be flustered. After all, Chicago, which Trump was using as an example of the general malaise of crime found across the country, is controlled locally by Democrats, like most major cities.

The desperation of Hillary Clinton, a representative of a party which has failed America's minorities and made them poorer, became evident when she mentioned a racial discrimination lawsuit, not a finding of guilt, brought against Trump forty years ago. With nothing to offer blacks and Hispanics, other than the same old dud policies on a national and municipal level, she had to invent a boogeyman to distract people.

But the media still lauded Clinton

The post-Hofstra debate media coordination will be just like this.

Regardless of her cheap antics at the debate, almost every mainstream media editorial from CNN's to the LA Times' waxed lyrical about Clinton's supposedly epic performance on Monday night. That sycophancy will only grow from now until election day. But if takes so much concerted, stooge-like media support to help her win, what does that say about her as a candidate?

Right now, though, we should be both proud of and amazed at where Trump is at the moment. Only six months ago, people were bellowing that he would still lose the Republican nomination. He could never ever win, the experts said. Moreover, just a year ago, his candidacy was considered a laughing stock by elites and nearly all supporters of the Democrats.

So who's laughing at Donald Trump now? Not many people, and certainly not a very concerned Hillary Clinton.

How To Survive A Black Lives Matter Riot

September 27, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

As we move into the fall of 2016, violent confrontations between black men and police of varied ethnicities continue to occur and be televised on national news, inevitably followed by the Black Lives Matter movement, which attempts to stop the shooting of black people by police because they are feared to be violent and felonious by being violent and felonious. Leaving aside their dubious logic, it is quite possible that any ROK reader living in or visiting America might find themselves on the wrong side of a riot, so here's some advice on that potential situation.

Whether you're a swastika-packing 1488 Stormfronter, or a Bernie Sanders hipster, if you're white, the BLM is going to hate on you, definitely beat you up and rob you, possibly rape you (if you're female or they're gay), and maybe even kill you. This goes the same for Asians, and probably Hispanics and anything other than black people. Hell, you might even need to be Wesley Snipes black to be truly immune from harm.

Point being, there's no reasoning with these people at this point, and you need to regard ALL of them as dangerous, and only work on getting yourself out of there. There are three main situations where you might find yourself up against the BLM.

On Foot

If you're out for a night on the town, and you turn the corner and there's the riot, you have some quick decisions to make. Best thing to do is head the other direction immediately in a quiet and discreet manner. Similar to the typical zombie movie, if you can get away without the mob noticing you, you win.

If they do notice you, now is the time to run like hell provided you have a decent lead on them. Part of my yet-to-be-written guide on tactical clothing is to always wear shoes in which you can run, and, although I will defer to my colleague Mr. Halleck's works on fitness, part of my standards is being able to run a good ways at the drop of a hat.

What if they're close and they notice you? They'll approach and either immediately engage in violence on your person, or start talking a big game, gearing themselves up for engaging in that same violence. Hopefully you're armed.

The legality here is reasonable expectation of harm. The mob has disparity of force; they don't need to be armed, although some will be, to be a lethal threat to you. However, you need to wait for a clear threat; you cannot legally shoot a mob not doing anything, but, on the other hand, you do not need to wait for them to assault you either. If they are assaulting someone else with deadly force, or they say something implying they are about to assault you with deadly force, that is the green light for you to employ self defense.

Once they notice you and start heading your way, I'd draw whatever weapon you have and hold it at your side. As soon as it escalates into justifying lethal force, pick the leader, and put one upper-center mass. Headshots are hard to do, and you're looking for some shock value here; anything having to do with the trachea will make some pretty disgusting noises.

If it's a small mob, chances are it will break if you blast their ringleaders and they will run from you. If it's a big mob, you have a brief moment while the mob will flounder for a second after you've taken out the leader, and that is when you run like hell. You may have to periodically turn and shoot at some people chasing you, but they should get the hint. Conserve ammo.

I'm not a knife fighter; about all I know is you're going to get cut in a knife fight no matter how good you are. Saps and batons are also good weapons; pepper spray, not so much. You may have to make an improvised club if you have nothing. If you truly have nothing, throw the first punch and put him down, and that might be enough in itself.

In a one-on-one shooting, I advise shooting to end the threat which should also kill the guy, then unloading the gun and calling the cops and filing as the victim. The more important part of this is to never let it get this far. Your job, when on the move on foot, is to see everyone before they see you and immediately head the other way if you see trouble. I would recommend the "The Talk: Non-black version" for the required mentality. I've got no issue with most any single black person, but, when there's a lot of them and non-black you in the same area, you can get killed even if you're not racist.

In your vehicle

The BLM seems to delight in blocking roads and being general pains in the ass. While this is illegal, it's not something for which you can shoot them, or even run them over. However, just like the above scenario when you're on foot, you can, and should, employ deadly force when the mob has done so to others, or makes threats to do so to you.

This includes things like breaking a car window, trying to open a door, or trying to disable your vehicle. I would use any sort of physical contact with the car as a wide definition of trying to disable the vehicle. This also goes for any credible threat to do so, and it doesn't have to be the guy you aim for that said it. All that is required is you being legitimately in fear of your life, or of your companions, or of serious injury.

Do not get boxed in. Always leave a drivable space behind the car in front of you, and you should never hang out in the middle lanes, or left lane, of highly trafficed roads. Once you can no longer change lanes freely, you should stay in the right lane, keep a space, and be vigilant once you come to a stop.

Let them protest, but the instant they turn violent, even if it is not your car, pull onto the shoulder, and punch it. The idea here is an impressive, but controllable speed. 30 mph is plenty fast to wreck a rioter and keep your momentum up, but not make you lose control. You want them to be diving for cover, not getting ready to swing at your vehicle. Lay on the horn, do not stop, and hit anyone who won't move.

Once clear, you will need to call this in. Might want to call the lawyer first, briefly, but you need to identify as the victim to the police, and you want to be first, because someone in the mob got you, your vehicle, and your license plate on their phone's camera, and, as fast as you can say Dindu Nuffin, they're going to be saying they didn't do anything to deserve it. Remember, they started being violent, and you were in fear for your life.

Lastly, if you do get boxed in, or your vehicle is disabled, you may need to abandon it. You may want to use it as cover, then refer to the previous "on foot" section.

In a building

The media made a big deal about the Pulse Nightclub shooting when a bunch of patrons were killed when they were hiding in the bathroom. People don't realize the power of having predictable entryways to a position. Get lined up on the door to the room you are in, and drop the first guy who breaks the door down. If you've got a club or a knife, stand to the side of the door with the doorknob, and stick him or smack him as he comes in. If you've got a gun, get a rest, and you may punch through to the guy behind him as well.

That being said, always have another exit so you don't get trapped in there. Stay away from windows and keep lights off so you can hide. Once you've got a room secured, this is a great time to call the cops. Say exactly where you are and clearly state how scared you are. Feel free to embellish on the size of the mob, its violence, and any threats they may be yelling. This will get the police there faster, establish your innocence before the fact in case you have to shoot, and also put the blame of the shooting on the police since they were obviously not there fast enough if said shooting does, in fact, occur.

A worse scenario is fleeing into a building that is hostile already. Best thing to do there is keep moving and haul ass out the back door.

Conclusion

While this is theoretical on my end, and backed up by advice from various experts quoted throughout, your mileage may indeed vary. Your main takeaways need to be to stay armed, stay vigilant, and remain in control of the situation, because your odds go way down once you directly face off with a riot. Stay safe.

Does “The Selfish Gene” Theory Explain Women’s Behavior?

If there’s one thing a man learns about women when he literally beds hundreds of them in his own personal anthropological experiment trying to find out what makes females tick (as well as his own taste for hedonism—heh) it’s that there are no unicorns. Those with powers of keen observation and rational analysis notice women are naturally gifted with the innate behavior the philosopher Schopenhauer called dissimulation, that is the tendency to conceal their true thoughts and feelings.

When a man watches female behavior instead of listening to their words patterns begin to emerge. One of the most important patterns a man might notice is that the most powerful force in the universe is hypergamy, not compound interest as Einstein humorously stated. Hypergamy is of course the human female’s tendency to marry up (never down) in social status. Oxford-educated anthropologist Robert Briffault knew this in the 1930s, but of course Utopia-seeking Western social engineers completely ignored what made society stable in mad pursuit of magic theories that were going to fix everything.

Their egalitarian notions of some sort of sexual equality were doomed to failure, and the failure was baked right into the cake. Briffault wrote:

> The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place.

That simple sentence, followed to its logical conclusion could have stopped the impending sexual disenfranchisement and subsequent disengagement of Western men from their own nations.

Briffault knew if a woman can't use a man for something—money, social status, power or all three—she wants nothing to do with said man no matter how attractive a man he might be or how altruistic he is. A perfectly equal society is a society in which women have ZERO attraction to men, because men in such a society would be bereft of the qualities that make them attractive to women in the first place. Feminism was destined to create chaos from its inception.

Eggs are rare, sperm is plentiful, therefore males are usually disposable in nature

Women will do anything for the seed of a top dog. Just watch as they literally faint in old videos of The Beatles and turn into total whores whenever a dominant male enters the room, or orbit actors like DiCrapio. Guys like DiCrapio look and act like douches but have the key female-attracting intoxicants: money, status, and power. (If you want to see what it's like to be an alpha male and see the power of hypergamy in full swing, go to a country in which you have high social capital and watch how differently you are treated than when you're in America or Europe. But, bear in mind women's interest in you as a human being is purely an illusion.)

Feminism fails to account for the fact that removing money, status, and power from men will ultimately unleash chaos on society.

Of course, the fact the world is melting down is based not only on Utopia-seeking sociological behavior that ignores fundamental principles of anthropology. Politicians and social engineers also ignore the primacy of a relatively new concept in science known as The Selfish Gene (which incidentally led George R. Price, one of its discoverers to suicide). They formulate hypotheses about a "perfect world" then try to simulate the real world using Game Theory (not the game theory of the manosphere) which reduces people to mathematical equations social engineers then plug into computer models. These models currently tell politicians the solution to all the world's ills is to throw everything up in the air, destroy national identities and borders, and pretend ethnic and sexual differences don't matter in fantastical sort of New World Order that is destined for catastrophe.

The Utopians most crucially missed the implications of The Selfish Gene on male/female relations.

The Selfish Gene

Women are innately solipsistic and selfish as any man who has had many dealings with them knows

If it’s been said once, it’s been said a thousand times, nice guys finish last. But why is it that women choose dominance every time over niceness, dooming notions of sexual equality to dismal failure?

The Selfish Gene” theory could explain the tendency of women not only to marry up, but to completely disregard the bottom 4/5 of men as potential suitors as The Pareto Principle suggests and eyewitness evidence in any club in America will illustrate. Here’s a simple definition of The Selfish Gene:

> A lineage is expected to evolve to maximize its inclusive fitness—the number of copies of its genes passed on globally (rather than by a particular individual).

This theory is bad news for men in a sexual market that has shifted to look more like a jungle than a civilization since the advent of “women’s liberation” a.k.a. feminism. The Realtalk translation of that very effete sounding definition of The Selfish Gene works out to: Women want to fuck the winners, and they will fuck over the losers.

Women have evolved to disregard and even harbor contempt for “inferior” DNA. In a cruel world in which survival of the fittest has been the rule from day one over 4 billion years ago when life began to form in the slime, being a nice boy doesn’t cut it. Women, more than men, are beholden to the influences of The Selfish Gene, and though we may lament its effects on our sexual and familial prospects as men there are sound biological reasons women have evolved to be ruthless when it comes to choosing sexual partners.

It all comes down to survival of the genes.

Even though the following information is regularly hidden in academia because it doesn't fit the West's cultural narratives, studies of sexual behavior have led to quite the stunning revelation that harems are quite a normal part of human history. And indeed, it seems this tendency of women to orbit dominant men while using weaker men for resources is becoming the norm once again in the 21st century world in which cultural mores designed to keep women's sexuality from destroying society have blindly been discarded in a vain pursuit of making "a better world."

As reported on my blog in June in The History of Harems: Women Orbit, Too, anthropological studies have found evidence that harems have been quite the norm throughout most of history:

> Here are some other parts of the world in which women were in harems of a dominant man rather than the one and only of hapless Beta males, the exact type of male they show open contempt towards today:
> - Egypt: Pharaohs demanded to be in the constant company of numerous beautiful girls.
> - Sri Lanka: King Kashyapa had a harem that numbered 500.
> - Mexico: Montezuma had 4,000 concubines when he met Cortez.
> - China: One emperor had 2,800 concubines.
> - Africa: Junior wives and concubines orbited Chieftans.
> - Mongolia: Genghis Khan fathered so many children 1 in 200 men have his DNA today.
> The University of Wisconsin showed the practice of maintaining harems is far from unusual in history. It surveyed 1,000 historical societies to find out how common polygyny has been, and the findings are astonishing: Just 18% of historical societies were monogamous. Half of rest of the 82% had occasional > polygyny and the other half had it all the time. If nothing else, this historical fact helps show why women have such contempt for Beta males – they are not as valuable for providing material things as high status men.

So women (like men, but moreso) are driven by coding from selfish genes, women want dominant men and don't care about the rest (incidentally this is the rule in other species as well), and they do not think about the consequences of their actions on the long term viability of the civilization they're in. They'd rather be in a harem with a dominant man than the "one and only" of a nice boy. The West was unique in that it had evolved to offer males a seat at the table of the human family via culturally enforced monogamy. That offer has since been rescinded.

What Does It All Mean

Western social engineers fiddle with Utopian ideals while their countries burn

The world we are heading into, rather than being an altruistic world envisioned by liberals and other clueless dupes is going to be an increasingly unstable world as men vie with each other in contests to be top dog for the sexual and reproductive advantages. Women benefit, and arguably the human genome benefits because the strongest genes survive, but civilization loses and it loses big as primitive sexual forces and survival instincts are unleashed on a soft, delusional society.

This, more than anything else explains why women are welcoming rapists into cucked nations in Europe and outbreeding in increasing numbers in the U.S. It's a giant civilizational shit test courtesy of selfish genes, of which women are more controlled by than men, who have greater powers of logic and reasoning.

The West's attempts at making a better world in pursuit of the ultimate fulfillment of its Spenglerean Prime Symbol of Infinity, in the modern sense a strange ideology that sees world socialism as the be all, end all to humanity's problems will end in tragedy. This is especially true in that it is blindly meddling with the primal forces of nature. It seems our "wise" leaders have thrown the dice one too many times in a delusional dream to bring about a "better world" but have unwittingly unleashed primitive forces (like The Selfish Gene and concepts Freud also worried about) that will destroy it.

It all boils down to liberalism being a giant Utopian dream that failed, and instead of taking us all to heaven as it claimed it would, it is casting us all into hell.

What’s Worse: Cultural Marxism Or Real Communism?

If you’ve ever wondered why the policy positions and tactics of liberalism seem like watered-down Communism, it’s no coincidence. There’s been considerable influence, some from traditional Communism (Marxism-Leninism), but mostly from cultural Marxism. Increasingly over time, this “Communism Lite” version became their guiding ideology. The left wasn’t always like this. They used to have real substance: the trust busters opposing the robber barons, the early labor leaders, Jack London—what the hell happened?

For that matter, today’s mainstream conservative establishment also leaves much to be desired. They have too many careerist politicos sucking up to major contributors and ignoring what’s happening to their grassroots. They’ve allowed themselves to be fettered by political correctness and co-opted by neocon entryists. The fact is, lobbyists and influential players in the background hold the purse strings for both sets of politicians, though all that’s another topic.

How “Communism Lite” differs from the real thing

Less substance, but all the foolishness!

Traditional Communism emphasizes socialist economics, along with the importance of hard work, productivity, and striving tirelessly for the good of the nation. Their historical analysis is all in terms of class struggle. This is a big blind spot; class struggle matters, but other important forces and historical events occur. To them, the proletariat is always good; the bourgeoisie and aristocracy are always bad.

Cultural Marxism diverged from traditional Communism. Note well, this is the "for export" brand. "Essential categories" are emphasized, such as race, gender, and sexual orientation. Like traditional Marxist historical analysis focusing only on class struggle, cultural Marxism sees everything in the lens of privilege and oppression. Class consciousness is still there, but in last place. For instance, all women are downtrodden and patriarchy gives all men privilege, including Jane the CEO and John the coal miner. A wealthy gay fashion designer is oppressed, and a straight grocery bagger is unfairly advantaged. Its stated goal is equality and respect for everyone, but they're full of double standards.

Traditional Communism has class-based preferences, favoring the workers and farmers and despising everyone wealthier. Likewise, cultural Marxism has its agreed-upon favored and disfavored groups. Some religions are routinely ridiculed; others are off-limits to any criticism. Minority groups are encouraged to have pride, stand together, and organize for their interests, but majority members doing so are vilified. Likely you can think of a few more examples. History is rewritten and current events are spun to suit these agendas, sold by the education and media machines to inflame grievances in some groups and promote guilt trips by others.

If you think any of this is really about inclusiveness, fairness, problem solving, or healing divisions, then I've got a bridge for sale in Brooklyn. The real goal from the beginning was to discredit the traditional establishment, drive wedges in society, and promote agendas. It's all about power.

A brief history of cultural Marxism

How Communism morphed into something really lame

In the beginning, Max Horkheimer and his colleagues of the Frankfurt School—a Communist think tank—formulated cultural Marxism. In the 1930s, they moved to the USA and began subverting the educational system. The media, with many key figures having similar views, started promoting the same things.

The goal was to disrupt the foundations of society: the family, religion, morality, patriotism, and ethnic solidarity (but only of the majority). That sounds just like the leftist ideological buffet since the 1960s, doesn't it? According to the Frankfurt School's plan, the only loyalty remaining would be class consciousness, and the public would be ready to embrace a global Communist government. They didn't think that one through too clearly; the New World Order they inaugurated empowered the billionaires, not the proletariat!

As the cultural Marxism memeplex spread out into the Western world through the educational system and media establishment, the originators no longer exclusively controlled the message. In 1991, the Soviet Union collapsed, leaving cultural Marxism effectively leaderless. The Queen Bee died, but the memebots kept marching on, sometimes wandering in very odd directions.

Twenty five years later, it's basically turned into a religion. No single individual or Politburo-type group dictates the Party Line; they basically act on consensus and sometimes have major factional disagreements (consider these as opportunities). This has a two-part structure roughly similar to the Inner Party and Outer Party of Orwell's 1984.

Cultural Marxism's hierarchy, The System and The Hive

Twins separated at birth?

Presently, this is best described as a loose coalition bound by ideology and mutual interests; no group is solely accountable. Although cultural Marxism is decentralized without a clear leader, The System forms the center of gravity. (Some call this the Cathedral, though others find the terminology problematic.) These are the high-level politicians, media executives, big-name demagogues, major figures in academia, heads of foundations, shadowy power brokers behind the scenes, etc. Those with the greatest hubris seem to envision the world's future as themselves and their posterity living like kings among billions of human cattle: easily controlled and dependent, bereft of cultural or genetic distinctiveness.

Basically, The System includes those who have money, power, and publicity. The limousine liberals rank lowest: celebrities, virtue-signaling corporate figures, and similar useful idiots. They present a glamorous public face and have deep pockets, but wield limited control over the public. Many business interests encourage globalism to profiteer from free trade (low tariffs) and mass immigration (cheap labor).

The Hive is a much larger group, worker bees used by The System to implement their ideology. As the name implies, they're basically a herd that doesn't think for itself very much. They're expendable; any who step out of line can be thrown under the bus.

The Hive's upper echelons include community agitators, civil rights attorneys, major feminists, editors, screenwriters, intermediate government figures, etc. Further down are propagandizing professors, petty bureaucrats, social media censors, half-baked intellectuals, foundation staffers, professional activists, journalists out to change the world, and the like. The lowest dregs are Social Justice Warriors: fanatics disconnected from reality whose only power is through online mobbing.

Are they sincere?

Why, of course all those politicians and globalist billionaires care about fairness for the masses and doing something about income inequality!

By Hedrick Smith's estimation, only 10% of the USSR's Party members really believed in Communism; the rest were opportunists in it for status and perks. How do the apparatchiks of cultural Marxism compare?

I'll charitably assume that some in The System really do believe their message. The rest are talking the talk for purely cynical reasons of power, money, and prestige. Salaries for such positions are high, sometimes astronomical. Does The System really want to help the little guy, or feel solidarity for the downtrodden? Draw your own conclusions.

Members of The Hive have various motivations. Some only care about their own cause—feminism, GLBT interests, other identity groups, single-issue politics, etc.—but collaborate for the sake of coalition. Power-hungry types dream of becoming big shots promoted into The System. Some misfits are just lashing out at society. Surely there are unenthusiastic worker bees complying for their paychecks. All the rest, though, are sincere idealists, caring individuals who believe they're fighting for progress and equality.

The naïve True Believers don't realize they're being used, or understand the nature of those at the forefront: corrupt politicians, plutocrats, demagogues, and the like. The pawns know nothing about the forces behind this, or they know next to nothing; they are in black darkness and confusion. Showing them the men behind the curtain might be enlightening.

On that note, many people in the general public have a feeling that something is going terribly wrong, yet can't quite connect the dots. Let us help them see who's pulling the strings.

Is liberalism better than communism?

Sometimes it’s a tough decision to make…

Communism is rightly unpopular these days. Its economic system just doesn’t work. Worse, it featured repression and political violence on a massive scale. Liberalism is less extreme, though it certainly isn’t squeaky clean. It’s a totalitarian ideology, and not a particularly wise one, implemented as soft despotism. Social engineering imposed on the public since the 1960s has caused massive damage. Cultural Marxism is responsible for most of what’s wrong with today’s society: radical feminism, political correctness, moral relativism, need I say more?

Traditional Communism, even if stagnant and inefficient at best, at least had the constructive goal to develop their countries. In some ways, they were more sensible than liberals. They emphasized unity, not divisiveness. They didn’t dumb down their education. They fostered pride in their countries (threadbare though they were), realizing early on that flabby internationalism wasn’t inspiring. They promoted high culture: classical music, ballet, and art that looks like art. They emphasized productivity. All told, it was a terrible system, but I’ll have to give credit where it’s due.

Remember, cultural Marxism was the “for export” brand. Despite whatever lofty ideals liberalism espouses, their tactics include stirring up social discord and distracting with trivial issues. Students are taught to feel guilty about their country’s history. Government policies are hell-bent on promoting dependency. (If they achieve total victory, how will they deal with all this dead weight from the intergenerational poverty they encouraged?) Cultural Marxism is a great society wrecker—it works as designed—but it’s a remarkably dysfunctional ideology to govern one.

Final thoughts

The System is painting itself into a corner. They’ve been living it up while Western civilization crumbles, but the party can’t go on forever. What the hell are they thinking, anyway? They should at least have the sense not to wreck the productive and industrious countries that allowed them to prosper enormously. Do they want to rule a transcontinental rubble heap?

They had better wise up and start governing responsibly. I’ve painted a grim picture of the liberal establishment, but things are overdue for a change. Their New World Order is unstable. Three outcomes are possible if they don't reform, stop their social engineering, and cease their hubris. If the adults get in charge, the corrupt elite will never be allowed near the levers of power again. If the status quo continues indefinitely, civilization agonizingly grinds to a halt and they'll perish with it. If the class war the Communists dreamed of finally emerges, they'll be in for a big surprise if they believe their wealth, power, and virtue-signaling will protect them.

9 Things I Learned From Writing 100 Articles For A Major Alternative Media Outlet

This being my 100th article for Return Of Kings, I thought it would be worth taking some time out to reflect on what lessons that writing has taught me. This is not to blow smoke up my own ass—it will hopefully be of value to those interested in journalism, blogging, or content creation generally. There are however also some more general themes to be drawn out that apply to guys who want to persist and get good at anything, be it getting girls, creating a business, or excelling in your career.

1. Consistency is key

Yes, it's been said a million times in self-help and business books, but consistency really is key. I wrote my first article for ROK, 7 Tips For Building A Harem, back in February 2014. After a gap of a couple of months (during which I was presumably trying to think of a suitable follow up, or out macking girls, or both) I submitted 6 Tips For Getting Laid In London. After that I was away, publishing posts on a more-or-less weekly basis consistently right up until last year, when a legal battle I was involved with meant that I had to take the odd week out (and even that is making excuses for myself—really I should have pushed myself harder during those times).

When Roosh offered me the gig as game writer for ROK I made a commitment to him and to Winston, the site's editor, that I would deliver regularly. More importantly, perhaps, I also made that commitment to myself. What that meant was the even when I didn't feel like it, I would sit down at the keyboard and bash out an article. Or, if I was going to be away on business, or on vacation, I would write and submit multiple articles ahead of time to make sure my slot got filled. That's not to say I've been perfect—no-one is—but in general I've kept consistency front of mind.

Consistency has many benefits both for you and for those around you. I haven't been perfect, but I've tried to be as consistent as possible, and when I have, it's made me feel really good. Because there's nothing better in life than holding good on promises and accomplishing what you set out to do.

2. Over time, you will get better

This is the other key thing about consistency—if you stick at something long enough, you will get better at it. Do I think 6 Tips For Getting Laid In London is a brilliant piece of writing? No. Would I write the article differently if I tackled it now? Yes, of course I would. But around the time I had published Use the 'One Strike' Rule to Improve Your Dating Life in May 2015, I believe I had begun to hit my stride. It was around this time that views on my articles really started to go up, I was getting great reader feedback and my posts were regularly in the top 5 of the week. I was also getting emails from readers and famous PUAs, and sales of my book The Seven Laws of Seduction were up.

Understand that this isn't to give myself a pat on the back—it merely underlines the fact that if you do something consistently for long enough, you will start to improve.

3. There is an abundance of content

The rule of abundance applies in writing (or creativity generally) just as it does with girls and money. There is an abundance of everything out there—you just have to internalise this and believe it. When I first agreed with Roosh that I would write a weekly article for ROK, I had no long term plan for what I was going to submit. I just knew that the subject area of dating, girls, and relationships was one that I was passionate and knowledgeable about having had a long background in game.

I never thought too much about where the next article was coming from. I knew only that I had made a commitment to the site and its readers, believed in abundance and sat down every week to write. As it was, life invariably threw up circumstances that I was able to use as the raw material for articles, while hopefully helping other guys at the same time.

My experience here taught me that there is no lack of content out there—in fact, there's an abundance of it. The same is true of girls, things to say in a conversation, jobs, or business opportunities.

4. Write about what you know for a defined target audience

Writing about game and relationships was a no-brainer for me, since it is something I have done myself, and taught, for over a decade. I've also written a book about it. Nearly all of my articles include some example from real life which I use to illustrate the technique or phenomenon I am describing.

At the same time, after a while it became necessary for me to start looking outside of my own experience for inspiration. This is where writing for a defined audience really helps. In my case, I often think about my mate Steve. Steve is a great guy who has often needed support and advice with meeting girls and a lot of my ROK articles have been born out of real life conversations with him. Perhaps surprisingly, it turned out that Steve's individual issues actually resonate with a lot of guys.

Anyone writing or creating content is well advised to either keep a real person in mind while they work, or at least create an avatar of your target audience and speak to that one person.

5. You can never tell for sure what will be popular, so just start

Sometimes you bust your gut over a piece of content only to find that your article bombs. Other times you create something quickly which you feel is a bit throwaway only to see it become incredibly well-viewed with readers really engaged in the comments section.

As has been said of the movie business, “no one knows anything.” Of course experience is valuable. I believe I have a better idea now of what will play well with ROK readers than I did two years ago. But still, every article you publish, every book you write, every business you start and every approach to a girl you make is essentially a crap shoot. You never know 100% what’s going to fly. On that basis then, why not just start? You never know—this idea could just be the one that gets you the girl or makes you a million.

6. Haters gonna hate—but there’s no such thing as consensus

On a related note, any time you put yourself out there in some way, whether it’s by publishing an article, launching a product or chatting up a girl, you will get haters—it’s just a fact of life. People will disagree with you, tell you you’re doing it all wrong, and suggest that you crawl back into your mom’s basement and never come out again.

Like all ROK writers, I have received my fair share of hate over the years, with people leaving derisory and sometimes personally insulting comments under my articles. What’s interesting though is how diverse opinion actually is. For every detractor you get, you will always get at least one person who thinks what you’re doing is brilliant.

This backs up something I wrote in The Seven Laws of Seduction—there is no such thing as consensus. There is no “right” opinion. If you approach a girl and ask her out in a club and she rejects you, then maybe some guy watching will think you're a douchebag. But equally, the guy standing next to him will admire you for your balls and wish he could be more like you.

In life you have to stand for something. There's no point in holding back out of fear of what people may or may not think. Act with integrity to your core purpose, whatever that is, and don't let people who think or feel differently hold you back.

7. On the internet, all publicity is good publicity

The good news about haters is this—if people are talking about you then you can make money, regardless of what they are saying. The weeks when I've received the most vicious reader feedback are also those when my book sales have been highest. Go figure. As above, if you act with integrity to your core purpose then those who like what you are saying will seek you out and support or reward you.

8. Headlines are really important—as is having a great editor

Online, a snappy, engaging headline is the difference between being read or not. Furthermore, your copy should be well-written in order to get your ideas over informatively and entertainingly. When you are creating content solo, this is all down to you, and it's your responsibility to get things right. Fortunately ROK is blessed with a great editor, Winston, as well as Roosh himself. Many times I have submitted articles with okay headlines, only to see these transformed into showstoppers on publication, causing my numbers to skyrocket. Great editing is a skill acquired over time, so props to those guys.

9. Be helpful

Finally, when creating content of any kind, the best way to go is to take a step back and think about how best you can help your audience. Is it by solving a particular problem? If so, would a certain example from your life help out? Is it by entertaining them? If so, how can you make your work funnier or more dramatic? Is it to move them? If so where can you add more poignancy or pathos. If you always put your audience's needs first when creating content then you won't go far wrong.

I hope that at least some people have found some of my first 100 articles helpful. Many thanks for reading—here's to the next 100!

6 Tips To Start Your Winter Bulk Off Right

It’s no secret that it’s almost impossible to gain muscle while also staying lean at the same time. The fact of the matter is that if you want to gain a large amount of muscle, you must eat at a caloric surplus. In other words, you won’t be gaining large amounts of muscle without putting on a little bit of body fat.

This is why a lot of guys go through the bulking and cutting cycles. What they do is they eat large amounts of food while putting on some serious mass, which is the bulking component, for 4-6 months, sometimes longer. Then, around February or March, they go through a cutting cycle, where they eat less so that they slim down.

Each one has pros and cons. Bulking cycles get you really big, but you’re not as shredded. Cutting cycles get you looking lean, with a six pack, but you lose some muscle in return. Regardless, if you go through a bulking cycle and then decide to cut, you’ll still retain a lot of muscle mass.

This is why most guys opt to bulk during the winter—since you aren’t at the beach, being super lean won’t matter much anyway. Then, come February, they start a cutting cycle, and get down to around 8% body fat to look good during the summer.

So, with this in mind, here’s some tips to do your winter bulk the right way.

1. Break Your PR’s

Now is the time to go all out, gentlemen. It's very difficult to break personal records on a cutting cycle, for the simple reason that you're in a caloric deficit. When you're in a caloric deficit, your body relies on breaking down fat for energy, which is fairly inefficient.

When you're bulking, however, you don't have to worry about this—you can stuff your face prior to lifting (assuming it's with healthy, high quality food), and go all out. That's why this is the time to break your deadlift, bench press, squat, and overhead press records.

To do this, I recommend using gym gear—and no, not that type of gear. I'm talking about the straps, belts, and wraps. Using gym gear is one of the most effective ways to break your PR's. Hell, my deadlift went up a whopping 25% just from using a belt and some straps.

2. Don't Workout Abs

I know that a lot of guys might disagree with me here, but it’s the truth. There’s no point in working out your abs unless you’re going to be sub-10% bodyfat.

There’s an old bodybuilding saying that goes something like this: “Abs are made in the kitchen, not in the gym,” and I wholeheartedly agree. If you’re not on a cutting diet, your abs aren’t going to show. Period. So why bother working them out?

“But won’t my abs get weak, Jon?” I can hear someone ask. No, they won’t. As long as you’re doing powerlifting exercises such as deadlifts and squats, you won’t need to worry about your abs atrophying.

See, when you do very heavy compound lifts, your abs act as an auxiliary muscle. In other words, they have to clench up tightly to support the enormous weight that you’re lifting. This in and of itself is enough to get a six pack if you have very low bodyfat. If you do this all winter, and then just throw in some ab exercises in April or May, you’ll be totally good to go.

3. Use Mass-Gaining Shakes

I want to be clear: you don't need supplements. I've said it once, and I'll say it again. You do not need supplements. The bulk of your diet should be comprised of complex carbohydrates such as oatmeal, sweet potatoes and rice, healthy fats such as olive oil and nuts, and quality proteins such as chicken breast, salmon, and grass-fed steak.

That being said, if you want to supplement your diet with, you guessed it, supplements, it will allow you to get that extra edge.

Using high quality whey protein is a phenomenal way to add in an extra 50 grams of protein a day, in addition to giving your muscles the well-deserved nutrients that they need.

I personally always use a whey protein shake with two bananas after my workouts. Bananas are high in potassium, which alleviates any muscle cramping I may have, and they're fast digesting glucose. Whey protein is very quickly assimilated into the muscles, so it gets your muscles out of a catabolic state (a state of breakdown) and puts them into an anabolic state (a state of recovery).

4. Start Early, End Early

A lot of guys make the mistake of waiting until November or December to start their winter bulk; don't do this. By the time that you start to actually put some weight on, it'll be time to cut, and you'll spend all of December and January freezing your ass off because you're 10% bodyfat.

Instead, I recommend that you start bulking up for winter NOW. This is what I'll be doing (once I finish physical therapy) and it's what I recommend you do, too. Then, around February or March, start shredding fat. Cut back on the calories, drink lots of water, use pre-workouts that give you extra energy and boost testosterone, hit the sauna, and consider practicing intermittent fasting.

If you do this, not only will you break tons of personal records and put on slabs of muscle all throughout the holidays, but you'll get lean and shredded just in time for beach season. And if you've ever done "beach game," when you have a six pack, you'll know it's like shooting fish in a barrel.

5. Get Plenty Of Sleep

For millions of years, winter was the season of sleeping. Our ancestors didn't have artificial lights to keep them awake, so they naturally went to bed earlier and slept longer with the increase in darkness.

Despite the fact that we've used technology to artificially extend daytime, our bodies still yearn to follow the seasons. Use the winter as a time of reflection, which is what I plan on doing. The winter season should be a time of personal development.

It should be a time for you to sleep an extra hour or two each night, a time of intense introspection, reading, and meditation. You should use the Winter months to not only grow your body, but to grow your mind. Then, come spring, new life shall begin—start sleeping less (although still get 8-9 hours a night), focus more on growing your business and game, and eat less hearty foods (save those for the winter).

6. Eat Hearty Winter Foods

As I said, winter is the best time to eat hearty foods. This season-long resting period will allow you to regain your strength so that you can hit it hard come spring and summer.

Spend lots of time learning to become a better cook, because Lord knows that most women nowadays certainly won't be of assistance in this area. Learn how to cook hearty meals, like thick, warm stews, with barley, oats, lamb chops, and vegetables.

Eat nice, warm vegetables like cooked squash, beets, onions, carrots, and cabbage. Eat fatty meats (my favorite) such as steaks, pork, wild caught salmon, and sardines in olive oil. Not only are the fats phenomenal for your testosterone levels, muscle-cell reparation, and brain-health, but they're also a great way to get in some extra calories for your winter bulk.

If you can't afford all of this, whether it's because you're a broke college student, or you spend all of your money on table service and hookers, don't worry, I've got you covered. Just follow my guide on How to Bulk Up When You're Broke as a Joke.

Why Are So Many Women Sluts?

Last week I tackled the question as to why so many women are leftists. This week I address an even more important question: Why are so many women sluts?

Today, it is not uncommon for a young woman to become sexually active in high school and continue through college and her early working years. Most of these relationships are short-lived—lots of men tend to move on after they have attained their goal—so it is not unusual for a modern girl to rack up some impressive numbers before she begins thinking about settling down. In other words, it is easy for modern girls to become sluts without even thinking about it.

But these women are not having sex by themselves. Aren't most men also promiscuous? Not according to the stats. Slutty women are not sleeping with all men—they are sleeping with the most desirable men—also known as the Chads. The less desirable men are getting very little action, if any at all.

Now, you might be thinking that there is a double standard. shouldn't men who sleep with lots of women also be called sluts? In a completely "fair" world the answer would be yes, but life is not fair. Our culture recognizes that there is something especially bad about loose women so the word "slut" almost always refers to a woman.

But what is so bad about a woman who gives it up easily? The answer has to do with biology. For a man, the price for having sex is very low. His investment consists of a few moments of thrusting. On the other hand, for women the price of having sex has been very, very high until recently. For women, sex can result in a pregnancy which means nearly ten months of being pregnant plus, in the premodern world, two years of nursing. If a woman chose to spread her legs for a man who was unwilling or unable to protect and provide, she literally endangered her own life and the life of her unborn child.

Over the course of tens of thousands of years, culture evolved to recognize the simple fact that vaginas carry a higher value than penises. One of the ways that society encouraged women to value themselves highly was by ostracizing women who didn't value themselves. Marriage itself evolved to support this situation. Women traded their sex during their high market value years in exchange for being cared for later.

Surprisingly, it was women who were mostly responsible for policing other women. Women viewed the loose woman as threat because she could steal husbands away. Loose women also decreased the sexual market value for all women—if a high quality man could get it cheaply elsewhere he would be less likely to commit or stay committed. Thus, women of the past cut promiscuous women off from the rest of society. One of the ways they did this was to call loose women by derogatory names like slut, hussy, tramp, or tart.

Nontraditional women who are angered by this article likely support Hillary–one of the biggest cad-enabling women in history.

By the way, there is a male analog to a female slut: a cad. While women policed sluts, men in traditional societies policed the cads. No man wanted a cad around his sister, wife, or daughter so known cads were kept out of honorable society, but never with the same fervor that women used against sluts. They didn't need to. Honorable women had little motivation to succumb to the cad.

The Pill

The institution of women discouraging other women from becoming sluts has fallen apart. The biggest reason for this has been the introduction of the birth control pill in the 1960s. The Pill made sex for women less expensive. For the first time in history, women could control their fertility. Now women could behave like men when it came to sex.

Predictably, as more women became more promiscuous, old cultural constructs started to go away. The institution of women policing other women fell apart. How could a former slut call a younger woman a slut for doing the same thing she did while she was younger?

Unfortunately, other institutions that were related to the old biological order also started to suffer. As sex became easy to get outside of marriage, it lowered men's incentive to get married in the first place. And mothers who had ridden the carousel during their youth could not teach their daughters to be chaste so generations of girls now are being raised to regard their sexuality as something to be given away cheaply.

The Pill not only increased the number of sluts, it increased the number of cads. The cads of today are sometimes called PUAs. With women giving it up more easily, it was just a matter of time before men figured out almost scientific ways to cajole women to voluntarily drop their panties. PUAs get a bad rap from leftist women, but PUAs are not rapists. The women that they sleep with are giving it up willingly.

Pro Slut Propaganda

A second factor also coincided with the arrival of the Pill and that is that Hollywood and other forms of media started actively encouraging slutty behavior in women. Most of this was a result of the feminist push for equality. If men could sleep around with little disapproval, women should be afforded the same benefits.

An interesting Amazon review on Kevin MacDonald's Culture of Critique indicates how the general method for how this was done. This example is about fostering disrespect for parents, but you can be sure that portraying promiscuous behavior also gets the same treatment:

> As a former leftist Hollywood Jew (I wrote TV shows), I can say from personal experience that Prof. MacDonald is 100% correct in this book. The shows I worked on: Mary Tyler Moore Show, That Girl, & Love American Style, among others, were nothing more than Jewish tools (for the most part) to undermine the innocence of American WASP culture, ("Cultural Marxism" as Prof. MacDonald calls it).
> I became disturbed with the studio editorial "rule" that children should be portrayed as sassy and disrespectful towards their parents. A few times I presented a script to my editor (also a Jewish guy) in which I had the child character behaving politely and respectfully towards his parents. The editor changed the lines to make the child bratty/sassy and then told me "… that's the way it should be done from now on, unless I tell you otherwise". That's when I started to see that something else was going on besides just making TV shows. I could see the changes in American society resulting from all this TV propaganda. I eventually left writing and became a teacher.

If the review is genuine, Hollywood producers and writers actively undermine morals in the US. Today, the message that promiscuity is good—even empowering—is ubiquitous. Rather than being revered as it was in the past, young women are taught to regard virginity as an ugly liability that they should strive to lose at the first possible opportunity.

Conclusion

The Pill and the media are the biggest factors in creating our current culture which encourages women (and men) to be as promiscuous as possible. Yet, it has not been able to stamp out tens of thousands of years of evolution. Even today's modern woman doesn't want to be called a slut no matter how much they are told that it is a badge of honor and that is why the word continues to be so hated.

Unfortunately, barring a return of the patriarchy, we are going to have to live with this situation for a lot longer.

Talk Radio Host Michael Savage Is The Latest Casualty Of Leftist Censorship

September 29, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Popular talk radio host Michael Savage, whose nationalistic message of Borders, Language, and Culture surely chafes the elites' asses and their dreams of homogenizing the world into one mass of microchipped cattle, was suddenly taken off the air Monday. The incident happened when Savage, who holds degrees in medical botany and epidemiology was discussing the Parkinson's Disease drug Levodopa, and it's possible side effects on a twitchy and fainting Sick Hillary.

The incident taking Savage off the air nationwide was initially chalked up to ISDN problems, but it was strange that it came hours before the debates were scheduled to begin and Sick Hillary's campaign continues suppressing news about her checkered medical history.

Soon after making comments suggesting Hillary could have Parkinson's Disease, and attempting to start a scientific discussion about the symptoms we've seen the Demoncat candidate display as well as known side effects from Levodopa and other drugs, Savage was abruptly taken off the air on his biggest affiliate, WABC in New York City and replaced with two low-rated hosts who said they conducted a coup on him. Almost immediately following his removal from the airwaves in New York City, he was then taken off the air on an additional 400 affiliates around the nation and replaced with an older, recorded broadcast of The Savage Nation.

What makes this incident intriguing is that it's just another in a long, long line of convenient “accidents” that happen to the Clintons’ opposition. This certainly isn’t the first such incident, as a trail of “suicides” have been piling up behind the Clinton crime family for 30 years.

This program has been determined inappropriate to the narrative by Big Brother

Savage quickly fired off an email about the situation to the press, expressing the belief there was much more behind the incident than technical problems:

> Pure sabotage. No advance notice from me or my producers. Then ‘ISDN problems’ during my discussion of the side effects of Levodopa, used for treating Parkinson’s. Then the two fill-ins trying to sound informed and clever from WABC who have 40% lower ratings than me, boasting on air during my hours that they conducted a ‘coup’ by taking Savage off the air.

Savage has a weekly audience that reaches about 20 million people, making him one of the top rated talk radio hosts in the nation. He also has the largest talk show following online, with his show being the most popular amongst those who stream audio. His conservative opinions have often made him a lightning rod for criticism by Social Justice Warriors. Since he has often claimed to be “To the right of Rush and to the left of God” he would likely be one of the first targets in a campaign of censorship, one Matt Drudge has been sounding the alarm about.

Clinton clearly has serious medical issues, but the issue has been censored and even ridiculed by mainstream media, and there has clearly been a concerted effort by the media to suppress her sickliness. The press has routinely ridiculed those questioning Queen Hillary’s health, and even labeled them “healthers” for months before video of her fainting and collapsing surfaced, forcing the propagandists in the media to back off.

There have been other high-profile incidents of either direct or indirect censorship of this major campaign issue, Hillary’s Health, an issue Lester Dolt of NBC didn’t bring up at the debate only hours after Savage’s expose had “technical problems.”

Perhaps Savage is lucky he didn’t “commit suicide” as so many of the Clintons’ enemies do.

More Censorship Over Clinton's Health

Dr. Drew was booted from CNN shortly after questioning Hillary's health

Savage's possible censorship is not without precedent. Dr. Drew Pinsky was recently fired from CNN after questioning Hillary's health before video of her collapsing on at 9/11 memorial ceremonies surfaced. A source close to Dr. Drew told the press the producers of the show immediately started receiving strange phone calls after he Pinsky publicly questioned Hillary's health.

> First, they demanded he retract his comments, but he wouldn't… It was downright scary and creepy.

Beyond the well-documented Dr. Drew incident with CNN, The Huffington Post (led by a barely legal editorial team of post-pubescent, mostly white girls who claim to be the model of diversity – LOL) recently fired and banned journalist David Seaman for posting an opinion piece about Hillary's health, an article that was trending and was ranked #3 on the site when it was abruptly taken down only hours after it was posted.

Seaman, who is well experienced in online journalism said:

> Both of my articles have been pulled without notice of any kind, just completely deleted from the Internet, and both of those articles mentioned Hillary's health. I've filed hundreds of stories over the years as a journalist and I've never had anything like this happen….I've never experienced this. This is spooky, to me this is extremely spooky – I don't like it.

This article was scrubbed from PuffHo because it didn't conform to the narrative that Hillary is healthy as a spring chicken

These incidents may just be trial runs for what's to come when true censorship disguised as "Net Neutrality" clamps down on free speech. The power structure is desperate to regain control of the narrative they lost when the Internet supplanted the centralized communication model that ruled the world for 50 years—one focused on radio and television. Fred Campbell president of the Center for Boundless Innovation in Technology explains how such legislation will put the government's deadly hands around the Internet's throat.

> This possibility raises the risk that Congress or the FCC could impose restrictions on Internet video and other services that have traditionally been imposed on over the air broadcasting and cable television, including the fairness doctrine that once put the government in charge of determining whether broadcasters were fairly representing both sides of an issue.

The web site Catholic Online said the move of censoring Savage could have been part of coming censorship of radio talk shows and other right-leaning media warned about by such prominent figures as Matt Drudge. The web site wrote:

> When private firms are not censoring content by deleting it or pulling the plugs, they're using soft censorship. For example, YouTube will not monetize content that contains material they don't like. Neither will many other advertisers. The lack of monetization discourages news outlets from covering such topics. Other forms of soft censorship include inflating non-issues and celebrities to flood the news cycle with hype and fluff. These serve as distractions while the real news stories of the day are either glossed over or ignored.

It is becoming clear the elite will do anything to regain control over our speech. The specter of censorship over Hillary's health issues reveal just how connected the Clintons are, and how stupid the elite believe we plebeians are. Perhaps Savage is lucky he hasn't had "a heart attack" like Andrew Breitbart did. (P.S. The government has had an untraceable heart attack gun since the 1970s. Andrew Breitbart was threatening to drop a huge story about the establishment days before he died.)

One day, we may go to tune in to our favorite radio show or call up our favorite web site and find it isn't there anymore. Just as the Soviet Union moved to silence dissidents during its reign of terror, the United States is now moving so silence dissent of its unfolding socialist New World Order. Hillary has obviously been selected to be the representative of this cabal by a government within the government, and those who cross her do so at their own professional, and personal risk.

Are Smart Drugs For Cheaters? How To Get Ahead In Life And Make Every Day A Productive Day

September 29, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Limitless Brain

Some people will say that nootropics are for cheaters. These are the same people who always finish last.

The guys at the top take whatever they can to always be performing at their best, so why shouldn't you? All nootropics are really doing is making the most of what you already have.

For those who are unaware, nootropics are a class of supplements that work by enhancing the brain. They have powerful effects on the key neurotransmitters and neurons that are responsible for our focus, energy levels, concentration, motivation, memory, learning ability, social skills, & much more.

The Creative People Get Ahead In Life

Whether in the corporate world, the entrepreneurial sphere or virtually anywhere else…

Competition is brutal and everyone is trying to get ahead.

In the modern world, the creative people are the ones who get ahead. If you want to get rich and be successful in life, you need to do whatever it takes to always be performing at your best. With nootropics, you can improve your focus, energy, memory, and cognitive output on demand.

Why have off days when you can always be performing at your best?

No matter what your day-to-day is like, nootropics can make a big difference in your life.

If you don’t have the energy to succeed, you won’t succeed

No matter how intelligent you are, if you don’t have energy, you won’t get too far in life. Even on my good days, I will eventually burn out.

One great thing about well-designed nootropic formulas is their combination of cognitive enhancing and energy enhancing ingredients.

By unlocking your brain's full potential and then giving you the energy to act on that potential, nootropics can truly turn your life around.

Smart Drugs Can Help You Reach Your Potential

I'll be honest, I was skeptical when I first began experimenting with nootropics. However, I noticed the benefits instantly and realized that before nootropics, I just wasn't performing at my best.

Don't get me wrong, I would still have great days.

But sometimes I would wake up, and my energy, my mood, and my focus just weren't where I wanted them to be.

Nootropics really opened my eyes, and my mind, and allowed my best days to be my everyday.

Are Nootropics Addictive?

If you've been to college or university or have been around anyone who has, you've probably heard the buzz around some of the ADHD medications that currently exist.

While some people do require these medications, many people are taking them illegally to get their edge.

The major difference between prescription medications and natural nootropic formulas is tolerance and addiction. Great nootropic formulas won't require you to constantly increase your dose nor will they be habit forming.

Instead of abusing illegal substances and slowly destroying your body, be smart and take a natural approach to cognitive enhancement.

Should I use nootropics?

Whatever your goals are, nootropics can likely help you. They've been well documented over the years to provide the benefits that are required to be successful in high-pressure pursuits.

For the readers of ROK, using a high-quality nootropic formula can help you build your own business and live life on your own terms. A lot of guys have also found them to be good for increasing energy and sociability.

Where can I find a good nootropic formula?

Many newcomers to nootropics end up trying everything they can to see what works best. This isn't only costly, but ultimately inefficient.

There is also the problem of buying products from a company that isn't transparent with their formula.

One of the major problems in the supplement industry is when companies create products and call their formula a "blend." This is basically short for, "We put a small amount of these big name ingredients and a lot of fillers." Many new nootropic companies are also creating formulas with just 1-3 ingredients.

This leaves minimal room for synergy between the formula and often packs a weak punch. Quit buying sawdust capsules and start buying a product that works.

A much smarter and more cost effective way to get the most out of nootropics is to buy a high-quality formula that is fully transparent with its ingredients and ultimately is a product THAT ACTUALLY WORKS!

LIMITLESS BRAIN: Buy The Premium Nootropic Formula & Maximize Your Productivity

We've been using nootropics for a long time. Long enough to know what works, what doesn't, and how to get the best bang for you buck with this incredible class of supplements.

We've spent a ton of money trying out different ingredients and combining them until we finally created our own custom formulation. We used it for a while and had a ton of success with it… and then we decided to make it available to the public.

It was a great decision, and we're happy to tell you about it today.

Our premium formula is called LIMITLESS BRAIN, and it contains the 8 most powerful & synergized nootropic compounds.

It's made in the United States, in an FDA registered fully compliant facility. It's also all natural.

It's safe, it's cheaper than your daily coffee habit, and most importantly – IT ACTUALLY WORKS.

If you're worried about being a 'cheater' – Who really cares. Give yourself an enormous advantage now with nootropics. The guys at the top already are.

Nootropics are the future of human performance enhancement, and LIMITLESS BRAIN is the gold standard.

Brad Pitt And Angelina Jolie's Daughter Is A Sad Casualty Of Disastrous Liberal Parenting

After 12 years of a highly advertised marriage, the Hollywood actors Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt are divorcing. The news is all over the tabloids and the press people specialized in celebrities are feasting around the spectacle. Return Of Kings not being at the service of the vacuous characters who keep the entertainment show running, I won't dwell much on what is already making the headlines, but would like to take the opportunity to focus on someone close from the case: Shiloh Jolie-Pitt, 10, whose appearances on the news reveal a rather disturbing relationship with her parents and especially her mother.

The first-born biological child of the Brangelina couple, Shiloh came after three adopted ones: Maddox, Pax Thien, and Zahara, the first two being Asian and the latter African. Like her parents, Shilol was light-skinned, and she showed a delicate blond complexion as well as blue eyes. A normal mother would have rejoiced to give birth to a child. But Jolie, quite jaded after her well-trumpeted adoptions, commented the matter differently:

> It's funny because [Shiloh's] almost going to be the outcast in the family because she's blonde and blue-eyed. I felt so much more for Madd, Zahara and Pax because they were survivors, they came through so much. Shiloh seemed so privileged from the moment she was born. I have less inclination to feel for her… I met my other kids when they were 6 months old, they came with a personality. A newborn really is this … Yes, a blob!

Aside from the fact that Jolie spoke about her adopted children as "coming with" personalities as if she was talking about dolls endowed with or without specific options, i.e. rather as objects than as human beings, notice the total absence of love and consideration she had for their own daughter.

Because of her physical type, Shiloh would be turned into the “outcast” of her family—if we can call this set of narcissistic champagne liberals and ego-gratificating children of various origins a “family” at all—and Jolie finds it “funny.” Does she feel any of the innate empathy a mother feels to her progeny? It seems not, and this mindset cuts at the root of the careful, nurturing nature academic leftists profess to deconstruct. Keep destroying nature indeed, keep destroying what you want to see as “social constructions,” you are destroying the very essence of meaningful and minimally satisfying relationships between related human beings.

Though likely having a high opinion of herself, Jolie won’t belove so easily what comes from her own womb. Her daughter seems “boring” to her, to the point of being akin to a “blob.” Here we see a bizarre, repulsive mix between the liberal redefinition of the family, where the traditional nuclear family cannot be recognized anymore, and a narcissistic, consumerist mindset straight from Hollywood: the adopted children are “cool” because they come with a seemingly supplement of soul, this being closely related to coming from an elsewhere deemed always cooler and better than regular European identity, and because they already have some exotic features Jolie can play the doll with, whereas Shiloh is all too familiar and bears the sins of the Leftist re-engineered White identity.

Is Shiloh “privileged” at all? If we only look at her parents’ wealth, of course she is. But if we look deeper than this particular factor, I wouldn’t describe her as such. Growing up as an “outcast” from one’s own family, torn apart by the massive presence of adopted children and by an utter carelessness and coldness from who should be the closest parent; getting despised and unloved by one’s own mother; that does not exactly sound like privilege. Rather, that is emotional abuse—or at least bemused neglect. And though the Jolie’s “blob” thing made the headlines of a scandal-hungry people press, I cannot remember any legal investigation on her rather strange relationship with her daughter.

Eventually, Shiloh grew up and, in 2008, four years only after she was born, Jolie complacently told the media the daughter “felt” to be a boy and wanted to be called John. In 2010, the same claims were repeated to Vanity Fair. In 2016, as Europe was (and still is) under invasion by a heavy tide of non-whites, the now 9 year-old girl was shown to the media sporting a pop pro-“refugee” t-shirt under the lenient eye of journalists celebrating how the child was as politically “involved” as her mother.

It is clear that both of these manifestations come from the parents. A child that age does not have neither the necessary maturity, nor the emotional autonomy from her parents to choose such things by herself, especially when said things are heavily promoted by the social milieu her parents belong to. (Slightly off-topic: it is bewildering to see that, after having promoted a blank slate view of children as to negate the relevance of genetics, leftists seem to have changed their stand and now believe that children can be autonomously “queer” or SJWs, regardless of their parents’ and of the mainstream discourse on the matter.)

In said case, Shiloh’s public endorsements are but a reflection of the champagne liberal fashions, and they were lavishly promoted by Jolie—where was Pitt?—exactly because of this. It seems like the daughter must endorse fashionable identities and live up to her mother's whims as to have a place in the family.

Is Shiloh happy pretending to be a boy in a girl's body? If she ended up rejecting that constrained, against-nature identity, would she still be loved or rather promoted at all by her mother? Beyond her androgynous clothes and haircut, notice her vibe: that of a sad child, who seems to live for the image she communicates rather than for her own sake. Engineered androgyny is definitely grim, no matter the billions of dollars wasted to craft the appearance of the opposite. As for the refugees thing, it seems like Shiloh never knew what a normal home is, just as many young Europeans did never know what a healthy, peaceful and homogeneous society was.

Indeed, the story of Shiloh, an unloved daughter who had to absorb a trans identity at four years old—do liberals have any respect at all for small infancy?—and get exposed daily to the media beast, let alone the more superficial Leftist causes Jolie bestowed on her later, is loaded with metapolitical significance. Without knowing it (yet?), this infant is a symbol, as well as her neglecting parents. Angelina Jolie, a baby-boomer of European descent busy jet-setting and appearing here and there in a never-ending trail of big bucks and narcissism, has a daughter she neglects and feels nothing for, precisely because said daughter is of her own blood.

Though Shiloh may live in a materially privileged environment, she seems to be mostly raised by a capricious mother who on her own avowals favours adopted children precisely because they are from The Big Elsewhere, barely has any dignity besides the ephemeral and artificial identities her mother wants her to carry with, lives in the eyes of predatory media without much intimacy, and may inherit nothing but a botched life of neglect and abuse and a world of disorder where wealth, moral dignity and public attention are misdirected on a bunch of adopted.

We should definitely investigate on how militant liberals, whether high-profile or not, raise their children: I am willing to bet we would find other examples of disastrous parentings hidden and partly caused by the Leftists' belief about what they call "white privilege."

His mother, who has chosen to stay anonymous, posted an incredible public shaming of her son's poorly chosen Facebook post

Aside from liberal-led households, Shiloh's case bears analogy with what a lot of millennials and so-called Z generation children have been going through. On the surface, she seems to come from a privileged upbringing, but beneath, things are sad and dark. How many young men have been silenced and shamed by pervasive leftist norms, despised by women, trained to be nice only to find this would lead them nowhere at all, deprived of a job thanks to offshoring and "affirmative action," more or less forced to endorse leftist causes as to exist into the bourgeois bohemian city centers, and deprived of hope into the countries of their ancestors turning impersonal and discouraging?

Somehow, we are the progressives' abandoned children, and Shiloh Jolie-Pitt's story is a prime example of this phenomena.

To conclude on a positive note, I would like to highlight the fact that no one, even born with a vagina and from very wealthy parents, is sure to escape the left's insidious violence. If Shiloh does not destroy herself through binge-drinking, drug abuse or risky behaviour, as star children often end up doing, she may find out she has no reason to keep living into a golden prison of false pretenses and emotional coldness. In other words, she might take the red pill, abandon her sham of a "family," and become one of us.

Who knows if a red-pilled Z man won't marry her and turn her into a beautiful housewife? If neomasculinity wins, and it sure can, there is hope. Per aspera ad astra.

US Judge Has Decreed “Non-Binary” As A Legitimate Third Sex

September 30, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

A female judge in a county court in Oregon has officially decreed that in 4,000 years of modern advancement, we failed to realize that besides man and woman, there is also a third category of transdoodle known as “non-binary.” Setting aside the fact that “non-binary” is a “non-answer” to the question “What sex are you?” (In the same way one cannot answer Are you pregnant? with “I’m non-binary.”) and indeed “attack helicopter” or “transdoodle” would be better choices than “non-binary,” this is a legal first.

While most rational people could laugh and chuckle as Tumblrinas and Facebook addicts changed the virtual world to reflect their fantasy that there are not two sexes of human (how many sexes of dog are there, by the way?), suddenly the ravings of the mentally ill mob have become a matter of law and public policy.

What?!?

Similar to the manner in which a person may legally change their name by filing paperwork with the court, a person can now legally change their sex from male or female to “non-binary” in Oregon and California (more states to follow soon). A 52-year-old female lesbian army retiree, Jamie Shupe, decided 3 years ago that despite likely being in menopause already, she wanted to be a man. Let all that sink in for a moment.

Well, she DOES have a point…

I'm "The Man" In The Relationship

Jaime has a female spouse of 27 years, and has refused surgery to make herself more masculine, so from what I can surmise, she is the bull-dyke butch of the relationship, and so why not just call herself a man. After all, Bruce Jenner is a brave and stunning woman, right? The Army resisted calling her a man unless she had surgery to change her sex, which, if there is any such thing as a rational position in the transgender arena, seems to be the only reasonable one. But Jaime refused the surgery. All of the benefits with none of the risk, right?

Relinquishing The Pussy Pass?

We know that 25% of women are mentally ill, and I'll throw all the cash in my wallet in the pot and bet that both Jaime and her spouse fall into this category. She is not getting a penis. She likely is in menopause already. So she wants to be a dickless man that scissors with his wife? And on top of that wants to give up the all powerful pussy pass that she currently has? That sounds certainly insane.

Government Rules

In order to obtain a driver's license, passport, credit card, or variety of other documents, one must select either male or female. There is simply no other option, and no other option is available to be displayed on the document. Anyway, if gender is something one can "choose," then it's entirely pointless to put down on an identification card in the first place. What's the point in categorizing me as "male" when I can later choose to feel female? The category loses any value to the issuing agency.

Furthermore there different obligations and benefits based on one's sex: Males must register for the military draft. Women can label sex "rape" or consensual based on their feelings, even after the fact. Women have an array of government benefits designated just for them (WIC, special women's training, housing, and education plans). Women benefit from government hiring quotas. Women have the right to alimony and child support payments, and are granted default parenthood in the case of divorce. Females have special rights after childbirth (remind me to identify as female right after my wife gives birth, for some extra vacation time). Women hold the all-powerful pussy pass.

What will happen to all these differences if one is "non-binary?" Does one lose the rights and obligations of both men and women? Will non-binary people be granted their own special set of rights and obligations, with government programs and departments created just to serve their needs? Nepal and Australia have already issued "X" passports which are for special snowflakes that will die virgins.

Slippery Slope Argument Was True

Non-binary Oktoberfest

I never cared about gay issues, and thought, hey, if someone is gay, they have a rough life. Why not let them get married, and have parades if that makes them happy. I laughed at the old codgers who said this would lead to people lopping their dicks off or having sex with children or animals. Indeed, child sex is entering the arena of progressive causes that feminists adopt, and when no straight man is left on earth that wants to fornicate with them, I suppose they will turn to animal sex to satisfy their urges.

In retrospect, social change is not something that should be radically or quickly altered. Change is fine, but it must be adopted slowly, with much discussion, debate, consideration, and preparation. It should be tested and analyzed and carefully considered before it changes the very fabric of society. Our ancestors risked their lives, fortunes, and families in order to build and preserve a strong society with organized rules and moral standards. We are wiping away centuries of progress in mere months.

Looking back at the changes of the past 15 years, I shudder to think what the world will look like in even 5 more years. I cannot fathom what another 15 will look like. On the bright side, the government will now have a database identifying of all these freaks.

What Would Happen If Hillary Clinton Wins?

September 30, 2016 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Although I predicted a Donald Trump victory last fall, and my confidence in this outcome is higher now than ever, we must still prepare for the worst. As he himself mentions in The Art of the Deal, "prepare for the downsides and the upsides will take care of themselves." A Hillary Clinton victory is still a big possibility and still the favored outcome on paper. We must therefore manage our expectations. If the worst were to happen, how bad would it be, and what can be done to survive and thrive?

While a Hillary Clinton presidency represents several unmitigated disasters that must be avoided at all costs, there are still, in my opinion at least, a few surprising silver linings that enterprising men can take advantage of, as disaster has always provided opportunities to those who saw them.

Gridlock

Whoever wins this election will be the most unpopular person ever elected President. This will make it very difficult for that person to govern. However, unlike Donald Trump, Hillary Clinton has no charisma. The result will be a regime that is deeply unpopular and distrusted, and will remain that way.

While Donald Trump may be able to use his powers of persuasion effectively, Hillary Clinton has no such powers. The media will certainly be on her side, but the media is already overwhelmingly distrusted and declining in influence rapidly. The proof is in the money. "Journalists" barely sell books, and Hillary Clinton couldn't even sell 3,000 in its launch week. For a presidential candidate of a major party with a united establishment behind her, this is utterly embarrassing.

Time and again, the pattern has been: the more the public sees of Hillary, the more it dislikes her. Truthfully, there's no better symbol to discredit the establishment than Hillary Clinton, whose incompetence, corruption, and lack of charisma and persuasive abilities will be symbolic of its moral and intellectual bankruptcy.

As people look for alternatives, whether in politics or in their personal lives, opportunities will open, and there's no better symbol to stage a contrast with than Hillary Clinton (a face is always the best thing to attach a thought to, as per Scott Adams, and her face is guaranteed to generate strong emotions).

Supreme Court

Regardless of how unpopular she is, Hillary Clinton, if elected, could end up filling two or three vacancies if some older liberal justices decide to time their retirement for the occasion. This will likely permanently realign the court and make it a rubber stamp for any "social justice" endeavor that the regressive left wants to pass.

"Social Justice" Culture Will Get Worse

Men, especially on college campuses, will have to take special heed. It may become necessary to record all interactions with women if, as seems possible, the "misogyny" pilot program underway in the UK expands. This is especially so if "misogyny" becomes paired with the increasingly nebulous concept of "harassment" (all words engineered to shut down critical thinking and operate on confirmation bias).

Black Lives Matter will increase in power. Violence against dissenters will become more open and encouraged through selective enforcement. Islam will continue to demographically expand through accelerated "refugee" resettlement. More terrorist attacks in the US and Europe are certain, and the creep of Islam in mainstream culture will accelerate.

Decrees mandating the increased presence of "social justice" related initiatives in college, at the workplace, and in your neighborhood could well be passed. It's possible that cuckolding culture will take off, with media blitzes about how "progressive" and "not sexist" it is. What better way to control your "toxic masculinity" (and to promote female desires at the expense of men)?

However…

Hillary Isn’t Effective

Aside from his charisma and persuasive abilities, the reason Barack Obama was so successful in selling his “fundamental transformation of America” was because he was almost a blank slate. He arrived with such meteoric velocity that he was more myth than man. Comparatively little was known about him. In four years, he went from obscure Illinois lawmaker to President-Elect. People could fill in the blanks with whatever they wanted to.

Hillary Clinton lacks this too. Everyone’s known her for decades. Her image can’t change. Young regressives voted overwhelmingly against her in the primaries and her lead among Millennials is dismal at best. Even Bernie Sanders, who drew massive crowds, barely drew 200 for Hillary. Millennial turnout will likely drop with black turnout. It’s hard to get excited about Hillary. Her reputation is just as negative among Millennials as everyone else. What’s Hillary running on? What’s the aspiration she’s selling?

There are many indications that there’s such little excitement for Hillary that even if she were to win, she would be a terrible salesperson for the regressives. They don’t like her and her ability to rally them is doubtful.

The spread of social movements isn’t only related to their truthfulness, but often with the status they convey on adherents. Accusing someone of witchcraft centuries ago was a way to decrease the status of the accused and increase that of the accuser by showing his or her piety to the prevailing orthodoxy. It’s no different now when someone is accused of whatever label that regressives like.

Barack Obama had a “coolness” factor allowing him to elevate the regressive left in power and status, from which it could look down on benighted souls that dared to dissent. Hillary lacks much of this. She may promote the regressive left and will work on its behalf, but it’s far from certain that she’ll continue to make it “cool.” It is instead possible that regressives will lose status because of her sheer incompetence and terrible salesmanship.

In the meantime, the counter culture that we’re part of will grow because of the lame symbol that is Hillary Clinton. It is to this counter culture that you can position your enterprising efforts, and I’m hedged in that way because one of my projects will be more relevant if Hillary wins.

So while Hillary Clinton will legally strengthen the regressives, it’s far from certain that she will add cultural force to them. She may in fact wind up weakening them with her lame and incompetent administration.

Warhawk Resurgence

The biggest danger Hillary Clinton poses is that she’s never seen a war she hasn’t liked. Hillary has repeatedly called for a no fly zone over Syria, which would mean shooting down Russian aircraft. Moscow considers her an existential threat, and she reportedly believes that Putin would “back down.”

In truth, the Syrian conflict is probably more dangerous than anything in the Cold War. You have two sides armed by opposing powers in conflict with one another, and aircraft from those major powers flying sorties in the same narrow airspace. This is not something I want Hillary Clinton, a warmonger and an incompetent one, anywhere near.

There’s a reason why the GOP’s neocons have lined up behind Hillary. If she wins, we can at the very least expect continued destabilization of the Middle East and possibly other areas, which means even more “refugees” imported into the West and an increased risk of terrorism.

Conclusion

A Hillary Clinton presidency must be avoided at all costs. It’s vital for every ROK reader who is eligible to vote to turn out. This year’s “gender gap” is a reversal of the norm—Hillary Clinton is having deep trouble with men. It may just be men like you and I that decide things.

But if there is a silver lining to the worst case scenario, it may be that Hillary’s total lack of persuasive ability and her thoroughly corrupt reputation shred whatever credibility the establishment has left. By any reasonable measure her presidency would be a disaster, but in disaster lies opportunity. Perhaps this is being overly optimistic, and I understand that sentiment. But as Scott Adams remarks, you can interpret almost anything as good or bad news, so I try to find what good I can.

14 Self-Defense Tools To Use Where Weapons Are Banned

With the growing presence of angry leftist mobs in any large Western city, as many of my colleagues at ROK pointed out, security becomes more and more of a concern. Luke Stranahan's recent advice is an important piece on how to use a gun to defend yourself against violent organisations such as Black Lives Matter.

It boils down to the advice: be aware, be armed and shoot first. The only issue is that with the growing leftist sentiment around the Western sphere, many of our readers live in areas like Western Europe (or in American leftist spots like New Jersey or California and their strict gun laws), where guns are outright banned and so is any kind of object perceived as a weapon.

You might get in more trouble for carrying something to defend yourself than punching someone into unconsciousness in the street. So goodbye knifes, tasers, machetes, sword canes, whips, kitchen knifes and other expandable batons.

But if we must not fall in the survivalist paranoia, any man has the right to defend himself, even more so if outnumbered. Knowing the context, we must avoid the items with blades as they directly classify as a weapon and therefore include harsher treatment by the law if prosecuted.

1. Screwdriver or hammer

The important part here is the legal status of both weapons as they are both common trade tools. If you are searched, you can explain that you enjoy DIY (as in a lot of places, you can carry them under a “valid motive”). If you don’t look like trouble, the worst that could happen would be to see your tool confiscated.

The screwdriver would have the advantage of being lethal even if it is quite small. A problem that can’t be solved with the hammer as the stopping power and the fear it inspires depends of its size.

The hammer is also lethal but enjoys a much more sinister reputation from all the portrayals in Hollywood horror movies. Law enforcement would be immediately more suspicious towards you.

2. Box cutter

Quite an effective blade as the lacerations inflicted will be deep and make the attacker bleed profusely or slice an artery, but stabbing wounds are unlikely as the blade is very thin and would likely snap on impact.

Proof it works: it is the first thing that all the migrants buy in any shop around Europe when they arrive. I did a test in Berlin recently going in a few hardware stores and supermarkets. It is practically impossible to find them as Soros’ minions have already bought them all. It has a bad image in Europe as it is the thug’s weapon of choice. It would be extremely hard to explain why you carry a box cutter if you don’t work at the local arts and crafts shop.

3. Metal pipe turned into a flute

Had this idea last year, as I wanted recreate a Bulgarian flute called a “kaval.” I find the melody sad and beautiful, even better when the instrument is made of steel (it is traditionally made of wood).

A metal pipe is a simple, reliable and weapon that allows you to strike from far, either in a circular motion or in a thrust like with a spear.

I was practicing outside and realised that if any trouble came to me, this stupid pipe with holes could safe my life. And it cost me the equivalent of a whole four dollars.

4. Self-defense keychain

It has the advantage of being legal but has to be deprived of sharpened edges. The only issue is that it often comes in the form of a pitbull or a kitten.

A better option

Easy to carry and to reach, the defensive key ring comes handy when the aggressors are after your money and think that you will give them your wallet by reaching in your pocket.

5. Monkey fist

Probably one of my favourite of all this list, as it is extremely effective and has a simple design. It is easier to reach than one’s belt and less obvious. There are tutorials for monkey fists everywhere on the Internet.

For maximum efficiency, it would be better to use a steel ball or a marble for the core. The most common way to make it is to use a bit of parachord and a ball from a ball bearing. It uses the same circular motion as a medieval flail. It can easily crack a skull or break bone as demonstrated below

6. Belt or belt chain

It takes too long to take it out of one’s pants, is obvious and an advancing attacker can grab it and counter attack. It is a last resort weapon to use only if nothing else is available.

The iron buckle can break and will only make the attacker angrier if the victim does not hurt him seriously. Same for biker whips and chains attached to the pockets like skinheads and punks used to wear, it takes too long to unhook.

“If there is a knife and you have none. You shoot or you run”. Look at this clown. :

A stealthy alternative to this type of defensive clothing would be the sap cap, a weaponised baseball cap ballasted with a lead disc. Undetectable, effective and fast. The only problem is how it is seen by the laws of your respective country.

7. Kubotan (pocket stick)

The pocket stick is easy to carry, cheap and can also be homemade. It can hardly be seen as a weapon, especially if its appearance is quite plain. It can easily fit on a key ring. The problem is the short range and one must be accurate during the strike as it is mainly designed to hit the soft areas of the body like the stomach, groin, neck or face.

A perfectly legal alternative would be its cousin, the tactical pen.

8. Electric torch

Ideally, it would be very sturdy and roughly as long as a hand. It is also extremely useful even for any other occupation than self defense. It fits on a key ring and a torch with a high number of lumens can blind a person even in broad daylight.

A heavy and large torch would not be easy to carry in addition of slowing you down. A small electric torch like this one could have saved the people in the Orlando club shooting.

9. Sling

The great perk of the sling is that it is extremely cheap and easy to make and when it is in its finished form, it is just an inert, harmless rope. The main issues would be to carry around enough projectiles and not staying too static if attacked. Plus the trouble in which you can get if you cannot get rid of your projectiles fast enough, plus the association of the two elements that makes it a weapon.

Second problem would be accuracy (the most accurate sling practitioner usually hits a competitive target (the size of a head at 25 metres) about once out of four shots. No mistake, the shot will be lethal if it hits a vital as the crack heard when the sling is used is when it almost breaks the sound barrier.

10. Socket spanner

Fairly cheap and common, the socket spanner would be a better choice than an usual spanner and lighter to use as it is hollow. It is absolutely legal to carry one anywhere. You can always pretend you are a mechanics enthusiast if searched by law enforcement.

11. Stone

If it sounds stupid but it works, it is not stupid. Do not forget that It was also the weapon used during the first murder stipulated in the Bible and was also probably the same in human history. A stone fits also easily in a pocket and has the advantage of behind found everywhere for free.

12. Millwall brick

Made popular by the hooligan firms of the eponymous London Borough, the Millwall brick is a tightly-rolled newspaper folded in two. Cheap as dirt and can be made heavier with a few pebbles or pennies at the end of it. With this, hooligans were still entering the stadiums, even after being searched, and still able to seriously hurt the rival firm.

The following video's hosts are two fruitcakes but the explanations are quite clear.

13. Umbrella

It is an innocent relative to the illegal sword cane or the suspicious cane if you are under seventy (although a crutch could fool a police officer). In addition to the fact that you are not a gentle sir tipping hats to any M'lady passing by.

You have M’sword cane, M’lady!

A solid umbrella with a wooden handle and a metallic tip can seriously hurt.

There was an actual XIXth century European fighting style based on wielding an umbrella when swords and sword canes became illegal to carry on the streets.

14. Bonus: Slash resistant shirt

I heard about them a while ago during the knife carrying epidemic that spread around the UK when I was leaving there. Panicked parents at school were buying slash resistant uniforms for their kids in the rough areas.

The guys who created them quickly made a lot of money, capitalizing on the fear of the parents for their children. The idea was genius as the clothes look plain and give you a second chance if struck by a sharp object. It is legal everywhere and light, but can get a bit pricey.

Frappe le premier et frappe fort

But here lays the eternal question: is it worthy to carry a knife, in the unlikely event of an aggression and get in serious trouble with the local law if searched or opt for a weapon not as lethal and risk serious harm by not packing enough power?

For our readers in the USA and especially confronted to domestic terrorist groups and violent mobs such as BLM, I would back all heartedly my colleague Mr. Stranahan's advice, in addition of proposing a secondary weapon: the bull whip or a bit more exotic, the sjambok, which used to be the weapon of choice of the South African Police. Hippo hide, guaranteed quality and efficiency.

Its imagery and heavy historical past would make any leftist, whichever his colour, think twice before charging someone wielding one. It would make any self-hating white break in tears and curl into an apologetic ball.

NOTE: ROK does not advocate violence. Self defense is a right when in danger. Consult your local legal adviser regarding your rights on carrying means to defend yourself.

4 Reasons Donald Trump Will Win The Presidential Election Of 2016

October 1, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

The elite-controlled media has been doing their best to use social proof against Trump. Everywhere you look, you'd think that the whole nation hates Trump and thinks he's a bigot. Every major news station paints him as a fanatical, Hitler-esque, corrupt billionaire, in the hopes that he will lose the upcoming election. Despite this, however, Trump has claimed a massive following that is not only highly vocal in person, but that is also very social-media savvy.

Anyone who meets a lot of people on a regular basis can tell that Trump is winning, and at the very least, tying with Hillary. The media has tried its best to skew polls and manipulate sample sizes, but despite this, Trump has been leading nationally in several polls.

It seems that no matter how hard the elites try, they cannot stop the overwhelming support for Trump from shining through. Here's why.

1. Men Are Starting To Wake Up

Over the past decade, more and more men all across the Western world have started to wake up. A growing number of men has started to realize that all of our politicians are corrupt, our rights are slowly being eroded, and our hyper-feminine, overly-PC culture prevents us from expressing our masculinity.

There's a number of catalysts for this awakening—some men have it forced upon them, after a terrible divorce or relationship. Some are exposed to the manosphere at a young age, leading to a more easy acceptance of the truth. Others are fed up with the system, and can now get news that's actually true via the alt-media.

Regardless of the cause, tens of thousands, if not millions of men all across the West have started to wake up—and it isn't just limited to the US, by the way. Men in great Britain, our motherland, woke up as was made so clear with Farage's piercing comments to the UN as well as his leadership which led to Brexit.

And here, in the US, we look around us and what do we see? An unprecedented number of mentally ill individuals, an economy decimated by years of irresponsible policies and handouts, an increasingly divided culture due to high immigration, and seemingly no chance to save it…until Trump. He is the antithesis of all that the left is: where the left panders to the childish demands of SJW's, Trump stands tall and laughs at them, as a father would laugh at a child trying to argue his way into power.

Where the left has attempted to destroy our economy with anti-business policies, ample welfare, and a high dose of bread and circus, Trump has declared: "No more!" and wishes to bring the jobs back with conservative fiscal policies.

And perhaps, most importantly, where the left has cucked our nation out to third world immigrants, Trump has declared that he will build a wall—an act that may very well be necessary to save our country.

Trump is the antithesis of all that the left is, and the men of America can see this; we're tired of effeminate, weak, spineless men who give into even the slightest social pressure. We want a strong, virtuous man to be our leader, and that's who Trump is.

2. Trump Tells It How It Is

In a world of political correctness, where politicians are forced to refer to mentally ill individuals as "feminists," and to call illegal immigrants "Americans," Trump is a breath of fresh air. He does not speak with fluff, he does not sprinkle truth onto a giant lie, he's just blunt.

The media, of course, tries to turn this into a weakness: "Oh, didn't you hear that Donald Trump said THIS?!" or "Oh didn't you hear that Donald Trump said this about that group of people?!" But, my previous point shows, men have woken up—and they can see past this.

Trump tells it how it is, without frills, and the left hates this. Do you recall when Trump said that Mexico is not sending us their best illegal immigrants? They're sending us crime, drugs, and rapists? Then, do you remember how the left skewed his words and claimed that he called every single Mexican a drug dealer and a rapist? This is the left's only strategy against him. Because he speaks the truth so clearly and overtly, their only strategy of attack is to simply lie about him.

It's difficult for me to even fathom how someone could disagree with Trump's statement. It's just a simple statistical fact that most illegal immigrants are either fugitives, drug dealers, or rapists—and they come here, because they know that our politicians will pander to them.

This is a simple fact, and should be stated simply, as Trump has done. This is just one example of his many blunt statements. Another might be this:

> You are going to approve one of the biggest tax increases in history. You are > going to drive business out. Your regulations are a disaster and you're going to increase regulations all over the place… You're going to regulate these businesses out of existence… I'm going to cut taxes big league and you're going to raise taxes big league, end of story.

This was, of course, in reference to Hillary's tax policies. Hillary spouts a whole bunch of feel-good nonsense without ever answering any of Lester's questions, and yet somehow the media completely twists this fact and claims that Trump is the one who did this. I believe that this quote clearly says otherwise.

Hillary is going to approve one of the biggest tax increases in history. This is true. She is going to drive businesses out. This is true. She's going to regulate business out of existence, and he's going to bring them back by cutting taxes… this is true.

Literally everything that Trump says is of the most obvious truth, yet somehow the left cannot even wrap their monkey-brains around it. So, like a child who stubbornly refuses to accept reality, they proclaim that Trump interrupted her, and that he's a misogynist.

3. Men Are Fed Up With Illegal Immigrants

For decades, the silent majority of men has loathed how easy it is for immigrants to enter into this country. An illegal immigrant jumps the border, and pops out a baby? Oh, what do you know! A new American! Give me a break—men are sick and tired of literally millions of unregistered, tax-leeching immigrants that refuse to assimilate.

Not to mention all of the crime they bring (which, again, Donald put so bluntly). Between 2008 and 2014, according to Breitbart News, illegal immigrants accounted for a whopping 38% of all murder convictions in California, Texas, Arizona, Florida, and New York, while they only accounted for 5.6% of the population in those states.

In addition to this, the Obama administration grossly under-reported the amount of crime that illegal immigrants committed in 2014. Again, according to Breitbart News, the Obama administration only reported 1/10th of the total crimes that they committed.

And need I mention the individual cases of horrendous crimes? In 2016, Sarah Root, a 4.0 GPA college graduate was murdered in a car crash by a low-life immigrant who was street racing for jollies. In 2007, Tessa Tranchant, a 16 year old girl, was murdered by Alfredo Ramos, an illegal immigrant who was driving recklessly while intoxicated. And don't even get me started on the illegal immigrants who've brutally raped and murdered female youth.

The list goes on and on, yet despite this, the mainstream cuck-controlled media claims that Trump is "xenophobic," and "racist." Give me a break—we're not idiots, Mr. Soros. We can see through your globalist plans, and we do not intend on sacrificing our country so that millions of illegal immigrants can destroy our economy, rape our women, murder our families, and ruin our nation.

Trump's single biggest advantage is his no-holds-barred approach to combating our nation's single biggest threat: illegal immigration.

4. Masculinity Is Rising

There is an esoteric sociological theory which postulates that societies oscillate through periods of being hyper-masculine and hyper-feminine. When a nation is founded, it starts off as hyper-masculine: virtues such as decisiveness, assertiveness, honor, and strength are praised.

Then, as the society grows more stable and safe, it becomes hyper-feminine: virtues such as receptivity, passivity, empathy, and cohesion are praised. Over time, however, the nation becomes too feminine to protect itself, and one of two things can happen.

It can either collapse, such as the British empire, the Turkish empire, or the Ottoman empire, or it can experience a resurgence of masculine vitality, such as is evident in the transition of the Roman Republic to the Roman Empire. This is what I believe will happen with America.

Ever since the 1980's, there has been a resurgence of masculinity, beginning with the men's mythopoetic movement, a movement which asked questions such as: What is a man in spirit? What can we learn from the masculine myths of the past?

Now, 30 years later, I look around me and I feel hope. I see a resurgence of no-frills powerlifting, because men want to be strong, not only physically, but mentally and emotionally. I see men refusing to accept easy truths, and daring to dive deeper, only to find that these “hard to accept” truths actually enhance your life beyond what you thought possible.

I see men dropping out of the system, because they’ve realized that you can’t win and that it isn’t satisfying to live your whole life as a cog in the machine. I see men taking control of their love lives by learning about the tests that women put them through, going out and learning game, and striving to change their lack of masculinity.

But most of all, I see men who want to reclaim their nation. I see men going out of their way to vocalize their support of Trump, I see men who refuse to bend over and let the waves of illegal immigrants decimate our country. I see men who refuse to cow-tow to political correctness, and most of all…I see men who want to take their country back.

What We Can Learn From The Collapse Of Glenn Beck's Empire

October 2, 2016 | by Brian Gerard | Link | Original Link

The 2016 election cycle is one that will be remembered by many as both a divisive and entertaining affair. Although these observations are both positive and accurate ones, the election's most important legacy consists of the fact that it has signaled the end of many "conservatives" or "republicans" who have turned against their own allies for short term political points. While this list is a long one that includes the likes of Mark Levin, Ben Shapiro and the National Review, the most prominent one is undoubtedly Glenn Beck, whose meteoric decline makes the fall of the Roman Empire appear childish in comparison.

While the immediate events surrounding the collapse of his network have been well documented by news outlets on both sides of the political spectrum, they fail to address a deeper issue, namely "when did Beck's fall from grace begin, and what precipitated it?" In order to answer these questions, it is necessary to briefly examine three key errors that Beck made as both an individual and a political icon. By understanding these critical mistakes, our readership at Return Of Kings will gain greater insight into what makes individuals fail beyond the point of no return, and how to avoid making those mistakes themselves.

Beck caved to the SJWs

The face you make after you let the left win.

As masculine men, we have many truths to use as a basis for living our everyday lives to the fullest. While the diverse array of rules concern topics game, self-improvement, and keeping your word as a man, there is one commandment that towers above all else. This rule consists of NEVER GIVING INTO THE LEFT'S DEMANDS. It doesn't matter whether they have a rare but valid point or if they exert unwavering pressure on their target, we must never admit defeat because we suffer irreparable losses if we do so. To make matters worse, leftists share many similarities with crack addicts or attention whores, in that giving them what they want will just make them demand MORE from you with no end in sight.

An important example of his cheese-eating surrender monkey personality occurred when the left launched a broadside of personal attacks against him after he aired a "controversial" segment on campus rape statistics. After he was attacked by the likes of feminist sites such as Jezebel, Beck had two choices.

Behind door #1 was his first choice, which would've consisted of him striking back and mocking the left to such an extent that they would never even consider the possibility of attacking him again. His other option, behind door #2, was to give in to the left by accepting and adopting their narrative. Unfortunately, he chose the latter by opting to disclose personal aspects of his family's history in an effort to show that he had a right to discuss the issue.

This was a major miscalculation on his part because not only did his actions have no effect on the left, but also because he revealed his true nature to his supporters. When faced with adversity, Beck is the type of person who would rather curl up in the fetal position than endure hardship.

Beck lost the last vestiges of his sanity

How many sane Americans would dress like this outside of Oktoberfest?

If one does even a small amount of research on Beck's past, it is apparent that he has endured countless struggles and internal conflicts. While his comeback from alcoholism is an admirable one which shows that most men are capable of redemption, it can be argued that his downhill spiral began again after the left targeted his family in a New York City park. This is especially true for his business ventures, which have suffered immensely over the fast few years due to his decision-making. As a result of these decisions, the worst being his decision to shift away from news and into film-making, his media empire is on the verge of bankruptcy and is the subject of a pending lawsuit.

Although his bad business decisions are indicative of his flimsy grasp on reality, what's even more troubling is the manner in which Beck has conducted himself while all of this was occurring. In addition to his well-known Cheetos incident, Beck's decline can be measured by the manner in which he has turned on his close friends and associates and a video he released in which he attributed his 2009 comments on Obama to a form of brain tumor.

In a business context, what normal person would make the decision to move away from the market which has made him successful, into a series of half baked plans and ill-advised ventures? What's even more disturbing is that he seemingly made these decisions while lacking any sort of plan that would enable his media empire to absorb the ensuing risk, which is one of the main reasons as to why his empire is currently on its last legs. As far as his personal conduct is concerned, I can't think of many sane individuals who would turn on longtime friends at the drop of a hat or who would fire loyal employees.

Beck failed to properly assess the political climate

Yes, this guy thinks Trump supporters and the Alt-Right are “Nazis”.

While Beck put himself in a difficult situation by caving to the left and allowing himself to lose touch with reality, these issues alone wouldn’t have ruined him forever. This is because, even in the midst of personal weakness or a mental breakdown, a strong willed person can find a way to overcome their circumstances to improve their situation.

Some of history’s greatest leaders, philosophers, and artistic figures were able to achieve success only when their world was figuratively burning around him. Unfortunately for Beck, however, this will never happen for him because he failed to properly assess the political climate around him, thus alienating many of his supporters and permanently destroying his political credibility in the eyes of most normal people.

This all changed with this Presidential Election cycle and the rise of Donald Trump as a symbol of a larger shift in American politics. Traditional conservatism, which at best is a watered down version of leftist beliefs, is no longer a viable political platform. Instead, the key themes of this election include border security, economic protectionism, non-interventionism, nationalism, and the rejection of the political elite. These themes, coupled with the threats America currently faces due to mass migration, deteriorating race-relations, and terrorism, all clearly demonstrate that the traditional conservative agenda has failed and that it is time for a new movement to succeed where it has failed.

Beck could easily have profited and perhaps delayed his empire’s inevitable collapse by embracing nationalism. Instead, he decided that he was going to become a “libertarian” and proceeded to label anyone who disagreed with him as an enemy of liberty or as a Nazi. His abhorrence of nationalism is so strong that it led him to describe this election in messianic terms, which culminated in him pretending he was a minister and suggesting that Ted Cruz was anointed by God to win this year’s election.

Arguably, it was his conduct over the course of this election that has sealed his fate as a public figure and as a businessman. Although there are legitimate criticisms of Trump that can be made, the possibility of another Clinton in the White House overrules all of those arguments. Even some of the more intelligent NeverTrumpers are realizing that if Clinton gets into the White House and has her way with our immigration system and the Supreme Court, then there will be no America in 2020. In spite of what's at stake in this election, Beck is still coming down on Trump, Alt-Righters, and nationalists harder than he did any leftist. It is through these actions that Beck has displayed his true colors for all to see. He is a social justice warrior, and the fact that many of his former supporters have realized that was the final nail in his media empire's coffin.

Conclusion

The current state of The Blaze.

In ancient Chinese culture, a cycle was used to describe how dynasties rose to power and then subsequently collapsed over time. If a leader was able to overcome hardship and adversity, he achieved "the mandate of heaven", which enabled him to build a powerful empire and lasting dynasty. However, he would eventually stray from his core principles, at which point he would lose the mandate as well as everything he had struggled to build.

Beck lost his mandate when he caved to the SJWs, because when he responded to them by validating their complaints, he slowly began to adopt their characteristics. By subconsciously adopting these traits, which were at odds with his supposed beliefs and business strategy, he began to unravel both professionally and personally. Finally, as his world was collapsing around him, he squandered his last chance to turn things around by moving against the populist surge that is dominating this election cycle, revealing his true nature in the process.

As a result of all of this, there is a real possibility that Beck might commit suicide soon, as evidenced by his response to Ted Cruz's endorsement of Donald Trump. The only silver lining that can be drawn from his meteoric decline is that it serves as a lesson to all of us at Return Of Kings to stay on the straight and narrow, never give into the SJWs, never turn our backs on one another, and to approach politics in a detached manner.

How To Develop Demonic Grip Strength To Rip Apart Apples With Your Bare Hands

Yes, it appears that Larsen is writing yet another grip training article. As I've repeatedly stated, if you were to train any one aspect to develop real world functional strength, it would have to be the grip. Anything you're going to lift will require you to take hold of it and grasp it in your hands, correct?

The techniques discussed in this article are not purely training techniques, but can be considered half training technique, and half tricks to impress your friends and intimidate your enemies. They will give your forearms and fingers a tremendous workout, but due to the expense and amount of detritus these methods produce, I don't do these regularly.

Ripping Apples In Half

This trick is one of the easiest ways to show off the strength of your hands, fingers, and forearms (and if you've been following my instructions, that strength should be great indeed). In addition to being something that will seem unreal to the average people you interact with, this is actually a useful technique should you find yourself wanting to share an apple but lack any sort of sharp implement to cut it in half.

To begin with, you'll need an apple—I specify APPLE, as attempting to tear any other sort of pome such as a pear, quince, or medlar (or for that matter, a drupe such as a peach or apricot) will end with a spray of fruit juice flying into your face, the fruit in question being squashed, and you being thoroughly embarrassed.

Remove the stem of the apple. Then place your index fingers into the end of the apple opposite the stem (See below, but bear in mind when you do this technique this end points down).

Then press your thumbs into the stem end, holding the apple so the stem end is pointing upwards.

Apply pressure inwards with the index fingers, while applying pressing outwards with the thumbs. You should begin to feel and hear the apple cracking.

Once you've achieved this, you can continue applying pressure until the apple splits. Or, for those who are not as strong, you can drive one or both of your thumbs into the crack you made, and apply pressure that way while continuing the same index finger pressure.

Split the apple, and then eat it. Or not, whatever.

Ripping Phone Books

Ripping a phone book in half has become a pop culture standard of strength and vigor, mainly due to the fact that most people don't know how to do it—what if I told you that it is, in fact, one of the easiest strength feats? Indeed, ripping a phone book in half is the first "Strongman" style feat of strength that I ever achieved—and as I have said before in these pages, I am not naturally a strong man, it's something I had to work at.

The problem most people have when trying to tear a phone book (as I feel most men have at some point in their lives) is that it's nigh—impossible to rip a phone book with the same motion you would use to rip a piece of paper-pinching it with the fingers and moving the hands away from each other will get you nowhere fast.

Don't do this

To properly rip the phone book will require proper technique. To begin with, hold the phone book like this, folding the book widthwise:

This is not a phone book, but it illustrates the proper position

Begin to apply pressure with the fingers and thumbs, pull your thumbs apart while simultaneously pressing the pages together with your other fingers. You should begin to audibly hear the paper ripping—if this is your first phone book you will likely not rip through the book clean. Even the smallest rip is a sign of progress! Hold this pressure until you have ripped about half of the pages in the phone book.

The key from here is to keep your thumbs in the same place and orientation they started in, so you can complete the tear in the phone book. Also don't be afraid to dig your thumbs into the tear you've made.

Once you have completed the tear (it will almost always be "shallow", encompassing just an inch or two of each page), you can grip the book as normal and rip it in the usual way.

My first phone book rip took half an hour of concerted effort, and yours will likely be similar. As with most things, you will become stronger and develop a technique that fits your hands specifically, making it easier as time goes on.

There are other grip "tricks" you can learn as your hands become stronger—such as crushing apples with one hand (it's much easier said than done, just grab the apple in a claw grip and apply pressure), or even popping soda cans with the hands—the last of these is purely theoretical for me, but I have seen it done.

And with that, I have said literally all I know about training the grip. Your long national nightmare of me talking about hand and finger strength is at an end!

The 5 Steps To Running A Modern Day Harem

October 2, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

The following article is sponsored by The Harem Handbook.

Hey guys, Kyle from This Is Trouble here. I've been writing at ROK for three years now. The lessons I've learned from this have been essential to my growth as a man. It's helped transform me from the awkward virgin to a guy who travels the world, has sex with beautiful women, and runs his own business from abroad.

If there's one thing I've learned in the last few years, it's that the power of choice is especially important when it comes to women.

If you're not able to have a choice with women, you end up settling with one who is below the standards. And we all know the effects that a damaged woman can have on a man's life…

Crazy, psychotic episodes of rage.

Divorce rape.

And a lot more.

The power of choice with women is important to living a good life. Once you have the ability to choose, your life will transform. You'll go from the one getting chosen by women to the one doing the choosing. Women will be hitting you up for sex. And finally, you'll learn how to truly screen for the best women out there, instead of getting the crazies.

The ultimate form of choice with women is acquiring and running a harem.

With that being said, here are the steps to running a harem in today's modern (and brutal) dating world.

1. Define What You Want

Wandering through life without an end goal is pointless.

Do you want a long term relationship, but the freedom to still sleep with new girls when you want? Or would you prefer to have a harem of four different friends-with-benefits relationships?

Simply put, you must define what kind of harem you wish to have, because based on that you must figure out…

2. Where To Find Them

First, a disclaimer: it's best not to look for girls for your harem in your social circle.

The reason for this is because girls fear judgment. It's best if neither of you know each other's social circles. This leaves meeting girls at night, during the day, and online game as your options.

Generally speaking, the slutty girls you meet at night, or online are going to be your best bets for a harem. Of course, you can meet the naughty girls during the day, too–but we're stacking the odds.

This goes back to #1.

If you want to have a lot of casual sex, it's best to pursue the night and online options, and then set them up in a harem (more on how to do that below).

If you're wanting to pursue a long term relationship with a bit of side action now and then, maybe you're better off finding that relationship-worthy girl during the day.

3. Balance Your Life (The Rules of 3)

It's very easier for girls to become a huge part of your life when you finally decide to "handle the women problem once and for all."

However, putting all your weight into women can cause unhappiness in other ways. If all of your self-value is derived from women, what happens when you remove them from the equation (i.e. have a dry spell).

You fall apart.

Therefore, a critical step towards building a harem is adhering to the rules of 3.

Here are those rules:

3 New Dates A Week

Keep to a maximum of three new dates a week while building your harem up. That's 12 dates a month. If you convert just 25% of those, that's 4 new bangs.

3 Dates To Sex

You should not wait for more than three dates to have sex with a girl. It's rarely worth it.

Most women I've slept with have flat-out told me that they knew they wanted to have sex with me within an hour of meeting me, so it's not a case of them needing to make up their mind.

3 Platforms For Dates

Trying to daygame, nightgame, and handle multiple dating apps will burn you out. Pick two, and focus on them.

3 Solid Prospects – ALWAYS

I make sure I have three leads who would be down to meet up within a couple of days if it came down to it. This ensures that I keep working enough girls that I'm not suddenly going to be left with nothing, and if I lose a girl in my harem, I can easily replace her with a new girl in a matter of days.

3 Strikes And She's Out

Girls fall off the radar. In most cases, it's not worth it to revive them. Once a girl hasn't responded to your texts three times (at most) simply delete her number and move on.

3 Days Of Cooking

Cooking at home will keep your health and walley in check.

The added bonus of cooking at home is that it's very easy to get girls over for dates if you say you're going to cook dinner for them.

3 Meets In Ten Days

Do not see any girl in your harem more than there times (two is better) in a ten day period.

3 Girls At A Time

I believe this is the golden rule to the harem: have three girls.

One main girl and a couple of casual sex bundies is great. So is three casual sex girls.

Anything more than this and I can tell you it simply gets exhausting.

4. Own Her Heart And Soul

You must make each girl in your harem feel a little bit special.

This means that you must be present with her. You shouldn't be talking about other girls with her, and even a basic fuckbuddy should feel like you at least care about her a little.

Doing this, combined with hard, dominant sex will bond a woman to you.

This is the true key to running an efficient harem where girls are begging to see you.

You must hit their buttons on both a physical and emotional level, even if it's just casual sex.

This makes her far more likely to cone back for repeat business, as opposed to always having to hunt for new prospects.

5. Define The Relationship And Hold Frame

If you're a man with game, girls you date are eventually going to want a commitment. But this last piece of advice is the best advice I can give you:

Girls do not fear physical cheating. They fear emotional cheating.

You'll be surprised at how many girls are okay with you having casual sex with other girls as long as you come back to them. They much prefer this over you taking other girls out to romantic, candlelight dinners.

Make sense?

No matter what–always hold frame. Hold true to what you want out of life.

You'll be amazed at the life you can live when you do.

9 Languages Men Should Consider Learning

October 3, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Knowing how to speak a foreign language or two is becoming increasingly important and beneficial these days. Whether you want to do some extensive travels, look for new opportunities, meet women from different cultures, or leave the dying West for good, there are many reasons to start picking up a language now. With daily dedication, even if you just manage to squeeze in 30 minutes of study a day, you'll see results in the future which you'll be thankful for. If you're hesitating or think that you don't have the time, know that they're just excuses. In few years time, you might regret not starting sooner—I've heard the same story from many other people and I myself regret that I didn't take language learning seriously when I was younger.

Unless there is one culture or country that you are fascinated with or currently live in, you might feel lost as to choosing which language to tackle. Based on my own experience, I think it's important to pick a language that will come handy and that you'll stick to for years to come. Picking up a language just because you feel like it would be cool to speak it is not a good reason and you'll likely end up quitting early on. Without further ado, here are some major languages to consider if you haven't decided on one yet.

1. Spanish

Difficulty: Easy

If you are fluent in English or other Romance languages, you'll find many similarities in Spanish to get you going. It is actually one of the more (if not the most) simple European languages.

Practicality: Very High

Of all the languages listed here, you'll get the highest ROI. Spain and the entire Americas (minus Brazil and few smaller countries) are yours once you know English and Spanish.

Cultural Value: High

Latin American cultures are rich and colorful; there won't be any regrets.

Business/Political Value: High

Quality of women who speak the language: High

One word: Latinas.

2. Portuguese

Difficulty: Average

Little more difficult than Spanish.

Practicality: Average

Portuguese is affected by diglossia, making Brazilian Portuguese distinguishable from the one spoken in Portugal. Those two are also the only countries that speak the language that are worth visiting.

Cultural Value: Average

Brazil in an amazing place, but it’s only one place.

Business/Political Value: Average

Quality of women who speak the language: High

Two words: Brazilian women

3. French

Difficulty: Average

Relatively easy, but not as easy as Spanish.

Practicality: High

If you live in Canada, you already know how useful it is in helping you get a job (public sector job).

Cultural Value: High

Business/Political Value: High

There's a reason why French was the original lingua franca. It is still a language that is sought after in many positions.

Quality of women who speak the language: Average

Still better than Anglo women.

4. German

Three genders and confusing amount of endings are enough to cause a headache.

Practicality: Low

Most Germans (and other German speaking Europeans) already speak a good deal of English.

Cultural Value: High

If you fancy old European culture, German will appeal to you. Wagner and Nietzsche anyone?

Business/Political Value: High

If you do lot of business in Europe it will come handy.

Quality of women who speak the language: Low to Average

Don’t some say that they’re the ugliest in Europe after English women?

5. Russian

Difficulty: Hard

Cyrillic is only the beginning…

If you plan on going to Ukraine, Belarus, or Russia for any period of time you should learn the language.

Cultural Value: High

Business/Political Value: High

Will be very useful if you plan on working for certain section of the US government.

Quality of women who speak the language: Very High

Nothing more needs to be said.

6. Arabic

Difficulty: Very Hard

First thing you need to learn about Arabic is that it is not a single language. The Modern Standard Arabic (or simply MSA) is not spoken by the average person and is considered a high language spoken only by diplomats, the media, academics, and officials. The dialects that are spoken in everyday life are divided into regions (sometimes within the same country) and must be learned separately.

Practicality: Low

Unless you plan to live in the Arab world for an extended period of time, your Arabic won't come handy. Many nations (especially the Gulf states) already speak good enough English.

Cultural Value: Above Average

Arabic will open the door to rich and exotic cultures.

Business/Political Value: High

Same as Russian. Arabic is highly valued in the military and is expected to remain in high demand for the foreseeable future.

Quality of women who speak the language: Depends on the region

Depending on where you go, the women can look anything from this to this.

7. Mandarin

Difficulty: Very Hard

Your biggest obstacles will the tones and the thousands of characters that you have to memorize. But, personally, I think the overall difficulty is highly exaggerated. The grammar is actually very basic and straightforward.

Practicality: Slightly Below Average

In spite of the number of people who speak it, including those who are spread all over the world, the practicality suffers due to regionalism. I know a man who spent more than ten years living in China who couldn't utilize the standard version he had learned outside the city center he lived in.

Cultural Value: High

China is the oldest living civilization. A Chinese person today can still read Sun Tzu's original Art of War that was published in 5th century BC.

Business/Political Value: High

China is growing and growing. It will soon be the most important language after English for business and diplomacy if not already.

Quality of women who speak the language: Above Average

Not the most attractive (unless you have a thing for Asian women), but far better for long-term relationship than the average Western women.

8. Korean

Difficulty: Very Hard

The written language is actually one of the easiest in the world (you can learn it in less than an hour), but the grammar will be a pain with all its formalities.

Practicality: Low

You'll only be able to speak this language with Korean immigrants and half of a peninsula. On the other hand, if you plan to live in Korea (as an English teacher or whatever), you'll be treated like a rock star in the country.

Cultural Value: Average

Korean culture is rich and exotic, but limited by size. The rising popularity of Korean culture in the region and beyond might change that in the future though.

Business/Political Value: Low

Quality of women who speak the language: Above Average

Somewhat superficial and materialistic (like the Chinese) but overall, traditional and feminine.

9. Japanese

Difficulty: Very Hard

Japanese use a hybrid writing system that incorporate Chinese characters. Think of the whole language as something between Chinese and Korean.

Practicality: Low

Only people who speak Japanese are in the country. Unlike Chinese or Korean, you won't find as much immigrants to interact with either.

Cultural Value: Above Average

Truth be told, Japan is a declining nation. Unless you're obsessed with everything Japan and plan to live there for the rest of your life, I don't see too many reasons to learn Japanese. It still has a great cultural value if you're looking to immerse yourself to an exotic culture.

Business/Political Value: Somewhat Low

Unless you work in a company that has connections Japan, it's rather low.

Quality of women who speak the language: Above Average

Nearly identical to Koreans. If you're white, you have a strong advantage with almost no competition. Their women are not as pretty as people imagine them to be though.

Conclusion

I'm sure I missed few or several languages that would also be useful to learn, but it really all comes down to your personal preference depending on what you're looking for. Along with game, learning a language is one of the most important thing you can do to improve yourself. The crucial thing to remember is to stick to your studies no matter what and to commit yourself to it. And unless you're only learning it for academic value, it is essential that you actually go to the country and live in the culture with the people to master the language; no amount of books and courses will replicate real-life interactions.

Start now and don’t regret later.

How One Of The Most Successful Armed Robberies In History Took Place

Fabulous Robbery Cleared Up by FBI With Arrest of 6

U.S. to Hold New A-Tests

For a long time, the armed heist known as the Brink's Holdup was the most successful robbery in United States history. It took place in Boston's North End on 165 Prince Street at the headquarters of Brink's Incorporated on January 17, 1950. The job was meticulously planned and brilliantly executed, and the thieves made off with over $2 million. The robbers were local heroes; Boston for some reason has a longstanding love affair with bank robberies. Because the story of the heist is not generally known to younger readers, we will relate it here.

The idea for the robbery began in the mind of a North End tough guy named Tony "Fats" Pino. He put the Brink's company on Prince Street under observation, knowing that it dealt on a daily basis with large amounts of cash and bonds as part of its payroll operations in the local area. Plans began to form slowly in his mind. From rooftops and overlooking rooms nearby, his sharp senses noticed that the Brink's employees would often let their guards down when dealing with large amount of cash. He was convinced that a successful heist was possible. But it would be difficult, and would need a disciplined team with precision timing.

Anthony “Fats” Pino

The next step was to recruit a first-rate crew. To this end Pino turned to two underworld chums he knew well: Stan “Gus” Gusciora and Joseph “Specs” O’Keefe. Both had come from the Boston streets and were true professionals at their trade. Gusciora was good with the muscle, and O’Keefe was known to be a calm, calculating, and highly intelligent thief. Together they would plan and stage the greatest robbery in US history.

Various plans were discussed. One scheme had the robbers hide in the building and overpower the employees in the morning; another idea was to take the head foreman hostage and make him open up the cash vault. O’Keefe thought that there must be a better way. So he and Gus eventually figured out how to enter the Brink’s building at night through an abandoned garage; once in, they performed a thorough reconnaissance of the cash house itself. The key to a successful robbery, they realized, would be to disable the Brink’s alarm system, which was only set at around seven o’clock each night.

From these preparations, O’Keefe hit on the idea of removing the lock cylinders from all the doors leading to the cash vault itself. He thought it would be possible to remove the lock cylinders, have keys cut for the locks, and then replace the cylinders in the various doors without anyone noticing. If they could do this, then they could enter the building during the day without triggering the alarm.

From this point the general plan took shape. Seven men would enter the building using the duplicate keys. They would disable the employees in the vault and take all the moveable cash. Drivers would wait in a getaway vehicle outside. Another man would meet the team at a safehouse after the getaway to divide the loot. The crooks found a way to get uniforms that looked just like the ones worn by Brink’s employees. The jump-off date for the operation was set for January 17, 1950.

Joseph “Specs” O’Keefe

At 165 Prince Street, O’Keefe and his men entered the Brink’s building armed with pistols, rope, bags, and duct tape. They put on Halloween masks and headed straight for the vault. Going right up to the shocked employees, they pulled out guns and told everyone to shut up or else. A couple workers were picked out to accompany the bandits to the vault, and there they filled multiple bags with cash. In about twenty minutes, it was all over. The crew left the building laden with loot and drove away, leaving the stunned employees to try to figure out how it had all happened. Each member of the crew received about $100,000 as his take in the haul.

When news of the robbery leaked out, Boston Police Superintendent Edward Fallon summoned over 150 law enforcement men to police headquarters to brief them on what had happened. Meanwhile, the public's imagination was captivated by the daring robbery. The crooks had gotten off scot-free, it seemed; there were few leads and no real clues, and soon the story faded from public attention.

The Brink's building on Prince Street after the heist

But as often happens, the thieves would prove to be the source of their own undoing. Greed, jealousy, and suspicion would doom them all. Specs O'Keefe and Stan Gusciora would eventually be arrested for unrelated crimes and ended up doing time in Pennsylvania; while they were away, "friends" spent their stolen loot. The police did eventually discover parts of the getaway car at a junkyard; the hold-up men had tried to bury its parts, but the frozen ground prevented this. Not much else was forthcoming, and the three-year statute of limitations on prosecutions loomed for the FBI. Unless a break in the case was found, they would never be able to do anything, even if they caught some suspects.

When O'Keefe got out of jail and found out that his friends had spent all his money, he was furious. In a long series of machinations too convoluted for us to follow here, O'Keefe took increasingly desperate measures to try to recover his money from other members of the gang. Soon violence came into the picture, and Specs narrowly missed an attempt to kill him. He had been wounded, and this provided FBI agents an opportunity to try to turn him against his former comrades. They made a point of telling him how most of the former gang members had grown rich, while he himself had nothing to show for masterminding the Brink's job.

Slowly, O'Keefe's hardened exterior began to crack. Seething with anger at having been used and cast aside, he agreed to spill his guts to the FBI. He revealed the names of all the participants in the Brink's job, and described in detail how he pulled it off. With this precious information, prosecutors brought indictments against all the surviving gang members (two had since died). When the trial was held in Boston in 1956, they got life in prison.

Specs was given special consideration for his role in solving the crime. Law enforcement frankly admitted that without his cooperation, the crime never would have been solved. He was paroled in 1960 with a name change, and died quietly sixteen years later. Most of the loot from the Brink's job was never recovered. While a perfect accounting is impossible, it is accurate to say that about $1 million in untraceable loose cash was hidden from the robbery, and has never been found.

KINGMAKER PODCAST: The Making Of A Modern Man

Quintus and I tried to start a ROK podcast this year but the meetup outrage happened, along with aftershocks that kept me occupied (Quintus went on to start his own excellent podcast). Things have stabilized to where I'm now attempting a solo podcast called Kingmaker, where I focus on self-improvement and masculinity issues.

In the first episode, I discuss the importance of a man's environment on shaping him because of how it acts as a mirror to his existence. I propose that modern Western civilization, with its ideas of individualism, materialism, and hedonism, have created a toxic environment that is hurting men more severely than had they been raised in a traditional society, using my own life path as a case study. I also discuss what we have gained and lost by moving from a traditional society to a modern one.

3 Ways That Non-Profit Organizations Are Ruining America

October 4, 2016 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

Several years ago, I helped a friend out with his non-profit business. I qualified for a position (got fingerprints, etc.) and I was given the title of a BST—short for Basic Skills Trainer. Within a few days, I was sent to a client.

My first client was a single mother. I drove her to the unemployment office where she picked up a welfare check. This woman was 25 and had two children—from two different fathers, mind you. From all appearances, she was a perfectly healthy woman. I noted that in a third-world country, she'd be selling apples (or vagina) on a street corner. But thanks to Uncle Sam, she was living in a condo, collecting unemployment, and receiving the help of a "non-profit."

The experience left a bad taste in my mouth. And it made me wary of the "non-profit" industry. So I began doing research, which lead me to an ugly conclusion: the non-profit industry is contributing to the decline of American culture; it does this by promoting feminism, undermining the role of the father, and bloating the egos of women.

1. Many Non-Profits Are Feminist

The Feminist Majority Foundation, Feminist Frequency (Anita Sarkeesian's site), Feminist.com…all of these are non-profit organizations; in other words, they all receive their funding from the federal government. That's ridiculous. The fact that the American taxpayer is funding Anita Sarkeesian should produce a small taste of vomit in the back of your throat. Apparently, the government believes that making YouTube videos about video game tropes is deserving of a pay check.

In today's speech, I'll talk about how to grease the government for thousands of dollars.

The feminist non-profit also highlights a blatant double standard. What manosphere site that fights for male causes (ROK, Rationale Male, Chateau, etc.) could receive non-profit status? Well, the question is rhetorical—none of course. If anything, the reverse has happened. The government has ignored a host of transgressions against the members of the manosphere: death threats, doxing, etc.

The companies I mentioned are only scratching the surface. There are hundreds more where that came from: Her Justice, Safe Nest, etc. These organizations take money out the taxpayer's pocket and they route it back into the coffers of a feminist "company." In short, the government sponsors a culture of misandry that undermines the edifice of the American family.

2. Non-Profits Undermine The Role Of The Father

Non-profits undermine the father by providing a parachute to women. A woman can cheat on her husband, file for divorce, and emotionally damage the children…no problem; the government will catch her. The non-profit is a safety net for women that make bad decisions.

I'm living proof of this. When I separated from my ex-wife, she went to live at a non-profit shelter for women. She stayed there for two weeks—all on the taxpayer's dime. Meanwhile, I stayed in a hotel for a hefty fee. Of course, these stories are common to the readership. We know that equality is an empty slogan, and that misandry is the de facto philosophy of the government.

A non-profit leader, encouraging your wife to “Divorce that jerk!”

Without the non-profit, a woman would think twice about her actions. She’d realize that she has no safety net—that her actions have consequences. As Machiavelli stated, “It’s better to be feared than loved. People respect those they fear, but are fickle with those they love.” Very true. The ancients were strict with women, and the women behaved accordingly. But the modern government is a supplicating beta, bending over backwards to its female constituency. The result has been an increase in divorce and a generation of broken families.

3. Non-Profits Give Women Horrendous Egos

The women who work for the non-profit industry are usually arrogant. This was pointed out by Roosh in his video “10 Reasons Why Washington D.C. Sucks” (cue to 1:28).

> “The city is stock full of boring, cookie-cutter women who get all of their value from their careers. This is a place where a woman think she’s made it in life, she’s accomplished, not by being beautiful or by being a mother or by serving a man. But by having a fancy business card, for having a business card from a non-profit…”

My experience has proven this to be true. From the case workers down to the secretaries, I found the women to be unbearable. They act as if a degree in social work is the apex of intellectualism. But most of them are credentialed—not educated. If you have a conversation with them, you’ll find that most are parroting the talking points of “girl power”: sexism, patriarchy (then rinse and repeat).

I'm so impressed by your shirt…let me put my head in the oven when you start speaking.

And God help you if you decide to date one of these women. The pitfalls of the "strong and independent" career woman are well documented. You've already been warned.

Conclusion

12% of the current US economy is the non-profit sector. Let me phrase this another way–the government creates jobs for 12% of the workforce. If you removed the non-profit industry, the unemployment rate would be close to 20%. People would begin speaking of the United States in the same way that they speak of Greece–a place with massive unemployment and a struggling economy.

Non-profits are draining the US economy. The US is 19 trillion dollars in debt and counting. It's time to stop funding projects that don't work. Non-profits do not create anything of value: iPhones, software products, medical devices, etc. Instead, they focus on helping people that–for the most part–are incapable of self-improvement. Moreover, they rob the country of valuable finances. This money could be used to cure a disease, or to explore a distant planet. Instead, the checks are going to Anita Sarkessian.

Now truth be told, some non-profits might serve a useful purpose. And I'm all for a kid with cerebral palsy getting a little help on the side. I'm not heartless. But as we all know, noble purposes in the US are quickly denigrated by the SJW Weltanschauung. It doesn't take long for them to turn a "Let's help" mantra into the "Fight the Power" battle cry.

Remember my adage—most women do not fight for male causes, and they are indifferent to the suffering of the average male. Therefore, you have no obligation to support their causes. Moreover, you should look for a way to end their government-sponsored organizations, since these organizations are taking money directly out of your paycheck.

Male Heterosexuality Is Becoming Illegal

When a man travels outside a sexually repressed culture and stays out for a good while, one of the first things that crosses his mind is the libertine nature of many other cultures. In stark contrast to the United States, people abroad are often literally fucking like rabbits. Sex is readily available to an attractive, well-dressed man in Latin America, which is totally the opposite of Anglo culture in which women commodify themselves then sell out to the highest bidder or have the one night stand with a thug.

Is the fact sex flows like water outside the borders of The Matrix merely an illusion brought on by hypergamy? It is a product of r/K selection? Or is the welcome "culture shock" the product of having been stewed and basted in a culture that has long had problems with sexual repression, and has recently made moves aimed at making heterosexual sex itself taboo in a form of Neo-Puritanism?

After all, sex has been around a long time, and women have been feverishly trying to control sex for economic and social status advantages in Anglo culture from the beginning. The government now appears to be in the process of legislating and propagandizing to completely take pleasures of the flesh away from Beta males.

Neo-Puritanism is on the rise in Anglo America among Marxist social engineers

Lawmakers, along with their prostitutes in the media (i.e. the gatekeepers and agenda setters) are pursuing a multi-pronged approach to make straight sex taboo. There are several ways social engineers are attempting to make heterosexual activity a legal and cultural albatross for men Anglo America and Europe. These are only a few of the ways this agenda is being pursued.

- Constructing a "Human Trafficking" facade which is based on mostly spurious claims of women being forced into prostitution, then passing endless laws to combat this phantom enemy (sound familiar to terrorism?)
- Passing endless rape laws pushing men farther into a corner with regards to normal heterosexual activity, i.e. the "Josie was drunk" ad campaign and affirmative consent laws
- Promoting homosexuality as sacrosanct while prohibition and public shaming still extend to the world's oldest profession, prostitution; Johns also have their lives and careers ruined around the U.S. by a voyeuristic police force and media
- Promoting the view that sexuality is "dirty" and something to be embarrassed about among the Plebeian classes, as something reserved for the elite and well-heeled men
- Promoting plague terror for over 30 years, especially a "cooties" campaign for adults as the HIV epidemic (contrary to what we were told in the 1980s and 1990s) remains confined to risk groups and the CDC's own statistics say heterosexuals could have sex for more than a lifetime and never contract the virus (a nearly 1 in 10,000 chance of spreading the virus through vaginal intercourse)
- Passing insane laws which are now making flirting illegal in the UK
- Shaming men who have normal heterosexual urges and pushing HR policies which make both sexes behave androgynously
- Promoting confusion of male and female genders with the transgender bathroom agenda being pushed by the U.S. government, extending into public schools and down to small children (get them while they're young)

These are only a few of the ways sex is being made confusing and taboo among heterosexuals in America and Europe. But, there are calls among Neo-Puritans for the state to do even more to "protect" (i.e. pedestalize) women against us "evil" penis-wielding men.

As the holder of a penis, Jake is 1/8 human in the eyes of the law because according to the poster's own narrative Jake can't consent either

Calls For Regulating Sex

Elizabeth Bernstein, "Women's Studies" professor recently published a book entitled Regulating Sex: The Politics of Intimacy and Identity which proposes to put the government in everyone's bedroom. The book calls for government regulation in numerous areas of people's private lives, from the ability of people to travel abroad to the state controlling "erotic practice" worldwide.

Bernstein and many other feminists are merely putting a new spin on a very old idea, one that has infected Anglo culture from day one in America: the view that sex is inherently sinful and that sexual contact between straight couples was a "necessary evil" intended only to propagate the human race. Since Marxists want negative population growth, they're falling back on this old idea, ironically one with religious roots, repackaging it, and making it even more virulent than it was before as they try to make straight sex an "unnecessary evil" in modern times.

As usual, the dreams of Neo-Puritans like Bernstein are first implemented on college campuses, which have become nothing more than Marxist social engineering labs in the early 21st century. The Washington Examiner warns us how these laws are making straight sex the new "evil" of our time.

> The rules for college students having sex have become absurd. The new Puritans are practically begging for abstinence by making consensual sex so impossible that it is better to forgo. Part of this problem stems from a broad definition of sexual "violence" that includes unwanted comments about someone's physical > appearance (which could be as mundane as someone telling their female friend they "look good" today). These comments constitute sexual "violence" even between two people involved in a committed relationship.

Just as in Britain, men even talking to women is becoming a prosecutable offense.

Affirmative consent is another cultural cancer spreading not only on college campuses, it is also metastasizing into adults' lives in the state of California where it was recently signed into law. Thanks to endless rules made up by micromanaging lawmakers, a man literally has to ask a girl before he can take off her panties or face the possibility of being convicted a rapist in California.

> "Affirmative consent," [is] a new rule that requires college students to constantly say "yes" to every sexual act — though it's never really defined just how often they must say this. Some affirmative consent policies even state that the "yes" must be sufficiently "enthusiastic," otherwise it's sexual assault.

Under the law, it's conceivable a man must further ask a girl if he can finger her once the panties are off. "Yes, you may." Then if he can suck her tit. "Yes, you may." Then if he can penetrate her. "Yes, you may." Did she not say it with enough enthusiasm? Be careful. If she's less than begging for your cock you may be committing a crime. What kind of idiocy is this? What the hell is the United States of America turning into? What kind of Beta, nay, Omega males is the state trying to socially engineer?

Shame on you for having sexual urges! Those are reserved for thugs and six-figure earners (Alpha Fucks, Beta Bucks)

When looking for the root of this strange world of constant propaganda and the social engineering of sexual activity, one must go back a century to psychologist Sigmund Freud. Think Freud was wrong about everything from Penis Envy to psychoanalysis? He wasn't. His ideas have been implemented for over a century and have led to the empty, nihilistic, materialistic culture of the West we see everywhere around us today.

Freud's nephew Edward Bernays first laid out the model of social engineering the corporate-government complex now uses to rule society, and especially men, with an iron fist. Although, it's an iron fist neatly concealed in a velvet glove of emotional manipulation. Bernays words literally changed the world and led to today's social engineering schemes by sociopathic elites:

> The conscious and intelligent manipulation of the organized habits and opinions > of the masses is an important element in democratic society. Those who manipulate this unseen mechanism of society constitute an invisible government which is the true ruling power of our country. We are governed, our minds are molded, our tastes formed, our ideas suggested, largely by men we have never heard of.

Using the power of the corporate media that dominated communication in the U.S. for 50 years, people's minds were indeed molded according to the desires of corporate and government profit and tax farmers. This model has been falling apart since the advent of the Internet.

Almost 20 years ago, Alec Rawls wrote an essay in The Stanford Review called Why Politically Correct Social Engineering Backfires, which predicted social engineering schemes like the marginalization of sex would eventually backfire. So far, they haven't, even though the process should have been accelerated by the collapse of the centralized mainstream media propaganda model.

Additionally, Rawls knew well the shameless duplicity of the media in shoving sex in everyone's face 24/7—from the leg-crossers on Fox News to endless sex in every kind of program from soap operas to movies – while at the same time marginalizing heterosexuals using the bullet points presented above.

The media has also been subliminally pushing the message that women must make the sexual advance for it to be valid, as most big screen and little screen scripts follow this model:

> In our politically correct world, "uninvited sexual attention" is officially taboo. It is always the woman who asks out, always the woman who initiates a kiss, always the woman who climbs on top. These rules are absolutely universal with only two exceptions. One is the creep, who is crass or repulsive, or simply a loser, and who is immediately scorned by the woman. The other exception is the charming man who turns out to be a rapist or a murderer.

In effect, the media are literally cucking men with their messages, and reprogramming the way people who watch media think about sex without them even knowing it. Establishing the cultural meme that women control sex and men who attempt to control it are violators is the intended purpose of this messaging.

What are you in for? Having consensual sex with a hot girl

Legally Enforced Chastity

If Rawls is correct, policing of instinctual human behavior like sex will build up like pressure inside a boil until men with enough balls to resist being turned into criminals for having normal male sexual desire came along and lance it.

> Correctoids think that by imposing their hypersensitivity, they can make the world a more caring place. Unfortunately, social engineering tends to backfire.

One should change the last sentence to "Fortunately, social engineering tends to backfire." Because if it doesn't, someday in the not too distant future it may be not only illegal but culturally taboo for a man and woman to have sex with each other. This is the hellish world leftist academics and the legal class have brought us into.

On a more philosophical level, if one reads the prophet of Western decline Oswald Spengler, this weird sexual world we have entered in the 21st century can be seen as manifestation of Faustian man (i.e. Western civilization) trying to turn himself into a machine, divorcing himself from his biology in an attempt to realize perpetual economic growth. It is also the product of Puritanism re-imagined by Marxist social engineers in an already K-selected, sexually repressed culture. The ultimate goal, of course, is a totally sexless society. Or, at least a matriarchal society in which men are little more than worker bees and sex toys of women.

When the day comes, these types – leftist academics and the legal class – need to be the first who are exiled…or otherwise creatively dealt with. Shakespeare's advice of what to do with lawyers (and let's not forget lawmakers) certainly comes to mind, if only in a fleeting fantasy.

The Cultural Impact Of A Donald Trump Presidency

October 4, 2016 | by Jef Costello | Link | Original Link

"The thing worse than rebellion is the thing that causes rebellion."
"Power concedes nothing without demand. It never has, and it never will"
—Frederick Douglass

Nearly two years ago, I wrote an article for ROK describing Gamer Gate and its potential marker as a turning point in the Culture War. The major premise was that in attempting to alienate and demean gamers as misogynist losers, the social justice brigade overplayed its hand. It incited a violent, effective backlash, which proved to be a counterweight to the incessant march of Cultural Marxism into the arena of gaming, at least for the time being.

As positive as the Gamer Gate uprising was, at the end of the day it was taking place in a somewhat peripheral arena. Video games are for most people nothing more than entertainment, and as such the gaming medium was always unlikely to be the springboard for the sweeping cultural changes espoused on sites such as this. To effect real change, a GamerGate–like force needed to emerge in the wider sphere. The waves Donald Trump is currently making in politics is looking like such a force, with his candidacy representing another, even bigger marker in the Culture War.

The Rise of Donald Trump: The Politician

Like most people, I completely dismissed Trump's candidacy when he first announced it in June of 2015. I thought it was merely a publicity stunt, and summarily wrote him off. I had paid little attention to the election in general, until the outrage over Trump's comments about John McCain as a war hero bubbled up.

It wasn't so much the merits of what Trump had said as much as his willingness to spit in the eye of the Republican top brass which piqued my interest. I had long since become disillusioned with the Republican party, and the prospects of a Jeb Bush nomination had me ready to tune out of politics yet again. Trump's antics made me pay closer attention to what he was offering, through to the first Republican Debate a few weeks after the McCain outrage.

It was 5 minutes or so into that debate, held on Fox News, that I punched my ticket onto the #TrumpTrain and never looked back. In what was clearly a hit job from Fox, the moderators opened the debate by asking the contestants if they would refuse to pledge to support the Republican nominee and not run as a third party candidate. Only Trump raised his hand.

Next, Megyn Kelly asked him an obvious gotcha question relating to "misogynous" things Trump had said in the past. This treatment of Trump, who was at the time the leading candidate in the polls, in front of a record audience largely drawn in by Trump, by right-leaning Fox News, was a confirmation of what I had suspected: that the establishment in both politics and media were anti-Trump. As per Roosh, this was merely a sign that the individual in question has ideas that are beneficial to America.

The combination of Trump's wealth, business expertise, virtually 100% name recognition, multi decade exposure to the media and natural charisma enabled him to break through that establishment behemoth which lined against him. A politician with similar ideas but lesser means would have been drowned out by establishment donors. Another billionaire without the media experience would have been crushed by the intense media scrutiny and gotcha games, while Trump regularly trolls the media with ease.

Considering his anti-globalist, anti-Cultural Marxist, America First message, Trump is perhaps the only man in America who could have had the impact he has.

Social ‘Progress’ Doesn’t Feel So Good

A Trump candidacy wouldn’t have been necessary but for the massive changes in the economic and cultural milieu over the last 50 years. Consider the following quote from President Obama in an interview he did with NPR at the end of last year:

> I do think that the country is inexorably changing, I believe in all kinds of positive ways. I think we are — when I talk to my daughters and their friends, I think they are more tolerant, more welcoming of people who are different than them, more sophisticated about different cultures and what’s happening around the world.
> But I do think that when you combine that demographic change with all the economic stresses that people have been going through because of the financial crisis, because of technology, because of globalization, the fact that wages and incomes have been flatlining for some time, and that particularly blue-collar men have had a lot of trouble in this new economy, where they are no longer getting the same bargain that they got when they were going to a factory and able to support their families on a single paycheck, you combine those things and it means that there is going to be potential anger, frustration, fear. Some of it justified but just misdirected. I think somebody like Mr. Trump is taking advantage of that. That’s what he’s exploiting during the course of his campaign.

What he is essentially describing are the effects of the twin forces of cultural and economic Marxism applied incrementally over decades.

Economically, the US economy went from a goods producing economy supported by savings and investment to a smartphone app producing economy supported by exponentially increasing debt, conspicuous consumption, and administrative, legal and compliance work.

We don’t need this guy anymore because we have a service economy now

This ‘new economy’ was ultimately constructed by the academics influenced by John Maynard Keynes, who ended up dominating the intellectual and policy-making landscape of postwar Western nations.

