There are lots of places to meet young people. Needless to say, bars and nightclubs. There are studios all over town giving inexpensive dance lessons—salsa and swing are big—and hundreds of sports clubs. The English language Mafia club is thriving. The Toastmasters public speaking club attracts many of the best and brightest with meetings in English, German, Russian and Ukrainian. The Language Exchange club also meets in several languages. From May to September, the river beaches are great, surrounded by restaurants, bars and discos.

Ukrainians love to practice their English and welcome foreigners. Not too many make it this far east. It is an easy place to make friends.

5. It is a good place to sit out the West's coming civil unrest

One of Kyiv’s many lovely river beaches

The Western press would have you believe that Kyiv is a lawless Wild West. That is the opposite from the truth — even today it is safer than any Western capital city.

The first danger cited is Vladimir Putin. When are the Russians going to invade? Answer: they won’t. Throughout is history Russia has expanded by stealth and opportunity. They stopped when Finland fought back in 1939 and Georgia fought back in 2008. They swiped the Baltics and part of Poland only after Germany had started a war that diverted the world’s attention. They imposed their will on their European satellites only because the Red Army conveniently occupied them at the end of World War II.

In Ukraine, they took the opportunity of political chaos in 2014 to steal Crimea, where by treaty they already had a large military presence. Emboldened, they thought they had an opportunity in the Russian-speaking Donbass. But the Ukrainians resisted, and that war is at a standstill. Putin knows full well that 80 million ethnic Russians cannot dominate 40 million ethnic Ukrainians, especially under the glare of world opinion. Despite what the neocons may have shouted to sway the US election, the Russians are not coming. Another comforting thought is that there is nothing here worth nuking. It is a benefit of staying out of NATO.

There is no dependent class here to rise up when economic hardship hits. Hardship is already here. There are no discontented minorities. Gypsies, the most visible of them, actually work—they sell flowers and work as junk dealers. You cannot be a parasite if there is no blood to suck. It is the United States and Europe that have legions of restless unemployed who are only being pacified by government benefits. and will rise up when governments can no longer afford them.

Ukraine’s corruption is well understood by everybody. As much as they complain, people know how to cope with it. It may take bribery to get things done, but they generally do get done. Corruption does not result in much violence. Occasionally some hard-nosed judge or a pesky reporter gets bumped off, true, but in every case the victim could have explained quite clearly why he was targeted. It is not like the random killing of whites by blacks in the United States or random Islamic terror in Western Europe.

Ukraine has lots of land, excellent agriculture, abundant water, reasonably good natural resources, and a homogeneous and hard-working population. It is not as dependent on international trade as most European countries. When the world financial system collapses, Ukraine will come through looking pretty good. They are so far down that it all looks like up, and the stress lines for civil unrest simply don't exist. Though you may come here for the love of a wonderful woman, you will find it a delightful place to make your home.

Women Only Hate Female Objectification When They Can No Longer Profit From It

November 19, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

With her Hollywood and silver screen career options all but dried up, former Charmed actress and constantly near-naked attention-seeker Rose McGowan is now a "leading" feminist. As you would expect, this transition occurred after her looks (which never approached those of co-star Alyssa Milano) had well and truly begun to fade. McGowan is not alone in making this spectacular shift. Pamela Anderson and professional SJW Natasha Devon are among a growing crowd of women who rail against "sexism" and "objectification" after years of trying, often very successfully, to sexualize their youth.

Seeking to cash in on her new-found fame as an unhinged SJW, Rose McGowan launched the "Rose Army," a kind of personal cult that tries to hide the overt narcissism of its creator by supporting campaigns against "domestic violence" and "female objectification." Full SJW mode is just a button away for her. For instance, she attacked gays for not being feminist enough and, probably projecting her jealousy over not landing a significant acting role for an eternity, claimed an X-Men movie poster promoted violence against women.

So now comes the task of reconciling the new Rose McGowan with the old one, whose self-objectification is best described by this infamous photo with ex-boyfriend Marilyn Manson:

Excuses, excuses…

Rose McGowan has tried to gloss over her past history of self-objectification and sexualization by saying she was merely a pawn of the patriarchy.

McGowan is now even blaming her past personal feuds, such as with a fellow Charmed actress, Shannen Doherty, on patriarchy, sexism and female objectification. Sadly, this very public attention-seeking, in which McGowan wrote Doherty an open letter, comes at the same time that the latter is suffering from cancer. But, you know, a girl's gotta attention-whore, including when another girl she used to have cat-fights with is about to die.

Rose McGowan has a lot in common with Pamela Anderson. Ex-Playboy cover model Anderson, after an entire career made from taking her clothes off and otherwise selling her body as if she were competing for a championship, has now come out against pornography. She may not be bad for a gal nearing 50, but her best years are a good 20-25 years behind her. I would wager that Pamela Anderson hit 45 and spent the last several years in denial, before she decided to lambaste an industry currently lauding nubile girls in their twenties and not her. Pornography addictions are bad, but Anderson showing these new colors in 2016 is nothing short of a joke.

Anderson's position can be summed up by the following two pictures:

Time when she did not condemn pornography:

Time when she condemns pornography:

Previously, a lot of attention has been paid to fat or unattractive girls being feminists. These activists are nominally against the sexualization of women, but appear to be driven primarily by envy and the need to diminish society's praise of attractive females. Whilst there is a lot of truth to this, it only tells part of the story. The rank opportunism of feminism is perhaps better explained by women who once made a career from selling their appearances and have subsequently turned on the industries whose financial teats they used to suckle. And what better time to turn on these industries, whether they be the pornography, film, or modeling markets, than when your looks no longer allow you to actively participate in them?

This phenomenon runs parallel to female athletes both utilizing and complaining about their sexualization. Attractive tennis players like Sabine Lisicki (and unattractive ones like Serena Williams) have made careers out of wearing revealing on-court clothing, which is much more for show than practicality. But when the chance presents itself, Lisicki and others have moaned, like at this year's Wimbledon, about how manufacturers' designs make them show too much skin. Many of these girls may not have lost their attractiveness yet, but they pick and choose when objectification is bad, just like celebrities whose looks have abandoned them.

It's not just famous people

Natasha Devon.

Many Return Of Kings readers will remember Natasha Devon from her awful performance against Milo Yiannopoulos during a British Sky News debate on fashion mannequins. There seems to have been an eerie timing in Devon's transition from self-described former model to SJW. She founded a so-called body image education program in 2006, in her mid-twenties. I don't know about you, but this seems to be the sort of age when non-famous models in particular face the meat grinder due to competition from younger, fresher girls.

As she hurtled towards 30, Natasha Devon penned an article for Cosmopolitan magazine on bulimia, which morphed into a regular monthly column. Then came "The Self-Esteem Team" Devon created in 2012. Frequently with government funding, "The Self-Esteem Team" has essentially applauded obesity, Britain's number one health crisis, and sought to re-engineer what humans are programmed by evolution to find attractive.

Devon, along with Anderson and McGowan, may chalk an anti-objectification epiphany down to age, experience or something similarly convenient, but the changes happened neither at the height of their self-sexualization careers nor during the pre-wall protracted slide. Always be on the look out for when exactly a woman took up feminist or general SJW activism.

When a woman complains about the "objectification of women," it usually means a) she never had the goods to begin with, b) her goods weren't enough to compete with other girls, or c) her goods are well and truly gone. There is a delicious irony to option c), as countless women will milk their looks until nature–or a half-decade of alcohol or drug-fueled benders–takes them away.

Feminism as projection

It is par for the course in today's political climate that our enemies describe us as sad momma's boys who play out failed encounters with women through our beliefs. Of anyone, Roosh has faced this entirely baseless criticism the most, all because our opponents have been unable to actually refute what he and Return Of Kings say.

We need to turn this idea of projection against feminists, even more than we have before. Modern-day feminism is itself the domain of women seeking easy comforts from an ideology that explains away either their own faults or their most primal fears about a harsh, uncertain world. For women whose looks are now washed-up, feminism enables them to label objectification as wrong and soothe the crushing blows that come from no longer getting the attention they were used to.

Rather than seeing these women as twisted and evil, it is better to perceive the behavior for what it is: desperation and the shocking realization that they are sexually irrelevant.

The Path Men Took To Trump

November 20, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Every man who supports Donald Trump came to it from a different path. Some of you support him because of economic impoverishment or because you have seen your neighborhoods degrade from illegal immigrants. Or maybe you support him because you were attacked for being politically incorrect. For me and many other men, we came to support Trump because we shared truths about sex and the true nature of women.

The fight began in 2012 with the Southern Poverty Law Center

In March 2012, after years of teaching men how to improve their sex lives through books and web sites, I was put on a list by the Jewish-operated Southern Poverty Law Center for being a misogynist. I was shaken up by this because I knew that my desire to enjoy sex with beautiful women and share the truths I've learned from it put me on a path of no return. Either I close down shop immediately or accept that the mob would one day come pounding on my door.

I decided to keep going. I responded to the SPLC designation with an article titled My Existence Is Becoming Illegal, where I described how heterosexual sex was now a defiant political act if the male received any benefit from it.

> It is clear that gender hate is now a one-way street. Men can hate women but not the other way around. Men can rape, women can't. Men can be abusive, both physically and emotionally, but women can't. Men can be misogynist, but women can't be misandrist, a word that is unknown to most of the American population. Men can be described as lazy slobs who play video games all day, but women are perfect as-is in a country where there are organizations trying to convince you that being fat is both healthy and beautiful. Male teachers get sent to pound-me-in-the-ass prison if they have sex with a student, but female teachers only get a slap on the wrist. If you're a man, you're likely a perpetrator of hate, violence, and abuse to innocent American women, even if you don't yet realize your thought crime, but never the other way around.

Fast forward two years to October 2014. Witch hunts by leftists were in force. Rage mobs were crawling through social networking looking for racists, homophobes, and sexists with the aim of getting them fired. I studied the people who were participating in these witch hunts and wrote one of the most important articles I've ever published: What Is A Social Justice Warrior (SJW)?

The article was widely shared, influencing how people viewed the useful idiot layer of individuals who were guided and controlled by establishment forces consisting of academia, the corporate news media, Hollywood, Fortune 500 companies, Silicon Valley, and the billionaire owners of our politicians. Scratch a feminist SJW and you'll find the reptilian skin of a billionaire who created the narrative she believes.

I was pessimistic when I wrote the SJW article, thinking we'd need a full generation (25+ years) to even begin defeating such a powerful anti-American entity. I focused on teaching men self-defense and avoidance instead of ways to defeat them. Little did I know that I was defining them at their absolute peak, and barely two years later a candidate who stood for the diametric opposite of social justice would win the presidency. The social justice warriors haven't gone away, and they are rushing to fulfill the will of George Soros by refusing to accept the results of a fair election, but the power they have to force people to bend to their demands has been reduced, along with the power of the institutions that support them.

Though SJWism peaked in 2014, I had to face the full brunt of their attacks in the summer of 2015 during the Canadian stops of my lecture tour and again in February 2016 during the international meetups. I survived those attacks, and the fact that I'm still here right now and able to exercise my free speech on all my platforms—while you're still here participating—shows clearly how little power they really had to stop us. They bruised me during the meetup outrage, but I healed quickly enough to weaponize my sites to spread my support of an even bigger enemy of theirs, Donald Trump.

Donald Trump ground zero

I'm a pessimist by nature, so I didn't have much hope that the establishment would allow Trump to win in the primaries, even though I was confident his ideas resonated with most Americans. But then I noticed that he simply couldn't be knocked out, no matter what his enemies did. I saw him humiliate Jeb Bush, out-compete a resurgent Ted Cruz, and smack down any attempt by the media to force him to display weakness. By the time I attended the Republican National Convention in Cleveland, I started to believe.

The ground zero for Donald Trump within the manosphere was The Donald Trump thread on the forum, created in June 2015 by veteran member and ROK contributor Samseau. This is where the battle unfolded for thosuands of men. Over 2,000 pages long, the thread has been viewed nearly 6 million times. Ideas within it have filtered out into mainstream discourse, as described here, to men with bullhorns larger than I have.

After significant battles in a real war, medals are awarded but soldiers don't nitpick on who was the "best" soldier. They all worked as a team to ensure victory, from the General (Donald Trump), the Colonels (his advisers), the Captains (major media influencers like Alex Jones, Matt Drudge, Paul Joseph Watson, and Mike Cernovich), the Sergeants (men like myself), the Specialists (men like Samseau), and on down to the Private, a regular commenter who contributes the occasional meme or argument in his spare time.

The ego cares about how impactful one is, how influential its ideas are, but the team player only cares about victory for the whole. Whether I am a Private or a Sergeant, I fought side by side with men in that thread and on this web site to what amounts to a modern fourth-generational informational war that will be studied by historians in the future. Who would have guessed that public internet sites operating on free open-source software would have such a positive effect on not just the result of the election, but on the lives of so many men who participated in it.

Approaching the date of the election

Two months before the election, I did a Youtube video urging men to vote for Trump, and it resulted in nearly 150 unsubscribes within a day, surprising even me since I thought my audience was mostly men who would automatically support a Trump presidency. The video echoed a lot of sentiments I shared in the article If Donald Trump Doesn't Win, We're Screwed, where I tried to convey the danger of a Hillary presidency.

> Obama was the "race" president, and look how badly he has damaged race relations in only eight years. Hillary will be the "gender" president. The future we have in store should be absolutely clear to you if she happens to defeat Trump.
> Not only will she move to establish a techno-matriarchy where men are second-class citizens to any female, but she will ensure that no movement or organization will be able to challenge her or her establishment cronies ever again. This isn't a trivial matter of getting banned from a web site like Twitter or Youtube—many of you will be forced to escape the country for no other reason than you happening to be a man who found himself on the wrong side of the establishment.

For the next month, I stared at the calendar, waiting for the election to happen, doing what I could to push back against the narrative on Twitter. Then in early October, an old tape was released of Trump saying he grabs girls by the pussy because they "let" him. My sister called me, confused, and asked if he really was a bad man. I told her that the media is distorting his comments just like they distorted mine a few months earlier when their proclaimed me as a "pro-rape advocate." I told her not to believe the media and to judge Trump by his actions and his policies, not a gotcha moment that was being spun out of control to help Hillary's failing campaign.

I spoke to her with confidence, but inside I was concerned: in a politically correct world, would this be the blow to sink Trump's candidacy? Is the majority of Americans actually ready to defeat political correctness? Thankfully, Trump responded strongly, ignoring calls by the traitors in the Republican party to step down.

The first poll to come in after pussygate suggested that Trump's support didn't decline. The fake controversy didn't work. I held my breath for the next few days to see if another tape would come out, maybe of him saying the n-word, but none did, and I knew the establishment had no more bullets. This was the moment where I finally believed. I felt a rush of energy on that day as my subconscious accepted that Trump was going to win. I did a Periscope that night as if I was amped up on methamphetamine, but I took no drug.

From that point on it was just a matter of hanging on, until finally on November 8 when he was elected President. I was in disbelief after he won because it was only four years prior when I was attacked by the same forces that were aligned against Trump. I didn't have to wait long until my personal enemies were dealt a monstrous defeat by another man whom I consider on the same team as us. If I made any miscalculation, it was that it would take a generation or longer for us to begin pushing back against establishment forces. I underestimated our own power, and those of our allies in the alternative internet space.

Human control is a foolhardy endeavor

The most important lesson I learned from Trump's victory is how pointless it is to control human beings, both their behaviors and their minds. Every single major institution in the United States, represented by billions of dollars of economic activity and influence, could not stop a populist candidate, in spite of trying everything short of assassination.

George Soros and his billions weren't effective. Obama and his allies weren't effective.

The mainstream media and their dozens of outlets weren't effective. CEOs of the biggest companies in the United States weren't effective. Hollywood and it's superstars weren't effective. Academia and it's thousands of professors weren't effective. Social media and its censorship efforts weren't effective. The FBI allowing Hillary to skate from real crimes wasn't effective. Even Donald Trump's own party wasn't effective in stopping him. It's absolutely incredible that all these forces couldn't stop one man and his believers. What a disgrace to the fields of scientific management and modern propaganda for them all to fail so miserably!

Think right now of how much effort the anti-Trump forces put into stopping him from winning. Think of how much money they spent to guarantee their desired outcome. And now think how it was all for nothing. They accomplished the very opposite of what they moved mountains to accomplish, after decades of cementing their control within the country by sucking the truth and life blood from the American public.

Whatever term you use to describe the force that governs our existence—nature, God, Tao, or so on—it is clear that humans cannot control it all, and that the pendulum will swing when it wants to swing, that the wheel of history will turn when it wants to turn, and your billions of dollars and your propaganda and your institutions can do nothing to stop it. Imagine how impotent George Soros and his friends must feel after their limitless money and influence was all for nothing.

Now they have to perfect their control methods even more, open their pocket books further, and try to force their will upon a population as if pushing food into the mouth of someone who is already full. Their desire to control you is nothing but their own psychological failings of trying to alleviate their crippling fears, of trying to prove to themselves and to the world that they are a somebody, that they are powerful, that the world must be shaped into their image, that they are gods among men, but it should be clear to you by now that they are not gods but sociopaths who gamed an economic system to amass huge amounts of capital and money. Much of that will be flushed down the drain as they continue to fight and grasp their way to unequivocal defeat, or attempting to control those who do not want to be controlled.

You can control human beings, but only temporarily and only some of them. At the end of the day, humans want to do what they want to do, and if you don't possess what they wish to buy, they will go to someone who does, no matter how much money you spend on your mechanisms of control. The more you control what does not want to be controlled, the more tension is created and then released in the great unraveling, of which we are currently living through. In previous eras, that tension resulted in victorious parades on the streets, but in our modern era, it is in the form of online celebrations with the use of tweets and memes.

If you want to be a true leader of society, create an environment where humans can associate with whom they want, can freely engage in commerce, can create families, can live in safety, can search for the truth without interference, and can work and play and live according to their nature. Put stone walls blocking their righteous will and watch them be torn down. It may take a decade, it may take 100 years, but it will happen, and the contraptions you used to control them will reveal not your strength but your own pathetic weakness.

Conclusion

We are tired of being controlled. Leave us alone. We are tired of institutions that are obsessed with controlling us, of forcing us to believe in falsehoods, of programming us to hate our country, of pitting woman against man and black against white. Leave us alone! Let men be men, and from that a new American renaissance will come forth. Men who are strong and good must be allowed to live their lives, and if you prevent us from doing so, we won't allow you to live yours. We will humiliate your useful idiots, we will destroy your institutions, we will lash out with more than just memes.

I'm afraid that those who stand against us are gearing up for even greater authoritarian control over us, but at least now we have our man in the White House who can join us in a fight that we have already been battling for many years. I can't wait to see where this fight takes us next.

How Effective Are Books On Fitness?

November 20, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

We’re all about self-improvement here at Return Of Kings. A man should always be seeking to improve himself in some fashion, and when he has achieved one goal, he should move onto the next one. In short, never rest on your laurels.

Combining this desire for self improvement with the masculine independence and minimalist lifestyle that other writers on this fine website should inculcate in you a desire to improve yourself while being thrifty and relatively solitary. As this article deals with fitness, you know what I’m going to say: personal trainers, or at the very least, the ones at your average commercial gym, should be avoided at all costs. And while most long-term fitness enthusiasts and professionals will likely either train by themselves or have one of the few trainers that knows what he’s doing, most of us have to train alone, especially beginners who have naught but common sense to light his path. But there is another option: books

Yes, books, that simple yet elegant method of transferring knowledge directly to its viewer. There are certainly plenty of books out there pertaining to the various fields of fitness and athletics. But the question remains: how effective is a book in physical training?

As an avid reader of fitness-related tomes (and many others, but that's neither here nor there), I own many of these books. And I feel that their effectiveness can be judged by grouping them based on "genre".

Weight Lifting and Calisthenics

When I first started getting into physical culture as a young teenager, I turned to the nearby commercial gym, as most tyros tend to. In that commercial gym, I quickly found myself being attached to a well-meaning jackass who gave me a machine-heavy program that, according to him, would "develop strength, size and endurance." And like most naive young men, I followed him, developing none of those things, but lining the trainer's pockets.

Eventually, realizing that I had been lied to, I embarked on a search for enlightenment, coming to the various corners of the internet that deal in such interests. One of the first things that I came across were books that I have repeatedly referred to in these pages, and still consider to be some of the best writing on general fitness out there—the works of men such as Paul Wade and Pavel Tsatsouline. Upon reading books such as Power to the People and the Convict Condidtioning series, and using a bit of common sense, I deduced that these books were superior than the typical tomes on fitness that the commercial gyms would sell at the counter for a few reasons:

One, they advocated a physical philosophy of simplicity and "purity". Rather than advocating a julienne of exercises; their routines were efficient and targeted all muscles of the body. Two, the credentials of the men were a cut above the average writer: as a maximum security convict and a Spetsnaz veteran (respectively), I knew that these men needed to train their muscles to fighting trim for purposes of survival, rather than "doing curls for the girls". And third, they referred to the strongmen of old like Maxick and Eugen Sandow, "standing on the shoulders of giants" and opening my eyes to the wider world of fitness writing, much of which I have further consumed.

In general, I would argue that writing on weightlifting and calisthenics are the most effective books on fitness, as these are solitary activities, and the books are typically written by one man speaking to another man. Thus, the techniques there in are written to be easily understood and practiced by the user without a partner.

Martial Arts

As I have repeatedly stated on this website, martial arts in general should be taken with a massive grain of salt—while I'm not so stupid as to say "there's no point in training any sort of refined fighting style because of adrenaline" (and yes I have seen this boneheaded argument made), I have also spent a substantial amount of time debunking the overly flowery and outright fictitious martial arts styles that many hack authors and film-makers propagate, on my own website as well as my Youtube and Dailymotion channels. Sadly, thanks to martial arts being more or less an unregulated market in the United States, any clown has the full legal right to proclaim himself a "master".

With that being said, some martial arts books are effective, thoroughly explaining the proper mechanics of a move and/or explaining proper situations in how to use them. While I have a background in "proper" study, I have also utilized books to teach aspects of martial arts that I was not formally taught—such as grappling. And again, I sought out accomplished and legitimate fighters that were decorated in their field: men like Farmer Burns (Lessons in Catch Wrestling and Physical Culture) and Masao Takahashi (Mastering Judo) wrote detailed and efficient books for fighting "in the clinch", and I have also used Dr. Sang Kim's books on Taekwondo such as Complete Kicking for learning some of the more exotic kicks that my own background didn't teach me. And of course I practiced on resisting opponents, some of whom had been wrestlers themselves and thus could shore up my technique.

The most important thing to bear in mind when using a martial arts book is that you MUST practice these techniques against a bag/dummy at the VERY least, and preferably with a sparring partner that will put up a fight. And while this is also the case for any book on physical culture, I would argue that it's the most important for martial arts—namely because martial arts techniques are, by definition, used in panic situations. In contrast, weightlifting is almost always done in a state of relative calmness—not counting the fake screaming idiots use to "pump themselves up".

Mindset/Meditation/Etc

Books such as the Kundalini Meditation Manual by Yogi Bhajan, which I have only recently started to use, are simultaneously the most simple and most complicated books on self-improvement to use. They are simple because in very basic terms the advice they give is basically "think really hard about something", but it is precisely that abstractness that can make them difficult-meditation is a nebulous concept for the best of us to grasp immediately, and in some ways changing one's mindset and behavior is the most difficult thing anybody can do.

While I admittedly do not have the depth of knowledge in these that I do with the other two topics, I would say that these are hard to grasp but easy to practice once they have been "grokked" in the words of Anthony Burgess: After all, every second of every day of your life will involve you utilizing your mindset. And thus, its difficulty lies in the original understanding.

Conclusion

Looking at these three broad "genres" of male self-improvement books, we can see that they differ greatly in content, but, speaking from a position of experience, I can safely say that to a great extent they are effective, and they can teach you new things, but only if you get one of the relatively few books that aren't written by armchair alpha males, and only if you diligently practice the information contained within them.

The Character Assassination Of Baseball Legend Ty Cobb

November 21, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

By now everyone has been reminded that the media is not infallible. It is composed of very fallible human beings who make mistakes with the same regularity as all the rest of us. I was recently reading a bit about something in statistics called "Galton's Problem," an observational dynamic named after its discoverer, Sir Francis Galton.

To state it very crudely, Galton's Problem is a situation resulting when observers assume that certain things are separate and discrete, when in fact they are not. For example, those who failed to predict Donald Trump's electoral victory assumed that social conditions in the United States were isolated from those of the rest of the world. Such people failed to notice the evidence of widespread public anger in many other countries, most notably England, Italy, France, and Hungary.

Sir Francis Galton

Failure to take into consideration the "big picture" is still forgivable, of course; no one can be right all the time, or even most of the time. Systems in the modern world suffer from too much input and data, rather than too little. But deliberate lying is quite another matter. And it is undeniable that some mainstream media outlets have deliberately sought to conceal the truth on a variety of domestic and foreign issues. Rather than act as a check on governmental power, the media has actually become an arm of government power, enforcing doctrinal orthodoxy with a variety of carrots and sticks that have proven to be reasonably effective.

Individual journalists can play significant roles in this process. Consider a favorite example of mine, the case of famed baseball player Ty Cobb. I've been an admirer of Cobb for a very long time, ever since reading his autobiography as a boy. Something never quite felt true about all those stories that other biographers would tell about him. The worst of these was sports writer Al Stump, whose biography of Cobb has now been discredited as mostly fabrication.

Stump was granted exclusive access to Ty Cobb in 1960 and 1961 for his biographical purposes. Cobb shared with him many intimate details of his life and career; but instead of faithfully reproducing those recollections, Stump embellished, slanted, and outright fabricated numerous anecdotes designed to cast Cobb in the worst possible light. Stump portrayed Cobb as a southern racist (Cobb was from Georgia), a misogynist, and even a murderer. Cobb was not alive at the time all these stories began to circulate and was unable to defend himself.

To add insult to injury, Stump's writings were used as the basis for a terrible 1994 film called Cobb, which starred Tommy Lee Jones. The film is a tissue of lies and distortions that deserved to—and did—flop at the box office. The real Ty Cobb was a complex, driven, and highly intelligent figure, who knew how to court controversy when he had to, but was actually a gentleman by the standards of the era. Readers interested in further reading should consult the wonderful biography by Charles Leerhsen entitled Ty Cobb: A Terrible Beauty.

To begin with, Cobb used brains rather than brawn to beat his opponents. He made careful studies of all the top players of his day and crafted strategies designed to exploit their weaknesses. For example, when he learned that pitcher Walter Johnson hated hitting batters with pitches, Cobb would crowd the plate to force Johnson to walk him. He learned how to get inside the heads of his adversaries, forcing them to lose their tempers; when they did, Cobb would steal bases right under their noses. He remains one of the few players in history who knew how to steal home base.

One legend about Cobb that has persisted is that he was a violent brawler. This is simply not true. It is true that men of his era got into fistfights often—it was part of a healthy masculine culture back then—but he never gratuitously assaulted or struck anyone. The few incidents that have been held out as examples of his misbehavior (e.g., a fight with a black groundskeeper and assorted hotel brawls) prove to be on closer inspection nothing more than the standard types of fights that physically-minded men like him became entangled with. Nearly all ballplayers of his era engaged in them, including Babe Ruth.

Al Stump's character assassination of Cobb went even further, painting him as an unreconstructed southern "racist" who had a grudge against blacks. This is completely false. Cobb was actually one of the few early supporters of integration in the big leagues. When asked his opinion about subject by the Sporting News in 1952, he said, “The negro has the right to compete in sports, and who is to say he has not?”

He had nothing but compliments for black athletes like Willie Mays and Jackie Robinson, and players in the Negro League whom Cobb interacted with in the 1920s confirm that there was no trace of prejudice in Cobb’s makeup. Cobb mentored younger players, corresponded with fans with personalized letters, and helped found a hospital and a college education fund.

Cobb was certainly no angel, but in hindsight he was nothing more than an aggressive, daring man who played professional sports at a time when things were much less regulated than they are now. Cobb himself may even have allowed spurious tales about himself to circulate in order to court publicity. But he had a limit, and complete fairy tales he would not tolerate.

Stump’s lies have been so pervasive and persistent that the mythology surrounding Cobb will take decades to undo. If anything, Cobb was too trusting in letting a man like Stump into his confidence. Cobb was so angry with Stump’s hatchet job that he was preparing to sue to prevent publication of Stump’s writings in 1961, just before his death. The terrible 1994 film Cobb only added more oil to the fire.

Malicious journalism can do serious damage. Sometimes the damage comes from ignorance, other times from deliberate peddling of falsehood. The motives for lying—whether coming from money, fame, or the desire to “virtue signal”—can always be found if one digs below the surface. In the modern era, the default rule must be to seek independent confirmation of news stories, and to remember that journalists are subject to the same human emotions and weaknesses as all the rest of us.

4 Examples That Show The Globalists Are Losing Ground

November 21, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

The media is beginning to demonize the manosphere and alt right. Twitter has suspended multiple accounts, such as Milo Yiannopoulos, Ricky Vaughn, and Matt Forney. The Guardian wrote a hit piece against the red pill. The media has called alt-right groups "xenophobic, racist, and misogynist," despite not pointing to a single piece of evidence.

As anti-Trump rallies continue to rage across the nation, in New York City, Philadelphia, and Michigan, the media completely ignores all of the assaults occurring on Trump voters:

Despite the elites' attempts to destroy us, we are, in fact, winning this battle. The reasons why are simple:

- Truth is always more powerful than falsehood
- We are too numerous to be effectively silenced
- We don't congregate on one single platform; we're a collection of individuals based around an ideology
- We're high energy, decisive, assertive, and confident men

Below, I would like to offer the supporters of our causes some signs of hope. Victory is near, and Trump is going to lead the way.

1. George Soros Being Sued For $550 Million

According to Breitbart, along with dozens of other alternative news sites, Dallas Police Department Sergeant Demetrick Pennie, President of the Dallas Fallen Officer Foundation, is suing a multitude of individuals for inciting a race war:

- George Soros
- Hillary Clinton
- Jesse Jackson
- Barrack Obama
- The New Black Panthers
- …and more

Some individuals might claim that there's no way someone can take on this collection of massively powerful and wealthy elites in a single lawsuit, and they may be right. However whether or not this lawsuit is successful, is completely irrelevant.

What matters far more, is that the word is starting to get out there. The President of the Dallas Fallen Officer Foundation, an extremely reputable organization, is taking steps to file a massive lawsuit against these individuals. This will, at the very least, do several things:

- Potentially serve a massive blow to the globalists
- Show the elites that we will not back down
- Generate huge amounts of public awareness
- Show the average gun rights promoting, masculine, traditional American that they have our support.

And best of all? The lawsuit was filed in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, which means that the outcome will generally be good either way.

First of all, there's a very high likelihood of them winning due to the case being handled in Texas, a highly conservative state. Second, in the event that the case doesn't win, it will likely be pursued all the way to the Supreme Court. If this occurs, expect truly amazing things to happen. The reason why? The President of the United States is responsible for appointing Supreme Court judges—and guess who's going to be President in two months?

2. The GrubHub Crash

After Matt Maloney, CEO of the online food delivery service GrubHub, proclaimed in an email that if you agree with Trump's politics you should resign, their stock dropped by nearly 10% in just a few days.

Since this time, in addition to his company's stock tanking, he has received ample backlash on sites of all manner: from Twitter to Facebook to Reddit to independent blogs to major alt-right news centers.

This is what my fellow ROK contributors and manosphere bloggers were talking about when they mentioned the "tangible impact" of Trump voters. Hillary's supporters lack the characteristics necessary to make change:

- A burning passion and sense of purpose
- Moral fortitude and a sense of justice
- Self-confidence, and the courage to stand up for your rights
- A fucking spine

This is why we will win, period. The anti-Trump crowd is based around having a massive entitlement complex, a victim complex, not thinking for yourself, and being a blind social sheep. Do people like this ever have ANY political or financial power in the world?

Of course not! Who do you think all of the hard working businessmen are? All of the entrepreneurs? All of the people investing in the stock market in order to take control of their financial future? Hard working, intelligent men, who don't make excuses, obviously. And do you know what? These are the types of men that voted for Donald Trump.

Why do you think the Dow Jones Industrial Average is at an all time high? Because Trump's win restored faith in America.

3. Rise of the New Media

The mainstream media has repeatedly shown to be completely incompetent in regards to actually reporting on the issues; they are nothing more than a puppet show meant to distract, entertain, and brainwash the American public.

They have consistently lied about candidates, manipulated the evidence, falsified facts, skewed statistics and polls, and defamed multiple individuals for a mere political opinion; this will happen no longer.

With the rise of the new media, more and more men have begun establishing outlets across all platforms: Reddit, Twitter, Facebook, YouTube, Periscope, the list goes on and on.

I firmly believe that the next eight years will be looked back on by historians as one of the most important times in all of humanity's time on this earth.

America has brought the world stability; we have stood as a symbol and an ideal for other countries to follow. We are a monolith of free speech, bravery, and economic prosperity—and the elites have tried to destroy all of this to satisfy their greedy little egos.

The men of America will not have this. Over the past 8 years (Cough Obama's Presidency Cough) we have seen an exponential increase in not only the quantity of alternative news outlets, but also the quality.

Sites that were merely blogs a few years ago have evolved into full-blown news syndicates with live reporting, on-site video footage, and actual news anchors. This is literally the people fighting back; we want freedom of speech, and we will have it.

While the mainstream media draws its final breath, they're proclaiming that there's this "new, radical white-nationalist group called the alt-right," in an attempt to make us look like evil Fascists. In fact, I just had somebody threaten to kill me on Twitter, but was he banned? Of course not.

This repeated favoring of violent, mentally ill leftists makes it very clear what the MSM's agenda is—total control and a complete suppression of our freedoms of speech. Sorry, but the alternative media isn't going to let this happen.

4. Massive Boycotts of Anti-Trump Companies

The left's hypocrisy never ceases to amaze me. Somehow they can completely legally destroy an independent, family owned business for simply refusing to bake a gay couple a cake, but when Trump supporters simply boycott a multi-billion dollar conglomerate, we're the ones that are hateful?

In response to several CEO's statements regarding Trump's "racism," and "hate," the men and women who voted for Donald Trump decided to simply boycott them. Despite this completely legal and anti-violent response, the left is up in arms.

Here is a list of companies whose CEO's have been caught attacking Donald Trump and his pro-American policies:

- PepsiCo (They own Pepsi, Lays, Mountain Dew, Starbucks, and More)
- Nabisco (Their brands include Oreo, Chips Ahoy!, Ritz, and More)
- Netflix
- Macy's
- Ben & Jerry's

Each and every single one of these companies has either spoken out against Trump directly, has refused to do business with Trump, or has moved factory production outside of the US (such as Nabisco, which has started moving production to Mexico). Some companies, such as Ben & Jerry's, have even openly supported the terrorist movement Black Lives Matter.

Again, what do these actions signify in Trump supporters? Power. Assertiveness. Courage. A willingness to take action. This is why Donald Trump won—his supporters are grown ups, not little babies who want more safe spaces and anti-free speech zones.

When Donald Trump's voters get oppressed by the biased, controlled media, or by elite globalists, they don't whine or cry about it, they just do something. They protest and stop supporting companies that are shipping our jobs away. They speak out in a logical, rational way against the anger and hatred that the left has towards white men.

They take their lives into their own hands rather than relying on a stupid system that caters to cry babies and whiners. They take their health into their own hands, they take their finances into their own hands, and they take their relationships into their own hands.

They don't wait around for someone else to do it for them—they get it done themselves. This is why Trump got into office, and this is why we're going to make America great again.

8 Reasons Why You Should Try Photography As A Hobby

November 21, 2016 | by Ness Nomadison | Link | Original Link

Have you ever had a curiosity in photography, yet you weren't sure if it's a hobby really worthy of your limited time? Then this article was written for you, as I was also once in your shoes.

I picked up a DSLR camera for the first time back in 2013, which awoke a passion inside me that I never even knew was there. Three and half years later, I'm here to tell you just a few of the many benefits and realizations I've experienced by taking on this timeless hobby. Here are eight reasons photography might just be the most meaningful hobby you've overlooked your entire life.

1. An Opportunity to Flex Your Creative Muscle

In order to be balanced human beings, I believe people need to be physically healthy, spiritually awake, and creatively expressive. Photography, just like writing and film, is a selfless way to be creative while also giving something back to the world.

The way we interpret our world changes from individual to individual, and photography provides a medium for people to express themselves. Ask ten different photographers to photograph the same thing – a city for example – and be prepared to see ten wildly different visions of the same subject. In our sensory-overload world, it feels good to create something that’s uniquely you.

2. Appreciate and Understand Your Surroundings More

I now find myself seeing everything around me in rectangular frames–a takeaway from having to frame so many pictures over the years. “Oh, those people over there would fit perfectly into a 3:2 box,” or “that building over there would look perfect boxed in from this angle.” My eyes are now sharper than ever.

But I also find myself observing and appreciating all the little things around me. I always have to keep my camera nearby, because I often want to photograph something I’ve noticed in my daily routine. The pattern on a sewer lid, a reflection in a puddle, birds perched in a tree, and so forth.

My pre-photographer self, just like most of the rest of the world, would have walked right past these things without a care in the world. Yet now I can be entertained from the most minuscule and simple things, especially if my camera is handy. The world is full of photogenic things, if can just teach yourself to notice them.

3. Help Preserve History

Since its inception, photography has always been one of the most moving ways to preserve history in our rapidly changing modern times. Photos touch people in a way other media can't. Both photography and video are both visual arts, but photographs differ in that they capture merely one frame of what is going on. Yet one frame is all one needs to feel taken back to another time.

With the advent of the smartphone, photography is as accessible as ever. While this sounds good on paper, the truth is our world's becoming more and more flooded with garbage and narcissistic photographs. Our world needs more adventurous and well-trained photographers out there taking photos of the modern world we live in and the rapid changes it's undergoing. These are the photos that will be cherished decades down the road, not all the shitty selfies that bog down social media.

4. Travel Experiences Will Be More Meaningful

Photography goes with traveling like bread goes with butter. It took me nearly five years of traveling internationally to finally get serious about doing photography on my trips, and after I got started, I never looked back.

Rather than traveling for escapism and hedonism, I'm traveling to learn about and document our world. As a result, my trips feel much more meaningful and fulfilling than they ever did before. The way you see and come to understand a country as a photographer is quite different than if you weren't one.

I now divide my history of travel experiences into two separate groups–the trips I had before I owned a DSLR camera, and the trips I had after buying one. Photography is so fun and addicting, that I find myself wanting to go back to all those pre-DSLR camera destinations, even the ones I didn't enjoy all that much, just so I can re-experience them with a camera in hand.

5. An Opportunity to Meet New People

One thing I always try to do when I travel is meet fellow photographers. Whether they be foreign or local, I appreciate talking to people with an observational eye, as they can provide me with unique insight that non-photographers rarely can.

But photography doesn't just help you meet other photographers, it helps you meet other people from all walks of life. I've had regular people on the street come up and talk to me once they saw I was taking photos. I've also met people from online for no other reason than they liked my work.

Being a good photographer can also be a great way to meet women. They're not gonna start blowing you as soon as they see your awesome pictures, but don't be surprised if you discover some newfound female admiration once your excellent photography skills are out in the open. And if you can make a woman look beautiful in a photo, she'll admire you in a way you never imagined.

6. A Blog with an Edge

In the diverse world of independently run blogs, how many bloggers do you know who can both write well and photograph well? I can literally only think of one, and the fact that this blogger is just as good at utilizing a camera as he is at wielding a pen (or rather a keyboard), puts his website in a league of its own in terms of quality content.

Though I still highly respect the good bloggers out there for their amazing writing skills and insights, I think they're doing both their readers and websites a great disservice by merely using stock photos or shitty shot-with-a-cell-phone photos in their articles.

Readers can definitely tell the difference when a blogger takes all of their own photos with a nice DSLR camera. Start taking nice, DSLR-shot photos and see for yourself how they can enhance your articles. They'll give you just that much more of an edge over all the other bloggers who don't.

7. You'll Also Have an Edge over 98% of Others on Social Media and Dating Sites

Since everyone else is posting lame, smartphone-taken shots all over their social media accounts, your DSLR-shot photos could shine like diamonds in the rough. The same way you stand above 98% of other men by lifting weights regularly, the same advantage can be expected by not taking cheap shortcuts with your social media-bound photography. Your Facebook, Instagram, and Twitter accounts will all look better than ever before.

This is also true for dating websites and apps, where most chumps just take some lame mirror selfies with their smartphone and then upload them to their accounts. Dudes with well-taken, nontraditional photos stand out big time. Don't just take my word for it, as there has actually been plenty of discussion about these benefits over at the Roosh V Forum.

And although they can be very helpful, you don't actually need another photographer with you to get some good shots of yourself. Rather all you need is your camera, an autofocus lens, a tripod, a remote shutter, and a creative eye.

8. A Resume-enhancing, Marketable Skill

Photography isn’t just mentally rewarding, it can also be financially rewarding if you play your cards right. The field of profitable photography may be vast and highly competitive, but one thing’s for sure – the demand for new photographs is infinite. The world never stops turning after all. Stock, portrait, wedding, wildlife, travel, sports, and news photography are just a few of the most in demand and profitable niches.

But if you really wanna make money selling your photographs, you gotta make a name for yourself by sharpening your skills and networking with the right people. A great photographer who no one knows exists won’t make any money.

My father is an outdoorsman slash wildlife photographer with decades of experience, tens of thousands of photos, and a giant network of contacts from his industry. It seems like magazine and website editors are always knocking on his door, because they know he probably has a nice shot of exactly what they’re looking for. Often all he has to do is dig through his archives, and boom–he’s made 500 bucks.

Conclusion

Stop dreaming about it, and just give photography a shot already. Borrow your friend or a family member's DSLR camera for the weekend, and just get out there and take pictures of anything that strikes your fancy.

Photography takes decades to master, but it all begins with a single click of the shutter button. Yet sometimes all it takes is one little click to realize you've been missing out on something very big and meaningful your entire life. You'll never know until you try.

How We Can Win The Propaganda War

November 22, 2016 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

It's now been over a week since the most glorious victory ever recorded in the war against rapacious globalism and lunatic Cultural Marxism—the election of Donald Trump to the Presidency of the United States. Like many of you, I was outside with my fellow tribesmen (the same tribe our opponents tried to shut down in February) until about 4 A.M. on Election Day. As you may expect, it was a joyous occasion that I'll never forget.

Yet, as I remarked at the time, while this was a glorious victory, a decisive one that ended the campaign, the war would continue. I had hoped to be as magnanimous as possible in victory, to finally bridge some divides and begin to move past the insanity we've been dealing with that's accelerated in the past few years. However, as has quickly become apparent, the Cultural Marxists, SJW's, and their globalist overlords have no intention of coming to terms or engaging in meaningful self-reflection anytime soon. Instead, they're doubling down on everything that voters resoundingly rejected on November 8th.

Predictably, there have been "protests" and some riots. Incidents of violence on the left have taken place and gone underreported. Just as predictably, most of these "protests" are professionally organized, with George Soros likely pulling at least a few of the strings. Learning nothing, the regressive leftists taking to the streets, complete with their Year Zero pathology, think themselves morally justified in blocking streets and attacking people, because they're on a mission to purify society. Anything that stands in the way of that mission can be justly eliminated.

I came across one of these "protests" a few days ago. It was generic and small, basic bitch shit, really. But recall that these are merely the peons in the army of their overlords. Their intensity will dissipate with time. The safety-pin wearing, safe-space occupying, neon-haired freaks aren't the ones to take note of on the grand strategic map. The bigger picture to focus on is the drive toward increased censorship in the past few days.

The recent counteroffensive began with the uproar over Donald Trump's selection of Steve Bannon to be his chief White House strategist. The media and its acolytes on social media went into another coordinated attack, lambasting Bannon and Breitbart, which he ran, as having connections to the "alt-right," which in turn, they say, is "associated with white nationalism." To reinforce this pairing, the media ran with a couple of the most controversial Breitbart headlines.

If you recognize this tactic, it's because the media A/B tested this against Roosh in February. They took the "How to Stop Rape" headline, said that it proved that Roosh was "pro-rape," and then repeated endlessly.

This is actually a sort of hypnosis trick and was certainly done deliberately. Scott Adams calls this word-thinking:

> Rational People: Use data and reason to arrive at truth. (This group is mostly imaginary.)
> Word-Thinkers: Use labels, word definitions, and analogies to create the illusion of rational thinking. This group is 99% of the world.
> Persuaders: Use simplicity, repetition, emotion, habit, aspirations, visual communication, and other tools of persuasion to program other people and themselves. This group is about 1% of the population and effectively control the word-thinkers of the world.

He further describes the phenomenon of word-thinking:

> Word-thinking is important to persuasion because if you can convince someone to accept a label on an opponent, it turns off their critical thought and turns on their confirmation bias. Nuance is lost. Context is lost. All that matters once the label is accepted is whatever qualities the label already contained.

And this is what the media is doing. They did it with Roosh and are now doing their damndest to do it to Bannon, no doubt as one of the thousand paper cuts they hope to use to take President Trump down.

Because the term "alt-right" is relatively fresh, it's vulnerable to being defined with the most ominous, dark terms possible, which is why the media is trying furiously to create as much connective tissue between it and "white nationalism" as possible. Remember, with word-thinking, nuance and context are lost.

And now that this first step has been achieved where it was meant to, the self-anointed moral cover for the more alarming stage of the counteroffensive is underway. Now that the ambiguous and ominous-sounding "alt-right" has been attempted to be extensively defined, the solution is obviously to crack down on it and anyone having to do with it (even if they really don't). Given this pretext, the purges and censorship have begun, with numerous prominent Twitter accounts being suspended. Agree with these accounts or not (I often don't), it should give you pause that this kind of blanket censorship is being implemented. If you're just a little bit politically unorthodox, you're now at heightened risk of being slapped with the "alt-right" label (even if you're on record as not identifying with it) and banned from outlets of communication that are both vital for pushing your ideas forward and for promoting any business you have.

But banning individuals is only stage one. Stage two is the recent drive by Google, Facebook, Twitter, and others to censor what they call "fake news." The media has been on a blitz against these "fake news" articles, completely unironically given that this is the same crowd that uncritically signal boosted the Rolling Stone rape hoax to the ends of the world, "fact checks" Donald Trump's comment that Hillary Clinton "acid washed" her private email server, selectively edits clips to promote the narrative that their pets in "Black Lives Matter" are entirely peaceful when they aren't, and fails to disclose contacts and relationships with officials of the Democratic National Committee while writing about the campaign.

No, this is not the Onion.

While this drive deserves to be a subject of laughter, we must nevertheless still take it seriously. There have already been reports of shadow bans on Twitter with prominent figures such as Mike Cernovich and Scott Adams, and it's far from out of the question that a blacklist of sorts gets put up for outlets such as Return Of Kings, which were crucial in taking control of the narrative during the campaign. All the while, the media continues to nitpick, inflate, and manufacture anything they can turn into a controversy about the incoming Trump administration. Narrative warfare is far from over.

What Can We Do?

Fortunately, we have a master persuader in Donald Trump to lead the way, but we at the grassroots, the grunts in the trenches, if you will, must continue our efforts.

First, we need to begin to de-hypnotize those that can be. Scott Adams had some thoughts on that, but here are the crucial points:

1. The basis of the hypnosis in recent days has been around pairing the terms "alt-right" and "fake news" with all sorts of bad things.

2. Take away that pairing and you've made significant inroads.

I've A/B tested this sort of thing numerous times. Remember Mike Cernovich's maxim that "conflict is attention and attention is influence." Here are a few pointers.

1. Just like with women, frame control is paramount. The inevitable tactic that they'll try to use is to associate anyone opposed to them with the worst elements of their "side." Fortunately, our opponents have arguably worse elements given their blanket of moral superiority and cultural influence. Refocus the frame on those. Make them own their own worst elements.

2. Appeal to vanity. Most people like to think of themselves as "rational." Tell them that their word-thinking is literally shutting down their critical thinking skills. I did this with a girl after the first debate, explaining to her that because “the movie in her head pictured a ‘Mexican’ in a certain way,” her critical thinking skills turned off, and that what Trump said about “the Mexican judge” would be equally applicable to someone of another heritage like “German.” It’s a long story, but her face was a picture. Tell them that they’re seeing things not based on reality, but on the movies playing in their heads, triggered by a certain word. Then watch the cognitive dissonance come.

On the broader level, here’s what we can do:

1. Continue on as usual. Continue to make a cultural impact. Get those websites, books, movies, and so on out there. Echoing what one member of the forum said: “politics is air cover, culture is the ground war.” They can try to censor “fake news” all they want, but we are too numerous to control if we don’t cooperate. It’s now time to redouble our efforts.

2. Don’t talk to any aggrieved victimhood class on social media if they’re acting hostile to you. They’ll use any excuse to ban you. Law 36: Disdain Things You Cannot Have, Ignoring them is the Best Revenge.

3. Begin to build new networks. Gab is up and coming and is far more free speech friendly.

4. I will echo what many others have said on the forum. MAKE FUN OF THEM. They’re a prime target for humor. Believe me when I say most people are sick of the special snowflakes on the street as well as the media.

This is a time of great opportunity, but we need to readjust for the new moves our opponents are making. They’re doing everything they can to censor us and de-legitimize Trump. That’s the next focus of the campaign. We must de-legitimize them in turn.

But take heart that we’re now in the ascendant. Otherwise they wouldn’t be making these moves. I recall when I first visited Return Of Kings and the forum nearly four years ago, there was a general malaise in the atmosphere. Day after day, it seemed, we were suffering another defeat. No longer.

Nationalism Is A Trap

More people are coming to the truthful conclusion that globalism is a failure and nationalism, where a country's people and interests are valued above that of non-citizens, is the way forward. A problem is that the globalism-nationalism framework is exactly the type of dialectic elites can use to usher in a global war or crackdown to further increase their power.

Imagine there is a wife who is tired of her husband going out every night with his friends to drink. Instead of nagging at him every evening, which would have the effect of motivating him to leave the house even sooner, she will wait until he gets into a drunk driving accident or serious bar fight so she could "draw the line" and make the reasonable ultimatum for him to never drink again. The husband is more likely to listen to her after something wrong takes place than after he had a safe night out.

Right now the nationalist movement is being allowed to gain strength so that a future event can act as a trigger for globalists to "draw the line" on the movement by imprisoning or killing its strongest members. In other words, globalists plan to use nationalism as a trap, a device they transform into to their advantage. As of right now, the budding nationalist movement is extremely useful in allowing them to identify all "resisters" before easily crushing them when the time is right.

Elites cannot advance their plans without a dialectic

The way the elites move an agenda forward is through a dialectic, meaning that two opposing ideologies rub against each other, create friction, and from that comes a desired result (i.e. "order from chaos"). Those in power either control or monitor the existence of both sides to guide and bend the dialectic to serve their ends.

The recent rise in nationalism, I speculate, has been allowed because previous dialectics such as capitalism vs communism and democracy vs terrorism are no longer useful in advancing the desired agenda. Soviet Communism is dead and increased terrorism did not allow planned wars in Syria and Iran to proceed like 9/11 did with Iraq and Afghanistan. In addition, the white vs black race war is years late, stubbornly resistant to the gasoline that Obama pours onto the fire. A new dialectic must be nurtured, and so nationalism may just do the trick. Hillary's recent alt right speech officially debuted American nationalism as the new "enemy."

While your conclusion that nationalism is logical and beneficial to a nation is true, and I'm sure to agree with it, you were guided onto those beliefs. How did you arrive at nationalist thought? Through decades of free trade, feminism, and open-door immigration that have worn you and your country down. Your arrival at nationalist conclusions is the direct result of globalism, which means that nationalist thoughts exist in your mind only because of the likes of George Soros, who pulled out a million Muslims from his hat and placed them in Europe while sponsoring a multitude of social justice organizations in the United States. His actions and behavior, along with other powerful globalists like him, have essentially created your very ideology, because you are entrenched in a dialectic where opposing forces must exist and be in combat with each other.

The growth of nationalism is "useful"

Nationalism must continue to grow in power right before the moment it can threaten globalist banking and geopolitical interests, and when it does, the globalists will clamp down severely on it. As if replaying World War 2, they will identify a nationalist country as the big bad bully, and then use that country as an excuse to start a war that will simultaneously weed out nationalists throughout the world by sending them to die or having them arrested at home for “subversion” or “treason.” Russia is the evil nationalist country that neocons and others have been poking, and even Poland is being puffed up into an “undemocratic” country in order to hedge their bets.

A hint that this may already be taking place is that France recently called upon “patriots” to serve in their National Guard to “protect citizens.” Since when does France care about patriots? They have committed no consistent actions in the past decade that suggest they do care, so we must reasonably conclude that this new army is a trap to attract nationalists into a game where the end result is their death. I wouldn’t be surprised if France’s beefed-up army is used to start a war in a place like Poland, which will be painted as an aggressor that caused “economic attacks” upon the saintly Western Europeans.

As long as you’re in the dialectic, which I see as a sort of Twilight Zone creation of the mega rich, you’re fighting on their terms. They need the nationalist “grassroots” uprising to create violent events that allow them to re-assert control and power. Even though nationalism may be the most sane movement of the day, it still plays into their hands as long as we insist on having only two sides of the debate, good and evil, as if we were living in a Hollywood-style storyline. Instead of this two-dimensional arrangement, the solution may be to go 3D, where you can move front and back and around in a spectrum of ideas, instead of just left and right where you’re a pawn of the game no matter what side you pick.

Just because a nationalist “resistance” is growing, doesn’t mean that that the globalists in power are being hurt. Without being able to effectively control the Western population through the Cold War, terrorism, racial divide-and-conquer, or modern Russian aggression, they are hoping that the nationalist movement grows enough to create the conflict that moves their chess pieces forward. While I’m not urging you to throw away your nationalist beliefs, as I surely won’t throw away mine, it is clear to me that a trap is waiting to be sprung, and we will all suffer when it’s finally launched.

Stockholm's "Feminist" Snow Removal Program Causes The Entire City To Shut Down

November 22, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Convinced that previous snow plowing policies were "sexist," the city government of the Swedish capital of Stockholm recently implemented a "feminist" system for clearing it. It ended in disaster and the city came to an absolute standstill. For a start, four times as many people than usual were hospitalized for snow-related injuries. Nearly as importantly, countless workers, most of them men, were prevented from getting to work. It would appear that the patriarchy-backed snow won, as local politicians ended up apologizing for the havoc-causing changes.

Forgetting that motor vehicles are often more impeded by snow than pedestrians (and create a greater safety risk), municipal resources, which had already been increased, were diverted to clearing bicycle paths and sidewalks and away from main roads. Areas like schools were also prioritized, which again ignores the frequently greater ease of walking in snow than driving in it, plus the longer distances car commuters face compared to children, mothers and other women walking to places. The situation is quite plainly moronic for a further reason: non-main roads and other parts of a city take up much more space, meaning that the Swedish capital's snow removal teams were targeting a far larger, less densely used zone. To boot, this was all during a November already breaking records for snowfall.

The saga in Stockholm reads like an microcosm of feminism itself: an over-educated (meaning under-educated) group of leftists come together, create "data" based on feelings, and produce a plan of action that screws up an entire community. Feminists in Stockholm had previously complained that the thoroughfares cleaned up first and most extensively by snowplows were the ones heavily used by men. How they came to this conclusion is unclear but, given the shutdown of the city that resulted from the feminist changes, it wasn't based on any solid reasoning. With private cars and public transport vehicles alike unable to move in many cases, the "female-friendly" snow-clearing ended up adversely impacting far more people, including women, than the old one.

Well done, feminists and white knights.

What this says about Sweden

Is it really surprising that one of the people responsible for Stockholm's "female-friendly" snow plowing scandal, Mayor Karin Wanngård, is a feminist and career politician who first joined the council in her teens?

Because Sweden is perhaps the most concentrated welfare state in the world, not having people at their jobs and instead stuck in snow is a very bad thing. How can a country continue to pay such a large bill for handouts with elected representatives of the caliber of Stockholm's trying to ruin things? Sweden is also home to a growing class of low-skilled migrant communities, including many tens of thousands from the most recent Mediterranean waves last year. Its recent migrant population is now essentially the same proportionally-speaking as states more typically associated with multiculturalism, such as Canada and Australia. And non-ethnic Swedes in Sweden tend to come from more troublesome cultures, compared to the more assimilation-friendly East Asians and Indians emigrating to Canada and Australia.

How Sweden intends to deal with issues like this while balancing urgent economic needs remains to be seen, especially with brain-dead initiatives like the snow plow fiasco taking precedence. Add to the mix the recent creation of a "mansplaining" hotline by a Swedish labor union and you start to see the "real" problems Scandinavia's most basketcase society is trying to solve.

So who was organizing the snow plowing–and actually doing it?

Yup, you guessed it, it's a man driving.

There's no doubt that the feminist snow plowing scheme was an unmitigated disaster. And it's also extremely likely that the vast majority of people tasked with clearing Stockholm's streets are men. Oh, the irony. Not only do feminist politicians try to preference women in the removal of snow, they expect men to do the work in achieving it. Just as sanitation workers and garbage collectors are invariably male, don't expect to catch too many female snowplow operators and other snow-clearing employees in Stockholm.

Wake up, Sweden

Swedish multiculturalism in action.

Stockholm's snow removal catastrophe is emblematic of a country refusing to deal with its real malaise. While the men who built Sweden are categorized as would-be oppressors, Swedish society itself is close to breaking point. Even Stockholm's central train station is now terribly unsafe and various city police forces have long made it known that they do not have control of many suburbs. In particular, Malmö, Sweden's third city, and certain districts of Stockholm are notorious for ethnic ghettos, gang violence, rape, and other crime.

But no, mansplaining hotlines and not removing snow in a new, feminist way are the clear and present dangers most Swedes should fear at night.

Is Feminism A Giant Shit Test?

November 23, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

As feminism erodes down to its tattooed, lesbian core, we should stop and take a moment to wonder what the point of the third wave part of feminism was. Although it ultimately proves destructive to western societies to give women "equality," at least the first and second wave had something legitimate to bitch about. Third wave feminism; not so much, and today we'll talk about the underlying motives and the end game of it all.

When one looks at modern feminism, you see women who have "flipped the script," to use their term, and rewired life so that men are not necessary for them. A modern feminist has her own job that can meet her needs, but maybe not all her wants, and has her own small place with her cat(s) and Netflix. When she wants the company of men, she goes out and sluts it up and is always successful due to the biological imperative of men.

On the surface, a feminist woman may appear to be the analog of a Red Pill Man, yet, upon closer examination, she is actually an imperfect copy. A man works harder, more dangerous jobs, and makes more money because of it, thus he has money for anything he wants and more. A proper man has interesting hobbies and a healthy, fit lifestyle, and he must do this to fulfill his potential and inner drive, but also because he realizes that normal men do not get laid due to hypergamy and he must be the best he can be if he wants to be successful with women.

However, the most crucial difference lies in the outcome. Women, who outlast their shelf lives while still being single are miserable, and I fully expect the suicide rate of women of my generation to skyrocket in about 5 years from now. Men, whose value is based on their production and can enjoy a later in life peak than women, also can live for other things than companionship and family, and can be quite happy on their own, even if they did want a family at one time, or still do.

So, the question is, if women, despite their feminist pandering to the contrary, actually DO want a man to live with and grow old with, why is third wave feminism devoted to stopping that in every which way? The answer, like most things, lies in the red pill philosophy. Women, including feminists, only want the best men; modern feminism is nothing more than a nuclear-level shit test.

A woman needs an alpha man like a fish needs water

SJW society today tells us that men are not supposed to hit on women in the grocery store, in the bookstore, or at the coffee shop because that's a precursor to stalking or some shit. At night, you're not supposed to hit on girls at the bar or club, because they are there with the friends and not looking for that. At work, you're not even supposed to talk to women about anything other than work-related topics because that's harassment.

If you are wondering where is a guy supposed to meet girls, then you get the point and the answer is that you're not. Feminists, and women in general, know that any man who actually allows them to regulate his behavior is not a man worth having in the first place, so they are only interested in men that see that the answer to feminism's constraints is to ignore them in the first place.

Combining the above shit test with hypergamy will result in a winning combo. If a man is successful, good looking, and alpha enough, he has a good chance of pulling another man's wife directly out of their marriage and family and taking her away. Women are ultimately interested only in their own self interest and that means, when confronted with the best man she has ever beheld, she will go against feminism because it is not in her own best self interest at the time, and instead, be receptive to the man in hopes of snaring him.

Ultimately, women DO still need and want men, they just don't want to be bothered by inferior men, and third wave feminism does a good job of convincing the betas to stay away until they are wanted for their paychecks by post-Wall NASCAR-style wrecks of women.

When is enough enough?

When you look at feminism logically (which is hard), you can come up with the premise that women have been disadvantaged over history, and feminism is an effort to balance the scales. They will disguise it in self-depreciating irony "feminism is the radical notion that men and women are equal," but what they really men is that men and women should be equal over the balance of history, and, since women have been so disadvantaged, men had better get ready for some suck to square the accounts.

I bet she's been in 100 ROK articles by now…

The question then follows, if men "owe" women, how much are we talking? Can it ever be paid off, or have women been so heinously treated over the entirety of our existence that there will never be enough atonement to make up for it? I have three theories.

It could be that men have apparently treated women so badly for all time that it can never be paid off because it's an absolute. The problem with absolutes is they lack scope. The worst atrocities in history have been borne by both men and women alike, and it could be said that men have borne the heavier half, as they are usually expected to die before defeat in war, whereas women, although they get raped by the conquerors, at least get to live. I doubt most women have been treated that badly, though, on the balance, so there is probably some finite amount of penance men would do to restore "equality."

The other two theories center on the idea that, eventually, men will atone for all faults perceived by feminism, and the only difference lies in what happens then. My second idea is not a noble one, but it is probably the most accurate. Feminists, you see, are not for equality, they are for female supremacy, and, once "equality" is reached, women will get to be on top for millennia. Some would say we are already at that point, and this is why anyone who is not a feminist can see why the movement has faltered and lost whatever relevance it ever had. When you already have it all, shouldn't you stop and try to actually make things equal, that is, if you actually have moral integrity?

That's the third idea, the concept of, once all debts are paid, "true equality" would rule. I doubt this one would ever happen, as our victimhood-empowerment culture makes it advantageous to be a victim, and you can't be a victim if your demographic is on top. Plus, being "feelers," not "thinkers," the average woman lacks the intellectual capacity to be honest with themselves.

Conclusion

Combining the idea of feminism being a massive shit test to guys and a scam to win money and prizes from society just because you have a vagina, one can see that the only solution is to treat it like the cult bullshit it is. While that is nothing new for those of us here at Return of Kings, and nothing new for those our message reaches, the reason we must treat it like that has hopefully been a little more exposed to the light here.

The reason that feminism makes no sense, and makes it seem like all men have no way to succeed and must lose everything is because that is precisely the point. There is no way to win, there is no equality, there is only female superiority, males that go along with it, and men that do not.

Mainstream Media Calls Real News “Fake” Because Their Narrative Is Collapsing

November 23, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

There are those who think we should only get our news from “official” sources. You know, like the blonde telling you what to believe in between hocking a hockey game.

If there’s anything the 2016 election showed us, it’s that the American people are increasingly distrustful of and not listening to the commands laid out by the once mainstream media. They’re increasingly reticent to commit national and demographic suicide under the guise of “diversity” and other nebulous ideals. They’re desperate not only to “drain the swamp” but to restore some sense of national pride and stability to the declining USA.

In response, the controllers of the presstitutes (the people who really run the world) are already hard at work trying to find some way to create a false narrative about “fake news” sites in order to lay the ground work for censorship and control. The Internet has all but destroyed the corporate-government narrative, and there is a shit fit happening at the highest levels of the propaganda ministry (i.e. CNN, ABC, CBS, NBC, et. al.) because they have learned the American people know how full of shit they really are.

Sites like Return Of Kings are on the front lines of this war in support of free speech and it is vitally important we stay on top of our game to avoid a reversion to the managed propaganda the centralized control of mass media gave us over the last 50 years.

Hackers and leakers play right into the hands of the censorship narrative

Make no mistake, one of the reasons leakers of misdeeds done by politicians and the elite they work for have been allowed to continue leaking dirty laundry is because it plays into the hands of those with designs on censorship and re-gaining control of the information the sheeple get to listen to. Having Julian Assange and Edward Snowden doing leaks of information and giving them extensive press coverage plays right into the hands of the censorship brigade because they can also play the protecting national security game when the time to silence dissent comes.

Fake news is only the first assault in what is sure to become a full scale war on free speech on the Internet. We can be thankful Trump won the election rather than The Bitch since his election will slow the process of censorship, but the aggressiveness of the "fake news" narrative shows us how determined some people are to shut us up and shut us down.

The New York Times is already on the front lines of this assault on free speech on the Internet. Only days after The Bitch lost the election, publisher Arthur Sulzberger published a Mea Culpa and promised to rededicate the newspaper to "honest" reporting.

> We cannot deliver the independent, original journalism for which we are known without the loyalty of our subscribers… [The New York Times promises to] give the news impartially, without fear or favor… We also approach the incoming Trump administration without bias.

Don't buy into it. This is what's known in Public Relations as a diversion tactic. While we focus on our seeming victory, they're already moving on to their next false narrative – so-called fake news. No sooner than the ink dried on the promise to give Trump a chance, The New York Times was moving to shut up the very people who made possible his rise to power – the alt-right and alternative news web sites.

> While some fake news is produced purposefully by teenagers in the Balkans or entrepreneurs in the United States seeking to make money from advertising, false information can also arise from misinformed social media posts by regular people that are seized on and spread through a hyperpartisan blogosphere.

They did a spurious case study on how a "rumor" got started about protesters being bussed in to protest at Trump rallies. Never mind the mainstream media is a business that runs lock, stock and barrel on fake news. Almost every narrative they create is a false one. One need do no more than a Google search to discredit many, if not most of the mainstream media's stories. The hypocrisy is astounding.

Pulling The Plug

Facebook censorship algorithms are nothing compared to the elite's agenda of eliminating free speech online

Whether or not the "fake news" narrative gains traction, the next step will be for the elite to create a problem that affects millions of people online, then follow through with the Hegelian Dialectic with a pre-ordained "solution" to "make everyone safer online" and to "stop the spread of false information" while "protecting free speech" online by destroying it.

Look for no less than a figurative "Internet 9/11" if the elite become desperate enough.

They'll pull the plug on the backbone of the Internet, shutting down e-commerce and communication online for a few days, blame it on a "fake news" story (just like Benghazi was blamed on a YouTube video) then spring in to save us from ourselves by passing all sorts of creative laws and restrictions aimed at nothing more than eliminating competition to the corporate-government narrative and gutting yet another of our Bill of Rights protections.

Make no mistake, Freedom of Speech is the most important of Amendments to the Constitution. Once that is taken away, it's Game Over.

Obama has already floated the idea of silencing those of us who "cling to our guns and religion" and continues this narrative even after the election of Trump

Obama has already been floating the idea of official news web sites. This is nothing more than proposing the creation of the American equivalent of Pravda in the Soviet Union, in which only the state-approved newspaper was considered the truth and everything else was considered lies. Obviously, the New World Order socialist narrative would be the only truth under a system such as this, and traditional and conservative views would be relentlessly silenced

Check out what The Messiah said in Berlin recently.

> In an age where there's so much active misinformation, and it's packaged very well, and it looks the same when you see it on a Facebook page or you turn on your television, where some overzealousness on the part of a US official is equated with constant and severe repression elsewhere, if everything seems to be the same and no distinctions are made, then we won't know what to protect. If we can't discriminate between serious arguments and propaganda, then we have problems.

The fact he is saying these things should frighten you. It should also make you angry. This statement is a PC way of saying the goal of the power structure is to shut us the fuck up. They want us to listen to clueless "journalists" who encourage the idea of microchipping your children and later, yourselves so every aspect of your life can be controlled by the government.

We must fight back by discrediting the "fake news" narrative at every turn and informing those who will listen of the possibility of a fake "Internet 9/11" designed to give the government a reason to curb free expression on the very Libertarian Internet of today.

An Exploration Of Finding Meaning In Life Through Logotherapy

November 23, 2016 | by Jacques de Seingalt | Link | Original Link

What motivates you to live? What is the meaning of life?

For centuries, mankind has questioned everything. Mankind's quest for the answer to what drives us, and what pushes us forward in times of darkness is not exempt from analysis. In fact, it's been a consistent theme since the dawn of time. Stoicism, although not directly attributed to answering 'what drives us', skirts around the topic and creates a general set of principles to help us deal with negative externalities in life.

While many philosophers have pontificated on the subject of mankind's driving force, and the 'will to live', there's a problem inherent with such an analysis. In order to research such a basic, and instinctual topic, one needs to experience a visceral, cerebral experience that brings him or her to a basic, instinctual level, before having such an epiphany. One needs to examine our animalistic base, and then explore logically from there.

One such analysis is known as Logotherapy, from the Greek word logos(wise). Logotherapy, developed by Viktor Frankl, is an influential school of psychotherapy, that is founded on the pillars of 'what motivates mankind'. Before we delve into Logotherapy, however, it's important that we discuss Viktor Frankl—who he was, and why his unique perspective provides for an incredibly powerful source of credibility and authority.

Viktor Frankl was born in 1905, in what was at that time known as Austria-Hungary. Frankl was a neurologist, and psychiatrist. His early life was relatively unspectacular, but from an early age he displayed an interest in philosophy, as well as psychotherapy. Initially interested in Freud and Adler's work, he began to see their faults, and eventually diverged from their teachings—becoming particularly interested in depression, as well as suicide.

During 1933-1937, Frankl, in completing his residency in neurology, was responsible for setting up the Selbstmörderpavillon, translated in English to "the suicide pavilion". It's estimated that Frankl, along with his staff, treated upwards of 30,000 women who had suicidal tendencies.

In September of 1942, his life was shaken. Frankl, along with his wife and family, were deported to a Nazi concentration camp, known as Theresienstadt ghetto. Whilst there, and during his stay at Auschwitz, Frankl worked as a doctor in the psychiatric care unit, focusing on mental health, helping newcomers deal with shock and grief.

In 1946, after three years in a concentration camp, Frankl released his book entitled Man's Search for Meaning, which details his experiences as a holocaust survivor, as well as his theory, which became known as Logotherapy. The book is divided into two parts—part one is a detailed account of his experiences, whereas part two discusses Logotherapy.

His time in the numerous concentration camps began to shape his philosophical, and psychiatric theory. While he had read books on the subject of 'psychological healing' prior to his imprisonment, he had never experienced it to the degree in which he had become accustomed to. Particularly intrigued as to why some prisoners lived longer than others, Frankl began to organize his thoughts and document how the average prisoner's life in a concentration camp was reflected in their mind. As a doctor focusing on grief and shock-stricken inmates, he was in a very unique position.

Hundreds, and during some weeks thousands, of helpless inmates were carted in Auschwitz, the most-feared concentration camp, weekly. Between the inmates sleeping next to him, and those seeking treatment, Frankl noted that each prisoner, without exception faced three stages of psychological reactions once entering the concentration camp. These stages were; shock, apathy, and depersonalization.

While seemingly unimportant, the noted documentation of these stages was very important for Frankl. As he began to notice, while every inmate experienced these stages, some experienced them to a less cerebral degree. Some inmates seemed less depressive than others, and featured a happier disposition. These inmates—with some expected variability—outlived the other inmates.