The new economy brought with it the death of the American Dream. For most, merely going to college now requires going tens of thousands of dollars in debt. Assuming one gets a good paying job, and finds a girl worth marrying, it is likely that she too is inundated with student loans which become an further liability.

Buying a house and a car requires much more debt relative to incomes than 50 years ago. Keep in mind that modern incomes are supplemented by a second income earner, whereas 50 years ago it was most likely one breadwinner. On top of this, the dual breadwinner of today is likely maxed out on multiple credit cards, all to achieve the same as the single breadwinner did 50 years ago with minimal debt and room for savings to boot.

In short, the American Dream lifestyle was far more attainable in years past, and didn’t require one to sell himself deeper into debt slavery at every turn.

Culturally, the US has succumbed to the Marxist ideals of equality, diversity, and the promotion of ‘oppressed’ classes above all else. Note that in the Obama quote above, he immediately cites the ‘tolerance’ and worldly sophistication of his daughters and their friends as evidence that the United States has changed for the better. The subversion brought about by cultural Marxism is most pronounced in the policing of language, beliefs and attitudes through political correctness.

Cultural Marxists view racism, sexism, homophobia, Islamophobia and other violations are as extremely grave offenses, while simultaneously believing their existence is prevalent even in the most mundane situations. For example, correcting someone’s grammar is potentially racist, and air conditioning is sexist.

Despite the supposed ubiquity of ‘bigotry,’ the penalties for these crimes are still severe. This corrosive paradigm exists solely to control people. If one can lose employment and thus the means to survive because of a mean post on Facebook, the message is clearly that one must fall in line with the prevailing narrative or else.

This makes the media’s incessant charge of fascism against Trump that much more laughable, but we should know from Vox Day that SJW’s always project.
Their replacement of objective truths with Marxist whims intended to serve a subjective vision of ‘equality’ has ultimately brought about it a much more unstable society.

Marginalizing Traditional America

In Democracy In America, Alexis de Tocqueville wrote the following describing the uniqueness of the American in the world:

> Their strictly Puritanical origin, their exclusively commercial habits, even the country they inhabit, which seems to divert their minds from the pursuit of science, literature, and the arts, the proximity of Europe, which allows them to neglect these pursuits without relapsing into barbarism, a thousand special causes, of which I have only been able to point out the most important, have singularly concurred to fix the mind of the American upon purely practical objects. His passions, his wants, his education, and everything about him seem to unite in drawing the native of the United States earthward; his religion alone bids him turn, from time to time, a transient and distracted glance to heaven.

This judgment is a bit harsh given that at the time Tocqueville was writing, the US was still a fledgling country trying to establish itself. The country didn’t have time for establishing a robust art and literature scene when it had to build itself from the ground up.

America did built itself up, and then some, through the prioritization of freedom, competition and hard work, essentially being as ruthless and pragmatic as possible in pursuit of commercial ends. Christianity generally set the moral boundaries. The sanctity of property rights and patriarchal family structures established a strong foundation for civilization, ensuring that the gains made could be passed on to the next generation. This is essentially ‘traditional America’ as we know of it today.

Economic and cultural Marxism erodes these values at every turn. 'Socialism,' Tocqueville wrote, 'seeks equality in restraint and servitude.' The push to normalize homosexuality, broken families and androgyny leads to an erosion of the culture at its very base.

So when Donald Trump came along, with his simple message of 'Make America Great Again,' those who felt marginalized by the 'new economy' and political correctness suddenly had a voice. Conversely, those who wish to see traditional American values destroyed felt a pang of worry upon hearing the Trump slogan, as it invokes an age of greatly reduced, if not nonexistent Cultural Marxist influence.

Indeed, the backlash has been strong, from all sides. Kevin Williamson of the conservative National Review wrote an article back in March eviscerating the mostly white, rural, industrial Trump supporter for having the temerity to long for a time when manufacturing jobs were still plentiful, even writing that those communities 'deserved to die' for not getting with the globalist program. Hillary Clinton's infamous 'deplorables' comment was made in reference to a similar constituency.

In the face of long overdue resistance from average Americans to the destructive forces of economic and cultural Marxism, that the elites have chosen to double down in their disdain for those in opposition should underline the importance of the battle at hand.

Turning the Tide

The personal contrast between Trump and Hillary Clinton is especially clear, with their personal lives being emblematic of the large choice America is facing. Trump is a patriarch, the unabashedly masculine head of a strong family. His wife is feminine, and has remained largely in the background during the campaign. He has five children, who despite growing up absurdly wealthy, did not succumb to the same pitfalls many rich kids do. Trump has eight grandchildren to whom the wealth he's amassed are to be bequeathed at some stage. While not perfect, Trump is a man of conviction; he sticks to his guns and is bold and defiant when challenged.

Clinton shares Trump masculinity, which would be flattering if she wasn't a woman. Her pant-suit-wearing-career-girl-lawyer-power-hungry-striver persona is cartoon-like. She manage to pop out the standard one child but remained laser-focused on her career, eschewing the idea of baking cookies and having tea, as she once put it. She is running on a hyperfeminist platform, to the point where feminist icons were being trotted out to warn women that eternal damnation awaits for not voting for a fellow woman.

Everything about Trump's lifestyle, from his patriarchal headship to his above replacement rate family formation, is frowned upon in Current Year America. While the 'strength and independence' of Hillary Clinton is praised to the heavens.

Politically, Trump's candidacy has given Americans a real choice for once. Consider that from 1980 to 2013, a member of either the Clinton or Bush family has been in the White House or among the President's Cabinet. To the extent that the United States has deteriorated over that time, the establishment from both parties has directly overseen it. The media's favored Republican candidates, such as Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio and John Kasich are all from the same Bush political family tree meaning there would have been little change had they won.

While I have no illusions about Trump being the perfect candidate, the best one can hope for is the right candidate for the time. At this time in American history, a change away from default Cultural Marxist views is what is needed. In order to achieve that change would require a transcendent candidate to snap people out of thinking, and voting in the default way set by the elites.

Trump, with his strong frame and appeal to a strong national identity, touches an emotive chord which has reached a large number of people. There are many voters who have either never voted, or previously voted Democrat who are lining up to vote for Trump.

Even those who think Trump is too much of a blowhard must concede that he is probably what is necessary to turn things around, at least initially, in an emotional sense. It's not as though Barack Obama, for example, won in 2008 because the electorate appreciated the intricacies of his cap and trade proposals. He won because he uttered 'hope and change!' every other phrase, and that resonated with people in that time.

The real, fundamental change required is more quickly had via an appeal to emotion versus logic and reason. Once Trump succeeds in building the platform to Make America Great Again, the policy wonks can drive it home, provided they promote policies in the same vein.

Conclusion

The main idea in Nassir Ghaemi's 2012 book, A First Rate Madness is that in times of complexity and turmoil, the best leaders are often the ones who are unconventional, with abnormal minds and the ability to think outside the box. During times of tranquility, more even-keeled, square-like types are better to maintain the flow.

To show this, Ghaemi explores the mental backgrounds of historical figures such as Winston Churchill and General William Sherman to understand why they were uniquely equipped to deal with the crises they faced. In contrast, square-like figures such as Neville Chamberlain, Tony Blair and George W. Bush were like deer in headlights when the pressure was on.

Trump might be 'extreme' and 'not presidential,' but in this climate being moderate means criminalizing criticism of an ever expanding list of protected classes by labeling everything as hate speech. Being presidential means refusing to acknowledge threats to society, if those threats come from those protected classes.

The years ahead are shaping up to be years of economic and cultural crisis. These crises are born of the Cultural and Economic Marxist dogma. As per the Frederick Douglass quote at the beginning, the rebellion spearheaded by Trump is preferable to the Marxist status quo that it responds to, and seeks to replace, even though there may be turbulence in the transition. It is exactly a candidate like Trump, 'insane' from the Marxist vantage point, who is most apt to cure a nation afflicted with Marxism.

The Modern Dangers Of Excess

October 4, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Aristotle famously observed that virtue is the middle course between excess and deficiency. Plato touched on that earlier in The Republic; those with moderate lives are happier on the whole than those whose lives are characterized by excess. Overabundance often occurs when something normally scarce becomes available in nearly unlimited quantity. Let's see what happens.

Food

Lay off the damn junk food already! A healthy body makes a healthy mind.

Hunger has always been a problem, and it's just as well that advances in agricultural technologies have done much to alleviate this. However, there are some drawbacks. For one thing, it's allowed the rise of big agribusiness, while family farmers—an arrangement that has grown the world's food since prehistory—are getting pushed aside. The grandsons of farmers might still be driving the huge GPS-guided combines, but they're no longer working for themselves.

Further, modern agriculture has facilitated deforestation and also unsustainable growth in areas that didn't get the memo about family planning. Worse, the leaders of the Western world are fine with allowing their countries to be safety valves for Third World overpopulation.

Moreover, the food quality has worsened: the meat is loaded up with hormones and antibiotics, the veggies are sprayed with pesticides and weed killers, and so forth. (In fact, one experimental genetically modified bacterium could have caused a global extinction event.) We're not quite sure what all this is doing to the population, which is a pretty big gamble.

Hormones are going off kilter, one of many things that are messing up our social scene. Testosterone levels in men have been declining steadily for quite a while, and girls are maturing earlier than ever. It's hard to say how much of this is from our diets (hormones and endocrine-disrupting pesticides), traces of birth control pills in drinking water, or plastic congealers such as bisphenol A.

One fact is pretty obvious: waistlines are expanding. This is quite notable in the USA, and other countries are not too far behind. Cheap food and couch potato lifestyles are making people fat and unhealthy. That's really not too sexy, another factor wrecking the social scene.

Sex

This kind of speaks for itself.

The dangers of riding the cock carousel have been covered here quite well, and we've also described player burnout. Often the dysfunctions of men and women really aren't so different.

An even greater problem is porn, a cheap safety valve for the sexual marketplace. It's free for anyone who knows how to pirate the videos. Unfortunately, it's easily addicting and messes up people's love lives. You won't grow hair on your palms, but porn induced ED is no joke. Also, spanking the monkey for hours a day can cause people's tastes to go off into some very strange directions.

Substance abuse

Even then, bug juice isn't so bad compared to dumb dust.

Alcoholism and drug addiction are nothing new. What happens when people can get booze for free? The physician Theodore Dalrymple described a job site in Africa where the workers could buy alcohol very cheaply, and sell it to the locals at a steep markup:

> I discovered that, when alcohol is effectively free of charge, a fifth of British construction workers will regularly go to bed so drunk that they are incontinent both of urine and feces. I remember one man who very rarely got as far as his bed at night: he fell asleep in the lavatory, where he was usually found the next morning. Half the men shook in the mornings and resorted to the hair of the dog > to steady their hands before they drove their bulldozers and other heavy machines (which they frequently wrecked, at enormous expense to the British taxpayer); hangovers were universal. The men were either drunk or hung over for months on end.

Not a pretty picture, is it? The rest of Dalrymple's article describes why controlled substances should remain so. The argument from pure theory that people should do whatever they want with their bodies doesn't work so well in the real world. Further, he explains why methadone programs don't work. The article is definitely worth a read.

Money

Does it ever end?

For anyone who's ever lived paycheck to paycheck—or worse, agonized about where the next rent money is coming from—the lives of the rich must seem like a dream. Granted, poverty sucks raw Rocky Mountain oysters; I know this from experience. Still, the opposite extreme isn't quite all it's cracked up to be. Much depends on what you make of it.

Some guys were born with a silver spoon in their mouths. However, most of us have to go from the ground up, generally beginning with the situation I just described. Later, as we get job experience and start to build a career, things get better. Some will plan carefully and manage finances wisely.

Others, though, go through money as fast as it comes in. Then they blow all their discretionary cash on creature comforts they really don't need. This results in lots of unnecessary monthly charges (who really needs 500 cable channels?) and junk collecting dust on a shelf. Welcome to the hedonic treadmill, bud! Doing it wrong means you're still spinning your wheels like you did when you were dead broke; now the wheels are just spinning faster. Nothing is saved for an emergency fund, a down payment on a house, or a retirement account.

Worse, many dig themselves into a rut, racking up tens of thousands on credit cards. The chains of slavery are forged one link at a time. By the time reality hits them in the face, they're living paycheck to paycheck and the surplus feeds the banksters. Is keeping up with the Joneses really that important? Epic celebrity bankruptcies show that even the rich and famous aren't immune to bad spending habits, despite making money that others can only dream about.

So how does it look at the high end of the income spectrum? Those who start at the bottom and make it big sometimes discover they've traded one set of problems for another. For one thing, there are the sycophants, scammers, and people they hadn't heard from since third grade looking for an easy mark. As for lottery winners, there are a number of tragic cases where people in many ways ended up worse off than they were. Also, the psychological effects of excess wealth can be quite pernicious. Those freed from the common man's struggle for survival often end up getting big egos and throw temper tantrums about nothing.

Power

One of them would be delighted to rule the galaxy. The other one is a Star Wars character.

These days, power comes from having a ridiculous amount of wealth. So what are the global elites doing? Should they look to the example of the wealthy in the Renaissance and become patrons of the arts, commissioning immortal classics still celebrated centuries later? Should they do as many Industrial Age robber barons did and promote high culture? Should they give their workers a big raise in recognition of all their hard work that enriched the CEOs?

Nah, ain't happening. Today's plutocrats are just as corrupt as any in the world's history, flaunting their wealth before the masses they consider to be sheeple. You'd think they'd have the sense to rule responsibly and not kill the goose that laid the golden egg. Unfortunately, the party line of the elites is cultural Marxism. It's an inherently destructive ideology, because it was designed that way.

Why the hell do they do this? Maybe some—insulated from reality by their wealth—really think this will make the world a better place. Others promote globalism for profits: low tariffs and cheap labor. Some engage in virtue-signaling to show everyone how wonderful and compassionate they are. (Those with even a little perspective know deep down that they're not really that special, no better than the common people they're lording it over. Surely these must be scary thoughts.) As for the worst, they dream of a world where their posterity rules over billions of docile, deracinated peasants. They consider their social engineering a means to bring this about. Mythology tells us that the Gods punish hubris; may this be so.

In summary

Steer the middle course. Avoid excess, for it is the path to decay and ruin. These temptations lead to illusory happiness, but the ultimate downfall is not long to come. If hedonism is dangled before you like a shiny fishhook, it is wise not to take the bait. When boundless abundance is spread before you, there is yet a better way, which lies in the pursuit of excellence. Simply put, be the best person you can be.

Master Shitlord Takes Advantage Of University Policy Allowing Students To Register Any Gender Pronoun

October 5, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

In addition to the sun rising, us dying, and the inevitability of taxes, another thing that is certain is that SJW-inspired drama and general hassle will continue to worsen and become more ridiculous as our societies further circle the drain. Today's topic is the University of Michigan, their quest to force "identity tolerance" on their students directly (and us all indirectly), what you can do to deal with this crap, and some fairly decent trolling done by one U of M student taking advantage of the situation.

The university, I am sure, has the best intentions at hand. The student can pick whatever mental illness they think they have and pick anything from ze to (presumably) attack helicopter, and it will automatically populate up on the faculty rosters for each student's classes so that they don't involuntarily make an error and assume that person with breasts, long hair, narrow hips and a Mixalot ass is a woman addressed as she.

> He, she or ze? University of Michigan students are now able to choose the personal pronoun they want faculty and staff to use when talking with them, the school announced.
> The move was made to help foster inclusiveness, according to an e-mail to students and faculty members on the Ann Arbor campus from Provost Martha Pollack and Royster Harper, vice president for Student Life.

There's a couple (at least) problems with this. The first is that you don't know where each student is coming from, and you can't ask them. On one end of the spectrum, you have people who legitimately believe they are the opposite gender from what their biology indicates, and, although that is definitely still a mental illness, it's not one to mock, as the only real treatment is radical, irreversible surgery.

Second problematic (yay, SJW buzzwords) situation is the generally confused students who pick one of the many new genders that have spread like a bad case of the jungle rot in the past couple years. All of these, without exception, are mental illnesses, bullshit, and delusions not to be humored or enabled. There are only men and women, you can't be anything else as nothing else exists outside the malfunctioning minds of the progressive.

Third problem are the attention whores. These are people who are straight, and are secure in that their mental identity matches their physical form, but they realize that just isn't edgy, so they create some made up thing to victim-signal and be more socially relevant and desirable. It's the evolution of all girls going bisexual in college; it's just attention whoring.

There is, however, a fourth problem.

Enter the troll

Grant Stroble, University of Michigan student, conservative, and candidate for 2016 Shitlord of the Year, decided to troll the hell out of the campus, and registered his pronoun as His Majesty, (er, His Majesty's pronoun as His Majesty…this shit is confusing.) Anyway, Stroble's name presumably appears with His Majesty in the pronoun field next to it, which is an obvious troll, but brilliant as they have to entertain it.

What if he identifies as a 16th century English king? Isn't that more believable than “female on Tuesdays” or “black on the inside?” Fortunately, he exercised a little restraint; he could have gone for Reichsführer or something equally triggering.

His Majesty Grant Strobl

Theoretically, the university has to follow through on their procedure and address Mr. Stroble as His Majesty when in the third person else they risk exposing this whole charade of pandering to the infantile and deluded as the farce that it is. Eventually, inevitably, however, all houses of cards fall, and therein lies our opportunity.

Live in reality

In a mixed audience, I’d simply say to check out what apparatus you possess from which to urinate next time you feel the urge, and that will tell you what gender you are, however, even though Return Of Kings has some female readers, the majority of us are male, so we can skip that check.

Gentleman, if you posses a dick, you’re a man; it’s that simple. You might be a gay man and fancy other men, or you might be an asexual man and fancy no one, or you could just be what used to be considered a normal man and like a principled, monogamous, healthy woman like we espouse here, but regardless, you are a man nonetheless.

That’s reality. I know it’s been argued that there is no reality, that it’s all perception and, since we can’t see reality outside of our perception, it could be all our perception. I’m an engineer, not a philosopher, and if you perceive that you can step off a pier and fly, your perception will be corrected by reality as gravity asserts itself and you move towards the earth’s center at some 32.2 ft/s^2 until stopped by something.

Yes, but we are being asked to buy into this person's delusions, which is something we can decline to do.

The point is to be effective, and I will use an example of computer gaming. In most online multiplayer shooters, there are three "realities" going on between you and your opponent with whom you are trading shots. There is your reality, which is where your computer thinks you are, and where it thinks the other guy is. There is his reality, which is where his computer thinks you and he are. However, the most important one is the server, which controls where you both actually are, and it's the one that matters.

Back when I was in college, I played these games and this was when we had a nice, fat internet connection, but many of the players all over the country were on dialup modems still. Their performance suffered because they had a bad connection to the server's "reality" and they got stomped by those of us better connected.

This works in life; those of us who are better connected to reality and not suffering delusions tend to do better. Anything from fitness, to valuable skills, to not tolerating shitty people in your life; the man that is squared away prospers, and he can recognize that same skill in other people.

I've long said that there are two kinds of people in the world; those that can do stuff, and those who can't and just talk about it. Similar to the Dunning-Kruger Effect, competent people can recognize competence (or incompetence) in others, whereas incompetent people are ignorant of their failings and those of others.

Gender identity disorders, like many other mental illnesses, affect the competence of the mind of the person suffering from it, and those people are just kind of noted and dismissed by the people who actually do things. I mean, I'm a straight guy, but, like we teach here, chasing women is not my identity and main purpose in life; do you think someone that identifies as a man or a woman based on what side of the bed they wake up on is really going to ever accomplish anything when that’s their most important part of their personality?

Conclusion

More and more institutions will be adopting this nonsense and the best thing to do is ignore it. There’s no need to take a stand or make a statement, just ignore it and refer to men as him and women as her. If you get yelled at, a simple “yeah” or “uh-huh” will suffice to placate the snowflake, then you immediately get back on with your life.

This will benefit you as you won’t be wasting time with nonsense, and you will associate favorably with others who don’t waste their time either by staying in reality and getting stuff done, as opposed to worrying about nothing. Life is too short to entertain the left.

Sen. Tim Kaine (D-VA) lost badly to Indiana Gov. Mike Pence in Tuesday night's vice presidential debate — despite having home field advantage in Farmville, Virginia — raising new doubts about Hillary Clinton.

Those doubts are twofold: first, about her decision to choose so weak a candidate, who seemed unable to answer basic policy questions; and second, about Clinton's health, since if her medical troubles are as bad as feared, Kaine may be taking over at some point if she is elected.

> our CNN instant poll of debate watchers — pic.twitter.com/BiXCrMe8je
> — lindsey macnabb (@lindsmacnabb) October 5, 2016

Kaine could not stop interrupting Pence, at times sounding high-pitched and shrill, at times whining and defensive. Pence was cool and even-tempered — presidential, in other words, while Kaine seemed to be playing cable news pundit.

The Democrat was often unable to suppress the juvenile impulse to shout campaign talking points, even in the middle of his opponent's answers. At one point, he interjected: "Our plan is like Ronald Reagan's plan from 1986." (Note to Democrats: the Reagan plan failed.)

Later, when the moderator asked why Putin would respect a Trump-Pence administration, Pence answered: "Strength." Kaine, unable to restrain himself, blurted out: "Business deals." His smirk betrayed his conviction that he had just scored points, even though the moderator had to instruct him — for the third time, at least — to wait until it was his turn to speak.

> Weird.
> Pence is coming off as the guy you want to have a beer with. Kaine is coming off as the person on Facebook you unfriend. #ImWithHer https://t.co/EOmbo1zwj8
> — Chris McCoy (@chrisamccoy) October 5, 2016

Kaine seemed not to understand how un-serious he looked. Pence responded with a steady, and appropriate, put-down: “That’s nonsense.”

Pence also beat Kaine over the head with the Russian “reset,” Clinton’s email scandal, and the Clinton Foundation. Moderator Elaine Quijano of CBS News stepped in to protect Kaine, especially when it came to the email scandal (though, to her credit, she at least asked about it, unlike NBC News’ Lester Holt in the first presidential debate).

There was nothing in Tim Kaine’s performance that showed he could act like a president. Pence aced that test.

Now the hard questions for Hillary will begin.

The Old Testament's "Sexist" Views On Female Behavior

October 5, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you were to summarize in one word what the Old Testament said about how women ought to behave, it would be "submissive." Women were destined to protect their sexual honor until they fulfilled a submissive role in the family home. This was made most vividly clear with the story of the Oholah and Oholibah sisters, found in Ezekiel 23, which uses a metaphor to describe the Jews "whoring" themselves to other gods. Besides the changing of a few details, it's a tale that rings eerily familiar to the behavior of modern women.

The Oholah and Oholibah Sisters

> This message came to me from the LORD: "Son of man, once there were two sisters who were daughters of the same mother. They became prostitutes in Egypt. Even as young girls, they allowed men to fondle their breasts. The older girl was named Oholah, and her sister was Oholibah. I married them, and they bore me sons and daughters. I am speaking of Samaria and Jerusalem, for Oholah is Samaria and Oholibah is Jerusalem.
> "Then Oholah lusted after other lovers instead of me, and she gave her love to the Assyrian officers. They were all attractive young men, captains and commanders dressed in handsome blue, charioteers driving their horses. And so she prostituted herself with the most desirable men of Assyria, worshiping their > idols and defiling herself. For when she left Egypt, she did not leave her spirit of prostitution behind. She was still as lewd as in her youth, when the Egyptians slept with her, fondled her breasts, and used her as a prostitute.

> “And so I handed her over to her Assyrian lovers, whom she desired so much. They stripped her, took away her children as their slaves, and then killed her. After she received her punishment, her reputation was known to every woman in the land.
> “Yet even though Oholibah saw what had happened to Oholah, her sister, she followed right in her footsteps. And she was even more depraved, abandoning herself to her lust and prostitution. She fawned over all the Assyrian officers—those captains and commanders in handsome uniforms, those charioteers driving their horses—all of them attractive young men. I saw the way she was going, defiling herself just like her older sister.
> “Then she carried her prostitution even further. She fell in love with pictures that were painted on a wall—pictures of Babylonian military officers, outfitted in striking red uniforms. Handsome belts encircled their waists, and flowing turbans crowned their heads. They were dressed like chariot officers from the land of Babylonia. When she saw these paintings, she longed to give herself to them, so she sent messengers to Babylonia to invite them to come to her. So they came and committed adultery with her, defiling her in the bed of love. After being defiled, however, she rejected them in disgust.
> “In the same way, I became disgusted with Oholibah and rejected her, just as I had rejected her sister, because she flaunted herself before them and gave herself to satisfy their lusts. Yet she turned to even greater prostitution, remembering her youth when she was a prostitute in Egypt. She lusted after lovers with genitals as large as a donkey’s and emissions like those of a horse. And so, Oholibah, you relived your former days as a young girl in Egypt, when you first allowed your breasts to be fondled.”

Oholah took on the exact same whore path as Oholibah even though she saw firsthand how it led to her absolute ruin. Do you know any women today who fail to think of the consequences of their promiscuity? Do you know any women who are unable to see what will happen to them if they continue down the wrong road? Considering that Western governments have just about removed all ramifications for a woman’s actions, it’s no surprise that we have nations full of Oholahs and Oholibahs.

Unlike the American government, God exacted his furious vengeance on Oholibah:

> "Therefore, Oholibah, this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will send your lovers against you from every direction—those very nations from which you turned away in disgust. For the Babylonians will come with all the Chaldeans from Pekod and Shoa and Koa. And all the Assyrians will come with them—handsome young captains, commanders, chariot officers, and other high-ranking officers, all riding their horses.
> They will all come against you from the north with chariots, wagons, and a great army prepared for attack. They will take up positions on every side, surrounding you with men armed with shields and helmets. And I will hand you over to them for punishment so they can do with you as they please. I will turn my jealous anger against you, and they will deal harshly with you. They will cut off your nose and ears, and any survivors will then be slaughtered by the sword. Your children will be taken away as captives, and everything that is left will be burned.

In modern times, Oholibah will get free welfare while a dozen beta males form a line in front of her door bearing gifts, love, and commitment.

The Old Testament's Thoughts On Women

One of the most consistent messages of the Bible is a clear warning to stay away from promiscuous or immoral women. In fact, it's safe to say that God hates whores.

> There shall be no whore of the daughters of Israel, nor a sodomite of the sons of Israel. (Deuteronomy 23:17)
> A worthy wife is a crown for her husband, but a disgraceful woman is like cancer > in his bones. (Proverbs 12:4)

God also hates the man who sleeps with whores:

> Wisdom will save you from the immoral woman, from the seductive words of the promiscuous woman. She has abandoned her husband and ignores the covenant she made before God. Entering her house leads to death; it is the road to the grave. The man who visits her is doomed. He will never reach the paths of life. (Proverbs 2:16-19)

Don't be tempted by the whore's siren call:

> For the lips of an immoral woman are as sweet as honey, and her mouth is smoother than oil. But in the end she is as bitter as poison, as dangerous as a double-edged sword. (Proverbs 5:3-4)
> Let your wife be a fountain of blessing for you. Rejoice in the wife of your youth. She is a loving deer, a graceful doe. Let her breasts satisfy you always. May you always be captivated by her love. Why be captivated, my son, by an immoral woman, or fondle the breasts of a promiscuous woman? (Proverbs 5:18-20)

Play with fire and you will get burned, as many modern men can bear witness to:

> Can a man scoop a flame into his lap and not have his clothes catch on fire? Can he walk on hot coals and not blister his feet? So it is with the man who sleeps with another man's wife. He who embraces her will not go unpunished. (Proverbs 6:27-29)

A good woman is a treasure:

> Who can find a virtuous and capable wife? She is more precious than rubies. Her husband can trust her, and she will greatly enrich his life. She brings him good, not harm, all the days of her life. (Proverbs 31:10-13)
> It's better to live alone in the corner of an attic than with a quarrelsome wife in a lovely home. (Proverbs 21:9)
> A quarrelsome wife is as annoying as constant dripping on a rainy day. Stopping her complaints is like trying to stop the wind or trying to hold something with greased hands. (Proverbs 27:15-16)
> A beautiful woman who lacks discretion is like a gold ring in a pig's snout. (Proverbs 11:22)

A woman who cheats on her husband will have a curse laid upon her:

> But if thou hast gone aside to another instead of thy husband, and if thou be defiled, and some man have lain with thee beside thine husband. Then the priest shall charge the woman with an oath of cursing, and the priest shall say unto the woman, The LORD make thee a curse and an oath among thy people, when the LORD doth make thy thigh to rot, and thy belly to swell. And this water that > causeth the curse shall go into thy bowels, to make thy belly to swell, and thy thigh to rot: And the woman shall say, Amen, amen. (Numbers 5:20-22)

The harem dance, oil on canvas, 65 x 115 cm

Conclusion

How can we reconcile the above with the modern "spiritual" woman doing just about the complete opposite? While these words are in the Old Testament, Jesus took an even harder line, declaring that divorce is the same as committing adultery:

> "Moses permitted you to divorce your wives because your hearts were hard. But it was not this way from the beginning. I tell you that anyone who divorces his wife, except for sexual immorality, and marries another woman commits adultery." (Matthew 19:8-9)

Was this declaration fulfilled and changed by another one of God's prophets since Jesus? I ask because you sure don't see it being taught in modern Christian churches. In fact, Christian countries have the highest divorce rate in the world, significantly higher than that of Muslim countries. From that comes broken homes, deviant children, further degeneracy, and a low birth rate which sets the stage for third-world immigration to help prop up the welfare state.

It's clear that Christian churches have been subverted by feminist thinking. The priests of today are no longer teaching from the Bible but making it up as they go along to appease the promiscuous women who fill the pulpits and want to be graced by God's goodness will even though they don't follow His word.

The teachings I've found in the Bible concerning women very closely match my own experience from sleeping with the most promiscuous of them. Unless there are restraints on their behavior, they will rush to becoming just like Oholah and Oholibah, and society will suffer as a result.

How Did The Situation In Greece Get To Be So Bad?

October 5, 2016 | by Varonos Minxaouzen | Link | Original Link

Greece is the most surreal country in the world—its defying of logic can hardly be found anywhere else. It is a place where East meets West and the Greek people have adopted some of the worst qualities of both, but not even a single good one from each one. Greece is in no better situation than the rest of Europe, in fact under many cases it is in a much worse one.

The Ottoman Influence

The Fall of Byzantium and the Ottoman Conquest of Greece. The beginning of Greece's Troubles.

This is the basis for the development of the modern Greek mind. Everything happened because the Ottoman Turks conquered the Eastern Roman Empire (Byzantium). That had a great impact because most scholars and a part of the nobility (from which most scholars came) fled to Europe. That meant that for the next 400 years there was no development of Greek thought and language—in truth, there was deterioration. The Greek language has lost many of its significant characteristics and most of its abilities in writing, even it’s highly articulated pronunciation that was fathered in the middle ages. The lack of competent scholars led to the not developing of the needed words for such conversation.

Political Apathy

Politically the problem was the influence of the devlet. The devlet is the oppressive Arabic state (dawlat in Arabic) that the Ottomans applied to their general governorship. The devlet created a servile, but unruly, character to any people that were ruled by it. In short the people have lost any political inclination, which made them expect only an economic relationship with the state. For this reason, Greeks politically are apathetic to any issue, except if it concerns their pockets, while having a tendency to rebel for any small issue but never for a serious one.

Phillo-Ottomanism

Surprisingly there was also the development of a Stockholm syndrome with the Ottomans by the neo-Orthodox school of thought in Greece. That was phillo-Ottomanism. The neo-Orthodox was a right-wing school with leanings to the church, whose most members were ex-socialist or ex-Marxists (or Trotskyists) or ex-communists (communism in Greece is Stalinist). These people believed that the Ottomans unwillingly helped the Greek people to develop their own culture on their own terms, making it unique! They consider that in the end it was a good thing that Greece was cut off from any European influence and developed a peasant culture. In conversations with commoners in the country, a simplified version of these beliefs is a frequent occurrence.

Greek Orientalism

This in time lead to Orientalism: In Greece people feel closer to Turks and Arabs than Europeans. In Greece culture was mostly imported: literature from France for a great part of the 20th century, music from the middle east and India, series from Turkey now in modern times. This phenomenon has led to the eradication of reason from the Greek mind. Greeks have only emotional reactions and their vindication towards political folly remains verbal. Also it is the reason why most Greeks shout for communication and are easy to pick a fight with.

Greek Marxism

Freedom-Bread-Education: the banner of the Greek Left

The only times when Greek scholars came to the right were in the beginning of the previous century, and all of them studied either in Germany, Russia, or Italy. The problem with them was that they did not write philosophy, only treatises on self-governorship or comments and funny articles on newspapers. Leftists though took complete control of academia and the culture in Greece. Everything had to be based upon their beliefs. In Greece public universities are geared to creating communists and anarchists from the 70's, the Junta did not manage to remove them from these positions.

The only difference that has been noted from the 80's is that the universities have become recruiting groundd for the two main parties, so they also produce Pasokists (now Syrizaists) and New Democratics (cuckconservatives) all in all it is mainly geared to leftism.

Feminized Culture

Literature in Greece survived in its Greek form by lowering its standards and mimicking the orient. Specifically it relied on overt expressions of emotion but with some sexual degeneracy to subsidize westernization. Series also took that road long before Turkish TV series appeared. Also, even the old Greek movies primarily based themselves on this formula. An interesting thing is that the 80's were the last time Greece produced action oriented material through its cinema or its fledgling television. Later the complete takeover or sex-comedies and soap-operas dramatic series took place.

Far more importantly, in the country gun laws are some of the most restrictive in the world. For owning even a shotgun (a hunting gun here) a specific diploma is required, while self-defense is highly discouraged by the law. The problem though stands true even for the policemen, as they do not know when and how they are allowed to use their guns! Lastly in Greece the culture that surrounds the military is highly hostile. In fact, we do not want to have an army and many Greeks cannot even understand its use! This has led to its deterioration.

A Lack Of Seriousness

All these point to the fact that in Greece nothing is taken seriously. Our borders, our economy, our defense, our culture, our religion, our education, our policing, near nothing is taken seriously… ‘til the excrement hits the fan. This is a product of Orientalism in Greece, but also points to another great problem. In this country the education system has been deteriorating for the last 30 years at least. Greeks do not learn even how to avoid mistakes with their language, not even in the universities. Journalists make juvenile mistakes in grammar, syntax, even inflection (Greek is a fusional language like German, or Russian, or Italian)!

Literate Illiteracy

This is the most important part: here you’ve got no choice. That’s it. The schools do not teach anything right. The teaching of Greek and history in schools is so bad that some parents teach these subjects to their kids themselves, to alleviate the effects. I need to point out that homeschooling was never legal here and won’t be legalized. I also need to underline the fact that boarding schools do not exist, while private schools are forced to have the exact same curriculum as the public ones. The only reason they exist is that they better look after the kids and control the courtyard.

This brings to a situation in which most people younger than 50 have at least a diploma, and on paper they should be of the most literate people in the world. When literacy is being counted they try to find how many books one person has read in his life—half of Greeks have read only one. Most works of economy, self-improvement, philosophy and politics are just out of reach for the vast majority, as relatively few works are being translated.

Greek “Nihilism”

Andreas Papandreou, still reigning from the dead.

After the fall of the junta in the mid-70’s Greece started a transformation to its political game. The two main parties could not support the changing paradigm, as a man came that awoke Greeks from their apathy. That man was Andreas Papandreou and his nemesis was Konstantinos Karamanlis, the bringer of democracy. These men were so popular at their time that in some cases holy icons were replaced by their portraits. In the end though the truly influential was the first.

Papandreou made Greeks actively vote on the promise of them being put to work in the public sector (they cannot fire you from it) and on giving them money from the economic EU handouts. He promoted also all the lifestyle magazines, which changed Greek culture dramatically during the 90's when they became influential. In the end the average Greek cannot comprehend anything but: money, food and sex. These magazines required 10 years to see any significant success in Greece, but when that happened, with the help of PASOK on their start, Greece ceased to be a traditional society. Even worse politically if one wants to rule over Greece he cannot have the votes if he doesn't follow the political paradigm of Papandreou. This makes Greek politics totally unable to adapt to any developing situation!

Political Holy Relics And Prideful Misery

This has led to the creation of political blasphemy. In Greece one may not touch the public sector, except the army and the police, due to our culture of constant rebellion. One may never touch public businesses, or sell public land. That is a problem because the public sector rarely manages anything properly. A good example is the "Elliniko," a vast amount of land that used to be an airport 20 years ago. It has been left to rot ever since, and even the idea of giving it to an entrepreneur to make resorts is preposterous to the Greek mind.

Last many Greeks have some sort of pride in misery. If a Greek takes any service from the public sector and does not have money for the private, for some reason he takes pride in it. But it is not the pride like "my country gives healthcare to everyone" but "public services are much better than private ones." That occurrence is personally referred also the "public medallion." It is needed to point that wealthy leftists work always on the public sector, or develop close ties to it, and take all their services from the private one. For the ones working in the public sector, many of them figuratively beg politicians for a job with no prospects with the basic salary (500€ and you cannot support a family with it) and are proud for it.

Fads As The Only Motivation

This leads the final observation: after the fall of the junta there appeared, like from nowhere, democratism. The democratists were people who believed in democracy but from an anti-junta perspective. The junta said it valued three things: Fatherland, Religion and Family. The democratists preached against these while their believers were called fascists. In the end it was not a serious movement and in time it passed. The problem is that even the ones following did not really lived up to their beliefs, they were only preaching them.

Celebrating Misery, Lies and Corruption: The modern Greek youth has no idea. The image is from a SYRIZA rally

Today, that fad is anti-racism. While most “racists” will not suffer repercussions, as this will happen only if the incident goes to the news, it is a fad to support “refugees”. The fact is, no one wants to deal with them and everyone throws them to the next person, like a hot potato, so that he can deal with them.

This in time will pass, but it will leave many problems to be solved. Whether Greece is capable of solving them remains to be seen.

What You Need To Do If Hillary Wins

October 6, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Nearly all the writers at Return Of Kings support Donald Trump. We believe that he represents a genuine threat to the hegemony of the oligarchs that control US domestic and foreign policy. While we are hoping for a Trump win, we recognize that it is far from a sure thing and that we should always be prepared for the worst. Here are some things we should do if the unthinkable happens and Hillary wins.

Realize that the game is over

If Hillary wins the election, trying to change the country democratically will become impossible. Hillary promises to grant citizenship to the 12 million illegal Central American immigrants already in the US. She also promises to flood the country with more third world immigrants from Islamic countries. Once this happens, the US will change from a center-right country to one that is hard left. The change will be permanent.

There are people who disagree with my conclusion. These “principled conservatives” believe that Islamic and illegal immigrants are “natural conservatives” who will become Republicans if the party is true to its “conservative principles.” They imagine that Muslims and illegals will join white and black Christians in voting for a government that opposes socialistic welfare programs and supports conservative positions on marriage, abortion, and small government.

Although these principled conservatives are good people, they are hopelessly deluded and naïve. In reality, over 90% of blacks, 70% of Asians, and 60% of Hispanics consistently vote Democrat. Despite all of the pandering the GOP has done over the past 50 years, they haven’t moved the needle in their direction. The only thing preventing the US from going full SJW is white men. Once white men lose their demographic advantage under Hillary, the US will permanently become a leftist state.

What that means for us is that it will not make further sense to pay attention to conventional politics or participate in the democratic process. But that doesn’t mean that we should be passive. We’ll just have to recognize that any positive change will have to come from more difficult, less appealing avenues.

But opportunities will arise

An opportunity to storm the gates will arise

A state built on constant racial agitation, tax laws that protect the wealth of the super-rich while making it difficult for everyone else to get ahead, unchecked immigration, proxy wars, and globalist trade policy that eviscerates the country’s manufacturing sector is not sustainable. It will not happen immediately but it is just a matter of time until things begin to unravel. Your job will be to prepare for this inevitability.

Don’t expect one huge collapse. Rather, expect a long series of small collapses followed by periods of stability as the government gradually becomes unable to manage the chaos it has unleashed. This will create opportunities for local action to fill the gaps that the crumbling system is unable to address. This process will take years, but you will not be able to fill the gaps unless you begin preparing today.

Arm Yourself

A more immediate concern is ensuring that you are exercising your Second Amendment to bear arms. Hillary has repeatedly made it clear that she favors more stringent gun control. So far, Democrats have been stymied by the Supreme Court that has tilted slightly conservative. If Hilary wins, that protection will be removed. Justice Scalia's slot is already open and Justice Ginsburg is ancient and not doing well. Justice Kennedy is already 80 and Justice Breyer is not far behind at 78. It is possible that Hillary could fill four to five slots during her supposed presidential reign—tilting the Court in a liberal direction for the next 20 years.

Conservatives like to think that liberal justices will still feel bound by the text of the Constitution. This is just more naiveté. A liberal Court will interpret the Constitution as a "living document" where it means exactly what the Court wants it to mean. You can expect a Court case that holds that guns are intended only for state regulated militias like the National Guard—not regular citizens.

But before that case comes down the pike, Hillary will move to regulate firearms and ammunition. After all, if you can't obtain ammo, your gun is useless. If Hillary gets in, stock up while supplies last.

Prepare to lose your platform

Ravens are used for communication in Game of Thrones but we'll need something better.

Americans are proud of their First Amendment right to free speech but even today that doesn't mean that you have the right to say anything. For example, no one has the right to yell "fire" in a crowded movie theatre because it would endanger lives. Expect the same reasoning to be applied to speech that might hurt other people's feelings. President Obama has already signaled that he prefers a more limited First Amendment.

Does what you are saying offend Muslims and cause them to blow up? It can be banned. If an article makes feminists feel bad, it can be banned. If your speech is in any way racist, it can be banned. The newly upgraded Supreme Court will interpret the First Amendment in the same way as it interprets the Second—in a more limited fashion.

Expect the currently damper on free speech to accelerate on the private social media platforms. It has already happened to Facebook. You are allowed to freely espouse any political opinion as long as that opinion comports with what Mark Zuckerberg deems acceptable political discourse. The same is becoming true of Twitter. If Hillary wins, we can expect that trend to continue with the encouragement of the federal government.

By the way, this may jeopardize Return Of Kings which is guilty of just about every "sin" that the left wing hates.

Prepare now by developing alternative methods of communicating with people electronically. This will necessitate the development of alternative communication platforms and the technical know-how to stay one step ahead of the censors.

Build your tribe

It follows naturally from what has been said above that face-to-face relations will increase in importance in the future. This applies whether or not Hillary gets in, but will happen faster if she does. It is imperative that you build a network of men (and it has to be limited to men) locally. This is a group of men that you work out with, train with, and socialize with. Ideally, you all know why you are getting together. General agreement of world view is important as well. You can't have soy-eating, Hillary-supporting, transgender otherkin as part of your crew.

It is possible to meet your tribe members online, but try to make use of existing face-to-face networks as it makes it more difficult to infiltrate. I personally spend time with a group of very traditional men from my local church. Not everyone of them realize the depth of onslaught we will face in the future, but they all know that traditional society is under attack. We share the common goal of wanting a healthy society where we can raise our children in safety.

Conclusion

Of course, I still hope that Trump wins in November. In the best case, Trump will not only be able to arrest the decline but begin reversing it. If that is the case, we will able to begin rebuilding a healthy society. But we have to remember that Trump is only one man and the forces arrayed against us are great. In any case it is prudent to adopt the old Boy Scout motto: “Be Prepared.”

7 Times You Should Do The Opposite Of What People Tell You

There's a pretty simple way to maximize your self improvement.

Do the opposite of what everyone else does.

It's easy. Most people in the masses are so plugged in, they're like zombies in their day to day life. They do everything that everyone tells them.

Just reading sites like Return Of Kings puts you in that percentage of men who are at least capable of stepping out of the typical drone life. Simply reading this site is a perfect example of what "normal people" don't do.

So let's apply this methodology to the rest of life. Here are 7 things where you should consider doing the opposite of what everyone else is doing.

1. College

Four years ago, I walked out of my college graduation with a degree in economics. The next week, I walked into my new job.

As a computer engineer.

Less than three years later, I walked out of that office, hopped on a plane, and now I have my own online business(s). Just because everyone says you should go to college doesn't mean you should. Especially with rising tuition costs, absurd SJW-inspired disciplinary rules, and an oversaturation of four-year degrees now in the workforce.

While I won't go as far as to say that you shouldn't go to college, you should at least look at the other alternatives and see how they stack up relative to where you want to get in life.

The opposite: Trade schools and entrepreneurship are becoming the new norm, especially for those who aspire to be location independent.

2. Pre-Planned Vacation Packages

Too many people use their precious two weeks a year to jump into a pre-planned vacation package.

Why on Earth would you want to go from taking orders from your boss to taking a "vacation" where you're told what to do the entire time.

Take a cruise, for example. You're told when to show up. When you can or can't be off the ship. You're shoveled into a stateroom that is about the size of a cubicle in an office. It's hardly any different!

The opposite: Book a solo trip somewhere you haven't been, or better yet–haven't even heard of. You will see more growth than you ever would imagine.

3. Buying Material Items

Much of what we're told we must have is completely unnecessary. Most people overload themselves with expensive cars, houses, boats, televisions, and more. Did I mention diamond rings?

The opposite: Life minimally. Maximize what you do have. A laptop can be both a work device and a way to unwind and watch a movie. An 85 inch television isn't necessary for that. If you feel you need a nice car to impress women, improve your game. The possibilities on this one are endless.

4. Being The Nice Guy

They've always finished last and always will. From a young age we're told that we need to treat women like special little snowflakes—then, and only then will they want us as men.

The result is flocks of guys trying to buy girls drinks in bars, tons of guys kissing their feet, and ultimately a lot of unhappy women confused why they don't like the nice guys.

The opposite: While you don't have to be a complete dick to girls, you do need to have a spine. Stand up for yourself and who you are. Call her out on her bullshit. She'll thank you later.

5. Crash Dieting

While I won't get into specific dieting methodologies, it doesn't take a genius to figure out that an “all-carb” diet isn’t going to get you a chiseled and masculine physique.

Rather than doing their own research, most people will just listen to what other people tell them to do in regards to their health. Even if it’s completely counterproductive.

The opposite: Make lifestyle changes that have long term health benefits as opposed to fad diets. And do your own research.

6. Making Money Online

Making money online is all the rage these days. And the gurus are willing to teach you ALL their secrets—for the low price of three payments of $4,997!

It’s easy to tell these guys apart from the guys who are genuinely trying things and putting out good advice. If someone talks about their online money making failures, and is able to discuss in hindsight why they failed and what they did to improve, it’s likely that they have a genuine interest in trying to help people. Genuine product reviews for things they actually use help, too.

The opposite: Don’t just blindly throw away thousands of dollars on get-rich-quick schemes. Understand that making money online isn’t hard, but isn’t easy, either. It takes work. Be unlike everyone else and be willing to put in the work.

7. Savor The Process

Too many people have a “give me now” attitude in today’s world. They don’t want to put in the work, time or effort to make good thing happen with their lives. Everything in life is about instant gratification.

You see this played out every day. Girls choosing to be Instagram whores for instant gratification as opposed to working on developing themselves so that they can one day be a good wife and mother.

Men choosing to blindly follow whomever they have deemed to be their hero (see: professional athletes) instead of developing who they are as a man. This is a poisonous attitude that leads to a poor work ethic and low energy.

The opposite: Develop a true routine that allows you stability in life. Go for a morning walk to clear your head in the morning. Avoid starting your day with an hour of browsing Twitter. Design your own routine that allows you to be productive and stay there.

And finally, try new things. Sometimes the best thing that ever happens to you is just around the corner.

How Our Government Is Sanctioning A New Kind Of Tyranny

October 6, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

My first knowledge of anarcho-tyranny was when my grandfather got busted in a sting. His "crime" was cutting hair without a license, which got him a fine. I should mention a few particulars. He was retired and just doing this as a hobby. He had been a barber until retirement, cutting hair since likely well before the arresting officer was born. Furthermore, this was near the border of Mexico where drug smuggling and human trafficking was rampant. Also, in that very RV park, burglaries were taking place. It just happened to be more expedient and profitable to bust an old guy for cutting hair—which he certainly knew how to do, despite not having that state's paperwork—than to go catch some real crooks.

Theodore Dalrymple touched on anarcho-tyranny when he aimed his considerable writing talent at the way parking tickets are disbursed like confetti in Britain. He begins:

> The alacrity, efficiency and speed with which monies are collected from certain members of the public are in stark contrast with the incompetence, inefficiency, and waste with which the ends for which the monies are supposedly collected are pursued. In short, the British public administration is a Moloch whose appetite grows with the feeding, and whose only real purpose is to feed itself. Existence and expansion is its very raison d'etre.

Basically, it has nothing to do with public safety; it's all a big cash cow for the government. Other examples readily spring to mind, such as speed traps. Worse are automated cameras to detect speeding and red light violations. That's not really about safety, but rather about playing "gotcha" and fleecing citizens. Still, there's more to it than that.

What anarcho-tyranny means

The late Sam Francis, who would've fit in quite well into today's alternative right scene, did the most to describe the concept. As he put it, that's "a kind of Hegelian synthesis of two opposites—anarchy and tyranny." He states as an example that we allow illegal aliens to invade our country, yet at the same time we went out of our way to invade Iraq without due cause.

I would add, it's not just illegal immigration that's the problem. Ever since Ted Kennedy's 1965 Immigration Act, the USA has let in people from anywhere with no thought as to how they'll fit in with the rest of the public. (The European equivalent is the Coudenhove-Kalergi Plan, implemented by Eurocrats such as Angela Merkel the arch-hypocrite.) The public is never consulted about these population replacement policies, of course. When problems happen—9/11, the Fort Hood shooting, the San Bernardino shooting, the Orlando nightclub shooting, etc.—the answer always is that the government needs more powers (like the Patriot Act) to stop this. How about instead we stop letting in people not compatible with the host population?

As Francis further explained:

> What we have in this country today, then, is both anarchy (the failure of the state to enforce the laws) and, at the same time, tyranny—the enforcement of laws by the state for oppressive purposes; the criminalization of the law-abiding and innocent through exorbitant taxation, bureaucratic regulation, the invasion of privacy, and the engineering of social institutions, such as the family and local schools; the imposition of thought control through "sensitivity training" and multiculturalist curricula, "hate crime" laws, gun-control laws that punish or disarm otherwise law-abiding citizens but have no impact on violent criminals who get guns illegally, and a vast labyrinth of other measures. In a word, anarcho-tyranny.

Basically, the government doesn't make a serious effort to stop real crime, although it's certainly capable of doing so. Meanwhile, it harasses honest citizens over petty matters. It's an overreaching nanny state—verging on a police state—with selective enforcement directed at the wrong people. Since Francis wrote about it, there has been greater effort to control crime. Even so, we're far from being where we should be, and the government still has misplaced priorities.

Soft on real crime

Some crimes do get taken seriously. Murders will be investigated. The authorities will pull out the stops when politically incorrect motives are involved. On the other hand, don’t expect much effort if you’re the victim of a burglary or mugging. The most that’s likely to come of it is that you’ll get a police report for the insurance company.

Today, gangs aren’t exactly the Jets and the Sharks from West Side Story. Now, we have outfits such as the Bloods, the Crips, MS-13, and so forth. They number in tens of thousands each, cross state and sometimes national boundaries, and use social media to organize and coordinate operations. Why does the government tolerate large paramilitary criminal organizations? With our electronic surveillance apparatus beyond the wildest dreams of Stasi or the KGB, they could be rounded up and charged with organized crime overnight. Apparently whoever is running all that has other priorities in mind.

Gangs, rioters, and the presence of urban “no go zones” seem more befitting of Afghanistan or the outlands of Pakistan. This is symptomatic of a weak state, reminiscent of a Third World country with guerillas lurking in the jungle, or a medieval kingdom with bandits controlling the highlands. The USA isn’t the only industrialized country where this surreal arrangement exists. Every so often, Muslim rioters erupt from the Parisian banlieues to torch cars and buildings . Britain has seen its share of similar incidents too.

The government seems to have a great deal of tolerance for those who steal with a pen. Sure, the Enron executives were brought to justice. (J. Clifford Baxter “committed suicide” shortly after agreeing to testify. Later, CEO Ken Lay had a convenient “coronary” and was hastily cremated.) Bernie Madoff got sent to Club Fed after his $9 billion Ponzi scheme collapsed. Still, there were no legal consequences for the 2007-2008 financial crisis, which plagues the economy to this day.

There were many opportunities for fraud charges: banks that underwrote liar loans for people who defaulted on their ARMs as soon as the interest rate went up, investment firms selling the shady mortgages as bundled securities, rating agencies certifying these investments as high grade, credit default swap issuers way over their heads, etc. Instead, the banksters that got their fingers burnt with their casino capitalism got bailed out because they’re “too big to fail”.

Tough on trivial “crimes”

This is the actual logo of an electronic spying agency. Could they possibly be any more blatant about this NWO stuff?

There's something to be said for the "broken windows" theory of controlling crime. Giuliani did much to improve New York City by going after graffiti, turnstile-jumpers, and the like. However, anarcho-tyranny goes well beyond this by criminalizing trifling things and coming up with new ways to hassle honest citizens. As Tacitus noted two thousand years ago, "When the republic is at its most corrupt, the laws are most numerous."

As Sam Francis said:

> Just before the end of this year's legislative session, the Maryland lawmakers passed several new laws that (a) allow policemen to stop drivers for not wearing seat belts, (b) authorize hidden cameras at red lights to take secret photographs of the license plates of cars that run the lights, (c) ban loud car stereos on state roads, (d) forbid minors from buying butane lighters because they might inhale the gas, and (e) require drivers whose windshield wipers are running to keep their headlights on. The lawmakers seem to have missed outlawing cooking breakfast in your underwear, but of course there's always another session next year.
> The citizens of Maryland will no doubt be thrilled to learn that law enforcement in their state has now so mastered violent crime that the cops have little else to do but round up non-seat-belt wearers and butane-sniffers. As a matter of fact, Maryland's Prince George's County has just announced that rapes and homicides increased in the first three months of 1997. Nevertheless, you can be certain that no one will be raped or murdered without wearing a seat belt.

Indeed, Maryland is a prime offender. One of my friends got pulled over three times for trivialities shortly after moving there. Later, I was driving him around while visiting, and he warned me not to pull out so soon from stop signs. I replied, "I've been waiting five seconds. Should I wait ten?"

The campus rape witch hunts are another prime example. As directed by the Obama administration, guys can get thrown out of college on no more than an allegation, subject to the findings of tribunals and without due process protections. If actual crimes are taking place, why are they being handled that way? Too many famous cases turned out to be groundless. Not only are the lives of the falsely accused ruined, it's simply a bad idea to trivialize a serious crime like that.

Gun control is yet another example of anarcho-tyranny. Some debate the existence of natural rights, but the fact is that survival is encoded into our DNA to be our first priority. American citizens who seek to be as well-armed as the bad guys must deal with a lot of red tape first. The more left-leaning the locale, the more onerous and restrictive this is. Many other countries forbid private ownership of guns. After Britain did so, crimes involving guns increased drastically, and the incidence of home invasions skyrocketed. So what's going on here—is it just pointy-headed liberals worried about muggers getting themselves shot? Or do those pushing gun control want the public scared, dependent, and disarmed?

Who benefits?

The government gets a lot from anarcho-tyranny. This includes:

- More money from tickets and fines
- Job security and justification for their budgets
- The politicians can talk about how they're "tough on crime" or doing something about public safety by these empty gestures
- Expanded powers and ability to control citizens
- Security theater
- Domestic spying
- Social engineering
- The ability to crack down on dissidents selectively

Ancillary parties benefit too, such as propaganda groups delivering "sensitivity training" and multicultural curricula (as Sam Francis mentioned), activists, foundations, "watchdog" outfits, and so forth. All told, it's a hell of a racket for both The System and The Hive.

Wherever anarcho-tyranny is found, that's evidence that the government has its priorities way out of order and isn't working for your interests. Unfortunately, this trend is still rising. The greatest problem with soft despotism is that it could lead to hardcore despotism.

The Polish Pro-Abortion “Black Protest” Shows That No Place Is Safe From Degenerate Liberalism

Last Monday, crowds of protesters (almost entirely women) lead a strike in over 50 cities across Poland to demonstrate against a controversial law that would introduce a complete ban on abortions in the country. Many of those female protesters were sporting black clothes, to symbolise the mourning of their rights.

In the Catholic nation of Poland, where as we have seen before, the religion holds an essential part of the ethos and culture of the country, droves of loud women assembled in front of the ruling Law and Justice party (PiS) headquarters in the capital, Warsaw, to yell their disagreement. The largest turnout in the land occurred in the Polish capital and reached 20,000 people.

No functioning ovaries in sights

The project of law that might be adopted will not bring a lot of change to the already existing one, as abortion will still be available if the woman is raped (by the same “rape culture” or “epidemic” that only exists in the unstable mind of a few 15-stone “real, beautiful women”) or the development of the foetus endangers the mother’s life.

This demonstration was mainly organised on social media and by liberal women hence its lack of substance and actual measures proposed to address the issue.

The Czarny Protest also took place in the spots where strong, independent Polish girls flock to slut it up, away from the scrutiny of the motherland. London, Berlin, Paris and Sydney also had their microscopic Black Protest.

The usual suspects

It was mainly organised to score a work-free day and “not doing domestic chores”. As you can guess, the crowd was mainly composed of old women past menaupose, young unemployed slutty girls (none above 7/10 WB) afraid that their pass for the cock carousel might be revoked and ugly Skrillex haired feminists that no man in his right mind would touch with a ten foot pole.

The token low-t white knights were dragged along to show the patriarchy that “men” agree.

Man-jawed feminists’ main goal, instead of actually caring about women and proposing ideas, was to “halt the economy” by exhorting girls to walk out of their daily jobs.

It failed. Women, representing a lesser workforce in Poland than in the Western nations, were already not very keen about forfeiting a day of salary (that kind of behaviour does not go well with the masculine, hard work ethic that carachterises Polish male bosses) and taking the risk of being seen as slackers.

Add to that the hard reality of the Polish minimum wage (gravitating around 450 USD) and the fact that the only "acts of resistance" consisted of shared hashtags and selfies with black clothes, and you have a movement that will be short-lived

A storm in a teacup

The turnout was minimal compared to the headlines that the mainstream media slapped all over the waves. Around 20.000 screeching carousel enthusiasts for Warsaw (1.7 million inhabitants) and much less for all the main Polish cities. Also, it was raining so many hairy legged harpies said "Meh" and went home.

Nothing compared to the crowds that far right rallies usually bring in Poland, which of course, are not relayed by the left-leaning press. The feminist mobs totalled to a bit more than 100.000 protesters for the whole country, far from the "6 million women" human tide that leftist MS papers such as the defunct Independent announced. Sad!

It does not change anything to the fact that girls accustomed to regular one-night stands and who forgot to slap a condom on that sexy bad boy they met at the local dive bar can still cross the close border to Germany to abort the fruit of their slutiness if they feel like it. The ones that usually travel to cockfest destinations like the Spanish Islands or the French sounthern coast will still do it, as they have done for a few years now.

It was just as unsuccessful as the Pro-European liberal demonstrations organised a few months back. But even if the protest is nothing particularly worrying, it is a reminder for the manosphere that no country is safe from the onslaughts of liberalism, no matter how conservative.

Of course, if you disagree with the protest, you are a mohawk-sporting racist and sexist hooligan. Bubble reads “Listen, they played us with this Black Protest! There are no darkies, only chicks!”

The conservative response was just as present

If any of the football clubs won the national league trophy, the turnout would probably be twenty times stronger. The number of screaming cunts brandishing coat hangers was dwarfed by demonstrations such as the one organised by Polish nationalists against the European Union reforms (50.000 strong in Warsaw alone) last winter.

Polish anti-EU nationalist protest of November 2015

Polish Foreign Minister Witold Waszczykowski puts it quite well, taunting the demonstrators on the absence of measures proposed by their clique.

> We expect serious debate on questions of life, death and birth. We do not expect happenings, dressing in costumes and creating artificial problems," he said, as cited by AP.

Conservative movements were fast to react by chastising the Black Protes about its lack of depth and its complete contradiction with the Christian faith, engrained in the Polish soul. Traditionalist men and women joined forces against the Black Protest by creating a "White Protest" group. It would not be surprising if a nationwide pro-life march occurs in the next few days.

The kind of pro-life Polish women using the #WhiteProtest hashtag:

I cannot quite put my finger on it but somehow, their style and beauty level seem slightly different from the one of the women present in the Black Protest march.

As it was expected, PC-controlled social networks like Twitter censored the hashtags #BialyProtest and #WhiteProtest (until some Twitter accounts exposed it) while the #CzarnyProtest and #BlackProtest were relayed everywhere and shown as trending.

Many were also mocking the protesters by recycling their slogan “Moje ciało, moja sprawa!”(My body, my business) directly copied from the “My body, My rules” trumpeted by Western Slut Walk and Fat Acceptance movements.

Conservative parody of the Black Protest slogan. The text reads “I want to snort cocaine legally. My nose, my business. #WhiteProtest”

Another conservative parody : “Henry! You got drunk again!” “My liver, my business!”

Keep you guard up, Poland

This law is being discussed since Spring and until this little happening, few really cared about it. Such an event is again a way to divert the attention of the masses away from the real issues that plague the country. the lack of jobs, the decreasing fertility, the expensive student loans or the EU trying to pressure Poland into opening its borders for thousands of Muslim migrants for its “enrichment”.

What will be interesting in the next few days will be the organised and material response of the majority of the Polish people. Even more so, the results of the investigation on who exactly started this campaign and mobilised this menstruating mob.

Many Polish and European fingers start to point at the crooked shadow that usually pulls the strings behind the destabilisation of Central European democratically elected governments: George Soros. Did not see that coming, did ya?

The #BlackProtest squad of manginas working at Gazeta Wyborcza, left-wing newspaper which was financed more than a few times by George Soros. How quaint…

Why College Is A Warzone For Young Men

October 7, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

If you graduated college more than five years ago, you have no idea what kind of indoctrination center your alma mater has become. Last month I became involved in a weekly community program at my local university. The college environment has changed so much that I barely recognize it, and must strongly encourage young men to reconsider entering the financial and social wasteland known as the American university system.

Ugliness Everywhere

I’m stable and healthy, trust me.

When I entered college as a freshman, it was an oasis of beauty. This was the first time many teenage girls were able to show off their fit bodies without parental control, and they took advantage of this, showing off smooth, toned legs, nice figures, and long hair. Yes, there were fat girls, goth-types that wanted to rebel by wearing black and being unique, just like all the other goth kids, and yes, several girls had tattoos. But it’s nothing like what I see today. If a girl had a tattoo in the last decade, you typically wouldn’t see it until you removed her clothing. If she was fat, she would avert her eyes when you passed because she was embarrassed by her bad hygiene and weight.

If they were so oppressed and unhappy, why are they smiling?

Today, as I enter campus, I must search hard to find a co-ed even worth gazing at. Laziness and ugliness are the norm. Multiple facial (and I'm sure other) piercings, visible tattoos, neon hair, obesity, and poor hygiene are the norm. The smartphone addiction is so bad it is rare to even make eye contact. But most disturbing are the social changes.

Hetero Male Students Are The Enemy

National Gender Studies Honor Society at UCLA

During every visit to campus, without fail, I have been bombarded with at least one NEW anti-male slogan, flyer, sticker, or commentary. Walking down the halls, one will see "Rape Free Zone" stickers and "Safe Space!" signs over professor's doorways. Female only, gay only, and degenerate only groups are encouraged, but male groups are met with violent reaction. There are flyers for LGBTQ clubs and meetings. I picked up the student paper to find a story about a new staff position that has been created to help comfort and support victims of sexual harassment.

The message, sent over and over again, is that YOU, straight male student, YOU are the problem, YOU are being watched, YOU had better shut up, and stop being patriarchal and sexist, YOU are responsible for all the ills of society, and YOU are not welcome here! Finally, this new generation of students is going to control speech, censor ideas, and create new vocabulary until all the problems of society are fixed.

Today they have it all, but they're angry and pissed.

Pick up the student newspaper: I guarantee the editor is a feminist. Look around at the flyers. You will see meetings to discuss sexual deviancy, clubs celebrating degeneracy, and recruitment to the gender studies department (hint: ROK will teach you more in a week about females than any gender studies degree). This week an FBI agent was coming to discuss the sex slave trade and rape culture in America.

Entitled Attitude From Feminists With Zero Accomplishments

College Life, One Generation Ago

While male students are seeing daily reminders of what worthless pieces of shit they are, feminists and other degenerates walk around with their heads held high. And why shouldn't they? They are king of the mountain here. And don't think this will end once they graduate college.

We are creating a new world, a new society where HR departments in the double digits are a requirement for any medium sized business, where gender studies consultants are demanded to give annual lectures to employees who may be tempted to use language not approved by the censors, and where employment benefits packages will include subsidized sex change operations, polyamorous spousal benefits, and free pet food, because it's not fair to subsidize the children of married coworkers but not the expenses for those who have an unhealthy obsession with their German Shepherd.

Pick up a copy of the student newspaper, and you will be exposed to bland, insecure writing equality, feminism, diversity, and a variety of social justice issues, with warnings about second guessing everything you do. Want to visit the Greek food festival this weekend? Fine, but remember not to culturally appropriate anything you bigot! Want to date someone from another culture? That's a nice gesture, but you'd better not be upsetting the power balance and microaggressing while you flirt.

In between propaganda articles, you will see ads touting the school's diversity policy, reminding the student body how to behave in a nondiscriminatory manner, and oh look, here's an article on trigger warnings, which half of college professors are already using, without the schools even telling them to.

I read a "review" of a local coffee shop that the feminist journalist didn't really like because, like, they didn't even smile at me when they handed my suppafrappalatte to me, and like they didn't even offer the seasonal pumpkin spice option that I later wished I had ordered, and the music was kind of dumb so I doubt I'll be going back there because I just felt kind of creepy the whole time.

Zero Balance

The underlying message behind it all

I am in favor of colleges being open, diverse, and free. A university should expose students to a wide range of ideas, to people from a variety of backgrounds, to new subjects and areas of study, and languages, and foods, and experiences, and ways of thinking. A broad, liberal arts education creates a well rounded, civilized society. But that is not what is happening today.

The group that always made up the largest, most intelligent, and successful group of students, is being attacked, belittled, and marginalized, at the expense of diversity. Diversity is good when it exposes someone to a new viewpoint, culture, or theory. Diversity is bad when it removes two white men and replaces them with chicks with dicks, and pretends now they will be able to better cure cancer. It doesn't work that way.

A Brave New World

It is extremely easy for me to walk down the hallways, smirking at the latest silly SJW slogan, or safe space notice, but that's because I was raised with common sense, morals, and a real liberal arts background. People are social animals, and are products of our environment. We are tribal, and as much as we'd like to think we are all independent autonomous geniuses, our behavior is based in large part on what society teaches us is acceptable.

Why do we eat a cow but not a dog? But in parts of Asia this is reversed? Why do Arab men expect women to be submissive? Why do Western men wear coats in 90 degree summer weather if we work white collar jobs? It's because of our culture and its expectations.

Yeah, who needs morals, right?

The university system is creating a culture where diversity for diversity's sake is good. Where straight masculine men are evil and bad. And where one should be accepted for who they are, no matter how hideous or unhealthy they appear.

This will create less masculine men.

If society tells children and youth that changing genders, mutilating your body, being weak and snarky, and having no universal standards or morality is good, then that's what society will create.

Reconsider College

Rhodes students learning about rape culture

While I went to college, and got some benefit out of it, I would highly recommend young men to reconsider this option today. I come from a family background where one is expected to attend a good college, perform at a high level, and be successful. And yet, I'm not sure I would want my future son or daughter to attend college. The amount of social conditioning, not to mention the increasing financial cost, makes the value of a Western university education questionable. (Although this is tempting).

If you are in college, resist the temptation to chase coeds. They are being told on a daily basis that there are rapists out there, and a culture of rape, and a culture of sex slavery and the people behind all this look exactly like YOU. Minimize your time with fellow students, and focus on getting into the workforce as soon as possible. Or do something truly diverse: take a semester abroad and visit a different culture that may affect your thinking and judgment for the rest of your life.

Seek out truly diverse opinions. Take what good you can from the college experience. Expose yourself to alternate sources of news, information, and viewpoints. Listen to the Kingmaker Podcast instead of bad music. Question friends, and plant seeds of thought and reason. There was a brief time when I actually believed the one in 5 myth. Until someone pointed out that it couldn't possibly be true. Be the voice of reason. Avoid the conditioning, and live life on your terms.

Is It Ever Permissible To Accept Victimhood As A Man?

When one writes such a word as "victimhood," what do you think about? If you are red-pilled enough, you must already be aware that it means something overused and stemming from hostile intentions. We are all too familiar with the muh-past-sufferings and muh-present-sufferings narratives pushed down by these organized groups the mainstream dignifies under the name of "minorities."

Victimhood in general means having part of one's identity, through one's real or purported history, tied to past or present undeserved sufferings. We should distinguish between felt victimhood, which pretty much everyone can harbor, and acknowledged or institutionalized victimhood which carries a variety of benefits, such as public commemorations, homage paid by other groups or people, funding, a place in the media and most institutions, moral authority and public empathy.

Such advantages flow from what we can call a victimhood economy, where the group whose sufferings are the most dignified or acknowledged enjoys the greatest share of the market and consequent advantages—exactly as the bigger shareholders of a company will enjoy the biggest dividends.

An intermediary form of victimhood would be one that exists inside a specific group, but has a hard time to get recognition outside. Such a form of victimhood can be kind of frustrating, as the unrecognized will perceive it as a lack of empathy whereas the other will likely mock it, but it also carries on various advantages, be it only the motivation that can flow from anger and quitting a dangerous state of naiveté to a fitter state of, at least, vigilance.

Here I would like to advocate for the idea that, yes, there can be a healthy and a fit victimhood. There are pitfalls to avoid, such as tying too much of one's identity to past sufferings and living in a state of perpetual trauma, or complaining instead of taking action. Yet, victimhood can also be an asset, especially if it is dominated by a higher awareness instead of dominating said awareness.

Just look at the Jews, who are well-represented at the Ivy League universities, in Hollywood, or almost everywhere there is money to be taken, have politicians kowtowing to them in most Western countries, yet still maintain a fierce communautarian attitude—not to say tribalistic—at the same time than they enjoy a moral authority thanks to what Norman Finkelstein called the Holocaust Industry. Their example shows that enjoying the greater share of the victimhood market can be paired with being, not losers, but the most powerful tribe on Earth.

As I am typing these lines down, I am intimately conscious of the bad reputation victimhood has among our circles. This is normal and natural, for it has been constantly used as a ploy against the dispossessed majority a lot of us hail from. But look at it from another angle: the left does not want us to have any victimhood. There is a big victimhood marketplace out there, and every group or identity acknowledged by the Liberal hegemony has an implicit right to present itself there as having (undeservedly) suffered a lot and still suffering.

The left helped such groups to constitute, i.e. led individuals of particular categories to identify their category as a class and their class as a community of interest competing with others. This has been true with so-called Black identity and with feminism. Both movements are identitarianisms in the sense that they are a separatism based on a feeling of group identity where there was none before, and both have been heavily funded and led by Jews.

On the opposite side, the same left that has been so busy crafting and grievancemongering so-called “minority” groups has also been very active to deny us any right to victimhood, let alone a dignified identity. We are supposed to be responsible of everything and just exist so we can pay for everyone else. In The Current Year, we can’t have the least piece of the victimhood cake, which is not so incidentally all funded by the Evil White Male through taxes and “redistribution.” This makes sense, given that the victimhood market does not create any wealth per se but piggybacks on those who create it.

Feminists have notoriously killed the nice guy by denying him any right to victimhood, that is, by denying that he had suffered unfairly and consequently had a right to acknowledgement and empathy as a nice guy. In the same way, the left has been busy to paint our identities on a very negative light, insisting that our ancestors had been exploiting everyone else without actually producing anything themselves, and thus making our very identities void of dignity, undeserving, tainted by the “privilege” of having had virtuous and able ancestors.

If we succeed at life, we have no merit because it’s all “white privilege,” and if we fail, we are “failures” and “losers” who cannot even succeed even whereas “privileged.” In said case, it goes evidently—and implicitly—that we should await death in silence, given that we have purportedly no right to public acknowledgement and empathy. In both cases, the idea that we have a “privilege” is a powerful mean to always cast us negatively, no matter what we actually do.

This is how the same left that rants about “white privilege” can also admit that the white working class is actually disenfranchised and even rejoice about its planned death: though these positions are inconsistent logically, they are consistent emotionally as they maintain a negative and stained view of whites in general, no matter our actual situation, no matter what we do.

Facing the giant dishonesty of the giant left, its perpetual narrative-spinning, emotional drama and attention-whoring, it is tempting for us to dig any victimhood at all and take the Stoic pose of the self-minded entrepreneur or of the dispassionate, cynical witness. But digging all victimhood as bad and neurotic lets us powerless in front of the motivated, organized, funded professional victims. Instead, I am strongly inclined to think we should accept some victimhood in our identities. For we have a right to it, and we can grow up more mastery—not less—if we do it right. Here come some arguments to support this idea.

1. The problem with the “I am responsible for everything in my life” attitude

Some years ago, a widespread message on the personal improvement circles was the following: if you take charge of your life, you should consider yourself as responsible for everything that happens to you. At first glance, this looks like rehabilitating merit, and this can be a motivating stance. But if we look deeper, we find that message to be the exact reverse of the “I am responsible for nothing, the majority owes me everything” stance one finds into the acknowledged “minorities” and especially womyn. Here we have an unholy complementarity between the personal improvement guy who takes responsibility for everything and the spoiled brat who rejects all responsibility on him. This is a parody of a true and healthy complementarity between the sexes.

The better way to avoid this pitfall is having a proper notion of the woman’s role. And in order to entertain a right notion, we must also remember how men can be manipulated and tricked. This is something we have been doing more or less implicitly for years on ROK. Now, it is time to do it explicitly when we have to, so that no one else can deny our past hardships nor their responsibility into said hardships. Everyone with a skin in the game must be accountable, no matter what—and this means part of our identity can be connected to the misdeeds of other agents.

2. Their victimhood is exaggerated whereas ours is undervalued

Compare the left's narrative with reality. The narrative says that every social category now acknowledged and singularized as a "minority" has been "oppressed" by the Evil White Male and Evil White Race. It adds that whites have always been "privileged" and carry a perpetual guilt for being responsible of the undeserved sufferings of groups that are as innocent as angels and can do no wrong. It is historically true that, say, some women have been seduced through trickery or that some whites (actually a very, very few) possessed slaves. But saying that all X have been "oppressed" or exploited is an exaggeration of gigantic proportions.

In reality, so-called white males have been pioneers, land clearers and cultivators, builders, providing husbands, law-abiding workers and honourable soldiers, while women took their fair share of necessary work. Today, most whites in the West are disenfranchised, struggle to find even a basic job, are almost forbidden to talk about a variety of topics and get scolded every day for simply existing on the lands where their ancestors lived for centuries and built everything. We have way more suffered than they acknowledge, and what we went through should give us a right to moral authority and acknowledgement.

3. We are not responsible for the environment we were born into

As a generation, the Millenials were born much after the leftist cultural upheaval had taken place, and thus we were born as frail creatures inside a world they had taken control of. As individuals born earlier than that, we endured history instead of making it as we should have done and as our ancestors have always done, thanks to the left hydra that hijacked it.

Waving the institutional power and being the continuation of the former left, current leftists have at least some moral responsibility for what the West has turned into. The more they participated and benefited from militant cultural Marxism, the more they are responsible in practice for our plight, whereas we the disenfranchised are not responsible for, say, having lived without a father and having underwent pussylessness or huge betaness. We have been unable and suffering nice guys or beta males because of the left. What we did to extract ourselves from that dreadful condition is our responsibility, but the fact that we found ourselves there in the first place is due to them and to their cultural power, not to a defect in ourselves.

4. Bonding through past sufferings

This point closely follows point six from a previous article of mine. We are not alone to have suffered. A lot of us went through the same hardships. Yet, if we do not give dignity to said hardships, we will easily hide them as if they were shameful and shame other men if they speak their mind. Without victimhood, a self-identified nice guy may be accused of being "whiny," "immature" or a "big baby" by other males, i.e. there will be no masculine solidarity, whereas victimhood allows for bonding through common hardships, solidarity and intracommunitarian help. Having been a nice guy should be a source of dignity, deepness and pride, not something one should constantly hide because of the lack of solidarity between men. Pride can and must flow from both past hardships and accomplishments.

Une précision importante

Once again, when I say we should accept some victimhood as part of our identity, I am definitely not encouraging perpetual whining and refusals to act. Neither am I advocating for a "meninism" that would be a feminism in reverse, thus aggravating the crumbling of society into various competing groups. The victimhood I see as desirable to us is a means to block and even cancel the abusive victimhood of powerful yet unproductive and destructive groups. It is not a way to merely exist inside the victimhood economy, where we have no place (yet?), but a way to find back the way to the true inclusiveness of complementary relationships between men and women and perhaps also between the classes and social functions.

Thus, if neomasculinity wins, we won't win as the biggest losers but as pillars of society that won't be tricked again through self-doubt, emotional blackmailing and accusations of "privilege." Said victory will be easier if we unite through the souvenirs of shared sufferings and strengthened by the memory of negative episodes where other agents played a crucial role.

Of course, victimhood should never be given too important a role, and it should always be annexed to accomplishments, virtues and the ability to lead. Neither whiny MGTOWs, nor jaded witnesses powerlessly talking about mere facts, but true men riding the tigers of their own dark episodes as not to be taken down by the darkness of others.

Why Masculinity Is Dying Off In America

October 7, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Everywhere you look, it seems that we are facing an epidemic: more and more weak men are being created, and more and more strong men are dying off. We live in a society that encourages weakness. We encourage men to be effeminate; to be scared of physical conflict, to value emotions over logic, and to hide their sexuality.

These changes are not an isolated incident. A series of systematic changes all throughout the US have brought about this lack of masculinity in our culture, and the results have been horrendous.

Men are more depressed than ever. We feel as if we have no purpose, no cause—we WANT a great war, we WANT battle, but we can't even get into a simple fist fight without lawyers being involved.

The Evidence

I can hear the pencil-pushing nerd shout out: “Where’s the EVIDENCE?! I want proof!” What I would say to him, is to open your eyes. The proof is all around you; hell, if you can’t see it, then you’re the proof.

Our culture has become infected with the disease of anti-masculinity; we warp normal, functional, healthy desires into being disgusting, and “toxic.”

Men aren’t allowed to rough play anymore; they aren’t even left unattended for a few minutes, let alone an hour or two to go explore. The second that a baby boy tries to adventure, his clingy mother shouts: “Oh no! Not my precious baby boy! He’ll get hurt!”

And like that, she’s chipped away at his masculinity. Little events like this add up over the course of a boy’s life; the constant restraint that’s put on him, the lies about how tussling with other boys is bad, and the high dose of shame that he’s given destroy his masculinity before he even has the chance to develop it.

And need I mention the other lies that our culture pushes down our throat? We’re all special snowflakes! You deserve a trophy just for participating! Give me a break—if you want a reward, you should earn it.

This type of “everyone is equal” attitude breeds a culture of entitlement; everyone’s been raised to believe that their moronic opinion is somehow equal to others, and that they should be treated the same regardless of their abilities and characteristics.

Sexual Shaming

Any and all sexual advances made by men are now painted as being rape. Just because a man made you uncomfortable does not mean he raped you. A man has the right to express his sexual advances to a woman, and a woman has a right to either accept or reject them. That's a fact, and it's time for people to grow up and accept it.

Men are expected to be asexual little princes for their entire lives; you can't even call a woman beautiful or sexy anymore without the HR departments threatening to fire you and sue you.

No, it isn't degrading, it isn't demoralizing, it isn't insulting—it's a fucking complement. Go to other countries some time, do you know how the men act when a beautiful woman walks by? In awe. In other cultures, they actually admire beauty, but in the US? All bodies are equal. Nope! You're not allowed to be attracted to a sexy woman, because it would offend a fat, ugly girl.

Marxists and liars try to point to sociological evidence to claim that beauty is subjective, but this is a half-truth. Yes, some aspects of beauty are subjective, but there is in fact a certain symmetrical and proportional mathematical backing behind objective beauty.

This aside, you can clearly see the motives of those arguing for "subjective" beauty—they're ugly individuals who put zero effort into their appearances, and want to be treated the same as a gorgeous supermodel who spends two hours a day doing her hair and makeup.

The Causes

“You go to UVA? NURSE! Get this man some testosterone, STAT!”

There are a multitude of causes that are all contributing to this lack of masculinity in our culture, but they fall into two broad categories. The first, is chemical. As I’ve said before, there are a multitude of artificial chemicals and pollutants that we’re exposed to today. This is, in large part, due to the unprecedented, nationwide drop in testosterone. These contaminants that lower our testosterone levels are everywhere. They’re in our food, they’re in our water supply, and they’re in our materials.

The second, is cultural. As I alluded to previously, we live in a culture that encourages men to be effeminate, and women to be masculine. It encourages men to value safety over independence, feelings over facts, and to remain in a boyish state of emotional and physical weakness.

Now, I want to be very clear here: nothing is wrong with valuing safety over independence or feeling over facts…IF you’re a woman. It’s normal for women to value these things, because it’s in their nature. Valuing safety and emotions, as well as receptivity and intuition is a simple cause of having higher estrogen levels. Now, of course the angry feminist would yell: “NOT ALL WOMEN ARE EMOTIONAL WE LIKE INDEPENDENCE TOO,” and my reply would be this: No shit—it’s called a generalization. I would also note out the angry tone that feminists use when claiming that they aren’t overly emotional.

Your Water is Contaminated

It has long been known that our filtration system (at least if you live in the US, I'm not sure about other countries) does not do a good job at filtering out birth control and other estrogens from the water supply. Every year, people dump tons and tons of drugs into the water supply—pills down the toilet, anti-depressants down the drain, and birth control down the pipes. These chemicals dissolve into the water supply, and every time you drink a sip of water, you guessed it, you're putting these things into your body.

Now, I know what you're thinking—these aren't high doses, they're fairly small, and you're right, but we're talking about WATER, something that you consume every day. Over years and years of consuming seemingly small amounts of estrogen and mind-altering agents, they'll have an effect on you.

The solution is to get a reverse osmosis filter. This is the only way to safely drink our contaminated water supply. Another option is finding a local spring near you, and transporting the water in giant glass jugs (more on this later) to your home. I realize that this is convenient, but trust me, it's worth it. Your testosterone levels and normal neurotransmitters will thank you.

Your Food Is Contaminated

A farmer inserting an estrogen implant into a calf

As I have touched upon before, almost all of the food that we consume is loaded with complete garbage, and it's not always that obvious. Sure, there's the obvious examples, such as trans fats, high fructose corn syrup, and loads of sugar, but what about soy crisps or hydrogenated oils? Did you know that both of these things have been linked to higher testosterone levels?

And while we're at it, let's take a closer look at your produce, shall we? As I covered in a previous article, many of the pesticides on common produce, such as apples, bell peppers, and apricots, used have been linked to higher estrogen levels as well as increased rates of cancer.

In addition to this, our meat is the worst offender. Several decades ago farmers started to realize that if they artificially jacked their cows' estrogen levels up, they would put on more fat while still eating the same amount of food.

In fact, there's a little pill known as Synovex C that virtually every single farmer uses on their cows to increase "feed efficiency" by 30%. In other words, they're jacking their cows' estrogen levels up so much that they put on 30% more weight with the same amount of food.

And when they kill and butcher this cow, and sell you its meat, what do you think happens? Do you think all of that estrogen magically goes away? Of course not—it's now in your body. And don't even get me started on the rBGH, antibiotics, and high cortisol levels that we get from consuming meat, too.

The solution is to only eat organic meat from your local farmers' market. If you want the highest testosterone levels possible, you cannot afford to be eating garbage—plus, buying from your local market supports hard working, small farm owners.

The Culture War

As has been said many times before, we are currently in the midst of a culture war; masculinity is no longer encouraged, and in fact, it's actually crushed out of our youth at a young age.

Men aren't allowed to rough play, they aren't allowed to confront one another in a functional way that leads to more cooperation in the long run, and god forbid they try to learn game! They'll face countless women dumping drinks on them, white knights trying to cock block them, and angry bitches screaming at them for being "objectifying."

Wanting to have sex with beautiful women is somehow a social taboo—men aren't allowed to express themselves sexually, lest they be slapped with a sex offender label and forced to move.

Oh, but women? They can talk about that sexy new employee or hot new boss as much as they like, and if you try to hold them accountable for their double standard? They'll just social shame you into oblivion. This is what happens when men are raised from a young age to always cow tow to women's desires, to be spineless cowards, and to be ashamed of their sexuality. There is one primary way that this is done, that all others flow out of: the media.

The social engineers had a brilliant idea many decades ago: instead of trying to destroy America physically, why not just infiltrate its media and slowly encourage degeneracy? Why not just fund women's lib and other cancerous causes? And this is what they did. Over the last 50 years, they've slowly, but steadily moved the agenda farther and farther left. Just two generations ago it would've been unheard of to give millions upon millions of illegal immigrants an American citizenship—but now? We're letting in tens of thousands of refugees that aren't even literate in their own language.

The social engineers aren't brave, but they're very cunning—ever since the 1960's they've been putting more and more degeneracy into the media, so by the time that these kids grow up, they've already been brainwashed to do the elites' bidding. They're useful idiots.

How To Reclaim America

Ultimately, a revolution may have to occur to throw the corrupt bureaucrats and bankers out of power. But until then, it's time we focus on ourselves. Throw out your cable box—nothing of value has been made by Hollywood in the last 10 years. Save a TV and use it to watch old masculine movies about men overcoming struggle, like Rocky or Straw Dogs.

Start eating healthy to naturally raise your testosterone levels—eat plenty of cruciferous vegetables like broccoli and cauliflower, have a grass-fed, locally butchered steak every day, along with some pastured eggs.

If you're overweight, learn how to shred fat fast as hell—every pound of fat beyond 12% BF has been linked to a 3% increase in estrogen. Lift some weights and consider getting on TRT if you have the resources to do so.

And, of course… learn game. You can't argue with women logically over the state of our nation, so it's best to just make them so desperately attracted to you that they follow your lead and accept your opinion as god's word. Take my four week boot camp to killer game; go out and practice day game and night game every day for four weeks.

I swear, if men simply knew how to seduce women, most of this nonsense would go away—men need to stop acting as if they can change women's opinions about America. You can't. Instead, just learn game so that they'll naturally change their behavior to suit your needs (AKA help you bring back masculinity in America).

And lastly, don't forget to get a healthy dose of the manosphere every week. It's been shown to decrease beta tendencies by a whopping 100%. Share, comment, and subscribe—I hope you guys enjoyed my column, and I'll see you next time.

The Biggest Startup Failure Of The Decade Was Caused By A Woman

Elizabeth Holmes, the hope of you-go-girl career hamsters throughout America, hyped as a billionaire and "the next Steve Jobs" after dropping out of college and claiming she had an amazing new way of doing blood tests that the FDA later rejected, recently announced layoffs of almost half her remaining staff, as she continues to milk her New Economy fame and fortune for whatever she can until the tap of free credit that crowned her a billionaire without ever selling or producing anything of value runs dry.

We're gonna miss you, Crazy Eyes

ROK covered Holmes and her new uber-cool startup company that was going to, like, totally revolutionize the world and stuff, in prior articles here and here. What's shocking is how this black turtleneck wearing Emperors-new-clothing genius is still running this fake business almost a year after providing no workable product. Even after this new round of layoffs, and the closing of her laboratory operations announced on October 5, her company Theranos will still have around 450 employees, all headed by the college dropout but media darling and medical "genius" Holmes.

Danger!

Warning: Teen dropout medical tests may be hazardous to your health

After starting the company at the age of 19, the establishment moved in quickly to crown her as the next big thing, estimating her company's worth at $9 billion, so confident that this teenager was going to revolutionize the health care industry with her strong entitled self.

In July of this year, the Center for Medicare and Medicare Services fined and banned Holmes for two years from owning or operating a blood lab, after sending her a letter warning that "deficient practices of the laboratory pose immediate jeopardy to patient health and safety" as the tests put patients at risk of internal bleeding or stroke. Perhaps before creating medical devices it would be wise to study a bit of medicine, or at least gain an understanding of basic research and scientific procedures and methods.

Dubious background

Holmes is the daughter of Christian R Holmes IV, almost certain US government spook with several foreign government positions including working for USAID in the US, Africa, China, and former member of scamster company Enron. Director of the U.S. Trade and Development Agency (TDA), Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Refugee Programs (State/RP), and Acting Director of the USAID Office of U.S. Foreign Disaster Assistance (OFDA). At TDA, he directed a global economic and trade development agency, concentrating on China. Her mother was a congressional committee staffer.

Just a coincidence that I always dress in black and named my company after the God of Death.

After founding Theranos, whose name is suspiciously similar to Thanatos, the Greek daemon of death (coincidentally she has used Sympathy for the Devil as her musical introduction when giving speeches), Holmes hired some scientists and researchers, and engaged her family's connections in order to obtain deals with the US military and Walgreens drug stores.

Board Member	Designation	Age
Henry Kissinger	Former Secretary of State	92
Bill Perry	Former Secretary of Defense	88
George Schultz	Former Secretary of State	94
Bill Frist	Former Senate Majority Leader	63
Sam Nunn	Former Senator	77
Gary Roughead	Former Navy Admiral	64
James Mattis	Former Marine Corps General	65
Dick Kovocovich	Former CEO of Wells Fargo	72
Riley Bechtel	Former CEO of Bechtel	63
William Foege	Epidemologist	79
Elizabeth Holmes	Founder & CEO, Theranos	31
Sunny Balwani	President & COO, Theranos	NA

She assembled a board of directors that appears slightly odd for a teenager, including three former US cabinet members (Secretary of State Treasury, and Labor), a director of the US Office of Management and Budget, CEO of engineering multinational Bechtel Group, Secretary of Defense Bill Perry, former US Senators Sam Nunn and Bill Frist, and 92 year old National Security Advisor Henry Kissinger. The firm's legal council is 74 year old trial lawyer David Boies, one of the most prominent trial lawyers in the nation, famous for government antitrust work, prominent role in the Bush v. Gore election recount decision, and successful advocate for legalizing anal marriage.

Her board seemed more qualified to select the next UN ambassador than run a medical company. Seems perfectly normal though, right? Nothing odd or suspicious with a teenager having those kind of world leader level connections, right?

Raising money for Hillary

She added Commander of the US Central Command and chief of US military operations in the Middle East and Central Asia General James Mattis, who succeeded David Patraeus in 2010, to her board of directors, and soon after her company was miraculously approved to test military troops abroad.

When asked about what sets her blood tests apart from competitors, she responds with pure feels, saying she “optimizes the chemistry” and “leverages software” but uses the same basic methods as established blood testing centers. She hired as an enforcer, Sunny Balwani, an older man she met after graduating high school in China who gave her the bang, a man with zero medical industry experience. (Note: Balwani’s age is unknown but the next-youngest board member is 63) Balwani would threaten employees who questioned the companies methods or procedures, and employees who spoke publicly about the company were sent threatening legal letters.

Proud, Brave and Stunning Feminist

Actual screenshot of the feminist firm's hiring practices

Holmes proudly talks about how she never played with Barbies as a child, and, channeling Kim Jung Un's miraculous childhood, claims to have invented a C++ software compiler at the age of 9 that she sold to Chinese universities. She is now 32 years old, wears close cropped hair, often flies alone on a $6.5 million Gulfstream jet, is a vegan, wears a Steve Jobs turtleneck at all times, and drinks a concoction of green vegetables at pre-set hours throughout the day.

She rarely leaves her office, even celebrating birthday parties there with her entourage of adoring coworkers in her 140,000 square foot Palo Alto, California complex. She couldn't handle the sight of blood as a child, and one can only imagine that the incessant "You Go Girl! You can do anything you want!" messages encouraged her to think opening a blood lab was a good idea. Watch the video above at your own risk.

Theranos employee. A picture speaks a thousand words.

The company's website is plastered with feminist faces, and indeed the promotional video offers an interview with several employees, all of whom are women, who praise what a great, empowering roll model Holmes is.

Lessons?

Is Holmes simply a victim of the silly propagandizing of American girls, encouraging them they can perform far beyond their means? Is she a nefarious creation of elitists, simply beginning her massive theft and deception at a younger age than normal? Is this the future of the feminist economy? How long will it be before Theranos offices are raided and finally shut down? How much longer is Holmes' operation going to continue before her pussy pass expires? Are the workers of Theranos actual women or post-op trannies? Is Holmes holding out for a position in the Clinton administration? Keep your eyes on this one, brothers, she's not done yet.

27 Masculine Quotes From Game Of Thrones

October 8, 2016 | by Robert Smith | Link | Original Link

Do you know why Game of Thrones has become the most popular TV show? No doubt you have thought about it at one point or another. Story, characters, cinematography, acting etc are vital things. But, two key points are:

1. We all love it because we can relate to at least one of the characters.

2. Men are respected in the show.

Recently, I have started re-watching it from the season one, before it became overtly feminist. It is full of strong and capable characters. We men can learn many things from them.

Here are the 27 lines of GOT Season 1 that are masculine. Every man has something to learn from these lines. Some of these quotes resonated well with me and I know some of them will resonate well with you too.

Episode 1: Winter Is Coming

1. Eddard Stark: "The man who passes the sentence should swing the sword."

Ned Stark, being a king himself, followed this rule. He could easily order someone else to kill the deserter from the Night's Watch. But he vowed to kill them himself and so he did.

A man should respect his words and once a word is given, he must do everything to keep his words. Mean what you say and say what you mean.

2. Tyrion Lannister: “Let me tell you something, Bastard. Never forget what you are, the rest of the world will not. Wear it like armor and it can never be used to hurt you.”

Tyrion knew that he is a shitty fighter, so he tried to outsmart everyone by his mind. He accepted that he is not good at violence and became good at convincing others to do violence for him.

Accept who you are. Comply with your nature. Find and multiply your strengths. Do what you are good at.

3. Eddard Stark: [to Jaime Lannister] “I don’t fight in tournaments because when I fight a man for real, I don’t want him to know what I can do.”

Well said. Ned never made anything clear to his enemies about what he is up to. He knew Lannisters were Murderers of Jon Arryn but he never made it clear about what he is doing to expose them.

Not showing all your cards and talents can give certain advantage in the world of competition. Never brag what you can do. Do it when time is right.

4. Eddard Stark: [about Bran] “He won’t be a boy forever. And, winter is coming.”

Being a good father, Ned Stark wanted to teach his sons how to be a man, hard man. He killed the deserter, showed them live death and even told Bran why he had to kill the deserter.

In our world, it can be translated as: You won’t live here forever. And, death is coming.

Find your mission/passion and fulfil it. Take charge of your life and do wonderful things.

Episode 2: The Kingsroad

5. Tyrion Lannister: “A mind needs books like a sword needs a whetstone.”

As already said, Tyrion being a dwarf was not good at fighting. So what did he do about it? He learnt to convince others to do violence for him.

How did he do it? By reading books and keeping his mind sharp. His wittiness might be attributed to it.

In our world, there is a wise line: “The more you learn the more you earn.”

Another good one is: “What you know makes you money and what you don’t know loses you money.”

Keep learning new things. Books are your best friends. Read real life stories and autobiographies, these are the books that are worth reading.

6. Jaime Lannister: "It's a strange thing, first time you cut a man. You realize we're nothing but sacks of meat and blood, and some bone to keep it all standing."

This line can be viewed in two lights. First: The first punch of your life (either you threw or got), the first one-on-one fight and the first time you kill an animal; you will remember them forever.

Second: Never let ego control you because you're nothing but sacks of meat and blood, and some bone to keep it all standing.

Episode 3: Lord Snow

7. Cersei Lannister: "Everyone who isn't us is an enemy."

Lannisters had taken this quote seriously and this is how they were able to keep the name of their house perceived as powerful.

From cavemen days to today, this line holds true. In those days people from different tribes were considered enemy unless they had friendly terms already.

In today's world, we can say it like this:

You have different goals than everyone else and they have different goals than you. You are not interested in what they want and they are not interested in what you want.

All everyone else are interested in is how you can help them achieve their own personal goals. No one cares what you want, what your goals are.

Help them achieve their goals and they will help you achieve your goals. That is how you build friendships, by providing each other value.

8. Cersei Lannister: "A good king knows when to save his strength and when to destroy his enemies."

Though Cersei Lannister said it, but Jaime Lannister acted on this line well. He served the Mad King well when serving was safe. And when it was not safe he killed the King.

Arguing when it is waste of time is bad and not arguing when the situation calls for it is also bad. Learn when to argue and when not to. Same applies with fighting, asking a girl out etc.

Also you don't have to fight and win every fight. No one has ever won all the fights. Only win those fights that are important and worth fighting.

9. Benjen Stark: [to Jon Snow] "You're no ranger. Here, a man gets what he earns, when he earns it."

John Snow considered himself a ranger. He wanted to go with Benjen Stark when he was leaving. He considered himself better than others, he saw himself entitled to be a ranger.

Benjen said this line and left him. So, don't expect to get anything from anyone. You only get what you earn. Stop the entitlement mentality.

Many people think that they deserve better, so someone should give money, cloths, cars, girls etc. to them. But being a man you must know that: First you earn it then you get it.

Episode 4: Cripples, Bastards, and Broken Things

10. Daenerys Targaryen: "The next time you raise a hand to me will be the last time you have hands."

Daenerys had tolerated her brother for a long time. Initially, she was not self-confident enough to confront him. Now as a Khaleesi, she know where his brother's limits are.

Draw clear limits of what behavior you will accept and what you will not. Don't tolerate misbehavior from anyone, whether it a Miss World or your dog.

11. Viserys Targaryen: "Brave men didn't kill dragons. The brave men rode them."

On one side there were men who fought with dragons and killed them. On other side there were men who used those dragons to win victories.

This line is true both ways. You are brave when you kill a lion and you are also brave when you can control it and get it to do what you want.

Episode 5: The Wolf and the Lion

12. Cersei Lannister: "The Dothraki don't sail. Every child knows that. They don't have discipline, they don't have armor, and they don't have siege weapons."

Dothraki were brave men, they had men and horses. All they lacked mainly was discipline.

Discipline is what great men have. From the earlier days of evolution to today, disciplined men are the leaders. They do what needs to be done regardless of how they feel about it.

Men with great body go to gym even when they don't feel like going. Great actors spend hours in front of mirrors perfecting their facial expressions every day.

Great warriors practice their art every day to keep up with other warriors. Great singers sing for hours, Great writers write several thousand minimum words a day.

Discipline is the price of success. Take it or leave it, is up to you.

13. Robert Baratheon: Which is the bigger number, five or one?

Cersei Lannister: Five.

Robert Baratheon: [clutches his right fist] … one. One army, a real army, united behind one leader with one purpose. Our purpose died with the Mad King.

Robert, having been a successful rebel, knew this thing more than Cersei. Unity is what made Robert the king and the Mad king dead.

All your efforts directed in one direction will earn far more results than your efforts directed in different directions.

Many entrepreneurs have repeatedly said this: build one business rather than building 12 businesses at once. Master one formula first and then move on next.

Episode 6: A Golden Crown

14. Syrio Forel: "There is only one god and his name is Death, and there is only one thing we say to Death: 'Not today.'"

Very true line. These words are what keep giving you hope to survive. Every men should learn them. Syrio, being a sword teacher, taught this to every aspiring warrior.

In our world we can interpret it like this: Every time you want to give up on something, just say "Not today".

Episode 7: You Win or You Die

15. Cersei Lannister: "When you play the game of thrones you win or you die. There is no middle ground."

Having watched 6 seasons, I can safely say one thing: In Game of Thrones anyone can die. It is not like those TV shows where the lead characters survive anyway. And, Cersei said it well.

Yet, our real world is not this way. Failure at one thing does not mean failure at other things. You can always try again and start fresh. See the beauty of it?

You won't die until you give up. A wise line: Fall 7 times and get up 8 times.

16. Petyr 'Littlefinger' Baelish: "You know what I learnt losing that duel? I learnt that I'll never win. Not that way. That's their game, their rules. I'm not going to fight them: I'm going to fuck them. That's what I know, that's what I am, and only by admitting what we are can we get what we want."

Littlefinger learnt this the hard way. He challenged Ned Stark's brother and was beaten in it. Now he carries a token of this stupidity.

This is what he learnt: Find a game where you can win and commit your life playing that game. That is how you win.

He did not know a lot about fighting, but he did knew enough about politics. And, he has survived by far in the show.

17. Eddard Stark: What you suggest is treason.

Petyr 'Littlefinger' Baelish: Only if we lose.

Robert rebelled against the Mad King and won, this was called a victory not a treason. It might have been called a treason had he lost the war. Greyjoys rebelled against Robert but lost, this was called a treason.

In our world, we can look at it like this:

Eddard Stark: What you suggest is a stupid business idea.

Petyr 'Littlefinger' Baelish: Only if we don't make money.

Your business idea is stupid only if it does not make money. Do the stupidest things if need be, that is what innovation seems to us at first.

18. Tywin Lannister: "A lion doesn't concern himself with the opinion of a sheep."

Tywin Lannister is the richest men in the seven kingdoms. His mindsets are fantastic and this line is burning example. All he wants is his family name to be perceived as powerful. He does this by anyway needed and he don't care what others think of him.

Never care what other people think of you. Do whatever you want whenever you want. There will always be people who will be jealous, want to hold you back, conspire against you and say negative things about you.

You remove one person from it, there will always be another person to replace him. So, don't concern yourself with the opinions of other people.

19. Tywin Lannister: "Your mother's dead. Before long I'll be dead, and you and your brother and your sister and all of her children, all of us dead, all of us rotting underground. It's the family name that lives on. It's all that lives on. Not your personal glory, not your honor… but family. You understand?"

This is again a fantastic mindset of Tywin. He knew his priorities well. Whatever he did, he did not do it for his personal benefits, but for family benefits.

For example, these two quotes saved Tyrion's life many times.

1. "Rich as a Lannister!"
2. "A Lannister always pays his debts."

It all was possible because of the family name he had. Tywin did well to maintain his family name. He had a bigger picture of the world in his mind.

Have a bigger picture of things in mind, think bigger than your personal glories. Be loyal to your family and your country. They are the ones who will support you in your bad times.

Even in cavemen days, a man had to become loyal to his tribe in order to survive. A wise quote:

"Don't ever take side with anyone against the family…ever." – The Godfather (movie)

Episode 8: The Pointy End

20. Shagga: How would you like to die, Tyrion, son of Tywin?

Tyrion Lannister: In my own bed, at the age of 80, with a belly full of wine and a girl's mouth around my cock.

This is a brilliant example of Tyrion's wittiness. He keeps his mood fun. He does not lose his cool, he does not get angry. Instead of begging Shagga for his life, he showed him how he can help his tribe achieve The Vale of Arryn.

However bad a situation is, don't lose your cool. Keep calm. This is what we call a tough man, he faces every situation you throw at him on his feet.

21. Theon Greyjoy: Are you afraid?

[Robb's hand is shaking]

Robb Stark: I must be.

Theon Greyjoy: Good.

Robb Stark: Why is that good?

Theon Greyjoy: It means you're not stupid.

It was hard for Robb to decide to start a war against the Lannisters and the King. His hands were shaking heavily. But he decided to do it anyway. It was a question of rescuing his father.

Some decisions are hard to make. Make them anyway, don't care whatever you feel or what might happen. A good quote:

"If you're scared to do something, that's a good sign that you should do it."

22. Eddard Stark: The queen can't kill me. Cat holds her brother.

Lord Varys: The wrong brother, sadly, and lost to her. Your wife has let the Imp slip through her fingers.

Eddard Stark: If that's true… then slit my throat and be done with it.

Brave words said by Ned. He asked to die like a man, bravely. He knew he did the right thing and if that means death, then so be it.

Be ready to die for something you believe in. Be ready to give your 100% for a business idea you believe in. You might lose money if you fail, but you will know you did right. And the lessons you learn will make you wise.

Episode 9: Baelor

23. Eddard Stark: "You think my life is some precious thing to me? That I would trade my honor for a few more years… of what? You grew up with actors. You learned their craft and you learnt it well. But I grew up with soldiers. I learned to die a long time ago."

Ned Stark respected his honor more than his life. He didn't want to be called a traitor and live. He wanted to be called an honorable man and die.

It takes lifetime of work and consistent efforts to earn honor, money, love and glory. Don't lose it for some wrong cause.

24. Maester Aemon: Tell me, did you ever wonder why the men of the Night's Watch take no wives and father no children?

Jon Snow: No.

Maester Aemon: So they will not love. Love is the death of duty.

The one thing that the men at Castle Black have is they have a mission. Their individual purposes don't matter. Together they have a purpose of protecting everyone from the wildlings and white walkers. Duty is all that matters to them.

Many soldiers sacrifice their lives for the honor of country. They have a purpose to live for and die for.

Find your mission in the life same as the men of night's watch. Die for your country and family, if needed. Help your family and friends find their own missions.

If they lose their path and want to give up on their mission, guide them to right path. Motivate them!

25. Robb Stark: "If we do it your way, Kingslayer, you'd win. We're not doing it your way."

Robb knew that fighting, with the rules that Jaime Lannister is good at, will result in Jaime's winning. That is why Jaime was demanding to fight that way in the first place.

You don't have to follow all the rules all the times. Real man invent their own rules, after learning from the old ones.

There is a rule of the universe: People who follow all the rules never get what they want. People that break all the rules get everything they want and more.

Episode 10: Fire and Blood

26. Joffrey Baratheon: I'll tell you what. I'm going to give you a present. After I raise my armies, and kill your traitor brother, I'll give you his head as well.

Sansa Stark: Or maybe he'll give me yours.

Joffrey, in the heat of the moment, talked about killing Robb Stark. But Sansa knew her brother well and did not underestimate him. She knew that in the battle Robb might defeat Joffrey.

Never underestimate yourself from your competition. Your methods and the way you work may be better than your competitors. Just keep improving, making your products and services better.

27. Jeor Mormont: When dead men, and worse, come hunting for us in the night, do you think it matters who sits the Iron Throne?

Jon Snow: No.

Lord Commander Mormont had a bigger picture of the world in his mind. He knew that the real problem is White walkers not Lannisters or the King.

Don't worry about small things, there are far bigger things to worry about. Don't worry too much about the broken glass window in your office, rather worry about keeping your customers happy.

That is worth worrying and will grow your business. Have a bigger picture in mind.

In Short…

These are great lines. There are many things to learn from these lines and the characters who said them.

And, I want you to do one thing: These 27 quotes have 27 messages/philosophies in them. Practice these philosophies every day one by one.

Like, for one day you could practice keeping your words. Another day you might decide not to give up on anything. Another day you might practice keeping your cool and not getting angry at all.

It will make you more of a man and you will be able to think past your emotions. And, that is great. Men are born to be logical, fight, lead, build, jump and run. I hope you enjoyed my compilation.

Political And Media Establishment Furiously Attack Trump For Being A Heterosexual Male

October 8, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

On Friday, our globalist elite released their most withering attack yet on Donald Trump: A ten-year-old recording of a private conversation where Trump said the word "pussy." The coordinated media/Democrat/GOP Establishment firestorm that erupted reveals that these groups ultimately represent the same globalist interests.

Breaking News: Trump has touched female genitalia

On Friday, Access Hollywood released a recording of Donald Trump chatting with Billy Bush. During the off-the-record conversation, Trump talked about how much he loves beautiful women and how his stardom enables him have great success in attracting them. Here is what Trump said:

> You know I'm automatically attracted to beautiful [women]. I just start kissing them, it's like a magnet. And when you're a star they let you do it. You can do anything. Whatever you want. Grab them by the pussy. You can do anything.

After the release of the recording, Trump apologized and pledged to be a better man.

> I've never said I'm a perfect person, or pretended to be someone I am not. I've said and done things I regret, and the words today in this more than a decade old video are one of them. Anyone who knows me, knows these words do not reflect who I am. I said it. I was wrong. And I apologize. I've travelled the country talking about change for America. My travels have also changed me. I've spent time with > grieving mothers who have lost their children, laid off workers whose jobs have gone to other countries, and people from all walks of life who just want a better future. I have gotten to know the great people of our country, and I have been humbled by the faith they have placed in me. I pledge to be a better man tomorrow, and I will never, ever let you down.

The coordinated attack begins

Immediately after the Access Hollywood played the recording, the GOP Establishment went into action with virtually every Republican establishment figure coming out in condemnation of Trump. House Speaker Paul Ryan canceled an event where he was scheduled to appear with Trump. Ryan issued a statement saying: "I am sickened by what I heard today. Women are to be championed and revered, not objectified." Marco Rubio, who is perhaps best known for his "true conservative" jokes about the size of Trump's penis tweeted:

> Donald's comments were vulgar, egregious & impossible to justify. No one should ever talk about any woman in those terms, even in private.
> — Marco Rubio (@marcorubio) October 8, 2016

Jeb Bush, who is still jealous that his low-energy campaign was crushed by Trump, said:

> As the grandfather of two precious girls, I find that no apology can excuse away Donald Trump's reprehensible comments degrading women.
> — Jeb Bush (@JebBush) October 7, 2016

Cuckservative Senator Ben Sasse, who Mike Cernovich reports may be a pedophile enabler, called for Trump to step down:

> Character matters.@realDonaldTrump is obviously not going to win. But he can still make an honorable move: Step aside & let Mike Pence try.
> — Ben Sasse (@BenSasse) October 8, 2016

Mitt Romney, who was too weak to defeat Obama in 2012, got on his moralistic high horse as well:

> Hitting on married women? Condoning assault? Such vile degradations demean > our wives and daughters and corrupt America's face to the world.

> — Mitt Romney (@MittRomney) October 8, 2016

Perhaps the most surprising thing is that one of the heroes of my youth, Arnold Schwarzenegger, took the opportunity to attack Trump by saying that he will not vote for him. Thankfully, Arnold had the good sense to refrain from invoking high morality probably because, like Trump, he too has a reputation for being a pussy grabber.

But it wasn't just GOP politicians who piled on Trump, cuckservative commentators also joined in on the orchestrated attack. Russell Moore, who is president of the public policy arm of the Southern Baptist Convention, became particularly unhinged. On Twitter he called Trump a sexual predator and alleged that any Christians who support Trump are doing harm to the gospel:

> The damage done to the gospel this year, by so-called evangelicals, will take longer to recover from than the '80s TV evangelist scandals.
> — Russell Moore (@drmoore) October 8, 2016

Kevin Williamson of National Review, who has been waging a holy war against Trump dropped readers a note to say, "I told you so."

> Americans and Republicans, remember: You asked for this. Given the choice between a dozen solid conservatives and one Clinton-supporting con artist and game-show host, you chose the con artist. You chose him freely. Nobody made you do it.

Coordination

The above comments are only a small sample of the dozens of denunciations by the GOP establishment politicians and associated cuckservative commentators. Not a single one broke ranks and tried to provide an alternative perspective. It is obvious that this was a coordinated attack. But if it is an attack, who is responsible for coordinating it? It is no secret that while the Democrats and Republicans differ on a few social issues, on other issues such as foreign policy and tax shelters for the very wealthy, they are identical. That's because both the Democrat and Republican establishments, including the lobbying and pundit class, are dependent on a small group of wealthy donors.

These globalist oligarchs fund both establishment parties to ensure that the elite agenda remains whether the politicians have a D or R behind their name. As I wrote back in March, Trump's candidacy is the first real threat to the elites' complete control of US policy. These same oligarchs own all the major media outlets. It was a simple matter for them to pass on the word that everyone needs to join in this attempt to destroy Trump. The release of the Trump comments at this time was also an opportunity to attempt to bury the latest Wikileaks which reveal the depth of Hillary's corruption. I strongly encourage readers to check out Matt Forney's definitive coverage of the leaks.

Conclusion

While Trump's words were rude, they are not anything that shocking to anyone who has either served in the military or participated in a high school team sport. Men since the beginning of time have been boasting of their prowess with women. A priest who had served in Iraq tweeted that anyone who was feigning offense at Trump's comments was a prissy. If our standard for President is a man who has never committed a sin, then our selection will be extremely limited. About half of our presidents, including some of the best ones, cheated on their wives. Hillary's husband, who many liberals adore, is not just a serial womanizer, but has even been accused of rape on many occasions.

The US is at a critical point in its history. The election of Hillary will result in gigantic, permanent changes to the country. For that reason, I hope Trump will weather this storm.

Republicans Use Trump's "Pussy" Comment As Pretext To Overthrow Democratically Selected Candidate

October 9, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

A man with a functioning libido is public enemy number one in the increasingly bizarre United States of America, a debased nation that liberalism is destroying. Putting tampons in men's restrooms is just fine, creating 600 genders out of thin air when every other species gets by with two genders is fine, but a rich and powerful man talking about having sexual desire for women and making accurate comments about how women let alpha males do whatever they want has caused the castrati in the media to call into session an impromptu kangaroo court of persecution. Trump is also being given the Julius Caesar treatment by his own party.

The same feminist nation that bought 80 million copies of Fifty Shades of Grey, a book women got hot and bothered reading that features far worse language and actions than the secret recording of Trump, is suddenly aghast when a real life billionaire is revealed to have been talking about trying to fuck some chick and making moves on women. Tepid comments have been enough to cause a stir in the Cucklican establishment, in which anything but gelded deference towards women is verboten. A recording of Trump made my a lowlife media jackal named Billy Bush caught him making the following thought crime comments:

> Grab them by the pussy. You can do anything. When you're a star, they let you do it… You know I'm automatically attracted to beautiful — I just start kissing them. It's like a magnet. Just kiss. I don't even wait.

Any man with two functioning testicles and any level of experience with women knows

Trump is exactly right. Women turn into instant sluts around rich and powerful men. Hypergamy is the most powerful force in the universe. They absolutely “let you do it.”

In all honesty, O’Dell has likely had more than just a boob job…why is it wrong for a man to point this out?

Trump is also being called a sexist for making these comments about Nancy O’Dell.

> I moved on her and I failed. I’ll admit it. I did try and fuck her. She was married. And I moved on her very heavily. I see her, she’s now got the big phony tits and everything. She’s totally changed her look.

Why is this even an issue when it’s a recording of a supposedly private conversation? Do the sycophants in the media think Slick Willy talked any differently when he was discussing the women he was diddling when he was the governor of Arkansas and later the President? Or when he was flying down to a pedophile’s private island?

Even though Hillary’s obvious pathological lying, criminality and health issues have been swept under the rug, a man displaying a modicum of testosterone was enough to send the 2016 campaign into a frenzy, and the media into overdrive conducting one of their infamous witch hunts against those not in the Marxist/globalist claven.

They did not seem to be bothered by, and even glorified Fifty Shades of Grey, however, a book featuring explicit erotic scenes of dominance and submission, bondage and discipline and BDSM conducted by a sadistic billionaire. The irony, as usual, is completely lost on vapid mediaites.

Republican Response

Typical Cucklican barnhouse crowing followed the Trump character assassination attempt Predictable attacks on Trump from the cucks in the disgraced Republican party have commenced. Former mayor of New York Rudy Guiliani insinuated that they intended to revolt against Trump all along.

> They largely didn't support him in the first place, so it is not so much of a surprise. You look at it, they were all Republicans who all opposed him and didn't support him in the past and this is basically the insiders against the outsiders anyway. Donald Trump is the populist candidate. Most of the people that have turned on him are members of the establishment, so I would see this as if you want change in Washington, you vote for Donald Trump. If you want things the same, you vote for Hillary Clinton.

The weasel Paul Ryan predictably came out saying Trump's functioning libido was "a troubling situation" before he was shouted down with chants of "Trump!" and "See ya, Jackass" from an unfriendly crowd.

There is possibly treason from within the Trump campaign itself as well, as a desperate establishment moves to do whatever it can to avoid losing its grip on power and to keep the globalists' plans in motion. Mike Pence said he couldn't defend Trump's comments and even used the predictable boilerplate language that he was offeeeeended by Trump. The statement from Pence reads like it was stamped out by a sackless PR agent.

> As a husband and father, I was offended by the words and actions described by Donald Trump in the 11-year-old video released yesterday. I do not condone his remarks and cannot defend them. I am grateful that he has expressed remorse and apologized to the American people. We pray for his family and look forward to the opportunity he has to show what is in his heart when he goes before the nation tomorrow night.

Then Nevada Cucklican Joe Heck disavowed Trump.

Pence is not defending his boss

Meanwhile, the media completely ignores the fact Gennifer Flowers said Rapin' Bill Clinton told her Hillary "had eaten more pussy than he had." The rules of political correctness for those in the out group don't apply to card carrying globalists, you see.

The Cucklican statements and actions as well as shameless genuflecting and hot air blowing from the media only prove there is a coordinated effort to destroy Trump's campaign. The media have been chomping at the bit to destroy Trump since the summer of 2015 when they wrote his campaign off before it started.

Look for the meltdown to continue as the vicious manlets and YouGoGrrls in the media foam at the mouth with renewed rabid fervor as they finally have a taste of blood in the water.

Why don't we just dispense with the entire ruse of having elections in the first place since the establishment media and political power structure have proven time and time again they will do anything to keep We The People from having a voice in their plans to rule us like serfs.

If anything, events like this prove we live in a managed democracy, i.e. a de facto autocracy, in which the power structure empties elections of their potential to change anything in Washington. Reformers will not be tolerated. If they don't destroy Trump with this pseudo-scandal, look for the measures to take him out to become even more outlandish.

Welcome to the USSA. It's a one party system with two-card monte.

Could You Pass A 1902 Fitness Test?

October 9, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Physical training methods have certainly changed a lot over the centuries—and most of those changes have been absolutely wrong. It's well known to any serious physical culturist that the state of modern fitness training is dismal. Just look at the rates of obesity in the developed world, and then ask yourself if it counts as "development" to move towards a dysgenic state.

Philosophy aside, I will often say to the people I train that "worthwhile development in physical culture stopped around 1905" (the year that Thomas Inch invented the plate loading barbell), and I stand by that, with the exception of technical advice on the traditional lifts—and most of that in recent years has come from the states of the Former Soviet Union. I will admit that I have faced resistance from some over my "antiquated" views.

Speaking of the middle years of the Edwardian Era, I have recently come into the possession of a "Universal Fitness Test", published in 1902, and written by Dudley Sargent, at the time the director of the Harvard University gymnasium. While the man can be criticized in some ways (namely, naming his son "Ledyard"), the question remains as to whether or not this 114 year old fitness exam has any merit.

The Introduction: A Brief Overview

The book doesn't hesitate in giving you its wonderfully antiquated "Old Money WASP" verbiage: "'To lift a heavier weight, throw further, to run faster, jump higher, to stay under water longer, to shoot further and with more accuracy than his comrades, is the burning wish of every youthful heart.' To see this same desire in the hearts of adults, we must turn to those half-civilized peoples for whom those accoutrements are of surpassing value in the struggle for life."

Ignoring the language that will surely clamp the anuses of SJWs shut, Mr. Sargent is right when he says that "…the practice of these exercises are of the greatest service in preparing young men for the struggles and trials of a business or professional career"—mens sana en corpore sano and all that.

As a humorous aside, he also criticizes the modern fixation on professional sports—and the adulation these professional players-of-children's-games receive—and bear in mind that this was more than 100 years ago:

"The Great Defect of Modern Day Athletics is that they are seen as an end unto themselves…those who excel in them receive praise and prestige. Why? …Physical perfection for its own sake is worthy of struggle"

The introduction then concludes with Sargent stating that the introduction of his test, and thus a competitive element to physical education, stimulated a much greater interest in physical training amongst his students.

The Test

The test was developed to have a series of criteria: it requires little equipment, it uses all large muscle groups and the CNS-PNS and cardiovascular system, it cannot be "gimmicked" with "tricks" or be made easier or harder depending on one's body type, and it does not require the supervision of an expert.

The exercises are as follows:

Exercise 1 is the "elbows to knees," an old-timey way of saying "the sit-up," with the main difference being that the legs are kept flat in this. This exercise will of course work the abdomen, as well as the hip flexors as well.

Scrunches are acceptable

Exercise 2 is the pull-up to work the back, shoulders, triceps, biceps, and forearms: Just grab onto a bar above your head and pull. The main thing that I would add is that he does not specify whether you should do palms anterior or posterior (or in layman's terms, the pull-up or chin-up). I would say you should do both, I certainly do.

Exercise three is the classic push-up for the chest, arms, and shoulders: Keep your back straight and push up and down, touching your nose to the floor. Don't worry about doing more advanced push-up variations like the one-handed push-up, the test doesn't ask for it.

Exercise 4 are toe touches, a test more for flexibility of the hamstrings than strength: Place the feet together, lock the knees, and bend at the waist. This should be easy for anybody that isn't morbidly obese.

Exercise 5: Heel and Calf Raises: Lock the legs and raise up on your tip toes, then do the same for the heels. This is a decent exercise for the ankles, feet, and calf muscles, and the heel raise trains the flexibility of the ankle in addition to the muscular work.

Exercise 6: This is an interesting exercise that some of you may not have done referred to as the “heel sit.” Hold the trunk upright, raise onto the ball of your feet, and squat down deep while extending your arms and fingers. Then rise up, bending your arms to your waist (See the picture below for clarification). Repeat.

Grading the Test

The book advises that the test should be done as follows: 10 minutes are allotted for each individual, and the testee should do as many repetitions of each exercise as can be done in that time. The book advises that a “minimal” grade would be 7 sit-ups, 4 push-ups, 4 pull-ups, 12 toe touches, 5 heel and calf raises, and 18 “heel sits.”

Improvements that can be made

If this test becomes too easy (and as it is it isn’t very difficult, I imagine it will become easy quickly), you can easily modify it to be more difficult: Instead of sit-ups, try Roman Chair situps or V-Situps. Instead of standard push-ups, do one-handed push-ups, and ditto for the pull-ups. Instead of toe touches, try touching the hands flat upon the floor (or even doing the splits if you’re capable of it). Instead of calf raises, try doing pistol squats (which will test both calf strength and ankle flexibility simultaneously). The heel sits can remain “As is.”

So for the beginner or the advanced physical culturist that needs a concrete benchmark for fitness, you could do a lot worse than this Gilded Age educational curriculum.

The Simple Rules That Govern Our Modern Political World

October 9, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you think of what happens to our community as a microcosm of larger forces, a lot of what we see occurring in Europe and the United States makes enough sense that you can start to predict the future. A reviewer of my new book notices this:

> I thought [Free Speech Isn't Free] would be somewhat boring and a mere recollection of what had happened in Canada, but there is far more of the story told and Roosh is surprisingly good at generating an almost suspenseful mood even though you probably know what happened. This is a behind the scenes, VIP access account.
> It's in Free Speech Isn't Free that we see the inside details of what went down and how the media is far more sinister than I ever realized. We hear alot about how biased the media is – almost to the point of pseudo conspiracy theory – but when you see how the line between advocate/activist and journalist has been obliterated, you'll be shocked as to just how much the media was out to get Roosh.
> What Roosh does here is connect the dots. Why would any media publication sacrifice their reputation? Why would they lie about the February 6th meetups? Why the hell would they care about Roosh giving speeches to what was seemingly just a small group of men in each city? What Roosh has done is uncover that there is more sinister forces at work – to the point that you almost think you are reading a work of fiction. The war isn't just cultural, its an ideological one and once you realize the etiology of the worldview of the people who went after Roosh, you realize that the cost of speaking out and being a figurehead isn't cheap.
> There is a war. It's up to you to find your role – something Roosh goes over in > this book as he explains the tactics and overall strategy that went into letting his speaking tour actually occur. Of key importance was finding people he could trust – a lesson as old as time itself.

These are only four rules you need to understand:

1. There is a group of very rich men who control the levers of power.
2. Those men own the media.
3. Those men sponsor political candidates on all sides to do their bidding.
4. Those men have a simple agenda of increasing their wealth and power, to be gods among men.

It's really that simple. Anything else is a red herring, such as the differences between political parties, whether there is an "Illuminati" that does blood sacrifices, or if those at the top are Jews or lizard people.

From these rules, explaining what happened to me in Canada last year and the meetup outrage this past February is quite easy to explain:

1. I have an agenda that is traditional and patriarchal.
2. Those in power have an agenda that is non-traditional and matriarchal.
3. I began to physically organize into a proto-political movement.

Which institution can be instantly weaponized to attack a man who is physically organizing a movement that stands against the ruling agenda? The media. I don't know exactly how they coordinate, but the exact same type of coordination you saw against Gamergate and now with Donald Trump confirms that the media works as a single organism that can spring to heel within hours.

Media coordination against Trump

Media coordination against gamers

I was recently told by an insider that the dividing line is physical organization. If you decide to have meetings that are politically subversive in nature, you will either be attacked like I have or be infiltrated by the FBI. We're allowed to stew angrily in our internet ghettos, but the second we coordinate in person, the machine will attack again. I'm left with the decision on what to do from this point on.

To see the whole story of how the media attacked me, along with a breakdown of their master plan, check out my new book Free Speech Isn't Free. It has a balanced mix of narrative and ideology that will also give you actionable advice to help defend yourself against establishment attacks. Second Presidential Debate Between Hillary Clinton And Donald Trump (OPEN THREAD)

I created this page for those who want to leave comments during the debate or in the immediate aftermath. You can also discuss it on this RVF thread.

The debate will start at 9PM EST. For those of you who don't live in the United States, you may be able to find a live stream on this site. Things have already gotten dramatic with Trump appearing in a pre-debate press conference with four women who have accused Bill Clinton of rape.

> "Mr. Trump may have said some bad words, but Bill Clinton raped me and Hillary Clinton threatened me. I don't think there's anything worse," Broaddrick said.

October 10, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The second Presidential debate at Washington University in St. Louis has delivered a remarkable victory to Donald Trump. After his toughest week on the campaign trail yet, following grossly unsubstantiated claims that he sexually abused women, Trump piled on Hillary Clinton with a vengeance. Everything, from her email scandal to her husband's history with women, was turned against her in dramatic fashion on Sunday night. Not even the biased intercessions of the two moderators, CNN's Anderson Cooper and ABC's Martha Raddatz, could save the former Secretary of State.

Starts at 32:00

Let's face it: many Donald Trump supporters found his first debate performance at Hofstra University two weeks ago underwhelming. I for one was one of those who felt Trump beat Clinton even then, but many others were not convinced. Last night, however, the outcome was clear. Trump hammered Clinton where it mattered and numerous times she was left reeling from his words.

Below you will find some of the truth bombs over which Hillary Clinton will be having nightmares for weeks to come.

Trump promised to get a special prosecutor to investigate Clinton's email scandals

> Donald Trump threatens to jail Hillary Clinton if he wins the election https://t.co/RXCwGVdnx4 #debate https://t.co/PMz2LDYPiy
> — CNN (@CNN) October 10, 2016

Donald Trump was brutally focused in his castigation of Hillary Clinton's deleted emails scandal. Homing in on Clinton's deletion of emails after she had been subpoenaed, Trump pointed out that anyone doing a fifth of what she had done would already be in jail. To that end, he promised to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate Clinton's misdeeds and the bizarre scenario involving a plane meeting between her husband Bill Clinton and US Attorney-General Loretta Lynch, who was the person most responsible for overseeing the investigation. Trump also highlighted reports that many FBI officials are bemoaning the leniency shown to Clinton.

Media commentary after the debate attacked Trump for supposedly being authoritarian in promising to put Hillary Clinton in jail. This is way off the mark, as Presidential administrations regularly go after people for "illegal" activities, well before a court has pronounced judgment. For example, under Barack Obama's authority, the US Federal Government is suing Trump supporter Peter Thiel's technology company, Palantir, for what it says is certain "racial discrimination." Bear in mind that only weeks ago Thiel was fronting the Republican National Convention to support Trump. How convenient!

Hillary was unable to push the "Trump hates women" agenda fully because…

Yup, it's due to the guy on the right.

Naturally, Hillary Clinton sought to attack Donald Trump for eleven-year-old video footage of him that was only publicized days ago. The footage featured the Republican nominee making remarks about women, which the Trump campaign described as mere locker room banter and liberals attacked as "misogyny" and "proof" of sexual assault. Nonetheless, the Democratic nominee's criticisms fell far short of what many had expected.

The presence at Washington University of both Hillary's husband Bill and a series of women who had accused the former President of rape, sexual assault, and general sexual impropriety definitely restricted what she could say about the Trump video. Better yet, Trump strengthened his position by reiterating the inappropriateness of what was said in 2005 but also categorically denying that he had ever sexually assaulted women. The Clinton campaign is so used to Trump not saying that he's wrong that it had no back-up plan for the very deft response he gave to his critics last night.

"Revelations" about Trump this week, orchestrated by CNN to perfectly time with the upcoming debate, were meant to destroy the businessman's campaign. By contrast, they have actually highlight the fragility of Hillary's. As someone who has said previously that women need to be believed whenever they allege sexual assault or rape, she knows she will do herself no favors by pressing too hard against Trump on women. This is, after all, the same former First Lady who tried to destroy her husband's accusers, women who have for years refused to recant their chilling claims. It's a very messy situation for Hillary indeed.

Bill Clinton's face, one that has given us many moments throughout the Presidential race so far, was especially classic on Sunday evening. NBC's focus on him as he was being mentioned by Trump regarding sexual abuse is a camera shot countless people will remember for a very, very long time.

Hillary's "you need a public and a private position" comment was blamed on Steven Spielberg's Lincoln

Apparently Hillary's line only related to applying pressure on Congress. Do you really believe that?

The most surreal moment of the debate was when Hillary Clinton blamed her "you need a public and a private position" comment on the Steven Spielberg film Lincoln. After Wikileaks recently released partial transcripts of her speeches to Wall Street, including to Goldman Sachs, quick attention in particular was paid to this remark. In one moment during the debate that would have dragged on excruciatingly for any Democrat watching, Hillary said that this quote was really just praise for the strategies used by Abraham Lincoln to manage Congress and pass the Thirteenth Amendment, as depicted in Lincoln.

Though Trump could have better linked this poor rationalization by Clinton to her flip-flopping on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, an issue where she has multiple times argued for "open borders," he did enough to greatly unsettle her. So much so that she needed to divert with "But let's talk about what's really going on here…" What followed was yet another rehash of her Russian conspiracy theory, whereby Clinton's long-term, documented duplicity on the issues should be ignored in favor of looking into a not just murky but opaque purported master-plan by Vladimir Putin to help Donald Trump win the November general election.

On this note, Trump delivered his equal best line (alongside "Because you'd be in jail") of the night:

> .@realDonaldTrump on the difference between Abraham Lincoln and @HillaryClinton https://t.co/krnoAN5t1Y https://t.co/kjYTnPCBMX
> — POLITICO (@politico) October 10, 2016

Hillary had no answer to Trump's tax retort

George Soros not only uses legal tax provisions, like Trump – he "broke" the Bank of England in 1992 through his currency speculations, too.

Unsurprisingly, Hillary Clinton went after Donald Trump over allegations he reported a nearly one billion dollar loss in the 1990s to "avoid" paying federal income taxes. Putting the undeniable legality of his actions twenty years ago to the side, Trump retorted in a fashion his opponent did not expect, asking why he should be attacked for legitimately using laws exploited by Hillary's own top donors. As an illustration, Warren Buffett and George Soros, both major Trump haters, are believed to have similarly saved huge, if not greater amounts of cash from the coffers of the taxman.

Strangely as well, Clinton said if elected President she would root out the presence of "dark, unaccountable money" in politics. But where would that leave Soros and her other financial lifelines? Hedge fund operators and other corporations, legal entities whose motivations are very hard to trace, let alone control, have backed Clinton over Trump to an unprecedented extent so far, with the present disparity only due to widen further:

Moreover, what is most lost on Hillary and her supporters is that Trump's resurrection from near financial ruin in the 1990s is the perfect microcosm of what America needs. With $20 trillion in debt, the United States requires a massive reversal to arrest its decline as a world superpower. Trump's own experiences demonstrate that he can perform this Lazarus-like transformation far better than Clinton, whose main source of income is delivering "speeches."

Just as my colleague Michael Sebastian explored the other day, Donald Trump is being targeted and vilified for being a heterosexual male and proud American unafraid to challenge the status quo. Powerful interests are at work to discredit him with heinous, patently false allegations. Trump's schooling of Hillary on Sunday night will have only inflamed their hatred of him and their pathological desire to see his fall.

So much work is yet to be done. Hillary's hounds in the media will be out again trying to unseat him from his perch. Traitorous Republicans, like the dozens who abandoned him after his harmless remarks from over a decade ago were released, will even go so far as to fuel the flames against Trump for Hillary and the Democrats.

The second debate was a triumph for Trump, but one that he (and we, too) cannot rest on.

13 Signs That A Woman Is Toxic

October 10, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

As feminism-infused women lay waste to modern civilization by destroying men and families, it is becoming more important than ever for the awakened men to filter out these toxic women from their lives. While much is said about the intricacies of female nature and women's ability to toy with man's passions, there is a faster and more efficient method to detect red flags out of women: through their body characteristics. You see, unlike words that can be easily manipulated, it is far more difficult to hide one's true nature expressed in the face and elsewhere. A woman's personality tend to be expressed through her body more than she realizes.

While the following characteristics may seem obvious when pointed out, it may be much harder to recognize them when you're actually interacting with women. And once you do discover them next time, know that it's not enough to simply refuse having a relationship with these women; if possible, you must avoid them completely lest their toxic negativity poisons you.

1. Fish Mouth

Women with fish mouth always have some serious attitude problems. They have chip on their shoulders and they're looking for ways to stir conflict non-stop. If you're ever wondering how they even developed those mouths, it's the result of their constant snarking and bitching. Not surprisingly, many feminists and SJW's (including some men) bear this tell-tale sign on their faces.

2. Abnormal Body Modifications

Dyed hair, butchered hair, tattoos like a gang member, piercings and rings like a pirate, and other freakish ways to attention-whore are all huge red flags. I wouldn't even treat a man who turns his body into a post-modern art seriously, so why should you with women?

3. The Thousand Cock Stare

The thousand cock stare is hard to describe in words: you either recognize it or you don't. I think the best way to describe it would be as a vapid lifelessness of a woman who's trying her best to hide her slut past and post-wall desperation. It's not surprising that they often resemble a recovering addict—which they are, in some ways. They also tend to look older than their real age as excessive alcohol and cocks destroyed their youth. I knew one gorgeous girl, who was the closest thing to a 10 I've seen in my life, hit the wall with visible TCS by the time she reached 24.

4. Crazy Eyes

Guess what this one ended up doing.

Crazy eyes are so glaringly obvious that I'm surprised there are men who still marry these women. If the eyes are the window to the human soul, you can tell that these women are deranged and unstable. Having a relationship with a crazy eyed woman is as dangerous as carrying a box of nitroglycerine on a shopping cart that only has three wheels.

5. Too Much Makeup

I've never found girls who are afraid to show their natural face attractive, and for a good reason. Women who cover their face with makeup are not only hiding their ugly faces but also their ugly personalities as well. I have yet to meet a decent woman who constantly wears thick makeup (even when swimming). On the other hand, I generally find that the less makeup a woman puts on, the more pleasant her personality and attitude is.

6. No Smile Or Fake Smile

“Could you be so nice as to do me a favor you would never do if I didn’t have a vagina?”

The reason why men tell women to smile more and why feminists go berserk in response is because a smile can tell you a lot about a woman. I get the impression that North American women stopped smiling at a collective level to put up a bitch shield against the hordes of thirsty males.

On the flip side, I notice that more and more women are using fake smiles to tease their beta-orbiters into currying favors. For the desperate simps, even the slightest female approval is the closest thing to a sex they’ll ever experience, which is why they’ll always be ready to jump any amount of hoops in order to earn it—and the women know this. One girl (who was much younger than I) tried to turn me into her servant by telling me to fetch something for her. You should have seen just how fast her fake smile disappeared when I told her “no.”

7. Middle Finger

Would you put a ring on her next finger?

I don't know where girls started getting the idea that it's hip to be crass, but the phenomenon is epidemic now. I've even seen one teenage girl give the finger to her father as a joke (the cuck just laughed it off). There's no reason for a woman, even as a joke, to be using the finger.

8. Forward Head

Belligerent and confrontational women love to get in people's faces. If you see a girl who habitually pushes her head forward like a chicken to make a point, lose her. You have nothing to gain by interacting with her.

Forward head as a posture may also be a sign of too much cellphone use. Besides, it just looks plain ugly. One of the things I noticed about foreign women when I moved out of North America is how almost all of them have a much graceful posture with their heads straight up.

9. Alpha Smirk

The alpha smirk isn’t even common among men as it is only used by the smug and cocky ones who are full of themselves (not that it’s necessarily a bad thing for a man). So, if you see a woman is doing it, you can be sure that she is pure toxic. I have yet to meet a woman who smirks who weren’t total manipulative, back-stabbing, dark-triad whore.

10. The “Tough Girl” Look

A sign of high testosterone. These chicks want to be seen as tough and they will put up this front as if they just grew a dick. I admit I used think these “tough” chicks were hot, but that was when I was 13 years old.

Newsflash: If you think girls with this look or personality is attractive, you’re most likely a supplicating simp.

11. Condescending Look

Similar to tough look, women today seem to think that their inflated SMV value and career elevates them far above the commoners they see around them. Even if woman is deservedly in a high position, her lack of modesty equates to arrogance and zero empathy. It’s no surprise that many of these women can’t hold onto a man and will most likely die alone.

12. Forced Deep Voice

Another pathetic attempt to puff up and appear stronger than they actually are. This is rare, but I’ve actually seen few cringe-worthy women who would deliberately lower their voices to yell in people's faces. There's zero reason for a woman to force herself to sound more like a man. Mock or avoid these types completely.

13. Hands On Hips

The universal "I'm a woman begging for your respect" pose.

You'll see this body language with insecure career women desperate for everyone else around them to see them as being strong and capable. Anything short of groveling will trigger these type of women into a hissy fit. As an example, I personally had one older manager (who was desperately single) who would always do this pose with her hands not on her hips, but all the way up almost at her chest level. She also had 10, 11, and 12 listed above. Everyone at work thought she was obnoxious and ridiculous, but didn't do anything to challenge her. I was the only person who would not take her shit. And every time I refused to "respect" her, she would throw a tantrum like a fat kid being denied an ice-cream. Eventually, she filed a false accusation against me just as I started being more soft towards her.

My experience shows that even if you're not in relationship with these women, and even if you try to pander to them, they will find ways to infect you with their blackened soul. Be aware and be alert. Because if you let your guard down, they will destroy you.

Why Cortisol Is Making Men Fat, Weak, And Effeminate

October 10, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Henry Tran

So perhaps this beta-male hormone isn't entirely new, and it certainly isn't ONLY associated with your belly fat…. However, it has taken a while for these concepts and ideas to fall more heavily into fitness and health-related discussions.

Today we're going to talk about Cortisol, and how your gut can actually cause an increase in the production of Cortisol. This leads to a downward, out-of-control spiral into fat-belly beta oblivion. But don't be too concerned… I'll tell you how to effectively reduce your Cortisol levels so you can drop the excess fat and get a body that demands respect and submission from every single person you come in contact with.

The "Stress Hormone" = The Belly Fat Hormone

I'm sure you've heard about this stress hormone, cortisol, but in case you haven't and you're not in the mood to finger bang your google machine… I'll just tell you:

- Cortisol is one of our naturally produced hormones
- It is necessary to survive, and it does some good things like help you deal with allergies
- However, if Cortisol levels are too high for long periods of time, it can cause muscle wasting, or a loss of muscle mass… Plus some other crappy physiological things.

- Prolonged stress and sleep deprivation are two major causes of high cortisol

Now that we've covered what our Wikipedia warriors probably figured out on their own (and bless you red pill poppers who actually did check the facts), here's what you need to know. This is the information that's a little harder to obtain from a quickie internet search, but you'll see why your stress hormone is also your belly fat hormone, and how it cascades out of your control.

The Fat Cells In Your Gut Are Alive / Belly Fat Produces Cortisol…Which Stores More Belly Fat

I won't get too nitty gritty with the science details, but numerous studies have noted that Cortisol directly affects fat storage and weight gain in stressed individuals. In fact, it can move fat from storage deposits in other body parts and relocate it to fat cells deep in the abdomen (1, 2), further encouraging your pot belly to protrude.

So if you didn't think Cortisol sucked enough already, hear this: Cortisol also aids adipocytes (baby fat cells) to grow up into mature fat cells (3).

And while we're on the road to stomach fat hell… there is also a compound in your belly fat that encourages EVEN MORE cortisol to be produced (3). So how the hell are we ever supposed to catch a break? Given this battle we're fighting against our own bodies, one can only ascertain this simple truth:

The Most Important Quality of An Alpha

Qualities of an alpha aren't just in how other people perceive and treat you. But rather, having complete control over a hormonal system that is designed to screw you over is the ultimate form of dominance. It's a similar concept to being the type of guy that overcomes difficult circumstances or events in life that would tear most people down. The act of not just overcoming, but never giving up…. and coming out successful.

Having the self-discipline, willpower, and self-respect to treat your body like the temple that it is will not only give you more confidence. It will outwardly radiate to people you interact with, bestowing upon you to true essence of an alpha, rather than faking it til you (hopefully) make it.

So – Beer bellies are simply not alpha. Period. Not to mention this excess abdominal fat also suggests that you may have low testosterone, pushing you even deeper into your sad little beta cave.

3 Ways To Beat The Belly Fat Hormone Cycle

If you're still with me and still plan on vanquishing that beta beer gut, then read closely. Earlier, we established that there are three major causes of this cortisol overproduction: Stress, Sleep deprivation, and excess belly fat. In fact, there is plenty of data that connects sleep-deprivation to belly fat (4). And I think we can all agree that lack of sleep also encourages more stress.

Are you beginning to feel like your waistline is royally screwed? Fear not. Here are three things you can do to establish dominance over your body's unconscious hormone signalling:

- Stop looking at electronic screens 1-2 hours before bedtime – Phones, laptops, even TVs.

Your body may confuse the brightness from the screen with sunshine – and sunshine tells your body's internal clock that it's time to be awake(5).

- Try a day of fasting – not eating a single thing except water and sugar free beverages.

Not only can fasting help regulate your digestion, aid in recovery, and reduce symptoms of depression and anxiety (6)… It has been suggested in research that fasting can actually help you sleep better. (7) Let me be clear, though. I don't recommend this often. There is a point where fasting is dangerous and can lead to more fat storage, but one day out of the week can be beneficial. And lest we forget, not eating for 24 hours BLOWS. It's probably one of the best parts of my day…. Ranking number two only to taking a #2…. Ha! Okay, maybe that was a shitty joke. Onto the last tip….

- Use this carefully concocted combination of naturally occurring amino acids, minerals, and herbs to help you get to sleep faster, sleep more deeply, and wake up feeling invigorated, refreshed, and recovered – mentally and physically.

I personally take this every night because research has shown these ingredients promote and encourage better and deeper sleep, improved relaxation, and even help encourage your body to release a hormone that directly opposes Cortisol… And can reverse the negative effects that cortisol has on your body.

Not only am I in it for the mental improvements that result from a good night's sleep, but I'm not about to settle for a beta beer belly; you shouldn't either. Especially when the fix is so simple.

So I'll leave it up to you. If you want to reach your peak alpha status by finally winning the battle against your belly fat hormone, you have my respect and I'll raise you this:

The Crippling Effect Of The Zero-Defect Mentality

October 10, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

At first I couldn't believe what I was reading. So I read it through one more time, just to make sure I wasn't missing something. But I hadn't missed anything. The article really was saying what I had thought. What am I talking about? I'm talking about this article which appeared in Canada's National Post.

Canada is actually planning to court-martial its special forces commander in Iraq for an accident he had with his rifle. And what was the accident? The accidental discharge of one round from his rifle into a safe area. Unbelievable. Here is how he explains it:

> While preparing to go to a forward trench position as I was arranging my equipment, I negligently discharged one bullet into a safe area while loading my assault rifle…As a soldier and as a special operations officer, the only acceptable standard of care with a weapon is error-free.

That's it. That's all that happened. No one was injured. No one was killed. He just accidentally discharged one round from his loaded rifle into a safe area. And because of this, he will now lose his career and most likely be drummed out of the services. It's just incredible. What is even more incredible is the last sentence of his quote above: "the only acceptable standard of care with a weapon is error-free."

Wrong. Your bloody job is not to be mistake-free. When any machinery or weapons are being handled, especially in a hostile-fire zone, mistakes are inevitable. They are going to happen. Am I saying that nothing at all should happen? No. But for something like this, the worst punishment the guy should receive should be a stern lecture from his CO to get his shit wired tight and un-fuck himself. Maybe even an adverse fitness report. But a court-martial? Are you kidding?

Society wants men to be like this

Do the Canadian authorities have any idea what they are doing to the morale and fighting spirit of their men with these kinds of prosecutions? Do they realize what the effect of all this will be? Or do they even care? Following on the heels of this pathetic story was another article that I couldn't believe made it to print: "Does Every US Soldier Really Need To Know How To Fight?" How foolish of me to hold the antiquated notion that the purpose of an army is to fight. How outdated I am!

Maybe I'm overreacting. Maybe this is a serious breach of good order and discipline. But I don't think so. If we want to have militaries that can actually fight wars, we have to cultivate a spirit of masculinity and aggressiveness. We can't so terrify our men that they are unwilling to take any risk for fear they will be punished. All that's going to do is result in an Army or Marine Corps full of aseptic wimps and whiners. We used to call this the "zero-defect" mentality. This is the thinking that says: "Never take risks. Play it safe. Don't rock the boat. Don't make anyone look bad."

And this mentality has permeated all tiers of our society. I see it everywhere. We've turned into a culture of chickenshits, of people afraid to do anything, a culture in which the highest ethic is to cover your own ass and mumble the party-line. And this culture is what's going to get us defeated in the next major war. Because we will have spent so much time sanitizing our men that they won't have the ability to defend themselves. This trend has been going on in the military for a long time, but in the past ten years or so it's reached shocking levels. And no one wants to say anything. Because the generals and civilians at the top are too chickenshit to say anything.

Why should I risk my pension? Because it's in your job description to have a set of balls, sir. You're expected to stand up and fucking say something when you see things that are fucked up.

This weekend, I saw an interesting movie. It was called The Last Days (Los Ultimos Dias), a Spanish film from 2013. It was one of those apocalypse films. And the premise of this one was intriguing. The idea is that people around the world began to be afflicted with acute agoraphobia. That is, they were unable to leave their homes and go outside in the open air. If they did, they would suffer seizures and die. As a result, all modern society collapsed. The streets of Barcelona became totally deserted and overgrown with weeds. Complete and total collapse.

The movie doesn't specifically give us the reasons for the outbreak of "The Panic" (as it was called). But they hint at the reason: the modern world had become too aseptic. Too clinical. Too filled with risk-averse people who were afraid to get their hands dirty. So people's immunity systems began to collapse. People just began to feel overwhelmed with everything, and preferred to curl up into the fetal position and stay indoors.

It may sound farfetched. But sometimes science-fiction can tell us much about the mood of an era. Already, we read headlines about men in Japan and other countries who are literally afraid to leave their rooms. Afraid even to have sex with women. Afraid to engage with the world. Afraid to get in the arena and mix it up.

It's clear that modern society (at least in the West) is determined to create a generation of neutered, aseptic chickenshits who are fearful of doing literally anything. And when this ethic takes hold, it will be our death-knell. Because you need to have people who are willing to put their asses on the line. And you need to reward those who take chances. Especially in war. Especially in conflict. Wars are not won by men who are afraid to touch their rifles for fear that they may accidentally discharge. It happens sometimes. And that's just part of the game. Suck it up. And deal with it.

Meanwhile, in other part so the world outside the clinical, zero-defect, aseptic West, there are cultures with men who willingly take risks. Men who have nothing to lose and are not afraid to do whatever it takes. They laugh at your rules. They laugh at your weakness. And they are sharpening their knives.

All the technology and armaments in the world are of no use if the people controlling them are spineless, gutless chickenshits.

Confessions Of A Former Journalist In The Corrupt Media Establishment

October 11, 2016 | by Kiron Solari | Link | Original Link

I doubt anyone needs to be reminded that the media is rotten to the core; even the most reluctant and closed-minded people are accepting this as a given now. But despite the media being widely condemned nowadays (my special thanks to Germans for bringing the word “Lügenpresse” back), few people know or understand what’s really going on in the journalistic kitchens, where the foul slop of lies that people are fed every day is cooked up. However, there is always a way in—through purposeful infiltration or, in my case, by accident.

I have an old friend—let’s call him Sven—whom I always knew as a kind-hearted and sincere man. However, these traits are also coupled with always assuming the best of people and being rather naive. Due to this, he keeps ending up in awkward and sometimes dangerous situations. One of them turned out to be a short stint as a journalist for a popular online newspaper. He barely maintained contact during his employment and eventually went completely off the grid. In about a month, he resurfaced a changed man, and not for the better. As he explained, he quit the job and then shut himself in for a while, armed with nothing but alcohol, to cope with the depression working as a journalist gave him.

Now, this probably sounds very soft to many of you, including myself. Men don’t sink into depressions or try to drink themselves out of problems. While I granted my friend the clemency of explaining his failures to him, I also recognized the usefulness of his experience and started questioning him about what he saw and heard at the job. I will relay his findings below; however, I will not disclose his true name or the name of his employer—given the “free” country we live in, this can land him in very hot water.

Whoever pays you, owns you

Just your regular journalists waiting for their paycheck.

Sven joined the ranks of journalists to tell people the truth. To his credit, he believed he would be doing exactly that. His first assignment sounded so simple, after all—talk to a person, record the conversation, write an article, publish it. The reality turned out to be diametrically different—after our fresh-baked journalist returned from his first interview, he was immediately ordered to transcribe the recording and email it to the content manager. Half an hour later Sven received a heavily edited version of the transcript, with the parts he considered most crucial replaced with meaningless buzzwords or removed completely. When he went to the manager to voice his indignation, the manager simply replied: “This man did not pay us for an article that would disparage him. Get back to your desk.”

This was far from the only case of Sven witnessing how much pull money has in journalism. His numerous colleagues almost never produced independent content—they were too busy publishing one paid article after another. When Sven asked whether these articles should be marked as sponsored, the only reply he got was a bitter laugh. Very often the content manager would come over to his desk and say something along the lines of “Do you know the guy you are writing about is a close friend of our boss? Do not screw this article up.” Sven was also surprised to see that many interviewees (usually politicians) would not even bother to talk to him, instead referring him to their secretaries or assistants. One of them even went as far as to hand him a pre-written speech, tell him to work with it and walk away.

However, our Sven also happens to possess a burning sense of justice, which has several times led him to ignore the “recommendations” his content manager gave him, deviate from the official story and allow small snippets of truth to make their way into public view. For each of such occurrences he was called to the manager’s room, given a strict admonishment and had his paycheck for the month reduced. Any “unsanctioned” things that he wrote were quickly edited away afterwards—even if the article had already been read by thousands of people. And his was supposed to be a “neutral and objective” media outlet!

Standards? Never heard of ’em.

It was a big shock for Sven when he finally realized that his employers were beings without conscience who whored themselves out to the highest bidder. It was an even bigger shock when he discovered how nonchalantly his colleagues treated their responsibilities. Investigative journalists relied on information they got from Google searches and Twitter posts, editors and sub-editors used rumors and hearsay to write scathing op-eds, website managers just posted any content that caught their fancy as long as they could come up with a flashy enough headline for it to attract people. Fact-checking was almost unheard of, unless someone specifically paid for it.

When it came to choosing topics and writing articles, the guideline for the entire establishment was simple: do not make the people angry. Not the regular people, mind you—those were not even considered human beings, just a faceless mass that one threw articles at and got pageviews and money in return. No, the label “people” was reserved for people who mattered. This included representatives of the powers that be, well-known public figures, moneybags with fingers in the political pie and, of course, personal buddies of the outlet’s owner.

These were to be protected, coddled and praised at all costs, while everyone else was fair game. Needless to say, politics held as much sway in the outlet as money did—whenever something noteworthy happened, “protectors of truth and objectivity” immediately went to work spinning the events in a way desirable for those holding their leashes. Hit pieces against political opponents and undesirables were churned out, smokescreens were cast, facts were omitted, denied and misinterpreted. Sven confessed to me later that the day his outlet covered the parliamentary elections was the first day in his life when he spent the entire evening drinking. Journalistic ethics, a term that the media loves throwing left and right, turned out to be nothing but hot air.

In the media omelet, you are an egg

Meet Peter Wolodarski, your new boss. He is here to make sure you keep writing articles about how your people should go extinct.

The title says it all. For top dogs in the media business, a rank-and-file worker is not just a pawn—he is a condom. Contrary to what many people think, a typical journalist's existence is quite pathetic: underpaid, undervalued, thankless and constantly bossed around. Staff turnover in the "kitchen" is very high, and not because people are getting promoted. In this field, the term "veteran employee" frequently means a poor sod who has no alternatives and cannot quit.

According to Sven, plenty of his colleagues worked only for the sake of getting their paycheck, which explains their negligence. Grey faces, pinched mouths, shifty eyes and sour attitudes—whatever it takes to get through the day. In addition, the higher-ups avoided any responsibility for the published content: whenever an angry reader called the office and complained about an article, the guy who wrote it was immediately thrown under the bus, even if his work was reviewed and approved by the management before publication. After all, what does it take to find another office drone with half-decent writing skills?

However, Sven also describes those of his coworkers who enjoyed their job. They arrived at the office with a spring in their step, a smile snaking across their faces and a mischievous glint in their eyes. These were the "talented" favorites of the outlet's boss—unfeeling, cold assholes who would sell their own mothers for a juicy piece of gossip that they would later smear all over the website. Whenever they got a chance to write a hit piece, spread a nasty rumor or ruin someone's life, one could almost see them light up from within. Remember all these smug, holier-than-thou, oh-so-intellectual articles churned out by rags like Salon, Dagens Nyheter and Huffington Post? You can bet your pinky finger they were (and are) written by these people. Which brings us to the next topic.

No wrongthink allowed

The staff of Aftonbladet, one of the most vehemently anti-White newspapers in Sweden. Notice anything?

As you have probably noticed long ago, the media field is a huge and accommodating Petri dish for all varieties of Kulturbolschewismus. In Sven's case, it wasn't just a fearbased company policy of snitching and self-censorship, but an actual agenda at work. He told me there was a flowchart hanging in the newsroom explaining what to do when reporting crimes and incidents. It went something like this: “Was the perpetrator native (white)? Y = report in detail, amplify, N = gloss the details over, downplay.”

Sven wrote an article about a national holiday once, but his content manager refused to approve it for publishing due to it being “too patriotic,” advising him instead to “write more inclusively about minorities’ participation in the festival.” Anything praising the country and its indigenous inhabitants was undesirable and omitted whenever possible, while any piece that brimmed with self-hate, praised inhabitants of other (read: African and Muslim) countries or attacked the natives and their way of life was a big hit and flew through approval like a bird.

Needless to say, the outlet’s newsroom was crammed full of women, their pet cucks and, of course, Jews. The former enjoyed absolute power regardless of their position—a simple complaint to HR was enough to fire anyone, no proof required. The cucks, represented by twig-armed, piercing-laden, wispy-bearded creatures in Che Guevara shirts, were very pleased with the way things were going, sipping lattes and snitching to HR on those who expressed ideas incompatible with the narrative. Jews were in their native element in the newsroom, doing their usual “arrogant intellectual” schtick and getting promotions out of nowhere. The majority of articles bashing natives, their culture and values came from them, as later study of the newspaper’s website showed me.

Liars for hire

So, to sum it all up: the media is not composed of good but misguided people, as many still think. On the contrary, it is a very purposeful and self-aware entity that positions itself somewhere between an unscrupulous opportunist and a loyal lapdog of the state. At best, it is faux-patriotic (“such a wonderful country we have, let’s invite more immigrants!”), while at worst, it is openly hostile towards the indigenous population of the country it exists in.

Moreover, it allows for consolidation and self-affirmation of globalist forces—the traitorous governments, the world Jewry, the multinationals, the entertainment industry and the like—against the increasingly disenfranchised and declining native population. And last but not least, the media is complicit in crimes committed in the West by non-White immigrants due to purposeful obfuscation of them and, if that fails, rabble-rousing to pressure the courts into letting the criminals off scot-free. To me, the latter reason alone is enough to send all the journalists and their owners to the gibbet.

The bottom line is to always remember that the media is not your friend in any way, shape or form, even if its lowest tier operatives fit the description of hapless victims rather than nation-wrecking enemies. The media must be opposed, exposed and boycotted at every turn until it starts bleeding money and choking on its own venom.

How To Wage Economic Warfare

October 11, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Here's how we as individuals can stick it to the globalist elites who are hell-bent on wrecking our civilization, after they've combined the excesses of plutocracy with cultural Marxism, a crappy form of Communism. They've failed to lead the public responsibly, and it's about time we take action to get them off our backs. Note well, capitalism and democracy are not intrinsically bad, but plutocracy and managed democracy are distortions which indeed are bad.

Money is power, and they're getting it from the public

It's time to starve the beast.

Objectivism has a concept called "the sanction of the victim". (I'm not an Objectivist, but some of their ideas are pretty good, and they're a refreshing counterbalance to fuzzy thinking that passes for leftist ideology these days.) The concept is that the bad guys can't win if we don't let them. This is best explained by the following excerpt from the John Galt speech in Atlas Shrugged:

> Then I saw what was wrong with the world, I saw what destroyed men and nations, and where the battle for life had to be fought. I saw that the enemy was an inverted morality – and that my sanction was its only power. I saw that evil was impotent—that evil was the irrational, the blind, the anti-real—and that the only weapon of its triumph was the willingness of the good to serve it. Just as the parasites around me were proclaiming their helpless dependence on my mind and were expecting me voluntarily to accept a slavery they had no power to enforce, just as they were counting on my self-immolation to provide them with the means of their plan—so throughout the world and throughout men's history, in every version and form, from the extortions of loafing relatives to the atrocities of collectivized countries, it is the good, the able, the men of reason, who act as their own destroyers, who transfuse to evil the blood of their virtue and let evil transmit to them the poison of destruction, thus gaining for evil the power of survival, and for their own values—the impotence of death. I saw that there comes a point, in the defeat of any man of virtue, when his own consent is needed for evil to win—and that no manner of injury done to him by others can succeed if he chooses to withhold his consent. I saw that I could put an end to your outrages by pronouncing a single word in my mind. I pronounced it. The word was "No."

Passive resistance has limitations, especially when the other side isn't playing fair. An old cartoon comes to mind, with two prisoners in a dungeon suspended by their wrists; one says something like, "So much for peaceful change." Ayn Rand didn't mind the rich getting richer. However, if she'd lived longer, she'd be horrified by today's elites controlling the public with cultural Marxism and managed democracy. In fact, characters from her novels like Ellsworh Toohey and James Taggart greatly resembled today's virtue-signaling elites. Rand's solution, if we go by Atlas Shrugged, would be to retreat to a valley and let the rest of the world go to hell. Since we don't have any valleys conveniently set aside, I have some other ideas.

How did the ultra-powerful amass such riches? Some were industrialists at the right place and the right time to make a fortune from a shoestring. (I don't have a problem with people who get rich through hard work, run their companies responsibly, and don't push destructive agendas.) For others, it was predatory lending, insider trading, currency manipulation, leveraged buyouts, or other financial chicanery. Even so, many of the individuals and companies that push cultural Marxist social engineering got where they were because the public's spending choices made them rich and powerful. We can do our part to put a dent in their wallets.

Unplug from the media

The best hairdo in the cabal

Whenever you see Hollywood celebrities reciting leftist talking points—as if being able to act gives them unique political expertise—remember that they would be nobodies if millions of people didn't buy tickets to their movies. What the public gives, the public can take away. Granted, movie studios have been left-wing since forever, and they would be displeased if their talent said things they didn't like. Still, the extreme virtue-signaling by some celebrities leaves little doubt that they mean it, such as choosing to adopt children not of their culture.

We already call out movies that push cultural Marxist agendas; let's keep hitting them in the wallet. When in doubt, do the research. Don't spend your money on leftist propaganda, or to fund the jet-setting lifestyle of some overpaid airhead moaning about "privilege" or whatever. Eventually, I look forward to the day when we make movies of our own, but that'll be a while in the future.

Also, get rid of your TV! If you're hopelessly hooked, then at least cancel your cable bill and get an antenna. Still, "cold turkey" is the better way. You'll have more time to do useful things. Since much of what's on TV is either crap or propaganda meant to demoralize you, then you might well notice your mood improving. Why spend hours a day passively staring into a glowing box?

Finally, be very choosy about your magazine subscriptions. You can do without a daily newspaper fix too. Unless you live in a small town, it's probably owned by a company far away setting the agenda for all you people in "flyover country".

Unplug from the corporations

Sometimes the problem is obvious.

We've already mentioned some corporations that don't deserve your support. Let's keep doing that, and hit those companies in the wallet too. Ultimately, what's needed is a database to keep track of companies that do things like fund agitators, piggyback sneaky social messages into their advertisements, cause widespread environmental destruction, "offshore" their workers while management swims in gravy, and the like. This would be something along the lines of Operation Eyes Wide Open, which potentially could even be hosted here. Leftists routinely boycott companies they don't like; it's about time we do the same. If businesses saw that virtue-signaling and other irresponsibility hurts the bottom line, they'd think twice about it and focus on their primary mission of making products.

If you don't care for big agribusiness, then shop frequently at your local farmer's market. By the way, "all natural" essentially means the same thing as organic. (It's easy for big agribusiness to get organic certification—they have departments that handle that—and much harder for small farmers not used to all the paperwork.) Your purchases will go to help small farmers near your local community.

Chances are that you have a bank account. Is it with some huge bank headquartered far away from your community, or maybe one that got a TARP bailout because it was "too big to fail"? You can fix that problem. Find a local credit union and move your money.

Take on as little debt as possible. It doesn't make sense to live above your means, and then have to pay monthly interest charges to the banksters. Sometimes you have to—not everyone is wealthy enough to pay cash on the barrelhead for a car, much less a house—but then shop around and get a decent interest rate. Not being encumbered by credit card debt will help your credit card rating, and allow you to get a low rate.

Where possible, do business with local family-owned stores, rather than huge chains with distant headquarters. Keep the money circulating within your community. Notice a theme yet? This third way is called Distributism, an alternative to plutocracy and socialism. The goal is to put the means of production in the hands of the individual producers as much as possible. This is more relevant than ever; the days when you could get a well-paying factory job fresh out of high school and retire from the same company at 55 with a gold watch and a decent pension are long gone.

The ultimate act of unplugging is to start your own business. This isn't something done overnight, of course. Rather than quitting your day job, instead come up with a side job that capitalizes on your talents and skills. Once you've finally got enough side income to escape the cubicle farm, then you'll be working for yourself and away from the watchful eyes of the HR department. Self-employment also provides resilience; this is better than having a single revenue stream where your financial future is subject to the company's economic fortunes and the whims of management.

In conclusion

You should be better off personally and financially by successfully taking these actions. Societally, this won't make much of an impact if just one person does it. However, if the masses get on board, we can make a real difference, so tell your friends and get them unplugged too.

5 Firearms A Man Should Own

October 11, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

The election in November is anything but a sure thing and it is quite possible that the USA will have Hillary Clinton as its next President. One of the first things that totalitarian tyrants do is disarm the populace so that they cannot resist oppression, and Clinton will be no different. While we of Return of Kings have had plenty of articles on the election, today we will cover something I wanted to write about much later after preliminary articles, but, as there is a clear and legitimate threat to at least buying new firearms in the future by the presumptive Bitch-in-Chief, here are the five firearms a man should own.

A Pistol (portability, discretion, and universality)

The first gun a man should get is a pistol. Fortunately, I can at least refer you to my back catalog on these. Pistols are important for a whole bunch of reasons, none of which are relative firepower. Friends, pistols flat out suck in terms of ballistic performance; they are literally one-third of a rifle in terms of cartridge power, action robustness, and accuracy and energy of flight.

However, the compromises made in performance are returned in practicality. You can wear them, as opposed to carrying a rifle. You can conceal them on your person, in your car, and in your home. If you are doing your job right, you will be armed and no one will know unless you need the gun, in which case you have bigger issues at hand. Lastly, a pistol can do a lot for you; it can defend your home, defend your car, defend your person, and can be thrown into your overnight bag as just another part of your kit.

To recap picking your first pistol, if a man is to have one pistol, it needs to be centerfire, and of a popular caliber that is powerful, yet easy to shoot, and it would help to be cost effective as well. If you are going the semi-automatic pistol route, you should go for 9mm Luger (9×19, or 9mm Parabellum), and it should be a modern pistol, hammer fired or striker fired, of either the full sized or compact sized format. Do not get a pocket pistol.

For revolvers, you want a double action revolver with a medium sized barrel (like 4 inches.) Too long a barrel is impractical, and too short is loud, recoils harshly, and tends to limit bullet performance. The best revolver caliber for starting is the .38 Special / .357 Magnum. Buy a pistol that will do .357 and feel free to run the lesser .38 Special in it most of the time, just clean the cylinder bores well so that the carbon ring of the shorter .38 doesn't build up and block the longer .357s from seating fully.

Any semi-auto gun requires extra magazines. I like at least six mags, guns typically come with two, so the first thing you need after the gun itself and ammo is magazines. Get online to Midway USA, Brownells, CDNN, Natchez, or even Gun Broker and get some for cheaper than your gun store. For spare parts, you need to get all springs first, a spare barrel, then maybe a hammer and internals.

You need two types of pistol ammunition; full metal jacket for range practice, and hollow points for defense. Make sure the defense ammo runs reliably in the pistol.

A Shotgun (power and versatility)

Shotguns make no compromise on power, although you can download them to low brass shotshells for easier shooting. They are not particularly concealable, although collapsible stocks, folding stocks, and pistol-grip only stocks help, as well as shorter barrels.

My guide to combat shotguns has yet to be written as of this article, but I can point you to a background article on shotguns in general of mine. A shotgun is a short to medium range weapon that excels at being a home defender. There is absolutely nothing better with which to hold a house and its surrounding lot than a good shotgun, with the only caveats being it will be louder than hell, and you need to worry about over-penetration of interior walls.

The best defense shotguns are either slide action (pump) or semi-auto. The pumps are cheaper, simpler, and will digest more types of ammo, but the semi-autos are semi-auto. You want one that can chamber at least 3 inch shells, and can handle variable chokes (use a full choke for self defense unless you want to run slugs.)

Saiga 12 (top) and Benelli M4

Run high brass, 3 inch, 00 Buckshot (that's pronounced "double ought buck") for defense. It's a good balance between nasty power in each pellet, and enough of them to do damage. Practice with whatever you want for fun, low brass birdshot is fun for clay pigeons and shooting up stuff in general.

Get a sling for the thing, and some way to carry more ammo. There are side-saddle clips that mount to the receiver, butt stock cuffs that slip around the stock, and belts and bandoliers for you. Unless you run a Saiga, you will need to practice feeding the tube, as magazine capacity is tight on these beasts (a full length mag tube will help there some.) Get a full set of chokes for versatility, and all springs that the gun needs for spares.

If you're going to have two guns, get a pistol, then a shotgun. A shorter barrel (18 inches to 24 or so) is combat shotgun length, and, although folding and collapsible stocks are ok, pistol grip only stocks will eventually truck your trigger hand's wrist because the recoil that is supposed to go into your shoulder via the butt-stock is now going into your wrist. Full length fixed butt-stocks are also useful as clubs for when someone is being rude, but not a deadly threat.

A Carbine (capacity and intermediate range)

The shotgun was rated above the carbine because of the versatility and close range defense, but, for intermediate range laying down of the law, the carbine rules supreme. “Carbine” is the correct term for a shorter barreled rifle shooting an intermediate cartridge in a semi-automatic manner, “assault weapon” is a bullshit, made-up term by the media, and an “assault rifle” has a longer barrel and is fully automatic.

There are way too many carbines out there to analyze fully here, as well as their cousins with longer, full rifle, length barrels, and, while I will get into sizes and brands in future articles, the upshot is that you either want an AR pattern rifle, or an AK pattern one.

The AR platform is based around the AR-15 design, and can be made to more-or-less military standards by many manufactures, or you can roll your own. The AK platform is based around the AK-47/74 series of Kalashnikov rifles, and are made internationally as well as from surplus parts. Natively, these rifles run the .223/5.56×45 round (get one set up for 5.56×45) and the 7.62×39 (later 5.45×39) respectively. Although an AR can run .223 and it is sometimes cheaper, the 5.56×45 round performs better and should be used. One of the AK arguments is the fatter 7.62×39 round, and the 5.45×39 round sort of negates that, plus, as I understand it, the latter is harder to get, but any of these rounds are just fine.

Defense ammo is less of a concern for a rifle that it is for a pistol as there is so much more kinetic energy already there, but, the same idea for full metal jacket for target, and hollow or expanding tip ammo for defense applies here, too. Get a bunch of good quality magazines and a lot of the ammo of your choice, as well as springs and other internal spare parts. Get a rifleman’s sling and learn how to shoot (I’ll cover three position field shooting in a future article.)

Upgrades to your carbine worth considering are: collapsible stocks, an optic, a sling, a fore-end grip, a light, and perhaps a laser sight. A good trigger upgrade should be your first stop if your trigger sucks; don't make it too light for a combat gun (as opposed to range toy), but there's no need to put up with grit, slop, or creep.

A .22LR Rifle or Pistol (discretion and economy)

.22s are something I've yet to delve into here, but the family of cartridges (which used to be .22 Short, Long, Long Rifle, and Magnum, but Long is dead and Short is rare) is economical for training, doesn't recoil much, and is a great little varmint cartridge in the Long Rifle variant, and the Magnum is good for turkeys, ducks, and the occasional bothersome cat.

I'm loyal to American manufacturers for 22s, and Ruger particularly. For rifles, there's the 10-22 in semi-auto and there's a bolt action American. For pistols, you can go for the Mark III for semi-auto, and any variant of the Single Six for a revolver.

Ruger 10-22 Rifle and a double action .22 Revolver.

They're great guns to just have a fun afternoon plinking stuff, or blasting small woodland creatures. Although I think a very little kid should start on a BB gun, I can and have taught 6 year olds to shoot with a 10-22, and they definitely work well for girls on dates who are trying to be cool but are scared of things that go bang underneath.

.22s run kind of dirty, and are prone to all sorts of quality control issues. Since the ammo is not reloadable, you should endeavor to find a particular brand your guns like and stack it deep. 22 has not come back to pre-Obama and Sandy Hook prices, although it is getting closer.

A Battle Rifle (long range firepower and control)

The pistol is the most adaptable to our lives, the shotgun is the most versatile, the high capacity carbine has the most volume of fire, the .22 has it for practice and little furry pests, but it is the full power rifle that is the birthright of all Americans and renders the rest of them unneeded if you can keep the enemy at range.

Russian Mosin-Nagant 91/30, US Rifle M1 Caliber .30 (the Garand), Fabrique National Herstal (FNH)'s FNAR, from top to bottom.

While bolt action surplus rifles are nostalgic and sometimes quite affordable, the best bet for a modern ranged battle rifle (meaning shooting a full power cartridge like .308 Winchester or greater) is either a model geared towards hunting sport, or a civilian copy of a military rifle. Semi-automatics are more expensive, but allow easier, faster follow-up shots, while the bolt action is simpler and cheaper.

Refer to my rifle introduction articles for more specifics, but the accessories you want are good sights, whether that be scopes, irons, or optics, a good marksman's sling, and a good trigger, in that order, and only them. The rest of the money you have allocated should be spent on ammo and practice.

Conclusion

If you can only have one gun, have a pistol. If you can have two or three, add a shotgun and an AR or AK. More than that, get a .22 then get a M1 Garand through the CMP. Spare mags, spare parts, cleaning supplies, holsters, slings, and cases, and lots of training and defense ammo.

I recommend 1000 rounds practice, and 500 rounds defensive ammo for each caliber weapon you have, and as much .22 as you can find at a good deal. This is an eventual goal, not an immediate mandate. Get in the habit of buying ammo when it's a good deal.

There are a lot of types of guns that didn't make the list. Lever action rifles, double barreled shotguns, muzzleloaders and other black powder weapons, pocket pistols, massive revolvers, semi-auto machine pistols, bullpups, and semi-auto belt feds are not what I would recommend for your core armament, even though this guy is badass, just for reasons of mission role.

Like a local gun store to me says "I would buy it now." Hillary Clinton, if elected, is going to go after the Second Amendment hard. I doubt she will be able to confiscate guns, but she may be able to stop civilian sales of firearms and ammunition, especially if she loads the Supreme Court with other treasonous liberals. Be safe and practice, then pass on what you have learned.

How To Find A Girl For A Relationship

It’s no secret that in our society, more and more women are becoming completely incapable of forming a life-long bond. Years of riding the cock carousel permanently alters women’s brains, to such an extent that they often times can’t resist one more ride with the bull.

Beyond this, feminism has corrupted many a woman’s mind—it’s taught them to fight and compete against men, rather than aligning with them. It’s taught women that they’re entitled to whatever their hearts desire, that they can be overweight and ugly, but still deserve a prince charming, and it’s effectively ruining marriages for men all across the West.

But, there is hope. Do not buy into the idea of a unicorn; all women fundamentally have the same nature. But, this does not mean that there aren’t some women which are vastly superior for a relationship than others. Here’s how you can find these women.

All About Demographics

Want a girl like this? Join a yoga club.

This is probably one of the most important topics when it comes to developing relationships, so it shocks me that it isn't talked about more often. Demographics is the idea that certain types of women flock to certain venues, social circles, and organizations.

For example, what type of women do you think go out to frat parties every single weekend? Definitely not the type of girl you want to have a relationship with. What about the women who go clubbing four days a week, known in some circles as bottle rats? Again—you definitely don't want to make these women your significant other.

But what about the women who frequent other, less slut-attracting organizations? Frequenting these types of places is the best way to meet high quality women capable of relationships:

- Book stores
- Yoga studios
- The gym
- Cooking classes
- Churches
- Social organizations (homeless shelter, dog care volunteers, etc.)
- Activist groups (not for feminism of course)
- Spiritual groups

Generally speaking, these are the best venues to meet high quality women at. Before you decide where to go, however, you must decide what you want.

What Do You Want?

Obviously we can all agree that we want women who are chaste, loyal, and feminine. No shit. Everyone wants these things, and even just finding a woman with these characteristics nowadays will be somewhat of a challenge. But let's go a little bit deeper. What else do you want? Unless you can vividly picture the type of girl that you want, you will most likely let her pass you by. Start by imagining what she'll look like. Blonde hair? Brunette? Slim? Thick? Blue eyes?

Next, let's get to the personality characteristics. Do you want a woman who will be able to go to the gym with you? Who's fierce and assertive? Then maybe you should meet a woman at the gym.

Do you want a woman who's passionate about changing the world, and could align her energy with yours to achieve something greater as a couple? Then maybe you should consider frequenting spiritual groups, activist organizations, and churches.

Or maybe you want a woman who is very nurturing, feminine, and caring? Then consider volunteering at homeless shelters, taking care of disabled children, and meeting women through there.

The point is that different personality types will flock to different venues—you have to decide what type of girl you want, and attend these venues. Now, as a side note, if you're a newbie I do NOT recommend that you get into a relationship.

The reason why is because as a newbie, you need to go out and get experience so that you can develop some game. Only then will you be capable of passing your girlfriend's shit tests, leading her in a calm, decisive way, and defusing her negative, emotional arguments with ease.

Meeting The Women

I would recommend that you actually choose a venue that you'll enjoy. If you're an intellectual, join a debate group that talks about issues, and go to book stores because you want to.

This is in very stark contrast to when you're trying to sleep with girls from nightclubs. Most men clearly go to bars and night clubs to meet girls, but with social groups it's the opposite. You go to these organizations, because you like what they offer you, and the women come as only an added benefit.

If you simply go to pickup girls, the people in the organization will notice. They'll be turned off by your overt negs, push/pull techniques, and other "gamey" things that you do. Instead, simply go to enjoy the event. Network with the guys there, make friends with everyone, and eventually if you have even a modicum of game, you'll be able to pick up on which women like you and which don't.

From here, it's best to invite them out in a casual, non-sexual way. For example, if I met a girl at a yoga studio (which I'm a fan of), I might make some small talk with her for a few sessions, and then if we connect I'll mention that I'm having a party at my place, or going out that weekend, or something.

If she's interested in you, she'll say yes. Then, from here, it's time to take things to the next level.

A Word of Warning

One of the biggest mistakes that guys make when trying to get a girlfriend, is that they try to initiate the relationship. Big mistake. Masculinity at its essence is freedom. True men want to be free; they value independence, going forth into the world, and liberation.

Women, on the other hand, value security, safety, and comfort—this is why they should be the one who initiates the relationship. “Okay, Jon…so then how do I get her to initiate the relationship?” I can hear someone ask.

It’s simple: sleep with her first, and then date her later. It is much easier to fall into the “lover” frame, and then work your way into the “alpha provider” frame, than it is to do the opposite. When you immediately take the dating frame, you assume that you have to date her before she puts out.

But this is a huge mistake, because women almost never put out if they see you’re willing to spend money on them. Why is this? Well, it’s pretty obvious—they want you to keep spending money and chasing them. Why would they sleep with you and stop that? They wouldn’t.

That doesn’t mean you can’t take them out and do nice things with them once you’re in a relationship. I took my last girlfriend to nice restaurants, concerts, and cool events, but that was only after we were sleeping together.

She Will Make You Wait (But Not Too Long)

Here’s the key: on one hand, if you’re meeting a girl like I recommend she’ll likely be somewhat of a prude. But, that doesn’t mean that you have to wait a year or something before you guys have sex.

By my standards, if a girl has had sex with less than 6 guys in her lifetime, she is in fact a chaste woman. Let’s be real for a second, guys: in a society where women are taught from birth to be as slutty as possible, the fact that any woman would sleep with less than 6 guys is very commendable.

The fact that she’s slept with a relatively small number of men means that she’ll probably make you wait, but most of the waiting time can be circumvented with a basic knowledge of game. Once you invite her out to a party (preferably at your house) or to a bar or something, it’s time to slowly escalate.

Make it clear that you’re attracted to her, but that you don’t need her. This is crucial; learning to balance overt sexuality with non-neediness is one of the most difficult things that newbies will do, but if you can do it correctly, she will sense that you’re a very high value man.

Pull the usual game routine: pass her shit tests, escalate, baby step her, isolate her, and go in for the kiss. Like I said before, she may make you wait—this is fine. If she says that she likes you, but wants to get to know you, this is a good thing. It’s a sign that she’s a good girl, and is all the more reason for you to wait.

How Long Does A “Good Girl” Make You Wait?

Much could be said about whether or not she's really a "good girl," but this is a completely moot point. I would say that a girl worthy of a relationship will make you wait until the third date to have sex.

If you're from another, more traditional culture, such as from India, China, or various parts of Europe (although not for long), she may make you wait even longer. In the West, however, seeing that most women don't make you wait any longer than a few hours, three dates is plenty.

What I'd say is this: don't even focus on how long she's making you wait. Just focus on having fun, teasing her, and connecting with her emotionally. A lot of the time, using "connection" as a metric is much better to determine a girl's sluttiness.

For example, if you meet a girl and just spit the typical game at her, and she fucks you that very night, you could argue that she's a slut. But, if you meet a girl, and it turns out you both love some esoteric band, read the same type of philosophical literature, and both came from the home town… things might be different.

Personally, I judge a woman's sluttiness based off of how CONNECTED she is to you before she sleeps with you. Some girls will sleep with you, even though you guys have zero in common or zero connections. This is slutty. Other girls, may sleep with you very quickly (if you learn to accept yourself and be congruent), but if you guys have a really good connection with a lot in common, I'd argue that this is much less slutty.

Regardless, ultimately you'll have to decide how long you want to wait before giving up on her—keep in mind that plenty of women will keep you on the hook for their own validation, as many on ROK have said before.

She Will Initiate The Relationship

Once you sleep with her, don't think of it as a big deal. You're a player who sleeps with one new girl a week, remember? Just play it off like it's no big deal, and tell her that you'll see her around. Don't make things awkward if you continue to meet at the same social venue.

Invite her out to do things every now and then, but no more than once a week. If she's interested in you, she will pursue you and ask if you want to hang out. Continue sleeping with her, and just focus on giving her good emotions and positive energy when she's around you.

Eventually, she will bring up the idea of a relationship. When she starts saying things like this, you're in:

- "So…what are we?"
- "Do you like me?"
- "I feel like we should be something more."
- "Are you seeing other women?"

These types of statements basically communicate that she wants to be your main girl. She's starting to develop a strong emotional connection with you (which sex does for women more so than men) and wants to be with you.

Again, the key is to remain congruent. You should be open to the idea of a relationship, but don't be so needy or eager to jump into one. If you remember ANYTHING from this article, make it this: women want to feel like they've "got" a high value man.

That's why women love bad boys so much. They want to be the one who he chooses; they want to be the one that "converts" him. If she feels like you're a "catch," and that she really had to work to "secure" you, I can guarantee that your relationship will last for quite a while.

The Pitfalls Of Being A Digital Nomad

October 12, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

For all of the fantastic information about out there about how to become a digital nomad and live a life of freedom and independence—there's rarely any content about the downfalls.

Sometimes the information is pushed by guys trying to make money directly off a product, or simply because they're in the honeymoon phase of their journey. That's not to say that living this life isn't amazing, but I do think it's important to put unbiased information out there for those of you who want to make the leap. It's important to note the potential pitfalls of life abroad.

Here are the potential downsides of living the life of a digital nomad.

You Have No Home

Changing apartments every month (hell, I know some guys who do it nearly every week) gets exhausting. No place feels like home. This is especially true if you're staying in the same city every month.

It's a little different when you're moving to a new country or city, because the excitement of exploring a new place makes it worth it. Regardless, having no place to truly call your own home, where you can truly settle in, can be disheartening. It's especially true when you factor in whatever you are trying to accomplish in life—such as building a business.

Tip: Make sure you get home to see your family (provided you like them and they don't try to bring you down with blue pill garbage). Spend a month or so to recharge your batteries before hitting the road again.

Something else that I'm considering doing is picking a city I really like, actually signing a lease—and still spending several months a year on the road. The cost saved on a yearly lease versus a monthly rental will outweigh the costs, even if I don't live in that apartment for 3-4 months a year.

The Language Issue

Don't get me wrong—I'm a big proponent of learning some of the local language before you head to a new country. But months and months of not being around many native English speakers can wear you down. It's the constant struggle of trying to communicate basic things on a day-to-day basis.

Add in a few dates with girls who speak poor English (though they can be fun, and are still infinitely better than American women), and you could see why this can be a downfall.

Tip: Network and make friends with your fellow Westerners. Just screen them properly—you don't want to escape the Western world only to find more of the poison. But try to go to a expat meeting and screen the people out. You might meet some great people who have been living abroad for years and can be a lot of fun to hang out with.

Electronics Are EXPENSIVE

My laptop died on me a few weeks ago. I thought I was going to have to buy a new one, with the typical 30% markup on electronics in Ukraine. Yikes.

I lucked out and managed to have it fixed for a modest $50, but I was still without my laptop for a week (more on service later). Kind of a problem for a digital nomad.

Simply put, anything you need to buy overseas from an electronic sense is going to burn you. This is made up by an overall cheaper cost of living, but you also have to factor in that most aspiring nomads are not making a full-time American salary (that allows you to manage large expenses like electronics).

Tip: The solution is to network with people around the globe. As soon as my laptop died, I contacted my good friend from the RVF forum (who was coming in two weeks). He agreed to bring a laptop should I need it. It's those kind of connections around the world that can make your life much easier.

The Service Can Leave A Lot To Be Desired

It's just part of living abroad. Sometimes, the service can be really bad in places. Take my computer problem for example. I was told I'd get a call back in two days. Nothing. Then they told me another day. Nothing. I call again on the fifth day.

"Uhh, we are working on your computer starting in one hour…we did not pay our internet bill, so we could not work on your computer."

Yes, a computer shop that didn't pay it's internet bill!

Restaurants are generally much slower—sometimes they'll forget an entire dish, bring main deals and then appetizers 45 minutes later, or just flat-out forget about you. Simply things that you wouldn't see in a place with an emphasis on Western customer service.

Again, it's just part of the tradeoff for a much better life overall, but these kind of situations can frustrate someone who is not used to it (or isn't expecting it).

Tip: Not much you can do, really! The more time you spend on the road, the more you'll likely grow to enjoy the slower pace of the service. Rather than a restaurant in America that has a 45-minute table turnover, you'll like getting to take your time and truly enjoy your dining experience.

Conclusion

Life abroad as a digital nomad is still infinitely better than being stuck in the jail cell, corporate life. I wouldn't trade it for anything. With that being said, there are definitely pitfalls about the life—but you learn to take the good with the bad. There are always way to counter these, as I've illustrated above.

I'd continue to encourage men to try to break free and travel the world, but take both the good and the bad into account when you make such a huge choice like this.

The Lewdness Of Hillary Clinton's Disinformation Campaign

October 12, 2016 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

Over the past weekend, Hillary Clinton's Democratic machine launched the first part of their October Surprise; their final attack on the reputation of Donald Trump. It comes in the form of a 2005 video obtained by the Washington Post. In the behind-the-scenes footage, as Trump prepares for a cameo role on Days Of Our Lives, he engages in some locker room banter with Billy Bush, one of the hosts of Access Hollywood. He starts off by telling Bush about attempting (and failing) to seduce a married woman, but it's the statement that follows which has been drawing the most ire:

> Yeah, that's [Arianne Zucker]. With the gold. I better use some Tic Tacs just in case I start kissing her. You know, I'm automatically attracted to beautiful – I just start kissing them. It's like a magnet. I just kiss. I don't even wait. And when you're a star they let you do it. You can do anything. Grab them by the pussy – you can do anything!

Bush laughs, and proceeds to comment on the legs of one of the other actresses walking by.

The video presented to the public has clearly been edited—there are several jumps during which we miss the intervening conversation—but even the final result is tame compared to what constitutes most public discourse in The Current Year. Topics such as Slut Walks, Kim Kardashian 'breaking the Internet' with her ass, pop starlets parading about on stage with sex toys, and the extreme forms of sexual perversion which are celebrated annually during Gay Pride Parades—all of these have become part of our ordinary discourse.

Parents bring their children to see midgets in gimp masks being led around on leashes, teenage girls listen to music which promotes bisexuality and hard drug use, grocery store tabloids report every single salacious scandal they can get a hold of, but when Donald Trump jokes about how much he likes kissing pretty girls? Better put a warning up for all of the 'lewd' language he'll be using!

On Politeness and Morality

The rank hypocrisy of this pearl clutching is astounding. This form of locker room talk is the nothing more than simple, healthy, virile, masculinity. Since the dawn of humanity, men have sat around discussing the beauty of women, bragging about how popular they are with the ladies, and making crude sexual comments about what they'd like to do with them behind closed doors. While feminists might scream "Rape culture!" and "Objectification!" these are nothing but the ejaculates of diseased minds. Feminists have a pathological fear of healthy male sexuality, and so they conflate the admiration of beauty with the devaluation of personality, and the desire for a woman with the intent to take her by force.

It is a biological fact that men are the initiatory sex, and that women are the alluring sex. Throughout all of the animal kingdom, males have to prove their worth before a female will accept them as a mate, and it is the female's alluring nature which drives them to compete in the first place. Locker room banter is just one of the many ways that the males of our species psych one another up in preparation. It isn't just normal—it is morally correct.

The milk sops who are attacking Trump over this comment are criticizing his lack of politeness—the meek language we adopt whenever we find ourselves in mixed company. If his statements had been made in public they might have had a point—a frank conversation about bowel movements belongs in the doctor's office, not at the dinner table, and telling a woman you barely know that you'd like to "grab her pussy" is the sort of social maladjustment that suggests a temperamental problem—but this was nothing more than a small clip of a long conversation, all of which happened behind closed doors, and exclusively amongst other men. Nobody present was offended—Bush's own replies affirmed and agreed with Trump's—and any man who denies having had a similar conversation is a bald faced liar.

Yes, the conversation was rude, but rude is not immoral; the behaviour that married couples get up to in the marital bed is also rude, and yet St Paul commands married couples to do it well, and to do it often. If you walked into a confessional and told the priest that you wanted to kiss pretty girls, he'd give you five Hail Marys for wasting his time, and even a nun like Mother Angelica can enjoy a bit of rude humor: after reading a Galatians 15:21 on her television show, she joked, "…drunkenness, orgies, and other things—oh my; I'm curious about what these other things might be!"

What sort of world is this where we expect Donald Trump to be better behaved than a Catholic nun? And what sort of hypocrites make up the Republican establishment, if this off-hand remark offends them? Do the indiscretions of the Democrats in general, and the Clintons in particular, even warrant a mention at this point? Or can we simply state that we're living in a world of puritanical hypocrites, who promote the most depraved and debauched culture seen on this planet since the fall of Rome, but who are more than happy to scream "Pervert!" at their enemy because he once patted his wife's derriere while boarding a plane?

The Timing is No Accident

The "recently" obtained footage which sparked this puerile controversy is anything but; it's been sitting around for 11 years, and it's no accident that they chose to release it right now. On its own it won't be enough to damn Trump—on its own, it will only drive more attention to the sexual scandals surrounding Hillary and Bill. Joe Sixpack and Sally

Homemaker might express the required outrage in public, but Joe will laugh it off in the pub, while Sally will compare it to Fifty Shades of Grey at her next book club meeting. In short order it will become little more than an internet meme with mass appeal:

> Q: Did you hear about Trump's plan for the blabbity-blah-blah-blah?
> A: He's going to grab it by the pussy!

The story's only four days old, and already it's petering out. While a multitude of establishment voices are treating this like some sort of "Gotcha!" moment, it's doing nothing to sway your average voter. It's just another case of the media reporting on itself, turning a non-issue into news and then reporting on said news because they themselves said it was newsworthy. Despite all the agitation from Republicans and Democrats alike, it's a non starter… at least for now.

Keep in mind that the reported numbers are biased in favor of Hillary.

For months the mainstream media has ignored the many scandals surrounding the Clinton family—crimes not only suspected, but in some cases outright admitted. Independent journalists like Matt Forney have been tireless in their exposes on Clinton corruption and criminality, while the establishment has worked to smooth it over and agitate against Trump. Now that the election is entering its final days, these same journalists will be able to wield rumor and hearsay with abandon, since by the time it's proven false it will be too late to matter.

Painting Trump as a sex addict is just the first part of the October surprise: Alex Jones of Infowars reports on a dossier he has received outlining the full extent of the Clintonian disinformation campaign.

Back in April, reports began to circulate that Donald Trump had been accused of raping a 13 year old girl over 20 years ago, along with Jeffrey Epstein of "Lolita Express" infamy

(the man whose underage “pleasure island” Bill Clinton has visited over 100 times). Trump emphatically denied the accusations, and the California lawsuit alleging this criminality was filed under a false name, and dismissed over a “technical filing error”—namely that the accuser’s listed address was a foreclosed property whose owner was dead.

With nothing more forthcoming (and Bill’s own connections to Epstein) the story quickly faded into obscurity, but there has been a recent development: on September 30th the suit was refiled in New York on behalf of “Jane Doe” by Thomas Meagher, an attorney from Meagher Emanuel Laks Goldberg & Liao, LLP, a law firm specializing in intellectual property and patent litigation.

According to the information Alex Jones received, the current non-scandal is just a lead up, the jab preceding the punch. By planting the image of Donald Trump as some sort of sex-obsessed misogynist, the 20 year old claims in the civil suit will seem that much more plausible in the mind of the general public; furthermore, by accusing Trump of these sorts of crimes, it will thwart any attempts to question Hillary and Bill’s sexual history; both the former’s laughter at a 12 year old rape victim, and the latter’s many rape accusations by women who don’t hide behind pseudonyms.

The calumny being spread by the Democratic machine and their operatives within the media cannot be ignored. Every bit of it—even the ribald joking from this 11 year old clip—occurs in a wider context. There is an organized campaign to smear Donald Trump in the eyes of the public, while covering up the massive amounts of fraud, hypocrisy, and criminality which surrounds his opponent. It is crucial that we do all that we can to call out their narrative from the very get go, when its slanderous foundations are being laid, before their plans can come to fruition.

Twenty years ago political commentators were lamenting the sheer amount of mudslinging going on in presidential campaigns; with this election, the establishment has stooped to a new low of mendacious reporting. That Hillary Clinton is actively involved in these sorts of lies and manipulations is proof enough that she is unfit to be President; when you combine it with her warmongering, her interpersonal vileness, and her anti-American globalist leanings, one is forced to question how any decent human being could ever say “I’m With Her!”

This isn’t a case of a Democratic President who plans to remake America along the lines of some sort of Utopian vision; this is a sick and vile woman who ought to be serving time in prison for the crimes she has already admitted to, let alone the many more which she’s suspected of committing. Even if you believe the worst depictions of Donald Trump—that he’s an arrogant, shallow, privileged, womanizing, bully—he’s still infinitely better than a woman who laughs at rape victims.

It is incumbent upon all good hearted people, not just to vote in this election, but to stand up for the truth throughout this election season. Do not allow the slanderers to win through your own silence; stand up for the truth, and make yourself heard.

NFL Player Antonio Cromartie Released After Taking A Knee During The National Anthem

October 12, 2016 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

On October 4th, the Indianapolis Colts released Antonio Cromartie. The release came just two days after Cromartie took a knee during the National Anthem to protest racism in America. For those who don't know about the NFL, Antonio Cromartie played for ten years and made it the Pro Bowl four times—so he was a relative star. However, it's safe to say that at 32, his glory days are behind him.

The Colts did not comment as to why he was released. They lost the game to the winless Jacksonville Jaguars in London, England (30-27) and now have a record of 1-3. Some people will say Cromartie was released because of the team's record. Others will say that he was released because of his contract.

However, I believe that Antonio Cromartie was fired—at least partially—because of a drop in NFL ratings; moreover, the incident shines a light on the hypocrisy that's often peddled by the far left.

NFL Ratings Are Still Down

One month ago, I wrote an article about the decline in NFL's ratings for week one. I questioned whether it was just an anomaly or a sign of things to come Well…now we're a month into the season and the NFL ratings are still down. Take a look at the ratings for week four (as compared to last year at this time):

- Dallas vs. San Francisco Fox Down 13%
- Kansas City vs. Pittsburgh NBC Down 27%
- New York Giants vs. Minnesota ESPN Down 11%

- Seattle vs. New York Giants Fox Down 14%
- Miami vs. Cincinnati NFLN Down 13%
- Indianapolis vs. Jacksonville CBS Down 25%

These numbers show that week one was no accident—fans are boycotting the NFL. Their displeasure is a real thing and not just a momentary fad. The hash tags, the online commentary…they highlight the American public's discontent with the NFL product and its players. Note that Indianapolis (the team that Cromartie played for) saw a 25% decrease in viewership in week four. That's a significant drop.

In light of these numbers, we can deduce that Cromartie's release was due—at least in part—to a declining interest in the NFL.

My point is furthered by the fact that hatred for Colin Kaepernick (who also refused to stand for the National Anthem) is at an all-time high. Kaepernick has spurned a series of #BantheNFL hashtags, inspired people to burn his jersey on YouTube, and he recently won the "NFL's Most Hated" award. The incident has picked up so much speed that ESPN has dedicated several sessions to the Kaepernick controversy (AKA, damage control).

Kaepernick's behavior has had a detrimental effect on NFL viewership

The league needs more than sold-out stadiums to make money; a lot of their payroll is dependent on lucrative TV contracts, so losing viewership is detrimental. The Indianapolis Colts are well aware of this reality, and I believe that it played a role in their decision to release Antonio Cromartie.

Antonio Cromartie is a hypocrite

The most vocal SJWs are the biggest hypocrites, and Antonio Cromartie is a shining example of this. What kind of man fathers 12 children from 8 different women? Let me answer that for you—one that's morally impaired. Just take a look at this video of Cromartie, where he struggles to remember the names and ages of his own children:

What a guy. His actions should come as no surprise, however. We've already seen a host of SJW's with skeletons in their closet. Here's a short list of the guilty:

- Betty Freiden: Author of The Feminine Mystique who spoke out against misogyny; in real life, she falsified abuse against her husband for thirty years.

- Jesse Jackson: Civil Right activist who has spent his life speaking out against racism; in real life, he fathered an illegitimate child while he was still married.
- Lena Durham: Outspoken feminist who molested her younger sister.

Cromartie is the newest addition to the list. Statistically speaking, children from broken families are nine times more likely to commit crime. Subsequently, Cromartie's children have a greater chance of becoming criminals, drug addicts, and felons. If he wants to see changes in the African-American community, then he should look in the mirror; it's men like Cromartie—because of their absentee parenting—that plant the seeds of failure within their communities. The integrity of a man is marked by his level of parental investment, and Cromartie's actions show a man that's lacking in this virtue.

Cromartie is not completely to blame, however. What kind of woman allows herself to be impregnated by a known philanderer? Again, the answer is simple—a morally reprehensible one. It's irrelevant to these women if their children grow up with a father in the home. As long as child support checks arrive, then they're happy. It takes two to tango, and these women share in the blame. Don't expect that narrative to arrive anytime soon, though.

Conclusion

The NFL fans who are boycotting the product should be proud—and I'm one of them. We're showing that we don't accept the tainting of our beloved sport. We view the NFL as a welcome respite from a difficult week at work. When we sit down on Sunday with our friends and family, we want to be entertained, not preached at. I encourage everyone to continue the NFL boycott. When we are finished with them, they'll be approaching us with a much different tone: they'll move from arrogant disdain to desperate courtship.

6 Reasons Progressives, Leftists, And SJWs Are (Literally) Hitler

October 13, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

For a long time, the political left has been on the rampage trying to call out Donald Trump as "literally Hitler", obviously as an emotionally charged incentive to try to get (braindead) people to not vote for him. In many cases even his mere supporters have been grouped into the label as well!

However, little do progressives and SJW's know, there are six (at the minimum!) ways in which it is actually they who are far more closely associated with Nazism, rather than the various libertarian and right-wing groups they are always attacking.

So don't just sit back and take the punishment. Call them out and fight back!

1. They Both Use A Stupid Looking And Impotent Arm Gesture

The Hitler salute used in Nazi Germany

A wannabe-tough and Hitleresque salute used by Black Lives Matter and their leftist sympathizers

The Nazi salute or “Hitler’ salute was a gesture used as a greeting to powerful Nazi officials, and to glorify the German nation under the Third Reich. The salute was performed by extending the right arm to at least eye level, and straightening the hand so that it is parallel to the arm.

The George Soros-funded domestic terrorist group “Black Lives Matter,” which has a great deal of sympathizers and supporters from the political left, has also adopted their own (ultimately meaningless) arm gesture. Conservatives, libertarians, and the Alt-Right simply don’t bother with such try-hard tough and faux-fascist nonsense.

Progressives and SJW’s are (literally) Hitler!

2. They Both Want Heavy Firearms Restrictions Or Outright Confiscation

In the build-up to Nazi Germany going on the war rampage, Hitler made damn sure that the non-military German populace (Jew and Gentile alike) would be thoroughly disarmed of any projectile firing weapons, as to prevent any kind of civilian insurrection or rebellion against his fascist regime.

Progressives and SJW's in the United States by and large hate guns, and repeatedly call for heavy restrictions on firearms or outright Hitler, Stalin, and Mao style confiscation.

On the other hand, conservatives, libertarians, and the Alt-Right (including neomasculinists) all respect and value the right to bear arms in order to stymie out-of-control criminality and keep government oppression in check. Not to mention it's a damn good idea to have most of the population armed as a major deterrent against outside invaders.

Just ask Switzerland, who successfully avoided all of the chaos in Nazi-occupied Europe due to both their mountainous geography and by having the most strapped-up civilian population in all the land.

Progressives and SJW's are (literally) Hitler!

3. They Both Blame All Of Society's Ills On One Segment Of The Population

The Future of Life Depends on Bringing the 500-Year Rampage of the White Man to a Halt

Whites can play an important role in restraining other whites.

By Frank Joyce / AlterNet December 20, 2015

The future of life on the planet depends on bringing the 500-year rampage of the white man to a halt. For five centuries his ever more destructive weaponry has become far too common. His widespread and better systems of exploiting other humans and nature dominate the globe.

From "Progressive" website Alternet. Could have come straight out of 'Mein Kampf' when talking about Jews.

Despite being responsible for about 95% of all major technological and medical advancements for the past 600 years, and the upholders or creators (along with Northeast Asians) of the most advanced infrastructure, high-income, low-corruption, politically stable, and peaceful countries on the planet (i.e. highly desired for migration for people of all races and colors around the world), progressives and SJW's almost never have anything positive to say about white males.

Every real or perceived societal issue must be caused by the white man and his "supremacist" outlook on life and his "racist" institutions, and no personal responsibility must be accepted for what plagues the African-American, Native American, or Chicano communities. The finger of righteous indignation can simply point straight back to heterosexual white males, who are "privileged" beyond all comparison.

(But please, keep it quiet that many Asian minority groups are economically outperforming white people and are being imprisoned far less per capita. Ok? You'll ruin the leftist narrative.)

In similar fashion, the Nazi's blamed just about everything that caused pain to Germany on the mannerisms, behaviors, and business practices of Jews.

Nazi Germany: Jewness will explain away nearly anything.

Degenerate leftist outlets like Buzzfeed, Huffington Post, and MIC work day and night to humiliate, belittle, and blame white males for every perceived societal injustice, in the same way Nazi Germany blamed Jews for everything.

Progressives and SJW's are (literally) Hitler!

4. They Both Condone Violence Against Innocent People And Their Property (2016 Alternate Universe: Black Lives Matter "Protest" And Beating Of Innocent Whites Begins At 0:42)

As part of the increasingly hostile treatment of Jews in Nazi Germany, the Kristallnacht or "crystal night" was an evening in late 1938 where thousands of Jewish-owned businesses were destroyed or damaged in a coordinated act of malice. Additionally, several dozen Jews were murdered during the attacks and untold thousands were injured.

In the late 2010s, the progressive and SJW-supported Black Lives Matter have enacted several major "protests" (riots) in various cities across the United States which have seen hundreds of businesses burned or looted, and innocent white people who happen to be in the wrong place at the wrong time have been specifically targeted for violent reprisal. Because, you know, another police officer (whether white or black) must have shot and killed another black felon.

But what do the SJW leaders of Black Lives Matter like DeRay Mckesson have to say about these destructive and inherently anti-white rioters? "We Stand With You."

Progressives and SJWs are (literally) Hitler!

5. They Both Use Incessant Goebbles-Style Propaganda To Push Their Bogus Narratives

Ok, so Goebbles isn't (literally) Hitler, but he's close enough to how the progressive and SJW media acts in the 2010's. Much like the Nazi propaganda machine of the 1930's, leftist media outlets continually push lie after lie after lie upon the masses. All in the hopes that it will eventually become, via sheer repetition alone, "the truth" in the minds of the emotion-driven sheeple.

Even though these lies, such as campus "rape culture", the "gender wage gap", and "institutional racism" in policing (all by-products of a supposed "white supremacy" and "toxic masculinity") have been disproven and debunked time and time again, they simply double down and keep pushing the lies one thousand times over. Like the Nazi's, SJW's……just……don't……..QUIT with the lies and endless propaganda.

On the other hand, the vast majority of conservatives, libertarians, and the Alt-Right are receptive to digesting actual facts about people and society. Untethered by the scourge of political correctness, and the scourge of favoring egalitarian "feelings" against factual analysis and data which may be discomforting to many.

Progressives and SJW's are (literally) Goebbles!

6. They Both Suppress Freedom Of Speech And Ideas

An SJW book burning rally against authors Roosh, Cernovich, Vox Day, and others.

Finally, the Nazi's despised any concept of freedom of speech. There was a huge verboden (forbidden) list of books people could read, names which new parents could give to their children, and people who spoke out against the Nazi regime would be arrested, have their livelihoods destroyed, or even "get disappeared" altogether.

Modern day progressives and SJW's take great delight in doxing people out of their jobs (and thus potentially reducing them to destitute poverty) if their manner of speech, writings, or opinions do not march lock-step with the social justice narrative.

If you don't think transgenders are "brave" and gorgeous people, that homosexuality is the greatest thing since sliced bread, that Islam will culturally enrich the West, and that high black arrest rates are because of racist white cops, then you put your livelihood in great danger if you make those opinions public.

Most conservatives, libertarians, constitutionalists, and Alt-Right adherents place great value on freedom of speech as one of the most prominent vanguards against tyranny. Progressives, SJW's, and the former Nazi's of 1933-1945 do not share that sentiment.

(1:10 – "We live in a free country. And that is a powerful idea. That's a magnificent way to live. But there is a price for that freedom, which is that sometimes we have to tolerate things that we don't necessarily like.")

Progressives and SJW's do not tolerate your freedom of speech. Progressives and SJW's are (literally) Hitler!

Conclusion

Now of course we know progressives and SJW's are not "literally" Hitler (we act on logic and reason rather than wild emotional fervor), but people who closely identify with those sets can start to eat their own words when they want to moronically accuse Donald Trump of being “literally Hitler.”

Their own way of life, and the master whom they will likely vote for (Hillary), are far more closely associated with Nazi-era behaviors than Donald Trump and his supporters ever will be.

6 Things I Learned From Living The Nomad Lifestyle For Months

October 13, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The twentysomething, basement-dwelling guy has become an archetype of the loser. Usually, one lives in a basement because one has no friends with whom he can share a rented flat or no money to rent something at all. Living in a basement also makes it difficult to receive anyone, especially hypergamous females.

On the opposite, being a nomad is cool because it signals more or less the exact opposite features. If you live as a nomad, you must be able to handle a lot of daily inconveniences, to take care of the unexpected, free to choose where you go. If you live as a nomad, you can live without the crutches of usual comfort. Today, living or having lived the nomadic lifestyle is often taken as a signal of self-reliability and competence. Those who travel to pick up girls get a bit of the lifestyle, and they usually learn more than those who stay at home, and some like Roosh have managed to embrace nomadism as a whole lifestyle for years.

As for myself, I am about to put an end to four months of a really nomadic, not to say bohemian, lifestyle. For four months, I have been living in three different countries, got hosted by various friends and family members, and though such a way to live has important drawbacks, it is also highly formative. Reflecting on my immediate past experience, here are important things I have learned. Most of the time, I already had an idea of these before walking around, but experience recalled or embodied these.

1. You Must Be Able To Live Minimally

Owning too much stuff leads to having your home and shelves overfilled. Most of said stuff was usually more expensive when you bought it than today, and most of it is also useless. Do you really need a collection of plastic miniatures or DVDs? Instead, embrace a minimalist lifestyle: less dust, more space, more place for creativity as you have to fulfill the now empty space, and more money as you stop buying junk. When one travels a lot, one quickly gets tired of being forced to bring weighty or voluminous stuff everywhere he goes, to the point of resenting having too many clothes.

The only thing I allow myself to carry plenty of is books. Depending on the weather and on who I plan to see, presents from afar, valuable alcohol and specific clothes (like winter clothes or three-pieces suit) can find their place in the bags. Everything else is non-necessary, burdening, and should be avoided.

2. Be In Shape And You Can Travel A Lot

Even if you are living the minimalist lifestyle, traveling outside the beaten path always mean you will have to use both strength and endurance. Sometimes you go from France, where good wine is cheap, to a country where you can sell the same wine twice or thrice the price, or give it to a friend, and then you find yourself carrying a 60-lbs luggage. Sometimes you get late and must walk fast to get on board before the train or plane leaves. Sometimes the underground escalating subways are out of service and you have to carry these luggages all by yourself. And, sometimes, you might be tired of walking and carrying, but there's a gorgeous girl out there and it may be great to pick her up.

The unexpected and the difficult are always around the corner, especially when you hop in new places. Whatever comes, it will be much easier to handle if you are in shape. I have never seen an accomplished traveller with a flabby physique. Couchsurfing events are sometimes crowded by bobos, but all of those who are actually traveling (and not merely throwing themselves to another local party) are at least in decent shape.

3. Having Control Of Your Space And Time Is Near Indispensable

Having one's own space and time is crucial. There are public spaces and there are private ones, there are moments for gathering or working with and for others as well as moments when you can do whatever you want. Even the Chinese near-slaves who toil fourteen hours a day at the factory and sleep in cage "homes" have at least their own cages.

Living in other people's place mean you are occupying their space and meddling with their routine, not yours. They may be accommodating, and you may be graceful to their patience, but a time will come when you will feel the need to have your own space and time rather than being negotiating for some. If you don't do so, people around will invade whatever you are doing, preventing you from ever be focused, and you will turn nervous and tired because you can't live according to your own rhythm. When you know you will have something important to do, ask your host about his schedule or spot the useful semi-public spaces such as libraries, coffee shops or parks. A host with no schedule and no sense of boundaries can be a living nightmare you will be thankful not to depend too much from.

4. Cognitive Overloading Can Be A Serious Issue

Traveling means you have a lot of things to think about: schedule, stuff to bring with you, money, places to visit, tasks to perform, training, seduction opportunities, paperwork… It is very easy to get overwhelmed by the sheer amount of things to remember or do. This is stressful, and if you fail to organize these, you may forget to do or bring things that matter. I have already forgotten to pay the rent on time or to take what I had just bought at the market, not because it was heavy, but because I was overburdened with stuff to think about.

When you travel, make lists. Objects to buy, people to remember, tasks to perform, openers or topics of conversation if you need some reminder for picking up girls. Even the least important thing can be important enough to be written down, at least once you have cared about the essential (see point 1).

5. Lifestyle And Life Choices Matter

The lifestyle one follows has a conditioning effect on what one does, can do, will do easily and thinks one can do. When you get hosted by various people, you get directly in the middle of their lifestyle. The sheer fact of having passed over others' homes allowed me to witness a lot of ways to live: from the wanker student whose whole family lives on welfare and who spends six hours a day playing video games to the maniac old woman yelling at me for letting a drop of water in the shower cubicle after use, not to forget the cool guy whose house was such a mess only half of the sofa could be used (the other half having been irremediably stained by a manures of a pet parrot), there are a lot of ways life can be lived, and they are far from being equal.

Witnessing a lot of different lifestyles and going through each allows you to evaluate the pros and cons. For example, keeping one's home minimally clean is good, but being a total maniac who will scoff at the least grain of dust or drop of water shows overemphasizing petty things over more important ones.

Also, turning one's home into a party center endowed with various sofas, a big hi-fi stereo and drinks can help to become popular, but it may also be at the expense of reading books, and if you aren't careful enough about who passes over you may end up exploited by freeloaders. Having been through various lifestyle makes you able to actually choose among a lot of things you would either have taken for granted or never thought about as possible.

6. We All Depend From Other People, So, Others Should Be Good—Or Shamed

We can and must strive for independence. Not depending from someone else or from things outside one's control means being able to choose self-determination. Yet, whatever your trade and the extent of your skills, you need to at least trade with other people and are far better off if you can actually trust at least some people than if you live in a state of perpetual defiance. This is especially true when you depend on someone else to take shelter for the night or store something of yours.

This is why individualism, that "fancy word for personal selfishness," must be kept in check and not merely by formal laws or the economy. This is also why the left should not be let in control of too much capital: I once looked at the Couchsurfers who lived in Paris and the sheer view of their smug Leftists faces made me wish I would never depend on them for anything, lest sleeping at their home. Being frequently hosted does not merely make you more dependent from selected others, it actually reminds you how dependent you are—and how dependent they are as well, the dependence principle working in all directions.

Being dependent from others does not (necessarily) mean you are weak and deprived of control. It means, however, that said others should be ashamed if they have bad behaviors, such as sluttiness for women and indiscriminate assholery for men, because their acts have consequences. If you get hosted, you need to be able to trust the one who gets you in his territory, and if you host, you need to be able to trust the one who will meddle in your territory. It works both ways. Even if you manage to wield a lot of power, you need to trust minimally those who work for or depend on you. Thus, even when we look for self-reliance and self-determination, we should always be keen to reward good behavior and chastise bad one, moral relativism be damned.

De retour à la maison

Some people are meant to live a nomadic lifestyle. Others are of a more sedentary character. For the latter, roaming could be a normal part of an initiation process: the young knights or aristocrats had to tour Europe, the compagnons (craftsmen) would spend youth years working in various places, ancient ascetics let everything behind, and the uninitiated still made a point to go to a pilgrimage to Jerusalem or Santiago de Compostela. This was an integral part of the traditional world, and this made much sense.

Travelling forces one to let behind comfort, to distinguish the essential from the accessory, to meet foreign but sociable ways, to get accustomed to minimalism, to face dangers, and at the same time to entertain curiosity about what is going around. The initiate's travel was meant to be a crucible, an ordeal for discoveries and self-purification—something very different from the American melting pot, sometimes wrongly called a crucible, which leads individuals to materialistic consumerism and promotes miscegenation.

Many of us find or have found one day, usually after teenage years, that we were born and raised as weaklings. We can attribute this weakness to a host of causes, some biological (water supplies poised with chemicals, reduced testosterone, an excessively sedentary life-), some familial or educational (the lack of father figures, being raised by mothers and cultural Marxists), some others cultural (constant leftist guilt-tripping, anti-white and anti-male propaganda daily). We are not responsible for said weakness and may rightfully advocate for these harms to be recognized and compensated.

Yet we are responsible for getting ourselves out of this dreadful state and going forward in life. There is much to be done if we want to only equate our ancestors. Traveling, roaming, wandering is part of the process. Only after having taken the ordeal, no matter how long, can we sustain a household—and, even more, a whole social orientation like neomasculinity—and keep burning the sacred fire at the center of the place we can truly call a home.

Why Cisgendered Straight Men Kill Themselves

October 13, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Tim Patten

Men struggling with issues of identity, purpose and societal expectations have a hard time getting the help they need. Unlike females, who have various resources at their disposal–many of them free–including women's studies initiatives, government outreach efforts and nonprofit support programs, males have few places to turn. In most cases, the only assistance available is what they glean from certain publications or at websites where individuals who have been similarly affected offer support and insights.

For men who feel overwhelmed, being able to learn from and interact with those who are knowledgeable about or who experienced tragedies of their own can be a true lifesaver–literally. In fact, the lack of understanding regarding issues that have spurred an ever-growing rate of male suicide are one reason why millions of men are connecting with movements like the Red Pill, Herbivore Men and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW).

Unfortunate, the fact that so many men are reaching like this hasn't led to more widespread awareness about the immense struggles they face. Around the world, men are killing themselves, and yet there are plenty of people, such as Huffington Post writer Jane Powel, who don't know why. According to Powel, "There are speculations on why men commit suicide, theories but no actual nuggets." However, if she took the time to look carefully, she might understand why things have gotten to where they are. Sadly, her ignorance exemplifies that of society in regard to men and their place in today's society.

There are, of course, many reasons why young men take their own lives. In some cases, it reflects the fact that they can't come to terms with a gay or transsexual identity. Some are veterans who faithfully served their country but who were left scarred by mental or physical health issues or simply left out in the cold when they exited the military. Others are the downtrodden and the homeless, unfortunate souls whose feelings of hopelessness and despair have forced them to give up on life.

But while these are the rationales that many are familiar with, they are not the only ones. They don't reflect the pain that tears at the hearts of a great many men–cisgendered straight males, in particular–who have been experiencing the dark realities of relationships with women, raising families, and playing roles imposed on them. By learning about the issues that have contributed to the suicide epidemic and using that knowledge in a positive way, we may be able to help save someone we care about from their own demise.

Four Life Events That Can Lead Men to Kill Themselves

For the most part, the circumstances that have fostered this disturbing state of affairs can be broken down as follows:

1. When men get married

Men and women tend to assume different roles when adjusting to life as a couple. Men are expected to work and do whatever is necessary to make partners happy. Women have various duties they are responsible for, which may involve going to work, overseeing the home, or both. Typically, women negotiate relationships within the family, largely through verbal communication. However, that role often devolves into something harmful, where the goal is not to communicate but to control and manipulate. Experts say that toxic communications, such as when one person repeatedly nags another, can sink a relationship–or worse.

In fact, evidence suggests verbal aggression, bickering and daily arguments can have a seriously detrimental effect on men, perhaps because they tend to be results-oriented, and don't benefit from venting their feelings through social interaction in the way that women do. Because men are preoccupied with others' needs and are not communicative by nature, they often bottle things up and don't share feelings with close friends or family, which can have adverse consequences.

In one study, Dr. Rikke Lund and colleagues from the University of Copenhagen followed 9,875 Danish men and women, aged 36 to 52, for 11 years. Over that period, 196 of the adults died from causes that ranged from heart disease and cancer to alcohol abuse-related liver disease and suicide. Men who said they faced “endless” demands from partners or who said things like “she won’t stop talking” with respect to partners were more than twice as likely to become ill and resort to suicide as the group overall.

2. When married men lose their job or a career

Reports indicate that age discrimination, downsizing and outsourcing have had an outsized impact on middle-aged white men. The experience can be a dark, shameful and traumatic, engendering despair, depression and suicide. This stems from the fact that in many families, men are seen as a disposable utility whose primary mission is to cover bills, food, shelter and basic survival. Males are also assigned a Mr. Fixit role, responsible for repairing leaky pipes and attending to their partner’s emotional grievances–they are the shoulder to cry on.

But with this perspective comes the damage caused when that role disappears. The loss of a job can destroy a man’s self-worth because it is closely tied to his work identity. Regardless of how or why it occurs, it can lead to a situation where family roles are reversed. When that happens, he needs a soft, supportive shoulder and not to be told to “man up.” Without the coping skills necessary to adjust, males can fall into a dark place and contemplate ending it all.

3. When men divorce from their wives

Every year, almost 800,000 American men are divorced; since no-fault divorce laws were enacted in 1970, over 50 million have endured oppressive splits initiated by their wives. Many husbands willingly put noses to the grindstone and dedicate themselves to providing for the home, cars, clothing and vacations. But wives are often quite willing to give that up, claiming they are unhappy, and seek custody of the children, half his assets, and child support payments.

When dropped into this bleak, dark vacuum, alone and often without any warning, many men find no one to turn to for support. Research indicates that they are four times more likely to kill themselves if they don't get help.

4. When men fight for child custody

When there is a divorce, it is not uncommon for a horrendous child custody mêlée to ensue. Up to 70 percent of soon-to-be-ex-husbands will be accused of having engaged in physical or sexual abuse, including molesting and raping their own children. While almost all of these sordid charges will be false, men must endure a painful and humiliating adjudication process or risk losing their parental rights. Even actor Brad Pitt was left feeling dumbstruck and anguished when accused of abusing his children amid a bitter split with his famous actress wife.

Unfortunately, even when husbands persevere and are proven right, it doesn't necessarily mean much. Data indicates that women gain custody 60% of the time, which suggests the system is inherently biased against them. Needless to say, men who lose access to their children experience hopelessness and despair. For many, the final straw comes when somebody they don't know is allowed to raise their sons and daughters with their ex-wives, leaving many believing that taking their own lives is the only option.

Help Your Man And Prevent Him From Killing Himself

Fortunately, things don't have to end badly. Being aware of the issues and the potential consequences can go some way toward preventing something tragic from happening–before it's too late. To ensure such a fate doesn't befall a man you care about, consider the following steps:

Be aware of his situational demeanor. Is he giving away prized possessions, increasing drug or alcohol abuse, or withdrawing from relationships with friends, hobbies and social activities? Has he lost interest in his personal appearance? If he is trying to make such a heavy decision, his thoughts may spin as though moving through different channels. He may dwell or communicate about death, uselessness or suicide in various creative forms, including poetry, music, art, or writing.

Avoid certain natural reactions. Do not panic, criticize or react with drama or anger in the face of such circumstances. Avoid your own self-chastisement and don't get caught up in the crosscurrents that can swirl through our minds, including:

- "How could he do this to me (or us)?"
- "I have to keep this secret."
- "Didn't I love/watch/listen to him enough?"
- "Will they try again?"
- "If I pretend this didn't happen, it will go away."
- "He is just trying to get attention."
- "This is not my problem – someone else can deal with it."

Secure the environment. Remove all knives, weapons, pills and guns, as these are the means by which people commonly kill themselves.

Establish a connection. Prepare yourself to speak with him and consider what actions you might need to take. Communicate with him on his terms: if he is a problem-solver, athletic coach-type, or a Mister Fix-it, he may not respond or react well to touchy-feely questions and statements emanating from the feminine side of the brain, including:

- "How are you feeling?"
- "Share your emotions."
- "You look moody."
- "Why won't you open up to me?"
- "Can we talk about you?"
- "How you doing?"

Instead, take into account how the masculine brain works and consider moving in a different direction. Among the things you might want to ask or say are:

- "When did you start seeing an end?"
- "Have you figured a way out?"
- "Are there alternatives you're considering?"
- "What are you trying to solve?"
- "Is there a way out of this situation?"
- "Where is the end of the rope?"
- "You're not alone let me help decide what to do."
- "Tell me when you're ready to give up."
- "Have you had enough?"

Hopefully, he will open up, and maybe even admit, "Yes, my life is over." But that doesn't mean you should tell him he is wrong or flip into caring and supportive mode. Instead, just keep talking. Probe him with questions such as "When will you do it?" and "What's the plan for ending it?" Allow him to experience the full impact of his thoughts and words. Eventually, as the gravity of what he has in mind sets in, his mood should change.

At that point, ask him if he needs help.

Getting Help

Remember, time heals most, if not all wounds. Situations change and when they do, so will his mood. If the issues are largely financial, there will almost certainly be some sort of safety net available–staying with a friend or relative, working things out with those who can supply critical necessities, or even applying for welfare and food stamps.

Of course, as long as he appears vulnerable, don't leave him floundering on his own. Stay in contact, keep tabs on what he is up to and, most important, talk to him. If you sense that things have reached a more troubled state, take action and encourage him to seek professional help. If he has a therapist, put in a call–on an emergency basis, if possible. Otherwise, encourage him to see a qualified male psychologist who can assist him with life decisions, rather than a psychiatrist who may only be interested in giving him medications. While it can be difficult to intervene, try to discourage him from taking anything but anti-depressants.

Should there be any sign at all that his situation is becoming critical, have him contact a local suicide line; alternatively, he can try the national suicide hotline number at 1-800-273-TALK (8255). If that doesn't work, contact 911 and ask for immediate assistance. Medical professionals may decide he needs to be in a secure setting for his own protection. While he may not be happy about this, which might even involve a hold of three days or longer, it is certainly better to see him upset than gone for good.

Find more information here. After such disturbing events, some men have tapped the online MGTOW community for ongoing support, healing and comradery. Encourage him to do the same.

How Feminists Sabotaged Baseball In My Town

October 13, 2016 | by Norman Furlong | Link | Original Link

The city of Birmingham, Alabama has been a struggling, aging city, known worldwide for the racism and violence of the 1960s, it has faced a declining population for the past 5 decades. In recent years, following the national trend of re-urbanization and gentrification, there was renewed interested in the downtown area. One of the biggest announcements was that the minor league baseball team would be relocating from a white suburb to the downtown area.

Note how the ballfield was positioned facing North (downtown)

In 2012, a new baseball stadium for the minor league Double-A class Birmingham Barons was announced. The site chosen was adjacent to another large gentrification project, Railroad Park, a 19 acre public park with lake which opened on an abandoned site in 2010. City planners hoped to spur development of this largely abandoned area of the city, and to build on the positive momentum of the park with an adjacent ballfield.

America’s National Pastime

American ballparks are perhaps the most stereotypically American thing there is, besides war and obesity. And the great ballparks of the nation are widely recognized for their architecture, style, and integration into their respective cities. Indeed, the motivation for moving the Baron’s ballpark into downtown Birmingham was to give it an urban feel, and associate the team with the city of Birmingham visually, as opposed to an out-of-town hobby for the suburbanites to attend.

The Baseball Field was strategically placed with a view of the city skyline, early pictures show

With this in mind, the location, design, and visual appearance of the park were all important elements of its planning. The city’s lodging tax was more than doubled, to finance taxpayer funding of the facility. The new stadium, designed to seat 8,500, was designed by HKS Architecture of Dallas, Texas, a professional international design firm with a specialty in designing sports stadiums. The firm, founded in 1939, established a sports division in 1992, led by Bryan Trubey, a well known sports architect, who designed three NFL stadiums, including the elaborate and expensive Cowboys Stadium which hosted the 2010 Super Bowl, and is currently working with Mark Cuban to design a new Dallas Mavericks facility.

Site ready for construction, with city skyline in background

The hiring of an outside, credentialed sports professional was seen as an exciting and encouraging, if somewhat surprising move for the city of Birmingham, which is ranked #154 among minor league sports markets, and anticipation for the planned stadium was palpable. The location of the park, just below the railroad tracks which demarcate the city's north downtown area and south side, was ideal. The southern side was home to most of the entertainment venues and housing facilities, and the source of most of the fanbase, while the north side anchored the downtown cityscape as a background upon which to set the new, urban ball field.

Not So Fast

Was someone here trying to have some FUN?

Before construction began, the project passed before a design approval committee, made up of volunteers who enjoy the authority of telling people what they can do with their own private property. This group of busybodies vetoed the design, insisting that the stadium should instead face a hospital and multi story parking deck, seating and signage would need to be redesigned, and the view of downtown was not acceptable, because, according to the group, "the invisible architectural boundaries" of the park must be respected. Yes, that's right, the thought of thousands of baseball fans eye-raping the park as they enjoyed the urban setting was too much, and the plan was vetoed.

One could argue that the entire rationale for moving the park downtown, which was to maintain an urban feel and look, had just been removed from the entire project. But the $60 million plan was already underway. The only solution, to appease this group, was to rotate the park to face the concrete parking deck, overruling the opinion of the team of men who were so passionate about sports that they dedicated their lives to studying, designing, and creating the most exciting, enjoyable venues in which to enjoy the sport. Men who had played baseball as children, traveled throughout the world studying and observing sports facilities, talking with fans, players, and owners, and who work day in and out, year after year, decade after decade, planning and designing sports facilities. No, this group who was paid big bucks for their professional opinion was vetoed to appease a few small town obstructionist feminists.

Other Silly Changes

80 foot tall lettering is “discreet, low key, and not overwhelming” but viewing the city skyline is rape, because reasons

Besides changing the park's orientation, the committee ordered additional changes to HKS Architecture's plan, including rejecting their plan for an LED message board with scrolling phone numbers for ticket sales because "we have a policy against that, and only words, not numbers, can be used." To this group of wannabe cat lady construction foremen, the flashy, 18′ tall sign was fine, as long as it didn't display an Arabic numeral, in which case it immediately would become an eyesore.

In order to preserve any remnant of a view of the city skyline, the upper level premium seating areas along the third baseline had to be completely removed from the plan, limiting the profitable premium space sold for corporate and private party use available to the ballpark operator.

And in the most amusing comment of the whole debacle, Cheryl Morgan, architecture professor at Auburn Urban Studio and Design Review Committee member who vetoed the HKS plan, described the 80 foot tall lettering along the side of the building as "fairly descreet and low key… not overwhelming the building." lolz.

Throughout history, beautiful architecture, art, music, and poetry was created almost exclusively by men. If a woman is genuinely talented in a certain field, her contributions should be celebrated and encouraged. But when a know-nothing body of obstructionists intervene and deliberately destroy a man’s beautiful vision, a serious public crime has occurred. For decades, baseball fans in Alabama will be stuck with an inferior stadium. Wise men are overruled and their experience and expertise are ignored. Meanwhile, the fun-destroying feminists can say “mission accomplished” and receive validation that they have done something productive, as they had the final say. Don’t let this happen in your city.

15 Tough Lessons I've Learned From Life

October 14, 2016 | by Nicholas Peake | Link | Original Link

After my previous article in which I shared some hard-learned ideas I've gained over the years, time passed and I found myself encountering more and more along the way. As these principles would occur to me occasionally, I recorded them in my notes before they had a chance to slip away.

Below is a list of 15 more truths in particular that I've learned through many difficult moments in my life.

1. Be Proactive, Not Reactive

So many times I found myself being too complacent, or too "easy-going"…so much so that it wasn't what I did that cost me; it was what I didn't do that created more difficulties.

Often my thinking was that I could wait for some perfect opportunity, perfect timing, or perfect people to conveniently fall into place for me to do anything from getting better women, to a better job, to a better place to live, and so, so much more.

The truth is, there's almost never a perfect time to do something, and almost never a perfect opportunity. Take my advice: take initiative, and make a move. You'll find you're often the only one who does.

2. Thing Are Almost Never Perfect On Their Own

I was a creative boy when growing up and mechanically inclined. I worked on many little projects over the years (cars, electronics, apartment repairs, customizing small things at home, etc) and discovered that the common factor was that in each case, improving my happiness and quality of life came from making an effort to make even small changes to things I bought, read, learned, etc. I found I could never count on the perfect idea or perfect solution to anything I wanted to accomplish without my own hand and my personal touches.

Rather than make excuses and give up success at something you'd like to do, take a fundamental starting point and tweak it, add to it, or modify it to get a great result that makes you happy.

You don't have to have great skills or be an expert in whatever field you are dealing with: just be creative, try different things, and you'll find your improvisation skills will improve over time as you have a set of ideas—and confidence—to fall back on the next time. Everyone learns through trial and error.

3. Be the the Icebreaker

Over the years I've noticed how more often than not people will remain content to be silent until there's one person who makes the first step to opening a conversation. And the results are often excellent.

I grew up a very shy, quiet boy, and yet here now years later I'm outgoing and open dialogue with others. Why? It's because I learned that until that first "Hello" and additional words are spoken, little happens with people. People need just a tiny indicator that you're friendly and give them an opportunity to talk about themselves.

I am amazed at the social relationships I've built simply because I was willing to be the first to open dialogue and convey positive feelings to them.

4. 90% of Everything Is Just Trying (Never Fear the First Step)

As the old saying goes, "The journey of a thousand miles begins with the first step." So true!

I have observed so many men settling for unattractive women, living with weak, slumped-over bodies, living an average, simp life or never attempting some great idea because they simply fear taking the first step. I recall specifically how years ago I attempted to encourage a friend to board a plane and go abroad. Naturally, the excuses came right away. I could read through the excuses: it said, between the lines, "I'm too afraid."

A worthwhile endeavor isn't like a switch: it isn't a simple do or don't…it's a series of things or processes. And it's inevitable that mistakes will be made. The most critical—and yet most amazingly simple—factor is simply trying.

5. People Are Subconsciously Talking to You

To my embarrassment I have to say that in retrospect I can see now years ago all the little clues girls sent about their interest in me; and yet I was blind to it.

People often like to think they are "sophiscated" and "complex." Yet in reality, human beings cannot help but express their subconscious characteristics especially in regards to how they view others. Subtle body language, their tone and inflection when speaking, changes from normal behavior, and much more give little clues to if they're someone you would want to be involved with or avoid as much as possible.

Pay attention…observe…and then go for it or avoid them as needed. Sometimes it takes a keen eye and good ear, but in time you'll see more than meets the eye, and have the advantage of knowing what to do next.

6. Never Be Afraid to Question Things

One reason we grow up in the blue-pill mentality, and suffer all of its resulting terrible consequences, is our false set of beliefs. I'm sure almost all men with real red-pill wisdom can agree on this.

Over time I've come to see that what is supposed to be "fact", or "correct", sometimes is either mistaken, misrepresented as fact/true, or as a result of someone's ego and unwillingness to admit error. Additionally, it's even worse to know that social pressure often somewhat ostracizes men who are willing to call out or simply ask questions about these "truths."

As I've gotten older I've embraced the value of thinking deeper, asking questions, and without apology:

- Examine the facts…does something feel "off" or questionable?
- Does it make sense logically? Or is there perhaps more to the story?
- What makes this person the end-all to say something is true? (Even so-called "experts")
- What are the ideas based on? Where did this come from?

Sometimes this means being the odd one out in a crowd. Think, examine, and draw your own conclusions. Most of all, don't just go along with the crowd like a lemming. Many times they're wrong, and you'll stay on the road to wisdom rather than being brainwashed.

7. Rid Yourself of Toxic And Negative People—Even If They're Family

There are those people we grow up with, become friends with, or at some point interact with who seem to have a way of causing us grief and sucking away our positive energy and resources. Rather than being a one-time mistake, over time we see a pattern and their behavior shows us that they affect us in a way that causes conflict, stress, and often MUCH MORE in our lives. Often they have particularly destructive words and behavior that would be unacceptable in the eyes of perfect stranger, and yet they seem to be allowed to carry on with the same nonsensical garbage time and time again.

Ultimately I learned that whether a partner, close personal friend, or even family, toxic people must be cut out of your life. They're a "net negative": despite a few good points, the overall result is your life is worse off for being involved with them. And yes, I live by my own words regarding cutting toxic family members out of your life.

Toxic people are "defective" and possess personality traits like narcissism, hate, anger, insecurity, jealousy, and so forth which means you will always be a target for their bullshit, no matter how much you try to "white knight" and contribute to help them. You are fighting a lost cause and their number one concern is themselves, not you! They will drain your focus, effort, and peace of mind that would otherwise be spent on your own happiness both in the present & future.

8. Do Not Waste Your Time, Effort, And Concern On Those Not Worthy Of It

I have learned that many people who appear to need our help do not truly appreciate it, will learn nothing, and will continue making the same foolish/selfish/pathetic mistakes that they always have. You are simply enabling more of the same.

People who make poor life choices—who are not victims of mere circumstance—especially those with a lack of gratitude, or who do not attempt to better themselves, do not deserve your time. I do have personal beliefs that have me feel that I would be happy to help someone truly in need—however I no longer do so blindly.

9. Put Yourself In The Favor Of Others—You'll Benefit

Over time I have lived in a few different cities, made new friends from former strangers, and without intending to do so, ran across something that benefited me many times: doing small favors for others, befriending them, and in return receiving better treatment or favors that others wouldn't get.

Now wherever I go regularly or whoever I do business with I make sure to get to know more about them, learn some of their language (if from another culture), and do small favors for them to win their preferential treatment that the average person wouldn't receive. I've been very glad I did.

10. Some People Cannot Be Reasoned With

A most difficult lesson to learn, and one I was taught when I was young due to violence in my public school. In the old days, I was a small, quiet guy who was picked on sometimes. Violence at school and even on the bus to and from our vocational school mid-day during high school, was somewhat severe at times.

I'll never for the rest of my like forget watching one of my best friends getting a coat thrown over his head then beaten over the head by several guys—for no reason whatsover. That was their idea of fun.

What became clear to me extremely well was, after being attacked and beaten many times by guys I was around was this: some men simply hate you because you exist. No amount of talking and reasoning with them will achieve anything. They are dysfunctional pieces of garbage and understand only violence. If you are passive you will get hurt—be ready to do what you must, and do not hesitate to deal with it harshly.

11. The Hardest Opponent You'll Ever Face Is Yourself

Despite all my experience, despite all the things I've learned and improved (or other people I've dealt with, both good and bad), it never fails that facing myself in terms of fighting my own defects and deficits is an incredible challenge.

It's not just the actual effort that it takes to examine our own flaws then change them, but often defeating our own ego and the feelings that come with knowing we're inadequate in certain ways. I've learned it's a continual battle to change the things about you that you don't like and never give up…it doesn't happen overnight.

12. Never Count On Money Not In the Hand

Planning in advance for funds you should have soon inevitably leads to crushed hopes and disappointment.

The problem is that in the real world, things like this happen:

- The friend who is supposed to repay your loan turns out to be a broke loser
- Your income tax refund turns out to be a lot less than expected
- A buyer backs out of buying your item for sale
- Your car needs repair out of the blue, and it costs a lot
- Your work bonus turns out to be misleading and not worth the trouble
- The little brother gets arrested, loses his job, and now needs you to loan him money

…and the list goes on and on. It just doesn't work. Don't plan on money you don't already have to spend. I have had all of the items above happen to me and I've finally learned my lesson.

13. Never Make A Major Life Decision Based On Opinions From the Average Person

The truth is, the average person—definitely not an ROK reader—is not well versed in recent events, has a poor understanding of reasoning, today's values, today's expectations for young men, and much more. With few life experiences, few struggles in life, and with no real understanding of critical thinking or listing the pros and cons of things in question, they'll often give you ignorant, dishonest, or misleading answers for subjects they claim to know about or should know about.

I have discovered that whether out of fear for admitting ignorance or simply a lack of social skills (and the result of telling you what they think you want to hear), people often give terrible advice or completely worthless opinions.

Take it from me, you must (as much as possible) investigate as much as possible and only take advice from trustworthy people you know that have demonstrated an understanding and hopefully life experience that give them a far more intelligent, and honest, response to your need for guidance.

14. Location Matters

This is a fairly recent lesson I had to live through. With regards to people changing locations (typically for a new job) I have seen the following written, when a person asked for serious advice about moving out of state to unknown parts:

"It's not where you are that matters. It's who you are and how you make the most of it."

This is a LIE!

Where you live and your environment matters a tremendous amount. A good city with opportunities and better quality of people can help your quality of life. A negative, depressing city or area will result in limited, if any, opportunities to enjoy life, pursue your goals, pursue women, and so much more.

Visit the area, spend time there, and make 100% sure you're feeling it. Never allow yourself to be pressured into making a quick decision or taking advice from those without your best interest in mind.

15. Be Open Minded And Willing To Try New Things

Where I grew up there was no "culture" per se, aside from the typical small-town mentality. This meant a lack of exposure to many things in the world, and for some reason there still exists the illogical aversion to new ideas, foods, lifestyles, thought processes, and more.

I formerly refused to eat certain foods and certainly had never been involved with women outside of my race. I most certainly never could have imagined I'd speak another language. After traveling to South America for the first time, I found myself in situations where it would it would have been to awkward to refuse trying new things…and the rest is history. I quickly realized that most of my refusal had been irrational.

After this some of the most rewarding experiences came from the "I'll give it a try" attitude.

In Conclusion

I've shared with you a number of principles that I have lived through, experienced, and came to see as being fundamental to a man's wisdom…and when observed, can improve his quality of life greatly. Also I hope you can avoid some of the same mistakes I've made.

I truly believe that the hardest lessons in life are often the most valuable and prove themselves true time and time again, giving us the motivation and wisdom to grow as men.

Motherhood Is Essential To Making Women Happy

October 14, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Only in The Current Year is it necessary for me to pen an article explaining that women are happiest when they engage in the natural, feminine, nurturing act of motherhood.

Recent data in the UK and US shows that stay at home mothers have the highest happiness and satisfaction ratings of any other career choice.

Working Is Fine, It Just Doesn't Impress Us

I think I like you, but I'm not sure. Please tell me more about your job. Said no Bond ever.

Contrary to what angry feminists will say, I have no personal beef against a woman wanting to work; indeed throughout modern history most women have worked at some point in their lives. But if she makes her job her #1 priority, I know she is not going to value my needs or the needs of her family.

Furthermore, I do not care one iota about what a woman's job or career is, short of her suppressing her unicorn horn and curing cancer. Men are not impressed, attracted by, or interested in a woman's work. Indeed the only time I've ever paid attention to a woman's career is when putting her on a relative comparison chart with other working girls: an HR girl who stares at a computer screen all day, sitting in a lonely cubicle, and issuing mandates about the next transdoodle appreciation day picnic is going to have a different demeanor than, say, a kindergarten teacher, who is nurturing her feminine side by caring for and playing with children.

The Data

Several surveys back up the obvious conclusion that women enjoy being feminine, nurturing mothers, and not corporate drones. A 2007 Pew Research survey shows that 48% of women consider being a full time stay at home mom the ideal situation versus only 39% 10 years ago. (The number saying working full time is ideal declined from 32% to 21%). Considering all the propaganda encouraging women to become career slaves, this data is quite impressive.

Less than 10% say career women are best

When polled about the ideal role of mothers, less than 10% of respondents believed a full time working mom was best for the family. The number of working mothers is far above 10%. Which makes us ask, why do these mothers not value their families enough? Do they crave the consumer goods that badly that they must sacrifice their family's happiness in order to bring in more income for smartphones, Chinese trinkets, and overpriced sugary coffee drinks?

Redbook magazine's survey of stay at home mothers

Redbook magazine recently polled their readers and found that stay at home mothers with 4 children were the happiest, and that 56% of stay at home mothers consider themselves "very or extremely happy," with only 10% reporting "slightly or not happy." Considering that at least 25% of all women are mentally ill, these numbers are huge.

Stay At Home Jobs

There are a large number of part-time, stay at home jobs that women can do from the home. Indeed, they are able to get the best of both worlds: small businesses are the major source of income growth in the US, and many of these ideas are far more fun than writing TPS reports. Blogging, making arts and crafts, making jewelry, painting, drawing, photography, tutoring, and many of the self-sufficient jobs that many ROK readers are searching for to get us out of the rat race, are far more rewarding and interesting than having a corporate job where she wears a masculine pantsuit and works in a mentally debilitating office environment, full of restrictions, codes, office politics, infighting, scheduled meals and breaks, and political correctness.

I met a friend the other day who just expanded his basement for his wife's embroidery business. She is a stay at home mother of three, and started out with a sewing machine in a small den. She now has several thousands of dollars of screen printing equipment, and has partnered with a couple of other moms in the neighborhood to create t-shirts, and whatever else women can sew or embroider. They are happy working on these projects, most of which involve their children, and they are able to make money at the same time, selling to the parents of other children. Best of all, she can work as much or as little as she wants, and is always home to look after the home and family.

While men do not care about women's careers, I think a woman with a hobby or part time job that she is passionate about could be a source of great pride for her husband. Many stay at home mothers are artists, authors, public speakers, or make other creative and valuable contributions to society, and I would be proud of a wife's accomplishments in these venues, far more than if she just got a promotion to Senior Vice President of Marketing.

Staying Home Prevents Feelings Of Boredom And Worthlessness

Further surveys from the British Office for National Statistics, British insurance conglomerate Liverpool Victoria, and others show that the "well-being" index is highest for mothers who stay at home to care for children instead of working, and have the strongest belief that their life is "worthwhile." These stay at home moms have less anxiety, more satisfaction and happiness, and higher optimism even when they are doing poorly.

Indeed, raising children is a laudable goal, and certainly more rewarding than earning another paycheck this week at Megacorp, Inc. Laura Perrin of Mothers At Home Matter, reflected on the ONS survey stating stay at home moms "are not only making their own family happy but also making a contribution to society as a whole."

We Are Winning

Sorry Big Red, you didn't make the cut this week.

Despite the increasing insanity on the social justice front, more mothers than ever are choosing to stay at home to raise their children. More women are realizing they are happier when they do things which align with their natural nurturing motherly instincts, and not when they try to be loud, aggressive, brash, short haired, men. Women, you are happiest when you find a good man, and become a devoted mother and wife.

As there is no budget for national men's research, I will only hypothesize that men are also happiest when we have challenges, struggles, and purpose, which is often found in a job, versus staying at home and raising a family. Since society doesn't care about the relative happiness of men, we do not yet have the data to back this up.

How The Cloward-Piven Strategy Is Driving The United States To Collapse

As most of our readership is aware, America is in deep decline on multiple levels. Economically, our nation is largely a service-based economy, where the ever-dwindling supply of good paying jobs are either taken by foreigners on H1B visas, or fought over tooth and nail by young and old alike. Militarily, our nation no longer cares about winning conflicts or supporting its active-duty personnel or veterans, instead choosing to corrupt it from within by promoting disastrous social engineering or outright incompetence. Finally, on a cultural level, our society is on the verge of outright conflict between races, genders, and different generations. These metrics, as well as others, clearly demonstrate that America could possibly collapse within the next few decades.

Although some might diagnose our decline to incompetence or idiocy, the true answer is that our precipitous decline was deliberately orchestrated by our political, intellectual, and cultural elites in order to achieve a utopia that they themselves have never experienced. In order to understand why, it is necessary to understand their favorite tool of choice: the Cloward-Piven Strategy. If we can understand how this strategy works, we stand a better chance at surviving whatever specific endgame the elites have in store for us.

The Cloward-Piven Strategy

Eventually, the cow will cease to exist.

The Cloward-Piven Strategy was born in the midst of the fiery and violent leftist protests of the 1960s, as the brainchild of two sociology professors from Columbia University: Richard Andrew Cloward and Frances Fox Piven. Dissatisfied with the Antonio Gramsci style of cultural marxism, they sought a quicker and more explosive method of destruction that would cause America to collapse within a matter of years as opposed to decades.

In a paper entitled The Weight of the Poor: A Strategy to end Poverty, Cloward and Piven argued that the only way to end poverty was to enroll as many individuals as possible in government welfare programs. In doing so, the massive influx of new recipients would cause the system to collapse, at which point leftist activists would take to the streets and demand the establishment of a government that could address their “grievances”. In the mind of people like Cloward and Piven, the ideal government was a totalitarian one that would implement Marxism and crush any and all opposition.

While the Cloward-Piven strategy was initially created to specifically address the issue of poverty, it also resulted in an effective 3-step process that others could use to destroy any advanced civilization. First, the political elite must indirectly stretch governmental and societal institutions to their breaking point, the idea being that once these institutions reached that point, it would only take one push to collapse the system entirely. Next, they must enable the creation of a flash point that would initiate society’s collapse, be it a series of violent riots, a hasty military conflict, or unwise economic policies. Finally, after society collapses, the political elite would then initiate an overt power grab, thereby ensuring the existence of a leftist totalitarian regime for decades to come.

Although there are many examples that can be used to prove that this plan is the one being used by America’s political elite, the three most compelling consist of the threat posed by illegal immigration, the Left’s reaction to Black Lives Matter, and the Federal government’s attempts to disarm law abiding citizens while also arming federal agencies to the teeth.

1. Illegal Immigration

They want to bring THESE people in.

Illegal Immigration on its own is already one of the most important threats to the future of the United States, because it reflects a deliberate attempt by our political elite to displace and supplant its native population with one that will always vote for them, remain dependent on welfare, and take jobs from Americans by working "under the table" at wages that American citizens cannot survive on.

This raises a logical question: if illegal immigration already displaces such a great number of Americans and creates so much controversy and strife, why keep bringing in as many as possible? A further question to ask is why do so now, as opposed to waiting until the economy is better? Our nation is nowhere near the point of recovery since nearly 50% of Americans are already on one form or another of government assistance, our nation has an interest rate and student loan bubble that will both burst soon, and an economy that is either being outsourced or stolen by thieves with H1B visas.

All of these factors clearly show that our nation is at its breaking point, yet we have a political elite that wishes to first enact unconditional amnesty and then import migrants from shady 3rd world countries. Any rational observer will realize that adding 13 million MORE welfare, public assistance or student loan recipients may likely cause the entire system to collapse due to inefficiency and a lack of adequate funding.

The reason that the political class is respectively pushing amnesty and sanctuary is that they, like Cloward and Piven, have realized that importing people who lack viable job skills and also possess values antithetical to those held by Americans, can help to create an atmosphere of distrust. They also understand that if a climate of distrust persists long enough, then it will eventually explode into outright conflict. As a result they have aggressively pushed these causes and will continue to do until our society explodes outright.

2. The left's response to Black Lives Matter

This is what they actually believe.

Although distrust and discord among different parts of society can serve as important catalysts for massive upheaval, they still require a violent spark order to fully initiate. This spark consists of Black Lives Matter and their activities that have taken place over the past two years.

The rise of BLM is difficult to trace because it seemingly appeared out of nowhere with a mandate to supposedly end structural racism, stop blacks from being shot by police, and force police departments to conform to dictates that Black Lives Matter supports. However, if one looks closely, there is no logical reason for Black Lives Matter to exist at all. This is because not only has violent crime largely been decreasing everywhere but the ghetto, but also due to the fact that many of the token cases cited by BLM were instances where the police were justified in their decisions.

If an astute observer notices the disconnect between BLMs raison d'etre, the reality surrounding violent crime trends, and the specifics of these publicized cases, they may conclude that BLM only cares about getting attention. Such a conclusion would be accurate, because not only is BLM an illogical movement, but it also exists solely due to generous funding from George Soros. This is both important and disturbing because if an organization receives funding from Soros, it is because elites like him have a plan for that organization, one that even the movement's leaders may not even be aware of.

In Black Lives Matter's case, the political elite allows them to exist and treats them with kid gloves because they intend to use them to spark outright conflict between various segments of society. Their hope is that if BLM burns enough cities down, takes over enough schools, and savagely attack enough whites, that whites will respond in kind, thereby triggering a race war that they could actively influence. If an open racial conflict arises in the near future, and if it is combined with the massive strain and societal distortions created by illegal immigrants, our government would be powerless to contain it, thereby collapsing in the process.

3. The plan to disarm the American Populace while arming Federal Agencies Respect authority figures, they said. It's patriotic, they said.

The final component of the political elite's endgame, though not specifically called for by the Cloward-Piven Strategy, consists of establishing the framework for a totalitarian government that can pick up the pieces of a society shattered by an overburdened safety net and civil unrest. Unfortunately for them, they cannot do so unless they disarm law-abiding Americans while simultaneously arming federal agencies to the teeth.

Since Obama took office in 2008, the political elite has tried everything from smuggling illegal guns to Mexican drug cartels, attempting to make ammunition expensive through regulation, to convincing banks to refuse to extend credit or loans to gun store owners. Schemes like these are intended to make gun ownership such an impossible venture, that eventually no one will own any, thereby making any attempts to establish a hard tyranny slightly easier.

Although disarming law abiding Americans is an important step in implementing the Cloward-Piven strategy, the political elite must also establish an enforcement mechanism for the new government they intend to create. Coincidentally, over the past five years, reports of numerous and excessively large transactions have occurred between federal agencies and ammunition manufacturers. While some agencies need ammunition for training purposes and to do their jobs, why do agencies such as the EPA or the Department of Education require ammunition and weapons as well, especially in an era where there isn't even enough for the military?

One possible answer to this vexing question is that even if the political elite succeeds in gutting the military completely, they likely don't trust the average soldier or Marine to carry out orders for a hard tyranny. Therefore, the political elite likely intends to use federal agencies to carry out tyrannical orders, all in the name of "law enforcement". If this is the case, it would likely explain the comments made by President Obama during a speech he made in Colorado, where he argued for a domestic force that was equally as well-equipped and funded as the military.

The endgame at a glance

The Cloward-Piven strategy represents an effective high-level blueprint for collapsing an advanced nation such as the United States. By stretching the pillars of society to their limits, fomenting civil unrest to cause the existing system to collapse, and disarming the populace while empowering the government; the political elite can easily enslave an unwitting populace. We can only survive if we recognize their plan for what it is, and take affirmative steps now to prepare for the worst.

5 Well-Paying Jobs For Men Who Dropped Out Of College

October 15, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

It’s no secret that more and more men are opting to avoid colleges and universities altogether. With false rape accusations at an all time high, SJW indoctrination posters surrounding every square foot of your dorms, and the value of a college degree plummeting, a lot of men are deciding that it simply isn’t worth it.

But what are you to do without a college degree, then? Surprisingly, you can do a lot. Not only are there a lot of decent paying jobs that don’t require a college education, but due to our digital world, there’s endless opportunities for self-employment.

Here are five of the best options for college dropouts.

1. Tradesman

As has been said many times before on Return Of Kings, attending trade school is a better option than 85% of the degrees that they offer in college. Anthropology? History? English? If you're phenomenal in your major, and plan on getting a doctorate or becoming a self-published author, then sure—by all means major in non-STEM related fields.

But, if you're a typical man who is looking for someone to employ you, I would urge you to look into trade school. Becoming an electrician, plumber, or carpenter is almost guaranteed to land you a job when you're finished getting certified. Compare this to the average unemployment rate of current college grads which is roughly 10% (according to liberal skewed polls), and it's clear that trade schools are the better option.

Even if you can't get a job at a trade school, often times you can work for companies that will pay you $15-20 per hour and train you, paying for your trade school. If you follow this route when you turn 18, you could easily be netting $55,000 to $70,000 a year by your mid 20's. And if you decide to start your own business? Forget about it—you could easily earn six figures and beyond.

Plus, as an added benefit you'll be working in an environment that is almost guaranteed to be 100% men. No woman that I know is willing to work in trades, which means that there are no HR departments to deal with. Having an environment where men tell it how it is and don't pander can NEVER be underestimated.

2. Las Vegas VIP Host

Will you have to deal with vain, slutty girls? Yes. Will you have to deal with snobby clients who aren't satisfied with anything no matter how hard you try? Of course. But, if you take this as a chance to develop some emotional resilience, and look beyond it, you'll see that being a VIP host has a plethora of lifestyle benefits.

First, let's talk about the pay though. Starting off, you'll be a street promoter—expect to earn $10 an hour. This isn't meant to be a permanent position, however; there's plenty of room for growth if you do well. Within a year, if you're calibrated and know how to talk with charisma, you can work your way up to a sub-promoter, and eventually to a promoter in under a year.

Once you reach this point, you'll probably earn around $1,000 a week. Beyond here, there's plenty of room for growth; some of the most successful promoters earn millions a year, especially after they build up a list of high-rolling clients.

But, the true benefits of club promoting come from the lifestyle that it affords you. Being a good promoter is easily one of the best jobs to get pussy. Period.

As a promoter, you have the power to let anyone into your night club, past the red rope. You have the power to give people free bottle service and discounted tables, and you have all of the connections in the club.

So, when an eager young club slut sees this, what do you think she's going to do? If you know anything about female nature, the answer will be obvious: she'll sleep with you to get the benefits that come with your lifestyle.

Plus, if you know how to pull club girls from open to close, you'll be able to game in the top nightclubs in the world…while you're working. What could be better for a young lad? You'll sleep with women, gain razor sharp social skills, and make connections with high end business owners.

3. Blogger Or Writer

As many of you know, having a job can have benefits and detriments. One of the major drawbacks of having a job is that you can't say anything too controversial; any mentioning of 90% of the things we talk about here on ROK, and you'll get called into an HR department for a talking to.

With this in mind, many men choose to start their own blogs. Sure, it doesn't make much money at first—but after a year or two of hard work, you can expect to make a livable salary. After three or four, if you know some basic internet marketing skills, you can be netting six figures.

Bloggers typically make money three ways. First, they write articles for other, more prominent blogs (like LifeHacker or Bodybuilding.com) and get paid per article. This is great, but it isn't passive income, so many bloggers only do this at first to get by.

The second way that bloggers make money is through affiliate advertising; this is where you get paid to recommend products that you use and like. I'm not going to name names, but I know of one blogger who recommends certain penis enlargement devices, and makes a cool $500 per week just from this.

The real money, however, is in eBook sales. Learning how to write and sell eBooks is what separates the amateurs from the pros. The reason why is that eBooks are a major source of passive revenue; in other words, you invest a lot of time at first, and then make money every day afterwards.

This allows bloggers to focus on writing great content, networking with other bloggers, and expanding their social media reach…all while making $300 per day in passive revenue. If you do decide to start a blog, I recommend you look into niche marketing—a lot of markets are super saturated nowadays, so it's important that you learn to differentiate yourself.

4. Trader

This is definitely one of the more difficult professions in this list, but if you can master it, expect to make seven figures per year, sometimes eight. This won't happen at first, of course, but if you're willing to put in the time required to understand the market and its fluctuations, you can expect to make some serious cash. In fact, some traders frequently triple their investments in a matter of months.

Typically, traders choose to specialize in one area of interest. For example, precious metals is one area that I'm fairly familiar with. Another field might be the agricultural industry, or the Forex market. Regardless of what you choose to specialize in, it's important that you become a master at it.

The benefits of trading the market successfully are, aside from the wealth, very rewarding. First off, you're your own boss—you don't have to answer to anyone, but yourself. Second, you can work whenever you want, and if you know how to set up automated trades with triggers to sell and to buy, you barely even have to work.

The greatest benefit of trading, however, is that you're location independent. You can work anywhere in the world, so long as you have a WiFi connection. This is why many traders frequently travel the world, staying in different countries for months at a time, while trading the Foreign Exchange market.

I would not recommend that you make this a career choice, at first. In my experience, trading should be a hobby until you gain some proficiency in it. Start off by putting $10,000 or so into a brokerage account, and get used to placing trades and observing predictable trends.

Watch the news VERY frequently, and you'll be able to capitalize off of panic and greed in the market. Again, this is one profession that takes years to master, but the benefits are extremely rewarding if you're willing to put in the work.

5. Real Estate Agent

Plenty of men have become fabulously wealthy through real estate investing. From Arnold Schwarzenegger to Robert Kiyosaki, countless men have proven that with a good work ethic, some charisma, and a little bit of know-how, you can make millions through savvy flipping.

Many men choose to get into the real estate development industry, but I wouldn't recommend this at first—start off as a broker. You'll have to get your license, first, but this won't take very long compared to a college degree. Look for a major agency in your area to employ you, and try your best to get one of the studs of the office to mentor you.

After several years, with plenty of experience under your belt, consider going into business for yourself. Still take the connections and knowledge that you got from your agency with you, but now it's your turn to keep 100% of the profits.

There's a few methods to real estate investment that men usually employ. The first is to flip; this entails buying a house that the owner needs to sell quickly. Because of their desperation, you can frequently get the house at a fairly low cost. Then, simply flip it within a few months and earn yourself a good $20,000-30,000.

The second method of real estate investment is buying and holding; this would be where you buy a broken down house when the market is bad, fix it up over the course of a year or two, and then sell it when the market starts to come back up. This can make you some great money, but the real key is in method #3.

The third method is to buy a house, and rent it—although this does require you to maintain the house, it's by far the most passive. Think about it. Imagine that you have 5 duplexes, and you rent out each room for $750 per month. That's an easy $7,500 per month!

Sure, you have to pay the bankers, replace the water coolers, and so on and so forth, but this takes very little effort—maybe 5-10 hours a week at the most. The rest of your time you can focus on investing in more real estate and creating other streams of passive revenue.

Conclusion

All in all, there's plenty of options for men who didn't go to college. In fact, some of these options are far better than being an office drone—not only in terms of income, but in terms of emotional health.

I don't know about you, but I'd rather be a self-employed, independent man, or work alongside a team of men, than be stuck in an office where Machiavellian politics and micro-managing policies consume every waking hour of my life.

If you have any advice, tips, or guidance for men looking to make it big in the world without a college degree, be sure to leave them a note down below.

Australian man Gable Tostee is presently on trial for the alleged "murder" of New Zealander Warriena Wright in 2014. Wright, aged 26 at the time, had met Tostee in person that same night after communicating on Tinder. They had drank alcohol, watched a film, and had sex throughout the evening at his Gold Coast, Australia apartment. As the night progressed, however, Warriena Wright attacked Tostee and partially upended his apartment, including to the point of throwing rocks at him. The man then restrained her and put her out on his balcony, locking the door. Wright, without assistance, then climbed over the balcony and fell to her death from the 14th floor (15th floor in American parlance). Murder charges against Tostee soon followed.