Discovery

As he began to poke and prod, Frankl noticed something that separated these individuals from others—hope. There is never not meaning in life. Every moment no matter how painful, dehumanizing or horrendous it is, has meaning. By extension, Frankl suggests, even suffering is meaningful. The inmates that survived the longest—the ones that outlived the rest, had hope. Frankl suggested that he could tell whether or not an inmate would live just by looking at their faces—the face of a dejected, depressed inmate was obvious and clear as day. Without hope, they were doomed.

> "Everything can be taken from a man but one thing: the last of the human freedoms—to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."

The next question that Frankl sought to answer was an important one, and the foundational maxim of Logotherapy—why did some men have hope, and others not?

The answer, was love.

> "The truth – that love is the ultimate and the highest goal to which Man can aspire. Then I grasped the meaning of the greatest secret that human poetry and human thought and belief have to impart: The salvation of Man is through love and in love. I understood how a man who has nothing left in this world still may know bliss, be it only for a brief moment, in the contemplation of his beloved."

Frankl, in his book Man's Search for Meaning recounted several instances where he would be driven into brief stints of depression; after a beating, during a late-night march in bare feet, or watching his friend get treated inhumanely. He'd vacillate from depression by thinking, and longing for his wife. The men whom lasted the longest, invariably had a wife, or a job that they loved. It was this motivator, the unquantifiable love, that pushed men in inhuman circumstances to existentially escape the physical realm, and put mind above body.

What we can get from this

To answer this, Frankl codified three ways that he discovered is how we can find meaning in life – A job, love, and how we react to suffering. It's important to realize that while it's easy to read this and assume that Frankl is saying we should all suffer in order to find meaning—he's not. He IS suggesting, however, that should we not have a job/deed, or love that allow us to find meaning in life, we can still find meaning by choosing how to react in a negative situation—our mental freedom is one of the only things that can never be taken from us, theoretically speaking.

The average man will never be faced with such a dire circumstance such as the atrocities that Frankl and so many others dealt with. What we can do, however, is choose how we react to life's adversities.

A fair assessment of Logotherapy is that it provides a simplistic solution to a complex question (life). Since life is such a complex series of events, Logotherapy offers a solution that may not be representative of life's true hardships and intricacies. In saying this, my own personal evaluation is that, this criticism in itself may have flaws, by assuming that a complex question must have a complex solution. Even the assumption that life is complex can be debated. It's a cliched saying that 'life is hard', or complex—and even if it is, it's not out of the realm of possibility that a complex question has a simple solution – sometimes the answer we seek is right in front of us.

Viktor Frankl died in September 1997, and his works are still read today. Several Logotherapy institutes exist today named after him.

Why Fighting Is Good For Men And Boys

November 24, 2016 | by Rik Storey | Link | Original Link

What would you do if you saw two boys of 6 years wrestling? Their shirts off, red and sweaty, they have a large group of peers around them, cheering, eyes wide and knuckles white. Would you stop them or give the young scraps some advice? Do you see a violent squabble or boys acting on natural impulses which will better equip them to defend their family and neighbours later in life? The answer you give is, in large part, dependent on your gender; so, the fact that this scenario would make an increasingly large number of men upset is a sign of a collapsing civilization. But, nil desperandum, Western civilization has the solution!

Mere horseplay!

As an early years professional, I saw education academics acknowledging the data—boys need ‘rough and tumble’ play for their mental and physical wellbeing! But they have no way of encouraging this in institutions where boys are immediately reprimanded for making finger-pistols at each other. Without saying it directly, they thought that the majority female teaching staff for younger age ranges were pushing our boys’ natural urge to fight like lion-cubs underground. What’s more, the boys were made to feel bad about themselves and their very nature.

Their solution? They suggested that more men be encouraged to teach younger children and engage in rough play with them. Until the late 1800’s, education was male dominated and boys spent a lot of time with male mentors. But, of course, there has been no effort to bring back that environment. Instead, a compromise between boys being boys and boys being fairy princesses was achieved—playing superheroes.

As though female teachers are going to tone down the disapproval as the boys shoot lasers and magic at each other. The treacherous political class present only feeble attempts to manage the symptoms of our societal masculinity problem; like sticking some tape over the burst pipe of our hemorrhaging testosterone as cultural marxism continues to swing the pick-axe of nth-wave feminism at it. So, it’s high time we took a few swings back.

But, first, we need to teach our lads how to fight.

At the age of 6 or 7, Viking children were taught the martial art of Glima. This was not just father and son play-fighting; boys and occasionally girls already wrestle with friends and family up to that age. This was more systematic, a group activity.

The Greeks also taught their boys how to wrestle because our other ancestors could see the big picture. The Hoplites, for example, were individualistic free men of all ages who voluntarily came together to practise combat; this not only strengthened their communities but also allowed these farmers to fend off the Persian Empire. Yet, today, even isolated expressions of violence in computer games are questioned by SJW's. Nevertheless, all the signs are there—our boys are yearning for the same activities practised by their forefathers.

At college, I started a unofficial fight club—men only. This based in large part on the book and movie of the same name, in which the narrator's Nietzschean alter ego, Tyler Durden, describes the bubbling frustration inside the ever-increasing number of 30-somethings coming together for underground fights: 'We're a generation of men raised by women.' Naturally, half the guys in my year were participating within a week. But, our young boys should be taught how to fight openly and without shame to avoid hidden expressions of violence and maybe even some mass-shootings by angry, loner teens. When they are young, it is the perfect time to teach them.

Young lads have no intention of seriously injurying their friends; it's just good fun and produces healthier attitudes towards violence and confidence in self-defence and the defence of one's community. Furthermore, a recent study has shown that fighting helps to strengthen peer relationships, meaning less bullying and segregation. It is interesting to compare the codes of honour of ancient Greek wrestling etc. with those we intuit as wrestling children.

- No intentional hitting or kicking
- No gouging the eyes or biting
- No going for the balls!

That’s precisely how I used to wrestle with my brothers and friends as a pup; it was just obvious. If someone took things ‘too far’, they were ostracised from the fun, at least until they calmed down and apologised. If someone got hurt, we stopped, checked whether they were just being a pussy or needed to get themselves mended; we kept calm and carried on.

The data are screaming that men haven’t changed, especially our need to practise fighting.

We still have the same natural impulses but their suppression, no, their demonisation has made our men weak and submissive. So much so, many are self-deprecating betas who believe masculinity is toxic, full of white guilt and ashamed of Western civilization. We have everything to be proud of and need to encourage our boys’ fighting spirit so they grow some balls, some confidence in themselves and their kin. That’s the spirit which has kept our enemies, foreign and domestic at bay for thousands of years and will do the same to cultural Marxism, malevolent immigrants and anyone else who wants to have a go. If we want to turn scrapping boys into men first and gentlemen second, we need to organise some fights, not break them up.

4 Reasons Why You Need To Maintain Your Energy Levels

November 24, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Limitless Brain

Modern life has a habit of draining the energy out of people. Whether it's the stress of work, commuting, paying the bills or eating a poor diet, most Westerners struggle to keep their energy levels up. However, succeeding at life, love and your career requires you to stay on the ball at all times, and you can only do that if you can keep your energy levels high. Here are four reasons why you need to maintain your energy levels…

1. It'll increase your success in business and your career

When you're tired and logy all the time, it makes you more likely to do the bare minimum to get by and pass up opportunities to improve your position in your business or career. People who are low-energy don't get anywhere in life. While we all laughed at President Trump calling Jeb Bush "low-energy," it was the truth: Trump's boundless enthusiasm and constant fighting were responsible for his success in business and in the presidential race.

If you maintain your energy levels, you'll have the drive to excel in your chosen career or grow your small business. High energy levels will provide you with the gumption necessary to power through obstacles in your day-to-day life and meet the challenges that you face. You won't do this if you're struggling to stay awake during your workday and retreating to video games as soon as you're off the clock.

2. It'll make you more successful with girls

Women don’t find low-energy couch potatoes attractive. Talking to girls at a bar, a coffee shop or on the street requires you to be on the ball and paying attention. If you don’t have sufficient levels of energy, you’re likely to screw up on approaches and dates, making getting laid all the more difficult.

By maintaining high energy levels, you’ll be able to more effectively charm women and get them into bed. By using supplements to naturally increase your energy level, you can avoid being a couch potato and live your life to the fullest.

3. It’ll improve your results in the gym

It may be a no-brainer, but it’s worth repeating: you need energy in order to lift well. Low energy levels mean you won’t perform as well in the gym. By boosting your energy levels naturally, you’ll be able to get the most out of your training sessions and make real progress towards your fitness goals.

4. It’ll make you more sociable

Related to point number two, a low energy level will hurt your social interactions with people in general, not just girls. Increasing your energy naturally will make it easier for you to navigate social situations with ease. It'll make you more charming and more able to carry yourself through challenging or stressful social situations, such as delivering a speech.

The benefits of maintaining your energy levels are so many and varied that I can't go over all of them here, but these four should be more than enough. Without energy, your day to day life becomes much more difficult and taxing. By increasing your energy, you'll be able to succeed in all areas of existence.

So how do you increase your energy levels so that you can excel in all aspects of life?

The simplest and most effective way to quickly increase your energy levels is through supplementation. Now I don't mean going out and taking nasty supplements that'll only leave you feeling drained or end up doing more bad to your body than good. The most effective, and most sustainable method of providing yourself energy to get through your day, is taking an all-natural approach. We've found that having high energy levels is great, but you also need the ability to focus, the ability to learn, and the ability to always be performing at your best, in order to do great things. The perfect answer is to get LIMITLESS BRAIN™, a very effective all-natural cognitive enhancement supplement.

The Ugly Truth Of Six More Leftist "Heroes"

November 24, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Earlier I skewered nine dictators, thugs, demagogues, and politicians adored by leftists despite considerable failings in policy, ethics, and hygiene. Here are six more over-hyped figures revered by leftists who always get everything wrong.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt

How the world remembers: FDR led America through the Great Depression and WWII, remembered fondly by seniors who heard his inspiring fireside chats.

The ugly truth: Some economists argue that FDR's measures prolonged the Great Depression. All the New Deal programs were struck down as unconstitutional, except Social Security. He got the Supreme Court to back off by threatening to pack the Court with more members with views to his liking. That restrained their judicial opinion, though the Constitution doesn't grant Congress the power to create a Federal retirement system.

Social Security works—though it's slim pickings if it's a retiree's only income—and for decades the surplus has been a cash cow offsetting Congressional overspending. However, the aging Baby Boomers who didn't have enough children might turn the cash cow into an albatross. Further, the Social Security Number is now a de-facto universal ID number; a convenient database field for monitoring citizens. America's Founding Fathers would have been appalled at today's domestic spying, and the Soviet dictators of old would have wept with envy.

FDR pledged to keep the USA out of WWII. Meanwhile, he quietly did everything possible to antagonize Japan, a once-friendly nation, such as (among several items) freezing their assets and cutting off their oil supply. When he got intelligence of the upcoming attack on Pearl Harbor, he didn't order the base to be locked and loaded.

If that wasn't bad enough: So nearly a quarter million Americans died in battle, but at least the pivotal intervention came just in time to "make the world safe for democracy", right? Unfortunately, FDR was far too friendly with the USSR, giving them nearly $11 billion in food, weaponry, and other supplies (about $119 billion adjusted for inflation).

At the Yalta conference, FDR agreed to let "Uncle Joe" Stalin take over Eastern Europe. General Patton wanted to press forward at full speed to keep as much territory as possible away from Soviet tyranny, but politics hampered him every step of the way until he got rubbed out. When the Iron Curtain rose and the Cold War began, Winston Churchill said, "We slaughtered the wrong pig." If only Roosevelt had listened to his generals!

FDR wasn't a Communist, but many of his appointees and trusted advisers were. Later, Joseph McCarthy barely scratched the surface trying to get rid of them.

Walter Cronkite

How the world remembers: He was a long-time CBS anchorman, reporting many triumphs and tragedies. A friendly face on living room TVs for decades, he became everyone's "Uncle Walter". According to polls, he was the "most trusted man in America".

The ugly truth: Although a decent fellow in person, Cronkite was the archetypal big-name liberal journalist, spinning the news for decades. Sometimes it was rather subliminal, including his signature subtle sneer. Most of the public then believed journalists were muckrakers and unbiased truth-tellers; as Cronkite's tagline went, "And that's the way it is."

Until Cronkite's late career, the mainstream media had a veneer of respectability—perhaps like warped plastic barely sticking to crumbling particleboard, but a veneer nonetheless. There once were only three American corporate TV networks. From Manhattan, they were the public's information gatekeepers; no other broadcast news (besides shortwave radio) was available. Baby Boomer liberals might get a bit misty-eyed remembering those days. Today, six mega-conglomerates own 90% of the media, but at least the Internet lets us present our own perspectives and call out biased reporters.

If that wasn't bad enough: His biggest whopper was about the Tet Offensive. The Viet Cong launched a desperate all-out assault, suffered very heavy losses, mostly it was over within a day, and ultimately the VC gained no territory. However, "the most trusted man in America" gave them a propaganda victory, reporting that the Vietnam War was hopeless. Public opinion promptly turned against the war. Ho Chi Minh should've given Cronkite a medal, an honorary VC generalship, and a dozen roses.

Many forget that the 1973 Paris Accords brought peace. Two years later, though, the shaky Ford administration couldn't persuade Congress to respond appropriately to a Shit Test by North Vietnam. Then they invaded, and Saigon fell. All that's a long story, but public opinion from biased reporting certainly didn't help. That affected America's prestige abroad, along with the lives of millions of South Vietnamese killed or sent to "reeducation camps".

Allen Ginsberg

How the world remembers: He was a pioneer of the beatniks, much beloved by the hippies who followed, and lauded with several literary prizes. Some even credit him with basically starting the 1960s counterculture singlehandedly.

The ugly truth: Ginsberg was neurotic and a degenerate. He wrote a so-called poem about his sphincter (yes, really) but the rest isn't much better. Anyone considering his bathroom wall ravings as "profound" either is educated beyond his ability to comprehend, believed the hype and didn't read it, or dropped too much acid.

"Howl", his best-known poem, begins "I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness". A brief excerpt (get some brain bleach) describing these "best minds":

> who burned cigarette holes in their arms protesting the narcotic tobacco haze of Capitalism, > who distributed Supercommunist pamphlets in Union Square weeping and undressing while the sirens of Los Alamos wailed them down, and wailed down Wall, and the Staten Island ferry also wailed, > who broke down crying in white gymnasiums naked and trembling before the machinery of other skeletons, > who bit detectives in the neck and shrieked with delight in policecars for committing no crime but their own wild cooking pederasty and intoxication, > who howled on their knees in the subway and were dragged off the roof waving genitals and manuscripts, > who let themselves be fucked in the ass by saintly motorcyclists, and screamed with joy, > who blew and were blown by those human seraphim, the sailors, caresses of Atlantic and Caribbean love, > who balled in the morning in the evenings in rosegardens and the grass of public > parks and cemeteries scattering their semen freely to whomever come who may, …

Even overlooking the lunacy, buggery, and butthurt, Ginsberg's "free verse" is stylistically lazy. Back when poetry meant Keats and Kipling, it rhymed and had meter.

He was a noted critic of the USA, for example:

> America, I used to be a communist when I was a kid I'm not sorry

Ginsberg visited several Communist countries, getting himself deported from some of them for immorality. He abandoned his ancestral faith for Buddhism and had a Hare Krishna phase. What people believe is up to them, of course, but adding these two things up—along with his wretched poetry—reveals a tortured soul. Rejecting everything one belongs to is childish rebellion for rebellion's sake.

Granted, Ginsberg's popularity was greatest during the screwed-up "kill your parents" 1960s. Still, what were those who promoted his crapulous drivel smoking? Were the literary gatekeepers pushing cultural Marxism running out of talented writers?

If that wasn't bad enough: Ginsberg joined the North American Man/Boy Love Association, sometimes speaking kindly on their behalf. Explaining in an accurately titled interview—"Politics, Pederasty and Consciousness"—to the Harvard Crimson:

> As I get older, having very specialised sexual tastes, it gets harder to make out… I like young boys. Why?… I'd have more chance at making out with younger guys if I were younger, dewier, dewy-limbed.

The media usually portrays pickup artists as reprobates, and screeched about Donald Trump's years-old private locker room talk, but the presstitutes (likewise the lefty "intelligentsia") fawningly praised Ginsberg despite his appetite for young boys.

Ted Kennedy

Best friends forever, east and west

How the world remembers: He was "the Lion of the Senate", representing Massachusetts from 1962 until his death in 2009. This champion of social justice carried on the Kennedy legacy—hailed as America's nobility—after his two brothers were tragically slain.

The ugly truth: He was as passionate for booze and adultery as he was for social justice, but the suckers kept reelecting him. His lack of character sank way deeper, though; all the way underwater.

After a night of partying on Chappaquiddick Island, Ted Kennedy drove off a bridge. He escaped, but failed to help his passenger, Mary Jo Kopechne. Per one of the investigators, she suffocated slowly in an air pocket for about two hours. If he'd ran to a nearby house for help—rather than waiting nine hours to sober up—she would've survived. He got a two month suspended sentence, barely a slap on the wrist for vehicular manslaughter. The judge basically said poor Teddy had suffered enough. (What about how Miss Kopechne suffered?) There's one set of rules for the elites, and another for us. Shortly thereafter, he tried to spin-doctor it with a "woe is me" shtick. The suckers kept reelecting him, though a Presidential bid was now beyond reach.

As for his many legislative actions, the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 was the most notorious. He promised the public:

> First, our cities will not be flooded with a million immigrants annually. Under the proposed bill, the present level of immigration remains substantially the same… Secondly, the ethnic mix of this country will not be upset… Contrary to the charges in some quarters, [the bill] will not inundate America with immigrants from any one country or area, or the most populated and deprived nations of Africa and Asia…. In the final analysis, the ethnic pattern of immigration under the proposed measure is not expected to change as sharply as the critics seem to think… The bill will not flood our cities with immigrants. It will not upset the ethnic mix of our society. It will not relax the standards of admission. It will not cause American workers to lose their jobs.

The "Lion of the Senate" was lyin' his fat ass off! This population replacement policy threatens America's future, just as the Coudenhove-Kalergi Plan is doing in Europe. Still, the suckers kept reelecting him.

If that wasn't bad enough: Besides giving away the country to which the Constitution granted "the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity", Lyin' Ted was in cahoots with the KGB. He proposed to help his Soviet pal Yuri Andropov with tidying up the USSR's image problem during the Cold War's endgame. The damning documents suggested that Walter Cronkite (see above) and Barbara Walters might be used for this effort. Conservatives often suspect liberals are soft on Communism; little did they know how cozy Ted Kennedy was in bed with Comrade Andropov.

John Lennon

How the world remembers: He was a talented musician, arguably the most prominent of the Beatles. Their story was an archetypal garage band becoming a bar band and eventually breaking out into great fame. Lennon produced dozens of hits that still get air play. He's remembered as a wonderful man, an embodiment of the 1960s (the good parts, anyway), and the conscience of the world.

The ugly truth: Despite Lennon's considerable talents, not all his songs were excellent. Things slipped with the White Album. ("Revolution 9", really?) After the Beatles broke up, he started a solo career, often featuring songs with sophomoric political poses. His last album produced during his life—after dragging himself out of a long heroin stupor—was Double Fantasy. Critics at first agreed that it sucked. After a nut shot Lennon, they felt sorry for him and declared it brilliant.

Lennon was the archetypal leftist celebrity using fame to push politics. Granted, everyone has a right to their opinion, but being able to sing or act confers no special political expertise. His song "Imagine" is particularly telling. As he put it:

> Imagine that there was no more religion, no more country, no more politics,' is virtually the Communist Manifesto, even though I'm not particularly a Communist and I do not belong to any movement.

Being under the shadow of the Berlin Wall back in their bar gig days should've precluded sophomoric posturing like this.

If that wasn't bad enough: His failings are quite troubling, too numerous to fully detail. One item is abandoning his family the way his own father did. A truly wonderful man wouldn't do that.

Another item was his extensive substance abuse. He spent 1974 guzzling booze, his "lost weekend". One night, a waitress refused service because he stuck a menstrual pad on his head. Then:

> Lennon: "Do you know who I am?"
> Waitress: "Yeah, you're some asshole with a Kotex on his forehead."

One Lennon biographer asked Timothy Leary, who'd been on hundreds of acid trips, what Lennon's extreme LSD consumption would do. Leary had no idea! Finally, what kind of inner vacuum caused this highly successful musician, much beloved by the public, to get himself strung out on heroin?

Jimmy Carter

In this heart-warming scene, Jimmy Carter and Uncle Fidel stand for the Cuban national anthem in Havana

How the world remembers: Carter is praised as a rare honest politician, exemplifying Christian principles and tolerance.

The ugly truth: The economy tanked during the Carter administration: double-digit inflation and high unemployment. Economists are still puzzled by stagflation; normally, unemployment and inflation are inversely correlated. At least Obama gave economists another data point to study.

Carter's commendably not corrupt, but exemplified bleeding-hearted liberalism. Despite winning the Nobel Peace Prize for not being George W. Bush (likewise Al Gore and The Lightworker), Carter was a lackluster embarrassment. He was known for TMI statements, for example about his hemorrhoids and committing adultery in his heart (at least Clinton had the balls to do it for real). He ranked lower than Mr. Whipple on a face recognition survey. The Boston Globe reported on one of his speeches with the headline "More Mush From the Wimp"; finally journalists got something right.

Carter's shining foreign policy moment was the Camp David Accords, establishing peace between Egypt and Israel. America started giving over a billion annually to each party for making peace, which ironically supplies their military. Why? The USA wasn't even a combatant, aside from the USS Liberty incident which certainly shouldn't inspire American tribute money. Taxpayers still fund this absurd protection racket.

Worse, he badly bungled the Iran hostage crisis. One Iranian official later stated they would've released the hostages if the USA had threatened force in the beginning. Yep, Carter failed Iran's Shit Test. Consequentially, the USA lost tons of international prestige, and the ordeal of the hostages dragged on unnecessarily.

If that wasn't bad enough: Carter is often a little too cordial with notorious dictators. Worse, Clinton trusted him to represent the USA during disarmament talks with North Korea. They gave him the Potemkin village show; he bought it hook, line, and sinker. Yet again, Carter was played for a chump—the USA opened its wallet and gave North Korea aid, and they pinky-swore to stop their nuclear program. Now the Norks have nukes—surprise! Awesome job, Mister Nice Guy!

Women Have Binary Minds Of Love Or Hate

November 24, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Most of you know men and women are fundamentally different. Despite the feminist narrative trying to push equality, neutering our language, and encouraging men like Bruce Jenner to neuter himself, there are fundamental differences between men and women that can never be overcome.

Elevating Women's Opinions

A girl in my current rotation recently became a Yelp Eliter! If you haven't come across this species in the wild yet, it's a basic bitch who has her opinion artificially elevated and amplified because she goes out often and uses her smart phone even more frequently than your typical millennial, constantly "checking in" to places and writing reviews about how that froth on her pumpkin double sugar latte lite wasn't quite as beautiful as the last time she ordered it, and maybe if the staff wasn't so rushed and asked her if she was having a nice day, she would return there more often.

This girl is excited because now she can be invited to new restaurant openings where they give free dinners in exchange for reviews (when I heard that I immediately discounted yelp as an unbiased source — Tripadvisor, Urbanspoon or other options are better). I'm invited to tag along, but I won't be participating in this unethical pay for play review system.

Women are Binary Creatures

I investigated some of her recent reviews on the site, and noticed they were almost all either 1 star or 5 star reviews. This explains the female mind perfectly to me. The experience to women is completely about feelings, and not about any objective standards of measurement. Mediocre restaurants or bars I've visited were given the perfect 5 star award because they created sufficient tingles and triggered her emotionally, while nice places that didn't greet her sufficiently when she met the hostess were given 1 star "avoid at all costs" labels.

1 Star Review in the Making

I've noticed this in the past when looking for a restaurant or hotel when travelling. I'd often pull up yelp, and if a place had mixed reviews, many times I could wade through and ignore the female reviews and get a much clearer picture of whether the place was good or bad (they love to surrender their privacy for the faux social status being a frequent reviewer gives them, so you can usually spot them by their female profile pictures).

Indeed, I noticed the last review she made was a luxurious boutique hotel with large glass chandeliers in the lobby, a rooftop swimming pool, sharp, uniformed staff, and a room far nicer than the one she typically sleeps in. This place was given a 1 star review, because someone either failed to make her feel like a special snowflake, or said something that caused her to have bad feelings.

In that moment I realized that women experience life almost completely on their feelings. There is nothing that someone could have said to me to lower such a luxurious place below 3 stars, and yet, here it was, ranked down there with the local No Tell Motel because of feels.

Indeed, the review bore this out, as there were no complaints about the quality of any of the amenities the business owner had provided to his customers–the pool, the beautiful views, the comfortable beds, the cable tv with endless entertainment options, and the fitness facility were all functioning properly, and yet, to a female mind, this was a poor experience because of her feelings.

Feminism wants to do this everywhere.

Of course much could be said about this elevation of women's voices into elite decisionmakers, which will negatively shape the products and services you and I are interested in. A place with great food but lacking in décor will fail (unless said décor is pulled off in such a way as to come off as "retro") because women will not feel good there.

Likewise, a place with mediocre or overpriced services but that caters to women's narcissism correctly, by, say, calling the girl by name when she shows up, or asking her how her experience was, or hashtagging the latest SJW crusade, will be given unwarranted praise and success. This is the effect of a feminized economy where women control up to 85% of spending.

Why Did She Do It?

But it also answers so many questions men struggle with in frustration. Why isn't she behaving logically? Why did she say one thing but do another? Why is it easier to bed women after taking them on exciting dates? Why do white women pursue foreign men when on vacation, when they will return home to all white gated communities and ignore the same men at home? Why did a 24 year old virgin have a one night stand?

Kind of true.

Why do men leave their husbands suddenly because “he doesn’t make me feel the way I used to?” Why will women go back to men who abuse or rape them? Why do methods like venue changing multiple times in a date increase the likelihood for sex? Why do women pursue DJs, bartenders, rappers, or alpha men they have no chance at a relationship with? It’s all because of their emotional state.

Indeed it is not even fair to judge them by our standards, because they are ruled by emotion, not logic. Which is why giving them unfettered freedom in the hopes they are happy with the outcome, or will learn from mistakes and become better people, is fundamentally misguided and wrong.

Use Your Knowledge

First, do not get frustrated at anything women say or do. Realize that whether intentional or not, they are motivated by emotions and it’s futile to try to understand emotions. Second, use this knowledge to create positive emotional experiences for women, and you will greatly increase your success rate.

I have no clue why women give shit tests, but I do know that the beta reaction of getting upset or defensive or argumentative creates a negative vibe, while being playful and dismissive and confident, even while logically ignoring her question, creates a happy, good vibe.

If I could sum up game into one sentence, whether concerning wives, girlfriends, or one night stands, it would be Control Her Emotions. How did Kobe Bryant keep his wife after getting caught banging teenage girls? He said the right things to make her feel good, and gave her a big nice shiny rock that makes her feel special. Women are simple. Instead of fretting that they're illogical, we should enjoy the bounty that comes when we manipulate their emotions in the right way.

11 Best Quotes From Donald Trump's "Art Of The Deal"

November 25, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Art Of The Deal is an autobiographical memoir written in 1987 that explains Donald Trump's rise in real estate. It gives you a broad overview of how real estate development works and a closer look at the beliefs that drive Trump's ambition.

Here are my favorite quotes from the book…

Trust your gut

> …listen to your gut, no matter how good something sounds on paper. The second is that you're generally better off sticking with what you know.

Think big

> My style of deal-making is quite simple and straightforward. I aim very high, and then I just keep pushing and pushing and pushing to get what I'm after. Sometimes I settle for less than I sought, but in most cases I still end up with what I want.
> I wasn't satisfied just to earn a good living. I was looking to make a statement. I was out to build something monumental—something worth a big effort.

Accept the worst-case scenario

> If you plan for the worst— if you can live with the worst— the good will always take care of itself.

Don’t be desperate

> The worst thing you can possibly do in a deal is seem desperate to make it. That makes the other guy smell blood, and then you’re dead.

Don’t overpay

> What you should never do is pay too much, even if that means walking away from a very good site.

Care about the cents

> To this day, if I feel a contractor is overcharging me, I’ll pick up the phone, even if it’s only for $ 5,000 or $ 10,000, and I’ll complain. People say to me, “What are you bothering for, over a few bucks?” My answer is that the day I can’t pick up the telephone and make a twenty-five-cent call to save $10,000 is the day I’m going to close up shop.

Use scarcity

> With so much demand, our marketing strategy was to play hard to get. It was a reverse sales technique. If you sit in an office with a contract in your hand, eager to make the first deal that comes along, it’s quite obvious to people that the apartments aren’t in demand. We were never in a rush to sign a contract. When people came in, we’d show them the model apartments, sit down and talk, and, if they were interested, explain that there was a waiting list for the most desirable apartments. The more unattainable the apartments seemed, the more people wanted them.

There’s always a time to strike

> The worst of times often create the best opportunities to make good deals.

Surround yourself with the best

> I have a very simple rule when it comes to management: hire the best people from your competitors, pay them more than they were earning, and give them bonuses and incentives based on their performance. That’s how you build a first-class operation.

Create win-win deals

> Deals work best when each side gets something it wants from the other.

Even though I don’t care about real estate development, the book was hard to put down. I enjoyed reading about how Trump dealt with problems that would have stymied lesser men. If you are a fan of Trump and want to understand the forces that drive him, I highly recommend this book.

How To Adjust Your Game As Your Social Value Increases

November 25, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

There's a common mantra out there told to the fellas who are just beginning their journey of self-improvement: "Fake it 'til ya make it."

Which is all fine and dandy, but it can be a difficult adjustment when you actually make it. Things change as you develop into a well-rounded and confident man. Today, we're going to talk about how your interactions with girls change as you continue to improve who you are as a man. The same things you say to a girl when you are just starting to work on yourself will not go over the same way two years later (assuming you've improved significantly).

Of course, you'll also hear that game is game, and that it works universally. This is true, but this is assuming that you stay the same. Once you start to grasp the concepts as to why your tactics must evolve, it will make sense.

An Example

When you first start approaching girls, there's a chance you could be in better shape. You could probably be making more money. More than likely, you need to work on your general charm and confidence. These are all fair assumptions to make, because if you already had all of these things—guess what? Girls would already be flocking to you. There would be little need to actually learn game.

You have to learn game in order to get the girls you want. You'll need to tease them a bit more, to be more aloof, and to overall give them a perception that you are higher value than them. You do this by teasing, being slow to respond to her texts, and more game is the great equalizer in this sense.

However, let's flash forward a couple of years. You've gone down the self-improvement journey. You're now in excellent shape, making good money, and several years of practice with the ladies has improved your social skills.

Now, the positions are reversed, because YOU are higher value than the girls. All of a sudden, it's the girls who are insecure. It's them that wonder if they are worthy of you. The same tactics that would charm a girl when you are a beginner will now scare them off. And it's not because you're creepy, or anything of the sort.

It's because now, THEY are intimidated by YOU.

You see, as you became a money-making, iron-destroying, charming man—you rose to the top of the food chain. Now, women are naturally attracted to who you are in that very moment. It doesn't require you to knock her down a peg or two. You're already a step above her. A neg or insult that would have previously made her panties wet will now backfire on you tremendously.

Real Life Played Out

An average-dressed man approaches an attractive girl in a club. He's a bit intimidated by her. He's wearing jeans that don't quite fit, has an extra 20 pounds to his gut, and is pinching pennies. He's certainly not going to offer to buy her a drink. He knows, from experience, that she'd take it and disappear. At first, she tries to blow him off—but then he grabs her attention by telling her she looks like an adorable squirrel. All of a sudden, she smiles and gives him time.

A man in a well-fitting suit approaches the same girl. He's not intimidated by her beauty at all, because he's done it a thousand times. He's in excellent shape, and has the money to afford the night out. He's not going to buy her a drink at first, but may consider it if he likes her company.

Do you think the chipmunk line is going to have the same effect as it would for the first man?

It's hard to put absolutes on a hypothetical scenario like this, but it's probably not going to have the same effect. By being well-dressed, in shape, and giving off an aurora of confidence, the second man is already in the door with this girl. To hurl a phrase like that too soon may cause this girl to become too insecure and clam up.

By virtue of his hard work to get where he is in life, he has a better opening chance than the first man would.

Not All Is Black & White

If there is one thing I've learned throughout my journey with women, is that life is not black and white. While we would like to systemize sex and relationships into a formula that works every single time, it's simply not possible. That is the beauty (or curse, depending on how you want to look at it) of life.

The point is, as you evolve as a man, the same things that worked for you once will not work every time as you move through life, as I've illustrated above. It doesn't apply just to women, either. If you look at it at a really basic level, it's this:

When you first graduate college, you'll hardly be given the time of day for prospective employers. However, it only takes a few opportunities until you've got some experience under your belt. If you go back to that same prospective employer with five years of killer experience under your belt, they're going to give you a chance.

The reality is that dating and game is somewhat similar to an interview. You're going to be approaching the girl, putting your best foot forward, and seeing what she thinks of it. If she doesn't like it, that's too bad—but not the end of the world. If she does like it, great. The more experience you have in life, the more value you have. The more value you have, the more attractive she will find you from the get-go.

It's all about the value you bring. An employer isn't going to hire someone who can't bring value to the company. A potential employee with five years of experience in the industry is a lot more valuable than someone just out of college.

Final Thoughts

This is not meant to be a cut-and-dry post. A lot of times out in the field, it won't make sense. When this happens, it's a good reminder that, despite this post, game still trumps all.

It's better to be a bit too mean than too nice. It's better to tease her than to kiss her ass. But as you grow, if the old stuff doesn't seem to be having the same effect, take a step back. Look at the bigger picture.

Realize it for what it is: a sign of progress in your development as a man. Adapt and grow your game accordingly, and your potential will reach even greater heights.

Hollywood Has Forgiven Mel Gibson, But At What Cost?

November 25, 2016 | by M.T. White | Link | Original Link

Ten years after a DUI arrest and the release of his war film Hacksaw Ridge, Hollywood has officially forgiven Mel Gibson. The American-Australian star, best known for his portrayal of slightly unhinged characters like Max Rockatansky in Mad Max and Martin Riggs in Lethal Weapon, also directed the critically lauded and Oscar winning Braveheart, a film that became an instant classic with its graphic depictions of medieval warfare.

However, Mel dwarfed those accomplishments with the success and controversy of The Passion of the Christ, a film that despite its foreign language dialogue and the fuss it caused among prominent Jewish leaders, won over the faithful everywhere, showing there was a market for masculine oriented Christian themed fare.

Then after all the success and media attention, Mel's wife, and mother of his seven children, said she wanted a divorce. Then he went drinking in Malibu and got pulled over by the police…

The Arrest

Was this DUI so bad that the man needed 10 years to wait for exoneration? Of course not. A star or starlet getting arrested for any disorderly conduct is de rigeur on TMZ or Access Hollywood. Was someone murdered? Was someone raped? Was a child abused? No. Then why? Why did it take so long to publicly acquit this man, this celebrated actor and Oscar wining director with a solid box-office record and huge international appeal?

Antisemitism.

His comments to police about "Fucking Jews" and how they are "responsible for all the wars in the world" and then asking the arresting officers if they were Jews didn't do him any favors. News spread quickly in the small world of Hollywood, an industry with a heavy Jewish population.

Hollywood power agent Ari Emmanuel (Donald Trump's agent and brother to former Obama Chief Staff, now Mayor of Chicago, Rahm Emmanuel) said the industry could not "allow Mel Gibson to get away with such tragically inflammatory statements."

Misogyny, Racism, Homophobia

If that wasn't bad enough, four years later, recordings surfaced of Mel saying his ex-girlfriend Oksana Grigorieva looked like "a fucking pig in heat, and if you get raped by a pack of niggers, it will be your fault." In a separate conversation he told her: "I am going to come and burn the fucking house down… but you will blow me first." He was also recorded saying "I will report her (one of his employee's) to the fucking people that take fucking money from the wetbacks."

So, in the span of four years, in a business where memories take a while to fade and is sensitive to the most puerile forms of political correctness, Mel Gibson made "anti-Semitic", "racist" and "misogynist" comments.

Add to that earlier comments about homosexuals to foreign publications: "They [gays] take it up the ass. [laughs, stands up, bends over, points to anus] This is only for taking a shit." And now you have a textbook case of career suicide in a business that employs many the "discriminated" groups Gibson spoke ill of.

In Wine (And Stress), Truth?

But is that really it? Is that really the reason they found need to exile this man from the big screen? In reality, his actions contradicted his language (as it should for any man). Regarding antisemitism, journalist Allison Hope Weiner (herself Jewish), said Gibson "worked in Hollywood for 30 years without a single report he was antisemitic."

In fact, Gibson tried to quell those charges immediately by reaching out to Jewish leaders and interest groups, even announcing he would helm a film based on the life of Judah Maccabee a so-called "Jewish Braveheart". But that all cratered when screenwriter Joe Eszterhas (author of both Basic Instinct and Showgirls), another man shunned by the Hollywood elite, released a recording of Gibson in another angry rant.

Some say it was just Eszterhas' way of deflecting negative attention away from his lackluster script, but whatever the motivation, it scotched Gibson's chances of a Hollywood comeback (but hey, Eszterhas did get an e-book deal out of it).

His other statements were chalked up by journalist Weiner as a man under intense duress during a custody battle with a woman allegedly blackmailing him. The L.A. District Attorney's Office charged him with misdemeanor assault but also considered charging Grigorieva with extortion, noting she probably tried to provoke Gibson in to saying inflammatory things.

Just One Of The Guys

So, a man, Mel Gibson, big Hollywood star, gets drunk, and says some things about Jews under the influence. If it was in any other city and any other person, the police report would never have seen the light of day. This same man, after one to the biggest divorce settlements in history, is being extorted for cash by his baby mama and is goaded in to saying some regretful things. Once again, if it were you or I, there'd be no public shaming, but it was Mel.

Then while trying to do his job of making movies, he yells at a hired hand (Eszterhas) for not doing the job he was assigned. As someone who has worked in management, I can confidently say we all have those moments. But that's the problem. Mel was one of us. He was a man.

Men are rare in Hollywood. Eszterhas pointed out in his Hollywood satire The Devil's Guide to Hollywood that most leading men were secretly gay (novelist Bret Easton Ellis also confirmed this on his podcast), and that unless the lead was played by Mel (or Russell Crowe), it was a fool's errand to write heavily masculine roles. So Mel Gibson was like most of us. He was a man's man but one of the few in Hollywood.

Christians Are Rarer

But even worse, Mel was a Christian. Catholic, to be exact. But Mark Wahlberg is a Catholic you might say. But Mel is a traditional Catholic, an observer of Vatican I, which celebrates the Latin Mass.

Eszterhas, a man obviously envious of the star, stated in his aforementioned electronic tell-all (Heaven and Mel) that Mel believed there was a strong communist influence inside the modern church to weaken it. Even worse, Vatican I was allegedly more hostile to Jews (salvation can only come through Catholic church) than Vatican II (salvation may possibly come from elsewhere).

However, none of this was a secret. When he won his Oscar for best director for Braveheart, it was commonly known he had conservative Christian beliefs and held traditional views on the sexes (note his seven children).

Good Christian Films Are Even More Rare

But The Passion of the Christ changed everything. Mel self-funded the film. Rumors were rampant during production and before release that the movie was "anti-Semitic" (it seems the script borrowed heavily from The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ—a tome that doesn't speak highly of Jesus' Jewish accusers). Jewish leaders spoke out before even seeing a rough cut.

Despite the swirl of controversy, despite it being in Latin and Aramaic with only English subtitles to guide the viewer, despite the R-rating due to graphic content, the film about Jesus' crucifixion was a box-office colossus, grossing over $370,000,000 in the US alone. Catholics and Protestants of all stripes embraced it.

Due to the profits, Mel acquired the highest net-worth of any Hollywood A-lister. Mel, the Conservative Catholic Alpha Male had fuck you money.

Powerful (And Rich) Masculine Conservative Christians Are Rarest

Hollywood (and Satan) could not abide that. It wasn't an overt conspiracy. There were probably no boardroom meetings at William Morris on how to take down the star. But Mel was different, he wasn't one of THEM, he was more like one of US, and everyone knew it and probably resented it.

The general wisdom is the power brokers will tolerate certain behaviors as long as the money is pouring in but once it's verified the troublemakers are box-office poison, then the knives are drawn. The DUI arrest and the comments he made were just the knives they needed.

The divorce took all his money. And as his personal life spiraled "out of control" with baby mama drama, his career followed suit. Apocalypto, his next film, did "disappointing business"; his last directorial effort for 10 years.

In an industry that celebrates all sorts of sexual vice and degenerate behavior; an industry that pleads for a director to be allowed entrance in to the USA despite his conviction of raping a minor; an industry that has been accused of being a den of pedophilia; this industry could not abide a straight, white, traditional Mel holding any sort of power.

The "Comeback"

He struggled, he continued to star in movies, most not very good, but when the time was right, Hollywood, as is its specialty, put on a show: It green lit a big-budget war picture—Gibson was always good at filming carnage—and started slowly leaking stories they were ready to "forgive" him.

Why now? Because they were calling the shots. This new effort would not feature Mel's traditional heroes. No warrior leading his people in rebellion for freedom while bedding French queens in his spare time, nor the Savior of the world taking a beating for humanity's salvation. No*, Hacksaw Ridge* is a war movie about a pacifist.

But Mel agreed to direct it. Mel received a standing ovation with tears in his eyes. Mel walked the red carpet lamenting the "tragedy" of the 2016 election. The critics wrote their reviews praising Hacksaw Ridge as a masterpiece. But the bearded Mel in front of the lights now is not the one we remember in Mad Max or The Patriot. No, this Mel looks beat.

Are You Listening Guys?

It sends a signal to all the other alphas in Hollywood—especially the rare ones who hold to traditional Christian beliefs instead of the miasma of New Age pap so rampant in Southern California. Marky Mark you've been put on notice. You can tell the world of your Catholicism but be careful. You don't want to end up like Mel.

Same for you Rock. Same for you Vin Diesel. You listening, Jason Statham and Liam Neeson? You like your jobs right? The men of Hollywood know who is in control. They know who is calling the shots. Hollywood has forgiven Mel Gibson. And to that I say, so what?

An Open Letter To Women Who Still Believe In Feminism

First of all, you might wonder, how dare anyone criticize feminism? You've been told that it's a noble quest for equality. What possibly could be wrong with that? The truth is that feminism stopped being about equality long ago. If it was just about equal rights under the law, American feminists would have declared the job done following the Equal Pay Act of 1963, then celebrated the golden peace between men and women ever since. It didn't quite work out that way; read on and I'll explain why.

I'm here to discuss radical feminism, which is the only variety that gets much attention and media access. Since the Second Wave arose—beginning in the mid-1950s, and kicking into high gear in the mid-1960s—feminism has been telling you that we live under a patriarchy, men are responsible for all your problems ("the personal is political"), we're a bunch of evildoers, and so forth.

I have some bad news for you. These demagogues in your movement have been lying to you all along. They haven't stopped lying despite being disproved again and again. That should tell you everything you need to know about their dishonesty and lack of character.

Lies, damned lies, and statistics

Likely you've heard that domestic violence is the worst around the Super Bowl. They lied to you. They wanted to convince you that we're a bunch of cavemen who get so worked up about our brutal games that we're inspired to slap you around. The truth is that domestic violence is wrong, no matter who's doing it. You might be surprised to know that it's not just men responsible for that. In fact, on average, lesbian couples have the most turbulent relationships of all.

Then there's the "wage gap" lie. Surely you've heard that women make only 77 cents on the dollar compared to what men make. I first heard that one in the 1980s, and feminists are still telling us that. The truth is that men work longer hours (more overtime), in dirty and dangerous jobs that you don't want to do, and study nerdy majors that pay well but have little interest to you. Want to make more money? Quit retail and drill oil wells, mine coal, or drive an eighteen wheeler. For the big money, I hear commercial fishing in Alaska and underwater welding pays pretty well.

They also told you that one in four coeds are raped in college. That one is a very dirty lie. The real number, according to Justice Department statistics, is 61 in 10,000. (In the general population, this is 76 in 10,000 among the 18-24 demographic.) One felony is one too many, of course, but the number certainly isn't 2,500 out of 10,000. Overstating that by orders of magnitude was pure demagoguery.

They lied to you. They wanted you to fear us, hate us, and think we're a bunch of savages. Also, they wanted more money for their programs, supplied by taxpayers and private donations. It's hard to ask for a budget increase if they admitted that 9,939 out of 10,000 coeds will go through college without needing their services.

This all ties into that "rape culture" scare, which is more vile demagoguery. Since it's a felony everywhere, the culture certainly doesn't approve of it. Actually, that (along with other violent crime rates) has declined sharply since the 1990s. Don't count on feminists to tell you this good news, much less thank conservatives for pushing the legal system to get tougher on crime.

Although diminishing, it remains a problem. Unfortunately, feminists have declared discussion of practical prevention measures off-limits. (If making a particular crime a felony doesn't reduce the rate to zero, then what's wrong with discussing how not to be victimized?) Instead, feminists bolster their misleading narrative with lots of false allegations. Ruining people's lives with phony charges isn't justice.

Think about it a minute. We're bigger and stronger than you. If we really were savages, we would be doing whatever we wanted to you, especially if that truly was approved by our culture. The reason you don't have to pepper spray someone every day is that the vast majority of us are actually decent, civilized people. There are a few exceptions; they end up going to prison, and rightly so, where they're despised even by the other criminals.

More feminist lies you've heard

At least these men have their male privilege.

You've been told that you're living in a patriarchy. So what were the practical implications, back when that was actually true? You had certain roles; actually, we did too. It was all on us to provide for you and the kids; be it by working on an assembly line all day, in a coal mine, digging ditches, or under the hot sun tilling the fields. If we didn't, then we shamefully failed to do our duty. We got drafted in wars to protect you. We let you have first place on lifeboats. Meanwhile, women were tending the children and doing housework. All told, it wasn't quite such a bad trade-off for women.

A hundred years ago, it was true that we had patriarchy; now we certainly don't. Still, they keep lying to make you discontented. There's been a lot of talk about "male privilege" too. That's more baloney.

They also told you that marriage and motherhood makes you a failure, or that you're wasting your potential by not spending your prime years in a cube farm. (Do feminists think the next generation will come from a cabbage patch?) Meanwhile, your TV tells you that being "slutty" is cool (music videos especially) and meaningless promiscuity is super (Sex In The City, etc.)

The fact is that sex is a great bonding experience, but the more people you do it with, the less effective the bonding is. (Yes, that applies to men too.) They even told you that walking away from your family is no big deal.

We care about what all this is doing to society, and doing to you. It's actually pretty ironic that we—even with our critical perspectives—care about you more than the feminists. They only want to use you as a pawn in their sociopolitical chess game; more on that later.

How feminism affects the social scene

Now take a look at what your wonderful movement has done. Today, there are men who are giving up on women and their hostile attitudes. We'd prefer a good relationship, but if that isn't happening, there are several safety valves for the dysfunctional sexual marketplace.

Some men are "going their own way" and saying to hell with you; and others by different means. Some guys are "herbivores" and don't even bother to approach you. Countless men meet their sexual needs with pornography. Other men are finding mail order brides, or sometimes flee the country to get away from our toxic social environment. A few join the gay community; finding it to be better than nothing. Now, there are even those who turn to sex robots.

You may be shocked by all this. You may be tempted to call them names or question their character. Still, Ms. Feminist, think carefully about it: maybe your sisterhood is the problem. What your movement did to society is quite unfortunate; it didn't have to be this way.

Countless women like you have been led to believe that being snarky or nasty is "empowering". Actually, we have no use for that. Sure, some of us know how to play these games and deal with all that. As for the rest, your attitude is a complete turn-off. Although some of you want to make talking to you a crime, we know that women really do want to meet high-quality guys. That's not going to happen if you have a nasty attitude; men have standards.

When we're young and innocent, guys just want to cherish and love you. (It would be great if we could get back to all that, but we can't do it all by ourselves.) Receiving hostility and crazy behavior affects our feelings toward you. It's often difficult to see things from another's perspective, so take it from these guys:

- Roosh: You Did This To Me
- Zenpriest: You Can't Change a Pickle Back Into a Cucumber
- More from Zenpriest explaining his experiences; long but a must-read
- This guy went through a dozen years of hell
- Even gay guys don't appreciate all the attitude

If all that shocks you, consider that actions have consequences. Decades of feminist negativity have made society a colder and more mistrustful place, and this has backfired on you. The screwed-up social scene that your sisterhood brought us greatly hurts your chances for a decent, long-lasting relationship.

Let me add another thing. If you spend your 20s partying and “finding yourself” as you’ve been encouraged to do, don’t expect Mr. Big to be waiting around patiently to sweep you off your feet after you’ve aged and decided it’s time to settle down. Actually, many Mr. Bigs used to be those nerds you wouldn’t have given a second look to back in college.

I could go further into how feminism led to more divorces,and more broken homes, which in turn worsened poverty and crime, ultimately making things worse for you. However, all that’s another subject entirely.

Why feminism changed

We don’t appreciate all the vilification, and hopefully you don’t appreciate your sisterhood’s leaders lying to you. Still, perhaps you might be thinking, “Maybe the feminists lied, but surely they meant well. They were concerned about real problems but exaggerated them.” The truth is that their intentions were anything but noble. Let’s explore some of them.

First, here are some actual quotes from your sisterhood:

> “Feminism is the theory, lesbianism is the practice.”
> “The simple fact is that every woman must be willing to be identified as a lesbian to be fully feminist.”
> “Female heterosexuality is not a biological drive or an individual woman’s erotic attraction or attachment to another human animal which happens to be male.”

Some of them were frustrated lesbians who wanted to distort the sexual marketplace so they’d have a better chance of getting into your panties. Pretty noble, huh?

Also, the social engineers in the corporate-government complex wanted to get women out of the home and into the workforce for more productivity and tax money. Increasing the labor pool also lowered the cost companies pay for salaries; that’s basic microeconomics. I’m sure that spending your days in a cube farm feels pretty liberating, though!

Finally Second Wave feminism—the radical variety—was heavily influenced by Communism. Feminism became one of many fronts of a variety called cultural Marxism. This is not to say that most feminists these days are Communists—in fact, most of you are just as unaware of how this happened as the rest of the public. Still, you're unwittingly participating in an ideology purposefully designed to bring down civilization. Unfortunately, it's working as designed.

Think about it

All that might seem pretty shocking, but by all means, do the research. The purpose of Second Wave feminism was about creating deep divisions in society and wrecking families. For the last fifty years, it's stirred up discord, making you distrust and even hate us. Did you think that was really about empowering you?

The leading feminists have been using you, and others like you, all along. This sort of thing has ruined the natural trust and affection between the sexes. In a healthy society, men and women get along together. We used to love each other. Let's try to get back to that. A growing number of young women are rejecting feminist indoctrination. It's time to join them and free your mind.

11 Tips For Raising Your Daughter On The Red Pill

November 26, 2016 | by Dawn Pine | Link | Original Link

As a divorced father of two daughters, and a RVF active member, I see articles on raising sons (examples 1, 2, 3 and 4, all from this year alone on ROK). Raising a son is an important matter, as most of us here at ROK are boys.

But wait a minute! 50% of the population is females. Those of us who are fathers (writer included) may also have daughters. The discussions here as I mentioned, are more about sons. What about daughters?

I could sit with myself, complain, or take it to the comments section. But that is not the way the manosphere practices. So I decided to write my own list of tips, based on my know-how so far. I have been on the red-pill for three years now, and I wish to share with my fellow readers what I have learned.

It seems that raising girls is far easier than boys. Even if this is true, it is no walk in the park. It is difficult, to some extent, but can be also rewarding.

1. Teach her what guys and girls find attractive

We all know the answer to that one. But a child does not. Children are not blank slate, but they are unaware of “how the world works”. It is my responsibility as the patriarch to show them.

In order to starve the hamster in advance, I give my daughters tools and the language to understand. Kids have a very strong hamster, as do females (we all know that).

Since early times, people have used stories and myths to educate. This is truer at a young age, as they are not yet teenagers. I often use stories and examples, as kids sometime struggle with “concepts” or “genralities”.

Example: Mr. Peabody & Sherman (the movie)

Some movies illustrate red pill better than others. You also need to find one which the kids relate to. For this article I picked Mr. Peabody & Sherman. It is a fun movie, staring male protagonists which are likable.

During the movie, when the heroes go back in time to save Penny (the child who beat him up and called him names), Sherman talks of her in a "love stroke" manner. In our words – he is attracted to her.

"Why do you think he is attracted to her?" I asked my daughters. Notice how I emphasized attraction rather than "love". Kids need to parse their environment in the right manor. If you call it love, later in life girls will have a problem separating attraction with love.

Even mean girls are converted if they find their guy Alpha

Their hamster ran as excuses came out one after the other. They dished out multiple explanations, which I will not name, but would make some us laugh.

"It is because she is pretty" I explained. "Boys are attracted to pretty girls. This is what boys prefer." I continue, "You can see it also in your school, and that pretty girls get more attention". They acknowledge it, as they have witnessed it firsthand. Lesson hammered in. I repeat it every time we witness it.

"Dad, were you attracted to Mom because she was pretty?" They have asked. I confirmed. They now know that beauty is important. But there is more.

Later in the movie, after Sherman rescues Penny, she is smitten by him. She starts treating him better, and even stands up for him to his "father". This is not something you do for a person you abused and ridiculed (actually on the same day, at school – if one recalls the plot).

"Why is she attracted to him? She wasn't before," I asked them.

Their hamster ran again. Fast. Excuses were coming out, repeating most of what they said before. They even try to say that Sherman is handsome.

"It is because he is now successful," I explained. "Girls are attracted to successful boys".

That rang a bell as they sometimes have a crush on one of the boys. Now they know why they feel attracted and not "LOVE". My other point is that you should not, at their age, discuss Alpha and Beta. This is for a later age. You cannot talk to young girls about "Alpha" male, or "Beta". I decided to run with "successful".

Next is the concept of “The Wall”

Taking CH advice:

> Tell her with uncompromising bluntness that she is pretty now, and all the boys notice her, but her prettiness will disappear faster than she knows (or can possibly know at her tender age), and there will come a time, always much sooner than she had hoped, when none of the boys will notice her.

My daughters know that they should be married by their mid-20s. I use their mom and other moms of their friends and asking: ”How successful will her boyfriend be, if she was single?”. They look at the fathers of their friends, and at least some of the time it is obvious. My eldest told me that her mom told her that being married at 25 is too young. I replied by stating that her mother has actually no strength running after them, and that they as young moms would have the strength to do things with their children. Message well understood.

2. Show her how guys hit on girls

I day game sometimes. I don’t do it much in front of my girls, because they will cockblock me. It happened a few times before I “stopped”. I recall one time that they ran interference at a wedding, when I was about to number close a young hot girl.

But if we are in a restaurant for example, I tease the waitresses. I use pet names, boss them around a little bit and treat her as a small child. The waitresses usually take it very well, and sometime even blush.

Cockblocked by your own daughters!!!

My daughters start to giggle. “Dad, I don’t know why, but I feel good when you do that,” my elder told me. “It is because older girls are like young girls. They love it when a successful man makes fun of them” I explained. “Also, you see that the waitress was responding well. She likes it,” I add. They witnessed it, and now they know how it feels and how it looks when a guy hits on a girl and what an interaction between boys and girls looks like.

Lesson hammered again. As a side benefit, now my daughters feel better knowing that their father is “Successful”. I’ll admit that my game level is intermediate at best, but good enough is good enough.

3. Connect them to their tradition

I'm not religious, nor traditional in my way of life. I'm atheist and does not feel the presence of god in the world. That does not mean that my heritage should be forgotten. On the contrary, one must have roots. Otherwise we will become leafs blowing in the wind.

In every Jewish holiday or event, I speak with them about it. We practice some of the rituals, since stories are good, and actually doing something is sometimes better. I use my parents for this as well (also atheist but feel the same about heritage as me).

My daughters have a good sense (for their age) about history. When we travel in our country I try to revive stories of the Bible for them. This is available in most of the country, and for you guys at your homeland as well.

I also use the bed time story for this purpose. I try to combine legends (which kids love) from our heritage. There are a lot. I alternate myths from my heritage with others (Greek mythology for example). One can find hordes of stories in one's heritage of all types and purposes.

4. Work on their femininity

We are man and we practice masculinity. Femininity? Red-pill guys? How exactly? One would assume that this is the mom's job. So what? We all know that women are not to be trusted with responsibility. So I gladly take some of this burden upon myself.

You can do it too. The funny things is that it is not that hard. It also correspond with the red-pill.

First example: Women highest calling

"What is the most important thing that girls can do?" I ask them. "Give birth" they answer. "And raise the child," I add. This is something I always find the place to mention to them. There is nothing more important than continuation of our species. "Dad, what if we didn't have kids?" They ask. "It will be the end of the world for our family," I answer. "The family line will be lost". It took some time to understand this, but now they get it. Now they know that kids are crucial and that they should have them and take care of them.

Second example: Chores around the house

Not my best one (to say the least), but I try to have them do feminine chores around the house: Cook with me, fold laundry and so on. Just because I live alone and do masculine and feminine chores does not mean that my daughters can't learn it also from me.

Start early, and they will reap the reward

This is something that I lack, and should delegate more to them. It is a matter of preferences (I'm lazy in those parts and outsource some of those chores). When done correctly, you get your daughter accustomed to doing chores.

Third example: Looks

In this case I have a good deal of help from their mom. She emphasizes looks, dresses well and wears makeup. Kids need to have discipline and getting dressed, even for girls is sometimes tiresome. Trust me, I use to be like that. When they sometime complain, I remind them that looks are important (see tip #1). This is where a cooperation between parents really kicks it in, and a lot of people mentioned how well they dress.

Whenever they form an opinion on someone (based on their looks), I hammer it home again. Looks are women's top and dominant SMV component.

Forth example – Future career

Kids do a lot of thinking on what they want to do when they grow up. That may change on an hourly, daily or monthly basis. I had my daughters move from teachers to waitresses to babysitters and to doctors – all in the course of one day.

When they come to me with the new career, I remind them that they will need to also be there for their kids when they are young. Then you see them spin the wheel to show me how it works great with a child (or more). At that time I also remind them that since they will marry a successful man (god, I hope so!) he will be the one providing for them, and they will assist.

5. Reward feminine behavior

Let's face it, it's kids. They will fumble, belch, swear and do stuff that they are not suppose to. It is part of growing and also of testing their boundaries.

I punish swiftly. Explain shortly what they did wrong and then punish. If it is a good behavior I reward it. It is virtually the same as when you date, only you care more.

Punishment themes

- Taking away their time with me (for example – not getting a bed time story). This is for when they disrespect my time. Time is important to me, as they know I make efforts to be on time.
- Tactical anger – my daughters have told me that they fear me. Good. If kids have no fear there will be no discipline. Other dads (or moms) may say that it is not good, and that love is enough. YEH RIGHT! I ignore or take the time to explain that fear is crucial.
  Never actually lose your temper. Calm down once the point was made. If you cannot calm yourself, walk away and breathe. Losing one's temper completely is weakness.
- Not paying allowance – if it is disrespect to my money. This happens when they break stuff (on purpose or that it could have been avoided). I use less of this punishment as it correlates poorly from a time perspective.

I think you get the hang of it. If you want to take their TV time, have a supporting reason. "Because I said so" teaches them that power is arbitrary (and drives them to accumulate power). Punishment should fit the crime.

Rewards themes

- Verbally – most easiest reward. Giving a good word is immediate. One must not abuse it. When you give praise, look into their eyes and mean it. Kids know when you are "half arsing" it.
- Treats – you may use this on occasion. Usually amounts to a few dollars. If it is an "all-for-dollar" store even better, It gives them a sense of independence and correlate good behavior with physical reward.
- Activity – "You get to pick where will go on Saturday" is one of their favorites. My daughters in particular, and kids in general sometimes like to "steer the wheel". Giving them that opportunity (not every week!) makes them feel loved and respected, which again is a good correlation between action and reward.

6. Make them play an instrument and practice sport

One of my younger protégé (member of the RVF, which I mentor) told me that a high quality girl either practice sport and/or plays an instrument. He makes the effort of not dating girls who have no depth (pun not intended). Playing an instrument or practicing sports means that you develop character.

Apart from the obvious benefits, it also sets them up for higher quality boys. I know that their hypergamy might also rise, but I'll take that chance. After all they are my daughters, and I know what's best for them.

Teach her to play an instrument. It will make her a higher quality girl

Both my daughter practice sports and one is already playing the piano. The second will start next year on an instrument of her choice. They know it and, to my great luck, enjoy it. If your kids does not enjoy sports or music for some reason, look for alternatives.

7. Be there to give meaning to the world

The world is messy, unfair and sometimes not understood. For a child this can be overwhelming. I had my daughter cry every few weeks at "events" that disturb their childish worldview. As a father it is my responsibility to make sense for them. They ask a lot of questions, and get serious answers.

Starting from "the birds and the bees", I'm there explaining and making sense. I also encourage them to question me and see if the world view I provide is wrong. They ask a lot, sometime repeat themselves – but I'm patient and urge all fathers to be. Making sense of the world is done in a peaceful and respectful manor.

Nothing to add

Remember that mythology teaches us that the masculine gives order to the world. It is the case in most, if not any myths I'm familiar with. A serious task, which one takes upon himself once one becomes a father.

8. Show what happens to "Bad Girls"

There is an appeal for the "dark side". Even if in movies the bad person gets what's coming, my daughters (as every other female) have that attraction for "bad behavior". They see that it is "cool" and has rewards in the form of attention and ability to "do what you want".

Yes, female behavior should be controlled, but that is easier said than done. What can a divorce father do? Spanking is out of the question (legally). I have a problem with blocking the TV and internet completely.

My answer is to inoculate them as much as I can. Introducing the concept of "wrong/bad kind of attention".

You come across a YouTube clip, say of Katy Perry. "Dad, they are showing the wrong kind of attention," my daughters come to inform me. "I know. You realize what will happen to girls who do it?" I ask. "They will get use to it, and have a difficult time using their brain or doing stuff because they are use to it," they answer. "She will do bad things to herself to get attention."

The wrong kind of attention. Just ask my daughters

Immune. They now come to me telling me when they come across it. I know that some of you may claim it is not enough. This is the best tool that I can utilize under the circumstances and it works. You may also use it for commercials. Basically exposing the "media" lies repeatedly makes one more immune (not totally) to it.

9. Explain to them that it is their life, but you are here to show them what to do and support them

Daughter: "Dad, will you help me pick a husband? I want to have a successful one"

Me: "Yes. But it is YOUR CHOICE. I can give my advice but you will live with him"

Other Daughter: "Dad, how can we know if a guy is successful?"

Me (rubbing my hands with pleasure): "Good question. You will be attracted to him, but he also has to treat you well, like I do. He must also be loyal to you, as you will be loyal to him. He will need to have a good job, as he provides for you."

There are more discussions of this sort going on every now and then. Talk more with your daughters about their husband, otherwise they will be fixated about their wedding. I also bring marriage life, and inform them that since their mother and I broke up, they should learn from our experience and marry better.

10. Teach them not to be bullied

Yes, it's girls and they are coddled. Yes, school has a strict policy against bullying and fighting. And YES – that does not mean anything today. Your kid, boy or girl, can be bullied. It my kids, so it's my responsibility.

I teach them to fight back. Never start, but if harassed, punch back, and punch hard. This may seem counter to feminine behavior but it is not. When attacked, one must strike back – male or female. Girls should know how to defend themselves.

Like Ender in "Ender's Game" you fight not to win this battle, but to win all future ones. For those who remember the first fight of Ender at the beginning of the book.

Fight not win this battle, but to win all future ones

I also warn them about what I call "Victim mentality". They are not victims, and I will answer to the school. It happened and I did. The teacher and counselor were told, by me, that I don't allow them to start a fight. However, since they were punched they should punch back. I take responsibility. They were somehow puzzled, and mumbled about a "non-violent school". I said again that my daughters will not engage, unless physically provoked. My frame was strong enough that they left it as is.

When kids in their class told them that it was wrong, they came to me. I asked them to look at the kids' behavior. Guess what? Almost everyone punches back. Speaking to an aggressor does not solve the problem, and I'm sure as hell don't want them depending on authority.

This is also a good time to talk about successful guys that will physically defend them. Yes, alpha males are aggressive when it come to our females. We will defend them, if they are attacked.

11. Pick your battles

My TV fight is a lost cause. I will limit it but not take it out of the house. I will watch with them to provide red-pill guidance. I know that advice on the manosphere is to disengage the MSM, but in this case I choose not to, for my own reasons.

However, I have shown them repeatedly that TV and media should not be trusted. They have witnessed it repeatedly. I sat with them during movies, shows of different kinds and negated the messages (girl power and boys being no good). I had a lot of talks with them about it. But I know that the TV will remain in the house.

I know that some of the fights are not worth fighting. We have a specific amount of energy. You need to pick your battles and not to alienate your kids. Also, sometimes if we win it will be a Pyrrhic victory.

I consider myself stricter than most of the fathers I know, but each year I give them more space and allow them to push the boundaries. It is part of growing up. If you boundary was breached, you can either tactically get angry, or sometimes just say "NO". But again, know when to lose.

Conclusion

There is a lot of talk about raising red-pill boys. I understand the importance. There is very little discussion on raising girls, at least that I have seen. What I write here is my lesson learned of my last three years of red-pill awakening.

I'm already waiting for the time that they'll have boyfriends. I may AMOG them, but for sure I'll have the talk Roosh had with his sister. This is already saved on my hard drive and on my cloud storage. The day will come (in a few years' time) when it will be relevant. I have practiced it sometimes with girls in my harem, and they all acknowledge that the message is strong and true.

That does not mean I will be successful. I have most of the world against me, including the education system and the media. However I feel comfortable that my daughters will be way less damaged than the rest. Who knows, maybe the change back to patriarchy we are discussing will happen during their generation. In this case they will have an upper hand on other girls.

The Strange Life And Times Of Pamela Anderson

November 27, 2016 | by Miguel Mijeime | Link | Original Link

If you're within plus or minus ten years of forty, the image of lifeguard CJ Parker poised to do her duty on the beaches of southern California wearing her red, one-piece, high-cut swimsuit is surely an image that's indelibly seared into the lustful recesses of your brain. Like Rita Hayworth, Marilyn Monroe, Raquel Welch and Farrah Fawcett, Pamela Anderson was THE sex bomb for a generation of American men. In fact, given the global reach of the Baywatch franchise and her Playboy fame, she was likely an image in the masturbatory fantasies of countless non-American men of all colors and creeds the world over.

For her female prototype is, arguably, the most desirable of all but, certainly on a global scale, the rarest – white, blonde and slim with medium stature but busty with well-proportioned hips and a shapely derriere. Their overrepresentation in entertainment and pornography – supplied as it is almost exclusively by the northern and western hemispheres but consumed globally – belies the fact that this is an endangered species of female because of both global demographic change and the degradation of beauty within the nations that form the natural habitats of such women.

The pretty gal from Ladysmith, British Columbia

The blow-up sex-doll from Hollywood, California

I was a young college lad when I discovered Pamela Anderson and I was always intrigued by her rise to fame from the obscurity of a small town on Vancouver Island. Over the years I've caught bits and pieces of her story through her evolution. Perhaps devolution is the more apt term for it?

I'm likely one of the few that remember Pamela Anderson from her early days as a Labatt Blue girl and, like every woman, she hit her prime in her early 20s with a fetching natural beauty quite different to the image most people would associate her with today. Certainly, she maintained and even amplified her sex appeal for much longer than most women but her beauty never retained quite the same quality it had when she was the young gal from Ladysmith, British Columbia discovered on the jumbotron at a BC Lions football game.

Fast forward twenty plus years – past the Baywatch and Playboy fame – and it's remarkable that she's still standing. Three failed marriages, two widely publicized and circulated sex tapes of her fellating her rock jock paramours of the time (the first with her then boyfriend Brett Michaels of Poison and the second with her then husband, Tommy Lee of Motely Crue), three sets of cosmetic breast surgery (first to a D cup, then to a DD and, finally, removal altogether), an inability to establish herself as a serious actress after several terrible movie and TV roles and, last but not least, the Hepatitis C contracted from Tommy Lee are but a few of the difficulties she's faced.

(Quick aside: she's a vegan which is likely motivated more by her PETA sympathies than any nutritional considerations. However, I'm puzzled by the cognitive dissonance of women who espouse healthy living, avoidance of GMO foods and vaccines but don't see a disconnect between that and the act of deliberate anesthetization, chest incision and implantation of petroleum-based by-products into the human body. I once worked with such a woman and, although her breasts were certainly pleasant to look at, her endless harping about the importance of healthy eating and lifestyle was tiresome given her habit of strutting around the office like a peacock wearing low cut tops and flaunting her silicone-enhanced breasts.)

Pam, you had beautiful natural breasts. Why did you mutilate yourself?!?

Not paying much attention to Hollywood these days, I was surprised to stumble across Anderson's name in a recent news piece. To promote a speech she was giving at the Oxford Union, the now 49 year-old was on a British talk show together with a rabbi discussing the issue of pornography and the damage it causes to real relationships between men and women. An interesting subject but not one I wish to delve into here. My focus is on a comment that she made in the interview – "I recognize that I've been part of the problem".

"You probably shouldn't have swallowed. I forgot to tell you. I may have Hepatitis C."

You mean our damaged sexual culture is not all because of men? Women possess moral agency, make choices in their behavior and are responsible for the outcomes too? While quite obviously correct, her statement was remarkable for a woman in today's day and age and I'm surprised it didn't get more attention.

Traditionally, it was always understood that, in the sexual interplay between men and women, part of the responsibility for keeping men's lust in check was modesty on the part of women – modesty in dress, speech and conduct. As men, we all know the craziness of the testosterone-induced sexual appetite of our physiology and, notwithstanding the protestations of today's sexually-empowered promiscuous female that it's the same for women, the estrogen-testosterone mix in women has nothing like the power of the testosterone levels in men. Much like mastery of physical appetite in the interest of maintaining optimal body composition in the face of countless readily available junk-foods, it can, at times, require heroic levels of self-mastery in today's culture to keep sexual appetite in check if you're committed to a wife and family.

In bygone times, there was a widespread understanding – a social contract – that women would assist in helping the cause. In fact, that's still evident in traditional religious communities be they Amish, Orthodox Jew or Muslim. And, while I certainly don't wish to live in a place like Saudi Arabia and the aesthetic drudgery of burkha-clad women, I'll confess that, in ways, I respect the moderate Muslim traditions. Their patriarchal culture does not allow its women to indulge in their inherent craziness and poor decision-making as it relates to the formidable sexual power they hold over men.

Moreover, many Western Muslim women that chose to don the hijab (a veil that leaves the face exposed), do so not because of the pressure from their patriarchal cultural but rather of their own volition because of the message that it sends – an emphatic "No!" to the idea of becoming a secular, sexually-liberated Western female. (Pity though the Christian or secular girl that tries to espouse a similar modesty. She'll be roundly mocked for it.)

Oh you're not a Muslim? You're a modest Christian woman? In that case, Pussy Riot will be arriving shortly to desecrate your sacred liturgy while Western media and celebrities defend their freedom of speech and artistic expression.

In today's Western culture of entitled and promiscuous women, Slut Walks and FEMEN agitation, openly discussing such sentiments as a man will get you harassed, fired and driven from polite society. Consider the poor mild-mannered academic who has the temerity to point out a valid analogy in response to the insanity of the Slut Walk phenomenon.

To say, "While the burglar is still guilty of theft, the homeowner who has left all the doors and windows of his home wide open while on vacation is certainly reckless", is a blasphemy when applied to the behavior of today's Western woman. Such common sense has no place in today's rape culture-obsessed climate of misandry and so, naturally, the man's message must be completely distorted and he must be shamed and blacklisted (not unlike the similar experience of our very own Roosh).

I submit that Pamela Anderson's acknowledgement was a remarkable piece of honesty for a woman. She acknowledged female moral agency in our damaged sexual culture (obvious to all us red-pill men but rarely acknowledged by women themselves). I haven't followed the story since and perhaps it was a careless piece of honesty on her part that she's since retracted in the face of a PC onslaught. (Chrissie Hynde of the Pretenders faced such criticism for stating in her autobiography, "Reckless", that she bore responsibility for being sexually assaulted by a group of bikers in her younger days because of her careless stupidity in maintaining their company alone late at night while drinking and flirting.)

Hi Mom!

For whatever reason, I have an affinity for the long-gone cutie from Ladysmith British Columbia and perhaps my respect for her honesty is foolish sentimentality. Yes, she's still a total loon. And yes, the anti-porn activism is likely just the prevarication of a post-Wall woman seeking meaning to compensate for the loss of her seductive power to elicit lust in the eyes of the men around her. How painful that loss of power must be for a woman! However, I respect those who take responsibility for themselves, their actions and the part they've played in a dysfunctional dynamic or conflict. It's always easy to point the finger at others but so difficult to look critically at ourselves.

Aside from her tumultuous celebrity, Pamela Anderson has had her share of challenges. From several years of childhood sexual abuse at the hands of female babysitter (What?!? A female perpetrator of sexual abuse?), to her rape as a teenager (a real rape – not one of those drunken, mutually careless college hook-ups that's later regretted and called rape by only the female party to it), through her crazy days of superstardom, you have to give the woman some credit for surviving it all.

As red pill men of the manosphere, we can see her journey as a by-product of the breakdown of patriarchy and tradition. A patriarchy and tradition that, at one time, perhaps would have protected this woman from the malignant forces around her and the self-destructive decision-making and confusion so often a feature of the "liberated" female mind. Yes, even in a bygone era she could very well have ended up working in a brothel but, compared to the number of women today engaged in everything from mindless promiscuity to pornography to the sex trade, both the absolute and relative number of harlots was surely lower then than it is now.

No, sorry Pam, no stirring in my loins whatsoever. Nothing. Nada. Ziltch. Your sexual power is gone. How's your cooking?

Of course, we understand that there are women who are victims of exploitation and desperation and they deserve our mercy, compassion and aid. But it is a red pill truth that attractive women learn very early the magic of their sexual spell on men and they become adept at monetizing it if they can. Some do so based on ill-conceived and confused short-term thinking based on the values of our decadent age with the results of their decisions doing damage to both themselves and the culture around them. Others still operate within the latent fumes of traditionalism and patriarchy and make more prudent long-term decisions allowing them and the culture around them to flourish. Maybe one day our society will be honest enough again to acknowledge that and admit that women too possess moral agency in these matters. Even the blonde bombshell from Ladysmith British Columbia had enough sense to do so.

Will Hollywood And Corporate America Keep Selling Garbage Politics To Trump Voters?

November 27, 2016 | by Maximus Decimus Meridius | Link | Original Link

There is still a lot of accepting and getting used to saying the phrase "President Donald Trump" for many people in America. Personally, I went to the gym first thing that morning of November 9th and the level of angst, frustration, and disgust from the women (and even some men) around me was palpable. I was absolutely jubilant and I suspect the women could sense this. It was an awesome workout, but a bizarre one none the less. I did not have to say a word, every woman knows what Trump's victory means.

The days of have-your-cake-and-eat-it-too are over. Any mainstream celebrity, brand, business or advertiser who ignores the cognitive dissonance cluster bomb that exploded on Nov 9th, 2016 will be out of business, fast.

While I am still keeping my eyes wide open on Trump's actions as he becomes President, nothing will change the fact that a cultural tipping point in the war on men has been reached. A tipping point that was possible because of the men of the manosphere and alt right communities.

> For a year, the media said that Trump was a KKK sympathizer, a rapist, and a xenophobe. They literally threw everything they possibly could at him. It didn't stick. Perhaps the country is starting to understand that ad hominem attacks are used by people who can't deal with rational arguments. People who can't talk about policy dismiss their opponents as racists. (Communities Digital News -Main stream media dies November 9, 2016: Rest in Peace)

Sound familiar? Who has been at the sharp point of the spear over this past US election cycle? Who has been using rational logic to refute liberal/leftist/feminist/SJW lies and ideology to prove who are the real deplorables? That would be you if you are reading this post, and every single writer and commenter who has contributed to not just ROK's success, but the success of the neomasculinity movement in general, no matter what form or version it takes.

It took me awhile to truly realize just how far reaching this Trump election will be culturally. Roosh has outlined what it could mean for men living out their daily lives in the West. Jon Anthony showed us just how clueless liberals/feminists were in their reaction to Trump's win, which was so obvious to us. Relampago Furioso showed us that the mainstream media is so far out of touch with reality, they fell all over themselves trying to explain away Trump's win with every theory under the sun except the only one that is true—Hillary was in the election only for herself, while Trump was a man for the people.

What I have not read on ROK yet is the cultural fallout of Trump's victory in the one sphere of society that walks with the biggest stick—money. If the main stream media is now dead and all but buried, what is the logical fallout from this fact?

Advertising on the MSM is a complete waste of money and time

ROK and others ARE the new mainstream media. We have the stats and the demographics to prove it, but no one would believe us until Trump's landslide victory.

And it is not just advertising that will be shaken up culturally. Comedians can't expect much of an audience, and therefore income, if they continue to insult you and the man you voted for to be president. Hollywood's reaction to Trump's win is going to result in a lot of empty theatre seats and people cancelling their subscription to NetFlix if they don't realize that continuing to insult and demonize half of the American population is not good for business.

> One producer told Deadline that we should keep productions inside California or only in the states that shares the same values as Clinton's voters.
> Hollywood Reacts To Trump Victory With Shock And Disbelief

Yeah… good luck keeping a studio afloat by producing feminist tripe over the expense of the heterosexual majority of the population that just voted in the most alpha male president in America's history. To say there is a disconnect between the producers of "culture" in America and the American consumer of "culture" is an understatement.

Sure, Americans have a lot less money than they used to, but they still have money. And if they choose to spend that money, what are they going to spend it on? If you are a big brand with a huge advertising budget, where are your ad dollars best spent? Targeting the leftist half of America only? Or perhaps expanding your demographic "diversity" a little and consider the fact us deplorables have more disposable income than your ideological, femi-nazi "love trumps hate" losers?

Are you a celebrity? Are you a mainstream brand or business? Will you be the first one to reach out to us "deplorables" and make it rain $$$ for your brand or business by recognizing we exist?

Case in point. Here is a female entertainer who bases her entire image on her sexual appeal to men (at least until she hits the wall) and women who aspire to be like her. Is it really in this woman's best interests to continue to demonize the majority of the heterosexual male and female marketplace for her brand?

> — Christina Aguilera (@xtina) November 10, 2016

While this may be a single and highly isolated example to many, this is the only Twitter update Christina Aguilera has given out since Trump's election win (as of Nov 22). One tweet in two full weeks since the election of Trump. Coincidence? Or is Christina crunching the numbers and now realizing just how much money she might be losing by continuing to push the feminist-Hillary-Democrat-SJW -leftist line of pathological insanity.

When you live in a bubble, you only wake up when someone pops it. Nov 8th was the biggest cognitive dissonance bubble pop heard round the world in human history. You might think my line of logic does not compute. That there is no way, no way, the entrenched leftist thoughts that are destroying the West could be so quickly dropped and the patriarchal pendulum start to swing back with a force unthinkable to snowflakes in there safe spaces on campus.

But we are talking about America. The land of money and dreams of money.

This election proved that fully half of America, and thus half of the money, has been completely ignored by advertisers who have no clue how to market to them. Unless you are a complete idiot, continuing to ignore half the American population (i.e. non-feminist, heterosexual men and ladies) is going to result in a lot less money for you. Are you going to see Star Wars Rogue One? I did not think so.

Conclusion

A massive change not just in the White House, but in Western, or at least American, culture is coming. Perhaps I am playing prophet once again, but feminism is well and truly dead. The 2016 election for President was nothing less than an outright, country wide, nay world wide, referendum on the entire intellectual foundation, history and future of feminism in the west.

And feminism lost. BIG. HUUUUUUUUGE.

This will be the only conclusion advertisers and others are going to discover once they begin to research how to market to us "deplorables." Girl power. Rape culture. Alphabet soup, gender and racial "diversity." None of these memes are going to work with us and if you market your brand / product to us in that way, or claim to speak for those values, you won’t lose only my dollar, but half of America’s.

And before you laugh at the idea of a wholesale culture change with the election of one man for a single term, possibly two, you should remember what the fate was of those who laughed at Trump when he said he was going to run for president in 2016.

How To Control Your Muscles

Yes, my dear readers, it is time once again for your friend Larsen Halleck to dig deep into the hoary fogs of eldritch and forgotten lore, and pull up a classic of physical fitness that has only recently become rediscovered by enthusiasts of physical culture. That book is, as you would assume from the title, Muscle Control by the German strongman and gymnast Max Sick, better known by his nigh identical stage name of "Maxick" in the English speaking world. Despite the age of this book, it is still relevant to the physical culturist today—not only in terms of the exercises, but also providing some basic training in mindset (although I would argue that the mindset he develops will inherently develop from any sort of hard physical training).

Who Was Maxick?

Like seemingly every other fabled strongman of the past, Max Sick was born a sickly child in an archetypal Mitteleuropean setting (more specifically, Bregenz, Austria, later becoming a German citizen).

Suffering from dropsy and rickets as a young child, he was not expected to live beyond the age of 5. “But somehow, one way or another, I began to cheat death, and at the age of 7 I was deemed healthy enough to go to school”. It is also here that he begins to develop the mindset to achieve his goals—namely, a mindset of resentment and shame: “And now for the first time I realized what a malady ill health is. I never knew how bad I was until I saw healthy boys, virile and exuberant. From wonder I passed on to envy of them, and with envy came mortification… I watched them at play and become possessed with a feverish desire to be like them.”

As I have written on this website and my own, shame is one of the greatest motivators there is.

Gradually experimenting over the next decade with various types of exercises, he gradually turns himself into a pillar of strength and vigor, performing many documented acts of strength in front of crowds of thousands. But what were his theories and practice?

Maxalding And Muscle Control

Working with fellow strongman Monte Saldo, he comes up with a certain type of isometric exercise known as “Maxalding”, or “Muscle Control” as the book is titled. According to Maxick, his experience as a blacksmith’s apprentice made him notice that mere mechanical exercise could only develop muscular size and strength up to a certain point. Deliberate concentration and relaxation would have to be used to get beyond those plateaus.

What this refers to is the action of agonism and antagonism of muscles. When one flexes and contracts, an antagonist muscle must slacken and extend. “To allow the working muscles to flex maximally, to work, the antagonist muscle must be in the utmost relaxation”

What is meant by muscle control is: “to be able to, via willpower, contract certain muscles maximally while maximally relaxing the antagonist muscles”. To achieve this “muscular control” he advocated stretching to keep the muscles supple, as well as his specific routine of muscular control exercises. Bear in mind that he never explicitly disparages weight training: He outright states that you cannot use JUST muscle control to develop your muscles to the fullest, you need external resistance. “But I do claim that solely resistance cannot develop the limit of strength you can develop unless you have muscle control”. His own career as a champion weightlifter would seem to indicate his use of both methods.

How Muscle Control Works

In very simple terms, muscle control is a method of deliberate concentration upon, and flexing of various muscles while deliberately relaxing the antagonist muscles. The ability to do this is trained by performing the various muscle control techniques contained within the book. This ability to relax the muscles is repeatedly stated to be the most important aspect of muscular control, and as such it is the first exercise given. As such, this article will give you the first two exercises (full body contraction and relaxation)

Leather thong not required

Figure 1 shown above is a pose in which “not a single muscle is contracted in this pose” The guy is standing, with hands down. “Think of each part of the body in turn, starting at the head, to the neck, and so forth. Allow each muscle to relax as you think of it, think of “drooping”. Care must be taken not to contract other muscles you have already relaxed. If you do this right, concentrating on drooping, you should feel your legs almost give out from under you. The legs are straight and the arms are slightly bent to prevent tricep extension.

From my own experience, closing your eyes and “Getting the feel” helps, as does visualizing the muscles softening and sagging.

Practice Exercise 1 until you master it. Then do Exercise 2, contracting all muscles of the body simultaneously. You will find that not all muscles are capable of being controlled at first.

Beginners can also start the same way Exercise 1 was done, imagine going down each muscle from the head to the feet, flexing all of them maximally. Retain all muscles in a state of contraction until the exercise is complete. As stated above you will probably not be able to contract all muscles. You will have to pay the utmost attention to those muscles, contracting them to get them under your mental control.

Once you understand what it is like to relax and contract all muscles, you can begin targeting other muscles. But those will be for another article.

Conclusion

While I have not completed the book's teachings, I have already moved onto more specialized muscle control exercises such as single trapezius and single abdominal control, and have noticed soreness in the targeted muscle, as well as increased strength and control already. In addition, I would imagine that the idea of muscle control can be applied to martial arts as well: A proper punch involves keeping the hands loose and then suddenly snapping the hand shut and turning the wrist, thus if that same sort of "looseness suddenly becoming hard" could be applied to the whole body, one might be able to greatly increase the velocity, and thus the power, of their striking.

While I would not recommend these sorts of isometrics as your only physical training, they do work very well as supplemental exercises to a program of compound lifting or calisthenics.

November 28, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

The 21st century leftists have proven themselves to be utterly ignorant and incapable time and time again. And I believe there are specific reasons for this that has to do with their very core nature. The following demonstrates all the loser characteristics embedded in their psyches that draws the leftists to their equalist beliefs. And because they compensate their own shortcomings with their ideology rather improving themselves, it ultimately leads to a cycle of loserdom which they cannot escape from.

For the sake of simplicity, I will group liberals, progressives, SJW's, feminists, degenerates, and all the rest under the title of 'leftist'.

1. They don't take care of themselves

The leftists are such losers that they do very little to take care of themselves. As well as being short-term thinking hedonists, they don’t want to put any effort in life, so you’ll often see them eat unhealthy food and shun working out. This is why the leftist females tend to look like painted hogs while the men are usually low-T twigs. You’ll also see them do little to dress properly or maintain their looks other than to exaggerate their own ugliness for attention and shock effect.

2. They have zero accountability

Leftists never take responsibility for their own lives. This is why they must constantly blame others for their problems, cry for resources and sympathy, and expect everyone else to respect them when they deserve none. It’s no surprise that many of these individuals tend to be in favor of nanny-governments.

3. They feel entitled

For every inch you give them, they’ll ask for another mile.

Because they have no accountability, because they’ve been coddled all their lives, and because they view themselves as victims who need to be compensated for, the leftists have the most deranged and shameless sense of entitlement. They seem to think that the world owes them everything, which is why they have such arrogant and hostile attitude towards everyone else. The whole concept of working to earn something for yourself is lost to them.

4. They think weakness and victimhood is a virtue

Instead of trying to be better and stronger, leftists prefer to rationalize their pitiful existence and turn their status as the “oppressed” into a source of pride. Because being a victim is such a coveted status, they don’t seem to want to move on from their real or perceived victimhood by trying to improve themselves. This is why the leftists always behave like perpetual infants.

5. They rely on government and billionaires

Brought to you by Soros and co.

As much as they claim to be against the elites and the established order, the leftists are the most reliant on those on top for their livelihood. Like the sucklings with no agency they are, the leftists depend on everyone else to take care of all their needs. This is also why they are so easy to manipulate into serving as the pawns of the elites.

Do you really think feminism and BLM would be able to continue on as they do without the “Patriarchal” and “racist” system tolerating and openly supporting their movements?

6. They think destiny is on their side

The leftists will always lose because they are arrogant enough to think that the spirit of times is on their side. With their smug faces, they'll tell you that it's time for women to rule because it's the "current year." They truly believe that we're all on a one-directional path towards some rainbow utopia where everyone lives in total peace and harmony. And they do so all the while berating everyone else they disagree as Neanderthals who are not getting on with the times.

Their flawed logic is as follows: A) Anything that challenges the status quo is progress, B) Progress is good for humanity, C) Challenging the status quo is therefore good. This is why they always target and assault the traditional order, ignoring the fact that it was exactly those time-tested values that enabled them the prosperity they take for granted.

7. They hate everything decent

The leftists are inferior in many ways—and they know it. And for that reason, they need to spew hatred for anyone who is better than they are and pretend that they're not interested in having the qualities they envy in secret.

The leftists hate healthy body, family, beauty, masculinity, honor, life, and more. If they see a strong and masculine white man, they'll feel threatened as they see him as an "oppressor." If they see a beautiful, traditional woman, they'll spit venom as they see her as a traitor who is conforming to "Patriarchal" standards. Instead of trying to be decent themselves, they prefer to promote degeneracy while destroying all standards so that everyone can be equal losers rather than just themselves.

8. They are hypersensitive

Leftists cannot escape their loserdom because they refuse to grow strong by facing challenges. Instead, these pampered children choose to shield their fragile feelings, only to dig themselves into a deeper hole. The more they guard their emotions, the more sensitive they become, and the more they demand others to meet their "need" for safety. This is why you see these spoiled brats clinging onto their infantile safe spaces, trigger warnings, and so on.

9. They have a fixed mindset

Because the leftists have a fixed mindset where they believe nothing can be changed through one's own effort, they expect everyone else to revolve around them. In their world, whites will always be privileged while blacks are oppressed due to slavery from generations ago. Rich will always be rich and poor will always be poor because the system is designed to be oppressive. Men will always be rapists and women will always be victims because of "Patriarchy." Individual initiative doesn't exist to them, only the collective identity.

10. They are guilt-ridden

The ugly truth the leftists will never admit is that they secretly hate themselves. The somewhat normal ones have been conditioned to feel guilty about being white or masculine while the deviant ones—even as they pretend to be proud of their aberrant identities—feel guilty about their subnormal nature. This explains why suicide rate among the trans-whatevers is far above the normal population. Back home in Sodom, I had a gay friend who revealed to me that the majority of the homosexuals in the city were severely depressed and consumed excessive amounts of drugs and alcohol to sedate themselves.

The guilt is also why you see white people hating their own race to virtue signal, along with the male-feminist turds who bash other men like it's going to get them laid. In a way, they have to direct all that negative energy onto others so that they'll stop hurting themselves.

11. They have no self-respect

Jonestown or SJW's protesting? Who cares, they're both equally crazy.

The leftists have no respect for themselves as they are incapable of generating it within themselves. This explains why they constantly seek external approval by demanding that everyone else accept them just for being "oppressed" and praise them for promulgating ideas about equality. When you have no accomplishments and nothing of value to be proud of, the next best thing is to have politically correct opinions that you've been taught to have which requires no effort at all.

12. They are deconstructive

The leftists are usually unable to create anything worthwhile on their own, which is why they try to deconstruct what they don’t like without offering any real alternative. And because of their destructive nature, they would rather shut down others from speaking than have a dialogue, they’ll criticize those who makes things happen rather than do things on their own, and so on. They like to go against all that is sacred and tear things down for the sake of “progress” and ceaselessly challenge the norms without any tangible end goal in mind.

Conclusion

The leftists are their own worst enemies and the only way they ever win is when the opposition slips or fails to put up a fight. That said, I would like to leave a word of warning to all the readers here: Just because Brexit happened and Trump was elected, it doesn’t mean the leftists will concede defeat and magically disappear from the society. They’ll cry even louder and try to be more disruptive than ever before. Eight years of Reagan and eight years of Bush didn’t do away with these freaks, it only set the stage for them to return with greater fanaticism. They’re already protesting en masse across the country, so don’t let your guard down—the real fight hasn’t even begun yet.

US State Department spokesman John Kirby recently got himself embroiled in a revealing exchange with a news correspondent from RT (Russia Today). As Kirby was performing his usual crocodile-tears act in front of the cameras about civilian casualties that his government is ultimately responsible for due to its military support of a brutal insurgency, he was challenged by the RT correspondent. The correspondent asked him to provide specific details to back up his allegations. Kirby, growing more irritated by the second, finally exploded.

Words in this case speak volumes. We should begin with the basics, without which any discussion about the Syrian war is incomplete. For the past five years, the United States and its regional allies have been arming, backing, and promoting a vicious, bloody military insurgency in Syria with the express purpose of replacing the secular government there with one that is allows itself to be a tool for US policy in the region. Independent players cannot be permitted to survive, in the thinking of US planners.

The slogans of “human rights” and “democracy” are now, as they have always been, nothing more than fig-leaves to conceal the true goal of regime change. For a while, it seemed like the project was going well. But when Syria called in its own allies for assistance, the tide turned. This did not sit well with Washington, to say the least.

Because its crimes and lies have been exposed for all the world to see, the US can do little more than throw temper tantrums and double-down on its deceit. Part of this game is the attempt to characterize dissenting voices as “Kremlin-controlled” or “Russian propaganda.” It is an old game, and one that has gained the US some mileage in the past. In the view of Washington and its acolytes, RT is not a “legitimate” news organ, in the same way that the BBC, CNN, or any number of other US networks are.

The US media: self-satisfied, spoiled, and lazy

RT’s detractors like to make a big deal out of the fact that the network is “funded” by the Russian government. Of course, such voices leave out the fact that almost all mainstream Western networks are also funded—directly or more covertly—by the governments of their respective countries. The truth is that every major network in every major nation is linked to its government with varying degrees of intimacy.

In the US this game is done with more subterfuge and dishonesty than in many other countries, but the links are still there. Who can doubt now, after having seen the media charades over the 2016 presidential election, that the mainstream media works arm-in-arm with the government? Influence-peddling, nepotism, covert funding, even direct investment all demonstrate that the US has no moral high ground it can claim in this respect. RT has never hid the fact that it covers world news from a Russian perspective.

And more to the point: what difference does it make? Are we going to evaluate truth or falsity based on who is doing the speaking, or are we going to look at the statements themselves? Rather than focus on the facts, Kirby’s response instead focuses on the messenger, in this case a RT correspondent.

The US media expects its correspondents to toe the party line

Parroting the official party line is a recent piece by one Matt Armstrong, who himself works for a US governmental agency. According to Armstrong, RT is part of a Kremlin-directed "misinformation" campaign that cannot be legitimately compared with Western news outlets. By taking this position, Armstrong arrogates to himself the right to decide who is, and who is not, a "legitimate" journalist. Revealing is the fact that nowhere in Armstrong's article is any space given to how the Syrian war started and why bombing of rebel areas is needed to bring the conflict to an end. This, of course, would lead the discussion into unacceptable realities.

Armstrong goes even further, calling into question the reporter's qualifications as a journalist for having the audacity to challenge the pre-scripted game of the self-appointed world hegemon:

> The disappointing part of the episode was not Kirby rightly calling out RT to ask similar questions of the Russian government, but the response that drew from the Associated Press reporter in the room. He chided Kirby and said "she's a journalist just like the rest of us." Yet she is not a journalist, her agency is not like the AP, in that it does not seek to empower its audience with accurate news. Let's not forget that RT's slogan is "Question More," which in practice clearly means "Sow Confusion and Distrust." RT does not share AP's values and principle and those of other professional journalists.

In Armstrong's universe, one professional is not even permitted to come to the aid of another professional who has been subjected to vilification by a US government spokesman. The campaign against RT and its correspondents brings into focus a dangerous tactic of US elite circles, one that is also copied freely by the US politically-correct left. The tactic is de-legitimization: any voices of opposition that threaten the prevailing orthodoxy cannot be acknowledged as legitimate or sincere. Instead, they must be demonized or de-legitimized, using the well-tested tactics of association, smearing, and invention. We can expect to see increasing reliance on this tactic in the future.

How To Defeat Leftists In Debates

Mainstream media members and social justice warriors everywhere remain outraged. Everything Donald Trump does, or says, is under constant scrutiny by people with unearned moral superiority. Whether it's ditching the press pool for a steak, or criticizing a highly overrated broadway play, even the most monotonous tasks are receiving front page coverage. While criticism of Trump is expected, the mainstream media is crying wolf far too often.

Unsurprisingly, we've seen a boon of snowflakes that are shocked, appalled and offended by everything that the president elect says. Twitter, which is a breeding ground for social justice warriors due to their censorship of differentiating opinions, is running rampant with overly sensitive SJWs and incredulous mainstream media members.

We should avoid meaningless confrontation with people who can't be swayed, however, the reality of the matter is that at some point, you may be entrenched in a debate with someone on the left. Rather than not preparing, you should arm yourself with the debate techniques required to defeat a leftist in a debate, maintain your image, while destroying their argument as much as is possible. By channeling historical, and contemporary sources, as well as my own experiences, let's dive into the techniques that we should use to win an argument against a leftist nut.

Remember: the goal isn't to sway your opposition – it's to influence the observers. Chances are that your leftist opponent won't vaciliate no matter how logical and reasonable your premise is. Lefties will shun your facts.

Equal Moral Grounds

When you debate a leftist, they'll attempt to distract you by assaulting your character with unwarranted, baseless claims. Being labeled a racist, misogynist, bigot, or white nationalist are just a few of the many buzzwords that will be pelted your way. It's worth mentioning that you should have thick skin – don't flinch, nor be affected by the insipid, vacuous insults.

The problem inherent with debating a leftist, is that they will pull the "racist" card. Once you're called a racist, you aren't left with many options. You can't retort with facts, because according to the them (the leftist/observers), you have yet to address the racist accusations. While some pragmatic observers may see what game the leftist is playing, most will not. It's important to note, that before you begin to put forth your argument, you should ensure that the debate takes place equal moral grounds.

You may feel the urge to throw slanderous accusations back at them, but it won't progress the debate, and you'll come off just as craven as them. What you want to do, is come off as calm and composed. Don't retort with "I'm not racist" because you're essentially proving that you value their point, and feel it a point worthwhile of rejection. You want to inform them that you won't continue the debate so long as he/she continue to slander you with unfounded claims.

> "This debate won't progress any further if you keep slandering me with false, baseless, erroneous claims. When you stop with the ad hominem rhetoric, we can continue and attempt to advance the discussion"

What this does, is put the leftist into a position where they only have two options.

1. They call you a racist again. In this case, they lost the debate. They prove to you observers that they were never interested in a serious debate, and that it wasn't worth your time anyways. The snowflake will then retreat back to their safe space.

2. You're asked to explain your point further. From here, you can have a civil debate – at least for a little while, until something triggers your opposition (as is likely).

The left is slowly beginning to realize that identity politics don't work anymore.

Reframe

Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860), is a German philosopher who wrote a book called 'The Art of Controversy', in which he details 38 stratagems for dealing with controversy; arguments, debates, insults, etc. I recommend that any man read the entire book – his stratagems are extremely effective in a debate.

One of the most useful techniques he suggests, is the use of a reframe. Listen to what your opposition says, then reframe and attack his or her premise from a different position.

> "Ignore your opponent's proposition, which was intended to refer to a particular thing. Rather, understand it in some quite difference sense, and then refute it. Attack something different than that which was asserted" Schopenhauer, 3rd stratagem

> "Another plan is to confuse the issue by changing your opponent's words or what he or she seeks to prove." Schopenhauer, 6th stratagem

A modern example of these stratagems in the context of a debate with a leftist would be on gun control. Suppose you're debating a leftist who parrots typical mainstream media balderdash and asks you why you don't want to ban assault rifles – another concocted term. Instead of retorting "No, I don't want to ban assault rifles", a proper retort would be to attack their argument from a different angle. They're pressuring you on assault rifles, but where's the consistency? Ask them why don't propose a ban on all guns – including handguns, since they are 'responsible' for more deaths each year. The key here is to find inconsistencies in their arguments, and with leftists it's not hard to do.

Whether you like him or not, Ben Shapiro is an excellent and dare I say it – perhaps the best debater currently in the political sphere. He has yet to turn down a debate, and when he does debate someone, he normally eviscerates them. He's a conservative, who has said that he personally aligns most closely, policy-wise, to Ted Cruz, so while he doesn't share all of the same views that we in the manosphere do, he holds a lot of the same principles – small government, immigration reform, and a realist regarding Islamism.

During June 2016, entrenched in a Politicon debate on institutional racism against a leftist lesbian named Sally Kohn, Shapiro applied the above principles beautifully. Below is the video, and instead of me quoting the entire piece, check out his article, in which an excerpt plus analysis on this debate is available.

Pressure Them

Once you've created an equal moral footing, which I admit, is difficult – leftists are exposed. The entire foundation on which they stand has been toppled, leaving them naked and open to attack. To do this, you need simply question them about specific policies, stats, and further rock their foundation. Leftists absolutely hate answering questions, since their entire arsenal lies in character assassination. Ask numerous questions, which while undoubtedly catch them off-guard, as most leftists only practice moral rhetoric.

Returning to Schopenhauer:

> "State your proposition and show the truth of it by asking the opponent many questions. By asking many wide-reaching questions at once, you may hide what you want to get admitted. Then you quickly propound the argument resulting from the opponent's admissions" Schopenhauer, 7th stratagem

Socrates is another famous philosopher that is known for this method of winning an argument. Socratic questioning involves asking a lot of questions, which creates a situation in which both parties are thinking about their premises rather than expressing their exaggerated opinions. It's idealistic to think that a leftist will think calmly, and logically, but again, your goal in debating a leftist isn't to convince them; it's to convince the audience.

Conclusion

While it's not ideal to become entrenched in a debate with leftists due to the fact that they will castigate you for no reason whatsoever, with the election of Trump, there's a high probability that you will be forced to face a leftist foe eventually. Should you be unprepared, your ill-conceived responses would incite further slander. It's best to think of leftists like a woman. Emotional, irrational, but they can be disarmed – with a combination of techniques such as the ones listed above. It takes practice. You won't slay leftists overnight. The most important piece of advice I can give, is to do your research, and don't talk about subjects which you know nothing about.

PODCAST: The Past, Present, And Future Of Game

What is game and why do modern men have to use it? In this podcast I explain the societal and environmental changes that have made game a requirement for men to sleep with attractive women under the age of 30. I share the origin story of how I got started in game and offer an effective nine-step program for men wishing to get started themselves so that they can be more successful with women. Lastly, I describe the future of game and how its application may change with time.

Women Sexualize Themselves For The Public As Much As For Their Husbands

Countless American and other Western men already live in de facto polyamorous relationships, including marriages. Why? Because so many long-term girlfriends, fiancées, and wives sexualize themselves as much as for the general public as they do for their boyfriends, fiancés, and husbands. Sexualization can take many forms, but is perhaps best demonstrated by constantly dressing hyper-sexually, rather than just to look good, for strangers' eyes, instead of for her husband's or established male partner's.

Even when this sexualization does not take the form of infidelity via penetrative sex (and many, many women do cheat in this way), enough women now believe that they must sexually present themselves to the entire neighborhood (and then some), above and beyond anything we used to see. In this vein, the distinction between the average husband-wife sex life and the third-party sexualization engaged in by the wife is becoming less meaningful with each passing year. What we are getting is a watered-down yet still marriage-undermining form of polyamory.

This behavior by wives is not as uncommon as you might think.

Aside from producing children, who, sadly, are likely to inherit–or be scarred by–the self-entitlement and overt hypergamy of a mother behaving this way, what's the point of these kinds of marriages? The man has presumably already traded his ability to have sex with other women, on pain of a wife's meltdowns or divorce-rape if he doesn't. So what does he get? Very little, it seems, except for a world of half- and even full cuckery, as his wife parades herself for every leery male nearby.

Enter Chrissy Teigen

The new poster child for this growing form of female exhibitionism is one Chrissy Teigen. Thanks to her, just when you thought female narcissism could go no lower, it did. Recently at the American Music Awards, "supermodel" Teigen deliberately showed off her vagina to a throng of celebrity photographers, red carpet onlookers, and–most importantly–the entire world. The problem here is not so much Chrissy Teigen did what she did (although it's still bad), but rather that she was married when she did it.

It's great to see how female empowerment is rocking marriages like never before, as shown by Chrissy Teigen on the red carpet at the American Music Awards:

Here she is with apparently complicit (read: cucked) husband John Legend on the same night:

How Chrissy Teigen is a so-called supermodel is beyond me, but we could pretend she was a stunner and my underlying point would still stand. Of course, she takes off most of her clothes for a living. Yet that's a different kettle of fish from showing your hooha on a night that's meant to be about your husband (Legend both performed that evening and was nominated in the "Collaboration of the Year" category).

Except for when Legend is in her vajayjay, anything Teigen gives her husband has essentially been offered to every man with access to a TV or computer. Unfortunately, there's a massive difference between an Elle Macpherson of the 1980s and 90s and the Chrissy Teigens of 2016 (and not just in terms of looks). Likewise, there's a yawning gap between the wives of past years and many of the wives of today.

So what's the point of marriage?

Well, there is no point, unless it's done right. And "done right" can be a very elusive outcome, as a man marrying today may have little indication of how his wife, supported and too often encouraged by a backward "culture," will behave into the future. The argument that game provides a solution for a betrothed man is only relevant up to a point. After all, the gender malaise affecting society is decidedly real and potent. Consider game as the collection of tools to climb an oftentimes very steep hill steadily becoming a mountain, when the hill should have been bulldozed long ago.

At the end of the day, marriage has been stripped of the intimacy and exclusivity that used to define it. Even if a married man had mistresses in the past, his sex life was less publicly on display than the sexualized attention-whoring indulged in even by married women who don't cheat. Consequently, in many or most marriages, there is next to nothing that is special about what a wife sexually provides to a husband, as she's offering a light, moderate, or, frequently enough, heavy version of it to the public.

Are you in a marriage or relationship like this? Then prepare to leave it

Yup, it’s time to leave.

Don’t act prematurely (secure your finances and develop a plan to keep any kids you have first), but you need to prepare to eject from toxic liaisons such as these. Without exaggerating, in 99% of cases, your energies are better spent finding another girl than trying to reform an attention-whore, even if you think she hasn’t cheated on you. Move as fast as you can to end things without jeopardizing your material situation.

Here at Return Of Kings and on the Roosh V Forum, we believe in–and expect from other men–a mentality of abundance. This can often be the harder choice, but it is the right one. In no sense should a “wife” or “girlfriend” be rewarded for behaving like a whore. Your self-respect should come light years ahead of her vanity.

For men considering either marriage or a long-term relationship, the same basic principles apply. It is much better to be on your own for a while than to be the guy taken advantage of as a cucked first among equals, the equals being the swarms of other men she tries to appeal to.

You may not have the riches and fame of a John Legend, but you can have bigger balls and excise Chrissy Teigens from your life.

Why Game Will Never Die

November 29, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You haven't seen many game articles from me in the past year, creating the impression that I quit the game entirely and am ready to renounce my previous books Bang and Day Bang. Many religiously minded men suspect I've found God or experienced a spiritual awakening. The plainer truth is that I still use game every single day, not to gain notches or casual sex, but within the dynamic of a relationship. From this new experience, I'm convinced that game is just as essential to maintaining relationships with non-sluts, especially in the modern age.

Approach game vs relationship game

For over ten years I used "approach game," where I would cold approach women, present the most attractive version of myself based on my understanding of the true nature of women, and apply logistical tactics to seal the deal quickly and efficiently. This style of game has helped thousands of men with their sex life, whether their goal was to gain a notch or enter a relationship.

As many people predicted, I got tired of sleeping with random women. My dopamine receptors burned out to where I saw no point in duplicating sexual experiences and pursing notches with sluts. I also began to feel degraded from putting my phallus in so many dirty women who I had no respect for. So I changed course and eased into a monogamous relationship with a girl who meets my standards and has stronger values.

Even though I don't approach women anymore, I'm still using game. I'm hyper-conscious about my girl's behavior and actions along with my own, and I work at managing the gap between our nature and self-interest in a way that ensures our relationship is successful.

While this relationship isn't the same as approaching ten girls in the club every night, it still uses the same part of my brain, along with skills that carry over from juggling many women at once. In terms of the differences, approach game requires more balls, grit, and energy while relationship game requires more emotional control and leadership.

I met my current girl through approach game, so for me to denounce that would be the same as wishing my relationship never would have happened. Approach game is a tool that is extremely useful for men who are introverted or lack a robust social circle while living in a large city (i.e. any man who has moved away from his hometown after high school). For these men, knowing how to approach women is just about required to meet a girl on the same socio-attractiveness level as him.

This doesn't mean that my past writing is without flaws. If I were to write my game books all over again, I would make two changes:

1. Focus less on encouraging notch-building and "banging." Building notches is not an effective long-term method to building your masculinity or confidence. For a time, however, I really thought that banging a lot of girls was the answer to happiness, and now that I see it's not, I can advise men on what I learned and how—after a period of necessary experience—game should be used more as a tool than a lifestyle.

2. Advise men to stay away from mentally unstable girls. My advice did push men to sleeping with girls who were extremely promiscuous. The problem with this type of female is that they have issues that could cause men a lot of problems, ranging from stalking to false rape accusations. I want to focus more on keeping men out of harm's way.

Most men would suffer without basic game knowledge

If you are a man living in the United States and are not in the top 10% in terms of attractiveness, and don't have some innate knowledge of approach game or relationship game, there's a good chance you won't lose your virginity until your early 20's or beyond. Even with my recent embrace of more traditional values, you can't entirely skip out on game, because we no longer live in a traditional world, as the neomasculinity manifesto describes.

I mentioned this fact in my State Of Man speech last year (speech transcript is included in my book Free Speech Isn't Free):

> It now takes hundreds of hours of game work and self-improvement work to enter a sexual relationship with a girl who is good looking. Did your dad have to put in a hundred hours to meet your mom? My dad had to take a shower every day. (Laughter and clapping.) Is that enough now? (No.) A shower every day… come on.

Using traditional behavior on women who are non-traditional may get you killed, and I do mean that in a literal sense if you consider all the men who commit suicide after getting divorce raped by modern wives they attempted to treat in a traditional manner. Even celebrities like Robin Williams, who hung himself because of a bad divorce, are not immune.

If I were to tell men right now not to use game and just be a traditional man like their grandfathers, I'd be sending them to their doom. It would be nothing short of betrayal. I'm sure many of you want to be traditional, as I do, but unless you hit the lottery and find a traditional girl in some conservative pocket of America who is immune from the negative influences around her, you're stuck with women who have toxic progressive ideas in their minds that can only be screened, tamed, and managed with logical game

I’m not going to tell you right now to hit the nightclub, get drunk, and bring home a slut, but I will say that it is just about essential for you to have the ability to start conversations with women, maintain attraction, and steer female behavior in a focused way that ensures a successful relationship. Your father or grandfathers didn’t have to acquire these manually, and a lucky few of you reading right now possess natural talents or a favorable locale that allow you to skip out on game learning entirely, but most of you, like myself, need to be taught this knowledge.

My future game writing will focus on meeting girls who are less promiscuous than average and how to maintain relationships with them. Until we revert back to a traditional society, men are going to need game, and if they choose me as their teacher I will be blunt to them about their prospects. As much as we wish we can just be ourselves or be an honorable man, those days are long gone, meaning that today’s man needs game more than ever.

Cuckservatives Have Started To Adopt Manosphere Narratives

Here's a kicker for you: housewives are happier than feminists, and happier than women in any other occupation. It may still be a thoughtcrime to publish that truth, but more people are now questioning female supremacy than ever before. You know change has come when former enemies within are now parroting what you say in the Culture War. In a stunning about face, some cuckservatives are now tepidly and timidly echoing what the manosphere has been saying about women and culture for well over a decade.

More about that in a moment. First, here's how I know we in the manosphere are right. If there's anything being truly "multicultural" i.e. traveling and banging women across the world will show a man, it's what a shitty deal men in Anglo America get. As my travels across the world began, I noticed I felt more welcome abroad as a white man than I did in my home country. This is especially true among attractive and fecund women.

It didn't take long until I didn't want to come home to such a fucked up culture in which the sexes compete against each other in some strange survival of the fittest operation rather than cooperating with each other. A man also notices he is not scapegoated for supposed, trumped-up crimes against women, and in a sexually libertine atmosphere like that found in Latin American countries (especially the one I currently enjoy in the Caribbean) he notices several other important differences. Women don't act like entitled bitches. They don't look down their noses at men. They don't hate men. They don't view sex (especially straight sex) as "dirty" and reproduction as something de-classe "breeders" do. They stand by men and their families.

Then there's the sexless nature of Anglo America today in which even an attractive guy who knows the principles of game has to jump through all sorts of hoops to get laid. The relations between the sexes have become so mercenary as a result of feminism the family has died and reproduction isn't occurring at a sufficient rate to sustain European and traditional American people and their culture.

Feminism has unleashed the Law of the Jungle on the West

A sexual jungle has been unleashed, as I detailed earlier this year.

> In the past, behaving the way women in the West now do would have been so disastrous the situation would have corrected itself. However, the tax farm we now live on subsidizes this type of behavior with – you guessed it – Beta bucks of hardworking taxpayers. The r-selection paradigm creates an unstable environment (i.e. uncivilized one) and leads to the following:
> - Single parenting
> - Women with children with many different fathers
> - Early sexual maturity in children
> - Short generation time (children having children)
> - Lack of male participation in society
> The natural balance that would have put an end to this, women finding themselves outcast from society or destitute for making childish, irresponsible or fickle choices won't return unless the system subsidizing it fails.

All the above narratives and the resulting chaos are the result of a 1960s era, Marxist narrative promulgated by the CIA via their cat's paw Gloria Steinem.

Cleansing Cultural Cancer

Sexy housewives may make a comeback as feminism implodes

Feminism has grown like a cancer in a cultural vacuum. However, there are signs cultural chemotherapy in the form of traditional men with the guts to call a spade a spade is having an effect.

Thanks to the manosphere the feminist guilt trip is now suffering its first brush with reality, and the narrative is increasingly falling apart. Bloggers are talking about how the manosphere helped win Donald Trump the election. And now, even the cuckservative, so-called "mainstream" National Review is calling the culturally and demographically suicidal religion of feminism into question.

After we have been lambasted and called every name in the book for questioning the gynocracy to begin with, the cucks are now echoing the manosphere. In a stunning about-face article entitled Feminism: Women Are Made Weaker By It published just last week the cucks wrote:

> Which brings us to the second goal of feminism: enabling women to be strong and making women strong. In one of modern life's bigger ironies, feminism has actually achieved the very opposite. In America today (as opposed to, let us say, Saudi Arabia, where it does take strength to be a feminist), the more stridently a woman identifies as a feminist, the less strong she is. Feminism has created what is undoubtedly the weakest generation of women in American history.

Whaaaat? It gets even better.

> Modern feminists are afraid of life. They are afraid of differences of opinion, and especially afraid of men.

Perhaps the fact men have united in droves against the femcunt narrative, and are openly calling for men to Go Galt and Enjoy the Decline is making the power structure take notice. There is a revolt brewing, and the Pareto Principle relegating 80% of men to sexless lives of servitude to the YouGoGrrl narrative isn't helping.

Even the Bush-family connected and National Review-endorsed, failed presidential candidate Ted Cruz got the memo about the sea change in conservative politics brought on by the ascension of Trump to the throne.

> If we're given the White House and both houses of Congress and we don't deliver, I think there will be pitchforks and torches in the streets. And I think quite rightly. I think people are so fed up with Washington, this election was a mandate with change and the most catastrophic thing Republicans could do is go back to business as usual.

Even though we are causing a stir, the manosphere and Alt-Right (of which there is some overlap between us and them) is being relentlessly vilified by the Left in one of their infamous witch hunts. Witness Vox vilifying the Evil White Male once again (i.e. Racial Bolshevism) for daring to look out for his own self-interest and not merrily ingesting the hemlock of the Kill Whitey agenda:

> The alt-right's priority, first and foremost, is preserving America's status as a white-majority nation. To that end, they want Trump to follow through on the most extreme immigration ideas he's discussed — such as deporting millions of undocumented immigrants and banning Muslim immigration. These steps, they think, will slow what they call the "dispossession" of America's whites.

The left is nervous. Nobody listens to their wailing anymore. With feminism now being openly questioned in the media echo chamber there are signs their great ethnic cleansing experiment i.e. multiculturalism may be the next narrative to fall like a domino.

The left continues to scapegoat white men for all the evil in the world while turning a blind eye to true atrocities

One might ask Vox: Does this mean when Mexico tries to preserve its status as a Latino nation, Zimbabwe tries to preserve its status as an African nation, and Saudi Arabia tries to preserve its status as an Arab nation they're also committing horrible crimes against humanity? No. The narrative from the left is always anti white self-interest.

Even as the Left clings to the Evil White Male phantasm, they stand idly by as real atrocities against women are being committed like cutting the clitoris off young girls.

We are onto your game, bitches.

So, while we have had a stunning success by making the Establishment, check-pants Republicans blink, our fight is far from over. We have won a major battle in a much larger scale war. But the left is already entrenching itself in trying to label anyone with a non-Marxist narrative their favorite playground name-calling term: raaaacist.

We must not relent until the cancer of not only feminism, but Cultural Marxism as a whole is cleansed from the body politic. We are the white blood cells protecting the immune system of the nation state. And now, even weaklings are taking up the mantle of truth which has its roots in the manosphere.

This was true even in Mark Twain's day. Twain wrote:

> In the beginning of a change the patriot is a scarce man, and brave, and hated and scorned. When his cause succeeds, the timid join him, for then it costs nothing to be a patriot.

The timid are joining us. Let's march on to cultural victory, gentlemen.

Why You Should Always Be Prepared For A Survival Situation

November 29, 2016 | by Gaius Marcius | Link | Original Link

Since the dawn of time there have always been rites of passage for men. In ancient times it may have been to hunt your first animal, or survive in the wilderness on your own. Generally they all meant the same thing: to be a man meant you are now able to provide and care for yourself. To acquire your own food, shelter, and handle your own problems. Nowadays this rite is often the moment your parents decide they can leave you at home by yourself without you burning the house down. And our first hunt for food by picking up a phone and ordering pizza.

Why Survivalism Is Needed

Now that we're adults and have jobs and can just buy our food, we don't see the need for learning the ancient arts of surviving in the wild. But to be a man you must be able to always fend for yourself and your family even during a disaster or national emergency. To be a man you can't rely on the government or anyone else to come save you when a large-scale disaster strikes. And they don't have the best track record when it comes to responding to large disasters.

How You Can Benefit

Survivalism isn't all about living like the world is going to end any day, like a lot of mainstream media would have you believe. It's the ability to bend nature to your will and make it work for you. It can be a very healthy lifestyle for modern men. Most men have, and still do, go camping. But next time you go, consider backpacking—putting everything you need for camping in one back pack and hike with it to your campsite. It's a more fun workout than going to the gym, and you'll have to plan out everything you'll need on your trip. It also teaches you to be resourceful and innovative. If you backpack ten miles from your vehicle and then realize you left your fork and spoon in the car, you'll have to improvise.

Also, learning how to prioritize essentials is a skill that is useful in all aspects of our life. Taking only what is essential and not carrying any dead weight. The extreme backpackers even shave down their toothbrushes to 3 inches to save on weight and space in their pack. If everything you need for camping fits into one backpack it would save a lot of space in your garage, too.

There's a sense of security in knowing that if you travel into the wilderness, far away from any other human being, you can survive on your own. Of course becoming a modern caveman doesn't happen overnight. And Hollywood is full of examples of when it goes wrong (127 Hours, Into The Wild). Learning the basics of fire starting, water sanitizing, first aid, and trip planning are a must.

Survivalists prepare for dozens of different scenarios ranging from zombies to asteroids to if the Cubs lost the World Series and Chicago descended into anarchy—I know several people who canceled business trips or bunkered down during the series to avoid that scenario. And I don't advocate for preparing for the end of the world or zombies. I advocate that men should know how to provide for themselves in the case of a devastating disaster. Near where I live a city the size of 160,000 people was hit by more than 3 inches of freezing rain one winter, knocking down power lines and trees and making roads dangerous. They didn't descend into anarchy but they were without power for a week or more. Power was restored to the stores and you could buy necessities, for twice the price they were the week before. But power to most of the houses was off for a week or more.

A man should be able to know what to do when the water doesn't flow out of the tap or the power doesn't come back on for a week. How do you sterilize water if there's a blackout during a boil order? And society is not as strong as we think. We all live in a trucking distribution economy. If the trucks stop moving the cities don't have food. The trucking industry has been falling on hard times. If an oil crisis or economic crisis occurs and the trucks stop moving then the cities go without food. It's been said that all cities are 3 days from bread lines and 7 days from cannibalism. Just look to the mess Venezuela is currently in. The people there resorted to eating feral dogs and pigeons.

Where You Can Start

Don't go turning your Man Cave in to a prepper bunker by any means. I can't understand why people buy a year's worth of baked beans and hide them in their spare bedroom. Any situation involving a complete collapse of society necessitating you to rely on a years worth of baked beans means you have more serious problems to deal with than finding food. Who puts out the fires if society collapses? And how are you going to carry a pallet of baked beans? Keeping a week of extra food and supplies is all you need for most disasters and emergencies. And some basic camping gear. But most of all, learning skills and practicing them is required. Once you learn skills you never have to worry about leaving them in the car that's at the bottom of the mountain you just climbed.

A lot of us living in the cities don't have a lot of spare room in our apartments. To start being more prepared you don't need much. A week of extra food, an independent cooker for food and sterilizing water (a barbecue grill works), extra hygiene products, and a few supplies. A food stash doesn't have to be complex or exotic. A good rule would be ten cans each of vegetables, fruits, and meat, as well as carbs such as crackers and rice.

You can find a small water filter for backpackers that is smaller and cheaper than a flashlight for your drinking needs. And having extra toiletries such as toothpaste and soap also saves you from late night drives to the store for one item. Extra batteries for flashlights, radios, or other gadgets can be a lifesaver in an emergency as well as good bartering items.

By the way, the first items that are bartered for in an emergency are toilet paper, toothpaste and batteries. So if you don’t have something you can trade for it. Duct tape, a roll of gauze, and a small bottle of isopropyl alcohol can get you through basic medical needs, but you really need to know what you’re doing for the more advanced medical stuff. And lastly, you will need the skill and the will to defend your stash if the need arises. Remember you are prepping for yourself and not the looters.

So as responsible adults, aka Men, we should take an interest in the survivalist movement and learn the skills of survival. With the way society is headed they may become useful.

How Mainstream TV Uses Emotional Triggers To Sway Political Opinion

I went to visit my family for Thanksgiving, and as usual, I was confronted with numerous blue pill beliefs. While I'm no longer annoyed by these things, because I've gone through the "Return Journey" phase of swallowing the red pill, I did notice something that was extremely disturbing.

As I grew tired of arguing over basic political, economic, and gender points, I meandered downstairs to my family's recreation room. There was a group of my younger relatives, aged 16-20, watching some show on Netflix about trans-gendered individuals.

I don't know what the show was called, but one thing that really struck me was the show's uncanny ability to use emotionally charged scenes and drama to elicit a feeling of compassion for the characters. In other words, numerous TV shows are now starting to take advantage of our natural empathy, and using it to sway our political and social opinions.

Emotionally Gripping

As I stood behind the couch watching a few minutes of this transgender show, I saw a very heart wrenching scene take place. Although the nuances of the story line were lost to me, I gathered enough information to see what was going on.

Basically, some guy was getting surgery to turn into a woman. As he was in the operating room, something went terribly wrong, and despite the surgeons' desperate attempts to save him, he ended up perishing.

The following scene was comprised of extremely grief-inducing piano music played to various clips of the man's children all mourning their loss. While this may seem innocuous, or like it's just "creative, dramatic television," I believe that it's actually something far more sinister.

What's going on here, is that the elites (because remember, this is a top down operation) are trying to traumatize the average American youth with images of the "horrors that transgender people go through!" They're using television to create these emotional "triggers," if you will, that will be ignited anytime someone says something against transgenders.

In other words, the trauma that occurs from becoming engrossed in this TV show (in our example) leaves an emotional residue of sorts, so that whenever the topic of transgenderism is brought up in conversation, the viewer subconsciously remembers the emotions associated with the topic which the TV show implanted into his mind.

Emotional Triggers

Television erodes your ability to think

This became abundantly clear to me as I was arguing with a friend from the West Coast over transgenderism. I very calmly said that I believe it's a mental illness, and should be treated as such. I said that these people need help, and we shouldn't encourage them. I backed my assertion by referencing how the chief psychologist at Johns Hopkins Hospital has vehemently called out doctors who perform transgender surgeries as "collaborating with a mental illness for profit."

Despite my calm and collected assertions, she grew EXTREMELY emotional and automatically assumed a whole host of things about me:

- I'm a disgusting, careless sociopath
- I have no sympathy for others' suffering and I'm a cold-hearted bastard
- I vehemently hate anyone who's different than me

Despite the fact that none of these things are true, it became clear to me why she automatically believed this about me: the TV shows that she watches had been subtly implanting little emotional biases into her brain. This is how manipulative our "real" media is.

What happened, in psychological terms, was that as I was calmly explaining my perspective on transgenderism, her subconscious was flooded with all of the EMOTIONS that she associates with the topic:

- All of the pain and grief she experienced from TV shows depicting transgender "issues"
- How Bruce Jenner is a "hero," and how much mainstream "opposition" he encountered when coming out
- All of the anger she experienced when the token "anti-transgender person" in each show was a huge dick to the main character (more on this in the next section)

All rational thought was completely stopped, as she had literally been trained to elicit a certain response whenever the topic of transgenderism is brought up. Do you see my point? By repeatedly exposing people to scenes that elicit sympathy for transgenders, the media is engineering a widespread social response in favor of it.

Token Characters

"I'm the stereotypical jock that beats the shit out of flamboyant homosexuals!"

As I alluded to before, another underhanded tactic that mainstream TV shows use is that they never have a rational, level-headed man who supports traditional marriage and normal heterosexuality. Any time someone in mainstream media doesn't support the main character's disorder, he's always portrayed as a complete asshole.

This can take the form of him beating up the main character, bullying the main character, or what have you. I recall several years ago there was ample talk at the work place over some "anti-homosexual" character in glee that smothered a smoothie onto a guy just because he was homosexual, or something ridiculous like that.

Despite the fact that NOBODY I know would do something like this, the elite-sponsored TV utilizes token characters in order to implant a certain idea into our heads—the idea that everyone who opposes deviant sexual orientations is a cold-hearted bully. I recall that this was pointed out to me by a Catholic high school teacher, and it didn't make any sense to me back then (before homosexuality was normal).

Now, in retrospect, I'm extremely thankful that he planted that seed in my class's mind. The more that I look at television through this lens, the more I see what he was talking about. There's never a level-headed, confident, genuine man that has game, either. It's always either a completely meek beta male, or a chauvinistic "bad boy" Hank-Moody type character (although I do love me some Hank Moody).

This phenomena is taken even further as the transgender or homosexual person in mainstream TV is almost always portrayed as some brave, sweet, sensitive soul, with a hard life. In other words, the elites are engineering a dichotomy as Roosh has referenced before.

The dichotomy is that you're either a sweet, empathetic, gentle-hearted person who supports transgenderism and deviant sexual preferences, or you're a complete asshole who bullies and berates people just because "you're mean." This use of labeling brainwashes others into IMMEDIATELY putting you into the "sociopathic jerk" category if you don't support transgenderism, making any and all rational discourse folly.

Subtle Desensitization

The average American is desensitized for 8 hours a day.

Another terrifying event that comes to mind of the media's disgusting methods was when I was watching a popular kid's TV show known as "Adventure Time," a year or two ago. Again, I was with my family for some holiday event (I can't remember which), and recall some of the kids watching this show.

Despite the fact that it's labeled as a kid's show, I saw an insidious little dialogue take place that was meant to desensitize children to pedophilia. In the show, there was some ball going on (I assume it was like a "prom" type deal), and the old wizard was looking for a partner.

He ended up going with some underage girl, who was probably 60 years his prior, and when the main character pointed this out, the old wizard simply stated: "Age…is nothing but a number!" Upon which the characters started dancing and doing comical things to prevent any sort of rational thought occurring after this was said.

After seeing this I became extremely disgusted and turned off the television, but that's beyond the point. Why is this type of dribble being used to brainwash our youth? Anyone with half a brain can see that the point behind this scene was to start subtly implanting the seeds of pedophilia into a child's mind.

Again, the words of my wise old Catholic high school teacher come to mind. I'll never forget when he told me that "in 15 years, pedophilia will become normal." My entire class was shocked, and couldn't comprehend such a thing happening. He said this in 2009, and it seems that his prediction is coming true.

"First it will start with the media," he said. "They'll have some show where they make jokes about it and they'll keep the humor very lighthearted, never showing the actual act. They'll begin the process of desensitizing you, then eventually some politician will bring it up, and it will be an official stance that other politicians will be forced to take. This will begin the process of slowly normalizing it."

My God was this man spot on, because this is EXACTLY how the media sways our opinions.

Keep in mind that their methods are SUBTLE, and that's the point—they want to keep it below the level of thought so that you never question what they're teaching you. Any time a strange or ridiculous belief is asserted, they very quickly move into a joyful scene or celebration to not only prevent you from thinking too much about the ridiculous belief, but to have you associate happiness with it, as well, which brings me to my next point.

Association And Correlation Bias

There's a very powerful phenomena in psychology known as association; this is sometimes also called the correlation bias, or "Illusory Correlation." This is basically your mind's tendency to look for relationships where there aren't any.

For example, why do you think most modern girls aren't girlfriend material? Why do you think that the average man is weak, pathetic, and emasculated? It's because of the media's tendency to slowly create illusory associations within your mind.

The media causes women to associate happiness and a successful life with the following:

- Being a man-hating feminist, who can't submit to a strong, confident man
- Not cooking or cleaning, because that's "sexist"
- Riding the alpha male cock carousel, and not getting married, because marriage is "oppressive"

The media creates a false correlation in women's minds by constantly portraying bitchy, overly-masculine, slutty women as being empowered, sought-after, and happy. As any man who's been learning game knows, this is absolute nonsense.

It doesn't matter, though—once your brain has an association, it's extremely difficult to get rid of it. This is why so many men are emasculated nowadays. It teaches us to associate:

- Being a weak bitch with getting a hot girlfriend
- Being a feminist and leftist with having girls think you're noble and heroic
- Courting a slut with being a gentleman

As any modern man who reads the manosphere knows, these are completely fallacious beliefs. Being a weak, low-testosterone man will not in fact land you the girls. Being a screaming leftist who holds those "I'm a feminist because," signs will not get you the approval of women, and courting a washed up slut does not make you a gentleman (it makes you stupid).

Despite the obvious illogical nature of these beliefs, because the mainstream media has 8 hours a day to indoctrinate us, most men end up buying into them wholeheartedly, and will even berate you for having game when you CLEARLY get more women than them.

"So What Can I Do?"

It’s time to dismantle the MSM.

First things first, stop watching mainstream media. In case you haven’t noticed, the MSM is starting to feel the effects of men waking up; in fact, they’ve recently gone on a long, drawn-out tirade about “fake news,” or in other words, news that is red-pilled.

I haven’t watched mainstream media EVER—the only time that I ever watch MSM is if they’re interviewing a pickup artist, a manosphere blogger, or if I’m trying to debunk their ludicrous reporting. I get almost all of my news from sites like ROK, Danger And Play, Info Wars, Natural News, and the people that I follow on Twitter.

In addition to only consuming a red-pilled information diet, ensure that your children don’t watch TV unarmed. I saw a phenomenal post recently on “How to Raise Red-Pilled Daughters,” and the ROK author talks about how he doesn’t flat out ban TV, but rather teaches his daughters to think rationally and learn to see the foolishness of MSM.

Aside from not watching MSM and raising your family to be skeptical of it, you can also support alternative media sites by simply tuning in. You don’t have to buy any of their products (although it helps); simply giving them your attention and leaving a thoughtful comment or two is enough to generate interest.

All in all, we’re facing extremely tumultuous times. More and more people are starting to break free of the MSM’s grip on their mind, but the men who get left behind end up more brainwashed than ever. Eventually, once the MSM dies, we can begin the long and arduous process of reclaiming our country—and this, my friends, is something I believe is worth fighting for.

5 Ways That Trump's Presidency Will Impact Game

November 30, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Since Donald Trump was elected the 45th president of the United States on the 9th November there has been a veritable tsunami of commentary from both the right and left speculating on what his presidency might look like, and what it will mean for Americans and the rest of the world. One issue that hasn't seen much coverage is how Trump's term in the Oval Office might impact on the world of game.

But with leftist media outlets like Salon and Esquire (plus The Spectator, a right-leaning political magazine) queuing up to position Trump as a consummate PUA who has successfully seduced America (with the support of websites such as this one), might we expect to enjoy a golden age of game once The Donald is inaugurated in January 2017?

Trickle Down Effect

Trump has long been regarded as pro-men's rights, largely as a result of his championing the cause of (mainly male) blue collar workers whose livelihood had been decimated as a result of globalism, plus his somewhat 'traditional' outlook on gender relations. Also, every aspect of Trump's demeanour marks him out as a man's man, an alpha who has little truck with the niceties of neo-liberal political correctness.

It is at this point that one might expect cries of "misogyny" to ring from the galleys. Let us not forget, though, that Trump's campaign manager was Kellyanne Conway, Rebekah Mercer is a hugely influential member of his transition team and he has named both Nikki Haley and Betsy DeVos as members of his incoming administration. In The Art of the Deal he writes: "I've hired a lot of women for top jobs and they've been among my best people. Often, in fact, they are far more effective than the men around them." So Trump is by no means a woman-hater.

Until he is office we can't know for sure certain what policies he will implement and the degree to which these will change society. Nevertheless, the so-called trickle-down effect is very real and very powerful. With a president at the helm who has demonstrably embraced various aspects of game (whether unconsciously or not, and evidenced by his hot wife and ex's) it seems likely that overall climate in the US will at least become more favourable for game as Trump's term progresses.

I'd now like to examine five aspects of the Trump phenomenon and consider how these might begin to reframe game in US and Western society as we go into the New Year

1. The Death Of Political Correctness

Let's face it, a presidential candidate who utters the phrase "grab them by the pussy" (even in jest and while being secretly recorded) is hardly a stickler for political correctness, and it seems likely that this will start to impact on the wider culture as his presidency progresses.

For the record, I have no doubt that Trump's statement was genuinely "locker room talk" of the type that guys frequently engage in, and I don't suppose for one minute that he was actually endorsing pussy grabbing or even suggesting that he had engaged in it himself.

How will this affect game? Well, as every player knows, a certain irreverence is hugely helpful when chatting up girls, and the ability to disdain societal convention—if applied congruently—can be hugely attractive. In a climate where the scourge of political correctness is relaxed and humour allowed to flourish once more, a space will be opened up once more for playful banter between the sexes.

2. A More Realistic Response To Women's Requirements For Men

"You have to treat 'em like shit" Trump famously said of women to New York Magazine in 1992. Out of context it is hard to tell for certain, but again, this sounds to me rather more like alpha joshing and bravado rather than a serious instruction. Nevertheless, the quote does reveal Trump's intuitive understanding of women—that what they say they want isn't always what they actually desire.

How often have you heard a woman say that this or that guy is "too nice" for her? Or that she always falls for the "bad boys"? Continually? Me too. The uncomfortable truth is that women are simply not aroused by nice boy behaviours, even though these behaviours might be a welcome add-on to an already hot, alpha dude. We've all met the douchebag who treats women terribly and yet has sex with them in huge numbers.

Look, it's pretty simple—men are biologically impelled to seek sex with a variety of partners. Therefore they will do whatever it takes within reason to get access to that sex. If being a really nice guy cut the mustard then every man would be doing it (and actually, 95% of men are).

Trump's more realistic assessment of women's desires (albeit couched in colloquial language) could be taken as a rallying cry for men to grow some balls and be more assertive during his term. More assertive men = more attractive men, which can only be better for both sexes, right?

3. Realising The Power Of Assumption

"All of the women on The Apprentice flirted with me— consciously or unconsciously. That's to be expected" wrote Trump in How to Get Rich in 2004. This has been quoted out of context to the horror of many over the last few weeks, but few people have stopped to consider whether Trump seriously meant it. Either way, the quote speaks to the concept of assumption—an incredibly powerful tool for men to use when pulling women.

Put it this way, when you see that cute girl at the party and you're about to approach her, do you think it's better that your mindset tells you she fancies you, or better that you believe you have no chance at all? Quite clearly the former is better. When you start talking to her your confidence will be high, your eyes bright and your chat more fluid. For these reasons her enjoyment of your company will likely be increased.

Trump clearly believes that walking out into the world believing that others see value in him is more effective than not doing so. Perhaps under his presidency men will feel empowered to do likewise.

4. An Awareness Of The Potential Pitfalls Of Marriage

Most men are brought up wanting nothing more than to meet a nice wife, work hard and have a family. This, we are told, will bring happiness. However, with the divorce rate over 50% in the West (and around 60% in many major cities) and with 75% of these divorces filed by women, something is clearly very wrong. Men need guidance and from time to time they need to hear the unvarnished truth.

When Trump said of Anne Hathaway's dumping of Raffaello Follieri "She hasn't remained very loyal to him, has she? When he had plenty of money, she liked him, but then after that, not as good, right?" he was only saying what a sizeable segment of the population—male and female—were already thinking.

For the record, I have no idea of Hathaway's motivations in that case and I don't suggest that her actions were mercenary. However, the fact remains that many men are divorce-raped, cuckolded and then hit with huge alimony notices every day of the week. I'm not saying that all marriages and relationships end like this. However, it would be a better situation if men can properly assess their options. Under a Trump presidency it looks likely this will be encouraged.

5. The Truth About Women And The Ageing Process

In 2015 Trump hit the headlines once again for declaring that supermodel Heidi Klum was “no longer a ten.” Klum responded to this in good humour, posting a 12 second video of herself on social media posing with a man in a Trump mask and the hashtag #HeidiTrumpsTrump.

Now of course, Klum is still a beautiful woman. But is she quite as hot as when she was in her early twenties? I’ll let you be the judge of that.

Once again, Trump articulates an uncomfortable truth. This time, though, it is hardly a secret. Most people—men and women—are aware that women’s sexual market value decreases markedly after the age of thirty. But this is buried in a miasma of political correctness, clouding many men’s judgements of just what they’re walking into when they sign a marriage contract or opt for a long-term relationship. The girl you met when she was 21 will be changed significantly by the time she’s 50—that’s just a fact. A more honest and open discussion around this phenomenon will equip men to make better life choices when selecting a partner or lifestyle.

These are just five examples of where Trump’s insight into male-female dynamics may likely impact on the culture and the type of game that takes place within it via the trickle-down effect over the next four (or eight?) years. While Trump’s brash style has offended many (even his own supporters) there is industrial-scale hypocrisy at work given that most of us say things we would prefer not to be broadcast to the world in jest or out of the earshot of others. It should also be remembered that a lack of political correctness does not in itself indicate malicious intent.

I’d love to hear your thoughts on these example and any more you can think of in the comments section below.

How To Maintain Your Online Anonymity Using Advanced Techniques

November 30, 2016 | by August Moliere | Link | Original Link

In a previous article I discussed the possibilities of increasing your safety online by using measures such as encryption, VPN and Tor. Nonetheless I did not cover all possibilities and most importantly it was a practical discussion rather than a theoretical one. This article will be a theoretical dissection of online anonymity tools and their weaknesses.

Why do people get caught despite using Tor? Can anyone be truly anonymous online ?

This article will be a summary of the work of Tom Ritter, presented at DEFCON 21, the annual hacker conference. His video presentation can be viewed here and the printed version of his article here.

While doing a great Job, Tom's work is heavy on tech jargon and might confuse laymen. So I will summarize his work and explain the strengths and weaknesses of modern anonymity tools. His work was published in 2013, but remains relevant today as well.

In his work Tom talks about 4 anonymity technologies : SSL, Tor, Remailers and Shared Mailboxes. Let's discuss them one by one.

SSL

SSL stands for Secure Socket Layer and is a common online security standard used by the likes of Facebook and other major websites. The way SSL works is that it creates an encrypted tunnel of communication between 2 parties so that third parties cannot read the messages they are sending to each other. Despite being secure on paper, it can be circumvented rather easily. To understand how, first we must talk about metadata.

Metadata

Metadata is data that describes other data. For example, library cards which hold the name of the book, its publishing date and its location in the library is a form of metadata. Metadata is also used in IT.

Other form of metadata is not registered but can be inferred. For example, someone created a program that can discover which parts of Google maps you are looking at based on the size of map tiles you are downloading.

When you are using SSL you are unwillingly lending third parties metadata which can lead to your discovery, particularly the time the message was sent and the size of your messages.

This allows for attackers to do something called a correlation attack.

Correlation attacks are primarily of 2 types : Time-based attacks and Size-based attacks

Time-based attack

In order to perform a time-based attack a party sends a message in an encrypted stream, then it looks at who receives the message. Since SSL communication is instantaneous, you can easily infer who is behind the SSL stream. The third party sends a message at 15:59 and whoever happens to get the message right afterwards must be the person they are looking for.

This type of attack was used against the person who dumped Stratfor mailpools. The way it worked is that government analyzed the time he was logging in on the internet and noticed it coincided with the time the person they suspected logged on to a secret chat through Tor. Not only that, rumor has it the government cut electricity to his house at a certain hour and noticed that the user of the secret chat logged out at the same time. The coincidences were too much, so he got caught.

Size-based attack

In order to perform a size-based attack, the third party sends a file of an unusual size, and then whoever receives the file must be the person they are looking for. Since most people on Facebook send small messages to each other, one only needs to send a very large message and see who happens to receive a message of that size afterwards.

As you can see correlation attacks render you vulnerable if you use SSL as your only line of defense. The reason is because the Third Party can not see WHAT you are sending, but they know that you ARE sending something, WHEN you do it and HOW BIG is the file.

Ideally they should not even know you are communicating with anything at all. So, let's see what other technologies have to offer.

Tor

Tor is a custom browser based on Firefox with extensions that works on the principle of connecting to a few nodes so that when you look at a website the only thing the website can see is the last node you traveled through and on the opposite side your ISP (Internet Service Provider) can only see your first node, not the whole route.

This is already getting better. However it does not add that much anonymity since now third parties do not know WHO is communicating, but they can still see that it DOES happen, WHEN it happens and HOW BIG the size of messages are.

Not only that, but there are known vulnerabilities, particularly of 3 types.

You are viewing a website in the country you are in.

This allows advanced opponents calculate that it was YOU who was using Tor. It is difficult, but not impossible. This is bad news since a lot of people from US view websites stored in US. And so do dissidents from China or Iran.

Every single node you pass through is compromised

In my previous article I mentioned that the government can set up Tor nodes that they monitor. But to successfully pull an attack they would have to monitor EVERY node you go through.

This requires NWO level trickery, but again, we already have examples of this happening already with VPN agreements. Countries in the Anglosphere have an agreement to give away information regarding VPN usage by suspects from respective countries. This agreements is called Five Eyes. I wouldn't be surprised if a similar thing is organized regarding Tor nodes.

Passive traffic analysis

Although not mentioned by Ritter in his presentation, it is common knowledge that an opponent with a lot of resources, mostly governments, could analyze the whole network and correlate patterns to discover who is viewing a certain website or communicating with someone.

To give an analogy, it would be like the police heavily patrolling every single street in a city and every single car , so that even if your car had fake plates they could notice patterns and discover its owner.

The problem is, this approach can create false positives, with a 10% chance of error, which is why these analyses are not accepted in court as proof. But you can rest sure if such an analysis points to you, you will be put under further investigation and it only gets worse from there.

So what can be used to further aid us ?

Remailers

Remailers are an interesting concept. The way they work is that people pool their mail messages on a server, after which some time passes and all mails are sent simultaneously at the same time.