We know most of what happened because of a combination of witness accounts and, crucially, Tostee's surreptitious audio recordings of his time with Warriena Wright. Nevertheless, the bone of contention at the trial is whether Wright "feared" for her life enough to want to try and escape the balcony, leading to her death. Despite the absolute lack of any medical evidence that Warriena Wright was strangled, the prosecution is now sensationally claiming that the audio recordings feature "guttural" sounds of her being choked before being put on the balcony. Go figure.

Importantly, Warriena Wright appears to have been severely mentally ill. The presence of self-inflicted scars around her body is a factor that needs to be emphasized again and again, especially as Tostee's alleged (now disproven) autism first became a media talking point a long time ago. Wright also threatened to call the police on him (for reasons no one understands) well before he moved her onto the balcony. Add to the mix her inebriation (a BAC of 0.156, over three times the Australian driving limit) and you can see why Tostee struggled to deal with her. That her body showed no signs of him assaulting her (in self-defense) is a testament to his patience.

Tellingly, Wright's outlandish behavior, self-harm, and intoxication have not been seriously entertained as reasons for her climbing off the balcony and dying. This is an ominous sign for any man accused of a crime involving inexplicable female actions.

Tostee is hated triply because of his womanizing, game, and association with Bodybuilding.com's Misc section

Man who takes his physical health and sex life seriously – bad. Woman with bull-ring and self-inflicted scars over her body who attacks that man – unquestionable angel.

Make no mistake, Gable Tostee became an even bigger target from the day he was described as a "playboy" by the media. This targeting has gone above and beyond the usual insinuation that any man accused of harming or killing a woman must be guilty. In a society where females are declaring their “emancipation” by slutting around or shouting their STD “status,” men who have options and refuse to settle down are bizarrely described as creeps and sexual predators. In this vein, social media is currently replete with user comments on news stories admonishing Tostee for supposedly objectifying women (isn’t this a trial about the death of one woman?), purportedly “preying” on girls, and being an all-round “douche” and “asshole.”

Amplifying this disdain for Tostee is his involvement in organized “misogyny,” namely through his posting on Bodybuilding.com’s Misc section. The principal thing that prevents the Misc section from being as hated as Return Of Kings and the Roosh V Forum is the more superficially vulgar banter and less overtly politicized discussions that take place there. Aside from the Elliot Rodger Isla Vista killings, it largely escapes all SJW radars. In a brilliant demonstration of subtlety, huge numbers of the posters are highly intelligent, astute guys who just happen to use vocabulary you would typically link to a building site. Regardless, once it became obvious that Tostee posted there, he was vilified.

Recording the incident has saved Tostee from a certain murder conviction

Enough men in recent times have been saved from certain criminal convictions for rape, domestic violence, and even murder because they recorded visual and/or auditory evidence of their encounters with women. What judgment the court will make about Tostee in these circumstances remains to be seen, but having audio of his interaction with Warriena Wright has bolstered his defence substantially. Without such corroboration of many elements of his story, this would be an open-and-shut case. Not open-and-shut in the sense of a fair trial and conviction, but another example of a man immediately presumed guilty and given the lip service of “due process.”

There is no question that Warriena Wright comes across as an unhinged, mentally disturbed dingbat in the audio recordings, and a drunk one at that. Imagine the even greater bias the media and other corners would indulge in if these recordings did not exist. That prospect should send chills down your spine as they are already rounding on Gable Tostee badly. After reviewing the relevant laws in your jurisdiction, you might seriously consider using visual or auditory recording to protect yourself from false allegations or charges where legally possible.

Understanding Gable Tostee

Bull-ring, hair dyed with an unnatural color…

There is no doubt that Gable Tostee has some unusual characteristics and his behavior on the night could have better, as well as his documentation of it online thereafter. His recorded reference to her being lucky that he did not throw her off the balcony is a good example. As for him eating pizza in the Gold Coast nightclub precinct after Wright fell and died, what is a man to do in this situation? Men are immediately judged and assumed to be guilty, a parade that endures throughout the legal process and often greatly influences/determines it. Whilst it would have been better if Tostee had not gone for pizza, the shock and disorientation he undoubtedly felt after Warriena Wright climbed off the balcony and fell to her death is understandable.

The same goes for Tostee not evicting her from his apartment. He claims the balcony was closer than the front door and that he wanted her to stop attacking him as soon as possible, without a prolonged physical altercation. Wright can be heard screaming “no, no, no” and that she wanted to leave, yet this was in the context of her just having assaulted Tostee and acting like a drugged-up pork chop. It is very easy to judge from afar. For the man in the middle of things, though, it is decidedly less clear-cut. If he "assaults" her back, even to the extent of self-defense, he faces criminal charges. If he does nothing, he gets things thrown at him and attacked further, and his property is at the risk of more damage. Warriena Wright's massive volatility that night would have been a big concern of Tostee's. You can let people like this free and they go crazy again (remember Indian-American fruitcake Anjali Ramkissoon?).

Tostee has been diagnosed with social anxiety, after claims of autism were dismissed. From conversations I have had with people, he had apparently undergone some impressive changes since leaving school, where he showed limited signs of the "playboy" inclination. He has taken his self-development physically and game-wise seriously, even if some on the Misc section were quite baffled by some of his posts at times. The problem he faces is that the media is portraying him as both the manipulative womanizer and the creepy outsider at the same time, particularly as he has previously been depicted as a semi-loner. It's bad from both ends and outlets have sought to capitalize on the hatred against him, which frequently incorporates threats of violence.

What's next if Tostee is convicted of murder or manslaughter?

"Why couldn't this man just patiently wait while the crazy girl attacked him and tried to trash his place? Misogyny!"

A jury can alternatively convict Tostee of murder or manslaughter. Either outcome would be deleterious. Just as "domestic violence" has been progressively expanded through extra legislation, the scope for homicide is being widened through very tenuous judicial decisions. I am not entirely familiar with Queensland's homicide laws and court precedents, but the general test in non-direct murder cases is that a person needs to have a reasonably founded fear for taking the action that causes their death (think someone running into traffic and being killed because a person is pursuing them with a knife).

Men have a very raw deal when it comes to a woman who acts violently. They are severely and unfairly scrutinized whatever option they take to deal with it. Once more we face the prospect of a man being convicted for a “crime,” involving a situation that could have been avoided completely if the woman in question had not gone crazy.

The world sucks, heh?

5 Ways To Apologize Without Giving Up Your Dignity

October 16, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

I know, I know. After reading the first clause of that title, the manosphere just keeled over faster than you can say “Trigglypuff.” But bare with me; there is a method to this writer’s madness (I am Canadian, after all, so I have built-in credibility on this matter!).

Neomasculinity teaches men, rightfully, to rid that dreadful, disyllabic admission of guilt—“sorry”—from their vocabulary. And 95% of the time, being shamelessly unapologetic is the proper conduct when dealing with women in your life.

“Sorry” typically conveys self-inflicted shame and insecurity for our biologically-driven actions or power structures that exist outside of our control. While feminists appear to want this from men—to claim responsibility for the “oppressive” Patriarchy and grovel in, yes, sorries—the reality is feminists are subconsciously begging men to scoff at their bullshit—respectfully—and lead them out of Plato’s Cave with confidence.

The best apologies can be dispensed with a little “now you see it, now you don’t”.

But men must, of course, be logical. Logical not only in a political, philosophical, or scientific sense, but moral as well. Alpha males intuitively understand that to attract women (and in many other aspects of life), you have to take risks, demonstrate persistence, and exude confidence, all while showing a deep emotional intelligence for their feelings. Without the later, unchecked confidence makes you a “douche” and unchecked persistence renders you “creepy.”

Occasionally, it can be a fine line.

However, there are times when you cross that line and your moral instincts kick in, alerting you of this infringement. You made a mistake, you hurt someone (ideally someone you care about), and it is time to own up to your actions (assuming this person is not trying to bully you into this ownership). At this point, apologizing is not about submitting to SJW pressure, but accepting personal responsibility—a quality all decent men must possess.

So you have decided you owe someone—in this case, a woman—an apology. How do you go about this without coming off like a contrite chump or self-flagellating sop? Is it possible to apologize from a position of strength? Is it achievable to say—here goes—sorry without drawing attention to the fact that you are, indeed, apologizing. The answer is yes, yes, and of course. Here are five ways to apologize with moral integrity and a sense of justice.

1. The Conditional Apology

Personally, I use this one a lot. It is typically employed when you have done something that you stand by, but can reasonably understand why a woman would be hurt by your actions (for example: you hit on or pick up her (hotter) best friend while she stands next to you at the bar). When confronted, you apologize conditionally, meaning you specify the terms of your apology.

This way you’re conveying that you understand the intent and consequences of your actions, and while you respect the woman’s feelings in response to your actions, you would do whatever you did again and again and again because you abide by your own set of principles, even if they happen to conflict with her feelings. I have done this many times and it has never failed. The girl always comes back.

2. The Proactive Apology

Women tend to dismiss this apology at face value, but deep down I think they respect it. The Proactive Apology is issued when a female comes to you with a problem or you make an honest mistake (for example: you're late for a date as you had to finish a paid assignment), typically in hopes of getting the full attention and sympathy betas have given her in recent past.

Here, it is perfectly reasonable to say "sorry," but you follow-up with a solution. You offer the woman recourse to her distress with a practical alternative. For instance, you see your date on the park bench and you are fifteen minutes late, so you say: "Hey, sorry I'm late, had to finish this project that's due tomorrow—hey, I know a good taco shop two blocks over, you hungry?"

Here, the apology indicates you have social awareness about your lateness, but the follow-up further demonstrates that you are always thinking two steps ahead of your stumbles. From here, she may internalize her anger, but will in time, if not straight away, begin to admire your unflappable initiative and ability for proactive thinking.

3. The Playful Apology

Donald Trump said it best to Megyn Kelly: "Oooh, excuse me." Trump has said some crass things about the female anatomy, for sure. He is a bit of a dick—and he knows that—but when The Donald gets his hand caught in the cookie jar, he acknowledges it (and still keeps the cookie).

A Playful Apology, shown in the clip below (at 18:48), should be deployed when you have been caught doing something kind of cheeky or prankish; but since you are a moral person at heart, you can accept responsibility for the mischief. With a twist. Your apology plays down the gravity of your "misdeed," while maintaining the charm inherent in your personality.

https://youtu.be/UGPvwdrlzCM

The apology's playful tone is congruent to your personality and rascally actions. That congruence makes the apology earnest and authentic, which women will respect. That said, you should not use the Playful Apology if you have truly done something terrible (say, accidentally drive over your girlfriend's puppy) as this apology is intended to take the sting out of your wrongdoing and bring levity to a situation that calls for it.

4. The Unapologetic Apology

We all know it. It's the apology in disguise, one that acknowledges your misstep without dwelling on the admission. The Unapologetic Apology is best implemented in the mild to moderate moments of error, from bumping into a woman at the store to questioning her decision to chop off chunks of her hair when, in fact, she has a hair loss condition.

The Unapologetic Apology usually springs from the “honest mistake,” where you may have misjudged or misbehaved so you address the lapse in judgment and casually move forward. You can push the faux pas aside with a nonchalant “my mistake” or “pardon me” or “I meant no offense” and let it roll off your back. Simple, direct and effective.

5. The Genuine Apology

You fucked up. You made a bad joke about your girlfriend’s ailing grandmother (that was genuinely funny, just ill-timed) or your women is enduring a 100% real, human hardship (that very same ailing grandmother you derided—you asshole—just passed) that isn’t puffed up with pointless girl drama.

This is the moment when your voice drops, your palms open, you meet her eyes while focusing on her nasal bridge, and utter that rueful word god gave us. The genuine apology is typically reserved for the women you deeply care about, because you respect their feelings even if half the time those feelings are in direct conflict with any sense of logic.

We all make mistakes, but it is when we realize and aim to correct them that we set ourselves apart from the fools. Here, saying “sorry” is not a form of supplication, but of your heightened moral awareness. To say the words shows empathy, which women do respect provided it comes from a genuine part of your character and isn’t merely conceded in an attempt to win back her favour.

Just not like this…

“Sorry” if necessary, but not necessarily “sorry”

As we well know, most of our communication is done non-verbally, implied via tonality and body language. Words matter only in a vacuum; what matters most is their underlying meaning and the temper in which they're delivered. While "sorry" has become a cringe word in the manosphere, it really has no damaging impact so long as it is used with dignity and purpose.

Sometimes a simple "sorry" (or "oooh, excuse me") is a pithy way of demonstrating self-awareness and conscience, not nervousness or insecurity. It takes a wise, intuitive man to grasp the difference and exercise the former when necessary. Apologies are not about being accepted, but when they are acceptable.

Why You Likely Have Bad Posture

October 16, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Fitness enthusiasts will criticize a person's fitness (or lack thereof) for a variety of reasons, some of which are more warranted than others. Many of these criticisms have a significant overlap with what the manosphere criticizes "beta males", simps, and male feminists for-and from what I've noticed, one of the biggest ones is posture.

In these circles, posture is used as almost a shorthand for everything that is unmasculine—references to "hunched over beta males" with womanly body language abound on men's websites around the blogosphere. And why shouldn't this be the case? Men and women do tend to have different body language, particularly when they're deliberately trying to cultivate the virtues of their respective sexes—"power poses" are a well known phenomenon to anybody who works in a corporate environment.

Bad Posture

As with most things, it is a lot easier to describe the wrong way to do things than to do the right thing—however, as this article is meant to be instructive, it is worth going over what bad posture is, before proper posture is discussed.

There are numerous ways to stand incorrectly, but all of them have a few things in common: The biggest one is that the spine is not in a neutral, semi-relaxed position

Sway back is a posture in which the torso above the waist leans slightly back, as if the person was carrying something in front of their chest.

Hollow back is sort of the opposite of sway back, in which the lumbar curves too much, leaning the torso forward and making the belly bulge outwards-an easy way to characterize this posture is to imagine an infant who is learning how to walk.

Rounded shoulder posture is, as its name implies, where the shoulders slump forward in a “gorilla-esque” manner. In this posture, the upper back curves convexly and the head and neck lean forward, in addition to the rounded gorilla shoulders

Thoracic Kyphosis

Flat pelvis(or flat back) is not as noticeable as the others, but can still lead to reduced bodily function-this is where the lower back does not curve enough, which leads the torso and neck to sag slightly forward.

Military posture, ironically thought of as a “proper” posture for many years, is a mild form of problem posture as well—this is essentially where the muscles are strained and overly tight, exaggerating all of the elements of good posture to the point where the posture is no longer good.

Many factors can cause bad posture, most of which are either created or exacerbated by the forces of modernity—the worst of these being the act of extended sitting. When holding the same position for a long period of time, it’s only natural that your shoulders and torso will begin to sag.

In addition to this, sitting also removes the light muscular flexion that keeps the torso in its proper position when standing. The harm of sitting can, however, be easily remedied—just stand up and stretch every hour or so.

Other bad habits can cause improper posture, such as walking around with your smart phone at chest level or wearing a backpack improperly.

Now that you know how bad posture is formed and exacerbated, how can one correct it?

Good Posture

It is commonly believed that “good posture” is something stiff and military-esque, likely due to bad memories of being lectured on our posture from various authority figures in our use. In reality, proper posture should be relatively relaxing and invigorating—it should feel “tight” and “snug” without being stiff and stifling. Eventually, after you have practiced good posture for a few months, being in improper posture will start to feel uncomfortable for you.

Also bear in mind that there is no one universal proper posture—it differs for each person, but with that being said:

If proper posture can be defined in one word, that word would be “symmetry.” Ears are even with the shoulders and the shoulders are straight. The hips are straight and the weight is evenly distributed to each foot. There is a slight and natural curvature to the neck and lower back. Observe the pictures below:

Now that you know what good posture looks like, you are likely wondering how you can obtain it—and the answer is with various stretches and exercises.

Several of the shoulder mobility exercises I showed you in this article will work wonders for stiff upper bodies, and in many cases will clear up posture problems in and of themselves. In case that isn’t enough, there are a few other exercises you can utilize:

Standing against a wall can clear up a lot of problems: Stand so your head, shoulders, and buttocks are against a wall, and place your feet about 4-5 inches away from the wall.

Stay like this for a few minutes a day. In addition to being used to determine what your body's proper posture should be like, this acts as a stretch, and can loosen up some tense muscles.

The static back stretch is another one you can use: Lie on the floor and place your legs on top of a bed, chair, or ottoman. Your knees should bend at a 90-degree angle. Get your hips as close to the object as possible. Lay your arms on the ground at your side. Hold for 5-10 minutes.

And of course, the last stretch I would do for posture is the subject of my very first Return Of Kings article, the always useful bridge. Doing any bridging will help your posture, so follow that article for details. I cannot stress enough how important bridging is to the physical man.

No matter how you go about doing it, good posture can be yours quite easily.

October 16, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Newsweek:

Roosh V used to go out most nights looking to seduce a woman, but today he has a much easier task: He's just looking to piss one off.

It's opening day of the Republican National Convention (RNC) in Cleveland in July, and the most hated "pickup artist" in the world has infiltrated a group of protesters outside the arena. He's wearing a Hillary Clinton hat (he supports Donald Trump), and in a video of the incident he streamed on Periscope, he and the demonstrators clash. "This girl just came up to me and tried to touch me without my consent," he says into his smartphone camera, feigning the politically correct outrage he mocks. "She said, 'Go back to the Middle East.' She is Islamophobic!"

Roosh, whose father is from Iran, then turns his camera to the woman, who responds, "You're a piece of shit. I didn't touch you!" Then she calls him a rapist. A crowd forms. Another woman edges close, holding a microphone, and says she's with the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. "Who are you?" she asks Roosh. Before he can answer, the crowd starts chanting, "Rapist! Rapist!" and the first woman says, "You should kill yourself."

Roosh is pleased. He not only got to spar with some of the "social justice warriors" he despises but also got material to share with his many followers. And don't forget all the free publicity, which he needs as he attempts to make his transition from pickup artist (someone who relentlessly practices the "art" of seduction) to a hero of the "alternative right" movement.

Like the bombastic presidential candidate inside the convention hall that day, Roosh thinks America is too PC. That's largely the subject of his new book, Free Speech Isn't Free, and since embarking on a lecture tour in summer 2015 ("The State of Man"), he has evolved from "game" guru to conservative provocateur, joining figures such as Milo Yiannopoulos, the flamboyant Breitbart editor whom Twitter recently banned for inciting harassment. Yiannopoulos is a leader of the alt-right—a meme-obsessed nationalist subculture that grew out of online forums, gained a following among Trump supporters and mirrors the right-wing movements spreading overseas. Its members include white supremacists, anti-Semites and internet trolls.

> — A.J. Hoge □□ (@ajhoge) October 15, 2016

Though Roosh says he is not part of the movement—they just have common enemies—his alliance with its leaders was evident at the RNC, where he went to a party Yiannopoulos threw. Also there: Geert Wilders, the controversial Dutch politician on trial for anti-immigrant hate speech. A journalist who attended described the event as a "hell full of manic trolls and smug neo-fascists from every slimy corner of the internet."

Followers of Roosh, whose real name is Daryush Valizadeh, know him as a blogger who has been running websites devoted to "game"—the tricks and techniques to use to seduce women—since around 2001. His website Return of Kings "aims to usher the return of the masculine man in a world where masculinity is being increasingly punished and shamed." There are more than a million posts on his forum, and he has self-published 18 books.

He's perhaps best known—and most hated—for his proposed International Tribal Meetup Day in February. Attendees (no women or gay men allowed) were to congregate at set locations, identify one another through a code phrase and then go to bars or cafés. The 165 gatherings in 43 countries would offer "the opportunity to meet other like-minded men," he wrote.

7 Ways The Collapse May Unfold

October 17, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Collapse is one of those things no one wants to think about because it's both depressing and seemingly distant in the fantasy future. But given the events we've witnessed around the world in this year alone, is it really that implausible? History has shown us that upheavals happen suddenly and forcefully all at once after long periods of brewing; it is usually not something people expect to happen. With the way things are shaping up around the world, you wouldn't be considered mad to think that a major disaster is lurking just ahead.

Here are some very possible scenarios in which we might experience the collapse firsthand in the near future.

1. Economic Collapse

The thing about the economy is that no one can really predict for sure. Every year, individuals pop out and claim that the economic collapse is imminent—only to not happen at all. You'll find hundred of different opinions and predictions from the so-called experts, but the truth is that no one really knows what the heck is going to happen even one year from now. That said, there are increasing signs that there is trouble ahead for the global economy with estimations ranging from a mild downturn to something worse than the Great Depression. And this isn't some conspiracy: organizations from the IMF to billionaires like Jim Rogers and Donald Trump, as well as the author of Rich Dad and more are warning of dark days ahead.

Also, every eight years after an American presidential election, a financial crisis seems to hit America. In 2000, it was the Dotcom bubble; and in 2008, it was the housing bubble. Could 2016 election be a sign that the next big bubble is about to burst? Could it be the so-called derivatives bubble? The elites are already preparing for the collapse with their doomsday bunkers. Do they know something we don't?

2. Environmental Collapse

Of the seven listed here, this one may be the most devastating scenario short of total nuclear annihilation. Civilizations come and go, but once the environment is destroyed, there's probably no coming back. To be honest, I don't know how well the ecosystem is holding up or whether man-made "climate change" is real or a hoax—I haven't took the time go through all the data (you should be highly skeptical of anyone who claims to know for a fact). But the general impression I get is that things are getting worse with each passing day as human population continues to explode while the demand for food and natural resources are increasing at an exponential rate, causing untold devastation in the process that may not be reversible.

3. World War III

Are we seeing a preview of what is to come through the Syrian war?

With the way Hillary, Neocons, and the MSM are drumming for a war with Russia, you would think the elites are preparing for a major war. The geo-political situation around the globe has been unstable in the recent years with Ukraine, Iraq, Syria, Yemen, Libya, Afghanistan and more already engulfed with on-going wars. The Middle East, in particular, can blow up bigger than anyone expects as the Saudis and the Gulf states, Turkey, Iran, Russia, the US and the rest of NATO are slowly being dragged into the present conflict.

Special attention should be paid to how the West, led by the US, is setting the stage for a show-down with Russia—especially if Hillary end up getting elected. They've already been pressuring Russians with expansion and propaganda war for years.

4. Race War

The recent Black Lives Matter riots and violence has shown that progressivism and the push for "equality" only leads to more racial tensions and violence. Meanwhile, in Sweden, Muslim immigrants and refugees have already set up their own zones where even the police are afraid to go. If decisive action is not taken now, the racial and cultural divisions will only cause greater problems in the future, and no amount of Leftist rhetoric of harmony and equality will stop that.

5. Cultural Collapse

As Roosh described in his outstanding essay, collapse of a society may come in the form of culture without causing the institutions within the society to fall. I think another way to look at this is to see it as a deconstruction of all human identities so that they can be better re-organized as economic units to serve the system. Attack on masculinity means no tribalistic men fighting for their self-determination. Forced immigration and multiculturalism means national borders and ethnic identities will be erased with greater ease for globalism.

6. Gradual Decline

Collapse doesn't have to be a dramatic event where everything falls apart at once. Even if none of the above materializes, it is very possible that societies will decay and regress into a state of dystopia much like the movie Idiocracy. If the current trends continue, we'll have a dumb, immature, and domesticated population dependent on governments and corporations just to function. People will be mindlessly hooked to technological mediums and entertainments to pass their time, handing over their money and privacy in the process. We're already seeing early warning signs in Japan and the Anglo-sphere where men don't want to be men and want to keep themselves occupied with their electronic screens.

7. Globalist Victory

Technically not a collapse, but it might as well be. If the globalists win, we will be their helpless subjects like chickens in factory farms. Cultures and nations around the world will be destroyed and processed into one under the new global order, with each human being functioning as a drone to serve the elites. Middle-class will be obliterated and the only social classes will be between that of the small ruling class on top and the rest of the hapless population on the bottom. Total surveillance will be practiced in the name security with individual citizen's every move being tracked and recorded by the state. All weapons will be confiscated and monopolized by the state so that the people will be completely dependent on their mommy government. No one will have autonomy, privacy, or even the freedom to share their own opinions. This is a real possibility that may happen very soon as long as the people continue making one little concession at a time.

How Much Should You Worry?

If you still have doubts that the collapse is coming, ask yourself: do you have absolute proof that none of the above seven scenarios will happen? Regardless what the actual chances are, I find that most people are too busy with their own lives to care. They want to accomplish and make money, they want to sleep with as many women as they can, they want to travel and experience the world, they want to be entertained and concern themselves with lesser issues, they want pleasure and status, and so on. Wars, social decline, economic fragility, and environmental instability all seem too far-off to be of concern. And even if you believe that a collapse will knock on your door the next year or the next month, what could you even do?

Well, if you are serious about being prepared, at the minimum, you need to have weapons, food and water supples, and other basic survival items stacked up. Although just having those are not enough, it will dramatically boost your chance to survive the worst-case scenario. If you have time, you should also strive to be a survivalist, honing skills that will keep you alive when the time comes. But for the time being, do your best to resist the direction our civilization is heading towards and stick together with like-minded men. All civilizations may eventually collapse, but mankind will always fight to exist.

US Navy Has Surrendered To The Gender-Neutral Agenda By Abolishing Job Titles With “Man”

October 17, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The US Navy overturned 241 years of tradition recently when it officially abolished all job titles for enlisted personnel. The decision has turned out to be extremely unpopular, and by the time you’ve finished with this article, you’ll understand why. The change was ultimately ordered by Navy Secretary Ray Mabus, but the original idea came from the top enlisted man Master Chief Petty Officer Mike Stevens.

For those who don’t know, the US Navy uses descriptive titles to describe specific job functions: e.g., aviation ordnanceman, hospitalman, legalman, naval aircrewman, aircrew survival equipmentman, etc. The “problem” with these job titles is that many of them have the letters “man” in them. And that, of course, is deeply offensive to the guardians against political incorrect heresy. Therefore—in Secretary Mabus’s world—the job descriptions have to go. And just like that, 241 years of tradition are consigned to oblivion.

To those tempted to say, “So what?” or “What’s the big deal?,” I would remind them that these job titles are part of naval and maritime traditions that date back many centuries. Naval warships are their own self-contained world, and these job titles become part of each sailor’s identity. Tradition matters in this world—despite the fact that this is not understood by the pencil-necked geeks in Washington—and to tamper with it without any advance warning shows just how little respect the civilians who run the Navy really have for it.

And beyond that, it shows a deliberate attempt to erase masculinity from naval tradition.

Words matter, and they matter more than people think. Language is being used to elevate women at the expense of men in an area that has always been—and will continue to be—a masculine world. Mabus himself only served in the Navy for twenty-four months. He was also the Ambassador to Saudi Arabia. He authorized the naming of naval ships after gay rights leader Harvey Milk and US Congresswoman Gabrielle Giffords, neither of which were military heroes. It's difficult to imagine inspiring a sailor's fighting spirit being inspired by serving on a vessel named after either of these two people. Mabus, as I see it, has insufficient respect for naval tradition and never should have been made Secretary of the Navy.

Mabus actually named a naval ship after Gabrielle Giffords. She is neither a naval nor military hero, but someone who was shot by a lunatic Promoting "gender neutrality" has been a big focus of Mabus's tenure as Secretary, and he's made no secret about it. This change was announced quietly on September 29, and the reaction has been near-universal outrage and disgust. And justifiably so. Stevens—now safely retired with his own fat pension, of course—says he was supported fully by the top admirals.

Of course he was. Everyone at the top knows the way the political winds are blowing, and will not hesitate to throw their men and their traditions under the bus when it suits their own career advancement. It's an old story, about which more will be written when the United States loses its next major war. Until then, all we can do is stew in our rage. Sailors in the fleet feel angry and betrayed; a petition to reverse the decision was begun in early October and has already gained 66,000 signatures. Once that number rises to 100,000, the decision must be reviewed by the commander-in-chief.

The timing of the decision lends itself to speculation. This year is an election year, and Mabus is likely to be out of his current office no matter who wins in November. Why was this done now? Of course Mabus and the top brass have trotted out all the usual diplomatic palaver to explain their decision: it was done to help sailors "cross-train" and "improve their job performance" and even, incredibly, to "help them transition to civilian life." As if the point of the military is not to fight wars, but to prepare enlistees and officers for "civilian life." Unbelievable.

Mabus also tripled maternity leave for women in the Navy and Marines

But for the men who are affected by this decision—and make no mistake, it is men, not women, who fight wars—the message couldn't be clearer. That message is this: you don't matter. We don't value you. You exist as props for our social engineering agenda. But it doesn't just stop there. Despite all the bending of the rules of nature and biology, and despite all the legislation and game-rigging that has been going on for years now about the gender issue in the military, some people say that men still need to do more to help legislate themselves out of existence.

One recent LA Times article entitled "If We Really Want Women In Combat, Men Must Do More," writer John Spencer asserts that men still aren't doing enough to help women step on their heads and walk over them. Spencer at least is willing to acknowledge reality:

> All close combat units have high entry standards. Infantry troops, for example, have to be able to carry heavy weights on their backs over long distances. The physical and mental demands of close combat are extreme. The job is not for the average soldier. A year-long Marine Corps study found that all-male infantry units were faster, more lethal and able to evacuate wounded soldiers in less time than mixed-gender test groups. Simply put, the study found that the average man was stronger than the average woman.

Despite this, however, Spencer is unwilling to draw the necessary and logical conclusions. Instead, he retreats safely into the gender-neutral, politically-correct fantasy world of the US military in 2016. He sternly lectures us that > Because it's crucial to maintain the same physical standards for men and women in close combat assignments, the military should put into place long-term physical training programs to help women develop the abilities to meet those requirements.

So now men are supposed to "help women" overcome the limitations of their biology. And then we are treated to the boilerplate admonition that we as men must "step up," take the initiative, and participate in our own marginalization and obsolescence:

> The military must identify the best female candidates in high schools, colleges and military academies, sell them on the importance of their presence in the newly opened combat roles and get them proper training. Military men — husbands, bosses, coaches and friends — can help on all those counts.
> If men don't step up, we risk that so few women will apply for close combat jobs that their value will be little felt on the battlefield, or worse, that the women who are accepted will only just make the cut. That could confirm the biases of those who think that women never should have been on the battlefield in the first place.

I've always believed that the most dangerous forces operating against the modern man are the careerist delusions and willful treachery of other men. These men are all the same: they parrot and enforce the party line, and it's all done for reasons of narrow self-interest. And make no mistake: social engineering is fully underway, and it's being done quietly, in the hope that most people won't notice. But you can see it, if you know where and how to look.

To those pushing this gender-neutral agenda, nothing men do is ever good enough. More sacrifices by men always need to be made. More hand-holding of women always needs to be done. Of course, there is never any reciprocal obligation intoned on the part of women: that would be heresy. The modern women has no gender responsibilities, as any Western man of dating age quickly finds out. The needs of men are irrelevant.

The US military has not really fought a war of survival since the Second World War. All this social engineering nonsense, I have argued before in these pages, is a luxury of peace. It will go out the window once the first real fight comes along. That is, unless we're not so hollowed out and gender-neutralized that we can't even fight back against a determined enemy. And in the meantime, many people will die unnecessarily, and a great deal of money will be wasted in misguided efforts to change biology and human nature.

I was just reading this weekend, for example, that the US Marine Corps is going to be phasing out it's time-honored slogan "The Few, The Proud." Some may think this means nothing. But it does: it very much does. Wait till you see what they replace it with. I can only imagine. I'm sure it's going to be some gender-neutral, aseptic, chickenshit mantra.

Yet one day men will wake up and find that they've been marginalized right out of the military, the workforce, and almost everywhere else.

British Soccer Star Ched Evans Found Not Guilty Of Rape After Years Of Abuse From Feminists

October 17, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

British soccer player Ched Evans, having endured years of hell, has finally been exonerated of “rape.” Last Friday, following a dramatic retrial in Cardiff, a jury found the Welshman, who has represented his country 13 times at the elite level and another 17 times at junior level, not guilty. Convicted in 2012 after a hotel sexual encounter, he spent two and a half years in prison before being released in October 2014. A subsequent appeal earlier this year had quashed that same conviction.

Throughout this harrowing time, feminists led a vigilante-style campaign to strip Evans of any ability to earn a good income. When third-division club Sheffield United showed an interest and allowed him to train with their squad post-prison, the proverbial knives came out. British track and field athlete Jessica Ennis-Hill, for example, effectively tried to blackmail Sheffield United, threatening to have her name removed from a stand at their Bramall Lane stadium. Thankfully, the club issued a figurative “Who gives a fuck, sweetheart” by renaming the stand anyway. The furor nevertheless led to Evans being dropped.

Some positives emerged, though. Sheffield United’s co-chairman Jim Phipps was unequivocal about the extreme pressure placed on the club to ditch Evans. He described it as “mob-like behavior,” a frank account he should be commended for in such politically correct times. Countless other people, and not just diehard soccer fans, flooded social media and news story comments with messages of support for Evans. The “CNN effect” I first described a long time ago, whereby regular commentators are happy to buck the leftist line of many a media publication, was alive and well. No doubt that backing helped the Welshman through an incredibly sad period of his life.

Feminist anger is as hypocritical as it gets "Rules are meant to benefit women!"

The central gripe of feminists over Ched Evans' exoneration is that the Court of Appeal heard from two of the accuser's ex-lovers. Normally this is not allowed under British "rape shield" laws (a terrible euphemism that often only prevents rightful scrutiny of claims), but last year a decision of the Criminal Cases Review Commission (CCRC) triggered the appeal based on this new evidence. Both men's testimonies about their sexual experiences with the accuser were strikingly similar to the situation involving Evans.

What is far more appalling than an accuser's sexual history being evaluated at a trial is the use of "bad character" witnesses against an accused. You know, the person facing prison if found guilty. This is exactly what happened during the British prosecution of the now convicted Rolf Harris. While few in society shed any tears for the jailed Australian entertainer, what should have shocked everyone was the ability of women aside from the relevant accusers to testify at the trial that Harris sexually abused them. Plenty of other men at the mercy of British courts also find themselves railroaded by obscure sexual accusations that are not even related to the charges they face in court. It is nothing short of a legal travesty that this kind of circus is allowed to take place, no matter what crime one is accused of.

The British system is as broken as it gets—Evans' family had to get him justice

More people, just like Ched Evans' family, will have to resort to private investigators to clear their or their loved ones' names.

So how did the new evidence that helped exonerate Evans make its way to the authorities? His family had to hire private investigators. The double-edged sword of modern "justice" is that courts are too happy to convict men using an absolute paucity of evidence, bar the testimony of an accuser, and any chance of overturning that conviction routinely depends on you or loved ones finding the smoking gun. Ched Evans may not have been earning the salary of a Lionel Messi or Cristiano Ronaldo as a soccer player, but he is, dare I say it, one of the lucky ones. A truly Average Joe fighting for his innocence is going to spend himself into bankruptcy one hundred times over before an appeals court gives him the time of day.

Of course, feminists have accused Evans' fiancée, Natasha Massey, of "bribing" potential witnesses by offering £50,000 for information to clear his name. Both ex-lovers of the accuser, however, swore under oath that they were not motivated by money in coming forward. Considering that rape accusers can financially benefit from claiming or reporting alleged crimes, either from suing a man (think Bill Cosby) or parlaying their story into something else (think Emma Sulkowicz), criticism of Massey's offer is rather ironic. To boot, police themselves continually offer monetary rewards to help solve cases.

The farce of modern British justice is nothing new. Long-time readers of my work might remember Elizabeth Sandlin. Having successfully had her sexual partner convicted for biting her on the buttocks during rough sex, she was able to claim eternal victimhood, notwithstanding that the man was, in her own words, "blind drunk" and therefore unable to consent.

Ridiculously, Evans' accuser is still anonymous

Good on Natasha Massey for standing by her man.

Ched Evans' suffering provides another illustration of why letting accusers stay anonymous is a terrible idea. After all, men who are simply investigated (i.e. not charged) for rape frequently have no protection whatsoever against their names, faces, and other personal details being disseminated worldwide. Media interest, not common sense, is the arbiter in these cases. Even when a suspect or accused is not slandered nationally or internationally, local word of the "crime" soon gets out and that person finds themselves ostracized for life, not to mention denied a fair trial.

Let's hope that Ched Evans' legal suit to claw back £500,000 in lost earnings during his court attendances and prison time is successful. He deserves nothing less than this and a lifetime of shame for his accuser.

PODCAST: How To Become More Resilient

October 17, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In my second podcast, I describe the most common ways men get attacked by women, coworkers, strangers in public, or by an anonymous internet mob, along with tactics to defend against attacks. Next, I explain the differences between the strategies of anti-fragility and resiliency before recommending that you shoot for long-term resiliency as your personal goal. I then give a formula to increase your resiliency when it comes to your finances, physical safety, and mental strength. I also talk about the importance of creating a local self-defense network.

The Media Uses A Strategy Of Reporting On False Rape Accusations To Destroy Men

October 18, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

When a politician isn't behaving or going along with the elites' master plan, a coordinated and underhanded rape attack is the first line of offense. The Marxist media, being prostitutes of the elite power structure, specialize in this type of character assassination. Posing as the Fourth Estate while really acting as "for hire" attack dogs is how they make their livings and curry favor with those in the corporate-government complex. When called upon, they collectively aim at a target and commence with "drive by" attacks in 90 second news stories.

It's really quite easy to perform a character assassination on someone in a sexually repressed culture. Pick an emotional issue, like women being sexually assaulted in a culture that pedestalizes them, and then commence with endless attacks while ignoring Hillary's endless scandals. That's exactly what has happened with baseless accusations of sexual misconduct by Donald Trump, repeated and replayed ad nauseum in a last ditch effort to neutralize the threat to globalism posed by his candidacy.

The "Victims"

Who will win the biggest victim prize? Jessica Leeds is in the lead

Suddenly, a senior citizen named Jessica Leeds, a former stewardess, pops up out of nowhere and is emotionally distraught by a groping that supposedly happened 37 years ago. Except her claim is baseless. She claims Trump “raised an armrest” on a flight she worked then proceeded to grab her, but the first class seats on that flight did not have adjustable armrests.

Not only that, an eyewitness said Leeds was throwing herself at Trump, as women tend to do around rich men but that she got rejected. The press would hear none of that because it would deflate both their agenda and ratings, and it would cast holier than thou females in an unholy light. Eyewitness Anthony Gilberthorpe told the press:

> I have only met this accuser once and frankly cannot imagine why she is seeking to make out that Trump made sexual advances on her. Not only did he not do so (and I was present at all times) but it was she that was the one being flirtatious.

It seems the pain of that rejection led her to make up a false story.

Why do the marionettes in the media dig up these old hags and baseless sexual harassment claims? Because it works in a culture in which women can do no wrong. The media even pulled a sexual harassment character assassination attempt back in 2008 with the old battle horse John McCain.

Here’s how they did it. The New York Times did a hit piece featuring Vicki Iseman accusing John McCain of sexual conduct. Here’s the kicker: The New York Times later settled a libel suit brought on by Iseman after the campaign had ended. This is how big media and big politics operate.

The veracity of the claims matter little to a gaggle of “journalists” who would slit someone’s throat for a scoop. Similar to the documented practice of some fireman to set fires to keep their jobs, the media create scandals to gin up ratings and dehumanize those not going by the New World Order playbook.

Predictably, once one woman gets the ball rolling, a dogpile of victims ensues in a culture that lionizes victims instead of winners.

The victim parade continues with Mindy McGillivray

Mindy McGilliavray came out and told the press Trump “nudged” her. She told the fellow travelers in the media:

> All of a sudden I felt a grab, a little nudge. I think it’s Ken’s camera bag, that was my first instinct. I turn around and there’s Donald. He sort of looked away quickly. I quickly turned back, facing Ray Charles, and I’m stunned. This was a pretty good nudge. More of a grab. It was pretty close to the center of my butt. I was startled. I jumped.

Hey, kino works that way, especially for billionaires. That’s assuming it’s true. It’s funny that instead of confronting The Donald immediately she waited 13 years to bring it up.

Kristen Anderson claimed Trump grabbed her vagina.

Apprentice contestant Summer Zervos claims Trump harassed her, even though she kept in contact with him and even sought out Donald’s help with her business. If she was emotionally scarred by Trump, why would she continue to associate herself with him?

A race is on to see who can turn being the worst “victim” into being the biggest winner of notoriety and 15 minutes of fame.

Obama proposed the return of Pravda last week

An old saying, common amongst jaded idealists when I worked in this soulless industry known as mass media was never let the facts get in the way of a good story. Believe it. That’s how the industry operates. No scandals, no ratings, no job. Bias is also clearly an issue since 96% of campaign donations from journalists have gone to the Hillary campaign, as reported by NewsBusters.

The Gateway Pundit knows their conniving modis operandi well.

> The media clearly did not fact check these stories. They ran the stories no matter how farfetched they were. It is clear from the number of stories dropped in the last week that this was a coordinated effort, probably from inside the Hillary Clinton campaign. The goal was not to present facts to the public. Their goal was to destroy Donald Trump.

These pseudo scandals could have raged on unendingly in the past, except the Internet is now exposing most journalists as the frauds they are. But don't think the elite are content to let us talk amongst ourselves and figure out the ruse. Just last week President Obama foreshadowed the coming censorship that's sure to be implemented once The Bitch begins her reign of terror.

> We are going to have to rebuild within this wild-wild-west-of-information flow some sort of curating function that people agree to. There has to be, I think, some sort of way in which we can sort through information that passes some basic truthiness tests and those that we have to discard, because they just don't have any basis in anything that's actually happening in the world.

Translation: Anything written that's not approved of by the elite is not the "truth" according to Obama.

The Democrat Socialists now want government imposed "truth tests" will tell us what to believe and what not to believe on the Internet, and later to vet what gets published and what doesn't in a supposedly free society. We are fucked as a society if the sheeple let this happen.

It's only because of the Internet the truth is now known about this thinly veiled attempt to destroy Donald Trump's chances of winning the election. If we lose the Internet, we lose free speech. Moreover, any man accused of "rape" by Big Media is almost certainly a person the power structure wants to silence for political reasons and to maintain the power structure's lock grip on the national narrative. Trump is only their latest target, but he certainly won't be the last.

6 Dating Sites I Used To Meet Women (2016 Edition)

October 18, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Online dating, while it's still controversial in terms of being a legitimate and proper way to meet people, is here to stay. The best theory I have heard for it is the "three poles in the pond" theory where you meet women in bars, online, and everywhere else as your three hooks to catch women. Return Of Kings writers come in all flavors, and you'll not get game advice from me (recommend you check out Troy, Donovan, Jon, and Roosh himself for that) but, as I am winding down a stint on many of the dating websites, here's some advice on six of the popular ones.

E Harmony

One of the original online dating sites, E Harmony is purely pay to play; you're either subscribed or you're not. The service benefits from its reputation as one of the oldest and most serious sites, so, theoretically, you'd find older, more set-up women looking for something serious.

E Harmony has their vaunted matching system as their main thing; expect to spend about 2 hours filling out their profile, and the reason is that their matches should match you better than other sites. This is important because the ONLY girls you will see are the ones they send you. This is the only online dating service (other than Tinder, which is simply an app) that will not let you search on your own.

This was, for a while, a good thing. Remember, women would only get a certain amount of matches too, so it put a little bit of the brakes on the hypergamous meat market women enjoy on most dating sites. However, E Harmony pulled a bullshit move last year, and they removed the “active within” feature from people’s profiles.

Ostensibly to prevent online stalking (so a customer service rep told me), it also conveniently removes the only direct indicator of whether the match you were sent was of a girl who had an active subscription or was a ghost who had stopped their subscription months or years ago. You then had to look for activity like a girl changing her profile or pictures, or viewing your profile to determine if she was active or not.

I don’t recommend this one anymore, and I’m not sure I ever did. I suppose it’s worth the discounted rate of 8 bucks a month they beg people to come back with, but new people are hit for over 30 a month. The typical girl you will see on here is an about to hit the wall or just did career girl who is slightly overweight and got frustrated and unsubscribed two months ago.

Match.com

Match is the other mainstream pay dating site, and is probably the most popular of them. They've got the E Harmony style match system, and all sorts of searches you can do. There's about 9 terms for female body type (6 mean fat) and you can search by them and anything else you want. If I want pale redheaded Presbyterians with graduate degrees within 50 miles of me, I'll find all one of them, but that degree of precision is available.

Match is a pay site for anything serious, like emailing, but they let people make profiles for free, which leads to a lot of spam profiles that are fairly easy to discern early on in your time there. That being said, if you want to pay for an online dating site, I'd choose this one, and make sure you don't have a recurring subscription.

The typical match.com girl is a few years younger than the E Harmony girl, still pre-wall, but probably ugly or overweight, and out of college and in the first years of her power-career path. Search by body type (you want thin and athletic only) and be prepared to go to local big cities if you don't live in one.

Ok Cupid

Here there be crazy. OKC is a site populated by people who are younger, freakier, and have way more crazy shit going on in their lives than any of the other sites I'll cover. Mostly a free site, but with an A List upgrade that will let you see who "likes" you and sort by body type and "attractiveness," this one has the crazies.

If you want a two-spirited, pansexual satanist with blue hair, 50% or greater tattoo skin coverage, and more hardware in her piercings than the bolt aisle at Home Depot, this is the place for you. They have a beleaguered match function, but most everything is done by manual searching and a bunch of insipid, but weirdly creative while wildly inappropriate questions. Although, "if your partner missed and hit the wrong hole, would you go with it?" might be useful.

The Ok Cupid girl is in her young 20s and would be attractive if she hadn't mutilated herself. She usually doesn't still live at home with her folks, but she doesn't really have a place either, yet; a shady apartment in the hood is the best you can get. Her profile reads like the bearings on her hamster wheel are about ready to fail, and, although many of them have a kid or two, there's no "my children come first," it's more of an "oh yeah, I had a kid."

Maybe not THIS crazy, but close.

A side effect of this being a popular, freaky, free site is the international spam. I got more visits from chicks from every Asian country except China and their Great Firewall than I ever did Americans. Use this site if you want to bag some freaky, and consider putting your Johnson in a vacuum sealer first.

Christian Mingle

Christian Mingle is the polar opposite of OK Cupid. It's a pay site, only a pay site, and only for Christians and those who identify as one (which is not the same thing at all.) Powered by a clunky web design that looks like it came from the late 90s, Christian Mingle is a low-activity place of so-called Christians that, oddly enough, are on the other dating sites as well.

A disclaimer is in order; while I, myself, was on these sites as well, I used the same pictures and close to the same profile. I saw a good amount of girls that had enough of the same pictures to clue me in that they were the same person, but had a lot of others tailored to the site, and their profiles were very different as well. Smart marketing or hypocrisy, you decide.

Most dating websites allowed me to pony up the fee for the subscription or the upgrade, then cancel the recurring payment, and ride out my months worry free that I did not have to remember to cancel it. Not Christian Mingle; the second I turned off the recurring payments, they shut me down till I turned it back on, and I finally cancelled them the day my subscription was set to renew. Not very Christian of them.

The typical Christian Mingle girl is mid twenties to 30 and had the pre-Wall epiphany that men do not marry skanks, so she better get busy making sure she is not seen as one. The ugly and overweight ones are probably honest about not having been with many dudes, but, if any hot ones try that, they are probably “reformed” Christians that did a lot of this, unless they appear so awkward they are obviously repressed snake-handling Pentecostals.

I don’t recommend this site, or any other “flavor” online dating website like Farmers Only, Our Time, JDate, or Black People Meet simply due to lack of numbers, and the same people will be a subset on the mainstream ones.

Plenty of Fish

POF is where everyone else ends up. It’s the biggest online dating site, and the upgrade package is nice but not necessary, so it’s the standard place to have an online presence for girls where they can at least pretend to be looking for something serious (as opposed to Tinder.)

The Pareto Principle aspect of the sexes is on full display here. The top 80% of girls, and, believe me, the lower parts of that range down at 30% or so are some serious 4s have standards higher than Cheech Marin, are only going for men with everything. This leads to some odd collisions of reality, where a mid-20's chunky girl with a receptionist job is turning down a career man with a decent physique as she is sure she can do better.

POF is mainly a search on your own site, along with a token match system called Meet Me, but there is a large forum community as well, of which I haven't partaken and see no reason why you should, either.

The typical plenty of fish girl, at least here in the Midwest, is a large white girl with a low paying job in some half-horse town that may or may not have children with someone to whom she was never married. Tattoos a given, piercings somewhat, not so much on the blue hair. If you want to slap together a decent profile, you should do it for the laughs, but you're looking for diamonds in sludge here.

Tinder

Everyone knows Tinder, and it’s so simple I won’t comment too much on it. There are a few things I learned that I can give you.

Location really matters. Out here in the corn/rust belt Midwest, the girls are either like the worst of POF above, or obviously bots with exotic names, perfect pictures, and no profile. You swipe right on the latter, it will be an instant match, a message following 30 seconds later with a lewd suggestion and enticement to come to this site they link, or a burner phone number to text, and then you get unmatched and the tracks erased about ten minutes later after they figure out you’re not biting.

At least it’s better than what it was a year ago, when the spambots actually worked on the Tinder chat channels. Every girl was bored, on her day off, and about to open a bottle of wine before going to meet her friends later at a generic restaurant-sounding name that the programmer desperately wanted you to believe was in your town.

Age matters. I’m 36, and, although I can set my standards from 25-30, that’s not who I am going to get sent. Every girl is mid 30s to 50, and either has kids, or looks heavily pregnant but is just obese.

Attention span matters. You have about two or so chat exchanges to get her number, then you need to set up a get together soonest. Also, you have to strike the balance between committer and bad boy that the girl who is there for a relationship but realizes she has to put out first, which is all of them, wants.

It’s a hookup app, and it’s free. There’s tons of guides on how to make your picture and profile, if you want another method of easy lays, go for it.

Conclusion

Everything in the world is becoming dumbed-down and more stupid, from elementary education to driving, and online dating is no exception. The traditional sites are slowly dying as people move from accessing websites from their home computer to running apps off their phones, and the rise of Tinder follows right along. Run it, POF if you want a free site, and Match if you want to pay, but don’t make it your only way to meet girls in any case.

How The FBI Infiltrates Movements—And What You Can Do To Stop Them

October 18, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A handful of government employees have told me that I'm almost certainly on a FBI "watchlist." While I have no conclusive evidence to prove that, a look into the FBI's history concerning COINTELPRO suggests that we should assume a minimal level of surveillance is occurring.

The FBI's shady past

COINTELPRO, short for Counter Intelligence Program, was an FBI program to surveil, infiltrate, and actively subvert organizations that could threaten government policy or power. They have targeted anti-war protesters, Civil Rights groups, and environmentalists by placing agents within theirs ranks to feed back information to the FBI or actively work to entrap its members into committing illegal acts. Often times, FBI actions led directly to beatings and assassinations.

The COINTELPRO program was exposed in the 1970's and said to have been dissolved, but its methods clearly continue today, as shown by recent publicized examples of FBI subversion.

The first case involves a human rights organization founded by a priest who aimed to close the U.S. Army School Of The Americas, a military camp for "revolutionaries" whose goal was to train soldiers to overthrow Latin American governments the USA didn't like. They were infiltrated by the FBI and surveilled for over a decade.

> Despite no incidents of violence over the multi-year period of the gatherings, the FBI justified its activities by claiming that other groups, such as anarchists, could join SOA Watch events and cause problems.
> Every year they acknowledge that it's peaceful and just about every year they have some type of alarmist warning that 'While it's peaceful, you never know when something will turn unpeaceful.

Recently in Texas, the FBI infiltrated a group protesting the construction of a pipeline based on environmental grounds. No illegal acts were committed by the group to warrant FBI attention.

> Between November 2012 and June 2014, the documents show, the FBI collated inside knowledge about forthcoming protests, documented the identities of individuals photographing oil-related infrastructure, scrutinised police intelligence and cultivated at least one informant.

Also in Texas, a left-wing group was infiltrated by an FBI informant who insisted that the group become violent in response to the Republican scourge. Once he convinced members to make Molotov cocktails, the FBI stormed in and made arrests.

> The film makes a compelling case that [FBI asset] Darby, with the FBI's blessing, used his charisma and street credibility to goad Crowder and McKay into pursuing the sort of actions that would later land them in prison.

Lastly, the FBI infiltrated middle-aged peace activists and filed trumped-up charges of them providing "assistance" to terrorists. The bogus charges were eventually dropped.

> The FBI first became interested in Tom and his fellow travelers on the eve of the 2008 Republican National Convention in Saint Paul, Minnesota, when the bureau that purports to keep America safe sent an undercover agent who went by the name "Karen Sullivan" to infiltrate the Twin Cities Anti-War Committee, one of the most prominent groups organizing protests outside the convention.
> "I remember a woman who was really eager," Tom told me. "She kept bringing up how eager she was about revolution. And you know, on the one hand, people > think it's good because we really need to change society, so it's a fine thing to talk about. On the other hand, she was trying to find people she could manipulate into [committing] a crime."

Is The FBI stopping terror or creating it?

The FBI is also known for recruiting mentally unstable individuals to commit terror acts, helping them develop illegal plots, and then arresting them at the last minute. Afterwards, the agency can brag that they "stopped terrorism" through their "sting" operations when it was they themselves who acted as a terrorist organization by creating the plan and assisting the terrorists to completing it.

> Nearly all of the highest-profile domestic terrorism plots in the United States since 9/11 featured the "direct involvement" of government agents or informants, a new report says.
> Some of the controversial "sting" operations "were proposed or led by informants", bordering on entrapment by law enforcement. Yet the courtroom obstacles to proving entrapment are significant, one of the reasons the stings persist.

I would not be surprised to one day learn that the FBI allowed terrorist patsies to complete their FBI-inspired plans in order to create a crisis which allows for the government to pass unfavorable policy. For example, imagine if the FBI allowed a patsy to proceed with a plan right before a Presidential election, with the goal to aid the incumbent party in power.

The FBI will commit illegal acts to take groups down

While I have no hard evidence to show that the FBI or other alphabet agency is watching us, it's hard to believe that our activities have not at least been brought up on agent desks. Here's what we know about FBI activities in only the past 15 years:

- They have infiltrated non-violent and legal organizations that are not slavishly pro-government.
- Their covert agents actively steer individuals and groups into committing illegal acts or "starting revolution."
- They are legally allowed to entrap members of a group with the goal of obtaining criminal convictions.
- They can bring up fake charges against the group to discredit, demoralize, and disband them.

There is nothing to indicate that the FBI has stopped the above activities, and if anything, they have likely increased them against right-wing patriot groups. I do believe that if the February 2016 cancelled meetups took place, many of them would have been attended by FBI agents to at least gather information on our group. The fact that we don't advocate for illegal activity does not mean the FBI won't spend considerable manpower to surveil us, especially when you consider that subverted groups in the above cases received much less media exposure than us.

10 behavioral traits of an FBI infiltrator

Indymedia has done the task of analyzing past FBI infiltrations to create a behavioral profile of a typical agent or asset. It's important to state that local police departments can also act as infiltrators by pretending that they are some of sort of elite FBI squad.

1. Agents may have a big bankroll to provide immediate value to the group. Sort of like the "big baller troll" that pops up on the forum, agents use money or fantastical backstories to impress targets, who also don't mind the fact that the agent picks up the tab most of the time.

2. They encourage violent and illegal actions. This is the biggest tell that you're dealing with an agent. Victory for the FBI is for members of the target group to agree to an illegal crime. You'll be busted right before you intend to carry it out.

3. Their past is a mystery. Agents can't properly explain details of their childhood, university years, or past employment. They get agitated when you ask basic question about their past.

4. They have fake lodgings. The apartment they show you is a shell rental that may not even have towels or soap. They also don't have family photos or nostalgic mementos.

5. They're nosy about criminal activities you've done in the past. They want you to admit to illegal deeds on tape.

6. They steer group members into tackling unrelated missions. Agents try to sabotage the group by distracting them with weird projects and goals.

7. They are insistent about "fighting the man." They'll keep saying that we need to "fight back" and "stick it to them." They've very heavy on promoting revolutionary-inspired actions.

8. They will shame you as weak for not doing what they want. If you decide that an agent's idea to plant a bomb somewhere is crazy, he'll say you are not man enough to "do what it takes."

9. They inject a lot of drama into the group. They amplify existing interpersonal problems between members in an effort to weaken the group.

10. They have inconsistent or underdeveloped beliefs. To gain access to your group, they crammed what was available online. They will parrot community beliefs without understanding the meaning or intent behind them.

The agent won't give up after the group fails to perform the illegal action he suggested. He'll keep persisting until he satisfies his FBI bosses and criminal charges can be brought up. You will have to deliberately exclude the agent from your group. This may involve having to expose him publicly or file a restraining order against him.

Conclusion

The information above will help safeguard you from human intelligence (HUMINT) gathering by the FBI and other law enforcement agencies, but it does not protect against agent hacking or electronic spying. For that you will need operational security (OPSEC), which is a more technical game. A good first step is to secure communications with other group members.

While we can't completely prevent infiltration of agents without an expensive counter-intelligence apparatus of our own, we can eject those from our community who display infiltrator behavioral traits. If you meet someone through one of my web sites who displays a couple of them, especially with talk about getting violent, it's a near certainty that that person is an agent who is trying to entrap you.

I hope that we aren't targeted by the FBI through one of their COINTELPRO methods, but at the minimum, our existence has been discussed in government agencies. Their infiltration still wouldn't change the fact that our ideas have merit and are part of an anti-establishment wave that is only growing in influence.

Modern Classical Music Is Dead

October 18, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Modern classical music is like modern art. One big garbled mess. There is no discernible structure, and, lacking any sort of rhythm or melody, one piece is indistinguishable from the next.

This past weekend my ears were forced to endure the 40 minute premiere of a symphony penned by a millennial hipster, prior to the Beethoven concert I planned to hear. It was like every other modern classical piece I have heard: an aural assault of dissonant noises, repetitive sounds, and unnatural rhythms. As I suffered through this piece, longing for the end, I reflected on the similarities between modern classical music and modern culture.

Disposable Pop Culture

When one mentions Beethoven, you likely hear the melody of Beethoven's 5th, or perhaps Moonlight Sonata playing in your head. Mozart evokes the tones of the Marriage of Figaro. Tchaikovsky will surely recall some melodies from the Nutcracker. Richard Wagner will likely trigger some Flight of the Valkyries.

I've never heard a modern dissonant classical piece that I could remember anything from the next day, nor compare to any other. They are completely forgettable, lacking any melody or chorus. This is why it is difficult to find recordings of any of these pieces even 10 years after they are released. Indeed it was difficult to even find many examples on youtube, as no one bothers to even record the performances (and trust me, the examples here are relative masterpieces compared to the modern pieces I've suffered through).

Ugliness is Venerated

Modern culture tells us that short skrillex haircuts, defiling the body with metal shrapnel and inked graffiti, and massive, revolting body fat is "beautiful." This message is so successful, that today, in the west, it is extremely difficult to find a female below the age of 25 who has not purposefully destroyed her physical beauty in multiple ways.

As this worship of ugliness has marginalized natural beauty, likewise, modern classical music teaches us that dissonant chords, out-of-key incongruous sounds, and loud, harsh noises are pleasant and desirable. Gone are the naturally pleasing chords and intonations which music theory teaches are good. Listening to a modern classical piece is truly like watching the Emperor parade around in his new clothes.

Repetition Trumps Creativity

Much as feminists do little more than repeat meaningless phrases like “Rapists cause rape” and “Still not asking for it” or having Trigglypuff breakdowns at public forums instead of having a thoughtful discussion, modern classical music replaces creativity and musical complexity with repetition.

In the piece I heard this weekend, much as in the piece below, the same chord was repeated at least 50 times before another instrument joined in. One may assume this is because it’s so daring and shocking to keep the audience guessing when he’s going to change and play something else. Surely he won’t continue the same chord for another 10 seconds. But then he does! How rebellious and avant garde!

Rules Are Broken Simply Because They Exist

The Circle of Fifths – outdated once we invented the third gender

The western system of music divides sounds into 12 tones, with a subset of 7 of these tones being related in a specific way known as a “key” (eight counting the octave, which is double the frequency of the first note). The notes are mathematically derived, based on the number of vibrations per second of a tone, and applying a ratio to obtain other tones that are both arithmetically related and aurally pleasing.

Note	Frequency	Harmonic	Diagram of vibrating string low low low A	$f = 55$ Hz	fundamental low low A	$f = 110$ Hz	second	1/2
low E	$f = 165$ Hz	third	1/3
low A	$f = 220$ Hz	fourth	1/4
middle $C^{#}$	$f = 275$ Hz	fifth	1/5
middle E	$f = 330$ Hz	sixth	1/6
approx. middle G	$f = 385$ Hz	seventh	M
middle A	$f = 440$ Hz	eighth

Mathematical derivation of the 8 tones in a key

Typically, before beginning to play, the orchestra musicians will all tune their instruments to a middle “A4” note of 440 cycles per second. Avant garde modern music does away with all of this, allowing all 12 tones to be used at any time, essentially doing away with the idea of a musical piece having a key. Notes which are 1/5 away (for example from C to G) have a naturally pleasant sound, and mathematically there is a relationship of 3/2 the frequency of the original note to its fifth.

Fractions perfectly describe the relationship of each of the notes in a key to each other, and this system of music developed in most cultures throughout the world, whether they understood the mathematic principles behind it or not. There are physiological reasons that certain frequencies are harmonious to the human ear. When notes are played which are not strongly mathematically related, they have a harsh, dissonant sound. In fact, music theory describes these as being “unresolved” or “anticipatory” sounds, and can be used to help build up to a grand climax of harmonies. The problem with modern musical pieces is that the entire symphony is one 40 minute assault of dissonant sounds. It’s like listening to a 40 minute standup routine with no punchlines.

Why are we wearing this? Just ‘Cause.

Of course, we see the cultural counterpart to this all the time. While there is a biological basis for some natural level of homosexuality, the large numbers of deviant lifestyles today, including bisexual, pansexual, or any of the other 49 flavors of crazy are nothing more than emotional outbursts of troubled minds who know of no better way to express their frustration than to shun the norms and mores of their culture.

Being a tranny shouldn’t be a lifestyle choice. It should be something done privately in the extremely rare case of severe sexual birth defect or gross medical error, and perhaps for the sake of comedy, at Halloween, or as in Monty Python skits, or Chris Farley working at the Gap. No one can truly want a livestock ring placed in their snout. This is clearly a case of rebelling for the sake of rebellion. And yet I see both trannies and livestock implements in millennials on a weekly basis.

Conveys a Message of Unhappiness and Discord

Beautiful classical music can be inspiring, emotional, thoughtful, and powerful. The message behind many modern classical pieces is one of unhappiness, chaos, conflict and discord. And the main problem is that these are not themes that the music touches briefly upon; instead the composer assaults the audience with nothing but harsh, aggressive, chaotic tones for the duration of the piece. It's the musical equivalent of watching a horror movie full of nothing but the scary scenes, with all dialogue and plot devices removed.

With SJWs and feminists, we can see that they are clearly unhappy and emotionally unstable. They could take a few easy steps towards being more attractive, desirable and happy, but instead choose to live out miserable lives mutilating their bodies and defiling their spirit.

Artistic License

Now, some will say there are no rules to creativity, and that is partially true. An artist should be free to try whatever he wants; however, Stephen King knows that putting random words down on a sheet of paper, just because it breaks the rules of grammar and the precedent of all of literature, will not make for good storytelling. Indeed, one of my favorite pieces, Aaron Copland's Appalachian Spring, is modern, breaks many traditional musical rules, and incorporates dissonance, but is also full of beautiful melodies and harmonies.

Artists should be free to experiment. But just as no one is going to be wearing the above jacket any time soon, humans the world over have shown a distaste towards discordant sounds, lack of melodies, and harsh noises which defy the laws of basic music theory and mathematic tonality. Experimenting with different techniques is great, but writing an entire symphony that sounds like unsupervised children banging pots and pans for 40 minutes straight is not creative, is not beautiful, and is not artistic.

Why Do We Have Music?

The purpose of music is to relax, to express our emotions and our humanity. Perhaps the authors of these pieces are so broken and distorted inside that they have nothing to say but the musical equivalent of feminist screaming, but the musical establishment should not be supporting and condoning these works. Music is a record of our culture and our civilization, and while perhaps modern composers are being honest by musically describing the world as a disarray of ugly and disturbing tones, we should strive for something higher. Modern classical music is yet another piece of the mass ugliness that our culture presents in art, architecture, literature, culture, fashion, and design.

Today’s Mainstream Conservatives Only Serve The Globalist Establishment

October 19, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Not so different

Earlier I had some pretty harsh words about the liberal establishment. This concerned both the big shots and all the toadies helping them run the show. (Indeed, it’s quite a clever scam. So many caring, idealistic people think they’re fighting for social justice, when they’re really helping corrupt globalist plutocrats consolidate their power.) For that matter, many of their revered “heroes” aren’t all that and a bag of chips.

So how does establishment conservatism fare? At best, they stand for slowing the decline—sort of like driving toward a cliff at 40 MPH rather than 60 MPH. At worst, they give false hopes to the public that they’ll do something effective. The government is supposed to work for the people, but the influence of big money is a major problem: deep-pockets donors, big business lobbyists, and foreign powers.

How conservatism changed

As early as 1968, George Wallace famously said, “There’s not a dime’s worth of difference between the Republicans and Democrats.” It wasn’t always like this. Many conservatives in times past—including Wallace—were a different breed from most of today’s variety. Some never compromised their principles. Pat Buchanan is still out there. Joseph Sobran and Sam Francis are gone but not forgotten. Ron Paul takes a different angle, but is honest and principled. The Republican leadership is certainly not interested in promoting anyone like them, no matter how much they resonate with the grassroots.

In the 1970s, the neoconservatives—former liberals (though not always very former)—came onto the scene. Although they were lightweights ideologically, they were welcomed into the Republican party. Eventually these entryists started calling the shots, taking it upon themselves to tell conservatives how to be conservative. By the 1990s, this effectively neutered conservatism. Neocons like globalism, and they like spit-in-your-eye wars (many are in bed with the military-industrial complex, and others with foreign powers who like our soldiers doing their fighting), but they’re not much help defending our civilization from cultural Marxism and population replacement policies. Today, we speak of RINOs—Republicans In Name Only. The unkind name is cuckservatives.

The Republican platform used to be approximately the following:

1. Opposition to Communism
2. Traditional values and rejection of policies detrimental to the majority
3. Economic policies

In the early 1990s, the first two broad planks disappeared. The only places Communism is taken very seriously any more are Cuba and many faculty departments. As for item 2, it became taboo to discuss many of these matters very openly. Cultural Marxism was still very much alive—basically a religion by then—bringing us political correctness. Conservatives failed to properly assert themselves then, which the neocon faction wasn’t interested in doing, and now opposition is needed more than ever. So all that’s left over is item 3. Middle America likes low taxes, but globalist policies favoring big business are uninspiring.

Since then, the Republican Party isn't the answer; it's just the lesser of two evils. If you want your country to remain basically the same as the one you grew up in, no mainstream Republican politician is going to do anything effective. The situation is absurd. Many rhinestone conservatives even sink to virtue signaling: for instance, "Why, no, I'm not an extremist, unlike this other guy to my right." The only reason the Republican voter base puts up with these shenanigans is because they have nowhere else to turn.

The controlled opposition

No matter who you vote for, you get the same thing.

Joe Sixpack might imagine, "Boy howdy, when my party comes into power, then they're going to clean house and everything's going to be okay." When it comes to pass, things turn out to be business as usual. Still, the Blue Pill public keeps falling for the scam. The Republicans are basically a soothing salve, giving false hopes that they'll reverse the decline and stop cultural Marxism.

Although conservatism is the opposition to liberalism, in practice they don't really diverge too much. Politicians argue with each other quite a bit, but even when one party gets the Presidency and controls both houses of Congress, major policy changes are rare. When the Republicans are in power, they don't do anything about immigration, welfare, abortion, or affirmative action and set-asides. Likewise, when the Democrats are in power, they don't stop fighting spit-in-your-eye wars, much less go after the military-industrial complex. Today, the Democrats and Republicans are effectively the left and right wing of the globalist agenda.

The Democrats—formerly the working man's party—support open borders. They've also supported globalist trade deals (such as NAFTA, GATT, most favored nation status for China, and the Trans-Pacific Partnership), They serve the ones who matter: wealthy interests holding their purse strings. Ironically, the Democrats appeal to the common people (the disadvantaged, as some put it) but their policies aren't really doing much for the masses, other than promising more handouts. For example, they used to have a large voter bloc of organized labor. However, the Democratic leadership doesn't have to worry about appealing to unionized factory workers any more, because most of them had their jobs shipped overseas, and now in their own country they have to compete with all the cheap labor imported from the Third World.

The Republicans are basically the controlled opposition. They put on a good show for their voters, but aren't allowed to veer too far away from the globalist agenda, as this would displease the masters holding their own purse strings. Their grassroots base is with middle Americans who value independence, smaller government, and traditional values, but the party isn't looking out for them either.

Why things don't change

Sometimes politicians have trouble remembering who they're supposed to work for.

In the USA, it's extremely hard for a third party candidate or an independent to get elected even to a Congressional seat. As for the Presidency, it's practically impossible. Ross Perot had a decent chance in 1992 until he made a series of missteps. Still, his 18.9% popular vote was the best return from a third party candidate since Theodore Roosevelt's 1912 run under the Progressive Party ticket.

One reason for this is the Electoral College. The majority results for each state determines all the state's electors, with the exception of Nebraska and Maine. That, and the nonexistence of runoff elections if nobody achieves 50%, is a very high bar to cross. Citizens often have to vote for the "lesser of two evils" rather than someone they really like.

Also, most voters are attached to one party or another; the real contest is for the much smaller fraction of uncommitted voters. If either party went too far from the center, it would appeal to the grassroots but turn off the uncommitted public. Half of the electorate doesn't vote, either from apathy or cynicism, so they're actually a huge, untapped reserve.

The final reason is the influence of big money from corporate interests, wealthy contributors, and foreign powers, as I've mentioned. The one who pays the piper, calls the tune. It's effectively a legal form of bribery.

Effectively, the voters basically have a Coke versus Pepsi choice between the Stupid Party and the Evil Party. Many other countries have parliamentary systems with three viable parties, often two will work together to form a coalition. The differences are mostly superficial, and parties with real differences have a great deal of trouble gaining any traction.

Managed democracy

The citizens of democratic countries will pride themselves on their freedom and openness. Still, there are other factors beyond the nominal political system in determining how free the country really is. Whether or not the government truly represents the will of the people is a big one. (Media bias is another factor, and we've covered the presstitutes here before.) If a group of oligarchs happen to be heavyweight contributors to all major parties as well as having the media in their back pocket, that's managed democracy.

In the USA, there are two major parties, and 90% of the media is owned by six mega-conglomerates, making things quite convenient for them. So you have two parties, and both are working for the oligarchs, not for you. What a choice! This makes the President—the "leader of the free world"—more or less a figurehead. The Democrats and Republicans do play to win. Still, they're not working for their party grassroots, but rather those who fill their coffers. For both parties, these happen to be largely the same people.

Each party's leadership certainly plays favorites. The leaked DNC emails show that they were in favor of Hillary, confirming what Sanders supporters suspected all along. As it happens, the Powers That Be don't like people peering behind the curtain. Someone thought to be the source of those leaked DNC emails was murdered; make of it what you will.

One particularly telling gem was from one of the DNC emails, by Bill Ivey to John Podesta concerning the Trump phenomenon. Res ipse loquitur:

> And as I've mentioned, we've all been quite content to demean government, drop civics and in general conspire to produce an unaware and compliant citizenry. The unawareness remains strong but compliance is obviously fading rapidly. This problem demands some serious, serious thinking—and not just poll driven, demographically-inspired messaging.

Just when you thought you'd heard it all, right? With this kind of attitude, our "kingmakers" might as well just drop their pants and moon the peasants on national TV. It amazes me that the public puts up with this kind of crap. Maybe it's because they're so unaware and compliant? This is the problem that demands serious thought on fixing.

The Trump factor

The Republican leadership doesn't want their leading candidate to win.

The Republican leadership was unable to contain their disfavored candidate, unlike the way they handled Pat Buchanan in earlier times. They've been going berserk about that, furiously trying to sabotage their own candidate. In Trump's favor are two things: he's rich enough so he can't be bought off, and the people are behind him unlike the tepid cuckservatives who were running against him in the primary election. The slogan "lose with Cruz" would be a lot funnier if the future weren't on the line.

Will Trump deliver? Time will tell, hopefully. At this point, I'll be cautiously optimistic. I'll take him over Hillary any day. The way I see it, if we're going to be ruled by billionaires, it might as well be by a sensible one.

7 Wikileaks Revelations About Hillary Clinton That The Media Is Completely Ignoring

October 19, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The recent Wikileaks revelations about the Clintons, the Clinton campaign, media collusion, and the various hypocrisies of the Democratic Party are groundbreaking in both their scope and depth. The sheer number of hacked emails covering so many topics, combined with the shadiness of the activities involved, should have already handed Donald Trump the election.

Alas, the media, whose collusion with the Clinton campaign is laid out in many of the emails, will not have a bar of reporting them in a professional, ethical fashion. The following seven email exchanges have either been deliberately suppressed by mainstream outlets or given the slimmest coverage to feebly ward off accusations that they are in the de facto service (or pocket) of Hillary Clinton.

1. “Women’s advocate” Hillary Clinton admits that Saudi Arabia and Qatar fund ISIS, but refuses to rebuke them for it

Hillary Clinton and them Saudis.

After rounding on Donald Trump for very tamely calling former Miss Universe Alicia Machado "Miss Piggy," one might think that Hillary Clinton has the interests of women at heart. Her admission that Saudi Arabia and Qatar fund female-enslaving ISIS tells another story. It is impossible to see that Trump has anything to answer for regarding women as is, not to mention when his record is contrasted with Hillary's enabling of Saudi and Qatari behavior.

Saudi Arabia and Qatar practice their own intense forms of oppression against women and the Clinton email means that she is only too aware that they are exporting this oppression by financially backing ISIS. As will be explored below, the Clintons are arguably beholden to the Saudis and Qataris, who have given very large donations to the Clinton Foundation.

Meanwhile, what of the massive arms sales and other military support given to the Saudis and Gulf States? Why help arm those states which are funding ISIS?

2. John Podesta owned 75,000 shares in a Putin-linked company, despite he and Clinton criticizing the Trump campaign for its Russian connections

John Podesta.

One mantra used by the Clinton campaign ad infinitum so far is that Donald Trump's campaign is merely a slave movement for advancing the interests of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Democrats and journalists alike (wait, aren't they the same thing?) have claimed that the Russian business ties of Trump and his associates are a national security risk should the Republican nominee be elected. So why was nothing said publicly of John Podesta's ownership of 75,000 shares in Joule Unlimited? Joule had received millions in funds from a government-backed Russian fund and Podesta was on its executive board.

After all, remember Paul Manafort Jr., the national chairman of the Trump campaign? He moved on/was moved on after the liberal media continually attacked him for his alleged sympathies towards Russia. Especially due his former role as a lobbyist for the now ousted pro-Russian Ukrainian President, Viktor Yanukovych, commentators screamed that Manafort's history was a liability. Moreover, Trump's entire presidential campaign was likewise characterized as benefiting Putin more than America. The New York Times, Time and other outlets published a flurry of hit pieces centered on Manafort and his then boss, during the exact same period that the Clinton campaign was ramping up its "Russian collusion" angle against Trump.

And Podesta? Well, he gets a free ride.

3. "Anti-SJW" ex-politician and Heat Street head Louise Mensch wrote ad material for Hillary Clinton—so which other "conservatives" are doing similar things?

Louise Mensch.

Louise Mensch is a former Conservative British MP exposed by Wikileaks for her outright collusion with the Clinton campaign. Though she had outed herself as a "never Trump" hacktivist long before this, her help in writing ad material for Hillary Clinton was surreptitious until more of the Podesta emails went public. Online publication Heat Street, which Mensch heads, has tried to make a name for itself in supposedly outing SJW lunacy and other leftist stupidities.

The question remains, is Mensch a cucked conservative or an outright political double agent? Perhaps, more opportunistically, she is a mere financial opportunist whose political allegiances are amenable to dollar signs. Heat Street pays her bills for now, but should Clinton win in November, could she be wanting a new, safer career? The leftist media milieu is pretty crowded at the moment; the ad material could be Mensch's entry card to the media big time.

Whatever the case, Louise Mensch's perverse game of anti-Trump conservatism by day and Hillary stooge by night is one others are undoubtedly resorting to as well. Many traitors to the conservative cause will not have been as reckless as Mensch, who left an easy paper trail in helping the Clinton campaign. Had their budding relationship turned sour, it could have been the DNC or Clinton's campaign who outed her, not Wikileaks. So how many of the chat-on-the-couch types of conservatives, Glenn Beck among them, are establishing quiet relationships with the Clinton campaign to stop Trump?

Fundamentally, who can we really trust amongst the anti-leftist insurgency?

4. Clinton allies want to create a voting public that does not think or assess politics critically

Bill Ivey.

> And as I've mentioned, we've all been quite content to demean government, drop civics and in general conspire to produce an unaware and compliant citizenry.
> — Bill Ivey, Clinton insider and former Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts under President Bill Clinton

A long-time friend of the Clintons, Bill Ivey, wrote an email to Podesta bemoaning how the American public was still "unaware" but lacked "compliance." Ivey was very frank in admitting that he and others wanted to "conspire to produce an unaware and compliant citizenry." The necessary method was to "conflate entertainment with the electoral process."

The worried tone of the Ivey email published by Wikileaks indicates that Trump's charismatic style, usually attacked by the Clinton campaign, is one that Democrats well and truly desire for their rather dull candidate. This jealousy aside, we ourselves should be concerned. Clinton supporters have the overwhelmingly clout in both Hollywood and major newsrooms across the United States, plus the newspapers and other media mediums. A series of celebrity and media figures could easily weaponize themselves further in producing a more politically biased entertainment and news industry.

Recent political-entertainment farces, such as Katy Perry's naked call for Americans to vote, have been performed with the cover of being "comedy" (in case they failed to produce a result), but the underlying intent was to both reach and expand a dumbed-down audience. Skits like the Perry one should actually be read as: "I'm trying to be funny and get you to vote for anyone, but I really mean Hillary Clinton!" Unlike Trump, who actively questions the wisdom of an oligopoly controlling the media, high finance, and other vested interests, celebrities roped in to assist Clinton or any future leftist candidate will merely use their breasts, profanity, or other irrelevant talking points to create propaganda.

5. Tim Kaine was selected as Hillary's running mate—in July 2015

Robert Bass.

Lobbyist Erick Mullen wrote an email to Podesta in July 2015 apparently complaining that Bob Glennon, an attorney for billionaire Robert Bass' Keystone, Inc., was telling two other Senators that Hillary Clinton had already picked Senator Tim Kaine as her running mate. More recent information about a Vice Presidential nominee "shortlist," which included Bill Gates and Tim Cook, seems to have been a cover. Almost a year to the day after Mullen's email, Kaine was officially announced as Hillary's running mate.

The Mullen revelation demonstrates two appalling potential aspects of the Clinton campaign: 1) a very fake process of searching for people to fill positions already decided on takes place and 2) this process heavily depends on/is determined by the scrutiny of donating billionaires and their advisers. Robert Bass is well-known for his financial support of Democrats and it is immediately suspicious that one of his attorneys would have been cited as spreading Kaine's name as a certainty so early on in the game. What's going on there?

6. Hillary's campaign was tipped off about the likelihood of the State Department releasing her Benghazi emails

Heather Samuelson.

Heather Samuelson, a lawyer and the former White House liaison for the State Department, leaked a tip to the Clinton campaign that 300 of Hillary's Benghazi emails were about to be released. Just as the decision not to prosecute Hillary over her private email server has bamboozled many a FBI insider and agent, this new discovery of special assistance to the Clinton campaign will greatly anger those interested in impartial judicial or Congressional investigations.

The substantial cross-over between federal government officials and those working for Democratic political campaigns is alarming. Heather Samuelson is just one of many who have carved careers out of switching from bureaucrat to partisan operative. It is hard to see how such jumping around can lead to good outcomes, especially as Samuelson's source appears to be from the State Department itself.

7. Repressive Arab states have paid the Clinton Foundation millions for Bill Clinton's "time"

Hillary Clinton’s Saudi and Qatari ties are cause for serious concern.

When Hillary Clinton was serving as Secretary of State, Saudi and Qatari interests were funding the Clinton Foundation to the tune of millions. The fact that Bill Clinton was then the main focus of Arab leaders’ requests for time and phone calls is irrelevant, as Clinton Foundation donors were heavily represented in the individuals and groups Hillary had official meetings with during her time at State.

Two email conversations are particularly troubling. In the first, John Podesta and various Clinton workers, including from the Clinton Foundation, have an exchange about Bill’s phone call with a Saudi sheikh. One staffer says that unless a $6 million check has been written out by the sheikh, the idea is “crazy.” In the second, Qatar desires a “five minute” meeting with Bill to give him a $1 million check for his birthday the previous year.

What exactly are the Saudis and Qataris getting out of these meetings and phone calls? And why, given Hillary’s own acknowledgment that both states fund ISIS, has the money not been returned?

This stuff is much bigger than Watergate

Richard Nixon fell into political oblivion for his alleged involvement in the break-in at Washington D.C.'s Watergate hotel in the early 1970s. Compare this scandal to the Clinton revelations published by Wikileaks and it appears minuscule. Everything from Hillary Clinton acquiescing to the funding of ISIS by the Saudis and Qataris (and keeping money from them) to the preordained selection of Tim Kaine as VP nominee reeks of political and moral corruption.

With Wikileaks promising to release even more emails and other evidence soon, will the media finally stand up and report the truth?

10 Signs Of Men Who Have The Loser Mentality

October 19, 2016 | by Nicholas Peake | Link | Original Link

Over the years I've known a few friends (and, sadly, family) who at some point I began to see in a different light—these were men very close to me who eventually revealed themselves to always make bad decisions, avoid personal change and self improvement, fail with women (or get with terribly low-tier ones), and periodically need my help to get themselves out of a hole they had dug for themselves.

At the very least it was slightly annoying, but after bailing them out numerous times I become angry and frustrated with the lack of personal responsibility. I came to understand that these are broken men.

What I now call the "loser mentality" is not reserved for extreme cases like drug addicts, felons, and so forth. Sometimes otherwise nice, decent people are actually living a "loser" life; not everyone is necessarily "bad" but sadly are still a net negative and will drain us of money, motivation, time, and more if we don't make the hard choice to walk away from them.

There appear to be common traits among these types which serve as telling indicators of those who your good intentions are wasted on. Allow me to present several here.

1. Their Lives Often Start With Paths That Are Difficult To Recover From

Sometimes your choices are costly in the long run. Even more costly is never trying to move ahead and escape.

One of my closest friends married young and had several children with a woman despite being in a low income bracket at the time, and still works up to two low-paying part time jobs, spending his best years struggling instead of advancing & growing. My brother, to my dismay, had several children by several different women. Another friend of mine became somewhat of an alcoholic and dropped out of the community college we were attending many years ago, despite my encouragement in staying.

In all cases, the theme was the same: these mistakes, along with a failure to pursue the opportunity for a better life (and the possibility of recovering one day) cemented their fate: a life of having to rely on others, never being able to "dig out of the hole" financially, and never enjoying the things in life that the rest of us do.

Reflecting on this common theme I see the same in others: their lives often started down a very hard road, and yet they never seem willing to make the short-term sacrifices (despite opportunities to do so) that would ensure long-term improvement and allow them to break out before it's too late

2. They Make the Same Mistakes Over and Over

It's often pointless to discuss the obvious with those who live as "losers." I understand, very humbly, that we all make poor decisions from time to time; what is critical is whether we learn and grow from this or foolishly disregard the consequences again and repeat our stupid decisions.

My own version of Einstein's statement regarding insanity is this: "Doing the same thing again and again and expecting different results is the definition of stupidity." Those with the loser mentality will quit jobs for trivial reasons, give up free education, wreck their vehicles (and lose them), get arrested over and over, and impregnate women again and again. And yet seem very passive about the consequences and how far away from happiness and success they place themselves. It's amazing, and infuriating, to see.

3. They Accept Money And Pity But Never Solid Advice

Some people seem to always be this away. As if it were simply bad luck.

This is one of single greatest truths regarding these types that I've ever learned. Every time these people came back to me, there was always some urgent emergency and they needed money badly. I helped how I could, and was supportive of course with kind words and enthusiasm, but I came to see something happen every time.

I spent much time sharing personal advice about how to improve their lives and yet, not once was any of my advice taken. NEVER.

Funny, all the Facebook comments and prayers and positive comments and sympathy seem to be welcome and responded to, but never anything truly meaningful is done about it. Honest, intelligent, and sincere advice is a waste of time on those with the loser mentality. Save it for men who deserve it. I'll never make that mistake again.

4. They Don't Really Want To Change

This is what it pretty much amounts to. So much for your great & insightful advice

From #3 above, there's a general underlying problem: men who live a sad, low-tier life often do so by choice. We have more opportunity in the West than many areas of the world. And yet, so many seem content to live miserable lives, severely restricted from what is right in front of them and all the possibilities that exist. How is this possible?

There is an underlying lack of a desire to change. Seeing some of my best friends constantly move backwards in life began to show how they avoided seizing the opportunities that others, and fate, provided them. Given an opportunity to move to a better location? Set up with a job interview at a better place? Encouraged to apply for a grant and attend a trade school? Dress better, get in shape? NO.

When you're a loser, and think as a loser does, you always have some excuse or "reason" to avoid anything that requires stepping outside your comfort zone or moving forward. They don't want to change, and that's that!

5. They Place The Blame Elsewhere

Life does hold random fate. However, a wise man betters his odds, not blame them for failure.

It never fails, and unfortunately I've had to witness a family member doing this: rarely, if at all, admitting, "Y*eah, I messed up*."

Conveniently blaming bad luck, bad timing, or just being completely oblivious to the consequences of poor choices is a trait you'll find repeatedly with these types. I've even heard "The man is trying to keep me down."

6. They Often Need To Be Bailed Out Of Bad Situations

One of the most significant characteristics of a loser is their need to be bailed out of bad situations, often in a very sudden manner.

Their lack of foresight and low income means they rarely have any emergency funds to withdraw from a bank, and then you're left with the chore of sending them money via Moneygram or something similar for whatever situation they've found themselves in. More often than not their problem is due to poor planning or not living within their means. You're extremely fortunate if they repay you, which is another topic unto itself.

Other times they're in jail again and need to be bailed out when no one else is willing to do so any longer.

I recall helping one of my friends years ago in his "emergency situation" when he claimed to desperately need cash for gas to travel to work and buy food. I urgently rushed to send the money via Western Union. Do you think I was ever repaid? Could I ever ask the same from him? I think you already know the answers.

7. They're Slightly Dysfunctional – Behavior That At Times Is Awkward or Irrational

Odd behavior = clues to problems.

A pivotal moment when my eyes became open was when I once suggested to one friend that perhaps rather than working 2 poorly paying part-time jobs he could start with a decent full-time job, enjoy more free time, and then later move to an even better/higher-paying full time job. His quality of life at the time was very low, working above-average hours per week at a trivial pay rate.

Similarly, with a family member and also a friend with a below-average life I suggested going to school part-time for a skilled trade or an Associate's Degree, which would open doors fairly easily to greatly improve their income and give them the opportunity to live in better places where their skills would be in demand.

In all cases I was met by awkward, bizzare silence and even a strange behavior in which they seemed to act as if I hadn't said a word. And at times their behavior in social situations showed they are not well-equipped to interact with others as expected of men their (adult) age. It's a very odd thing to see.

When you innately have problems and live in a world where you retreat into your shell like a turtle, you are living a dysfunctional and counter-productive life.

Witnessing one talk about women (some of which were productive, attractive, respectful) as if they even had a remote shot a such a woman showed me they had a skewed outlook and were unrealistic in their perception at times. They have almost nothing, and yet at times have the desire to have women who are attracted to men who are more successful.

8. Their Choices Are Often Enabled by Others

After witnessing many situations both different and similar to those I'm recalling here, another pattern emerges: Losers continually rely on the help of others, always anticipating that someone will bail them out, thereby enabling their behavior time and time again.

Sadly, it's both distressing to be called upon to help someone you once respected, knowing full well this is a result of their poor decisions yet again, and the stress and annoyance of it is a drag on you internally.

The difference is that we must understand that men with the loser mentality subconciously expect someone to bail them out every time. It becomes learned behavior…they're never forced to struggle and resort to find a solution themselves.

Despite your best intentions, continually bailing out losers won't help them in the long run – they'll just get by until it happens again the next time. It's time to say "no."

9. They Live Day-to-Day, And Don't Think About the Long-Term

When a relative of mine died almost 10 years ago, I received a small amount of money. I reflected back on how my father had little to no money during his retirement age years and had little to get by on. I decided to make the right decision and start a retirement account back then, which now is considerably larger.

I watched time and time again as my old friends and acquaintances would come into large tax refunds, a bit of interitance, or so forth. Inevitably, the money would be gone very quickly, often into a car or petty things, rather than planning for the future and being concerned about how they'd get by later.

It never fails: those who live paycheck-to-paycheck never truly live below their means (in which case they could begin to get ahead) or give serious thought to how they'll survive emergencies.

10. If You Ever Need Their Help, Prepare to Be Disappointed

I'll never forget how it felt to need help in an emergency from someone I loaned money to multiple times in the past, along with many other forms of help, only to be denied. It was an extremely angering feeling in the middle of a stressful situation.

On a trip a few years ago to a latin country, I later discovered that my debit card became lost or stolen between Miami and a rural area overseas (we traveled from the capital to her parent's 2nd home). It was an emergency situation as I had very limited cash and no means to access my bank account overseas (although I should have prepared better). I was stressed, in a difficult situation, and it was a rare time I really needed someone's help.

I called back to the USA to someone in my family and told them how I needed maybe $300 or $400, etc. to hold me over until I returned. What did you think I heard? "Ain't got no money, man." And the same from his wife at the time "Naw, ain't got no money." Not, "I don't have the money, but I can get it here or from so-and-so", or "Let me ask xxx if they could help me out", or even "Don't worry I'll get an emergency loan to get you by." After so many times I helped this was my reward: nothing.

By the grace of God, my father who was living off of social security, was able to send me a bit of money until I got home.

Never expect help when you really need it from those who have the loser mentality. These broke-ass losers are living day-to-day worrying about themselves and losers cannot be counted on. Ever.

In Conclusion

Of all my regrets in life, one of my greatest was all the money I lost and the naive, foolish concern and effort I wasted on those who honestly have little to show for their lives. It was particularly sad because these were often guys I once enjoyed the company of and was close to, and had good memories with. As time went on I saw their lives turn into sad melodramas and I realized they are a drain on our resources and motivation.

Being burned the one time in my life that I really needed help from one was an especially unforgettable lesson.

I no longer foolishly give time, money, or advice to those I know who I recognize as being of the “loser mentality”: going nowhere in life, disregarding advice, and never trying to better themselves.

Take my advice: Learn to separate losers from men who genuinely deserve your resources and concern. Walk away from those who have the characteristics I shared here and would affect your life negatively.

3 Emotions Men Should Master

October 20, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

We are all too familiar with the SJWs' "muh feelings" pose. We are also familiar with the Leftists' manipulative stance, be it through their sanctimonious bullying, guilt-tripping, appeals to a pseudo-consensus, veiled threats, or constant emotional blackmailing. The maelstrom of emotions the Left plays with makes tempting to withdraw emotionally. We might be led to think that the higher good lies in "cold, hard facts" alone. But if we do so, we easily forget that cold facts do not prompt for any action, and if we merely describe while trying to get emotionally disconnected, we cut ourselves off the game.

Passions are part of the game

When the infamous Karl Marx wrote that modern capitalism "drowned the most heavenly ecstasies of religious fervour, of chivalrous enthusiasm, of philistine sentimentalism, in the icy water of egotistical calculation," he had a point. The bourgeois world of classic modernity is emotionally lacking, and both the bohemian artistry and Communist radical politics stepped up to fulfill the void. This historical point is still relevant today. Conservatives fail to make stands because they are much more passionate about their personal interest than about defending anything they pretend to stand for. SJWs, on the other hand, went very far into shrieking and bullying because they are usually passionate for their points. Different motivations lead to different outcomes. And a strong motivation, not to say a deep or passionate commitment, greatly helps to build a strong character.

The far-left was able to pick up people's passions because the bourgeois would not, and perhaps could not, do that. The bourgeois idea of progress was about people becoming farm animals, individuals reduced to the status of producers and consumers in a world where nothing really new or interesting could appear anymore. In such a world, there is no need for passions and no need for politics, isn't it? Well, the individuals would not let themselves get boiled down to the status of mere economical agents, and many preferred embracing some ridiculous strand of new-age spirituality, worthless artistry or even becoming Communists than living through the bourgeois-conservative nothingness..

Rejecting the passions and emotions, or at the very least trying to put them aside as to ignore them, made men weak and unable to take a stance. It has also made women unhinged, shameless, and willing to do anything for short-term pleasure, as no men were able to give them a proper sense of boundaries. Plus, passions being powerful motivators, the far-left mastery when it comes to stirring some made it tremendously powerful as well.

We must face passions, not as an annoyance, but as a resource that has to be mastered. This is true for ourselves and others. First, when we are aware of our emotional states without being directly prompted ("triggered") by them, we gain the ability to choose consciously what we do and want to do, and can follow our own intuitions instead of getting framed by an alien narrative. Second, when we are also aware of others' emotional states, we can steer them in a specific direction.

The latter is especially true for women: today, they follow fashions and MSM approval, when not following their own sluttiness and attention-whoring… but if men were able to reward, shame, and inspire proper passions in them, they would follow us instead. If we want this to happen, we have to take over the empire of passions and stir up some emotions in the public's hearts, be it through discourse, artwork, or daily conversations. Here are three emotions I think we should be keen to stir.

1. Empathy

According to Dr. Neel Burton,

> Empathy can be defined as a person's ability to recognize and share the emotions of another person, fictional character, or sentient being. It involves, first, seeing someone else's situation from his perspective, and, second, sharing his emotions, including, if any, his distress. (Burton, Heaven and Hell, chap.21, p.153)

As empathy fits well with maternal instinct and motivates nurturing tendencies, women are naturally prone to it. Up until a very recent time, they took care of babies and small children, participated to local charities, worked in shelters for the homeless or went through menial but important tasks as nurses. They did so because their natural empathy motivated them to act this way.

By contrast, a striking feature of feminism is that it destroys womanly empathy and nurturing tendencies. From a feminist point of view, men are enemies or at the very least potential oppressors and children are a burden. Feminism reverses the empathy, turns it into defiance or even hatred. Worse: after women have lost their ability to feel positively towards the men they should at least respect, cultural Marxism stirs their natural empathy towards "minority" identities. Thus we see grrls caring about thugs, invaders, or weirdos, who are all positively portrayed in the media, more than they care about what should be their community.

The lack of empathy is also a problem among white men. Though black men often exert violence against each other, the majority of them always bonds when it comes to attacking the depleted white majority. The same goes for any community out there: they empathize with each other more than they would ever empathize with us. We, white men, are the only ones who do the exact opposite by being hypercritical against each other when we should actually be supportive and look at the positive rather than the negative.

There should be a lot more empathy towards us than there currently is. Others should be more sensitive to our plight, suffer when we suffer, or at least feel compelled to suffer when we do. We are the proximate [prochain?], not the Big Other. We, too, should have more empathy among ourselves: nice guys, for example, should not be considered as "jerks" or "bastards," as say some red-pilled guys who seem to have internalized a negative framing, but as misled victims who proved some nobility by trying to conciliate "respect" for women with the healthy desire to get a deeper relationship. Along the same lines, the working- or middle-class average Joe who got disenfranchised should be painted on a positive and humane light so that wealthy liberals cannot ignore or merely sneer at him.

2. Hope

Here is an emotion the Left has really abused from. Remember 2007-8, when the first "black" president was supposed to end the racial tensions in the US as well as the neocon foreign wars? Democrat activists at that time wrote without batting an eyelid about their hope for a world without losers, for an outcome where everyone would win. Then, the racial tensions have never been so high, the white majority is more dispossessed than ever, and the same liberals who were trumpeting about a world without losers have no shame calling us losers—from their choices and politics. Hope has been abused from, and we have to take it back. In fact, we have already started to.

> Hope can be defined as the desire for something to happen combined with an anticipation of it happening. It is the anticipation of something desired… To hope for something is to desire that thing, and to believe, rightly or wrongly, that the > probability of it happening, though less than 1, is greater than 0. (Neel Burton, Heaven and Hell, chap.14, p.103)

Trump is a wild card who comes with no guarantee, for sure. He still gives us something no Obama could ever give us—hope. The Alt-Right, manosphere, and the whole flourishing of high-quality dissenting intellectual efforts give us hope as well. Someone wrote that "the Alt-Right represents the first new philosophical competitor to liberalism, broadly defined, since the fall of Communism." Someone else, here on ROK, noticed that more and more women were fed up with misandric grievance-mongering and longed to become mothers. These trends are more than interesting: they seem to point towards a better future that we still have to conquer.

On the other side, the liberal status quo and Hillary in particular mean pure hopelessness. If Hillary gets elected, we will have even less jobs, anti-white and anti-male organized groups will attack even more, the wealthy globalists will get fatter at our expense, and so on. Interestingly, liberals today use arguments of a conservative kind: when they shriek something as "the 5 last US presidents tell you not to vote for Trump" or "the Alt-Right and deplorables are un-American," they look more like McCarthyists than hippies. They are the establishment clinging to the status quo and worsening. We are the embodiment of hope for a positive change.

3. Love

While hope should be spread among any decent people and is pretty straightforward once we agree on the intrinsic value of its object, love appears a bit trickier. In a relationship, whoever loves the other most is dominated whereas who loves less has more room to take action. If a man falls in love, he falls in the sense that he gets dumbed down, pedestalizes the girl, who in turn will get bored and look for a more challenging partner. Thus, seduction must be used to stir love in women: they must love us as well as their children. Both as a mistress and a mother, both as sexual and nurturing, a woman exerts love.

In men, love must be exerted in a more distilled and thoughtful form: when we protect our dear ones, toil for them, care about their interests, these efforts are an expression of love as well—although this form of love must be more distant as to allow ampler room for action. In any case, the feminine element must love the most and more directly.

It should be added that masculine and feminine can be conceived, not only as absolute, but also as relative terms. Esotericists consider that we are all "feminine" when considered under a higher point of view: the most fierce, courageous and risk-taking warrior remains "feminine" relatively to a genuine spiritual authority, and any human is "feminine" relatively to God as the ultimate Father. The Bible compares the good ones to a bride that shall get married to God (Revelation, 19). Hinduism recommends bhakti or devotion, i.e. religious love, to those belonging to the warrior caste, whereas the spiritual authority is more "masculine" as it enjoys a higher and more direct knowledge of God. These considerations might seem a bit far-fetched, but they were already highly relevant before the tiniest stint of modern degeneracy was born. Just remember that being in love is acceptable for a man as long as it never equates to pedestalizing a woman.

Conclusion

Passions and emotions matter. If we set them aside as irrelevant, someone else will push our emotional buttons—and the girls'—and spin us in no time. The philosopher René Descartes wrote that "all the good and the bad in this life depend from the passions" and that we had better be able to use them wisely. Ironically, the word "Cartesian" now denotes a logical, rationalistic, supernatural-denying mindset. This is accurate for the young Descartes, who was among the top scientists of his time, but tosses aside an important twist: the philosopher eventually lost his only daughter, Francine, and the sadness he felt while mourning her made him aware of the power of emotions. Yet, instead of being dominated by said emotions, Descartes strove to gain cogency about them, and he wrote a very interesting little treatise to expand a whole theory of the "passions of the soul."

Our case is the same. Most if not all of us have been blue-pilled since infancy. Cultural Marxism was shoveled down our throat by school teachers, media figures, movies, social pressure. At each step of this process, our emotions were stirred and directed by spinsters so that, for example, we would feel a high empathy for so-called minorities while ignoring the homeless "white males" dying of cold at winter.

Ride the tiger of your own emotions and of (some) others' as well if you don't want sinister globalists to.

The Final Presidential Debate Showcased The True Corruption Of Hillary Clinton

October 20, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The final Presidential debate for 2016, held at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas last night, yielded few surprises. For a start, both candidates, Donald J. Trump and Hillary Clinton, dislike each other just as much as, if not more than before. They did not shake hands either at the beginning or end of the debate. On most issues, too, they have very non-complementary or outright opposing views.

What the third debate represented, really, is a distillation of both candidates' stances as revealed throughout the campaign. Aside from Trump's stinging assault on the orchestrated Democratic Party violence to disrupt one of his rallies (injuring police officers) and discussion of other new Wikileaks revelations, the to-ing and fro-ing was reminiscent of the first two debates in New York and St. Louis. Hillary Clinton clung to the tired old line that the Republican nominee is a Russian stooge and Donald Trump recommitted himself to draining the swamp of corruption and self-interest in Washington D.C.

Here are some of the key themes from yesterday evening's proceedings:

Hillary is still trying to cover her receipt of "dark, unaccountable money" with ridiculous platitudes

Caption unnecessary.

At the beginning of the debate, in response to a question about the Supreme Court, Hillary Clinton waxed lyrical (again) about her supposed desire to rid American politics of "dark, unaccountable money." But with the Clinton Foundation having its meetings at places like Goldman Sachs' headquarters and Clinton underlings explicitly talking about the need to make billionaire George Soros "happy," action on this front is sorely missing from her campaign. Even this week, it was revealed that Goldman Sachs' chief spin doctor, Richard L. "Jake" Siewert, had defended the Clinton Foundation in 2015. Politico used a quote from him, which was then strangely presented as an anonymous source. Consequently, and we are just scraping the surface, the "dark, unaccountable money" vibe is coming solely and squarely from the Clinton campaign.

Every major US corporation that has taken a side during the Presidential race so far has taken Hillary Clinton's. Interest groups ranging from hedge fund operators to journalists have also overwhelmingly supported Clinton in financial terms. Whilst in some respects this was a point that Trump could have hammered home better, the all-round stink of the Clinton campaign when it comes to the support of elites cannot be disputed. Between now and election day, this is something both Trump himself and his supporters need to emphasize continually. It worked for the British people and Brexit, and it can work for the American people and Trump.

Trump owned Hillary on the Second Amendment

Hillary's pretend guns position.

> Well, let me just tell you before we go any further, in Chicago, which has the toughest gun laws in the United States, probably you could say by far, they have more gun violence than any other city. So we have the toughest laws and you have tremendous gun violence.
> — Donald Trump

Hillary Clinton was in the frankly unenviable position of "defending" the Second Amendment and simultaneously calling for the kind of gun restrictions unheard of in most of America. After she clumsily tried to explain that her 18-year stint in Arkansas and time as New York Senator make her an ardent supporter of the right to bear arms, Trump floored her with the truth about Chicago. Some of the most restrictive anti-firearms legislation in the country has utterly failed to save America's third-largest city from the terror of unprecedented gun violence. Washington D.C. is another case in point, a capital city so unsafe that virtually half of it is a no-go zone for those interested in their own personal safety.

Again, Trump could have made the retort more biting, reminding Clinton that this was her hometown and a political stronghold of Democrats over many decades. Still, the implications of his remarks became clear immediately: Clinton looked visibly annoyed and cornered. Trump's willingness to focus on the systemic and historical failures of Democrats in inner-city areas in particular is one that needs to be replicated by his most well-known supporters, including Chris Christie and Rudy Giuliani, between now and election day. So much of what Clinton is calling for, and not just on gun control, has already been beta-tested in major American cities with abysmal results.

Interestingly, Clinton brought up the NRA as if it were some shadowy, malevolent organization, when, in fact, it is much more transparent in its dealings and endorsements than the corporations and other interest groups, usually just fronts for billionaires and multinationals, supporting Hillary.

Hillary is aiming to give citizenship to millions of illegal immigrants (future Democratic voters)

Whether in Europe or the US, letting in so many people and allowing them to stay is in service of the same outcome – liberal voting majorities.

Debate moderator Chris Wallace from Fox News indicated in his immigration question to the candidates that Hillary Clinton had “offered no specific plan” for securing the US southern border. Following Trump’s reiteration of the necessity of making the border an actual border, not a free-for-all transit zone, Clinton waffled repeatedly. She talked about poor “Carla,” whose parents are illegals and might be deported under Trump (yes, she was born in the United States, so she benefited from the preposterously read constitutional interpretation of birthright citizenship). These human interest diversions are simply a vehicle for liberals to avoid actually addressing the messes they have created.

The only thing Clinton seemingly promised to do was to remove the most criminally-minded aliens. Considering that the Democrats cannot remove most criminals from the streets of Chicago, which they have otherwise controlled for forever and a day, one should seriously doubt any Clinton Administration’s ability to root out undocumented felons from south of the border. What we can definitely say is that an elected Hillary Clinton will follow through with President Obama’s attempts at using executive orders to stop deportations of illegal immigrants.

Campaign 2016 Presidential Debate

Trump won't commit to accepting election results if he loses

Post-debate, the mainstream media blew out of all proportion comments by Donald Trump that he would decide later whether to respect any November 8 election outcome. And why shouldn't he wait? To put it bluntly, Trump would be a fool to promise that he will honor the "result" in November. Wikileaks revelations about rigged Democratic primaries, recent videos from Project Veritas about the DNC's engineering of widespread violence and voter fraud [1] [2], and extensive proof of journalists outright colluding with the Clinton campaign are all emblematic of a political and media establishment breaking countless laws and moral rules to keep Trump from the White House.

As the powers that be rage to stop The Donald, we have 19 days left to help get him into the Oval Office.

The Elites Are Not Smarter Than You

October 20, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For the longest time I held in high esteem those who worked in distinguished institutions. I'd revere the Congressman, New York Times journalist, think tank strategist, anthropology professor, non-profit director, and literary novelist. They got to where they are through merit, intelligence, and hard work, not through connections, nepotism, or by being a useful idiot for a specific agenda.

My doubt about these servants of the elite increased as the war against men ramped up in earnest, culminating with my many direct interactions with them. Those encounters confirmed to me that they are no smarter than us, and in some cases, severely lacking in knowledge and context to make better decisions to lead society. Here's a passage from Free Speech Isn't Free where I try explaining to a well-known think tank commentator that the homosexual agenda is deliberate.

> "It's hard to see the problem from your nice office here when you associate with people who are not touched by these issues, or if you only read mainstream media outlets, but I'm meeting with hundreds of men on this tour alone and I have interacted with thousands more through the internet. We clearly see the absurdity of lifting all other groups in society except for men, while we are forced to suffer under policies that stem from hatred. No one has the backs of men except a few lone voices like myself, and that's shameful."
> She was taking notes. I continued. "For example, look at the homosexual issue. Suddenly for the past five years, the needs of 3% of the population have become a huge, all-encompassing matter, where they are deemed more worthy of money and beneficial social policies than the men who compose nearly 50% of the population, with a complete coordination of all major institutions to re-write legal codes and cultural norms to accommodate their alternative lifestyle."
> "Oh that, well that issue just went viral." She genuinely thought the homosexual agenda's ascension into mainstream life was like how a funny cat video gets ten > million views on Youtube.

Individuals such as herself would also think that groups like Black Lives Matter and ISIS are “spontaneous,” developing out of thin air without deliberate planning, coordination, or funding behind them. Of course you know that this is not the case: Black Lives Matter is funded by George Soros to destabilize the United States while ISIS was initially armed by the United States and funded with oil purchases from Turkey. I have no doubt that globalists have heavily donated to homosexual organizations in the past twenty years to advance that cause as well.

When you’re at the very top, you sponsor individuals mainly for their ability to advance a particular cause or objective. There’s no need for them to be the smartest guy in the room. In fact, being too intelligent will actually prevent their hiring because then they will be able to see that their boss doesn’t care about “race equality” but fostering race inequality. He doesn’t care about “love not hate” but destroying the family unit. Therefore, to work for the elite, you must have huge blind spots that prevent you from seeing the big picture, or at least be sociopathic enough that you are willing to work for an immoral agenda so that you can get closer to the seats of power.

All the people I mentioned earlier, the journalists, politicians, professors, and think tank insiders, were hired primarily for their usefulness in advancing a specific set of goals. This is where the term useful idiot comes from. As long as a particular journalist can channel the narrative competently, she’s hired. As long as the politician will follow the directives of his sponsor and vote yes on a bill like TPP, he’ll get big campaign donations. As long as the professor infuses SJW talking points into his lectures, he gets tenure. These individuals have enough intelligence to do their jobs at a standard level, but that is secondary to their usefulness.

Growing up in America, you come to believe that people advance through their merit and ideas, but if you start examining these institutional positions and what allows individuals to rise to the top, you realize that their merit and ideas were only secondary. They were hired because those one level above found them to be useful, and no more. Intelligence is optional, and only necessary if the job demands it, but far more important is the ease of which they can be controlled to help usher in a pre-determined goal.

The biggest barrier to improving your society is thinking that people in influential positions are better or smarter than you. Unless you are unusually dim-witted, and can't understand what I'm trying to explain to you right now, I assure you they're not. At the most, they're more connected than you and more willing to sacrifice their dignity for a chance to control others. Their power mostly stems from the system and structures they inherited, not their own internal strength. Understanding this fact gives you confidence, because if you can survive the onslaught from their institutions, defeating the individuals behind them will be a simple matter. Like a game of whack-a-mole, you just have to take one down at a time, until there are none of them left.

3 More Hollywood Films For Men That Leave Today's SJW Films In The Dust

October 20, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Being exposed to even a single, solitary, modern-day Hollywood SJW film, is like being exposed to a blue-haired feminist with a really pretty face and a killer body. It all looks good at first, but you know it's going to mess your head up nine ways to Sunday if you stick around till the bitter end…

Thankfully, the following three Old School Hollywood films are guaranteed to reverse that trend, because these made-for-men movies supply every red-pill male with exactly what he craves: visceral, relentless, hard-core action, along with resonant, unapologetic dialogue – and all of it without a single shred of SJW sentiment or subterfuge.

Ah, so very, very refreshing… a veritable oasis amid the decadent desert of modern Hollywood despair.

So let's drink up. Shall we.

1. A History of Violence (2005 – Viggo Mortensen, Ed Harris, William Hurt, Maria Bello)

Viggo Mortensen leaves it all on the court as former Mob leg-breaker and hit man, Tom Cusack, who changes his name to Tom Stall, picks up stakes, and relocates to a sleepy Indiana town, far from his native Philadelphia, in an ineffectual attempt to forget about his past and lead a quiet, normal life.

But Cusack's past won't let him escape that easily, and he's forced to confront an assortment of mobsters with bad intentions who eventually come calling – as well as his new wife's anger and shock upon finding out that he lied to her about who he actually was to begin with…

As an alpha male in serious trouble with zero time to explain, Mortensen's character does the right thing and bangs the hell out of his wife, Edie (played by Maria Bello) – with emphasis – in order to quickly calm her down, and she begrudgingly resumes watching his back all the way through the rest of this taut, tension-filled drama.

The fight scenes are absolutely top-notch – no bogus, chop-socky buffoonery here – and even though William Hurt's turn as Tom's big-brother Mob boss, Richie Cusack, features an East Coast accent that noticeably misses the mark (why so many filmmakers stubbornly insist on forcing actors to use accents they can't master, is a total mystery to me – does it really matter in most cases, if the guy sounds like he's from wherever it is that he's actually from? – rant over), Hurt's rage-filled, sociopathic character is still a tornadic force to be reckoned with, and Ed Harris's venomous portrayal of Mob underling Carl Fogarty is wonderfully understated in sinister fashion.

You'll get a kick out of watching Viggo's character run wild, as he lets out his inner wild dog in the numerous, realistic fight sequences; the fight scene in big brother Richie's palatial home is the best of the bunch, as Viggo's character brutally dispatches a would-be assassin in a most gruesome and horrific manner…

You can't miss by watching this hard-core action film that was specifically crafted for bona fide, red-pill men. Go ahead and shoot that blonde hottie a text who lives in your building and have her come over and watch it with you. (Make sure she doesn't forget to bring along her hot cheerleader's outfit; like all modern sluts who horde such getups for special banging sessions with alpha males, she'll definitely have one – and if she doesn't admit to it, text another girl who will.)

2. Cool Hand Luke (1967 – Paul Newman, George Kennedy, Strother Martin)

They don't come any cooler – decorated Korean war hero Lucas Jackson (Paul Newman) gets busted for cutting the heads off parking meters in a drunken display of public defiance against the fraternal oligarchs who rule a small town in the American Deep South.

Dragline (George Kennedy), the top alpha male of the prison block, beats the brash newcomer to a pulp in a grudge-inspired boxing match, but eventually rolls over and gives Newman's character alpha dog status, largely due to Luke's admirable, witty, charismatic and defiantly non-conformist personality, which perpetually gets him into trouble with the backwater prison's ruling hierarchy. (As Dragline himself puts it, during one poignant sequence in the film, while admiring Newman's character from afar, "Hell, he's a natural-born world-shaker…")

This extremely realistic, morbidly unsettling, and at times, extremely humorous film (the screenplay was adopted from a book written by ex-con Donn Pearce), takes us on a roller-coaster ride that showcases the brutal, daily grind and boredom-fueled antics of a prison road crew.

Kennedy won an Oscar for best supporting actor in this must-see, alpha-male film, and figuring out precisely why Newman didn't win similar hardware for best actor, remains one of the greatest mysteries of all time.

(Oh wait a minute, my bad, I know why Newman didn't win – Rod Steiger won the award that year due to landing the lead role in the SJW mindfuck film, In the Heat of the Night, which used the now-beaten-to-death theme of rampant racism among myriad, dumb, white crackers who are so unworthy of even being alive that they make life a perpetual living hell for all the poor, never-did-nuffin-wrong, terminally oppressed blacks in the bigoted, hateful, lynch-prone Deep South – yawn.)

From the hard-boiled-egg challenge, to the horny-slut-washes-her-car-while-cock-teasing-the-chain-gang sequence, to the brutal beat-down scenes featuring vicious, psychopathic prison hacks and pitiful, extremely human and utterly defenseless convicts, this five-star film will make any red-pill man's day – and probably leave him feeling invigorated and shocked by the end of it.

Ultra-strong acting chops are displayed by Strother Martin (who plays the prison captain with a Napolean complex; Martin's character utters the now-infamous line, "What we have here is failure to communicate"), Harry Dean Stanton (as Tramp), Anthony Zerbe (as Dog Boy), Dennis Hopper (as the crazed convict, Babalugats) and virtually every single one of the remaining cast members, especially Morgan Woodward, who plays the sinister, silent, rifle-toting prison guard, who goes by the nickname "The Man With No Eyes"…

You could watch 50 of today's brain-dead action films, all of which feature blow-'em-up, shoot-'em-up, beat-'em-up action sequences, a lot of SJW dialogue, and very little else, while simultaneously sporting the intellectual appeal of a can of Spam, and they wouldn't add up to half the film that Cool Hand Luke is…

But why waste your time. Rent the film and watch it right now.

Why? Because unlike today's vote-rigged SJW Hollywood films, which get inflated rankings at IMDB from thumbs-up Internet robots and SJW movie reviewers who pose as "regular Joes" while being paid to lie, there isn't a real man alive who doesn't admire this film, and I absolutely guarantee that you will love it.

3. Hard Times (1975 – Charles Bronson, James Coburn, Strother Martin, Jill Ireland)

Charles Bronson just keeps coming right at you in the fast-paced, 1975 action film, Hard Times, as he portrays Cheney, a grizzled, down-on-his-luck, 50-something street-fighter, who brutally knocks out every single chump who is dumb enough to stand in front of him.

Bronson is utterly convincing as the taciturn, backwater, Depression-Era "Hands of Stone"; James Coburn should have gotten an Oscar for his turn as the colorful, loud-mouthed Speed, a handler and fight promoter who sets up shady, off-the-grid, bare-knuckle matches and peddles them to gamblers and lowbrow characters of various shapes and sizes; and Strother Martin is subtly fantastic as Poe, a philosophically inclined fight doctor with a nasal, Southern drawl, who has a serious addiction to opium.

Throw in a steely-eyed performance by Michael McGuire as underworld boss Chick Gandil, and a cold, world-weary, sure-buddy-I-believe-anything-you-say turn by Jill Ireland as Cheney's two-night banging interest, Lucy Simpson, and you've got a recipe for a top-notch action film that was carefully crafted for red-pill men only.

When an alpha male's back is against the wall, his true nature is bound to come out. At which point he abandons the inconvenience of convention and starts kicking ass and taking exactly what he needs, as this hard-core RPO film clearly points out.

The fight sequences are satisfactorily realistic, the dialogue is first-rate, the cast is stellar and the direction is very strong (courtesy of Walter Hill, who also wrote the screenplay for this film; Hill's other notable directorial efforts include The Getaway, The Sting, The Warriors, 48 Hours, Last Man Standing, etc.; Hill also wrote and directed the pilot for the critically acclaimed HBO series, Deadwood.)

Today's Hollywood films have been carefully crafted to turn you into a beta orbiter and a liberal, cucked, blue-pill-chugging simp – that is, once you stop fighting it, after first ripping your hair out and throwing butter-congealed popcorn at the theater screen…

Don't let the Puppet Masters brainwash you – take a stand right here and right now, by renting a couple of these bona fide RPO films today, and reclaim your manhood.

You'll be glad you did.

3 Reasons Broken Western Women Secretly Want You To Cheat On Them

October 21, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Western females today simply do not respond well to good treatment from their significant others. Call her beautiful, she gets big headed, stops trying to look good for you, and starts packing on the pounds. Be attentive to her needs, she calls you clingy. Send her good morning texts every day, and her responses become less frequent and further apart. The list goes on and on but you get the idea.

Today's female responds poorly to attentiveness.

On the flip side, telling her she's looks "alright", being completely selfish by ignoring her needs in favor of your own, and texting every few hours (or whenever the hell you feel like it) will make her vagina buzz like a bee hive while eliciting the kind of loyal behavior we used to dream about as sexless beta boys. What a messed up society we live in.

Infidelity is the ultimate slap in the face to men and women alike. However, the effect is very different between the sexes. Most of us here know and understand how a cheating woman affects us as men. But females are affected very differently by infidelity. The truth is, the fallout for a cheating male actually works in his favor more often than he realizes. Below are the three most advantageous reasons for a man to step out on a low-quality woman.

1. She needs to know you have balls

…or backbone

Most men in this part of the world won't so much as verbally disagree with his female or even raise his voice at her. Men like this are fearful of the proverbial shit storm they're sure will ensue if they upset the applecart. For this reason they live in a perpetual state of discontentment caused by this fear.

A man in a relationship where he's afraid to check his woman for any reason will lose the single most important element in in keeping her loyal: respect. A woman cannot love a man she does not respect. It can't be done. And if a man doesn't have any backbone, his woman can't respect him let alone love him.

According to women, two of the worst things a man can do to a woman within the context of a sexual relationship is physical abuse, and infidelity. But knowing what we know about women tells us that that these two 'crimes' keep them around a hell of a lot longer than the opposites. I've addressed the effects of physical abuse towards women in a previous post:

> …the adrenaline rush that comes with the unpredictability of her lover's volatile mood keeps her on her toes and for better or worse it keeps her around.

Nobody here condones hitting women, but the hard truth is that battered women respect their abusers more than any man in their lives and it's as simple as that. A man who won't put his hands on a female won't get as much respect from said female as a man who does. Sad but true.

Before you get your panties in a bunch, nobody here condones this behavior.

Infidelity works exactly the same way. If your woman doesn't think you'll cheat on her, or worse, doesn't think you could cheat on her she loses respect and attraction for you. Similar to raising your voice at her or being physically abusive, it shows her that you have the ability to grab your Y chromosome, show some testicular fortitude and won't hesitate to do so if the situation warrants.

No, she's not gonna like it when she finds out you were balls deep in your side chick last night. Yes, she'll cry and scream and throw a tantrum. But she'll be infinitely more loyal to you than her ex who told her he'd never dream of cheating on her because he loved her 'more than life itself.'

2. "Post-selection"

Men who frequent this and other sites like it are familiar with the concept of pre-selection. We're all aware that if a woman sees that you have the respect and adoration of attractive women, she'll become more attracted to you because she sees that high value women have signed off on you.

I've written about the concept of 'post-selection' and how it can sometimes hinder a man's endeavors with the second sex. Including my own:

> Pre-selection works wonders before you hook up, but "post-selection" can and will burn you if you don't take the necessary measures to avoid your current stable from witnessing your exploits with other girls.

Even the best relationships get a little stale at some point. It could be because of weight gain from either or both parties, being around each other too much, general boredom, or any number of reasons. One such reason that sticks out is that her attraction to you has dwindled because she hasn't seen any glimpses of that pre-selection that drew her to you in the first place.

You've been so focused on her and only her you don't take to flirting with other girls or exhibiting the domineering persona that grabs and holds the attention of attractive females. At some point her hamster starts to spin and subconsciously puts thoughts into her head like: "Is he really the best I can do right now?" or "Is he really as attractive as I thought he was?"

[image]
She needs to see more of this…before, during, and after your tryst.

Sticking your dick in another chick indirectly makes both of those answers emphatic yes's. Your girl finding out you've been humping around will remind her that she's not the only woman who finds you attractive enough to sleep with. And if your side chick is attractive it solidifies the fact that you are the best she can do.

Again, she'll cry, she'll scream, she'll call you names, and she may even break up with you. But you can bet your bottom dollar that as she's crying in her beta orbiter's arms she's wishing his arms were yours. And if you're a high value male with game and in good shape, you can just about guarantee she'll be back with a hell of a lot more loyalty and appreciation for you than before you stepped out on her.

3. Drama and dread

Wet eyes means wet vagina.

Drama and dread should be two of the lures you use the most in your player tackle box. Any man who regularly sleeps with beautiful women knows that if there's no drama, she's bored. He also knows that if she's feels 'secure' in the relationship, she gets complacent.

Boredom and complacency is a recipe for all sorts of shenanigans. Weight gain, bitchiness, granny panties, cheating, etc. are always floating at or near the surface anyway. But if your relationship becomes mundane she'll find a way to change that by any means possible with the aforementioned behaviors.

Engaging in debauchery with another girl is sure to create both drama and dread. When she finds out about your affair there will be plenty of fireworks like I've discussed before. In addition, she'll tell anyone who'll listen to her drone on and on about her "scumbag boyfriend who cheated on me with that slut!" and she'll tell the tale as dramatically as a broadway actress.

Cheating also activates dread. In my personal experience nothing, and I mean nothing has been more effective in keeping my female(s) in line than good old fashioned dread game and there are a few levels to it:

Level 1: Flirting with other chicks in front of your girl. When she sees this behavior she may call you out on it, she may not. But she'll be motivated to step up her game because she sees that you can and will replace her if she doesn't keep her shit together.

Level 2: Texting or talking (on the phone) to other girls in front of your girl. This is a bold move but again, if she ain't actin' right she needs to be reminded that you could skate at any time. Just use the age old 'She's just a friend' or 'Relax, it's not like I'm fucking her.' Pause after that second one and say 'yet' while looking her right in the eye with a slight smirk and I can guarantee she'll suck the soul out of you that night.

Level 3: Cheating. This is maximum level dread game. It's one thing to flirt with or text other chicks. It's quite another to actually do the dirty with one of them. The former just sends a message…the latter confirms it.

I've said it twice and I'll say it again. Your girl willl cry, she will scream, she will call you names, she will dump you, she will throw things at you, and she will rue the day she met you. But when the smoke clears (and that could take few days) she'll love and respect you tenfold.

The reality of infidelity is…

…that it could end your relationship in a hurry. Sure, you'll earn her respect and adoration for having the balls to step out on her but the fact of the matter is that it could still blow up in your face…at least initially. You may want to save it for a normal, broken, Western woman.

The shenanigans that are sure to follow when she learns of your treachery will test your mettle. But as I've stated in this column multiple times, and in a previous post, don't give in and apologize lest you lose the respect you've acquired:

> When the smoke clears you may have a headache but you'll definitely have her > respect, which is probably the single most important element to keep your woman from running around on you.

We've all heard stories about this girl or that who stays with 'that cheating bastard' despite her friends telling her to leave him. One of the many reasons she won't is because he's exhibiting the kind of masculinity and fearlessness only a small percentage of men can show these days.

[image]
"Why don't you leave him already??"

I'm not going to tell you that your woman will never leave you or that she won't go and sleep with someone else because of your adultery. Cheating on your girl could result in some unintended consequences to be sure. But at the end of the day females respect, admire, and obsess over men who show that they are unafraid of them and don't sweat it if the so-called relationship ends in a whirlwind of drama and tears because of infidelity and/or abuse.

If nothing else, we know they're a hell of a lot more loyal to those men than betas who end things amicably, wouldn't lay a hand on them, or 'even dream about so much as looking at another woman!'

How Donald Trump Forever Changed US Politics

October 21, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Whether you love him or hate him, you can't deny that Donald Trump's run for the presidency has had a huge effect on the country, especially our broken political process. Right now the globalists are working overtime to crush Trump and his message. They believe that if they can stop Trump, Americans will go back to being bovine worker drones in their globalist machine. But that is impossible. What has been seen cannot be unseen.

Here are some of the ways that Trump has forever changed US politics.

The message is more important than money

Frank Luntz – focus group expert

Up until Trump announced his candidacy, the assumption has been that the candidate with the largest war chest wins. DC beltway analysts and New York marketing experts had elections down to a science. If you can afford to pay the best experts and buy more ads than your competition, you'll win. A good example of this was the Marco Rubio campaign. Everything about Rubio was done according to the textbook. His message was created and market tested in conjunction with Frank Luntz to ensure it would have maximum voter appeal. All that Rubio had to do was execute, run the requisite number of television ads, and he would win. That conventional wisdom was forever destroyed by Trump.

Instead of following this conventional route, Trump went with his gut. No doubt he consulted certain people such as Senator Jeff Sessions in constructing his immigration message, but his general approach was to bypass focus groups and target big issues that voters felt strongly about. Because Trump staked out positions that resonated with the GOP voter base he was able to build a durable following without spending a lot of money. According to Bloomberg, Hillary has spent roughly $432M on the campaign while Trump has spent $213M—less than half. Yet the polls are still close so Trump's focus on message over Madison Avenue advertising experts is paying off.

Sometimes you have to offend people

Orlando shooter and misunderstander of Islam

Another piece of conventional wisdom that has been proven wrong by Trump is the idea that you cannot offend anyone in the electorate, even very tiny portions of it. You can see it in Hillary's message, which is 100% focused on women and minorities. Mainstream Republican candidates are a little less politically correct but not by much. While they might say "radical Islamic terror," they are always very quick to point out that Islam itself is a religion of peace. All terrorists are, in the GOP view, "perverters" of Islam. The reasoning behind this "don't offend" approach is that a politician cannot afford to lose even one vote.

There are many problems with this approach but the biggest one is that sometimes solving a problem requires offending a group of people. Trump's statement that there seems to be a problem with Islam and terrorism could definitely be construed as being offensive toward Muslims, but until we have the courage to have an open discussion about it, we will never solve the problem of terrorism. Trump's defeat of 16 of GOP's best and brightest proves that it is more important to speak the truth than it is to worry about who you offend.

Conservatives are a fake opposition

George W. Bush's daughter Barbara attends a Hillary Clinton fund raiser in Paris with

Huma Abedin

The greatest gift that Trump's candidacy has given us is the realization is that the Conservative Movement that powers the Republican Party was never meant to change America for the better. It's only purpose was to provide the appearance that voters have a real choice. This allowed the progressive agenda of feminism, gay marriage, and the elimination of national borders to advance without the masses rising up in open rebellion.

The fact that the GOP was only a fake opposition party became evident from the moment that Trump announced his candidacy. During his speech Trump mentioned two distinctive policies that have defined him ever since. The first is the idea that illegal immigration must be stopped. The second was that the US has negotiated bad trade deals that are decimating US manufacturing. While other Republicans had mentioned immigration as a problem in the past, none of the 2016 batch of candidates had made it a priority. And none of the other Republicans had chosen to attack existing trade deals.

There was swift retribution for Trump's comments. Several companies canceled contracts that they had with Trump's company. The Republican elite rushed to condemn Trump's statements as offensive to Hispanics. They also dismissed Trump as not being a serious candidate.

As it became clear that Trump was winning, the GOP establishment tested various other attacks to no avail. At the GOP convention, most of them grudgingly endorsed Trump, but they were just waiting for a more opportune moment to attack Trump. That moment came after the "grab them by the pussy" tapes were released on October 7th. GOP leaders and pundits coordinated their statements against Trump with the media and the Democrats.

The reason the GOP establishment is working to stop Trump because he represents a genuine departure from the standard Democrat and Republican policies. Trump's policies threaten to take away power from the donor class, the wealthy plutocrats who really run the country. By attacking Trump the Republican establishment demonstrated that it was only interested in representing the interests of its wealthy donors, not its voters.

If elected, Trump will have a chance to change the Republican Party into a party that really represents the interests of most Americans. If he loses, the GOP will likely try to revert back to its fake opposition policy but no one will be fooled into thinking that it presents a real alternative.

The media is a mouthpiece of the ruling elite

Glenn Thrush

Regular readers of Return of Kings have seen the perfidy of the mainstream media before. When Roosh tried to hold meet-ups for men, the international press went into attack mode. Newspapers all over world obediently printed minor variations on the same false headline that Roosh was “pro-rape.” The same thing has occurred with Donald Trump when women began to accuse him of groping them.