This is supposed to protect from Time and Size based correlation attacks.

The problem here is that it still allows third parties to see that you ARE sending a message, WHEN you sent it and HOW BIG it was. But they can't see the other end. For the receiver, he has the same problem. Third parties can't know WHO he got the message from, but they can still see WHEN he receives it from the remailer and HOW BIG it is.

Mix Networks (Remailers)

If ~~Who~~ When
How much

On top of that, for Remailers to work lots of people have to use them at the same time. Otherwise if there are few users, an enemy can still use size-based correlation attacks.

It's hard to use size-based attacks when thousands of people are sending messages of various sizes, but if only three people at one time are using a Remailer, then it is very easy to do a size-based attack.

Shared mailbox

Shared Mailboxes (AAM)

Date	From	Subject	Message
6/28/2013 4:15 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	[illegible]
6/28/2013 5:32 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	[illegible]
6/28/2013 5:56 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	[illegible]
6/28/2013 6:13 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	[illegible]
6/28/2013 6:47 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	[illegible]
6/28/2013 7:00 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	[illegible]

Shared mailboxes are the most out-of-the-box anonymous solution.

The way a shared mailbox works is that users share a mailbox. They cannot delete messages from it, but can only add encrypted messages to it. And when they want to check if they received a message they download all messages and use their key and try to decrypt the header of all of them and see if any of the messages belong to him.

Shared Mailboxes (AAM)

Date	From	Subject	Message
6/28/2013 4:15 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	-----BEGIN PGP MESSAGE----- [illegible]
6/28/2013 5:32 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	-----BEGIN PGP MESSAGE----- [illegible]
6/28/2013 5:56 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	-----BEGIN PGP MESSAGE----- [illegible]
6/28/2013 6:13 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	-----BEGIN PGP MESSAGE----- [illegible]
6/28/2013 7:00 UTC	Anonymous	[illegible]	-----BEGIN PGP MESSAGE----- [illegible]

It is a resource-tedious process, but it offers a great payoff. For the receiver this is great because when he downloads the whole mailbox third parties can't know if he received a message, maybe he did, or maybe he didn't. For the sender however, the equation stays the same as before.

Shared Mailboxes (AAM)

Receiving (With Shared Mailboxes)	Sending (With Onion Routing or Mix Networks)
~~If~~	If
Maybe?	~~Who~~
~~Who~~	When

This is for the moment the most powerful anonymity solution out there. However it has a few issues. In order to use alt.anonymous.message (the shared inbox) you need to have some degree of technical skill, and user inexperience leads to issues.

In order to be easier to use alt.anonymous.message allows the use of nymservers. Nymservers act as regular mail addresses, which when sent to, automatically post them to alt.anonymous.message .

There are however issues with AAM and Nymservers.

1. Poor network diversity

The number one issue is there are currently two main node operators: Zax and Dizzum, which are responsible for the trafficking of messages to alt.anonymous.message. If both were to retire or be arrested it would the death of alt.anonymous.message. As you can see, network diversity is horrible.

2. Poor encryption used on messages

Another issue is the type of encryption used. Some messages used the outdated MD5 encryption standard which is easy to crack.

Also, the title of messages are encrypted less strongly in order to be able to determine quickly which belong to you and which don't. Subjects can be encrypted using either hsubs or esubs. Esubs is an older and stronger standard, but hsubs have grown in popularity in recent years.

3. Pattern analysis due to use of same subject line and same remailers

A lot of messages use the same subject over and over, people tend to reply to a particular subject. On top of that most people also usually use the same remailer over and over, you can start noticing communication patterns :

4. Custom Remailer command errors

There are different type of remailers. The old school one was called Type 1 and lives on in the protocol of Mixmaster. It allows a lot of customizing options for the header. The users often screwed up the name of the command, which ended in the title of a message.

For example if you write “X-No-Archive Hello Friend” it would turn into “Hello Friend” and the X-No-archive would be interpreted as a command to not archive. But if you wrote “no-archive-x Hello Friend” you messed up so the title would become “no-archive-x Hello Friend”. If you do this multiple times, you would be identified as a unique user since your titles would all contain “no-archive-x” or uncapitalized “x-no-archive” or whatever other combination of mispelled commands you use.

Since most people used the same commands over and over and did the same mistakes they became quickly identifiable as unique users.

5. Imperfect Remailers

There are different types of remailers. Currently there are two types of remailers in use, MixMaster and MixMinion. MixMinion has certain advantages over MixMaster. But both suffer from certain problems.

6. Nymservers which do not protect from size-based correlation attacks

Nymservers themselves have problems. Zax's Nymserver is instantaneous which allows for size-based correlation attacks. However even Type 1 Nymservers (older ones) which are not always instantaneous still allow for size-based correlation attacks given a bit of perspicacity.

Therefore we identified main issues with AAM (alt.anonymous.message):

1) Giving users options allows for segregation and profiling
2) Some encryption is weak
3) It can be complicated to use and allows for beginner mistakes
4) Weak network diversity

Nonetheless, Ritter identified the most secure way of using AAM :

1) Use a strong passphrase and hsub
2) Use Type 3 PGP packet (Key Stretching)
3) Use Remailers
4) Do not use extra headers or options

The issue here is that if you do it properly you will still be part of a small community of people doing so (around 500 – 1500 people), which will make you looks suspicious and will cause the government to look closer into you and maybe add you to a database.

Solutions of the future

Pynchon gate

Pynchon Gate is a project meant to replace shared mailboxes. It uses Private Information Retrieval. It exposes less meta-data, scales better and resists flooding and size-based attacks. However it is currently work in progress

Nymservs – Pynchon Gate

- Uses Private Information Retrieval instead of Shared Mailbox
  - Scales Better
  - Less Metadata
- Lets users to download some messages, or delete
- Partially controlled through Remailer Network

- Less than 20% done
- https://github.com/nmathewson/pynchon-gate

Improved Remailers

MixMinion is currently the best remailer protocol and as such should be used as a basis for future improvement. Planned improvements include things such as improving TLS settings and moving to a new packet format.

Remailers - Mixminion

- New Packet Format (Sphinx)
- Improve TLS Settings
- Distributed Directory
- Cryptographic Implementation Upgrades
- Pinger
- General Love
- https://github.com/nmathewson/mixminion

What is currently lacking

As of right now, what is lacking is some tech that could be used to anonymously share large files. AAM and such are low bandwidth, which means it can only be used to share small files like text messages.

A new service needs to be created to cover this niche. In the words of Tom Ritter :

> But what I keep coming back to is the fact that we have no anonymity network that is high bandwidth, high latency. We have no anonymity network that would have let someone securely share the Collateral Murder video, without Wikileaks being their proxy. You can't take a video of corruption or police brutality, and post it anonymously.
> Now I hear you arguing with me in your heads: Use Tor and upload it to Youtube. No, youtube will take it down. Use Tor and upload it to MEGA, or some site that will fight fradulent takedown notices. Okay, but now you're relying on the good graces of some third party. A third party that is known to host the video, and can be sued. Wikileaks was the last organization that was willing to take on that legal fight, and now they are no longer in the business of hosting content for normal

> And you can say Hidden Service and I'll point to size-based traffic analysis and confirmation attacks that come with a low-latency network, never mind Ralf-Phillip Weinmen's amazing work the other month that really killed Hidden Services. We can go on and on like this, but I hope you'll at least concede the point that what you are coming up with are work-arounds for a problem that we lack a good solution to.

Conclusions

As we can see true anonymity online is non-existent. At the very least, third parties can collect meta-data on you and use correlation attacks, when ideally they shouldn't even know you are communicating at all. Moreover, even strong anonymity tools like Tor have shown to have known vulnerabilities.

However, what matters is not whether something is vulnerable in theory, but rather does it keep you safe in practice? And so far, the tools we have at our disposal are pretty powerful.

As I have mentioned in my previous article, using TailsOS off a flash stick in a public wi-fi area with no cameras + VPN/Tor seems to be the best solution for now.

The testament to the power of anonymity tools is that pedophile rings and drug dealers have managed to escape persecution by multiple world governments to this day using them.

And that's what I will talk about in my next article. We will analyze the electronic operational security of pedophile rings and how one infamous one managed to escape unscathed after years of being searched. Stay tuned.

Welcome To America’s New Golden Age

December 1, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

In 1920s, the US experienced a period of unprecedented economic prosperity, rapid advances technology, and a sense of destiny. With the election of Trump, the US is on the verge of a new golden age. Here is how Trump is going to make it happen and how you can capitalize on it.

Economic windfall

By far, the biggest effect of a Trump administration is going to be economic. Trump didn’t run as a moral reformer. He’s a businessman who ran on the promise to make American great again, and the primary way he is going to do that is by turning the US economy into a job-creating machine.

After Trump won, Apple suddenly announced that it was considering moving its iPhone manufacturing from China to the US. Later, Trump announced that he had convinced Ford to keep a plant from moving to Mexico. Even on Thanksgiving Day, Trump was negotiating with Carrier to keep its Indiana manufacturing plant in the US. Trump’s promise to do away with bad trade deals will keep existing jobs in the US and create many new ones that do not exist today. Manufacturing is what drove the prosperity of the US during the 20th century and under Trump, the US will again become a manufacturing powerhouse.

But the opportunities will not be limited to manufacturing. Those new jobs will drive demand for more service and knowledge oriented workers. If you are an employee, you can expect your salary to start increasing after the real unemployment rate begins to drop. It might take a couple of years to get there, but people in the middle class will once again see their wealth begin to grow. But the real opportunity will be for those who want to start their own businesses. This is a good time to begin thinking about what goods and services will be in demand during the golden age of Trump, and opening a business to meet those needs.

If the Republican Congress implements Trump's tax plan, you will be taxed much less on anything you do earn. This will especially benefit middle class men who are trying to get ahead. Currently, the tax code benefits the wealthiest individuals who earn most of their income through capital gains and the poor. The middle class workers who are high wage earners now get taxed at a 39% rate. Under the Trump plan, they will only be taxed at a 25% rate—a substantial reduction that will allow ordinary families to build a nest egg.

The return of masculinity

Presidents don't just influence policy, they also influence fashion and style. The 1970s were characterized by long hair, bushy mustaches, and bad fashion with wide lapels, clownishly wide ties, and the bell bottom pants that you saw on That's 70s Show. The "ideal" man was the skinny, amoral, polyester-clad lounge lizard. When Reagan came into office, the style changed. Men cut their hair short, ties got narrow, and bell-bottoms vanished. Even the actors got more muscular—the 1980s were the golden age of tough guys from Schwarzenegger to Van Damme. The opposite happened during the Obama years. Men with muscle vanished and were replaced by narrow-shouldered hipsters in skinny jeans with low testosterone levels. In a way, Return of Kings is a reaction to these weak soy men of the Obama era.

Unlike Obama, Trump exudes what SJWs would call "toxic masculinity." He enjoys being in the company of beautiful women. He works hard and believes that there is nothing wrong with enjoying the fruits of your labor. In comparison to the effete, professorial Obama, Trump has no problem conversing with ordinary working men. Expect to see masculine men to make a comeback during the Trump years. More men will hit the gym in a quest to develop functional muscle. It will again become acceptable for men to congregate together without women. We might even see a revival of the wood-paneled,

SJWs in eclipse

Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) have used our natural aversion to hurting the feelings of others as a stick to control us for over two decades now. Their control extended to every aspect of our lives. Americans were not able to have an honest conversation about immigration because doing so was deemed racist, and men have lost their jobs on the testimony of one SJW accusing them of being homophobes.

Before Trump ran for office, there appeared to be no way to break the SJW straight jacket. But Trump's campaign changed all of that because he was able to say publicly what the rest of us were thinking privately. His winning of the presidential election marked the first victory over the SJW rule of terror. Trump's eight years could represent a serious setback to SJW ideology but only if the rest of us refuse to bow to SJW orthodoxy.

Conclusion: nothing lasts forever

The Trump years promise to be prosperous for everyone living in the US but he will only be in office for eight years and the voting public has a short memory. Trump's successor might be an establishment Republican or a liberal Democrat who would reinstate the failed policies of open borders and bad trade deals that characterized the Bush and Obama administrations. It wouldn't take more than a year or two before the prosperity of the Trump years would be rolled back. Thus, while you should enjoy the extra wealth that streams your way in the next eight years, you should also be sure to sock away a lot of that money in savings. This is not the time to develop the habit of snorting cocaine off of some prostitute's bare backside. Continue to live a minimalistic lifestyle and you will leave the Trump years as a wealthy man.

6 Reasons Why I Gave Up On Libertarianism

These days, libertarianism tends to be quite discredited. It is now associated with the goofy candidature of Gary Johnson, having a rather narrow range of issues—legalize weed! less taxes!—, cucking one's way to politics through sweeping all the embarrassing problems under the carpet, then surrendering to liberal virtue-signaling and endorsing anti-white "diversity."

Now, everyone on the Alt-Right, manosphere und so wieser is laughing at those whose adhesion to a bunch of abstract premises leads to endorse globalist capital, and now that Trump officially heads the State, we'd be better off if some private companies were nationalized than let to shadowy overlords.

To Americans, libertarianism has been a constant background presence. Its main icons, be them Ayn Rand, Murray Rothbard or Friedrich Hayek, were always read and discussed here and there, and never fell into oblivion although they barely had media attention. The academic and political standing of libertarianism may be marginal, it has always been granted small platforms and resurrected from time to time in the public landscape, one of the most conspicuous examples of it being the Tea Party demonstrations.

To a frog like yours truly—Kek being now praised by thousands of well-meaning memers, I can embrace the "frog" moniker gladly—libertarianism does not have the same standing at all. In French universities, libertarian thinkers are barely discussed, even in classes that are supposed to tackle economics: for one hour spent talking about Hayek, Keynes easily enjoys ten, and the same goes on when comparing the attention given to, respectively, Adam Smith and Karl Marx.

On a wider perspective, a lot of the contemporary French identity is built on Jacobinism, i.e. on crushing underfoot organic regional sociability in the name of a bureaucratized and Masonic republic. The artificial “construction” of France is exactly the kind of endeavour libertarianism loathes. No matter why the public choices school, for example, is barely studied here: pompous leftist teachers and mediocre fonctionnaires are too busy gushing about themselves, sometimes hiding the emptiness of their life behind a ridiculous epic narrative that turns “social achievements” into heroic feats, to give a fair hearing to pertinent criticism.

When I found out about libertarianism, I was already sick of the dominant “fifty shades of leftism” political culture. The gloomy mediocrity of small bureaucrats, including most school teachers, combined with their petty political righteousness, always repelled me. Thus, the discovery of laissez-faire advocates felt like stumbling on an entirely new scene of thought—and my initial feeling was vindicated when I found about the naturalism often associated with it, something refreshing and intuitively more satisfying than the mainstream culture-obsessed, biology-denying view.

Libertarianism looked like it could solve everything. More entrepreneurship, more rights to those who actually create wealth and live through the good values of personal responsibility and work ethic, less parasites—be they bureaucrats or immigrants—, no more repressive speech laws. Coincidentally, a new translation of Ayn Rand’s Atlas Shrugged was published at this time: I devoured it, loving the sense of life, the heroism, the epic, the generally great and achieving ethos contained in it. Aren’t John Galt and Hank Rearden more appealing than any corrupt politician or beta bureaucrat that pretends to be altruistic while backstabbing his own colleagues and parasitizing the country?

Now, although I still support small-scale entrepreneurship wholeheartedly, I would never defend naked libertarianism, and here is why.

1. Capitalism in general and unregulated capitalism in particular give a structural advantage to tribalistic groups

Part of the Rothschild family, where nepotism and consanguinity keep the money in Unity makes strength, and trust is much easier to cultivate in a small group where everyone truly belongs than in an anonymous “great society.” Some ethnic groups, especially whites, tend to be instinctively individualistic, with a lot of people favouring personal liberty over belonging, while others, especially Jews, tend to favor extended family business and nepotism.

On a short-term basis, mobile individuals can do better than those who are bound to many social obligations. On the long run, however, extended families manage to create an environment of trust and concentrate capital. And whereas individuals may start cheating each other or scattering their wealth away, thanks to having no proper economic network, families and tribes will be able to invest heavily in some of their members and keep their wealth inside. This has been true for Jewish families, wherever their members work as moneylenders or diamond dealers, for Asians investing in new restaurants or any other business project of their own, and for North Africans taking over pubs and small shops in France.

The latter example is especially telling. White bartenders, butchers, grocers and the like have been chased off French suburbs by daily North African and black violence. No one helped them, everyone being afraid of getting harassed as well and busy with their own business. (Yep, just like what happened and still happens in Rotheram.) As a result, these isolated, unprotected shop-owners sold their outlet for a cheap price and fled. North Africans always covered each other’s violence and replied in groups against any hurdle, whereas whites lowered their heads and hoped not to be next on the list.

Atlas Shrugged was wrong. Loners get wrecked by groups. Packs of hyenas corner and eat the lone dog.

Libertarianism is not good for individuals on the long run—it turns them into asocial weaklings, soon to be legally enslaved by global companies or beaten by groups, be they made of nepotistic family members or thugs.

2. Libertarianism is not good for the middle classes

How the middle classes end up after jobs have been sent overseas and wages lowered

People often believe, thanks to Leftist media and cuckservative posturing, that libertarians are big bosses. This is mostly, if not entirely, false. Most libertarians are middle class guys who want more opportunities, less taxation, and believe that libertarianism will help them to turn into successful entrepreneurs. They may be right in very specific circumstances: during the 2000s, small companies overturned the market of electronics, thus benefiting both to their independent founders and to society as a whole; but ultimately, they got bought by giants like Apple and Google, who are much better off when backed by a corrupt State than on a truly free market.

Libertarianism is a fake alternative, just as impossible to realize as communism: far from putting everyone at its place, it lets ample room to mafias, monopolies, unemployment caused by mechanization and global competition. If one wants the middle classes to survive, one must protect the employment and relative independence of its members—bankers and billionaires be damned.

3. When the leaders leave everything to unrestrained nature, society gets wrecked

Spontaneous order helped by a weak government. I hope they at least smoke weed.

A good feature of libertarianism is that it usually goes along with a positive stance on biology and human nature, in contrast with the "everything is cultural and ought to be deconstructed" left. However, this stance often leads to an exaggerated optimism about human nature. In a society of laissez-faire, the libertarians say, people flourish and the order appears spontaneously.

Well, this is plainly false. As all of the great religions say, after what Christians call the Fall, man is a sinner. If you let children "flourish" without moral standards and role models, they become spoiled, entitled, manipulative, emotionally fragile and deprived of self-control. If you let women "flourish" without suspicion, you let free rein to their propensities to hypergamy, hysteria, self-entitlement and everything we can witness in them today. If you let men do as they please, you let them become greedy, envious, and turning into bullies. As a Muslim proverb says, "people must be flogged to enter into paradise"—and as Aristotle put forth, virtues are trained dispositions, no matter the magnitude of innate talents and propensities.

4. Hollow pyramid effect

Michelle “The Man” Obama and Lying Crooked at a Democrat meeting

When the laissez-faire rules, some will succeed on the market more than others, due to differences in investment, work, and natural abilities. Some will succeed enough to be able to buy someone else’s business: this is the natural consequence of differences in wealth and of greed. When corrupt politicians enter the game, things become worse, as they will usually help some large business owners to shield their position against competitors—at the expense of most people, who then lose their independence and live off a wage.

At the end, what we get is a handful of very wealthy individuals who have managed to concentrate most capital and power levers into their hands and a big crowd of low-wage employees ready to cut each others’ throat for a small promotion, and females waiting in line to get notched by the one per cent while finding the other ninety-nine per cent “boring.”

5. A pass for leftists and immigrants

Censorship by massive social pressure, monopoly over the institutions and crybullying is perfectly legal. What could go wrong?

On the surface, libertarianism looks good here, because it protects the individuals' rights against left-hailing Statism and cuts off the welfare programs that have attracted dozens of millions of immigrants. Beneath, however, things are quite dire. Libertarianism enshrines the leftists' right to free speech they abuse from, allows the pressure tactics used by radicals, and lets freethinking individuals getting singled out by SJWs as long as these do not resort to overt stealing or overt physical violence. As for the immigrants, libertarianism tends to oppose the very notion of non-private boundaries, thus letting the local cultures and identities defenseless against both greedy capitalists and subproletarian masses.

Supporting an ideology that allows the leftists to destroy society more or less legally equates to cucking, plain and simple. Desiring an ephemeral cohabitation with rabid ideological warriors is stupid. We should aim at a lasting victory, not at pretending to constrain them through useless means.

6. Many libertarians are poor examples of virtue

Am I the only one to find that Gary Johnson looks like a snail (Spongebob notwithstanding)?

In 2013, one of the rare French libertarians academic teachers, Jean-Louis Caccomo, was forced into a mental ward at the request of his university president. He then spent more than a year getting drugged. Mr. Caccomo had no real psychological problem: his confinement was part of a vicious strategy of pathologization and career-destruction that was already used by the Soviets. French libertarians could have wide denounced the abuse. Nonetheless, most of them freaked out, and almost no one dared to actually defend him publicly.

Why should rational egoists team up and risk their careers to defend one of themselves after all? They would rather posture at confidential social events, rail at organic solidarity and protectionism, or trolling the shit out of individuals of their own social milieu because "I've got the right to mock X, it's my right to free speech!" The few libertarian people I knew firsthand, the few events I have witnessed in that small milieu, were enough to give me serious doubts about libertarianism: how can a good political ideology breed such an unhealthy mindset?

Conclusion

Political ideologies are tools. They are not ends in themselves. All forms of government aren't fit for any people or any era. Political actors must know at least the most important ones to get some inspiration, but ultimately, said actors win on the ground, not in philosophical debates.

Individualism, mindless consumerism, careerism, hedonism are part of the problem. Individual rights granted regardless of one's abilities, situation, and identity are a disaster. Time has come to overcome modernity, not stall in one of its false alternatives. The merchant caste must be regulated, though neither micromanaged or hampered by a parasitic bureaucracy nor denied its members' right for small-scale independence. Individual rights must be conditional, boundaries must be restored, "minority" identities based on anti-"white male" resentment must be crushed so they cannot devour sociability from the inside again, and the pater familias must assert himself anew.

Long live the State and protectionism as long as they defend the backbone of society and healthy relationships between the sexes, and no quarter for those who think they have a right to wage grievance-mongering against us, no matter if they want to use the State or private companies. At the end, the socialism-libertarianism dichotomy is quite secondary.

Why You Shouldn’t Go To Bratislava, Slovakia

December 1, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Last week, I ventured to a city and country you generally don’t hear a lot about: Bratislava, Slovakia.

Despite lying dead-center between two major capital cities (Vienna and Budapest), Bratislava tends to go relatively unnoticed in the grand scheme of things. Men aren’t quite flocking there to find a foreign girl, or even for drunken stag parties (setting aside the kids in the movie Eurotrip ending up in Bratislava). It’s certainly not a tourist destination you hear Western people dreaming of.

After spending just a couple of days in the Slovak capital, I thought I’d share some thoughts.

Yes, Slovakian Women Are Hot

I know it’s what everyone wants to know.

I’m happy to say that Slovakian women are near the cream of the crop. They’re beautiful with a good amount of diversity—blondes, brunettes, and even a few redheads.

Overall, they aren’t as hot as Ukrainian women. They are thinner and hotter than Polish women. Their hair is not as nice as Lithuanian girls, but it’s not that far off, either.

The English levels of most people in Bratislava is high. I suspect, like most places in Europe, that those levels drop off drastically as soon as you venture outside of the major city (or even to the suburbs. People were genuinely helpful—bartenders were happy to go to great lengths to help pick a beer, and everyone on the streets was helpful with navigating their poor public transportation system (more on that later).

However, despite the beauty levels and charm of the locals, I really can’t rave about Bratislava as a city.

Why?

Bratislava Is One Ugly Place

For those of you who have traveled to the edges of Eastern Europe, you likely know what I mean when I say “FSU-style dump” (even though Slovakia was not a part of the FSU and had their own Communist overhaul in 1989 with the Velvet Revolution). This means communist buildings on every block, and a general dull, grey drab that seems to envelope the entire city. In most of these cities, you have to at least walk a kilometer out of the city center to have this take over.

That wasn’t the case in Bratislava. As soon as you step out of the main square (which was quite nice—but most European central areas are), the dullness begins. See for yourself:

As you can see, these buildings lack any character and certainly aren't well-maintained, despite them basically being in the city center. While this isn't a problem on paper, it does come with issues for anyone looking to spend considerable time in Slovakia. For most of us digital nomads, it's nice to have a pleasant place to live. One that makes you want to get up everyday. Not one that drags you towards depression.

In the base of Bratislava, it leans towards the latter. It's a far cry from what the tourism department would like you to believe:

Simply put, Bratislava is not a place I'd care to spend more than a few days for any short-term trip. You'll have much more fun in places like Budapest, Prague, or Krakow.

Things might be slightly different if I had a different objective—such as hunting for a longer-term relationship, or perhaps buckling in and trying to build a new website or writing a new book.

The Quality Of Life

Slovakian food was actually quite good. They had some interesting dishes with some real flavor, as well as excellent beer. Bratislava also has enough international influence that there are a variety of different cuisines available. In addition to the usual Irish and English style pubs, I also stumbled across Cuban, Mexican, and a wide variety of Asian restaurants.

As mentioned before, the public transportation is poor. There is no actual integration with basic apps like Google Maps that will tell you which bus or tram to take to get to a destination. Normally, I'd be happy to go the old-school route and pour over the public transportation maps—but that was not the case in Bratislava.

Nearly every transportation map at every metro and tram was mysteriously missing critical pieces of information. Trams that were not listed as not stopping at that stop were showing up. Buses that were supposed to come by would never show. It was normal for all means of transit to arrive three minutes late. The problem is not so much a lack of modern technology, it's fundamental.

A lack of simple execution and keeping information up to date is what makes the Slovakian capital's public transportation system so lackluster.

Finally, the cost of living is quite reasonable. A decent meal in a mid-level restaurant will run you about 5 euros. A quality beer will be somewhere between 1 and 2. Short-term apartment rentals can be found in the center in the range of $30-$40 a night.

I go into a little bit more detail about the quality of life in this video.

But Do Slovaks Even Want To Be There?

The general consensus I got from my brief trip was this: the top-end Slovakians have moved on. This means that the most beautiful girls have migrated out of the city in pursuit of opportunities in major EU metropolitan areas such as London, Paris, or Milan. The most driven and successful men have likewise taken opportunities outside of their home country.

Slovakia's membership in the Schengen area makes it easy for them to make the move abroad provided they can find the opportunities. Simply put, Bratislava isn't a happy place. I'm sure things change a little bit during the summer months, but considering half of the year is spent in fog and cold, it's just the way that Slovakian life is for much of the year.

I did venture out to the country a little bit, and there is some real beauty to be seen there. However, that doesn't still doesn't make Slovakia a hotspot destination. Slovakian women are beautiful, yes—but it's still not a place I'd tell men to check out for the purposes of meeting girls. Eastern European girls will never have the same sensual warmth of Latina women, especially during the colder months of the year.

In addition, I can't recommend it as a pleasant place just to go for a tourist-type visit. Perhaps things will change in the coming years, but for now I can definitively say that Bratislava is not a place that I'll be returning to.

A Red Pill Perspective On The Existence Of God

December 1, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Throughout human history there have been a plethora of polarizing debates. From benign arguments like vodka versus whiskey and split routines versus compound lifts to the ultra critical like pro life versus pro choice and most recently, Hillary versus Trump, there has never been a shortage of issues that split even the tightest knit groups into opposing factions.

One of the most divisive topics of all time is religion—more specifically the very existence of God. Now before I get started, I'll go ahead and let everyone know that I have nowhere near the theological knowledge or brawn of my colleagues Quintus Curtius or Arelius Moner. If you're looking for a deep ecumenical analysis of religions the world over, you won't find it here.

Instead, I'm going to examine the existence of God from an everyday man's point of view. This will be a simple, logical look into what we've been told about various religions (namely Christianity) our entire lives and will ask a few straight forward, pointed questions regarding the events of the past in terms of their validity and plausibility.

When men find the red pill everything is called into question. Relationships, money, fitness, and everything in between are all scrutinized more closely and nine times out of ten, we make significant changes in most if not all of those areas. Personally, religion also falls into that category and at this point in my crimson capsule renaissance I'm starting to query just about every element of my religious beliefs as they apply to my new found knowledge about the way the world really works.

As stated earlier I'll talk about these things mainly from a Christianity point of view as it's the religion I was raised with and know the most about.

The basics of religion

As far as I'm concerned, the basis of most religious groups are all pretty much the same. Exercising some sort of self discipline by not indulging in life's many tempting vices, treating others with decency, and regularly executing some sort of ritual at a specific day and/or time. Sure, there are many more layers to every religion but by and large those seem to be the main building blocks.

The truth is, human beings have an inherent need to belong. No matter the person, upbringing, or environment we all want to be a part of something. Without human interaction we go insane. Even people who describe themselves as loners have a circle of friends, albeit very small, they trust and can confide in. From young men who join gangs to post wall sluts to people who join cults, 'religion' in this context is a way for people to fulfill their basic need for routine, temperance, and structure.

We all want to feel like we're a part of something

Think about this: The worst thing that can happen to a man in prison (other than being raped) is being put in solitary confinement. He's surrounded by murders and rapists but being put in the hole for a month is a terrible fate because he's left by himself for an extended period of time. Religion represents going back to the general population for most everyone.

'The hole' will drive a man crazy because of lack of human interaction. It's probably the highlight of his day when the guard slides his slop under the door.

Sports, hobbies, and even those evil misogynistic websites that brainwash men into thinking women are demons from the seventh circle of hell are all described on some level as a religion. People say all the time "I do xyz religiously" when describing something they do on the regular.

Regardless of what we call it anything we do or believe consistently could loosely be described as a religion.

The depravity of modern Christianity

For my money Christianity seems to be the branch of religion that has soured the most people on the existence of God. I'll be the first to point out that I could be way off in this assessment and that my upbringing in the Baptist church and being an American drastically skews my point of view but I'm certain I'm not the only person who feels this way.

I could write a three-part column on how Christians have royally fucked things up for people who could really benefit from religion but instead I'll talk about the major factors involved with making Christianity and its followers borderline unbearable.

Dollars and sense

Anyone who grew up going to church remembers the collection plate being passed from row to row by the ushers. We remember person after person putting in cash, checks, and envelopes as the plate made its way through the congregation. It wasn't long before we asked our parents what that was for and they dutifully explained to us that the church is supported by its members' contributions and that's why they passed the collection plate around every Sunday.

Things could not be more different in 2016. The 'mega churches' popping up every week don't even look like churches anymore. Inside and out they resemble something of a cross between a warehouse, a night club, and a mall. Churches like these cost money and lots of it.

With jumbo trons, flat screen tvs, and state of the art tech as the backdrop, these places seem more intent on entertainment than the teachings of Christianity. They also reek of SJW tendencies what with their 'No judgement here!' and 'Non-denominational' marketing campaigns to cast as wide a net as possible to ensnare as many members as they can get.

Is this a church service or the NBA Finals?

Yes, churches need support from it's congregation and yes, they have to get the word out somehow. But when you're bombarded with billboards, flyers, and even television commercials then see the pastor driving a six figure vehicle and living in a seven figure home it becomes crystal clear that Christianity is more of an industry than a religion and that's what rubs people the wrong way.

"God has a plan"

Ever heard this before?: "God has a plan for you!" or "If it's God's will it, will happen." or "The Lord works in mysterious ways."

Post red pill awakening I've figured out that Christians and its purveyors often use this rhetoric to explain away terrible or unfavorable events. One could say that people need to believe that there is a higher power out there that makes things happen.

The neomasculinity in me, however, knows that if I show up to an interview for a job in casual clothes I'm not getting that job. The red pill mindset I have knows that if I'm drunk off my ass and I get behind the wheel and wrap my car around a telephone pole, or worse, kill somebody it has nothing to do with 'God's will' and that it's my responsibility and mine alone.

Is God ‘testing’ me or did I just make a bad decision?

Back in the day the one I noticed that all atheists seemed to have in common was anger. They were angry that God had ‘allowed’ their loved ones to die or that God had ‘allowed’ their husband to be stricken by cancer or that God ‘allowed’ bad things to happen to them. A lot of them may have even been Christians at one point or another.

My guess is that during their hard times their Christian friends reached out to them to try to console them and good for them for doing so. Where they went wrong is that they probably used the ‘God’s will’ to explain the untimely deaths of their loved ones. It’s only a matter of time before someone going through that kind of turmoil enters the anger phase and because the people around them told them that God had indirectly caused their pain, they check out.

Most atheists don’t fit this stereotype anymore

The counter argument there is that just because a person is angry and decides they don’t believe there’s a God doesn’t mean there isn’t a God. I used to say all the time when yelling at atheists on television ‘Just because you don’t believe it doesn’t mean it’s not true!’

The bottom line here is that every person has control of their own life. I’m not saying that this means there is God or that there isn’t. What I am saying is that if a person is successful, it’s mainly because of their own efforts and know how. If a person is or was ever homeless, it’s largely because of a series of bad decisions. I’ve talked and written about my own series of bad decisions that led me to quasi-homelessness and I had nobody to blame but myself. Not God, not anyone…myself.

When a man looks at this through his crimson capsule spectacles, the ‘plan’ and ‘will’ arguments closely resembles hamstering. When someone tells you that a good or bad event in your or someone else’s life has more to do with the actions or desires of someone or something other than your own, it’s eerily similar to a female blaming her bad decision making on the 14 tequila shots she did the night before.

Is this untimely plus sign God's plan or is it the result getting drunk and having unprotected sex?

There are a plethora of other issues that gives Christianity a bad name world wide. From the Christians themselves who are in the club Saturday night then in the front row at church Sunday morning to the conflicting versions of the Bible different denominations use to pick and choose what they want to abide by, Christianity is looked down on a lot of people for many reasons.

As far as I'm concerned, the priority of exorbitant profits trumping the importance of their message and the epic hamstering involved in and out of the pews are the two biggest reasons it has a bad name.

The staples of Christianity called into question

Over the years I've begun to call into question the so-called strongholds of Christianity. Things I've been taught as absolute truths now make a lot less sense because I'm older and more experienced. My red pill conditioning has also contributed to my rethinking these things.

Does prayer really change things?

Does this really make a difference?

Am I not in complete control of my own life? Is being disciplined and steadfast in my daily regimens useless if I have the power of prayer on my side? If I pray, then work hard and become successful what percentage of the credit goes to whom?

How do we know what or how God thinks?

Everyone seems to think they know how God thinks and the reasons he thinks them. How do we know God is a loving and kind? How do we know God even wants us here? How the hell do we really know why God does what he does simply because we can refer to a 2000 year old book (the Bible)?

Would we believe in a virgin birth in 2016?

Would Mary ever sit in front of this guy to prove her virgin birth claims?

If a woman in the Middle East gave birth and claimed to be a virgin would we really believe it? Would she be opposed to a DNA test to reveal who the suspected father really was? Would an examination pre-birth reveal an in tact hymen? And even if it did, would we believe it?

Did Gabriel really come down and talk to Mary?

Did Mary and Gabriel really have a conversation or was Mary hallucinating? Or worse, did she make the whole thing up? After all, back then it was impossible to become pregnant without having sex.

Was Jesus Christ really the son of God?

Speaking of that DNA test, what would that reveal? Would the father's DNA be 'other worldly' or 'alien' or would it reveal the DNA of a male homo sapien?

Do we really believe the stories?

Did God really etch the Ten Commandments in these tablets or did Moses do it himself with a chisel in 40 days and 40 nights?

Do we really believe that Red Sea literally parted for Moses? How feasible is it that an old man climbed to the top of a mountain, stayed there for over a month (40 days and 40 nights) to wait for God to etch the 10 Commandments into stone? And how did God do that?

Do we believe a man got swallowed by a whale and survived long enough to get spit back out?

We all know the story about Jonah and the whale but how likely is it that a man swallowed by a whale or big fish would survive, let alone get spit back out? Why would the whale even do that? Was it bulimic?

Do we really believe that Jesus literally walked on water?

Think about it. People are claiming a man walked on the water's surface and didn't sink in. Would we really believe that in 2016??

Would anybody believe these stories with this kind of tech available to them back then?

I'm not saying these things didn't happen but based on what I've learned and experienced, it's highly unlikely. If the science and technology available to us today were available to us back then, I'm fairly certain these stories would have been debunked fairly quickly and that's if the stories got out in the first place.

Are you saying you're an atheist?

Absolutely not. When I apply the same sensibilities, knowledge, and experience of my 39 years of life, I know that at some point up the chain of creation there is an uncaused cause. I believe that to be the deity we call God, Allah, or whatever name we attach.

The Universe didn’t create itself

But at this point in my life I’m not nearly as certain the God I’ve been taught about by Christianity exists. I believe there’s a God but not the God I’ve grown up believing in. If a strip club burns to the ground, I don’t believe God ‘rained down fire to punish the heathen sinners’. My guess is either arson or somebody flicked a cigarette in the wrong place.

If someone’s successful I don’t use the word ‘blessed’ anymore. I use the word ‘fortunate’ and ‘hard working.’ If someone has a run of bad luck, it’s ‘shit happens’ and ‘bad decision making’ and that’s all there is to it.

Conclusion

At the end of the day I’m willing to admit that religion certainly has its advantages. Quintus and Arelius have pointed out countless red pill doctrines from back in the day that kept women in line. Like it or not Muslims have their women in check. Their females rarely get out of pocket thanks to the quran.

But even the most devout Catholics, Muslims, Buddhists, Christians, etc. would have to admit what nobody’s ever really discussed: They can’t all be right.

Both are devout, and might even like each other but they both can't be right

The Southern Baptist minister in Lexington, Kentucky is every bit as devout as the Hindu Priest in Mumbai, India. But they can't both be right.

Hopefully in the coming years I can gain a little more clarity in terms of what I believe and what I do not. For now, I'll keep living my life and let the chips fall where they may.

What’s The Difference Between A Modern SJW Protest And A 1963 Pro-Segregation Rally?

December 2, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Segregation is coming back to college campuses. But this time it’s welcomed by the establishment, administrators, politicians, and student leaders. Recently, University of California at Berkeley students, in a protest reminiscent of the famous Schoolhouse Door stand by Alabama Governor George Wallace, physically blocked minority students (whites, who make up 25% of the student body) from going to class by forming a loud, angry mob at the Peder Sather Bridge, and yelling hostile profanity laden monologues, which sounded even more aggressive and hateful than the 1963 Wallace rally.

Let’s examine ten statements used by the speakers from both protests. Try to guess which event is a modern SJW protest and which came from George Wallace’s protest.

1. Whose university? OUR university!

2. This intrusion results solely from force or threat of force, undignified by any reasonable application of the principles of law, reason or justice.

3. I don’t give a FUCK about you!

4. While some of you may applaud these acts, millions of Americans will gaze in sorrow from the situation existing at this great institution of learning.

5. TURN AROUND! TURN AROUND!

6. I hereby denounce and forbid this illegal and unwarranted action.

7. OUR STREETS! OUR UNIVERSITY! (as they move to the streets and block them also)

8. I am going to ask that all the people in this state continue to be calm and restrained in this matter.

9. There will be casualties on both sides. People have to die to make a change in this world.

10. We must have no violence today or any other day.

If you guessed the odd numbered items were modern protests, while the even were from the 1963 Wallace speech, you are correct. Due to the shrill, fast, high pitched and profanity-laden screeches of the Berkeley protest, I could not hear much of what was said, so item 9 is from a November Los Angeles protest.

While the 1963 event occurred after two black students attempted to enroll in classes at the then all white University of Alabama, and the governor attempted to prevent them (before standing aside peacefully and lawfully minutes later after JFK federalized the Alabama National Guard), the current protest was triggered when a university-designated safe space was moved from the 5th floor of a building to the basement.

A group of angry millennials quickly formed and blocked the Peder Sather Bridge, where they let minority students pass, but blocked white students, yelling at them to “Go Around!” The students then went out into the streets, blocking traffic, paraded through the student center, disrupting students trying to study, and then then moved to the student bookstore where they surrounded it and posted an eviction notice to the bookstore, stating “You are hereby notified by the students of UCal Berkeley to vacate the premises immediately. This space expansion is one step in an ongoing process to remedy the historical devaluation of students of color and LGBTQIA+ students.”

They then marched on with banners stating “Fight 4 Spaces of Color” which, despite it being racist and illegal to have a racially segregated area in a publicly funded university, they already have at the university’s Edelman Hall.

Whites were turned away; minorities allowed to pass

Of course, their targets were poorly chosen. The Peder Sather Bridge was built by a donation from Mr. Sather, a Norwegian who moved to California and became a benefactor of the school. He is responsible for the tall clock towers found on many campuses, as he installed one of the first in America, the Sather Tower, third largest in the world, modeled after St. Mark's Campanile in St. Mark's Square in Venice.

After the Sather Tower was built in 1914, colleges around the nation began adding these to their campuses. On the top of the Sather Bridge, a national historic landmark, are four men and four women, representing eight academic disciplines, and showing an equality of the sexes over 100 years old. Indeed, when passing through the gate, one may see a woman on one side, and a man on the other, inscribed on panels.

The bookstore who received the eviction notice, followed by the written threat that “if you fail to vacate immediately, community action will continue to escalate with the goal of eliminating any revenue generation,” donates to local charities, encourages its employees to participate in social justice issues, and makes efforts to fight global warming. Of course, this is a lesson to never give an inch, because it will not earn you any form of allegiance or sympathy. With these freaks, you just can’t win.

To sum up, institutions that sell books, engage in social justice issues, donate to local charities, and support the student body are bad. White people are inherently bad and racial minorities are inherently good. Segregating students by their race and harassing them is not racist. Blocking students based on their physical appearance and ethnic background, something they have no control over, is a legitimate method of protest. Threats to local business owners who have done nothing wrong are perfectly warranted. Basements are inherently worse than 5th floor spaces. Separate but equal is fine government policy. Public universities should spend money for racial based and other exclusionary groups. The actions of the Berkeley students are not racist. ROK is a site promoting rape.

While Trump won the presidency, it was by a narrow margin, and half the country is not going to give up their feminism and SJW lunacy. Expect more of this kind of insanity.

5 Quick Fixes For Your General Social Anxiety

December 2, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

I'm a firm believer that social anxiety is really a manifestation of an underlying cause, or a series of underlying causes. Social anxiety, in my opinion, is so common nowadays due to multiple dysfunctional aspects of our culture:

- Men have no strong male role models
- Male-female dynamics are blurry at best
- Men are trained to be ashamed of their gender
- Cultural nihilism and a complete lack of genuineness is now the norm

Despite the fact that the causes for social anxiety run so deep in our culture, I still believe that any man can overcome it. This article is not meant to be a "cure all," or some sort of panacea for the most depressed of men—fixing these deeply seeded issues will take more than a quick fix.

"Magic pill" solutions, however, are very useful, because they get the ball rolling. Having a few quick fixes for social anxiety up your sleeve can boost your confidence and give you the small amount of momentum that will eventually lead to greater changes. So, with this in mind, here are some of my favorite quick fixes for social anxiety…

1. Meditate

Bitches love the Dalai Lama's presence

A large amount of social anxiety is due to overthinking things. In fact, I'd say that simply overthinking things is the biggest factor causing you social anxiety right now. If you think about it (haha, not funny), usually you have the following thoughts in a social interaction:

- "Am I saying the right things?"
- "Am I acting weird? How do I stop being so creepy?"
- "Should I do this? Should I do that?"
- Etc.

If you're astute, you'll notice that the root cause here is your thoughts. How many times have you tried to approach a gorgeous woman, but then at the last minute veered away, because you had self-doubt? Learning to overcome approach anxiety, is in large part, simply learning to stop over-thinking things.

I can think of no better way to stop thought than meditation. I realize that I talk about meditation a lot, and at this point I may just be beating a dead horse, but meditation is by far one of the best habits that any man can have.

Meditation, is not, some weird spiritual practice that only Buddhist monks do—in fact, some of the most successful people in the world meditate on a daily basis. Why? Because it trains you to detach yourself from thought. When a thought pops into your head, rather than attaching to it and getting all worked up about it, you simply train yourself to ignore it.

When you're at the club, rather than thinking: "Oh god, what if that guy tries to AMOG me?!" you won't even think at all. You'll just be completely present, in the moment, and focused on taking his girls.

2. Change Your Underlying Beliefs

Go from “something’s wrong” to “everything’s alright”

A lot of self-development stuff out there is extremely surface level. What I mean by this, is they teach you to fix the surface level issues, rather than the actual cause of the problems. With this in mind, one of the root problems of social anxiety is the belief that something is wrong.

I see this in guys that have social anxiety very frequently; they always feel like they have to be DOING something. There’s something wrong with the situation, or with them, and they have to say something to break the tension. They can’t just relax and enjoy the interaction.

This stems from the fundamental belief that something is wrong, when in fact, nothing is wrong! More often than not, when you think that something is wrong, you’re really just tripping yourself up. As an experiment, I want you to try something out the next time you go clubbing.

The next time you’re at a bar, a club, or just interacting with friends, take note of how you feel. Do you feel an underlying sense of anxiety or worry? Again, the underlying belief that’s causing this is that “something is wrong here.” Half of the time, simply acknowledging and understanding the cause of your social anxiety can in fact, cure it.

When I first discovered this in myself, I was shocked at how often I felt like something was wrong—even when I was lying in bed next to a girl, I felt like something was wrong. I had to say something, because I was anxious and worried; I didn’t know why, but I just felt that something was wrong.

Learning to recognize this annoying little trait in yourself will begin the process of you distancing yourself from it, and recognizing how stupid it is.

3. Use The “Genuine Opener”

Broken man game at its finest

There’s a concept known as congruence in game, and despite its importance, I only think I’ve talked about it once or twice. Congruence is basically being aligned in your thoughts, words, and actions. It’s simply being who you are.

Despite its seeming simplicity, congruence is actually one of the most difficult parts of game to master. In addition to this, it’s also one of the most important components of verbal game, and without it, girls will chew you up and spit you out. Girls want to know that you’re okay with yourself, and congruence is how you convey this.

This is the biggest thing for chicks; they want to know who you are, and anytime they sense that you’re changing your personality for THEM or for another person, they’ll secretly resent you for it. “But Jon, what if you’re a depressed loner?” I can hear someone ask.

That’s fine, and in fact, it’s often times even better. Whenever I go to the club and I’m in a bad mood, I always use what I call the “genuine opener,” or the “congruence opener.” This is basically just being COMPLETELY congruent with what you’re feeling. If you’re depressed, then just be depressed.

Women would far rather be with a man who’s genuinely depressed, angry, bitter, or jealous, than a man who fakes happiness. Women respect a man who has the balls to put his emotions out there, rather than constantly wearing a mask, because he’s too afraid to be himself.

Here’s an example of me using the genuine opener a while ago. I was feeling depressed for some reason, so I just expressed how I felt:

- Jon: “Hey.” [Intense eye contact, slight frown, sigh]
- Girl: “Hey…” [twirling her hair] “Are you alright?”
- Jon: “No. I fucking hate my life.” [Intense eye contact, sad expression]
- Girl: “I’m so sorry! Can I give you a hug?”
- Jon: “Yeah, sure.” [Completely indifferent]
- Girl: [Gives me a hug] “Why are you so depressed?”
- Jon: “Honestly, I don’t want to bring your mood down, just forget about it. What’s your name?”

And like that, I was in. Often times if I’m experiencing a lot of social anxiety, I’ll use the genuine opener as a way to segue into gaming the girl—use it to get some social acceptance (because who would flat out reject someone so puppy-dog comical depressed), and then work your way up from there.

4. Utilize Semen Retention

Or, in layman’s terms, do no fap. As ridiculous and over the top this may sound, doing no fap has literally been life-changing for me. Others before me, such as Napoleon Hill, have noted that very successful men often have high sex drives; this is not coincidence.

There’s something in psychology known as transmutation. This is the process of turning sex drive into other, more practical emotions, such as ambition, confidence, motivation, assertiveness, and “masculine drive.”

So basically, when you stop jerking off and looking at porn, you’ll have all of this pent up sexual energy that your subconscious mind will use to turn you into a badass. I realize that this may sound ridiculous, but here are some of the things I noticed after around a week of utilizing semen retention:

- Less social anxiety
- More confidence
- Deeper, more relaxed voice
- More assertiveness
- My game “magically” increased (this is what testosterone does)
- And more

Doing no fap, is in my opinion, the most effective way to permanently overcome social anxiety. I mean think about it: every time you masturbate and look at porn, you’re literally flooding your brain with an unnatural level of dopamine and re-wiring it to favor instant gratification over long-term rewards and pleasure. How do you expect to have the courage and will power to learn game if you’re a weak little drug addict?

I could write an entire article on the benefits of no fap, and I will in the future, because it is literally so incredibly life-changing that I believe if every single man in America did it, we could bring back the Patriarchy. In fact, no fap has been so utterly transformational for me that I even made it one of my “7 Strategies to Develop Your Masculinity.”

I highly urge you men struggling with social anxiety to stop masturbating and viewing porn altogether. There’s a reason why Reddit’s no fap community is literally over 200,000 men. The stuff works, try it. You won’t be disappointed.

5. Use Game-Enhancing Drugs

The beloved plant of ROK

Ah, yes—we can’t have a post on social anxiety without mentioning good old kratom, can we? Most of the men of ROK are already familiar with kratom, however, so I’d like to focus on some other game-enhancing substances. But first, I’d like to explain the underlying philosophy behind using them.

Recognize that game-enhancing drugs are a very powerful quick fix, but you don't want to use them as a crutch. Rather, you should use them to get over the initial period of approach anxiety that a newbie encounters when he commits himself to improving his game.

Don't ever use kratom (or any of the other game-enhancing substances I'm going to mention) as a crutch. This won't fix the underlying problem, but will only mask it. With that being said, don't be afraid to use them as a way to get over the initial hitch.

Aside from kratom, I've personally found phenibut to be PHENOMENALLY powerful—when I'm on phenibut I find myself opening women with literally no approach anxiety. I don't even have to warm up, either; I just find myself permanently in the zone.

In addition to phenibut and kratom, I've found GABA and Kava to be helpful. For GABA I take 500-1000mg about an hour before going out, and for Kava I prefer two teabags of Kava tea. I would be careful with these two, however. Depending on your brain-chemistry, I've found that 50% of people have phenomenal results with GABA and Kava, while 50% find it makes them more anxious.

Ultimately, you'll just have to experiment for yourself. Phenibut is the safest place to start, because 99.5% of people have very good results from it. Remember though, use it as a tool; ultimately you'll have to develop the emotional and social tools necessary to feel at ease in a social situation, and this can only be done through repetition.

How To Use A Revolver For Self-Defense

December 2, 2016 | by Brutus Centinel | Link | Original Link

Until fairly recently, revolvers were generally the preferred self-defense handguns due to their rock-solid reliability. Recent improvements in the reliability of semi-automatics have given them the edge. They generally have a greater magazine capacity, and reload more quickly and easily under stress.

But there are situations where the revolver still has an edge, and many of you may already own a revolver, and may want some ideas on using them for defense. This article examines some of the advantages and disadvantages of revolvers, as well as practical advice on how to employ them for self-defense.

Advantages Of Revolvers

Old Faithful

There are many reasons to pick a revolver for defense. They are simple to operate; point at bad guy, pull the trigger, it goes BANG. This makes them a good choice for novice shooters who don't have time to train with a semi-automatic. This also makes them excellent backup-carry guns if you might need to arm another person. Revolvers are extremely reliable, still a bit better than the best semi-automatics, although no gun is 100%.

A major advantage to revolvers for concealed carry is the ability to fire from concealment. Because they don't have a slide moving back and forth, concealed revolvers can be fired from within a pocket or coat, without having to be drawn first. A mugging victim could pretend to reach for a wallet in the pocket that has their revolver.

The biggest advantage to a revolver is the ability to use powerful cartridges. .357 magnum is a significant step-up in power from any of the common auto cartridges (9mm, .40, or .45). If you can handle .44 magnum, it is a real death ray, and stands head-and-shoulders above any cartridge commonly used by a semi-automatic. You can even go up to a hand cannon like .454 casull or .50 S&W if you need to make up for a small penis!

Long-barrel revolvers (6-inches+), can be a good choice for several purposes, although they are generally too big for concealed carry. The longer barrel increases the muzzle velocity, especially with magnum cartridges, where the velocity increases 20-40% compared to a 2-inch barrel. For this reason, long-barrel revolvers are generally considered the best choice for animal defense; grizzly bears will laugh at a 9mm, but a .44 magnum from a long barrel revolver might save you. They are also useful for hunting small and medium-size game at close ranges. And they are a good choice for home defense due to their decided advantage in one-shot stopping power.

Disadvantages Of Revolvers

Semi Autos Have The Edge on Capacity and Speed Reloads

A full-size revolver generally holds 5-7 rounds, while a full-size semi-automatic generally holds 11-17. Revolvers are somewhat slower to reload, but reloading reliably under stress is a much bigger concern. With practice, revolver reloads can be done quickly, but the the stress of using fine motor skills in a gunfight is, I believe, the biggest downside to using one for defense. Reloading a semi-automatic is easier, and easy is good when your heart rate is through the roof, you have tunnel vision, and someone is trying to kill you.

While military and law enforcement may need to be able to throw a lot of ammo in a short time for suppression, the limited capacity and difficulty of reloading are not fatal to the revolver for defensive purposes. Most defensive gun fights happen at close range, and are ended within a few shots. If the fight is not ended within a few shots, you can generally run away or get to cover to reload. In 90% of defensive gunfights, a snub nose revolver with 5 shots will work just as well as a full-size Glock with 4 spare magazines.

That said, you should still have a good method of reloading your revolver if you need to. So, what are the best ways to reload a revolver in a hurry?

Speed Loaders

Speed Loader

A speed loader holds a full reload of ammo in a plastic or rubber shell shaped to match up to the cylinder of your revolver. To reload, open the cylinder, extract the shells, put the new rounds into the cylinder, release them, close the cylinder, and get back in the fight. Here is a video of police trainer and expert competitive shooter Massad Ayoob demonstrating his preferred method of reloading a revolver with a speed loader.

If you are going to carry a revolver, or use it for home defense, I would recommend at least 2-3 speed loaders, kept fully loaded. It is very important to get the loader that matches up exactly with your gun, because it must be custom-fitted to the cylinder or it will not function.

Speed Strips

Speed Strip Tutorial

Speed strips are a rubber strip with holes to hold ammunition. They are generally designed to reload two shots at a time. Simply insert the rounds into the cylinder, and peel the speed strip to the side so the rounds will drop into the cylinder. Here is Massad Ayoob again, demonstrating his preferred method of reloading with speed strips.

Fun Fact: If any of you also own an SKS or AK-47 rifle, you can also use your stripper clips to reload a revolver! .38 special and .357 magnum, by pure coincidence, will fit perfectly into 7.62×39 stripper clips. Here is a video showing how to do it. I actually prefer these metal stripper clips due to their rigidity, and find it nearly impossibly to fumble cartridges when using them.

Speed strips are preferred by some for a concealed carry revolver, because they are flatter than a speed loader, and easier to conceal. I prefer speed loaders, due to their quicker reload time. However, speed strips can be easier to use under stress without extensive practice (they’re less likely to spill your cartridges everywhere), so they may be a good choice for those without the time to practice using a speed loader.

Conclusion

While semi-automatics are generally preferable, revolvers remain a viable defensive tool. Revolvers are reliable, easy to operate, can be fired from concealment, and fire powerful cartridges, making them the go-to choice for dangerous animal defense. Their Achilles heel is reloading, so plan to either fire a few shots while running away, or spend some time learning to reload under stress. And remember the most important rule of gun fights: HAVE A GUN!

Compendium Of All 131 Answers I Gave For The 2016 Q&A

December 2, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My question & answer series was a great success. I answered 131 questions in nearly six hours of video that has so far received approximately 85,000 views on Youtube. Here's a full index of all the videos with links to specific questions…

Lifestyle & Health

"Roosh, we often laugh at the antics of feminists and SJW's but the focused effort against you from the ROK meetups must have still been withering. What mindset principles and practices did you use to stay mentally strong during that fiasco?" (UNABASHED)

4:01
"With workplaces becoming increasingly hostile to men, with women acting as the gatekeepers to employment, affirmative action being commonplace, etc., do you have any actionable insights or tips for men to prevent, deal with, or get out of poverty in a declining society that routinely denies them opportunities?" (CONRAD STONEBANKS)

7:58
How important are partners in business, teamwork or life in general?" (DWRD CFLA)

12:22
"What stack of skills do you think 18-30 year olds should begin to hone to live the best life possible? Do they change past 30?" (LIBERTAS)

15:16
"How to be true to yourself while living in a Leftist-dominated society like Canada or Western Europe where,oftentimes, people like us have to lead double lives out of fear of reprisal?" (NEVSKY)

18:09

“Hi Roosh, just read your latest book Free speech isn’t free – loved it, then bought your whole collection of books. My question is – If you decide to start something new, how do you push away all thought such as these “You should be doing something else, this is a waste of time”?” (TIMMAH)

20:05
“How did you support yourself while writing your first ebook? I’m writing some fiction. It will be a 5-10 year project. I’m not expecting to make any money on the first book and I am working in property to support myself.” (TOM)

22:45
“Considering what you’ve seen and to my knowledge accepted through the work of Marcus Aurelius, does the time spent chasing women for hedonistic pleasure seem worthwhile to you now, or do you now think there may have been better things to spend your time doing?” (STILBON)

27:45
“If you was send back in time to when you were 25, what would you then do?” (SCANDINAVIAN JAKE)

29:32
“How can we escape the system?” (MR. LEON)

“What tips would you have for starting a politically incorrect blog like this one? Would it make sense to hide my identity?” (PYRO)

34:40
“The more people I know, and the older I get, the more misanthropic I become. Have you also become more misanthropic with age?” (RK ROMA)

37:55
“You said awhile ago that you don’t cocern yourself with happiness, you’re just a man who has had experiences. Could you expand on that, and potentially give some advice on how to be like that?” (OCON)

42:33
“I remember in one of your videos or live talks you said you ate very little to maintain the figure you have.. Am a few years older and always experimenting with various habits and rituals to keep the diet such that one stays trim and toned. Of course exercise and weights too.. Do you have any tips for a man in his thirties for how to stay in form?” (STADTAFFE)

American Politics

“If you were a president or a influential congressional member, how would you encourage nationalism without neglecting minority groups such as blacks, latinos, asians, etc? Since those groups do have political and financial power. Also how would you keep nationalism in check to prevent another world war since keep in mind that nationalism and militarism were the primary causes of WWI and a factor (not the primary cause) of WWII." (JANE PETERSON)

"If Trump fails to deliver on what you expect and/or is a disappointment, what do you recommend we do?" (MERCENARY)

10:21
"If you became president, what executive orders would you make the first day in office?" (SAGETTAURUS)

15:17
"What is the actual end goal of causing division and chaos with BLM/Islamic "refugees" etc? Cause enough fear that they can implement martial law? What is the point? I see that the point of global trading, immigration, and feminism is economic due to cheap labor and increased tax revenue, but what is the point of causing racial division in the US? What is the end game of having sharia in Europe? Or are the powers-that-be just naive?" (SLIM SHADY)

"Cops quite readily violate probable cause and other such statutes, and lie to get their way – often supported by other cops and courts to charge especially young people with frivolous yet serious crimes. Yet, after the BLM bullshit we have forgotten about these violations and become "pro-cop". How do you reconcile the real infringements on freedom by officers while not giving ground to race-baiting terrorists?" (SLIM SHADY)

24:44
"While organizations such as Black Lives Matter are dangerous and need to be stopped, it has become obvious in their inaction that the police are handcuffed by bureaucrats, while average citizens are being jailed for ludicrous offenses on a daily basis. What are your feelings on holding police accountable for 1) Their inaction when groups like BLM disrupt peaceful meetings (like the Young Republicans gathering at Depaul) and 2) Continuing to enforce immoral and unconstitutional laws that enable gun confiscation, seizure of assets, false rape accusations, and unfairly targeting and arresting men during domestic violence encounters?" (DJDJDJ)

28:23
"Do you think that any American leader (Trump or anybody else) can reverse this third-wave, toxic feminism or is America simply too far gone? Another way of asking this is: after the meetup outrage in Feb, have you given up on America?" (JOHN QUINCY)

33:30
"I have alleged that bringing men into the RoK-sphere is a step-by-step process. First we convince mainstream Republicans to the anti-feminist side, then expose them more and more to the RoK. I seriously doubt mainstream America will go from embracing the gender equality message to Roosh V overnight. And we need mainstream America to convert. Why do you antagonize female anti-feminists?" (JOHN QUINCY)

36:20
“What should be the #1 medium-term strategic goal of the nationalist/patriot wave? In my mind, it’s destroying the media. Do you have a different assessment?” (LIBERTAS)

39:11
“As a man on a college campus, how can I fight against feminism?” (JUSTIN)

Religion & Spirtuality

“1. Why is it that you seem to go against your fellow middle easterners and uncle tom for the whites. is it due to that they are your main readers.
2. Why do you hate Islam and immigrants from Muslim countries despite being the son of an Iranian immigrant?” (SPLOOGE & SOREN)

“1. Every intellectual has to pick a religion. They usually do it by now; you’re almost 40. What is the holdup?
2. Are you contemplating joining an organized church/religion?
3. What is your current status with regards to religion and spirituality?” (SGT POG, PEARLBUCK, KOMATIITE)

14:25
“To what extent do religion or spirituality play a role in your daily life?” (THEBASSIST)

17:28
“Have you ever tried Meditation? If so, thoughts? If not, is it something on your radar?” (DASHER)

21:05
“1. How can one prepare for “the end” (death)?
2. Were you ready to lose it all for what you believed in?” (RONALD REAGAN REMIX)

Game & Travel

“What is a good rule-of-thumb number of notches and flags, beyond which a man can safely settle for a nice girl? And what to do if he meets one before hitting the target?” (ZBYSZEK)

4:27
“How do you combine an outgoing, social lifestyle with a very time-consuming career (e.g. academic research)? I know that you endorse free entrepreneurship, but maybe you know guys who have managed to do so and have some tips?” (ZBYSZEK)

6:29
“Have you experienced any bad consequences from all the unprotected sex you’ve had with random hoes from the club?” (JONATHAN ROSELAND)

“What advice do you have for men that have been raised with a beta mindset, but is trying to learn, develop, and create a dominant and confident mindset?” (NICK)

13:10

“In 2013, I asked “if you had to live in one city for the next 5 years, what would it be?” The answer then was Kiev..what would your answer be now?” (TEEDUB)

17:15

“Which city from your travels do you think back to most, whether from good or bad experienences?” (CORTES)

19:12

“To what degree is it necessary for a man to live in a developing country in order to have his needs fulfilled? (in terms of women and freedom).” (LEIGHTON BLACKSTOCK)

21:54

“Would you pass up what so many people now want but cant find (a good girl) to solely pursue personal / financial development in 20-30 age (unstable future) , or start a family young (stable future)?” (JACK)

25:44

“If you already have an established career in the west, would it be worth to give it all up to relocate to Eastern Europe? I don’t feel happy in my own country, and would like to move to Ukraine / Russia. I already spend a long time there, but my education would be useless there, but I’m still young (I’m 25) so I have time to learn something new.” (SCANDINAVIAN JAKE)

28:42

“How do you convince normal men that the manoshpere is relevant to them and that they have a part in it?” (TUSKEGEE51)

33:43

“What’s your approach to game nowadays? In which way has it changed since you wrote your BANG and DAY BANG? Do you still go out at night to meet women? Is indirect daygame still your favorite?” (MRREMI)

39:42

“When player burnout occurs, what is the best way for men to find an additional purpose and focus in their lives?” (AREMENIA 4 EVER)

44:15

46:58

“Since the outrage of the meetups and all the things to do to counter it plus the book, how many daily approaches (if you are still doing them) are you doing those days,

48:44
"Will you consider writing a Bang 2.0 to reflect the multiple ways in which game has changed as a whole since its intial release in 2007?" (HIGHSPEED_LOWDRAG)

49:51
"What is your average monthly expenses when you are living in Central/Eastern Europe excluding travel costs like flights and hotels?" (BACON)

50:52
"Sex has lost its appeal. I don't care to pump and dump, cause it doesn't seem worth the time and effort. I'm not sure what to do. I don't want to just go back to porn and jerking off, but even if I wanted sex I don't think I could find someone I'd want to do it with. What do you think I should do?" (MODE RIGHT)

54:22

How To Reduce Your Risk Of Divorce

December 3, 2016 | by Brutus Centinel | Link | Original Link

The neomasculinity movement is, in many ways, a reaction to the changing incentives for men. Divorce courts began to favor women who abandoned their vows, giving them cash and prizes for breaching their promises. Men were being thrown out of their own homes, cut off from their children, and forced to pay alimony to a woman who went back on her word (women initiate most divorces)..As a result, men are making the rational decision to avoid marriage in greater numbers.

Yet, there is a deep longing within us to be married. Call me a faggot, but I want to share my life with a woman. To have a helper, to raise children… to be loved.

Is this possible in a society that rewards female treachery? There is always a risk that you will be divorce-raped. Nothing is certain. But, it is possible to control this risk if you are very careful about the woman you trust.

Can You Cut Your Divorce Risk 80%?

For years, we have heard that half of all marriages end in divorce. This is number may be a bit high, but it's clear that there is an epidemic of divorce today. But not all marriages are created equal. There are factors that strongly influence the likelihood for divorce.

Free Northerner has an excellent post discussing how vetting your potential wife can drastically reduce your risk of divorce:

"…I consider myself justified in estimating, that the type of women I plan on marrying would have a statistical likelihood of divorcing me around 10%."

The post relies on data from several different sources, so it's hard to amalgamate them. But his reasoning looks pretty sound; certainly you can substantially reduce your risk of divorce rate by avoiding certain red flags. You can read the Heritage Foundation research that formed the basis for the post here, CDC source material from 2002, and the CDC data from 2012.

Here are 10 risk factors to consider:

Factors In Divorce Risk

1. Number of Sexual Partners

Source: Heritage Foundation

This is the most important factor. Women who are virgins when they marry are far less likely to get divorced, and women with lots of partners are far more likely to divorce. This is probably related to an inability to pair-bond.

2. Age Of First Sexual Experience

Source: Heritage Foundation

This factor is also quite strong. Among non-virgins, those who delayed sex until the age of majority are somewhat less likely to be divorced. And those who had sex very young were much more likely to be divorced.

3. Race

Source: CDC 2002

There is no question that different cultures and races have different attitudes toward divorce, and that younger women tend to treat divorce differently than older women. Hispanics have a fairly flat risk of divorce by age; younger Hispanics are less likely to divorce than other races, older Hispanics more likely. Blacks are greater risks for divorce in general, but the difference is sharper as they age. White women in their 20s are the best bet for those looking to avoid divorce.

4. Religion

The CDC data makes it clear that women for whom religion is very important, or somewhat important, are somewhat less likely to divorce. Free Northerner makes the point that religious participation is more important than religious affiliation. Women who participate in their religion are 10-20% less likely to divorce.

I have previously written about the benefits of patriarchal religion for marriage and family life. One of the main benefits is having virtuous older women to encourage her to be a good, faithful wife. This helps counteract the cultural cesspool constantly encouraging women to abandon their families.

5. Education

Figure 5. Probability that a first marriage will remain intact (without disruption) for 20 years among women and men 22–44 years of age by education: United States, 2006–2010

Contrary to what I expected, women who complete a college education are significantly less likely to get divorced. Is this because women who complete college are smarter? Are they more likely to be wise, because they can complete tasks? Or is this a crossover effect? I'm not sure, but the data is clear: a completed bachelor's degree means a big drop in risk.

6. Presence Of A Father

Figure 21. Probability that the first marriage breaks up within 10 years by race/ethnicity and intact status of family of origin: United States, 1995

Source: CDC 2002

Like almost everything in life, women raised by both parents are much more likely to have successful marriages. This is probably because she at least has some role model and male authority in her life, and some exposure to the benefits of remaining committed to your vows.

7. Rape Victims

Figure 22. Probability that the first marriage breaks up within 10 years by race/ethnicity and forced intercourse: United States, 1995

Source: CDC 2002

Women who have been raped (forced sexual intercourse) are 23 percentage points more likely to be divorced than those who have not.

8. Baby Mamas

Figure 23. Probability that the first marriage breaks up within 5 years by race/ethnicity and timing of first birth: United States, 1995

Source: CDC 2002

Marrying your baby mama, whether the baby is already born or whether she is pregnant, correlates with increased divorce risk. Interestingly, not having children within marriage increases divorce risk somewhat, while having children within wedlock cuts divorce risk substantially. Is it possible women will be happier back in the kitchen?

9. Mental Illness

Figure 24. Probability that the first marriage breaks up within 15 years by race/ethnicity and generalized anxiety disorder: United States, 1995

Source: CDC 2002

Women who were diagnosed with Generalized Anxiety Disorder were 16 percentage points more likely to divorce than those who were not. We can extrapolate and guess that women with mental illness generally would tend to be more likely to divorce.

10. Interracial Marriage

Source: CDC 2002

Those who marry a woman of a different race are at somewhat higher risk for divorce as the marriage goes on. I would like to see this broken down by the race of each partner, however. I suspect that certain couplings (black male, white female) are more likely to end in divorce than others (white male, Asian female).

Conclusion

All women are not created equal. There are still traditional, feminine, virtuous women out there. Your risk of divorce rape can be managed, but not eliminated, by weeding out undesirable traits. If you get married to a whore, you're probably not going to end up happy. If you marry a a virtuous woman, your chances are much better.

We Must Not Get Complacent After The Great Election Victory

December 3, 2016 | by Erik Langston | Link | Original Link

Congratulations gentlemen, after much ridicule, vitriolic leftist rhetoric, and subversion attempts we have prevailed. Donald Trump is the right man to lead the country at the right time when it is really and truly divided and hurt.

However we must stay vigilant because the Democrats and the left will be back after they lick their wounds and learn their lessons. It may take them 1 election cycle or an entire decade to field a suitable candidate, but the pendulum will swing back in their favor eventually. Once all all the post-election shock dies down, the liberal establishment will accept the fact that they lost fair and square and put their hopes into the wrong group of people.

The journey to this realization and the steps necessary to fix it will take some real effort and they probably won't get it right the first time around. In the immediate aftermath of the election cycle I think the Democrats will still cling to their support base of feminists, SJWs, and all the other bottom feeders, but they will eventually realize that their useful idiots are the reason they alienated so many people and turned others into closet Donald Trump supporters. In other words they put their faith into the wrong people at the expense of alienating the white working class and even some minorities and legal immigrants.

The Original SJWs

To put some historical context into this, let's go back in time to the early 20th century right around the time when the Russian Revolution was happening. Lenin, Trotsky, and their merry band of Bolsheviks were working hard to destabilize and discredit the rotting Russian monarchy. In many ways they were pioneers of Marxist propaganda tactics that modern day leftists have adopted so effectively. In their effort to spark the revolution the gloves came off and they fought dirty. All the disenchanted classes and intelligentsia were mobilized to attack the government. In their ranks they included the original SJWs, though to be fair they probably weren't whiny entitled brats back then.

After the revolution succeeded, half the Bolsheviks wanted to keep pushing for a global revolution because nothing was enough for them, but the other half wanted to take a breather to the put the country back together. The half that wanted a break to stabilize won out courtesy of Stalin when he ruthlessly cut down the extreme wing of the party. He then went on to immediately wipe out the useful idiots who were used to stir up the revolution and focused on bringing the country back from the Stone Age. Trotsky got an ice pick in the skull for not shutting up.

Though not exactly a match for today's situation, we can still draw some parallels. Some credit has to go to the left for bringing some important issues to the table. Even though we can agree that the Democrats have done some serious damage, we can also be intelligent enough to look back on the presidencies of Clinton and Obama and pick out some good accomplishments. Once they accomplished their goals of creating an "equal society" they found themselves directionless and that's when we started seeing the ever more ridiculous and shrill calls for continued revolution. It manifested itself into what we see today as safe spaces, gender binaries, and all the other confusion plaguing society.

The American people were never given the time to absorb and digest all the leftists victories because they came in rapid succession. Gay marriage, LGBTQ, BLM, multiculturalism, refugees, SJWs, and all the other social movements that sprang up happened so quickly and were given preference over the white working class. Not only that, but not accepting it was met with a disdainful and aggressive attitude that reeked of condescension.

Trump is the necessary force to put a stop to all the excessive leftist nonsense because any more and we could truly have been on the brink of violent conflict. Hopefully with him in power we will finally get a breather and a long needed break from the progressive left that has had a virtual monopoly due to limp opposition from the right. While I don't suggest to equate him to Stalin, he does possess a lot of the same characteristics such as an iron resolve and a mastodonic pair of testicles.

The Great Forgetting

I hope that in the next couple of years we will see an era of the Great Forgetting where all the loudmouth feminists, SJWs, and other far left elements slowly lose favor and fade into the background. In the Russian Revolution they were all either shot or sent to far away Siberian camps to do hard labor. Of course in 2016 we can't do that, but I have hope that market forces will do the next best thing and cause them to keep quiet and actually get a job.

It will be a painful process and they won't come quietly, but I believe that we will slowly see them getting phased out until they lose their platform. All the protests and petitions to ban the electoral college are going to become a PR problem for the Democrats once the dust settles and they will begin the process of disassociating themselves with the subversive elements. All the women and men they managed to corrupt will unfortunately become collateral damage as some are too far gone to bring back. I genuinely feel sorry for them because they were used for nefarious political purposes as cannon fodder. We will unfortunately see a whole generation of bitter spinsters and emasculated men as one of the consequences of long Democratic rule.

I see in the next 10-20 years America reverting back to simpler times and the anti-white rhetoric turning down many decibels. We may even see American women becoming more feminine once it become apparent that the government no longer favors feminism. The white working class needs to be given a voice to grieve all the unfair treatment they have been receiving for the last years. We need to be given time to make sense of everything that has happened around us.

A word of warning

We should take the time to celebrate this victory because we all fought hard for it. However we must not get complacent because the election result shows exactly what happens when you do. Just because The Donald is now the new President doesn't mean that all the leftist will suddenly get with the program.

In the immediate aftermath we must still be aware that the legacy of the leftists is strong and the legal barriers they built are still there. In other words your tongue and your actions can still get you in trouble as seen by the poor white guy who got jumped by a bunch of black guys for voting for Trump. Keep your wits about you and be careful who you trust. It will take time to undo all the subversive damage and you can expect them to come kicking and screaming. I don't believe we are going to stop seeing false rape accusations anytime soon.

Another thing to keep in mind is that the Democrats will be back. As I said earlier it will take time and they will go through a crisis, but eventually they will find strong leadership. They will learn the lessons and they will not be so careless anymore about who to put their faith into. I see them weaseling their way into appealing to the white demographic because this election proved they were the crux. Their message will be revised and they will pull voters back their way eventually. In order to do this they will not push such an aggressive Globalist agenda down people's throats, but they will not abandon their dream altogether.

In the near future I see a Globalism 2.0 appearing that is much more inclusive and fair to the white working class, as well as the world in general. As humans we have always moved towards a more globalized society and all the bumps along the road have never kept us down for long. A more globalized society is inevitable, just the current way of going about it is not correct. The left will find a better mix in the future and people will buy it and support it.

To push Globalism 2.0 they will revive their army of SJWs, though in 10-20 years I can't imagine what they will look like. The current generation of far left militia will move into the shadow realms much like the ones from where the Manosphere and PUA culture originated from and they will wait patiently for their day again just like we did.

Everything comes in waves and movements fade and come back. The militant leftism from the 60s was revived 40 years later and is now nearing yet another culmination. I don't think anybody here likes them, but I don't think we can deny that they aren't effective when used correctly. So just be aware of that and realize that the enemy has only made a tactical retreat.

Now go out there and grab America by the pussy!

An Alternative (Right?) Perspective On Objectivism

December 4, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Ayn Rand, the founder of Objectivism, was born in 1905 in Saint Petersburg. She witnessed the disastrous rise of Communism during her youth, before moving to the USA. In addition to provocative monographs such as The Virtue Of Selfishness and Capitalism: The Unknown Ideal, she conveyed much of her philosophy in the books Anthem, The Fountainhead, and Atlas Shrugged. Her capsule summary of Objectivism was:

> Metaphysics: Objective Reality; Epistemology: Reason; Ethics: Self-interest; Politics: Capitalism.

It's often regarded as rather extreme, and a problem it shares with many ideologies is trying to fit everything into conceptual boxes. From an Alternative Right perspective, Objectivism has some drawbacks. Still, it has many useful concepts. For example, I mentioned "the sanction of the victim" earlier. The takeaway is that our enemies are basically parasitic, drawing their strength and substance from others, so refusing to cooperate with them will get them off our backs. There's quite a bit to say about Objectivism, but I'll cover the highlights, taking—shall we say—an objective look.

The importance of reason

Objectivism emphasizes rationality. Rand's perspectives on the nature of reality are a great contribution to philosophy. Academia largely dismisses it as unworthy of consideration, because they don't like Rand's politics. That's actually a good endorsement, considering the sorry state of faculty departments ridden with cultural Marxists these days. She wrote with crystalline clarity, quite unlike the tedious and muddy postmodernism so popular in academia today.

Leftist ideology often features obscurantism, circular reasoning, emotionalism, and fuzzy thought. This is one reason why arguing with them is like drilling holes in the water. Rand described "floating abstractions", very poorly-defined concepts that could mean whatever the speaker wants and effectively mean nothing. Rand also described the "fallacy of the stolen concept" (something that denies the existence of a concept it depends on); "property is theft" is one example. Another item is the "anti-concept", a thought-terminating cliché meant to delegitimize a valid concept. All these rhetorical tricks are common in leftist terminology and linguistic bowdlerizations, notably catch-all insults larded up with preconceptions often ending in "-ism" and "-phobia".

Rand used the word "evasion" in a technical sense—basically meaning refusal to face the facts—even calling this evil. These days, people having their PC blinders on are afraid to face uncomfortable truths that threaten their views. Ideology is often taken to a fanatical degree, and cultural Marxism is a huge offender. Social Justice Warriors in particular are so screwed up that hearing contradictory facts is "triggering", and logically reassessing their views could cause an existential crisis.

Subjectivism is a big article of faith in far-left viewpoints, which basically asserts that reality is a product of our minds. That's childish nonsense popular with those educated beyond their ability to understand. For example, some varieties of feminism say that men and women are exactly the same, other than a few body parts. They act as if they repeat it enough and believe it strongly enough, it will become true. Naturally, Objectivism—stating that that reality exists independent of our beliefs, we encounter this reality through observation and the power of reason, "A is A", and wishing something doesn't make it so—is a great antidote to subjectivism.

Rand took it pretty far, for example, that one should examine why one likes particular styles of music, art, etc.; it wasn't enough just to like them. Still, she couldn't quite figure out why she was a Salvador Dali fan. Rand had a theory of aesthetics and how it relates to one's sense of life. It's altogether good, though not as significant. Still, it was considered serious business back in the day. It's true that one's taste in art can tell you something about that person's psychology, but some things are just a mystery buried deep in the unconscious mind.

The importance of freedom

The Utah Data Center is designed to store exabytes of information and "is alleged to be able to process "all forms of communication, including the complete contents of private emails, cell phone calls, and Internet searches, as well as all types of personal data trails—parking receipts, travel itineraries, and bookstore purchases"

Rand summarized,

> My philosophy, in essence, is the concept of man as a heroic being, with his own happiness as the moral purpose of his life, with productive achievement as his noblest activity, and reason as his only absolute.

Rand knew the distinction between liberty and license. She was on board with the Aristotelian concept of liberty—freedom to act in your rational best interests. Others had the same rights, which shouldn't be transgressed. She didn't believe freedom meant doing whatever the hell you want; she called that "whim worship" and denounced it.

She thought anarchy was silly, which it is. Her view of the state's role is that it should only provide basic law-and-order functions. I consider that debatable, but Rand's perspective is a good antidote to leftists who want an overreaching government that can do anything for you (and to you).

Within the bounds of the above considerations, she strongly emphasized personal freedom. If she were around today, she would be appalled by the degree of domestic spying, nanny-state intrusiveness, and erosion of Constitutional law. More emphasis on personal freedom is a good thing, given today's stifling government increasingly hostile toward its citizens.

Steadfastness

In 2008 Obama said he thought marriage was between a man and a woman

Rand considered compromise wrong, stating:

> In any compromise between food and poison, it is only death that can win. In any compromise between good and evil, it is only evil that can profit.

Also:

> There can be no compromise on basic principles. There can be no compromise on moral issues. There can be no compromise on matters of knowledge, of truth, of rational conviction.

Note well, Saul Alinsky had a very different viewpoint. As he put it in Rules For Radicals:

> But to the organizer, compromise is a key and beautiful word. It is always present in the pragmatics of operation. It is making the deal, getting that vital breather, usually the victory. If you start with nothing, demand 100 per cent, then compromise for 30 per cent, you're 30 per cent ahead.
> A free and open society is an on-going conflict, interrupted periodically by compromises–which then become the start for the continuation of conflict, compromise, and on ad infinitum.

As Alinsky hinted, this "new normal" would then be the launching point for more demands as soon as the other side partially capitulates. Not accepting the 30% compromise they agreed to means they were negotiating in bad faith all along. This is a very valuable lesson to those of us who strive against cultural Marxism's dialectic strategy. It's a mistake to give into their demands and let the camel get its nose under the tent; it just encourages them, and you lose piecemeal.

Still, Rand's refusal to compromise could be seen as excessively hard-headed. There's something to be said for building bridges with potential allies. She rejected the Libertarians as whim-worshipers lacking a philosophical grounding; a lost opportunity since Libertarians actually have political positions very close to Objectivists.

Emphasis on capitalism

Objectivism presents an excellent, devastating critique of Communism. The epic tragedy We, The Living described first-hand the tyranny, hunger, and corruption of the early USSR. Atlas Shrugged provided another hard-hitting look at all the graft and dysfunction resulting from socialism. Her scathing depiction of those supporting and profiteering from it—limousine liberals, pointy-headed intellectuals, and what we now call SJWs—will be quite familiar to those aware of today's globalist/leftist alliance. The Fountainhead skewered them too, focusing on how they manipulate the arts and the cultural scene.

Rand's glowing elegies to productivity and genius are admirable. The creative captains of industry driven to success who she describes are alphas in the best possible sense. If Rand's novels inspire someone stuck in a dead-end job—or stuck in his mom's basement playing video games—to start a small business which becomes a profitable career, so much the better.

Capitalism does have much going for it, but Rand didn't quite foresee the distortions that great concentrations of wealth can cause. For instance, she defended the existence of monopolies, but didn't fully grasp that lack of competition interferes with Adam Smith's "invisible hand" effect, which is what makes capitalism fairly efficient. Neither did she foresee the negative effects of big money on the political process and all the associated corruption.

If Rand were around now, she would regard the wealthy being in charge as right and natural. However, she'd be horrified that they are leftist degenerates who use cultural Marxism as a control method, manipulate international culture and geopolitics, and are doing their damnedest to produce a sheep-like servility in the public. There's much to be said for a market economy, but problems result when it's dominated by huge corporations. Instead, we should decentralize production.

Rejection of altruism

Most think of altruism as being kind to others. Objectivism uses it in a technical sense, basically meaning putting others above oneself, contrary to one's own interests and well-being. Altruism includes anything from social pressure (for instance, your loser brother bugging you for yet another "loan") to hardcore tyranny. Objectivism, being highly individualistic, regards altruism as involuntary self-sacrifice; basically like slavery. People should be self-reliant, neither mooching from others nor tolerating that.

Rejecting altruism might seem “not nice”, especially for those unaware of the Objectivist technical sense. Still, it’s time we refuse to be played for chumps. Being “Mister Nice Guy” gets you nowhere! There was a reason for hospitality to wayfarers in ancient times, and looking out for your family is a good thing (within reason). However, it’s wrong to make you responsible for the well-being of the whole country (or the world), or force you to place everyone else’s interests ahead of yours.

Pathological altruism features in the runaway welfare state as well as the religion of multiculturalism. These days, our society’s values—kindness, tolerance, fairness, etc.—have been turned into weapons against us. Thus, we should reevaluate if things like extending charity to the entire planet, letting in the world’s hard-luck cases, or becoming a global melting pot are wise or good for us.

Ultimately, I favor a balanced perspective. Some are helpless through no fault of their own, such as children, the severely disabled, and the elderly. I wouldn’t mind a well-regulated social safety net encouraging and assisting people to become as independent as they can, given their circumstances. Unfortunately, what exists now is a massive and inefficient bureaucracy subsidizing dependency. That leads to intergenerational poverty, causing squalor and crime, and that doesn’t help in the long term.

One definition of justice is the balance of the interests of individuals to the interests of the community. This balance is an example of the Aristotelian Golden Mean, wherein virtue is the middle ground between two vices. One negative extreme is pathological altruism. The other negative extreme is atomistic hyper-individualism. Society is more than just the sum of its parts, and we should care about the outcome of our civilization.

Rejection of nationalism

Res ipse loquitur

I’ve covered several largely positive items. Now here’s a major shortcoming. Rand dismissed the importance of ethnic heritage because of the belief in the primacy of the individual. As the idea goes, one's accomplishments stand on their own, neither increased nor diminished by one's ancestry.

That's fine in theory, but regarding people as identical, interchangeable social units misses some important considerations. To mention just a few, group differences are real. Genetics has an influence on culture. Packing several unrelated groups—with greatly differing customs and values—into the same territory is a recipe for trouble. More cultures mean more conflicts. Since evasion is bad, Objectivists aren't allowed to dismiss all this once they're confronted with the facts.

To her credit, Rand didn't make this a centerpiece of her ideology as leftists do, or virtue-signal about it like today's cuckservatives. Actually, she did make some politically incorrect remarks that certainly would "trigger" SJWs these days.

The failure to see beyond Rousseau's "blank slate" argument and confront the problems with multiculturalism causes some to see Objectivism as a distraction. Indeed, it offers no ideological defense against globalist population replacement policies. If Rand had seen that multiculturalism and mass immigration were being used as a sociopolitical battering ram (something more apparent now than in her day), she might have reconsidered. Ultimately, dismissing ethnic solidarity as collectivism was an opportunity lost.

Other pain points

Rand was a hard-boiled atheist, which she considered to be a key part of Objectivism. She was strictly materialist, in the "if you can't touch it, it's not real" sense, and had a great dislike for what she saw as irrational mysticism. This has turned off many conservatives who might otherwise embrace it. There's no wiggle room for reconciling religion with science, and this matter remains a hot topic of discussion.

Rand didn't personally put much emphasis on family ties, and this is reflected in the childless heroes of her novels. This is an unfortunate lapse, since youth is the future. Our families are part of who we are, even as individuals. Further, she was pro-abortion; she wasn't a feminist (and took a lot of heat for saying a woman wouldn't make a good President), but endorsed their most lethal position. If she'd witnessed one of these ghastly procedures, perhaps she would've changed her mind.

Objectivism galvanized a great many. Eventually, a cult of personality emerged around her, which she didn't discourage. If it seems inconsistent that a passionate advocate of rationality and individualism would have a cult-like following, it is.

Rand got into a polyamorous relationship with Nathaniel Branden, then her top disciple, a detail many consider immoral. To make a long story short, he broke up with her, and that caused a rift severely damaging the Objectivist community. Polyamory does have a high drama potential, and bad breakups are a cost of doing business, but it would've been much better kept as a private matter.

Despite striving for perfection, Rand was still only human, and subject to personal flaws. Whatever these shortcomings were, confusing the messenger with the message is mistaken.

The possible influence of Rand's background

There are some, such as David Duke, who regard her Jewish ancestry suspiciously (her birth name was Alisa Zinivievna Rosenbaum). It's a bit indelicate, but I should address it lest it be the elephant in the room. Perhaps too much has been made of it; there are far more deserving targets for criticism. Rand was pro-Israel (though saying fairly little about it), seeing Palestinians as dreadfully backward, per the general opinion of Muslims as fanatical "camel jockeys". I'm not taking sides in the Arab-Israeli conflict, but there are reasons why that stereotype exists.

As an atheist who didn't consider ethnicity important (even her own), she didn't feel her Jewish roots strongly; no more than I consider my very scanty Mormon background while I enjoy a cold beer. Neither did she have a self-hatred complex like Karl Marx or certain key globalists today. Actually, she greatly admired us, and lacked any ill will or rivalry toward gentiles. By some others, that most unfortunately has led to friction, ultimately destructive to both sides.

Did her latent Jewishness inspire her notions on materialism? She did carefully work out her ideology from first principles and believed what she said. So we should consider Objectivism on its own terms, at least until some scientist discovers a gene for materialism. I'm happy to recognize overall positive Jewish contributions; more of the same (and fewer negative ones) will help alleviate the regrettable friction. Those concerned about anti-Semitism should note this well.

Objectivism is like spicy food: some like it and some don't. Extending the analogy, it can be a refreshing break if you've been fed a steady diet of nothing but baloney. It does have much to contribute to politics and philosophy, serving as a remedy for much worn-out leftist thought. Still, it does have some negatives, most of which are from taking good principles too far as well as shortsightedness in some areas.

Objectivism is not really a "pick and choose" ideology. An Objectivist diverging on one of the major tenets (or perhaps some minor one) might be criticized for not being a true Objectivist. This "all or nothing" approach surely turns off some who agree with most of it. However, there's nothing stopping us from learning from its good points, or deciding how far it is beneficial to take them.

If Objectivism gives a Libertarian a sharper ideological perspective, there's no harm in that. If it causes a liberal to lose faith in socialism, that's even better. If exposure to Objectivist epistemology causes someone steeped in mainstream conservatism to realize that one must consider uncomfortable truths, that person might shed the PC blinders. Rather than an ideological dead end, Objectivism's clarity, emphasis on reason, and barbecuing leftist sacred cows can be a launching point to other valuable perspectives such as ours.

One Simple Trick To Help Your Calisthenic Workouts

December 4, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Everyone (which is to say, everybody that isn't a complete novice) knows that weight training is something done in small incremental increases over a period of time. You start off with low weights, and gradually work up to higher and higher weights. That's pretty obvious.

What isn't as obvious is that calisthenics have their own version of this, a tactic so fundamental to advanced calisthenics that it was alluded to multiple times in my Convict Conditioning series of articles, but never explicitly delineated. A tactic that I have dubbed declining calisthenic loads.

What Is It?

Essentially, where weightlifting requires you to add small increments of weight in units of 5 or 10, calisthenic unloading requires you to decrease the weight born on your limbs as you do moves such as the one handed pushup or one-handed pullup.

An old reliable picture of yours truly

While you will find variations of this in all sorts of calisthenic and gymnastic training regimens, I am not aware of anybody giving a proper name to it. Thus I take full credit for being the first to do so.

How does it work?

It depends on the exercise that is being used at the moment, but each of method of declining loads involves gradually removing a limb from labor (note: do not LITERALLY remove your limb, idiot). And as luck would have it, the human body already comes sub-divided (to borrow a musical term) into smaller and smaller units that can be gradually removed, forcing the remaining units to work harder. Those units are of course the phalanges-the fingers and toes-and the various other tarsal and carpal bones that can be nullified in the midst of calisthenic exercise.

Those who have read Convict Conditioning are likely aware of this concept already—indeed, Paul Wade's discussion of "hand and a half" pushups or "basketball squats" are the fundamentals of this idea, removing the entire hand or foot from the equation and forcing the other podial to labor twice as hard.

But just as musicians will repeatedly subdivide a bar of music to get the proper count and rhythm, and barbell manufacturers produce 1.25 pound plates, you too can subdivide calisthenic exercise—by using musicians will repeatedly subdivide a bar of music to get the proper count and rhythm, and barbell manufacturers produce 1.25 pound plates, you too can subdivide calisthenic exercise—by using your fingers.

Take, for example, the one-handed pull-up: A very difficult exercise indeed, and one that probably provided me with the most difficulty in the convict conditioning curriculum. A way of working up to the true one-handed pull-up that I discovered was to hang with the fingers of one hand.

Beginning with removing the thumb (the strongest digit), you hang with the four remaining fingers, and then do pull-ups with that. And from there you release the pinky finger and do pull-ups. Then remove the ring finger, and so forth until you are using solely the two strongest fingers beyond the thumb, the index and middle finger. Once you've successfully done this, you can do pull-ups with just the index finger. And then move onto the other fingers.

The effectiveness of this method is that you can combine fingers based on your level of strength: Knowing that the index and middle fingers are the strongest, should you be struggling to use only the middle finger, you can use the middle and ring or middle and pinky finger as a stop gap.

Similarly, you can utilize any other combination until you are doing pull-ups with just the pinky finger (combined with a fully utilized opposite hand of course). And once you've mastered that, the actual one-handed pull-up cannot be too far behind.

If you are struggling with the one handed pushup, you will of course use the "hand and a half basketball" method. And if you can't cross that gap into the true one-handed pushup…you guessed it, you use the finger method!

Personally speaking, I found that once I had gotten down to using one index finger on the ball, I was ready to do the one-handed pushup. And it is likely many of you won't even need to do this.

However, where I found this method to be the most useful was in the one-handed fingertip pushup

Gradually removing fingers from the opposite hand into the true finger-tip pushup (With the aid of the medicine ball/basketball) was probably the most useful technique I used in achieving the true one-handed fingertip pushup.

Undoubtedly one could use this for even more calisthenic techniques such as the handstand pushup…but I will admit I have yet to achieve the two handed fingertip handstand pushup, to say nothing of the nigh-mythical single-armed variant.

Regardless of my failure to perform a skill that most people couldn’t imagine…I have still given you the tools to achieve slightly more believable bodyweight skills, in this and past articles. Go forth and use them.

8 Reasons Why The Leftists Win

December 5, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

In my last article, I went over reasons why leftists are losers as people. Today, I want to go over how they've been managing to win in spite of their loser nature. It's not by accident that progressivism, feminism, and other illusions became mainstream in the West and beyond. The effectiveness to which the leftists have managed to change entire culture and society is something we must acknowledge if we're serious about countering them.

1. They have government support

Who needs a female minority to lead social justice when a cis-gender white male is the prime minister?

Most of the countries in the West are globalist or globalist leaning, which means its ideology gets trickled down to the masses through schools, media, and policy. In a way, it’s not that the leftists are winning, but that the governments have effectively molded the majority of the population to accept the ideas of multiculturalism, feminism, progressivism, etc. Unlike what the leftists believe, they’re not fighting against the system—they are the system.

2. Material force is on their side

The wall alone is not going to reverse the demographic changes.

In my last article, I said the leftists were delusional because they believed that the spirit of times was on their side. But the truth is, they are correct in a way. Just look at the countless examples of what's happening today: As technological advancement accelerates, so does globalism. The demographic landscape of the West is changing dramatically in a way that even a complete halt of all immigration will not prevent the minorities already in the nations from growing in numbers, which contrasts to the declining birth-rate of native population.

And with consumerism becoming the dominant religion, people today lack values which they compensate by taking up social justice causes while rejecting "outdated" traditional norms. The truth that everyone needs to acknowledge is that social development through materialism is dictating the political trends, not some ghost called "Cultural Marxism."

3. They control the narrative through institutions

The leftists dominate the mainstream media, academia, tech industries, and the entertainment industry in numbers. Although a counter-reaction has been fomenting in the past few years, leftists are still dominant in any platform that is “major” and “official.” How they achieved such level of dominance is up for speculation, but I’m strongly convinced that it has a lot to do with the above two points plus the fact that a group of highly successful people were able to influence the system from where it matters.

4. They have the celebrities

America loves celebrities and the vast majority of the stars in Hollywood and elsewhere have a clear and unabashed leftist leaning. And it isn't just the actors and musicians who are shaping the people's political consciousness, there are many liberal political commentators like Jon Stewart (who got me into American politics during the Bush era), Bill Maher (I still enjoy his show from time to time even if I disagree on half of the issues), Stephen Colbert, John Oliver, Young Turks (horrid, but they have a large audience) and many more mainstream political commentators who make political issues fun and easy to digest for the young Americans. Alternate viewpoints that appealed to younger generation were just not available until very recently.

5. They don't concede

When leftists have an issue, they bite on it like a bulldog and don't let go. Just look how they operate: They fought for abortion and once they got it legalized, they moved to gay marriage. Once they got homosexuals having weddings, they moved to bathrooms for transsexuals, and so on. They fight until their issue becomes normalized. On the opposite side, however, concessions are made every decade to appeal to the general population that ever so slightly slides over to progressivism.

For example, homosexuality has been so normalized today that people calling themselves conservatives tolerate it and are even openly supportive of it. If this trend continues, I expect to see a pro-abortion, pro-multiculturalism transsexual woman calling xerself a Christian conservative in twenty years time (note that there is already a trans-gender Republican called Caitlyn).

6. Not as much infighting

Perhaps due to their message of equality and harmony, the leftists don't tend to engage in as much infighting as the right. You'll usually see liberals, "anarchists", feminists, BLM, gays, of all colors and sexual orientations forming one large blob to fight for social change. Yes, they occasionally eat their own, but they're usually individual cases and not full blown divisions.

Compare that to the anti-leftists who are divided and often averse to one another because those with similar views are: not white, neo-Nazis, Christian, atheist, pro-Russia, women, gay, statist, libertarian, and so on. Does this mean they should unite as one like the leftists? No. But leftists will always have numerical advantage for this reason.

7. They act as a mob

Twitter 'mob' puts free speech in peril

Debate being quashed, says Free Kirk Moderator

By Rachel Watson

SCOTLAND is becoming a 'monochrome society' with no real freedom of speech, according to one of the country's leading churchmen.

The Reverend David Robertson, Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, blamed the 'mob mentality' of social media users and ruling elites for quashing diverse debate.

Celebrities such as JK Rowling and politicians including the late Charles Kennedy and Labour's Margaret Curran have all been the target of abusive 'trolls' on Facebook and Twitter.

It is this that Mr Robertson addressed in his Christmas message. The Dundee minister said: 'As I listen to the same opinions, delivered by the same people with the same certainty, in their own media "safe spaces", I cannot but wonder how monocultural we are becoming as a society.

'That as the free market has meant the devastation of our high streets and the removal of diverse local shops, so the need to make the new mandly in our schools is reducing them to a monochrome dullness.

'Social media combined with the increasing power of the rich has resulted in a mob mentality which threatens anyone who dares to be against the "equality and diversity" agenda, thus ironically seeking to prevent any real diversity from the social and moral moves handed down from those who govern us.'

He continued: 'Equality is one of the great mantras of our society – and yet the more we shout about it, the less it happens.

'The gap between rich and poor increases and as this is accompanied by a decline in the public services, it means that for the poor it is even worse. poorer education, poorer health care and poorer job opportunities are not good news for the poor.

'Our liberal elites talk about equality but have failed to deliver it.'

Turning to the way in which the festive season is now celebrated, Mr Robertson said: 'There was a time when Christmas was either banned or hardly celebrated in Scotland.

'Sometimes when I see the exploitation and farce of much of today's Christmas celebrations I am tempted to think that our forefathers had a point.

'However, I believe they got it wrong and that Christmas is a wonderful time of year to remember the birth of Christ and to consider the light that has come into the darkness.'

Mr Robertson is minister of St Peter's Free Church, Dundee.

As they are somewhat united and are collective-minded, the leftists use an effective strategy of swarming individuals or organizations using a mob attack. They make people afraid to voice their opinions as their employment or business might become threatened along with their reputation. Corporations and universities seem particularly cowardly with the way they kowtow to the whining tantrums of the leftist infants as they must guard their profit. The silent majority usually prefers to remain civil and focus on building their own lives, which the institutions view as acquiescence, which is why those said institutioins will continue to cater to the leftists who cry ever louder.

8. They use passion

Last, whatever the leftists may lack in intelligence, they compensate with their passions. These individuals are often accused of being dumb and irrational bunch, but that may be exactly why they've been so successful all these years. Being reasonable and making sound arguments may win you meaningless intellectual debates, but to win in politics, you need to be driven by passion to fight and impose your will upon others.

The leftists inspire changes because they make noise, they're not afraid to take it to the streets, they don't care about breaking the rules, they get in your face, and they put their ideology above themselves. Their energy is directed towards changing the world around them rather than their individual lives. That makes them a loser as a person, but as a group, they become a formidable force. They are also highly effective at keeping their messages simple and rousing to rally the people instead of drawing out convoluted truths that are hard to comprehend. The human passion trumps anything logical and rational.

Conclusion

Now, let me just say that I don't condone these methods nor am I suggesting that we or others should adapt their techniques. I am just pointing out what makes them an effective force. That said, I've noticed that the opposition is starting to mirror the techniques and strategies used by leftists seeing how effective they are. The younger generation has especially been active on the Internet to propagate opposing viewpoints to counter the current leftist trends.

As the socio-economic situation around the world continues to deteriorate, I expect to see further polarization of politics and for the ideological battles to get even uglier.

The Chain Of Fate That Brought Down The Chapeco Football Club

December 5, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Some days ago on November 28 I received a text message on WhatsApp from a girl I'm very close to in Rio de Janeiro. Shortly after that we spoke directly on the phone. She was distraught, having lost a journalist friend who was aboard the charter plane carrying the team members of the Chapeco football club to their next match. Fifty-one players and people associated with the team were killed when the plane went down in the Andes Mountains near Medellin, Colombia. In such times, you can do little more than try to offer comfort and condolences.

As I read more about the tragedy, I was even more unsettled to learn about the negligence and dereliction of duty that had led to the crash. Accidents involving death are always tragic; they are doubly so when the accidents themselves may have been preventable. I wanted to give my thoughts on the incident here.

Chapeco is a city in the state of Santa Caterina, Brazil. The Chapecoense team had been enjoying unexpected success in its tournament, and was preparing to go into the finals of the Copa Sudamericana, which is the second largest football tournament in South America. The team had been flying from Bolivia to Medellin, Colombia. The jet involved was a British Aerospace 146 aircraft, owned by the Bolivian company LaMia. Although a complete investigation has not been completed, enough details have surfaced for us to reconstruct approximately what happened. It is an unsettling picture.

According to aviation rules, planes are supposed to carry enough fuel to permit them to fly for thirty minutes beyond the time for their scheduled destination. To make up for time lost from a delay, the pilot in this case chose to ignore the need to refuel the jet, believing that he could make it to Medellin. For this failed gamble, he paid with his life, and with the lives of the passengers he was obligated to protect.

According to the flight plan, the pilot was supposed to stop and refuel in the Bolivian city of Cojiba en route to Medellin. But the problem was that this was a charter flight, a private flight, and it was not properly registered with the Colombian aviation authorities. Even more tragic is the fact that the team was originally supposed to leave on a direct flight from Brazil. But because Brazil understandably does not allow charter flights to leave its territory that are not properly registered in their countries of departure or destination, the team had to use a more circuitous route.

So the plan was to fly from Sao Paolo, Brazil to Bolivia, and then go from Bolivia to Colombia. But the flight to Bolivia arrived about an hour late; and this meant that it could not refuel in Cojiba as planned since the airport there could not handle refueling operations at night. Instead of choosing another city to refuel in, the pilot decided top off his tanks and make straight for Medellin; in his estimation, we can imagine, he would make up for lost time and thereby please his passengers.

The pilot, whose name was Miguel Quiroga, should have known better. The flight plan he submitted would have stretched his aircraft’s range capacity to the very limit (4 hours and 22 minutes), allowing no room for error or unexpected fuel consumption en route. Quiroga decided not to make any other alternate plans.

Why this was so, we do not yet know. Perhaps he was coming under pressure by his impatient passengers. Perhaps he overestimated his own abilities. Perhaps he was lazy and didn’t give a shit about the potential consequences. We do not know. What we do know is that Quiroga never should have made the decision he did. It was grossly negligent, perhaps even criminally so; we also do not know why the authorities refused to stop him.

To add tragedy on top of tragedy, it now appears that the plane might have just barely made it but for a last-minute delay as the plane was approaching Medellin. Quiroga had run out of fuel completely and was literally flying on vapors as he drew close to Medellin. We know from a leaked recorded conversation with the aviation authorities in Medellin that he asked for emergency permission to land due to impending equipment failure. Apparently he did not make his point clearly enough, or perhaps he tried to camouflage the true extent of the crisis.

But air traffic control told Quiroga to wait another ten minutes or so, since there was another plane that needed an emergency landing. This extra few minutes were what tipped the scales of Fortune against him and the passengers, for the plane could not stay in the air for another ten minutes. Flight 2933 then began its terrible descent from the skies, crashing into a mountainside just 30 miles from Medellin.

What makes this event so supremely tragic is that it was so preventable. At any link in this chain of Fate, prudent consideration might have stopped the rush to disaster. But it was not to be. In such ways does Fortune remind us that she alone is the arbiter of all events, and will always punish the willful arrogance of men, hurtling them to their doom for their folly.

Why Is Modern Art So Uninspiring?

As Andy Warhol said, “Art is anything you can get away with.” It’s proverbial that a picture speaks a thousand words. Yet some pictures chatter on without really saying anything. The trends in modern art are causing it to be not very enjoyable. The main problems are that much of it displays little skill, isn’t very uplifting, and sometimes even is ugly.

Pointing out these things might get you lectured about the distinction between modern and contemporary art. However, the usual rejoinder is that if you don’t “understand” it, then you’re just an unsophisticated rube. Actually, there are people academically trained in art history who aren’t taken in.

Granted, individual tastes vary, but I’ve long suspected that the art scene these days is partly a scam. Like so much in cultural matters, quality has taken a back seat to popularity. Much is stylistically lazy. Often you’re left wondering what the hell you’re looking at. By throwing form out the window, it’s missing something vital. A Jackson Pollock style drip painting can convey a mood by the choice of colors and how the paint is tossed, but that’s about it.

Generally it takes about 2000 hours of practice to achieve mastery in something. However, with no standards required, the learning curve can be sidestepped. Little children—and even chimpanzees—have produced pretty decent paintings by modern art standards. Often the critics can’t tell the difference between these efforts and that of “serious” artists who get paid very handsomely.

You can’t blame the kids for not producing something better, since they’re barely learning; or the chimps, lacking the manual dexterity of humans. Really, the laugh is on the art critics who can’t distinguish between mediocrity and mastery.

Tom Wolfe spills the beans

The truth hurts.

Tom Wolfe, who often has moments of Red Pill brilliance, wrote The Painted Word, poking fun at artists, art critics, and their antics. For example:

> What I saw before me was the critic-in-chief of The New York Times saying: In looking at a painting today, “to lack a persuasive theory is to lack something crucial.” I read it again. It didn’t say “something helpful” or “enriching” or even “extremely valuable.” No, the word was crucial.
> In short: frankly, these days, without a theory to go with it, I can’t see a painting.
> Then and there I experienced a flash known as the Aha! Phenomenon, and the buried life of contemporary art was revealed to me for the first time. The fogs lifted! The clouds passed! The motes, scales, conjunctival bloodshot, and Murine agonies fell away!

Wolfe’s book ruffled some feathers, to say the least. Many reviewers made him out to be a bigger philistine than Goliath. Predictably, they claimed he was too unsophisticated to understand what he was describing. The brutal truth is that the critics actually were the ones with no taste. Remember, they have trouble distinguishing a little kid’s doodling from a masterpiece.

Understandably, the “intelligentsia” threw a hissy fit. The Painted Word threatened to deflate hundreds of very lucrative careers. Both critics and artists worked symbiotically to accumulate great wealth with little effort. If Wolfe’s message had been heeded, art could’ve required more quality and effort to be taken seriously. Also, presumably the museum curators and rich collectors who bought expensive junk would’ve been ashamed to admit they’d been scammed.

Unfortunately, not much changed since Wolfe published it in 1975, and the problem is endemic among all types of cultural gatekeepers. (Need I mention the music industry and the literary scene?) The end result is that crap is celebrated. Woe betide anyone who can paint like Michelangelo but doesn’t want to do trendy stuff!

More from The Painted Word:

> In the beginning we got rid of nineteenth-century storybook realism. Then we got rid of representational objects. Then we got rid of the third dimension altogether and got really flat (Abstract Expressionism). Then we got rid of airiness, brushstrokes, most of the paint, and the last viruses of drawing and complicated designs (Hard Edge, Washington Field, Color School)…

Thus, novelty and self-indulgence became the supreme considerations as quality became increasingly unimportant, and painters dropped basic elements one by one with each fad.

This reduction is reminiscent of Aram Saroyan's memorable 1965 minimalist poem, featuring the word "Light" with the "gh" doubled. That's not the title; that's the whole poem, all one word of it. He got $500 from the NEA for that word; a decent chunk of change (adjusted for inflation, it would be about $3800 today). Many people found that a bit silly—including Ronald Reagan—but at least Saroyan didn't unveil a blank piece of paper and claim it was a poem.

Wolfe goes on though several other artistic fads, finally concluding with Conceptual Art:

> And there, at last, it was! No more realism, no more representational objects, no more lines, colors forms, and contours, no more pigments, no more brushstrokes, no more evocations, no more frames, walls, galleries, museums, no more gnawing at the tortured face of the god Flatness, no more audience required, just a "receiver" that may or may not be there at all, no more ego projected, just "the artist", in the third person, who may be anyone or no one at all, not even existence, for that got lost in the subjunctive mode…

If you suspect that might be an "Emperor's New Clothes" scam with mediocre artists laughing all the way to the bank, Robert Rauschenberg had a phase where he made paintings with a single color covering the entire picture. One example was just a blank canvas. This was the endpoint that Wolfe was writing about. Truly anyone who can't see the brilliance of this must be too unsophisticated to understand!

This has its parallel in music too, such as 4'33", a work in three movements composed by John Cage in 1952. Even if you're talentless or don't own a musical instrument, you too can perform this yourself. Just be silent for four minutes and thirty three seconds; that's the whole "song". Actually, he wasn't the first composer to come up with the idea. Hey, at least silence is better than most rap music!

Fame is an agreed-on social frame

In Beau Albrecht's classic "1". he contemplates the profoundness of existence. In "2", with great verve and passion, he symbolizes the rising of workers against capitalist oppression. Unfortunately, "3" is too rococo.

Surely you can do a painting like Robert Rauschenberg's one-color-everywhere style too—or his blank canvas masterpiece, of course—even without a scintilla of talent. Still, some have given lofty praise and waxed mystically about efforts like this. The difference is you probably won't make the kind of money Rauschenberg did from that! At some point, you wonder if it's all a big joke on the public.

Fame is sort of like Social Proof in the dating arena. You're a hot commodity if other people think you're hot. Wolfe described what he called the "Boho Dance". Basically, a would-be successful artist must strike a "to hell with the world" pose where he doesn't appear to care about fame and success. Once the Bohemian Bourgeois gets discovered, then he can drop the "starving artist" act and bask in the glowing reviews; it's all easy money from there. It's the "famous for being famous" concept.

It's a great racket, though getting discovered is no easy task. Only once some critic sings praises to your brilliance can you make a king's ransom. This is why you can't just toss paint onto a canvas and sell it for tens of thousands of dollars, like an original Jackson Pollock would cost. (If you happen to be an art critic, hit me up and we'll arrange a kickback meeting to discuss my artistic proposals, okay?) As you might suspect, many times Pollock's style has been imitated and passed off as a long-lost work of his; scientific testing of the materials discovers the fakery that the art critics couldn't.

Actually, I might flick paint colorfully on my living room floor one day, stripped down to bare concrete. If I get tired of it, I can always put down vinyl planks. Maybe in the distant future, some developer will pull up the flooring to install carpet. After discovering my bright splatters, I will be hailed a great artist the world never knew, and the developer will make a pile of loot from it. That assumes the economic bubble from all this hasn't burst by then. One day, a voice louder than Wolfe's might proclaim that the Emperor is naked, toppling the ivory tower.

Why is this popular?

"Remember when we sold my used chewing gum as a minimalist sculpture?"

As we can see, modern art is popular because the "right" people say so, even if the public is unenthusiastic about paying taxes for it or even looking at it. However, there's more to it than that. First, a little more history.

Things started hitting the skids about a hundred years ago. Art had been getting a little fuzzier with Impressionism and some other forms, which was still pretty good at that point. However, the First World War brought the beginnings of the Dada genre, which is about as weird as it gets: furry spoons, urinal sculptures, etc. Considering the world to have been shattered forever, Dada was light on talent and heavy on shock value. Sometimes the point was to get us to question "What is art?" A century later, that shtick is kind of worn out.

Since then, several other movements came and went, as Wolfe described. We're right back to shock value again, still beating this dead horse—for instance, "art" (often Federally funded) such as dunking a crucifix into urine, a naked man with a bullwhip coming from where the sun doesn't shine, or the Blessed Virgin Mary surrounded by smears of elephant poop. All that makes the colorful splotches of the 1960s seem pretty good by comparison.

These days, much alleged art is pretty dreadful. Disregarding all considerations of quality set us way back. How far back? Carvings and cave paintings by Neanderthals and Cro-Magnons were superior to the works of a number of well-paid "artists" today. Sometimes the public questions why stuff meant to offend their morals should be displayed in public. They have an even greater dislike for taxpayer funding of things meant to stick a thumb in their eye. Any suggestion of quality control causes shrieks about censorship from people who don't understand the difference between the government banning something versus not purchasing it.

The political angle

The Frankfurt School's Institute for Social Research, the birthplace of cultural Marxism

Now I'll digress about politics (you knew I would). It's unsurprising that cultural Marxists prefer art that's formless, lacking talent, and often even ugly. Taking the "everything is equal" meme as Holy Gospel, they won't see much difference between paint dribbles and an exquisitely beautiful Renaissance work that took months to create. In fact, they'll probably say the random splattering is better. They're good at getting everything completely wrong; fair is foul and foul is fair. I might add that the "chaos is good" meme applies too.

Still, not all leftists are hacks. For example, Socialist Realism was pretty good, especially compared to some of the train wrecks a museum might buy for a king's ransom. Sometimes the Soviets were more sensible than cultural Marxists. I'm not a fan of Communism, but I'll certainly give credit where it's due. An important point is that Socialist Realism actually is art. Someone crapping on stage (this actually happened) is only crap.

Digressing into music a bit, Theodor Adorno—one of the founders of cultural Marxism—had an odd taste that was both highbrow as well as desirous for a clashingly revolutionary style. If he turned up his nose at jazz, I wonder what he'd think about today's music? One must be careful what one wishes for! His Frankfurt School wanted to turn society upside down. They succeeded beyond their wildest dreams, and popular music reflects the zeitgeist they created. In any event, ugly and jarring art does tend to fit into the cultural Marxist theme of manipulating people to be perpetually discontent, as well as disconnecting us from our cultural heritage.

It's not just a leftist thing, either. Modern art was promoted by the CIA to show that the USA had a serious art scene. They didn't want to let the USSR's Socialist Realism steal the stage. What an odd agency the CIA is, which also promoted Gloria Steinem, and later smuggled cocaine through Mena, Arkansas during the War on Drugs. Did some of the top spooks drop acid left over from their MKULTRA experiments?

What are we to make of it?

This one tells a story, sets a mood, and good use of color too. It even looks like something.

Note that not all modern art is bad. Even if a painting is completely amorphous, perhaps the colors pop or there's something else stunning about it. There's a place for experimentation, and if it turns into something brilliant, why not?

Art Deco (which had a small revival in the 1990s) is slightly abstract, but that's not a problem; its stylistic verve gives it an edge. Kandinsky's style grew increasingly abstract over his career, but his use of color and geometry makes his art stand out from many of his peers. Antoni Gaudi is top notch. His avoidance of straight lines gives his architecture all a melty look, and it came out excellent. Not very many people have left that much of a lasting, positive mark on their city. Azerbaijan has a great modern art scene—with a colorful and inspiring style—though Baku is certainly far off the beaten path from the usual fine arts circuit.

Other than that, I'll give greater leeway for sculpture too. Having worked with sheet metal, I know that even putting together a box takes some doing, so fitting odd three-dimensional shapes together requires effort and at least some talent. Likewise does chipping away at stone. You can't say that much for throwing paint.

One important point is that modern art speaks to the subconscious mind, whereas representative art speaks to us much more directly. Still, there are distinctions of quality to be made, of course. Modern art isn't something to be feared. Instead, we should applaud the best efforts, and meanwhile let the spotlight shine on folk art too. So there you have it: reward the best, forget the rest.

There's a theory that, much like cyclical history, art has phases where it becomes increasingly abstract until it can hardly go further, then snaps back to a representative style. I'd say that the art scene has beaten this one to death by now. Perhaps we'll even reboot to a neoclassical revival. That should drive quality way up, since that style requires considerable talent. I'm one of those philistines who'd like to see more art that's uplifting and showcases technical skill. Beauty is a nice respite from daily drudgery.

During this turbulent time of change, we'll have to start setting up parallel institutions, and art can become one of them. Those of us with the time and talent can network and showcase our works online. Taking it to cyberspace, we don't need cultural gatekeepers to decide what's worthy to exhibit, or what we're supposed to think about a painting. Actually, this could be the beginning of something great.

Why Everything In The Blue Pill World Is A Lie

December 6, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Telling the masses of men to put women on a pedestal is obviously a blue pill myth, designed to create a nation of supplicating, subservient Beta males. Why would self-described benevolent leadership tell men to do such a thing?

Taking the red pill often leads us to realizations we'd rather not have to face as awakened men continuing our journey down the rabbit hole of reality. Rather than running away from those unpleasant truths about women and the world, we face them. This is the essence of science and masculinity—openness to new ideas and ruthless scrutiny of old ideas, leaving emotional considerations aside.

The older I get and more truth-seeking I do, and I suspect many ROK readers will agree, the more I find everything we are told to believe and told to be believe in by society and the power structure is a lie. Especially if it comes from the government, the edumacation system, or Establishment media. After all, we have government selling people slavery to protect them, the edumacation system teaching people how to be obedient and follow orders rather than how to think critically, and the Establishment media deceiving the masses with corporate-government propaganda for over 50 years.

Generally, the lies we hear on a day in and day out basis are designed to maintain control over the populace (the necessary illusions detailed by Reinhold Niebuhr) and to keep money moving around at a sufficient enough rate to keep the economy moving.

But, why is everything necessarily a lie? Enter the concept of Machiavellian intelligence. This concept goes to the very heart of the organization of human society.

> In cognitive science and evolutionary psychology, Machiavellian intelligence (also known as political intelligence or social intelligence) is the capacity of an entity to be in a successful political engagement with social groups.

"Men judge generally more by the eye than by the hand, for everyone can see and few can feel. Every one sees what you appear to be, few really know what you are." - Machiavelli

The concept sounds benign enough on the surface. But far from it, Machiavellian intelligence explains why the masses have been conditioned to love their own slavery, to defend the shepherds who enslave them, and now in the 21st century to hate Marxism while embracing Cultural Marxism—i.e. the gradual process of destroying all traditions, languages, religions, individuality, government, family, law and order in order to re-assemble society in the future as a Communist Utopia.

This benefits the Establishment and elite, of course, to the detriment of the well-being and happiness of the masses. The elite don't come out and tell the masses what their plans are for them or elucidate how much of their humanity has already been stripped of them. They provide illusions and myths to keep the "commoners" on course.

> Also known as Machiavellianism, it is the art of manipulation in which others are socially manipulated in a way that benefits the user.

Or, put in a more RealTalk sort of way:

> Machiavellian intelligence is a component of human intelligence thought to be rooted in the Darwinian selection value of using cunning, cooperation, and deceit to manipulate others.

At every level of society, one will find cunning, coerced cooperation, and deceit manipulating those who have not awakened to the horrors of the system being used to exploit them. We see cunning and deceit all around us, whether it be Hollyweird actresses playing the victim card to regain lost notoriety or politicians using these concepts to maintain their power and authority.

The Deceiver Or The Deceived

Law professions are based on cunning, deceit, and manipulation

What the concept of Machiavellian Intelligence boils down to is the fact humans have evolved to fall into one of two classes: the deceiver or the person being deceived. As explained in the excellent essay Machiavellian Intelligence: The Macro-Evolutionary Influence:

> Humans did not learn to be manipulative of one another at a particular point in history; instead, they have always been that way, even before the transition from apes to a society of hunting and gathering.

The bottom line is it was easier to lie to competing tribes and convince them there were no food or other resources on a particular tract of land than it was to spill blood defending those resources. Call it an adaptation that decreased violence but led to the creation of a blue pill class in human societies.

> If humans were not innately manipulative, they would have evolved to be completely reliant on physical strength; yet, that is not the micro-evolutionary path humans took. Physical dominance was not the only indication of leadership and power.

This adaptation also explains why weakling liars (i.e. Obama) often end up in positions of power rather than dominant Alpha males.

> Leadership also depended on coalitions and acquiescence by those who are being dominated. In the case of the chimps, it was not always the most physically fit chimp who was the Alpha male; rather, it was the best deceiver of the group. In hunter-gatherer societies, this political rule of nature allowed non-dominant individuals to operate against the dominant by forming groups to oust the leader.

The translation goes like this. The best liar and deceiver often ends up at the highest level of business or government, not the strongest and definitely not the most honest man. Even two thousand years ago Aristotle knew all politics were based on the ability to deceive. This is true whether in petty office politics or politics on the national stage.

Machiavellian intelligence is evolutionary baggage hardwired into our species. It allows a small cabal of ruthless liars to maintain control over billions by selling them on fantasies most of them will never truly realize – the “misplaced” American Dream.

This is why the Red Pill, truth-seeking men of the manosphere will always be marginalized and demonized by the Establishment. We are cutting into their game by telling the truth.

Schopenhauer knew innate human instincts to deceive were amplified in the female of the species

Equally important, but perhaps a topic for a separate article, human females are natural masters at Machiavellian intelligence. In other words, bitches gonna lie and deceive. It's what they do – even more so than the males of our species. Arthur Schopenhauer wrote:

> For as lions are furnished with claws and teeth, elephants with tusks, boars with fangs, bulls with horns, and the cuttlefish with its dark, inky fluid, so Nature has provided woman for her protection and defense with the faculty of dissimulation, and all the power which Nature has given to man in the form of bodily strength and reason has been conferred on woman in this form. Hence, dissimulation is innate in woman and almost as characteristic of the very stupid as of the clever. Accordingly, it is as natural for women to dissemble at every opportunity as it is for those animals to turn to their weapons when they are attacked; and they feel in doing so that in a certain measure they are only making use of their rights. Therefore a woman who is perfectly truthful and does not dissemble is perhaps an impossibility. This is why they see through dissimulation in others so easily; therefore it is not advisable to attempt it with them. From the fundamental defect that has been stated, and all that it involves, spring falseness, faithlessness, treachery, ungratefulness, and so on. In a court of justice women are more often found guilty of perjury than men. It is indeed to be generally questioned whether they should be allowed to take an oath at all. From time to time there are repeated cases everywhere of ladies, who want for nothing, secretly pocketing and taking away things from shop counters.

The Winona Ryder shoplifting incident certainly comes to mind with that closing sentence.

Incidentally, this is what makes the truth-telling mission of the manosphere such a noble venture. We are straying from the way humans have done business since the beginning by embarking on a mission to awake men rather than to deceive them.

Only time will tell if we are able to bring a higher standard to the world by encouraging them to see the nature of the cages and the series of human farms (religious, political, economic) they were born into.

Editor Of Newspaper That Accused ROK Of Being Pro-Rape Has Resigned For Sexual Harassment

December 6, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

The editor-in-chief of Fairfax Media's The Age, Mark Forbes, has resigned and apologized to a woman over a sexual harassment incident. This scandal comes only months after The Age and The Sydney Morning Herald falsely accused Return Of Kings and its proprietor of "promoting rape" and other forms of sexual assault. The Age, which covers Melbourne and the state of Victoria, is the sister Fairfax paper of The Sydney Morning Herald, which covers Sydney and the state of New South Wales. As a result, these publications significantly reproduce the same "stories," including the various defamatory articles about the ROK meet-ups earlier this year.

More shockingly still, The Herald Sun claims Fairfax knew about the allegations for two weeks, before eventually suspending Forbes only last week. Return Of Kings will be the first group of people to defend and actively campaign for due process, not hysteria, in determining sexual harassment or assault allegations. But Forbes' admission of responsibility in recent days raises the specter of Fairfax potentially knowing the exact details of the incident and doing nothing about it for days.

And it gets worse. The Guardian reports that a second woman has come forward, claiming that Forbes made comments about her breasts at a function earlier in the year. Inasmuch as this second accusation should require actual proof to be taken seriously and shouldn't be believed because of an initial admission about something else, Fairfax Media has brought this situation on itself. By constantly reiterating the fiction that rape, sexual assault, and sexual harassment are regular experiences for Western women, male Fairfax employees can hardly complain when amorphous, seemingly opportunistic allegations are made against them.

Let's remember that at the time of the alleged second incident, February 2016, Fairfax had already vilified Roosh and Return Of Kings, mostly for a satirical piece from the year before. It should have been keeping an eye on Mark Forbes, though, not denigrating an online website and obliquely attempting to incite violence against its owner and his family.

Ironically, it seems that Fairfax Media might have a "rape culture" dilemma, not Return Of Kings.

Hypocrisy much?

Stuart Washington's Sydney Morning Herald journalists and Fairfax's general journalism pool were given wide scope to publish all sorts of nonsense about Return Of Kings, but details of Mark Forbes' sexual harassment are being kept to a bare minimum.

Fairfax Media went into great detail and to great lengths in January and February to maliciously portray Return Of Kings as a supposed lightning rod for "legal rape advocates." Yet its accounts of the sexual misdeeds of its former Age editor-in-chief are decidedly sanitized. They do not mention, for example, that Forbes was alleged to have groped the buttocks of a female journalist, which is a lot more serious than the generic umbrella term of “sexual harassment.”

Compare this to the treatment Return Of Kings and Roosh received in early 2016. A satirical piece on personal responsibility, directly modeled on Jonathan Swift’s A Modest Proposal, was dissected hamfistedly by ideologically-driven Fairfax journalists and used to generate third-party threats of violence against men who only wanted to meet with other men for drinks. To add insult to injury, Fairfax publicly and effusively thanked Forbes for his thirty years of “service” after he admitted responsibility for the sexual harassment.

In large part, all the vitriol unleashed against Roosh and Return Of Kings in January and February started with columns penned by Fairfax journalists, such as the violence-inspiring Phoebe Moloney. Having read Moloney’s ridiculous piece, in which she underestimated the number of monthly ROK articles by nearly a hundred, a group of teenagers organized a Facebook event where participants would bring knives to a central Sydney Starbucks for the purpose of castrating ROK meet-up participants.

In light of this and other deplorable developments at this time, I wrote to Stuart Washington, managing editor of The Sydney Morning Herald, insisting that he correct numerous inaccuracies in Moloney’s piece in particular. In reply, he restated Fairfax’s unsupported allegations that we advocated “rape.” It is interesting to juxtapose Washington’s willingness to defend drivel written about us then with the apparent reticence of The Sydney Morning Herald now to have its reporters mention the exact nature of Forbes’ sexual harassment.

This is what happens when you churn out “listen and believe” articles about “sexual assault” all the time question or he didn't, but had to go anyway. I would not be surprised if the latter scenario is the true one. Resisting claims of sexual harassment in a workplace as notoriously leftist as Fairfax Media is often about as fruitful as having as a snow-shoveling business in central Australia. The Daily Life section of both The Age and The Sydney Morning Herald is the worst of all, combining incessant articles about "rape culture" with simultaneous attacks on women (regarding their fashion sense) and support for them (if they're fat and feminist).

In writing articles that emphasize "listen and believe" and/or acquiescing to them, male Fairfax employees are paradoxically opening themselves up to a maelstrom of false accusations. I do not feel sorry for these men, or sympathize with any fear they might feel in crossing their female colleagues in a professional setting. My overriding concern, however, is for the general society negatively impacted upon by claptrap such as polemics about "rape culture."

A retraction, let alone apology from Fairfax Media for how we were treated in early 2016 will not be forthcoming. All I can suggest is that Fairfax should be more focused on its own toxic workplace culture and the other Mark Forbeses it might be employing than the political and social non-violence that characterizes Return Of Kings.

Are Long Distance Relationships Possible?

December 6, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Jump4Love

Long-distance relationships are a common phenomenon today. Firstly, this is due to the popularity of online dating websites and apps that people use to find their potential partners. There are some happy remote daters who met online and have been keeping their relationship for several years. But if they have never met offline, it can be hardly called a real relationship, rather platonic love or friendship.

Sooner or later, an online relationship goes offline (if partners really want to be together). Secondly, this is due to the mobility of today's world. A new job or promising internship in another city or country makes couples deal with a long separation. These couples used to live under the same roof or at least, date regularly but now they are miles away. Keeping a long-distance relationship is a real challenge for partners. Lovers get 80% of information non-verbally. To put it another way, words are not as important as physical presence. There is an adage that only a real love can stand the test of a long-distance relationship. Separation makes true feelings even stronger and kills the weak ones. Anyway, if you believe that you can make your relationship work being geographically separated, here are some tips prepared by Russian Women from jump4love.com to help you.

1. Communicate as often as possible

Thanks to the technology, it’s not a problem to stay always connected. Phones, social media, chats, Skype – you can use all of them. Don’t be afraid to overdo it. While in real life it’s considered too much if a guy texts his woman from his office in the morning, chats with her online during lunch, and calls her on his way home, this is what a long-distance couple should do. You should stay the closest and the dearest people no matter how far away you’re from one another. And don’t even think to complain about the international calling rates.

2. Do something together

Since you can’t be physically near your partner, you can create an illusion of presence. For example, call your loved one while cycling in the park and comment on everything you see around you. Ask her to help you choose a new tie sending her photos from the fitting room. You can even set up an online cinema: start watching one and the same movie and comment on it via Skype. It may sound weird but you should do your best to create the effect of presence.

3. Learn to deal with misunderstandings

For many people, indirect communication (not face-to-face one) is hard because they need to see their interlocutor’s reactions to their words. Since a great part of your interaction will be in writing, you should be more cautious with words. Women tend to look for the subtext and hidden meanings in the text even if there isn’t any of that. If your significant other misinterprets your words and gets offended, don’t blame her for being a hysterical woman. She misunderstood you because you were unclear. Just accept it. How can you avoid those conflicts? First of all, make use of emoticons (don’t think it’s lame). Secondly, watch for any suspicious signs in her behavior: if she gets caustic or ignores your messages, call her immediately and ask what you did wrong. And thirdly, double check your message before clicking the “Send” button.

4. Surprise her

It’s important to keep romance alive being away from each other. Your woman should feel your care and attention. It doesn’t take a rocket scientist to order the flower delivery in her city. She’ll be pleasantly surprised and touched when she finds a bunch of flowers in her office. It’s important to give positive emotions no matter how far you’re. You can also send her a gift. If she mentioned that cute dress she saw in a magazine and you got the hint, buy it and have it delivered to her.

5. Plan your visit

Staying connected 24/7 is great but there is no substitute for a face-to-face communication. Grab every opportunity to visit your loved one. If suddenly you get two days off, go to your woman or agree to meet on a “neutral” territory. Your meetings will recharge your relationship. They are necessary to keep your passion alive. If you feel you can do without real-life visits, it seems that you’re failing the test.

US Government Goes Full Retard And Backs War Draft For Women

Recently, Congress has been trying to push a bill that would require women to register for the draft—could this be a preparation for a potential war with Russia? I don't know, but regardless, this event makes it clear just how far feminism has come.

I seriously doubt that this draft will actually be passed, but then again, when you consider that the elites are pulling the strings, they may actually manage to push it off. Then again, with Donald Trump in office, he'll probably just choose one of the 50 illegal vetoes that Obama used to prevent it from being enacted.

Despite its seeming ridiculousness, I actually believe that this will be a good thing—not women going to war, but an attempt at passing the draft. Clearly having women go to war will be horrible, but I highly doubt that it will get that far. Here's why:

The Elites Are Insulated

But actually, though

I believe that the elites are trying to pass this law, in order to further break apart the family unit and begin the process of permanently erasing gender roles and differences. But, despite their financial and political power, there's not a snowball's chance in hell that they can do this.

Put yourself in the shoes of an elite for a few moments. They live in posh mansions their entire lives, they've never gone grocery shopping, and anything that they could ever want is given to them on a silver platter (quite literally).

They've probably never frequented venues or public areas if the average net worth of people in the place is less than $5 million. In other words, they're basically in a bubble where everything is all perfect and dandy.

The entire day, they're being told about how their plans are going splendidly, they're on conference calls with George Soros talking about how much havoc BLM has caused, and they're sending letters to the CEO's of MSM on what next week's news will be.

This is why they think that America is so far gone, that if they push the "going to war is feminism!" propaganda, that it will go through. Every single reader of ROK should know that this is absolutely not going to happen.

Even the most die-hard feminist does NOT want to be drafted; she'll gladly tie her hair up into pig tails, twirl them innocently, and proclaim: "B-but you're a big strong man! I don't want them to hurt little old me!"

Again, the elites are too insulated to see this—they don't realize the massive backlash that this bill will cause, which brings me to my next point.

How The Media Will Try To Push This

Too bad Hillary lost.

The media's predictability is entirely laughable, and yet somehow, they seem to keep doubling down on their crumbling narrative. Expect headlines like the following to be blasted all over the news:

- "Beyoncé supports the female draft!"
- "Feminists fight for their country!"
- "She's fighting to protect her little girl."
- "Female brigade prepares to fight against sexist Putin, leader of Russia."

Regardless, the media hasn't learned anything from the past six months of trying to stop Donald Trump, so don't expect them to change anytime soon. Despite the obvious ridiculousness of what they'll be proclaiming, you can bet that they'll run their narrative into the ground.

This will only further bring about their demise, because obviously no woman in her right mind (even a feminist) wants to be drafted. This is the one thing that separates the men from the women: our ability to protect the tribe. As more and more people start seeing how controlled the media is, expect the alt-news to grow even more.

It Will Expose Feminism For What It Is

Ever since 2012, Return of Kings has been exposing modern feminism for what it is: a ruthless grab for power by greedy women with daddy issues. No, we're not talking about the right to work, vote, or own property—we're talking about modern feminism (it's called by many names).

Modern feminism has, and always will be, about giving more power to women and taking power away from men. This takes many forms:

- Economic power
- Social power
- Political power
- Physical power

At first, it was economic power—women simply wanted the right to work. Then, it moved onto political power, hence the 19th Amendment to the Constitution. These were both legitimate pursuits, but beyond this, it's all been a grab for power.

Despite women having a gigantic 3:1 advantage against men in STEM fields (due to gender quotas), the feminist media is STILL clamoring for more laws to be put in place regulating jobs. Women have always had more social power than men, but it's only become worse with the modern slut-glorification and vanity of women—and how men can't speak out against it, lest they lose their job.

And don't even get me started on divorce rape or domestic abuse disputes. Yes, clearly some men are abusive and belong in jail, but there's a huge amount of evidence showing that men are unfairly treated in these cases, even if a woman simply claims that he did something (despite being his girlfriend for 5 years).

So, it seems that in addition to having more social, economic, and political power than men, they even have more physical power over men by proxy of beta male white knights and police officers. Clearly it's time for a change.

It's War Time, Ladies!

This is what happens when you ignore gender differences

The massive amount of backlash that I expect this draft to receive will do two things:

1. Make women realize that they actually do need men for some things
2. Start pushing some men onto the red-pill journey, as they begin to see the hypocrisy of modern feminism

As this potential draft becomes more and more mainstream, it will also become the hot topic for casual banter, and will likely cause some heated debates. There's no way that every woman in the US won't know about this come New Year's Eve.

I believe that this will start to begin the process of unbrainwashing women. Yes, it isn't a lot, but it's definitely a huge jump in the right direction. Striking fear into the hearts of women all across the USA will make them realize just how much they appreciate men.

Expect primal masculinity to start making a comeback—as more and more women become terrified, and realize that they actually do need men to protect them, our culture will slowly start to value men more and more.

Particularly, high testosterone men that are capable of fighting, which is just what we need. It seems that sometimes the pendulum has to swing way too far to the left (modern feminism) before it comes back to sanity.

This, combined with Trump's presidency, will lead to a huge restoration of a society that's in line with biological differences within the next 8 years.

“Donald Trump is My Hero!”

This pathetic attempt at making a female draft the same as feminism, and riling up women to the point that they’re eager to get drafted, will only give Donald J. Trump a chance to be the savior of every single woman of America.

Imagine it: Breitbart, ROK, Info Wars, and all of the alt-news comes out with a massive headline: “President Trump Vetoes Female Draft!” How could a woman NOT love him for this?

Of course, the mainstream media will likely remain silent on this matter, or somehow try to blame Trump for the bill in the first place, but by this point it won’t even matter—the damage will have been done. Women will have lost their faith in “Daddy Government’s” best intentions, and they will have their faith restored in “Daddy Trump,” as Milo Yiannopoulos calls him.

By the time that Trump is in office, and has the chance to veto this ridiculous bill, the MSM will be even closer to death than it was before. As alternative news sites start gaining more and more political and social influence, expect the news that Trump is responsible for saving women to spread like wildfire.

Lessen Gender Tensions

Over the past several years, the media has been going full steam ahead, trying to portray every single man as a rapist. In fact, as others have noted, it's not uncommon to see posters all over college campuses, saying something like the following:

- "Susie and John had been drinking, and then they had sex. The next day, John was arrested for rape. DON'T LET IT HAPPEN TO YOU!"
- "Susie had a drink, and invited John back to her place. Little did John know, that was rape."
- "One in four women on this campus has been raped. Stay vigilant!"

Obviously this is complete propaganda, but despite this, it's been brainwashing young and impressionable college students to buy into the "all men are rapists," frame. The draft being vetoed, however, will begin the process of lessening this.

I believe that once Donald Trump vetoes the draft (which, I promise you, based off of his values, he will), women will feel a surge of relief, and some of them may start to realize that not all men are, in fact, rapists. Some are actually normal guys that are just trying to protect them.

As more and more men start to wake up and realize that feminism is a hypocrisy, and as more and more women start to question their conditioning, I believe that we will begin the process of transitioning us back to a normal, patriarchal society. We're on the path to victory, boys.

Why Rejection From A Hot Girl Isn’t Always The End

December 7, 2016 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A lot of game content concerns itself with rejections and rejection-handling. The assumption behind most of it is that pick-up is a binary activity—that you either pull the girl or you are rejected and that there is nothing in between. Most of the time this is the case. However, there are sometimes occasions when a brush off can mean “not now” rather than “never.” If you are looking to take your seduction skills to the next level it is important to learn to recognise these scenarios and play them to your advantage through “long game.”

Girls Who Rejected Me That I Later Slept With

Disclaimer: I didn’t actually sleep with Bar Rafaeli, but you get the idea

When I think back through my game career, a number of girls come to mind who rejected me at first, only to have sex with me at a later date. I’ll relate a couple of these anecdotes now.

The first concerns a stripper called Kelly who I met out at a club. Having seen her before at this particular event and admired her all-but perfect body, I approached her and introduced myself. However, it turned out she was with another guy who was hovering nearby. After I'd chatted to her for a moment or so (she was perfectly friendly) this guy came over and told me in no uncertain terms to get lost. An argument ensued when I told him to mind his own business. Later, I saw the girl alone at the bar and chatted to her again. She told me politely but firmly to "have a good night." I got the message and moved on to other targets.

A couple of weeks later, though, I saw Kelly again in another club. Undeterred by what had happened I approached her and chatted her up once more. This time she was more receptive. She was waiting for the guy but she had a little time—he wasn't here yet. This time we ended up making out and she gave me her phone number.

This presaged a season of "long game" where I pinged Kelly on WhatsApp from time to time, sometimes receiving an encouraging reply, sometimes getting no response at all. I kept up the cocky-funny messages periodically, though, while enjoying other girls in the meantime. Eventually, Kelly came through, agreeing to my suggestion of drinks. We met up on a Thursday evening and had one cocktail before going back to my place for a night of sex.

Another example of this same phenomenon is an ex-LTR of mine, Becky. I first met Becky when she was a student based at a University near to me in London. I'd cold approached her in the street, she'd given me her number and we had gone on a couple of dates. She had not, however, been prepared to come back to my place or otherwise move things forward. Again, there was a period of 'long game' where I pinged her from occasionally and she would reply. Finally, she invited me out to a party with her friends, which I attended. Later that evening we ended up in bed for the first time. We proceeded to date for over two years.

How To Tell If She Likes You Despite Rejecting You

The lesson from these two stories is that not all rejections are equal. Of course, most of the time when as girl holds her hand up in your face when you approach her in the bar it's a signal that she is not interested. However, there are other situations where a girl may turn you down 'for now', but would be willing to reconsider at a later date. The bad news is that it takes skill and experience to differentiate between the two. The good news is that it's not rocket science, and if you can get her contact details then you will at least have a chance of reigniting things later.

The anecdote above concerning Kelly is the more recent of the two. By that time my social awareness was very highly tuned, so I could tell almost by a sixth sense that she was interested in me even as she turned me down. It was, I think, revealed most strongly in the gentle way in which she told me to 'have a good night' at the first club. While it was certainly a brush off, her tone of voice intimated on a barely discernible level that she was slightly regretful all the same. But although I tried to number-close her that night, to be honest it was sheer luck that I bumped into her again later at another venue.

With Becky—well, I knew she was at least attracted to me since we had made out several times. But that in itself was no guarantee that she would eventually part with her underwear for me. But given that there was at least a small glimmer of hope I stayed in contact with her on social media while pursuing other conquests elsewhere.

Always Be Playing "Long Game" With A Select Few Girls

The very last thing I want to accomplish with this article is to encourage guys who are engaged in lengthy, oneitus-fuelled attempts to pull "that one special girl." That's not what I'm getting at here at all. As I've made clear, in the vast majority of cases if a girl makes it known that she is not interested in you then she is not interested, and you should next her and move onto a more receptive prospect.

That said, if you have a near-miss with a girl who you feel might be interested were it not for circumstances (a boyfriend, exams, living in a different timezone or whatever) then by all means keep hitting her up on social media periodically and trying your luck. You have nothing to lose and it could very well pay off.

My top tip here is to ensure that your messages remain brief, humorous and sexualised. Don't, whatever you do, fall into the trap of sending dull, vanilla missives about how she is doing, what's happening with your job, etc. No. Your aim is to remain on her radar as a fun, exciting sexual option so that when the right window presents itself (she gets dumped by her boyfriend, she visits your city for a business trip) then you will be the one she reaches out for first.

Whatever you do though, make sure that your long-game is practised in the background and doesn't get in the way of approaching fresh new prospects. Remember, the chances of a long-game prospect coming off are comparatively low, so keep filling your pipeline regardless. At the same time, if you sense that there is "unfinished business" between you and a girl you've met, it takes hardly any time to send her the odd flirty message, and you never know where things might lead.

10 Things I Learned From Driving A Moving Trailer Cross-Country

December 7, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

The world is a big place and sometimes you need to move to a different place than the one from which you started to pursue the life you want. With recently finishing a home renovation, it was time to put some furniture in the place, so I took an extended Thanksgiving holiday and hauled a truck full of stuff and a car on a trailer from where I grew up to my new home. If you want to move yourself, here's a few things I learned that might be able to help.