Before publishing a story that tarnishes a person’s reputation, it is standard journalistic practice to check the accuracy of the story. This includes contacting the person who has been accused to get their response. It involves doing some checking of the accuser’s reputation and looking for corroboration. In the case of the women that Trump allegedly groped, none of this was done. The media ran the groping accusations even though the women’s stories were easily debunked because the media’s only job is to carry the water for the globalist elite.

Sycophant Glenn Thrush asking Hillary's campaign manager to approve his work

Nowhere has this been more apparent than with the release of the Wikileaks Podesta emails. The emails show a high degree of coordination between the media and the Democrats. In one particularly egregious case, Politico writer asks Podesta to review what he has written to ensure he has not "fucked up" anything.

Conclusion

Although Trump has changed US politics, we will suffer a serious setback if he loses on November 8th. As I have written before, it is likely that Clinton will move quickly to modify US demographics to prevent another conservative from ever being elected. The big difference will be that we are now wiser as to how things really work. We've been rudely woken from our sleep and injected with 500 mg of caffeine. There is no way we are going back to sleep again.

8 Basic Rules For Improving Your Conversation Skills

October 21, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

I recently returned from a trip to Central America. I am fluent in Spanish and traveled at first alone, managing foreign border crossings on foot, and later with a local female. During my trip I made an important discovery: most Americans talk about the most boring, inane topics.

It's Not Me, It's You

I often tire of small talk amongst acquaintances, and even sometimes amongst friends. I had ascribed this to a combination of an introverted personality and above average IQ. But after spending a month abroad, observing and conversing with locals and American tourists, I decided that it's not small talk that I dislike—it's boring people.

American tourists are easy to spot when traveling. They are dressed the worst, and are loud and overconfident. They are conspicuous, and typically have little to no foreign language skills. They love to converse about mind-numbing topics like how much something costs, what it was like traveling on the airplane that got them here, what medical afflictions they have, or how they are missing their favorite Frankenfood that isn't available abroad.

I don't really enjoy small talk, especially with strangers, and am easily bored with the typical banter strangers say to one another. However, I found myself having plenty of interesting chats with locals—taxi drivers, hotel clerks, restaurant waiters, tour guides, boat captains, and street vendors. We would talk about their families, food specialties of the area, interesting things to see or do, or what they were doing later.

Part of it is simply the joie de vivre that these people have, as opposed to the dead-inside corporate rat race attitude of most Westerners. But it's more than that. There are certain topics and words that Americans, both home and abroad, tend to use that range from awkward to downright boring to offensive.

This reminded me of a radio episode I heard titled "The Seven Things You're Not Supposed To Talk About" where the narrator's mother recalls a list of rules for language, which was passed on to her by a French friend, and which I firmly endorse (route talk, sleep, health, dreams, money, diet, menstruation). With that in mind, here is a basic list of dos and don'ts.

1. DO smile

A warm, friendly smile, particularly when meeting someone or initiating conversation will engage the other person, and will form a strong image in their mind. Body language can be more important than actual language, especially when speaking with women.

2. DO speak slowly and calmly

Close your eyes and picture a confident, masculine man. How do you imagine he speaks? Just listen to the difference between Jay Leno and Sean Connery in this clip. Most males today speak far faster than Leno today. Slow, calm speech is masculine and confident. Perhaps most importantly, it's easier to hear and understand. Often when I'm rushing my speech, a girl won't hear what I said, and I must remember to speak slowly and calmly.

3. DO NOT use route talk

Please don't make others verbally experience this

Any discussion of transportation, including how you arrived at your current location, what brand of airline, bus route, taxi company, or vehicle you used to get here, what highway you drove along, or the condition of the traffic, is completely boring and useless information. Never, ever use route talk. This is the cardinal rule of conversation.

4. DO NOT use vulgar language

I just can't even.

While sitting at a cafe for a bit of dessert with a thin, dark headed Latina, we couldn't help but overhear the loud American who kept using the word "BULLSHIT." We laughed every time we heard it, and it turned into a discussion of why I'm not like most gringos, who are stereotypically loud and vulgar. Vulgar language makes one appear uneducated, crass, and common, if not worse.

5. DO NOT complain

Unless you're a comedian, don't.

Much small talk seems to revolve around perceived mistreatment by others. The airline stewardess didn't allow my luggage to be placed where I wanted it. The coffee barista took too long preparing my expensive drink. I had to wait for an hour in a waiting room to see a doctor. Don't complain. No one cares about your personal grievances, and you come across as petty and weak. Particularly if it's a first world problem.

6. DO NOT discuss your health or diet

No one cares that you used to enjoy poached eggs for brunch but now you no longer order them because you've become vegan. Americans also have a bizarre fascination with medical problems, and talking about their surgeries, prescription drugs, and other medical issues. Publicly talking about your health shortcomings is insane—why draw attention to your weaknesses?

No one cares about your knee surgery or what your doctor's name was, or how pleased you were with the outcome. Really, just shut up about health or diet, especially if it's a negative statement. Talking in a positive manner (The papaya here is so fresh and delicious!) is perfectly fine.

7. DO NOT discuss work or money

Americans love to discuss money, perhaps more than anyone besides Asians. This is seen as offensive, vulgar, and trashy in most cultures, and it is.

It’s also offensive in many cultures to talk about your career. Don’t do it. I had a buddy who lived in Italy for three years and developed a close group of friends, but never knew anyone’s occupation. Most people don’t really care where your paycheck comes from anyway. Extra negative points if you are a doctor or lawyer and talking about your job, and double negative if you are using medical or legal jargon.

8. DO NOT use your telephone in public

This should go without saying. The telephone is a tool for talking one on one. Use your telephone privately, and if you have a smartphone, use it sparingly.

These rules are important in daily life, when traveling, and especially when approaching new women. Day gaming is much more my cup of tea than hitting clubs full of bad music and sluts. Remember that most guys aren't going to approach strange women. And the few that do will likely be incredibly boring, offensive, or uninteresting. Be different. Be interesting.

While one can ramble a bit with women, especially at first to get them to open up and talk to you, try to think before you speak and have something of interest to say. Follow these rules, and you'll be ahead of 99% of the competition.

5 Major Signs That She’s Using You

It’s no secret to the men of ROK that women use men. Yes, this is obvious to even the newbie who’s trying to learn game. But, it does not do to simply know that women use men—it is imperative to know the signs.

When you know the signs to look for, you can avoid having women use you. And believe me, if you’ve ever had a woman use you before, it is not an enjoyable experience. Unfortunately, the mainstream media paints women as completely innocent angels that never do anything wrong.

This, of course, is one of the many lies that the media forces down our throats. That is not to say that women don’t offer many positives to a man’s life; the right woman can be a great thing. The right woman will make you feel like more of a man, she will provide you with feminine energy and help you calm down when you’re in your head, and she’ll drastically improve the quality of your life.

But, in order to find girls like this, you first need to filter through the bad ones.
Here’s some tips to filter through the bad ones, and figure out which ones are using you:

1. She Never Puts Out

This is, perhaps, the most obvious sign that she's using you—and yet, it still baffles me when I see men pursuing women who are clearly exhibiting this sign. I don't care what her excuse is, if you've been seeing her for over a month, and she hasn't put out, she's using you.

She's using you for validation. She's using you to buy her lunch. She's using you for emotional support. She's using you, she's using you, she's using you, my friend.

"But what if she says that she wants to wait until marriage, Jon?" Then don't believe a word she's saying. Are you telling me that if Brad Pitt walked up to this girl and spat his game on her, she'd reply with: "Oh, sorry. I'm not that type of girl."

Give me a break. She's using you. If she kisses you, but any time you try to escalate she refuses, or if she doesn't even kiss you, then she's using you. This category also includes girls who only put out when you do a favor for them.

For example, there's tons of men who get trapped into relationships where they go by a sort of tally system. For every three favors he does for her, she gives him sex. Or, even worse, some men have to take their women out to expensive dinners before she puts out. Is this the type of situation you want to be in?

Sometimes friend-zoning hot girls for the benefits is a way to counter this—if you can sense that she isn't into you, and there's not much sexual chemistry, proactively put HER in the friend zone so that she'll invite you to parties and introduce you to her social circle.

In general, however, you want to avoid these women—they will drain your bank account, your emotions, and your energy; they'll drain pretty much everything except what you want them to drain.

2. “I Just Got Out Of A Bad Relationship.”

I cannot tell you how many times I’ve heard girls say this. It’s almost comical when I hear it nowadays, because I know what she’s really saying is: “I fuck a lot of guys, but don’t know if I want to fuck you.”

They’ll have elaborate stories, oh god will they have elaborate stories. “My last boyfriend was an abusive alcoholic,” or “my last boyfriend got me pregnant and forced me to have an abortion, when I just wanted to keep the baby!” or whatever else it may be.

Don’t believe it for a second. Yes, to be fair, sometimes this is a legitimate excuse—but this being a legitimate excuse occurs so rarely, that if a woman pulls this card, it’s safe to assume she isn’t interested in you.

Case in point: the other day I was spitting verbal game on a girl, and I could clearly tell that she was the type of girl who loved to string guys along. So what’d I do? Take a look at our conversation:

- Jon: “Hey, maybe you can save my number as ‘Chipotle Guy,’ in your phone, and I’ll always take you out to Chipotle thinking that I’ll get some, but then you can just tell me that you just got out of a bad relationship!”
- Girl: [laughing] “Oh my god yes, and then I can shoot you a winky face every now and then, but only express interest after midnight, so that you think I actually want to have sex with you!”
- Jon: “Oh yeah, I love when girls do that—then maybe you can come over one night, because you’re lonely, cuddle with me, and then when I try to make a move tell me that you’re not ready, and just cut off my balls permanently!”
- Girl: [cracking up] “HAHAHA oh my god, who are you?!”

Boom, I was in. Do you see the point though? Girls are extremely conscious of the little things they do to lead guys on. Don't fall for their lame excuses, because a lot of the time they'll be "half true," or they'll seem like they might be the case. This brings me to my third point.

3. She's Extremely Vague

"Hmm, which one should I commit to?"

A lot of the time, if a girl wants to lead you on, she'll be extremely vague and say things like:

- I'm not sure what I'm doing tonight
- Maybe, I'll just have to see
- That'd be fun! I'll have to look at my planner

Rest assured, she is putting you on the back burner in case another, more favorable opportunity presents itself. This can be a tricky one for men to understand, because knowing when a girl is using you is more of an art than a science, but here's how I look at it.

If she says that she's interested in hanging out with you, but then flakes more than 1/3 of the time, she isn't interested in you at all. This is what makes the rule of 1/3 so key, however, because there will be those few times that she does in fact decide to come see you…but then, refer to point one.

On the times that she does come to see you, does sex happen? If you escalated, and she rejected you, then she's not interested. She's using you, and it's time for you to ditch her. The best way to deal with flakes, in my opinion, is to actually be completely indifferent.

A lot of guys take a more “boundary-setting” approach, which definitely has its merits—in a relationship, if a girl tries to flake on you, it’s definitely best to call her out on her bullshit and tell her to make a decision so that she doesn’t waste your time.

But, if it’s a girl that you just met, you shouldn’t even care—why would you care if some random girl hooks up with you or not? You just met her. Remember: the key to maintaining this indifference is abundance. Who cares if this girl you just met isn’t into you? You should have zero emotional investment in her, period.

4. She Wants To Keep Your Relationship Secret

There’s many different levels that women can use you at, but there are two primary ones which they use you at. Generally girls either use you before sex happens, for validation, or during a relationship, for emotional needs. This point is regarding the latter.

Sometimes, when a girl initiates the relationship (which she always should), she’ll say that she wants to keep it a secret. This is fine, at first—sometimes women don’t know what will come of your relationship, so they don’t want to announce it and make it an official thing.

But, if they continue to do this for a long period of time (think months), then you can bet she’s using you. If you’re a player, and are spinning multiple plates, as Rollo says, this doesn’t really matter, but you should still recognize that she’s using you.

When women want to keep a relationship secret for a long period of time, it’s almost always because she’s using you to cheat. Whether it’s on her boyfriend, or her husband, if she doesn’t want word of your little relationship getting out there…she’s cheating, guaranteed.

Again, depending on what you want out of a relationship, this can either be a good thing or a bad thing—it can mean that she’s giving you sex with no strings attached, but you better be careful lest her partner(s) find out.

5. She Wants You To Listen, But Doesn’t Listen To You

To be completely fair, women typically do most of the talking in a relationship. That being said, any functional, emotionally healthy relationship entails communication from both the man and the woman.

When only the woman does the talking, and the second that you try to express your feelings she cuts you off, this is a telltale sign that she’s using you for emotional validation. Why else would she talk all day and vent to you, but the second that you want to say something, she interrupts you or can’t listen for more than 10 seconds?

I’ve personally been in a multitude of short term relationships with women, and let me tell you this: if the girl is into you, she’ll actually be asking YOU questions. She’ll be curious about who you are. She’ll be asking you things like:

- So what do you like to do for fun?
- So just how many girls HAVE you been with?
- Are you looking for a relationship?
- What do you want to do with your life? (mainly if you’re an undergraduate)

If she isn’t at least asking you a couple of these questions, you can rest assured, she’s not into you. The reason why is this: women want to know who a man is. They want to know what he’s afraid of, they want to know how he acts under pressure, they want to know who he is. They want to know you.

This is one of the reasons why congruence is so important in game; when you’re congruent, women feel like they actually know who you are, because you’re the real deal. Regardless, when a woman talks at you and never lets you get a word in or never asks you how you feel, she’s using you.

5 Truths About Using Credit Card Points For Your Benefit

October 22, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

You've probably heard of "miles hacking" by now. You know, the silly nerds who are obsessed with racking up hundreds of thousands (or millions) or airline miles, hotel points, and other credit card reward program currencies.

So, confession: I'm one of them.

Of course, most of those people spouting the advice are also dropping affiliate credit card links in those same posts showcasing you how they're staying in a $1,000 per night hotel room free of charge.

Having been a bit of a junkie for a few years myself now, I thought I'd shed some insight light on the situation. Without further ado, here are seven things you must know about credit card point collecting.

1. It Does Work

I'm sitting on a bank of over 500,000 miles at this point in my life. I've been on the road full-time as a digital nomad for nearly a year, and miles have funded nearly all of the costs of my travels at this point.

So, move past your doubts. Right now. It does work, so this now becomes a matter of setting yourself up for success with a system. Because there are a lot of things that can go wrong. There are requirements to making it work for YOU, which we'll dive into.

2. You Have To Be Responsible

You can't be stupid. If you're the type to forget to cancel things, or are prone to paying your bills on time—forget it. You'll get hit with hundreds, if not thousands, of dollars of annual penalties and fees that will put a real dent in the glory of flying for free.

You must be organized in the process.

The real gist of the entire "game" is this:

You open a credit card. You spend X amount of dollars and receive Y amount of points. Typically, Y is worth several hundred dollars, whereas an annual fee is around $100 (though it does vary quite a bit).

So how do the credit card companies make money, when they're practically giving away a currency (points) for free?

Because they're counting on YOU to not pay things on time, to spend more than you can afford, and to forget to cancel the card (and therefore miss the annual fee after your year is up).

Don't be the person who does one of those, much less ALL of them.

3. But What About My Credit?!

Another common hangup is that this will hurt your credit.

First off, another rule: if your credit is below 700, you don't really have the capacity to be playing this game. Get your credit up, then come back and consult this article. For those of you who have a credit score above 700—the truth is that you will see ebbs and flows as you play the credit card game.

When I started in January of 2015, I had a credit score of 760. Over the course of the next year (as I opened 10+ credit cards), the lowest it ever got was 707. Now, in October of 2016, it's 787. It should be noted that I haven't really opened any since I started my journey as a location independent digital nomad.

4. Like Stocks, Diversification Is Good

You wouldn’t put your entire savings into one stock, would you?

Your credit card points should work exactly the same. Just last year, I was sitting on a nice pile of nearly 250,000 American Airlines miles. Then, American made the decision to raise the reward prices across many of their regions. Suddenly, the value of those points dropped significantly.

Fortunately, I was on the verge of booking a very large trip for multiple people (more on that below).

But what if I hadn’t been?

What if my 250,000 miles had suddenly had their value cut and I had no way to get rid of them? Talk about being on a sinking ship.

The point is, don’t put all your eggs in basket. This can be applied to most things in life, credit card gaming is no different.

5. It Makes Amazing Things Possible

I waited to share this part last, and it’s a little cheesy. But this little game of miles hacking has allowed me to do some pretty remarkable things for my family.

Just this year, I coordinated getting four of us living across three different continents for a two week trip around Europe. The value to fly my parents from the United States to Venice, Italy would have normally been $2,500 one way—each.

Instead, they just paid the $150 in taxes each.

I redeemed enough points to get everyone flights, that, if had been bought in outright cash, would have exceeded well over $10,000. Sure, there is always the "make more money" option—but that isn't always feasible.

And when you are making (and therefore, spending) enough money that you can afford a $10,000 flight—you should be making miles on that, anyway!

And A Bonus

It's completely silly, but some credit cards are really cool. Something like a Chase Sapphire is 100% metal, and feels SOLID when you hold it in your hand. An AMEX gold card with your business on it looks cool, too.

…and girls notice this stuff.

Unless she's looking for a sugar daddy, she won't say anything—but if you just "happen" to leave it out in clear view while waiting for the waiter to pick up the bill—watch her eyes.

This only works with the high-end cards that signify status.

And sometimes, the dating game is so tough in America that you need every edge you can get.

Conclusion

If you've had your doubts about using credit card miles, opening multiple new credit cards, and are confused on how to use them—I don't blame you. There is an information overload out there. The fact of the matter is, it does work. But you need to be careful, be well organized, and to plan properly to use them.

But if you do all of that, the world is truly your oyster.

3 More Methods Of Body Hardening

October 23, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

If you will recall, a few weeks ago I wrote an article on body hardening, a concept in martial arts where the muscles and bones are deliberately subjected to trauma in order to strengthen and prepare them for delivering their own punishment to an opponent.

In that article, I discussed two methods: sandblasting (using the fingers to strike loads of beans, sand, or BBs to strengthen them for the finger attacks typical of such kung fu styles as the Praying Mantis), and bottle rolling, which is done to the shins to deaden them to pain. In addition to describing their body hardening roles, I also described how such body hardening techniques can be used as a form of conventional strength training as well.

This article will provide three more methods of body hardening that are predominantly used to benefit the combat athlete, but can also be used for general purpose strength training or cardiovascular training:

1. Hitting the bag

This is the method of body hardening that is most typically used nowadays, to the point where many martial arts schools won't even do a lot of the more esoteric body hardening techniques. Indeed, hitting a heavy bag with proper form will condition the bones and tendons of the striking limbs to withstand the force of a strike—it seems pretty obvious, and it indeed makes sense according to the "greasing the groove" concept. Doing something a lot will make you better at it.

In addition to its body hardening benefits, hitting the bag serves as a reasonable cardiovascular workout as well, which can be done for both sustained periods of time equivalent to a jog or rapid intervals equivalent to the High Intensity Interval Training that fitness websites talk about every so often. In addition to cardiovascular training and body hardening, heavy bag work—or hitting an equivalent such as a makiwara, mu ren zhuang, or your nearest banana palm—will develop your muscular endurance as well-the "broken rhythm" of fighting will make the uninitiated's muscles sore like no other type of workout.

2. Iron Body

"Iron body" training is one of those concepts that most people have a dim idea of from popular culture-perhaps you have seen films such as Enter the Dragon or Tiger and Crane Fist demonstrating this technique, or have seen video footage of kung fu masters taking kicks to the groin without flinching, such as in the featured image.

While I have never willingly taken a kick to the batch, this technique involves a combination of proper posture (thrusting the hips forward so the impact is divided between the groin and the buttocks) and muscular control over the inguinal canal, and is beyond the reach of this article.

Instead the iron body technique that I am familiar with is the one that conditions the body to absorb pain from an opponent by subjecting the body to controlled impact. While the movies always show this as something that is done with a partner—or more often than not, a supplicating student ordered to by his master—you can utilize iron body by yourself with just a couple of easy-to-find tools.

First off, you'll need a cudgel—not a large, double handed club—ie: don't use a baseball bat, shillelagh, or something similar—but something around the size of a police billy club. Tonfas, tetsubos, or even a decent sized stick from your backyard will suffice.

Then, strip to the waist-you need a bare chest for this one. Inhale, flex all of the muscles of your torso, and begin striking your tensed muscles while steadily exhaling. Bear in mind that you should not be striking yourself to the point of actually causing long term injury, but you should be hitting yourself hard enough to sting. The impact should be audible, and your skin should begin to welt. After you've bruised your torso sufficiently, try doing this to your arms and legs, particularly your shins and forearms, both of which can be used to block or strike.

The key is to build up your tolerance to pain gradually: once your normal striking doesn't welt your skin, increase the force. Eventually, you can switch from a wooden club to a metal one, such as a lead pipe. And like the bag kicking, this is a sign of muscular endurance development.

3. Breaking

Breaking will forever be associated with martial arts, and rightfully so: the whole purpose of breaking is to get the fear of striking out of the trainee, and teach them to "follow through" with their strikes. While it seems like something completely divorced from the mundane physical culturist, I can happily say that breaking is much easier than it seems, although it still requires training and gradual body hardening.

The first thing to realize with breaking is that 50% of it is in how you position the objects. The boards, bricks, or sheets of ice (my personal favorite because it doesn't leave any solid waste) have to be positioned resting upon two objects, with as much of the surface area of the to-be-broken object hanging in the air as possible. Observe the picture below.

From here, strike the object and follow through. It's not very difficult for one, but difficulty will increase as you stack more and more of them atop each other. The limb that strikes the board will become stronger very quickly, and will continue to become stronger with successive practice.

Conclusion

The body hardening techniques I have provided for you will suit all of your martial arts needs, as well as secondary functions of general fitness. While these are not the only body hardening techniques out there, I will admit I am not familiar with qigong or other forms of meditation.

Enjoy, and be safe.

Women Who Refuse To Call Themselves Feminists Are Still Feminists

October 24, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

There are words floating around that feminism is losing because fewer and fewer women are identifying themselves one. It is supposed to be a sign of victory that women are getting sick of the whole demented movement. But is that true? Does it matter? Does it really signal the demise of the shrieking, menstrual cult that is feminism?

I say no. I believe that women are just not calling themselves feminists because of all the negativity associated with it. Women care about their image and they're not about to sacrifice it by associating themselves with some blue-haired freaks. Most of them don't even want to get down and dirty by putting themselves in ideological battles. No, they're more Machiavellian than that. But their aversion does not mean that they have rejected the basic tenets of feminism.

Redundancy

Just a bunch of confused kids brainwashed by our institutions.

First, you have to realize that feminism has already won. We are currently living in a post-feminist dystopia where measures are being implemented to control men and turn them into second-rate citizens. If you're in doubt, let's have a look at the results: In today's society, a woman can ride the cock-carousel; get tattoos and other body modifications; get fat and expect to date men with six-packs; have a bitch attitude; make false rape, violence, or harassment accusations; have two-to-one hiring advantage in STEM; divorce-rape a man at will; and do this all without consequences and all without calling herself a feminist because she already lives in a world where feminism has destroyed all sensibility.

Women today don't want to call themselves feminists because it is simply redundant. The fact is, the majority of them would rather enjoy the spoils of victory than be politically active. The ongoing, post-victory plundering is left for the mentally-unstable snarkies and the virtue-signaling, millennial twigs to engage in. As a man, you would be making a serious mistake to let your guard down just because a girl doesn't identify herself as a feminist.

The Lie Of Equality

We know that most women still hold feminist values because while many reject the “F” label, the same poll showed that most of them still believed in “equality.” So what is this equality they are referring to? Equality they refer to are selective privileges that were earned by men who fought for them.

Let’s take, for example, the right to vote. This is one thing that even many anti-feminists refer to as an example of patriarchal oppression of the past. But do you know why women weren’t allowed to vote? Because they weren’t drafted to wars like the men. Yes, the lie of oppression and equality can only work when you cherry-pick specific privileges without taking account everything else in society that granted those “privileges.” Tell me, where were the feminists during the two world wars begging for an equal opportunity to be shipped to the front lines?

So, what the early feminists managed to accomplish was creating an absurd scenario of inequality where women were allowed to have the male privilege of voting without the responsibility of fighting wars. Even in the Soviet Union, where the sexes were supposedly made equal under communism, men in general still brunt the toil of war with over 20 million casualties (to be sure, many women did fight as well). And fast-forward to today, now that the US government is thinking about introducing draft to women, these same pampered feminists are crying that it is not equal. Simply put, these whiny women like being given “equality” by the government instead of having to earn it.

The fact that many don’t want to accept is that men are women are different. Period. This is due to biology, not some patriarchal conspiracy to enslave the womankind. Men and women each have their own strengths and weaknesses and have (or at least used to have) different roles and standards that corresponded to their sex roles. To say that men are women are equal is as silly as saying that apples and oranges are equal. Society works because the two sexes play their unique roles like how a man and a woman can dance a tango in harmony due to their separate but compatible roles. Feminist efforts to destroy this standard is what is causing all the problems between the sexes we see today.

A New Measuring Stick: Equalism

Equality when it suits me

Now that we've established "equality" as a false premise, let us return to the original topic of modern women and their social values. I propose that, instead of judging a woman based on whether she is a "feminist" or not, she should be judged based on whether she believes in equalism or not. Equalism being the misguided attempt to standardize two different things (in this case, the sexes) that cannot be made equal. To paraphrase: women either believe in traditional and biological role for themselves, or believe in a sham equality where they enjoy all the male privileges without the responsibilities.

And as Roosh pointed out, woman can even speak out against feminism and still hold equalist views that correspond to feminism; they are not necessarily our allies. At best, they may be genuine about fighting against the 21st century feminists who are censoring others while instigating an anti-male culture. But at worst, they are merely playing a game to garner male attention for their own ends. Personally, I wouldn't reject these women outright, but I wouldn't jump into fandom and orbit them like all the thirsty men do either. It's becoming a joke how easy it is for any woman with above average looks to garner a horde of male fans just by echoing anti-leftist rhetoric.

So, next time you meet a woman, ask yourself: Does she believe that men and women have fundamental sex differences along with their corresponding roles or does she believe in "equality"? Her attitude towards sex differences will tell you a lot more about her true nature than anything she labels herself as.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY: Return Of Kings Has Turned Four Years Old

On October 16, 2012, Roosh V officially launched Return Of Kings. The original idea behind the site was to create an "online magazine" that offered content that could be found nowhere else. In 2012, the landscape was basically a wasteland for masculine men. Roosh once told me:

> If you think back to 2012, there really wasn't any content geared towards men that was not infected to some degree with political correctness. Yeah, there were some general-interest blogs dealing with masculine subjects, but there was just something lacking. All the other large sites offered 'approved' and 'filtered' masculinity in a lukewarm, insipid format. In other words, everything was sanitized to make masculinity acceptable for women. The market was one vast echo-chamber, endlessly repeating the same feminist pablum and neutered masculinity that offered nothing to us except submission and surrender.
> I knew I could do better, and I had the men to do it. I didn't need the permission of the mainstream. I had a vision for what I wanted…maybe the best word to describe it was resonance. I wanted to create something that made an impression, something that spoke to our generation, and something that was absolutely independent from the mainstream. And what we have created here is nothing less than historic. No one helped us: we did this ourselves.

And that was how it all started. If you hit the archives tab at the top of the screen, you can see what some of the early articles looked like back in 2012. Back in those days, ROK had a very personal, intimate feel to it. It was almost as if the writers were sort of "feeling" their way along as they entered uncharted territory. Readers may be surprised by the number of book reviews that Roosh put up in the early months. There were many.

None of the other sites put out the consistent content that ROK did, and none of them attracted the diversity of writers that ROK did. No other voice existed for men who were tired of being lied to, put upon, or forced to feed from the trough of the mainstream media. The reactions of advertisers was mixed. Some of them were willing to take a chance with us; some were not. Some stayed around for a while, and then bailed when the shit hit the fan. The fact that the site is consistently profitable is an impressive achievement in an age when the mainstream media does nothing but lose money.

And this is why they're losing. And they know it.

ROK exploded onto the scene with a defiant tone, but it's also important to remember that it ran a wide variety of articles, from those extolling man's noblest impulses, historic personalities, and struggles for survival, to those articles where bawdiness and hilarity was the point. It was all here. It isn't easy to do this on a consistent basis, and those who think otherwise should try it for themselves.

The guidance to us writers from Roosh back then was simple: write about what you want. There are no real limitations. See what suits your interests, knowledge, and experience. You'll do best when you write about the things that you really understand. It must be said that it takes a lot of confidence for a chief editor to allow his staff writers this degree of autonomy. I doubt that any other major website would be willing to take such a risk. But this is the magic of starting a new thing: all the writers were imbued by a degree of idealism—even zeal—that made them want to put out the best product they could.

And the results were sometimes startling, often shocking, and always memorable. The original lineup varied from month to month, but began to take shape within a year and would eventually include such names as Tuthmosis, Athlone McGinnis, Law Dogger, Black Knight, Western Cancer, Edward Thatch, Billy Chubbs, 2Wycked, Samseau, and myself.

There were a few other names, but those formed the basic weekly core of material published.

Those who have followed the site over the years will be amused to recall its evolution over the years. The early viral articles by Tuthmosis were followed up by the notorious "Fat Shaming Week." The next big events were the coverage of Roosh's lecture tour and the "contested" lectures in Montreal and Toronto. Yet despite these headline-grabbing events, regular readers checked in every day to find consistent, relevant content that spoke to them specifically, without any of the effeminate filters imposed by the mainstream media. As the 2016 presidential election loomed, ROK began to take on more of a political tone, but never lost sight of its core mission.

"What I like about you guys," one reader once told me, "is that there is no filter. You just put it all out there, and let the reader judge for himself. I can respect that. I may not agree with all of it, but at least we have here something that is like a bucket of ice water dumped on someone's shoulders."

Every reader is going to have his own list of favorite articles. I know I have mine. These articles below have stayed in my mind for one reason or another. I thought I'd mention them in case you've never read them.

Photograph Yourself In Your Prime. This unexpectedly poignant article by Tuthmosis repeated a message that I've found to be confirmed from my own personal experience. It's something that might seem obvious, but yet it's something we need to be reminded of. Life can move very fast, and if we don't take the time to record its key moments, we will regret it later. Sincerity matters, and the reader can sense here that the author is sharing an observation confirmed by the passage of time.

Stop Being Such A Fucking Faggot. I'm probably going to get a lot of heat for praising this article, but so be it. It gets better with time, believe me. Read it out loud or—better yet—read it to a trusted friend or two. It lends itself easily to dramatic readings. There is just something about the rawness, the in-your-face honesty, and the brutal sincerity of this that makes you feel like you've had a bucket of ice water dumped on your head. We lost a lot of advertisers over this article. Most of them couldn't get past the title.

The writer of this piece—the mysterious Loftboy and his Ron Jeremy avatar—only wrote one article for Return Of Kings, and then faded into obscurity. But that one article landed like a bunker-buster bomb. When you really think about it, the gist of this article is applicable to just about everything a man does every day of his life. When is this article's advice not applicable?

It should be said that this opinion is not shared by everyone. Many readers in the comments section were outraged by the article; some called it puerile, shallow, and nothing more than a ream of juvenilia. But I don't see it that way. Sometimes in life we have to strip things down to the essentials, and to cut through all the accumulated bullshit and pointless equivocation. The article works because it grabs you by the throat in the opening few sentences and holds your attention right until the last bitter word. Well done, Loftboy.

How To Get Laid On Amtrak Trains. Some of you are going to be scratching your heads when you read this. "What the hell is he talking about? This article is strange as hell." Yes, it is, and that's just my point. Where else but at Return Of Kings would you be able to find an article about how to chase women on an actual train? This one stands alone as unique.

There have been so many memorable articles that it's just impossible for me to list all of them here. But the three listed above are ones that have made an impression on me for one reason or another. Sometimes an article may not be the best one out there, but for some reason it just "speaks" to you. Maybe it reminds you of something, helps recall an experience, or assists you in solving your own problems. That's why reading is an adventure.

So to Return Of Kings, I say this: happy birthday. It's been a wild four years. And somehow, I get the sense that things are just getting warmed up.

The Culture War Is Being Transformed Into A Hot War

October 24, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We're approaching a point of no return. Your life will soon be impacted not just in the abstract of the degradation in women around you or an invisible tightening of your free speech, but a concrete decline in your safety and standard of living. The next stage of the long-running culture war will be marked by three features, shades of which you're already seeing. They include an alliance of the government with subversives, a sharp increase in violence, and institutional collapse.

The media and government will form an official alliance with groups that are determined to commit violence

Damaged police car from Milwaukee race riots

It should be pretty clear to you now that the establishment is on the side of those who wish to breed chaos in America. George Soros, Barack Obama, and other politicians are regularly making statements that whitewash crimes by Black Lives Matters and Islamic terrorists while the media is driving a wedge into the country through relentless race incitement. This is the clue that the enemy is indeed the media and your own government. Without them, BLM would not have been incited and the actions of Islamic terrorists would not have been enabled through supporting them in the Middle East with our failed policies, especially in Syria.

While it is within your right to be angry at BLM protesters or Muslims, the astute man will instead understand who supports them, in the same way you would be annoyed not at a child who misbehaves in public but its parents. The establishment wants you to waste your energy attacking blacks and Muslims, and many men are doing just that, all while the puppet masters tighten their control and continue with their plans, unimpeded.

There will be a marked increase in urban violence by blacks and non-urban violence by strategically placed refugees

Somalis in Minnesota

The population must experience enough fear so that they will accept pre-determined solutions, which includes Hillary Clinton being placed in power, the federalization of the police to establish greater centralized control over urban centers that remove local governance, and the weakening of white gun-owning patriots who live outside liberal cities.

It will take a lot more than the deaths of a dozen police officers for citizens and even local police to beg the government for help, so expect far more carnage, which may be postponed until after the November election (the elites have noticed that Trump is helped in the polls after urban violence). This scenario is classically Hegelian in that the government introduces a problem (chaos) for a reaction (citizen fear) that allows for their solution (crackdowns and greater control).

Remember all those Somalis and other brown migrants that are being placed in predominately white states? It's about time they get "activated" with guns from a Fast and Furious type of program so that patriots have to fight enemies on multiple fronts, making a future Bundy type of stand-off that we saw in Oregon impossible to succeed. The Feds will not experience much resistance to their Federalization plans in the cities as long as BLM does a good job in killing more cops, but the patriot white man remains a big thorn in their side and must be dealt with soon.

Institutions will fail and invert their objectives

CNN announcer admits that the channel is going all out to help Hillary Clinton

Lastly, you'll start seeing institutions invert their stated missions. The FBI will sponsor crimes instead of solve them. The Department Of Homeland Security will allow questionable foreigners to immigrate but punish law-abiding citizens. The Federal Reserve will sink the economy by destabilizing the banking system. Even non-governmental institutions will begin failing, and we're already seeing that happen in the media with their failure to control the narrative. Universities will teach anything except "education" and Christian churches will leap towards Satanism when they endorse soft forms of pedophilia.

You will no longer be able to trust or depend on institutions for providing the most basic of services. You'll only be able to depend on local alliances comprised of your friends, family, and local law enforcement. In spite of their faults, the police are being attacked specifically because they are the last line of local "tribesmen" that could resist Federal takeovers.

Conclusion

The name of the game for the elites is to foster enough chaos so that the Federal government can usher in their dream list of centralization while further tightening their squeeze on all patriotic communities and individuals. Blacks, Muslims, and other immigrants will be the useful idiots who create this chaos and sacrifice their lives after being manipulated and incited so that patriots and nationalists can be rooted out and crushed, similar to what happened in World War 2. Donald Trump is the wild card who is perhaps the only one able to alter the trajectory of these plans, but one should not count on him alone because of the strong forces he's up against.

You can probably survive riots and cop shootings in urban cities. You'll be able to avoid the most harmful acts of the government if you stay sharp. You'll also be able to avoid the media's lies to understand the truth of what is happening. But if the white patriots wake up and start fighting, the war is on and you should take your safety more seriously than ever. To predict what will happen in America, just watch what the white man does when his country is deliberately wrecked before his eyes.

I took a one-week trip to Croatia recently, visiting Dubrovnik and Ivan Dolac (on Hvar Island). I made two videos to show what it was like.

These destinations are better if you already have a girl instead of going there to meet Croatian girls. For that, Zagreb is your best option.

The Media Must Be Dismantled In Order For Freedom To Survive

October 25, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

There is an evil wind blowing through America and the world, and the source of the hot air is the media—in all its forms. The news media is rightfully railed on from many corners for its outrageous portrayal of "reality," but the way the media disease infects the body politic of America is much more insidious than talking heads in cheap suits.

The cancer of the media also permeates Hollywood film, sitcoms, and almost any other form of "entertainment" out there. Whether it's degenerate whores pushing an agenda of pedophilia in their music videos, or another predictable "GrrlPower" song denigrating men, the music industry also plays its part in molding the American populace into mindless, overworked, sarcastic, sheep with abrasive personalities.

I recently dropped in for a visit to The Matrix because I still have family there, and I must say it was a jarring experience. From inadvertently stepping into a white girl strip club and noticing how frigid and listless the girls were, to making the rounds getting some food at the grocer watching people lumber around like zombies, to eating some slop at a fast food joint surrounded by fatasses, I must say I could not wait to get the fuck out of 'Murica as quickly as possible. America is not a country as much as it is a coast to coast eatery and shopping mall. Sarcasm is now the national language.

These are things we've all heard before, but sometimes points deserve to be repeated. And most of the problem comes from social engineering via the media. This quote from Austrian philosopher Ivan Illich sums up the problems that troubled me as I observed people on my recent trip home, issues that left me terrified that this programmed environment is the blueprint for the entire world if the globalists have their way.

(Emphasis mine.)

> The machine-like behavior of people chained to electronics constitutes a degradation of their well-being and of their dignity which, for most people in the long run, becomes intolerable. Observations of the sickening effect of programmed environments show that people in them become indolent, impotent, narcissistic and apolitical. The political process breaks down because people cease to be able to govern themselves; they demand to be managed.

A 40 year old film predicted the day would come we would need to stop watching TV

Prevalent almost everywhere I went was the media broadcasting messages of political apathy and consumerism, spraying human beings with so many figurative cans of Raid. Why do people watch this shit nonstop? The Howard Beale monologue from Network perfectly sums up the situation:

> So if you want the Truth, go to God. Go to your gurus. Go to yourselves! …We deal in illusions, man. None of it is true!
> But you people sit there, day after day, night after night — all ages, colors, creeds. We're all you know! You're beginning to believe the illusions we're spinning here! You're beginning to think that the tube is reality and that your own lives are unreal.
> You do whatever the tube tells you — You dress like the tube. You eat like the tube. You raise your children like the tube. You even think like the tube. This is mass madness, you maniacs! In God's name, you people are the real thing.
> We are the illusion!

Which leads me to my next point as a 15-year veteran and now refugee from the totally corrupt news industry.

If you think the leg crossers are on Fox News for any other reason than sex appeal, you are mistaken…all media runs on sex

News Reporters Are Prostitutes

An old joke when I worked in the news industry was: the management are the pimps and we (the on-air personalities) are the prostitutes. As humorous as that may sound, it's actually worse than that. The corporations are the pimps and the news networks are their prostitutes.

News has always been biased, but the American media exists for one reason and one reason only in 2016—to further the agenda of the corporate-government complex a.k.a. the globalists. What is the corporate-government complex? It was defined early this year by The New Modern Man as:

> Large corporations (of which there are 16 that control over 90% of the products you consume at the grocery store and information you get to see or hear in the media) fund political campaigns and lobby for the government to have more power; in turn the government enacts laws favorable to large corporations. The left blames corporations while the right blames the government, when in reality the two interests work together to subvert the will of the people.

The thought has crossed my mind more than once that the 2016 presidential election has been decided before it even began. So why have the ruse? Because it's profitable to stir the sheeple up into a frenzy and it serves the interests of the political power structure to keep us divided against one another. As long as black and white people are fighting each other they are not fighting the real evil in the world, which is why the media creates racial problems to create profit.

You will never get any truth from the media when it comes to politics and many other issues.

You are what you watch just as much as you are what you eat

You Are What You Watch

We've all heard the old maxim you are what you eat. This needs to be taken a step further: You are what you're exposed to and what you see on television, whether you realize it or not.

Cracked actually wrote up an informative article detailing how movies affect the human brain. Here are the troubling findings.

- The brain can't separate fact from fiction
- Stories are invented to control you (they always have been, even before movies)
- The writer of a story always has an agenda (human nature, and in Hollywood, the influence of money)
- Generations of Americans have been raised and educated by pop culture
- Everything in the human brain is a story

See how film might just be one of the best brainwashing instruments ever conceived? When it comes to film being used to push political and social engineering schemes, Cracked wrote:

> This isn't some paranoid conspiracy theory — it's a fundamental part of how human culture came about. Ask yourself: Why do we go watch superhero movies? After all, variations of these stories about brave, superhuman heroes predate recorded history. We used to tell them around campfires before written language even existed.
> They were created as a way to teach you how to behave. The point is, this is why stories were invented — to shape your brain in a certain way. [Emphasis mine.]

In other words, careful what you watch, what you listen to, and especially what women and children are exposed to. It can literally wreck a society, as Hollyweird dreck and Miley Cyrus are wrecking this one.

Treehouse of Horror VI: Attack of the 50 ft. Eyesores contains an important message about advertising and media

The Media Must Die

In short, mass media is the most insidious form of thought and mind control that has ever been conceived. It obviously molds people into the mess of broken humanity we now see coast to coast in America.

How do we fight back against this evil?

Whether through self-inflicted wounds i.e. the fact nobody believes the news channels anymore, or as The Simpsons suggested in Treehouse of Horror VI, when people turn off their television sets the media and its deleterious effects on society will go away. In that Simpsons episode, a cosmic radiation storm caused advertising symbols came to life, and Lisa ran to the ad agency that created them looking for a solution.

> Lisa: If your advertising agency created all those giant characters, you must know how to stop them.
> Advertising Man: Well sir, advertising is a funny thing. If people stop paying attention to it, pretty soon, it goes away.
> Lisa: Like that old woman who couldn't find the beef?
> Advertising Man: Exactly. If you stop paying attention to the monsters, they'll lose their powers.

The Simpsons metaphor works nicely. If we collectively stop paying attention to the media except to mercilessly call them out on their bullshit, while looking elsewhere for information and entertainment (how about starting by living exciting lives instead of watching overpaid idiots pretend to have exciting lives!) the monsters of social engineering and consumerism plaguing modern society will also lose their powers.

The Network film character Howard Beale gave us a premonition of what we must collectively do.

> So turn off your television sets. Turn them off now! Turn them off right now! Turn them off and leave them off. Turn them off right in the middle of this sentence I'm speaking to you now. Turn them off!

Turning off mass media mind control from all centralized sources, including television, movies, and radio, may be the best thing we can do to cleanse the cancer eating Anglo society alive and turning the Western world towards abject tyranny.

I have personally not watched television in over a year since leaving the news industry, and my mind is more focused than it has ever been in my life. I will likely never own another television in my life. Come join me, life is better without mind control in your life.

Why Undercover Trump Supporters Are More Common Than You Think

October 25, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

He—and, in far rarer cases, she—stirs in a dark and sweaty room, like Martin Sheen at the beginning of "Apocalypse Now," pondering the future of America. The setting sun creeps in through the curtains illuminating the sturdy fist that's bracing his chin.

Thoughts rush through him at an incredible speed, rapidly deconstructing his personal politics, while shattering flimsy, false paradigms in his head like a sledgehammer through plexiglass. As he does this, the bottled-up, deeply suppressed reality of modern American politics starts flowing out with intense clarity.

On one hand, this deluge of enlightenment exhilarates the man; but on the other, he becomes fiercely frustrated that too many others around him, even closest family, are still in the dark. He eventually realizes, after attending dinner parties, reading the local left-leaning newspaper, and engaging in water-cooler conversation, that "too many" is, in fact, nearly everyone but him. Not only do his peers disagree, they accuse him of bigotry and ignorance for the sake of claiming the moral high ground.

"Toronto… shit; I'm still only in Toronto… every time I think I'm gonna wake up back in the jungle."

Reason and facts fail them. His calmness of tone rattles them. In the end, peers ostracize him by building up a straw man about him in their narrow minds. Thereafter, you consider restricting conversation with people to music, movies, sports, and apolitical current events just to keep the peace.

But you know if you continue down that dark and lonely path you will be suppressing your informed beliefs and turning red as your peers giggle and revel in lazy groupthink around you. At this point, you realize why you are sitting in this room—alone—to begin with.

Face The Enlightenment…

Meet the Closeted Trump Supporter, known herein as the "CTS." I know: some subscribers to the manosphere will scoff at this type of constituent, and make the, albeit reasonable, claim that concealing your beliefs and convictions out of fear of criticism or exclusion is a noted unmanly trait. While true, the CTS—like myself—has justification for his silence.

It comes down to making a cost-benefit analysis. For example, when living in a hugely liberal big city like Toronto, New York or Chicago (as I do), the CTS has to decide if publicizing his political views benefits his own bigger picture. Unlike Peter Thiel, the CTS does not have the social and monetary capital (yet) to show his true cards while safely knowing his value will out-leverage the consequences.

PayPal cofounder Peter Thiel came out of the closet as a Donald Trump supporter and donated 1.25 million to the man's presidential campaign.

If the CTS is relatively young and trying to make inroads into his particular industry, or his job depends on collaboration or maintaining a tight, trusted relationship with a group of clients, the best bet for the CTS is to focus on the work and keep the politics out of it, even if his clients or coworkers choose not to.

The CTS understands that most criticisms of Trump are not truly political, anyway. Hating Trump, largely, is just fashionable shop talk in social and professional circles, something that's easy for a laugh while one kicks back and relishes that fifth glass of Merlot.

The Mainstream Media (MSM) has worked overtime this election cycle exaggerating and twisting the things Trump says. The MSM dominates one of America's past times—the television—where it seeks to manufacture consent. Regular people, already crippled by their own social anxieties, mimic the MSM consensus in social settings to fit in with the group. A lot of hating Trump comes down to pure peer pressure. Simply, it has become socially acceptable.

The CTS shields his eyes not out of guilt, but weary frustration. The reality is most people just don't get it.

Hating Trump Is Usually About Peer Pressure

Granted, kernels of truth can be found in many falsehoods. Occasionally, Trump says things that are admittedly boneheaded or rude—his "Two Corinthians" gaffe, "look at these hands" and "eating machine" comments—which draw attention to his thin-skin complex and uncouthness.

It is easy, then, to badmouth Trump because the man has been turned into a walking meme (some of it his doing). At the same time, this is the only part of Trump the MSM chooses to focus on because it has an extreme bias.

The CTS also understands the complexity of The Trump Phenomenon. He grasps the paradox within all this: Trump is clumsy and oafish with his words, he lacks a seasoned politician's poise, and more than frequently abandons all semblance of tact. And yet, he represents the bedrock of Americana—free speech, sovereignty, and individualism—or everything the current Establishment, meaning the bought-and-paid-for Democrats and Republicans of D.C., hates.

Yes, Trump is a goon. But when you push past the tomfoolery that's been over-emphasized by the media and pay attention to the beat of his drum, you realize Trump is the best-intentioned, if not the brightest politico in the room. Lacking a politician's trained tongue, his policies tend to come off as unrealistic and formless. When his ability to articulate fails him, his words spin in circles and get reduced to rhetoric.

Trump may have nearly ate his microphone during the 2nd 2016 Presidential Debate, but he still came out on top with his "you'd be in jail" rebuke.

While Trump's instincts are sharp, he is not the best at communicating them. Instead, your usual Washington lapdog with the worst instincts (like a Hillary Clinton) is smoother and slicker at conveying his or her policy prescriptions and trending character attacks. See the paradox?

The CTS Gets The Great Paradox

Shakespeare called characters like Trump the “wise fool”—the court jester that unfailingly tells it like it is. The wise fool speaks in idiotic riddles that secretly hint at complex, important issues overlooked by the arrogant aristocrats.

Trump is that puckish character, blatantly explaining to American citizens that their stupid politicians are selling out their country to foreign interests and pulling “down thine own breeches” (if you will) with lousy trade deals.

The Fool In The Storm. Is there not a better metaphor for the rise of Donald Trump?

Since most people are followers with an one-track mind, the CTS cannot convey this complexity without the sheep responding with a dumbfounded furrowed brow. The CTS quickly discovers that the herd cannot comprehend the cognitive dissonance or, simply, do not want to hear it.

Instead, it rebuts with ad hominem attacks that distract from the deeper points the CTS is attempting to explore regarding Radical Islam, illegal immigration, and the globalist agenda. To the herd, you are just another “conspiracy theorist”.

When the CTS deems it necessary to speak his mind, he may relay his thoughts by asking a Socratic question. For example, a leftist coworker is raving at lunch about Trump’s “bad hombres” remark and declaring it another example of the Republican nominee’s racism.

While acknowledging Trump’s offhand choice of words (for a presidential debate), the CTS goes on to inquire how Trump bringing up the fact the United States has 11 million undocumented migrants and that the U.S. government should consider deportations or a pathway to legal status as a solution is racist. That person will likely respond with “he called them all rapists", to which you affirm that Trump did not call them all rapists; he alluded to the fact that a disproportionate number of illegals are committing crimes, namely drug running, murder, and rape.

Like in a social justice debate, don't lock horns with your opponent when discussing Trump. Just calmly defeat them with logic.

Instead of locking horns, you casually allow the bullhead to realize the falsities in their arguments. It is non-confrontational and yet you stand up for yourself and the truth.

Some readers may dispute that an alpha male risks confrontation to defend his beliefs. The CTS understands that notion, but also understands that to pick a fight feeds the stubbornness of your opponent and their assumptions of you as a bigot. Russell Brand could have freaked out at MSNBC, but instead he politely pointed out their own stupidity and arrogance, which, in his own way, was asserting his position.

Living With It

Adapt or die, the CTS realizes. When moving away is not an immediate option, the CTS learns how to mix in with his liberal urban populace while managing to hold on to his political beliefs. He accepts his isolation and difference of viewpoints from his peers as the waking up of his individuality.

He ditches Facebook, that leftist bubble. He reads the news he trusts. He continues to be skeptical. He questions authority, when it ought to be questioned. He finally concludes that too many people obsess over asserting their "identity" nowadays at the expense of getting anything done. He doesn't stress about that; he gets to work.

Today, in The Current Year of morally bankrupt spoiled brats and smartphone zombies, the Closeted Trump Supporter has never felt more alive. And there are plenty of us out there. We're just waiting to get federalized.

4 Ways To Kill Your Social Anxiety

October 25, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Limitless Brain

Social anxiety is a major problem most people face. Even if you're an outgoing guy, certain social situations, such as a business presentation or meeting girls at a bar, can trip you up. Human beings evolved to live life in small, tight-knit tribes, and social anxiety is in many ways a byproduct of the unnatural social environment we all live in. While some anxiety is natural, if you're suffering from too much of it, it can seriously impact your success in your career, with girls and in other aspects of your life.

Fortunately, it's possible for any man to reduce or kill his social anxiety and become a more confident, sociable person. Here are four ways you can lower your anxiety…

1. Take care of problems in your life as soon as possible

Most peoples' anxiety and stress stems in part from concrete events in their lives. If you’re stressed out about something—paying the bills, issues at work, or a family/relationship issue—it’s going to show in your behavior. If you have major problems in your life, you need to work on resolving them before you do anything else.

Society teaches people that you can eliminate anxiety with pills prescribed by your doctor, but this is a recipe for long-term misery. While it is possible to use supplements to lower your anxiety (more on that later), no substance can substitute for solving the underlying problems. Ultimately, the most effective way to deal with sources of stress is to eliminate them if you can.

2. Practice positive affirmations

Much of your internal state is determined by your own thoughts and actions, and by training yourself to think and act positively, you can reduce your social anxiety considerably. Self-talk methods have been scientifically proven to help people achieve their goals and improve their lives.

Most people already unconsciously practice self-talk, but it’s negative self-talk. If you constantly—even jokingly—refer to yourself as an “asshole,” “crazy” or other negative terms, your brain will internalize them and they’ll become a self-fulfilling prophecy. By using positive affirmations, you can reshape your reality by training your mind to accomplish your goals, akin to Adam Savage’s quote, “I reject your reality and substitute my own.”

Keep in mind that your affirmations have to be realistic goals. Part of the positive affirmation process is finding out what you really want out of life and pursuing it. Remember the difference between a wish and a goal: a wish is something you’d like to happen but don’t really care about, while a goal is deeply-held and attainable. By reorienting the way you view the world, you can achieve the things that you once thought were impossible.

3. Try to be more social on a day-to-day basis

YALE GUN CLUB.

In many ways, sociability is like a muscle: if you don't use it, you'll lose it. If you live alone and barely talk to anyone during the course of your day, you're going to be at a disadvantage when it comes time to be sociable. Priming your brain for social interaction isn't something you can cram for, but a natural process that you have to engage in the moment you get out of bed in the morning.

If you have a big party or event coming up, you need to ease yourself into it by being as social as you can over the course of your day. Strike up conversations with store clerks and cashiers, say hi to people on the street, and generally try to be as friendly as you can, even if you don't want to. Much in the same way that it's better to practice learning something for a little bit each day instead of cramming in a single day, being social every day will naturally lower your anxiety levels.

4. Use anxiety-reducing supplements

While antidepressants and other doctor-prescribed mood-altering drugs are generally bad for you, there are legal, over-the-counter supplements you can take that will ease your social anxiety. If used properly, certain supplements can naturally lower your anxiety levels and put your mind at ease. For example, one of the most effective supplements for reducing anxiety is Limitless Brain. It contains eight natural nootropic ingredients, including l-theanine, huperzine A, and sulbutiamine, designed to lower your anxiety levels and improve your health in a natural fashion.

Keep in mind that like any other substance, these supplements can be abused and misused. You shouldn't be using any substance as your sole method of fighting social anxiety; they can't wallpaper over underlying issues in your life or natural insecurities. Supplements are an effective tool for fighting social anxiety, but you can only use them to enhance your existing state; if you have serious problems in your life and/or a negative mindset, you should work on those first.

While most people suffer from social anxiety to a certain degree, it’s a simple process to get rid of the anxiety that you do possess. By making changes in your day-to-day life, using certain supplements and altering your mindset, you can overcome your social anxiety and become a more charming and successful man.

4 Reasons Liberalism Is A Cult

October 26, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

The American Presidential election looms ever closer, with the liberal candidate Hillary Clinton seeming to still win the (rigged?) polls despite ever increasing scandals. I want to use today's space to examine some of the apparent inconsistencies of the left, the underlying motivations of their views, and how those views are fundamentally incompatible with the ideas of us here at Return Of Kings.

Modern liberalism, or leftism if you prefer, possesses several contradictions that make it seem logically impossible to hold all their ideas at one time in your head without suffering from an extreme case of cognitive dissonance. Whether it be simultaneously embracing the gay rights movement and feminism while having sympathy for fundamentalist Muslims, or how you can be for gun control to save all the toddlers who were lucky enough to survive your pro-abortion policies, any liberal platform point is so weak that any rational person sees his point made and won with no effect at all; the lefty simple rattles on to their next talking point without having the good sense to know that they lost.

How can someone have an unreasonable political philosophy that is self-defeating and irrational and still hold their head up as a person of sense? They can't, and the reason that they appear to do so is because we are mistaking modern day liberalism as a movement of rational thought and philosophy.

It's not. It's a religion. More accurately, it's a cult. Here are four hallmark behaviors of the liberal that are cult-like.

1. They “feel” instead of think

Rational thought is what sets humanity apart from the beast; we are born significantly premature to allow our oversized brains out of the womb. Using tools and critically perceiving our surroundings and making rational decisions is what allowed us to dominate larger animals and survive and flourish over thousands of years.

Liberals don’t think; thinking leads to examination of yourself and the world, and if you don’t like what you see, you will feel bad about yourself, and liberals don’t like feeling bad. While the rational way to deal with feeling bad would be to improve yourself and feel good about your successes, liberals would rather feel good by ignoring their situation, which is one reason why marijuana use is so popular with the left.

This is why many liberal arguments make no sense. Liberals agree that one should not feed wild animals in a park lest they become dependent on artificial aid, yet they have no issue giving money and food to bums in person, nor do they have any issue with even the most exorbitant welfare programs.

It is about FEELING. A liberal feels good when he gives money to a homeless person, even though that money might keep the homeless person in complacency instead of finding the will to better themselves. Writ large, the liberal feels good about their taxes supporting welfare programs and really good about your taxes being used for welfare programs as well.

Liberals are pro-illegal immigration, even though illegals commit much crime, because it feels good to help disadvantaged brown people, and it assuages their institutionalized white guilt. Liberals are pro-gun control, because it feels good to make guns the villains and make criminals victims as well. Liberals are pro-abortion because women that don’t have kids are in better physical shape than women who have had them, and it feels good to be hot, and you don't have to feel bad when an abortion happens as the kid was not a person yet.

2. The only crime is not being liberal enough

Liberalism, being of a religious value, excuses everything. Running for President of the USA on a pro-woman ticket yet your husband is a rapist and you covered up for him? Not a problem, you two are liberals, and you're excused since that makes you a good person.

How can Hillary Clinton attack Trump for the birther thing when she started it when campaigning against Obama? How can she criticize Trump's comments to women when her husband's acts against women are far worse and far more numerous? How can she consider Trump too reckless to have control over the nation's nuclear weapons when she drops classified info about them on national television?

She's a liberal and she is excused from all evil; he is not.

This sort of "for me, but not for thee" thinking is the bedrock of a cult. Everyone who lives in the USA as a citizen is supposed to be considered your fellow man; one nation under God. Hillary, with her infamous deplorables comment as a prime example, has shown that she is possibly the very first American Presidential candidate that hates a large segment of the populace of the country. Even Barack Obama values me for my tax revenue.

Compare this with the viciousness with which a liberal will turn on another liberal when they are not liberal enough. Any Bernie Sanders supporter will be able to attest to this. Truly, the only sin you can commit while liberal is not towing the party line hard enough. This is straight from any hard-core religion or cult's manual on keeping the believers faithful.

3. Everything is pro-them

Once you look beyond the hypocrisy of their standards, you can see the hypocrisy of their stances. Wouldn't it seem a little illogical to be pro-abortion, which murders little kids, but be pro-gun control, in order to protect these little kids? The only time the Democrats won't use children in their campaign platforms is when they're talking about abortion rights.

Liberals are pro-abortion because it gives them power and privilege to end their casual sex "oopsies" at any time they want. They're pro-gun control because they don't own guns, and if the only people who do are their obedient agents of the State's power, then there won't be any crime and the deplorables won't be able to fight back against their statist programs. It doesn't have anything to do with children at all; it's all about what benefits them, and only them.

4. They want everyone to be like them, by force if necessary

Liberals fear independent thought, and so they hate the middle class. Rich people have so much money, and probably more than a little guilt to exploit, that they can be co-opted into the liberal cult easily and used for their money.

Everyone else, however, needs to be poor enough to be dependent on the liberal machine. The liberal view is that people need to be powerless, because, even if they are miserable, prosperity and happiness will be assured because the state will tell you that you are so and you will not be allowed to disagree.

What can you do?

You can't reason with a fanatic. The greatest debates are had when there is either no proof, or there is, but one or more sides will simply not listen. We can extol conservative or libertarian values all day long and point out how they are backed up by reality, but, if they are blinded, they will not see.

If Trump wins, do not gloat to these people, for their machine will take a long time to dismantle, and even a headless snake is dangerous. If Clinton wins, do not lament around them either, for you merely mark yourself as a target.

The best thing to do is to get people of the left out of your life the best you can. Friendships can be stopped, and acquaintances through social activities can be distilled down to only interactions of that activity, though you should really ask yourself if a hobby that is shared with liberals is really worth keeping. Same thing with churches, although it is hard to find a church that is still traditional and not yet corrupted by feminism and liberalism.

Work will be a difficult one. We have covered being in a "man's field" before, and that helps to a degree. Beyond that, simply not speaking with leftist coworkers other than necessary conversations for business should be your goal, and this will go double if you have one for a boss.

Conclusion

We’re in a transitory stage between reasonable and friendly disagreement and open physical violence being the norm. Open sabotage and various legal and illegal acts used by the left against their ideological foes is the order of the day.

We must be hard targets against the hate of the left, as there is nothing that a liberal hates more than a successful, middle-class, white, Christian, straight man. Do not allow them access to any vulnerabilities, but do not draw attention to yourself either. Great forces are at play during these current times, much can be accomplished by simply stepping out of the way at the right time.

Why Every Man Must Take Control Of His Finances

October 26, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

The world that we live in is nothing like the world that our parents lived in. Back in the pre-globalization era, of roughly 1940-1990, it was completely feasible to expect a corporation to pay your salary and help ease you into retirement.

Back in this "golden era," corporations actually looked out for their employees. Through various financial means, such as the Roth 401k or a conventional pension, employers could expect to be getting a reliable deposit bi-monthly in order to help them sustain their standard of living all throughout their retirement years.

It also used to be that a college degree was something to aspire to; something that guaranteed you a well-paying job, that would allow you to support a family of four with just a single college graduate's income. This is obviously no longer the case.

Now, in 2016, the rate of unemployment for college graduates is officially 7%, but we all know the games that the economists play. The fact of the matter is that it's more likely around 15%. Anybody who talks to a lot of people quickly realizes that unemployment rates are far higher than are being reported.

Now, corporations do not care about your well-being. You're a year away from retiring and getting that pension? Oh, too bad—they'll just fire you and you'll never be able to cash out. And, with the rise of globalism, this has only gotten worse.

The Rise Of The Corporations

With the advent of globalism, your job is no longer safe. Anything that can be outsourced for cheaper, will be outsourced for cheaper; this is just a fact. If you work in a customer service based industry, expect your job to be replaced by machines within the next decade or two.

Just in the past 5 years, we've gone from needing 5-10 cashiers per grocery market to just 1-2, due to the automated checkout machines that have been incorporated. If you work a job that pays you minimum wage, expect to lose your job in the near future.

Don't expect your 401k to cash out, either—as was clearly seen in 2008, with plenty of corporations going bankrupt, you can't even count on them to follow the promises that they've made to you.

This is not to say that there won't be more opportunities; we do in fact, live in an age of unprecedented opportunity, for those who are willing to take risks. This is the key, however, you must be willing to take risks. Most men, who are cowards deep down, will not thrive in this unprecedented period of uncertainty.

If, however, you follow some of the advice that I will lay out in this article, you can expect yourself to be a very wealthy man.

Job Uncertainty

A lot of people may read this article and proclaim that I'm being overly-negative, but anyone with a pair of eyes can see that I'm being realistic. There has never been a time, all throughout history, where so much change was happening so quickly. The only time that even can close to the rapid level of change occurring now was the Industrial Revolution.

And even then, jobs were at least certain—if you couldn't continue to be a farmer, you could at least find a job in a nearby city as a factory worker or something. But now? How are you supposed to compete with some guy 10,000 miles away in India or China? You can't.

The following is a list of jobs that will likely disappear within the next 10 years:

- Farmers
- Postal Workers
- Factory Workers
- Fishermen
- Power Plant Workers
- Basically Any Blue Collar Job Involving Technology and Not Manpower

Technology beating out our jobs, combined with stupid economic policies that slice medical professionals' wages, means that we will be seeing a global economic shift in which jobs are available. Expect IT jobs to shoot through the roof to accommodate the surge in technology.

Also, expect jobs that require actual analysis and thought to go up. Anything that a machine can't do (yet) is safe (for now). Things like writing well-thought out articles, providing emotional support, researching public policies, and anything that requires higher cognitive functioning will go up in demand.

Irresponsible Fiscal Policies

Ever since 2008, the amount of base currency has sky-rocketed as the Federal Reserve has flooded our economy with paper notes, in a futile attempt to jump-start our dying economy. I won't get too far into the economics, because plenty of smarter men have explained this before me, but here's the gist of it:

In 2008 our economy crashed due to a large number of faulty loans; after this crash, the Federal Reserve started what is known as "quantitative easing," or "pumping fake money into our economy."

In other words, by giving banks a ton of excess money, their hope was that these banks would lower their interest rates, leading to more businesses taking risks. This is all well and good, but the only problem is that there hasn't been a fundamental change; it's all fake, propped up by fiat currency. In other words, the value of our dollar is plummeting, and once we hit a critical mass, it will be worth next to nothing.

Every single nation that has employed a fiat currency has suffered a catastrophic economic collapse at some point in history:

- The Roman Empire in the 3rd century
- China in the 11th century
- France in the late 1700's
- Germany after WWI
- Mexico in 1994
- Zimbabwe in 2008
- The USA…soon to come

Once our currency reaches a critical mass, it will be impossible to import anything due to our ridiculously low currency value. In other words, 85% of the goods that we depend on (from China, Thailand, and Malaysia) will no longer be accessible.

This is what we refer to here in ROK when we mention “shit hitting the fan,” and “the collapse.” Prepare yourself accordingly, because you can bet that there will be riots.

How Can You Profit?

Now that I’ve discussed all of the negative aspects of globalism and job uncertainty, I’d like to present the upside. Yes, we live in a world of unprecedented uncertainty, but we also live in a world of unprecedented opportunity.

There are three general ways that the men of ROK can profit off of the current uncertainty and upcoming economic changes:

1. Get a skill that won’t be outsourced
2. Utilize the internet
3. Invest in precious metals

It’s really that simple. The first thing you must do is get a source of income that wont be quickly outsourced. Any trade will do, such as plumbing, electrical work, or oil rigging. Other skills such as writing, sales, or being able to think philosophically are good, too.

Next, utilize the internet to start setting up passive streams of revenue—I’ll talk more about this later. Lastly, put a large portion of your money into precious metals, because they’ve been shown to retain their value over millennia (unlike currencies).

Get A Skill That Won’t Be Outsourced

The very first thing that you must do is get a skill set that will be valuable 100% of the time. This includes things such as blue collar trades, medical professions, sales, and construction. Generally speaking, if you do something with your hands, or that requires a large amount of knowledge, you're safe.

That being said, the times are changing—if you want to excel in a certain profession, I recommend that you make a website and learn some basic SEO. Advertise your skills online, and with some time and effort, you can be earning an additional $15,000+ per year.

If you don't have a skill that you can perform as a service, consider making an eBook and selling it for $100/day in passive revenue. I know plenty of men, Roosh and myself included, that make a good income from selling eBooks. There's virtually zero barrier to entry, and if you sell them through your own blog, you keep 100% of the profits.

I recommend that you also start saving up—this is key. Learn the principles of wealth and start integrating them into your life. Don't waste money on frivolous things; save most of it up so that you can invest it wisely and ride the tailwinds of the upcoming economic changes.

Investing To Profit Off Global Uncertainty

As a few of my blog readers know, I almost tripled my money in just 5 months from investing in precious metals. I was smart enough to sense the upcoming global uncertainty, right before Brexit, and invested in ABX (a gold mining company) and SLW (a silver-streaming company). In fact, I tweeted about my investment right before these stocks nearly tripled; I want to help the manosphere gain more financial power in the world, because that's what we need.

With Brexit, the Euro's currency as well as certainty in the future of globalism plummeted, which netted me a nice 268% increase in my funds within just a few months. I got out of the stock market during the summer, but recently got back in after the precious metals industry slumped.

I expected the values of gold and silver to sky-rocket over the next 2-5 years, as we begin to see just how much global uncertainty there is. If Trump is elected, which I certainly believe he will be, then gold will shoot through the roof, with foreign speculators withdrawing their investments.

Not to mention the migrant crises going on all throughout Europe—with the EU slowly dying after Brexit set off the chain of events that it did, it seems that the only steady investment in the foreseeable future is gold. I recommend that every man have at least $5,000 worth of gold stashed away somewhere in case of a crisis. Gold is a universal currency, and with it, you can travel anywhere and pay for anything in any country.

But, don't forget to invest in yourself—buy books, seminars, and video-courses. Spend time cultivating your mind through meditation and improving your body by working out. The best investment is truly yourself; knowledge cannot be taken from you, wisdom cannot be taken from you, and your body is your greatest asset.

Overall, the next 10 years will be extremely uncertain—the US may experience a resurgence of masculinity and we may experience millions of men taking back our country, or it may devolve into a dictatorship with Queen Hillary pushing an open borders policy. Either way, you need to prepare yourself for the impending changes.

How A Communist Brainwashing Method Was Exported To The United States

October 26, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

During the height of the Cold War, the CIA attempted to develop mind control techniques with the MKULTRA program. As it happens, the Communists already had a leg up on them. We'll explore how this was done, along with some new twists.

The criticism and self-criticism technique in history

This is what happens to people who joke about Chairman Mao ripping off Hillary's wardrobe.

The technique of "criticism and self-criticism" (kritika i samokritika) was developed during the early days of the Soviet Union. This got results. When the early Soviet show trials and purges took place, the targets would confess to committing treason—the details stretching credulity—and beg for execution. The Maoists (Chinese Communists) used it too, typically during "struggle sessions." Also, forced confessions were required in Vietnam for prisoners in reeducation camps.

What happened wasn't much different from a medieval inquisition. Those targeted would be badgered until they confessed to whatever it was they supposedly did. Of course, physical forms of coercion were also an option. These weren't actual trials; their fates were already decided.

The lucky ones were released and got to resume their lives as before, after their memorable reminder to toe the Party line. Others faced stiffer penalties than that: from loss of Party membership (and accompanying status) all the way up to execution. No amount of compliance or abject groveling could save them if it was predetermined that they were going to be purged or killed.

After the ordeal, survivors were surely scared witless. With their egos beaten down, they were ready to do as they were told without question. It's basically a form of brainwashing. As for those who were executed after that, the purpose of going through the motions was for benefit of the audience. It was political theater, convincing those present that they were delivering justice to wrongdoers, and serving as an example of what could happen to those who step out of line.

Other than that, the "criticism and self-criticism" technique—badgering and forcing a confession—also was picked up in the USA during the 1960s by certain cults and oddball encounter groups. Today, we might think of these strange and humiliating rituals as a thing of the past, but the truth is that they've merely changed form. As I've noted previously, cultural Marxism is a crappy and inherently destructive "for-export" variety of Communism, so it's no great surprise that it has adapted this technique for its purposes.

Modern witch hunts

This is what happens to people who say that Bruce Jenner is actually a dude.

When people are encouraged to become incensed over even tiny things, this causes a "walking on eggshells" atmosphere. In today's politically correct climate, it's easy to run afoul of the Thought Police. This might result in a visit to the HR Department, or a campus "speech code" investigation. However, if the thoughtcrime is serious enough—or the target is prominent enough—then this can ignite a media circus. Also, someone could end up featured on a mailing list for Social Justice Warriors. Besides just trolling and harassment, this can result in doxxing (release of your personal information) or pressure on an employer to fire the thought criminal.

We in the Western world pride ourselves on the right to free speech. That was one of the main goals of liberalism, back in the 18th Century when liberalism was still a good thing. Actually, many "free" countries criminalize politically incorrect speech. Even in places that don't have legal penalties for speaking your mind, it carries the risk of the loss of your livelihood. This effectively makes entire policy arguments forbidden to articulate, which naturally is the whole point. Other goals, of course, are information control and thus thought control. So much for freedom of speech! It took a few centuries, but liberals now oppose what they once stood for.

The following scenario has happened time and again. Someone points out an inconvenient truth, writes something that offends someone, donates to the "wrong" cause, mocks a feminist's First World problems, tells an off-color joke, or even wears the wrong T-shirt. Then the feeding frenzy begins, resulting in torrents of criticism. Usually the target apologizes profusely, but loses his job no matter how abject or groveling his apologies are.

It's possible to convince a judge and twelve jurors that you're not guilty of something, but good luck getting the media or an online SJW mob to calm down and leave you alone! The traditional Communist session was better in one way. That is, they quit after breaking the target's will. A modern feeding frenzy, though, can drag on for months, even after the target has been begging for forgiveness. What goes on the Internet can stay there forever, including lies about you.

If you get caught in a Social Justice Weenie witch hunt, never apologize. Explain and clarify if you absolutely must. This is for the benefit of the uncommitted; the SJWs will already have made up their small minds about you and won't stop no matter what you do. Never let them break your frame! Instead, go on the attack. You have a right to your own opinion and to express it.

If you beg for their forgiveness, then you will be allowing them to turn their criticism into your self-criticism. Remember that groveling is unlikely to save you! Apologies are for people who actually did something wrong. Having a difference of opinion isn't wrong, despite some people's curious notions about freedom of speech.

Here are some other particulars to remember:

- You can't reason with them; online mobs don't know you and have been told that you're an evildoer.
- You'll probably never know exactly what was said about you, who said it, and what email list all that was on. (If you do find out, sue for defamation of character.) However, you can be sure that you've already been deemed guilty.
- They're not interested in the truth. SJWs have great difficulty comprehending basic logic. Many of them don't even believe in objective reality; only their feelings are real to them. Why would the truth matter to these idiots?
- Finally, Social Justice Weenies are a bunch of losers. Their opinion of you matters less than that of a snotty child cursing you out. Therefore, don't let these oxygen-wasters mess with your self-esteem.

Societal criticism and self-criticism

Wallowing in guilt at its finest

The Frankfurt School, a Communist think tank that moved to the USA and began subverting the educational system, developed critical theory. One of their top classics was Eros and Civilization by Herbert Marcuse. It contained lots of Freudian arguments on how our society was too repressed and we needed to loosen up our morals. Another was The Authoritarian Personality by Theodor Adorno. That too contained Freudian mumbo-jumbo, smearing right wing politics with accusations of neurosis and homo Daddy issues. All told, they wrote dozens of books along those lines, some attacking Western civilization directly. These vaporings wouldn't have amounted to much, if they hadn't become trendy in academia and influenced the 1960s zeitgeist.

Meanwhile, radical feminism—the Second Wave—was starting up. This too had lots of Communist influence, another front of cultural Marxism. This also was all about criticism of our culture. This caused friction between the sexes, driving a wedge deep into the heart of society. The results included the snarky, snotty, and spoiled attitudes you've surely encountered. Worse, this caused untold misery from high divorce rates and broken homes.

This was one of several movements that became prominent during the 1960s and are still with us today. (Surely you can think of many others.) The methodology was the same—all angrily made overblown complaints about how bad society has been to them. The way they tell it, they're out fighting for their rights. The goal of cultural Marxism, though, was all about attacking our morale and softening us up. The people involved in those movements were merely tools, being used by leaders who were in it for power, money, and status.

The educational system has been dumbed down. History has been rewritten too. Figures like Christopher Columbus and the US Founding Fathers are bad guys now. Even as early as the 1980s, campuses were hell-bent in purging “DWEMs” (their charming term for “dead White European males”) from the literary canon. None of this was really about inclusiveness; it’s all about robbing our people of our heritage, making us ashamed of our accomplishments, and destroying our resolve.

The propaganda is everywhere. Television is full of social and political messages, even in shows for children, and piggybacked onto advertisements too. “Sensitivity training” courses deliver politically correct indoctrination. College campuses are notorious for pushing propaganda. This even happens to elementary school kids. (My first exposure was in second grade.) Some of the indoctrination exercises require audience participation, such as forcing them to fill out “privilege” checklists (with the facts cherry-picked) to instill a sense of “collective guilt.”

All this has worked according to plan. Many are out of touch with their roots, and don’t understand that they have a heritage worth preserving. Worse, others have been infected by guilt trips. Sometimes this leads to public spectacles of wallowing in guilt; again, there’s the self-criticism part.

The antidote to this is the truth. The fact is, every civilization has its good points and its bad points, and ours is no exception. It’s rotten hypocrisy for the bullshit merchants in academia and the media to dwell on our faults and overlook those of other parts of the world, while selectively ignoring our accomplishments and elevating those of others. The truth is that none of our shortcomings or misdeeds are solely found in Western civilization, but some of our good characteristics are indeed unique.

You can protect your children by home schooling them or sending them to a private school where they won’t be indoctrinated. You can always get rid of your TV too. Meanwhile, though, millions of other students will be putty in the hands of propagandizing professors and teachers, and of course the lying media. Those pushing this from the top down must be called out, exposed, and removed from power.

We’re Finally Opening A T-Shirt Shop For ROK Gear

October 26, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We’re about to launch Red Kings Shop, which will sell ROK branded clothing. We’re starting with a limited run of a basic red t-shirt. Here’s a bearded fellow we hired to model the shirt…

We will do a soft launch of the store in approximately one week to those who sign up with their email address. If you want to be the first in line to get your shirt, click here for the Red Kings Shop homepage and enter your email address. The sign up will be removed in approximately 48-72 hours.

Donald Trump And His Supporters Are Fighting A Rigged System

October 27, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

At the third debate, Donald Trump was asked if he would accept the results of the election. Trump responded that he would have to look at the process to determine if everything was done fairly before he could accept it. The media went berserk claiming that Trump was undermining democracy. But is the US system really rigged? And if it is, can Trump overcome it?

Why rig the system?

The elite realize that their time is short.

> Woe to the inhabiters of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. Revelation 12:12

It is human nature to want to accumulate wealth. It is also human nature to want to keep what you have. One of the ways that the wealthy do that is through influencing the political process to ensure it is favorable to them. A democratic republic is particularly easy to influence. The wealthy elite can “buy” candidates through donations to them or to their superpacs. They can make voting patterns more favorable to them by changing the country’s demographics. Or they can influence voters through the supposedly unbiased news media that they control. In the US, the wealthy elite use every one of these levers to rig the system.

For example, liberal voters often favor a progressive tax system where high earners pay greater percentages than those who earn less. It sounds like a populist policy but it is not. Progressive taxation is put in place to prevent middle class people from rising into the ranks of the truly wealthy who have already accumulated their wealth and are taxed at the much lower capital gains rate. Progressive taxation keeps the rich on top and keeps the plebs down. That’s why no matter which political party is in power, we are still stuck with progressive taxation.

Everything goes well as long as both parties don’t rock the boat. But once you get a true wildcard like Trump, the system must spring into action to stop the threat to the established order. That’s what we are seeing now. The elite are using every tool in the arsenal of the rigged system to ensure Trump does not upset their gravy train. The elite sense their time is short.

Voter Fraud

The first way in which the election is rigged is through voter fraud. In his Gettysburg address, Trump outlined some of the ways in which this occurs:

> According to Pew, there are 24 million voter registrations that in the US that are either invalid or significantly inaccurate. 1.8 million dead people are registered to vote, and some of them are voting. I wonder how that happens? 2.8 million people are registered to vote in more than one state. These are numbers folks. These are numbers. 14% of noncitizens are registered to vote.

Liberals always object to any sort of voter identification requirement. They say that it negatively affects minority voters, who may not have any identification. But this is obvious nonsense. The real reason liberals oppose voter identification is because it would make voter fraud more difficult.

By raising concerns about voter fraud, Trump is firing a warning shot. He is saying that he will fight voter fraud, unlike prior GOP candidates who preferred defeat to calling out cheating by the other side. Simply putting the Democrats on notice may cause them to cheat less than they would have otherwise. The only question is whether Trump will be able to muster enough votes to overcome the amount of cheating that will take place.

The Lügenpresse

A second way that the system is rigged is through the legacy news media. These include the three oldest television news networks (ABC, CBS, NBC) as well as the newer ones (CNN, MSNBC, Fox). It also includes the remaining newspapers, especially the New York Times, Washington Post, and the Wall Street Journal. Of these, the only ones that are reliably conservative are Fox and the WSJ, both of which are owned by Rupert Murdock. But even here, it is more accurate to call Fox and the WSJ "neoliberal" rather than conservative as they both push the globalist message of open borders and unenforced trade.

Trump is very media savvy. He's been in the public eye since the 1980s and his philosophy has been that no publicity is bad publicity. Trump has used this to highlight his policies. By making controversial statements, he has been able to force the media to cover his positions. Still, the nonstop smear campaign has hurt Trump's numbers particularly among older voters who still get their news from legacy sources.

New media outlets like Return of Kings, Breitbart, and Danger & Play have been more favorable to Trump but the most highly funded new media such as Daily Beast, Heat Street, Buzzfeed, and Huffington Post all push the globalist message. The end result that Trump is fighting an ocean of disinformation with only a handful of allies by his side.

Voter Discouragement

Fivethirtyeight doing its best to discourage Trump voters.

Another way that that system is rigged is that the legacy media conspires to discourage Trump voters from going to the polls. One way they do this is to over poll Democrats to make it look like Trump is losing. For example, one recent poll placed Hillary 12 points higher than Trump. But even Obama was only able to beat McCain by 7 points even though he was packing stadiums of 70,000 people. And Hillary doesn't command the sort of adulation that Obama did in 2008.

There is a huge motivation gap between Trump and Clinton. Recently, Trump held a rally in Tampa where 28,000 people showed up. Some of these people waited in line for 12 hours for the chance to see Trump. A day later, Hillary hosted a rally in Florida where only 1000 people showed up. And some of those were likely paid plants. Her running mate Tim Kaine did even worse barely getting 30 people to show up for one of his events.

One day before the Brexit vote, polls showed Remain leading by 10 points. Leave ended up winning by 3.5 points.

Why does the legacy media report polls that show Trump losing by a landslide? Because it is designed to dishearten Trump voters.

Conclusion

Will Trump be able to overcome the rigged system? It will be a heroic achievement if he does. One thing is certain: This is not the time to give up but to fight with all of our might. The elites want us to be discouraged, to give up hope, to lie down and die. That is the one thing we will never do. Even if the host of hell rise up to oppose you, go to the ballot box on November 8th. Regardless of what you may hear otherwise, your life will be very different under President Trump than it will be under globalist pawn Hillary.

Win or lose, our battle to bring back the patriarchy will not end on November 8th. A Trump victory would give us breathing room to start restoring our society in the open. A Hillary victory, heaven forbid, would signal that our work will need to be underground. Either way, our battle is just beginning. In future columns I will outline the way forward for traditional men.

4 More Emotions Men Should Master

Last week I expounded the idea that we should take the time to ponder about emotions. These matter much in prompting us to take action or not to, to think about something or not to. Sustained emotional states can lead us to pedestalize girls, ignore our own needs, or refraining from caring about our own interests, whereas others push theirs every day. They can also allow said girls to go shamelessly after short-term pleasure, or be complacent to rapefugees while shrieking and finger-waving against men of their own kin.

Pondering passions and emotions does not mean getting led by them at the expense of critical thinking. Rather, it is the exact opposite, as it allows us to spot the shrewd ones who want to push our emotional buttons, as well as being freer to take more thoughtful and actually less emotion-determined actions. Once we have gained awareness of passions, we can decide which ones we want to stimulate and why.

Following this idea, I made some suggestions of how and in whom we could stir positive emotions such empathy, hope, and love. Today I will do the same with four other passions or emotions: admiration, shame, humility, and fear.

1. Admiration

Society, I think, should admit some victimhood to those who were raised as weaklings or acted cluelessly out of good intentions. Women in particular should be more empathetic and nurturing towards nice and beta males—as long as their empathy does not extent out of admitted boundaries—hence taking an opposite direction from the egotistical, uncaring orientation a lot of them currently harbor. Of course, this should not equate to validating too much the unhealthy, unmanly men: women should also be trained into validating more manlier men. And here admiration comes into play.

As Nassim Taleb put it, we are living more and more in an “extremistan” where those at the highest level take the lion’s share while the resources diminish quickly down the ladder. Girls today tend to admire only the most famous or high-status people, which leads them to despise the ninety-nine per cent. This exasperated hypergamy should be tamed so that the average man, as long as he achieves the minimum and/or is upstanding and dutiful, gets his fair share. A more “democratic” but still conditional distribution of girls’ admiration would reward actual good behaviour for men and decrease the intramasculine competition.

Girls should also admire—and not mock—proper feminine role models. Upstanding mothers, females taking proper care of themselves and so on ought to be at least esteemed by the average girl.

2. Shame

> Shame arises from measuring our actions against moral standards and discovering that they fall short. If our actions fall short and we fail to notice, we can 'be shamed' or made to notice… Shame is normally accentuated if its object is exposed, but, unlike embarrassment, also attaches to a thought or action that remains undisclosed and undiscoverable to others. (Neel Burton, Heaven and Hell, chap.4, p.38)

A particularly strong emotion, shame usually comes as a blow, makes one lose face or composure, to eventually feel guilt or remorse. Just like other strong emotions, it has been used with consumed malignancy by the Left.

Leftists created a narrative where whites are held entirely responsible for dreadful historical phenomena such as slavery, the Holocaust, an oppression of "minority" groups, or "racism." As these phenomena are constantly talked about and expanded, whites are also supposed to feel a correspondingly boundless guilt. The sheer power of guilt can explain why so many whites have been afraid to stand up: being shamed as a "racist" or "Nazi" can be enough to endure rejection from one's family, lose reputation and employment.

Shame can be aroused through two levers: the standards one agrees with, and one's purported responsibility. Both levers have been skillfully used to *un*shame the liberal-favored groups. As for the standards, feminists attacked what they called slut-shaming while also shaming relentlessly manly behavior, and as for the responsibility, pretty much all those who claim to identify with a "minority" tend to deny all by slipping it over the majority's shoulders.

This is how you get persistent offenders or Jihadi families expressing neither shame nor remorse, whereas the productive, working, and normally sociable person gets nagged for being white. In the Current Year, better be a true rapist who can evade responsibility and shame by invading Europe than a young virgin of European descent.

What we should do here sounds pretty obvious in theory though it will be much harder to carry on in practice, as people evidently hate being shamed, especially when they have been accustomed of blaming everything on the others.

Shame the fatties, shame the arrogant snowflakes whose unwillingness to respect is all too obvious, recall the self-determination of anti-white liberals and criminals. They all made free choices. They should carry all associated responsibility.

As for us, we must keep our face straight, never make clueless concessions to skillful framers or hysterical SJWs. If they appeal to moral standards, put forth your own as legitimate. If they appeal to your purported actions or responsibility, emphasize theirs—and how it cannot be boiled down to external factors.

Even dogs and cats are considered responsible by their caretakers so they can be punished for bad behaviours and learn: likewise, granting certain people or groups a constant de-responsabilization amounts to give them a free pass for destroying everything. Criminals of said groups have agency, and the liberals who gave them a pass to plunder and kill whitey are responsible as well.

Shame can also arise from being associated with something or someone deemed as despicable. The liberal policy of distinguishing sharply between terrorists and documented aliens, in spite of how much the latter to house the former, allows for the latter going without shame even when they are closely associated with terrorists—whereas every white is threatened with shame if he has a “-ist” or “-phobic” acquaintance.

Turn the table. Shake off the burden from the disenfranchised majority, and put it back on those who have been acting with impunity for too long.

3. Humility

Current Year girls' overinflated ego is enough, notwithstanding economic or racial factors, to explain a host of social problems. Blinded by it, girls ignore how much they are determined by their own cravings, short-term desires, or by the latest fashions around. They drink loads of booze, fuck with random strangers, reframe their story as a "rape" later so they can blame it all on the guy. They never learn to cook, clean, take care of something else than their Instagram account and corporate career. (Speaking of corporate: isn't it striking that so many men are badly in need of employment, sex, and have almost nothing, whereas spoiled corporate drones believe they can have—take—it all?)

Ego makes one lose any sense of proportion or balance. It leads to complacency, merciless exploitation of others, refusal to take responsibility, and open despise.

Augustine of Hippo wrote that humility was at the foundation of all other virtues. This makes sense. If one's ego is inflated, one does not feel the need to practice virtues and feels entitled to never be ashamed of her shortcomings—that are easily denied or blamed on someone else. Ego also leads to wasting resources on luxury, parce que je le vaux bien, as says a famous brand of cosmetics, instead of focusing on self-improvement or caretaking.

Though girls should be the first to have their ego smashed, as the survival of basic family units depends on it, bloated ego is a general disease in our age. Men too can be sold the idea that, say, being a smug urban elf is a proof that one sides with progress and civilization whereas they are actually weak, dependent and unable to fix anything by themselves. It's not all about our individual selves.

4. Fear

Readers asked for it, so, here it is. Fear is a very powerful emotion, to the point of prompting one to freeze, flee, abandon a previously planned course of action, or never even think to consider an idea or an action. The Left has been using it in two different, albeit complementary, ways.

First, it has constantly accused conservatives to "play on fears," implying irrational or unjustified fears, when they dared to ask serious questions or making realistic assessment. When the 1965 Immigration Act was voted, democrat senators pretended that opening up the borders would not change the ethnic mix of America and that any suspicion it might happen was "highly emotional." In France, the socialists and mainstream righters alike have been carrying the same accusations. Here the Left accused any doubt to be a hint of unjustified and intolerable "fear."

Well, what happened since? Doesn't it look like every "fear" from the right was justified—especially since the post-WW2 Right has always been incredibly wary, not to say coward, when it came to criticize the Left's moral high ground?

Second, the Left has also been keen on doing exactly what it accused the conservatives to do, namely, stirring fear about political bogeymen. Liberals invented "rape culture" or "patriarchal oppression" when men actually became weaker. They associated to "Nazism" any white person who assumes his race should basically survive. They shamelessly bludgeoned whom they could call "white supremacists" as if defending one's right to live in peace against hordes of thugs and violent parasites was equal to being Hitler himself.

Whites were led to fear their own supposed "authoritarian" tendencies, as the shrewd Jews who intrigued through the Frankfurt school put it (see Kevin MacDonald, Culture of Critique, chap.5). Whites were led to fear some of their fears—better have one's daughter killed by Muslims than expressing concerns about them to other whites, because racism is so evil, boo.

When I was younger, I noticed the local thugs had a huge advantage over us normal people: they were much more fearless. They had this devil-may-care, provocative attitude, which made them potentially dangerous to the bourgeois prude beta male and attractive to females. Not incidentally, the first movie of the French essayist Alain Soral Confessions d'un dragueur ("Confessions of a Womanizer") shows a young Arab with decent pick-up experience taking a young middle-class white boy under his wing as to help him escape from virginity.

Feeling fear is a necessary step in life. Fear appears greatly useful when there is something to flee from or watch as a potential hazard, but being too fearful or afraid of the wrong things can be a serious liability. Never trust a liberal who either points finger at you for being "fearful" or tries to paint you as dangerous and justifying his own fear-mongering.

On the flip side, being feared by others is not always a negative. Some people need to be afraid to respect you: if you try to treat them correctly or let free rein to your innate generosity, they will harm and exploit you. Such people, just as everyone around who may be tempted to disrespect, should be kept in check by a minimal fear. Better be feared and respected than getting tread upon.

Conclusion

Frame and *un*frame whatever matters when you have to, as you have to. The left cursed us by locking us into an always negative framing: when we fail, whatever the reason, we are despised as weak or "losers," and when we succeed they say we are "privileged" and "oppressive." In both cases, the chosen framing leads to negative emotions associated to us—no matter what we actually do.

Fortunately, it is always possible to turn the tables, provided we keep a tight frame, and change these emotions as well. For example, when we are weak, we should elicit empathy, be noticed for our good intentions or noble infirmities, and when we are strong, we should elicit admiration and trust.

Think, frame, feel positive about us and about what we do. Get rid of those who won't.

The Most Important Concepts The Manosphere Taught Me

October 27, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

An interesting thought recently crossed my mind. What would have happened if I stumbled across the manosphere in my late teens?

Back when I was a blue-pill high school greenhorn, clueless about women and with a mind set on “neutral,” I was destined to be just another cog in the big government machine. Simply put, I would have been the dog’s bollocks.

But having all these resources served on a silver platter would not have given me the hunger that I have for life today. I would take this things as granted instead of considering every opportunity as the last one.

Dwelling on those thoughts is not good. What I can do is to keep writing so other young people and lost men turn their life around for the better. If I must condense the most useful things I have learnt:

On Game

Logistics are key

Get a private room or an apartment within 20 minutes walk of the date location or party district. Check that the security will not cockblock you. Have alcohol and music ready at your place. Clean it. Have condoms stashed. Get taxi numbers, a local SIM card etc.

Keep an abundance mentality

Stop “over-pursuing” as Quintus puts it. The sheer number of women cruising around prevents you from being needy. Showing this weakness to women NEVER works in your favour.

Next the time wasters. If it is not her, it will be another. Stop dwelling in the past, stop keeping the number of dysfunctional girls from previous bangs. Keep moving forward.

Always escalate

Never apologise for being a man with a healthy sex life or hesitate to be sexual. If she calls you out, double down, fuck it. You are not here for a peck on the cheek or listen about her output on life.

One of the sentence that stayed with me and still is in a corner of my head to this day is "Think of it as the last time you see her."

Women need leadership

Despite the rubbish that the media spews, they love it. It's ingrained in their membrane. You lead, they follow. If one refuses, leave her where she stands.

The Wisdom Books Of The Old Testament

October 27, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The most interesting books of the Bible for those who aren't believers in God are the wisdom books of Job and Ecclesiastes. Written from a philosophical point of view, they attempt to help people live with suffering and pain while putting existence into context.

Book of Job

Job is a devout believer in God who follows all of His rules. He has been blessed with incredible wealth and numerous children. Satan then challenges God by arguing that Job is only faithful because of what he has gained, and that he would immediately curse God if everything was taken away from him. God allows Satan to destroy him, taking his wealth and killing all of his children.

Once the misfortune befalls Job, his wife implores him to curse God, but Job refuses. Instead, he openly laments at why God is allowing him to suffer. He even asks God to allow him to die.

> I would rather be strangled—> rather die than suffer like this.
> I hate my life and don't want to go on living
> Oh, leave me alone for my few remaining days. (Job 7:15-16)
> Why make me your target?
> Am I a burden to you?
> Why not just forgive my sin > and take away my guilt?
> For soon I will lie down in the dust and die.
> When you look for me, I will be gone. (Job 7:20-21)
> What do you gain by oppressing me?
> Why do you reject me, the work of your own hands, > while smiling on the schemes of the wicked? (Job 10:3)

He then has a series of poetic dialogues with priestly men in an attempt to explain God's justice. Job asks some pointed questions, implying that those who are eager to sin seem to experience more prosperity than those who closely follow God's words.

> The godless seem like a lush plant growing in the sunshine, > its branches spreading across the garden.
> Its roots grow down through a pile of stones;
> it takes hold on a bed of rocks.
> But when it is uprooted,
> it's as though it never existed! (Job 8:16-18)
> When a plague sweeps through,
> he laughs at the death of the innocent.
> The whole earth is in the hands of the wicked, > and God blinds the eyes of the judges.
> If he's not the one who does it, who is? (Job 9:23-24)

Just like how there are so many laws in the legal code that you are always on the hook for something illegal, there are also so many possible sins that it may be impossible to live a clean life.

> Whatever happens, I will be found guilty.
> So what's the use of trying?
> Even if I were to wash myself with soap > and clean my hands with lye, > you would plunge me into a muddy ditch, > and my own filthy clothing would hate me. (Job 9:29-31)

The men that Job spills his guts to state that he's sinning in some way and knows nothing about how God works, and that he must grin and bear it instead of questioning God's actions.

> Pay attention to this, Job.
> Stop and consider the wonderful miracles of God!
> Do you know how God controls the storm > and causes the lightning to flash from his clouds?
> Do you understand how he moves the clouds > with wonderful perfection and skill?
> When you are sweltering in your clothes > and the south wind dies down and everything is still, > he makes the skies reflect the heat like a bronze mirror.
> Can you do that? (Job 37:14-18)

God appears and asks Job how dare he question His actions, even though those actions amounted to an agreement with Satan.

> Who is this that questions my wisdom > with such ignorant words?
> Brace yourself like a man,

> because I have some questions for you,
> and you must answer them.
> Where were you when I laid the foundations of the earth?
> Tell me, if you know so much.
> Who determined its dimensions > and stretched out the surveying line?
> What supports its foundations, > and who laid its cornerstone > as the morning stars sang together > and all the angels shouted for joy? (Job 38:2-7)

God goes on to describe his powers and then serves a “How dare you?” argument to Job, who then accepts his utter impotence.

> Then the LORD said to Job,
> “Do you still want to argue with the Almighty?
> You are God’s critic, but do you have the answers?”
> Then Job replied to the LORD,
> “I am nothing—how could I ever find the answers?
> I will cover my mouth with my hand.
> I have said too much already.
> I have nothing more to say.” (Job 40:2-5)
> You asked, ‘Who is this that questions my wisdom with such ignorance?’
> It is I—and I was talking about things I knew nothing about, > things far too wonderful for me.
> You said, ‘Listen and I will speak!
> I have some questions for you,
> and you must answer them.’
> I had only heard about you before, > but now I have seen you with my own eyes.
> I take back everything I said, > and I sit in dust and ashes to show my repentance.” (Job 42:3-6)

Other parts of the Bible channel Job by asking why bad on Earth is allowed to continue:

> Wake up, O Lord! Why do you sleep?
> Get up! Do not reject us forever.
> Why do you look the other way?
> Why do you ignore our suffering and oppression?
> We collapse in the dust,
> lying face down in the dirt.
> Rise up! Help us!
> Ransom us because of your unfailing love. (Psalm 44:23-26)

And the usual response is to not question God:

> What sorrow awaits those who argue with their Creator.
> Does a clay pot argue with its maker?
> Does the clay dispute with the one who shapes it, saying,
> ‘Stop, you’re doing it wrong!’
> Does the pot exclaim,
> ‘How clumsy can you be?’
> How terrible it would be if a newborn baby said to its father, > ‘Why was I born?’
> or if it said to its mother,
> ‘Why did you make me this way?’ (Isaiah 5:9-10)

After Job stopped questioning God, he was rewarded with even greater prosperity than before:

> So the LORD blessed Job in the second half of his life even more than in the beginning. For now he had 14,000 sheep, 6,000 camels, 1,000 teams of oxen, and 1,000 female donkeys. He also gave Job seven more sons and three more daughters. He named his first daughter Jemimah, the second Keziah, and the third Keren-happuch. In all the land no women were as lovely as the daughters of Job. And their father put them into his will along with their brothers. Job lived 140 years after that, living to see four generations of his children and grandchildren. Then he died, an old man who had lived a long, full life. (Job 42:12-17)

You have to be patient with God:

> Those who plant in tears will harvest with shouts of joy. They weep as they go to plant their seed, but they sing as they return with the harvest. (Psalm 126:5-6)

The lesson of this story seems to be one of stoicism: accept your fate, don’t question it, and understand that what you have now can be taken from you at a moment’s notice if God wants to, no matter how cleanly you have lived in his honor. Ironically, this book did more to make me question God’s wisdom than any other.

Book Of Ecclesiastes

The next wisdom book is Ecclesiastes, purportedly written by King's David son, Solomon, who amassed one-thousand wives during his reign as King of Israel. His wife collection led to him serving other gods, and he was punished for it when God broke up the Kingdom of Israel. Ecclesiastes is the book that Solomon wrote at the end of his life, sharing all that he learned.

> "Everything is meaningless," says the Teacher, "completely meaningless!" What do people get for all their hard work under the sun? Generations come and generations go, but the earth never changes. The sun rises and the sun sets, then hurries around to rise again. The wind blows south, and then turns north. Around and around it goes, blowing in circles. Rivers run into the sea, but the sea is never full. Then the water returns again to the rivers and flows out again to the sea. Everything is wearisome beyond description. No matter how much we see, we are never satisfied. No matter how much we hear, we are not content. History merely repeats itself. It has all been done before. Nothing under the sun is truly new. (Ecclesiastes 1:2-11)

What is the point of accumulating wisdom in life? Why work hard?

> For in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow. (Ecclesiastes 1:18)
> I thought, "Wisdom is better than foolishness, just as light is better than darkness. For the wise can see where they are going, but fools walk in the dark." Yet I saw that the wise and the foolish share the same fate. Both will die. So I said to myself, "Since I will end up the same as the fool, what's the value of all my wisdom? This is all so meaningless!" For the wise and the foolish both die. (Ecclesiastes 2:13-16)

> So what do people get in this life for all their hard work and anxiety? Their days of labor are filled with pain and grief; even at night their minds cannot rest. It is all meaningless. (Ecclesiastes 2:22-23)

All is vanity:

> For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. (Ecclesiastes 3:19-20)

Promiscuous and bad women are sent forth as a punishment from God:

> I discovered that a seductive woman is a trap more bitter than death. Her passion is a snare, and her soft hands are chains. Those who are pleasing to God will escape her, but sinners will be caught in her snare. (Ecclesiastes 7:26)

Solomon tries to convince himself that evil will not prosper, but he can't help coming back to the fact that it does:

> When a crime is not punished quickly, people feel it is safe to do wrong. But even though a person sins a hundred times and still lives a long time, I know that those who fear God will be better off. The wicked will not prosper, for they do not fear God. Their days will never grow long like the evening shadows. And this is not all that is meaningless in our world. In this life, good people are often treated as though they were wicked, and wicked people are often treated as though they were good. This is so meaningless! (Ecclesiastes 8:11-16)

At this moment, it seems that Solomon goes off the rails by seemingly promoting a life of debauchery:

> So I recommend having fun, because there is nothing better for people in this world than to eat, drink, and enjoy life. That way they will experience some happiness along with all the hard work God gives them under the sun. (Ecclesiastes 8:15)

One interpretation of this is that if you live in sin like Solomon, you will eventually come to the conclusion that life is meaningless, all is for naught, and the only purpose is to have fun. The book may have been included in the Bible to serve as an example of what will happen to you if behave as Solomon and come to the end of your life thinking that it wasn't worth it. I hope this was the intended result because otherwise it would cause you to lose faith in God's own wisdom in justice, just like with Job.

The wisdom books of the Bible raise questions of God's justice and plans for his human subjects. Why do people suffer or prosper? Why does life feel like it's not being guided by God? These questions vexed the Jews enough that they honored other Gods to get more immediate results. And then Jesus Christ came along to say that it will all be worth it—not necessarily now, but in the eternal afterlife, as long as you accept him as your savior.

6 Myths That Men Believe About Southeast Asia

October 28, 2016 | by Greg Freeman | Link | Original Link

I've been living in South East Asia for almost a decade now, and over that time I've come to have a matured perspective on living here and a fair appreciation of the pros and cons of doing so. Like most people who come here, I set off thinking I was going to live in paradise. That's far from the reality, let me tell you!

Living in South East Asia has its pros and cons, just like anywhere else. While I myself have decided to return west for a while, I'll always have a connection to Asia and I'm sure I'll be back many times throughout my life.

So what's the REAL story with living in Asia? Is it all its cracked up to be? What does a man have to be aware of when coming here? Let's look at six common stereotypical ideas about living in South East Asia, and assess them in the light of reality.

1. Asian Women Are Kind, Gentle, And Compliant To Their Husbands

So sweet! Not so fast….

This is, most definitely, a myth, and if you come out here expecting to find some little house pet who does your bidding, you'll be in for a rude awakening.

It's definitely true that Asian women, in my experience, are a lot more traditional. They give the man his place in the house, rarely question your final decisions, and do not resent housework and basic wifely duties.

However, the idea that they'll just do whatever you tell them without question is nonsense. They're human beings with a will of their own and you wouldn't be the first guy to get a smack in the head from a five-foot-two broad who weighs 90 pounds if you disrespect her.

The idea that Asian women are some sort of angelic alternative to Western women is also nonsense. While it's not the norm, I've met several Western men who have been taken to the cleaners by their Asian wives and girlfriends. When you move here, you're completely at her mercy and you will never have any legal rights as a citizen.

Asian women generally are a lot more traditional, but this stereotype that they're some sort of perfect wife material has got to go. They're individuals—and there are all kinds, good and bad, among them.

Read this guide to dating Asian women for a more complete perspective on the issue. It's a thorny subject, and there's a lot of misunderstanding surrounding it.

2. Asia Is Ridiculously Cheap

This is one I'd have to lean slightly towards agreeing with.

Most things in Asia are a lot cheaper. Eating out for my entire family often costs less than $15, meaning I can afford to do it basically every day. My rent for a condo apartment costs less than $150 a month, although that's mostly because I live in the sticks and am not in a major city.

A general rule of thumb is that outside of major cities like Bangkok, Singapore, and KL, you can divide the cost of living by three and get a rough estimate.

Note, this does not apply to consumer goods such as cars and electrical appliances, which are in and around the same price. It certainly does not apply to luxury goods, which are often much more expensive because of the taxes placed on them by local governments.

Asia is cheaper overall, but anything other than the basics costs roughly the same. Life in South East Asia CAN be cheaper, but it isn't necessarily so—it depends on your lifestyle.

3. You Can Become A Citizen Of An Asian Country And Stay Forever

Becoming a citizen in an Asian country is nigh on impossible. Even if you could, you probably wouldn't want to.

You can get a variety of visas like permanent residency, and each country aims to facilitate the spouses of their nationals and, especially, retirees with proven cash in the bank. However, you'll not become a CITIZEN with all of the various rights they enjoy.

It's also worth noting: while you might get permanent residence, you'll never be "one of them." Even if you live here for 30 years, you will always be a foreigner and will be viewed as such by locals. This has pros and cons to it, but you'll never quite feel at home and accepted as one of the group.

You'll get undue respect from some for being a Westerner, but forget about talking politics or leveling criticisms at the way things are done—you'll be met with hostility and resentment for the latter.

4. The Weather In Asia Is 24/7 Sunshine

The weather in South East Asia is generally pretty awesome, and you can live an outdoors life you'll truly enjoy if you're that type.

The sun shines almost every day, and even when it's overcast it's warm, meaning you can go out and about and do anything from walk on the beach to shop in the city.

However, when the storms come, you'd better be prepared to get your ass inside. The rainfall and wind in many countries in South East Asia is truly terrifying. Just switch on any news station the next time a major storm hits the Philippines and you'll see what it's like.

Thankfully, after 1.5 years of living in the Philippines, I've never been caught directly in a major storm, although I've seen the tail end of plenty of them.

The weather is good when it's good, and utterly awful when it's bad. Check this clip out to see how bad it can get:

5. Asia Is 100 Years Behind The West In Terms Of Development

This is a stereotype that’s deeply mistaken, and whether or not it’s true depends on which country you go to.

True, countries like Laos and Bangladesh are miles behind any Western nation, but head to Singapore and you’ll be shocked by how far ahead of us they are in terms of tech and development.

Asia is developing at breakneck pace, and with that development comes super highways, skytrains, skyscrapers and everything else we usually associate with an advanced country. It won’t be long before many countries out here catch up and surpass the West, although it is definitely true that most of them are slightly behind for now.

There’s a phenomenon called “leapfrogging” which virtually guarantees Asian countries will catch up to and surpass the West quickly. Leapfrogging is when they can skip all of the evolution and development and simply emulate modern day technology developed elsewhere—a great example is India, where they have skipped the transition from dial-up to mobie internet and gone straight from nothing to mobile.

If you think this can’t be done and there are intellectual property laws to protect tech from being stolen wholesale, I salute you, but I have to laugh. There are no such laws, and even if there were, nobody would bother to enforce them.

On the other hand, you still have many scenes like this outside your window when you get out of the main cities:

6. Asians Are Extremely Family Oriented

Again, this is one I lean towards agreeing with. There are exceptions to every rule, but the family unit is extremely strong in Asia, especially countries like the Philippines.

I don't want to wax lyrical or speculate as to why this is. It's enough to acknowledge it as a fact and accept that it's the case. 90% of the Asian people I have ever met and gotten to know from Indonesia to the Philippines to Thailand are devoted to their families to the extent that we'd consider it cult-like in most Western countries.

I pass no judgment on this whatsoever. It can be a great thing or a bad thing, depending on your own perspective. I personally like it and think it's something we've lost in many European countries, and America, too.

This is an idea about Asia I agree with—the dedication to family above individuality is definitely true, and so by default if you get into a relationship with an Asian woman, be prepared for this.

The family unit is the sun around which everything orbits in most Asian countries.

Living In Asia Summary

Sorry to disappoint you, fellas, but you won't find paradise in South East Asia.

What you will find is a place with many opportunities, pitfalls, pros and cons, but which I do not regret living in for a single second and which has come to be a large part of my life's story.

I came out for a year and stayed for almost a decade. However, I've decided that time is now over and it's time to go home.

I’d love to hear about your experiences living or traveling in Asia. Do you find my perceptions to be accurate, or do you have a different view?

5 Ridiculously Stupid Things Men Keep Doing For Women

October 28, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Forget the movies that set aloof men against love-seeking women. It is men who are the hopeless romantics much, if not most of the time. And they express this extraordinary naivety by engaging in stupid behaviors that their fathers and other male role models should have beaten out of them. Though feminism, demographic trends, and socioeconomic realities encourage women to be entitled prima donnas, men add to the feedback loop by rewarding modern-day princesses.

Of course, there are sensible exceptions to avoiding the following behaviors. A time and a place, for example, can be found for defending a woman, most notably your mother or wife, from someone else's verbal or physical attack. Likewise, sometimes emergencies or certain serious events mean you should put your priorities aside to help a high-quality woman who gives long-term value to your life. That said, in the vast majority of cases acting in this way is unnecessary, time-consuming, resource-draining, and plain self-destructive for a man.

So, here are the five things many men perversely and uselessly keep doing for women:

1. Fighting for them

I lost count long ago of the number of times I have seen a man step in to save a woman from either herself or a slight (usually deserved) against her. A girl will behave like a pork chop at a restaurant, club or elsewhere, picking a verbal or even physical argument with an employee or fellow patron. Along comes Captain-Save-a-Ho, who might not even know the girl, to protect her honor. The expectation of many women that men will do this for them is bad enough, let alone when a man does it of his own volition, without being requested.

In return for risking a physical or similar altercation with other people, the white knight invariably gets a smile, a few words, and perhaps a phone number. From this point onwards, though, the interaction between Mr. White Knight and the Entitled Damsel Who Causes Her Own Distress invariably fizzles out. And it is not just members of your typical white knight crowd who act this way. Men who are nominally good with women fall into this trap, too, confusing it with the opportunity to be “alpha” and dominate over another male. The most common outcome, sadly, is that a woman’s very poor behavior is condoned by a man falling over himself to be her medieval champion.

2. Fighting over them

Not only is this bickering usually ill-advised, it is often exactly what she wants.

This stupid behavior is only marginally better than fighting for women and the two activities consistently overlap. Whilst competition in life, including between men over women, should be largely encouraged, swathes of men are effectively scrapping over last Sunday's leftovers on a Saturday, three days after the refrigerator stopped working.

Remember: a woman can be attractive but, because of her attitude and behavior, have very little long-term value for you. Countless men live with the illusion that if they toil hard enough to get the good-looking girl, it must be worth it. That's simply not the case in modern times. To boot, a lot of sexually thirsty men nowadays are chasing physically low-yield women that their fathers and grandfathers would never have noticed.

At best, the majority of men who fight over women are dueling over the prospect of snaring a girl who one of them will probably fuck a few times, if at all. And if they do manage to secure the girl for a long-term relationship, the pairing usually implodes down the track. The man either realizes he wasted his time or suffers greatly in material terms, such as by being draped (divorce raped).

In the meantime, the girls being fought over have their egos stroked time and time again. Unattractive girls see themselves as attractive and attractive girls with foul, entitled princess personalities find themselves validated once more. Everything in these situations is predicated on the men fighting and proving themselves, rather than the women reaching an appropriate standard of physical and emotional femininity.

3. Paying for them

What are you getting from the transaction with her? And yes, everything is transactional in male-female relationships.

Unless you are completely sure you have claimed the world's best girl for yourself (and even that belief is probably based on very false or temporary appearances), you should ideally be investing less financially in the relationship than she is. This may seem counterintuitive, especially when a man is sexually valued by women for his status, achievements, and resources. But we are not living in a time when almost every woman is marriageable. A man providing for a woman can only justify it if she is of high-quality and gives him something substantial back in return. On both these counts, most men are paying for dud deals.

In every long-term relationship I have had, I have put less into the relationship financially, proportionally-speaking. Almost always, even the girl's gross investment has either approximated mine or surpassed it. For dates and during casual relationships, too, I pay for a woman's time about as much as she pays for mine, if not less.

When relationships end, girls can and do play petty games over money or property you may be owed. What matters, however, is how you conduct yourself overall. Only when a woman has materially invested in you or invests in you should you invest in her. When patriarchy returns, the male-female dynamic will alter. Before that time, be sure she does her fair share financially.

4. Shifting or sacrificing their priorities for them

Meanwhile, he should be do everything else for himself.

Unlike many other self-destructive behaviors concerning women, this one can be very incremental and hard to spot. It is very easy to procrastinate on your work, final exams, self-development goals, and the rest of your social life when what you feel is a high-quality woman comes along. In fact, nature has basically designed you to do that by throwing your biochemistry into a drug-like dependency at the beginning of a courtship. In addition to these problems early on, men are apt to continue the shelving of their other, more personal demands after the relationship is well established.

On a topic I will explore in more detail in another article, there should be certain hours in many days (or simply days in general) in which women do not even enter your mind. Contrast this with your average man, who will throw away opportunities to further himself to please his girl. And often she's not his girl for much longer, as his neglect of himself becomes apparent in her less attracted mind. By devoting yourself to a ho, you become dispensable to a ho, not just psychologically, but physically, financially, and socially as well. Don't let yourself rot.

Your body, finances, education, and other forms of self-improvement need to be your number one focus. After all, they are the only things you have (or don't have) 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. Individual girls may come and go, but your obligations to yourself remain. Paradoxically, keeping these obligations to yourself is what attracts girls in the first place. A man who takes proper care of his money, career, body, and social life gets women.

5. Moving to them, for them

Sucker.

This is the one even my leftwing father warned me about. But it’s something a lot of guys are yet to learn. Like shifting or sacrificing one’s priorities, moving to a girl for a girl is conducive to throwing your own needs into utter disarray. Every time I moved to where a girl of mine lived, I did so mostly for myself. Whether to explore a new country for three months, or find a new, refreshing place to get my work done, the relocation benefited me. This is qualitatively far different from upending yourself to some new city for the mere chance to thrive and the overwhelming desire to please a girl.

Perhaps the saddest thing about the man who moves for his girl is that when he wants even a fraction of the favor he gave her, he’s often left in the lurch. Don’t make this mistake. Either she must move to you or you move to her for a lot of reasons that don’t revolve around her. If the relationship fails (and most of them do), you leave yourself in an equal or better position than the one you would otherwise have been in.

Don’t follow the crowd of thirsty males

Too many men slave away in a female desert. Girls are not non-existent, but they're too often low-quality relative to what a man is willing to do for them.

Snap yourself out of these behaviors and help your friends shake them off, too. You may not indulge in them regularly, but the temptation to perform them at least sometimes is likely to be there. More broadly, we need to see a seismic shift in the way many men act. Become part of the solution.

So what's just as bad as an entitled woman? A man who encourages her entitlement with obsequious validation.

How Influential French Author Alain Soral Become Red Pilled

October 28, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Alain Soral is an influential French-Swiss thinker, author, and filmmaker. His beliefs are summarized as “French Third Position,” basically a third party for those that reject the traditional left and right political views, and there have been Third Position movements in many European countries over the past several decades.

Major beliefs of Soral’s ideology include nationalism, political sovereignty, social conservatism, anti-globalism, anti-immigration, anti-feminism, anti-bankster, and a non-interventionist anti-war foreign policy. A major slogan of Third Position is “Reconciliation” between the Labor Left and the Values Right—economic policy which values individual work and labor, and social policy focused on nationalism and traditionalism.

Early Life

Alain Soral was born in 1958 in southeastern France. He attended a well-regarded private Catholic school, before enrolling in the distinguished National School of Fine Arts in Paris, founded in 1648, and later transferred to study under the philosopher and economist Cornelius Castoriadis, a famous 20th century thinker.

Castoriadis

Castoriadis favored autonomous societies that are self-aware of their autonomy and independence, and believed societies should provide legitimacy for their laws and government actions. Historically, this was often done through absolute monarchy by invoking religion and God, with the monarch having a direct connection to the almighty (What God has commanded is what we must institute with the law).

Modern capitalist societies proved their legitimacy through circular tautology; that is they claimed that capitalism was logical and just, and therefore whatever a capitalistic society deemed profitable was therefore logical and just. A just autonomous society was always questioning and challenging its laws, but at the same time adhering to, respecting, and upholding the law.

Castoriadis described modern society as a struggle between creative imaginary and capitalist imaginary:

> "The repetition of empty forms, of conformism, apathy, irresponsibility, and cynicism at the same time as it is that of the tightening grip of the capitalist imaginary of unlimited expansion of "rational mastery," pseudorational pseudomastery, of an unlimited expansion of consumption for the sake of consumption, that is to say, for nothing, and of a technoscience that has become autonomized along its path and that is evidently involved in the domination of this capitalist imaginary. The other road should be opened: it is not at all laid out. It can be opened only through a social and political awakening, a resurgence of the project of individual and collective autonomy, that is to say, of the will to freedom. This would require an awakening of the imagination and of the creative imaginary"

Post-University

Soral loved books and knowledge, studying radicals from throughout the political spectrum. He was a dragueur de rue (street pick-up artist) when the PUA movement was virtually unknown. He developed a skill at attracting young, narcissistic, valueless city girls and claimed to bed hundreds of women, and published a book on game in 1996. His experiences with these women led him to develop strong anti-feminist beliefs.

He developed a strong dislike for the French Bobos—Bourgeois bohemians, younger wealthy highly educated narcissistic hedonists interested in fashion and trends. Perhaps something like rich hipsters, but less retro, more fashionable and trendy.

He joined the French Communist Party, motivated by his dislike of the bobos, and his camaraderie with the working man. The Communist Party, along with the Front National, were among the few opponents of the creation of the EU. Soral studied the works of Marx and other Marxists before leaving to join the far right Front National, where he was a speechwriter for Marie Le Pen. He noted that both Communists and Front National members were strongly nationalistic, and indeed many workers left the Communist Party to join FN around this time.

He became a strong critic of feminism and minority politics (gay, feminist, and Islamist or other racial multicultural groups). After Front National performed poorly in the 2007 elections, he formed Equality and Reconciliation, seeking to consolidate ideas on the left and right who believed in nationalism, patriarchy, anti-communism, anti-immigration, and anti-Zionism. Summary Of Views

Trolling a feminist

Not much is available in English of Soral, and even English subtitles on his many videos are hard to find. I have but a cursory understanding of French, so I have relied on secondary sources and translations. His major beliefs are:

Anti-Feminism

Views feminism as not pro-work, as women have always worked, but instead as anti-family and anti-mother. Discusses two classes of feminists: freaks and bitches. The real struggle is between rich and poor, not man and woman, who are naturally attracted to each other. He has attacked women's magazines as altering the social conscience and relegating women to the status of objects. Stresses self-improvement and virility in men.

Anti-capitalism and anti-consumerism

Opposed to valueless consumption and consumerism. In favor of bankster-free economics, and an end to the nanny state. Opposes "desire society" and the cult of celebrity.

Anti-imperialism

Opposed to the Globalist Empire, and American Imperialism, attempting to spread its cultural, ideological, economic, social views everywhere and to destroy all nation-states.

Anti-Zionism

Has attacked Jewish lobbying and intervention in French affairs. Made statements criticizing the Jewish people for being ostracized in societies around the world, throughout history, which earned him an immediate and harsh media blackout. He makes a distinction between French Jews and Zionism, saying that Zionists are opposing the interests of France and French Jews.

Anti-communitarianism

Favors nationalism, not communitarianism. Calls communitarianism “a poison.” Opposed to ethnic, racial, sexual, Islamist or feminist communitarianism, which is opposed to morality and national standards. Opposes the public effeminate, homo and transsexual society, and laments the lack of strong male role models. Makes a strong distinction between homosexuality and the Gay Pride community movement, which promotes drag queens, parties, vulgar parades, and hypersexualization.

Anti-vulgarity

Opposes vulgar language, dress, and speech, especially in women. Has said he prefers publicly wearing the Muslim veil to thong underwear. Would go crazy at a Slutwalk. Critic of profanity and vulgarity; proponent of morality and modesty.

Islam

Feels the “menace of Islam” is an artificially created and manipulated threat; primitive Islamic society is not a real threat to modern western states, and capitalistic globalist interests manipulate the region to destroy the anti-globalist anti-feminist culture of Islam, to foster animosity between social groups, to possibly create a clash of civilizations, or world war, leading to a full globalist takeover, and to loot Mideast nations, and that the fundamental values of moderate Islam are perfectly compatible with French moderate Catholic views.

Anti-modern culture and mainstream media

Opposed to the decline in western values and culture, and the sorry state of mainstream media, who has labeled him a pariah.

Le Neomasculinité

Many like-minded red pill men are turned off by the left-right politics in America. The third position combines right views on nation, morality, and law, with some left positions on social issues and economics. I believe if both the left and right hate you, you are probably doing something right. The ideas here strongly resonate with neomasculinity. Soral's ideas are stimulating and interesting and definitely deserve further investigation.

An excellent summary of Soral and his beliefs is available here.

What Young Men Need To Know To Avoid A Statutory Rape Accusation

October 29, 2016 | by Justin Puck | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: This is not legal advice. If you are charged with a criminal offense or think that you may be, contact your attorney.

If you are a Western man under 30, your world view when it comes to sex was forged in the era of internet pornography, epic divorce rates, hyper-sexualized television content and a political climate of anything goes sexual identity, at virtually any age. You could be forgiven for thinking that when you first had sex with your sweetheart back in high school or earlier, it wasn't something remarkable and you've both probably forgotten about it years later. You could also be one accusation away from defending yourself in a sex offense case.

While American culture evolved (or, as many fairly and convincingly argue, *DE*volved) into a sexually open environment where there are few if any societal and legal restrictions beyond those involving children and animals, statutory rape is still caught in a complex patchwork of state based laws.

Federal law does not stipulate a universal age of consent, instead leaving it to the states to codify. Though you are safe everywhere in North America by avoiding all girls under 18 and you may think that's the law of the land, federal statutes principally refer to matters surrounding pornographic material and prostitution. By the way—you didn't take any naked selfies or make a homemade porno with her, right? Good thing you didn't because you could have violated that federal law about pornography.

What is the age of consent in America?

I wouldn't even trust her (fake) ID.

The age for private consensual sexual acts in America ranges from 16 to 18, sometimes lower in the case of married couples. It's even lower in some foreign countries. By the way, say you're an American student overseas with a foreign girlfriend who's legal in her country, but still under 18—you might want to check with a knowledgable lawyer before getting down a d dirty.

Why is this significant? For starters, the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child considers anyone under the age of 18 to be a child. That magic number is also used to prosecute anyone going overseas with the intent to have sex with a minor. While US law in this area is aimed at pedophiles and traffickers, there's no reason it could not be applied to a young man on a trip to Cancun or studying abroad in Eastern Europe. The most likely situation for a young American male will be domestic, however.

Don’t take one for the team.

For example, back when you were 18 and your girlfriend was 15 and the age of consent in your state was 16, you might have both been well aware of what you were doing and done it several times—perhaps even with the knowledge and approval of your parents. You may have stayed with her for years and eventually got married, but more than likely you and she parted ways and haven’t looked back since.

Till one day you get a knock at your door from a policeman who wants to question you about your relationship a few years earlier. Thinking nothing of it, you tell him the basic details, admitting to sexual contact, and bam, you are arrested for statutory rape of a minor. Any defense of her consenting multiple times, or even that you did not know she was underage, is irrelevant—as a minor, she cannot consent and because of this she may have no say in whether or not to press charges.

The long arm of the law may reach you.

“Well, that’s no bother to me since it was so long ago and the statute of limitations passed anyway, right?” Not so fast. First, if you have amassed any assets years later, she could still decide to sue you in civil court for damages (although this is not always successful) and either win at trial or eke out a monetary settlement from you. Even absent a criminal conviction or a civil court judgement against you, having to pay a settlement for a sex assault related case is something no man wants on his resume—just ask Bill Clinton.

Moreover, just because it is now beyond the statute of limitations for prosecuting you, do not assume you are in the clear. Statutes of limitations can be changed, once again including accused offenders even though they were previously beyond the statute of limitations. Any statements you may have made to law enforcement before this happens would once again be fair game.

While the intent of changes to these laws is noble—they want to nail child abusers who got away for decades—the reality is you can get scooped up into the mix if you as a teenager once had a sexual encounter of any kind with an underage girl, perhaps even if you yourself were underage. If you think you engaged in a situation where you could be charged, the best course of action is to clam up and consult lawyer in your jurisdiction.

This applies even more if one day you are approached by anyone and out of the blue they bring up the subject even though you’d nearly forgotten about it. If you get arrested and charged but the prosecuting attorney decides to not prosecute, continue to keep quiet regardless. Prosecutors come and go, and a replacement with a political agenda could perhaps decide to re-open your case and pursue charges.

Branded for life.

If you get charged but by some miracle are able to cop a plea and get probation with no jail time, you will probably still wind up in a sex offender registry, perhaps for life. Say you get luckier still and serious doubts surface about the veracity of the story and eventually the charges are reduced or dropped completely, resulting in no conviction and no sex offender registry requirement for you. Well guess what? You will still have an arrest record for a sex offense on your rap sheet—it matters not that there was no conviction.

Imagine driving down the road years later, a cop drives up behind you and automatically scans your license plate as is now common practice. A sex offense arrest pops up. Think you stand a good chance of getting pulled over for further scrutiny? What are the chances you're going away with a warning instead of a ticket that day? For better or worse, cop instinct is to view arrests the same as they would a conviction, so it's best to keep all arrests completely out of your life as much as possible.

You will get no breaks, so watch yourself. And STFU.

Yes, of course, you both "knew what you were doing" back on prom night. And yes, we know grown women teachers who have sex with minors often are convicted at trial and still receive no jail sentences. But you, sir, are a heterosexual man acting out on your urges and therefore a prime target—doubly so if you're white, non-Islamic and attending college or boarding school, particularly a prestigious institution. Forewarned is forearmed.

Young men need to be well aware of the laws in their state before engaging in any sexual contact in situations where they could face a statutory rape accusation. And if you've got a story or two from back in your glory days as the high school quarterback with the freshman cheerleader? Don't tell that story to anyone. Ever. The political climate is not favorable to you—and it could stay that way for a while absent a much needed reality check.

Feminism Has Lost The Minds Of Young Women

October 29, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

The idea that feminism is dead is gaining ground all across the west. One would like to think it is because of the trail blazing of the man-o-sphere, and to a great degree it is. But truly, the root of feminism's death was in Man, capital M, from the very beginning. One look at Conan is all a man needs to know this truth.

> Feminism is dead. The movement is absolutely dead.
> The women's movement tried to suppress dissident voices for way too long. There's no room for dissent. It's just like Mean Girls.
> If they had listened to me they could have gotten the ship steered in the right direction. My wing of feminism—the pro-sex wing—was silenced. I was practically lynched for endorsing The Rolling Stones. Susan Faludi is still saying I'm not a feminist. Who made her pope?
> Feminist ideology is like a new religion for a lot of neurotic women. You can't talk to them about anything.
> ~ Camille Paglia on Rob Ford, Rihanna and rape culture for MacLeans.ca

Neurotic women indeed.

Paul Joseph Watson of Infowars/Prison Planet fame was bang on in his assessment of feminism at the end of 2014. But he may have underestimated his conclusions in my opinion.

Feminists did not just lose the debate, they lost the war.

The feminist attempt to demonize normal male/female behaviour in public—men initiating contact with a female with a hello and attempt to strike up a conversation—backfired in less than a month.

When you have a woman volunteer to walk down the street as Princess Leia, the QUEEN of 70's patriarchal sexist 'misogyny', to ridicule feminists, you have lost the war for hearts and minds.

And when I say hearts and minds…

I mean the silent majority of young women who want NOTHING to do with feminism.

Leia makes it clear in this video that boys will be boys. So too will jawas, Darth Vader and even Yoda apparently, that sly dude. Who knew?

And that's a good thing! Men and women are meant to interact and engage in romantic courtship. Feminists may hate this, but the vast majority of women still prefer, and expect, the man to take the initiative to get the girl. This is how men and women were created and evolved, you can't fight Darwin and God and come out on top.

This video shows that the majority of NORMAL women LOVE male attention. They WANT men to look at them. They WANT men to notice them. Why?

THEY WANT A MAN!!!

I realized this is the case when I decided to google the fast rising phenomenon of women against feminism.

This image from the Women Against Feminism Tumblr page really hits home the loss for feminism. This woman was raped. She is not running around spreading lies like the UVA RAPE HOAX story that Rolling Stone ran and had to retract. She justs wants to go back to living a normal life. She does not want to be angry at ALL men for the crime of ONE of them. She does not want to demonize all men in some sad attempt to get revenge. She does not want to be a victim.

Feminists have lost the female youth of Millenials, the very generation that is supposed to obliterate the patriarchy completely in the 21st century.

I understand some men who are still angry over feminism may proclaim these women are doing nothing more than crying for sympathy and attention now that Millenial men have become vocal, blunt and merciless in their attacks against feminism and the current generation of 'women' it has reared. The problem with this type of knee-jerk reaction is just that—you're being a jerk. Yes, far too many western women for comfort are no good for a relationship anymore. But, that does not also translate into there being no young women who are not just as frustrated and angry at feminism as you are and the feminists who claim to speak for them.

Young women might not think about it as much since feminism has clearly made the road to independence (an illusion) easier for them to choose, but these women are taking note that men are completely ignoring them now that they have surpassed men in almost all aspects of western society.

Case in point.

I met a wonderful young Russian blonde a little while back. Twenty-three. Tight. Feminine. So freaking perfect. We hit it off immediately on first contact. Having myself only traveled outside the west twice, I still primarily meet foreign women in my own country and every time I do, I am blown away by their immediate friendliness and ease in my company compared to western girls. As I conversed with this well educated and refined young Russian lady, she told me she was attending university and so naturally, I asked her what she noticed most about the boys on campus compared to back home.

Her answer was revealing…

Boys? They completely ignore the girls. Don't even look at them. Just walk on by.