1. Shop around for the best deal

U-Haul’s vans have a few more pimp options than other companies, but that is really things that don’t matter too much, like lower deck height and over-the-cab storage. They are, however, much pricier. I went with Budget Truck and got my van and trailer for half the price with unlimited mileage, which was nice as I took the extra days my thousand-mile journey mandated (I did it in 1.5 days, but they insisted I take it for 5 days) and did a bonus run from Grandma’s of some other stuff.

2. Get just enough truck

Too small a truck means you cannot pack everything. Too large a truck means worse fuel mileage, but, more importantly, the bigger the truck is, the worse it will drive, and the bigger spaces it will require to turn, park, and fit through. I took a 16-foot truck, put a lawn mower, a canoe, 5 bookshelves, three cabinets, a giant office desk, a TV, a couple carburetors and a stuffed deer head in it and nothing was stacked, meaning that there was floor for everything. Going 3D with height is how you use space; you don’t need a 24-footer unless you are moving a whole house.

3. Skip Diesel

I know, diesels are awesome. They are; but their fuel is not everywhere, and these vans are not semis. The van I drove was a newer GMC van conversion with about 120k on the clock, and it had enough power and brakes to do the job. Gasoline engines will do it for you, just make sure that the vehicle is not tired out already.

Going through the hills of northern Alabama required us to pick up speed on the downhills to avoid having to drop into second gear and 40 mph at the top of the uphills; we didn’t want to do that after smelling some oil burning the first time it happened, and this van was still pretty new.

4. Check on that trailer

I hauled an old Ford van up for a restoration project, and it was fairly heavy. Check the brakes, the tire pressure, the lights, the safety chains and the hitch, everything. If you don’t know how to hook it up, ask the company employees at your rental place, and look up things on the internet. These trailers get a LOT of use, and some abuse, and they can and will fail.

5. Load carefully

Load the moving truck in such a way that your items will not shift or fall over during the ride. Bias your thinking towards braking; you can control how fast you take off, and how hard you take turns, but you might have to lock that big rig up to avoid running over some illegal in a shitbox that just cut you off, so make sure stuff won’t go forward. There are rails on the sides screwed to the ribs of the truck that make great anchor points to tie back to and loop around the load so the rope is already pulled taut.

I made big use of saran-wrap style mover's wrap; my stuff was from Walmart. It's a bitch to do, but, between that and some old sheets, I didn't get anything dinged. Don't kill yourself loading; these vans have a loading ramp that pulls out that you should use, but you should definitely get help (I bribed my brother), and take breaks as often as you need. Lift properly, and take as much time as you need, because it's better to be slightly late than injured and really late.

6. Put the car on the trailer carefully and correctly

This van is a fairly normal sized vehicle, but it was at the max width of the ramps and just a little shy of the max of the trailer, so we lined it up really carefully, got it on, and left it there until the trip was done. Remember the primary rule of trailering; you need the load in front of the axles, not on them or behind. That means "engine forward."

Although the trailer guide said we would have one with multiple chains, we got one with two latticed webbed nylon straps on winches for the front tires, and safety chains for the front and rear of the frame. We did bring extra straps, but didn't end up using them, other than a small bright spot where a chain rubbed on a bump and the suspension bounced, there was no effect on the vehicle.

7. Check everything a lot

This trailer failed, but were the safety cables even hooked up?

Towing gurus say to check things in an increasing increment. Go to the end of your road, check everything. Go a few miles, check again. Go 20 or so, check again, then check each time you stop thereafter.

You want to check the straps and chains holding the vehicle down for tension and problems. If the car has not moved, that’s a good sign; mine did not move other than my straps got some slack in the rain during the overnight, and I ratcheted them down two clicks in the AM. Check tire condition and pressure. We rubbed a tire on a curb and gouged it while parking at an overnight hotel. I saw it, called the fleet service Budget contracted, and had a guy come replace the tire in the hotel lot the next morning. No muss, no fuss, but I saw that tire at night in a storm, and was able to maintain schedule because of proper vigilance, even though they may still try to give me the butt-sex on an extra bill here soon, I suspect.

Check your lights on the tow vehicle and the trailer. My running lights on the trailer did not work, and, although it was a very easy fix (the moving van uses spring clips to hold the pigtail’s connections in; just adjust the clip), we could have been running without running lights. Fire it up, get your moving buddy to stand back there, check brakes, hazards, turn signals, and running lights.

8. Drive Carefully

Don’t be this guy.

My moving van with a medium load and a heavy trailer and payload drove like a pig. Even though it was loaded properly, the combined 5500 lbs of the trailer made the van wallow a bit in steering, the brakes were functional but not impressive, and the merest suggestion of acceleration required at least one downshift. We cruised at 60, topped out at 65 a few times, and were the slowest thing on 7 interstates.

You can and will kill yourselves and others if you fuck up. These vans do not require commercial driver’s licenses, but they do require some sense. Leave plenty of room in front of you, take any corners really wide because of your trailer tracking inboard of you, and remember to slow down if in doubt, and never put yourself in a situation to have to back up.

9. Plan your route

Turn wide with a trailer

I GPSed the damn hotel and we still hit a tire on a curb. Know your route. Have your co-pilot have his map, and he should be telling you which lane to be in, and advising you about oncoming traffic to the right. Pack your lunches and coolers; the only time you should be getting off the road is to piss and stretch or get gas. Interstate rest stops are freebies; no traffic lights, no turns, and you can park in giant, pull through, semi truck spaces.

Truck stops are also awesome. You don't need to use the semi-truck diesel side, but the car-gasoline pumps are usually laid out better as the places are bigger, plus they have nicer bathrooms and usually have fast food joints attached. Look for gas stations on the right of your route, and try to visually spot them before taking the exit so you ensure you will have easy turns and not much of a detour, respectively.

10. Pace yourself

It's dangerous to drive at night or in inclement weather or when you are overly tired in a big vehicle. Our first leg was 600 miles with a 5:30am start and a 8 pm stop with only stops for gas and bathrooms. The non-interstate portion slowed us down and rush hour in Birmingham is intense. We were tired, it was starting to rain, and it was hours after dark. Although we reaped the reward with more time to unload the next day, it was near the limit of what we should have done.

Make sure your insurance company covers moving vans or take the optional insurance.

Conclusion

Road trips with family and friends are always good, even though this vehicle was a pain. You can indeed move yourself for not much money, but it will be on your time, your back, and your gasoline. Everyone should drive a large vehicle, preferably towing something, at least once in their life to experience a whole new set of driving skills. I had done towing and moving before, but this was a good refresher. Be safe, slow down, and plan every turn way ahead of time.

7 Criteria A Girl Should Pass To Enter A Relationship With You

December 7, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I'm going to let you in on a little secret. Well, more of a hunch–but keep reading, and see if you agree with me.

HUNCH 1: Most men do not start to learn game so that they can bang hundreds of girls.

HUNCH 2: Most men start to learn game because they want a girlfriend.

HUNCH 3: Sometimes, men get really good at game and then end up banging lots of girls.

FINAL HUNCH: Often times, that desire for a girlfriend resurfaces, or just never went away.

There's nothing wrong with relationships. But, many men are now are very "anti-relationship," and I see why. It's because most girls are not worthy of a dinner out, much less a commitment. If you want something serious, you have to learn how to screen girls and be ruthless about it.

The few that are worthy of it are often taken. Those girls who are not worthy of it need to be screened out and moved aside. Sure, keep them around as casual flings.

But a relationship? Something you invest your time, energy, money, and soul into? Only a very select girls are worthy of that. And yes, you are far more likely to find this kind of girl in a place like Russia than you are in the West. However, it's important to remember that game is universal. Learning how to screen a girl properly, before you get sucked into an LTR with her, is one of the most important skills a man can have.

1. Evaluate Her Feminine Side

This is a broad subject, so let's start here. Generally speaking, the more feminine a girl, the higher quality she will be. You will get along better with her—this assumes that you're a masculine and confident fella.

Does she rest her head on your shoulder and look up to you? Are you her pillar of strength? Feminine girls are by nature, more fragile. This does not mean high-maintenance. A feminine girl derives her strength from your presence. Just being in your arms makes her feel safe and secure, no matter how rotten her day has been.

A girl who chooses to be in a sour mood over her bad day, and pushes it off on you, is not a feminine girl. A feminine girl looks merely for your presence for her comfort.

2. Her Domestic Skills

Does she cook?

Does she clean?

Those are signs of wanting to please you, as well as unselfishness–both of which are positive. However, not all girls have these skills–and that's okay. Perhaps their moms were masculine ball-busters who failed to show them a feminine side. However, if she knows that you appreciate those kind of domestic skills and then makes the effort to learn them, then you may have one worth keeping around.

When it comes to how to screen a girl, her domestic skills often go hand-in-hand with how feminine she is (see #1).

Most men will be far happier in life building a business, making decisions, and dealing with the "manly stuff" of the house (changing oil, mowing lawns, etc.). Leave the kitchen and cleaning to the ladies.

If she's happy with that arrangement, everybody wins.

3. The Way She Looks At You

Admittedly, this requires you to have a reasonable amount of past experiences with girls.

But think back to past relationships, or casual flings. There is often a feeling of just going through the motions–when those girls look at you, it's just normal. A girl who is falling in love with you and is a high-quality girl simply has this look and glow in her eyes every time she sees you. It's a mix of passion, respect, and well—love.

It should feel like a bit like there is just you two and no one else in the world. It's very difficult to explain, but when you see it, you'll know.

It's simple: many girls today are simply unable to bond. Especially in the West (not so much when you venture to other places). The copious amount of dick they have taken in their life have rendered them against this. Their "new" nature stops them from giving you "that look".

They are simply not able to feel something so deep. But when you see it, you'll know you have a quality girl on your hands.

4. What Do Your Friends Think Of Her Personality?

If other men are impressed with your girl from a personality standpoint, you are heading in the right direction. All friends are going to tell you if your girl is hot (assuming she is), but if they rave about who she is at a person, it's gold.

Bring her around your friends and see how she acts.

Needless to say, if she gets hammered drunk and shamelessly flirts with them, that's your sign. However, if she's able to keep a conversation going, say a few clever things, and doesn't cave to the social pressure—you can feel good about your choice. If they scream that she's a gold digger and a red flag, listen to your friends. They'll usually be correct.

5. What Are Her Interests And Hobbies?

I'll make this one real simple.

A girl who is passionate about having tequila shots done out of her belly button is probably not a high-quality girl you want to get in an LTR with.

A girl who is passionate about feminist rights and marches in protest with her tits hanging out is not a girl you want to get in an LTR with.

A girl who is passionate about twerking to rap and hip-hop music is probably not a girl you want to get in an LTR with.

So what hobbies are good?

It's important not to throw a blanket statement on this one.

Generally speaking, hobbies that are superior alternatives to the ones above include: reading, artsy stuff (painting, poetry, writing, singing, knitting), cooking or baking, fitness activities, nature, animals (a genuine love for them, not activating for PETA), or simply spending lots of time with her family.

As a side note, tread carefully with the girls who claim to have masculine hobbies like watching football. For whatever reason, there's usually something a bit "off" with them. It's still a better alternative to tequila belly shots.

6. Her Family

This one is real easy, simply observe her family. Are they a traditional family unit like you'd find in a place like Ukraine, or a new modern-age bunch?

What are her parents like–does her mom walk all over her dad? Does she have a healthy respect for her father, or is she reeling in daddy issues? It should be noted that, especially with younger girls, she may not "like" her dad (at times). The respect is the most important part.

The funny thing is that this is probably the easiest way to screen a girl of them all. But so many men ignore the giant sign that says, "ENTER WITH EXTREME CAUTION."

If she shit-talks her dad, or worse–has no relationship at all with him–it's almost always safe to assume that she's going to have some issues, and probably isn't a girl who is worthy of an LTR with you.

7. How Does She Stack Up?

Remember what I wrote in the beginning of this article?

> HUNCH: Most men do not start to learn Game so that they can bang hundreds of girls.
> HUNCH: Most men start to learn Game because they want a girlfriend.
> HUNCH: Sometimes, men get really good at Game and then end up banging lots of girls (that's more or less my story, heh).
> FINAL HUNCH: Often times, that desire for a girlfriend resurfaces, or just never went away.

Assuming you have gone on the path of learning Game and still want a girlfriend–simply ask yourself how she compares to the other girls that you're either dating or have dated.

Now, if your past includes a stripper and a heroin addict, then that's not a fair measuring stick. You can't screen her based off of her being higher quality than them. However, assuming you have dated a couple of normal girls, ask yourself who the cream of the crop is. Does the one you're screening go above and beyond what the rest of them do?

Does she meet the criteria laid out in this article?

If not, it may be time to say goodbye. Remember that the eyes don't lie.

“Rogue One: A Star Wars Story” Promises To Be An SJW Sermon Against White Males

December 8, 2016 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

To be truthful, I was unconsciously looking forward to “Rogue One.” I say “unconscious” because what handful of trailers I saw of it did pique my interest, but movies, and particularly Star Wars, have been so heavily imbued with politics I’ve been conditioned to tune them out completely. Ergo, it takes a really good trailer, full of action, X-Wings, Death Stars, and AT-AT’s to pierce this conditioning and get me to take note.

While Rogue One’s trailers did manage to achieve this, I also unconsciously noted that the heroes had more colors than a rainbow. And when this observation was combined with my previous knowledge of how Hollywood, and particularly Star Wars, was going to force a PC narrative into their movies, Rogue One went back on the “meh” list of movies I’ll probably never get around to watching.

Enter Brett White.

If the multi-ethnic, multi-color Reading-Rainbow-Rebel heroes of Rogue One (headed up by a “strong-independent woman™”, BTW) wasn’t a clue as to how there was going to be a political lecture, a blatant statement by one of Rogue One’s writers, Brett White, was:

> When I look at the ‘Rogue One’ trailers, I see what I want from America. I see a multicultural group standing strong together led by a rebellious and courageous woman. That’s what we are working towards, and what we will continue to work towards no matter what. That’s what America – a land created as a haven for the persecuted, to be able to realize their limitless dreams – was created to be.

Of course, you cannot hold responsible the score of writers and hundreds of employees working on Rogue One for the statements of just one of their writers. Additionally, one low-ranking writer’s political opinion about a movie, does not mean the movie will be political. But when two more (higher-ranked) writers condoned White’s statement, and further hinted that The Empire was a white supremacist organization, you knew Rogue One was going to be (yet another) SJW sermon against “evil” white males and the merits of women and minorities because…uhhhh…”vagina” and melanin.

Now I don't know about you, but I certainly get my fill of politics during the normal course of a week. It's part of my job, it's part of my hobby, not to mention, politics is forced in front of everyone everywhere be it social media, traditional media, your friends, or literature. Combine this with a mind-numbing job, a taxing commute, and the toils of everyday life, the absolute last thing people need in their few and precious moments of entertainment and fun is politics. You would think providers of entertainment and fun would know this, and would be smart enough to leave politics out of it, much like a Thanksgiving dinner. But they don't. They insist on forcing it down the audience's throat, almost as if they're compelled by some other, ulterior force, all while risking alienating people with their politics.

Why?

The answer to that lies in a combination of writers like Brett White and Star Wars itself.

Modern Art

Modern art is a phenomenon in society where the cart has been put before the horse. Traditionally art was made to be appealing to society and the market (it was something people wanted). This ensured that what art was made was of high quality, in demand, of good taste, and also ensured what we would see in public (paintings, murals, buildings, architecture, landscaping, statues, etc.) would be beautiful. But making good art requires talent. It also takes labor, toil, practice, failure, enduring, thought, contemplation, and work. So if you were going to become a successful artist you would have to really put forth your heart, soul, effort, toil, blood, sweat and tears into this passion.

Sadly, all of that is antithetical to being a leftist. Leftists, SJW's, liberals, democrats, and other varied forms of socialists are PRIMARILY DEFINED by their laziness and crippling fear of real work. But they are also egotists which means they don't care whether they have the ability, talent, determination, or work ethic required to become great artists. They simply insist on becoming artists. These two presumably mutually exclusive positions would result in something having to give. Either the leftist would have to put forth the toil and effort to make great art, or give up on art altogether and pursue another field.

However, the ego of a leftist is more powerful than reality, and so what has happened is leftists have redefined what makes good art, putting the cart before the horse. Specifically, art is no longer about whether you created something that is genuinely artistic or beautiful, but the political message it conveys. This is why nearly all modern art is completely shit, but there is ALWAYS a "political message" that leans to the left attached to them (and this is not speculation or conjecture on my part, just look it up. Go to any art museum today and see if there isn't a political message jammed down your throat). It is this messages that allows the lazy and talentless to become "artists" (in their minds anyway) without having to put forth the effort to actually become one.

Understand Brett White (and what I would speculate to be the majority of writers for Rogue One) are talentless hacks substituting politics in for their laziness and genuine lack of artistic skill. This is further reinforced in that the real work, the real heavy lifting for Rogue One has already been done in that it is simply a remake of George Lucas' original work.

In my latest podcast I aliken this to Gordon Ramsey creating a masterpiece dish using his own recipe, but then Brett White comes in, adds some ~~vagina~~ parsley garnish to the side, and claims it as his own. This is even worse than what's going on in today's modern art world in that usually you have to make a shitty piece of art and stand by it as you attach some leftist political message to it. But the Brett Whites of the world aren't even doing that. They're taking other people's templates and attaching their shitty (and tiring) anti-white male leftist political message to them. But the larger point is to realize this is why politics are constantly forced into movies where they don't belong – these leftists' egos and fear of real work are stronger and more important to them than your enjoyment and entertainment. And they're going ruin it for you whether you like it or not.

Brett Is Merely A Microcosm Of Hollywood

We can pick on Brett all we want (and I will because I and about 60 million other white males are done being accused of evil because of "melanin and penis" by talentless, worthless people like him), but Brett and Rogue One's anti-white male politics is merely Hollywood's confession that they are plumb out of talent, intelligence, originality, innovation or ability. They are so incapable of coming up with new ideas that, like a talentless trustfund baby minimalist artist, their only idea is to "add leftist/racist politics" to an already existing work of art. It's nothing more than an inferior scumbag "tagging" the Mona Lisa with political-graffiti because they lack the real talent to make something as great as the original. And it's proven by all the remakes, reboots, and sequels Hollywood is making.

Of course, ironically, because the original dish of Star Wars was so good, the mindless sheeple of America, particularly white males, will show up in droves to be lectured about their cardinal sin of being born white and male. Hollywood, leftist pundits, and no doubt the writers themselves will erroneously view this as vindication of their political message, and double down on the anti-white male/pro-leftist formula for their next movie. But for you “conservative” and “libertarian” keyboard warriors who were all pro-Trump, and adamant about replacing diversity with meritocracy and “making America great again,” we’ll see if you can actually make a huge sacrifice and forego watching Rogue One. Because if your addiction to Starbucks and Apple products is any indication I’m predicting you cucks will gladly line up, bend over, and let Hollywood fuck you one more time up the ass because

“but but but….it’s STAR WARS!”

CORRECTION

It has come to my attention that Brett White is NOT indeed a writer for the Star Wars film, just merely a writer cited in the article writing about Star Wars. I wanted to make this clarification, but still do not believe (due to the tacit endorsement from actual writers in Rogue One) this changes the fundamental point of the article. I will reconsider my thoughts if it turns out the Evil Empire in “Rogue One” is chock full of an equivalent amount of minorities and women and does NOT portray the evil empire as a white male organization…which I’m absolutely sure they will in an honest application of diversity to both heroes and criminals alike.

5 Excellent Retirement Countries For Masculine Men

December 8, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

The recent election of Donald Trump has given a renewed sense of hope for the reemergence of traditional masculinity in the United States, and across the western world for that matter. Rather than "Going Galt" to an unnamed non English speaking country as early as possible, red pill men are feeling compelled to remain, fight back, and make their home nations great again.

This is a wonderful development and I encourage and applaud such behavior. However, this does not change the fact that many of us will want to enjoy our later years in much warmer, relaxed, and affordable locales than many of the countries we originally hail from. It is only in human nature (or even survival if money is relatively tight), and the following five countries are very good choices for more conservative leaning men who are over 50.

Thailand

While many would argue it is too overrun with Westerners, Thailand is a perennially popular destination with retirees for a reason. It is “3rd world” to a very high standard (health care, infrastructure, food selection, street cleanliness and internet speeds are by and large good) and costs are very low when you simply aren’t being involved in any mass tourism activities.

The affordability, delicious food, massages ($6 USD for a one hour Thai massage), relative ease of English-speaking services, and year round warm weather are worth the price of admission alone for many older men, especially from super feminist and heavily overpriced Australia. Lots of Scandinavian men also have an affinity with Thailand for similar reasons.

Key drawbacks of the country are the fact that you will never truly fit in with the local culture (you are little more than a walking and breathing ATM), the shaky political scenarios the country is prone to, and the large amount of scumbag tourists passing through every week. Oh and that whole ladyboy culture as well. Gross.

Malaysia

Malaysia (specifically peninsular Malaysia) is a somewhat more overlooked option in Southeast Asia. This is primarily due to it's modestly higher costs compared to Thailand, along with it's Muslim-dominated government which slaps a giant tax on alcoholic beverages.

Nonetheless, Malaysia (and specifically Kuala Lumpur and Penang) is becoming a good choice for retirement due to it's high standard of health care and infrastructure, warm weather, food choices, relatively low cost of living, strong English language skills, and the fact that the country does not draw any of the degenerate yahoo tourists which infect neighboring Thailand with the never-ending street puking and aura of sexual sleaze.

For single men, the quality of Indian-Malaysian women or Chinese-Malaysian women isn't too shabby in places like Kuala Lumpur or Penang either. (Some people like to give the false impression that you can't get laid in this country at all.)

The chief drawbacks of the country for older men are having to live under the clutch of Islam, the high prices of alcohol they enforce, and massage and spa services cost somewhere between two to three times as much as Thailand. However, especially in cosmopolitan Kuala Lumpur and Penang, the Islamic influence is very modest, and there are plenty of opportunities to date the large number of infidels which reside there.

Uruguay

"You are gay" jokes aside, the small nation of Uruguay is a peaceful gem in an otherwise relatively dangerous continent. The country is borderline 1st world, has a stable currency, is not crowded, has decent beaches, and is far removed from many of the most pressing issues in the world (mass migrations, West vs. Islam, etc).

Meanwhile, the women (while somewhat difficult) are quite attractive, and you can smoke all the marijuana to your hearts (and lungs) desire without any fears of criminal punishment. Life here is just very relaxed, very simple, and far removed from the degeneracy of the English-speaking world.

If life here just seems too simple at times, then wild Buenos Aires is just over the River Plate. The southern states of Brazil are also a relatively short drive away if you need a more bustling change of scenery from time to time.

Drawbacks to Uruguay include it's relative expense (less than Brazil, but one of the highest in Latin America), left-leaning politics, potential boredom / death-by-mate, and how Montevideo doesn't have a large number of direct flights outside of South America. However, many would argue that the countries semi-isolation helps keep it from being overly inundated with tourists. Thus better maintaining it's natural character.

Mexico

You've got lots of places to go

Mexico has plenty of attractive and well-maintained spots to enjoy one's golden years at half the cost of the United States (or twice the luxury).

Thankfully, Americans in particular have been so browbeaten by the lying mainstream media that the entire country is "dangerous" (it's mainly just the border regions and a few other isolated areas), so only a relatively tiny portion of the more red pilled segment of the population takes the plunge.

The manosphere-friendly author Fred Reed for instance, maintains residence in the beautiful town of Ajijic, Chapala which enjoys a year round average temperature of 22 degrees celsius.

Simply put, you can enjoy San Diego weather in this country at a fraction of the price compared to the US. Additionally, many Western passport holders also get a whopping 180 days visa-free entry, just in case you want to give the retirement life a test run down the line.

Drawbacks to Mexico include it's (somewhat) more edgy character, the rather tepid treatment of gringos compared to other Latin American countries, the huge infiltration of U.S.-style strip malls filled with Wal-Mart, and having your ears blasted by Mariachi. Nevertheless, Mexico rocks, and it's not nearly as underdeveloped or dysfunctional as you might think.

Spain

A great shining beacon on the old continent. Warm weather, beautiful women, friendly locals, modest prices, well-maintained infrastructure, incredibly rich history, and an approachable language make Spain arguably the best country to just kick back in Europe for your later years.

It's very close proximity for British, Irish, and other northern European nationalities gives it a fantastic edge, and monthly expenditures in the country can easily be cut in half (or more) compared to the Germanic and Celtic nations.

Drawbacks to Spain include the very huge volume of tourists and expats in many parts of the country, the relatively high degree of feminism (but nothing like Scandinavia), and the fact that well…. it's still Europe. Things aren't going to be nearly as cheap as Southeast Asia.

Conclusion

Why did you forget about us?

Some people may now be saying, why no Colombia, Brazil, Ukraine, or the Philippines etc? Why did you leave out my favorite “poosy paradise”? Well please remember that this article was intended for men over 50 in mind.

In Brazil, you are just not going to be picking up your dream-girl beach bunny on the Praia or on Tinder when you are increasingly putting on years, and the crime rate, corruption, high taxes, and expense of the country is just not the type of retirement that most men aspire to. English and Spanish will only get you so far there as well.

Ukraine is too cold, corrupt, unstable, and has far too difficult a local language.

Colombia is nice and is constantly on the improve. However it seems that Medellin is the only place that expatriates want to go (for the weather and the women), and I believe the place highly risks being overrun by Americans in a similar manner to Costa Rica or the Mexican Riviera. It will get increasingly more expensive and a less genuine experience as the years and decades pass.

The Philippines is a logistics nightmare, has poor infrastructure, and has terrible internet and terrible food. However, the latter two things could be improved upon tremendously at any time. For now, it still best serves as a potential wife-hunting destination and not for long-term residence. That’s all, thank you. Oh and learn Spanish if you haven’t already. It’ll come in handy.

Why You Should Avoid The Cucked Interpretations Of Modern Christianity

December 8, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Last week my colleague Donovan Sharpe published an article entitled A Red Pill Perspective On The Existence Of God. The article is a meditation on how belief in God, specifically from a Christian perspective, can be sustained in light of neomasculine philosophy. The topic is infinitely important for our lives so Donovan's article deserves an intelligent response. Here is my attempt.

Modern Christianity is weak, cucked, and often plain wrong

Modern Christianity has watered down the message of Christ in many ways. Donovan mentions one of them: The "God has a wonderful plan for your life" slogan. This slogan was developed by Bill Bright who founded the Campus Crusade for Christ in the 1950s. Bright tried to boil down the Christian gospel to an easy-to-present plan to facilitate making converts.

The problem with the "God has a wonderful plan" slogan is that it is patently untrue.

Traditional Christianity teaches that God does indeed have a plan for our lives, but that it might not be what we consider wonderful. The Twelve Apostles did not have wonderful lives. They were poor and persecuted during their lives and were martyred for their belief. Other saints through the ages experienced every sort of deprivation. If we wanted to develop a more accurate slogan for Christianity it might be: “God wants you to be with him eternally. Your life here may or may not be that great.”

This message that God promises people a wonderful life has had a deep impact on the lives of many modern Christians. It is a message that fits perfectly with our hedonistic culture that puts pleasure above duty. Christian couples forego having children so they can travel or drive luxury cars. Lukewarm Christian women divorce perfectly good husbands in pursuit of the Prince Charming they think they deserve. Bishops and pastors preach only those parts of the gospel that make them popular with the secular culture.

Modern Christianity is also compromised in other ways. Rather than standing against the culture, Christian churches have tried to accommodate as much of the culture as possible. Some denominations have embraced Christian feminism, push for left wing social causes such as open borders, and bless gay marriages. For that reason, if you want to learn what real Christianity is, you will have to ignore recent teaching in favor of the past. A good rule of thumb is to simply avoid reading Christian material written after 1900. Listen to your Sunday Sermon but take it with a grain of salt.

But does it work?

Christianity is not the easy path.

Donovan’s article is written from a practical perspective: Does it benefit red-pill men? Here is my personal take on whether Christianity is helpful. To begin, the only reason to become a Christian is if you happen to believe it is true. If you believe it to be true, you have no choice. There are times when I wish Christianity wasn’t true because it makes me uncomfortable. That said, there are both advantages and disadvantages to Christianity.

The biggest disadvantage of Christianity is that it cramps one’s style. For men, the biggest hit comes in the form of sexual morality: you can only have sex with your wife. And you can’t divorce her. No fapping, no polygamy, and no concubines. If you are a PUA, becoming a Christian will end your pick-up career. That said, Christian morality, even sexual morality, is conducive to success in life.

As for advantages, I believe my life is better than it would have been had a remained an agnostic. I happen to like being married. Fathering children has been the greatest joy in my life and I can't imagine doing it outside of marriage. Being a Christian was what made me realize that there was something very wrong with modern culture. I attribute becoming red-pilled to reading older Christian books. I have not found that Christianity leads to becoming a beta cuck. On the contrary, it is a call to be a man fully alive.

But ultimately, Christianity is not about earthly benefits. G.K. Chesterton was once asked why he had become a Christian and he responded, "To have my sins forgiven." Christianity promises more than just heaven to believers: It promises nothing less than divine sonship—to be a son of God. The divine adoption of a Christian is not something that starts in the future, although it will receive its fulfillment there. It begins in the here and now. If becoming a son of God is not a good enough reason to become a Christian, I don't know what is.

Islam and Women

Radical Muslim Tashfeen Malik led her beta husband to commit terrorism.

Donovan ends his article with the observation that Islam appears to do a much better job at dealing with women than Christianity. From an external point of view, this does indeed seem to be the case. In an Islamic society, women are forbidden from doing many things such as voting or driving. They also must not be seen in public without some type of covering. We might imagine that women in Islamic society are loving and obedient to their fathers and husbands. In my experience this romantic view of life under Islam is a myth.

While I was in college I had several Muslim friends so I was able to observe some differences between Islam and Christianity. Jesus laid great emphasis on interior disposition. He criticized the Pharisees for being obedient to the letter of the law, but not its spirit. For example, Jesus taught that it was not only wrong to commit adultery physically, but that one must also refrain from lustful thoughts. Serious Christians, therefore, make an effort not just to appear to be good on the outside, but to be good in their hearts.

Islam, on the other hand, appears to be a religion that is very much devoted to external forms. As long as you obey the letter of the law, you are bound for paradise. This is why the 9-11 hijackers saw no discrepancy between visiting a strip club before they flew planes into the World Trade Center. This legalistic attitude played a big role in the Muslim girls I knew. While they were technically virgins in that they still had a hymen, they were very promiscuous in every possible way that did not violate their virginity. These Muslim girls also tended to be very materialistic. All those hijabs in Saks and Barney's are not just window shopping. And even the perception of obedience seemed to be a myth: Muslim women can be very demanding of their husbands. I will caveat my observations by noting that my sample size was very limited. I'm certain that some Muslims do interiorize their faith, but I didn't witness that.

In contrast, devout Christian girls, while not perfect, are the real McCoy. If they are virgins (yes, they exist), they are more likely to be actual virgins, not just technically. While all girls like nice things Christian girls are less materialistic than non-Christians. And Christian women tend to be loving and faithful wives and excellent mothers. The only bad thing I can say about the Christian women that I know is that there are so few of them. They are usually the result of being raised in deeply Christian households. But the rarity of Christian girls is not a flaw in Christianity, but a deficiency of Christian leaders who have watered down the teachings of Christ to fit in with the wider culture.

Conclusion

We live in a post-Christian civilization. Most people who call themselves Christians, including many ministers and priests, have a weak faith that shrinks under the slightest opposition.It is natural that masculine men reject this flaccid philosophy. But true Christianity is anything but weak. If you are going to give Christianity a try, make sure it is the genuine article and not a modern day fake.

4 More Hollywood Films For Men That Leave Today's SJW Movies In The Dust

December 8, 2016 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Your old Uncle Bob tries to mix things up whenever and wherever possible, so today we're going to take a look at four RPO films for men that might have slipped under the average guy's radar, especially in the case of you younger squires.

Each of these winning films is definitely worth a look, as they not only entertain, but also provide you with a solid glimpse of some vital solutions surrounding the tantalizing mysteries of life. In addition, they sure as hell are fun to watch – which is always a plus, especially when it comes to spending your precious time and money watching Hollywood movies.

So without making an even bigger fuss about it, let's get down to brass tacks and find out why these four, lesser-known, highly entertaining, RPO films for men are eminently worth your time – and then some.

1. City of Industry (1997 – Harvey Keitel, Timothy Hutton, Stephen Dorff, Famke Janssen)

In this hard-hitting, neo-noir crime drama, master thief Roy Egan (Harvey Keitel) comes out of retirement for one final jewelry heist, at the urging of his ex-con brother, Lee Egan (Timothy Hutton). After assembling a motley crew of highly skilled surveillance men and thieves, the Egan brothers stake out a jewelry store which they have chosen as their target, in order to get their ducks in a row for what appears to be a relatively easy score.

All goes well for them during the ensuing robbery, despite being surrounded by a bevy of clueless policemen in lights-a-flashing squad cars for a couple of extremely tense minutes shortly after the heist, and the Egan brothers and their crew manage to get away clean, retreating to the sanctuary of a trailer park out in the L.A. desert, in order to lay low for a while, as they set themselves to work regarding the details of fencing their ill-gotten gains.

But things go to hell in a hand basket at that point, as the psychotic newcomer to their crew, Skip Kovich (Stephen Dorff), decides to blow them all away and make off with the goods. Roy Egan manages to escape Kovich's wrath, but his brother Lee isn't so lucky, catching a round in the chest at close range from Kovich's .38. Roy hides in a nearby drain pipe after the police are called to the scene, and after he takes a day or two to mend his psyche, and his wounds, in a seedy L.A. hotel room, he hatches a devious scheme for exacting revenge on the traitorous Skip Kovich.

The remainder of this solid, RPO film for men is violent, gritty, totally believable, and rounded out by a strong performance from Famke Janssen, who plays the recently widowed Rachel Montana, whose husband was one of Skip's trailer-park murder victims. Janssen's bitch-on-wheels portrayal of the righteously indignant hot wife of a dead ex-con, features numerous shit tests, extreme vulnerability, simmering sexuality, and ultimately, a genuine display of knockout loyalty to the man who eventually gets revenge (as well as a pile of money) for both of them.

This highly satisfying film will leave you feeling hopeful that women like Janssen's character actually exist in the real world. And in the opinion of your Old Uncle Bob, they definitely do. You just have to work hard to find them, and then, you have to be man enough to keep them. (In my particular case, for maybe a year or two, tops.)

This is a good film to watch with that hottie you've had your eye on who lives in your building. Shoot her a text and tell her to cancel her plans and get the hell over to your place, pronto – and don't forget to bring refreshments.

2. Devil In A Blue Dress (1995 – Denzel Washington, Don Cheadle, Jennifer Beals, Tom Sizemore)

This under-the-radar, neo-noir, cinematic gem is based on the novel of the same name, written by Walter Mosley. Set in 1948 Los Angeles, Ezekiel "Easy" Rawlins (Denzel Washington), is a World War II veteran who suddenly finds himself working as a private investigator, after being wrongfully laid off from his job working for an aircraft manufacturer.

Despite having no training, Rawlins' fervent desire to continue paying his mortgage soon leads him to an L.A. bar managed by his old friend Joppy (Mel Winkler), where he is introduced to the shady DeWitt Albright (Tom Sizemore). Albright informs Rawlins that a beautiful young woman, Daphne Monet (Jennifer Beals), has gone missing, and he is looking to hire someone to locate her. Daphne is the girlfriend of the wealthy Todd Carter (Terry Kinney), who was the favorite to win the L.A. mayoral election, until he inexplicably dropped out of the race.

Rawlins accepts Albright's terms for the private investigation, and he sets out to find the missing Daphne Monet – a move which, due to the age-old axiom of hindsight being 20/20, he ultimately realizes was a really big mistake.

This fast-paced film is chock-full of tension, action, drama, violence and sex—not to mention numerous red-pill life lessons, which are offered up primarily by Denzel Washington's character.

An example of Ezekiel "Easy" Rawlins' dime-store, buddha-like wisdom:

> A man once told me that when you step out of your door in the morning, you're already in trouble. The only question is, are you on top of that trouble or not?

Denzel Washington really brings the thunder in this excellent RPO film for men, and Don Cheadle's performance as his lifelong friend from Texas, the murderous Mouse Alexander, is a thing of absolute beauty. This is a really good film – and just like a classic old car, you can't miss by taking it for a spin.

3. Mr. Brooks (2007 – Kevin Costner, William Hurt, Demi Moore, Dane Cook)

Maybe it's because he's quite a bit like the character he portrays in this intriguing, neo-noir thriller – or maybe he just got lucky, as I usually don't care for his acting skills – but Kevin Costner absolutely aces it as the well-to-do serial killer with a split personality, Earl Brooks, in this top-notch, captivating, RPO film for men.

For some strange reason, this film didn't do very well at the box office, which is probably why a sequel has not been made up to this point in time. But many critics loved it, as did the Average Joe reviewers at IMDB, and your old Uncle Bob really liked it as well. So maybe Hollywood will pull its head out of its collective, increasingly SJW-esque butt in the very near future, and do a second installment in the franchise, because the first film is unsettling as hell and really solid, and Hollywood definitely owes us more of this kind of fare (no doubt about that one).

William Hurt's portrayal of Costner's split-off, alter-ego, Marshall, is delivered with deftly satisfying aplomb. Dane Cook brings it home as the sappy, beta, wannabe-serial-killer, Mr. Smith, and does so with smooth, likeable and totally believable ease (most likely because he is a beta and he is likeable), and despite Demi Moore's palpably weak portrayal of Detective Tracy Atwood, this film fires fast and hard on all cylinders and will leave you rooting for Costner's unhinged, mass-murderer character to escape his myriad police pursuers… so he can either get his act together and stop murdering people, or regroup and kill again.

The scenes featuring Hurt and Costner are truly epic; the dreary, cloudy, rainy, Portland Oregon locale is perfect for the overall mood of the film; and the murder scenes are tense, unsettling, and eerily real, to the point where you'll feel the whole thing churning in the pit of your stomach.

This one is worth every second you spend on it – and there is zero doubt about that one. So check it out soon, young squires. You'll be really glad you did.

4. Blood Simple (1983 – John Getz, Frances McDormand, Dan Hedaya, M. Emmet Walsh)

I don't usually care too much for the Coen brothers' films (as if Joel Coen and Ethan Coen care what I think, Oscar-winners and multi-millionaires that they are), but this under-the-radar classic delivers a full-course cinematic meal, comprised of deception, betrayal and murder, and it's served up hot and fresh – with a major side of shock sauce.

Texas bar-owner Julian Marty (Dan Hedaya) has an all-too-common problem on his hands, one that most men have to face at least once during the course of their lifetimes – his wife is fucking somebody else. Determined to get the proof of her infidelity, Marty hires sleazy private investigator Loren Visser (M. Emmet Walsh) to do whatever is necessary to catch the cheating slut in the act. Visser complies, taking numerous photographs of Marty's wife, Abby (Frances McDormand), and her lover, Ray (John Getz), through a motel window.

After returning to Marty's bar to show him the photos, Visser teases him about being cucked, and Marty starts doing a slow burn which eventually explodes into a raging, internal inferno, as he ultimately decides to have his wife Abby, and her lover, Ray – who happens to be working for Marty as one of his own bartenders – killed.

Marty contacts Visser again by phone, in order to arrange a meeting for them to discuss his new proposal, and they eventually get together at a hillside hangout for teenagers to work out the details, where Marty finds Visser hitting on an underage girl. Marty and Visser retreat to the privacy of Visser's clunky old Volkswagen Beetle, where they hammer out the terms of the contract killing – $10,000 in cash, paid in full after the deal is done.

Visser accepts Marty's proposal, and then tells him to disappear for a few days and go fishing. But after thinking it all over for a while, Visser hatches a devious double-cross that ultimately turns out to be Marty's worst nightmare – as well as his own.

I won't spoil the remainder of this truly entertaining and thought-provoking film for you, other than to point out that the Coen brothers actually managed to capture the truly demented nature of the human mind to absolute perfection here, as giant misunderstandings, miscommunications, and misinterpretations abound. The tension in some of the scenes is full-throttle fantastic; the dialogue is realistically spot-on; and the direction, acting and pace of the film are top-notch.

If you only see one of the four films I reviewed for you here today, make it this one. Because this is truly a five-star RPO film for men that will leave you thinking about human nature, human sexuality, and human depravity for a long time afterwards.

For a little taste of what you can expect from Blood Simple, here's M. Emmet Walsh's opening voiceover, from the very first scene of the film:

SCENE 1: An opening voiceover plays against dissolving Texas landscapes–broad, bare, and lifeless.

> The world is full of complainers. But the fact is, nothing comes with a guarantee. I don't care if you're the Pope of Rome, President of the United States, or even Man of the Year–something can always go wrong. And go ahead, complain, tell your problems to your neighbor, ask for help–watch him fly. Now in Russia, they got it mapped out so that everyone pulls for everyone else–that's the theory, anyway. But what I know about is Texas. And down here…you're on your own.

Modern Hollywood movies are like a song with one note. And those one-note farces get really old after a very short while. But despite SJW Hollywood's current penchant for producing mind-numbing drivel, you can still find some absolute winners inside the film vaults of yesteryear.

The elitists might be leading the game at the moment, but every point we score from here on out definitely counts. So vote with your dollars, young squires, and maybe Hollywood will backtrack one day very soon, and lift their all-too-heavy foot off of that mind-control gas pedal of theirs, and start making good films again. Rent a couple of these fast-paced, thought-provoking, RPO films for real men as soon as possible. And score a point for the manosphere.

No matter what happens in that regard, your old Uncle Bob will keep pointing out the golden cinematic wheat among the mountains of puerile, IQ-lowering chaff (so long as ROK wants me to do so and so long as I don't run out of good films to review), and unlike the loyalty of your current special snowflake, that is something that you can most definitely count upon…

The Real Story Of Pocahontas And How She Helped Destroy Her Native Tribe

December 9, 2016 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

It should come as no surprise to the reader that the true story of Pocahontas bears little resemblance to the Disney retelling. The fictional Disney version revolves around a romance with Englishman John Smith that never happened. Let's examine the real story of this Native American Princess.

Birth and Patriarchal Upbringing

Like, so boring and stuff

Pocahontas was the daughter of Powhatan, an Algonquian chief in Virginia around 1596 when she was born. She grew up under a strong patriarchy, and her father had many wives who gave the chief one child each. Under the guidance of her tribe, she was educated in the female activities of gathering firewood, foraging for food, farming, constructing shelters, cooking, collecting water, making mats, baskets, silverware, and platters. Women were taught the importance of bearing and rearing children.

Arrival of the English

In 1607, when Pocahontas was around the age of 9 to 11, English settlers landed at Jamestown, Virginia. Captain John Smith, one of the leaders, began exploring the Chesapeake Bay and mapping the surrounding lands. Smith is credited with saving the colony through his strong leadership, and he is credited with training the colonists in useful tasks such as farming, construction, and basic labor, and instituting rules such as "he that will not work shall not eat."

Was Smith the first US case of friendzoning?

Smith had an impressive background, including sailing away from home at age 16 after the death of his father, serving as a mercenary in the army of Henry IV of France, engaging in piracy in the Mediterranean, knighted by the Prince of Transylvania for beheading 3 Turks in single combat duels, and being sold into slavery, before escaping through northern Africa to return to England before sailing for the New World.

Smith apparently mutineed en route to the Americas, and was scheduled for execution until the company landed, and unsealed orders from the Virginia Company designated him one of the leaders.

Completely fictional scene from “The New World”

Smith was captured by the Powhatan, and there is some controversy over a supposed sparing of his life by Pocahontas. Smith claims his head was forced between two stones, when Pocahontas rushed over and placed her body over Smith’s, saving his life. Some claim this never happened. Some claim this was merely a ceremonial ritual and Smith’s life was never in danger. And some claim that Smith fabricated the story in order to white knight for Pocahontas and make her appear virtuous to the English.

Today, many historians doubt the incident ever happened, despite it being the central plot to the Disney film, but regardless, Smith was released.

Attention Whoring Child

Virginia statue depicting Pocahontas

Pocahontas was actually her nickname, which meant “naughty one” or “spoiled child” and indeed she was. Pocahontas (at this time no older than 12) would frequently visit the English, bringing food, and cartwheeling around in front of the English men wearing little to no clothing.

This, only younger and with less clothing

Food grew scarce, and more English arrived by boat. Chief Powhatan grew suspicious and worried of the demands of the English and stopped providing food to them.

The English, desperate for food, arranged a trade of weapons for food; the negotiations went poorly, and Chief Powhatan decided to kill Smith, but Pocahontas escaped and warned him, foiling the plan and dooming her people.

War soon broke out, and in 1613, around the age 15-17, Pocahontas was captured easily, when the English lured her onto a boat to look at fancy trinkets, and it sailed away with her on board.

In captivity, she quickly adopted the ways of the English, taking the name Rebecca and being baptized as a Christian.

She was treated generously, much like a present day Instagram celebrity would be, by the English, who knew her well, and she soon rejected the ways of her people. During a confrontation between English and Powhatan in 1614, Pocahontas was permitted to speak to her people, and told them she preferred living with the English.

I’m such a special princess!

That same year, the first American interracial marriage occurred when Pocahontas wed Englishman John Rolfe (again the John Smith fantasy never happened). The following January, Pocahontas gave birth to a son.

The Powhatan were raided and attacked by the English, who killed their Queen and drowned their children in the river. The tribes closest to the English fort were wiped out and never recovered.

When Pocahontas married Rolfe, the two nations ended their warring, giving the English time to build up their forces and eventually destroy the Powhatan. Pocahontas’s father died, and her uncle who took over, was later murdered by the English.

Tell me about these port-o-potties you have in England

But none of this bothered Pocahontas much, as she was far away in the Dubai of the 1600s, London. She left for England in 1616, where she was treated like a celebrity. Now known as Lady Rebecca Rolfe, she was sent around the country on tours, and attended parties with King James I and Queen Anne.

While technology prevented her from distributing an internet sex tape, the “naughty one / spoiled child” with a penchant for frolicking around in the nude likely had other ways of retelling her story. She died the following year at age 21 from unknown causes; likely a disease to which her body had no auto-immune defense.

Fictional Version

Just for fun, we’ll briefly examine the Disney version, as there are lessons to be learned here also. In the 1995 Disney film, English Captain John Smith arrives in Virginia just in time to save the Powhatan princess from being wed to a brave warrior from her tribe.

Pocahontas rebels because she is a free spirit, too independent to be tied down by marrying a masculine warrior. Pocahontas elopes with her girlfriends into the wilderness, where they become so ecstatic from the concentrated estrogen that they hallucinate and visit a talking tree and woodland critters who tell her to seek out adventure, and tell her that fresh foreign cock will soon by arriving by sea.

Brave, masculine, strong, respected, but still not good enough for our special snowflake

Smith arrives, builds a settlement, and comes across Pocahontas in the forest. They meet and flirt. The Powhatan come across the English and engage them in a skirmish. Chief Powhatan warns his daughter Pocahontas of the invading English and forbids her to go near them. She immediately rebels and makes out with Smith in the forest, with her jaded warrior lover Kocoum looking on from a distance. He attacks Smith, but is killed by an English crewmate.

I caused the death of my last lover before he tried the goods; want to be next?

Smith is captured by the Powhatan and before he is executed, Pocahontas intervenes and begs her father to save his life and reconcile with the English. The chief agrees, but the English governor tries to kill the Chief, wounding John Smith in the process. The wounded Smith returns home for medical treatment. He begs Pocahontas to join him, but she isn't interested in a relationship; just destroying the lives of two men who risked their lives for her, so she sends John Smith back to England alone.

Nothing New Under The Sun

Ancient societies, both Native American and European, knew the dangers of letting women freely explore their dreams. In the case of Pocahontas, she first disrupted her family by leaving her father, shunning the male warriors who would have courted her, and caused the destruction of her entire tribe because she wanted to be free and explore her feelings. In the end, she died at the age of 21 because her body was not well adjusted to European diseases.

While today, modern medicine, the social welfare state, and government laws protect women who rebel against traditional ideas, supporting single moms and their myriad children with a variety of special services provided by the taxes of hard working men, women are largely free from the personal repercussions of their behavior.

But do not mistake the end result of unfettered attention whoring, unlimited freedom, and shunning of traditional roles and values. The story ends the same way–with the end of that civilization. Modern feminism is toying with an experiment that has always ended with disastrous results. May we be wise enough to stop it before our culture is wiped out.

How To Survive Losing Your Job

December 9, 2016 | by Tubal Cain | Link | Original Link

At some point in your working life, chances are you will find yourself unemployed. With the average job now lasting four years, you can also expect to be unemployed multiple times. Whether it's a result of mergers, closings, globalization, mismanagement, or a psychotic boss looking for a reason to throw you under the bus, you are not immune to job loss.

Today's average employer has the loyalty and integrity of a street whore. Satisfactory job performance, stellar attendance and punctuality, a solid work ethic and skill sets, and quietly tolerating endless sniping and drama from colleagues are no guarantee that you'll hold onto your job. Working to live is a mantra many of us ascribes to, but that's now a deal breaker. It's live to work, or you might not get hired or retained.

At-will employment (with the exception of Montana) is the law of the land. Simply stated, an employer has the right to terminate you at any time, without notice, or without a reason. Read the fine print disclaimer the next time you fill out an employment application. Conversely, you as an employee have the right to terminate your employment at any time, without notice, or without a reason. Of course when you turn in your customary two week notice, you'll most likely be told to leave immediately, or worse yet, be run through a worthless and degrading exit interview with some HR bitch.

Case in point, years ago, I worked for a small privately owned steel company. The place was a toxic hell hole. One of my colleagues was a guy in his early fifties. For twelve years he had toiled without complaint, all while being treated like an inmate at Auschwitz. Oddly, several times he received the employee of the month award. One day, his wife was offered a major promotion with her employer, but it required they relocate across the state. He went to the management and gave his two week notice. He was immediately led out the door like a condemned man heading to the gas chamber.

Unless you are a protected class (women, minorities, transgendered, etc.) you have little to no recourse. If you are a white heterosexual male, especially a white heterosexual male over fifty, you have a bull's eye strapped to your back. Sure, you can attempt to bring a wrongful termination suit, or an ageism suit, against a former employer, but try getting the EEOC to have your back. Any decent attorney will tell you that suing an employer, especially as a white heterosexual male, is a fool's game.

I've been on this earth for nearly sixty years. In this time, I've had more than my fair share of slap downs and setbacks, including job loss.

Here are two things I've learned about jobs and unemployment. Hard lessons learned the hard way.

Don't rely on employers for anything

My late father was a journeyman Tool & Die Maker. He graduated from high school shortly after WWII. His high school curriculum prepared him with industrial arts courses, trigonometry and geometry, analytical and reasoning skills, and surprisingly, civics and character building.

After graduating, he entered a Tool & Die apprenticeship in a machine shop. Back in the day, there were plenty of decent paying jobs in wealth generating manufacturing (make America great again, Trump). Young men like my father were prepared and willing to do these jobs. College was for the wealthy, beatnik slackers, and dilettantes. Young women like my mother were attracted to hard working men with good jobs and good character.

My father had 3 jobs during his career; the last one was 29 years. He earned a very comfortable middle class income, and he lived with little to no debt. Lifetime employment was a reality for his generation, and he retired with a pension like a medieval robber baron. We had our differences, but he instilled in me character and a work ethic. His old school “strict but fair” worldview is more attractive to me now.

But my generation, and those after me, faces a very different workplace and job market.

Today, we have employers, who will discard you like a morning turd in the toilet, pay bitch wages, hire lazy and dumb snowflakes, give total autonomy to man hating HR cunts, and enable male management to store their balls in masonry jars.

I know people who made up their minds early in life that they’d never rely on any employer, they’d keep their debt down, and they’d self-fund their own retirement. These are the folks who have prospered and survived. They say living well is the best revenge, and I believe it.

Apply for unemployment insurance (UI) immediately

UI is insurance, and not welfare. In my state, it lasts 26 weeks, and currently pays a maximum of $444.00 per week depending on how much earnings you had in a given quarter. You also must pay taxes on UI, and they can do a percentage deduction from your weekly benefits. Chump change, but it’s better than nothing. You initially apply online or by phone, and do your weekly claims the same. It’s a cake walk. You pay for part of it in your payroll deductions, while the employer pays the lion’s share, which of course pisses them off. But on the bright side, it’s a legal way to get back at an employer who bent you over a barrel.

It’s a one week waiting period if you are laid off, and a three week waiting period if you were terminated. The burden of proof for separation is on the employer.

They have to prove you were terminated for gross misconduct. Gross misconduct is narrowly defined (stealing, workplace violence, etc.). Otherwise, if you gave what's referred to as a "good faith effort", meaning you showed up every day on time, attempted to perform your job to the best of your abilities, and did not refuse anything duly owed to your employer, you are awarded UI.

Most employers are scared of their shadow, and fear litigation, so generally, they roll over easily. I've only had one employer challenge my UI claim, but they were initially unable to prove gross misconduct, so it went no further, and I was awarded UI benefits. If an employer does contest your claim, then a hearing is scheduled, usually over the phone. An arbitrator hears both the employer's and claimant's sides, and then makes a determination for UI.

The more claimants drawing on an employer's UI account, the more they have to pay back into the fund to make up for the deficit. Again, this pisses them off.

You can't draw UI if you quit, unless you can prove a hostile workplace. This too is narrowly defined (sexual harassment, racial harassment, sexual orientation harassment, etc.). Again, this is nearly impossible to prove if you're a white heterosexual male.

Here's a word of caution. My state allows you to work up to a certain amount part-time before they start deducting from your weekly benefits. Think twice about working, especially off the books for cash, and not reporting it to UI. They take UI fraud very seriously. A guy I knew worked construction off the books for cash while drawing UI. He split up with his psychotic hipster girlfriend. Out of spite, she turned him into UI. He was subsequently charged and convicted of criminal fraud of UI benefits. Not only did he have to pay the money back, but he did jail time, incurred large legal fees, and now has a criminal record.

Conclusion

For the ADHD basement dwellers, whose commentary is forthcoming, try to wrap your empty heads around this; I'm older, and I've lived through job losses, so I know what I'm talking about. Make no mistake, I'm pro-business, I voted for Trump, and I hold down both a full-time day job, and a part-time evening job. But, I deeply loathe shylock employers, and I equally loathe predatory capitalism.

For my perceptive and thinking ROK brethren, at all ages and stages in your lives, a word to the wise; Caveat emptor, especially when navigating today's workplace. Learn to trust your gut to avoid pissing on your shoes, as I sadly learned later in life, especially with bad job choices. Know that most employers don't care about your professional development, nor do they give a rip about your job satisfaction and happiness. All you owe any employer is an honest day's work, to the best of your abilities, and to play by their rules while on the job. But, respect and ethics goes both ways. An employer is not obligated to treat you in a professional or humane way, nor look out for your best interests. But the beauty of a free market is that you can vote with your feet and move on.

I commend those ROK readers, and especially those at a young age, who've started their own businesses, are self-employed, and have given the middle finger to toxic bush league employers. Fuck those shit skins, life is too short.

4 Double Standards That Leftists Keep Propagating

A French-Jewish essayist once said: “Time has come to deconstruct the deconstruction apologists.” This was in 2014. That year, our trend had already progressed much compared to the preceding years. I can remember the 2000s as a period covered by a lead cloak, a dull time to live, where most if not all mainstream culture was a disgusting mix of soft SJWism, r’n’b, miscegenation apology, socialism and the like. Since then, we managed to achieve a lot, beyond what anyone in the 2000s would have thought even possible, and this is still true even when not counting The Donald’s ushering into office.

Of course, this is only the beginning, and those who held the lead cloak of political correctness beyond our heads will not accept gladly that they are losing some of their grip. They were aiming, and still aim, at total victory—that is, the annihilation of white middle classes, the complete blurring of sexes, the irreversible decline of people of European descent, the rewriting of history, the destruction of the traditional family to the benefit of a brave new world, total SJW cultural power, gynocracy, and so on.

They will accept no middle ground, no peaceful coexistence: the very identities of so-called “minorities” are based on anti-white or anti-male resentment, and the very definition of what they call “progress” is the displacement and disenfranchisement of the white majority. Rabid SJWs will always push here and there—no lasting peace is ever possible with those whose sense of self lies in waging culture war in the name of “progress”, and this is why spineless, willing-to-compromise conservatives will always be cucks.

As we become mainstream and drill the cloak, it is necessary to focus on the right enemy and hit it efficiently. If we stop doing so, it won't. Shrewd "white" intellectuals—note the quotation marks here— will always find a weakness to exploit and send some useful idiots there.

Hence, let's deconstruct the deconstruction apologists swiftly. This article is the first of a series about the leftists' worldview and tools. Understand them better than they understand themselves, dismantle their thought structures, and catch them hamsterizing their contradictions or melt down into further hysteria.

Michel Foucault, an overrated homosexual militant professor: "What? People on the right doing deconstruction? I don't want to hear about that, since I have started to deconstruct patriarchal capitalism I've got a copyright on deconstruction."

We know how addicted SJWs are to blaming, accusing, negating, openly despising non-leftists, being perpetually offended and taking the moral high ground. Everything is good to them when it comes to have a pretext to enforce their narrative—that is, a worldview where we are always the bad guys, whereas they and those who identify as "minorities" are always innocent and can do no wrong. Their accusations often follow a pattern, and one of these patterns is the charge of double standards. For example, we would be "guilty" of distinguishing between white and non-white immigrants, or between men and women.

Having different standards for different people and situations is justified. As Aristotle said (Nicomachean Ethics, book V, chap.3), fairness is not about equality—in the sense of a kind of abstract identity between different individuals—but about equity: equal standards between what is actually identical, not between what is different and ought to be.

Males and females are different. Their different social roles are consistent with both the inner needs of individuals and the outer needs of society, which relies on complimentary between the sexes, not on a weird inter-sexual competition.

On the same way, homogeneous societies are those where trust and metapolitical peace flourish, so, having a standard that aims at maintaining our homogeneity is pragmatically justified—not to mention the unfairness of massive population replacement against those who built the West. In both cases, we have different sets of standards for what ought to remain different, and these sets should never be "deconstructed" and boiled down into a multicultural soup.

However, it is also clear that all differences in standards are far from justified. An obvious example could be nepotism practised at the expense of a genuine meritocracy.

Likewise, the leftists who cry about our real or supposed double standards entertain themselves a lot of those. And those are not about Aristotelian equity, but about hypocritically granting different rights for different people… based on divisive "identity politics," hidden behind taboos, and justified by an irresponsible pretense to "equality." While normal standards are based on reality and on a healthy sociability, leftist double ones are justified by the accusatory leftist narrative of "oppression" or "inequalities"—in other words, their various sets of standards are circular and barely justified outside the liberal bubble.

Ultimately, all leftist double standards contribute to the current anarcho-tyranny, that is, to a strange mix between impunity for some and ultra-severity for others.

1. The right to collective identity

We have long been told that everyone would be better off if there were neither nations nor frontiers, as Lennon sung in "Imagine," and that whites must be colorblind because taking race into account is "racist." In the 60s these imperatives were already conflicting with the idea that "colonized" people had a right to self-determination, that is, to a separate collective identity, and with so-called affirmative action. Since then, it became increasingly obvious that only whites had to pretend to colorblindness. No liberal ever yelled at blacks for being communitarian. Only we who don't fit into the "minorities" circle were supposed to deny our own identities and act as if we were abstract individuals.

Conservatives who noticed this double standard—so-called minority groups have a right to a specific collective identity, the silent majority doesn't—mostly denounced it out of adhesion to nothingness. Everyone should try to blend away inside the melting-pot, not only whites or males, hence "the Democrats are the real racists!" Of course, this disastrous line means whites or males should accept to be milled into the melting-pot, and if you want to exist as you are, well, "you're a racist!"

Fortunately, for once, it was the left who did a big leap forward. In the mid-2000s, after enforcing colorblindness for whites and sexblindness for males, they completely turned around and started to speak about race and "gender" all the time. This move seems to owe to an exasperation of minority identitarianism: after decades of building collective identities where there were none or very few before, they had to victimize themselves more and attack us more, hence being openly identitarian and divisive, to maintain their identity-building dynamic. We still don't have the right to openly exist, but the very obsession of the left over "cishet white males" and "toxic masculinity" participated dialectically into making our very identity more existent.

This has been painful, but the left (involuntarily?) helped us to separate the red-pilled wheat from the mildly conservative chaff.

2. The right to self-determination

This one has been especially conspicuous when the UK opted out of the EU. Post-WW1, the dismantling of important European empires into petty countries has been legitimized on grounds of "people's rights to self-determination." The line was also pushed forth post-WW2 when local third world violent groups were given free reigns in countries almost wholly built by European colonizers by both hypocritical Americans and West-hating USSR. It has been used to justify as well the identitarianism and separatism of so-called minority groups.

(All these situations eventually turned into large-scale disasters, the first one summed up into the expression "balkanization"—must be a coincidence.)

Now look at what has been said about populist parties and the Brexit. "Populism" happens when the people, unrepresented by traitorous elites, wants to exist again through a leader it can identify with. Brexit happened as a result of Englishmen willing to cut off from the stifling EU bureaucracy and bring back their jobs. Both stem from the will to determinate oneself as a group—and it could be argued that collective self-determination stems from the same willingness than the desire to liberate ourselves from the SJW straightjacket.

Nonetheless, and quite predictably, our right to self-determination is either openly denied or framed as "regressive," "oppressive" to some Big Other, and the like. Some can rule themselves, or at least pretend they have a right to do so; others ought to remain cattle under the managerial State-Corporations complex and its SJW minions.

3. The very right to exist

In 2009, the French newspaper Le Figaro ran a piece about Jews being afraid to "disappear on the long term" out of their failing demography. As a non-Jew, I can perfectly understand that Jews care about their people's destiny. But then, why can't we care about our existence as well? Those who promote miscegenation also say that opposing their influence-peddling is “racist.” I suppose wanting to maintain one’s identity and future is “racist” as well—when one is white of course.

In the academic world, some strange Jewish teachers have been busy redefining “whiteness” as a pure “privilege.” This equates to saying that our very existence is mostly, if not entirely, negative, unfair to the Big Other, and should be erased by all means. As The Occidental Observer writer Andrew Joyce aptly put it, this very worldview and its propagation are essentially “an act of inter-ethnic aggression” pursued at the heart of the System.

The twisting of people’s worldview equating “whiteness” or “masculinity” to “privilege” and “oppression” feed a double standard that grants everyone else the right to exist, such right being part of “progress” and “emancipation,” whereas our simple existence is associated to the most vile and perverse accusations. If you find the last sentence overusing quotation marks, this stems from how much common language has been twisted in order to create a subtle double standard in how the average Joe perceives people’s rights.

4. Undergoing social pressure to be “tolerant”

“I don’t have to be tolerant, because I am tolerance incarnate, but YOU, filthy normal person, BE TOLERANT or we’ll have you fired!”

A long time ago, “tolerance” used to be an injunction asking everyone to tolerate difference. Read Locke’s Letter on toleration (1689): in a context of inter-religious wars, the author asks every belligerent to tolerate the very existence of the others. A few decades later, however, cunning anti-Catholic intellectuals started to use to “toleration” plea as a one-sided accusation. They equated the very Church with “intolerance,” hence casting themselves and their own ideas as equated with “tolerance.”

Used that way, the “tolerance” thing essentially means that an agent A blames another one, B, for being purportedly oppressive, and asks him to tolerate a growing aggressive faction at its own side. This tactic tends to cast B as a villain, puts B on the defensive if B cannot exit the tricky framing, and, most importantly, leads B to be completely passive while A can be active—in the name of toleration. After what, A can freely build influence while B remains frightened.

All those who asked for toleration turned into dictators and murderers, all those who accepted to be more “tolerant” ended up overthrown and killed. The Church’s mild tolerance got thousands of priests slaughtered by revolutionaries. Today, what has been going on is exactly the same: those who pretended to be oppressed and asked for toleration have grown into aggressive and cancerous groups. Whoever asks for tolerance wants more power for him and wants the other to remain passive whatever himself does.

The left intuitively understands that. Have you ever witnessed anyone ask a rabid feminist or SJW to be more tolerant? Of course not. Only we are supposed to be more “tolerant” while hateful minoritists grow—and I could bet anything that, had we not revolted through the manosphere, Alt-Right, or Trump candidacy, they would push their advantage until all “straight white males” got killed or willingly renounced to live.

Conclusion

The most perverse thing here is that these double standards are often taken as self-evident, so much that leftists themselves enforce them without even thinking about it.

For those out of the Matrix, left-enforced double standards often give the feeling of something wrong, but they are also too elusive to be pinpointed. The whole narrative of “white privilege”, “patriarchy” and other contrived or cherry-picked stuff (see below) actually hides these double standards while also justifying them—’cause racism against whites is “social justice”, y’know.

Now, these can be spotted in the intertext, as deconstructionist Jacques Derrida would say, of most SJW-poised content. Spotting the double standards makes them much less powerful and helps to understand the true structure and motives behind leftist sophistry. If you happen to debate a leftist, do not hesitate to call him out when he uses ones, whether he is aware of it or not.

Your humble servant being about to become a father—and wanting his future children to live in a world where they have a place—the series on leftism may run with some irregularity. I have just mentioned a few of the double standards that deserve to be pointed out and excoriated from their comfy mainstream intertext. So, stay in touch.

How Donald Trump's "Art Of The Deal" Applies To Game

Recently I read a post by Roosh on Donald Trump's most popular book and memoir, The Art of the Deal. In this article, Roosh presented 11 of his favorite quotes from the book—and while these quotes are extremely applicable to business and life, I also believe that they're applicable to game.

I've said it before, and I'll say it again: women are attracted to characteristics that make you successful. This is not coincidence, it's biology—they're hardwired to desire men with characteristics like decisiveness, assertiveness, confidence, and persistence. The reason being that men with characteristics such as these can almost always successfully protect and provide for a woman.

So, with this in mind, let's take a look at how Donald Trump's 11 best quotes from "The Art of the Deal" will help you grab 'em by the pussy.

Trust your gut

> ...listen to your gut, no matter how good something sounds on paper. The second is that you're generally better off sticking with what you know.

This is an absolute necessity. Too many times have I seen men who have a bad feeling about a woman, but because she's hot they end up dating her anyways. This is a complete rookie mistake; the game veteran learns to always trust his instincts, no matter how good something may seem.

I discussed this in a previous article, but the idea is that every woman has a certain "energy," to her. Some women may have a good energy, which is indicated by compassion, femininity, and nurturing tendencies. Others, however, have a bad energy: manipulativeness, dramatic behavior, and jealousy.

Learning to read these energies is extremely important, and to do this, you must trust your gut instinct. If your gut tells you that a woman is a catch, then she probably is. If your gut tells you that she's trouble, then she's probably just that.

Think big

> My style of deal-making is quite simple and straightforward. I aim very high, and then I just keep pushing and pushing and pushing to get what I'm after. Sometimes I settle for less than I sought, but in most cases I still end up with what I want.
> […]I wasn't satisfied just to earn a good living. I was looking to make a statement. I was out to build something monumental—something worth a big effort.

I swear, it's almost like Trump wrote this book specifically for game. He aims very high, and then just keeps pushing and pushing to get what he's after. Yes, sometimes he settles for less, but in most cases he ends up with what he wants.

Is this not the quintessential aspect of game? You aim high by choosing a gorgeous woman you want, and you remain persistent despite her shit tests and playing hard to get. Obviously "just keep pushing and pushing," doesn't mean to rape her, but rather to be persistent.

Persistence is a major key with women, but it's also where most men screw up. Most men interpret being persistent as being needy, but they're entirely different. You can persist, but not chase a girl. You can persist, but not be needy. It simply comes down to not wanting her validation, but being willing to put in effort for what you want.

> The worst thing you can possibly do in a deal is seem desperate to make it. That makes the other guy smell blood, and then you're dead.

Wanting a woman so badly that you're willing to sacrifice your dignity is a recipe for disaster. One of the first things that men learn upon practicing game is that you can never appear to be too desperate. When a woman finds out that you're desperate for her approval, you've immediately lost her.

And what's worse is that desperately craving a woman's attention invites all sorts of other nasty things into your life: cheating, divorce, financial ruin, and more. When a woman realizes that she can use you, again and again, but you're too desperate to care, "then you're dead," as Trump says.

Care about the cents

> To this day, if I feel a contractor is overcharging me, I'll pick up the phone, even if it's only for $5,000 or $ 10,000, and I'll complain. People say to me, "What are you bothering for, over a few bucks?" My answer is that the day I can't pick up the telephone and make a twenty-five-cent call to save $10,000 is the day I'm going to close up shop.

This one is very applicable to being in a relationship with a woman. A lot of the time, she'll gain your trust, but the second that you give her your credit card she'll start to abuse it—this is a huge red flag, because it demonstrates that she doesn't respect your money.

Usually a woman will come up with some lame excuse as to why she spent money you didn't give her permission to spend. Maybe she desired to splurge on a $200 pair of shoes, and her excuse is that she wants something nice to wear when you take her out. Or maybe she spent $500 when you only gave her permission to spend $300, because "they were having a sale."

Don't tolerate this type of behavior, because she's lying to you and manipulating you. As Trump says, the day that you can't spend a little bit of effort to prevent someone from overcharging you, is the day that you need to close up shop.

> With so much demand, our marketing strategy was to play hard to get. It was a reverse sales technique. If you sit in an office with a contract in your hand, eager to make the first deal that comes along, it's quite obvious to people that the apartments aren't in demand. We were never in a rush to sign a contract. When people came in, we'd show them the model apartments, sit down and talk, and, if they were interested, explain that there was a waiting list for the most desirable apartments. The more unattainable the apartments seemed, the more people wanted them.

This one is absolutely massive. Any time a woman feels like you could leave at any moment, she will magically start respect your time and treating you ever so sweetly. When a woman intuits that you have 20 other girls that want to sleep with you, she'll view you as an extremely scarce resource.

If you're in a huge rush to seal the deal, she'll most likely sense that you don't get laid very often. Now, this isn't the same as moving fast and escalating, but rather it's the underlying emotion behind it. Never communicate to a woman that SHE'S the one who's scarce (AKA you're not sleeping with any other girls). She wants YOU to be the scarce one, and she wants to feel like you're choosing her over all of your other girls.

> The worst of times often create the best opportunities to make good deals.

Regardless of what you may think, there's always a good time to strike with a woman. In fact, some of my most memorable pulls have been at ridiculous times that would've seemed extremely inconvenient to most men.

I recall being at a party a while back, and this platinum blonde girl was very clearly into me, despite her boyfriend being at the party. Unfortunately, however, we didn't have the logistics to get back to my place and all of the rooms were locked. So what did I do? I pulled her to the bathroom, and fucked her on the floor—she was into it, too (asked me to call her a slut and choke her).

The point is, however, that I recognized my time to strike. I saw that as everyone was occupied with their own social matters, this girl was right next to me and eager to have sex. So, I struck while the iron was hot. I figured out a way to make it work, despite the difficult logistics.

> I have a very simple rule when it comes to management: hire the best people from your competitors, pay them more than they were earning, and give them bonuses and incentives based on their performance. That's how you build a first-class operation.

This can be applied to either women, or more importantly, men. Surrounding yourself with the best of women is great—it will give you an abundance mentality, get you lots of great sex, and more importantly, put you in an upward spiral to success.

Surrounding yourself with the best of men, however, is far more important. The best way to learn is through osmosis—this is true for everything, especially game. No amount of reading theory online can substitute for actually being "in field" with a player.

I recall being a pickup newbie, and how I literally waited for 10 hours just to shake a successful PUA's hand and have a 30 second conversation with him. Was this foolish of me? A stupid man might think so, but in reality, it was extremely worth it.

Why? Because the man's notch count was well over 500, he owned an 8 figure business, and most importantly, he was the happiest person I'd ever met. Just having that 30 seconds of osmosis taught me more about being successful than hours of reading content. If you want to have good game, you must surround yourself with guys who have good game.

Create win-win deals

> Deals work best when each side gets something it wants from the other.

Even though I don't care about real estate development, the book was hard to put down. I enjoyed reading about how Trump dealt with problems that would have stymied lesser men. If you are a fan of Trump and want to understand the forces that drive him, I highly recommend this book.

A lot of the time, guys who first hear about the manosphere community think that game is manipulative. What they don't realize, however, is that it's actually a win-win. Game, at its most basic level, teaches you to be an emotionally healthy man who can intuit what women feel, and act accordingly.

Game is a win-win, because both men AND women benefit from it. Men benefit by having access to higher quality women. Women benefit, because there's more men that can make them laugh, have fun, and feel good. Game is not about taking something from a woman, but rather creating an experience that you both enjoy—and that, my friends, is a true win-win deal.

How To Make A Living In A Foreign Country

December 10, 2016 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

There are better places to raise a family than the United States. Places with lower costs of living, better schools, and more intellectual freedom. However, one has to eat.

The most significant question is one that arises anywhere: should you work for somebody else or for yourself? Be a wage-slave or an entrepreneur? Given that wages are low by definition in places that are cheap to live, the balance overseas is even more favorable for investing and entrepreneurship. The person with capital to invest will get better returns, especially in this age in which the central banks have driven interest rates down to nothing in the developed world. This article addresses Ukraine, but the principles are the same everywhere.

Wage-slave

By all means, if you can avoid it, do not go overseas expecting to look for a job. Get somebody to send you. Let them pay for your relocation expenses and language lessons. Most companies will offer you an American salary, and if you are lucky they may give you an overseas differential and provide benefits such as housing. Every major city has some US-based law firms and accounting firms. Most have international schools for expatriates, and those schools recruit teachers in the United States through job fairs.

For the English speaker arriving on his own without special skills there are always low-paying jobs teaching and proofreading English. If you speak the local language you can translate and perhaps write for local English-language newspapers. However, competing with other expats and hungry, talented locals will not make you rich.

Henry J. Kaiser's credo was "Find a need and fill it." Each of us has a unique set of resources—intelligence, skills, education, persuasiveness, connections, access to money and so on. Each of us is continually surrounded by opportunities, needs to be filled. The entrepreneur is the guy who can profitably match the two sides of the equation.

The same holds overseas, but the balance is different. Command of the local language is usually worse. Some of your skills and credentials may not be valued in the local market. On the other hand, your knowledge of English, appreciation of how things are done in the West and problem-solving skills may give you an edge.

1. Offshoring

Information Technology is the best place for a young Ukrainian to make money

Ukraine enjoys several advantages. Young people here are intelligent, hard-working, and speak adequate English. Ukraine is culturally European and close to European markets.

Wages are low. Locals have yet to overcome the wage-slave mindset related to the country's Soviet legacy. There is a lot of corruption. But…in chaos there is opportunity. There are no customs agents on the Internet. Businesses dealing exclusively in intellectual property can thrive. The biggest such business here in Ukraine is software development. There is a lot of programming talent. Danes, Dutchmen and others who know their home markets well are able to sell the services of Ukrainian software developers.

Ukrainians are geniuses with design software such as Adobe and CAD/CAM. They can do amazing graphics, animation and videos in support of advertising, receiving the requirements over the Internet and sending the product back by the same. A Ukrainian friend with no capital but a good knowledge of English and a gift of gab via Skype has built a solid business over the past year and a half producing advertising animations.

It takes only an office and a telephone to get started. Besides being low wage, Ukraine is right-to-work. There are no unions, no diversity issues and little government interference. The benefits on the employment side offset the hassles with payroll taxes, tax reporting and corruption.

2. Import and business services

Many Europeans have succeeded with very traditional businesses. One acquaintance imports goods such as silverware, ladies' clothing and handbags for distribution through Ukrainian retailers. Another founded a freight expediting service serving primarily Northern European companies shipping goods into and out of Ukraine. These guys' asset is knowledge of the business and clients. They hire people to handle local language communications and interactions with government.

3. Agriculture and food

Agribusiness is big – and needs business services

Ukraine's agricultural sector continues to grow. The business model exploits the defects in Ukrainian law. It is hard for a farmer to sell his land and illegal for a foreigner to buy it. The workaround is leasing. Half a dozen large agricultural companies have acquired leasehold rights to great swathes of farmland. They buy fleets of modern equipment, brands such as John Deere, International Harvester and Claas, bring in Dutch agronomists to consult on crop rotation, seed selection and all such issues, and do a very good job of factory farming. There are opportunities in providing them professional services.

One is amazed, shopping in the Ukrainian markets, at the huge array of cured meat products and cheeses available. But few of them have brand names or distinctive flavors. Compare with France, where Camembert, brie, Roquefort and Gruyere are unique and command high prices. There is a niche to be exploited creating artisanal cheeses and meat products in Ukraine.

Specialty foodstuffs could grow the same way as fashion has. It requires intelligent, creative designers, a low-wage workforce to produce the clothes, and proximity to market. Just in the last five years several Ukrainian fashion firms such as Vovk and Olga Egorova seem to have come from nowhere. For the moment they are taking domestic market share from European exporters, but they will soon be competing in Europe and the United States.

4. Real estate and real estate information

Buildable lots 3 miles from Presidential Palace – $200,000 per acre

Raw land prices have fallen as much as 75% on account of the 2007 crisis and the war. Apartments and rents have fallen somewhat less. The upshot is that residential real estate will yield a fairly good return both in current income and future appreciation. Residential land titles are secure, registered via a comprehensive land cadaster.

Mortgage money is scarce and expensive in Ukraine. It keeps prices down, an advantage for an investor able to borrow in his home market at a rate close to zero. Structuring such deals—convincing foreigners that the reward of foreign land ownership offsets the risk, and setting up deals—is an entrepreneurial opportunity.

There are no national real estate companies like Century 21. There is no widespread information service such as Zillow to help standardize pricing. Therefore, there are more pricing anomalies to take advantage of in Ukraine. Less efficient markets mean that more opportunities for people who are willing to do their homework.

The pieces are in place to establish a real estate information service. There are three major online listing services. One could pull information from them to compile a comprehensive database of real estate for sale. The best source for actual sales prices would be registries with the land cadaster. Any system that employed algorithms such as Zillow’s to estimate the market value of property for sale would be a tremendous benefit. The business model might be advertising based, or premised on selling information on a proprietary basis to real estate investors.

5. Offshore Education

Medical students

American higher education is a slow-motion train wreck. It continues to use a nineteenth century model – stand and deliver teaching in a classroom. It is fraught with systematic problems:

- It is customer driven, but the customers often do not recognize or want quality.
- Costs have risen far more rapidly than inflation.
- The mandate to educate all comers drives quality down to the lowest common denominator.
- The leftist professoriate is politically out of touch with the country.
- There is a pervasive bias against men and marriage.

Education is the process of imparting knowledge, ending with the issuance of a piece of paper attesting to it. It is actually the student who must develop the knowledge within his own head. The University just midwifes the process through a system of lectures, assigned readings, laboratory experiments and discussion sessions.

The disadvantages are obvious. The rising generation is exempted from responsibility as they are bathed in anti-establishment thinking and social justice rhetoric which renders many unsuited to the workplace. This is a Kaiser-sized need to be filled. Ukraine could do it!

Ukraine is an ideal place for a residential, campus-based education serving both foreign and Ukrainian students. Ukrainians want to study in the English language and to obtain an American diploma. Americans will be attracted by the low price. Americans will also appreciate the lack of political correctness, forced diversity and anti-male bias. This is a society that accepts that men and women are different, amply demonstrated by attractive and traditional Ukrainian coeds.

The entrepreneur can arrange to use MOOC (massive online open course) lectures that are already available for free from a number of leading universities. Inexpensive and public domain E-books can serve as textbooks. The Internet can serve as the campus library.

The primary human interaction, as on most campuses, would be with teaching assistants. In the USA these lowly paid graduate students lead small group discussions of the lecture and reading material and grade written assignments. In Ukraine it will be easy to find better qualified teaching assistants for less money.

American colleges and universities are fighting over a shrinking pool of qualified students. Convincing one to expand overseas and make a dollar or two in the process should not be hard.

Conclusion

The best way to make money overseas is as an entrepreneur, whereby your income depends on your human and material resources rather than the level of prevailing wages. Every country offers a number of entrepreneurial opportunities. It is worth investigating doing it overseas. The opportunities are different, startup costs are lower, and foreign countries offer better opportunities for finding marriage partners and raising families.

How The Back Lever Can Increase Your Strength And Flexibility

If you will recall, a few months ago I wrote an article about gymnastics for the masculine man. Namely, how masculine men can utilize gymnastics to develop a great degree of strength, dexterity, and flexibility with very little space or equipment. And I still stand by that article, especially as my foot is still keeping me out of the gym until this coming April at the least. I am still capable of doing the static gymnastic poses.

But, of course, these are a daunting task to undertake for a man who is just beginning to train in gymnastics. The novice often doesn't know where exactly to start. From my experience, the easiest fundamental gymnastic static hold to master, and the one that has the most visible signs of progress, is the back body lever.

What Is It?

The back body lever is a static pose where your arms are held above your prone body as it hangs in mid air, with your head in front and the legs extending horizontally. Much like its easier forebear "skinning the cat" (discussed below), this one also develops the strength and dexterity of the shoulder rotator, as you are essentially hanging from this anatomical feature.

As you might expect, you won't be able to go into the full body lever right from the beginning, you have to work up to it through a series of progressively more complex exercises, the same as any other type of calisthenic.

To begin with, start with the inverted tuck hang

This isn't me, because my pull-up bar is situated in a way that the picture would be nothing more than my ass sticking out of a door frame.

You achieve this hold by hanging from a bar, and then lifting your legs up and through the "Grapevine" you make with your arms, bringing your legs down until your knees are parallel to the floor. This motion is dubbed "skinning the cat."

When done properly, you will feel muscular tension in your shoulders and in the muscles of the armpit. Keep the legs tucked tight, and just hold it for 10 seconds.

Once you've done that, you can attempt the straight back tuck hang.

See the above caption

It's just like the inverted tuck hang, but you keep your back straight. I find that pushing down with my hands and flexing the lats, combined with actively concentrating on straightening the back, will give you the proper pose.

Doing this pose will increase the involvement of the muscles of your lower back. You will noticeably feel a greater “burn”.

Once you have mastered this, try to extend your legs down to the floor while still keeping the back straight. This involves more strength and flexibility of the lower back, and in reversing the hold begins to involve the muscles of the hip flexors and abdomen as well: when you have assumed the proper pose (that is to say, going into the straight back hang with the legs fully extended), use the muscles of the torso to roll your body upwards and bring your feet back above your head while simultaneously keeping the back straight. You can do this for repetitions for a decent abdominal workout, but we of course would like to move on.

The last step I will be teaching you today is the inverted straight hang. More specifically, a modified variation of this hold. If you have gymnastic rings, these can be simply done (note that I use the term “simply” rather than “easily,” nothing about these exercises is particularly easy) by starting the “skin the cat”, rotating only half way so that your back is vertical, and then extending the legs until your back, hips, and legs are completely vertical and straight.

Seeing as I don’t have gymnastic rings, and it’s more likely that my readers own pull-up bars or have a conveniently placed horizontal support than own a pair of gymnastic rings, I will instead teach you a slightly modified form of the inverted straight hang.

Begin in the half-inverted hang as stated above. Then extend your feet and touch the ceiling. Unless you’re really short, your hips are still about halfway bent. Begin rolling back towards the full inverted hang, but do not complete the rotation. Each inch that you rotate further, straighten your hips a little bit more and extend your legs a bit farther. A good way to judge this is to progressively lean higher and higher portions of your buttocks against the horizontal bar, eventually reaching the lumbar region of the back, as I attempted to show in this image below.

I couldn’t have you people thinking I couldn’t “walk the walk.” To answer your questions: 1) Yes, this is the best possible picture I could have taken and 2) Yes, I usually don’t wear pants at home. Deal with it.

You will be slightly angled, but your body will be straight, and that is what is important.

And from here you can begin trying to slowly lower yourself into forms of back levers, “lowering into a hold” being a concept that is of the utmost importance in gymnastics.

But that is an article for another day.

10 Recent Examples Of Fake News From The “Real News” Media

December 11, 2016 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Refusing to learn from the great rebuke they’ve experienced this year, our friends in the legacy media have doubled down hard, continuing their shrieking hysterics and redoubling their efforts to clamp down on what they call “fake news.”

Though comical and a sign of desperation at their rapidly dwindling influence, we still must be cautious. I warned weeks ago that the collusion on the “fake news” angle by the media was the first step in an ad campaign to promote censorship, and with the recent incident at Comet Ping Pong being described as a result of “fake news” (undoubtedly a coordinated effort), we can expect more drives to censorship in the future given this perfect fodder for their narrative.

Unfortunately for the self-anointed watchdogs in our supposedly free press, the “fake news” label, while potentially potent, is ripe for reverse engineering, and it was immediately blown back at its creators. Here’s a brief rundown of 10 “fake news” stories peddled by the “real news” media.

10. Trump “Mocked A Reporter’s Disability”

Of all the hoaxes peddled by the media on Donald Trump in the past 18 months, this one was arguably the most glaringly obvious falsehood. The story goes that a Carlos Slim/Jeff Bezos blogger (otherwise known as the New York Times and the Washington Post, respectively), Serge Kovaleski, a man who suffers arthrogryposis, which gives him joint problems, was “mocked” by Donald Trump after a conflict over a story regarding Muslims celebrating on 9/11. To this day, Clinton News Network talking head Jake Tapper runs with this narrative as being objectively true. I’ll just let this one speak for itself.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_8JqT2atxD8

9. GamerGate

We've written extensively about GamerGate here, and for good reason, as it was the first true victory against the cultural left in many years. Yet the whole movement sprung as a result of "fake news" trickling into gaming media. Gamers, justly tired of being harangued and shamed by the fake news media, revolted against social justice intrusion in their space, but the revolt was characterized as a "targeted harassment campaign," and nothing but that, for months on end by the "real news" media. Laughably, cases of "harassment" were brought to the FBI, which were then closed due to lack of evidence.

The media failed to understand the actors involved in the revolt and that was a key reason why GamerGate eventually won.

The fake news media's arrogance and condescension acted as a blinder that failed to give it proper intelligence about the revolt and also caused more people to join it. It was a prelude of things to come.

8. The Assault On Roosh

In early 2015, Roosh wrote "How to Stop Rape." His mistake was assuming that people were smart enough to see the point of the post and not put a disclaimer that it was satire. In the age of outrage, this was foolish. When he took his lecture tour in August of that year to Canada, perhaps the headquarters of social justice freaks, he was immediately slapped with the "pro-rape" label, stalked, hounded by mobs, and assaulted.

The mob behavior further increased in intensity during the meetup outrage in February, when hundreds of publications in dozens of countries collectively labeled Roosh as pro-rape. Roosh, of course, acted in the best way and took the fight straight to them.

Fake news. The media lied.

7. The Rolling Stone Rape Hoax

In late 2014, Rolling Stone released its infamous "A Rape on Campus" story. The "journalist," Sabrina Rubin Erdely, went around campuses looking for a rape story that year. The University of Virginia tale spun by Jackie Coakley was the best she could find. While the outrage machine began after its publication, others quickly found discrepancies in the story and it unraveled. In the old days, any rookie journalist would have known not to publish this, but in the age of narrative spinning called real news, it went through. At least this time some justice has been done, as defamation lawsuits regarding the story have been successful.

Fake news. The media lied.

Stories like this unfortunately do damage beyond the parties immediately effected. They contribute to a culture of rape hysteria, which naturally puts men under unfair scrutiny and prevents meaningful relationships from forming, as an air of fear permeates.

And Obama has the gall to discuss “the problem of fake news” with this hoaxing outlet. Sometimes I wonder if they’re even trying to appear credible anymore.

6. “Hands Up, Don’t Shoot”

August, 2014. Michael Brown, a black man, was killed by a white police officer in Ferguson, Missouri. Early accounts had postured that Brown had his hands up in surrender and was shot anyway. The story was circulated widely by the media, along with pictures of Brown in his cap and gown. All of this led the audience to the conclusion that Brown was a good, upstanding citizen shot by racist police. It was perfect fodder for the desired narrative, which is why responsible journalists should have been skeptical. They weren’t.

And so the Black Lives Matter movement was born in the minds of the mainstream public (it started before this but it became mainstream after this incident). Of course all of the evidence that was collected contradicted this emotional tale. There was no “hands up, don’t shoot” incident.

Fake news. The media lied.

And it has continued to lie about the Black Lives Matter movement, which has already inspired murders. Case in point:

Fake news. The media lied.

And they're now upset over his victory tour. Fortunately, you'll always have me to tell you the real story.

4. "Russian Hackers" And "Propaganda"

While the fake news media constantly accuses its opponents of peddling conspiracy theories, they peddled a big and far more dangerous one this year, that Russia, under the auspices of a Vladimir Putin that seems to be the person responsible for everything they hate, would do whatever bad thing they imagined in their nightmares.

We've often heard stories about "Russian hackers," particularly in regard to Podesta's emails, but he was seriously lax on his security, and it wouldn't take the Russian equivalent of the NSA to hack his accounts.

The so-called attacks by “Russian hackers” on DNC servers was ambiguously reported by intelligence agencies as being such, but there may be another story.

Regardless of the veracity of these accusations, the emails were legitimate, and the Russian narrative took precedence in the media over this simple question—“should our politicians be acting this way?” The media, in their zeal for Hillary Clinton, largely ignored the newsworthiness of the leaked emails throughout the campaign. Small wonder, since many of those emails showed outright collusion that went undisclosed.

And then there’s the latest focus on Russian propaganda in the “fake news” crusade by the media. Jeff Bezos’ blog created what was essentially a blacklist, yet it was based on the most faulty of premises, as stated even by another premier hoaxing site.

3. The “Refugee” Crisis

This was (and is) one of the most transparent hoaxes of all time and impressive in its sheer audacity. Peaking in 2015, the media went to Europe to focus the spotlight as brightly as it could on “refugees,” showing the sorrowful faces of women and children, while in the background lurked…something else.

Yeah, you guessed it. The vast majority of these refugees are military-aged men. Many, if not most of them, didn’t even come from Syria or any other conflict zone. If you asked any questions, you were “racist.”

Fake news. The media lied.

2. The Syrian Civil War

In what is perhaps the greatest long term failure in journalistic history, the media has shamelessly and flagrantly lied about the real situation in Syria ever since the war began in 2011, towing the line of their reverent political masters and their Saudi financial overlords.

Say it once and say it loudly: there. are. no. “moderate.” Syrian. rebels.

Instead, the West, Turkey, and the Gulf States have been training, arming, and supplying Islamist jihadists to overthrow a secular government that, while it may not be “nice,” keeps public order in place in a dangerous region of the world.

Quintus Curtius gives the best accessible overview of the war, which he has been closely following, on his website.

The media won’t report that our weapons have gotten into the hands of al-Qaeda and ISIS and it won’t report the real goings-on on the ground, how the people feel about the “rebels,” and so on. Instead we’ll simply get warmongering so-called journalists like crybaby Martha Raddatz prattling canned lines that basically amount to “BUT WHAT ABOUT ALEPPO?!”

The whole Syrian Civil War has been a five year extravaganza of “fake news.” The media lied.

1. The Invasion Of Iraq

I don’t think there has ever been in modern times a single piece of journalistic failure that was so damaging and so far-reaching. Trillions of dollars have been spent, hundreds of thousands of lives lost, and for what, exactly?

Throughout 2002 and early 2003 we were told the following things:

1. Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction.
2. Saddam Hussein was connected to al-Qaeda.
3. Iraq posed a threat to the United States.

None of these things were true, and the media, without much integrity, drummed up the war dutifully. Judith Miller of the publication now known as Carlos Slim’s blog was perhaps the biggest peddler of all behind that narrative.

Fake news. The media lied.

7 Essential Qualities For Masculine Friendship

December 12, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Of all human relationships, I would argue that male bonding is the most important of them all (yes, above sex relations and family) that defines a man's identity. Every successful society through the progress of humanity existed because men who were dedicated and committed to their tribe worked together as one to build and fight. In contrast, the lack of male bonding that we see today is both a cause and symptom of the debasement of masculinity.

That said, I think it's more imperative now than ever to restore male bonding and brotherhood to counter modern society's efforts to divide us and make us weak. We need to form groups to reassert ourselves as men. Towards this end, here are some traits you should seek in other men while cultivating them yourself.

1. Loyalty

Friendship is nothing without loyalty and this is especially true among men. In fact, I would go as far as to say that this is the most important trait a man should have (that, of course, doesn't mean that other traits aren't important). Really, what are we but bunch of goons and individualist drones if we can't even remain committed to our friends?

On the flip side, however important loyalty may be, there are limits to be observed. Basic principles need to be guarded and you must ensure that you're not being suckered into a position of being used by some of the more selfish and narcissistic men with no honor.

2. Reliability

Men need to be reliable for one another. Leave the flaking, incompetence, and making excuses for the females. As men, we need to enhance each other's lives rather than detract from them. I'm sad to report that I've had female friends who were far more reliable than many men whom I placed my trust on—and this is coming from someone who is advocating for men to shun friendship with women.

Now, this doesn't mean you should be a complete tool and be a yes-man who will do anything and everything for your friends, but I think we can all try to be a little more reliable for one another.

3. Understanding

In spite of whatever differences we may have, we in the manosphere share the fact that we have all taken the red pill and experienced what it is like to be a man in the current state of society. We know the hardships associated with the conditions we've been thrown in, so I think we need to be more understanding of each other rather than being judgmental.

The truth is, nobody really knows what it means to be a man in the modern world where men aren't foisted with the same responsibilities that our forefathers had. Yes, we have some vague ideas about strength, confidence, being able to attract women, etc., but those are not necessarily masculine identities. There are especially many young men who may not have been so fortunate to have strong fathers or had the chance to grow up in a more masculine environment. These men are lost and confused, they fumble and make mistakes, but they're trying. I believe those who are more developed and accomplished shouldn't look down on those are still struggling to make something for themselves.

4. Support

Men should be supportive of their friends, but only up to a point. Every man is different and has different philosophy on how to help and how much. I personally do as much as I humanly can to support any man who asks for help in any form. And if you're the one in the position of needing help, know that it's a skill you have to learn. Too much, you're just being needy and dependent; too little (or none at all), and you might be needlessly putting yourself at a disadvantage out of fear or pride. But if a fellow man who is supposed to be a friend doesn't offer you a hand or even a word of solace during your darkest hours, I say lose him.

5. Honesty

This is one thing I'll agree on with this hippie.

I think brutal honesty is something we should start practicing more often as men. Fake compliments and fake reassurances are for women. As men, we need to tell each other the harsh truths so that we will grow instead of being coddled inside a bubble. Like many other men, I've always been afraid to simply tell the truth because I didn't want to seem blunt, rude, arrogant, or whatever. But no more.

This, of course, doesn't mean that you should always speak your mind or always tell the truth, but that you should do so at the right moment with the people who matter to you. If you're in doubt, just try it out and see your confidence grow while conflict and ambiguity clears from your heart.

6. Masculinity

I had a friend with all of the above traits. He was more loyal, reliable, understanding, supportive, and honest than any other man I've met. He was truly a good man with good intentions. But there was just something about him that made me feel a strain of aversion; it was as if he was infected with something that I wanted to avoid by limiting my contact with him. And I knew exactly what it was: he was too effeminate. In spite of the fact that he was morally upstanding and not like the I'm too cool assholes I've dealt with, I just found it very hard to connect with him because he was too soft (I guess I now know how girls feel about nice guys).

I read in a book called The Charisma Myth that charisma is power plus warmth. If we were to apply that concept to masculinity, I would say that the ideal man for friendship is someone who is tough yet sympathetic, ruthless yet kind, masculine yet humane. Look for those men and try to be one yourself.

7. Brotherhood

Finally, men need a sense of shared identity or a mission to form a brotherhood. Men in tribes before civilization were grouped out of necessity and purpose. For that reason, all of the traits listed here were invaluable for their survival and dominance. But with the advent of the modern, gynocentric order, men today just occasionally get together to drink, talk, or have fun. There is nothing that compels men to group and bond together as they were meant to. I suppose this is why so many men today engage in surrogate activities like spectator sports and multi-player video games just to experience the emotional high that comes with masculine camaraderie: something that had been robbed from them. This must change.

Conclusion

If you want a male group, don't wait for some signal or for some leader to emerge and rally you. Find other men that you belong to and create a purpose for you to unite under. Seek closer ties with men you already know and are in contact with. The more divided we are, the more we'll be exploited and the more the others will try to control us. There are countless men out there who share the same views and issues as you, but it isn't enough to just interact on the Internet. Whether it be with personal relationships or political connections, try to solidify your bonding with other men.

Western Society Has Become Completely Inverted

Everything that was once false is now true, and everything that was once immoral is now moral. This change was started with the Baby Boomers, enhanced under Generation X, solidified with the Millennials, and now nearly complete with Generation Z. In just four generations we've seen the re-engineering of human behavior and values to promote all that is deviant and depraved.

An example of this happened in Berlin during my lecture tour last year, described in my book Free Speech Isn't Free, when drunk gays were dancing almost naked on the streets while heterosexual men had to meet in secret to hear a speech on ordinary masculinity. I described what happened during the New York lecture:

> Women and gays are now seen as superior to straight men. They are being given the benefits in the universities and in the media before everyone here. Their voice is amplified while ours is muted. Three weeks ago, I had a lecture in Berlin. There was a man over here who was there. I had to hide where the venue was, like I did here. I couldn't say where the event was taking place until about twelve hours before. At the same time we held the event, outside on the streets in full view, guess what was going on? A gay pride parade.
> Hundreds of people, gay men with their shirts off, humping each other. The music was loud. Alcohol was flowing. And to top it off, there was a midget gimp on a leash. (Laughter.) I got a witness, he was there. The gimp was in a leather mask like a slave midget, being led around, and we have to hide. This is what happens. (Laughter.) There are kids outside: "Mommy, what's that little man in the leather?" But I can't say where I'm going to hold this event. And many of you here right now are scared to death that someone is going to take your photo. (Laughter.) One thing is you can't lift up a group without pushing down someone else, and we are the ones getting pushed down.

What’s happening is the manipulation of humans to enter their weakest and most corrupt state. This prevents family formation and makes it easier for them to be controlled. When humans are driven by transient feelings of lust, gluttony, and sex instead of traditional rituals, moderation, and strength, they are slaves to their present desires and needs. The inversion can easily be seen in photos.

Some of these changes were at least partially inevitable with the introduction of technology, but most of it is engineered with the explicit intent to weaken humanity. And it's working. We're so distracted by our own frivolous desires and concerns, so exhausted from being pestled by elite-sponsored phenomenon like migrants, ISIS terrorists, social justice warriors, and Black Lives Matters, that we have nothing left to fight against the puppet masters behind it all, and that's even assuming you've reached a level of awareness where you see the top level organization and funding.

Inverting society so that what was once strong is now weak while weaponizing useful idiots to act as shock troops against the few remaining strong men who survived the engineering is the powerful one-two combination that we must face. If you rise above a certain level of awareness or masculinity, you will either be forced to hide like the men who attended my lecture in Berlin or outright attacked and be threatened with the removal of your livelihood. You must now make a decision of how you will respond as the societal inversion gets worse and the attacks against you get bigger.

A French Writer’s Defense Of Religion As A Social Good

Before and during the French Revolution, the intellectual mood of Europe had favored the elevation of “reason” over faith and tradition. Philosophers, scientists, and intellectuals in the salons were united in condemning what they saw as the excesses of Church power, along with its supposed promotion of obscurantist doctrines that prevented the “natural development” of the human condition.

But for every action, there is a reaction. The rationalists of the Enlightenment overstated their case; they had too great a belief in “reason” as a cure for all men’s ills, and forgot that reason itself can become a religion. Men adapt their logic and reasoning to suit their desires; and what may appear to be “rational” may only be our instincts in disguise. The Enlightenment went too far: it forgot that men cannot live on reason alone; he needs a sustaining faith in something bigger than himself to carry him through the inevitable trials of life. Myths, legends, and the pageantry of the Mass are psychological supports that have provided untold benefits to countless generations, and to denigrate this is self-defeating.

The bloody excesses and anti-religiosity of the French Revolution seemed to prove this point. The Romantic movement arose partially in response to the Enlightenment's contempt for the imagination, myths, and legends that had been part of European culture for centuries. It was only a matter of time before some capable thinker explained just how religion served as a net benefit to the people. That man was author François-René de Chateaubriand, and his book was entitled Génie du christianisme (The Genius of Christianity). It appeared in 1802; the second issue, issued the next year, he prudently dedicated to Napoleon.

We should note here that the word génie does not have the meaning of the English word "genius." It is more akin to the Latin word genius (from which it is derived), which means "spirit" or "essence." Chateaubriand's thesis was essentially that the Church, despite its flaws and occasional crimes, served as such a support to the moral order of society that it was an indispensable part of Western civilization. Where others saw an authoritarian religion crushing the "rational" human spirit, he saw a vital pillar of social order.

He began by summarizing the fundamental doctrines of Catholic Christianity, and expressing his belief in them. A belief in some form of God is necessary, he argued, simply to prevent life from becoming a merciless Darwinian struggle of all against all. Without some higher moral power, nothing at all matters, and anyone can do anything without fear of repercussion. By making the religious believer part of a community united by the common bonds of faith, the Church had brought immeasurable good to the lives of the average person for centuries. Far from liberating the human spirit, atheists had simply enslaved man to anxiety and despair: for if there is no higher power, then man is adrift in a meaningless universe, and his life has no significance.

Taking his cue from Pascal, Chateabriand frankly believed that it was better for a man to believe in some God than to take on faith the impersonal swerving atoms of Lucretius. For even if he is wrong, he will live a happier life than the materialist atheist. How can anyone, he thought, gaze on the glories of the natural world and not think that some divine purpose was behind it all?

But it was in the subject of morals and social order that he found the greatest need for the Church's firm hand. People cannot be admonished to do good by words alone; there must be something more powerful behind the admonition. Man must both love and fear God; for fear serves just as indispensable a purpose in social order as does love. It would not be enough for Moses to write down some rules and hand them to his people: he had to claim that they were of divine origin, for otherwise people would not take them as seriously. The same applies to the divinely-revealed moral codes of Islam.

No one should see anything cynical or opportunistic in this, Chateaubriand warned his readers. Human passions (lust, greed, selfishness, etc.) are so strong that people will always find ways of justifying their passions with the garb of reason. The moral code (backed by religion) must have a supernatural (i.e., God) sanction if it is to be respected and believed from one generation to the next. This is simply the reality. The values of faith, hope, and charity are more socially cohesive than the individualistic values of lust, greed, and selfishness; so we must make a conscious decision to elevate one set of ethics over another.

Finally, he argues, we should remember that the pursuit of "truth" is not everything in life. Societies that abandon the religions that form the foundations of their civilizations tend to crumble and fall; once we kick out the structural support of religion, then selfishness and greed runs rampant, and society suffers as a consequence. Who can doubt that Chateaubriand here makes a valid point?

The reaction to the Genius of Christianity was generally positive. He argued more from emotion than from reason, but sometimes emotion is more important. Conservatives horrified at the excesses of rationalism and revolution were buoyed by the prospect of finding a philosophical justification for their own preferences; the Church was understandably pleased; and Napoleon, a man of order first and foremost, no doubt nodded his own head in approval at Chateaubriand's eloquent chapters. His influence on the Romantic movement is undeniable, as is the fact that he helped stimulate the French Catholic revival.

Twenty years after the Revolution tried to purge religion from France, it was back and more powerful than ever. Resiliency is the best measure of worth.

How Feminism Led Us To Demographic Annihilation

December 13, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Running themes in Pieter Bruegel's works include the absurdity, wickedness and foolishness of humans, and the above painting entitled Netherlandish Proverbs is no exception. Painted in 1559, nearly 500 years later the work of art still represents the foolishness of our declining society as it eats, drinks, and acts merry even while the very foundations of Western nations wash out from under it like sand in the tides.

Take a look around the crumbling remains of the West. The population of nations has never been replaced as rapidly as it is being replaced now unless those being conquered lost a war. We indeed have lost a war, but it's not a military war we lost. We lost a cultural war. It has been said a great nation can't be conquered from without until it destroys itself from within. That's exactly what happened to Europe and America.

Most people have no idea why the West is dying. Every major problem we have relates to one simple issue: traditional Europeans and Americans have become demographically non-viable.

The long and short of it is, there's a magic number demographers use to demonstrate the viability of a culture or ethnic group. There must be an average minimum of 2.1 births per woman to sustain a culture. Traditional European and American women have fallen short of that reproductive mark for 40 years. The ongoing demographic conquest and resettlement of both continents is a direct result of this dereliction of traditional female duty brought on by feminism. The welfare state and child support slavery laws aimed at turning men into sperm donors and indentured servants have added insult to injury.

In many ways, feminism can be seen as the ultimate betrayal of the Western beta male and the ultimate display of female solipsism. It is the root cause of population decline in the West. This is likely why ancient wisdom from the Bible consistently warns men about female nature.

European and American men of yore built the most peaceful and prosperous societies on the planet and women thanked their posterity by not reproducing with them in sufficient numbers to keep the machinery of the perpetual motion, infinite growth economy running. Nor do they reproduce with them in sufficient numbers to even maintain the population. And the situation gets worse with each passing year. As a direct result of feminism, more white people are now dying than being born. For that reason research will be done in the coming year in search of an answer to this looming question: Have American women really become the worst in on the planet from both biological and subjective standpoints?

A Dying Population

The average age of a first-time mother is up from age 21 in 1970 to age 26 today

Within the past few weeks, Establishment media gleefully trumpeted:

> In around 1/3 of U.S. states, more white people are now dying than being born — a major shift that is expected to continue and has significant implications for government policy. Seventeen states — home to 121 million people, or roughly 38% of the country's population — had more deaths than births among non-Hispanic whites in 2014, up from just four states a decade earlier, according to research released Tuesday by the University of New Hampshire's Carsey School of Public Policy.

Just to emphasize: The number of states where more whites are now dying than being born is increasing rapidly, not decreasing.

The end result of feminism will be that two continents (and possibly a third with Australia) will be conquered—yes, conquered—demographically. It is over for the Evil White Male and he has only himself and his statistically sterile women to thank for it.

One only need travel around the USA to see that even parts of Kansas and Nebraska now resemble Mexico and Spanish is the lingua franca, not English. One can also glance at demographic trends that show Hispanic births will outnumber Anglo births sometime around 2040. That's little more than a generation away, folks. The USA will be an appendage of Latin America in only a couple of generations and Europe will have cities and areas of many countries that are majority Muslim.

If you wonder why you are becoming a stranger in your own nation—this is what feminism hath wrought.

Every problem the West now faces boils down to the demographic implosion of traditional Western populations brought on by feminism and the extremely poor quality of its women from a reproductive and familial standpoint. No matter how much wailing and gnashing of the teeth feminists make, nature comes down to the heartless business of saving those heredities that work, and rejecting those that don't. Once a population adopts feminism, heredities don't work any longer.

By Design?

"You are an old man who thinks in terms of nations and peoples. There are no nations. There are no peoples. There is no West. There is only one holistic system of systems, one vast and immane, interwoven, interacting, multivariate, multinational dominion of dollars." -Network, 1976

Keeping the machinery of a perpetual growth, consumer economy is why immigration has become arguably necessary as traditional Western populations die off, and why Western leaders have opened the flood gates to refugees (an opportune moment for them to consolidate power by doing so, too, unscrupulous as they are.) The only question remaining is, is the demographic resettlement of Europe and America happening because of historical cycles of civilization or is it by design of a maniacal Establishment?

After all, it should be common knowledge among policy makers the population actually needs to be growing slightly in a Western economy in order to be stable. The effects of passing policies to slow population growth among certain ethnic groups must be known by demographers and politicians.

What's more, the fewer traditional Europeans and Americans who are born have become too effette to carry on many of the necessary dirty jobs and blue collar tasks a functioning society requires due to decades of "special snowflake" indoctrination in the edumacation system.

It's as if a scientific study was done on how to attack and debase the West, then politicians proceeded to do just that.

That said, effeminate Western men, who worship Hollyweird marionettes rather than themselves or traditional religions have some blame for not setting their foot down and saying “Enough is enough!” before this catastrophe became deeply embedded in the fabric of society.

Cliff’s Notes: The “monster” i.e. the infinite growth economy needs an ever increasing supply of warm bodies to keep it functioning. When white women don’t bear enough children to keep it running, and white people in general become too effette to do blue collar labor, leaders bring in other groups to keep the machinery of the economy moving.

Feminism was the hemlock that changed everything for the West.

Nothing lasts forever: All civilizations eventually decline, according to historians

History’s Cycles Echo

Another way of looking at this is through the lens of Spengler’s Decline of the West, in which he predicted the very demographic tsunami now hitting the West. Through this lens, feminism is only the manifestation of Spengler’s predictions by a gynocentric and pussy pedestalizing culture.

In Decline of the West, a sweeping, epic study of the cycles of 6 previous civilizations going back 5,000 years and the later Man and Technics, Spengler predicted – a century ago – all the tragedies currently befalling the West. Academics often quibble with his work, but no one can deny he foresaw the current decline with astonishing accuracy.

Here’s basically why the West is being conquered, condensed down for easy digestion.

Spengler saw each high culture and civilization in terms of four seasons. In the declining “Winter” phase of a society of a civilization is which we find ourselves, the center of a nation’s culture shifts from its rural roots to the cities. Out of the irreligious metropolis, as the intellect of the city sterilizes the religion and traditions of a culture, life becomes a series of problems to be analyzed rather than a thing to be lived. Western man’s irreligious, rational, materialistic intellect has sterilized everything about his culture by analyzing it to death – including himself as fertility has declined. An epidemic of snarky, nihilistic manchildren helps illustrate this point.

Feminism is, of course, a representation of the intellect sterilizing the simpler, more intuitive, and more fulfilling ways of life. The other tenets of liberalism also represent the “intellectual” destroying the foundations of the culture.

City intellectuals arrogantly criticize and shame the rural, intuitive ways of life of the masses of people. Religion and traditions are mocked, art itself becomes repetition of past great works, and children are weighed in terms of economic pros and cons rather than a necessity for the promulgation of not only the economy but the ethnic group itself.

The population is then ripe for conquest. Which is happening before our very eyes. As Spengler knew, we can face our fate with cowardly optimism or brave pessimism.

Things only get worse from here as friction grows between traditional Europeans and Americans who have very different ways of life from those who will soon make up the majority of their nations. Democracy will end in the Western world as white people no longer have power at the very ballot boxes they created within a generation or two.

Just remember—feminism (and by extension, weakling males) was at the root of it all when the time comes. When will men stop being White Knights and call a spade a spade, then take away the Pussy Pass women have enjoyed far too long?

How The Manosphere Saved The Republican Party And America

This is the first installment of a multi-part series.

Now that the election is over, and Trump has won against nearly impossible odds, and yet I knew he'd overcome them and take the blue collar rust belt states and Florida with at least 30% of the Latino vote, it's time to get down to business, gentlemen. Just as I was confident Trump would win in a fair election, I also know what is going to happen to the future of America's economy should his legislation pass. I know what needs happen in the Republican party for the country to survive, and for the well-being of our neighbors. I also know what must happen for the men here.

During the primaries, all we needed was to do was campaign on the internet. And there was a reason for that. People who vote in the primaries are typically well-informed voters. Well-informed voters use the internet. The internet is far more powerful than television or knocking on individual doors. Well-informed voters understood the TV had become propaganda back in 2013-2014, and we were the biggest part of redpilling the internet.

It's funny, the term redpill, as far as I am aware, was coined in the manosphere, with Roissy being the most articulate (now Chateau Heartiste), then we developed more red pill ideas here which were broadcast more at Return of Kings, and now the term "red pill" is even used everywhere on the net. You even hear it in day to day conversation sometimes. Our effect on the culture has been massive.

They say politics is downstream from culture, and now we have a President who once said to “grab ‘em by the pussy.” We shouldn’t dismiss how influential we’ve been, although it can be hard to measure our influence as we have no direct measuring instruments to know for sure. But we can be confident in our knowledge that the redpill concept started in our communities and spread to the rest of the world.

How, you ask? There are two types of leaders – political leaders, and thought leaders. Both are equally important, but the internet has changed the nature of the game for intellectuals. Previously thought leaders had to get their word out through books. Books are a holdover from the printing-press era, a 550 year old invention. We are so used to the reality of the printing press and books that people are still catching onto the power of the internet.

We no longer need books. Authors can just write essays and get read within seconds of publishing. Thought leaders today are more powerful than ever before.

Control a man’s thoughts, and you control his behavior

For 99.9% of people, all thoughts come from words used by other people. Almost all knowledge is inherited, except for the geniuses among us who create the first thoughts. This is why Orwell said freedom of speech is really freedom to think. This is also why free-will is largely an illusion. Your thoughts are rarely your own. Therefore we know what we hear spoken by others came from someone else. And the whole redpill philosophy is nothing more than a reassertion of basic human nature, and, more importantly and novelly, of female nature, something completely lost on the vast majority of philosophers throughout Western Civilization with the notable exception of Arthur Schopenhauer’s On Women, and ancient Christian thinkers like St. Augustine and the Apostle Paul.

Thus I, Mike Cernovich, Roosh, and most of the smartest men of the manosphere all give credit to Roissy, who was the most articulate and accurate philosopher of women in the 20th century; an early adopter of the internet to spread contrary ideas, a man who took the simplistic PUA movement of the early 2000’s into so much more. He sparked a movement that took Roosh to the next level (ironic as Roosh’s blogging encouraged Roissy to start his blog) and create his own forum, which then gave rise to many esteemed posters, and Return of Kings as the pre-eminent media outlet of the redpill manosphere.

The Roosh V Forum in particular has easily been the greatest think-tank produced in the last 30 years on cultural issues facing Western men. In fact, I am tempted to say it is the greatest cultural think-tank of all time because of it's use of the internet, plus it's rules for free speech, plus the banning of women (because they distract men!).

So many different men from America have chimed in here, from every state in the country, although mainly from the Northeast, and many from all over the world, producing thoughts and opinions contrary to nearly everything taught about women in the past 100 years, and in many ways, the past 1800 years. You have to go back to Roman times where the women were equally as decadent as the ones we have today to find similar opinions as ours, such as Ovid, but even then, the lack of internet meant it was easy to suppress those voices and keep the truth of women hidden from other men.

The impact of the manosphere

As a result, the manosphere was extremely important for winning Trump the primaries. We tilled the cultural soil using the internet as our plow, which paved the way for a man like Trump to reap the harvest.

To understand just how big our impact has been, we need only to look at how much single men abandoned the Democrats and their feminist platform. A loss of 15% Democrats and a gain of 5% Republicans translates to at least 15 million men:

Make no mistake, we've destroyed the hegemony of the feminist narrative with our internet army. At least half of America's single men (mainly young men) think feminism is bullshit. And since it is mainly men who vote in the primaries, we were able to use logic and reason to persuade the non-internet men into accepting Trump and dominate the primaries, with the largest victory of any Republican nominee, ever, of 14 million votes.

A resounding victory, yet, we still have more work to do, although at this point the inertia is doing most of the work for us. We're also moving away from hypocritical Christianity and toward real Christianity, where acceptance of our Neighbor's sins is the norm instead of ostracization so people can love and heal each other as neighbors. This is also critical, as I will explain later.

Still, when Trump announced his campaign, there was still a lot of uncertainty about the man and his policies. We hashed out our arguments for and against Trump on the forum, and once our arguments were developed, we went out onto Twitter, political websites like Breitbart, Reddit, DallyCaller, 4chan, 8chan, the disqus comment sections of mainstream news like NBC and MSNBC, and we crushed all other arguments with ease. The people who watched us defeat our cuckservative opponents then copy-pasted the arguments to other sites and took them to their friends and family, who then carried these arguments to other places, etc.

The internet is truly an amazing game changer, and it has had an amazing impact on our culture and democracy.

8 Reasons You Must Teach Your Son To Cook

December 13, 2016 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

A man should not be dependent on women for anything except that which women are uniquely equipped to provide: love and companionship, bearing his children, and nurturing them. Being self-sufficient is a man's source of pride and the essence of independence. Anybody can cook. In fact, most women are delighted to find a man who can cook—modern women often don't know their way around the kitchen. Teaching your son to cook is a vital step in raising him to be a man.

1. Cooking gives a boy adult responsibilities

Cooking is a connection with the real world. It gives a boy the chance to work alongside adults and make a contribution to the family. Contrast this with school work, in which the kid passively takes whatever the adults hand out, or leisure time activities which are mostly intended to keep him busy. Every kid is eager to be respected as a full-fledged human being.

A child can start to help in the kitchen at an early age. We let our son use a paring knife to cut apples at two years old. He is now up to getting the ingredients out of the cupboards, measuring and mixing, weighing ingredients, and feeding meat and vegetables into the food processor.

Taking him grocery shopping lets a boy have some impact on the menu. He will tell you if he would rather have oranges than apples, broccoli rather than spinach. It is also a chance to teach him about value. How much do the apples cost relative to the oranges? It gives him a chance to think about ingredients. Are there really evil chemicals in soft drinks, like everybody says? Is there anything special about bottled water that makes it worth a dollar per bottle? How much sugar is there in a candy bar? Besides which, carrying groceries—and even being allowed to buy some things on his own—makes him feel important.

2. Cooking is educational

Stirring pancakes

Grocery shopping and cooking demand some mental math. If two pizza crusts take 2 ½ cups of flour, how much do you need for three? If olives are on sale, buy one can and get another for half price, how much of a discount is that? Working as we do with American recipes in a metric kitchen, there is a lot of opportunity for conversion. Yesterday's fish required a hot oven—450°F. Quick, in your mind—how much is that in centigrade? That is not a question for a five-year-old, but a high schooler should be able to handle it.

Making our own sauerkraut, pickles and pizza dough offers lessons in biology and chemistry. Why does bread rise? What makes pickles sour? Why aren't pancakes sour when you make them using vinegar and soda? Inquiring young minds want to know!

A real man should be the master of his world. He should be handy, and a good part of a father's job is to teach a boy to be handy. Boys have a fascination with screwdrivers, hammers, saws and all kinds of machinery. A responsible father will ensure that his son has a chance to work with all of them. The advantage of starting such work in a kitchen is that the tools are generally easier to use. A kid can begin at a younger age. Also, mother is more likely both to work in the kitchen than the toolshed. The boy can learn from both parents.

3. Cooks pay attention to their health

Cooks know what they are putting into their bodies. This is cheesecake

A cook is aware of what he is putting into his body. He measures the sugar going into a pie or the cream going into a quiche. Men have a vague notion that the stuff they buy at Cinnabon or Chipotle are not good for them, but there is no graphic display equivalent to seeing the ingredients laid out on the kitchen table prior to cooking. In addition, people who publish recipes have different motivations than restaurateurs. They try to convince you that the recipe will be tasty and nutritious.

Restaurants encourage you to spend as much as possible. A cookbook will balance a meal among the three major food groups: meat and dairy, fruits and vegetables, and carbohydrates. A fast-food operation balances among three groups of seductive poisons: sugar, salt and fat. Teaching your kid to cook is a significant step toward keeping him healthy.

Cooking is a better way to occupy the child's time than electronic amusements. In addition to giving him the satisfaction of creating something useful for to the family, it will keep him busy. Our five-year-old can spend half an hour at a time cracking walnuts or stringing popcorn for the Christmas tree. Every walnut presents a unique challenge. How should he position the nutcracker on this particular nut? How can he dig out the last piece of nutmeat? Even time spent on the computer is not wasted if he is doing something like researching mince pie recipes with daddy.

Cooking is exercise. Most of the work is done standing up, moving around the kitchen. It involves a lot of lifting, moving, chopping and scrubbing. While it will not replace a serious workout regimen, it certainly beats sitting on the couch and watching the boob tube.

4. Cooking is thrifty

A lot of young people do not learn the habit of thrift. They start life with a debt-slave mentality, accepting with resignation that they will be behind the eight ball all their lives, starting with their mountain of educational loans. They close their eyes the consequences, order what they want in a restaurant and let the credit card debt stack up.

Wrong! At a restaurant, the raw ingredients account for only about a third of the final bill. Cooking saves money—your kid can cook for himself and pocket the difference. The responsible person who prepares his own meals and watches his pennies will come out ahead of the game. He is in charge of his life. He will wind up with more money, and of course a better selection of the good things in life, such as marriage partners.

5. Cooks learn to clean up

He’s proud of himself – and helpful as well

You can’t work in a messy kitchen. A chef has to start with clean counters and know where to find his pots, pans and cooking utensils. An apprentice chef quickly learns that there is no substitute for cleanliness and order… working in a messy kitchen takes more time and results in more mistakes.

Cleaning up is guaranteed to bring praise from the adults. Kids can start by cleaning the table, then putting things away, then progress to cleaning dishes and on to pots and pans. There is work at every age level.

6. Cooking saves time

Even “fast food” is not that fast when you take into account the travel time to get to the restaurant. A man who learns to be efficient in the kitchen can wind up eating better, more cheaply, and even more quickly. A simple dinner such as hamburger or pork chops, frozen vegetables and rice takes about half an hour to cook. While it is cooking, a guy can take a moment or two to glance at his email.

The serious cook plans ahead. If he is tight on time, as most young people with serious jobs are, he can plan a week or so in advance. Make do with one major trip to the grocery store. Cook dishes that will serve for two or three meals. If it's chicken, plan to eat a third of it now, leave another third in the refrigerator for tomorrow, and put the other third in the freezer, ready to microwave in a pinch.

7. Ladies love men who cook

Knives are for guys, dude. You should be showing her.

Sometimes a young man has unexpected company. Perhaps a young woman. What better place to invite her than to his house? It is cheaper than a restaurant and closer to the sofa. He might have something in the freezer that he can microwave quickly, such as the above-mentioned chicken. He might have something a little fancier, perhaps a quiche that he cooked for himself—it is not hard to do. Imagine how impressed she will be just to find a guy with a homemade quiche in his refrigerator! Homemade borscht was instrumental in my getting married.

When a girl comes over, what you talk about? Men are from Mars, women are from Venus. It can sometimes be difficult to come up with a topic of conversation. However, most women are interested in cooking and if a guy can converse comfortably on the subject, it provides common ground. Even more promising, she may be interested in sharing the work in the kitchen. What an opportunity! "Dear, can you take the lid off this jar? It's very tight." "Dear, I am scared of that great big French knife, and I cry easily. Could you please chop the onions?"

As they are working together in a small kitchen they just accidentally brush up against each other every now and again. He might even have to put his arms around her to show her how to hold the paring knife. The opportunities are endless. It could even lead to grandchildren

8. Cooking is highly social

Chefs at a French cuisine party. Cassoulet, quiche, salad and eclairs

It is reasonable to expect that your son will live in a group house at some point. With the right bunch of people, he may be inspired to host a party. It may be in the apartment, the back yard, or even a picnic in the park or the beach. Expect people to bring guitars, boom boxes, and of course something to drink. There is lots of party food that is easy to cook. I favor steak—marinate it, grill it, and slice it thinly so that a person can take only what they want, and choose between rare and well done.

Potato salad ensures that nobody goes hungry. He can show off by fixing something exotic, such as dolmas or shrimp bread. Finding a woman is a numbers game. The more presentable women come by the house, the more likely he is to wind up with a good one. She might arrive on the arm of some other good-looking hunk, but conclude from the cuisine that your kid is a better marriage prospect and chat him up.

Conclusion

Throughout history the hearth has been a symbol of home life. Cooking is an elemental, and until very recently an essential aspect of family life. It is not coincidental that the demise of the American family has coincided with the rise of commercial food preparation.

Cooking is not trivial. Observe food stamp recipients' tendency to buy junk food because they simply do not know their way around a kitchen. The young man who learns how to cook well will have mastered a valuable life skill. It doesn't take much time or money—in the end it will save his family both.

Most important, knowing how to cook is a sign that a man is serious about family and is likely to be a good husband. If your objective as a parent is to raise successful sons who will give you grandchildren, teaching them to cook is an investment you must make.

Why YouTube Is Superior To Broadcast Television

December 13, 2016 | by Brutus Centinel | Link | Original Link

Awhile back, I was about to start another mind-numbing video game session when I noticed I could watch YouTube videos on my TV. There's an app on the Xbox that lets you scroll through and pick videos using the controller. You can sit there, right in your living room, and watch YouTube videos on your flat screen, instead of playing video games or watching regular TV. Little did I know, this would end up being the best change of habit I have ever made.

Replacing Mindless Entertainment

Well, don't smash the damn thing, you can watch YouTube on it now!

As many of us know, modern television is a cesspool of cultural Marxism. It pollutes our brains with foolish ideas, and ruins our motivation with pacification. Video games can have a similar effect. Mindless entertainment is at odds with our primal nature as men.

When I started watching YouTube videos, I went from a passive consumer of garbage, to an active seeker of useful content. Instead of mindlessly taking in whatever the corporate overlords were shitting out, I looked up things that were interesting and challenging to me. It turned me into a hunter.

News and Political Commentary

Instead of watching the fake news and drivel that comes onto TV, I began watching real news. I was amazed at the depth of real, factual coverage that was available. This was what I had been searching for, and rarely found, when I used to turn on the nightly news (propaganda) from a network.

I began watching RT, which has nuanced, truth-telling, investigative reporting on matters all over the world (except for Russia, which pays the bills). I picked up some Alex Jones for conspiracy theory entertainment, and Corbett Report for actual, journalistic coverage of conspiracy theories. I even like to watch the openly left-wing channels like The Young Turks, or Democracy Now, to help combat confirmation bias. A lot of what they say is crap, but sometimes having an opponent's perspective on things helps us ensure that we are not being lazy in our thinking.

Taking in commentary from different sources has helped me to realize that there are honest leftists out there also fighting the political elites. Ralph Nader has discussed about how both political parties need to unite to dismantle the corporate control of the state. Noam Chomsky has exposed the ways that the media manipulates people for the benefit of the corporate elites. Defeating the elites will be easier if we learn how to bring the classically liberal, pro-free-speech liberal types into our camp (think: John Kennedy).

Learning New Skills

One of the coolest things about YouTube is that you can use it to learn things. Instead of having to get a book, or ask for help, you can just hop on YouTube and try to learn it. Need to replace a part on your car? Want to learn a new language? Can't figure out how to smelt aluminum in your backyard? Maybe you want to learn how to build a hut completely from scratch like a caveman? There's videos on everything!

One of the first skills started working on was shooting. I found Sniper 101, which has over 100 hours of top quality instruction on long-range shooting. Everything from the kinetic energy of different cartridges at different distances, to scopes, rifles, and marksmanship. He spends a lot of time teaching the math required to hit targets at long distance (bullet drop, wind, angle, etc.), and goes into incredible detail on everything he discusses. After watching the videos and practicing for about a year, I can now hit man-sized targets, on my first shot, every time, out to about 500 yards.

Thinking Deeply

The modern philosophers are doing podcasts

Being a well-rounded man means spending time thinking deeply about the world, and wrestling with philosophy. Frankly, the highest quality modern philosophers I have found are all doing podcasts.

Stefan Molyneux is a libertarian-leaning philosopher that covers politics, news, nonviolent parenting, and other areas. Instead of the short, entertainment-focused drivel available from TV, he has podcasts that run an hour or more, and involve deep, nuanced discussion about the issues from experts. He has discussed topics like the Fall Of Rome and modern parallels, the philosophy of Aristotle, and how to defeat SJWs.

The Joe Rogan Experience is another favorite podcast of mine, and I consider him a modern-day philosopher of the highest caliber. Joe Rogan is a stand-up comedian, actor, and former martial artist who provides commentary for UFC fights. Many of his guests are related to the UFC, but many are just damn interesting people. Recently he interviewed Jordan Peterson, professor from Canada who was nearly fired from his job for refusing to use politically correct gender pronouns. Another interesting interview was "The Ice Man" Wim Hoff, a daredevil who has broken many world records with his scientifically-verified meditative breathing method. Hoff has climbed Mount Everest and Mount Kilimanjaro wearing only shorts, has run marathons in subzero and hot temperatures without water, and he holds the world records for being submerged in ice.

Conclusion

Mainstream television is mindless junk. Consider replacing it with YouTube videos on your TV set. You'll get real news, learn new skills, and stimulate your mind with philosophy. You may not be into the same things I'm into. But replace your TV or video game habit with useful entertainment, and perhaps your life will change for better.

What The Next 25 Years Of Western Civilization Will Be Like

December 14, 2016 | by Jon Anthony | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, one of the things that has always separated ROK from other websites is our ability to predict future outcomes. We successfully predicted virtually all of the following phenomena that have been happening over the last several years:

- Increasing bitchiness from unattractive girls
- More and more political correctness
- The "exodus," where men have left the country in droves
- Donald Trump's victory

Our uncanny ability to predict the future is due to its basis in principles and culture, as opposed to current events. In other words, we look at the current principles that are underlying American and Western culture, and project them to their natural end game.

This is how we've predicted the current culture war that we're in, it's how we've predicted the increasing epidemic of shit tests and flakiness, and it's how we've predicted the slow, but steady descent into hell that the West has made. It is with all of these things in mind, that I would like to present my personal predictions for the next several decades. I will aim to cover all spheres, from social to economic.

First: Underlying Causes

Technology, unbeknownst to most, is serving as an amplifier. Rather than simply dumbing everyone down, as most think, it's actually doing two things:

- Making the smart even smarter, the masculine even more masculine, and the "red-pilled," even more red-pilled.
- Making the dumb even dumber, the effeminate even more effeminate, and the "blue-pilled," even more blue-pilled.

The reason being that technology is a tool, and the way that it's used is to be determined by the user. Where some angry, obnoxious feminazi (literally Hitler) might use her internet to seek out Tumblr pages supporting her views, and YouTube videos of cis-scum being "destroyed" in a debate, other men are using technology to do the following:

- To seek out alternative news sources that don't lie and manipulate
- To educate themselves on matters of game, finance, and politics
- To connect with like-minded individuals

This drastic and increasing divide in socioeconomic influence, intelligence, masculinity, and awareness is one of the major foundations which I've built my predictions upon. Other assumptions are that around 1/3 the population is starting to doubt the MSM, men are always more effective at creating structures than boys or women, and that the majority of men are actually good (or will be good if presented the chance), but have had to hide it due to social pressures.

2017-2018: All Hell Breaks Loose

I won't harp too much on Donald Trump, because I realize that many readers are tired of hearing this, but I believe that his presidency will set off a chain of events that will be absolutely tantamount to saving the West. His presidency will do several things:

- Start the process of "draining the swamp," or dismantling MSM and ridding our political and school systems of hyper-Leftists
- Begin to repair the lack of masculinity that most men in our country have been conditioned to accept
- Finally, and most importantly, begin the process of eliminating anti-free speech laws (aka political correctness)

I believe that the globalists will try to do everything that they can to fight against this, but, as history has shown us, the angry mobs will be at their doors soon enough. The elites will continue to do what they've done in the past, but this time, they've got a trick up their sleeve.

Ever since 2008, the Federal Reserve's quantitative easing policies have been pumping the monetary supply full of more and more fiat currency. I won't go into detail here, but anyone with a modicum of historical economic knowledge knows that this is a bad thing.

I predict that we will experience a major crash, far worse than 2008, which will start sometime in mid to late 2017. This will then, of course, be blamed on Trump's presidency, but the deplorables will know better: this has been due to the meddling of the central bankers.

Regardless, tensions will reach an all time high as degenerates don't receive their welfare checks, and as home owners default on their loans. Expect rioting in a large number of American cities. The suburbs will be relatively protected, but anywhere with a large lower class population will be decimated (think Black Lives Matter, but on a much larger scale).

This will likely force Trump to reluctantly call in Marshall Law, which in turn will create even higher tensions. Expect to see elements of the patriarchy re-emerge on a local level. The men in various neighborhoods and families will bond together to ration out food, water, and protection. The women will be tasked with homely duties, as it will be deemed too dangerous to walk the streets alone.

Although this may sound terrible, it's actually a good thing. It will start to bring back the patriarchy on a very fundamental, grass-roots level—in our own neighborhoods. This is the catalyst that we will need to bring about the return of a traditional society, living in accordance with nature's biological laws.

2019-2025: Transition to Economic Fundamentals

As Trump expertly handles the economic crisis, I expect us to return to some form of the gold standard to bring relative economic stability. This may take the form of various men bartering with silver and gold, as our fiat currency's hyperinflation will become very readily apparent, or it may simply be that every US dollar becomes redeemable for a fixed amount of gold.

Either way, I urge you to learn How to Invest in Precious Metals Stocks so that you're prepared when the economic crash comes. As we begin to emerge out of this economic catastrophe near the end of Trump's first term, expect there to be a lot of anti-Trump sentiment. By this point, however, the MSM will have been almost entirely discredited, so despite the remaining MSM desperately trying to paint The Donald as a horrible president who caused the crisis, we will know better.

As I said in my assumptions, previously only 1/3 of the population distrusted the MSM—by now it will be almost 2/3, which will usher about the final death of the MSM. This will be a natural, grass-roots effect of more and more people spreading news organically (through video footage, word of mouth, etc.), which means that it is a movement that won't be stopped.

As mainstream news conglomerates such as MSNBC, CNN, and CNBC begin to lose relevancy, expect alternative news sites to start evolving into full blown operations with anchors, high tech cameras, live streaming, and more. I believe that we will also begin to reclaim our airwaves, either through the existing infrastructure within the FCC or by creating our own, in order to ensure that censorship is not possible.

Donald Trump will almost definitely win a second term, again in large part due to the alt-right, the manosphere, and various alternative news sources spreading the truth. This, I believe, will begin to usher in a new era for America, similar to the transition between the Roman Republic and the Roman Empire.

2026-2032: Reclaiming Patriarchy on a Local Level

Expect local men to come together.

As the patriarchy has now been brought back on a local level, Trump has eliminated political correctness with the help of others like Breitbart, Milo Yiannopoulos, and ROK, and the MSM has lost all credibility, expect local men to start taking back their school systems as well.

The economic crisis will have made it abundantly clear that we need to teach men survival skills, and this will fall into the hands of local men. Expect home schooling to become more and more common, until eventually, private schools start popping up everywhere taking advantage of this new anti-Leftist sentiment.

The same bonds that men formed with their neighbors and tribal members during the economic crisis will now be used to create communities where children play, learn, and grow together. This will start to form a sort of crude educational system on a very local level, which emphasizes the importance of men being able to protect their families, self-reliance, real world skills, and independent thought.

I expect the entire US educational system to undergo a complete overhaul, which will cement America's position as the greatest country in the world once again. I believe that our educational system will evolve to look something like this:

- Male/female segregation for at least part of the school day

- More recess, especially for boys
- Femininity is encouraged in women, and primal masculinity is encouraged in men
- A curriculum based around the Greek system (a heavy emphasis on logic, rhetoric, and debating skills)
- No more PC culture and Leftist teachers indoctrinating our children.

An educational system like this will emerge, simply because a severe economic crash and large amount of social upheaval will make more and more men wake up and realize the importance of gender differences, self-reliance, and tribal bonds. Men that value these things do not want their children to go to some PC school that brainwashes them, plain and simple.

2033-2040: National Patriarchy Emerges

Out of the ashes of our old America, a new one will emerge

As patriarchy becomes more and more popular on a local level, it will begin to foster an entire culture based around the values that made America so successful in the past. Some might say that the President who's elected will determine everything, but I disagree.

I believe that a large economic crisis which forces men to band together and form civilized tribes will bring about a severe blow to the establishment. It won't matter who promises us what, because voting will be based upon how much we trust candidates. In other words, the local patriarchy which this severe economic crisis in 2017 will have created, will begin a grass-roots transition into being a full blown cultural shift all throughout America.

This will reflect who is elected on a national level. By now, all the cards will be in our favor:

- Masculinity will have re-emerged in a grass roots fashion
- The MSM will be dead, and the new alternative media will become the mainstream
- Conservative values like self-reliance and independence will be at an all time high
- Our economy will be primed for massive growth
- A new, conservative leader will charge the path to greatness

Expect America to once again become the world's greatest nation, with incredibly intelligent children, highly masculine men, a booming infrastructure and economy, and most importantly, a traditional culture.

Summary

I could easily write a ten part article on this topic, because it's incredibly deep and multi-faceted, but I won't. If you start to look around you closely, however, I believe you will come to the same conclusion as I have.

Take a cursory glance at the nationalist movements that have been occurring since Nigel Farage set off a chain of events with Brexit. First it was Britain, then the entire UK, then Donald Trump, and now France is consider a highly nationalist leader in their 2017 election?

It's very clear that the world is starting to wake up and fight back against the globalists—and as I hope I've made clear, the globalists will not win, for one simple reason: their movement is artificial and ours is organic.

That which happens out of natural biological tendencies is always far more powerful than an attempt to control them, due to the natural resistance effect. When you align your cause with what is natural (as the manosphere has), there is an inherent power within it due to its truthfulness, that cannot be stopped.

7 Things I Learned On The Road This Year

By the time this post runs, I'll be airborne heading back to California from my new "home" in Eastern Europe. While it'll be a temporary stop for only about a month, it's the perfect time to look back and reflect on the year.

I took a one-way ticket on March 28th to Poland, and spent the rest of the year hopping around. Certainly some things have measured up to my expectations about living abroad. Other things have fell flat. While I'm infinitely happier as a free man and have no desire to go back, there are things that have made me, well—unsure of life.

The point I'm trying to make is that the grass is always greener. It's rare that everything will be perfect, all of the time. It's best to adjust expectations accordingly to maximize happiness. With that being said, here are just a few of the many things I've learned as a nomad this year.

I've broken them down into categories as appropriate: Girls, Travel, and Business.

Girls

1. I Feel Robbed

I walk around places in Ukraine such as Kiev and Odessa and I just think:

"Wow, I really truly got fucked by life in some ways."

Don't get me wrong, I wouldn't change anything. But when you see girls walking down the street in heels and see genuine feminine energy alive and well in the world, it makes you a bit sad.

America could have been like this, but for many reasons (all of which have been discussed on this site) it's simply not.

To an extent, it hurts.

It hurts to know that I had to travel so far around the world to find better. It sucks that the nice guy within me had to be killed off not only because of me (I was a total wimp, I can admit), but because of the environment he was raised in. Don't get me wrong. Eastern European women require you to be strong and masculine, but they don't have near the stigma against the nice guys that girls of the West have.

I simply feel that I was robbed off a chance of a "normal" life with normal male and female interactions.

2. They're Very Aware

Girls in Eastern Europe aren't stupid. They know the value they have when they're young. They recognize that skills such as cooking and cleaning go a long way towards pleasing a man. Unlike their American counterparts, they go to great lengths to show these skills off. On the flip side, American girls go far out of their way to show you that they don't have these same skills.

To back hand in hand with what I said about being 'robbed' above, I've had my whole world flipped upside down on me.

Instead of having girls actively trying to discourage me from entering a relationship with them, I'm now faced with girls doing everything in their power to lock me down. In some ways, it's refreshing. It's nice to be chased, to feel desired, and to have all the options.

On the other hand, it's also terrifying.

Travel

1. Other Places Aren't Perfect

I recently ran a post on my niche site about how to learn Russian online, and decided I'd post it over on the Ukraine Reddit forum. Oops.

Before I knew it, my tiny niche site was flooded with criticism for saying that travelers to Ukraine should learn Russian instead of Ukrainian. Never mind that both languages are incredibly difficult to learn. Never mind that most Ukrainians speak fluent Russian. Never mind the fact that 250 million people in the world speak Russian versus 40 million for Ukrainian.

It'd be like going to Barcelona and people being upset that you're speaking Spanish instead of Catalan.

I ended up having to clean up some posts' comment sections and am still getting heat weeks later. Indeed, it was this kind of mindset and stubbornness that made me realize that Americans aren't the only ones that are guilty of being slightly ignorant and misunderstanding of the rest of the world—even though we get the most criticism for it.

2. Weather And Environment Play A Huge Factor

Around October, things started to look awful gloomy in Eastern Europe. Short dresses and high heels were replaced with rain boots and fur jackets. Smiles and leisurely paces turned into scowls and anger.

I went from seeing the sun every day to seeing it every week—or less. Upping the dosage of my Vitamin D pills improved my mood significantly.

If you’re not happy with your environment, you won’t thrive in life. Having spent the last 5+ years in Southern California, it was eye-opening to me to see what kind of impact something as simple as sunlight had on my productivity, happiness, and overall well-being.

In the future, I may do a sort of follow-the-sun kind of travel schedule. I must say, Vietnamese women and the (somewhat) untapped waters of Vietnam are calling my name.

Business

1. Creative Juices Flow Better As An Entrepreneur

It’s quite common for me to wake up at bizarre times of the night now and be unable to get back to sleep. I’m not riddled with crazy dreams, but rather an overflow of ideas.

Sometimes it’s a new niche site I’d like to build or an idea for an upcoming blog post. Sometimes it’s how I could do things better with my business. The point is, once you’re out of the rat race, you’ll be amazed at how much more creative thinking gets done. That’s not to say that you have to be location-independent or a nomad to have these ideas. I imagine they will start flowing for anyone who decides to walk away from the office life.

2. Hard Work Is Much Easier

Going hand in hand with the above, “hard work” has never been easier. I don’t mind waking up before the sun comes out and then well into nightfall. It’s my dream, my passion, my business.

No longer am I working to be a small cog in someone else’s dream. Sure, I’ve had to make sacrifices in other areas of life. I don’t game girls as much as I used to. I’ve admittedly skipped a workout here and there. I settled down in one city towards the end of the year because I wanted to work.

3. It’s Always Up To You

The most valuable lesson I learned this year was this: it's always up to you, and it's never too late.

I've attempted to start small businesses or websites with people I've known on a personal level, and it's fallen flat on my face. I've tried to help friends start their own business and live freely, to no avail.

Sadly, I've learned that there is only so much you can do to help other people. It's cliche, but you can lead a horse to water but you sure as hell can't make him drink. You can give someone all the tools in the world to succeed and yet they just won't drink that damn water.

It's frustrated me in numerous ways this year.

I think of the time wasted that could have been better spent. A huge loss. However, I also recognize that there are lessons to be learned from this. I didn't lose out on anything major, financial wise. It didn't cost me any truly valuable relationships. I simply lost some of my time, but I learned a lesson from that loss.

I've learned that it's not a bad thing to take a loss if you take a good lesson from it. Most of all, I've learned this:

My own destiny is always right in my own hands.

3 Types Of Shows That Are Like “The View” For Men

December 14, 2016 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

“The View” is (rightfully so) the butt end of all jokes, references, sleights, and insults intelligent people use to shame the inferior women who watch it. It is vain, vapid, narcissistic, unintelligent, masturbatory, full of itself, and other accurate pejoratives, but above all else it is a waste of time. Women who watch it are quite literally pissing away their lives. About the only thing worse that could be said about it is that it misleads women into having an inaccurate view of the world that not only ruins what dwindling time they have on the planet, but lessens the value of the lives of those around them. It is, quite simply, poison.

But before we men get on our high horses and mock and ridicule those who watch “The View,” we might want to take inventory of our own viewing habits, for most of us are guilty of wasting our time on equally worthless, vapid, and pointless shows.