This really surprised her. Being a feminine Russian girl who expects men to look at women, this behaviour by western men was completely alien to her.

Men, young boys, in their prime 20s, completely ignoring women on campus as they go about their day.

According to Wikipedia, women against feminism started on Tumblr in 2013. I see #WomenAgainstFeminism as a sign that many young women are fed up with feminism and male bashing in western society. It is not a sign of women speaking with two faces and trying to work both sides of the gender war to their advantage. All you have to do is look into the eyes of this young woman to know just how desperate these girls are for a real relationship, one with love and respect.

I don't think men realize how significant a movement like women against feminism is.

As men, we are naturally comfortable with open conflict and expressing not just dissenting, but offensive opinions. The very existence of women openly declaring they are rejecting feminism, and risking social ostracism in a wholly feminist dominated university climate, is why feminists are hyperventilating and going into ape-shit, mentally insane overdrive mode to try and salvage what support they have left. Here are just a few mainstream articles trying to push the meme feminism is not dead and just needs a 'generational' adjustment.

With all the knowledge men have now on the nature of women, we still have women who are speaking out against feminism. The nature of women with respect to speaking out and taking an unpopular position socially is pretty clear, even to women themselves.

What women strive for most in their lives is non-confrontation and avoidance of conflict.

Women (ok, normal women) want harmony, peace, love and happy relationships.

Coming out against feminism is not easy for a lot of girls. You may think it is, but you must put yourself in the soul of a woman and remember how important relationships and being liked and connected is to them. Women don't want to rock the boat. They don't want to make enemies. They don't want to create bad feelings among family, peers and co-workers. This is female nature and sounds odd to men because it is odd… it is not how we are wired.

As 2014 came to a close, something I think began to become very clear for a lot of Millenial women.

A growing number of Millenial women are beginning to notice that young men, the ones they want to date and marry one day, are now so alienated from Western society that they are writing off women entirely.

This fully explains the rise of MGTOW and women are taking notice. It also explains why Red Pill knowledge and Game has completely changed the natural pairing dynamic between men and women by reducing the female to the most crude and rudimentary of male wants and needs—pure sexual objects. Again, women are taking notice. No, there is no massive sea change in the attitude of western women toward the men around them… yet, but make no mistake—women are not stupid. The vast majority of them still know where there happiness lies (with a man and marriage/family), even if they deny it intellectually and emotionally to their detriment.

Up In The Air was a film that played for months in theaters. It resonated with audiences because it addressed the two biggest elephants in the room of western society—the complete marginalization of men in the man-cession of 08/09, and the underlying recognition, slowly bubbling to the surface of mental awareness, that Millenial women were sold a raw deal on how to pursue and find 'happiness.'

Up In The Air was released in 2009, when Clooney was still very much a bachelor for life, and Millenial women were just coming of age—20 to 25—that Anna Kendrick played to perfection. I think any young western woman who saw this film walked out of the theater in quiet, petrified fear for her soul. She was finally presented with her ideological and philosophical reflection, both older (Vera Farminga) and younger (Anna Kendrick) and, far from inspiring this young woman at the 'advancement' feminism has elevated her to, IT SCARED THE LIVING SHIT OUT OF HER.

It's been down hill for feminism ever since.

That Twitter feed from ELLE magazine trying to shame a woman who has come out against feminism has reduced the feminist movement to imbecility . This article on Elle.com—The Internet Wins With 'Confused Cats Against Feminism' Meme-–about as mainstream and $$$ as one can get, tried to ridicule the #WomenAgainstFeminism Tumblr meme with CATS!!! No, I am not joking.

> We might not have predicted that #WomenAgainstFeminism would be a hashtag that was surging in popularity in 2014, but watching dozens of women stand up against a movement that's in their own self-interest is a sobering reminder that feminism's image problem runs deep with the millennial generation. Luckily, the evil geniuses behind feminist website We Hunted The Mammoth have come up with the greatest response Tumblr of all time: Confused Cats Against Feminism.

When your ideological political movement to free all humanity from, literally, Hitler inspired hated and violence of the evil male patriarchy, is reduced to using cats to disparage opponents, your 'movement' is dead… period.

The only reason feminism gained any ground at all in the past was because Boomer blue-pill men wanted to get laid, so they became feminists or leaned toward manginahood. Today, young Millenial men want nothing to do with the current generation of feminist indoctrinated, western women. I think it is safe to say, with Red Pill knowledge increasingly penetrating the cranium's of young men in the 21st century, pussy is losing its halo and thus all power over the minds of men to keep them in submission to the goddess.

So it was in the beginning, so it will be anew. But, unlike the first patriarchal revolution, women will be on men's side now as well for a return to patriarchy.

This is not to say we let up and begin to ignore feminism. All we need to do is simply keep reporting the truth of the feminist movement. It is imploding under its own idiocy and going forward, I can only see feminist attempts to shame both young men and women to get back into line getting even more desperate, and more hilarious. When the emerging pro-masculine and renewed patriarchal transformation of society is complete, feminism will go down in the history books as one of the most screwed up episodes in man's history.

I find it hilariously ironic that the ONLY reason feminism gained any ground, any success, any cultural dominance, was when men gave their assent and granted feminism power over them.

Men take away their assent, feminist "independence" and "girl power" goes POOOOF!

Man, capital M.

No more reason is needed for why feminism is dead.

By Crom!!! Let's finish this!!!

How Population Growth, Industrial Agriculture And Environmental Pollution May Have Weakened Society

October 30, 2016 | by Kshatriya Indransha | Link | Original Link

The global population in 1800 was about one billion people. Today it stands at over seven times that amount, with the rapidly growing populations of India and Africa expected to increase that to at least nine billion over the coming years. Readers today are well used to the idea that the "global south" is densely populated relative to its economic size and area, but this was not always the case. Prior to the collapse of Empire, Europe, having undergone thorough industrialization, was the most densely populated continent in the world.

Year	Population by Continent
	Africa	Asia	Europe	Latin Am. & Caribbean	Northern America	Oceania

Europe was also where the world's social justice movements—liberalism, communism and feminism—began, overthrowing the old order of kings, castes and courtship with the vulgar and degenerate world we suffer today. But why did this happen? Why did the immense increase of wealth and prosperity not correspond to an increase of human happiness, but instead lead to the emasculation of men, the breakdown of the family, and the disappearance of religion and morality?

In these series of articles, I examine the root causes of this paradox, what one can do about it on an individual dietary level, and what one can do about it on an individual environmental level. I am a strong believer in social change through individual growth, and, having experienced a dramatic turnaround in the quality of my own personality and success of my outcomes as a result of following these strategies, I hope that others can benefit from my knowledge, and similarly make themselves into solid Men.

Popular mainstream theories for social degeneration

Many authors have postulated economic reasons for this degeneration—industrialization, having deprived men of their primary roles as the masters of nature, reduced their worth and attractiveness—or utility—in the eyes of women. Relatedly, others argue that technological progress, which increased independence and ability for all, allowed women to go their own way.

Another popular argument is that increased prosperity leads to reduced incentive for discipline—r-selection versus K-selection—and so prosperous, disciplined societies create a generation of lazy youngsters, fat off the success of their parents, who cause so much havoc with their short sighted policies that their civilization collapses, leading to a new generation of disciplined youngsters who again create greatness. One example of a short-sighted policy would be the feminist political movement, which artificially separated woman from man by giving her, through affirmative action, socially harmful economic independence.

While all these explanations bear some truth, none of them delve into the deeply emotional, spiritual, human and thus fundamentally biological causes of social degeneration.

Why the mainstream theories are flawed

To begin with, a healthy Man and a healthy woman, even with modern technology at their disposal, should not so substantially less love and cherish each other, as seems to be the case today. The proof of this can be seen by examining what it is women do with that technology: a modern loose woman uses technology to go to places where men can ravish her. Even if it gives woman the ability to go it alone, Technology does not diminish her emotional and biological need for man.

Further, the availability of technology does not always translate into its adoption—the failure of Google Glass is the emblematic example. It does not have to be the case that smartphones are automatically adopted for Slut Culture—they do not have to automatically lead to female promiscuity. Anyone familiar with Russian or Japanese women, who have the same technology at hand, but a vastly greater sense of restraint and self-worth, can attest to this fact. Therefore, the technological argument is not sufficient to explain modern degeneracy, although it is certainly a necessary condition.

credit: Ninaras

credit: moguphotos

To briefly examine the argument that Men no longer have (non-financial) utility in the eyes of women: a man is not necessarily attractive to a woman if he actually breaks rocks, or actually kills other people—instead, being able to is sufficient.

Therefore, the emotional and spiritual inseparability of a healthy woman from her evolved master, man, remains and will remain eternally true. The change in technology and the nature of men's work is not the causal factor—instead, the change in preferences of both men and women explains modern degeneracy. Men hardly today want to lead and possess their woman; and women do not respond to weakling men.

Let us examine the r/K selection argument: if it were the case that wealth and ease begat indiscipline automatically, it would be true that the rich produce weak and undisciplined progeny. This may seem like a truism today, viewed through the lens of the post-industrial, overpopulated Paris Hilton West, but in societies of the past, it was certainly not the case—rather, historically, the opposite has been true: the weak were poor because they were undisciplined, and the strong were rich because they were disciplined. The poor raised weak and hence undisciplined children, while the rich raised strong and disciplined ones, so the cycle continued and over time aristocracies formed.

An extreme version of this disciplined-rich mentality can be seen in modern British farmers, many of whom, financially wealthy and prosperous, drive old, beaten SUVs, reuse clothes and generally minimize expenditures. While it cannot be denied that even the modern rich have in general become mostly degenerate, this is, in my opinion, a (disproportionately visible) symptom of a deeper malaise that affects society across the board.

Therefore, I do not rely on the technological or economic explanations for societal degeneration-I view these theories as descriptive of passing symptoms or trends, and not timelessly causal truths.int

The population growth, nutritional depletion and environmental pollution theory of societal degeneration

Having outlined and accounted for the above theories, I argue instead that the degeneration of society is caused mostly by the biological degeneration of the human being that makes up the society. This degeneration is caused by factors that affect the human organism on the basest level, and the two primary factors are:

- Nutritional depletion of food, caused by the growth of industrial agriculture, which itself is made necessary by unprecedented population growth.
- The pollution of the environment caused by industry and the introduction of unsafe technology.

According to this view, it was not the Boomers' access to ease that made them such degenerate and irresponsible scum, but rather the fact that the rapid population increase during their key developmental years meant that the growth of industrial agriculture that somewhat necessarily accompanied it—the Green revolution—created such nutritionally sparse food that there was insufficient development of Boomers' brains, leading to a generation of overgrown children.

Further, according to this theory, the increased dependence on technology is not viewed as the cause of millennial autism, but rather a symptom of millennial autism.

Recent historical examples

Consider the historical path of Communism, which did not generally spring up in the villages. This was not because the landlords were better able to control the peasants, but instead because poor city dwellers, even if earning a higher income than poor peasants, had access to much worse food and lived in a far dirtier environment, making them both mentally and physically ill.

The unfortunate result of insufficient mental development in a crisis situation – our aim should be to save as many leftists as possible, and almost all can be.

The poor in the countryside today continue to vote conservative or liberal, while the urban poor vote socialist, for this same reason: the rural poor, despite usually being less wealthy than the urban poor, are intellectually mature enough to see how harmful a controlling government can be. The urban poor mostly achieve the intellectual maturity of children or adolescents, and mostly feel rather than think, so they support an emotion-based class war or gender war ideology.

This theory explains the early rise of social justice in Europe, where industrial agriculture was first adopted on a wide scale, and also explains why such movements did not organically grow anywhere else until much later, owing to the much later adoption of industrial agriculture. It should be noted that in the countries where communist revolutions were actually successful, they enjoyed no broad support, but instead were able to defeat the mostly pre-industrial historical governments because of these governments' economic weakness, and also because of extensive support by globalist or communist interests (this was true in Russia, China and Cambodia).

Ancient historical examples

This theory also explains the path of historical civilizations—Rome's case is highly instructive. At its birth Rome was a small collection of largely self-sufficient, highly disciplined towns, where the diet, like in many towns of that era, was a mixture of grains, vegetables, small farmed meats (like chickens), and hunted meats—what we would call a balanced diet. In this society, men were the masters of their households, with power of life and death over their family members, while facing total responsibility for their family members' behaviour. Only a group of strong, capable and self-disciplined individuals could sustain such a social order.

Population of the City of Rome; 1.0E6 = 1 Million Inhabitants – Source: www.davidgalbraith.org

Rome's extreme martial and social discipline led to expansion. As it expanded and the city's population grew, the diet for most people changed over time to mostly grains farmed highly intensively, shipped in from all over the Empire, losing a lot of its nutrition on the way. Simultaneously, and partly as a result of rising grain production, meat consumption fell, reducing the population's testosterone levels, leading to falling strength and willingness or ability to compete, as well as rising mental illness because of copper overload.

The weakened population's increasing demands for emotion based socialism led to the growth of a massive welfare state, and eventual bankruptcy, hyperinflation and collapse of the central government.

India is another equally tragic example. The population growth that resulted from highly prosperous Nanda rule led to the growth of Buddhism and the adoption of degenerate attitudes, moral collapse and eventually weakness to invasion. After the institutionalization of Buddhism by power-hungry and utterly Machiavellian psychopath Ashoka—who looked to weaken the Brahmins, Hinduism's traditional moral guides—Buddhism's degenerate vegetarian curse spread like a virus, and created, over several generations, a population of weaklings, who weren't again able to assert their independence for over a thousand years. The Song dynasty followed a similar path as these two empires, being eventually overrun by the Mongols (the Yuan dynasty).

Population of China – Source: Vaclab Smil, China's Environmental Crisis (1993)

This degradation of the diet, caused by population growth, has been, at least, a significant causal element behind the degeneracy and collapse of most prosperous sedentary civilizations.

The modern context

The dramatic increase of the population since ancient times should help you understand why humans today are such fools and weaklings compared to our ancestors. There is only so much nutrition in the world's topsoil to go around, and a population seven times greater than 200 years ago, eating a diet uncorrected (through nutritional supplementation) for dietary sparsity, will be living individually, in effect, 1/7th the life that its ancestor population did. Is it any wonder that people today feel so weak and helpless that they want mommy government and daddy police state to give them the illusion of comfort and security?

This theory is also borne out in the data: in general, food today contains ½ to 1/10th the nutrients it did in the 1930s, which was already about 50 years after the adoption of modern style industrial agriculture in the West. This dramatic fall in nutrition has accompanied the tripling of the global population, and close-to doubling of the European population, since that time. While some population control seems necessary, I believe that sustainable organic agriculture, combined with nutritional supplementation, should obviate a large amount of needed population reduction.

I hope that the reader is, after consideration of these facts, sufficiently convinced of the true causes behind the modern world's degeneracy. People have, fairly universally, across the political spectrum, become weak and insane from malnutrition. Artificial protein may have allowed some men to grow muscles, and calcium from an (over-)reliance on milk may have allowed them to grow tall, but perhaps the lack of most necessary nutrients has meant that they are generally still retarded, emotionally, spiritually, and intellectually.

The effects on modern society

This weakness amongst men—and dietary sparsity has disproportionately affected men, due to our much greater nutritional requirements—has not just resulted in an inability to control the destructive forces that lie latent in every society. Worse, the fundamental outlook of men, who viewed themselves as the creators of civilization, the slayers of enemies and the protectors of women, all under God, has changed. The modern millennial man is a childlike hedonist who cares little for his civilization, culture or People.

An aspiring patriarch.

Environmental toxins

Environmental toxins are also a problem. Electrical, oestrogen and toxic metal pollution are under-researched but may have devastating effects on human health. Radio waves, plastics, unfiltered medication and purposely added toxins in the water supply, like fluoride and chlorine, have deleterious effects too.

What can we do?

Considering these realities, it serves little purpose to blame women for their self-destructive behavior. While in the past, like men, women used to have enough emotional maturity to try to live a life of self-respect (for example by remaining virgins and not drinking alcohol), they have never had much agency, charisma or true self will, even before the diet was empty, and before they were being stuffed full of drugs and chemicals by the unscrupulous pharmaceutical industry and its proxies.

These poisons may cause serious and dangerous, (although slowly fixable) hormonal and behavioral changes, but the real effects are felt by their offspring. Unfortunately, once a woman is hooked on these drugs (for example, the birth control pill or antidepressants), she is unlikely to come off them, and if she does, she is unlikely to do anything to fix the damage to herself or her future children. This is especially the case as the medical industry, which has brainwashed her to see doctors and the state as her loving protectors, is unlikely to recommend it.

Even so, these drugs don't permanently alter the fact that women, as mostly emotion driven actors, are biologically and intrinsically people pleasers, and respond automatically to the most powerful person (or group of people) that can give them a raison d'être. Even if we can't ensure that women in general improve their diet and avoid pollutants, we can certainly make changes on an individual level, convincing or browbeating our girlfriends, sisters and mothers.

The healthier a woman gets, the greater her affinity with nature becomes and the more maternal she feels, so you can be fairly certain that she'll try and pass on the knowledge to her children and friends, like our grandmothers and great-grandmothers did. Furthermore, there are a large minority of health conscious women, who it should be our duty to marry and impregnate as many times as possible. Considering the rapid population declines that will occur in the atheist and leftist segments of our countries' native populations, these women are our best hope for creating a viable future.

You will have to teach her a few things. Credit: csp_Subbotina

The situation is not hopeless—but we have a fight on our hands

In the past, well-informed people couldn't expect, due to the limited, and elite-controlled, nature of communication technology and the educational system, to make any impact on the vast majority of the population. The political fight against Big Agra and Big Pharma seemed hopeless. Today is different: the growth of the Internet and the increasing spread of awareness has meant that more people are aware about the importance of eating well, avoiding environmental dangers and supplementing wisely.

This is partly evidenced by the steadily rising percentage of people who eat organic diets, and the booming supplement industry. I hope that, in the future, at least a significant portion of us can survive in a sane enough state to politically fight back against moves by globalists, Islamists, communists and ruthless financiers who are circling, like vultures, over our degenerating civilizations.

On the other side of this political battle, the globalist controlled medical industry has been the biggest proponent of unhealthy diets and dangerous and addictive drugs. Special interests have also been the biggest corrupters of regulators and the institutions created to defend the population against industrial and chemical pollution.

A system of global monopoly wealth extraction is not possible with active, capable and self-confident masculinities from proud nation-states to resist it; those who seek to benefit from such a monopoly system have tried their absolute hardest to suppress natural health information. But so far they have failed, and the situation is only improving, so there is considerable reason for hope.

Conclusion

Our forefathers demanded to fulfill their destiny, ordained by the Gods, to defend our civilizations against the forces of rapacious greed and murderous atheistic villainy—to be the protectors and kings of our people. Today, most men are mentally ill and have become childish hedonistic narcissists. As expected, the ruthless and soulless have exploited this weakness for their own benefit. Now that you have, I hope, understood the principles behind why most of us have lost the urge to fight to protect our cultures, the cause and fix to the industrial malaise should no longer seem out of reach or impossible to grasp.

This area of the human condition is just one another where we stand at the crossroads of history. But in my opinion it is the most important: if the dietary trend of the last two centuries is not reversed, and the nutritional quality of at least a significant minority of men is not substantially improved, then each generation of people will become more communist, more feminist and more weak than the last, and the globalist special interests that seek to create a totalitarian world-monopoly police state will win, regardless of temporary political victories.

Each of us has chosen a path to follow in our quest for spiritual, intellectual and national salvation. This is mine. In my future articles I will detail the best dietary approach for strong men (and beautiful women) to follow, and overview the most important environmental precautions we must take, in our quest to fix the root causes of modern degeneracy.

I hope that, ultimately, you are convinced to help me, and others like me, prevent our world from collapsing entirely into a miserable cyberpunk dystopia.

Why It’s Necessary To Relax Into A Stretch

October 30, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

In a previous article, I discussed stretching—namely, why stretching is important for the masculine man, and several stretches that you should use in your training to maximize your physical fitness. And while that advice is still valid, I neglected a very important concept in that first article: the techniques that detail how to stretch.

I am not referring to a specific stretch or some sort of hypothetical “stretching mindset,” but rather a set of techniques that can be utilized for any stretch to increase ones flexibility immediately. But before I can discuss those, I have to discuss the incorrect way of stretching that many people still use.

How Not To Stretch

Many people believe that stretching is a literal act of forcing the muscles and connective tissue to stretch—avoid this at all costs! First and foremost, as I have discussed previously in these pages, you should never apply any stretching pressure to the connective tissue. They evolved solely to “hold fast” and keep things in one piece, they should never be stretched at all!

The muscles are the anatomical feature that stretches, as they evolved to do. When stretching, your body should always be positioned in a way where the connective tissues are stable and the muscles are moving.

Even when you are positioned properly, no part of stretching should involve the athlete forcing his muscles to stretch, as that risks muscular tearing which is a nagging injury that never truly goes away. This is because the human body has naturally evolved what is referred to as the “anti-stretch reflex” to prevent muscular tearing-stretching the muscles increases in difficulty the farther and deeper the stretch is, and your body responds to this stress with pain. This is a biological sign telling you that if you go further you’ll be risking muscle tears, and should normally be a heeded warning.

However, if you want to do advanced stretching (such as that nigh-impossible benchmark of fitness the splits), you will have to find a way to overcome this reflex without hurting yourself. And as luck would have it, there is!

Relax Into Stretching

Reflexes can be overcome with gradual and repeated practice—just ask your friendly neighborhood hooker about how she overcame her gag reflex! Similarly, your anti-stretch reflex that keeps your “joints” (actually your muscles) stiff and immobile can be overcome with a few techniques.

The most basic of these techniques is the one that I have had the best results with (as usual, the simple but difficult answer is usually the correct one), and that is the titular concept of “relaxing into a stretch”—with thanks to Pavel Tsatsouline for naming the concept.

To use this technique, take an easy form of the stretch you want to do: using the splits as an example, you would do a seated groin stretch. Engage the stretch just to the point where you feel tension in the target muscle, and then…sit and wait.

Yes, paradoxically, relaxation is the key to increasing your physical fitness in this context. You are literally going to sit there and wait for your muscles to stop fighting the stretch—in other words, you’re going to exhaust your reflex until it stops being reflexive.

This is not something that happens quickly—from my experience, it will take 5-10 minutes per stretch, so it is perfectly acceptable for you to get a book or watch TV while doing this. As a side note, this is literally the only time where it’s acceptable to have a visual distraction during exercise, in my opinion.

As you might expect, once your muscles have relaxed and the pain has melted away, you can increase the stretch a little bit more, and hold it for another 10 minutes. Repeat this process until your muscles are in pain and you judge that you can’t go any further—this is a personal call that you will have to decide for yourself, as I can't judge when your muscles are demanding you to stop.

This technique can be utilized for any stretch, and in many cases will give you the progress that you so desire. However, there are other methods in the "Relax Into Stretch" family of exercises that can be utilized as well, such as meditation—mentally relaxing will lead to muscular relaxation.

Or you can try "forced relaxation", where you flex the muscle simultaneously while stretching, forcing the muscle to relax.

- Stretch as far as comfortably possible and contract the muscles you are about to stretch with one to two thirds of your maximum effort.
- Tension should increase gradually and reach its peak by the third or fourth second. Don't contract the stretched muscles explosively!
- Hold steady, unwavering tension. If you were holding a real weight with the target muscle, the weight would stay put rather than bob up and down.
- Don't hold your breath, breathe shallow.
- Hold the tension until it becomes unbearable, then release it with a sigh of relief—don't let the breath get 'caught' in your chest as is common for a very stressed out person; let go! —and immediately increase the stretch.
- Understand that 'immediately' means 'without delay' rather than 'with quick movement'!
- The duration of the contraction may vary from five seconds to five minutes. Find your sweet spot through trial and error. Start with thirty to sixty second contractions.
- If you have the mental fortitude, keep the tension until your muscles start quivering and finally collapse in exhaustion, unable to contract

Either way you slice it, don't just brute force your stretching, utilize these techniques for better results.

Airbnb Goes Full SJW And Demands Users Host Deviants Of Every Kind In Their Home

October 30, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> You commit to treat everyone–regardless of race, religion, national origin, ethnicity, disability, sex, gender identity, sexual orientation or age–with respect, and without judgment or bias.
> — Airbnb's new SJW diktat

Short-term residential accommodation network Airbnb is forcing its providers to adhere to a new "nondiscrimination" policy, including a requirement to accept transgender people. The policy takes effect on November 1 and is accompanied by a slew of other recent or impending changes, which Airbnb says are designed to make its "community" more "inclusive." Those who refuse to accept the main nondiscrimination policy will barred from listing their properties with Airbnb.

The major problem with Airbnb's new nondiscrimination provisions is that they really just represent an euphemism—bowing to a customer's feelings, rather than proven discrimination. The overall framework of the company's policy alterations assumes that those accommodation providers accused of discrimination are actually guilty of it. This rush to judgment gives little or no recourse to those who depend on Airbnb to generate an income. It also makes it very easy for certain protected groups, most notably transgender people, to falsely or very loosely claim discrimination, when, in fact, the issue is likely to be the prospective guest's temperament or perceived reliability in respecting the property.

Secondly, the policy changes ignore the unique nature of sharing economy sites like Airbnb. Accommodation providers are often accepting guests into their literal homes, or their sole investment property. Whereas hotels have round-the-clock staff, including security, Airbnb properties are much more informal and unsupervised. Providers therefore have good reasons to be very judicious about who exactly they let into their residences.

Airbnb's "Open Doors" policy treats any discrimination complaint as gospel truth Brian Chesky must've drank the same poisoned water as fellow tech SJW Jack Dorsey of Twitter.

> We'll be implementing a new policy called Open Doors. Starting October 1st, if a Guest anywhere in the world feels like they have been discriminated against in violation of our policy – in trying to book a listing, having a booking canceled, or in any other interaction with a host – we will find that Guest a similar place to stay if one is available on Airbnb, or if not, we will find them an alternative accommodation elsewhere.
> — Brian Chesky, Airbnb CEO and co-founder

In addition to dictating what kinds of guests can enter their providers' properties, another one of Airbnb's new policies, which is already in force, treats those accused of discrimination as immediately guilty. Rather than determining whether discrimination has occurred, Airbnb has made it clear that it will bend over backwards to find those claiming discrimination other accommodation within its network or, more strangely still, alternative accommodation outside its network. The second arm of this "discrimination response" will become very interesting indeed should privately-owned Airbnb decide to go public. It is hard to see how shareholders would acquiesce to a company offering customers third-party accommodation options that effectively deprive it of money.

Airbnb is simply trying to have its cake and eat it, too. On the one hand, it wants to create as wide a market for itself as possible, now having providers offering 2,000,000 listings in 34,000 cities around the world. On the other hand, however, it wants to assume total control for determining what is and what is not discrimination, despite having no ability to verify pretty much any of the accusations. Airbnb are mere gatekeepers, providing a rudimentary service that makes its bucks by the sheer volume of providers. These same providers should not suffer because of the company's "thinly-spread" business model.

Allegations of discrimination have been scant at best

We don't question the right of people to be selective about new housemates, so why not Airbnb providers and their guests?

Various news articles reporting on the shift in Airbnb policies have only been able to point to isolated instances of even alleged, let alone proven discrimination. The best that SJW enablers can offer is a deeply flawed Harvard study, which claimed that prospective guests with stereotypical African-American names like LaToya and Darnell were 16 percent less likely to be approved by the company's accommodation providers. Considering that a guest's profile provides a lot more information than just their name, the Harvard "research" leaves a lot to be desired.

Moreover, names like "Cletus" and "Mary-Sue" would arguably garner even less approvals. Both these "white" names and the aforementioned African-American names usually dovetail with some of America's least sophisticated and worldly types, the exact kinds of people least likely to be allowed into someone's home. It has precious little to do with race and almost everything to do with run-of-the-mill decisions about how to safeguard one's own property by entrusting it to the right people. Such decisions are routinely accepted when new housemates are sought, so why not with Airbnb?

Has Airbnb signed its own execution order?

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/792404359262965760

Just as Roosh swears by Booking.com, there are plenty of other options you can take in avoiding Airbnb from now on. Like Twitter, the company is quickly falling under the spell of the SJW crowd. It seems certain that, minus a backtrack, Airbnb and its reputation will follow Jack Dorsey's company into the abyss. Unlike Twitter, though, Airbnb may never make the jump to publicly-listed company.

We live in very sad times for freedom. But there's one freedom we can all exercise now–staying the hell away from Airbnb and its SJW madness.

How The Elites Are Using “Divide And Rule” To Control Us

October 31, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

It wasn’t long ago that the Left represented the anti-establishment wing in politics. They used to fight against globalism (remember the anti-globalization movement?) even if their motives were different from those of today’s anti-globalists, as well as being against censorship, imperialist wars, and the expanding powers of governments and corporations. But today, you see leftists protesting against Brexit, attacking and censoring anyone who disagrees with the establishment (using Twitter on their Apple products while sipping on their Starbucks coffee), and are calling for war in Syria to challenge the Russians. So, just how the hell did did they end up becoming the patsies for the elites?

To understand, we must go back to 2011 when the Occupy movement was ongoing. The Occupy protests, which now seem like ages ago, came about as a response to the economic downturn with the people realizing that they were being screwed by the system. We can debate endlessly about exactly who these people were and the motives behind them, but the important fact is that, to the elites, it was a sign that the people were waking up and challenging their power.

The elites were in a panic as this was the first time in post-war history that the people of West mobilized in mass to threaten their rule. So, the cabals decided that they needed to act fast before the whole movement evolved to a full-blown revolution. And they already had a plan in mind: the never antiquated strategy of divide and rule.

The Diversion

When the people are discontent and angry from being powerless and dispossessed, the pressure will mount and it won't go anywhere. The people want to vent out their frustrations. The elites know that responding directly with repression only inspires greater desire to rise up, so instead of fighting it, they prefer to re-channel that pent up energy elsewhere.

On February 2012, with the Occupy movement still raging, the elites were given that golden opportunity—or, rather, they created one—when a black teenager was shot dead in Florida: the none other than the infamous Trayvon Martin case. The shooter wasn't even a full white, but the elites jumped at the chance and used their control of the media to throw everything they had on it; anything to divert the public attention away from them. With their efforts, it quickly became the biggest story of America.

But they didn't stop there. Police shootings, which have always been happening and to all races, were also highly publicized by the mainstream media to stoke liberal outrage and racial tensions that led to the creation of Black Lives Matter movement—a movement that is financed by George Soros and others to stir up unrests across America.

Did the elites convert Occupy protesters into SJW patsies?

The diversion was complete as the people were now more interested in racial issues than the “1%” who were dictating their lives. The Occupy movement faded away and the people were now venting out their anger elsewhere. Although I don’t have as much proof as with the rise of BLM movement, I strongly suspect that the resurgence of social justice warriors around the same time is also the work of the elites who want the Leftists to target fellow citizens over asinine cultural issues rather than the established order.

The Strategy

Back in 19th century, Karl Marx claimed that religion and nationalism was being used to distract the masses from the fact that they were being oppressed under capitalism. If we were to apply this concept to the world today, the culture wars going on now are distractions to keep the masses from undermining the power of the elites.

The goal the elites is simple: divide the masses and let them fight each other so that they will never come together to topple those in power. Meanwhile, they themselves focus on expanding their own wealth and continue to implement institutional control to further their globalist plans. The worst case scenario the elites want to avoid is to have the common people unite as one, so they must do everything they can to fragment them by creating as many divisions as possible.

My understanding of their modus operandi is this: 1) Use hot-button issues to stir up controversy (something that doesn't affect them like gay marriage, race issues, and all other politically correct nonsense). 2) Have the Leftists either get outraged or do something that will provoke a reaction from the Right. 3) Let the people vent out their anger onto each other and get at each other's throats. 4) When the issue fades away, foment a new controversy to repeat the whole process. By cycling through them over and over again, the elites are able to maintain the status quo and keep the people from uniting against them.

Thus, we have our current situation where the masses are divided with blacks against whites, women against men, Islam and atheism against Christianity, Left against Right, and so on, but no more anti-globalization, Tea Party movement, or Occupy Wall Street.

As long as those on the left continue berating the right as racists, sexists, and bigots who are controlled by corporations and the right in turn accuse the left of being degenerate, socialist slackers who just want freebies from a nanny government, nothing will change. As long as the two sides see each others as enemies who are stupid and ignorant, and getting in the way of creating a decent society, the people will remain divided. As long as the rest of the population go berserk over wedding cakes for homosexuals, the latest "misogynist" outrage, or how a lion named Cecil got shot, the elites will continue to win.

A Couple More Points To Consider

I know they look like an occupying army, but there's nothing to be alarmed about. They're just your friendly neighborhood police doing their jobs to protect you from the "terrorists."

First, while this article has been focused on how the Left has been toyed by the globalist elites, let's not forget that the Right are not totally immune to their influence either. Remember how Neo-cons (globalist puppets disguised as conservatives) effectively lured the conservatives in America through faith and patriotism? The support they got from that base was the impetus to launch their war against Iraq based on bullshit evidences of WMD's and Saddam–Al-Queda link. While the Right has changed a lot since then, there are still "conservatives" today who are itching for a war with Russia because… USA! USA! USA!.

Second, it is crucial to remember that although the main goal is to maintain divide and rule, it is not the end of it. The elites have far more sinister aims. By raising hell in societies through demographic conflicts and terrorism, the elites are preparing for a total social control. I get the feeling that the elites are letting the chaos and violence run its course so that the people from the two opposing camps will join together in their approval of new government measures for social control.

No matter their differences, when the people get terrified of savagery and disorder, they'll welcome the state to intervene in the name of security. Europe is already getting used to large military presence on their streets while the US government is seemingly preparing for a war against their own citizens. A leaked Soros memo also reveals that the BLM movement is potentially being used to federalize the US police. While many people seem to be concerned about violence and terrorism, it seems those are just tools used by the elites to justify a totalitarian state in the near future.

The Culture Wars: Necessary Fight Or Engineered Distraction?

The issue of culture wars is not an easy one as they are important in many ways, but are still forms of distraction implemented by the elites.

On one hand, we are playing into the hands of elites by raging against social justice and feminist pigshits instead of trying to stop the globalists, Zionists, bankers, mega-corporations, and the governments from undermining our existence. Really, do the issues of politically-incorrect Halloween costumes and whatever bathroom trannies use matter more than the fact that the middle-class is being destroyed, revelations of massive corruption in the DNC, the coming police-state, and the globalist wars that are causing death and destruction around the world? All the drama of outrage and counter-outrage is silly when the elites are snickering as their new world order is taking shape.

On the other hand, culture does matter in many ways. Uncontrolled immigration, anti-male laws, and censorship are all very relevant issues. And as much of the Leftists are now serving as pawns of the establishment, the situation isn't exactly the divide and rule model I described above. In a way, we are now forced to fight the Left and everyone else who are getting in the way of fighting the globalist elites.

So, does this mean we should ally with those who scorn us? Or should we continue playing the elite's games and bicker with their SJW drones? I don't have a good answer, but whatever we choose to do, I believe it is crucial for us to focus our battles and not get trolled into petty issues that the mainstream media wants us to focus on. We should always keep in mind that it is always those at the top who are the true enemies of mankind.

Conclusion: Is There Still Hope?

Although we no longer see grassroots movements and popular mobilization, the current US election has shown that the people are still awake and sick of the establishment. To me, that alone is a hopeful sign that people are still willing to challenge the ruling class.

With Bernie Sanders brought down by the establishment and his supporters scattered into different camps, the only anti-establishment movement now is the presidential campaign led by Donald Trump. This is why we are seeing unprecedented efforts by the elites to bring down Trump and use disgruntled Leftists against his supporters.

I have my doubts about Trump, but he is thousand times preferable to the certain nightmare that Hillary Clinton will bring to America and the world if she gets elected. But besides voting, I believe that it is more important for the people themselves to wake up and be aware of the methods of control that are being implemented upon us. We can't constantly expect some knight in shinning armor to come rally us; we must take the initiative ourselves and be willing to fight for our own destiny.

How Hedonistic Game Became The Gateway To Virtuous Truths

When people ask me about my current position fighting in the culture war, years after starting my writing career with "Bang" books, I simply say, "I just wanted to get laid." From these hedonistic beginnings opened a path that I find myself in today. A reviewer of my new book Free Speech Isn't Free also noticed this transformation:

> I've been following the 'Red Pill' community for a a few years now. The members therein have been engaging in some of the most relevant conversations anywhere on the net. Roosh is one I've only recently become familiar with as I tend to appreciate and relate more to the more traditionalist members like Vox Day, Dalrock, and Roissy.
> What is so fascinating about guys like Roosh is how their journey to acquire more sex and attention from highly attractive women has led them stumbling across uncomfortable truths about the world that we men of the West find ourselves living in.
> This book is a very straightforward account of an encounter that an iconic Red Pill pillar had with the traditional media community that exposes a truly shocking level of laziness and corruption on the part of an institution that we are supposed to respect for some reason. I remember watching from a social media distance as these events went down and I had no idea just how bad it was.
> I really admire the stones on this kid and I hope he stays motivated and encourages more people to be bold with the truth (which is always unPC). I'm not a fan of lotharios but I appreciate intellectual honesty and bravery. I hope Roosh's Neomasculinity gets legs. I really do.

How did game serve as the gateway drug? Simple: I kept asking why, as if I was an annoying 8-year-old child.

- Why are woman attracted to me when I dance and act like an entertaining clown?
- Why did my father not have to act like a clown to attract my mom?
- Why has society changed to encourage women to pursue exciting "bad boys" and clowns over good men?
- Why are institutions like the media and universities pushing women into behaviors which harm them and the family unit?
- Why is there a concealed group of elites who seem to control politicians and the most important institutions?
- Why are those institutions attacking me for speaking the truth?

There wasn't only one step from having fun into the nightclub to fighting back against social justice warriors and the media, but several steps that had to take place over the past 15 years. My path weaved through sex and gender relations, but there are other paths as well, which I describe in The 5 Paths To Realizing Truth. For example, minimalism is another point of entry:

> When you live below your means, you begin to see that most people are unnecessarily living above theirs. That leads to the conclusion that they were trained to live a life of excess by corporations with the complicit help of a government that wants to keep society in a neverending state of indebtedness and distraction so they ignore everyday injustices while losing any will or desire to fight the establishment. The easiest stepping stone out of The Truman Show is to realize that consumer lifestyles are not the path to happiness, and those those who chase material possessions are misguided.

Many other men have also had a similar path as myself, whereby promiscuous sex was a device for understanding the world and deciding on behaviors that are more sustainable to the male soul. While not every man gains wisdom during the stage of his life where he wants to sow his royal oats, many do, and they use that wisdom to devise solutions that can solve our modern problems. I do not at all regret engaging in shallow sex with many dozens of women throughout the world, because it has developed my thinking into what you read now, even though the sex itself wasn't especially memorable and didn't give me much except momentary pleasure.

From my current vantage point, it really does feel like it was all pre-determined, as if I was supposed to participate in shallow intimacy in order to arrive at true understanding, but that would imply some sort of divine providence. Whatever the mechanism, it's clear to me that many of the behaviors and ideas we hold now could be mere way-stations for a grander, more universal truth. Whatever individual journey you're a part of, I hope we'll find out soon enough.

How To Repair Strained Or Broken Relationships

October 31, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A subject not often discussed is the topic of how to repair strained or broken relationships. It is one that comes up in everyone's life, so it will be useful to make a few suggestions about it here. We will talk about relationships from friends, family, and lovers.

Relationships among friends we will treat first. The first step in this process is to make an evaluation to determine whether the relationship is worth saving or rehabilitating. It is a simple fact of life that some relationships have an expiration date; when two people no longer have anything in common, or their paths take them in divergent directions, it may be difficult to find common ground. In this situation, it is always better to let the relationship die a natural death slowly, rather than rapidly. Abrupt terminations may leave the other party with negative feelings, and this should be avoided if at all possible.

There are some instances where repair is not possible. When someone has committed a fundamental violation of trust or respect, this is a warning sign that the person was never a friend in the first place. Another point to keep in mind is that repair of a broken relationship requires—no, demands—the participation of both parties. If the other person is unwilling to participate in the process, then your efforts will be futile, and will come to nothing.

Once we have determined that the friendship is worth repairing or sustaining, the next step is to decide how to make the first approach to the other party. In this we must try to evaluate the reasons for the problems in the first place. We should make an honest assessment about how things got to where they are. Did someone say or do something that caused hard feelings on the other side? Was there some intervening cause that made the two parties diverge in plans and activities? These types of questions must be honestly and repeatedly asked. We have a tendency to minimize our own hurtful actions and exaggerate those of others, and this must be kept in mind.

The key rule at this point is to try to put ourselves in the shoes of the other party. We must try to see things from our friend's perspective. For many people this can be difficult, as it involves getting past our own feelings of hurt or rejection and into the shoes of the other person. And yet it is essential. Very frequently the reasons for strained or broken friendships lies in the fact that there is some problem going on in the other person's life. Only by being a perceptive student of human nature can we divine the cause. Sometimes the only thing that caused the strained relationship was some misunderstanding that was easily curable.

Keep in mind that we must try—at least in our own minds—to discover the source of the other person's problem. This is not always possible, as human beings are not always rational. But we can at least make the effort. I remember in the film Hoffa that there was a great line from Jack Nicholson. He told one of his men, "Real problems, real grievances can be resolved. They can be negotiated. But imaginary grievances? That man is going to hate you for life." I have no idea if Jimmy Hoffa every actually said this, but it sounds like something he would have said. He meant that we should avoid hurting the pride of our friends. We should be acutely aware how it is sometimes the intangible slights that can most rankle with a man.

When you have decided to make the first step, it is always better to initiate contact directly. Do not wait for the other person to do it. Depending on the circumstances, this should be done discreetly and without too much in the way of overpowering insistence. There is a certain type of finesse that a man should have at critical times, and this is one of them. The approach should be direct, but neither insistent nor demanding. A fish is best hooked with a lure gently laid.

Of vital importance here is that the approach be sincere. One should genuinely want to contact the other party. Sincerity is the glue that binds friendships together and permits their longevity. There should be no hypocrisy or falsity in any of our dealings with friends. This kind of thing is immediately apparent and, once detected, its whiff surrounds the offending party like a permanent cloud. If the other party is receptive to the approach, we can then gradually feel our way forward, taking care to avoid the reasons why the friendship became strained in the first place. Things may never quite go back to what they were, but at least we can find solid ground for a new frame of reference.

Two examples will suffice here. The historian William Shirer worked closely with famed correspondent Edward R. Murrow when the two were in Germany in the 1930s. Yet after the war was over, the two grew apart. Shirer's account of the estrangement suggests that he was repelled by Murrow's enthusiastic adoption of the anticommunist hysteria of the time. Shirer found himself gradually blackballed from most major news networks before being forced out completely. He broke with Murrow over these events. Many decades later, he approached Murrow; all venom spent, the two were able to find common ground again.

Another example makes the same point. Theodore Roosevelt was a strong-willed, insistent man, to say the least. He was in a position to choose his successor as president, and to this end he selected a man very different from him, the affable and rotund William Howard Taft. Taft eventually began to find Roosevelt an overbearing and unwelcome presence in his life. The two men eventually broke completely, a result of their personality differences and different conceptions of leadership. To his credit, Roosevelt eventually approached his old friend privately to patch things up. They were never the same, of course, but at least some cordiality was restored.

Relationships with family are of a fundamentally different sort. Because we are linked by bonds of blood (or perhaps marriage), it will be more difficult to disentangle ourselves from those with whom we have become estranged. On the other hand, it may be easier to repair such grievances, or at least find common ground, since there may be more shared experiences with the other party that act in our favor. The key here is not to expect too much. Although shared history and common blood may work in our favor, they can be counterbalanced to some extent by the fact that irrational family antagonisms can run deeper than those from strained friendships. Patience and persistence are most important here, perhaps more so than friendships with those unrelated to us.

Repairing strained relationships with lovers is perhaps the most difficult. When a man and woman have been united in the past through the coital act, an entirely different set of emotions and motivations come into play. Relationships between lovers can fail or become strained for an infinite number of reasons, and it would be impossible to discuss all of them here. It is enough for me to state my opinion that it is nearly impossible to bring an intimate sexual relationship back to what it was after it has been broken.

Strained is one thing; broken is quite another. My own experience leads me to believe that once a sexual relationship is done, it is done. One cannot really go back to what it was before. Amicable dealings are certainly possible, and happen all the time; but I would not call this friendship. I would call it an uneasy equilibrium. Love's inflammatory presence scorches all it leaves in its wake.

PODCAST: What Travel Can And Can’t Give A Man

October 31, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My newest podcast discusses the role of modern travel on the development of men. After reviewing how travel is most commonly used, I share the specific benefits travel can offer along with the mistaken ideas of what naive people think travel can accomplish. I discuss seven of my favorite travel rules for men and also take an aside to discuss the growing phenomenon of finding a foreign wife, which is harder than many men think. I close out the podcast by prescribing a strategy of using travel to maximum your strength and potential.

STUDY: Women Contribute Nothing To The Tax Base

October 31, 2016 | by Ricardo Sanchez | Link | Original Link

The greatest trick that feminism has pulled is to convince the masses that women are presently disadvantaged relative to men.

It is true that at first glance, men dominate every field, from business to Pokémon Go achievements, which can lead some to think that there is a conspiracy against women. When you become familiar with evolutionary psychology, you realize that this is only a natural masculine propensity for status pursuit, that is now used against men. Anyhow, the male superiority in many fields is exactly what allows society to prosper. Years after the humiliating debunking of the wage gap, it's time to address the real elephant in the room: the fact that women don't pay taxes.

A research report on the fiscal contribution of men and women across age groups was published by the Victoria University of Wellington. Let's explore the key findings.

[image]

This is the well-known earnings gap (incorrectly referred to as the wage gap). Women's preference for low paying jobs, among others, is a factor at play here. Another factor is the amount of women working part time. The average week for women, in this research, was 28.9 hours, and 37.2 for men. The workforce participation rate did not differ between men and women in significant ways.

[image]

This is the disposable income. This is the "income remaining after deduction of taxes and other mandatory charges, available to be spent or saved as one wishes." You can see that progressive tax rates unfairly impact males, and reduce males' disposable income near women's, although the market income was almost double that of women's. If it disproportionately affects men, you can be assured that no one will complain.

[image]

Those are the raw taxes paid by men and women. The tax gap has, oddly, never been an gender issue until now.

[image]

When the tax money received by men and women is included in the equation, you can see that for most of women's lives (except between 44 to 60), they receive more tax money than they supply the state with. Men, on the other hand, give the state more tax money than they receive from 23 to 65 years.

[image]

This is where it gets upsetting. As you can see, women's short period of positive fiscal impact doesn't come close to counter-balance an already massive overall negative impact. "The net fiscal incidence on men is approximately zero when accumulated over all ages." As such, society invests in young males, and they subsequently pay back society's investment. Women bear massive costs to society, while we are taught to see them as underprivileged.

By the end of her life, the average woman will cost about $150,000 to the average taxpayer. This means that an average man is extorted $150,000 in his lifetime that will be directly transferred to women. If men could use that money to their will, women would chase men as much as men chase women.

There are a few confounds that need to be ruled out. The authors mention specifically that health and education costs are almost equal for men and women. Also, the workforce percentage doesn't exceed 10% difference between men and women. Women don't spend more for children either, according to the report. Even if there were confounds that needed to be accounted for, this is not something feminists have done for the 77-cent wage gap. They have compared raw percentages without accounting for any confounding factors.

Also, these numbers do not include massive costs for the governmental budget for women's issues, that are a massive burden for the state. For instance, my local government (from a Canadian province of 8 million people) just announced a $200,000,000.00 plan to fight sexual violence against women, after two immigrants ding-dong-ditched women in a student house.

Add to that millions invested in sex-ed programs, in which a feminist teaches boys that porn movies tailored for them shouldn't be imitated, and that instead, that they should have their partner's pleasure in mind, while teaching the exact opposite to girls. The government takes money from males to empower women into hating men and their contribution to society.

> https://t.co/Rnb9rpFW3s Québec (Canada) announces 200$ million plan against sexual violence after two FOREIGNERS touched female students
> — Nicolas Kilsdonk (@nkgervais) October 29, 2016

The data also doesn't include all the money directly and personally transferred from a man to a woman. For instance, while women make so little, they still account for 85% of all consumer purchases. And you were wondering why marketers so desperately try to appeal to women in advertisements.

[image]
A metaphor for male taxpayers and women? This is a real Danone ad. Watch it here or see my comment here.

The only defense that feminists can use, when confronted with these facts, is that women invest so much time in children. However, feminists made it very clear in the past decades that a woman's contribution to society shouldn't be based on her involvement with children. Moreover, at birthrates of half of the necessary 2.1 for population stability, they're also doing the children thing pretty badly.

These findings raise a serious question: would feminism survive a libertarian regime that doesn't involve (male) tax money? After all, it is not a coincidence that women consistently vote for a welfare state. Within 10 years of women's suffrage in the USA, the government doubled their tax expenditure and revenue. Women's voting patterns have made the government become the new providing husband. But this time, the providing husband doesn't get a woman or children in return. Remove taxes, and no woman will ever claim to be a "strong, independent woman." The state is cucking you. A little like if prostitution was not only legal, but free. Most guys would probably be strong, independent single males.

Pretty ironic that the institution that gives money to women for being pregnant, prevents them from being paid less, makes abortions affordable… is entirely supported by men. Feminists are not seriously against living in a society entirely supported by men, they are just against men having the autonomy over the wealth they create. Male wealth is a public good, and female wealth is… "her body her choice."

Women have obtained equal pay in 1963. It's time we fight for equal tax.

Will #DraftOurDaughters Bring Hillary Down?

November 1, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

October has been a portentous month for the presidential campaign. In the beginning of the month women came forward accusing Trump of unwelcome advances. Later, FBI Director James Comey re-opened the criminal investigation of Hillary Clinton after finding more government emails on pervert Anthony Weiner's computer. But the most important event may be a meme campaign that highlights Hillary's support forcing women to register for the selective service.

The meme campaign consisted of dozens of fake ads posted under the #DraftOurDaughters hashtag that highlight two very important policy points of the Hillary campaign: First, Hillary is a radical feminist. Thus she favors equality in all things—that includes equality in combat. As a step in that direction, Hillary told the Huffington Post that she will support legislation to register for the draft.

Young women may think registering for the draft is not a big deal. They should reconsider because of the second policy of the Clinton campaign: She will almost certainly start a war against Russia—a war that will see those young women drafted into combat on the front lines.

Hillary has repeatedly blamed Russia for Wikileaks and she stated that she would get revenge through military action:

> As president I will make it clear that the United States will treat cyber attacks just like any other attack. We will be ready with serious political, economic and military responses.

The #DraftOurDaughters campaign could be the thing that brings down the Hillary campaign. To get elected, Hillary relies on two demographics: People of Color and liberal white women. Up until now, women have been able to support leftist social policy because it did not impact them negatively. If they become aware that Hillary intends to draft them into combat to fight a war with Russia, they may re-think the wisdom of their equalist position.

Here are some of the best examples of the #DraftOurDaughters campaign.

I feel this one is the most powerful. It clearly states Hillary's intention to put women into combat and start a war with Russia. Unlike the Arab nations that the US has been toppling for the neocons, Russia has a formidable military and nuclear weapons. Any military conflict will not be short and easy. That means it will highly likely that young women will soon find themselves getting blown to smithereens if they elect Hillary.

The above three ads all target the weak, cowardly men who either support Hillary or the Never Trump cuckservatives. In the Alt Right, these men are frequently portrayed as being cuckolded by wives. Hence, they are often mocked for their wives having children who are not their own: “My wife’s son” or “My wife’s daughter.”

The ad below drives this point home even more forcefully. While women might encourage their men to vote Hillary or oppose Trump for being too alpha, they secretly despise the weakness of these men.

The following ads are directed to convincing women of the ramifications of their decision to vote feminist. Feminism taken to its logical conclusion means you are going to have to trade your Louboutins for combat boots.

Lots of the ads emphasize Hillary's extremely aggressive stance toward Putin and Russia. She has blamed WikiLeaks on Russian hacking even though there is no proof that the Russians were to blame. And she and the Obama administration have been saber rattling against Russia in Syria.

The really frightening thing is that mainstream pundits are now starting to parrot the idea that the US must go to war with Russia. All the more reason to elect someone who is not controlled by wealthy donors like Hillary.

The ad below indicates that our “enemy” Putin has a saner view on women in combat than the Democrats do.

While the campaign is mostly geared to point out Hillary’s intention to draft women, it also reminds men that their lives will not be spared in the conflagration that Hillary will start.

The media often portrays war as a sanitized affair. A soldier, safely positioned in a US-located command center, controls a drone that takes out the bad guys. The reality of war is that people from both warring factions die and are maimed. Once Hillary gets in, it won’t be just men dying in large numbers. Women will experience equality in having their lives snuffed out.

A final ad drives home the point that the future war with Russia (and Iran and Syria) will not be any sort of conflict against barbarism or evil. It will be for Hillary's power trip.

Conclusion

Elections matter. For decades, women have voted for leftist policies that have put the burden on other people. If they are successful in electing Hillary, they will face the bitter consequences of their decisions. But unfortunately, they will not be the only people impacted. Thousands of innocent Americans, Russians, Syrians, and Iranians will also have to pay the price of their virtue signaling.

The #DraftOurDaughters campaign may be enough to wake some of them up from their folly.

Will There Be Riots In America The Day After Donald Trump Wins The Presidency?

November 1, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The above photo was snapped in Ferguson as thugs burned the city down. Could we see a repeat of that fateful event and perhaps a worsening of it soon to a city near you?

The election is the focus of every news channel ad nauseum. But few people are focused on the day after the election. No matter who wins this year's presidential "selection" the possibility of civil unrest the day after election day and beyond is a real possibility. Are you ready for chaos if it develops?

The nation is so divided we are likely to run into problems.

The ugliest scenario for the day after election day plays out if Trump wins. If Trump wins, get ready for Black Lives Matter, the Black Panthers, The Race (La Raza) and other racially motivated anti-white groups to come out and possibly start burning cities down again. After all, they have been given carte blanche all year long to do so in Ferguson, Baltimore, Charlotte, and San Jose. A worrisome precedent has been set.

Of course, Trump won't be in power the day after election day (we have to wait until Inauguration Day for him to clean up any potential messes) so Barack Hussein Obama is likely to give the racial hate groups the green light once again while the media whips out their collective Stradivarius, plays my heart bleeds for thee, and sympathizes with the devils destroying the nation.

If The Bitch wins conservative groups may clash with leftists over rights being stripped away

If Hillary wins, there's the real possibility of protests the day after the election, and the social conditioning of whites to be polite and docile even as they're railroaded in what was formerly their nation may not hold this time around. A Hillary win means the chaos and possibly violence could wait until she starts stripping constitutional rights away. Then, we are likely to see conservatives finally come out and start raising some righteous hell. There could be racially motivated clashes on the horizon as white people standing up for themselves goes against a long-established narrative that they're all evil racists.

Few people think of the effects civil unrest could have on their livelihood and well-being. It's time for a little education on just how thinly stretched the American supply chain is, and what could happen with only a short-term disruption in it.

Here's a scenario – just one of many possible scenarios. Video of rioters stopping and then looting a semi tractor-trailer in Charlotte is worrying because if trucks stop, America stops. If attacks on truckers happen often enough, truckers may decide it's not worth the risk to their lives to continue moving freight around and stop driving. Within a day, bedlam could ensue as the supply chain runs on a razor's edge in modern America and everything from food to medication to gasoline starts running out.

Supply Chain

Rioters broke into trucks on I-85 and burned cargo in Charlotte

According to the American Trucking Association (ATA) a disruption of 24 to 48 hours means hospitals and nursing homes would run out of food. Fuel supplies at gas stations would also run out in that time frame. Garbage would start to pile up. Most grocery and retail stores would start to run out of food and merchandise. ATM and bank cash supplies would also run out.

The tight rope the corporate system walks quickly breaks when merchandise stops moving.

As an example, the ATA tells us this is what happens during a hurricane. Imagine what would happen with days or weeks of rioting in major cities.

> In a hurricane situation, supplies that would normally last a few days, such as water, powdered milk, and canned meat, typically disappear within one day. Given these inventory rates, this means that perishable goods could be depleted in a matter of days and non-perishables in just a few days. Runs on food and non-food staples during hurricanes, and even before big winter storms, provide a good example of how fast some retail inventories can be depleted during panic buying. The same quick depletion of inventories could occur if trucks stopped making deliveries for any reason.

Panic buying means no food on the shelves. When people don't have food at home and then the grocery store doesn't have food, rioting will intensify. Things could get ugly in a hurry as one small disruption leads to a domino effect, after which Bedlam ensues.

So, it is best to be prepared with non-perishable items just in case things get out of hand. Have at least several weeks food supply on hand. But, how do you stop people from coming and taking your stash?

Be Armed

The police won't be around to protect you if Bedlam ensues

Contrary to gun propaganda from the media, you absolutely want to be armed in the event the election and its aftermath don't pass peacefully. What happens when stores no longer have food and gas stations no longer have gas? Gangs form looking for homes that do have those items.

They're going to pick out the weakest home in the neighborhood and pounce.

A home with guns is a safe home. Just as this YouTube video shows, armed thugs may bust into a house looking for money or food, but they started jumping through plate glass windows and scrambling like cockroaches once the homeowner came out with guns blazing.

Several handguns with extra ammunition are advised. Know how to use them. Be steady with the trigger. And don't be afraid to use them if looters come to your house.

The police will NOT be there to protect you as they'll have their hands full with the chaos.

Better To Be Safe Than Sorry

The idea of an intact nuclear family may be a trite memory, but protecting your loved ones is still key

With the meltdown of America happening right before our very eyes, we are entering an unstable period in the nation's history, to say the least. No matter who wins the election the nation we once knew and loved is passing away. Trump may be able to turn things around temporarily, but even if he does the country now has so many immigrants it will be impossible to assimilate them all.

We are entering a period in which America will resemble a third world country more and more. The demographics of the nation are being changed on purpose so white people are diminished at the ballot box and Democrats will gain a lock grip on the levers of power in the nation in the coming years. Divisions between rich and poor will grow, and the evil media will be there stirring the pot with racial, class, and gender division every step of the way. Peace will become a thing of the past as squabbling factions compete with each other for dominance.

In this transition from prosperity to despotism, it is best to be safe than sorry. The day after election day will be telling in that it will set the tone for the next four years. It may be a somewhat peaceful turn towards Communism if The Bitch wins, or it may not be.

But my money is on a steady degradation of civil society in the coming years. Tend your own garden, as I know I will be tending my own. My military friends are already discussing what will happen in SHTF scenario. You should be thinking about it, too.

Friendly Guide To ROK's World View For Recovering Liberals

November 1, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Return of Kings has a great variety of information about many subjects: improving your social life, health and fitness, tourism, among several others. Still, our political perspectives might be off-putting to some readers on the left. Although you could tune out whatever you don't agree with. you might do well to take a closer look. Not all of us agree on everything, but we do have a rough consensus on some items.

Our views on the political establishment

The left blames corporations while the right blames the government, when in reality the two interests work together to subvert the will of the people

It's pretty easy to see that this site has a mainly conservative perspective, especially on social matters. Not all of us started out that way. Many of us began our journey away from the political orthodoxy after realizing what a mess feminism has made of society. Others have been turned off by political correctness. Once upon a time, I used to be liberal, and I know I'm not the only one. Be that as it may, some of us are actually friendly to liberalism.

By the way, we don't give a free pass to the mainstream conservative establishment either. Unfortunately, the government in countless ways seeks to amass power for itself while producing fear and dependency in the populace. Really, it's not a Democrat problem or Republican problem; they're basically two sides of the same coin. Heads, they win; tails, you lose.

Surely you're in favor of progress. One good question, though, is what exactly this constitutes. Also, who gets to define what is progress? All that might seem rhetorical, but these are important matters. Likely you see change as a good thing. But who's setting the agenda, deciding which direction that change goes? Actually, we have answers for all that.

In fact, we might have some more in common with you than you expect. Don't care for agribusiness? Neither do we. Are you troubled by the influence of the ultra-wealthy in the political process? We are too. Do you suspect that the powerful have set up a system of managed democracy, where they're pulling the purse strings of both the Republicans and the Democrats? (If you supported Bernie Sanders, you've probably figured that one out already!) We understand you.

Today's political and social scene

You might be disenchanted by some of the things going on with the Democratic Party today. Perhaps you've heard of their hypocrisy and contempt for the public. Are you troubled by some of the Clinton scandals, maybe even wondered if there was more to it than you expected?

Perhaps your questioning goes deeper; you might wonder who hijacked liberalism. It once stood for helping the working man, but some time in the 1960s it turned into so much squabbling divisiveness. Actually, there's a reason for that; the culture war began long before the 1990s! That wasn't about liberation, but rather a deliberate attempt to spread divisiveness and weaken the fabric of society.

Also, taxpayers have spent untold money on social programs, but why don't they solve problems? Instead, they create intergenerational poverty. You might be shocked to learn that encouraging dependency, along with taxing and spending to oblivion, was actually a stratagem meant to crash the system. That's not about helping the disadvantaged; it's about using them! Schemes like these—causing societal upheaval so a Socialist paradise will magically fall into place—are pretty reckless.

You might shake your head in bewilderment at online mobs of misguided youths spewing bile about things that don't really matter. Sure, you're against police brutality (as am I), but deep down you also fear what will come of all this open contempt for the law and violence against police. The authorities take a pretty dim view of cop killers; kind of sounds like someone behind the scenes wants to start a lot of trouble, doesn't it?

Finally, you might wonder if the people on top of the liberal establishment really give a damn about the common people. We think it's rotten that they're using so many well-meaning people for the cynical ends of amassing money and power.

Likely you have some nagging concerns about what's going on in society today. Why are women both liberated and spoiled, and sometimes even hostile? Can't the feminists see that things aren't really so bad? Sure, you're all about tolerance and have lots of gay friends, but you privately wonder if there should be sensible limits. You might be uncomfortable with all the evangelizing of "alternative lifestyles", especially if you have children in school.

You consider the press to be the bedrock of a free society, but you have doubts about journalistic integrity. Hey, we understand. The propaganda is everywhere, even in shows for young children. The media has been feeding you bullshit all your life, and we think their lying is rotten. You deserve better than that.

Starting to reconsider?

A die-hard Social Justice Warrior will seethe with rage for me bringing up these uncomfortable facts. Even if you're a moderate, you might be reluctant to consider any of this. We understand; rethinking deeply held beliefs is a painful process. For so many things, you'll see that what you've been told is right is actually wrong, and what is “wrong” is really right.

Many on the left have been there before and found their way out. For me, someone explained that I’m not responsible for the world’s problems. “It’s not your fault.” The endless attempts in college to ram opinions down my throat hardened my resolve. Others who’ve made the journey have different stories. Some got religion. Others realized that their past fanaticism has hurt others. Some wondered why decades of costly social programs haven’t accomplished anything. Some came to see that preferential treatment in hiring decisions is anything but “fairness”.

It’s in your best interests to purge the misconceptions and guilt trips from your mind. Still, you don’t have to abandon everything and embrace the polar opposite. Some have reached a synthesis position.

Welcome to the other side

If you’ve read this far with an open mind—and checked out some of the referenced articles—then you might be confused. Perhaps you’re tempted to reject our message. On the other hand, you might be shocked and even angry about what’s been going on in politics and society.

We understand; enlightenment is a painful process. We’re here for you. The truth hurts, but we’ll do the best we can to tell it like it is, which is much more than can be said for what you’ll see on television. I’ve merely scratched the surface here; stick with us and you’ll see how deep the rabbit hole goes.

Donald Trump Is The Candidate For Americans, Not Special Interests

November 2, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

Next Tuesday is the American election, and, for better or for worse, we'll pick the next President at that time (assuming we don't get mired in voter fraud and recounts), and we'll either brace for government mandated SJW enemas or bask in a temporary setback of those evil people. But, today, I want to talk on Trump once to match an article from last week, and I intend to focus on how he is the American candidate, as opposed to the special interest groups' one.

I had a conversation last week with some people who acted as SJWs, but were later presented by a mutual friend as libertarian. The discussion immediately went nasty, with my opposition painting Trump (and anyone who supported him) as a racist and a bigot. Upon trying to determine why two of the left's ubiquitous labels were applied to me this time, I learned that their perspective was, unless you were universally for all special interest groups, you were a bigot or a racist.

False Dichotomy And The American Nightmare

The problem, I found out, was that these people have distilled the political spectrum down into a black or white situation. Either you want all refugees here from the Middle East, all the Hispanics from any country south of the border to come here freely and citizenship for those already here, and that any black people shot by police are just misunderstood and were turning their lives around, or you're a racist. There's simply no middle ground.

They don't understand that Trump is not a special interest candidate, by which I mean that he is not going to put any minority group ahead of the rest of us at our expense, but he is not racist towards minorities, or sexist towards women.

It is possible to be against illegal immigration, but treat Americans of Hispanic ancestry as valued citizens whom you will represent. It is possible to be against feminism, Affirmative Action, and the persecution of men for the profit of women, yet still value American women as Americans themselves. It is possible to note that some black people cause a disproportionate amount of crime, yet note that some police are racist, and see that there are bad and good cops AND bad and good black people.

The American Dream is that all men are created equal, and that's men as in humanity, not just males. It is not that all men are equal, and there's a big difference to note here. You have the same opportunities as everyone else when you are born with the exception of disability, and I do not know anyone, myself included, that is against governmental aid for the disabled.

What we have, instead, is the American Nightmare, where the left uses government and taxes for the most inane of causes, trying to fix any disadvantaged group's lot, real or imagined, so that things will be better. They take from the producers, and give to the non-producers so that, according to their idealistic vision, they will suddenly become productive members of society (or become addicted to the welfare tit and vote Democrat for the rest of their lives.)

The Good Of The Country Over That Of The Individual

Long gone are responsible Democrats like Kennedy who told us to ask what you can do for your country. Every recent Democratic President, from Carter to Obama, and most of the Democrat Congressmen, view the working middle class of the country as simply a group to exploit for their pet special interest groups. Trump is the first candidate in a long time who isn't for the blacks, or the gays, or the Muslims, or the feminists, or whatever, and that matters a lot.

The reason why not being for a special interest group (which is ALL that Hillary is for, with her youth vote, black vote, women's vote, gay vote, etc.) is so important is that these groups, even put together, do not matter when it comes down to the good of the country. Don't get me wrong, there's plenty of good, hardworking black people, just like there's the same for women, and for gays, and for young people, but these hardworking folks from all these groups aren't going to be part of the BLM, or La Raza, or Lamda, because they're too busy being productive Americans. Activism is for unemployed people.

What's going to happen if we don't placate BLM and just ignore them? They riot a bit more and some get arrested? What if we told them that people that commit crimes to protest being treated like they commit a lot of crimes is ass-backwards thinking and counter-productive to their goals? They'd quit rioting.

What would happen if we shut the Mexican border down to illegal immigration, but made a straightforward, but strict, path to citizenship for Hispanics that wanted to be citizens? What if we said, this is America, we appreciate your culture and encourage to preserve it and your language in your children, but the national language IS English, and all business and schooling will be done in it, and in it only, and it's your choice to not learn it, but the difficulties that will arise from that choice are all on you? They'd be Americans, proud of their heritage and their legal immigration and citizenship as well.

What would happen if we told gay people that it's cool if they have civil unions under the law, and have the same rights as everyone else, but it’s not cool trying to pick a fight with a Christian bakery to make the government hall monitor come drive them out of business just because their belief in their God and that you’re sinning makes you uneasy and worried that they might actually be right?

What if we told them it’s ok to do whatever you want with another consenting adult, but you don’t have to try to make five-year-olds decide if they’re gay or straight when they shouldn’t be wondering about that till puberty hits? They’d be normal Americans who just happen to like sex with the same gender, and they’d quit pushing their agenda and being obnoxious and in the rest of our faces.

What would happen if we talked to Muslims and said that there is a huge, deafening, silence when it comes to the subject of Islamic Terrorism from them that makes it hard to trust any of them? What if we told them that we needed their help to bring the religion out of its tacit acceptance and support of terrorism, and part of that help means supporting us vetting Muslims coming here more strictly until they are no longer statistically more likely to be terrorists than people of other religions and ethnicities? They’d go along with that and maybe realize we’re fixing a problem, not hating a people.

What would happen if we told women that feminism has all but killed modern marriage due to universal punishment of divorced men and that no punishment for false-rape accusers both makes men not trust women and insults any real rape survivor? What would happen if we told them that giving them jobs for their genitalia over their skills is destroying industries by lowering the only standard that matters, that of merit; that of excellence?

What if we told them that gender ratios and quotas may fix the macro view of sexism, but make the man passed over for the position solely because you were female pissed as all hell towards women and, when you do that to the majority of men, you'll be just as successful, and just as hated by men as men were and were hated by you in years past? They'd realize that it's not a competition, it's a cooperation, and maybe skill should be valued over sex.

What would happen if we stopped all these divisive issues that really don't do anything other than tear us apart and work on a better economy, on rights for all, on border security? What would happen if we simply looked at each other as Americans, and put us, all of us, first? What would happen if we ripped out the crap in the Federal government that overtaxes people, or deploys armed forces against our own countrymen? What would happen if we made the Supreme Court Constitutional again, and made term limits a reality for Congress? Maybe we could get a government for, by, and of the people again. Maybe America can indeed by great again like the man says.

Conclusion

I'm not in a special interest group. No President, outside of George W. Bush right after the September 11th attacks, that I can recall since my childhood, has been for me as an American. I've always been someone to be taxed, to be disarmed, to be hated, to be blamed. It's not racism or bigotry to want us all to be treated as equals and not be penalized for real and imagined wrongs that occurred in the past before I was born, or more recently yet with which I had nothing to do.

I'm not part of the problem. I'm an American; the people who say I am part of the problem are the problem. Their candidate, mired in scandal, corruption, and treason, is Hillary Clinton. Mine, with a message of hope for the country, not just some groups in it, is Donald Trump.

5 Habits All Successful Seducers Share

November 2, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Whether you are looking to attract a long-term girlfriend or wife, or you are experimenting with shorter-term liaisons, learning the art of seduction is essential. Reams of content have been written on the topic, both on ROK and elsewhere: indeed, it's possible to get lost in a tsunami of pick-up advice.

But while it can be useful to absorb successful people's techniques, a shortcut is to observe their habits and adopt them yourself. To that end, here is a list of the top five habits I've observed in men who are great with women.

1. They take every opportunity

Guys who are great with women recognize and take up every opportunity that is presented to them. In this way they are somewhat akin to entrepreneurs. They know that the market is in a constant state of flux, and that change is at the heart of opportunity. As such, like the speculators of pussy they are, they are never afraid to launch a takeover bid, regardless of the circumstances.

Game writers will often advise men that they should be approaching all the time. I would wholeheartedly endorse this. I would also add that however many opportunities you're taking now, there are always more to be had. I, for example, will try to get my first approach of the day in in the morning while I'm traveling to my office on the subway. There are so many cute girls on their way to work in London (or any reasonably-sized commuter city) and yet guys won't talk to them, rationalizing that it is too early, she'll think I'm crazy or whatever. In actual fact, I've probably taken more phone numbers and set up more dates through morning approaches than at any other time.

So next time you are out and about and see an attractive girl, be sure to approach her whatever the time or the circumstances. It is only by being present and open to all prospects that you will truly optimize your game.

2. They notice and follow up on IOIs

While most game advice is centered on what the guy should do in order to attract the girl, the fact remains that there will be many times that girls will shoot you so-called 'indicators of interest', or IOIs, without you having done anything.

While I would never advise anyone to rely on these as a mainstay, I would counsel that you should always at least do your best to notice them, and to follow up with alacrity. Not only do direct IOIs frequently lead to sex, but also, if you fail to pursue a potentially-interested girl you may find yourself regretting it for a long time afterwards. Men, after all, are the more romantic gender. There are few more lasting self-inflicted wounds than the thought of that beautiful girl who smiled at you at the museum and who you just know you could have dated, had you had the courage to speak to her.

The successful seducer is always on the lookout for IOIs, therefore, and he'll execute quickly when he gets them, even if it means deviating slightly from his routine. For example, a while back I was on a subway train when I got strong direct eye contact from an attractive, petite and very feminine brunette—just my type. Once you've been in the game a while you will learn to distinguish a solid IOI from casual interest, but the best way to describe it is as that "rabbit in the headlights" look that girls give when they are truly smitten.

Well, she was giving me that look and I knew I had to follow up. When she got of the train I went right after her, introduced myself on the platform, took her number and then left. A drink and then several awesome sex sessions ensued later. Had I not taken the time to go after her then we would never have connected.

Remember: always be willing to go after a sure thing, and never leave money on the

3. They stand out from the crowd

Every truly successful seducer I have ever known has found ways to differentiate himself and stand out from the crowd. This can manifest itself in many ways, but primarily I'm talking about standing out physically (in terms of what you wear) and standing out in terms of your personality.

While the old concept of "peacocking" is rightly maligned by both men and women these days, there can nevertheless be little argument with the fact that, all else being equal, the better dressed man will be more successful than his slacks-and-sweatshirt counterpart. A former colleague of mine who has slept with more women than anyone else I've ever met was particular about his clothes to the point of obsession.

I appreciate that this will immediately cause some people to question his masculinity ("what real man takes so much care over his clothes?") but remember that narcissism is one of the three "dark triad" characteristics that are like catnip to women (along with Machiavellianism and psychopathy). Therefore, taking time to select a silk pocket square that contrasts dramatically with your blazer plus the right trousers and shoes will help your cause a lot—if you remember that your main aim is to stand out rather than blend in.

Your personality, too, should be larger than life. Don't be obnoxious, but as a rule of thumb try to ensure that you are louder and have more to say than the other men in the group.

4. They are dominant

There can be no doubt that women are attracted to masculine men, and that means that to be a contender you need to be dominant. Now of course, the massive and blatantly obvious caveat here is that you should also be ultimately respectful and appreciate that no means no. Nevertheless, within these boundaries it will serve you well to ensure that your body language, your tone of voice and your general demeanor communicates dominance – both of the woman you are interacting with as well as any men in your vicinity.

The key thing here is to appear decisive and unwavering—even if secretly you aren't. For example, after you've had a couple of drinks with a girl on a date, try getting up, taking her by the hand and simply leading her to a taxi. When she questions what you're doing just say "we're going back to my place to watch a movie." Doing this will communicate that you have had similar success with women before and that you are not intimidated by her.

Now, in the back of your mind you may well be uncertain that she will acquiesce and that's fine – just do the actions anyway and see what happens. She's much more likely to want to go home with you if you demonstrate leadership and even if she doesn't, she will still respect you more which will pay dividends the next time you meet.

5. They don't apologize

Highly successful seducers never apologize—or certainly not for minor social infractions anyway. The fact of the matter is you can't make an omelette without breaking eggs. If you are the kind of guy who frequently approaches women while demonstrating leadership and a certain kind of cocky-funny humor then the chances are you're going to offend someone every so often.

Now, I'm not recommending that you should be a dick—be classy and convivial in all your interactions. But the truth of the matter is that the real seducer always ruffles a few feathers in his quest for vaginal Valhalla. If someone gets offended then make a joke but don't apologize. As long as have acted lawfully then you have nothing to be sorry for.

Remember, an apology is a submission to someone else's frame—and that is never a good look.

Feminists Attack Elderly Gay Man For Saying Older Women Shouldn't Wear Yoga Pants

November 2, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> …not since the mini-skirt has there been something worn by so many women who should never have it on in the first place…
> — Alan Sorrentino, a sexagenarian gay man, in his letter to a local Rhode Island newspaper

A senior citizen and self-described "short, little gay Italian" in Rhode Island has been the victim of a vicious intimidation campaign by feminists with too much time on their hands. After he wrote a newspaper letter saying that women over 20 should not wear yoga pants, the backlash against Alan Sorrentino was vitriolic. 300 women marched on his home address, which was publicly shared, using the excuse that it was just a "neighborhood protest."

In retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights, which you might have incorrectly thought encouraged violence given the heavy-handed feminist response, Sorrentino received threatening calls and explicit death threats. Publications such as The Washington Post regarded the shameful intimidation of an old man as some kind of fun outing. Rabid social media users and the protesters themselves also lost sight of the context of Sorrentino's letter and later comments. Among other things, he pointed out that men rocking up to supermarkets in Speedos would be considered inappropriate, too.

“Violent” gay man whose fashion prescriptions in a newspaper reaching only a few thousand people are capable of disemboweling feminists and ejecting them into space.

If anything, the moronic march on Sorrentino’s home and throughout his neighborhood demonstrates the paucity of real issues women have to complain about. For all the talk of the “misogyny” and “patriarchy” that triggered the march (pun intended), these women were able to assemble freely in one of the most liberal states in America and harass, without interruption, an old white male, albeit not a straight one. They evidently did not feel the fear they continually reference in their diatribes. Where were the Saudi-style female dress code police or the rape squads of the rape culture they always talk about to teach them a lesson? Alas, the dastardly misogyny and patriarchy must have chosen to remain invisible again!

Women tell men what to wear all the time

I didn't see anyone staking out Jennie Price's home for telling her husband and other men what to wear. Image attribution: Martin Spaven.

It goes without saying that one of the biggest criticisms leveled by women towards their boyfriends or husbands is their allegedly bad fashion sense. Even beyond their relationships, women have a penchant for sticking their noses into what a man wears, from his sporting clothing and clubbing attire to his choice of bathing suit. Here in Australia, an entire media sub-industry emerged to criticize our former conservative Prime Minister, Tony Abbott, for wearing so-called "budgie smugglers" whilst swimming and keeping fit.

Because Alan Sorrentino had 300 women obviously stalk him in his home for his fashion comments, should men have targeted the residence of one Jennie Price, a hack journalist from The Daily Mail? Instead of celebrating her husband's decision to resist middle-age decline and obesity through cycling, Price penned a ridiculous piece in 2014 decrying so-called MAMILs (middle-aged men in lycra).

She joined BBC "journalist" Dominic Casciani, who equated men taking up the amateur sport with a mid-life crisis. Notwithstanding that men in lycra wouldn't get me or my readers off, at least men wearing this fabric actually engage in exercise when they don it (in the morning, too, when fewer folks are awake to see them!). By contrast, yoga pants seem to be the default female fashion option for non-exercise more than any kind of physical exertion (even yoga).

Naturally, had just three guys, let alone 30 or 300, publicized their intention to protest-cycle their way through Jennie Price's neighborhood in Britain, the police would have been called. The same can be said of any march on the homes of countless female journalists and female "fashion experts" who have opined on what men should or should not wear. And let's not forget women telling each other what clothes are or are not acceptable. A number of females make their careers out of critiquing what other women wear, usually savagely, especially on the celebrity red carpet. I wonder how many times, for example, then zombie and now dead zombie Joan Rivers found her home visited by offended feminists after she berated either a piece of female fashion attire or the character and appearance of the women wearing it.

Sending a tweet is "violence" but 300 people marching on someone's house is not–what world do we live in?

The national debt? Nah. Terrorism? Nah. Urban crime? Nah. These folks are protesting fashion comments.

At the start of this year, I brought you the story of Holly Michelle Wood, a putrid Harvard PhD candidate and feminist, who went around calling white people "awful." After the now banned Milo Yiannopoulos simply retweeted Wood's criticisms of him, fellow feminist Catrin Cooper used the "cyber violence" argument and tried to get a Twitter stooge, Michael Margolis, to alert its founder, Jack Dorsey. We would not have the time to go through a mere noticeable fraction of the other instances in which women who cannot argue their position online reframe criticism as "misogyny" or outright "violence."

Even as Alan Sorrentino clearly feared for his safety during the march, hundreds or potentially thousands of women in America gave themselves excuses for calling some other man disagreeing with them online or in person "violent." Tragically, this goes well beyond Sorrentino's plight. A climate now exists in which whatever words certain women find offensive become the basis for stopping what they're doing (presumably not much) and going after the person saying them in the most organized and appalling ways.

At a minimum, the target of their fury must lose his job, reputation, and sense of personal safety to satiate their desire for revenge. In the meantime, the very act of their shrill protesting, which is not interfered with, validates the idea that women are not the targets of systematic hate or oppression in society.

As a gender, women, particularly the middle and upper middle-class women who seem to dominate these kinds of pointless, abusive protests, have nothing to complain about. Except maybe having too much time on their hands.

Game Is A Modern Rite Of Passage That Helps Turn Boys Into Men

November 2, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Anyone who's been involved in the manosphere for long enough knows about the concept of a rite of passage. For tens of thousands of years, when boys hit the age of puberty, they were forced to undergo a set of challenges.

These challenges were meant to break them down, and build them back up even stronger. These challenges were meant to test them as men, and they are collectively known as an "initiation," or as a "rite of passage." When a boy successfully completed the tasks laid before him, he became a man.

Our society, for the most part, lacks these rites of passage. This is, in large part, why there is such a lack of masculinity in our culture—boys are never given a chance to develop into men. We have all of these 45 year old boyish-men running around for a reason: there exists no institutionalized rite of passage in the West.

Despite this, however, I believe that learning game is a form of initiation. It contains all of the traits necessary to turn a boy into a man. It teaches boys to develop self-confidence, despite what women think of them, to become decisive and assertive, and to remain persistent and cultivate strength of will.

Death Of The Ego

One of the primary functions of a rite of passage, is that it destroys a boy's ego. This is necessary, for in order for him to become a man, his identification with boyhood must be destroyed. In other words, he must cease to view himself as a boy, and come to view himself as a man.

This is, in a nutshell, what most of the rites of passage were designed to do—this is why many of them simulated death, in a rather belly-of-the-whale-esque fashion. One rite of passage, of the Aborigines to be specific, entailed kidnapping a young boy from his mother.

When a boy would reach the age of puberty, the men of the village would sneak into his home during the night and kidnap him; his mother would put on a big show, screaming and fighting, to make it seem realistic. The men would blindfold the boy and take him to the middle of the woods.

He would then spend the next several months undergoing challenges; he would not see a single woman for this period of time. This sudden yanking from the "mother-world," of safety, and being thrust into the "father-world" of dangerous challenges, symbolized his death as a boy.

When the boy returned home, he would view himself as a man. He would carry himself taller, he would interact with the women differently, and he would have a new sense of purpose. In many ways, as I will soon explain, game does all of these things for the men willing to learn it.

Facing Fears

Many of these challenges that boys were forced to face involved overcoming their fears. Fear of death, fear of the unknown, and fear of failure were all overcome during these rites of passage. As an example, one Native American rite of passage involved making a boy sit, blindfolded, on a tree trunk for three days straight.

Imagine his fear as he heard the various animals during the night; the howling, the cawing, and the roaring of the animals alone would be enough to terrify even the bravest of men. Then, add in the elements of cold and wind, the bugs that must have crawled over his feet, and the fear of a rival tribe member killing him, and it becomes very apparent how brave the men of the past must have been.

Then, once three days had passed, a man of the village would come and remove the boy's blindfold. This, again, is symbolic of his rebirth; for three days straight, he was blind and helpless. Then, his vision returned and he emerged a new man.

All throughout the rites of passage of history, whether they be of the Inuits, the Amazon tribes, or the South African tribes, there are some very common characteristics: facing your fear, being reborn, and coping with uncertainty are all critical parts of these initiations.

Why Were These Rituals Necessary?

Upon contemplation, it becomes very clear why these rituals were necessary. The world that we live in is radically different than the world that our ancestors lived in. A tribe of weak men meant extinction; there was no “military,” or “safety.” If the men could not protect the tribe, it would not be protected.

Imagine, right now, if a marauding band of 25 vandals roamed into your neighborhood. They were all extremely jacked, mean looking, and each one was carrying some sort of weapon; a baseball bat, a stick, or a crowbar. Do you think that you and your neighbors would have the balls to fight them off?

You, being a reader of ROK, may very well fight a noble fight—but your neighbors? I seriously doubt that a purple-haired, complaining, self-castrating feminist “man” would be of any use during a battle such as this.

Now, try to imagine that this sort of thing happened fairly regularly for our ancestors. It was not uncommon for neighboring tribes to frequently attack you, so it was an absolute necessity that the men be trained for battle. But, being trained for battle requires more than physical strength.

It requires ferocity, it requires strength of will, decisiveness, assertiveness, and a complete lack of fear. These are the characteristics that rites of passage were meant to breed, for without them, a tribe would go extinct.

Are These Rituals Still Necessary?

Someone might point out that we aren't at war anymore, so these rituals aren't necessary. Although I agree that we aren't in a state of constant warfare anymore, I still believe that these rites of passage are extremely necessary. Here's why.

Men and women both have distinct psychological makeups; there is no denying this, no matter how hard the Marxists cry and clamor. Men and women are different. Boys have an inherent desire to be a part of something greater than themselves, namely a tribe. Boys have an inherent desire to be welcomed into the world of men…and we aren't getting it, because there isn't even a world of men anymore.

The once sacred separation of the genders has been desecrated. Only a select handful of men's organizations still exist: the manosphere, the Freemasons, and various other spiritual organizations. It used to be commonplace for gentleman's organizations to exist everywhere, but they've become a thing of the past.

This is why, in large part, we're experiencing such a crisis of masculinity; men don't know who they are anymore. We don't have any healthy male role models. All we've got is weak men who justify their weakness with feel good aphorisms. We want more, but we don't get more.

Any man who is attuned to this can feel it; he can feel the general sense of boyishness that the adulthood of men seems to hold onto. There's no chance for us to prove ourselves. There's no dragons to slay, no enemies to fight off, and no fears to overcome.

And we're suffering. We can feel it in our bones. Not only are men unnecessary, but we don't even have opportunities to grow and develop like the men of the past. We don't have any initiations or male guidance; no men to reassure our belonging in the tribe, no obstacles to face.

Learning Game: The New Initiation?

I believe that, although it isn't perfect, game is a phenomenal substitute for this lack of a male initiation ritual. Game provides us with many of the characteristics that you need to be a man, and it has many of the characteristics that the old rituals of the past did:

- Destroys your ego
- Requires you to face your fears
- Forces you to be decisive, in times of uncertainty
- Develops confidence, ferocity, and a strong will Again, obviously game isn't perfect. One could certainly make the argument that one's masculinity shouldn't be contingent upon what women think, and I agree 100%. But do you know what? You may get into game for women's approval, but any seasoned player knows that you actually STAY in the game for your own personal growth.

When men first start learning game, they get into it because their sex life isn't what they want it to be. They think that learning game will get them girls, and it does. But something happens along the way—they start getting all of the sex that they could ever want, and they realize that game has changed them on a deeper level.

Game provides you with an outlet to overcome your anxiety, and to live life fearlessly; by consistently going out and facing your fears of rejection, you develop a certain fearless mindset that bleeds into other areas of your life.

Learning game creates a whole-personality transformation, that cannot be found anywhere else. No other hobby, outlet, or activity will change you as much as game does, aside from an actual initiation conducted by the men of the past.

Game Makes You A Man

Game will transform you from a boy into a man, for a vast number of reasons. First off, game demolishes your ego. A lot of men have this delusion that they could get any hot girl that they want, but they are forced to face reality when they actually go out and try to pull girls.

This is why so many men hate game, and can't handle it: you're forced to face reality very quickly, and most men can't take this. When you start to go out and learn game, you have one of two choices:

- Accept that you suck with girls, and keep trying to improve
- Viscerally deny reality and perpetuate your delusions by never going out and experiencing rejection

Most men choose the latter. Their ego is far too precious, and they can't handle it being challenged. Those men who do have the courage to demolish their ego, however, will end up bedding women more gorgeous than they ever imagined (take my word for it).

Second, learning game requires you to face your fears. Think of how many men have approach anxiety nowadays; do you think that this underlying anxiety might bleed into other areas of their life? Of course! So once you overcome your approach anxiety in pickup, this fearlessness will bleed into other areas of your life. In other words, you're starting to develop a totally new personality that isn't afraid of living life and taking risks.

Game forces you to be decisive in times of uncertainty. A lot of the time, in fact most of the time, you don't know whether or not a girl's friends will be okay with you. You don't know if she has a boyfriend, you don't know if she lives nearby, you don't know this, you don't know that. When it comes to game, there's a lot of uncertainty.

This is why learning game teaches you to accept uncertainty and make take decisive action in the face of it. What other skill could be more masculine? The men of the past revered this skill, because it's what their entire livelihood was based around.

You see a pack of deer 100 feet away; you don't know if you can kill them or not. Should you take the risk? An enemy tribe is attacking; should you run to your hut and get a better weapon, or pick up a rock and do what you can? You're injured and alone, but you see a nearby village; should you ask them for help? Would they kill you or heal you?

Learning to take decisive action in the face of uncertainty was a skill that every man had for millenia; his life depended on it. Now, the only way to cultivate this skill is through game or other, more extreme measures, such as fighting in a war or something (although even then, you won't have much freedom to make decisions).

All in all, game will take you from a boy to a man. It will teach you to be confident, and to become completely detached from either rejection or acceptance from women. It will help you to develop assertiveness and social calibration.

Most importantly, however, it will teach you to overcome your fears. In the words of my favorite pickup mentor: "Learning game is an Odyssey of the mind." It teaches you to overcome your fears, to face your lingering negative beliefs, and to grow as a man. Our society gives us no right of passage, so we've created our own. Go out and learn game, for it will change your life.

6 Reasons To Create Fat Control Laws And Obesity-Free Zones

November 3, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Lately, gun-free zones and gun control laws are all the rage among the globalists and liberals of all shapes (usually circular) and sizes .

Those measures, solely aimed at disarming the people and depriving them of the sacred right to defend themselves, has shown its vast ineffiency, with gun victims and terrorist attacks on the rise in those zones since no honest citizen can shoot back to stop the massacre.

Here is why I propose, once a conservative government reaches the White House, to create Fat Control Laws ("F.C.L") and Obesity-Free Zones ("O.F.Z") as obesity is indeed a more serious threat to the lives of Americans than honest citizens carrying legally purchased guns. Here are six potential benefits:

1. Simple philanthropy

Obese people are delusional thinking that it is great to be a useless sack of shit. Nowadays, they get fed a distorted reality saying that “big and round is beautiful” when the natural reaction, deeply branded in our DNA, is disgust, mockery and suspicion.

Fat and sedentary lifestyles kill much more than guns. The war against obesity is as important as the war on crime or drugs. Bovine people not only harm themselves but others too. By creating measures to prevent them from becoming fat or exhorting them lose weight, we are helping our common man to preserve his dignity as a human being.

In their case, sugar and salt create a dopamine rush and an addiction loop very similar to an addiction to opiates. We must show our potbellied (or barrelbellied) junkies the way as they can’t take the steps themselves.

Just like with restrictions on cigarettes, if they are stupid enough to gorge themselves on calories, we must conclude that there is a severe lack of judgement on their part and prevent them from purchasing the source of their misery.

2. Preserving aesthetics and other senses

No more eyesore of seeing fatties rolling around everywhere you go. Imagine a beach with a plethora of more feminine, attractive and thin women by banning whales in bikinis.

Our nostrils would also be free of the olfactory offence that they throw in our faces. Say goodbye to the pungent smell of fat rolls sweat at your local grocery store.

No more 280-lb SJW land whales with laboured breath sounds in waiting rooms or uncontrolled farting in the public transport like you are in a cattle train. It could be tomorrow.

3. Positive impact on children

I do not want these people to roam free and that my future progeny can witness it and think that this is normal. Worse, if the PC politburo tells them it is beautiful to be a beached whale. Let’s send them far until they get better. Out of sight, out of mind as they say.

Legal elements should be implemented against pernicious publicity aired on television and directly aimed at children, whether by the time chosen to air it or the promotion it makes of unhealthy eating.

Of course, with Fat Control Policies, kids will get bullied at school. Some will cut themselves for being called fattie. So what? Adapt and overcome or crawl in a ball and cry. The weakest has to be left behind if he does not want to save himself.

4. A healthier population

You are under arrest for being an immovable, gargantuan arsehole

Fat is not a silent killer. Hundreds of thousands of people die (with a loud thud) every year of obesity-related diseases, a largely preventable cause of death worldwide. Today, 1 in 5 Americans and 1 in 11 Britons dies from being a fat arse with no self-control.

It is a fact that obesity causes death by cardiac arrest, diabetes, coronary and liver diseases, cancer, and hypertension among others. Promoting a healthy lifestyle and physical activity will create a longer life expectancy.

Physically healthier people are mentally healthier too (boost of self-esteem and confidence). Fat Control Laws will reduce mental health issues such as depression, inferiority complex or suicidal tendencies caused by obesity. That is also less money spent by the taxpayer

5. A boost for the economy

According to a 2009 report, ham planets cost the economy $117 billion a year. And that is for the American economy alone! The number of human cattle is still growing exponentially. It inflicted more than a $325.8 billion loss to the economy in 2010.

In 2016, we can reasonably assume that the number of obese people has grown and has impacted the wallet of your average American even harder.

A fitter population, with its nutritional choices, would result in a more natural, higher-quality food industry. Smaller amounts of food produced and needed, resulting in reduced resources and materials wasted during and after its production.

We could see the end of excessive fossil fuel used to transport land walruses and their fat arse across long distances and hogging the space that could be use by three normal individuals.

Healthier, more active people are happier, more productive and successful since the cogs of the machinery are not coated in fat. An age of stronger, self-governed, high-energy men bringing a healthier society. It’s YUGE!

6. A new sexual and romantic market

It will bring a more balanced sexual arena to limit the accumulation of fat. A radical answer to the phenomenon of plummeting testosterone levels caused by high fat percentage, trimming the numbers of plump omegas and sexual market voluntary rejects.

Let’s impose a healthier diet for higher numbers of attractive, thin and pretty women. Greater numbers of quality girls to choose from reduces aggressive competition, which decreases the bitch shields of thin, entitled girls.

Endless supplies of betas queuing to capture crumbs of their attention would be a thing of the past. As I said it before, “male thirst is the root of all evil” when it comes to romantic competition.

Sexier citizens means more relationships, a peak in libido and reproduction of physically and mentally balanced individual, helping nations suffering from low birth rate.

One more element for the protection of Western society (being the most affected one) and its people, cementing the bases of a strong future, fighting globalism and the myth they try to sell us about global overpopulation.

By logical natural process, bronies, corpulent man-children and manga conventions should also disappear soon.

The Fat Control Laws

1. Segregated Obesity-Free Zones

Our diabetic mammoths must be isolated from further propaganda and tasty treats.

This is why we should create large (VERY large) fenced areas to protect the healthy subjects, as fat is more dangerous than guns.

Let’s pen the big-boned rejects in separated zones where access to junk food and other harmful products would be forbidden. Fresh water, open spaces, salad and treadmills as far as the eye could see.

BUILD THAT FENCE!

We shall call it the “David Fatrelle Center for Porcine Rehabilitation”

2. Permits

A permit would have to be issued (similar to a gun-carrying permit) for the purchase of junk food, high-carb snacks, soda drinks etc. After a doctor’s physical exam of the patient, slim citizens would be delivered a permit with a stamp of approval, granting them access to supermarkets or venues where processed or junk food is served.

3. Mandatory workouts

Compulsory exercise would be imposed to obese people to reach a standard BMI. We could bring it up a notch where a fine could be issued after a determined period of time if the weight loss target has not been reached.

A Steps Counter Activity tracker would have to be worn or installed on their smartphone and a quota of physical activity would have to be reached on a day to day basis.

Just like the programs for convicted criminals or drug abusers with reports to the local police station on a regular basis, the stubbornly chunky would be followed during a rehabilitation stage and their progress monitored.

4. Fat shaming

Fat shaming works great, as we have seen before. Remember the shitstorm of the "beach body" campaign, immediately declared thought criminals by the Body Positive Lobby or Islamic Thought Tribunal of Londonistan?

Or the cold-blooded leaflets given by anonymous though criminals to particularly adipose London Tube passengers? YUGE success.

Pourquoi ça n'existe pas?

Fat people are a dead weight to society in all senses of the term and to compensate this burden, they must chip in one way or another and repair the harm they cause.

Fitter people means a self-aware, powerful mass that strives for greatness.

But the liberals in charge don't want that. This is why they produce massive amounts of harmful, processed food and encourage the pleb, by manipulating publicity and promoting make-believe, to remain fat, weak and above all, docile.

It's all part of a plan. Fat Control Laws are the answer to that great evil.

3 More Emotions Men Should Master

November 3, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Passions and emotions are an almost bottomless pit. Start digging there and you will find new ones, or new relations between this and that tidbit of emotional content. So-called Enlightenment philosophers who tried to theorize the passions—something that had been done at greater length, actually, by Thomas Aquinas—could never agree on how many there were or even how much they exactly mattered in the course of life.

Whether or not you have been reading my last two pieces on the topic, remember this is about mastering passions in the most general sense. This is not only about emotional restraint or seduction. Our own emotional states are the first in line, but mastering the passions is also about spotting what other people are feeling, how they can be led to a specific course of action, and what tends to make them tick. Mastering the passions is far from evident, it rather takes times and experience: the concepts and directions I am providing here aim at giving some conscious clarity about things that are by nature a bit muddy.

Artists, though they often suffer from mental problems, are skilled at painting a particular vision in vivid colours, allowing their public to share a specific point of view and emotional state. This is something the elite know very well. Critics trashed Ayn Rand's Atlas Shrugged because they could see themselves painted there as passive-aggressive cultural parasites. Rand's novel was more cogent, and attracted more heat, than her barely original "philosophical" pieces today sold at the cheapest price on the second-hand book market.

More recently, the movie The Fall (2004) got backlashed by some of the mainstream media on the grounds that it depicted Hitler as “too human.” While seeing actor Bruno Ganz pondering, eating, talking to his closest company or getting angry, the viewer could perhaps feel a bit of empathy to him. Which is, of course, unacceptable to a Left that clings to the idea of a crazy, careless, “inhuman” dictator to be forever cast as an embodiment of evil. Hollywood directors do not like witnessing others competing with their own emotional mastery.

We need artists, as well as qualified cultural critics, to take some distance from the mainstream propaganda disguised as entertainment and expand an alternative culture and artworks. Emotions explored in the present series can be used just that way.

1. Gratitude

Gratitude denotes a trained and refined disposition. Being graceful means “recognizing that the good in our life can come from something that is outside us and outside our control” (Neel Burton, Heaven and Hell, chap.8, p.61). It focuses on positive things we already have and that cannot be ascribed to our sole merit or efforts.

The traditional world, whatever the particular cultural or religious form it was embodied into, always emphasized the necessity of being grateful. You owed your existence to God, to your family and your community. None of these goods were actually deserved, which meant you had to be grateful for them and repay them by being a dutiful member of the community as well as a dutiful father for your own children. A lot of prayers and ancient rites imply a thanksgiving for what one already has.

Moving later in time, it is striking to see that modern progressivism breeds the exact opposite mindset. The ideology of rights make many goods granted, not a “thank you for” but an “I have a right to.” Neophilia (the relentless pursuit of novelty) always casts a bad shadow on what has been around for some time, as if what was coming later was always better.

Advertisement, gossip culture, economic growth pressure, quest for victimhood lead to envy and always being more or less frustrated with what one already has, regardless of what it is. By leading us to always want more, progressivism makes us oblivious to what we already have or how it does not stem from pure individual merit—and, when it flatters the ego, it makes us complacent and far from cultivating the art of being thankful.

Turning our backs from the modern, ungraceful mindset is easier said than done. To start with: loud-mouthed girls should be remembered they owe their nice, luxurious workplaces to the men who built them, LGBTBBQ should thank their heterosexual parents and ancestors for their very lives, anti-white black activists should remember they would not even exist had their ancestors not benefited from their white colonizers healthcare technology. Feel free to expand the list. Ultimately, I think, every person who is modern or westernized enough can be outed as ungraceful for something.

2. Trust

A famous study showed that multiculturalism was closely correlated with defiance and a lack of trust in each other. Provided that we enlarge a bit our definition of multiculturalism, this absolutely makes sense. Some ethnic groups are especially prone to violence, and some “minority” groups are rewarded for freely accusing the silent majority, but the hegemony of political correctness made it a taboo. Communities have been fragmented by individualism, i.e. each person looking to take as much as she can, and by an “antiracist” white guilt that soon became an intra-white generalized suspicion of “racism.” People do not identify anymore with the larger society and often cannot even identify with a smaller community—which makes everyone else a potential enemy.

Yet, without trust, life becomes unbearable. If you can’t go to the streets without the possibility of getting mugged by, say, BLM activists, or go to a family meal without the prospect of a lukewarm struggle with aging leftist parents, or have a relationship with a girl without the possibility of her making a false rape accusation, there aren’t a lot of things you can do on the long run. Without trust in other people, you have to trust the complex of big corporations, NGO, and State institutions we call the system—and be dependent from it for things as basic as food and shelter.

Only trust in each other can make life sustainable and long-term projects workable. To re-create trust, we have to make people accountable and bound to precise rules, reward good behaviours while punishing bad ones. Actions must bear consequences. But before neomasculinity gets into power, men should strive to establish a reputation through reliability, persistence, and a strong mindset. I could wager you have been more trusting of your Facebook friends last years than of the mainstream media, the former conveying more trustworthy information than the latter.

3. Desire

Modern capitalism and progressivism always ran on desire. Want cheaper prices? More goods? Better goods? More TV channels to watch? More monies? More ego and thinking you are the hot shit? Well, just buy in X or do some work for Y, and here it is… um, nah, you just have to do some more, and some more, and some more. In the end, you forgot why exactly you are doing what you're doing, or why you started to watch TV. But it all started with you led to perform something, no matter how surreptitiously framed as spontaneous or normal it was.

The system plays on desires in three ways. It sets things to be desired, things to be feared or never desired at all, and things to be consummated without end. Things to be desired include everything the advertisement wants you to desire, like a revolving credit, a new sofa, an SUV or whatever, as well as the next step of "progress" as it has been elaborated on the top of the pyramid.

Things to be feared are where the system wants you to be resigned and fatalistic: did you ever feel sad to see all these girls losing themselves into a sea of fat, bitching, and SJW-propaganda spouting? Too bad, that's globalization, resistance is futile, move on! At last, things to be consummated are mainly produced to keep you busy and programmed though you are not really practising anything beyond staring at a screen.

Lately, an important shift has been happening between the first and third ways to play on desires. Decades before, the average consumer had to desire owning more junk or being part of the “progress”: the system needed him to work and monitor his peers. Today, the junk is already everywhere, PC culture is already hegemonic, and the average American worker is no longer needed. Active desire is not needed anymore.

Thus, the system has shifted into making the average Joe more passive. Instead of actually desiring more, the consumer should be content with surrogates of everything—pseudo-group identity with team sports, pseudo-sports with football and basket on TV, pseudo-sex with porn, pseudo-life with video games, pseudo-family life with animals, pseudo-expertise when the average libtard obnoxiously parrots the media on everything. This is Brzezinski’s tittytainment in a nutshell.

Even if you don’t give up on having a real life instead of a surrogate, the system will still want you to desire things only for yourself, thus retreating into individualism, instead of trying to actually weight on the world. Either you surrender to “the progress” or you try to ignore it before it comes for you. As if nothing could change.

Don’t let the elite frame the world according to its own interests. Desire self-realization and weighting on the course of the world. Of course, our female counterparts should desire being loving, caretaking, and definitely on our side.

To conclude this series

Once again, it is hard to sketch in a few words what could be done with passions or emotions. What I have mostly dwelled into is how those already in power manipulate them and what we could do as to take them back. If you find the topic worthy of interest, you can expand it in two directions: first, documenting yourself on a particular passion or emotion, and second, using some by stirring it with a certain aim in mind.

In the former case, I would recommend Neel Burton's Heaven and Hell (quoted several times in the course of this series) as a point of departure. In the latter, being creative or simply assertive is up to you. Whether this looks more like efforts or self-persuasion or artistry does not matter much.

Here, as well as in seduction, a tight framing is key. Whatever the topic, no vocabulary and no picture are really neutral, which is a problem as our perception and thinking orientation are often conditioned by these. The mastery of emotions is reinforced—and reinforces—the mastery of representations. If this sounds far-fetched, let me provide some examples of use, examples you are absolutely free to expand as it suits you.

In the comments space, several guys here have been giving a very negative portrayal of the nice guy: he would be a fake, a "sneaky bastard," a "jerk." So guys who want to get laid or have their own interests, just as everyone else, are jerks? This looks like internalized feminist thinking. In my opinion, nice guys should elicit empathy, which goes through a positive portrayal emphasizing their willingness to respect the girl or how they were likely raised by an unmanly culture.

A recent ROK piece about mainstream media has shown how these are making a conscious effort to hide and de-legimitate white victimhood: they paint vividly any crime where the victim is non-white and the perpetrator is, but mention no detail or do not mention at all any crime perpetrated by non-white(s) on white(s).

The same pattern appears in the movie Elysium (2013), when the (of course) white villain mentions children she wants to protect from a mass of brown invaders, yet these children are never shown and consequently stir no empathy from the average watcher, whereas the brown-skinned are vividly depicted as humane and not responsible for their own poverty.

Analyzing these phenomena is fine, but ultimately insufficient. Creative people on our side have to provide an alternative that includes mastered emotions. Picking up girls is part of, and gives some experience in, this wider game.

“Memoirs Of A Misogynist” Is A Brutal And Entertaining Look At Our Sexual Dystopia

November 3, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Chad Cocker and written by Matt Forney

Everyone says that you shouldn’t judge a book by its cover, but that’s really difficult when the cover makes you throw up a little in your mouth. That’s how I felt when I was tasked with writing a review of Chad T. Cocker’s Memoirs of a Misogynist: An Erotic Novel for Men. What kind of “man” would want to read an erotic novel? Romance and erotica are female masturbation material; trying to write a Harlequin novel men is like marketing lesbian porn to actual lesbians.

Or so I thought.

Despite the packaging, Memoirs of a Misogynist is one of the best works I’ve read this year. Contrary to Cocker’s marketing, the novel is a examination of life as a man in modern America, filtered through the protagonist’s relationships with women. While it starts slowly, Cocker’s prose and honesty save the day and make Memoirs of a Misogynist absolutely worth your time and money.

From The Marquis De Sade To Neomasculinity

Because mainstream publishing almost exclusively caters to women, underground and independent writers have turned to fill the void of male-centric literature. From braggadocios "fratire" writers like Tucker Max and Maddox to "loser lit" authors such as Andy Nowicki and Ann Sterzinger to our very own Roosh and Quintus Curtius, there's a surfeit of alternative writing for men who are sick of the misandry and feminism of the "real" literary world.

Viewed against the backdrop of alternative publishing, Memoirs of a Misogynist is an odd animal indeed. When I first picked it up, I assumed it would be a tell-all memoir along the lines of Roosh's A Dead Bat in Paraguay, or a roman à clef in the fashion of Charles Bukowski's work. However, it does indeed live up to its subtitle, as much of the novel is devoted to lengthy, detailed descriptions of the protagonist's sexual encounters:

> She'd also gotten used to her chastity belt, and that scared her. It still didn't sit well with her that Master had total control over her sexual gratification. Slave was constantly wet and horny, and that made her even more compliant. The orgasms that Master gave her were unlike anything she had experienced before. They were mind-blowing. Even after a year together, their sex was electric and deeply satisfying.

In the introduction, Cocker warns us that the book is "possibly the dirtiest, most depraved, and most offensive novel you've ever read," making me wonder if he's ever heard of 120 Days of Sodom. Still, the structure of Memoirs' plot and the skill of Cocker's prose shows that he's both acquainted with classic erotica and has actually had sex with a lot of girls. The first half of the book is reminiscent of Pauline Reage's Story of O, in which a woman is systematically trained to become a sex slave.

Interestingly, Memoirs of a Misogynist also seems inspired by Venus in Furs: not the Velvet Underground song, but the erotic novel by Leopold von Sacher-Masoch. It's from Sacher-Masoch that we derive the term "masochism," the tendency to derive sexual pleasure from pain (akin to how "sadism" is derived from Sade), as the plot revolves around a man who desires nothing more than to be utterly subservient to his mistress. Severin's humiliation at the hands of his lover drives him to become a "misogynist" in the same way that Cocker's protagonist is one:

> That woman, as nature has created her, and man at present is educating her, is man's enemy. She can only be his slave or his despot, but never his companion. This she can become only when she has the same rights as he and is his equal in education and work.

(It's worth noting that Sacher-Masoch was a feminist and believed that equal relationships with women would only become possible with women's liberation. Insert your own joke here.)

Power Doesn't Care What You Need, As Long As You're On Your Knees

Enjoying Memoirs of a Misogynist requires you to get past the initial few chapters, which read like Fifty Shades of Grey with about 30 extra IQ points. The initial plot concerns Melinda, a runaway who falls into the care of a wealthy man who goes unnamed for most of the book. After offering her room and board, the man and Melinda begin a relationship, sealed by a contract where she agrees to become his sexual plaything:

> "My body is my Master's. It is his blank canvas, for him to modify as many times, and in as many different ways as he chooses." He could hear her breath quickening as he read. "He will control my bodily functions; most particularly my orgasms. I will only orgasm when my Master allows me."

What saves the book—and what kept me reading—was its depiction of the protagonist (henceforth referred to as "Master"). Far from the masturbatory blank slate that Christian Grey was, Cocker depicts Master as a complex and conflicted character, constantly trying to rationalize the way he treats Melinda (later re-christened "Slave"). Cocker's deft writing kept me wondering what the protagonist's motivations were all the way to the end. The book also frequently switches to Melinda's perspective; while it's usually a challenge for male writers to depict female characters (and vice versa), Cocker is skilled enough to make her compelling as well.

Where Memoirs really picks up is in the second half, which is set nearly ten years later. The focus shifts to Elizabeth Avery, a disgraced doctor stripped of her medical license after she's caught abusing a male patient. Destitute and despondent, she accepts a job as the personal physician of Master's stable of whores, his lifestyle offending her feminist sensibilities:

> Doctor Avery's world was spinning. She tried to distance herself. This was just a patient, after all. She was being paid a significant amount of money for this job—the kind of money that would solve a lot of her problems. Regardless, she couldn't help but be disgusted that a woman had allowed herself to be treated this way. He'd said she consented to this. In fact, the way she looked at the man showed she clearly loved him, and was a willing participant in her modifications and degradation. The woman, or Melinda, as the man had called her, looked up at him with what the doctor could only call adoration.

Once again, it would have been easy for Cocker to depict Elizabeth as a raging, bra-burning feminist stereotype, but he agilely avoids clichés in favor of nuance. Elizabeth isn't portrayed as a fire-breathing misandrist, but as a woman who unthinkingly absorbs leftist cant and has her life ruined because of it. The final chapters of the book show Elizabeth tussling with the sexual arousal she feels working for "Mr. X" (her name for the protagonist) and her attempts to maintain her beliefs as the evidence of her failed life piles up. I won't spoil the ending, other than to say that after finishing the book, I had to sit on it and digest it for a few days.

Each chapter of Memoirs begins with a factual statistic about the state of men and boys in America today, a jarring contrast with the depravity of the book's action. I initially wondered why they were there, but as I approached the end of the book, it all suddenly clicked. Memoirs of a Misogynist is a biting look at what our toxic sexual marketplace does to men and women. American dating is like an acid bath: no one who dives into it comes out unscathed. Even men who are successful at getting laid are affected by what they have to do to get ahead. There are no winners, no saints, and no role models: just people trying to make the best of a broken system.

As I stated earlier, Memoirs takes a while to really get going, and if you're not into lascivious descriptions of sex, the book won't appeal to you. But if you want a haunting, piercing look at the horror show of modern gender relations, Memoirs of a Misogynist is a must-buy. I can't wait to see what Cocker comes up with next.

What It’s Like To Be A Welder

November 3, 2016 | by Tubal Cain | Link | Original Link

By day, I work in a scrap yard. It is not glamorous, but glamour does not pay my bills. In the evening, I teach in a welding program at a community college.

Like many others, I once bought into the fallacy that you need a piece of paper from a university to succeed in life. At the age of thirty, I graduated from a university with an undergraduate degree, and the customary debt, which came along with it. Twenty-nine years later, I see how wrong I was.

Soon after graduating, I obtained an office job and moved to a city where I knew no one. The job I was so optimistic about turned out to be like marriage to a crack whore. Each day was as if walking through a minefield full of dysfunctional women, emasculated men, drama, backstabbing, cat-fights, and every other problem associated with modern workplaces. Worse yet, the cut male managers allowed trim to be in charge resulting in a fucked up toxic culture. After three tumultuous and abusive years, I found myself unceremoniously kicked to the curb, and surprisingly relieved.

After a lengthy stint of unemployment, I landed an entry-level job in a metal fabrication company. One of the benefits offered was tuition reimbursement for work related classes. I enrolled in welding classes at night, and upgraded my skills, all on my employer’s dime.

I immediately noticed a difference from my previous job. I worked exclusively with men. Except for a few token assholes, the men liked their solitude, did their jobs, and left each other alone. The work was varied, creative, and with overtime, the pay was decent. The fact that I had a work ethic, showed up every day on time, and desired to learn earned me respect quickly.

I eventually went down a different path, but returned to welding part-time as an adjunct instructor.

Welding is the joining of two metal pieces or parts by applying heat. A filler metal, or electrode, helps to make the joint. Power source supplies electricity required for heat, and a shielding gas or flux-covered electrode aids in the welding process.

The most common welding processes are Gas Metal Arc Welding (GMAW), Flux Core Arc Welding (FCAW), Gas Tungsten Arc Welding (GTAW), and Shielded Metal Arc Welding (SMAW). Of these, Gas Metal Arc Welding is the easiest to learn and offers the fastest production. Welding involves both Ferrous (steel) and Non-ferrous metals (aluminum, stainless steel).

Why Welding?

1. According to a Bureau of Labor report, the need for welders will grow by 26 percent by 2020.

2. According to a National Association of Manufacturers report, nearly 81 percent of manufacturers in the United States report that they cannot find skilled welders to meet demand.

3. The American Welding Society reports that the average age for a welder is now in the mid-fifties

4. Entry-level wages in my region average $28,000-$40,000 annually, with skilled welders earning $50,000 and more after five years in the trade.

I frequently hear from employers who are desperate for skilled welders. One plant manager told me “there are too many computer jockeys and not enough people who can weld and turn a wrench.” Another manufacturer told me “we have over a dozen welders retiring and no one to replace them”. Further, the school I teach at has more jobs available than they have students enrolled.

What Welders Do

Welders work in manufacturing, construction, maintenance repair facilities, and service companies. Welders typically work eight-hour shifts and a five-day week, but overtime is common. Welders often perform other duties like operating metal fabrication equipment and doing assembly work.

The more skills a welder develops, the more value and earning potential he has. For example, being able to weld, cut and fit up metals, and read weld symbols and prints will command a higher wage. Becoming certified in certain weld procedures also increases a welder’s wages and marketability.

Qualifications

Welding is the quintessential blue-collar job. It is physically demanding, hot, dirty, and requires a high degree of skill. Other personal characteristics are good eyesight and hand eye coordination, good manual dexterity, and good concentration.

Training

Community colleges offer affordable training for entry-level jobs in welding. Most programs are nine months, but my school also offers a sixteen-week work ready certificate in welding. Students learn common welding processes, thermal cutting processes, and blueprint reading. Unlike the typical ivory palace college professors, instructors are required to have a minimum of three years related and verifiable industrial experience. Job placement is also good.

Additional Facts

Despite a decent paying skill in high demand, clueless parents and educators continue to dissuade young men from entering blue-collar trades like welding. The result has been an entire generation of young men ruined by hostile four-year colleges, worthless degrees, and insurmountable debt.

Perhaps you are a perceptive and bright young ROK reader considering a career change. In closing, consider these facts.

1. You will always have employment as a welder.

2. Welding skills are highly transferable. You can carry these skills to your next, and often higher paying job.

3. Unlike many white-collar corporate jobs of today, the average welder's wages increase with skill. Overtime, merit increases, and production bonuses are common benefits for welders.

4. At the end of your shift, you can leave your job at the door.

5. Welding offers a level of creativity, solitude, and seeing the fruits of your labor. Studies show that welders, machinists, and other blue-collar trades have lower suicide rates than many white-collar professions.

6. Welding is often a "gateway trade" into other even higher paying trades like machinist, multi-craft machinery maintenance, and millwright.

7. Welding is a male dominated occupation. Traditionalist men will find it offers some insulation and respite from the typical feminist diatribe and PC bullshit of today's corporate world.

Conclusion

How has welding benefited me? First, I developed reasoning skills, something that academia failed to do. I also developed a thorough understanding of how men do the dirty, nasty, and dangerous jobs in this life. Feminists and elitists can marginalize men all they want, but men risk their lives and health to build and maintain their shit.

Further, welding has opened some doors for me, mainly teaching. My ultimate goal is to teach welding full-time, a late life career change if you will, and one I hope will happen.

The Importance Of Patriarchal Religion To Marriage And Childrearing

November 4, 2016 | by Brutus Centinel | Link | Original Link

I live in America, and I am happily married, with kids. I do not write this because I am more manly, or intelligent, or successful than you; I am not. I write this to share the main key to my success: patriarchal, traditional religion.

I am writing from my own religious convictions, which I believe are true. You are free to disagree, but you may still find value here. I have read the writings of other religions, and consider them "True Myths," useful for their wisdom, even though I may disagree with their theology. Neomasculinity itself is a philosophy that can be accepted by people of different religions, or no religion.

Modern Religion

I'll find another church, thanks

Modern religion is a feminized wasteland. God exists to impose obligations on men, and excuses women's evil acts. Faith is blind, irrational, and collectivist.

Men hate modern religion, which is why most churches in the West are demographically imbalanced toward women. Men are bored to death with touchy-feely sermons, endless committee meetings, female gossip, and the losers sitting in the pews around them. This is not how it should be.

Patriarchal Religion

That's more like it.

Patriarchal religion is interesting to men. It teaches that God is a man, creator of rationality, slayer of evil men, protector of the innocent:

> Praise be to the Lord my Rock, who trains my hands for war, my fingers for battle. (Psalm 144:1)

In male-led churches, women are taught to be respectful to their fathers, husbands, and legitimate authority. They understand that their role is to raise and care for children, and support their husband's mission:

> Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands as you do to the Lord. (Ephesians 5:22)

In patriarchal religion, female sins, like rebellion, envy, dishonesty, hypergamy, dressing and acting like a whore, and "hamstering" or rationalizing sin are condemned:

> When the woman saw that the fruit of the tree was good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom, she took some and ate it. (Genesis 3:6)
> I also want the women to dress modestly, with decency and propriety, adorning themselves, not with elaborate hairstyles or gold or pearls or expensive clothes, but with good deeds, appropriate for women who profess to worship God. (1 Timothy 2:9-10)
> And Adam was not the one deceived; it was the woman who was deceived and became a sinner. (1 Timothy 2:14)"
> This is the way of an adulterous woman: She eats and wipes her mouth and says, 'I've done nothing wrong.' (Proverbs 30:20)

Finding A Virtuous Woman

This is the unicorn I married.

All women are tempted towards sins like envy, but not all women act on their impulses. In spite of what many observe in the West, I have met many virtuous women: few sexual partners before marriage, respectful, submissive to their husbands, physically fit, feminine, good mothers. Most are in the older generations, especially before the Boomers. Most are involved in traditional religion. There are fewer younger women who are virtuous, and every single one that I have met is involved in traditional religion. They tend to be more rural, from small churches.

Traditional religion can be extremely helpful to finding and vetting women. It provides a community with certain values that you want in a woman, and it provides reliable references for a person's character. A woman who spent her younger years "out in the world" and came back at 29 be a "born-again-virgin" is a red flag, but a woman in her early 20s who teaches Sunday School and helps with the potluck dinners is far more likely to be wife material. The older women in the church will usually let you know if a woman is a whore.

Patriarchal Religion Helps Control Women's Sinful Tendencies

With proper training, woman can be virtuous.

Traditional religion acts as a curb (but not a cure) for women's immoral, rebellious, destructive behavior. My wife goes to a women's bible study group, where she often receives instruction from older religious women. This includes things like telling her to be submissive to me, lose weight and be healthy, not waste money, have cheerful sex on a regular basis, and to learn how to get some control over her emotions:

> Teach the older women to be reverent in the way they live, not to be slanderers or addicted to much wine, but to teach what is good. Then they can urge the younger women to love their husbands and children, to be self-controlled and pure, to be busy at home, to be kind, and to be subject to their husbands. (Titus 2:3)

One of my wife's friends once corrected her attitude toward sex, saying: "you need to view your body as a sheath for your husband's sword." She now routinely thanks me after we have sex. I am not a natural alpha, but I have little fear that my wife is going to suddenly cut off sex if I have a minor slip up.

Band Of Brothers

We've got your back, bro! Deus Vult!

With this great power comes great responsibility. As a patriarch, I am commanded to lead my family, instructing my wife and kids on how to act properly, with genuine love for their well-being. I must be on top of my game, be physically fit, and think rationally when my wife is irrational. I attend a men's Bible study, where we talk about leading as men. Every man in my group owns a gun, and we often go shooting together.

We encourage, support, teach, and correct each other. I have had sharp, intense, discussions with my pastor and men in my church about my own character and life decisions. Things are handled like men, discussed in the open, with real-talk (not rhetorical bullshit), and masculine love and concern for each other. This has aided me in thinking deeply about my life, and correcting bad decisions I have made.

Awhile back we helped another man who was on the verge of divorce. He was working 100 hours a week because he would not stand up to his employer, and had no energy to lead his family. We told him that the marriage counseling he was getting was bullshit ("talk about your feelings more!"), and that his slavish attitude toward his employer was making his wife lose respect for him. The women in our church also talked to his wife about choosing to be respectful and submissive, in spite of her rebellious emotions.

He cut back hours at work, which enabled him able to be captain of his ship again. This, along with training his wife received, helped her become more respectful. Now, his wife is less of a bitch, and they have sex several times a week. I doubt this would have happened without patriarchal religion.

Children

I've succeeded as a father!

We see that our culture is toxic, feminized, and immoral. Men need a place to raise children apart from these toxins, and church is a great place to do this. My kids go to Sunday School classes where they are taught to be respectful to me, my wife, and legitimate adult authorities. We have several families with well-disciplined children that we can trust won't corrupt our kids. My wife often takes the kids for play-dates so she can socialize with wholesome women, which is a great alternative to sitting around on social media all day.

Conclusion

Patriarchal, traditional religion will not change female nature, but it can help restrain it. This is how past generations maintained civilization. I can confidently say that traditional religion is the main reason I can maintain a happy marriage in this cesspool of a culture. Those who are not religious might consider other institutions that may provide similar support for their marriage and child-raising.

Is Western Civilization Worth Saving?

November 4, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

By 2050, it's predicted the USA will no longer have a white majority, which in 1960 was 90%. For this, we can thank Ted Kennedy's Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, which the politicians swore up and down wouldn't change the American ethnic composition. In Europe, due to declining native birth rates and mass immigration, this will eventually come to pass for several other nations later this century, all according to the Coudenhove-Kalergi Plan. The leftists, with their really big hearts, think all this will be wonderful.

Globalism and cultural Marxism are the driving forces behind population replacement policies, but unawareness and apathy are almost as much of a problem. Some think that if Western civilization will go down the toilet, they should just "go with the flow" and enjoy the ride all the way down the tubes. Thanks to media propaganda and educational indoctrination, they have no idea that their own civilization is worth anything, and don't have the slightest concern for their own posterity. Still, they're pretty naive to believe that things can't turn far worse within their own lifetimes.

Why this is bad (for those who need reminding)

In the future, is this going to get better, or worse?

If trends continue unabated, the founding peoples will lose control over their destiny. History shows that when this happens, the results are not good. Pillaging and plundering is a more genteel affair in modern times (though not always) but you're still not going to like it. Will your new rulers say, "Since things have changed so much, how about we abolish Affirmative Action and set-asides to show we've transcended race?" Don't count on it. More likely, they'll double down on these preferential treatment programs, and come up with new ones, and you will have no chance to block the spoils systems.

That's just the beginning, too. The "diversification" of cities for the last several decades has been bad—Detroit, need I say more?—and riots really are getting out of hand. Now imagine what it will be like when you have no hope of influencing things like Section 8 housing moving into your neighborhood, or if you'll get any real police protection.

This is what we're facing if the Aztlán crowd takes over the Southwest, the community agitators get in charge of the big cities, and together their constituency has an electoral majority controlling the Federal government. (Also remember that they've been told since the 1960s that you're evil oppressors responsible for all their problems.) Parts of "flyover country" might be able to hold out for a while, but nothing short of forming their own country will stop the advance of "progress". If it were ever to come to secession, they'll be surrounded, outnumbered, and outgunned. Let's keep things from getting to that point.

Is there any hope?

"Refugees" have taken on the characteristics of invaders

I've painted a grim picture, but I have to be realistic. As for what will happen later, things only look worse; Jean Raspail's Camp Of The Saints describes a bleak future like that. This isn't just the USA on the line, but Western Europe too, and perhaps Eastern Europe and Australia in time. If we want to keep from disappearing into the endless night, the time to act is now.

Sometimes, with luck, sovereignty can be regained: for example, the Spanish Reconquista, or the nations of the Balkans rising after a few centuries under the Turkish yoke. However, the results aren't guaranteed; some nations may never recover. In these examples, the "dhimmis" were subjugated under military occupation, but they were not outnumbered in their own lands. The founding populations must not allow themselves to be dispossessed in their own countries in the first place.

Granted, the dark forces of globalism are very powerful—and they'd like us to think they're invincible—but they must be stopped. They also want you to think they're smarter than you and know what's good for you. (If they'd simply focus on getting richer, and cease their social engineering, they'd have far less to answer for.) Not only has our political establishment failed us, they're working against the public. It won't be easy, but we must reassert control over our destiny.

Do we deserve to be dispossessed?

Brainwashed SJWs welcoming their own destruction

Some will even say—often with haughty condescension—that if we lose our countries, then we deserve this fate. Ignoring for a moment the sheer snottiness, as well as the "might makes right" argument incongruent with the usual rhetoric of fairness by the "prepare to be assimilated, resistance is futile" crowd, let's consider the following facts:

- In the 1920s, a Communist propaganda campaign was launched in the Western world. In the 1930s, this mutated into cultural Marxism and kicked into high gear during the 1960s. Most people have no idea of the scope of it all, or where things like political correctness came from.

- Only senior citizens remember what it was like living in a fairly normal country. Even fewer never grew up exposed to this propaganda in one form or another. The rest of us have been indoctrinated from an early age by the mass media and educational establishment.
- The Western political tradition lately is about openness and democracy. For this reason, we don't conduct political change by torches and pitchforks these days. We play fair, even if our enemies often don't. Further, political correctness encourages the "disadvantaged" to have solidarity, but vilifies the same in the majority. This is one reason why we're on the defensive, and (for now) usually losing.
- Most people only have a vague idea about the extent of managed democracy and sheer corruption. Those against population replacement policies mostly put their faith in the mainstream opposition parties, not realizing that they've sold out to deep-pockets globalists too. "Mainstream" conservatism is a controlled opposition, providing token resistance at best.

So with that extent of treachery, disinformation, limited options for resistance, and managed democracy, it's grotesquely dishonest for the defeatists to tell us that we're losing a fair fight! As for their opinion that we should just give up, I have one word: No.

Whenever you hear the defeatists crowing that this is inevitable or that we "deserve" it, remember that they want to demoralize you and anyone else listening. (The same goes for when they tell you that loving your people and wanting your posterity to survive is "hatred".) Suppose someone is losing his home by a devious swindle, orchestrated by crooks widely lauded for their fairness, caring, and honesty. It would be the height of arrogance to tell the defrauded that he deserved it and should shut up about it and let it happen.

The depopulation and population replacement agenda

"First, the EU has to accept at least a million asylum-seekers annually for the foreseeable future… The EU should provide 15,000 euros ($16,800) per asylum-seeker for each of the first two years to help cover housing, health-care and education costs—and to make accepting refugees more appealing to member states."

Don't be fooled: this isn't happening because some vague, invisible force called "progress" is pushing things inevitably in this direction. No, it's being actively promoted by globalist interests that have adopted cultural Marxism as a means of control.

Why are native fertility rates declining below replacement level? The major factors are:

- Women are encouraged to spend their 20s partying and their 30s trying to get rich in a cube farm. Encouraging them to to make starting a family last priority often leaves them very unhappy over the long term, and many will miss the chance to begin.
- Good economy tends to be positively correlated with higher fertility rates. During recessions, births go down. The implications are obvious. If less tax money was taken from working citizens for costly social services programs and spit-in-your-eye wars, then they'd be able to afford more children. Sending the guilty to prison (instead of bailing them out) when they crash the economy might be a good indirect measure too.
- About a third of American babies conceived end up aborted. (Thanks, feminism!) The same leftists who think this is wonderful will scream bloody murder whenever a savage killer on Death Row is executed, but all that's another matter.

Because of declining fertility rates, the globalists tell us that we must open the floodgates of Third World immigration to prop up the population and support the aging citizens. So they've fed us poison, and to soothe the symptoms, they want to feed us another kind of poison. To hell with that!

Granted, keeping Social Security going in the USA will be a challenge. Still, it's pretty uncertain that newly-arriving immigrants—if they become the majority—will be able or willing to support millions of elderly "gringos". As for future European retirees, will they be well cared for by "refugees" from Africa and the Middle East? The way things are now, many of them prefer rioting, looting, and collecting welfare over working. So these are going to be the people propping up the European retirement programs?

Dispossession is inevitable only if we let it happen. For now, we must educate the rest of the public about what's going on, and convince them that their future is worth saving and their posterity is worth preserving. Once we've achieved critical mass, we can confront the political establishment and get the government to start working for us rather than against us

What's in it for us?

Whenever someone writes that Western civilization is nothing but injustice and oppression, they're using technology we invented to complain about us.

It's fashionable—especially in academia—to bash Western civilization. We're not perfect, but nobody else is either. The truth is that we're a creative, dynamic, and industrious people. Some of us are under the impression that we don't have any culture (only other people do) but that's mistaken. I could spend all day listing our major artists, composers, poets, philosophers, writers, theologians, and the like, but I only would scratch the surface.

Other cultures have made notable contributions—particularly East Asia and the Middle East—but the fact is that the majority of science and technology that makes life comfortable today originated in the Western world. Electricity, motorized transportation, refrigeration, telecommunications, computers (need I go on)? Yep, that was us. We shared our medical advances with the rest of the world, increasing longevity and quality of life around the globe. Whether the world's future looks more like Star Trek or more like Blade Runner may have a lot to do with whether or not our people survive.

Finally, most of us are going to live out our lives in our native countries. Do we want them to stay the same nations we grew up in? Some time in the future, today's youth will be running the show while we're elderly. What kind of a place do we want it to be by then? Western civilization is great; let's keep it going.

The Only Strategy That Could Have Stopped Donald Trump

November 4, 2016 | by August Moliere | Link | Original Link

As the election is inching slowly towards it's end, experts are nervously scrambling to find any dirt that would stop the Trump train.

First, Megyn Kelly pulled the sexist card, then it was his undisclosed tax returns, then his comments on John McCain, then making fun of crippled reporters, then his reading of Mein Kampf, then his remarks about dating his daughter.

Then accusations of racism from former employees, his usage of eminent domain, hiring of immigrants and other questionable practices, the Trump University scandal, his blunder on abortion, old comments on drug decriminalization and gun control, his relationship with the Clintons and the DC insiders, his comments on refugees and illegal immigrants, the Khan incident. And, of course, the pussy-grabbing scandal.

Surely this time, it will sink his campaign, won't it ? And yet each time Teflon Don deflects dirt more dexterously than ghetto trash trying escape alimony payments. Nothing seems to be able to stop him, not that his opponents will ever stop trying.

Trump has the fantastic ability to escape unharmed from what would clearly destroy any career politician. Howard Dean's "Yee-haw" was enough to end his bid for the Democratic candidate in 2004, and yet Trump can call for an end to Muslim refugees, be accused of grabbing women by their loins, and end up being praised for it by the masses, while the mainstream media spew their bile 24/7.

What has allowed Trump to maneuver so nimbly against these accusations is the unprecedented role of internet media in elections, including being able to reach people directly through Twitter and a lack of trust in traditional media, as well as his bigger-than-life persona letting him get away with what others would be lynched for.

But that's the story for another article. I would rather talk about something else. Particularly, is there anything that could stop him? The answer will surprise you as it goes against all conventional wisdom.

Yes, but it's not what you think.

Trump's weak spot

One of the biggest problems with defeating Trump is that unlike other politicians, political scandals not only seem to not affect him, but they even aid him. There is a saying that every anti-Trump meme is also a pro-Trump meme.

Trump has mastered political antifragility, which causes him to only strengthen when opponents try to destroy him. Trump has defeated the left's "no platform for fascists" mentality by saying things so outrageous they have no option but to report on him.

So, the left cannot choose to not cover him and let him wallow in obscurity like they did with Ron Paul. Neither can they attack him, for each of their attacks only make him more popular.

One memorable movie quote I remember went something like this: "Every man has a weak spot. First you try to buy him with money, then women, then you go for his family, and if that doesn't work, well, a bullet always does the job." Unfortunately, unlike other political losers, Don does not need other people's money, nor does he lack female attention, and his family is smart and probably safe from violence.

But this isn't an article about (God forbid) Donald Trump getting assassinated. That would stop Trump, but not the Trump train. Trump is more than a man. Trump is an idea. He is the avatar of discontent of all those opposed to progressive ideology. He would become a martyr, thus raising the hatred for his opponents to a fever pitch which might alter America's consciousness forever. Trump's enemies can't afford that.

So if ignoring Trump does not work, throwing dirt at him does not work, bribing him doesn't work and even killing him won't work, than what is left? The answer might surprise you.

You see Trump's power comes from his contrarianism. He is not a candidate, he is an anti-candidate. People don't just vote FOR Trump they vote AGAINST Hillary, Obama, Progressives and Cuckservatives. He is the wrecking ball who the injured working class and all non-liberal whites as well as minorities not completely in love in with progressive Marxist ideology want to use against the establishment.

So what can be done to stop him ?

Well, let's ask ourselves what makes Trump popular ? His brashness, his anti-PC attitudes, his anti-elitism, his not being a part of the Establishment hacks, his being "not one of them," his being different.

So if that is what gives Trump strength, it would make sense that to weaken him, you would have to present him as the opposite of that. To present him as being nothing special, to make him look boring and weak. To present him as just another PC-drone.

They've claimed nonstop that Trump is the next Hitler and that he will start building concentration camps and sexually assaulting random women by grabbing their cock pockets and will obliterate Muslims and minorities with Right WiNg Death Squad robots.

Instead they could have claimed that he is just weakling trying to act tough, and that he won't deliver anything. That he is in love with political correctness and respects women. That he is a progressive's best choice. That he will bring four more years of Obama.

That of course would present it's own difficulties. In the age of online media, the monopoly of physical press has been broken. When news circulates at the speed of minutes rather than hours and days, it would be very hard for the establishment media to accomplish this. It is very hard to call Trump ordinary and boring when his statements break so many taboos.

Yet, as difficult as it may have been, at the very least it would have had a chance of success, as small as it was. Calling him sexist, racist, and other mean words did nothing to stop him, and instead only made him more popular with the masses. Some of these incidents have made Donald seem human and it made people trust him more. Showing his flaws had the opposite effect as intended, as those who hated him already needed no extra ammo, but those who liked him were either left indifferent, or what's worse excited by his statements.

At worst a few moderates had doubts set in their mind, however considering what short attention span undecided voters have, his stellar performance at the second debate clearly made them forget about the statement and maybe even convinced them to focus on Bill's sexual misdeeds instead.

Why haven't his opponents used this against him?

This brings us to the final point of this article. Why haven't his opponents used this against him? Have they not the brains to figure this out? Hard to believe, considering the amount of money being poured into think tanks.

No, the truth is like that the strategy was forsaken because of the side-effects it would have on their own camp. Should his opponents try to attack him as another PC drone, they would be also attacking themselves. Just like Hillary trying to paint Trump as sex offender only made it easier for Trump to point at Bill's sexual indiscretions. As it has been said in the mighty book of Kek : "thee that dwell in glass lodgings shall not propel sedimentary formations" The Prophecy of Kek, Chapter 4 : Verse 20.

Attacking Trump for being multicultural, politically correct, weak, inefficient, or a shill would only shed light on the establishment's own weakness.

This means that in order to draw voters away from Trump they would have to claim Trump loves multiculturalism, anti-racism, open borders, free trade, globalism and offer another candidate who would be even more extreme than him on these crucial issues.

Using this strategy against Trump, even if it was successful, would be a Pyrrhic victory for his opponents, as cuckservatives would have to acknowledge they can't woo supporters with talks about reducing taxes and bringing back Reaganism. The truth is, the future is bleak for Reagan-Bush-Cuck wing of the GOP. Even if they were to win the election, they would lose the war.

The left has won the cultural war not just by winning elections, but by cultural meta-warfare. Instead of moderating their message in attempt to win election, they used popular culture and mass media to push liberal values to the masses, and so the right wing had no option, but do concessions, dropping people who opposed civil rights, women's liberation and closed borders.

To put it simply, the battle was lost even before Trump came—Trump was the match that ignited the powder keg. He simply mobilized people, and said what others kept in private, but always wanted to say and now there is no turning back.

The elites cannot choose to ignore popular will and still win elections anymore. They will have to reform the GOP to account for their constituency's desire or risk ending in the dust bin of history. There is no longer the option to charm the sheeple with talks about low taxes, open borders and the awfulness of bigotry. They will have to, at least, nominally give something back to the people to stay in power.

As one wise commenter on this site once said : "Trump may be a liar like the rest of them, but at least he is saying the right lies."

The next thing people on the manosphere and the alt-right will have to look after will be Trump-like figures who will copy Trump's rhetoric, but will fail to deliver any solutions. Or they will try to co-opt and redirect that anger. But for now, for the first time in more than 50 years, we are winning the culture war.

Why Do People Become Cuckservatives?

November 5, 2016 | by Brian Gerard | Link | Original Link

Cuckservatism is a topic that has previously been discussed in detail on Return Of Kings, in articles and comments sections alike. The underlying reason that this topic is the focus of a great deal of discussion is because its roots are deeply steeped in both cowardice and betrayal.

While our readership is well acquainted with the political and social implications of cuckservatism, there is also a need to also discuss its behavioral roots. To accomplish this task, I used my social media accounts to examine connections of mine who displayed all of the classic red flags associated with cuckservatism. I then searched for common traits that they possessed based on the nature of their rants or posts.

The three characteristics listed below represent key factors which, in my opinion, are necessary for any individual to transform from an otherwise normal person into a cuck. If we can understand these factors, this will enable us to develop a more comprehensive strategy for rendering them irrelevant, apart from merely ignoring them.

Political Naiveté

Nothing screams political naivety more than voting for a last minute candidate who considers himself a “conservative” alternative to Trump.

This factor represents the first step that one must take to become a cuckservative, because it entails believing in a series of premises that are patently false. Political naiveté can include simpler forms, such as believing in the wage gap or that illegal immigrants are natural republicans. Conversely, political naiveté can also be more complex, in that an individual afflicted with it might believe in equality as a virtue or that a democratic two party system is the best form of government.

A perfect example of this can be seen in my friends and associates who blindly believe in the Constitution. These individuals refuse to vote for anyone other than a "constitutionalist," and their sole metric for judging candidates is the implications of an obscure constitutional issue that only they care about. This perspective is indicative of political naiveé because the globalists who run our political system jettisoned any belief in the Constitution and rule of law decades ago. For them, the Constitution is merely a convenient rubber stamp used to justify unpopular political decisions.

Accordingly, anyone who votes ONLY for candidates with such narrow viewpoints is naively playing into the hands of globalists because they fail to understand that the Constitution will only function in a nation that's virtuous and willing to abide by its principles.

If the United States continues on its current demographic track, we will eventually import a new population that not only despises original American values, but would also actively vote to eliminate them. The Constitution will provide no protections if this occurs, because these people will simply ignore it, invoking arguably the most important phrase in all of American legal history.

To fail to understand these stakes when considering one's voting patterns, instead opting to emulate the local revolutionary war re-enactors, is a hallmark trait of a cuckservative.

Lack Of Self Confidence

A Cuckservative would never get this far.

Lack of self-confidence, and the feelings of doubt that serve as its foundation, represents a second symptom of cuckservatism, which is why Return Of Kings has countless articles on how to acquire and maintain self-confidence as a form of preventative medicine.

Doubts as to one's chances of success, coupled with fear and the innate need for self-preservation, can easily shatter most people. In such moments of weakness, it's very easy for a person to do a 180 and to do something that they would normally find revolting. Conversely, if one steadfastly believes in their convictions and themselves, their self-confidence will become stronger. This is true even in situations when seemingly the entire world is against them.

The following clip is from an interview that Jeb Bush did with Lester Holt during the Republican Primary, and is an excellent illustration of how a lack of self-confidence can lead to powerlessness and a lack of control over one's surroundings.

https://youtu.be/Dmnd2yM1SKA

From the very beginning of this clip, Jeb's lack of self confidence is readily apparent. Whether it was the fact that he was too far hunched over in his seat, his attempts to curb his nervousness by forcing himself to smile or laugh, or the fact that he rarely made eye contact with Lester Holt, any ability that he has to project himself was undermined by his body language.

An even deeper sign of his lack of self-confidence begins at 0:45 in the video, when Holt proceeds to ask him why he didn't frame the Charleston shooting as an act of "racism." In this situation, if asked such a question in any setting, an individual has one of two choices. If he is self-confident, he would turn the question back on Lester Holt by saying that racism is a social construct and the only people who care about it are limp-wristed losers.

However, if one is like Jeb and lacks self-confidence, their response to this situation will be to immediately try to "compromise" by acknowledging the premise raised by someone like Lester Holt and then spend the rest of the interview trying to show that they're not a bad person. This was the approach that Jeb used, and it demonstrated to Lester Holt that he was weak, which then led to Lester forcing Jeb to backtrack and question his own decision to support Stand Your Ground laws during his tenure as Florida's governor.

A lack of self-confidence, as evidenced by Jeb's failure to retain control over his surroundings during his interview with Lester Holt, highlights a classic character trait shared by cuckservatives. The only answer that I can come up with, as to why this trait is so prevalent, is that it might be a product of their childhood that they haven't been able to get over.

In a way, the archetypal cuck was likely bullied or mistreated as a child, but has never learned how to fight back or to love being hated by others. Because of this, they never developed the necessary level of self-confidence to succeed in life, which eventually translates over to their politics.

They Want To Be Friends With Everyone

How to destroy a political movement established by one's father in one fell swoop.

Having grown up in the leftist Northeast, and considering that I still live and work there, I'm used to being in the political minority. My coping mechanisms for this situation consisted of (unknowingly) embracing key tenets of the Alternative Right, and knowing how to pick my political fights. Additionally, I also resolved to never be friendly with or ever trust anyone from the political left, a decision that has been vindicated over the last several years.

Unfortunately, my approach is not a popular one amongst political dissidents in my region. This is because many of them, having grown up with leftists, simply view their political disagreements as a series of gentlemanly differences that they can put aside over a few beers. They refuse to believe that leftists and SJWs hate anyone who even slightly disagrees with them and, like women, view weak men as easy targets.

Accordingly, when faced with the choice of staying true to their beliefs or "moderating" them in order to ensure that they get invited to the next sushi night, art showing or paint nite; the cuckservatives that I know will roll over every time. Specifically, they'll profess support for third party "libertarian" or "constitutional" candidates, while supporting a slightly less-liberal version of their leftist friends' politics.

This tendency demonstrates a key principle that most cuckservatives subconsciously hold: they want to be liked by everyone, and will therefore do anything they can to make this happen, even if it means betraying themselves and their own beliefs in the process. When does adopting this attitude ever lead to success in life?

If a child keeps getting beat up by a schoolyard bully, should they cower in the bully's presence and act as his lackey in order to avoid getting hurt? We all know that such an approach is worthless and that the only way to respond is to fight back, yet these people adopt the same approach when dealing with the political equivalent of a schoolyard bully. Perhaps their reason for trying to be friends with globalists and trying to appease them by being moderate stems from the way in which they handled problems in childhood, however that issue itself is another topic that deserves discussion by itself.

Is There A Remedy For These Character Flaws?

Even if we understand these characteristics, and can think of active ways to subvert cuckservatism, we will not be entirely successful. Most people who fall under this category have been psychologically conditioned to act this way, meaning that much of our attempts to open their eyes will fall on deaf ears. I have no sympathy for these people because they've never had the internal drive or fortitude necessary to overcome adversity, and would rather wallow in misery while also pulling others into the abyss with them.

However, there are always a couple that might show potential. These individuals might only be seen by us as cuckservatives because they imitated others around them, while lacking a positive role model that could show them the truth. The greatest service we can do for these select few is to identify them and prove that there is a viable alternative.

If 25 cents a day can supposedly help a starving African family have rice for six months, then us acting as positive role models to our weaker brethren will help them immeasurably while also advancing our own cause.

American Woman In Bikini Desecrates French Catacombs For Her “Female Indiana Jones” Brand

November 5, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The Paris catacombs are a place dear to my heart. Born in this very city, I had a front row seat to see it turn into a giant museum. Every wealthy asshole wanting his own piece of the “city of lights,” and Paris being one of the most visited cities in the world, I could see year after year the streets taken over by luxury clothing shops and expensive venues. The middle and lower classes have been pushed aside by rising living costs so that the rich globalists, the bobos and a never-ending trail of tourists could stroll around.

Yet, go twenty meters below the Haussmanian hurdle, and you will find something very different.

South of the Seine, the lands have been deeply dug to extract building stones. Most of the voids have been filled since, but more than a hundred kilometres of quarries galleries are still there. Exploring the place is officially forbidden. Which is a good thing, as one can go there unofficially, provided one knows how to enter and not get lost in the labyrinth, without bothering with swarms of tourists or wasting money in an overpriced bar.

Officially prohibited, actually more or less self-managed by a loose community of cataphiles, the Catacombs are one of the most interesting places today in Paris. It allows for genuine explorations and friendly meetings while also teaching some masculine virtues to those who venture there seriously.

The underground network being fragile and the officials not enjoying when too many visitors tread on their jurisdiction, the cataphiles have a complex relationship with exposing it. On the one hand, we like to show the place and share its atmosphere with passionate newcomers; on the other, we are afraid that too much exposition will attract too many visitors and stifle the officials' relative toleration for unofficial activities.

Well, today, other cataphiles won't chastise me for mentioning the topic in public, for this has been already made recently by an attention whore of international scope. Alison Teal, a Hawaiian 28 or 29 years old girl, made a show of herself down there and sent ludicrous photos to the Daily Mail.

"So, I'm here to teach you about protecting the planet, y'know"

"I love bringing surfboards in places without waves. By the way, I'm the feminine Indiana Jones, especially with the help of a crew I'll never give credit to. Follow me on Instagram and YT!"

Here we are not talking about attention whoring lightly. The Daily Mail photos already tell much: a blond girl in a pink bikini carries a pink surfboard in a narrow underground network where there is, by definition, no waves to surf at all, to take some photos of herself, herself, herself, and a bit of the catacombs, as they could be used as the setting of the latest of Alison's Adventures™. I'm not joking. These "adventures" are literally Hitler a trademark.

Since she was at least 18, Teal seems to have taken advantage from the nomadic lifestyle of her parents to make photos, movies, and promote herself heavily along the way. With the help of her dad, a well-connected photographer and self-promoter who claims to master yoga, she got a bunch of awards and media promotion. Long-haired Alison was thus handed a niche that allows her to travel the world, take pictures of herself in various places, and claim to be concerned about the environment.

Her résumé shows a massive ego associated to minor lies. "The world was my school and playground"—I guess smaller places would be too small for her giant ego, and this may explain why she suffered from claustrophobia under Paris, as we are to see below. Between name-droppings, references to media awards and other big pictures of Alison, Teal, and Alison Teal, we learn she was styled "the 'Female Indiana Jones' by Time Magazine (2015) and the 'Oprah of Adventure' by The Huffington Post (2016)." Really?

Actually, Teal said to the HuffPo she aspired to be "the Oprah of adventure" in 2014 before branding herself as "the female Indiana Jones" to the Time a year later (2015, not 2016). Then she said on Twitter and on her résumé how they had referred to her as such. Not a big lie, but a lie indeed. By the way, she also branded herself a "Tarzan child" in the HuffPo interview. Would someone who really "grew up in the wild" be so obsessed with linking herself to famous icons?

> "This might sound weird, but I want to be the Oprah of adventure, sustainability and healthy living," she said with a laugh. "I want to travel around the world with a cause, be a bridge between cultures, and influence millions at once by posting my adventures online."

Excerpt from the HuffPo article, 05/20/2014. The same articles adds she is a "self-described 'Tarzan child.'"

Adventure filmmaker Alison Teal grew up all over the world, following her photographer parents on excursions to some of the most remote places on the planet.

Now an adult, Alison combines storytelling with her love of exploration to create the "Alison's Adventures" film series. She styles herself as a "female Indiana Jones," traveling the globe with her pink surfboard and sharing stories of survival and sustainability in the hopes of educating and inspiring people around the world.

Excerpt from the Time article, 11/08/2015.

Named by Time Magazine… or self-styled?

[image]

And now on her résumé. Not only does she lie by misattributing to famous media outlets self-characterizing and lavishly flattering labels, but she can't even put the right years while referring to said media pieces.

So, self-styled "female Indiana Jones," no less, went through what seems to be a joint undertaking with the Daily Mail by descending into the Paris catacombs with the symbols of her Adventures™, namely a pink bikini and a surfboard. The English tabloid released the photos, video, and testimony of Indiana-Jones-In-A-Bikini-Surfing-The-Catacombs the 30th of October. Days after, a bunch of French outlets copied the Mail content, often translating it verbatim.

What struck me first are the stunning inaccuracies the tabloid published. First, the Mail claims Teal went 150 meters below the ground, whereas the actual depth of the Catacombs goes between 10 and 30 meters depending on where you are in the network. Can't Indiana Jane tell the difference between 30 and 150 meters?

Second, she also claimed to have lacked oxygen and witnessed the water level suddenly rising. This is at best extremely unlikely. The water levels can change from month to month and even from week to week, but to my knowledge it never changes abruptly in seconds. As for the oxygen issue, I have witnessed some only two times: at a big party, when so many people were in the same room that there was not enough oxygen to light a cigarette, and from claustrophobic newcomers who could not stand the place.

Either she completely made up the sudden water change and oxygen issues in order to give her story a sensational aspect, or, more likely, got a panic attack due to claustrophobia, but preferred to twist it into a grandiose plot rather than acknowledging her own limitations. The Mail just ate that up and published without question. They did not ask any actual cataphile for sure. Had they done so, anyone with a decent experience of the catacombes could have told them what I just wrote above.

I also noticed from her quotes that she does not mention anyone from her crew, gives no credit to the men who opened the manhole cover, helped her go down the humid ladder, showed her the way, filmed her… She would never have found the entrance if no one already in the know had accepted to be her guide. Neither could she lift manhole covers of more than a hundred kilograms with her thin arms—even the round butt she likes to display couldn't do that.

The first photo displayed by the Mail. Notice how she strategically displays (some of) her butt.

I could bet she did not have sex with any of the guys who enabled her display to happen. As Julius Evola hinted, she is likely the kind of woman to whom “the possibilities of physical love are often not as interesting as the narcissistic cult of her body, or as being seen with as many or as few clothes as possible” (Evola, Revolt Against the Modern World, chap.20).

In this respect, the only thing that makes Teal “special” compared to all other look-at-me twats is the adventurous label she tries to put on herself. Exploiting people and places to garner attention is definitely not special. Yet, a lot of comments have noticed this behind the weird mix of glamour and pseudo-adventure: some are offended that she treaded on bones, i.e. remnants of real past men, in a pink bikini. Doing so is not only a proof of bad taste and self-aggrandizing mania—it is also utterly disrespectful.

This is indeed a blatant example of pussy pass. Imagine going to Hawaii, bringing a skateboard at a local cemetery and start skateboarding over the graves in a pink thong. What do you expect would happen? You would probably get beaten by locals, and if the media gave you attention at all, they would label you as a disturbed troll or something like that. All this, I think, would be fair. But when a self-important Oprah Jane of super-adventure does the same, the mainstream media reacts completely differently and celebrates her without the least hint of criticism.

Though she treading and surfing on bones of actual past people is not very respectful for sure, I think especially appalling the outlook Teal seems to carry on the place. The Catacombs are just another background for Alison Adventures™. Whole places, some loaded with historical and spiritual significance, are reduced to a set for the egotic show of another vapid character. The entire world was her school, or so she said, meaning that the world is turned into a mixture of Disneyland and Hollywood studio where her picture can stroll around.

Some weeks ago, Alison Teal was busy showing herself near an erupting volcano. Notice another strategic part-display of her butt.

Usual newcomers to the Catacombs come there with a genuine interest in the place. They come to find out, sometimes drink, and have an actual adventure. They cannot help but feel some humility, perhaps even awe, when meeting with the bones of millions of nameless dead, most if not all of them having lived before the nineteenth century, and having been carried there so that Paris could grow.

This is very different from using the place to play adventure, treading on bones in a rather inappropriate outfit, depending on a crew of real cataphiles but forgetting to give them the slightest credit, and showing utter carelessness to the historical and spiritual significance of the place, all so that Alison's Ego Adventures™ Show continues.

As you can see above, a lot of the comments are negative—especially those from cataphiles—and Teal has discreetly withdrawn the video of her trail from YouTube, putting it into private mode.

Teal's circus has at least one merit: it symbolizes pretty well one of the worst aspects of the Westernization of the world. In the West, there is no wilderness, no sacredness, no magic. There are tons of potential places for tourism, but ultimately, all these places are losing their soul and turning into Disneylands. The Catacombs are worth it because they are definitely not so, and should never be.

Fortunately, there can be some immanent justice. The wave of criticism under Teal's disrespectful show is well deserved. More harshly, a young libtard who thought she could hitchhike through Middle East to prove Muslims peaceful got raped and killed by the "peaceful" ones she theatrically claimed to care about. The event shew, or should have shown, that the world is not a giant kindergarten for Western "strong and independent" narcissists.

In a world of self-marketing and self-centred cunts, everyone is too busy caring about one's image and about meaningless representations to truly care about a place or about family members.

Truly respectable women are not the ones we spot the most easily, and true cataphiles are often discreet as well.

Your humble servant bathed there before Teal pretended to "surf" the place, but I would definitely not exhibit myself treading on bones in a pink thong

Donald Trump Rushed Off Stage In Reno After Possible Assassination Attempt

November 5, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via Breitbart:

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump was rushed offstage at a Reno, Nevada campaign rally as a protester in the audience was involved in an extended incident near the stage.

It was not immediately clear what was occurring in the crowd, but several members of what appeared to be law enforcement or U.S. Secret Service jumped down into the area where the protester was, as could be seen on Right Side Broadcasting Network's video livestream of the event.

Video of Trump being rushed off stage was posted online:

In the video it appears Trump pauses to look out into the crowd for the event disrupter. Two U.S. Secret Service agents can be seen rushing in to remove Trump from the stage and two other agents also facilitate his removal.

During his absence someone announced to the crowd that Trump would return. The protester was eventually seen being removed from the crowd, although there appeared to be a struggle with several law enforcement or Secret Service agents to secure the protester's removal. It was several minutes before Trump was able to take the stage again.

As Trump returned to the stage, he thanked the crowd, which cheered him back.

“Nobody said it was going to be easy for us, but we will never be stopped, never ever be stopped,” said Trump.

Federal Jury Finds UVA Rape Hoax Journalist Sabrina Rubin Erdely And Rolling Stone Liable For Defamation

November 6, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A ten-person federal jury has found that Rolling Stone journalist Sabrina Rubin Erdely defamed University of Virginia dean Nicole Eramo with actual malice over a fraudulent college rape story. Rolling Stone and its parent company Wenner Media were also found to have defamed Eramo, who is seeking $7.5 million in damages, but to a lesser extent than the writer herself. Rubin Erdely's piece conveyed that Eramo was indifferent and even callous towards the accuser, Jackie Coakley, in addition to discouraging her from reporting the "crime." And so continues coverage of the rape hoax of the decade.

The controversy, which began with the publication of Rubin Erdely's story in 2014, centered on a now debunked fraternity gang rape alleged by fabulist Coakley. Well before this week's court decision, Rubin Erdely admitted to not bothering to contact the male UVA students accused of the act. These young men, via their Phi Kappa Psi fraternity, are suing separately for $25 million, a surprisingly low figure which makes Eramo's claim look comparatively astronomical.

Because of Coakley's limited financial position, and the respect even outed sexual assault frauds are given, Eramo is legally pursuing only Rubin Erdely, Rolling Stone, and Wenner Media for the $7.5 million. Nevertheless, Eramo's attempts to portray herself as a victim are troubling. She was, after all, UVA's go-to college administrator for handling "sexual violence" cases, a euphemism for the organizer of what are basically kangaroo courts.

Aside from Eramo, UVA President Teresa Sullivan's actions were appalling. Giving basic credence to Jackie's allegations, Sullivan suspended all Greek Life activities at the University of Virginia as publicity about the accusations grew. This only increased the suffering of the falsely maligned fraternity members, plus gave ammunition to the "rape culture" activists who ridiculously represent every young male on campus as a potential sexual abuser of women.

The true victims are the falsely accused young men, not Nicole Eramo

Nicole Eramo is a “victim” of the same system she helps to prop up and defend: “rape culture.”

Nicole Eramo may have been defamed, but she was also intricately involved in a UVA system that does not afford young men even the most basic procedural rights. Whilst we should be happy that she did not rush into supporting Jackie Coakley’s lies to the extent of trying to eschew police involvement, we are still not dealing with either an admirable or upstanding individual.

After extensive research, I am yet to find instances of Eramo challenging the shameful treatment of college students accused of sexual assault, whether in specific instances or more broadly. She is neither a defender of these young men nor some kind of principled whistleblower. The only “positive” thing that can be generally said of her is that she is somewhat less prone to typical knee-jerk SJW reactions, i.e. she did try to get Jackie to talk to the police.

Again, Jackie Coakley has escaped any punishment

Stupid does not even begin to describe the man who decided to marry rape hoaxer Jackie Coakley. Thanks to Chuck Johnson and www.gotnews.com for their work in outing Coakley as a fabulist and sociopath.

Jackie Coakley is the sociopathic architect of this whole mess. Notwithstanding that Rubin Erdely and others would have gleefully found another poster girl from somewhere else in America, the degree of malice and calculation in Coakley's actions is the worst I have seen. Even the very terrible Crystal Mangum, the black stripper who is now serving a long sentence for homicide (not false rape allegations), made her bogus accusations of racism and being gang raped much more opportunistically, after Duke lacrosse players declined her services as a stripper. Coakley's misdeeds, however, inhabit a world of their own.

Because women like Jackie Coakley, obsessed as they are with fantasy worlds and self-victimization, have next to no money to go after in defamation suits, they need to be charged and prosecuted for crimes such as public mischief. It obviously would be better if they were charged with making a false rape claim, yet Coakley had enough self-preserving foresight to avoid talking to the police. Consequently, the system usually gives next to no remedies for discouraging outright lies about rape. To boot, The Washington Post may have savaged Rubin Erdely and Rolling Stone, but it still refuses to publish Jackie Coakley's full name, despite all the evidence completely disproving the rape accusations.

If Nicole Eramo gets $7.5 million, the accused male UVA students deserve $7.5+ billion

Attention-seeker Emily Renda. She used Jackie Coakley's lies to promote an agenda, not seek redress for a "victim."

Determination of damages in the Nicole Eramo case is yet to take place and the $7.5 million claim may just have been posturing by her legal team, a high watermark figure designed to secure a smaller but nonetheless very tidy sum. At a minimum, the accused UVA students deserve 100 times more than whatever Eramo gets. Of course, Wenner Media's coffers are nowhere near that big, but the principle remains. Compared to the mauled reputations of the witch-hunted fraternity members, Eramo suffered a slight pinprick from a broken system she has otherwise staked her career on supporting and expanding.

Other villains in this saga also need to be held to account. Chief among them is Emily Renda, a sociology major at UVA who is now completing a law degree at UC Berkeley. A "rape culture" extremist, she acted as the conduit between Coakley and Rubin Erdely. As Chuck Johnson and Got News have already demonstrated, Renda's own "rape survivor" story has changed. Biased "journalists" such as Anna Merlan, formerly of Jezebel, additionally promoted the UVA hoax and were greatly upset when the gang rape was found not to have taken place. So many supporting actors created this mess.

Let's hope that the heavy legal blows against Rubin Erdely, Rolling Stone, and, obliquely, Jackie Coakley's lies continue with the UVA fraternity defamation suit. Only significant financial and legal hardship, not the pangs of conscience, will stop SJWs and their enablers from attempting to ruin the lives of innocent men.

Don’t Believe The Myth That Weightlifting Will Slow You Down

November 6, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Many older physical trainers, and even those younger ones who were proteges of the older men, will tell the trainee that there is an inverse correlation between strength and speed—that being too big and muscular will slow down an athlete (for whatever reason, I have found that this is most prevalent amongst traditional martial artists). The usual reason given is that the increased mass is simply a “dead weight”, while those with a little bit more knowledge will explain that lifting will develop “slow twitch” muscles over the “Fast twitch” muscles needed for sprinting, jumping, punching, and kicking.

I am here to tell you that the “common wisdom” is completely wrong-when done properly, weightlifting will not impede your speed, and will in fact enhance your speed and explosiveness!

Anecdotes

Perhaps you’ve heard of this man?

That is of course Jamaica's Usain Bolt, the fastest man in the world, and holder of multiple Olympic records. Also worth noting is that in an interview, Mr. Bolt revealed that he squats 400 pounds, and at least partially attributes his nigh inhuman speed to his training regimen. And he's not the only speed athlete who this can be said of-look at any Olympic class sprinter, they are all quite muscular fellows.

Similarly, other athletic disciplines (that's "athletics" in the specific rather than general sense, I'm using the European term for what my countrymen call "track and field") have claimed to utilize weightlifting in their training, such as the long jump and the hurdles. Or, you can take my word for it: at my best I had a one rep max squat of 320 pounds, and had a 38 inch vertical leap (I am judging this by my ability to perform a standing jump over 2nd-highest position hurdles, which are measured at 38 inches).

In fact, many world-level athletes of all disciplines are utilizing Olympic style weightlifting to develop speed and power.

Anyway you slice it, compound weight training is a fantastic supplement to all athletes, even those who seemingly don't need that raw brute strength.

The Science

As I elaborated in this article, as well as in the free PDF I offer to subscribers to my website (the subscription sign-up is on the front page) there's more than one type of way to be athletic. More accurately, there are three, speaking purely in terms of muscular and/or nervous system function, so this does not include hand-to-eye coordination or other skills related to team sports. These three things can, loosely, correlate to the three types of muscle fibers-Red—or slow—Oxidative, Fast Glycolytic-or White-, and Fast Oxidative. Rather than rehash an article that I've already written, we will focus on the white muscle, the fast glycolytic. This is the type of muscle you want to be training for if you want to develop sprinting speed or a high vertical leap.

Or, to put this into terms of Newton's second law of motion, Acceleration=Force/Mass, ie: the amount of muscular force you can exert, divided by your body weight=how fast you can accelerate. And yes, I am aware that there's probably a more mathematically accurate way of putting this.

Which Exercises To Do?

It is at this point that you're probably asking which exercises you should train to develop those physical skills you desire. If you read my articles regularly, you will know what I am likely to say-compound free weight lifting!

In fact, I'll go out on a limb and say if you don't know which exercise you should do to develop a certain physical trait, you should always default to a compound lift unless you receive some further information that says otherwise. Training for speed or vertical leap is no exception to this rule.

If you are looking for sheer running speed and leaping ability, the power lifts that hit the lower body are most effective: deep "Ass to grass" squats, deadlifts, and the clean and jerk are used by professional athletes to great effect.

Similarly, if you want the ability to throw a ball or punch harder, upper body compound lifts are the key: bench presses, overhead presses and, yes, the clean and jerk, will see you through.

So for those of you who are afraid that your athletic performance will be somehow impeded by heavy weightlifting, nothing could be further from the truth.

6 Reasons Why You're Not Happy

November 7, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Happiness: it's what we all want as human beings no matter the differences in where we seek them. We are motivated to do things to be happy and we avoid things that may detract from it. Even those who claim that they don't care about happiness or that they're living for a higher purpose is doing what they do because it makes them happy. In that way, happiness is beyond a state of feeling; it is a state of being.

Now, although you don't want to be obsessive about happiness and make your life revolve around attaining it, there are few things you can do to live a more fulfilling life and improve the quality of your being. And as it's often the case with self-improvement, I believe that addressing the bad habits will lead to a healthier life than trying to gain the positives.

Here are some ways you may be sabotaging your own happiness.

1. You are chasing it

“I’ll be happy once I finally…”

The more you chase happiness, the less you have of it. And not only are people today chasing happiness, they’re chasing all the wrong things in hopes that it will bring them everlasting joy. Money, women, and status may elevate your life, but they can’t be the source of happiness alone. They will especially fail as being compensation for some void in your life that you’re trying to fill.

Also, know that your mood will naturally fluctuate over time. Constantly obsessing over how you feel and getting stressed over your emotional state will not help you. So, rather than jumping from one thing to another in hopes that it will boost your mood or dull your pain, focus on things that matter to you. It’s far better to work on self-improvement and enhancing the overall quality of your life than be wavered by feelings.

2. You don’t have the basics taken care of Good sleep is extremely underrated in our busy society. It affects your mood, testosterone level, mental capacity, and more. Prioritize sleep as much as you do with healthy diet and working out.

It’s often the basics that are overlooked. Ask yourself: Are you sleeping well (it’s harder to tell than you think)? Are you eating healthy? Are you keeping yourself fit? Are you getting enough sunlight? Do you ever take the time to connect with nature? Do you have a stable life? Do you have a purpose or a meaning? I doubt most people have all of these basic needs checked off. But I’m willing to bet that an improvement in even one area will significantly improve a person’s mood and well being.

3. You concern yourself with things you can’t control

“No! Something bad is happening in the world and I can’t do jack shit about it! Time to complain about it on the internet."

The more you sweat over issues which you can take no practical action over, the more helpless you feel and the more unhappy you will be. Of course, being able to tell the difference between what you can control and what you can't is an art in itself that you need to master through experience. One thing I'm personally doing to lower stress is to reduce my news consumption and be less concerned with events around the world that are irrelevant to my personal life. I'll read enough to get a general awareness of what's happening around the world, but I refuse to be emotionally invested in things I have no control over.

4. You lack intimacy and deep human connection

If you don't have any friends to be vulnerable with, you didn't have any to begin with.

I would argue that this is one of the biggest, if not the biggest factor in causing anxiety, depression, and general unhappiness in the modern world. Humans are social creatures and we need to bond with others. And beyond simply spending time with people to chat and drink, deeper connection needs to be made with people. The quality matters much more than the quantity.

In today's society—especially in North America—it seems people have all become superficial and afraid of intimacy whether it be for friendship or romance. Without opening up your true self due to the fear of being rejected or ridiculed, all the relationships you have with others will not be genuine and it will not be fulfilling.

5. You are not living in the present reality

You may be conscious, but are you aware?

If you live in the past or the future, you lose touch with the present reality. That disconnection will cause longing which can only lead to dissatisfaction and loss of joy.

The lure of nostalgia and daydreaming of a better life or an improved world is actually quite insidious because of how intoxicating it is. When your mind drifts to imagining a pleasurable experience or a more exciting life, you are tricked into thinking that the longing is happiness itself, sort of like how mirages work. On the contrary, studies have actually shown that you are actually happier (and more productive) when you focus on what you're doing right now even if the task is boring. So, stick to the reality and forget about your fantasies. Either make things happen or accept that you're just wasting your time and energy on wishful thinking.

6. You engage in junk activities

"I'm happy, I'm happy, I'm happy…"

Just as there are junk foods, there are junk activities that may feel pleasurable at the time but dissatisfying and even harmful in the long-run.

Ask yourself: do you really need entertainment? I've squandered my youth by immersing myself in long hours of digital entertainment day after day. I barely even noticed that I was unhappy the whole time because I was so sedated. And what did I even get out of them? Those were several hours everyday that I could have spent reading, working out, learning new skills, meeting new people, and experiencing the world.

The fact is, giving up on entertainment has no negative impact on your level of happiness. Sure, you might miss them when they're suddenly gone, but overall, as long as you find more valuable things to do, your life can only get better when you ditch them. Learn to enjoy things that give you value rather than seeking enjoyment in things without value.

Conclusion

Unlike what many people today say, no one deserves happiness; that's something you'll have to earn. I'll go as far as to say that "happiness"—as defined by modern standards—isn't even necessary and hard to come by for certain individuals. Everyone has their own path towards living life to his unique potential and there is no universal rule that applies to all. So while I haven't really listed anything specific for the reader to strive towards, I hope I laid out some pitfalls that you can avoid in your journey.

Relentless Media Censorship Is Bringing Us A Fate Worse Than Big Brother

November 7, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Do you really like sexy women like the one in the photo above? Are you sure? Big Brother Google says "Why don't you look at this story about alternative lifestyles about men who have realized what terrible misogynists they are for having sexual desires?" rather than searching for articles on for pick-up artistry.

Sooner rather than later, all Internet roads will lead to the same New World Order Socialist philosophy.

As profiling of Internet users becomes more prolific and the algorithms more sophisticated in the coming years, the news and information we search for will be tailored to slowly "nudge" us one way or the other politically, one small step at a time.

The management of the information we get to read is already in its infancy.

Why do you think that "free" app on your phone that only performs a few functions swells in size with each "update" that is released? Do you really think they give a damn about your privacy and are plugging security holes? Hell no. The apps we download are moving from useful, low-resource using services to resource hogs (necessitating an upgrade in processing power every year or two) because they only provide us with a "free" service in order to hook us so the apps can gather information about everything we've ever written on our devices for social engineers and marketing flacks. The apps are becoming more sophisticated in the way they monitor everything we do – which is why the apps need all that memory size.

And soon, apps will be gathering information about everything we've ever said aloud by using the built in microphones on each device and speech recognition technology. CIA agents confirm microphones can easily be activated even when a device is switched completely off.

This type of information will be collected in giant databases such as the Utah Data Center, with the ultimate goal being the corporate-government complex knowing more about us than we know about ourselves.

Big Brother Was So Yesterday

Orwell's Big Brother idea never could have imagined the insidious nature of today's information technology

Today's information technology has put Big Brother on steroids.

The Waking Times details this frightful world that is already emerging as anyone who pays attention knows search engines are already tailoring information to what we search for and even what we text people about.

> "Mr. X, we've studied the little virtual bubble you live in, and now we can sell you your own special brand of truth."

Most of the time, the information one will see in this Internet bubble will be customized to suit a person's interests. This is why Facebook relentlessly pushes the "Like a page or product" portion of its web site. This information is used to build a profile of a person that ultimately will be able to accurately predict the color of their next bowel movement.

If a man is interested in non-GMO foods advertising and "news" stories will be tailored to inform him of grocers who sell organics and about news from "approved" outlets with stories written on the topic. Most of the time, this will be insidious advertising and ads disguised as information.

> "Hello, audience. We're going to pitch you on becoming full-fledged obsessed consumers, as if there is no other worthy goal in life—and then we're going to profile you from top to bottom, to find out exactly what kind of obsessed consumer you are, so we can hit you and trigger you with information that uniquely stimulates your adrenal glands…"

The Utah Data Center is designed to store exabytes of information on “all forms of communication, including emails, cell phone calls, and Internet searches, as well as all types of personal data trails—parking receipts, travel itineraries, and bookstore purchases”

As another example: Okay, we know you are interested in traditional gender roles. We (the information managers like Facebook and Google) will now to find news stories and customize the information you get to read online in order to cause you to doubt the validity of your beliefs. The ultimate goal is to slowly but steadily move you away from believing in traditional gender roles to believing in militant feminism without you realizing what we have done.

This type of information management is even more insidious than outright censorship, as it will be designed to steer everyone towards what the controllers of society want us to think and buy, no matter how far from the ideal consumer and fellow traveler we may be.

Think of it as a game of Plinko on The Price is Right, in which all chips ultimately fall into the “perfect, braindead consumer” slot at the bottom of the maze. The social engineers’ dream is a world of nothing but sexless consumers who perform mindless work in meaningless jobs, whose only outlets for pleasure are shopping and eating out and other State-approved activities.

Think that’s hyperbole? Travel around the world for six months to a year, then come back to the United States and tell me what you think.

Little Information Bubbles Merge Into Big Information Bubbles

We become what we are repeatedly exposed to, which is why a war is on for your mind

Once we have you believing a certain way or questioning your established beliefs, the key comes when it is time to steer public perception one way or the other. This is where the “rubber meets the road” in the realm of managing the populace like so many sheeple.

> BUT when a Big One comes along, like the 2016 national election in the US, the separate tunes come together and ring as one. Then the overriding need to extend Globalism’s goals (in the person of Hillary Clinton) blot out every other priority. Then the major media twist whatever they need to twist. Then it’s the same bubble for everyone.

Soon, just like the mainstream media on television and in print, everything you see online will be directed at making you think, behave and vote a certain way. The micromanagement and control of information just hasn’t become that sophisticated – yet.

Obama already hinted that only “official” information should be linked up by the corporate interests of Facebook, Google, etc. Look for Hillary to implement that idea with an iron fist if she is whisked into the Oval Office. An Internet security “crisis” will likely be engineered in the near future in which—you guessed it—Big Daddy Government needs to step in and take control of the web. From there on out we will be back to corporate-government propaganda instead of the Libertarian’s dream the current iteration of the Internet is.

So, the awakening we have seen from the brainwashing of the corporate media will be a temporary one if the elite have anything to do with it. The groundwork of this new, Socialist system of micromanaging information is already being laid. You already see it every time you do a search.

Someday soon the only information we’ll be able to find online will be from sources the corporate-government complex approves of. Of course, there will be renegades and rebels like us who resist, but most of the braindead sheeple out there will go along to get along just as has been happening since time immemorial.

Our options will be to get off the grid or to move to a new Internet. Neither move will be peacefully tolerated by the powers that be.

What François De La Rochefoucauld Has To Teach Us About Cynicism

November 7, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Is there any merit in taking a cynical view of life? Are the observations of cynicism realistic, brave observations on human nature, freed from sentimentality, or are they only the somber commentary offered by one who is a loser at the game of life, taking solace in his weakness and failure? There are compelling arguments either way. What is not disputed, however, is that François de La Rouchefoucauld was one of the most brilliantly cynical epigrammers who ever lived.

It probably did not help that he came from a long line of noblemen, for nothing so enfeebles the soul as much as inherited wealth and titles. He was born in 1613 and inherited the title of duke on the death of his father in 1650. Receiving the usual education of his class, he dabbled in military matters in his teens. Various itinerant love affairs followed with well-placed women, but some of these ended badly; we find him imprisoned in Bastille for a week in 1636 for political intrigue.

Although married, he continued to pursue other women, as was the custom of the time and his station. Marriages in those days were business affairs to be ignored at each party's pleasure or necessity; one such dalliance resulted in an illegitimate child, but the woman eventually rejected him for a more appealing competitor. In 1652 he found himself mixed up with a quasi-revolt called the Fronde, an adventure that left him with impaired sight when he was struck with a musket ball in the head. Health problems also intervened to add to his misery in the form of gout and melancholy.

In late seventeenth century France, the Paris salons were centers of debate, discussion, and the flowering of controversial ideas. By now La Rochefoucauld had acquired an acrid talent for stinging prose, and he knew how to use it. His failures in love and war had primed his spirit for a cynical view of life, and this predilection meshed well with the taste of the salons for savage wit. Nothing is so shallow as sophistication.

From his frequent visits to the salon of Mme. de Sable in Paris, he had begun to piece together a body of epigrams that represented his worldview. One of his peers had more commercial goals in mind, for a bootleg collection of 189 of his sayings was first published without his permission (and with no attribution) in 1663. Two years later he finally put out a proper edition; this contained 317 maxims. The volume was titled Sentences et maximes morales, but this is usually shortened to Maxims.

There is a philosophy here. It centers around the idea that all men are self-seeking egoists to a fault; any "virtue" a man displays is only a smokescreen concealing his self-love: "Our virtues are only vices in disguise." Human vanity takes precedence over nearly all else: "Virtues are lost in self-interest, as rivers are in the sea." Even the nobler emotions like love and altruism, according to La Rochefoucauld, are only a "kind of traffic in which self-love ever proposes to be the gainer." He took a dim view of women, finding them fit only for love (for men such as himself, of course) and procreation. One of his crueler maxims was "few women's worth lasts longer than their beauty."

But life's realities eventually caught up with him, softening his rougher edges. His wife, who had cared for him in his infirmities for eighteen years, died in 1670; his mother's death followed two years later. Two of his sons would eventually die of injuries received in France's ruinous wars of the period.

This gloomy picture was brightened by the entry into his life of the Mme. de La Fayette, who was twenty years his junior. She invited him to stay with her in Paris, and he was carried there with difficulty. She seems to have viewed him as a reform project; she would later say that "He gave me understanding, but I reformed his heart." Perhaps his fame made him an interesting captive. The union worked, and seemed to alleviate his dark picture of humanity; and when his final hours came, he asked for, and received, the last rites of the Church in 1680.

A fair assessment of La Rochefoucauld must take into account his undeniable wit, his probing sensitivity, and his ability to strip away the pretenses behind many human actions. Yet all in all, his maxims are meager in result. Many of them are superficial and shallow, the product of a personality still nursing the wounds of an early disillusionment. We weary of his aphorisms after two or three pages, and hesitate to reopen his book later.

Worse still, he was wrong to say that virtue and altruism are shams. Nothing is more vital to life, and we can see them around us every day, if only we know where to look, and as long as our senses are not blinded by fear. Timor animi auribus officit, as Sallust says: fear blocks out the ears.

Any bitter weakling can be a cynic, but it takes depth of character to accept the world's—and man's—faults and foibles, and to balance those against man's unquestioned capacity for greatness of soul. Broader life experiences might have corrected La Rochefoucauld's errors, but he preferred to remain in a state of arrested development while receiving the applause and notoriety of Paris society. His maxims can bring smiles to our faces, as it is easy to find amusement in the flaws of others; yet we forget that his barbs were directed at us as well.

Montaigne was far wiser, for he took a balanced view of life, accepting the world's absurdities and joys with the equanimity and calm resolution of a Greek or Roman sage. He was also a better man. La Rochefoucauld was intelligent without being wise, and never found the confidence in himself to submit his ego to the consolatory power of a higher philosophical authority in any form. Cynicism, in the end, strips a man of his most important protective armor, and leaves him naked to face the cruelties of life. No cynic ever died a happy man.

Is Hillary Clinton’s Entourage Involved In A Satanic Pedophile Ring?

November 8, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

The latest batch of the Podesta emails shared by Wikileaks add a darker dimension (if it was even possible) to the sordid culture of corruption, lies and depravity that surrounds Hillary Clinton, explaining why the FBI has been calling her for quite some time now, the “Antichrist personified”.

It is a possibility that Hellary’s clique attends and organizes Satanic rituals, involving mock-up scenes of cannibalism and sexual abuse involving children.

One of the emails directed at Tony Podesta (John Podesta’s brother) contains the following sentence:

Dear Tony,

I am so looking forward to the Spirit Cooking dinner at my place. Do you think you will be able to let me know if your brother is joining?

> “I am so looking forward to the Spirit Cooking dinner at my place.
> Do you think you will be able to let me know if your brother is joining?”

This really does not sounds like much until you discover the author of this invitation.

She, who walks in the footsteps of the Beast

This is the woman who sent the email, Marina Abramovic.

Dressed in red and holding the skinned head of a dead goat, a clear reference to the occult character Baphomet

There is proof that the Clinton Foundation directly transferred Abramovic ten thousand dollars in at least one instance for her “services.”

Abramovic carving a pentagram in the flesh of her stomach with a blade to show her artistic side

A self-proclaimed artist, Abramovic hails from Serbia and regularly organizes “performances” and events using what she calls “Spirit Cooking”.

This “spirit cooking” includes mixing semen, breast milk, urine or fresh blood before consuming it or splattering it over various things such as life-sized representations of young children, like shown below:

This performance included spelling with the body fluids, the following stanza:

> With a sharp > knife cut deeply into the > middle finger of your > left hand
> eat the pain.

Other examples of her “art” (nowadays any revolting expression of bad taste if sporting the correct pair of problem glasses) include public dinners, where politicians, Hollywood stars, singers and decision makers gather to eat cakes that depict a naked human corpse or feast on the fake (I hope by all that is sacred) blood contained in a coffin where swims another human body.

Celebrities that use demonic symbols in their persona such as Lady Gaga rush to participate to Abramovic's events

Another heavy user of the occult symbols, Jay-Z, is a big fan of Marina

These codes are all directly copied from rituals such as black masses or Sabat night reunions and popularized by figures such as Aleister Crowley from whom Abramovic draws direct inspiration.

It is part of this growing phenomenon where the elites and celebrities close to power get caught, intentionally or not, showing symbols celebrating the ancient Babylonian rites or the worship of the Devil.

On November the 4th, Clinton chose Jay-Z in a last bid to draw crowds to her empty rallies. Coincidence?

Innocent children involved in that mess

There is hard evidence that Bill Clinton traveled at least 26 times (sometimes without his bodyguards, it is all in the pilot logs) to billionaire and convicted pedophile Jeffrey Epstein's Island on board his plane, dubbed the "Lolita Express," as it is in this plane that the guests could allegedly have sex with minors.

With this in mind, it is disturbing to notice that other Podesta emails refer to children as being the "entertainment" at pool parties almost entirely attended by middle-aged men involved in politics.

Other emails involve strange references to food such as "pizza", "cheese", $65,000 worth of "hot dogs" for a party that attendees "dream of" and "recipes" that many sources suggest are code words for orgies involving minors and extremely young children. You can read more about it here.

The Whole Clinton Bag of Crooks reeks of unnatural sexual behaviour and reproachable acts and we will certainly know much more in the days to come, as Hillary Clinton is still under FBI investigation as we speak. This follows the scandal surrounding Huma Abedin (Clinton's right hand and confidant) and her estranged husband, sex offender and champion one-handed texter, Anthony Weiner.
It will take some time before they go through Weiner's 650,000 emails and decide of a course of action regarding these dark revelations and other atrocities of the Clinton crime family.

La plus belle ruse du diable est de vous persuader qu’il n’existe pas

These heavy accusations of Satanism remind us of the sexual blackmail practices said to take place among the popular hip-hop and Hollywood communities, as Roosh described in his related article, or other rumours linked to suspicious reunions involving the secret ceremonies of the elite such as the ones of the Bohemian Grove or the Rothschilds’ parties of the 70s.

If those recent speculations turn out to be true, it could have the effect of a bomb and mean a revolution.

Observe the symbols of cannibalism, eerily similar in the three following pictures. Those are respectively: a scene of the Rothschild’s “surrealistic bal,” a painting hanging in John Podesta’s office and one of Abramovic’s dinners:

6 Things To Know About Prague (Czech Republic)

November 8, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

A “gateway” between Western and Eastern Europe lies on the Charles River in the Czech Republic—Prague. It’s been a Western tourist hotspot for many years now. Many people consider it a city “overrun” by the Westerners. Ruined, and no longer worth it.

I’ve spent the last month of my travels here in Prague, and have had a good opportunity to contrast to a place further east–Ukraine.

With that being said, here are 10 observations I’ve made about Prague.

1. Yes, It’s Overrun, BUT…

That doesn’t mean you can’t find places that aren’t overrun. Yes, if you choose to stay in Prague zone 1, you’re going to have a drastically different experience. There will be hoards of people with selfie sticks, and fat Western girls wobbling all over Old Town (blocking the already narrow streets).

If you head out to Prague 2, 3, 5, etc., you'll have a much different experience. You'll get to meet some locals, try beer other than Staropramen, and avoid the throngs of tourists.

Of course, it's important to note that Prague is a beautiful city. It's natural to want to see some of the sights. If you choose to go this route, there's simply no way around it.

2. The Reaction From Locals Changes Over Time

Simply put, locals are used to Westerners. And most of them roll their eyes at them. However, once they know that you've laid down some semi-permanent roots, they're far more friendly.

Just the cashiers at the market below my apartment have done a complete 180 on me in the few weeks I've been here. It went from a general coldness that they show all English speakers to genuine warmth.

3. The Beauty (Of The City) Is Unreal

This is my third time in Prague, and I'm still blown away by how beautiful of a city it is. From the castle to the riverwalks to all the colorful buildings, it's just a very pleasant place to be. There are a lot of beautiful cities in Europe, but Prague is definitely near the top of all of them.

You can't really blame people for wanting to come and see it.

4. Cheap By Western Standards, Expensive By EE

Simply put, if you're looking for short-term rentals—you're getting hosed. And there's not many ways around it. Prague landlords know the power of Western currency and know that the short-term stag parties don't mind blowing it.

It's far, far cheaper to sign a lease for a 3, 6, or 12 month period.

A meal in a nice restaurant will probably run you between $8-12 USD. This is incredibly cheap compared to places like Italy, Spain, or London. At the same time, it's definitely a bit more expensive than places such as Kiev, Budapest, or some cities in Poland.

If you want actual numbers, I'd say it's about 30% more expensive than Kiev. Probably about 10-15% more expensive than Budapest (the last time I was there was April 2015, so keep that in mind), and just marginally more expensive than Poland.

Of course (as I keep harping on this), it's going to get cheaper the further you go from the Old Town area.

5. The Girls

I know this is probably a large part of the reason you're reading this. So let's break it down. The girls are hot. They're not as hot as Ukrainian and Russian girls, but they're a step above Polish women.

At this point, it's easy to see that any and all local Czech girls living in Prague are basically immune to foreigners. You aren't going to impress a girl by swooping in for a weekend and renting out a great pad with a view of the Old Town. In fact, she'd probably rather do almost anything but hang out in that area.

However, being a foreigner will give you some major value if you're living there. In Colombia, girls will bang you just because you're a foreigner. In Ukraine, they'll probably at least give you one date for being foreign. In Prague, they'll do neither—especially the high quality ones.

However, the same things apply if you're living there (or coming back consistently).

Plus, it's not exactly rocket science to be higher value than the drunken tourists stumbling around. Just keep your liquor in check, and avoid putting a GoPro on your head–you'll already be ahead of the game.

6. Conclusion—Is It Livable?

When you come from a place like Ukraine, Prague feels much more like home. The English is better, and it has a more Western feel. You can find the larger supermarkets and other comforts that are often rare in the Former Soviet Union countries (Ukraine, Belarus, etc.).

The question is whether or not it's worth it to deal with what comes with those Western amenities—high amounts of tourism and a general feel of it being taken over. There's no denying that Prague has probably lost a lot of luster for the adventurous single man compared to how it was 20 years ago.

However, Prague is definitely a good spot for a digital nomad to settle in and get some work done. The internet is fast, the city is interesting, and there are good expat groups that put on cool things to do.

You could do a lot worse.

If You Dress Like An Attention Whore At Work, Expect To Be Treated Like One

November 8, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

A favorite trope of feminists and women claiming workplace discrimination is that female staff are the victims of "sexism" due to judgments about their appearance. But how many times have we all seen girls working in our building or out on their lunch breaks in attire more befitting of a Tinder date, raunchy nightclub, strip joint, or even the gym? Meanwhile, men must keep their fashion within a very narrow range of acceptability, otherwise they risk failing to get that fancy new job or could lose their current one.

Furthermore, guys learn to deal with the fact that the world does judge you based on your appearance. Many women have zero idea about this concept, only accepting the judgments they agree with or those ones that further their interests and career. For those opinions they don't like, they can always conveniently claim the person giving them is sexist or misogynist, or, just as amorphously, "objectifying" a woman. This is classic attention-seeking.

Attention-whore Jayde Phoenix.

The epitome of this growing female narcissism is a British woman by the name of Jayde Phoenix. Touting herself as a "IT security expert" (despite her academic and job credentials being a fraction of what it means to be highly qualified or plain non-existent), she suggested a “guess the number of USBs in a jar” competition to promote her company. With her breasts nearly spilling out of a see-through top, she looked at the camera with a lustful gaze, what many on the Roosh V Forum would call “a thousand cock stare.” Her clothes (and demeanor) better suited a street hooker than a “professional.”

As we should have expected in our troubled times, the many critics of Phoenix’s contrived appearance were labeled as “sexists,” “bullies,” and “misogynists.” She herself tried to excoriate her detractors, emphasizing how “good” she was at her job and the professional standards she supposedly meets every day. But there are a few questions both the original photo exercise and her subsequent justifications failed to answer, namely:

- If she’s so good at her job, why did she need to use a see-through bra in the picture?
- Why doesn’t she wear a top size that comfortably contains her breasts, rather than flaunting them?
- Why is she and not someone else in the photo?

Though the attention-seeking of Jayde and her employer first flared up several months ago, the dilemma of girls like her is an ongoing one.

Try getting employed in an office as a man with this sort of attire

Baggy pants with your underwear showing

The male office worker could be wearing black pants and not jeans, like in the photo, and sporting a typical business shirt. That doesn’t matter. No white collar company worth a dime is going to hire a man whose boxers or briefs are showing down to his ass. Compare this to the parade of female office workers who go beyond showing their arms and the hint of a bra strap to exhibiting half the surface area of their breasts. In addition, if you haven't already noticed, the very short crop top is now a staple garment within American office (un)culture. It is not unusual to see a large part of a woman's bare stomach and back, including over-the-top tattoos.

Hawaiian shirts and board shorts

Some workplaces, most notably those trying to appear "hip," have drastically relaxed the need for business attire. But these employers are definitely in the minority. A man with a penchant for Hawaiian shirts, board shirts or other beach clothing will find his career options drastically limited. As they should be! The way in which you relate to your friends or fellow tourists on a holiday is almost always far different from how you should deal with clients, investors, stakeholders and the like in your profession. Men save their best (or worst) Hawaiian shirt for office charity fundraising days, company summer parties and related functions, not an average day.

Leather, lycra or ridiculously tight clothing in general

Inasmuch as tight clothing on men doesn’t tickle your or my fancy, it’s how ironic how an obese woman can wear garments twice or thrice as close-fitting in the workplace than a fit male. And, male office workers of the world, don’t even consider wearing leather pants during your next boardroom presentation. The occasional gay man or metrosexual might escape sanction for some outlandish or garish outfit, but most industries, if they value their reputation with clients, will prohibit you from donning clothing that looks like it came from the wardrobe of Lance Armstrong or someone from Queer Eye for the Straight Guy.

Excuses for female attention-seeking are out of control

It seems that “Lady” Victoria Hervey and Jayde Phoenix read the same book.

There is little doubt that Jayde Phoenix’s employer expected a backlash against her. In this sense, it was a very good marketing and advertising ploy (for those prospective clients who do not care about actual professionalism, of which there are many). As for Phoenix and other women like her, this situation is win-win. At the very least, she and those of her ilk can continue their day-to-day objectification of themselves, generating desperately craved male attention in particular. Even for girls who do not receive the public’s spotlight, any roadblock or mishap in their career can later be blamed on “misogyny” after judgments about their appearance.

At best, as happened in Phoenix’s situation, she gets nation-wide and even global coverage. For narcissistic girls who take zero responsibility for how others may negatively perceive them, this is the coup of a lifetime. Yet as they age (and Jayde Phoenix looks far older than her early 20s), expect their antics to become more straw-clutching. And while these girls engage in sexual self-advancement and wage war over imaginary discriminations, the vast majority of male employees have no scapegoat they can use to rationalize their failures and virtually no means of combating institutionalized prejudice against their so-called “privilege.”

By the way, is Jayde Phoenix’s Arabic necklace indicative of some “work” she may have done in Dubai?

Donald Trump Elected 45th President Of The United States

November 9, 2016 | by News Syndicator | Link | Original Link

Via AP:

Donald Trump was elected America's 45th president Tuesday, an astonishing victory for a celebrity businessman and political novice who capitalized on voters' economic anxieties, took advantage of racial tensions and overcame a string of sexual assault allegations on his way to the White House.

His triumph over Hillary Clinton will end eight years of Democratic dominance of the White House and threatens to undo major achievements of President Barack Obama. He's pledged to act quickly to repeal Obama's landmark health care law, revoke the nuclear agreement with Iran and rewrite important trade deals with other countries, particularly Mexico and Canada.

The Republican blasted through Democrats' longstanding firewall, carrying Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, states that hadn't voted for a GOP presidential candidate since the 1980s. He needed to win nearly all of the competitive battleground states, and he did just that, claiming Florida, Ohio, North Carolina and others.

Global stock markets and U.S. stock futures plunged deeply, reflecting investor alarm over what a Trump presidency might mean for the economy and trade.

A New York real estate developer who lives in a sparking Manhattan high-rise, Trump forged a striking connection with white, working class Americans who feel left behind in a changing economy and diversifying country. He cast immigration, both from Latin America and the Middle East, as the root of the problems plaguing many Americans and taped into fears of terrorism emanating at home and abroad.

Trump will take office with Congress expected to be fully under Republican control. GOP Senate candidates fended off Democratic challengers in key states and appeared poised to maintain the majority. Republicans also maintained their grip on the House.

Senate control means Trump will have great leeway in appointing Supreme Court justices, which could mean a major change to the right that would last for decades.

Trump upended years of political convention on his way to the White House, leveling harshly personal insults on his rivals, deeming Mexican immigrants rapists and murderers, and vowing to temporarily suspend Muslim immigration to the U.S. He never released his tax returns, breaking with decades of campaign tradition, and eschewed the kind of robust data and field efforts that helped Obama win two terms in the White House, relying instead on his large, free-wheeling rallies to energize supporters. His campaign was frequently in chaos, and he cycled through three campaign managers this year.

His final campaign manager, Kellyanne Conway, touted the team's accomplishments as the final results rolled in, writing on Twitter that "rally crowds matter" and "we expanded the map."

The mood at Clinton's party grew bleak as the night wore out, with some supporters leaving, others crying and hugging each other. Top campaign aides stopped returning calls and texts, as Clinton and her family hunkered down in a luxury hotel watching the returns.

At 2 a.m., Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta told the crowd to head home for the night. "We're still counting votes and every vote should count," he said.

Trump will inherit an anxious nation, deeply divided by economic and educational opportunities, race and culture.

Exit polls underscored the fractures: Women nationwide supported Clinton by a double-digit margin, while men were significantly more likely to back Trump. More than half of white voters backed the Republican, while nearly 9 in 10 blacks and two-thirds of Hispanics voted for the Democrat.

Doug Ratliff, a 67-year-old businessman from Richlands, Virginia, said Trump's election would be one of the happiest days of his life.

"This county has had no hope," said Ratliff, who owns strip malls in the area badly beaten by the collapse of the coal industry. "You have no idea what it would mean for the people if Trump won. They'll have hope again. Things will change. I know he's not going to be perfect. But he's got a heart. And he gives people hope."

Trump has pledged to usher in a series of sweeping changes to U.S. domestic and foreign policy: repealing Obama's signature health care law, though he has been vague on what he could replace it with; building a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border; and suspending immigration from country's with terrorism ties. He's also praised Russian President Vladimir Putin and spoken of building a better relationship with Moscow, worrying some in his own party who fear he'll go easy on Putin's provocations.

The Republican Party's tortured relationship with its nominee was evident right up to the end. Former President George W. Bush and wife Laura Bush declined to back Trump, instead selecting "none of the above" when they voted for president, according to spokesman Freddy Ford.

House Speaker Paul Ryan, a reluctant Trump supporter, called the businessman earlier in the evening to congratulate him, according to a Ryan spokeswoman.

Wall Street, Hollywood, The Media And SJWs Fail To Stop Donald Trump From Becoming America's Next President

November 9, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, Donald J. Trump is the new President-elect of the United States. Though a few results are still pending, Trump has captured the perennial large battleground states of Ohio, Florida, Iowa, and North Carolina, plus Georgia. And, in a change not seen in more than a generation, he has seized Pennsylvania, Michigan and Wisconsin.

Pennsylvania and Michigan have not voted for a Republican Presidential candidate since 1988 and Wisconsin since way back in 1984. It appears also that states the Democrats thought were well and truly in the bag for them, such as Minnesota, Maine and Virginia, have stayed blue with only wafer-thin or very disappointing margins. The 2nd Congressional district of Maine, a state which divides its electoral votes along with Nebraska, has been called for the Republicans for the first time in nearly 30 years. The last time any Maine district voted for a GOP Presidential candidate was 1988, when George H. W. Bush seized all four electoral votes there.

Importantly, too, avowedly liberal states have seen significant turnouts for Trump. For example, counts so far show that some 40% of voters in Connecticut and Rhode Island, states with even more liberal media bias than the nation generally, have opted for the "racist," "sexist," and "homophobic" Republican candidate. Their votes ultimately did not change the electoral college map, but it is heartening to know that even in the eye of the liberal storm, plenty of people are happy to support Trump. This is despite them facing fierce rebukes and, often enough, violence if they make their views public.

The “clown” candidate has beaten 16 more “experienced” Republican challengers and now Hillary Clinton, the most elite-backed candidate in the world’s political history.

As last night’s results have shown, plenty of Trump voters in red and blue states alike have been forced to keep their beliefs quiet. Media airtime for pro-Trump views and stories has been deliberately minimized and frequently demonized by the major networks. Mainstream “journalists” such as Glenn Thrush, Wolf Blitzer, Jake Tapper, Jessica Valenti, and Brent Budowsky have been caught collaborating with both the DNC and Clinton campaign (if you believe that these two groups are actually separate). This only increases the esteem in which the emphatic, resounding Trump victory needs to be held.

And let’s not forget the Senate and House races! After months of spineless GOP cucks rushing to differentiate themselves from Trump, The Donald has still carried them to victory in both Houses of Congress. The White House, Senate and House of Representatives are all in Republican hands until at least the 2018 House midterms. Can you taste the very salty tears of the liberals and SJWs yet?

Every powerful vested interest not only supported Hillary, but did everything they could to ruin Trump

Yes, it’s happening.

Did you see the last major Hillary Clinton rallies? Celebrities-cum-political hacktivists, chief among them Lady Gaga, Beyoncé, Jay Z, Bruce Springsteen, Bon Jovi, and Katy Perry, all fell into Clinton’s corner well before their final appearances for her, excoriating anyone who had the gall to support Donald Trump. Even long-term Republicans who betrayed Trump, like Arnold Schwarzenegger, were attacked by celebrity SJWs such as Robert De Niro after they joined the “Never Trump” ranks, as if they were dangerous saboteurs. The celebrity paranoia has been palpable for months. Hollywood, that broad industry taking in not just film stars but also musicians, silver screen actors, and comedians, has become little more than an overpaid trade union for Hillary Clinton.

Likewise, every major American company that has come out for a candidate has come out for Hillary. Plenty of “neutral” corporations have undoubtedly been funneling support to the Clinton campaign behind the scenes as well. Prominent billionaires like George Soros and Warren Buffett have done all they could to drag Hillary’s stumbling half-corpse, both literally and figuratively, across the line. Whilst Trump has been supported by a number of ten-figure businessmen, these men are regularly attacked in the media. They include the scapegoated but brave Peter Thiel and Carl Icahn.

And then there’s the mainstream media. Countless studies have indicated that about 85-90% of all journalists are liberal. This over-representation is more salient still in the upper echelons of newsmen and women, particularly prominent mastheads such as The New York Times, Washington Post, and Huffington Post, plus Democratic TV surrogates like CNN and NBC. The 2016 campaign has inflated this preexisting liberal bias, one that plagued the two George W. Bush Administrations but raged even more ferociously against Donald Trump over the last 18 months.

All of these media elites have lambasted Trump for over a year, at the same time they give the paltriest coverage of the disgusting Hillary, Podesta and DNC emails. Everything newsworthy on this front, from the overwhelming presence of Clinton Foundation donors in Hillary's Secretary of State diary book to more recent revelations about John Podesta's involvement with Satanic rituals, has been brushed off the balcony by the Wolf Blitzers and Chuck Todds of the American mainstream media. Yet Trump has triumphed nonetheless!

The new administration must crush the criminal Democratic elites and Clinton Foundation with the rule of law

Will Hillary now find herself stumbling into jail?

Inasmuch as the Clinton campaign, the SJWs, and their big business and media enablers have been defeated in this year's election, they retain very well-oiled and effective means for trying to undermine President Trump once he takes office. Trump's first priority as Commander-in-Chief must be to remove the bureaucratic apparatchiks preventing a full and frank investigation of the Clinton Foundation. He also needs to clear the way for legal inquiries into the various criminal activities, as uncovered by Wikileaks, perpetrated from within the DNC and Hillary Clinton's campaign.

The Department of Justice in particular has engaged in all manner of skulduggery, most notably when Attorney-General Loretta Lynch had a private meeting with Bill Clinton during the most crucial time of the FBI investigation into Hillary's emails. Additionally, elements of the State Department illegally informed Hillary about new developments in that same case. Enough is enough. It's time to drain the swamp.

Election night produced another curve-ball: after weeks of calling Donald Trump a "sore loser” for him not saying if he would respect the final result, Hillary Clinton refused to speak to her supporters and the American people. It would seem that she only telephoned Trump privately. So who’s the sore loser now?

Last night we were witnesses to the greatest electoral sea-change in American—and perhaps global—history. We cannot lose sight of the work to be done, but for the next 24 hours we can bask in this unprecedented victory against all odds.

Hail to the Chief, Donald J. Trump.

What To Do In An Ammo Panic

November 9, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

Firearms panics happen over a variety of things, like acts of domestic terrorism, mass shootings, or Democrats getting elected to office. Though we may not have to worry about this for a few years after 2nd Amendment enthusiast Donald Trump's decisive victory last night, let's cover our bases and talk about a panic if future Democrats are elected.

What is a panic for ammo and firearms? A panic is when people go and buy items just to have them because they are worried that there will soon be no more, or it will be illegal to buy and sell such items, but maybe not to own them already, as most Americans still believe in the no ex post facto laws part of the Constitution.

Adding to a panic is speculators, who buy from retailers who are roundly shamed if they raise their own prices, only to resell privately at much higher levels. While this is legal, it certainly isn't ethical or a decent thing to do, and these folks deserve being shamed and mocked at every opportunity.

Lastly, the gun store's or site's inventory cannot handle the flex in the buying demand, nor can the manufacturer, and an artificially contrived panic creates a real scarcity that can only be corrected by the panic running out of steam as everyone buys what they consider to be enough and natural undercutting resets the price back to lower levels.

Some prices never return. 22 Long Rifle ammunition has still not totally recovered from the damage old B-rock "the Islamic Shock" Obama did to it with his multi-year championship of Best Firearms Salesman Ever, and it may be even worse under the Bitch in Chief.

So, what gets grabbed in a panic? What should you get? What should you count on still being available? We've got three categories: guns, ammo, and components/accessories.

Guns

Anything that's big on the liberal hit list is a first target for a ban, so it's a first target for a panic. Look for things that are popular with the right, and scary to the left. Also look for things that are modern; no one is going to ban the M1 Garand anytime soon.

Evil features matter more than destructive power. Anyone who knows anything about guns knows that the AK-47 and the AR-15 fire intermediate cartridges that are puny enough to be considered inhumane in several states with which to hunt deer as they lack the power to kill the animal with marginal shots. However, they're black and have mean things attached to them, so they're on the shit list, while a nice blued with wooden stock scoped bolt action rifle in a magnum cartridge capable of wrecking your world from twice the distance that an AR can pull is safe as it looks "traditional."

They have to be popular to the left to get noticed; rifles like the FAL and anything based of the G3/HK91 action simply don't have enough exposure to get targeted, unless they pull something sweeping like the USC 18 922r rules again. The Mini 30 and the M1A might be safe; maybe.

For pistols, pretty much any semi-automatic of the polymer age is fair game to want banned. Oftentimes, stupid rules like restrictive magazine sizes get pushed. 1911s, Hi Powers, other old domestic semi-autos, and revolvers should be safe. Expect the libtards to go after Glocks and the like.

Shotguns seem to be immune these days as there's not a whole lot of difference between a hunting gun and a combat gun other than paint and mag tube length. I think the Saigas are still not being imported, and it's about the only box mag fed one out there, but anything else makes a good home defense gun that should also be immune to the ammo panic portion as well.

Ammunition

Range (full metal jacket) and defense/hunting (hollow or soft point) cartridges in popular centerfire calibers and 22 Long Rifle will almost literally evaporate from your local store and online, and it's probably beginning as I write this.

Oddly enough, only certain rounds will suffer panic buying. For rifles, it's limited to .223/5.56, 7.62×39, and .308/7.62×51. Traditional hunting rounds like 30-30, .243, and .270 do not seem to be impacted. Why doesn't 30-06 get bought in a panic? As the old joke goes, men with 30-06's don't panic, but it really has to do with the feedback cycle I mentioned at the start. If there's little demand, it cannot exceed the in-store supply, so the perception of it being gone for good cannot occur.

Everything but the shotgun shell and the howitzer round to the far right will sell fast in a panic.

Panic bought pistol ammo is the big 3: 9mm Luger, 40 S&W, and .45 ACP. .380 will round out the affected semi-automatic rounds, and there usually is a bit of a run on .357 Magnum and .38 Special as well. 10mm, .357 SIG, .45 GAP and other magnums like the .44 do not seem to be affected.

For rimfires, .22 Long Rifle just goes poof, while its Magnum brother and smaller, 17 caliber, cousins do not seem to be as affected. Rimfires are not reloadable, and this contributes to their over-stockpiling.

Components and Accessories

Most centerfire ammo is reloadable, and the serious amongst shooters will roll their own for economy, self-reliance, and performance, so the consumable components will also get some panics. Although I've held off on reloading articles until I get my press set back up, we can hit up the components that will get panic bought briefly.

Biggest thing is primers, even bigger than the bullets, oddly enough. The primer is the little metal cup that gets smacked by the firing pin and sets off the powder in modern cartridges, and they come in two sizes for pistols, two for rifles, and of varying hardness to satisfy military specifications.

The second is gunpowder itself. Fortunately, there's a wide variety of smokeless powder, and everyone tends to have the brands and formulas they prefer, so it takes a little less of a hit than the primers. The third is the bullets, and since there are so many types and manufacturers, they also take a little less of a hit than primers. While you obviously need all three to reload, bear that in mind. Always save your brass, and anyone else's you can pick up.

Even though the little ones are easier to use, the higher capacity ones disappear first. Get both.

While it is always a good idea to have spare springs and small parts like firing pins and extractors that are prone to breakage, the number one accessory or part to take a hit in panics is the box magazine, especially “high capacity” ones. I don’t mean the 200 round drum mags, although those do take a dive, nor do I really mean the 100 round coffin mags, but I mean the full capacity full sized pistol mags, like a 15 round mag for a full sized pistol, or a 30 round AR-15 mag. Expect to see P-mags and surplus style aluminum AR mags just vanish. The Gabby Giffords Special, the extended Glock 17 30 round mag, is also a contender for vanishing fast in a panic.

Holsters, slings, cleaning accessories, optics, and ammo cans seem to be immune from panics.

What to do?

If you already own a carbine and/or a semi-auto pistol, make sure you have enough ammo, magazines, and spare parts. It’s a lot better to have one gun with multiple mags and a lot of ammo than many guns with the one or two mags with which they came from the factory and a couple boxes of ammo.

I try to have at least six mags for my semi-auto pistols, and at least ten mags for my semi-auto rifles. Get some rifle mags of different sizes, the 30 and 40 AR mags are fun for shooting standing up, but they get in the way of prone firing and the 10 and 20 rounders are preferable.

Your ultimate ammo goal, I maintain, should be a thousand practice rounds and 500 defense rounds for each gun you have, but, in a pre-panic or panic situation, just get what you can at a normal price; some is better than none. If you're into reloading, you know what to get already.

If you don't own anything, and want to soon, refer to some pistol articles, a rifle article, a shotgun article, and a buying guide here. Consider buying some stripped AR lowers to build on a rainy day later on.

Build an AR and meet girls at the range?

Conclusion

No matter who got elected, I think this country is in for rough times. It's always better to have firearms and not need them, then not have them and need them. Store yours safely, but accessible and ready in times of need.

Trump Presidency Creates Mountains Of Salt From Butthurt Liberals

November 10, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Rejoice, gentlemen! The tears of liberals are flowing freely, as Donald Trump has recently been announced president. All of the hard work that we've committed ourselves to over the past year has finally come to a close. It's truly an event of the ages: a hard working, American businessman beat out the globalist titans and Satanic elite.

In the spirit of this great victory, I believe that we're all entitled to some enjoyment. This article will be solely dedicated to bathing in liberal tears; and, mark my words, it will be glorious. This is the beginning of the end of SJWism, and I think it's high time we soak in the fruits of our labor.

Sorry guys, there’s no brakes on the #TrumpTrain

As poll results came in, moving Trump from a measly 2% chance to a whopping 95% chance of seizing the presidency, libtards began crying all across the nation. Turns out that America does not, in fact, want their Lord and Savior Hillary Rodham Christ, to be president of the free world.

Note the sour expression of the woman on the far right.

Unfortunately for you guys, Trump has won the presidency. Sorry illegals—you're out. SJWism is coming to an end, the mainstream media is dying off, and we're going to make America great again.

5 Things America Can Learn From Hungary's Resistance Against The Migrant Masses

November 10, 2016 | by Bernie Paprika | Link | Original Link

On the 2nd of October Hungary has seen a stunning manifestation of national unity, as 98% of votes cast on a referendum regarding the EU-imposed migrant settlement quotas were declared a strong and undebatable no. Now the Hungarian national parliament works at incorporating the referendum results as an amendment to the country's constitution. While some left-wing news outlets—like the Guardian—celebrated the supposed inadequacy of the referendum, it is beyond dispute that the message of the voting is strong and firm.

Here are five lessons we can learn from this monumental stand against globalism.

1. Democracies Need Strong Leaders

Wimpy western politicians would have their voters believe that personality does not matter. Strong, witty, and masculine politicians are often depicted as exponents of a "fascistic personality cult." Nowadays, it seems, not much distinction is made between being a macho and being a Nazi.

In reality, all great western democratic leaders were strong men—and sometimes women. Winston Churchill, Charles de Gaulle, David Ben-Gurion, Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher were not known for being timid, politically correct politicians who would retract and apologize for every past comment that they've made. Do you think that today's EU politicians and Western leaders could have beaten Hitler or won the Cold War?

Hungary's Viktor Orbán might have some faults, but he is certainly not a shy and weak politician who lacks magnetism. Even his opponents will grant him that he has a rare political talent and an almost visionary skill for seeing future happenings: think of how one year ago Hungary was the first European country to build a wall to keep the migrant wave out. Today, most countries—from Austria to Great Britain—follow his lead.

Just listen to his 15th March, 2015 speech (made on Hungary's national holiday commemorating the country's 1848 freedom fight against the Habsburgs). Look at how he is standing in the rain, without some guy holding an umbrella over his head. This man has speaking skills, grand views, and balls:

The idea that Western democracies can function with leaders who "have the charisma of a damp rag and the appearance of a low-grade bank clerk"—to quote Nigel Farage who has so sharply put it to Herman van Rompuy—is a lie and has no foundation in reality. Democracy is about the masses; the masses need inspiration and leaders; democratic leaders therefore have to be strong and need game themselves.

I am personally a friend of monarchies, and I have libertarian arguments for it; but as long as the western world believes in democracy, we cannot have cucks and wimps protecting it.

2. Liberty Is Protected By The Right-Wing

Anyone who believes in game enjoys the fruits if Western liberal capitalism, like it or not. Yes, the modern world has its faults, but freedom of speech, freedom of sex life, freedom of entrepreneurship and freedom of travel are all essential parts of our lifestyle. Of course, these are tenets that the left hates today; in fact, if you want to live free and live a masculine lifestyle, the "liberalism" of today is certainly not your friend.

Therefore I'm going to write about "liberty," and not "liberalism." One can debate the difference between these terms; in short, what I mean is that the left today doesn't want you to be free, but wants a politically correct nanny state to control and plan every move you make, and punish you if you do not oblige.

The right, however, still stands for the basic concept of personal liberty that we have grown to love and respect. Hungary has been criticized a lot by left-wing groups for having curbed some freedoms; I will agree that some of these state actions were unnecessary and hardly defensible. But Hungary—and Eastern-Europe—today still has more freedom than some corners of the oh-so-liberal-and-tolerant Western world.

In Hungary, universities rarely propagate the debased agenda of social justice wars; cultural Marxism is regularly attacked and barely tolerated; feminism is rare and marginal, and the country is, overwhelmingly, conservative and right wing (the governing party with two-thirds of parliamentary seats is centre-right, the largest opposition party is openly far-right). In the capital city of Budapest, one of the best and cheapest cities for night-life and gaming in Europe, you will certainly not be prosecuted for stopping hot girls and asking for their number—unlike some Western cities.

3. Minorities Are Misled

The Hungarian press—much outside of the view of the grand world, due to our rarely known and complicated language—has been in throes for the past few months about the migrant crisis. Like most Eastern European countries, Hungary barely has any immigration or Muslims. In fact, if there's a black person on the street, people will often turn their heads.

Debates that have been present in the Western media—about Muslim integration, terror and Islam, "Palestine" and Israel— have only recently surfaced in the Hungarian press. Minorities, of course, have been misled by the left-wing press into believing that the migrants were "refugees," "poor victims whom he have a responsibility to assist." The Jewish press (meaning official Jewish congregation organs, not conspiracy theories) and LGBT groups voiced their concern for tolerance and non-violent communication.

It is probably not a grand revelation to most readers of this site that Muslim immigration brings little good to minorities. As Milo Yiannopoulos said in a lecture of his, the Muslims are "not on top of the oppression ladder, but they want to kill all the others on the oppression ladder." Minorities have been misled into following the agenda of the political left; the sight of Hungary's gay public personalities demonstrating for letting in Muslims in front the parliament is a clear proof of this.

4. Feminists Love Islam

Feminism in Hungary is a rare bird, but it does exist. One such radical Marxist-Feminist made the news when she openly argued that there could be “no terrorists among Muslim refugees”; this, of course, was before the Paris and Brussels attacks, many of the perpetrators of which arrived as “refugees” through Hungary. A few days ago I stumbled across the Facebook page of another fine specimen: this hardly attractive girl celebrated the “empowerment” of the hijab which, according to her, was a beautiful expression of female’s voluntary decision to defy the dating market.

Describing such violent and shameful oppression of people as “voluntary self-empowerment” is crazy. Feminists live in denial of facts, and the recent alliance between crazy radical Islam and Marxist Feminism only proves that neither has any love for Western culture.

5. Eastern Europe Is Still OK

The Western media gleefully celebrated the fact that with a voter turnout of a little more than 40%, the 50% limit of required turnout was not reached. According to Hungarian laws however, a referendum with 25% or more electorate turnout is valid, even if not politically binding. The Hungarian government will soon amend the constitution to declare that Brussels cannot force the country to take in immigrants without the consent of the people.

Such a policy is clear and sound. The message is that Eastern Europe—with all its faults, economic lagging and sometimes real intolerance—is still a better place to live for masculine men that many a place in the western world. Here masculine lifestyle is appreciated, Donald Trump has grand support—even Viktor Orbán voiced his good wishes for the Republican president-elect—and feminism has failed to win any serious ground.

Eastern Europe is still not lost, and Hungary is certainly among the best options for men of game today.

What The 2016 Election Has Exposed

November 10, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

There are some things that we have learned about the United States from this election. We'll need to keep these in mind as we make efforts to return sanity to society.

The federal government has been corrupted

Probably the most shocking lesson of this election is that the entire federal government has been coopted to serve a single party—the Democrats. The best example of this was the behavior of FBI Director James Comey. The FBI is part of the Executive branch of government so Comey reports to Loretta Lynch, who in turn reports to Obama. Despite this fact, one expects that the FBI be allowed a high degree of discretion to honestly investigate individuals regardless of which political party they belong to. After all, the US was founded upon the idea that we are all equal before the law.

Comey's actions reveal that the FBI has thrown equality before the law out the window. At first the FBI investigated Clinton's use of an unsecure, personal email server to conduct national business while she was Secretary of State. But even though Clinton apparently violated several laws that have gotten other people severe jail sentences, Comey exonerated her back in July with a hand slap.

In a move that surprised everyone, Comey re-opened on October 28th the criminal investigation of Clinton after 650,000 emails State Department emails were found on pervert Anthony Weiner's computer. Trump supporters rejoiced and Hillary supporters expressed outrage. But the White House calmly called Comey "a man of integrity." Did they know something we didn't?

It turns out the fix was in from the beginning because just 48 hours before election day, Comey exonerated Clinton again. The FBI director likely intended to clear Clinton of wrongdoing before the election to defuse Donald Trump's criticism of her.

The big lesson is that the law is applied selectively. Wealthy, politically-connected people don't need to play by the same rules as everyone else. Unless this situation is corrected, it means the rule of law is dead—and that is a very grave lesson indeed.

The elites are in control but…

Elites want you to believe they are super smart and super powerful like the Great Oz.

I've written many times about the control that globalist elites exert on the country through their control of the media, educational institutions, and politicians through the form of bribes (donations, cushy job offers, speaking fees). By controlling the flow of information and setting the narrative, the globalists are able to control the masses like cattle. The good news is that their control is not complete. They are not omnipotent.

The weakness of the elites has been demonstrated in three ways. The first was with the Brexit vote. When Prime Minister David Cameron agreed to hold a referendum on the UK's membership in the EU, he never dreamed that Britons would actually vote to leave. All the polls at the time showed that any movement to leave would go down in flames. Still, through the work of men like Nigel Farage and Boris Johnson, the British populace voted to leave the EU. The Brits on the leave side had to endure being called racist and look past polling that said they had no chance to win.

The second way was the campaign of Trump himself. The GOP had planned a coronation for Jeb Bush. The rest of the GOP field was "me too" candidates who were virtually indistinguishable from Jeb. Trump came in with an uncompromising message and crushed Jeb and the rest of the little Jebs. The elite plan to have Hillary versus a weak conservative was completely thrown into disarray by Trump's campaign. Even if Trump has lost the general, it is still a victory because now, instead of seeing the Great Oz, we see the globalists behind the curtain.

The third manifestation of the weakness of the elites is the rise of the Alt Right. A tiny group of young people on the internet was able to quickly wake up large segments of the population. Only a year ago, terms like nationalism and globalism were rarely heard in the US. Now, we have grandmothers in Texas tweeting about how we need to lay the axe to the globalists.

The overall lesson is that we should not fear the globalist elite. They exist and they are able to fool a majority of the population, but not all of us. With sound strategy, they can be defeated.

The Elite have completely divorced themselves from non-elites

In the past, Europe had an aristocracy. This aristocracy had a close relationship with the rest of the people in the country. The aristocracy was expected to defend the nation in case of war. They also had the same religion as the rest of the country. We already knew that the modern "aristocracy" of the globalist elites has no responsibilities toward the rest of us, but, thanks to WikiLeaks, we have now learned that they don't even share the same religion.

WikiLeaks revealed that Hillary Clinton and her campaign manager are close friends with Marina Abramovic, a Serbian artist who performs occult rituals she calls "spirit cooking." Spirit cooking appears to be set of magical rituals that use bodily fluids such as menstrual blood, urine, and semen to achieve certain goals, usually sex-related. It also involves at least minor sacrifices: one "recipe" calls for cutting one's figure and "eat[ing] the pain."

While spirit cooking is certainly grotesque, it is not my intention to focus on it except to point out that it has become a sort of initiation ritual into the US globalist elite. Hillary Clinton, John Podesta, Jay-Z and Beyonce, Lady Gaga, and Gwen Stefani have all attended these rituals and I would not be surprised to learn that many other politicians, CEOs, and bankers also participate. Getting invited to one of these spirit cooking sessions means that you have gained entry into the wealthy elite in the US. There are probably similar groups or rituals for the modern day European elites.

There are several things at work here. Most of the spirit cooking participants probably don't believe in the efficacy of the spirit cooking ritual. It is more like a college fraternity initiation. It only means something in terms of one's social standing. Also, the satanic imagery of spirit cooking and its sexual overtones are big middle fingers to Christianity which our elite regard as the religion of the unwashed masses.

In both of these ways, our modern "elite" have separated themselves from the rest of us. They don't share the same destiny as us. If the country starts going to hell, the wealthy elite can just pick up and move to another country or they can live in small, heavily guarded compounds, untouched by the damage their policies have caused. And they even lack a common morality with us. In their own eyes, their wealth has somehow put them beyond the traditional moral code that guides the rest of us.

The fact that the elites have no regard for the rest of the country does not bode well for them. The aristocracy of old knew that their fortune was bound up with that of their countrymen. The modern elite lack this wisdom. Once enough of the hoi polloi realize it, it is only a matter of time before these pseudo-elites are deposed from their pedestal.

Conclusion

With Trump's election, the problem of federal government being used for political purposes will be mitigated. However, the problems with our indulgent pseudo-elite will continue to be a force that prevents the patriarchy from returning. In any case, we can be grateful that the election of 2016 has exposed some of the cancers that are eating away at our society.

Why So-Called Intellectuals Do More Harm Than Good To Society

November 11, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The existence of intellectuals is more ubiquitous today than ever. Many are those who contend for public attention, credibility, and money as a reward for their wits, not to mention the very status of intellectual. Yet the existence of such people is far from self-evident. For centuries, traditional societies barely had anything or anybody that looked like modern intellectuals, and this did not prevent them from lasting hundreds or even thousands of years.

So, as we elaborate projects and ideas for reforming the depraved societies of the Empire of Nothing—a necessary step if we want a lasting victory—an important question must be confronted: do we need at all what has been called "intellectuals" during last centuries? And if we do not, what should we have instead?

The origin of modern intellectuals

At the heart of modernity lies a deep crisis. Before it, Western Europe was united by the same Christian faith and a basic agreement on the place of economy—subordinated to guilds and the rights of the average producer.

When modernity reared its philosophical head through René Descartes, a prominent thinker of the seventeenth century, the Old Continent was in a much more problematic state: Christianity had splintered into various opposing faiths whose intellectual opposition was shaking everything to the core. We have been told that the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were a glorious new flourishing of intelligence. But, in fact, thinkers who actually lived at this time had quite a different impression.

The Irish bishop George Berkeley (1685-1753) criticized how the practice of philosophy had become, on his age, synonymous with getting embroiled into "thousand scruples… prejudices and errors of sense," a situation he attributed to "the wrong use we make of our faculties." Likewise, the Scottish philosopher David Hume (1711-1776) scolded his contemporaries for being too eager to criticize the "systems" of others for the sake of pushing their own on the scene, that is, a mutual hypercriticism that led to a general lack of certitude about everything:

> There is nothing which is not the subject of debate, and in which men of learning are not of contrary opinions. The most trivial question escapes not our controversy, and in the most momentous we are not able to give any certain decision. Disputes are multiplied, as if everything was uncertain; and these disputes are managed with the greatest warmth, as if everything was certain. Amidst all this bustle it is not reason, which carries the prize, but eloquence… From hence in my opinion arises that common prejudice against metaphysical reasonings of all kinds.

The first precursors were honest in their endeavour to solve the crisis. Descartes, Berkeley, Hume and many others genuinely sought a grand encompassing theory that could resume with all controversies. But soon the very controversy became an institution. A whole market of ideas was growing, in which more and more lettrés started to see an opportunity to make a name, thus earning fame, social standing and sometimes money. Hume could not help himself: soon after criticizing those who fed the crisis by attacking the others' "systems" while promoting their own, he was doing the same.

Such was the so-called Enlightenment: the further undermining of any spiritual, philosophical or cultural unity by ambitious individuals ready to hustle for notoriety. They would be experts at flattering the powerful, mocking the Catholic church, fiddle fashionable themes and "witty" prose, and more than everything else rationalizing their activity as a "progress." The very expression "Enlightenment" stems from their willingness to market themselves to the posterity.

The intellectuals' bread and butter

It can be noted that, from the amateur gentlemen of the eighteenth century, generations of scientists have sprang up. Some of these characters were mathematicians, engineers, doctors, or dedicated observers of nature, and they all contributed to improving general human power over matter. But make no mistake: even science needs problems and unknown stuff to justify careers and research, thus following a headlong rush dynamic. At its side, the literary intellectuals need more problems so they can have the opportunity to sell themselves through claiming they want to solve them.

The momentous crisis turned into a crisis structure and the structure turned into a mark of the modern West. Where God ceased to speak, the modern talking head took more and more territory and wrote dozens of books trying to prove he was the embodiment of progress. It doesn't matter if problems are genuine or artificial. Intellectuals need them like a blacksmith needs iron.

Two typical intellectual characters are Voltaire and Émile Zola. Both were gifted writers, both were charming and witty, both managed to write about matters that were actually relevant to their times, and both have used a trial with political overtones to make a show of themselves. (Not so incidentally, both were French and participated to the furthering of a twisted literary chauvinism.)

Voltaire took advantage of various trials to claim that the defendants were accused because they were Protestants inside a Catholic country. The infamous affaire Calas, from the name of a father who was accused of having murdered his own son, was used by the shrewd philosophe to sending pathetic letters to the upper crust of the society, stirring the public opinion, pressuring magistrates, until the father—who had been convicted and executed after a thorough investigation—was rehabilitated. Two centuries and a half later, young Frenchmen are still taught Voltaire was a champion of truth, justice, and reason, whereas he was more like a playwright who peddled influence.

Zola, more than a century later, did the same. A Jewish-French captain, Alfred Dreyfus, was convicted for high treason after he allegedly communicated secret documents to Prussia. Years later, some new evidence seemed to indicate that Dreyfus was innocent and that another officer had leaked the documents: at this very moment, Zola published an incendiary article, J'accuse, where he spat on the judges and cried about the injustice of the affaire. Eventually, Dreyfus was rehabilitated—and the army, the patriots and the Catholics were shamed through a never-ending media discourse that casted them as villains of the whole story.

Voltaire and Zola played the same role in a narrative of the exact same kind. We are taught about a situation of injustice, where the majority of the population is oppressing an innocent group through an innocent individual and crooked institutions. Fortunately, a heroic talking head rises, miraculously converts the opinion to recognize the poor innocent victim as such, the talking head is crowned as an awesome thinker beyond boundaries whereas some are fairly vilified as “oppressors,” and the poor victim’s rehabilitation is also the victory of reason, justice, and progress.

Thus, the intellectuel in the most typical sense is a highly paradoxical creature who becomes taught in classes after having seemingly rebelled against dominant institutions. Teenagers are led to think that heroic and highly intelligent individuals can turn the tide of unfavourable opinion… provided they follow a mysterious sense of history. There have been a lot more intellectuals than the mere classics, and often those rejected by the official narrative are more interesting than those inside.

Who’s gonna pay?

Even if you are gifted with words and language, being a talking head does not pay much. Would anyone be ready to pay you for giving an opinion, no matter how elaborate, on anything? The problem of money is a good starting point to connect the dots: Voltaire was close from wealthy Protestants bankers, one of whom even helped him to obtain a house in Geneva, and Zola was a Rotschild protégé. Both of them contributed to tarnish Catholicism and most of their own people. In other words, they served interests that could pay them—they were sellouts.

Today, some bloggers happen to earn money as independents, especially when they found themselves a niche. Yet independence is scarce. Way too many people would like to live from their wits, and, even more, obtain recognition as intellectuals. More than often, intellectual types turn into teachers, journalists, or even marketers—thus depending upon an institution that pays them.

In North America, the war against whites and masculinity is massively subsidized, whether in the academic or in the media. You won't easily find a job there if you take a critical stance on cultural Marxism. And in case you wouldn't be self-hating enough, they are already replacing you with "minority" individuals who are rewarded for spewing wordy venom daily.

Old Marxism was well-aligned with the interests of intellectuals as a class, not as individuals. It handed them an official status and flattered their ego by casting them as the vanguard of "progress." Keynesianism triumphed for the exact same reason as it justified the creation of a bloated State where model-obsessed nerds enjoy a tremendous power over those who produce actual wealth. Intellectual types historically joined the left because it gave them a status, money, and moral recognition.

But the whole Marxist vocabulary of "progress" and "emancipation" dissimulated what seems glaring today. Namely, that intellectuals were recognized and paid, not because they were enlightened or bright, but because they were an efficient tool of destruction.

The conservative right has often lacked a milieu for intellectual types. The average conservative was reluctant to pay someone he saw as a parasite. Such a lack pushed a number of high IQs to the arms of the left, who made an establishment out of them and paid them to enforce globalism, anti-whiteness, anti-masculinity, pathological altruism, transgender madness, "politically correct" repression and so on. Intellectuals were never paid to say the truth: they were paid as tools who performed a primarily destructive social function.

If we happen to beat cultural Marxism, what shall we do with intellectual types? If we are to dismantle globalism and build healthier societies, we have to think about what we will replace the bobo-leftist establishment. The intellectual mediocrity and spinelessness of the average conservative is no solution. A truly traditional society would likely have initiates, something akin to high priests and knights, in lieu of vacuous and coward talkers. How exactly we go there or how exactly this could look today is another question.

Conclusion

The French essayist Alain Soral once famously said, "a journalist is either a whore or without a job." This is even truer for most intellectuals, sold as they are to a destructive left or (more seldomly) to the inefficient right.

Culture is overrated. What the mainstream refers to under that name is a giant matrix, full of lies, taboos, and the snobbery of talking heads who end up lying to everyone or believing into their own bullshit. No wonder why the shrewd Robert Greene advised to be an "intense realist": one must cultivate inner intuition and situational awareness not to fall prey to some of the claptrap that constitutes at least eighty per cent of current mainstream “culture.”

The previous generations could join the cultural Marxist establishment and pretend their destructive, ego-laden works were progress. To our generation, this is impossible. Either we stand up for our very existence, even if we must go against more than two centuries of manipulations and lies, or we resign ourselves to an ignominious death. Before we take the power back, a shared awareness must be stimulated, and this is where we enter in direct conflict with the well-funded anti-white, anti-masculine establishment types, whom we must beat on their own field once and for all.

Bonus: 6 quotes about the intellectuels

> Some of the problems that modern philosophical thinking puts forward appear void of any importance and meaning. [Modern philosophy] features a range of issues that merely stem from an equivocal stance and the confusion of different viewpoints. These issues only exist because they are poorly framed. They have no fundamental reason to exist. In many cases, defining their statements more precisely may be enough to make them disappear, plain and simple, if [modern] philosophy did not strive to maintain them, because it makes a living out of ambiguity.
> — René Guénon, Introduction to the study of the Hindu doctrines, chap.8.

René Guénon (young)

> Philosophers care much more about putting forth problems, no matter how artificial and illusory, than about solving them… They also strive to link their name to a ‘system,’ that is, to a strictly bounded set of theories they would own and consider as nothing more than their own work. Hence the desire to be original at any price, even if the truth must be sacrificed on the altar of said originality. A philosopher who cares about his repute does better by making up a > new mistake than by repeating some truth that has already been expressed by others.

> —René Guénon, The Crisis of the Modern World, chap.5.

René Guénon (older)

> The most evident feature of [modern] critique is the lack of principles and of authenticity. Its greater preoccupation consists in being brilliant, in appearing original… From the point of view of those who embody this 'intellectuality,' the catchy line, the dialectical or polemical posturing well noticed by others, have a much greater value than truth. Ideas, when they use them, are nothing but a pretext. What matters is to look intelligent—just as, to the mainstream politician, the ideology of a party is essentially a means for career. The 'vanity fair,' the most deleterious subjectivism, often verging on pure and unmitigated narcissism, are essential components of this phenomenon… The 'critique' is a scourge of modern culture, an epidemic that was born out of bourgeois society concomitantly with the commodification of culture… In normal, traditional civilizations, one could find creators, artists, and those who would judge the works without intermediaries: the sovereigns, the patrons, and the people. Our times have witnessed the appearance, between the public and the creators, of that cultural pimp, that cheeky and presumptuous parasite we call a 'critique.'
> — Julius Evola, The Bow and the Club

Baron Giulio Cesare Evola

> Show me more venal, more insensitive, more corrupt minds than those of the literate caste! How many of them do you know whose virtue would still be uncorrupted? Who, but them, for over thirty years, kept flooding us with a loosened morale, a disdain for work, a disgust of duty, a disrespect for family, who but the literary? Who dipped into secret funds more shamelessly than they did? Who seduced women, softened the young, excited the nation to more debauchery than they did? Who did abandon cowardly the princes after begging for their favours…? So-called men of letters, always! They run like harlots between the legitimate government and usurpers, between monarchy and republic, between politics and socialism, between atheism and religion. Everything is good to them as long as they can make a profit and be fashionable out of it.
> — Pierre-Joseph Proudhon (quoted by the following one)

Pierre-Joseph Proudon

> Compare, for example, seventeenth century writers with those of the eighteenth. What a difference in tone and gait! The former, under a veneer of servility, have the most noble and proud stance… They do not pretend to reign. They merely stand at their place, recognize the place of a superior power beyond, give themselves completely to their writing task, dismiss the temptation of advertising and demonstrate their professional dedication. On the other hand, look at the Voltaire, Diderot and the like: they open well the era of intellectuals, writing stooges as they are, courtiers of princes they flatter and despise at the same time—something they are forced to do as they want to usurp their power… Their courtier nature reveals in everything they do… The whole eighteenth century, both spiritual and plain on a scoundrel background, is libertine, and already pornographic: such is the start of literary mercantilism; people of letters make money out of their writings, pretend to financial independence, and they write garbage to flatter the opinion of their public.
> — Édouard Berth, Les méfaits des intellectuels (“the misdeeds of the intellectuals”), Introduction

Édouard Berth (disciple of Proudhon)

> I have had the same experience with journalists citing each other about my books without the smallest effort to go to my writings—my experience is that most journalists, professional academics, and other in similar phony professions don't read original sources, but each other, largely because they need to figure out the consensus before making a pronouncement.
> — Nassim Taleb, Antifragile, chap.23.

What Donald Trump’s Victory Means For Men

November 11, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The celebrations have ended and we’ve all come to absorb the fact that Donald Trump is our next President, an outcome that many of us have aggressively worked for in the past several months. Now that we’ve gotten what we wanted, it’s time to describe exactly how a Trump presidency will improve our standing.

If the President can say it then you can say it

The biggest effect we’ll see is the death of political correctness. We now have a shitlord for President who has insulted ugly women as “fat pigs,” and whose private macho talk, which all masculine men have done, was relentlessly attacked by the press but not punished in the voter booth. This means that when you talk like Trump, the first thought your listener will have is, “He sounds like the President of the United States.”

What excuse will they now have for limiting your speech if one man was able to gain the highest office in the land because of it? Either Trump was elected because voters liked a person who makes those kinds of statements or they didn’t care enough that he made them. Whichever explanation you accept means that the will of the American people has stated that you can exercise your free speech, your opinions, and your desire to flirt with attractive women without having to obey a speech police force that evaluates everything you do based on how offensive it is to a kaleidoscope of races and loony identities. You can begin removing your politically correct filter.

I’m in a state of exuberance that we now have a President who rates women on a 1-10 scale in the same way that we do and evaluates women by their appearance and feminine attitude. We may have to institute a new feature called “Would Trump bang?” to signify the importance of feminine beauty ideals that cultivate effort and class above sloth and vulgarity. Simply look at his wife and the beautiful women he has surrounded himself with to remind yourself of what men everywhere prefer, and not the “beauty at every size” sewage that has been pushed down our throats by gender studies professors and corporations trying to market their product to feminist fatsoes. The President of the United States does not see the value in fat women who don’t take care of themselves, and neither should you.

Liberals will be forced to tolerate us in a way they didn’t have to before

There are so many of us that we can ease out of the closet and not be afraid of persecution like before. What are they going to do, fire everyone who supports Trump? Accuse every man who voted for him of rape? The way the establishment has been able to marginalize us is to corner men individually and apply intense pressure, but now we have natural allies in all men who back Trump, even if they don't subscribe to our particular interpretation of masculinity.

Liberals will not be able to point and shriek to get you to withdraw like before. They will not have easy victories by using labels like "racist" or "sexist." They will have to endure us in their midst and bite their lip when we offend their degenerate ideals, knowing that the price of attacking us is becoming too costly. It may be as simple as whipping out your MAGA hat, as if it's a bat signal, and having fellow Trump supporters come to your aid. I know that if I see a Trump supporter in trouble, I will help him, regardless of his race or station. Liberals will be forced to share space with those whom they hate, instead of trying to exile them like in the past.

It will be easier to find a fellow traveler

Men who hold our beliefs have long ago learned that we can't go around sharing them in public to those who are not vetted. If you're like me, you first "test" a new man you meet with a masculine comment to see how he responds, such as remarking on the attractiveness of a woman or how you've heard of a community online that trolls liberals without mercy. We've even had to devise a special "pet shop" code to know if a man is aware of the teachings that are found on ROK or the forum. We now have a easier shortcut in Trump.

If a man tells you that he voted for Trump, it's safe to say that he is favorable to strong borders, nationalism, masculinity, and beautiful women. On a basic level, you will be able to get along with this man and build a bond. It also works the other way around where you bring up Trump to screen out those who are offended by him. It's fine if someone is politically indifferent, but if a man opposes Trump then I have to anticipate him attacking or sabotaging me in the future. I will distance myself from him for my own well-being.

The cultural decline will halt

We now have a President who will not encourage anti-male propaganda, rape culture, and female victimhood. While I do have minor concerns on the influence of his feminist-minded daughter, Ivanka, Trump will not continue the attack on men that has been institutionalized since the sexual revolution and accelerated during the eight years of Obama. Because our current cultural dystopia is the result of intense long-term manipulation, it is more than enough for Trump to simply not touch the gender issue to allow the culture to return to a more patriarchal order. Stop feeding the rot and it will die off, allowing biology to naturally reassert itself.

We've experienced so many changes in the past decade that we haven't had a chance to understand what's going on and adapt. Instead, we've been reacting from one blow to the next, whether it's the loss of our jobs through witch hunts or the rape culture horror that has turned a banal consensual hookup into possible incarceration. Trump's victory gives us room to begin pushing back against the fictions that have put men in harm's way.

Conclusion

Paradoxically, the benefits of a Trump presidency will not involve specific actions from Trump. His presence automatically legitimizes masculine behaviors that were previously labeled sexist and misogynist. While we may still get heat for them, it will be less severe and we'll be less likely to sustain serious damage. Liberals will have no choice but to silently stew on our words and we can more effortlessly connect with men not only for male bonding but also to push back against a demoralized and fractured left. Victories will be far easier to achieve under Trump than Obama.

This is our moment. The door is opening for a renaissance of masculinity where men can take pride in being men, and the best part of it is that we don't need to wait for Trump to do anything. His victory is more than enough for us to apply our own individual strength in seizing the bull's horns where we can come out of the politically incorrect closet and assert our beliefs and behaviors. It would be icing on the cake if Trump rolled back anti-masculine laws and policies, but it's not required, because the power to change ourselves and our country is within our hands. Return Of Kings opened in 2012, and the only surprise for me is how quickly the name is being fulfilled.

Two More Hollywood Films For Men That Leave Today's SJW Movies In The Dust

November 11, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Today we are going to take a quick look at two epic Clint Eastwood films, one of which is a well-known, Western classic (The Outlaw Josey Wales). The other one is a little-known, under-the-radar gem, which showcases the psychotic insanity of the deranged Western female (Play Misty for Me).

Both of these superb RPO films will leave any red-pill male feeling wholly satisfied, shortly after viewing them, and, well, that's what these movie reviews of your old Uncle Bob's are all about, are they not…helping you find the bona fide gold nuggets amid the endlessly steaming piles of SJW Hollywood crap? Yes indeed.

So let's get crackin'.

1. The Outlaw Josey Wales (1976 – Clint Eastwood, Chief Dan George, Bill McKinney, John Vernon)

Clint Eastwood directed and starred in this sweeping, extremely well-crafted, post-Civil War epic film, and the cinematography and direction are undeniably excellent. But Eastwood's portrayal of the Southern-sympathizer, Josey Wales, who has a major score to settle after Union troops burn his house down and murder his wife and children, is in itself a major cinematic achievement.

Out for blood and taking no prisoners, Eastwood's merciless Josey Wales thunders across the plains and prairies of the American West, blowing scores of Northern soldiers away in the process, as he makes a desperate dash towards Mexico, and what he hopes will be sanctuary. But Wales gets sidetracked along the way, collecting a stray dog and a few stray human beings as well, which proves that the only thing a man can truly count on in this life is change.

There's a great scene early on in the film, involving Josey Wales' partner in crime, Jaimie (played by Sam Bottoms), where he starts babbling incoherently, while faking a state of fever-induced delirium from underneath a blanket, as the two outlaws are confronted by a pair of backwoods yahoos who are looking to collect the bounty that has recently been placed on Wales' head.

Here, we clearly see the behavior of the typical, frightened, woefully outmanned beta male, as character actor Len Lesser (who portrays the overmatched bounty hunter Abe) starts yapping and barking in a very loud voice, while jerking around excitedly, shortly after getting the drop on Eastwood's alpha-male killing-machine.

If you're an alpha male and you're in good shape, you've undoubtedly seen similar beta-male behavior. Probably at a bar, when some paunchy beta asswit, who's sitting with his cucked crew, has had one too many beers and starts cutting you down in a passive-aggressive manner, from your periphery, as he barks and yaps in an excited voice about how tough he used to be, or how he doesn't need to lift weights to be a man, or how he doesn't think it's cool to wear tight shorts (a hostile barb born of envy, uttered because he feels his package is inadequate). Yup, you know the routine.

In the film's wow-we-almost-had-a-gangbang scene, featuring a somewhat-turned-on Sondra Locke (see above photo; Locke portrays Kansas-born settler, Laura Lee), as she's confronted in the back of a covered wagon and dragged outside by a group of lusty Comancheros, which was obviously a blatant exaggeration, because, as we already know, all rapes are committed by totally unattractive, deranged, horribly evil, light-skinned men who smell badly and have absolutely zero neck tattoos—"Ewwwww," etc.—Clint's character comes riding to the rescue out of the hills and guns the would-be rapists down, which probably made SJWs and feminists at the time scream with unbridled outrage at the theater screen, "She was giving her consent! Didn't you see it? It was in her eyes! It's her right to express herself sexually, with however many men she might choose! Murderer! Creeper! Pussy-blocker!"

Unfortunately, just like today, there were feminists and SJWs aplenty back in 1976. Their numbers have been growing with a vengeance since roughly the mid-1960s, and after more than 50 years in the saddle, they still keep going round and round in circles, yelling preprogrammed buzzwords and catch-phrases, while unknowingly speeding up the destruction of freedom of speech, but hey, Uncle Bob, tell us something we don't already know, and yeah, I'll get back to the film review now.

My favorite scene in the movie occurs when Josey Wales (who, now that I think about it, is a bit of a white knight, hmm…), rescues a Native American woman who is about to be double-teamed against her will by a pair of drunken white trappers.

Eastwood's mad-dog character ultimately gets the drop on the would-be bounty-collectors, and he blows them straight to hell in an impressive hail of gunfire, which, I'll have to admit, is pretty darned cool in itself. I mean, that's why we watch films like this, isn't it – for the violence, and the babes, and the red-pill messages? Well, there are plenty of those to be had in this no-holds-barred, epic Western film.

Maybe I'm going to have to rethink this movie in terms of it being perceived as a wholly red-pill film. Clint's character stepped up and stopped a potential gangbang, as well as a three-way, and nobody asked him to do it. So this might have been a sly, Hollywood warm-up for the series of blatant white knight films we see today, but I don't really want to think that way about Clint, so I won't. I'll just gulp down a quick blue pill right now—ah, much better.

I mean, Clint played Dirty Harry Callahan, for chrissakes, in a film that I will hopefully be reviewing at a later date, if I don't get hit by a truck driven by an illegal alien who's sporting 20 arrests for murder while having no driver's license; or lynched by a swarm of rabid SJWs who are on the hunt for any white male who isn't a media CEO or a billionaire.

The film bogs down a bit after about the two-thirds mark, in my opinion, but it still gets high marks across the board in every other critical category. If you haven't seen it, rectify that soon. You can't miss by watching this top-drawer, RPO film for men.

2. Play Misty for Me (1971 – Clint Eastwood, Jessica Walter, Donna Mills)

Unless they are over-the-top, laughingly ridiculous, obviously fictional slasher films, red-pill movies like this one just don't get made in Hollywood any longer.

When you think of Clint Eastwood, you usually think of Dirty Harry, or The Outlaw Josey Wales, or Unforgiven, or Gran Torino, but Clint made a few obscure films that were both solidly red pill, and truly excellent movies, although they've been swept under the rug and locked away in the film vaults by today's liberal-leaning film-hiders.

In this well-directed, highly suspenseful thriller, Carmel-by-the-sea disk jockey, Dave Carver (Clint Eastwood) lives a freewheeling, alpha male lifestyle, regularly banging out an assortment of hot women who listen to his live jazz broadcasts on a nightly basis. Carver is living the dream, pounding most of the available hot babes, and thoroughly enjoying his rightfully appointed alpha male privilege (or is that white male privilege?…er…SJW moment there, sorry).

That is, until Jessica Walter's psycho-stalker character, Evelyn, walks into his life.

Now, you may have encountered a few of these yourself. Or maybe it's just me. Sometimes I think I have an invisible sign on my forehead that only the initiated can read, which proclaims, "If you're hot and insane—I'm your guy." But Clint Eastwood shows us exactly what it's like to be pursed by an attractive, psycho, female stalker. From writing creepy notes to him in lipstick on his mirror, to cutting up his clothing, to attacking his cleaning lady in a fit of jealous rage, Clint's disk-jockey character quickly begins to realize that he bit off a hell of a lot more than just pussy when he started banging actress Jessica Walter's batshit-crazy Evelyn.

I've always had a feeling that actresses who were really good in these psycho roles, were just being themselves. But I could be wrong about that. (I was wrong once before—it was in the third grade and she didn't really love me.) Be that as it may, Jessica Walters really brings her A-game in the role of the totally unhinged Evelyn. If you've ever had a relationship with a woman like this one, watching the film will send chills down your spine, and result in some serious flashback imagery.

(Have you ever done this—what Clint is doing in the above photo—namely, hold and comfort a crazy woman who somehow managed to weasel her way into your life, by skillfully turning you into both an enabler and a caretaker…if so, I definitely feel your pain. And I'll bet Clint has experienced it a time or three himself, or he probably wouldn't have done this film.)

Play Misty for Me is absolutely worth watching for myriad reasons; but the most important reason of all, I wholeheartedly believe, is because it will clearly demonstrate to you, in no uncertain terms, the subtle and overt signs that a man absolutely has to be able to recognize, in order to avoid being blindsided by a psychotic, unhinged female. And for that reason alone, it's a must-see classic, no doubt about it; when Clint's character ultimately gets revenge on his tormentor, at the very end of this excellent RPO film, you'll feel all warm and fuzzy inside, too—and in a weird, viscerally satisfying way—which makes the whole experience just that much more gratifying.

By boycotting all modern SJW Hollywood cinema, you are sending a message to the power structure that is loud and clear—you are not being fooled by their deliberate attempts to poison people's minds and socially engineer them to be pussified, dumbed-down, blue-pill-sucking robots.

Always research the plot lines of any films for which you are seriously considering buying a ticket, or renting on DVD. And if you smell an SJW rat, don't spend your money. It's that simple. In the end, it's just like investigating a potential LTR candidate. You have to conduct your due diligence. Otherwise, you might just get taken for a ride.

What The Trump Skeptics Got Wrong

November 12, 2016 | by FitzRoy Sommerset | Link | Original Link

There have been few true upsets in our history: Caesar crossing the Rubicon, Wellington's victories at Assaye and Waterloo, and Washington's victory at Yorktown over the most professional army in the world. It is often said that when General Charles O'Hara (who had the dubious distinction of surrendering to both George Washington and Napoleon Bonaparte) surrendered Cornwallis's sword, the band played "The World Turned Upside Down."

Today, the establishment and the intellectuals cannot help but share a similar sentiment as Cornwallis or O'Hara did at Yorktown. And I fully admit: In spite of my vote for Trump, I fully expected him to lose. The polls, his 60% negative approval rating, and the sheer forces of the media, the FBI and even some Republicans were arrayed against him.

My skepticism of Trump was not his ideas, but his chances of winning the election. Myself, and other conservative intellectual skeptics who voted for him, were wrong.

I am one of the intellectuals who expected a Trump defeat. I've been studying politics, history and economics for years, reading countless books on the matter from The Prince to Freakonomics to The Wealth of Nations.

And I was wrong. It was a Canadian housewife and an Iranian pickup artist who called it correctly for Trump. Trump beat the odds, he beat the intellectuals, and made the establishment "babies in the hands of a giant" as was said after Napoleon's resounding victory at Austerlitz in 1806.

The left is currently in panic-mode in an attempt to explain how they lost. They are calling Trump supporters racist, sexists, homophobic and even sex offenders! But in the end, it was this same blindness that made them psychologically incapable of defeating Donald Trump.

Trump was immune to almost all conventional political weapons.

Trump won because of the following

1. The left seemed far more interested in calling Trump and his supporters racist than saying something of substance.

2. Outlets such as the New York Times did blatantly stupid crap like try to blame the NRA for the Orlando Shootings, and even tried to call them terrorists. In this, they beat even Trump in outrageousness: they thought the American people were stupid, so they just lied to them and said "fuck it, those peasants will believe anything we write."

3. All Trump had to do was call them on their bullshit, and call them liars. And he was 100% right: the MSM has lied to the American people this entire election cycle. Subsequent to every terrorist attack perpetrated by a Muslim, the MSM continued to push the narrative that "home grown right-wing terrorism is the real problem." Trump called them on their lies, and the American people, who are tired of being lied to by the MSM, cheered him on, even if he had a few issues with the truth himself.

4. The Democrats ran the absolute worst candidate possible. Hillary Clinton had negative approval ratings that rivaled Trump's own. And she was bland. And she couldn't decide if she was a moderate or a firebrand progressive. And she is corrupt, and lied about it, stupidly thinking the American people were too ignorant to understand that putting classified information on a private email server is a recklessly irresponsible thing to do.

5. Trump knew how to communicate with people. He knew that whites without a college degree were tired of being talked down to by progressives on the left and genuine intellectuals on the right (like myself). I freely admit I am guilty of this: when you study two thousand years of philosophy, economics and rhetoric (Cicero was particularly effective), it is sometimes frustrating when people don't approach a situation in terms of axioms and proofs. The working class that built America go by what they feel in their gut, and often times, they are right.

All in all, the left failed because they failed to understand America. They bought into the idea that "Americans are stupid…haha!" Americans are not stupid: they may not be smart, but they sure as hell know when a liberal taking head is lying to them about now the NRA is basically the Taliban in an obviously biased hit piece.

Hillary took working class Americans for granted, and she lost. This should stand as a parallel for black Americans whom the Democrats also take for granted.

I am pleased that Donald Trump is now President-Elect. He wasn't just a candidate, he was the anti-candidate. He did everything a politician should not do. He used vulgar language. He talked freely about his ideas. He made no pretense about being polite to those who are destroying America. He turned weaknesses (such as his spotty track record) into strengths that would have ended any other candidate's campaign. He was the un-candidate America needed.

I have high hopes for Trump's presidency. In spite of my tepid support, I see Trump as a President who can do a lot of good, and has the potential to do more good than any President of recent memory.

First, Trump spat in the face of PC culture and won. Just as Scott Walker took on the Unions in Wisconsin and cucked them by winning the recall election by getting more votes than he did in the previous election, Trump defeated the SJW's. If Trump can keep this up, we can achieve a major strategic victory in the war against political correctness, and get back to a concept called "actually being correct."

Secondly, Trump is an unapologetic nationalist. He loves America, and doesn't give a damn if you think Howard Zinn's A People's History of the United States is a great book. The Department of Cultural Guilt that has infected schools in America teaches children to hate their own country. I look forward to seeing Trump abolish the practice of teaching children that the Founding Fathers were evil racists, the British Empire did nothing good for the world, and that America is the greatest evil the world has ever seen.

Lastly, Trump is the antithesis of everything the Social Justice Warriors stand for: a successful alpha male who tells people to go fuck themselves and still gets elected. I hope to see a rise in masculinity in America: studies have shown that testosterone levels are down among the American male population. This should rise under Trump, as men embrace their masculinity instead of hiding it for fear of being accused of sexual assault.

I was a Trump skeptic. I underestimated him. I didn't disagree with him on much (perhaps maybe 20% of his platform), but I had little faith he could pull it off. And I was vocal about my concerns regarding his elect-ability. But like the liberals, I was wrong. And a Canadian housewife and a former pickup-artist-turned-conservative-philosopher were 100% right.

I recall something I told a fellow soldier while on a long, boring convoy operation in Iraq: "When a genius says something, others say 'wow, that is way above my head.' But when a true genius says something, others say 'wow, why didn't I think of that before?!" Trump is a true genius: he stated the obvious to the American people and made them believe he wanted to Make America Great Again (and I think he genuinely does). He didn't use fancy graphs or focus groups: he spoke the truth, without political correctness.

And now he is President-Elect.

Why It’s Absolutely Worth It To Learn Game

November 12, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

After my previous article, which advocated that men learn game as a form of self-development, I got a good amount of disagreement—most of it was not inaccurate. The majority of ROK readers are becoming less and less interested in learning game, simply because Western women are not as attractive as they once were.

This isn’t to say that we’ve abandoned learning game as a whole; certainly we still want to get laid and eventually find a girl for a relationship. But, nonetheless, there seems to be a large portion of the manosphere which simply doesn’t believe that game is worth it anymore.

In this article, I would like to present a very realistic and objective perspective in regards to learning game. In retrospect, my last article may have been too focused on the positive aspects; I do not wear the rose colored glasses in regards to the game. In fact, it’s quite the opposite.

As a veteran myself, I’m quite aware of the troubles that men can encounter when learning game. I’ve been slapped for making mildly offensive jokes, I’ve had drinks thrown on me, I’ve had guys threaten to slit my throat, and more. Despite this, however, I still believe that it is 100% worth it to learn game.

Beginner’s Hell

"HOW DARE YOU TRY TO ASK ME MY NAME YOU FUCKING RAPIST!"

I believe that the reason why most men don't feel that game is worth it, is because they experience difficulty getting over a period known as "beginner's hell." This is when you're just starting to shrug off your feminist conditioning, and you haven't developed the confidence or game that you need to succeed.

Most beginners walk around, not really knowing how to talk to women, how to carry themselves, or how to flirt in general. Because of this, women will typically have one of two responses:

- They pity you and ignore you
- They lash out and berate you for being a "creep," or "weird."

Of course, you may get the occasional girl who's drunk enough to be into you, but these are few and far between. For the most part, the "Beginner's Hell," phase of learning game is absolutely horrendous.

You will be sometimes be targeted by club douchebags, who will either confront you or use their superior social intelligence to embarrass you, and on the rare occasion that you do manage to get a girl talking to you, he'll come over and steal her. You will have women smack you, ignore you, and tell you off—again, it's called "beginner's hell," for a reason.

6's Who Think They're 10's

This initial difficulty in learning game is only compounded by our culture's general lack of femininity. It is extremely obvious, to anyone with eyes to see, that women in our culture are encouraged to be less and less feminine as time goes on. The once praised virtues of nurturing, empathy, and kindness, have now been replaced by resting bitch face, sociopathy, and social climbing.

This coupled with the fact that women experience an endless supply of beta orbiters, means that they've been conditioned to believe they're highly sought after goddesses, who can use men like tissues without any sort of social repercussions (and in fact, they're sometimes praised for doing so).

This is, perhaps, one of the biggest obstacles to newbies struggling to learn game. Couple this with severe approach anxiety, a complete lack of masculinity, and a weak body that hasn't been trained, and it's very easy to see why most men don't see that game is worth it.

The Turning Point

Once one gets beyond this initial bump, however, most of game is smooth sailing. Once the newbie has learned how to fix his lack of masculinity, how to balance assertiveness with consent, and has improved his game in general, he enters what I call the turning point.

The turning point is essentially that point at which learning game is no longer a struggle, but it's actually enjoyable. This is due to several key lifestyle and mindset shifts which take place as the newbie gets more and more success, such as:

- Drawing state from within, rather than from without
- Being in a state of abundance, rather than scarcity
- Improving other areas of your life, which creates an upwards spiral

If you're a newbie struggling to learn game, and you don't feel like it's worth it, I fully empathize with your pain—the problem is that when you don't have much game, of course learning game will be hard, because you get stuck with the bitchy fat girls.

When you start to develop the three characteristics that I mentioned, however, a cascade of effects starts to take place that catapults your game to the next level. This allows you to pick and choose which hot girls you want, rather than being at the mercy of the ugly 5 who "might" want to come over and hang out.

Internal vs. External Drawing Of State

"By my age, you realize that bitches ain't shit, but hoes and tricks."

The transition from drawing state from outside of you, to drawing state from within you, is literally the difference between a guy that doesn't pull at all, and a guy that can pull Victoria's Secret models.

Let me explain: women typically draw state from without. This means that their emotions are governed by their environment. This is why they respond so much more to social pressure than men, why they "just want to dance," when a song they like comes on, and it’s why they’re generally so emotionally volatile.

Due to their changing environments, their emotions change rapidly as well. This is why they want men to draw state from within, or in other words, not be affected by their outside environments. This is why women are repulsed by men who care too much about their opinions: it’s indicative of a man who draws state from without.

As a man, drawing state from within has numerous benefits, the most obvious of which being that you’re perpetually in a good mood. Once you learn to make this shift, and learn to be happy regardless of your external circumstances, women will pick up on it like a hawk—they’re very attuned to this type of thing, and you’ll definitely notice a difference in their behavior.

This will get them vying for YOUR attention, which will start to give you tremendous power. This will make game fun, which will lead to even more women in your life, which will begin the start of your upward spiral.

The Beginning Of The Upward Spiral

Once you begin to make this simple mindset shift, game will no longer feel like it’s not worth it. You see, game feels like it’s not worth it when you have to put in a huge amount of effort for a below average looking girl, with a horrible personality. But, when you start to get to the point where you can put in a medium amount of effort, for a very gorgeous woman? That’s when game starts to be fun.

This basic mindset shift of learning to not care what your environment is like, and to simply be happy by yourself, will create a chain reaction within your life. First, you’ll start to get much more women much more easily. This will allow you to start a harem, which will keep you in a perpetual state of abundance until you find a girl you want for a relationship.

This state of abundance will amplify your game by about five fold. Women will sense that you’ve got a ton of other women vying for your attention, and they will do the same—it’s like a magnet that just draws them in. Plus, if a girl does or says something that you dislike, you can simply kick her out of your life since you have so many other women.

Then, when you start to have so many women in your life, you'll start to friend zone hot girls for the social benefits, because you simply can't handle sleeping with all of them. They'll invite you to parties, and try to hook you up with their friends, and you'll receive many of the social benefits that they do.

Game Is Worth It (It Just Sucks At First)

Getting over beginner's hell is a lot like this. Once you get to the other side, it's all downhill, though.

As I have made clear, learning game at first is a huge struggle—you will encounter massive cock blocks, a lot of negativity from women, and not to mention you'll have to deal with all of the white knights, too. But, if you can learn to get over this initial Beginner's Hell, as I've coined it, you will see the other side of reality that most men are shielded from.

I realize that it can be very difficult to learn game at first, and can feel like it isn't worth it, but if you make a decision to put in the effort and learn it, your world will literally be 1000x better than before. If you're struggling with learning game initially, be sure to maximize your appearance.

Get some height increasing soles, read through some of the style articles on ROK, get a good designer haircut, and learn to perfect your appearance, at least as much as you can. Consider taking some martial arts classes to boost your confidence, as well.

Ultimately, however, if you want to learn game and experience what it's like to have dozens of hot girls hitting you up, you just have to bite the bullet and go out. Go clubbing, go to bars, go on trips to Las Vegas or Miami. Approach women during the day and approach them during the night—eventually you'll get over this "Beginner's Hell," and will experience an abundance of women in your life.

Buzz Aldrin Is A Warning Of How Success Can Lead To Depression

November 13, 2016 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Buzz Aldrin and Neil Armstrong are household names because they were the first men to land on the moon. And while Neil is perhaps the more-remembered of the two because he was technically the "first" to land on the moon, Buzz is just as remembered because of his unique name (while I bet most of you don't know who the third guy was). But technicalities of who landed where first and who had cool names aside, Buzz Aldrin will forever be one of the world's greatest historical figures because of his unrivaled accomplishments and will die a better man than the vast majority of us.

But did you know Buzz Aldrin was an alcoholic? And after retiring he fell into a severe depression? And after his divorce his days consisted of drinking alone in his apartment, fetching KFC and booze until he entered rehab?

It's a hard fact to believe. Where a man who seems to have everything (fame, a super-accomplished career, and least of all, the titanium-strong professionalism and self-discipline to become an astronaut), yet he ends up down, depressed, drunk, and perhaps even suicidal like any other ordinary piece of trailer trash. But while it doesn't make sense at first, and you can't see how this relates to you, realize there's a VERY good and simple reason for this fall from great heights.

The Buzz Aldrin Syndrome

Understand as we use the internet to accumulate the wisdom and knowledge to rocket past our contemporaries and excel in life, a problem is festering that you are unaware of. Additionally, much like Alzheimer's, it is not prevalent today, but as humans advance more and live longer, it will become increasingly common. Therefore, we have the option to identify it today, prepare for it now, and thus avoid the pain and insanity that comes with having a problem we can't identify or we can have it devastate our lives later.

It is the Buzz Aldrin Syndrome.

The Buzz Aldrin Syndrome is where a man achieves such greatness, such accomplishments in life, that he is truly unrivaled and peerless. While exhilarating at first, perhaps even earning one fame, riches, and fortune, the success also unintentionally alienates the person from the rest of society. At the time Buzz Aldrin only had three or four other astronauts who he could REALLY talk to, confide in, and relate to. The remaining 3 billion people on the planet (at the time) were just star-struck, wide-eyed sheep. Alas, Buzz Aldrin could be surrounded by scores of fans at a party, but still be completely alone mentally.

The syndrome is also exacerbated as one's pinnacle achievements in life are likely correlated with retirement. You typically progress in your career, right up until the day you retire. However, here you leave the environment and network you've come accustomed, thrived in, and derived your entire agency from. Thus, in a very short period of time you go from the center of attention, the life of the party, the engine of the machine…to a retiree in California, drinking scotch, and eating KFC, longing for the days you could go back to the office again. Without the environment you derived all your worth and value from, you lose purpose in life, you lose mental stimulation, you lose your peers, and very likely sink into a crippling depression.

The Perfect Storm

There are seven factors that, when combined, create the perfect storm for the Buzz Aldrin Syndrome to form. And most ROK readers either have these traits are affected by them:

1. Technological Advancements

Technology has always advanced, but in this particular case it affects us in two specific ways. Making living expenses cheaper and allowing for more and easier ways to make money.

As opposed to the 1800's, most of a man's life was spent toiling in the field. He didn't have time to contemplate loftier or heavier subjects much like the purpose of life, what is man's reason for being, etc. You had to worry about the plague, tetanus, your wife dying in labor, and whether there'd be enough crops to survive the coming winter. But today, through economics, capitalism, agricultural technology, etc., a single man can basically eat for near-free at Wal-Mart or the local grocery store.

Technology has also freed us from work. Not so much from the fact we have to work, but in terms of how much time we need to spend on it in order to survive. No more than a decade ago a young man had to work 40 hours a week, 10 for a commute, and likely for an inept baby boomer boss who was never going to let you get past the cubicle plantation. Now, with the internet not only can a man give the proverbial finger to rush hour and a commute, but his boss as well, making whatever minimalistic modicum of money he needs to survive through online entrepreneurship. In short, it has never been easier to satisfy Maslow's first three and vital hierarchy of needs, freeing a man's mind to pursue his own excellence, not to mention ponder his point and purpose in being here.

2. Minimalism

It is no secret that red pill men practice, or at least pursue minimalism. We know that material things do not matter, as it is the love and friendship from our fellow man, friends, family and loved ones that matter most. You know that it would be "nice" to have that Shelby Super Snake Mustang, but you'd never trade it in for a lifetime of conversations and cigars with your best friend. Additionally, we value our freedom above all else and refuse to subjugate ourselves to becoming debt slaves by buying things we plain don't need.

Jettisoning these material desires liberates more of our finite lives from work and a commute, to once again pursue our passions, our fields, our adventures, and our lives. In simply refusing to buy a McMansion and take on a car loan, we guarantee we will live more interesting and rewarding lives than 90% of our peers.

3. Avoiding Divorce And Unwanted Children

Further saving us more time is the disproportionate number of us refusing to have children or marry (in fear of divorce). And for those of us who do marry, we are fully aware of what to look for, more or less immunizing us from divorce.

4. Knowledge of Women

To be blunt and honestly assess the good the "manosphere" and red pill community have done, we have saved the lives of MILLIONS of young men, and prevented older ones from wasting what remains of theirs. If I were to estimate it, every boy born today will save at least a decade of time that would have otherwise been wasted at nightclubs, chasing tail, dating the wrong girls, and perhaps even marrying the wrong ones.

Being a product of the 70's, I have often talked with my Gen X peers where we estimated what we could have done had we not wasted the 80's and 90's chasing women we were either never going to get, or would regret catching. We could have easily had doctorates, houses built by our own hands, much better careers, not to mention better mental health as we would have avoided all the batshit insane women we sifted through. Young men today, especially those who consume the Red Pill, will easily have a decade of time on us by simply learning from our mistakes.

5. Self-Improvement

Unless you are in the VirginTOW community, you know how important self-improvement is to a man's life. You have this one finite life on this planet, and not only is it imperative you enjoy it, but you must ensure it is a masterpiece of art in whatever endeavors you choose to excel in. This may not land you on the moon, but you will achieve greatness and excellence in some capacity or another. Music, literature, innovation, philosophy, being a good dad, something. You will not idly stand by, sitting on your ass, majoring in sociology, or collecting a welfare check as you knock up baby mama after baby momma. You will be notable and leave a positive legacy on this world.

6. Entrepreneurship or STEM

Most of you know not to major in stupid, worthless shit. You also know that for the majority of us, entrepreneurship or self-employment is the only form of employment that we can tolerate. Because of this, two things will happen in your life. One, you will save an inordinate amount of time spent trying to make a go at a career that just isn't in demand in the real world. You will work as an engineer, a programmer, a doctor, or some REAL profession/trade, which will not only pay you a handsome wage, but make your life incredibly easier. Two, at some point in time you will come up with an idea that will either cement your success in your career or outright launch a successful entrepreneurial endeavor. This will free you from your dependence on traditional employers, ensure your financial future is sound, but it will also likely lead towards you achieving your legacy in excellence.

In the veritable sea of liberal arts majors, not one of their millions will ever make anything of themselves. They will simply waste away, doubling down on masters degrees and doctorates in their hopelessly worthless fields. Worse, they will be crippled until death with student loans and inadequate compensation as they beg and vote for other people's money. They will die like most, unmentionable, irrelevant, and forgotten.

You will not.

7. A High Intelligence

To make all of this a reality you need the raw intellectual capacity to bring this to fruition. While no studies have been done, if you have the independent mindedness to be reading ROK, I'd estimate the average IQ of ROK readers to be 120. However, keep in mind while being highly intelligent is an asset, it is also a curse. Like ROK, you are on "the fringe." And because of that you are not only going to receive an inordinate amount of flak from the rest of "normie" society, but relating to the rest of it, let alone finding a healthy and rewarding social life in it, is going to prove next to impossible.

When you combine these traits and conditions, you have what is arguably the perfect environment for a great life to form. You need very little to survive because you won't waste your resources on frivolous material things in life. You also have very little liabilities or responsibilities, not only because you're a minimalist, but are likely not going to marry or have children. The lion's share of your time and energies can be dedicated towards achieving excellence and greatness in your life.

And if you've done it right, you'll be two decades ahead of your Gen X peers since you avoided worthless degrees and leap-frogged your philosophical understanding of life. You will be accomplished, you will be successful, you will have paid a fraction of the mental toll to get there, and you will indeed be an amazing man, the world's most interesting perhaps. You have reached the so called "finish line" much earlier and faster than Buzz Aldrin…

and that's when your real problems start.

You Weren't Meant to Be Here

Understand that while the goal of man was to secure unlimited food, resources, and security so that he may pursue an unlimited and happy life, the human mind has no experience being here. The entire existence of humankind has been struggle, suffering, fighting, and striving for such a life, but also 99.9999999% of the time failing. And over the course of human history the human brain has had 2 million years experience and conditioning in failure, NOT success.

This leads to an ironic and perhaps the most tragic instances in human experiences. A man finally gets what he wants. Wealth, health, success, excellence, legacy, everything. But upon attaining it he can't enjoy it because the human mind is not programmed to. He not only realizes this rare success doesn't result in happiness or a perpetual life-long glee that will see him to his grave, but there's nothing left to conquer. There's nothing left to do. The game of life is over, and like Red Dead Redemption, it gets mighty boring just riding your horse around after you conquer the game.

Worse, because of the unique characteristics required to attain this excellence any man "lucky" enough to be this successful is in one way or another ostracized from the rest of his peers. Professionally, romantically, intellectually, some way or another, to be in that .000001% you have to be a statistical freak. Alas, you get to suffer the true symptoms of The Buzz Aldrin Syndrome.

Peerlessness – While your friends are pumping out children or your colleagues are trying to get out from underneath their McMansion mortgage and impending divorce, you may be avoiding these dreaded fates, but you are also alone. No longer are these the college days where your intellectual peers in equal life-circumstances can hang out, chat, philosophize, and in numbers that seem endless. Slowly, but surely, they will get picked off like German Messerschmitts in WWII by the forces of life and you will be left alone.

Understand this has nothing to do with your pursuit of greatness or achieving excellence in life, but is outside of your control as these people fall within the bell distribution curve of averageness. They choose these lives, meaning it's not the statistical freak leaving them, but them leaving the statistical freak (no matter how loudly they claimed in college they were going to live life "differently"). And don't think that you can simply recoup your former social life by joining them by being average, putting on a sports jersey, ordering some Buffalo Wild wings, cheering on the local sportsball team. Your mind won't tolerate it.

You are peerless. Get used to it.

Boredom – Without people you get bored. No matter how intelligent you are, you are still human. And humans are indeed social creatures as they derive their entire life value from others, not things. But the paradox those suffering from the Buzz Aldrin Syndrome face is that while you would like to be social with people, the vast majority of people are either too common, too stupid, or just too boring, especially when compared to being by yourself.

Go to that same Buffalo Wild wings to hear loud, drunk, divorced SWPL men in their 40's cheer on the local swingystick team?

Or read Marcus Aurelius?

Go to a movie where Jason Bourne discovers another mole in the CIA…again…who set up his father…again….where he drives around Europe shooting the place up….again?

Or binge on some history podcasts?

I know! How about you go to a party where you'll hear the same conversations from men about the sportsball game they just saw at Buffalo Wild wings, as they lament their inability to get out from underneath their mortgage, while the wives gossip about their painfully pointless government-make-work careers while talking about how great the cake is?

Or road trip out west and do some hiking in the desert?

The larger point is not only are the VAST majority of people not intellectually stimulating enough, but good luck finding enough of them who have the freedom and finances to do anything besides hit up happy hour when wifey lets them out of the house.

And then there's…

Frustration – Being unencumbered by the daily scourge of chores, children, finances, mortgages, and commutes, your mind will be unshackled to pursue whatever intellectual pursuits it wishes to pursue. You'll solve world problems in an afternoon that politicians are taking eons to not solve. You'll come up with some and many viable business ideas, discarding most of them because you have not the time to put them all into execution. You'll see the obvious solutions to making your friends' and love ones' lives infinitely better, but they'll have the horse-blinders on so tight, they'll ignore your wisdom. Or you'll make a great scientific discovery at work, while your boss dismisses it away and threatens to fire you for having an independent thought. It is simply the real world telling you, "You don't control everything, and matter of fact, most of this world was not meant for you."

Obviously, you can see where depression, alcoholism, and ennui set in. You can see where the pursuit and successful attainment of excellence in life can lead to unintentional alienation and ostracization from the rest of society. And since society is where all humans – geniuses or not, successful or not – get their value, you can see the downside to zooming past the "finish line of life," especially at increasingly earlier ages as technology and minimalism permit it.

The solution is in part to find quality people who can be life-long friends, colleagues, peers, and comrades. Perhaps even get married if you find the right girl. And no matter what, keep yourself and your mind occupied. Hobbies, interests, pursuits, etc. Inactivity is death. But ultimately, what is going to best prepare you for what's coming is to simply know it's coming.

Nirvana and heaven are not at the other side of that finish line. An active and rewarding social life, full of close friends and loved ones are the not the reward for success. And it certainly isn't a life-long party until you die. It is a mentally-barren landscape much like the moon, a place Buzz has been to both literally and metaphorically.

Why You Should Be Doing The Twist Stretch

November 13, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

As I have repeatedly shown in my articles, I am a fan of all aspects of fitness—not just strength and developing muscular mass, but also cardiovascular endurance and flexibility as well. You likely knew this already.

You are also likely aware that I have done several articles on stretching, most recently the “relax into stretch” technique that I state can be used predominantly for lower body stretching such as the splits, which are and will likely always be considered the benchmark of hip and leg flexibility.

But what about upper body flexibility? Most people don’t focus on that, and that is just as important to train as lower body flexibility (namely for purposes of increased athletic performance, reduction of joint aches and pains, and, in some cases, increased strength). I have taught the readers some basic upper body stretches in the past, such as the chest stretch and the door frame stretch. But in my opinion, if you’re going to do any one stretch for upper body flexibility, that would have to be the seated twist stretch.

How It Works

This stretch involves crossing your legs in a manner that will be discussed below, and twisting the torso while simultaneously locking your arm onto your bent knees. This stretch will hit most of your most prominent upper body muscles—the latissimus dorsi, the triceps, the deltoids, the obliques, the neck, and the pectorals.

In addition to those visible muscles, the twist stretch will work the deep spinal muscles, and even the muscles of the buttocks (the gluteus maximus, medius and minimus) as well.

Many athletes perform the twist stretch, particularly combat athletes such as wrestlers, judokas, and mixed martial artists that need great torso flexibility to escape from holds and pinfalls.

Sounds like something you ought to learn, doesn't it? But how?

As I have happily admitted in the past, and will likely do so again, Paul Wade's outstanding Convict Conditioning series has taught me this and many other exercises, and I cannot advocate Wade's writing enough. More specifically, the Twist Stretch comes from Convict Conditioning 2. The first book deals with the core calisthenic series—push-ups, squats, and the like. I have already gone over these in detail. In contrast, the second book deals with static holds that develop strength and flexibility such as the L-Sit and today's topic.

While the third book deals with explosive movements such as the back and front handsprings, that will be a topic for another time. Instead, let's go into the steps of the Twist Stretch.

All of the pictures here are taken directly from the book.

The Exercises

The first twist stretch is the "Easy twist stretch." Sit down on the floor with your feet extended. Take one foot, and put it "inside" the other leg, resting that foot next to the opposite knee, as shown.

Now, twist your body so the opposite shoulder turns towards the raised kneed (ie: if the left knee is raised, turn the right shoulder, and vice versa). Keep the foot flat on the ground and the knee stationary-just twist the torso. Allow your neck to turn as it naturally wants to turn.

Then, “lock” your torso by placing your elbow against the opposite side of the knee, while holding your body up with the other hand.

You should immediately begin to feel a stretch all around your torso.

Hold the stretch for 10 seconds, for each side. When this is comfortable for you, move on.

Step 2 is the simple twist stretch, which requires a little bit more flexibility. Place one foot over the other leg as shown above. Then, take the foot that is not flat on the ground, bend the leg back and touch the heel of that foot to the opposing buttock (ie: the right heel touches the left buttock).

This foot position will be used for all twist stretches from henceforth.

Now, as before, rotate your torso towards the opposite knee (right shoulder to left knee, and vice versa), locking yourself by placing your elbow on the opposite side of the knee, and again supporting your body with the other hand. Hold for 10 seconds, and move on.

Stretch 3 is where things become more difficult. Assume the position from Stretch #2. But this time, you will have to rotate the torso with much more force, as the goal of this stretch is to extend your arm and touch the instep of the foot that is flat on the floor. Your arm won’t be able to stretch on its own (and I don’t advise you try), you will have to accomplish this with proper torso rotation.

Stretch 4 has the difficulty increase further: Get a hand towel or some other object that is about a foot long. Assume the stretching position, and rotate the torso while holding said towel. Remove the supporting hand from the floor, and flick the towel through the “hole” made by your raised leg (obviously your hand is not extending down to your instep here). Wrapping the “support” hand around your back, grab the other end of the towel. This begins the stretch.

Each time you stretch, you will assume this position holding the towel in two hands. You will work your hands up and down the towel, slowly bringing your hands together by gripping greater portions of the towel. Eventually, you will be able to clasp fingers, and that is the final level of the twist stretch.

This process will be slow and arduous—“Coach Wade” himself admits that it took him the better part of a year to accomplish this by moving his fingers together inch by inch. I myself am not quite at the final level yet-a rough measurement shows that I have about 4 more inches of towel to go before my fingers touch, but I have certainly noticed increased mobility and flexibility already.

The towel stretch can be made easier by remembering to “worm” both hands up the towel, not just one. Actively use both to secure deeper stretches, and you will notice progress.

Doing even the easiest variations of this stretch will make you notice an immediate healing of the spine: your back will deliciously crack and you’ll feel warm and limber afterwards. And with practicing the more advanced variants, you will make yourself more limber for whatever physical activity you engage in, ranging from dancing to getting out of submission holds.

Or you could be one of millions of Americans with bad backs and hips. The choice is yours.

8 Ways To Forge Strength Through Challenges

November 14, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

We, modern men, need to constantly improve ourselves in a hostile world like ours that tries to debase us. While the lesser “men” embrace weakness and degeneracy, we must embrace strength and discipline. While whiners complain about how unfair the world is and how it’s better to just disengage, we must engage the world with greater willpower and defeat our enemies. Towards this end, I propose that we become both resilient and antifragile in every way possible.

The following are ways you can turn a seemingly negative circumstances into strengths.

1. Stress

Although stress has been maligned as the plague of the modern world that wrecks our mental and physical health, the way you perceive it makes a profound difference on how it affects you. New studies have shown that those who see stress as being toxic suffered damaging health effects while who saw it as being helpful were able to turn it into a source of energy to push them through their challenges.

So, next time you feel stressed from whatever trouble you may be facing, remember that it is your friend. You must reframe the sensation and believe that it's your body trying to help you. By changing how you processes stress, you can use it to succeed in life.

2. Obstacles

Your response to obstacles reveal the kind of man you really are.

Whatever obstacles you may face in your endeavors, you have two choices: become frustrated and discouraged by it, or see it as an opportunity to grow stronger. Like stress, it's the weaker man's inclination to view an obstacle as a confirmation of his own helplessness, but you must do better and face up to whatever gets in your way. Use every occasion to grow stronger from your obstacles and if you aren't facing enough of them in your life, you need to get out and start doing more things.

How you deal with obstacle will show your true nature as a man for the world to see. So, don't pussy out or moan about what you must overcome; instead, be determined to rise above it. Your honor is at stake.

3. Failures

Failures are inevitable in life. Although you should always try your best to succeed, you shouldn't be afraid to fail either. Just as with obstacles, view every instance of failure as an opportunity to learn and adapt. It's not failure itself that is bad, but not learning from it or giving up so easily. Remember: winners don't quit; they try to do better.

4. Rejection

Rejection is a specific kind of failure that is often the most painful of them all. It’s especially difficult because it’s often unclear whether it was actually your fault or not. I would say that it’s best to assume full responsibility for all the rejections you face and see what area you can improve to better increase your chance next time. As long as you’re willing to learn and as long as you’re willing to try again, you will grow. Master rejections and you’ll be placing yourself far above other men.

5. Physical Discomfort

This is why Russians are so tough.

It's well known that the human body is designed to be anti-fragile. Your bones get thicker with every blow and your skin gets tougher with every scrap. Pain and discomfort of all sorts also become more bearable the more you expose yourself to them. The more harshness you endure, the stronger you become over time. But inversely, the more comfortable you are, the softer you turn and the weaker you get.

One simple method you can implement to become more healthy and energized is to start taking cold showers. The benefits of doing it are many, including: stronger immune system, enhanced mood and energy, better circulation, boost in testosterone level, and so on. If you are having trouble getting started, start by doing just 30 seconds at the end of your usual warm shower and go from there. You want to train yourself until you can comfortably stand under the coldest water for at least five minutes.

6. Fear

You can't really turn fear itself into a positive, but the process of conquering your fears can have a transformative effect on your life. Some of the proudest, most exciting, and memorable moments of my life were when I defied fears by doing a presentation in front of hundreds of people (I had a terrible stage-fright), going rock climbing (I have a terrible fear of heights), and traveling for the first time by myself to a foreign country.

One thing you can do to completely turn your life around is to do what this man did and make a list of all the fears that you wish to defeat. Write them down in an order from the least fearful to the most and start knocking them down one by one. It's impossible not to become a better man once you conquer them all.

7. Anger

Like fear, anger is not something you can transform into a positive trait (I've heard of people "transmutating" their anger to re-channel the energy into other activities, but I've never had it work that way). However, it is a good focal point to master your mind to become more stoic. It can also serve as your area of focus if you practice meditation.

No matter how unpleasant, your anger will teach you a lot about yourself and only if you allow it. It will reveal your weaknesses, insecurities, and any other areas of your life in need of improvement. As one of the most base and primal of human emotions, you shouldn't just shirk it as something that is unneeded; instead, make it your friend.

8. Negativity And Pessimism

For the longest time, I felt guilty about being “so negative” because I was constantly told by everyone else that it was a bad thing. Smile, they said; think positively, they said; your life will improve, they said. I was constantly berated for not being part of the North American positivity cult. It’s no wonder why people there tend to say that they’re doing “great” even when they’re feeling like shit (a habit I have yet to fix).

But in contrary to the long held belief that positive thinking and attitude gives you a better life, studies have shown just the opposite: Forced positivity can actually harm you. For some people (like me) positive thinking backfires and makes things worse. Also, bad-tempered people who are pessimists have been shown to enjoy more successful marriages, be healthier, live longer, be better at negotiating, and more successful overall in life. So, if you’re a natural grouch like me, it’s time to embrace who you are and tell the fake-ass, positivity people to shove it.

Conclusion

The road to self-improvement is an ugly and a bumpy one. I honestly can’t say that I enjoy it. But no matter what, I know that it is a necessary part of being a man. I can’t imagine myself not trying to be better in spite of all the difficulties. I refuse to live a life of complacency. Some people mock and insult our efforts, but know that their opinions don’t matter. Lesser men have no say on what it means to live. So, fight on and prosper, for this is your one and only life.

The Dangers Of Romantic Love

November 14, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Since we were children, we have been bombarded with propaganda that romantic love is the ultimate relationship ideal. Hollywood movies, Disney cartoons, and literary fiction all portray romantic love as an absolute necessity in any wedding union, but how much of that narrative has been a lie? Is it possible that our pursuit of romantic love is actually preventing us from forming a lifelong pair bond?

I began to question the notion of romantic love when thinking about its emotional root. Love is a fleeting emotion, and like all emotions, it comes and goes like the clouds in the sky. Why have I been taught to select my life partner based on an emotion? I'm surely not encouraged to use emotion when buying a house, applying for a job, or doing my personal finances, but when it comes to choosing a human being that I'm supposed to spend the rest of my life with, I'm advised by the establishment narrative to use emotion for the biggest decision of them all.

Another major clue that romantic love is a childish strategy for choosing mates is the fact that countries with arranged marriages, where partners are picked based on purely practical matters, have lower divorce rates that in countries where romantic love is used to select mates (1, 2, 3). While there are multiple reasons for divorce in any society, it is rather coincidental that the countries most impacted by notions of romantic love happen to have the highest divorce rates.

Romance was invented

It turns out that your desire to use love as a precondition for marriage or pair bonding is an invented construct that had roots in destroying tradition and theistic authority. Romanticism, a movement that began in the 18th century, put romantic love at the forefront, not just for individuals but nations as well, all from a central thesis of individualism. It wanted you to take the focus away from boring old rules and traditions to focusing on how you feel.

The movement came primarily from bourgeois youth, who used family money to fiddle away on idealistic writings.

> …the Romantic Movement was nothing more than a protest against bourgeois conventions, bourgeois society and morality. To be extreme and flamboyant and unusual and violent even at the risk of becoming grotesque was the desire of every young Romantic. The Romantics were, in fact, bourgeois origins, who were trying hard to escape from their own shadows. (Source)
> Romantics believed that men and women ought to be guided by warm emotions rather than the cold abstract rules and rituals established by Bourgeois society. (Source

They sound a lot like modern day social justice warriors, many of whom are trust fund babies that lash out against "privilege" and "inequality" to relieve the psychological pain of being wealthy without having had to earn it. Combined with the fact that SJWs also trump feelings over logic, it's clear to see how romanticists were proto-SJWs, whose individualistic ideas are just what the enlightenment needed to complete its destruction of tradition.

Romantics re-defined what relationships should be based on

Prior to the romantic era, companionate love was the relationship form often described in literature and other historical writings.

> Passionate love is the arousal-driven emotion which often gives people extreme feelings of happiness, and can also give people feelings of anguish. Companionate love is the form which creates a steadfast bond between two people, and gives people feelings of peace. Scientists have described the stage of passionate love as "being on cocaine," since during that stage the brain releases the same neurotransmitter, dopamine, as when cocaine is being used. (Source)

Besides Song Of Songs in the Old Testament, writers were not encouraged to muse endlessly about passionate love, and there is zero evidence it was used as the principal factor in forming new marriages, but it's this passionate love that we're told to strive for, of feeling like you've been swept up in an exciting whirlwind, before publishing the gory details on Buzzfeed or in a bestseller like Eat Pray Love, authored by a woman who is embarking on her second divorce.

Women of the romantic era played a big part in elevating romantic love, and why wouldn't they? It's much more fun to get swept up in the excitement created by non-committal alpha male than it does to do arduous daily duties before you husband, king, and God. Women were given the chance to pick between excitement or responsibility, and we know what they have chosen.

> The works of the Romantic Era also differed from preceding works in that they spoke to a wider audience, partly reflecting the greater distribution of books as > costs came down during the period. The Romantic period saw an increase in female authors and also female readers. (Source)

The modern era has doubled down on the notion of romantic love

Jewish psychologist Robert Sternberg proposed the popular triangular theory of love, which is often used today as defining the love ideal. This theory has caused immense harm for stating that all three forms of love are needed in equal measure for a successful relationship.

Anyone who takes an introductory psychology course, or who reads a pop psychology book, will be exposed to this theory, and walk away thinking that passion is absolutely required in a relationship. If it's not there, the presumption is that the relationship is no longer "consummate" and far short of ideal.

Believing that romantic love and passion are necessary in a marriage makes it that much easier to exit out of it, because when a woman no longer "feels passion," she will walk away knowing that experts like Sternberg would agree that the relationship degraded and was no longer worth saving. And this is exactly what modern women are doing in droves. They have shown an appalling disregard for their wedding vows, especially upon realizing that they initiate 80% of divorces.

Romanticism and the rise of nationalism

If nationalism came out of the romantic era, and passionate love was a mistake, does that mean nationalism is also a mistake?

> One of Romanticism's key ideas and most enduring legacies is the assertion of nationalism, which became a central theme of Romantic art and political philosophy. From the earliest parts of the movement, with their focus on development of national languages and folklore, and the importance of local customs and traditions, to the movements that would redraw the map of Europe and lead to calls for self-determination of nationalities, nationalism was one of the key vehicles of Romanticism, its role, expression and meaning.
> Patriotism, nationalism, revolution and armed struggle for independence also became popular themes in the arts of this period. (Source)

Upon closer inspection, it's easy to see that the ruling agenda of today, globalism, is essentially "world nationalism." Instead of loving your neighbor, and only those who share your unique traditions or race, you're supposed to love everyone in the world, because it's evil to think that there are large differences between a German businessman in a Hugo Boss suit and a Tutsi villager with a lip plate the size of a grapefruit.

The romantic ideal of nationalism is not Adolph Hitler, but George Soros, who insists on loving everyone in the world from the depths of your heartfelt human compassion. A nationalism based on genetics and local bonds will no doubt serve citizens better than a "global nationalism" where you're supposed to care for those who are nothing like you.

How should men choose their life partners?

It's clear that using romantic love and passion as your primary standard for long-term relationships will lead to failure and maybe even personal catastrophe. You'll easily come to this conclusion by evaluating your past relationships and the mistakes you've made on women who you had intense passion for.

Instead, practicality must be the order of the day. You must logically evaluate any woman you intend to be with for more than a casual relationship by weighing her values, beliefs, and sexual history. This is easier said than done because we've been so brainwashed to believe passion is important, but it simply makes the most amount of sense. Find a woman the same way you would find a new job or buy a new house, and be wary of women who picked you based more on passion than practical matters.

It may sound cold to search for your wife like you would a business partner, but that is exactly what she is. The day-to-day life of a family home is far more business and economics than love, and so you should come to the easy conclusion that that's what you must use to form a stable home.

Understand, however, that we do not live in a traditional and patriarchal society that aids us in our search for a virtuous woman. Instead, society is encouraging women to corrupt themselves, sexually and physically, in the name of empowerment and independence, making our search exceedingly difficult. This is one of the costs we have to pay for living in the modern world. Some men will be able to overcome it, but many men won't, and will fail in their search for a woman they can create a family with.

But at least we are now armed with the knowledge of what it takes to have a more successful long-term relationship. It's not romantic love or butterflies in the stomach, but a matter of practicality. Logically evaluate her past, her values, and her beliefs to make sound predictions of how she'll behave in the future. From this evaluation will come a logical decision that is likely to endure, instead of relying on emotion, which changes as readily as the direction of the wind.

The Revolutionary Reforms Of Peter The Great

November 14, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Peter the Great (1672-1725) was one of the pivotal figures of Russian history. His reforms were a product of his personality and his vision for what he wanted Russia to become; and sometimes in history, personality matters more than those vague "historical forces" that professional historians like to imagine as controlling the destinies of men.

Russia in his day was still half-barbarous. To rule her he had to be an absolute monarch, and never for a moment doubted his right to be so. His personal habits say much about him: he had little need for sleep, regularly working for fourteen hours (or more) per day. Alcohol was considered, then as now, an acceptable escape from the drudgery of rule; but he knew when to limit his intake, and forbade his ministers from excessive consumption. His sexual appetites were as normal as any man's, but he showed little interest in the kind of conspicuous indulgence that characterized most of his contemporaries in western Europe.

He did make a point of choosing mistresses of lowly origin, rather than from titled families; he had no desire for intellectual competition in the bedroom. When Frederick II of Denmark teased him about the type of women he chose, his response was "Brother, my women do not cost me much, but yours cost you thousands of crowns which might be better spent elsewhere."

He chose to spend most of his time in the city that bore his name, St. Petersburg. He liked maritime affairs, and wanted to be near the sea. He disliked the atmosphere of Moscow, with its abundance of clergy and freezing winters. It was the army that first felt the effect of his modernization programs. Peter introduced conscription, a professional officer class, and defined periods of service; his naval program was less effective, and most of the vessels built during his reign were not of high quality.

He realized that he would never be able to make Russia into a great power unless he changed the mentality and outlook of the people. And like many rulers before and after him, he underestimated just how difficult this task would prove to be. After his death, many of his reforms were permitted to wither on the vine; but at least some tentative first steps had been made that future monarchs might draw inspiration from. By imperial decree he banished beards in 1698 (an exception was made for the Orthodox Patriarch); this was a shocking step in a country where whiskers had become a symbol of piety and fidelity. Those who insisted on keeping them could do so by paying an income-adjusted annual tax. We are told that some distraught peasants obsessively saved their shaved facial hair, lest they incur some disfavor from the saints.

But there was method to Peter's apparent madness. He understood that appearance and thought are connected, and that if a man wished to change one, he had to change the other. In 1700 Peter decreed that all royal officials had to adopt Western-style clothing. Trousers and cloaks were acceptable; caftans or overly "oriental" garb was not. Like Kemal Ataturk two centuries later, he had no patience for backsliders or protesters, whom he swept aside ruthlessly. In social relations, he ended for good the traditional practice of secluding women from public intercourse with men, a habit that had probably been an inheritance from the Mongols.

These reforms gained Peter some bitter enemies among the clergy. For centuries the Russian ecclesiastic establishment had held a near monopoly on education and rural social life; Peter's reforms threatened to erode this base, and they saw in him an implacable enemy of traditional belief. They also suspected him of having had too much contact with western Europeans, a fact that–it seemed to them–made him nearly an atheist. Peter did not help matters by openly mocking their rituals and folkways; as he saw matters, it was his responsibility to bring Russia up to par with the other advanced nations of the day, and resistance from obscurantist clerics could not be tolerated.

Peter solved this problem for a time by making himself the head of the Orthodox Church in 1700 when Patriarch Adrian died. He did not appoint a successor, and went one step further in 1721 by abolishing the title of patriarch altogether. In its place he formed a council of clerics that he himself would appoint; with this measure, the Church effectively became an arm of the state. Ecclesiastical grumbling was audible, but Peter wisely refused to venture into disputes with the priests over religious doctrine. He cared about power, not theology.

Slowly he made progress in industrialization. This frankly could only be done with dictatorial power, and to this end he reorganized the traditional Russian boyar system. In place of the old aristocracy, a new one arose that was based on military and civil function. His rule saw some success in mining and textile work: when Peter died in 1725, Russia was exporting iron, and state-sponsored factories made modest gains in cloth manufacture. Protective tariffs were used to shelter the new industries from suffocating foreign competition.To pay for all this, Peter unashamedly taxed everyone in his realm to the limits of their tolerance. State tax revenues rose from 1.4 million rubles in 1680 to 8.5 million in 1724. The majority of this revenue went to the military.

A Russian boyar

Ambitious plans existed for education, too. Peter ordered the old Slavonic alphabet used by the Church to be replaced by a new system (based on Greek letters). He imported printing presses, founded institutes, and organized professional associations to spread the ideas that were current at the time in western Europe.

What was the net result of all this effort? The picture was a mixed one. Reformers are not usually popular, as by their very nature they are required to focus attentions in different directions. Men and horses do not appreciate new stirrups. The peasantry–already used to a harsh existence–found themselves taxed to exhaustion; Moscow became filled with paupers who alternated between banditry and begging. The nobles hated him with the same ferocity as the French nobles hated Richelieu, and for the very same reason: because he forced them to serve the nation rather than each other.

As his unpopularity grew, Peter resorted more and more to the whip and the dungeon to implement his designs. Perhaps there was no other way. But at the very least, his example pointed the way for future authoritarian leaders who would drag Russia, kicking and screaming, into the modern era. Some of his achievements were lasting and significant, and some were not. In history, even great men must contend with the limitations of their era, and try to balance their own vision with the possibilities granted them by circumstance. It is on this precarious tightrope that all great men walk.

PODCAST: The Serenity Of Stoicism

November 14, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Stoicism is a philosophy for your mind that helps you deal with suffering and misfortune. In this podcast, I review stoicism's strongest points as presented by three powerful thinkers (Epictetus, Seneca, and Marcus Aurelius) by using direct quotes from their most important works. I also share how I've used stoicism to reduce pain in my own life and how you can do the same through an effectively four-point strategy.

5 Ways The Media Responded With Butthurt To Donald Trump’s Victory

November 15, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The media doesn’t even try to hide its shameless pro-Socialist bias these days. Since nobody really pays attention to them anymore, you might have missed some of the more entertaining butthurt spouted by shameless propagandists posing as journalists.

Election night coverage on the propaganda news channels is a lesson in hilarity when examining the reaction of lamestream media talking heads. What is most entertaining about Trump’s ascendancy to the Oval Office is that it was totally unexpected, catching cocksure Marxists at CNN and other alphabet channels completely off guard.

Let’s go over some of the more entertaining reactions last Tuesday.

5. Hillary Shill Martha Raddatz Breaks Down In Tears

Over at ABC, the wrinkled old Hillary shill Martha Raddatz was at a loss for words as she attempted to perform an off the cuff hamster rationalization to fellow Clinton operative George Staphylococcus, explaining why The Bitch lost the election.

Raddatz looked like her mother just died as victory turned into defeat for the criminal

Hillary Clinton. She's sure to be moving from a pack of smokes a day to two packs a day as the reality of the election continues to settle into her pea brain over the next 4 years. Her tears say more than her boilerplate language ever could.

4. Bernstein Plays The Race Card

To the mainstream media, white people voting in accordance with their own self-interest is racist. In fact, white people acting in any other manner than total subservience is racist to CNN. Washington Post "journalist" Carl Bernstein even went so far as to say Trump's election is "tragic and dangerous" as despondent and quite possibly drugged CNN propagandists looked on. Bernstein seemed most upset about Trump's immigration policy proposals, in which Mexico will no longer be able to flagrantly let its citizens violate U.S. immigration law.

Bernstein completely forgot the racism white people have endured all year long at the hands of Black Lives Matter, La Raza and other black and brown supremacist groups.

3. Chris Matthews Goes Into Hamster Rationalization Mode

Hamster rationalizations are usually reserved for women, but effeminate, low-T manlets like Chris Matthews also have them. His first spin of the hamster wheel makes him say Hillary won the debates. She didn't. Then he says she had the best ad campaign. Nobody believes advertising or anything you say, anymore Chris. Then Matthews says she had the best ground game. She might have, but she was a terrible candidate. The half-man, half-alligator James Carville looked ready to give Chris a hug as the reality of Hillary's defeat began to settle in on MSNBC.

2. The Racist Van Jones Whines About White People

Van Jones looked like he needed a change of underwear as he fell back on tired, old leftist talking points from the 1960s about the evil white male—especially white males that haven't been turned into geldings. He then goes on with an emotional overreaction to say families will be afraid to have breakfast the next day because whitey got back into office. LMFAO. Really, dude?

He then says immigrants are afraid now that Trump is going to be President. No Van, immigrants aren't afraid. Illegal hordes who figuratively if not literally say "Fuck you!" to U.S. immigration law are afraid, as they should be.

Jones then goes on to make a supremely ironic quote as he talks about a so-called white-lash: He says Trump's campaign was based on "Throwing away some of us to appeal more deeply to others." Umm, isn't that what the entire platform of the Democratic party is, Van? Throwing away, nay, crucifying white men to appeal more deeply to others? Your entire career is based on just that, Mr. Jones.

1. CBS Does A Mea Culpa

CBS published an article admitting how badly the press is biased

CBS was so stunned it did a full mea culpa on the network's shoddy coverage of the 2016 election. This stunning article entitled "The Unbearable Smugness of the Press" needed to be written 10 years ago. Better late than never. CBS actually echoed what we in the manosphere and alt-right have been saying since day one with the Op-Ed piece.

> This is all symptomatic of modern journalism's great moral and intellectual failing: its unbearable smugness. Had Hillary Clinton won, there'd be a winking "we did it" feeling in the press, a sense that we were brave and called Trump a liar and saved the republic.

The Eyeball network even admitted the contempt the network has for men like us.

> So much for that. The audience for our glib analysis and contempt for much of the electorate, it turned out, was rather limited. This was particularly true when it came to voters, the ones who turned out by the millions to deliver not only a rebuke to the political system but also the people who cover it. Trump knew what he was doing when he invited his crowds to jeer and hiss the reporters covering him. They hate us, and have for some time.
> And can you blame them? Journalists love mocking Trump supporters. We insult their appearances. We dismiss them as racists and sexists. We emote on Twitter about how this or that comment or policy makes us feel one way or the other, and yet we reject their feelings as invalid.

Damn. At least some people over there know why we hate them. (That includes this former mainstream media news anchor who defected!)

Shameless Activism

Got Marxism? It’s the guiding philosophy of the alphabet channels

Anyone who has the capacity to perform an iota of critical thinking knows the mainstream media is NOT on the side of the average American. It hates and seethes at traditionalists and works to tear down every institution of Western civilization while attempting to impale the most hated of creatures on this planet, the Evil White Male.

The rebuke of a sorry candidate like Hillary when the socialist shills thought she was a shoe-in caught the smug son of a bitches off guard. Their reactions are priceless, and need to be documented and remembered. These reactions are undeniable proof that blogs like Return Of Kings and web sites like Breitbart and Drudge are sorely needed, indispensable resources in this day and age.

We have not been getting the truth from media for generations. And now, as alternative voices appear, the rift between the two versions of reality grows wider and deeper. The once mainstream media have become nothing but shameless activists for New World Order socialism. The election night “horror show” only solidifies this point.

We should be proud to be activists pushing our own agenda, if nothing else to balance the scales. The media are NOT friends of the American public. Ultimately, the tired old Socialist media must be dismantled in order for freedom and traditionalism to survive.

Shopify Review: They Erased Our Store From The Internet While I Was Fulfilling 55 Orders

To launch a Return Of Kings t-shirt shop, I decided to go with Shopify because of how much easier it is to launch than a self-hosted store. I signed up with them, paid for one year of service, and did a pre-launch with a small group of readers, which resulted in 55 orders. As I began fulfilling them, Shopify pulled the plug on the entire store without warning, both the public storefront and the administrative backend with all our data.

Because of Shopify's decision, my customers couldn't access their order status, I had no way of informing them of what happened, and I couldn't fulfill remaining orders. They put both me and 55 individuals in the lurch for no legitamate reason, forcing me to threaten legal action in order to get enough information to complete fulfillment of all orders.

The Backstory

There are many open source solutions for hosting a web store. The problem with them is that it takes extra time to create the store and maintain it, compared to services like Shopify, Squarespace, Bigcommerce, Magento, and others. To get the ROK store up and running as quickly as possible, I picked Shopify because of their competitive prices, not knowing that I was in for a far greater price down the road.

After I set up the store, featuring photos of yours truly in our first t-shirt, I collected email addresses of those who were most interested with participating in the pre-launch. I sent this group an email announcing the store and 55 of them took action, ordering a t-shirt or two.

The shirt in question

During this time, I received an email from a Shopify risk analyst by the name of Justin. He asked me to send in identification, which I was happy to do, and then asked me for more information:

> Thanks for signing up with Shopify Payments and providing your ID.
> In order to complete this initial review and ensure payments continue to be sent to your account we would need a little bit more information.
> If you could send me any documentation you may have to validate the business that would be great. Examples would be a business bank statement, business license or business registration documents.
> Could you also confirm where you're primarily operating your business from?

I sent in my business incorporation documents, my IRS employer number designation, a recent bank statement (from my US-based bank), and a note of how I often travel through Eastern Europe, but that my business, bank accounts, and tax status all reside in the United States. In spite of that, Shopify unjustly classified me as a foreign business and gave me no means to dispute it.

> Unfortunately, Shopify Payments is currently only available to companies that are based in Australia, Canada, United Kingdom and the United States, so we are not able to help with payments for your site right now. It's frustrating for us to have to turn down good businesses, but we need to make sure we're abiding by both US and international regulations. This means that any successful charges you have will be transferred to you on schedule, but you won't be able to use Shopify Payments to accept any further payments.

> Despite the information provided, our payment processing partner needs to ensure that the shops are based, operating from and have a substantial presence in the United States.
> Ultimately, their decision is final and we must respect it.

According to the United States Federal Government and the IRS, my company is American and liable to pay American taxes, but to Shopify, I'm not an American business. The repercussion from this was that I couldn't use Shopify's own payment system (Shopify Payments) and had to pay a 2% extra commision on all orders, but this wasn't a huge setback since there were many other payment options. I stayed the course because I wanted to do an on-time opening for my readers. I could always change stores later when it was convenient for me.

The Disaster

I have a worker based in the United States who maintains the shirt inventory and is charge of shipping them out. He printed most of the shipping labels for the first batch of orders and got ready for shipment. Before he was finished, I tried to log into the admin area of the store to monitor his progress and saw this:

The public storefront was also taken down. There was no longer any way for me to know who my customers were and what they ordered. I couldn't even send them an email. I then received this from Justin:

> Hello,
> I'm afraid that after reviewing your information and website we believe your business presents a level of risk for customer disputes that we will be unable to support on Shopify.
> We will transfer your existing payments to you, but will be unable to accept any > additional payments on your behalf from Shopify Payments.

> I'm sorry we won't be able to help with your business.
> Regards,
> Justin

After I read this email, I was absolutely livid. I've been doing business on the internet for over fifteen years, and have never had a situation where a company pulled the rug out from under me and my customers in a way that I would personally classify as fraud.

They allowed me to take 55 orders, begin processing them, and then removed all access so I could not complete fulfillment. Imagine if you bought a shirt from me and then tried to access the store to see the status of your order. You would have no way to know what's going on and would probably think that I took your money and ran. Shopify created a situation of unneeded worry for 55 individuals while directly hurting my reputation as if I'm running some sort a scam operation.

The Phone Call To Support

I called support and got on the line with a Level 1 support tech. I told him the situation as calmly as I could. His response: send an email reply to Justin. This was unacceptable because politely complying with him through email beforehand had only resulted in the deletion of my entire store without warning. I demanded to speak with someone from the risk department but the support tech told me there was no way to patch me through since he was working remotely. I was not calling Shopify's main office but someone sitting in the middle of nowhere in his pajamas.

I also told the support tech that there was no further information asked of me, that this was a unilateral closing of my shop while I was in the middle of fulfillment. If Shopify is so worried about fraud, why would they leave 55 individuals in a position where they would believe they got defrauded and start initiating chargebacks with their credit card companies? I had no choice but to threaten legal action. I told the support tech that if Shopify doesn't give me a way to complete these 55 orders, I would pursue all legal means as a response to what I saw as fraud.

The support tech put me on hold. After a few minutes of chatting with the risk team, he said that they have given him permission to send me a CSV file of all my orders. I decided that this was enough to satisfy the 55 individuals who purchased from me, but it still didn't allow me an easyway to process exchanges or refunds if one of my customers was unsatisfied with the shirt.

Before ending the call with the support tech, I told him to relay to Justin and his team that they have created so much ill will by the way they have treated me that I will ensure that everyone knows exactly what they did, not just to me but also to my customers, who had an unfortunate experience because of their e-commerce platform.

Using the CSV file I received, I was able to contact my customers to let them know of the situation and complete fulfillment. Many of them have already received their t-shirts in the mail.

The Lesson

Shopify has every right to choose who to do business with, and I would not be particularly upset if they said I have to go elsewhere after fulfilling open orders, but the way they removed all access from my store is absolutely reprehensible and the stuff of nightmares for a business owner. No owner wants to wake up one day and find that everything is gone with no way to contact his customers. I have never been treated so poorly by an American internet business before, and I'm confident that any business who treats people in this way won't be in business for long.

Maybe my situation was special, as I am often abroad, but Shopify operates as if its customers are not even allowed to take a vacation out of the country. If you log in from a certain IP address pool, their algorithms go crazy and here comes Justin to hit the delete button on your store with one click.

Whatever the reason, it's important for existing and potential Shopify customers to know that it doesn't take much for them to shut you down at any moment and for any cause. They will take all your information and prevent you from contacting customers or fulfilling orders. Your only recourse to receive your data is to threaten legal action, and that may be no guarantee of success. If any of my friends ask me about which web store platform to use, I will strongly warn them against Shopify.

As for the ROK store, I've decided to try the open source method. Hopefully we will be ready for orders again within two months.

The Sad Saga Of John Walker Lindh, Rebel Without A Clue

November 15, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

John Walker Lindh grew up in the Washington, D.C. area. His family brought him to California when he was ten. In another ten years, he would become known as the American Taliban. While in Afghanistan, he was known as Sulayman al-Faris, one of several Arabic monikers he's used over the years.

Johnny joins the jihad

There are moments when one realizes one's vacation is really starting to suck.

When he was twelve, the young Lindh saw Spike Lee's rather hagiographic film biography about Malcolm X. That began his fascination with Islam. While a teenager, he used the evocative email and made several postings about rap music on Usenet. Sometimes he pretended to be Black, even having the nerve to "dis" Dr. Dre:

> $hort Dog does hip hop no glory
> Wack like Dr Dre and his made-up gangster stories
> Sellout house nigga living honkey dory
> Saying he's broke in his own pool doing laps
> All these playground MC's fall off like scabs
> Skills disappear like alaka abracadab
> Dr Dre's a disgrace selling out to the talcolm
> He'll be left dead and naked in the outcome
> Word to brother Malcolm
> Dre shirts and hat's when will we see his cereal?

So who's the poseur there, anyway? I'm not sure whether to laugh at the sheer impertinence, or cry at the abuse of the English language.

When he was sixteen, he formally converted, beginning his fateful journey. Meanwhile, his family situation was on shaky ground. His father turned gay, living part-time with his male lover, and eventually divorced.

John began his world travels, twice venturing to Yemen, both times for nearly a year. Later, he stayed at a Pakistani madrassa. In May 2001, he went to Afghanistan to fight on behalf of the Taliban. Unfortunately for him, after September 11, American forces went to war with the Taliban. He was captured on November 25 after his unit surrendered in Kunduz.

The CIA questioned him, and he claimed to be an Irishman. (That must have been an interesting conversation, perhaps "Ach, begorrah, top o' the mornin' to ye!" Presumably, pretending to be black again wouldn't have gotten him very far.) Shortly after, the captive jihadis staged a bloody uprising, and Lindh escaped. Hundreds died, including Mike Spann, one of his interrogators. After that, he was recaptured and—following some rough treatment, not that I'm shedding any tears about it—questioned again. He announced defiantly that he wasn't in the Taliban, but rather Al Qaeda. His actions sealed his doom.

Fighting for the Taliban fruitcakes was a pretty dumb move on his part. His actions after being captured were even dumber. What could he have done differently? In the beginning, he could've said he was interested in Islam, and his quest for discovering his spiritual roots took him abroad. Then he could have lied and told them he was press-ganged into the Taliban, and he was quite happy to be freed by his countrymen.

He could have tipped off his interrogators about the planned escape attempt—potentially sparing many lives on both sides—as well as avoiding further criminal charges for himself. Had he given a helpful warning about the uprising, likely they would've concluded he was small fry and let him go. After that, he could've become the star of the daytime TV talk shows. Then he could've given speeches on the anti-war circuit, helping his jihadi buddies by saying they really aren't that bad or whatever.

Instead, he ended up faced with ten criminal charges, which could've meant three life sentences plus ninety years. Finally getting smart, he copped a plea for twenty years, with the possibility of three off for good behavior. Now, he's in Federal prison, making the news back in 2012 by suing for the right to be allowed group prayer.

What went wrong?

As Bush the Elder put it, Lindh was "some misguided Marin County hot-tubber." Later, he apologized profusely for the remark. Still, I have to say that Bush 41 was onto something with that one; all the criticism he got from that was because the truth hurts.

Things could've been different. Lindh didn't have to become a renegade. If he'd made other choices, he could be living a happy life as a productive member of society, rather than counting the days in a prison cell. Still, his environment bears some responsibility for what he became.

He was raised in the Catholic faith, but a stronger grounding in it—as well as explaining some of the unpleasant realities about Islam to balance out the picture—might have put the kibosh on his journey to jihad. (A liberal environment should at least be able to explain why all that's bad. Or has liberalism become too wishy-washy to assert its own values?) There wasn't much chance of parental guidance turning him from the wrong path; his mother converted to Buddhism and his father left for the gay community.

For that matter, if he had acquired an appreciation for good music—be it Mozart or Metallica—perhaps he wouldn't have been so fascinated by irritating rap music. What kind of white kid is so alienated from his heritage that he pretends to be Black and laughably accuses Dr. Dre of selling out? On that note, as for Malcolm X, didn't Lindh have some cultural icons of his own? I have to wonder if he received much grounding in his own Irish-American heritage.

All this is an illustration of what can happen when an impressionable adolescent is cast adrift in an "anything goes" environment. Islam speaks in absolutes, enjoining right conduct and forbidding haram conduct, and they fight for what they believe in. (I can't fault them too much for that, although I disagree with their theology and actions on many points.)

Going further, Islam offers paradise for believers—promising seventy virgins to their martyrs—and eternal hellfire and brimstone for the damned; there's nothing wishy-washy about it. Indeed, embracing radical Islam could be interpreted as an utter rejection of the "anything goes" world view. I certainly don't agree with Lindh's choices, but I can see how he found that compelling in comparison to being at sea in moral relativism.

This certainly isn't the first time that people turned their backs on their countries and went abroad to give aid and comfort to the enemy. Jane Fonda's North Vietnam adventure comes to mind; an action she now regrets. More recently, there were about five hundred misguided youths who volunteered to be human shields in Iraq for their pal Saddam. For all their posturing, none of them got themselves blown up over there. (Leaving aside the question of whether or not the resumption of war was justified, 500 fewer Social Justice Warriors would've helped cleanse the gene pool a bit.)

Then there's the odd case of Matthew Todd Miller, a Californian who went to North Korea, tore up his visa, and announced he was seeking political asylum. That one's an iffy case though; later he said "I just wanted to speak to an ordinary North Korean person about normal things." Kids these days…

In summary

Don’t let this happen to our youth. They must not grow up culturally bereft.

In times past, children were taught about their country’s heritage, instructed in their culture, and pride in their nation was instilled in them. It was a given that these were presented as good things. These days—at least in much of the Western world—this isn’t happening. We can’t count on the educational system—and certainly the media—to do that any more.

Because of decades of cultural Marxism, young people are indoctrinated with a negative view of their own civilization. “All societies, beliefs, and ways of life are equal, except yours are terrible.” Those who don’t see through that baloney end up rootless, alienated, and disconnected from their own culture. Some even end up thinking that their homeland is the embodiment of all evil while repressive regimes abroad are wonderful. This is basically what Social Justice Weenies think, something they have in common with young jihadi rebels without a clue.

This will have to change, of course. Hopefully, the day will come when the media manipulators and educational bureaucrats who pushed cultural Marxism are standing in the unemployment line. For now, we’ll have to pay close attention to the messages that the young people in our lives are absorbing, and help them learn to be secure in their faith and cultural identity. Teach them about their roots and why that’s important. Don’t let the TV be your child’s babysitter. “Anything goes” is not a standard by which to raise our youth.

4 Goals For The Neomasculinity Movement During Trump's First Term

November 16, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, I am filled to the brim with joy. We have successfully thwarted the globalist's plans to ruin America—we've fought against the big banks, we've fought against the Satanic pedophile Elites, and we've fought against the corrupt mainstream media.

But, the battle is not over yet. We still have much to do if we wish to make America great again. This will not be an easy fight, for we will certainly face much resistance along the way. Expect the cucks and liberals to throw temper tantrums as their safe spaces come tumbling down, expect the mainstream media to demonize the alt-right, and expect the elites to do everything they can to stop us.

They will not stop us, though—no, we are far too powerful. The wheels of truth do in fact turn slowly, but alas, they turn! And they are growing in speed as we blaze towards victory. Here are four goals that we must achieve on our path to victory.

1. Dismantle The Mainstream Media

As more and more of us start to wake up, the media will begin to sense this—in fact, they already have. Have you wondered why they've started to cover anti-Hillary stories? It's because they realize that they're losing credibility.

The mainstream media is very well aware that they're losing their chokehold on the American public's mind, so in a last ditch effort, they're trying to seem unbiased. Do not buy into their lies—it's all a giant farce; an attempt to regain their former credibility.

Over the next four years, it will be extremely important to start dismantling these outlets. It's time to call them out for what they are. Start sharing alt-right stories on Facebook and Twitter, get our message out there. Don't watch any mainstream media. Don't buy mainstream magazines, don't watch their news shows, hell, don't even pay for cable. Do everything you can to bleed their pockets dry.

As more and more money moves away from the mainstream media, it will naturally move towards alternative news sources—sites like Return Of Kings, Info Wars, Matt Forney, and Danger and Play will become the new media.

Don't expect this to happen at first, however. In one final cry, before its gory death, the media will proclaim that there is a new "racist, xenophobic" enemy that helped Donald get into office: the alt-right. Expect them to demonize us. Expect them to lie about us, to scream and shout, and to protest. This is fine, however—for we are anti-fragile. The alt-right is in a very unique position.

Any and all hatred towards the alt-right will be a net win for us. Why? It's simple: any publicity is good publicity. A single mention of an alternative news site by the MSM can, and often does, net us tens of thousands of new viewers. In other words: if they ignore us, we continue to grow in power. If they attack us, we grow even faster. They can't win.

2. Drain The Swamp

Everything that we've done up to this point to get Donald in office will be completely pointless if we don't drain the swamp. This is our one chance—we have four years to do this.

In order for us to bring about permanent change in this country, we need to hold the cucks and libtards accountable for their actions. Anyone who pushed the pro-Islam agenda, rape culture, or feminazi philosophy must be called out for the traitors that they are.

The elites, the corrupt bankers, and the globalists must all be brought to light. In order for us to bring about true change, and to prevent a globalist dictatorship from happening in the near future, we must ensure that at least 25% of Americans are aware of the elites' "conspiracy" by the next election.

This is a grass roots movement, and it is growing in power—but we must take away power from those who tried so hard to fight us. Now is the time to cause a ruckus and email your representatives. Now is the time to demand Hillary be thrown in prison. Every single person involved in Hillary Clinton's private email server must be thrown in jail. Pedophiles and Satanists such as Anthony Weiner and Marina Abramovic, and traitors such as Huma Abedin and Comey must be thrown in jail for their crimes.

Now is the time to clear out the murky waters—to sift through the dirt and rotten garbage lurking below. I believe, that once all is said and done, America will enter into a new age of prosperity. The patriarchy will return.

3. Normalize Straight Males

For too long have men been oppressed, by the very civilization which we created. We have let the SJW's and culture warriors back us into a corner, but we've finally started to fight back. More and more men, upon being exposed to the manosphere, are starting to wake up and take the red pill. We're starting to realize, as a nation, that there is no reason to be ashamed of being white or being a man.

Once we start to dismantle the mainstream media and drain the swamp, most of this should happen naturally—it was only through the artificial social engineering that being a white male became a crime.

But, we can't stop here—it's time to start slowly red-pilling our blue-pilled friends. The best way to do this, is simply through osmosis. Don't try to convince them with logic, because they did not arrive at a blue-pilled position through logic. They did so through emotion.

Simply be a beacon of masculinity. Be confident in yourself, be assertive, and don't cave into ridiculous HR requests or political correctness social pressures. Again, once the mainstream media is dismantled and the manosphere grows in popularity, our movement will gain strength exponentially.

The normalization of males, especially white males, is essential for our culture to continue—the second that we started to become ashamed of our heritage and of our nationality was the second that the cucks started closing in. We cannot give them an inch, or they will take a mile.

This is not to say that our country shouldn't accept immigrants—IF they go through the legal process. How did it get so far that it became socially unacceptable to shame ILLEGAL immigrants? Again, ILLEGAL immigrants? Like I said, it got this way due to an overwhelming amount of white guilt. Do not be ashamed of your heritage, men.

We have made a gigantic step towards national sovereignty with Donald Trump being elected as president, and we cannot let this victory go in vain. We must push onward and continue to normalize what is NORMAL. Being a straight male, white or note, should be the norm, not being a transgender, green-haired, SJW.

4. Get The Law On Our Side

As our grass roots movement picks up more and more steam, I believe that the pressure we create will naturally push judges and lawmakers to change our corrupt legal system.

First things first, we must create laws that treat men and women as they should be treated. Too many laws are skewed in favor of women. Now that women have the right to work, we must remove alimony—it's ridiculous that men should have to pay $10,000 a month to their ex-wives, because she "got used to" a certain living situation.

We must remove corrupt anti-male divorce laws, ridiculous "hate-speech" laws which infringe on our freedom of speech, and ultimately, SJW "rape" laws. I, along with many other ROK men, have been falsely accused of rape. It's time to remove all of these ridiculous laws that make it illegal for men to simply talk to women, and that were built into the system by the elites in order to wage war against men.

The law should encourage freedom of speech; the fact that Twitter has not been held accountable for banning Milo Yiannopoulos is absolutely absurd. Information and social media platforms should be held to the same standards that the American people are.

Google needs to stop censoring search results—and if they don't, it's time for us to create laws against this type of behavior. Allowing Google to filter search results is like a regression back to Medieval times. For one entity to selectively edit our version of reality is unacceptable.

Most importantly, judges and lawmakers that have taken bribes should be thrown in jail…indefinitely. Anyone who took a "donation" from George Soros or any other member of the Bilderberg group should be imprisoned for crimes of treason.

Summary

We are on the path towards victory, men—but it will not be without many hiccups. The first thing that the mainstream media will do is demonize the alt-right, but again, this will only make us stronger. It will expose our view points to a larger audience.

Expect it to get darker just before the dawn. Expect feminists, SJW's, cucks, and libtards to protest and scream and shout—but, it will all be in vain. Too many men are starting to wake up. Too many men are starting to see the lies that have been shoved down our throats, and there is no going back.

The next four years will be more important than ever. Our primary objective is to dismantle the mainstream media through natural means. It's time for them to be exposed as the liars that they are. Simply eliminating the MSM will be most of the battle—remember, this is a war of information, and when the alt-right starts to control the news, there will be sanity.

We must also focus on draining the swamp. We must rid our corrupt political establishment of the people who've betrayed us. We must normalize the family unit and white men—no longer shall we feel ashamed of our gender or sexual orientation.

Then, from here, the laws must change. Remember: this will not be easy. There will be much resistance along the way, but we've come this far. We've beat all odds and elected Trump as the president of our nation…and it's time to make America great again.

How “The Camp Of The Saints” Predicted The Migrant Destruction Of Europe

November 16, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Written in 1973, The Camp Of The Saints is a novel by Jean Raspail that predicted the European migrant crisis forty years before it began, not only the actual invasion by brown migrants but also the leftist arguments that enabled it, which ushered Europe to its doom.

The story follows a one-million strong flotilla of Indians who are slowly making their way to Europe. The leaders and people of Europe have decided not to stop their arrival. Light on action, the book focuses on the mood of the pending arrival, particularly how Europeans were eager to cuck themselves into oblivion.

> After all your help—all the seeds, and drugs, and technology—[migrants] found it so much simpler just to say, ‘Here’s my son, here’s my daughter. Take them. Take me. Take us all to your country.’ And the idea caught on. You thought it was fine. You encouraged it, organized it. But now it’s too big, now it’s out of your hands. It’s a flood. A deluge. And it’s out of control.
> You’ve gone and worked up a race problem out of whole cloth, right in the heart of the white world, just to destroy it. That’s what you’re after. You want to destroy our world, our whole way of life.

Raspail understood how the media whips the public into feeling immense guilt as a mechanism to introduce non-white migrants. Well before the globalist view on migration and equality was elucidated, Raspail was steps ahead in predicting what the result of it would be, as if he was reading into a crystal ball. He even knew that migrants would bring diseases like tuberculosis.

> And all at once whole sections of New York are deserted, a score of American cities watch the flight to the suburbs—and half the historic Paris pavement too—American tots in their integrated schools fall five years behind, tubercular Gauls flee in droves from our open-air clinics. … Tally-ho! Tally-ho! Just listen to that battering ram smash at the southern gate!

The centuries-long segregation of the first and third-world brought great complacency upon Europe. No one could really get a grasp of what was in store once the third-world reached critical mass and started invading the West.

> "I can tell," Vilsberg continued, "that you really don't believe how serious the situation is. After all, we lived side by side with the Third World, convinced that our hermetic coexistence, our global segregation, would last forever. What a deadly illusion! Now we see that the Third World is a great unbridled mass, obeying only those impulsive urges that well up when millions of hapless wills come together in the grip of despair.

In a bittersweet scene, one of the prominent media leftists goes out with his wife to celebrate the arrival of the flotilla with joyous Africans. Towards the end of the party, his wife gets brutally raped by them and he eventually dies in sorrow. The horde's arrival suddenly awakened all the immigrants already in the country into asserting themselves. They began stealing directly from the native citizens by attacking their "white privilege."

> Now, it's a known fact that racism comes in two forms: that practiced by > whites—heinous and inexcusable, whatever its motives—and that practiced by blacks——quite justified, whatever its excesses, since it's merely the expression of a righteous revenge, and it's up to the whites to be patient and understanding.

What drives the maniacal leftist? Raspail believes it's a suicide mechanism, likely activated by a human organism void of spirit and with no reason to endure a cosmopolitan existence. Attempting to destroy its host culture is an indirect way of killing itself.

> Whenever the pop tunes would lose their blaring charm, there was nothing left but to let oneself drown in the sticky-sweet syrup of human misery and despair, set to music of sorts, that one refuge of yearning and unfulfilled souls that had learned nothing else. It never occurred to any of them to measure that notion of misery against the past, or against their own well-being. For them it was a drug, and they needed to shoot up a good strong dose to keep themselves going, like addicts and their heroin. The fact that it was often hard to come by close to home made very little difference. Nothing stops an addict when he has to have his fix, and poisons like that are easy to import. There's never a lack of pushers. Besides, modern man has always had, tucked away in the back of his mind, that singular longing for total destruction, sole cure for the boredom and anguish that consume him.

The book even predicted a cucked Catholic Church. Raspail knew that every institution had to be on board with Europe's destruction for the third-world invasion to proceed seamlessly.

> I came south like a lot of other priests, father, to hail what I thought would be mankind's redemption. To welcome the million Christs on board those ships, who would rise up, reborn, and signal the dawn of a just, new day.

The European women who welcomed the refugees became whores for them. If you think this is too extreme, consider that European women are getting raped by migrants today but not reporting the crime, yet if a white man so much as brushes past them, he's accused of assault.

> She died in Nice, in a whorehouse for Hindus, disgusted with everything in general and herself in particular. At the time, each refugee quarter had its stock of white women, all free for the taking. And perfectly legal.
> Yes, the Third World had started to overflow its banks, and the West was its sewer.

Raspail even predicted the fact that the media would elevate the interracial couplings of white women and the invaders. We saw something similar recently when the German government sponsored sex workshops for migrants on how to fornicate with German girls.

> Ralph Ginzburg, the famous American publisher, had printed a series of photos in his magazine Eros, which had caused not a little ink to be spilled. They showed an interracial couple—white woman, black man—in various stages of nude embrace. With a caption that read as follows: "Tomorrow these couples will be recognized as the pioneers of an enlightened age, in which prejudice will be dead and the only race will be the human race."

The fleet made landfall in France. The French, impotent to do the right thing to save their country, tripped head first into spreading the welcome mat (they actually competed with each other to see who would be the most welcoming). You can imagine the result when one million wretches made landfall in a country they cared nothing about. The new social justice government that rose forth catered to the invaders more than the French, similar to what we already see in Western European nations.

> In war, the real enemy is always behind the lines. Never in front of you, never among you. Always at your back. That's something every soldier knows. In every army, since the world began. And plenty of times they've been tempted to turn their backs on the enemy—the so-called enemy, that is—and give it to the real one, once and for all.
> When freedom expands to mean freedom of instinct and social destruction, then freedom is dead.

The book itself wasn't my style of storytelling. Raspail made numerous detours and long-winded soliloquies that took away from the action in favor of creating accurate character portrayals. It's more of a mood novel than one that moved forward at an exciting pace. The only flaw is that it didn't predict the rise of an alternative media that would sound the alarm bell. Even though an active invasion is taking place today, the anti-migrant side is far stronger than what's portrayed in the book.

The Camp Of The Saints was a prophetic story that showed how the migrants themselves weren't the only cause of Europe's destruction—leftists played the largest role in ripping apart the country before their arrival, a fact that many of us already know too well.

10 Things I Learned From Being My Own General Contractor

November 16, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

One of the foundations of living a good life in today's times is having a good place to call home. Whether you want a solid, comfortable place with which to pursue your hobbies, recover from the day's tribulations, and just to be, or whether you want a bachelor pad for your romantic pursuits, or both; a good home is essential to the modern man.

I purchased a home and I decided to be my own general contractor for the renovations. My home was an as-originally-furnished home of the 1970s, and I brought its multi-color painted, green shag carpeted datedness up to a sharply trimmed, hardwood-floored modernity while being of a somewhat timeless style. A general contractor is a person hired by the architect or engineer to run the job site, source the labor, follow the schedule, get the materials, and execute the vision of the plan. Here are ten things I learned as my own general contractor.

1. There are good contractors, and there are bad contractors

You will run into both good and bad contractors out there. A good contractor does good work, at good value, follows the schedule, and is honest and doesn't lie to you. A bad contractor will do any or all of the above. I fired a contractor who had good value, but did poor work, could not follow the schedule, and lied to me. I paid more for a later contractor who did excellent work, hit the schedule on time, and was a perfectionist. Give a bad contractor a second chance, mainly to see how he corrects it; and, if he fails to shape up, cut him loose.

A good contractor has the correct amount of paperwork, but no more. Some firms I turned down did things by hand and had no contractor's license, and that is too little, whereas a firm that gives you fifteen pages of legalese allowing them to take out an uncontested mechanic's lien on your home if you do not pay is too much.

A lot has to do with the presentation of the representative. Tradesmen are naturally rough people who work with their hands, but a man that does not have a good handshake, good eye contact, and is evasive on important details is shady.

2. Good contractors cost more, and they are busy

The best indicator of a good contractor is that they have a busy schedule, and I mean they are booked often a month or so in advance. The guy I fired kept trying to work me in on the weekends and at night, which, while it SEEMS like he's busy, he's actually operating in the red and trying to use your funds to cover his other jobs.

A good contractor will negotiate terms up front and not change them, and he will, when awarded the job, put you in his schedule at an agreed-upon time. My best contractor was so busy that I had to do other things first before I could get his firm to bid my work, and they did what good contractors do when they are too busy; they turned down my work until later.

3. You need to establish a reputation

General contractors in an area have a reputation amongst their customers and the contractors they sub-contract to, and the only difference between those that do it for a living and you is that you have no reputation.

A busy contractor will work with a GC who will give them work in the future over one who will not. I was an unknown, so the busy guys during the busy season (fall and pre-holidays) would pass on me and work with ones they knew.

However, word got around to the others that I gave jobs of good scope, and paid on time. I hired a sub contractor for a set of jobs, and, once they found out who I used as my electrician (it was who they subbed their own electrical jobs to), they called and the electricians vouched that I was picky as all hell, but paid on time, and let them run their own schedule and have the run of the house. At that point, I was in.

4. Good contractors know other good contractors

Reputation works the other way too. A good roofer who I only turned down because he was too busy and wouldn't meet my timetable has a brother who runs the electrical shop mentioned above. Although you should ALWAYS get multiple competing quotes (bid to three, two will generally respond, and pick the better one), the deciding factor was that his brother, the roofer, ran a good shop, and it stood to reason he would, too.

My plumbers knew my AC guys and my chimney guy. My flooring guys knew my kitchen cabinets guys. Everyone works with and around everyone else, and I saved all my paperwork and contact info for all my vendors so that, on any future projects, I know who to call for what, and, even if I don't know, I know who to ask for recommendations.

5. It will take more money than you think it will

Home renovation is expensive, and it's mainly for the nasty reason that, once you commit to action, you can get hit with extra costs. You can mitigate this with good bid scopes that you give to your contractors so all parties know what is what, but you will find that the home will need things you didn't think about, or that the hourly rate of the laborers is higher than you budgeted, or materials will simply cost more.

Part of the balancing act that is required is you will learn what to spend money on now, and what to spend money on later. Right now, I live in the place (finally), but I still have construction paper down on my floors as I have not yet bought furniture pads or rugs for the high traffic areas. My bathrooms have plumbing in, but no mirrors, cabinets, towel racks, or toilet paper holders. Entire rooms are without furniture. All of these can, and should, be taken care of later, but things like flooring and painting needed to happen earlier.

6. It will take more time than you think it will

You may not need something this complicated, but a Gantt chart shows dependency of one job on others.

Contractors have their own schedules, and there is also the time outside the work time where they have to arrange a site visit, you have to juggle quotes, they have to then write you in, then they do the work, then there's follow-ups and punch-lists, and then, finally, that job is done and you pay them.

You can't do some other jobs before you finish the first one. This is where having a master schedule and knowing who is doing what and affecting whom matters. My floor guys had to have the run of the place when they were finishing the floors, but they did not when they were laying sub-floor, and I was able to have plumbers in that day as well. Contrariwise, I could not start the kitchen install until after the floors were done.

7. Some of your ideas are wrong, some are right

I had my own thoughts about what to do with the place. Sometimes I was wrong; it was stupid to try to reuse the baseboard that was over the carpet and put it over the hardwood (even though it was the same color) and I listened to my contractor and used new. Sometimes I was right, my backsplash behind my sink was supposed to match the counter-tops' colors, and the ratio of white I wanted was correct, but I was persuaded to add more by my contractor.

Know what is important in your vision and be able to explain your intent, but the contractor might have a better way of how to do it in mind than if you had told them the how, instead of the what. I have a rather creative way of running the drains on my basement fixtures; they did what I wanted, but did it in a better way than I would have suggested, and they got it almost completely right to my intent in the process.

8. There will be gaps in your manpower coverage

The one thing a professional general contractor does that you, as a private operator, will not is do all the basic stuff themselves. A GC will hire an electrician to wire fan boxes for mounting fans, but he will install the boxes and hang the fans himself. My electricians did install and hang them for me anyway.

This was for two reasons, and this is how you can mitigate having little shit jobs that no one will want to do as a single job. The first is to provide all the materials yourself, which also allows you to pick out what you want. I had a pile of fixtures, fans, and bulbs laid out for them with a plan of what went where, and this helped them just throw them up after the technical wiring part was done.

The second reason is to provide a good scope of work. Will a plumber come install a single faucet? Maybe. Will he come install five and a garbage disposal? Certainly, that's a good day's work, so, if you have little jobs, have a LOT of little jobs, and you'll get more interest.

9. There are things with which you will not be satisfied; good enough is good enough

This house is old, but renovated. Some things simply cannot be fixed without massive upheaval; I cannot have perfectly flat ceilings because the drywall is 40 years old and it had popcorn texture on it. Some things I did not address; I have new baseboard and new window trim, but the door trim is original and has the nicks and stains of time.

Some things were done, but were not perfect. The drywall where my kitchen cabinets' bulkhead used to hang from the ceiling has one spot where, even after two reworks, still has a hairline paint crack. Some of the window film has pull away lines, and there's a couple things trapped under the film in places. One of the toilets will top itself off for a few seconds signifying a small seal issue. You cannot have perfection, but you can go for reasonable excellence.

10. Code enforcement sucks

The Man sucks. Someone called Code Enforcement on me, and I had to go get a permit of a cost of X% of the renovation's cost, mainly so they can jack my taxes up.

I got the permit, and I expect my taxes to go up. The inspector was a real schmuck, as most appointed officials are, but the joke's on him, as I only got the permit on what I had left to do and I omitted some things that would still happen, but weren't too noticeable.

With code enforcement and county ordinances, the idea is reasonable cooperation and being able to explain things away with saying you were mistaken, instead of flouting the law. I went and got the permit when I was busted for it, but they only know a third of the story. Had I gotten a permit earlier, perhaps whatever nosy neighbor that ratted me out might not have called at all. Another tactic, which I will do on a future project I have planned, is to get the permit months ahead of time, then hit it hard over a few days and be done before anyone notices.

Conclusion

If you have the time, the patience, and the skill to know exactly what you want, who to get for it, and how to juggle a massive schedule, running your own home renovation is a lot of fun and very educational. If you want it done faster and just want to deal with one person for everything, then hiring a professional general contractor might be the way to go instead.

3 Hollywood Films For Blue-Pill Men That Reinforce SJW Values And Concepts

November 16, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Your old Uncle Bob is mixing things up here—and I think you will see where I'm going with this new angle of mine pretty quickly. I have selected three SJW films to review: one from the 1960s, one from the 1980s, and one of much more recent vintage, from 2015. And what might all three of these insidious Hollywood movies have in common? Why, they outwardly or subliminally program viewers to blindly adopt blue-pill beliefs and behaviors, that's what…

I feel unsettlingly dirty just writing about these films, but somebody's gotta do it. So let's get busy here and expose these three, flat-out, unintentional farces for what they really are. Seize the day. Onward and upward. (Or is that downward…in this case, in terms of these three horrendously blatant SJW films, most definitely downward.)

1. To Kill A Mockingbird (1962 – Gregory Peck, Robert Duvall, Brock Peters, Mary Badham)

This multiple-Oscar-winning film is based on the Pulitzer-Prize-winning novel of the same name, which was written by Harper Lee and published in 1960—and it is that Pulitzer Prize, and those multiple Oscars, that should be your first major clues that the Hollywood elitists were up to no good while crafting this brilliantly clever piece of SJW brainwashing.

This wickedly hypnotic movie cleverly reinforces the statistically bankrupt notion that most white males in the American Deep South are vicious, stupid, ignorantly racist crackers who spend most of their time ruining the lives of innocent blacks—that is, when they aren't shooting them down like dogs or lynching them outright.

The plot centers around a hard-working, stand-up, straight-arrow black man, Tom Robinson (Brock Peters), who is falsely accused of rape by a conniving, white-trash slut named Mayella Ewell (Collin Wilcox), whose alcoholic father, Bob Ewell (James Anderson), is a racist pig of unfathomably low character.

The town's SJW lawyer, Atticus Finch (Gregory Peck), plays white knight and comes rushing to Tom Robinson's defense—much to the dismay of the local good ole boys—but despite his best efforts to free the poor, wrongly accused black man, Finch cannot hold back the powerful tide of racist anger, which ultimately results in the backwater town's killer cops shooting poor Tom down in cold blood (a familiar theme, which can be abundantly found in today's world of dindu-nothin' black folk, who are perennially and viciously gunned down by racist white cops, on an ever-increasing and frightening basis…yawn, "Gee, never heard this one before.").

I'm not even going to get into the rest of this mind-numbing film's plot and story line, because it's a waste of both my time and yours. But I will mention a few correlative facts here, which you might find just a little bit interesting…

SJW lawyer Atticus Finch, giving his wide-eyed, ignorant children, a mindfucking - most white people are evil racists, all blacks are saints.

The SJW-controlled civil rights movement exploded with a vengeance not long after this film was released. And here's the red-pill truth of the matter: according to the 1994 annual report on murder by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, most interracial murders in the USA involved black assailants and white victims, with blacks murdering whites at 18 times the rate that whites murder blacks.

These stunning disparities began to emerge in the mid-1960s, when there was a sharp increase in black crime against white people, an upsurge which, not so coincidentally enough, corresponds exactly with the beginning of the modern SJW-crafted civil rights movement. Blacks thus committed 7.5 times more violent interracial crimes than whites, even though the black population was only one-seventh the size of the white population at the time. This is according to the survey, Highlights from 20 Years of Surveying Crime Victims, published in 1993. You'll have to buy the book if you want to find out the real truth.

These days, Washington's SJW data-gatherers no longer keep track of such "bigoted" statistics…probably because they care about our safety so very, very deeply. Over the years, the cumulative effects have been staggering. Justice Department and FBI statistics indicate that between 1964 and 1994 more than 25 million violent interracial crimes were committed in the USA, overwhelmingly involving black offenders and white victims, and more than 45,000 people were killed in interracial murders—the vast majority of them being black-on-white killings. By comparison, 58,000 Americans died in the Vietnam War, and 34,000 were killed in the Korean War.

Mayella Ewell, the false-rape accuser, and Bob Ewell, her racist, alcoholic, evil father - you know, just a typical white dude...

I wonder how many additional people have been killed in America, during the escalation of these deliberately inflamed race wars, since 1995? Unfortunately, we can't get a look at those statistics, as previously mentioned, because the Puppet Masters no longer keep such records, so far as I can tell—and if they do, they definitely don't want us to see them.

Be that as it may, the notions set forth in To Kill A Mockingbird are repulsively twisted, morally insidious and patently false. And if that offends anybody out there who might be reading this review, that makes my entire freaking day. Because in the end, all that should matter to any critically thinking person is the truth. And what Hollywood dishes out on a regular basis, is anything but…

2. Gandhi (1982 – Sir Ben Kingsley, Martin Sheen, Candice Bergen, Sir John Gielgud)

Supposedly, as the crafters of history have quite ingeniously led us to believe, Mohandas K. Gandhi (played by Sir Ben Kingsley, in this multiple-Oscar-winning film) utilized the greatest weapon of all in his epic fight against British tyranny on behalf of the Indian people—the incredibly effective method of non-violent resistance.

And in the movie, Gandhi, there is a sequence in the film featuring a large group of non-compliant protesters, as it faces down a group of security forces armed with sticks, outside of a salt factory, the end result being that the protesters get the holy crap beaten out of them.

One of many non-violent resistance scenes in "Gandhi" - here, outside a salt factory. The protesters (in white) move forward, despite being beaten severely by the guards with sticks. Boy, that really showed 'em. They got the crap beaten out of them, but it was worth it. Up is down, black is white, and this is dumb.

In reality, that was basically all that happened. There was a public dog-and-pony show, shortly after this supposedly real-life event, which was choreographed by the elitist-owned media. And indeed, in this cleverly constructed movie, actor Martin Sheen can be seen describing the bloody mayhem at the factory over the telephone to his cohorts back in the USA (Sheen plays American Journalist Vince Walker in the film).

And what Sheen's character witnessed, and put into words, and then passed along to his editor over the phone, was summarily put into print in vast numbers of elitist-owned newspapers, as well as on film, in elitist-owned news reels, and marketed all over the world…which resulted in bringing worldwide focus on the "terrorist acts" of the security workers at the salt factory. This entire episode was allegedly a key element of India's signature accomplishment of gaining her independence from the British.

Despite the fact that every single major worldwide event that finds its way into the mainstream media's propaganda conduits, is either a completely staged event (like the Indian protesters getting beaten outside the salt mine, IMHO), or something that meshes well with the elite's overall master plan, or they will not even put it into print or on film to begin with (90% of the world's major media companies are owned by just six major players), we are supposed to believe that the elitist-produced film, Gandhi, depicts real-life events that occurred as the direct result of one brave man in a loincloth, who stood up to the ferocious might of the British Empire and brought the entire house down, single-handedly?

Please. You'd have a better chance of talking me into using Tinder.

The mass-slaughter of Hindi protesters at Armritsar - some estimates put the body count over 1000. That's all that ever happens to protesters, really. They get identified, imprisoned and/or killed. Makes it easy on the elitists at the top...get it?

There is another infamous sequence in the film, wherein a group of Hindi demonstrators is peacefully assembling in protest, within an enclosed, park-like area of the Indian city of Amritsar. The demonstrators are consequently assaulted by British soldiers, who open fire, brutally and randomly, on the assembled sitting ducks, and proceed to gun down hundreds of protesters (this incident allegedly occurred on April 13, 1919, and some estimates put the actual number of demonstrators killed at well over 1000).

And in this single, crucial, very revealing sequence of the film, the sobering truth is once again put on display for all to see—assembling peacefully, going against the grain of the established order, by utilizing peaceful protest and non-compliance within a group setting, is exactly what the elite want the people to do. Because it makes it a whole lot easier to identify them and kill them.

In the film, after the mass slaughter, the soldiers' commander is dressed down by his higher-ups for taking the law into his own hands, and gunning down the peaceful demonstrators. But that was all done strictly for show. And this is most obviously a case of cinematic cover here, as anyone who can think for themselves can easily infer (who do you think produced Gandhi…uh, that would be an elitist-owned film company, Columbia Pictures—do you really think the elite are going to pass along the bona fide solution to wiping them out…uh, no way; last time I checked, rattlesnakes don't commit suicide).

Gandhi, scaring the piss out of the British Empire, with one of his myriad refusals to bend to the will of the fascists. He had them shaking in their boots. Great fairy tale. Totally fictional.

The British Empire has a long and bloody history of usurping lands. And the notion that the string-pullers at the very top of the greasy flagpole would be aghast at the actions of the British commander who ordered the slaughter at Amritsar, is comical at best.

What the slaughter at Amritsar actually accomplished (in addition to the mass-murder of a huge swath of ardent protesters) was the following:

With the complicit assistance of the elitist-owned press, the British commander's actions that day reinforced the suicidal notion that peaceful protest and non-violent resistance were the keys to bringing about significant social change. And throughout history, other choreographed events like the slaughter at Amritsar and the subsequent explosion of moral outrage, fueled by the reports in the elite-owned media, have continued to give rise to the suicidal notion that non-violent resistance actually works.

Which of course it does, but only in isolated, high-profile, choreographed incidents, where the outcome has already been decided beforehand, whenever the Puppet Masters want it to appear that way to the sleeping sheep…the rest of the time, it only results in mass-incarceration, physical assault, political harassment or murder.

On a more subtle note, you might have noticed that two of the leading actors in this Oscar-winning film were eventually knighted by the British Empire—namely, Sir Ben Kingsley (knighted in 2001) and Sir John Gielgud (knighted in 1953)…to which I can only say, "I rest my case, Your Honor."

3) The Gift (2015 – Jason Bateman, Rebecca Hall, Joel Edgerton, Allison Tolman)

I don't typically watch modern Hollywood films these days. Mostly because I know what Hollywood is up to, so I normally avoid them in the exact same way that I avoid single mothers with tramp stamps, or chicks with green hair. But I went ahead and checked out this absolute mindfuck of a movie on Showtime the other night, knowing it would probably throw me a wicked, SJW curveball—and sure enough, it didn't disappoint.

As an aside, I threw this film into the mix, juxtaposed with the previous two Oscar-winners, partly to demonstrate how far the bar has fallen in the Hollywood filmmaking industry, in terms of the standard of quality.

They don't even try to hide the SJW brainwashing madness in their films any longer. At least back in the day, they could mindfuck the sheep in an entertaining and captivating way, while keeping their overall intentions under the radar…but today, as this next film proves? Not so much.

Simon Callem (Jason Bateman) has a “horrifying” secret buried in his “twisted” past, and his wife, Robyn (Rebecca Hall), is clueless about the whole thing (innocent white female vs. evil white male, the usual bullshit here). The couple relocates from Chicago to a suburb of Los Angeles, where they run into Gordon “Gordo” Moseley (Joel Edgerton), a creepy, awkward, socially inept former high school classmate of Simon’s. Gordo starts dropping by the couple’s new house, uninvited and unannounced, and he does so on far too many occasions. Simon thinks Gordon’s behavior is weird (which it is), but his SJW wife thinks Gordo is sweet, shy, and simply misunderstood.

Gordo's weirdness escalates in typical bore-me-to-death fashion (Hollywood is really great at this audience-wowing technique lately), until Robyn finally discovers her husband's long-held secret: he bullied poor Gordo back in high school, by inventing a story about him, which centered around a homosexual relationship that Gordo never had. The horrendously unfair story got back to Gordo's father, and Gordo's father nearly killed him!

Of course, Simon's liberal, SJW, brainwashed wife eventually wants her bully-boy husband out of her life forever, shortly after discovering this unforgivable transgression (even though she's pregnant with their first child, and they were very much in love up to this point; yeah, like that would ever happen in real life).

The SJW bullshit meter spikes so hard in this film, that you'll be left slack-jawed, stunned and eye-rollingly incredulous, and if you are unfortunate enough to have to sit through this absolutely putrid piece of garbage, be sure to keep a barf-bucket handy (especially for the ending)—because you are definitely going to need it.

Hopefully, it's getting a whole lot easier for you to spot the bullshit that is being sold, not only in today's SJW Hollywood films, but in Hollywood films of days gone by (most especially Oscar winners).

The elite are always using the magic of Hollywood for nefarious purposes—namely, to “magically” instill behaviors in its audience members that will get them into trouble, or instill beliefs in them that are totally divorced from reality.

Doing this makes it much easier to divide the movie-going sheep, and thereby conquer them, typically by race, or by historical beliefs, or by sociopolitical beliefs.

So do yourself, and the world, a huge favor, and avoid SJW Hollywood films wherever and whenever you can. The rule is simple: if it’s being made in Hollywood today, it’s a BPO film (blue pill only). And unfortunately, as it pertains to movies that were made all the way back in the early 1960s (if not even further), well, as we have just seen, the same rule applies, in many cases.

By boycotting Hollywood films, you are lessening the degree of brainwashing to which you subject yourself, simply by being alive in the world at the present time. And in this particular case, less is most definitely more.

5 Reasons You Should Stop Using Facebook

November 17, 2016 | by Brock Robinson | Link | Original Link

I remember signing up for Facebook ten years ago. At this point in time, the new social media site was geared mostly toward college students and it was uncommon for anyone over the age of 25 to have an account.

But over the last decade we've seen Facebook morph into a $50 billion conglomerate and information kingpin acquiring massive power and wealth from the endless amounts of time users waste scrolling through their news feeds. This beast of a social media platform has gone on to consume the lives of millions, gather nefarious amounts of data, foster unnecessary personal dramas, and often cause more harm than good for its users.

It would be prudent to take a good hard look at your Facebook experience and ask yourself if it's something that's actually adding value to your life. Here are five reasons why you should think carefully before using the world's largest social media site.

1. Your Facebook Feed Is A Black Hole Of Completely Worthless Information

I think it’s important to create streams of information that add real value to your life. Through platforms such as Twitter, Feedly, and YouTube, I’ve followed writers and content producers that have dedicated their lives to self-improvement, entrepreneurship, higher meaning, and the search for truth.

So you can probably imagine the stark difference between an intellectually curated Twitter feed and the dumbed-down Facebook community of people you went to high school with that peaked in the 12th grade.

Log into your Facebook and the most common information you’ll likely find is who got married, who had kids, and who got fat. Scrolling through your Facebook feed is akin to flipping through a more personalized celebrity gossip magazine at the grocery store checkout line.

Every time I log onto Facebook I’m immediately reminded why I never log onto Facebook.

2. It’s No Longer Useful For Dating

In college, I gained some value out of the site by using its chat feature to build up attraction with girls in my social circle and get their phone numbers.

But over the years, most girls have attached the “creepy” stigma to guys who hit them up via Facebook messenger.

In addition to that, you don’t really need a Facebook profile for “social proof” as you once did since Instagram is a better social media app for meeting girls.

3. Forfeiture Of Your Privacy

Most people have realized by now that the first thing a potential employer will do after interviewing you is look you up on Facebook. They're basically searching for any and every reason not to hire you. Lock your account down as best you can with privacy functions. Don't let that one drunk picture of you from 5 years ago ruin a potential job offer.

If that wasn't enough, Facebook has a long history of shady activities when it comes to privacy. They've already been caught accessing your location without permission. We can only speculate what else they've been infringing on.

4. Censorship

Although Facebook has a right to control the information broadcasted on it's platform, that doesn't mean they should abuse that right by censoring anything they might find disagreeable or offensive.

Much like an overbearing parent, Facebook proactively controls the discourse of its children, eagerly censoring content that might rub someone the wrong way. Facebook has so many overreaches that an entire website has been dedicated to documenting their affronts on freedom of opinion. You can probably guess which side of the political spectrum they try to stifle.

5. It Brings Out The Worst In People

Plenty of time has now passed for in-depth research to come out regarding the long-term effects that too much Facebook can have on a person's mental well-being. It gives the illusion that everyone else has it better than you and that your life just isn't fair. This is a slippery slope into a victim mindset and blaming others for your circumstances. How oppressed these chronic Facebook users are as they sip lattes from a comfy chair in Starbucks and scroll through their Facebook feeds on the latest Macbook.

I won't completely deny the merits of Facebook. If you're using it to build a brand or a business then it could be a good investment of your time, simply because so many people actively use it. I've also witnessed the joy it brings to older users for connecting with long lost friends they haven't seen in decades.

But the truth is that in many cases, Facebook does cause more trouble than it's worth. It's never a bad idea to cut back on your usage or even just opt out entirely. You may no longer be the first to know about an upcoming dinner party or what Brad and Sarah from freshman year have been up to all these years, but I suspect you might be better off as a person.

How To Live After Trump

November 17, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Before Trump's glorious victory over the forces of progressive darkness, I promised that I would provide a roadmap on what traditional men could do next to usher in a return of the patriarchy. If Hillary had prevailed, the roadmap would have been a grim one, as all of our work would have had to take place underground. Happily, we will be able to work in the open. Here are three ways that we can leverage Trump's victory to bring back the patriarchy.

Rule yourself

Bruce Wayne is a good role model for traditional men: Urbane, fit, financially independent—and dangerous.

This may seem obvious, but if we are going to bring back the patriarchy, we have to be men who are worthy of it. A patriarch who relies solely on the fact that he is a man will quickly be overthrown. However, a man who has authority because he has earned it by the way he lives will naturally retain it. Thus, the first step in making progress under a Trump administration is the same as it would have been if Hillary had been elected—self-improvement.

Self-improvement involves the obvious things: getting in shape, training martial arts, getting rid of addictions, and exercising self-discipline. The process of self-improvement needs to be under-girded with a philosophy of life. For most men, this will involve adopting, and faithfully living, one of the faith-traditions. For others, it may mean adopting stoic philosophy. Whatever it is, it will have to be more substantial than the degenerate, “pleasure, wealth, and power at any cost” morality of our Spirit Cooking elites—lack of morality got us into this problem in the first place.

Self-improvement also involves moving in the direction of financial independence. Under a Trump administration, this last goal will become easier to achieve. Trump’s tax plan cuts tax rates across the board. This will especially benefit men who are in the middle class who are trying to generate more income. They will be able to keep their savings so that they can move ahead rather than paying a penalty that keeps them from becoming wealthy.

Trump’s emphasis on fair trade will also result in more American jobs and unleash unprecedented creativity. The age of Trump will be a great time to start a new business. One word of warning is in order though: Under Trump the US is likely to flourish in a way that hasn’t happened since the the 1920s. Enjoy the prosperity but don’t get caught back in the materialism merry-go-round. Our goal is a lifetime of financial independence, not conspicuous consumption.

Financial independence is an important practical consideration because you will need a firm financial foundation for the second step, which is ruling your family.

Rule your family

Be the patriarch.

Starting with the boomers, our society rejected the traditional way of life and adopted progressivism. Families got smaller, divorce became more common, promiscuity increased, feminism became the default philosophy for girls, and the remaining vestiges of the patriarchy vanished. Progressivism promised freedom but delivered enslavement to political correctness and globalism.

A Trump administration will do little to reverse the deleterious effects that progressivism has had on the family. At best, the only thing government can do for the family is encourage it financially and provide a safe environment for it. But real change has to come from the bottom up—from men and women who return to tradition. For us, that means finding a traditional woman, or more likely one who can be converted to tradition, getting married, and having lots of children. A Twitter shitlord (@johnrandom1234) drove home this point in a humorous way by suggesting with a four-step "Trump Bump" starter kit:

Getting married, having children, and raising them to hold to the patriarchy is the long game, but it is the only way we will have long term victory. Without a next generation of traditional men, any ground that we gain under Trump will soon be lost.

Rule society—bring back the patriarchy

Benjamin Franklin is a great example of a man who was serious about his civic duty.

The next thing that we must do is start reclaiming our institutions. Trump has captured the presidency and Republicans control Congress, but many of those Republicans are cucks who will oppose the Trumpian agenda. And our other institutions are still dominated by leftists. Hollywood, the news media, education, and corporations all proclaim the progressive, anti-patriarchy message. If we don't take advantage of the current moment, any gains that Trump makes will be quickly rolled-back after he leaves office.

Therefore, we need to start re-engaging with these institutions to shift them towards Patriarchal Nationalism. You can share any ideas you have to do this in the comments. Here, I'd like to suggest that one institution that needs our participation: the Republican Party. Trump has created many allies within the GOP but the majority of the Party still holds to the cucked ideology of open borders and bad trade deals like NAFTA. The GOP desperately needs like-minded men within its ranks who will help Trump achieve his vision.

Getting involved in your local GOP is easy. You merely have to get in touch with your local party leadership in your district. You don't have to run for elected office. Simply volunteer your time in getting local officials elected, voting for delegates, or attending GOP events. Go in with a respectful attitude. A lot of the local GOP leaders are good people who still don't understand that the real battle is against globalists. Work for incremental change. And, if you have the disposition required for it, consider running for local office yourself.

One piece of advice: If you do choose to get involved in politics, don't get caught up in it. One way we ended up with an ossified and out-of-touch GOP is that people started to hold the globalist neoconservatism with an almost religious fervor. The other trap is to use politics as a way of enriching oneself in the manner of Hillary Clinton. If you do choose to enter the political realm, resolve at the outset to not use it for your own financial gain. Don't make politics your life. Think of it strictly as civic duty.

Of course, politics is not everybody's cup of tea. The key is to use your gifts, whether that is in movie-making or in running a company, to help create an environment where the patriarchy can flourish.

Conclusion

The one thing we must not do in wake of the Trump victory is rest on our laurels. If Hillary had won, we'd all have a great sense of urgency to protect what little remained of our way of life. Now that Trump is coming into power, the temptation is to relax—to just let Trump do it all. This temptation must be avoided. We must capitalize on the Trump victory with the same high level of urgency that we would have regarded a Hillary victory. If we don't, we run the risk of losing all the ground we have gained.

The Red Pill Masterpiece That Predates Them All

November 17, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Like me, you now sigh every time you skim-read the synopsis of the new LGBT agenda-approved blockbuster that the septic tank of Hollywood releases which usually stars:

- An anorexic AIDS ridden cowboy teams up with a love-starved transexual on a fabulous journey to the Open Borders Districts of America.
- Carpet muncher falls in love with female tortured artist or heroin addict next door
- A female remake of Ghostbusters sponsored by Cheetos and Whiskas, a Clinton-approved work of art and recipient of the IngSoc Academy award.

Should have put the muzzle on his balls for more self-inflicted humiliation

Where are the mythical heroes, triumphing against all odds? Now Mad Max waits patiently in the car while a bonehead empowered you go grrrrl takes the decisions.

It seems that we have to turn towards Russia once more for our recommended daily dose of normal masculinity.

As red pill and cold-blooded as it gets “Brother” (“Brat” in Russian) is a 1997 movie directed by Alexey Balabanov. It is seen by many as the one of the greatest gangster movie of all time and changed forever the image of the traditional justice-seeking hero.

It has been a few years at least that I want to share my discovery of this film with our readers. It had a tremendous impact on the way I see the world and the attitude I have towards life. I was convinced of its quality, of the impact it could have on the disciples of the red pill and that a few lines cannot do justice to this giant of Russian cinema culture. It entirely deserves an article of its own.

My brother, the criminal

Enter Danila Bagrov, played by the stellar Sergey Bodrov, who died at 28, at the peak of his meteor-like career. Many called him the Russian James Dean.

After serving in the bloody war theatre of Chechnya, young veteran Danila returns home, in the sleepy provincial town of Tula.

Needing money and without any solid prospects, he joins his brother Vytia who works as a hitman for the local “well-dressed businessman” in Saint Petersburg. Being an expert in making rudimentary weapons and with his quick capacity of reaction and frugality, Danila adapts marvelously to his new occupation.

After seeing the risk of a gifted concurrent stealing their livelihood, the city's gangsters soon put a price on his head and send a few professionals to tie up this loose end. But even after being betrayed by a mix of greed and cowardice, young Danila Bagrov decides to take on the mob single handedly.

An epitome of the Russian alpha. Hard and unforgiving, sober in words and in behaviour, for whom nothing counts more than the bonds of blood and brotherhood.

To err is human

His one soft spot is the faith he has in human nature, convinced that if he does good, his fellow man will be virtuous in return. He could not be more wrong, especially with women. He discovers very fast that beta moves like buying them gifts and helping them only brings him trouble or ungratefulness.

What is rare and makes Danila stand out is his loyalty, a cornerstone of the definition of masculinity and a value that progressively vanishes nowadays. His brother will do the unthinkable. But after the storm clears and Danila emerges victorious, he proves once more his quality as a man by being magnanimous and giving him a second chance.

No fancy green screen or politically correct themes

Brat is good because it is painfully real and does not embellish the lawless chaos that was early post-Soviet Russia. This is how it felt when the Wall came down. Everyone was trying to survive the best way they could.

The odd, low-quality orange filter used in the film reminds us of this period where everything was made from what people could find when the shelves where empty.

You cannot go wrong with a good revenge movie and Danila is an example of bravery. Alone and against all odds, he takes on the mafia that wronged him and will make them pay.

The man says it like it is

His analysis of the city and its perverse influence on men is brutally accurate:

> Danila: You told me about the city, about its strength. But here, everyone is weak.
> Hoffman: The city is a great and terrible force. It sucks the life force out of the strong – turns them weak. It takes away your power. And you fell right in the middle of it.

His opinion about the abuse of power and the corrupt elites that would kill mother and father for their own profit and the final victory of truth applies especially well to today's political and social context.

> American, what's your power? Is it really money? My brother says it's money. You've got lots of money – so what?
> Truth is a real power. Whoever is right is strong. You cheated on a man and took away his money. Did it make you stronger? No, it did not, 'cause you are not right, and the person you cheated on is. That means he's stronger. Right?

"Brother" also drops lethal truths about women and their ways. After spending all his roubles buying drinks and dope for a young interchangeable skank, she tells Danila:

> Kate: Do you have condoms?
> Danila: Why?
> Kate: ‘Why? You really think I will give you back your money? Come here…

Two brothers for two majestic films

The second volume, simply titled “Brother 2”, breaks the stereotype that sequels are always awful and is at least as good, if not better than the original.

Same characters are followed but this time, Danila’s brother in arms has been played by a crooked American businessman, in touch with the Muscovite mafia. They attacked his brothers once more and he will have this time to cross the Atlantic to reclaim what is rightfully his.

Again, the movie is realistic, gritty but has a lighter outlook on life. Whereas in the first volume, the main character showed a sheer hatred for everything that came from America and corrupted his country, the sequel that involves Danila's adventures and clueless discovery of American culture often results in hilarious encounters.

Un film qui prend aux tripes

If the red pill was a religion, Danila Bagrov could be its patron saint. You can watch it legally following this link which includes English subtitles. The firm KinoKompania STV that produced the film decided to release it online, the film being such a household name in Russia and worldwide.

Needless to say that you have watch it in the original Russian. The second opus can also be found online with English subtitles and Russian audio.

Don't miss out on these monuments of Russian cinema.

3 Reasons Why You Should Apply For A Job In The Trump Administration

November 18, 2016 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With the election over and done with, America is turning its attention to the transition from President Obama to President Trump. In barely two months, the Donald will take office, ejecting the Democrats' coterie of corrupt courtiers and beginning his mission to right America's wrongs. But President Trump can't do it alone: he needs good, talented people to work under him and carry out the hard work of making America great again.

That's where you come in.

The Trump administration is now soliciting people to apply for jobs for when the man himself takes office in January. We are officially calling on all ready and able Return Of Kings readers to submit their applications and take up any job offers. Here's why you should consider a job in President Trump's administration (beyond obvious reasons such as money and prestige)…

1. It'll help keep President Trump accountable

While the media is lying about Trump reneging on his campaign promises, it's still a good idea to give the man more reasons to keep his word. By staffing his administration with committed nationalists, we'll make it easier for President Trump to fulfill his political program, as well as make it more difficult for him to go back on his promises. Remember, it was rank-and-file FBI agents who forced James Comey to reopen the investigation into Hillary Clinton; a leader needs loyal men in order to carry out his agenda.

2. You'll be able to make history

Given the momentous task of rebuilding America after eight years of Obama's perfidy and failure, you almost have a civic duty to help President Trump in his mission. Expecting America to become great again all on its own is delusional; we need to do our part to restore this nation's glory. By working with the Trump administration, you'll have a direct role in reshaping America for years—possibly decades—to come.

3. You'll help trigger the left

Despite their massive losses in the election—beyond Hillary Clinton's defeat, the Democrats now control only a handful of state governments and failed to dent the GOP's Congressional majority—the leftist mainstream media is trying to order Trump around and persuade him to staff his administration with the same flacks who filled Bush's and Obama's. Right now, they're freaking out over Breitbart executive chairman Stephen Bannon being appointed as Trump's chief strategist.

By joining the Trump administration, you'll have a hand in helping trigger the left into conniption fits and spasms of impotence. Nothing horrifies them more than losing access to the levers of power, which they've controlled for decades. Watching leftists squirm and cry is one of the biggest fringe benefits of Trump's victory, and we need to keep the triggering up for years to come.

If you think you have the job skills, Return Of Kings highly recommends you apply for a job in Trump's administration. President Trump may have started the fire, but it's our job to help the fire rise.

What Modern South Korea Is Like

November 18, 2016 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

Over the last decades, South Korea has emerged as one of the wealthiest countries in all of Asia. Currently the OECD country is roughly on the same material and economic level as other affluent East Asian nations such as Japan, Hong Kong and Taiwan. However, it appears now as perhaps the most potentially strong among them. South Korea seems more dynamic and willful than its larger neighbor and economic main rival, Japan, which perhaps has entered the path of a more long-term decline.

In this article I do briefly describe the main characteristics of contemporary South Korea, and also reflect upon various cultural sub-topics which are of importance for any male who is interested in to obtain more sophisticated knowledge about non-Western cultures and what they might and might not offer.

The emergence of modern South Korea

Culturally, politically, technologically and economically, South Korean development during the 20th century onward cannot be understood without to mention the strong ties to Japan and the United States. As much as Japan suppressed Korea between 1910-1945, the material progression is nevertheless a direct and indirect consequence of the traumatic colonial period. Korean leaders were also inspired by the Japanese military dictatorship (which in turn was influenced by European militarism). After South Korea—which was formed in 1945 after the divide of the country—stopped relying on American aid and focused on its own potential, the economy grew rapidly due to an effective export-oriented industrialization.

Democracy was gradually introduced in 1987 but some of these authoritarian residues are still visible in today’s society, the military in particular, but also with regard to how many companies are run.

Presently the economic-political relationships between South Korea and Japan remain flexible and pragmatic, for the sake of both countries. The ties to the U.S. seems less problematic, although Koreans negotiate between on one hand a more distinguished Korean culture and on the other further Western influences.

Additional ambivalence might also be a result of that some Koreans regard American relations as a hinder in the process of a future reunification between the two Korean nations. Generally, though, the political, military and economic cooperation between South Korea and the U.S. appears fruitful and to the benefit of both sides.

The Korean wave and the rising appeal of South Korea

For quite a long time, modern South Korea may be regarded as not much more than a smaller version of Japan, although with a unique language and some other differentiating characteristics. In post-millennial times, however, this picture has gradually shifted—both among other Asians, Westerners, and people in other continents too—towards a more appealing national image.

The reason for this is mainly material, related to a refined development of technology (Samsung), pop music (K-pop), TV dramas (K-drama), cosmetic products (K-beauty), and perhaps also a more exciting metropolitan nightlife and a better ranked top university (Seoul National University). The Korean wave, Hallyu, covers a whole plethora of different expressions of the rising popularity of South Korean products and celebrities and it has had spill-over effects for other sectors such as academia and tourism. For instance, more people are interested in learning Korean than 10 or 20 years ago.

The nightlife in the capital, Seoul, is unhesitatingly of very high standard. For instance, this year Dj Mag ranks Club Octagon in Gangnam as the fifth best nightclub in the entire world. In the city regions Gangnam, Hongdae and Itaewon in particular, both foreigners and locals can easily find bars and clubs of various sizes that offer high-quality entertainment and which conform to a relatively broad spectrum of tastes in music and dress style.

Cultural characteristics

Contempory South Korean culture can be described as a hybrid of Korean, East Asian and Western culture. As I have stated above, South Korea has been influenced by Japan and the U.S. in particular to a significant extent. This means that the similar, real or quasihierarchical structures as in for instance China and Japan are visible in South Korea too. One is expected to speak and behave in different ways, depending on a person's age or social rank (which are more or less explicitly stated).

This does largely overlap a meritocratic social structure, rather than status being a primarily inherited factor. A doctor is looked upon as socially more valuable than a regular office worker, regardless of family background. It is thus not much left of the old Confucian system.

The Korean language—even though about 60% of the words are based on Chinese words, and its grammar being partly similar to Japanese—is unique with all its different suffixes that in turn conform to different speech and writing levels. These can be more or less formal, plain and polite but are always related to the social relations and contexts of either speaking or writing. People who know each other well tend to use an intimate speech style (Hae-che), but in some contexts, such as the workplace, they might change to a more formal and polite level (Haeyo-che) when they walk to other people. Many who learn Korean at a beginner's level start with Haeyo-che and then gradually broaden the scope to include other levels of speaking and writing.

Apart from the Korean language, a foreigner may find many things in South Korea that are either similar to places such as Japan and Hong Kong, or to the Western world. South Korea, especially Seoul, is largely the product of globalization and as a wealthy country this goes along with high standards of infrastructure and general quality of life. As a high-tech nation it appears as being in the forefront of material development, often outshining its Western counterparts, at least in some ways.

The present culture, especially the more youth-oriented culture, is safe and relaxed. Only slight modifications in dress and behavior (towards more politeness and moderation) makes any Westerner fit in well, at least short term-wise, and to only speak English is seldom a real obstacle.

If a person digs deeper into Korean history and culture—and geographically move outside the Seoul metropolitan area—one may find many differentiating and even somewhat unique characteristics (although these do often have China as its root or point of departure), but apart from Buddhism—which is separated rather than integrated into the larger society—these elements are rarely manifested in present time. There are obviously many real Buddhists and Christians in present South Korea, but the traditional layers of culture tend to be mere relics of the past. With that said, the country as a whole is overall more socially conservative than many Western nations.

Whether or not the trend towards increased westernization will continue remains an open question, but in terms of technology and popular culture it is unlikely that South Korea will look in other directions in the near future. After all, much of its present infrastructure and popular culture makes it into pretty much a local version of the Western-global society.

Lastly, two other things that have direct implications for any foreign person who reflects upon the option to stay longer in South Korea than as a tourist, temporary employee or exchange student, is that 1) the population is very homogeneous, and 2) it has no explicit will to change this fact.

This means that it is difficult, although not totally impossible, to obtain a citizenship if you are not of Korean descent. South Korea uses a type of partial jas sanguinis, citizenship by the blood. It is not very uncommon these days that Korean men get married to and have children with for instance Southeast Asian women, such as Filipinas, and South Korea is gradually shifting towards a more multi-ethnic society. However, compared to many Western countries the levels of ethnic and genetic heterogeneity are much, much smaller.

Due to the legal difficulties and cultural differences, especially language-wise, it is definitely not a smooth process to become naturalized as a Korean citizen or resident. Permanent and temporary living are generally two very different things and South Korea is yet another palpable manifestation of that.

Women in South Korea

Phenotypically, South Korean women are similar to those of other East Asian populations. As a result of drastically improved nutrition, younger South Koreans are relatively tall, seemingly not much shorter on average than their Western counterparts. The levels of obesity are slightly rising but still very low compared to the U.S., Canada and even thinner European countries such as Italy and Sweden. Overall, Korean females—especially girls—can be characterized as moderately tall and slim.

Additionally, a significant share cares a lot about their appearances. Fashion, diet, hair style and make-up are all very important in everyday life, and although these things change rapidly due to new trends and seasonal shifts, many will ride along the same wave wherever it goes. Collectivism is quite striking in that respect, and sub-cultures are not as widespread and visible as in Japan. Many look about the same.

As with many phenomena in life, the extent to which a person likes or dislikes how a population generally appears is related to individual taste. With that said, I think that more objectively speaking the two main strengths of Korean girls and younger women are that they are relatively thin and well-groomed. They do everything they can to optimize their beauty potentials, sometimes even with the help of plastic surgery (which will make them look somewhat more European, which partly is an ideal among East Asian populations).

Additionally—even if this stems more from observations and anecdotes than general facts—they tend to be more polite and well-educated, in a positive sense, than Western females. This is something they also have in common with other well off Asians, such as Japanese, Taiwanese, and Singaporeans. In the more exciting locations of Seoul, one will find quite many pretty and decent Korean girls, and even though hook-up culture has for good and for bad penetrated the south of the Korean peninsula, a significant share of these females may be looked upon as serious girlfriend material.

Western guys do have a comparative advantage in terms of looks and even sometimes behavior (Korean guys tend to lack the cockiness of Westerners), but these automatic benefits should not be over-emphasized. Many of the things that girls are attracted to, such as confidence, extroversion and good looks are general, close to universal traits. If one is a loser in the West then one will probably be that in the East as well. Conversely, the more alpha males will magnify their results if they have the proper time and opportunity to do so.

Conclusion

Overall South Korea is a rather impressive modern society that shares many of the good features with its equally rich neighbors. However, recently it has seemingly surpassed places like Japan and Hong Kong in terms of material development, nightlife and popular culture. For some Western males, between the ages of 20-35, South Korea might offer a valuable opportunity for temporary—ranging from weeks to even years— and circular migration. Because eventually it is most likely time to go home, regardless of one wishes it or not.

Men Are Binded By Their Shared Realization Of Truth

November 18, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The 9th of November 2016 was a great day. We will remember it as well as our parents remember the first moon landing in July 1969 or the fall of the Berlin wall. Liberal mainstream media—almost a pleonasm—are either stunned or agitating. Some of these crybullies clamour to themselves how "fearful" they are, lament on the "destruction of the West"—a curious expression as it seldom appears under leftist pens—or have difficulties to acknowledge that the man they have despised and defamed every day for months will be the 45th President of the United States.

Outside the US, The Donald's victory is creating waves, too. So many liberals allegedly connected to the Canadian Immigration website to crash it. In France, the bourgeois bohemians who work in the media, academia and everything that constitutes the big left establishment do the same posturing than their American counterparts, whereas the petits blancs (impoverished, disenfranchised whites) and local "righters" rejoice.

In Brazil, where your humble servant lives, the official media is making some tedious comments that deliver a flabby criticism. Local leftist talking heads condemn the "white protestants" and reality shows in a very cliché posturing that mixes anti-white prejudice with a critique of capitalism, whereas some new traditionalists, among whom some have been avid readers and makers of Alt-Right content, are grateful.

This is our victory.

Feels good, man

A pro-Pepe Facebook group has had a substantive discussion about where a red-pilled foreigner considering moving to the US after the Donald won should go. To make a long story short, some have advised potential newcomers to go live in the Midwest, in Texas as long as one stays away from Houston or Dallas, in Wyoming for the gun rights, in Pennsylvania excluding Philadelphia and the urban areas, close to the Appalachian mountains if one enjoys outdoors, while staying away from Illinois. Most of those who participated were whites, but I have spotted some Latino and Arab names. Some made jokes on these names but no fuss.

And here the following question arises. What defines us? Liberals have been shrieking about “xenophobia” or “racism” all the time. Yet, strictly national boundaries are much less relevant than before, even for us, even when we all rejoiced about Trump’s promise to make a wall. All over the world we are rejoicing around the GOP candidate’s victory.

American “Trumpists” undoubtedly feel closer to non-Americans who have been dissenting from the NWO on the Internet and wanted the Donald to pass than to American libtards. A lot of us are OK with having non-whites around: we don’t pander to arrogant, aggressive anti-whites, but that does not mean we would have to be “racists” as the liberal caricature wants us to be. To cut in more personally, I know of no genuine red-pilled or Alt-Righter who would have rejected me as a frog, although I remember some stars and stripes cucks blaming me for daring to speak about American politics without owning a US passport.

The frog is green after all

So, once again, what defines us? Why are we a “we”? Race plays a role for sure. We struggle to keep the white people from getting dissolved into the acid bath of wide-scale miscegenation and dispossession. We want a right to solidarity based at least partly on race, i.e. on lineage and identity, just like all the pseudo-minority groups out there. We fight the double standard that allows them to be communitarian, tribalistic, nepotistic, without being ever responsible of what they do, whereas we are supposed to keep our heads down and be taught everything by liberal social engineers in a world where we would have no freedom, no future, no dignity.

But even then, there have been Blacks, Latinos, and many women who participated into bringing The Donald to the White House. I have a race-mixed friend who supported Trump all along. This is not to say “I’m not a racist!,” afraid cuckservative-style, but to show there are some and we know it firsthand.

It is no mystery why most of us are white: we are united around a civilization that was primarily built by people of European descent. But there is more, too.

And this “more” that, I think, defines and binds us; this “more” is shared awareness.

On the periphery of the System centers, we managed to grow and gather

We are all aware, broadly speaking, of the same phenomena and trends. We have witnessed the break-up of families and harmonious relationships between men and women. We have been faced with the untold prohibition to make the least critic of feminism, “minority groups” aggressive identitarianism, and with the pervasive omnipresence of these leftist norms commonly referred to as political correctness. We have seen neoliberalism allowing a handful of careless, irresponsible assholes sending the jobs overseas, importing third-world immigration, then force us into a life of chronic unemployment or endless struggles against other low-wage individuals for a small place under the sun.

We saw how conservatism was a sham that never faced the genuine problems. We witnessed societies crumble, conflictual “minoritarian” group identities being crafted by the likes of Soros, and the meritorious worker or professional—whatever his race—getting exploited to the benefit of the lower and upper parasites. We saw the liberal establishment using various social categories like pawns to create horizontal struggles and depopulation.

Of course, some disagreements can be found on this or that particular issue, but we all see the same devastated landscape in lieu of the brilliant civilization the West once was.

And here is the major fault line. The leftists deny or value—they often go from the former to the latter—the replacement of native European population, the aggressive and tribalistic stance of “minority groups” towards the silent majority, the forced inclusion of individuals into sick identity politics games, the perpetual hostility and institutionalized prejudice against whites and males… Either the leftists utterly deny what we are aware of, for example when they say that whites are not under replacement, or they demonize it as a remnant of some “privilege” or “prejudice.”

All their talk about “oppressed minorities” dissimulates the very real disenfranchisement of the white majority, of non-white meritorious and integrated Westerners, and serves to deny us from our rights to public empathy, to dignity, or to even basically survive in a world of our own. They work on language and representations because their job consists in manipulating these, thus brainwashing us into seeing the world through their lenses and denying the legitimacy of any other vision.

The importance of shared awareness explains why we united on the Internet. A lot of us were closet nationalists years ago, and still are. We could not, and often still cannot, be nationalists in public, or we would have been excluded from normal social life by the local leftists and cowards. Leftist hegemony was and is still real in the mainstream. You know hegemony when you see it and spend countless hours thinking about how you can thrive even when living under it.

In the mid-2000, I found out about the information website Fdesouche (“Native French”) quote. By the standards of today, this news aggregator seems hardly interesting: it mostly collates pieces written by others. But then, it was fantastic. Here I could recognize what I already felt about the world—that something was wrong with all these non-whites thugs holding the streets and getting lavish promotion when they bragged about it. It was all concentrated before my eyes, and others were talking about what they went through daily as well. At least, others felt and saw the same as I did! I was not crazy, not bound to a life of unauthenticity or forlorn solitude among the almighty left. We were assembling. And we were on the Internet.

"Fdesouche.com—The website they want to keep you from visiting"

As most of us found ourselves under attack from non-native Frenchmen, and knowing intuitively that identity goes deeper than the fleeting winds today called culture, we often despised immigration in general. But eventually things changed, thanks to Alain Soral, mostly, who emphasized how racial struggle was leading to sterile battles among disenfranchised people while letting the truly powerful off the hook. Mathias Cardet, a black journalist who worked with Soral, showed how gangsta-rap culture was injected and nurtured among non-whites by powerful interests.

After all, one can be black or Arab and wanting to live in peace as a free individual, not as an identity politics pawn who spends his life attacking another social category.

Being pro-white, pro-masculinity and pro-tradition does not require being white: I often felt closer from Muslims with good intentions, i.e. Muslims who were genuine believers and not rancorous people using Islam as a mask for anti-white tribalism, than from white liberals. The Muslims would not share my blood, but they would share some of my awareness and yearning for Tradition, two things that white liberals eagerly reject.

“Faith front, warriors’ alliance against common foes”

The Internet is immaterial. It is, basically, a network where information flows. Awareness, and the will to spread it, are immaterial as well. This is why we could meet and act on the Internet. After all, the Alt Right and manosphere have been sharing ideas, media contents, memes, advises—and only later proceeded to meetups, panicking the totalitarian liberals in the process.

Trump’s victory is a major one. Regardless of what The Donald will actually do, it is an event of considerable historical magnitude. But it is only the beginning—make no mistake about that. The libtards’ establishment still holds loads of money, of institutions, of cultural territory. It has started to crumble and leak, yet it is still there.

Major battles are waiting ahead. We have to further our awareness, make thorough research on every aspect of leftism, and develop more proper cultural references.

Always remember the libtards never cared one second about us. They would have let us die off, alone, poor, childless, traumatized and demonized, had we not chosen to follow the path of the red pill.

America is a first-tier power, but it is still a battlefield among others. Wherever we are, it is time to thicken our mutual relationships and cooperate more closely. It is a battle, not between nationals and foreigners, but between workers and parasites, between those who feel the void and wrongness in the rotten core of postmodernity and those who dwell in the last liberal trend, between the realists who want freedom and responsibility in a healthy world of values and cultures against those who ravel in blue pill, media bullshit, complacency, parasitism and cucking for the empire of nothing.

We are the future. It doesn’t matter where we are. We are those with true awareness, those with genuine and healthy values, those who struggled to hone their abilities, and most importantly those who actually deserve to inherit the Western world. So, save it and conquer it, country after country, institution after institution, outlet after outlet—or there will be nothing left.

What It’s Like To Live In Kiev After Marrying A Ukrainian Woman

November 19, 2016 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

Suppose you are one of those adventurous Americans who meets and marries a beautiful foreign woman. You are the envy of all your friends. What next?

You can bring her back home to the United States or Europe. The guys will be jealous, the women will feel threatened. And your bride will be a fish out of water—for a while. But it doesn’t take them long to get established. She will find a group of her countrywomen, other Thais, Vietnamese or Ukrainians. They will teach her the ropes. Where to go shopping for the kind of groceries she needs. The most efficient way to send money to her relatives back home. Where her fellow countrymen hang out. And, oh yes! They will also learn American culture. Their friends will explain about American men and American divorce law. And that is where the trouble starts.

My Vietnamese war bride, an upscale Frenchified thing, informed me after just over a year of marriage, after I had helped her family escape Saigon, that “A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle.” When the inevitable the divorce came she refused a reasonable settlement offer and hired a junkyard dog lawyer to fight it in court. Losing, she was shocked to discover that that offer was off the table.

Keep your woman in her own country, where she is comfortable and where the culture is more likely to appreciate men. You make the adjustment to her culture instead of vice versa. Why? American culture is about the most poisonous in the world. Almost anything is better. Countries that haven’t been indoctrinated in feminism and cultural Marxism still value children and respect a woman’s role in bearing them and raising them. They also respect a man’s role as the breadwinner and head of the family.

I committed myself to Ukraine nine years ago, met my wife seven years ago and our son appeared five years ago. It is worth enumerating the many ways in which it is a pleasure to be living with her and raising him in Kyiv instead of the USA.

1. Kyiv is a beautiful and lively city

Beautiful architecture – Andreevska Church

Kyiv is a worthy capital city. It has millennium-long history studded with cathedrals and other exquisitely crafted monuments. There are many, many targets for a tourist camera. The walled city was built to be defensible, situated atop a steep bluff on the right bank of the Dnieper River close to where the Desno River joins from the east, 20 miles south of where another major tributary, the Pripyat, flows in from the west. From their capital in Kyiv the Viking princes could easily sally out in their long boats to the Black Sea or anywhere in Western Russia.

The sandy river beaches are good for swimming from June to September and for fishing any time it isn't frozen. One can rent kayaks and rowboats or take a river cruise in the warmer months. When it does freeze it is dotted with ice fishermen. All it takes is a saw, some bait, a line and the anti-freeze of one's choice. There are bicycle paths along the river and on the islands in the middle of the river. The city is experiencing a surge in the number of bicycle commuters.

The Soviet system had its good points. They housed everybody in high-rise apartments. It may not be as attractive as detached houses, but it makes for a very compact city. Those people needed places to breathe and exercise, so the city is full of parks. As compact as Kyiv is, it is, with most people living in apartment blocks, it easy to get around. Every place in the city is within walking distance of a convenience store of some sort, and restaurants and shopping centers are usually within a walk or a short bus ride.

Young people the world over want to live in the city, and Kyiv is no exception. It has lots of bars, cafés and nightclubs. The trends are toward sushi and Italian food. Ukraine is traditional enough that young people even go to church. There are Orthodox churches in every neighborhood, and a handful of English-speaking congregations scattered throughout the city.

Kyiv is home to Ukraine's most famous universities, Shevchenko University, Kyiv-Mohyla Academy and Kyiv Polytechnic Institute. These are their Harvard, Yale and MIT — an extraordinarily high percentage of business and government leaders have graduated from them. They know each other. As in the United States, just being admitted to these universities is a sign of intelligence and talent. For a foreigner, getting to know these elites is a lot easier than getting to know Ivy Leaguers in the United States.

2. Ukraine is extremely affordable

Attractive, inexpensive traditional markets (and supermarkets, of course!)

Kyiv is a very inexpensive place to live… very bottom of the Big Mac Index. The hryvnya exchange rate has fallen threefold since the start of the war in Donbass. Prices have risen, especially for imports, but not nearly as much. The tourist will note that it is still possible to get a decent hotel room for $30, a taxi anywhere in the city for $10 and a meal for under $10. That is just the start.

For those of us who live here, 16¢ Metro rides—buses and trams are even less—make life cheap and convenient. Try the grocery store—10¢ a pound for potatoes, beets, carrots, onions and cabbage, the staples of the Ukrainian diet. Meat is generally under two dollars a pound. Although there is a lot of hue and cry about corruption in the energy business, in the end it costs far less than in the United States: $100 a month to heat a house and between four and five dollars a gallon for gasoline. However, most Ukrainians' utilities are included in rent, and only a few drive cars.

Medical care is a preview of the impending Obamacare disaster. The state promises the moon but delivers only what it can afford. The average Ukrainian has to stand in a long line to get indifferent service from underequipped and underpaid doctors in shabby, Soviet era hospitals. The flip side is that fee-for-service is alive and well. You can get decent care if you pay for it… and it doesn't cost very much. In fact, Ukraine is a medical tourism destination, especially for fertility treatments, plastic surgery and dental work.

An American Social Security check makes you rich by local standards. It is a good place to live in retirement. Moreover, any American can teach English, and there are a number of entrepreneurial opportunities that don’t take a lot of capital to start.

3. Ukrainians are fairly uniformly Slavic – and they like people like themselves

Just us Slavs

Western newspapers are full of horror stories about Ukraine — war and corruption. Leaders in Moscow, Washington and Europe love to point fingers at us to distract from the increasingly blatant corruption surrounding those in the West. I’m no fan of corruption, but given the fact that it is universal, it is worth relating why Ukrainian corruption is more comfortable to live with than that of the Europe or the United States.

There is no hypocrisy about our corruption. Or, rather, the hypocrisy is so transparent that nobody believes the lies. The virtue? We still have free speech. Ukrainians do not lose their jobs if they are politically incorrect. They are not jailed if they say what they think about Middle Eastern immigration. If you tell a woman she looks good, she might actually blush and appreciate it.

The corruption has kept the standard of living low, which, perversely, has important benefits. People remain traditional because they have needed the support of families just to survive. “Asylum seeking” immigrants don’t come because there is nothing here for them—few jobs and nothing in the way of welfare.

Not having immigrants leads to high levels of social capital. The people actually like and trust each other. I am the only American in our little development of 3000 homes. They have included me in the group—everybody knows me and says hello when I meet them on the street, in the bus and in the stores. In my toney neighborhood of Bethesda, Maryland, most neighbors were too occupied with their important jobs to bother being neighborly.

The fact that it is mostly just Slavs has a couple of important corollaries. There are no bad neighborhoods in Kyiv. People will tell you to avoid the Troyeshchena, but a lot of people I know live there. I went to see for myself. I had a couple of pleasant shots of vodka chatting with the locals. I cannot imagine doing that in the Anacostia neighborhood of Washington DC.

People always stand up to give my son and me a seat on the bus or Metro. Old ladies absolutely gush over him, and engage him in small talk. They support their rising generation, and are tickled to death that I am raising him to be a Ukrainian.

Lastly, even though the locals will tell you otherwise, Ukrainians are good and polite drivers. They invariably stop for you at crosswalks. Very few will drive after even one drink. Fatalities per vehicle mile are about twice as high as in the West because the roads are poor, but you can't blame it on the drivers.

4. Young people have pride in themselves

An English language Toastmasters meeting

Students and young professionals show self-restraint: no tattoos, no piercings, no sloppy clothes, no swearing, very little smoking and no drugs. They are what in the 1950s was called square—delightfully so. They look forward to marriage and families, especially the women. For this reason they are perhaps not as easy as girls elsewhere, but when you get one, you have something of substance.