1. Sports Coverage Shows

It is no secret I enjoy playing sports, but loathe those who merely watch them. This isn't to say you can't take in a game or enjoy a Sunday afternoon football party, but if you're one of those losers who's wearing another man's jersey while you hork down wings and light beers at Buffalo Wild Wings, we need to talk. If your emotional and psychological health depends on whether "your" team wins or loses, we need to schedule a beating. And if you are one of those people who watch the draft because your "fantasy football" team depends on it, even beatings won't help you.

But even if your entire life's happiness is dependent upon "March Madness," you still haven't lowered yourself to the level of watching "The View"…that is unless you watch…

The game I can understand. Lacking the mental strength to ignore the temptations of tribalism I get. But if you have nothing better to do than watch the "pre-post-pre-pre game show," ESPN, or "Sports Center" you are now watching one of the three male versions of "The View." Sports Center, ESPN, even the local sports-talk radio program are talking about events that happened in the past and literally have nothing to do with you. You aren't part of their team. You aren't part of their club. You are merely a sucker who is paying extra cable costs to imagine you are.

But what's worse is the pure wasting of time and resources that is spent on the analysis and forecasting of professional sports. Drawing lines and highlighting players with circles, dissecting on the "best plays of the week," and analyzing the trade of "Pip Johnson" for "Flabby Jones" as if there was a science, let alone a point to it. What makes it doubly rich is the people this "analysis" comes from—has-been's, never-were's, and the epitome of vicariously-living hacks—sports journalists. Their opinions, observations, and editorials are just as valuable as that of a women's studies professor's opinion on politics because there is no study in the first place.

Professional sports, and certainly the shows surrounding it, have never solved, and never will solve any problem in the real world. So please, stop wasting your time, and go throw a ball with your son.

2. Political Analysis Shows

Somewhat closely related to sports is politics.

Like sports, politics is something most people wield little-to-no control over. It is purely the domain of trust-fund baby, public service athletes called "politicians." However, just like sports themselves, the analysis of politics is not complicated, nuanced, or difficult.

All of politics can be summed up quite succinctly as a battle between producers and parasites. Producers are hard working people who want freedom, excellence, low taxes, and to be left alone. While parasites are lazy people, deathly afraid of work, who want to live off of the producers and will come up with ANY reason and rationalization as to why they're entitled to other people's labor. See if that description does not explain nearly everything you've seen in politics since you've started paying attention to it.

Ergo, because politics is not complicated, like sports it attracts very mediocre minds who believe it's some kind of "study" or discipline that requires their "unique" insight to explain it to you commoner plebs. This is perfectly evidenced by the three main types of people who pursue politics as a career, or obsess over it as a hobby:

1. Journalists
2. Political Science majors
3. Activists/SJW's

And like your pre-pre-post-post-game analysis shows, you see the same low-brow, "View"-level intelligence from these self-anointed political experts.

"Meet the Press," "60 Minutes," "The Rachel Maddow Show," "This Week," and the veritable media shitshow that passed for "news coverage" this last presidential election. Nearly every one of these "professionals" have been regurgitating the same shit for the past 50 years, yet NEVER managing to actually advance politics or democracy towards an improved state or a better system that would serve the people. Furthermore, they're incapable of it because that would require higher-than average intelligence (not to mention morality), so watching these talking heads in the expectations of hearing a revolutionary thought or break-through in civics and governance is like waiting to hear Colin Cowherd say something that would cure children's cancer.

Of course, paying attention to politics is very important. We all have a huge, legitimate, and vested interest in who is leading our government and what his or herpolicies are. So at least in this regard, it's better than sports because you are invested in the outcome (and with your vote, you actually have a say). But you cross the line when politics becomes your god, agency, and purpose in life. That, like ESPN, you no longer care about the game, but the analysis before and afterwards because you have nothing else to do. It's just instead of ESPN, you're tuning into CNN or Foxnews because you're a "news" or "political junkie" and you need your fix.

Once again, like "The View," we are very quick to mock and ridicule these type of people—the feminists, SJW's, protestors, OWS, BLM, etc. These people's lives are so worthless, they have nothing else to do but subscribe to these false political religions and derive value from them. But before we judge too quickly, look your own political bias and behavior. How much time do you spend reading political articles? How many articles about women screwing over their ex's in divorce court can you consume? How many articles about refugees and the collapse of Western civilization do you need?

This is perfectly exemplified by the zealots, fanatics, and purists in the MGTOW community who obsess over the politics of sex rather than learn from it and move on. In other words, you may very well be correct politically, but if it becomes your life you are once again wasting your time on the second male version of "The View."

Research the candidates. Research the issues. Learn a little bit about economics. Become an informed voter. Vote. And then get back to your regular life with your wife, children, friends and loved ones. Fuck George Stephanopoulos, fuck Rachel Maddow, fuck 60 Minutes, and fuck Foxnews Politics. You have more important things to do in life.

3. Financial Markets Shows

The third and final "View Variant" for men are financial market analysis shows. CNBC, Mad Money, Squawk Box, and "Power Lunch," there's no end to the amount of ~~propaganda~~ shows that remind you by the minute how important it is you invest your money in Wall Street and the stock market. Why you just won't be able to retire unless you squirrel away 30% of your paycheck into a 401k! But thankfully these kind, thoughtful, caring ~~talking heads~~ anchors are smart enough to tell you how.

BS.

Here's the dirty little secret about Wall Street, investing, and all these "financial gurus."

They're all unnecessary and obsolete.

Yep, that's right. If all these "experts" died and went away NOTHING bad would happen because the truth is about 85% of them can't even beat the S&P 500 index. That means you, WITHOUT ANY TRAINING IN FINANCE OR INVESTING, can beat 85% of the "professionals" out there in New York by merely investing in indexed funds. You combine that simple bit of advice with the following five bits of advice:

Don't go to college until you know what you want to do.
Don't major in stupid shit.
Spend less than you make.

Don't stick your dick in crazy.
Don't have kids you can't afford.

…and it's damn near impossible for you to fuck up your finances.

So if it really is that simple to retire successfully, why are there multiple 24-hour-a-day channels dedicated to the financial markets? Well, in part it's a genuinely needed service for finance professionals to keep tabs on the market. In part it's to drive demand up for finance firms' largely unnecessary investment services. But where it takes on role of "The View" is where it serves as, once again, a substitute for something tangible and meaningful in one's life.

I don't know how many people I knew in the late 90's who all fashioned themselves professional stock traders simply because they belonged to one of the millions of "investment clubs" that were the fad back then. I don't know how many "housing experts" I knew back in the mid 00's who thought they were on par with Donald Trump when it came to being a real estate mogul. And today it seems the latest fad is for young men to make their millions trading currencies. They all thought they were capable of this because they were all watching CNBC during the daytime.

This isn't to say that learning about financial markets, investing, retirement planning, and economics is a bad thing. Nor am I slamming on CNBC (I think it's a great channel with some great introductory EDUCATIONAL material). But when people started making it their new-found profession, substituting dreams of becoming a "day trader" vs. their current career as a plumber, these financial news shows became larger than they were.

Instead of an everyday-man's way to keep tabs on the world's financial markets and economies, it became the third male version of "The View," wasting people's time (and sometimes life savings) on a get-rich-quick hobby that just was not rigged for them. And just like women wasted their youth and looks on feminism, Oprah, and The View, I've seen many men waste all their money on flipping houses, Dotcom's, and currency speculation.

There is no substitute for agency

The larger point is, to us outside observers, things like "The View," "Oprah," day time talk shows, Harlequin romance novels, and grocery store aisle magazines are clearly wastes of time that can turn damaging should women actually start to believe that poppycock. But without thinking about it ourselves, men can fall prey to equally, cleverly-marketed forms of media, running the same risks women do who watch "The View."

What one needs to do is constantly be on guard to ensure that what endeavors and interests we do pursue in life provide genuine agency, purpose, and reason, and are not substitutes that lead us into self-pity, inaction, defeatism, entitlement, sloth, poor decisions, poverty, or just outright stupidity like the aforementioned three do. Just like a woman's life is too short to be blaming everything on the opposite sex, so too is your life too short to be wearing another man's jersey. Ensure you are at MINIMUM better than the average "The View" listener and demand agency from the media you consume.

4 Reasons Modern Beta Males Will Become Extinct

December 15, 2016 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

After a few years observing betas and their stubbornness when exposed to damning evidence about the realities of the sexual market , as well as noticing that they have still not been wiped off the face of the Earth (mainly thanks to their role of useful idiots and docile rodents in their entertainment wheel), I first came to the conclusion that they will simply evolve into different subspecies. Following the Darwinian evolution theories, they will undergo the same fate as the finches on the Galapagos Islands that developed different beaks over millennia to adapt to the type of food that they could find in their area.

Beaks as varied as the types of betas already observable: men-children, omegas, white knights,chubby chasers, cucks…

After thinking more about it, though, I then realized that the modern species of beta is closer to a walking dinosaur. The decline in Western society and the announced cultural collapse has not destroyed them all, only because the observable phenomenon is too recent and we have yet to see how brutal it will get.

It appears that the extinction of betas will occur faster than expected, as external factors added to their refusal to deal with their environment and adapt, will accelerate their destruction.

1. The great disturbance of modern times

Betas have, so far, formed the bulk of human society since the dawn of times, with alphas (kings, heroes, rock stars, warriors, CEOs, villains etc) being always logically represented in smaller numbers but in a greater control of power, wealth and, more importantly, women ("A shroud has no pockets" comes to mind) which granted them access to the most coveted prize: reproduction.

That ratio was always kept stable because women and their urges were controlled. We have never been faced, since we started walking on two legs, with a scenario where women are in control and encouraged to limit their reproductive duties to focus on abortion, the pill, endless entertainment, sleeping with unlimited number of men, getting drunk, and seeking attention on social media.

Stefan Molyneux describes it well when he explains that women "cannot complain about men, as men have evolved precisely because of what women want".

2. The cataclysm

Betas will meet their maker through external factors. What will be their asteroid impact or volcanic eruption on a global scale?

We can speculate that they will disappear due to four main factors:

More and more of them will become alphas or at least lesser betas/alphas and progressing through time, with the spreading of the teachings of the manosphere on the Internet, masculinity-friendly governments, fellow men becoming aware of our teachings and sharing it with others. This will create a ripple effect (following an altruistic instinct which can be interpreted as the "burden of the alpha," where those who found their way will want to save beta males from their foolishness when it's not too late, then they just want to put them out of their misery) or father figures that will be the ones reproducing, keeping their son in line to secure grandchildren.

The beta male's contribution to the global workforce won't be needed anymore as he is slowly replaced by machines. After being neutered by rising "female empowerment," toxic feminism, and virtual pornography paired with the rise of highly-advanced sex robots and ruthless alpha competition, this final blow will render him obsolete, even as government-employed working cattle.

The victory of globalism and open borders policies in certain areas of the globe, with a rise of aggressive, predominantly Muslim colonizers and the dwindling numbers of nationalist Whites, hunted down by the elites. Beta cucks and other "Refugees Welcome" types will be weeded out of existence by the very people then opened their butt cheeks for. Mincey faggots welcoming invaders, bringing a violent civilisation that excites their women more than their white knighting will be rewarded by the disappearance of their seed and lineage.

Women will reproduce more with alphas following the logical laws of biology even if the sexual market is flawed. The male children will adopt the physical traits of their father (beauty, strength, intelligence…). If those traits don't appear as innate, then the fathers will initiate them to the principles of game, exhorting them to polish skills relevant to the dating world, helping them secure a quality mate for their progeny.

3. Adapt or die

Some will change when exposed to the truth about the world, the elites, game or women and will accept it, changing their behaviour and consolidating another brick in a stronger edifice. Others will deny till the end and refuse to adapt, becoming the dodos of the modern male population.

The likes of MGTOW are an evolutionary dead end. Their kin still dies with them, even if they understand elements of the nature of women, but deny their mission of reproduction.

But as altruistic as we can be, we have to realise that a man exposed to these facts, who refuses to acknowledge the truth, does not deserve to be saved. Without this instinct of survival, the beta male shall vanish.

Sharks outlived dinosaurs, even if their numbers greatly diminished, due to the fact that they were the perfect sea predators, a masterpiece of natural engineering. All the terrestrial dinosaurs which were larger than a dog, disappeared. Small beings like cockroaches or bees survived against overwhelming odds due to their resilience, sheer numbers or organised communities. Crocodiles adapted mainly from being cold-blooded creature that did not need great amounts of food on a regular basis.

A parallel would be made with alphas adapting to the new rules imposed to them and acting in a way that seems counter-intuitive: working out for aesthetic reasons, being assholes to girls, recruiting them for their orifices on Instagram or Tinder, disgusting themselves in the process by encountering even more broken women, being selfish and seeing yourself as the absolute priority…

A man has got to what a man has got to do to prevail. We do not make the rules. Alphas could enjoy an endless buffet of sluts but that will not ensure their survival on the long term. It is then their role as apex predators to find the quality food (young, fertile good girls), even if that means turning their back on the less soul-nutritive slags and Tinder bicycles.

4. The possible aftermath

Once again, a few scenarios could unfold:

Case in point: Sweden. Combo of low-T men, feminists in power and Mohammedan hordes cause civilization to reach total collapse. Globalists win. Native population is replaced. Nerds might stand a chance if Islamic conquest chooses to elevate dusty academics among the ranks of alphas, just like in Michel Houellebecq's visionary "Submission".

Case in point: Russia, Poland, Hungary. Western civilization deflects the assaults of globalism, keeps a system based on ethnocentrism and patriarchy. Modern betas survive but are still in slight decline as the system is reminiscent of pre-sexual revolution times.

Case in point: America if Trump and nationalism create a long lasting positive loop, or European nations awakening through a similar leader. Feminism loses ground, lying media is replaced by honest news, modern betas naturally ostracised on the long term and will eventually disappear. Blooming civilisation recaptures some of its former glory.

Red pill routine in the ethnocentric, self-sufficient town of Orania, South Africa

Case in point: A hybrid new community overseas created by red pill men. Original civilization declines but numbers of dissenters refuse the rule imposed and emigrate to a friendly country to create a new and hybrid lineage. Western masculine men would leave in order to find suitable mothers for their children in a traditional, safe environment.

Va y avoir du changement

Whatever the outcome, the model of society as we know it and its ratio of alphas and betas is bound to mutate.

Either into an Open Borders 1984 hell of obese, green-haired women and brownish betas (from all the race blending over the years encouraged by the elites to quench any feeling of unity) or into an alpha-rich traditional society where women are kept in check (with the racial demographics yet to be determined).

What If Everything They Told You Is A Lie?

What to eat, what medicines to take, what scientific theories to believe in, what to think of men and women, what to think of the races, what to think of gay people, who to vote for, what to make of Russia. Your opinions on hundreds of topics have been shaped by journalists, scientific "experts," pundits, and politicians who have cozy positions in the establishment hierarchy. We're led to believe that the information they share with us is truthful and in our best interest, but what if they've been lying to us about this, that, and, well, everything else?

The first lie you encountered is probably the lie that men and women are equal. Through your dating experiences, you came to see clear differences in male and female behavior that show women are not the flawless, independent, and strong yet innocent angels that the establishment portrays them as, and that their true nature is quite destructive if not constrained by societal forces. You would be correct to assume that this is not the only lie you've been told.

Imagine you have had a wife of ten years. You just discovered that she lied to you about where she was and who she was with the night before. What is the most logical conclusion to follow after discovering her lie?

- That this was the only time she has lied to you in ten years OR
- That she has probably lied before, especially when concerning her nighttime activities, so more investigation is in order

Discovering a lie is almost always the tip of an iceberg that there have been additional lies which—at the minimum—relate to the initial lie. In your wife's case, it is unlikely this is the first time she's lying about what she's doing at night.

Why they lie

The establishment's lie about women is essential for them to push national laws and policies, including social welfare, sexual harassment laws, rape laws, Title IX, university funding to gender studies departments, and so on. This means that the lie is useful for those at the top to advance their specific agenda. Just like with the wife we caught in a lie, we can conclude that any "fact" the establishment has given us, which is used to shape national law and policy, is almost certainly a lie. In addition, any "fact" that allows corporate interests to gain extra billions of dollars in profit per year has also been a lie.

The wife lies because her marriage and well-being is at stake. The establishment shill lies because their trillion-dollar agendas are at stake. The scientist lies because his corporate sponsor has billions of dollars at stake. When you are given "facts" about an issue where there is an agenda or money on the line, you are almost certainly being lied to. You are being given a carefully constructed piece of information with the intention to allow the agenda to proceed or the money to flow. You must therefore either reject the "fact" or research the issue to come to the truth.

Here are just a few things where we are not getting truthful information from the establishment:

- Political candidates
- Food safety and nutrition (GMO and pesticide safety, etc)
- Chemicals in hygiene products
- Plastics and their estrogenic effects
- Treatment for heart disease and cancer
- Human happiness
- Feminism
- Mental health of gays and transsexuals

- Theory of evolution
- Benefits of the service economy and technology
- Race
- Tradition and religion
- International trade
- The Middle East and Russia
- Black Lives Matter

Government and corporations need at least some consent from the public to push their policies, agendas, and products. Where does consent come from? Public opinion and beliefs. Where does public opinion and beliefs come from? The government and corporations, who also outright control or directly impact the universities and media. Round the wheel of human control we go.

They need you to believe in lies

While bludgeoning you over the head with a club and telling you to eat your GMO corn and soy may work in the short term, it's an ineffective long-term method to get you to eat the product. Much better to wrap up the GMO poison in catchy advertising, pay famous people to promote your product, sponsor scientists to do studies where only the desired result is published, and lobby for laws that prevent you from even knowing you're eating GMO corn. Most people cannot resist such a multi-front assault on their mind.

Recently, an examination of psychological studies show that most are complete bullshit. They cannot be replicated. That's only psychology, you may be thinking, and more important matters like medical research are more rigorous. Wrong, medical research is just as bad. If you're taking an expensive treatment for a serious disease, chances are you're ingesting something that is no better than just drinking cough syrup. If you consider that a successful study will mean billions in profits for a single drug, I wouldn't be shocked if you told me that 80% of published medical research is complete bunk. There's just too much money at stake for them to depend on honestly alone.

Telling you to open up your veins for toxic medicine won't work unless I have the "scientific studies" to "prove" its effective and safe. Much better to pay a dozen scientists with crushing mortgages and car payments to construct studies where my drug will perform well, and just shred the studies when it doesn't.

Telling you to submit to women and to give up your legal rights when it comes to sexual assault wouldn't be a smart way to push an agenda that weakens men and destroys the family unit. Much better to get "social scientists" to make up statistics on rape and wages, hire homely female journalists who resent beautiful women to publish mountains of garbage, have the media invent rape hoaxes that portray men as violent savages, and have politicians push "equality" laws that only benefit one group while marginalizing the other.

With every issue of significance, there are multi-layered efforts to shape your belief on the issue so you don't resist when the final policy, agenda, or product is pushed. Since you were a child, your mind has been relentlessly hammered with lies on dozens of issues so that you go along with the charade to increase the power and wealth of select individuals who have grand plans and trillions of dollars at stake.

Because I've caught my wife in a lie not just once, but several times, I can no longer believe her. I should divorce her, but we can't divorce an establishment that involves tens of thousands of useful idiots, from obese government bureaucrats to Marxist journalists, who are playing the game to get their own measly share of the pie while those powerful figures above them ensure that their lucrative interests are not compromised. If you're forced to stay with a lying wife, what will you think when she comes home late tonight with alcohol on her breath saying that she had tea with a girlfriend? You'd think she was a cheating bitch, that's what, and you can't wait for the moment when you can throw her to the curb for good.

How we can arrive at truth

If the establishment is lying to us about everything that they have a major stake in, how can we arrive at the truth? By examining the opposite conclusion and see if it holds water. I did this with the theory of evolution and found, through my own research, that there are enough flaws in evolution to make me doubt the theory as the sole means for arriving at a new species, and that the adoption of this theory was an all-to-convenient way for the elites to destroy traditional societies that believed in God so that they can replace it with a rootless materialist society. While some parts of evolution may be true, I reject the theory as merely a useful tool to destroy tradition, and I refuse to give my consent to any policy, product, or medicine that uses it alone to arrive at its version of facts.

Once you accept that the establishment is lying to you, there will be an uncomfortable void within your mind. You crave facts and truthful knowledge, but no longer have any institution to trust. This opens the door to believing in unproved theories, some of which may be accurate but lack rigorous evidence. And this is the crisis of men today: the time and money it takes to arrive at the truth, and the lack of it in the establishment, means we will be unable to know the truth for most things. You have to merely feel gracious if you happen to arrive at ultimate truth on this topic or that, such as the true nature of women. Or you can just try asking your grandparents, for what they believed in likelier to be closer to actual truth than what we're been brainwashed with today.

My "wife" has lied to me too many times. If she comes to me with a tall tale, I won't believe it. Until truth-tellers are made out to be heroes in our society instead of being persecuted and attacked like they are now, it's safe to disregard everything they say. Every study, every white paper, every media article is propaganda, meant to get me to agree to the plans they have in store for me, you, and our fellow man. They've lied to me for so long that not only will I not believe them, but I will look at the opposite of what they say and see if there's evidence to prove that instead, until one day, I hope, I can finally divorce them for good.

5 Ways To Profit Bigly From Miserable, Childless, And Career-Obsessed Feminists

The feminist-oriented economy is booming and companies to invest in abound. Why not take advantage of it? If you don't, someone else will. And when the inevitable stock price increases and dividends come rolling in, you'll be laughing to the bank at the feminists whose money you have legally taken.

So here are five key ways to capitalize on a couple generations of miserable, childless and career-obsessed feminists:

1. Cat and other pet food companies

The man she went on the date with isn’t good enough (or doesn’t earn enough). She doesn’t like having housemates, either, as they ruin her feng shui plans. So cats and other pets, particularly small dogs amenable to human-like hair-styling, are the go-to mammals for domestic companionship for many a feminist. And, believe it or not, these creatures need food.

When looking for the right cat and other pet food company to invest in, make sure you find a business concern that values what cats owned by feminists value: fair trade status and a commitment to saving the very endangered Mexican Staring Frog of Southern Sri Lanka. It goes without saying that the company should produce products capable of being endorsed by Bono, Lady Gaga, Lena Dunham, or, at worst, Rachel Maddow.

2. Pet clothing and lifestyle businesses

Yes, this needs its own category, set apart from pet food. Whereas women of the 1980s, 1990s and even 2000s focused on clothing and throwing birthday parties for their children, feminist women of the mid-2010s are treating their animals as their actual children. Few investors are yet to realize the unbridled opportunities that this shift will bring.

Things like chihuahua-friendly handbags and environmentally sustainable cat-suits are far from dead crazes. That said, the time to start your dive into this amazing world is now. Could you ever forgive yourself if you were never a part of the vegetarian, gluten-free pet cake phenomenon? Western society doesn't need replacement level fertility rates when feminists can pamper their kitty or pooch while the apocalypse goes down.

3. Sperm banks and in-vitro fertilization clinics

Every man-hater with a womb needs a cold turkey-blaster capable of matching her cold approach to male-female relationships. And with no better husband or father than the welfare state, plenty of empowered women are opting to raise a child on their own so they can smother them with their feminist abuse. But you have to always be ahead of the competition in your investment choices in this area, budding Warren Buffetts.

Rather than looking to the bland, sterile sperm clinic, choose a place where the staff remind the clients that it’s not their fault that they didn’t get a Brad Pitt or Ryan Gosling. In fact, even those men are not worthy of their curves, feisty demeanor, and borderline personality disorder. More so than any other business in human history, at a sperm clinic the customer is always right, including about the circumstances that brought her there.

4. Wellness and “find your inner child” retreat facilities

Where does a feminist go when is unfairly reprimanded for not doing her job properly and wants to make use of the “criticism leave” she is entitled to before the sex discrimination lawsuit? We all know the answer: Mount Susan B. Anthony Retreat for the Oppressed and Undervalued Woman Looking to Find Herself Center (or its sister location, Lady Gaga’s Center for Decidedly Demure and Classy Women). The world is harsh and what better way for a girl to insulate herself from it than with a $500-a-night luxury cocoon or safe space with gluten-free meals?

A related investment opportunity are spirituality retreats. You know something is wrong when women haven’t yet found fulfillment in the latest iPhone release or the newest array of Instagram filters! What these state of the art facilities will teach women is that the world is meant to appreciate them. When that doesn’t happen, it’s time to come back to the retreat center again.

5. Online dating websites

This is the secret gold-maker. Despite their seeming ubiquity in modern society, online dating websites are grossly under-appreciated by your average investor. Because almost no man ever ticks the feminist female’s boxes for long enough, she’s always having to look for a new guy to fill her box on the internet, whether for a “normal” relationship or to cheat. And this means more monthly subscriptions for online dating. Recent studies by Return Of Kings and men everywhere suggest that feminist women grow sick of the man in their life as many times as their mood changes.

In choosing your portfolio of online dating websites to buy into, make sure that all the pages associated with them do not make use of the color pink, which is an invention of the patriarchy designed to oppress a woman’s uterus between 11pm and 9:30am the next morning (and then intermittently for all remaining hours of the day). Also, check that the terms and conditions of the website require a man to have sex with any fat girl or transgender person who contacts him. This is the sort of social awareness that puts online feminist daters at ease and will lead to long-term investment profits.

Think this is satire? Think again

Don’t confuse the tongue-in-cheek tone of this article with a presentation of fantasy. All these business areas are booming. In America and Australia, for example, animal grooming and related services are among the fastest-growing industries of all, the majority of pet-styling customers being women. Similar insights can be made about the other categories explored here.

Sadly, time and money that a woman used to spend to make herself marriageable and motherly are now devoted to hamfistedly plugging the personal hole that feminism has created for her. Whilst Return Of Kings encourages women to be healthy and enjoy things such as the companionship of animals, they are dangerously over-compensating in many of these life choices.

Feminism taught many women to consciously hate raising children full-time, needing to find a man, and keeping their bodies attractive. Yet now these same women are often raising and pampering pets full-time, looking for (too many) men online, and trying to keep themselves healthy through over-priced, ineffective wellness and lifestyle purchases.

If anything, the feminist economy sees women acting out their deep-seated desires in unfulfilling and/or personally destructive ways. You may as well profit from these choices when you can.

An Ode To The Millennial Generation

December 15, 2016 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

Generations are typically defined as those born during a certain time span and usually sharing certain common experiences, values, and aspirations. Historically, generations have been binned into 18 year intervals: the Greatest Generation (1910-1928), the Silent Generation (1928-1946), Baby Boomers (1946 – 1964), Generation X (1964 – 1982), and the Millennials (1982 – 2000). The start and end points of a generation are often chosen to coincide with major historical events, e.g, the Baby Boomer Generation began with the end of WW2 and ended with the start of the Vietnam War (Gulf of Tonkin), and the end of the Millennial Generation is generally chosen to coincide with the bursting of the dot-com bubble and 9/11.

Pundits are fond of heralding the arrival of the Millennial generation onto the national stage. Every week or so, some Legacy Media columnist or contributor swears the Millennials are on the threshold of seizing the reins of political, economic, and cultural power. However, despite these assurances, there are major indications that the Millennials represent a stillborn generation that will leave behind no lasting legacy.

Misleading Name And Deceptive Statistics

First, “Millennial” was a very poor moniker for those born between 1982 and 2000. Before “Millennial” stuck, this cohort was referred to as either Generation Y or Echo Boomers, either of which would have been more apropos. The term “Millennial” really should have been reserved for those born after the new millennium, e.g., after 2000.

The oldest Millennials were born during Reagan’s first term and were partying in college when they rang in the new millennium. Moreover, Millennials lived a good amount of their childhood prior to the widespread availability of the internet and nostalgically remember frustratingly slow dial-up. Those born after 2000 really have grown up in a totally different reality, never knowing a world without high speed wireless internet, social media, and smart phones.

Pundits are also fond of emphasizing that the Millennials represent the largest generation (in terms of cohort members). However, that fact belies certain discomfiting realities. Most Millennials are children of Baby Boomers. If Boomers reproduced at replacement level (meaning 2 children per couple), then it stands to reason that they will give rise to a generation at least as large as their own. Many Millennials grew up as only children or with one sibling. Consequently, their situation growing up was one of familial isolation, being spoiled by doting helicopter parents, and a lack of a need to share or compromise.

Late To The Party

People often succumb to the logical fallacy of believing all generations will exert equal influence. Whatever one's view of the Baby Boomer generation, it cannot be denied that they have exerted massive influence on the national culture and did so from a very early age. Even before they were old enough to vote, they were changing history, fighting for Civil Rights and protesting the Vietnam War ("Hey! Hey! LBJ! How many kids did you kill today?"). The Baby Boomer generation has been setting the direction of the country for 50 years.

In the 2016 election, the American people were presented with two candidates, both older Baby Boomers (Trump born 1946 and Hillary born 1947). A Baby Boomer will be at the helm for the next 4-8 years. Assuming younger Baby Boomers will exert similar influence as their older Baby Boomer counterparts, we can expect the end of Baby Boomer influence to come in approximately 25 years, at which time The Baby Boomers will have set the nation's course for 75 years!

The oldest Millennials are already middle aged. When the Baby Boomer influence is finally over, the Millennials will be 40-60 years old. Historically, a generation peaks early. The Millennials have not made themselves felt to any comparable degree. The Millennials were late to the party and may be early to leave if a subsequent generation is more assertive (and there are indications that non-PC views in general and Alt-Right beliefs in particular are more common among those in the Generation Z cohort) and pushes them off the national stage.

Lack Of A Generational Voice

The Baby Boomers had their own sages and prophets trumpeting their arrival on the national stage: Bob Dylan, Simon & Garfunkel, Crosby, Stills, and Nash. Ask yourself: Are there similar generational voices for the Millennials? Lady Gaga? Miley Cyrus? Katy Perry? Are there similar ballads and anthems of the Millennial Generation? What about cinema? The Baby Boomers had movies with counter-culture, anti-authority themes like The Graduate, Easy Rider, 5 Easy Pieces, and Alice's Restaurant.

What do the Millennials have? Big-budget CGI remakes. A remake of Ghostbusters. A reboot of Jurassic Park. Another installment of Star Wars. Now, think about the heroes and icons of the Millennial generation, those who have had a profound impact on how Millennials live their lives. Bill Gates and Steve Jobs? Both born 1955. Both Baby Boomers. PayPal's Elon Musk? Born 1971. Barring the creators of Facebook (Mark Zuckerberg) and Snapchat (Evan Spiegal), there are very few Millennials who have influenced other Millennials in any major way.

The Millennials have come of age in an era of globalism and open borders; consequently, the Millennial voice is being muffled though massive immigration from Latin America and Asia. Millennials are being squeezed from both sides: from the bottom (Latin America: poor and uneducated) and from the top (Asia: wealthy and well-educated). The previous generations were marked by exceptional ethnic, cultural, and lingual homogeneity. While whites still constitute a majority of Millennials, the Millennials as a whole are a much more mixed group with large numbers of Hispanics and Asians—groups that were almost non-existent in America when the Baby Boomers were coming of age.

The American economy was also much stronger in earlier generations: Baby Boomers could pay their way through college working summer jobs as a lifeguard or burger flipper. Not anymore. The rise in the cost of tuition has far outstripped the pace of inflation. Additionally, there are many more wealthy people from other nations that are willing to pay the exorbitant tuition at American universities. In the 1960s, countries like India, South Korea, and China were backward and frantically trying to modernize. Now these countries have huge numbers of middle and upper class families eager to send their children to prestigious schools in the West. Back then, American schools were for American students. Now, American schools are for whoever can pay the admission fee.

Millennials have a grin-and-bear-it mindset. While earlier generations would have set up barricades in the streets or taken the out-of-touch elites to the guillotine, Millennials are perhaps best characterized by their seemingly endless ability to absorb one punishment, privation, and humiliation after another. They are seemingly unwilling to stand up for their own interests, not resisting the elites' efforts to bring in an endless stream of poor Central American migrants, foreign students, foreign professionals on H1B visas, and rich foreign nationals to buy up all the prime real estate.

The Millennial response to being unable to make ends meet? Become a part-time Uber or Lyft driver.

Lack Of A Generational Vision

Perhaps as a result of encroaching globalism and a lack of ethnic, cultural, and lingual hegemony, the Millennials seem to lack anything amounting to a collective vision and seem content to adopt a YOLO mindset that spurns long-term thinking and legacy formation in favor of hedonistic consumption and materialistic pursuits.

To whatever extent the Millennials entertain ideas beyond self-indulgent base pursuits, they are derivative, ersatz facsimiles of a previous generation's aspirations. Landing a man on the Moon was a paradigm-shifting first for earlier generations. Now Millennials are clamoring to get a job at SpaceX. For some reason, they are excited to try to duplicate the accomplishments of an earlier era. Witness the congratulatory tweets that followed Mission Juno's successful insertion into orbit around Jupiter. Even Google offered up a celebratory Doodle.

No one found it the least bit odd that they were celebrating a duplication of accomplishments of the Pioneer and Voyager missions from 35-45 years ago. Look at all the teams competing for the Google Lunar X Prize. No one finds it odd that they're trying to duplicate what the Soviet Union accomplished with the Lunokhod 1 rover in 1970! The Armenian engineer Alexander Kemurdzhian, born a hundred years ago, worked on planetary rovers over half a century ago! A combination of woefully poor history education and a lack of formal master-apprentice relationships to facilitate the transfer of knowledge from the previous generation to the next has left the Millennials in a state of total ignorance, not knowing what's been done before and what hasn't.

Health Problems

Regardless of one's opinion of the Baby Boomers' politics, it can't be denied that they aged fairly well. The same cannot be said of Millennials, the oldest of whom are now in their mid-30s and the youngest of whom are now graduating high school. It is more common than not to encounter a Millennial male who appears prematurely aged with a receding hairline, prematurely graying hair, or is even completely bald. The number of oral cancers among young men is also rising dramatically. We can expect the Millennial generation with their hedonistic lifestyle to be decimated by HPV-related cancers.

Childlessness

When you watch footage of the 1967 Monterey Pop Music Festival, the 1969 Woodstock Festival, and life on hippie communes, you're struck by the number of babies and young children. You see women breastfeeding their babies. You see parents playing with their young children. At least one child was born at Woodstock and who knows how many were conceived there. What's on the cover of Led Zeppelin's Houses of the Holy album? Naked children.

Think you'll ever see a parent bringing a baby or child to a Kanye West or Miley Cyrus concert? It's not because they're overly protective parents afraid the content is unsuitable. After all, Woodstock is infamous for its unabashed drug use, nudity, and profanity. It's because those who attend these concerts don't have children. They are childless.

A good number of hippies—while spurning a lot of traditional things—still opted to have children and have them at a young age. The same cannot be said for Millennials. For the first time in history, people are opting to remain childless. This is unprecedented. People continued to reproduce even under the most adverse conditions: during the Ice Age with prowling saber tooth tigers, during the Bolshevik reign of terror, during World War Two with the Red Army drawing ever closer. In a time of unparalleled abundance and amazing safety nets, people have convinced themselves that the world is too challenging and foreboding to bring a child into.

Conclusion

Despite frequent claims to the contrary, the Millennials will ultimately merit but a footnote in the annals of history. There will be no grand epitaph on their generational tombstone.

3 Maxims Men Should Stop Believing

December 16, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

We've all heard expressions like "beggars can't be choosers" and "better late than never" since we were wee lads. These aphorisms have been around since before our grandfather's grandfathers and have stood the test of time as we hear them just about every day.

While there is truth in the above adages, there are a few that are complete bullshit that even red pill aware men live by or give undue credence to. Unbeknownst to the men who believe them, these faulty theorems are holding them back and will continue to do so until they see them for what they really are and eliminate them from their thought process.

What most of these have in common is that females all but make these sayings gospel truth and accept them as hard and fast truths regardless of context or circumstance. That's par for the course for women but as men we have the ability to see through the nonsense and make our own minds.

That said, here are the three most prevalent age old maxims men should stop believing:

3. "What goes around comes around"

Another variation of this fallacy is called “karma.” This particular maxim states that if are a good person, do right by people, and live a good life then you will be rewarded with a good life and good things will happen to you. On the other side of that coin, if you’re a bad person and do bad things, you’ll live a terrible life and bad things will happen to you.

The reason this proverb is untrue is because there’s no such thing as karma. There are many people who do good things who continually get shit on by life. That gave birth to the phrase “no good deed goes unpunished.” If what goes around really did come around, the aforementioned saying wouldn’t exist.

There is no greater example that shines a light on the erroneousness of this statement than the state of today’s sexual market. We’re told that the better we treat women, the better they treat us. If we’re loyal to them, then they are loyal to us.

If you’ve spent enough time in this sector of the web it’s easy to see that’s been proven to be grossly untrue. In fact, it’s quite the opposite as most women respond more favorably to poor treatment from men. Unappreciative, disrespectful, and abusive men enjoy more success with women than the inverse.

“What goes around comes around” is also a statement people cling to in order to cope with a wrong that has been done to them. If a girl cheats on him he’ll keep repeating this to himself to make himself feel better about the fact that she’s getting pounded by someone else these days. Women simply go and sleep with her ex’s best friend then chalk it up to “karma” as her reason for doing so.

Wrong. O.J.’s in jail because he trusted the wrong people and allowed them to lead him into a quasi-trap. Had he exercised better judgment he’d still be in south Florida up to his eye balls in women and cocaine.

O.J. did this to himself….’karma’ had nothing to do with it

Don’t get me wrong, I’m a firm believe in that for every sequence, there’s a consequence. If you drive drunk enough times you’ll eventually get caught. If you work hard at your craft, you’ll get better. The difference between this and “karma” is that these are things you have control over.

But if you screw someone over or get screwed over, whatever happens after that has little to do with what you did or what got done to you. Shit happens. People get away with murder and other terrible things and people suffer terrible things when they’ve done mostly good in their lives and that’s all there is to it.

2. “You can’t always judge a book by its cover”

I remember back when I was 18 or 19 I was driving to the store with my youngest brother who is six years my junior. We saw this dude driving a gold tricked out Acura Legend with these shiny chrome rims pull into the gas station we were at. A dude leaned into his window for a few seconds, then left.

I remember saying to my brother jokingly “Man I’m in the wrong business” and he responded “How do you know what he does? He could be a doctor!”

I calmly said “Maybe, but would you trust him if he were your doctor?” He fell silent and shrug his shoulders in agreement.

The fact of the matter is that we all judge people by the way they look and act. A man in a suit who is well spoken gets treated better than a man in tattered clothes. Women who are dressed modestly are looked upon with more respect than women who are dressed like sluts.

It should come as no surprise that females, who spew this garbage far more than males, are the biggest hypocrites when it comes to judging “books” as they dismiss men as possible suitors based solely on the way he looks, dresses, and speaks. This isn’t a bad thing because their biological hard drives are programmed to weed out weak, low value males. If the man dressed in tattered clothes approaches her to strike up conversation she’s got every right to dismiss him.

I’m sure she’s a loyal, virtuous woman on the inside

But the pendulum swings both ways. If the high value male in a suit sees a slovenly, unfit woman in his presence he quickly makes the judgement that she has no discipline, is unattractive, and would make a terrible significant other as her “cover” tells him everything he needs to know about her within the context of a sexual relationship.

Further, this so-called cannon reeks of SJW droppings. They would have us believe that abandoning common sense and personal sensibilities would make the world a better place when they’re the first to lock their doors if they see a dude with sleeve tattoos wearing a hoodie walking down the street.

Are there people out there who are more than meets the eye? Sure. There are people out there who are well off financially but live a modest lifestyle and men who know all the pick up lines but couldn’t pass a shit test even if they knew it was coming. But those are the exceptions to the rule and as we all know, the exception doesn’t make the rule.

So can you always judge a book by its cover? No. But you can most of the time.

1. “The grass isn’t always greener on the other side”

Back in August, my best friend in college came west with his wife for their annual visit. Back in the day he was more red pill than anyone I knew. He treated girls like shit and they loved him for it. He got married right out of college and it didn't take his wife very long to tame him.

Long story short, she turned him into a sniveling beta in no time flat and every time we all get together the vice she has on his balls gets squeezed tighter by the second. Needless to say she doesn't like me very much because I represent the life he could have without her. Any time I regale them with a story about this chick or that she'll shoot a glance at him that has "the grass isn't always greener on the other side" written all over her face.

This particular falsity sounds as though it was designed specifically to keep blue pill men unaware of how awesome his life would be if he took the red pill. As if giving feminism the finger, getting fit, stacking paper, learning game and sleeping with beautiful women is a bad alternative to being married to a fat, bitchy female who will divorce rape you the minute she gets the 'seven year itch.'

In a red pill context, the grass is always greener on the other side. The crimson capsule lifestyle is far more gratifying than living in the matrix and men here know and understand this very well. Yes, sometimes a new situation isn't all its cracked up to be and yes it can sometimes burn you to venture into what you believe to be greener pastures.

But there's another proverb that flies in the face of this one that every man should internalize and live by:

Fortune favors the bold.

A few more we should discard from our minds

“You can’t love someone unless you love yourself”

I’m not sure where this one came from but I’d bet the farm it was coined by a woman. Women, who are notoriously insecure and are utterly incapable of loving themselves for a number of reasons, fall in love all the time. My guess is that they use this bullshit expression when breaking up with a guy with the typical ‘its not you it’s me’ excuse. Either way, self love isn’t required to express or feel love and they know it.

[image]

Funny…age doesn’t matter to females when they’re underage and sleeping with a man in his late twenties or when they’re past the wall and embracing the ‘cougar lifestyle.’ But when they sees the men they want dating younger, tighter versions of themselves they’re always the first one’s to call him a pedophile. Typical.

A man should never stop looking for ways to improve himself and better his situation. Using myself as an example, I’m currently working on two podcasts (one of which has already launched), I start Brazilian Jiu Jitsu next month, I lift, I bike, I write, and I may look into getting my helicopter pilot’s license in the not too distant future.

Don’t get me wrong, a man has to take time to rest and recharge his batteries. But so long as he masters the art of time management and take advantage of downtime, he can have as many “irons in the fire” as he wants.

Another falsehood used by women when complaining about what they’re not getting. Rather than go about getting his attention the right way by losing weight, being kind, acting feminine, and taking pride in her personal appearance, women are taught that bitching and complaining all the time is the best way to get what they want from us. They’d rather gripe about the promotion they didn’t get instead of working hard and earning it.

Conclusion

It’s important to keep in mind that there are shards of truth embedded in these conjectures, albeit very minimal. But we should be keenly aware that most conventional wisdom that comes from a culture steeped in feminism is likely to be extremely damaging to men. Just like the ridiculous “Happy wife happy life” b.s.

Next time you hear one of these so-called proverbs, take a closer look at it and decide for yourself whether or not it benefits you as a man. Chances are, it probably doesn't.

Is Pope Francis Destroying The Catholic Church?

December 16, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Traditional men should be concerned with what goes on in the large Christian churches, even if they don't happen to be Christian. That's because the churches affect the moral temperature of the country. If the churches are strong and uncompromising, it is a good bet that the society is strong and healthy as well. If the churches are weak and willing to change their teachings to fit the culture, you can be assured that morality in that society is declining. Immoral societies are not good places to find a wife or to raise a family so it is in our best interest to have strong religious institutions.

If you look at Christianity in the US, the prognosis is bleak. The two largest groups that have held strong Christian convictions are the Evangelicals and the Catholic Church. Both groups have been bulwarks of traditional morality… until recently. As the same sex marriage movement gained momentum, individual evangelical churches started to cave on gay marriage and now there are signs that some evangelical groups will begin accepting transgenderism as something that is okay. The Catholic Church stood strong on these issues, but with the election of Pope Francis that unyielding stand may be coming to an end.

When Jorge Bergoglio was chosen to be the pope by the papal conclave in 2013, the media—and some Catholic bishops—fell all over themselves trying to paint Francis as a Christ-like figure. He was portrayed as person who genuinely did not want wealth but only a simple, faith-filled life. While he was a bishop in Argentina, he frequently cooked his own meals and used public transportation—both unusual qualities for a high ranking bishop. Even Bergoglio's choice of his papal name, Francis, was meant to evoke St. Francis of Assisi, a saint who was known for his love of simplicity and poverty.

Francis' initial acts as pope served to confirm his reputation as merciful pastor who sided with the poor. Instead of moving into the papal apartment of the Apostolic Palace, Francis chose to stay in the same suite he was in as a cardinal during the conclave. On one occasion, he was scheduled to attend a Beethoven concert but he neglected to show up saying that he was not "a Renaissance prince who listens to music." And, most notoriously, he changed the traditional washing of the feet ritual.

Instead of washing the feet of twelve priests, as the ritual requires, Francis chose to wash the feet of prisoners, including Muslims and other nonbelievers. Beyond that Francis made an unprecedented addition to the ritual: he not only washed the prisoners' feet, he also kissed them. Defenders of Francis viewed it as a display of Francis' great humility, but critics saw it as a shameless act of attention-getting.

While Francis' actions broke with the tradition of popes before him, they were not really problematic because they did not concern the teaching of Christian doctrine. The bigger problem has been the confusion he has sown within the ranks of faithful Catholics. The first of these came up when he was informally asked about gay Catholics. Francis responded, "If someone is gay and he searches for the Lord and has good will, who am I to judge?" Francis' response is not technically wrong, but it is incomplete as it neglects to mention that in Catholic teaching a homosexual orientation is considered intrinsically disordered. Also, the "who am I to judge" line seemed to give papal approval minimizing homosexuality as a sin. After all, Francis did not take a "who am I to judge" line with Donald Trump when he said anyone who would build a border wall is "not a Christian."

Gays are not the only group that Francis seems to be fond of. He has also praised Muslims, atheists, and Communists. The only group that Francis doesn't seem to like are Catholics. He stated that observant Catholics are particularly susceptible of following a "self-absorbed Promethean neo-Pelagianism." And he accused devout young Catholics who like to attend the Latin Mass of being "rigid." Virtually every Catholic I've talked to feels that Francis doesn't really like Catholics, and the feeling is mutual.

Cardinal Caffarra, who is one of the four cardinals who have respectfully asked Francis to clarify exactly what he means.

So far, everything I've described has been annoying to Catholics, but not ground shaking. The Catholic Church has survived several bad popes in the past. But with the publication of the Apostolic Exhortation Amoris Laetitia (On Love in the Family), Pope Francis has put forth a teaching that threatens to destroy the Catholic Church from within. In an ambiguous footnote in the Exhortation, Francis seems to say that Catholics who are divorced and remarried may in certain circumstances receive the sacraments of the Church. At first glance, that implication might appear to be inconsequential, but it strikes at the heart of one of the foundational doctrines of the Catholic Church—the indissolubility of marriage.

Catholics believe that once you are validly married, you are married "until death do us part" as the traditional vows state. The doctrine directly from Jesus' own words:

> The Pharisees also came to Him, testing Him, and saying to Him, "Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife for just any reason?"
> And He answered and said to them, "Have you not read that He who made[a] them at the beginning 'made them male and female,' and said, 'For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh'? So then, they are no longer two but one flesh. Therefore what God has joined together, let not man separate."
> Jesus replied, "Moses permitted you to divorce your wives because your hearts were hard. But it was not this way from the beginning. I tell you that anyone who divorces his wife, except for sexual immorality, and marries another woman commits adultery."

The Catholic Church has steadfastly held to this difficult teaching for 2,000 years. Saints have gone to their martyrdom defending the doctrine so it is not a doctrine that Catholics take lightly. But in Amoris Laetitia, Francis appears to contradict the teaching of Jesus on marriage.

If that is not bad enough, at certain points Francis sounds more like a social justice warrior influenced by the Frankfurt School than a Catholic pope::

> I certainly value feminism, but one that does not demand uniformity or negate > motherhood.

> If certain forms of feminism have arisen which we must consider inadequate, we must nonetheless see in the women's movement the working of the Spirit for a clearer recognition of the dignity and rights of women.
> History is burdened by the excesses of patriarchal cultures that considered women inferior….

These statements may sound innocuous to the average person, but longtime readers of Return Of Kings will immediately recognize that the Pope is introducing a false egalitarianism into Christianity.

Four respected Catholic cardinals have asked Pope Francis privately to clarify what he meant by the ambiguous footnote. This is a pretty standard practice. After all, the whole purpose of the office of the Pope is to provide clear teaching. Yet Pope Francis neglected to respond to the cardinals' questions so the cardinals made their questions public. Even that did not force Francis to clarify. Instead, allies of Pope Francis have attacked the four cardinals as disobedient heretics for calling into question the Pope's teaching.

What could happen?

No one knows exactly where this will go from here because there has never been a historical situation like this. The Catholic Church is in uncharted waters. If Francis remains silent, the crisis may be averted because the Church's traditional teaching trumps any ambiguous statements that Francis makes.

The other possible case is that Francis will double down and explicitly contradict the teaching of Christ. At that point, Francis would be a heretic. It would almost certainly result in a schism within the Catholic Church, if not complete destruction of the institution.

Conclusion

As a Catholic, I owe the Pope a high degree of respect. It is also my responsibility to interpret the Francis' words and actions in the best possible light. But my fidelity is not to the person of Pope Francis, but to the teaching of all the popes who have proceeded him. Insofar as Pope Francis' teachings agree with those of his predecessors, I am bound to be obedient. However, if Francis departs from the teaching of Christ, I am under no obligation to excuse his error. Rather, the charitable action would be to warn others about the error.

Of course, my non-Catholic readers have no such obligation. But all of us have to live in the culture that is created by our society's major institutions. In a world where corporations, education, the news media, and entertainment media are firmly under leftist control, we need the churches to be staunch defenders of traditional morality. Whenever a Christian church compromises with the degenerate culture, traditional men and women lose another battle. When a Christian institution the size of the Catholic Church compromises, it is a sign that we have lost the war.

How Saul Alinksy Has Revealed The Flaws Of The Left

Most of us here wouldn't care too much for Saul Alinsky's politics, though he's not really much worse than many other leftists. He wasn't a Communist Party member, though he did rub elbows with them. What makes him remarkable was his influence by those calling themselves progressives today. Hillary was a huge fan of his, and Obama considered him an inspiration. His greatest fame was from his book Rules For Radicals.

We've covered some of its highlights earlier, as well as key tactics. It's a bit of a classic, and worth a read for activists of any political persuasion. There's much to be said for all that, though Rules For Radicals also illustrates a few of the left's weak points.

The ends justify the means

Consistency? Ethics? Principles? What the hell's all that?

Early on, Rules For Radicals features a dedication to Lucifer, an attitude apparently not exactly unheard of with some very well-connected leftists today. Another controversial figure Alinsky mentions is Machiavelli:

> The Prince was written by Machiavelli for the Haves on how to hold power. Rules for Radicals is written for the Have-Nots on how to take it away.

You'd expect, then, that Alinsky would reject Machiavelli's ways as cynical and unprincipled. Quite the contrary. The chapter "Of Means and Ends" makes it clear that the only consideration that matters is "Will this work?". The concept of right and wrong is tossed out the window, as is any caution for unintended consequences, or even common decency.

Alinsky's attitude seems to be pretty common with leftists. Consider quotes such as "You can't make an omelet without breaking a few eggs" by Lenin (he wasn't really talking about eggs, of course) and "By any means necessary" by Malcolm X. Anything they do wrong is justified because it fits their notions of the greater good. Still, even the greater good is unimportant if "Will this work?" is the only criterion that matters.

Civil disobedience is a common leftist shtick, famously used by Thoreau, Gandhi, and MLK; the basic idea is that you don't have to follow the law if you believe it's unjust. But civil disobedience is just the beginning. "The ends justify the means" gives the golden seal of approval for any sort of destructiveness, anything from petty vandalism to coups d'état. Even mass starvations that killed millions can be justified by leftist True Believers by saying, "They were only trying to create a Socialist paradise." Thus, the way they tell it, even the most egregious atrocities have no greater moral impact than a botched surgical operation.

Now wait a minute. Leftists to this day get upset about Joseph McCarthy outing Communists, firemen hosing down demonstrators in Southern cities during the 1960, and Augusto Pinochet's one-way helicopter rides, just to name a few items. Well, since Mr. Alinsky said that the ends justify the means, then what's the problem?

Holding leftists to their own hypocrisy

As Alinsky wrote:

> The fourth rule is: Make the enemy live up to their own book of rules. You can kill them with this, for they can no more obey their own rules than the Christian church can live up to Christianity.

Very interesting—Alinsky told us that the ends justify the means, yet recommends insisting that the other side play completely by the rules! As he indicates, this is practically impossible to do all the time, even when the other side has the best intentions.

One huge vulnerability of leftist ideology is their endless capacity for hypocrisy. For a few examples, according to them, executing a bloodthirsty murderer is barbaric, but aborting innocent babies is wonderful. Pornography is free speech, but politically incorrect statements are "hate speech". Colonialism was an atrocity, but population replacement policies today must never be questioned. GLBTs are better than "cishets"; they need special rights and society must bend over backwards to accommodate them. Women can do no wrong, but men must be regarded with deep suspicion. Some groups are encouraged to organize and voice their interests, but others doing so are utterly vilified. The list goes on.

What do these soi-disant progressives really stand for, anyway? The above items aren't really about equality, justice, or freedom. The only consistent thread is cultural Marxism disguised as those things.

The good news is that if you can break through their emotional shell and engage them logically, you can plant the seeds of doubt and set the stage for a red pill moment. If you can lead them to examine their ideology rationally, then it falls down like a house of cards. That's no easy task, and it will likely take them time to mull it over, but every deprogrammed leftist is a new ally.

How leftists use minorities

Reading between the lines of Rules for Radicals, Saul Alinsky seemed to have a rather curious relationship with Blacks. Although leftists claim to feel solidarity for minorities and want to help them, overall the pattern is that Alinsky's intent was to use them to further his own purposes. One of his plans seems a little childish:

> Let us take one of the negative stereotypes that so many whites have of blacks: that blacks like to sit around eating watermelon. Suppose that 3,000 blacks suddenly descended into the downtown sections of any city, each armed with and munching a huge piece of watermelon.

Basically he concludes the watermelon plot would lead to numerous positive effects, though the logic escapes me a bit. For that matter, I never could figure out what's the matter with liking watermelon. Italians like pizza—is that scandalous?

Alinsky was the prototype of the community organizer. It's understandable that people might be inspired to act on behalf of their own community. Alinsky, though, also went to Rochester to stir things up. There's an old term for that sort of person: outside agitator.

Haven't we seen this type of thing before time and again by the left? Let's consider LBJ's words, spoken to two Senators while on Air Force One, while explaining his motivations to start welfare:

> I'll have those [African-Americans] voting Democratic for the next 200 years.

Documenting similar sentiments and behavior by the left—toward several minority groups—would turn this article into a book. Building alliances is nothing new, but using other people to fight one's battles—demonstrations, riots, looting, burning, and to be revolutionary cannon fodder if needed—is treacherous, to say the least.

The media follows along with this. The typical pattern is to inflame grievances, encourage them to exercise their own solidarity, and focus microscopically on any bad news affecting them. Meanwhile, any not in the left's favored categories are vilified when they try to organize, and comparable news affecting them rarely sees the light of day.

More recently, the BLM folks are The System's footsoldiers. You might be surprised that outfits like that are not organic movements from within the Black community, but rather funded by deep-pockets donors. (Might I add, wasn't the Obama administration supposed to be all about racial reconciliation?) Recent tensions have led to the assassination of police officers. The official response has been remarkably restrained thus far; the law generally doesn't much appreciate cop killing. Still, it certainly seems that someone wants to stir things up.

Creeping gradualism

In 2008 Obama said he thought marriage was between a man and a woman

Saul Alinsky spoke glowingly of compromise. Actually, he revealed a big secret of the left's strategy, with the key to defeating them:

> If you start with nothing, demand 100 per cent, then compromise for 30 per cent, you're 30 per cent ahead.
> [Compromises] then become the start for the continuation of conflict, compromise, and on ad infinitum… A society devoid of compromise is totalitarian. If I had to define a free and open society in one word, the word would be "compromise."

Imagine that you're haggling over a car. The dealer begins at $40,000, you open with the invoice price of $30,000, and you compromise for $33,000. As you're in the finance room about to sign the papers, the dealer announces, "That's wrong, I say it's $36,000." Who would want to do business with a crook like that? Never make a deal with anyone negotiating in bad faith.

In terms of the culture war, the following cycle has happened again and again:

1. Activists make several outrageous demands.
2. The media softens up the public, first with feelers to introduce the subject, then by heartstring-pulling dramas and sitcoms ridiculing those with opposing beliefs. This pushes the Overton Window of public opinion leftward.
3. The issue starts getting discussed incessantly and the unthinkable becomes orthodoxy.
4. Society appeases them, sometimes by lukewarm conservative legislators weary of the controversy and endless criticism.
5. A cooling-off time starts until the status quo becomes accepted as the "new normal".
6. GOTO 1

If this creeping gradualism sounds like a dialectical strategy, that's because it is. That's a riff that cultural Marxism picked up from its Communist roots. This is how the culture war has been lost gradually, one little step at a time. Each acquiescence soon leads to the demands being ratcheted up a notch, etc.

To defeat this, we must recognize their strategy for what it is, and don't give in. Think of these demands as societal shit tests. Remember that nothing makes cultural Marxists happy; too much is not enough. One of the things that Ayn Rand got right is refusal to compromise on matters of basic principle. Finally, if someone accuses you of using the “slippery slope” fallacy, remember that it’s not a fallacy when it’s their strategy!

All told, Rules For Radicals is a primary text for leftist agitators, just as St. Che literally wrote the book on guerrilla warfare. On the other side of the coin, Alinsky gave us a valuable look at the left’s playbook as well as revealed major flaws in their mentality.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. 3 Lessons We're Learning From Venezuela's Collapse

December 17, 2016 | by Gaius Marcius | Link | Original Link

"Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." – George Santayana

Some ideas have long records of complete failure, yet people try them again and again. Venezuela's meltdown has two of these ideas that have never ended well, but people keep trying them.

First, Socialism never works. From Korea, Russia, Africa, to Latin America, it has never worked. But people keep wanting it. Venezuela has had a bad decade with their socialist experiment and within the last year the final domino has fallen. Their economy is in meltdown. When the price of oil plummeted, Venezuela could no longer afford their socialist programs and the state-controlled industries failed.

The second bad idea is an economic "solution" that has always failed: Venezuela kept printing money so they could pay for everything their socialist experiment demanded. Of course, Venezuela went the way of every other country that has tried devaluing their currency—hyperinflation has completely wrecked the economy. Venezuela's currency inflated so fast that they couldn't afford to buy more paper and ink to print more.

Socialism and hyper-inflation may not be immediate threats to us. But we can look at the meltdown in Venezuela to see how an economic collapse could play out, if, no matter the cause, it did happen here.

1. The Government Makes A Lot Of Mistakes

The markets and the economy work best when they are not interfered with by the government. But we elect officials expecting them to do something. When there is economic turmoil, don't expect your elected officials to just sit in their offices. President Herbert Hoover tried letting the markets work themselves out during the Great Depression and everyone hated him for it. President Roosevelt is still praised with saving us all from the Depression despite the research that says his worker programs actually prolonged the Great Depression. Had Hoover had his way of non-intervening in the markets, the recovery could have happened much sooner.

The government in Venezuela solves all their problems backwards. No money? Print more. Now they don't even count money, they weigh it by the kilo. Bread lines stretching for a mile? Make standing in line illegal. No more bread lines. Prices of goods double every other day. Make a law freezing all prices, but keep printing money. So, just because the government says a loaf of bread can only cost 100 bolivars, it doesn't mean anything when everyone's millionaires from all the inflation.

Any economic disaster we may experience you can expect our elected officials to go head over heels trying to be the next Roosevelt. Anyone remember the bank bailout? Or the current rounds of Quantitative Easing? Or negative interest rates? The government is helping the economy to death.

If another housing bubble bursts, or car loan bubble, or tuition bubble, or healthcare bubble, or if the Fed stops keeping interest rates at a frightening low level, we can expect large disturbances in the markets. But corrections are a good thing, until someone says, "I'm from the government, and I'm here to help."

2. Hungry People Will Do Anything

The currency in Venezuela has less buying power every day. People are weighing bricks of paper money that they carry around in wheelbarrows. The people who don't have enough cash can't buy food. So they loot it. And those who do have enough may discover that food shortages have left grocery shelves empty. And delivery trucks get mobbed by crowds of thousands of hungry families. Now food is being delivered in armored cars with military escorts in Venezuelan cities. But the food shortages have continued.

People in Venezuela have resorted to eating wild dogs, cats, and pigeons. Women are selling their hair to wig companies for some extra cash. And many armed militias have taken to the streets to restore or disrupt the peace.

How fast would your neighbors gang up to "redistribute" the food in your pantry if grocery shelves haven't been stocked in a week? We've already seen how the riot police in our own cities have allowed "protesters" to loot grocery stores, service stations, electronics stores, and even auto parts stores to let them "get it out of their system." That's nice of them, if it isn't your neighborhood or your store.

3. Money Isn't The Answer To Everything

As in Venezuela, any major turmoil will usually see a black market develop. And it's not always money that people want. Trading your skills and goods can get you further than money in hard times. If your country is struck by hyperinflation, paying your plumber with some canned goods may be more beneficial than a brick of paper money if there's no store to spend it at and no goods to spend it on.

Some people stockpile silver and gold in case paper money becomes worthless. I buy it as part of my investor portfolio, but don't ask how well that's worked out. They even make credit card-sized slices of gold that can be broken down into 1 gram squares so you can make change in a barter economy. If an economic collapse has ruined the faith of your currency then having precious metals to trade could be valuable, provided the people you trade with would accept it. After all, you can't eat gold and silver.

The Historical Answer To Economic Turmoil

An economic collapse is usually a long and drawn out process. Stockpiling food can help but isn't always the answer if there's going to be food shortages at the supermarkets for the next year. You will run out of stock eventually. And no one wants to turn their guest bedroom into a small grocery store.

Basic human needs haven't changed since we were cavemen. After air we need shelter from the environment. I'll just guess that no one reading this is homeless. Then comes water. Once again, I assume you have indoor plumbing. Then it's food. Hungry people have brought down empires. Some smart people have theorized that every significant regime change in history was brought about by food shortages more than any other factor. Food shortages have been attributed to the collapse of the Soviet Union, and more recently attributed to the Arab Spring movement.

If the economy experiences a major disruption, like the next great depression, having a reliable food source is the most important factor. Considering you still have shelter and running water, that is. Growing a few plants in your home is a good start. Even if you don't have a lot of space. You can buy dwarf fruit trees that you can grow on your counter top. Or a few potted plants for vegetables if you have the room for it. Growing a few plants can be a fun hobby and livens up your place, too. And it makes a great contingency in the event of economic trouble. You may not be growing enough to be self-sufficient, but if signs point to trouble coming, you could always add more plants. And having some experience in it before trouble hits would be ideal.

Dwarf fruit trees can be grown indoors and provide a healthy addition to your food supplies

Another thing to consider is cooking food from scratch. It will be easier to get your hands on bags of flour and the like instead of foods already prepared when the people make a run on the grocery stores. Even Roosh has taken the Bread Pill and makes his bread from scratch. In economic hardships it will become cheaper to make food from scratch, and easier to acquire in a rush.

Knowing food is key to keeping people out of the streets demanding revolution, Venezuela has decreed a massive farming operation and created bylaws to force people to the fields involuntarily for up to 60 days, or indefinitely, to grow that food. That gets them out of the streets I suppose.

Conclusion

You might be thinking, learn to garden? Learn how to cook? This sounds like something that should be posted on Return of Queens, not here. Like I've said before, men shouldn't be dependent on anyone else. Especially not government handouts. What would happen if a major economic disaster happened and everyone was fine because they had a couple weeks of food to fall back on? And if independence can be had by taking a few easy steps and being a little more self-sufficient then we should all take those steps.

Why Quentin Tarantino Is One Of Hollywood's Biggest Cucks

December 17, 2016 | by M.T. White | Link | Original Link

You've probably seen at least one of his movies. You might've even quoted some of the lines from those movies. You've definitely heard of him. Quentin Tarantino: "QT", Hollywood "Bad Boy", the so-called "King of Kool" and for some a lightning rod of controversy. But could Tarantino really just be a giant cuck? For all of his hilarious "politically incorrect" dialogue with liberal use of racial epithets and extreme violence, a close viewing of his films reveal a career of skillful media manipulation with discreet virtue signaling to establishment dictum's.

Movies have always been used as a propaganda organ. In the past, producers like Merian C. Cooper and studio bosses like Howard Hughes and Walt Disney understood the power of movie imagery and utilized its globalist reach to promote pro-American values. For the same reason, Communist infiltration in the industry started early (there's a reason Senator Joe McCarthy investigated the business).

So what does Hollywood want to propagate today?

Product, Product, Product

With studio consolidation, bloated budgets and cash now flowing in from Chinese, Japanese, Middle Eastern and Hedge Fund sources, consumption of movies and their related tie-ins are now the main purpose (hence the prevalence of films based on existing brands: Marvel, DC, Star Wars etc.). The values promoted are not those of patriotism, communism or religion—no, only globalist branding matters now. Product trumps art. “Diversity” and “acceptance” are the buzzwords of the day—they need the widest customer base after all!

Hollywood’s vanguard for this movement is “fanboy” culture. A group of mostly white, straight men who spend their time on the minutiae of Hollywood’s latest release. Fans who religiously visit movie news web portals like Ain’t It Cool, HitFix or any site where every headline ends with an exclamation point. These same fans have an almost automatic, Pavlovian response to every trailer, every poster and every leak of casting news about the latest comic adaptation, rarely calling things in to question except when there is a consensus.

But these guys need an outlet, a release of sorts, because they can't spend all day talking about the next super ero who will leap to the live-action screen. So instead of working on game, lifting weights, learning martial arts or anything else proactive they might watch the "dangerous" work of a "renegade" artist…who just happens to work happily in the Hollywood system.

The QT Cult

When it comes to Tarantino's appeal, as a fellow Gen-X-er, I can't help but agree with novelist Bret Easton Ellis: "In an era where a generation (Millennials) is obsessed with triggering and micro-aggressions and the policing of language, the Tarantino oeuvre is relentlessly un-PC: his movies are impolite, rude, irresponsible and somewhat cold."

He's very skilled technically (cinematography, casting choices etc.), his dialogue hilarious, and his interviews, when talking about film, are intriguing. If you Google enough, you might even find a positive review I gave of the first Kill Bill (I've since changed my opinion). However, I enjoyed his movies but never found myself addicted to them. I watched them then went on my way but his latest work always aroused a bit of curiosity.

But I did notice, with a little alarm, Tarantino had devoted followers—sycophants, really. Fans who dissected his movies, memorized every line of dialogue, listened to all his soundtracks, giggled at his pop culture references but never bothered to explore the director's genre (or "trash") influences. If by chance they learned of a music cue from Master of the Flying Guillotine used in Kill Bill, they never bothered to watch Wang Yu's Kung Fu classic.

This movie is more entertaining than most of QT's oeuvre.

But maybe they are even worse than sycophants. One could say the Gen-X Tarantino devotees were proto-SJWs. When the director was criticized, they would attack. Former collaborator's like Roger Avary and Craig Hamann would receive emails saying, "FUCK OFF. Tarantino is God," or find their own films spammed with negative reviews on various blogs and IMDB (like Hamann experienced with his movie Boogie Boy).

In my experience, I've found most QT film lovers to be usually men attracted to women who share their liberal politics or at the very least resemble Tarantino's female characters in both looks and speech. These man-children are quick to virtue signal when they hear any words that are considered "hateful" but love the films of a man that feature these words liberally. They give lip service to feminist politics but secretly express violent fantasies towards the women who wrong them and of course love the films of a man who creatively kills women on screen. Also, it seems their reading regimen consists mostly of mainstream magazines and newspapers—they're almost allergic to books.

On that note, the establishment liberal press—like The Guardian—feature glowing articles about the director and his work. Peter Biskind, a former 60's radical turned entertainment journalist, wrote about Tarantino first in the pages of Premiere and then in his own book Down and Dirty Pictures with nary a criticism (Isn't it a little strange that Biskind would call action flicks like Dirty Harry and Death Wish "fascist" yet praise Tarantino's work that is, in actuality, more violent?). Jane Hamsher and Sharon Waxman, both liberal feminists, were critical of QT's personal behavior in their respective books but of his creative output they spoke mostly in positive terms (to be fair, Hamsher, who produced Natural Born Killers, was more critical but that's more due to professional disputes).

There is severe cognitive dissonance at work here. Or is there? Could there be a reason the establishment keeps releasing Tarantino's impolite cinematic gems while actively marginalizing masculine directors like Mel Gibson, Walter Hill, Michael Winner and Michael Cimino?

Studio Sponsored

In some form, all of Tarantino's films have been made under the patronage of Harvey and Bob Weinstein. Harvey in particular is a powerful force in Hollywood and Democratic fundraising circles. Disney, under Michael Eisner and Jeffrey Katzenberg (another heavy Democrat contributor) purchased Miramax shortly before the release of Pulp Fiction. When the Weinsteins broke off from Disney, to form the The Weinstein Company, QT followed them.

Tarantino with Bob and Harvey Weinstein

With the exception of Reservoir Dogs, all of his movies had fairly significant budgets, not high, but all above $10 million which even today is a lot of money. Providing this cash were major studios or the Goldman-Sachs funded Weinsteins. So how does a straight white male filmmaker, who likes politically incorrect language and violence, survive in this type of environment?

He cucks.

"I don't know about you but I love violent movies. What I find offensive is that Merchant-Ivory shit." How can a man who said this quote be a cuck?

For evidence, let's roll the film:

Female Casting

Notice how all the female cast members are either ugly or de-sexualized? Uma Thurman is about as pretty as it gets in Tarantino's films. But in Pulp Fiction she was forced to wear a black wig (a supposed nod at French starlet Anna Karina) and in Kill Bill, the woman appears disheveled or bloodied a majority of the time, (with her feet featured prominently). Watch Lady Snowblood or Broken Oath (influences for Kill Bill). Even though there's plenty of action theatrics, the respective leads, seem to maintain their good looks throughout the proceedings.

Other attractive females cast in his pictures (Bridget Fonda, Kerry Washington, Rosanna Arquitte, Rosario Dawson, etc.) are similarly dressed down with strange wardrobes.

When attractive females are featured (Diane Kruger, Melanie Laurent, Vanessa Ferlito, Mary Elizabeth Winstead, Rose McGowan, etc.) they're either given nothing to do or are violently dispensed with. For example, in Death Proof, a pre-ugly McGowan is brutally murdered and Winstead's character briefly appears and then is written out before the climatic car battle.

The Girls of "Death Proof"

And no matter the looks, the women speak in a vulgar patois that shames even the most foul-mouthed of male sailor. Maybe it's just me but I don't find cussing women attractive.

The intellectuals and critics may argue this is just Tarantino's dedication to kitchen sink realism and his forebears of the French New Wave. But New Wave benchmarks like Eric Rohmer and Jean Luc-Godard usually cast attractive women while maintaining a sense of realism.

Could it be something else, maybe? Could it be that Tarantino's trying to appeal to the feminists who, after all, don't like pretty women? They take pleasure in the killing of the lovely ladies? Maybe they also like to be as vulgar as men too, just like the girls inhabiting QT's cinematic worlds. Could it also be a dog whistle to men who have no game? A repressive mechanism for them to take out their anger on the various women who spurned them?

Politically Correct Tropes

The dialogue may be "politically incorrect" but the characters and situations it inhabits certainly aren't. Reservoir Dogs, the only true independent gets a pass here but the subsequent films do not. At best, Tarantino plays it safe with his characters and plots and at worst, well, let's take a cursory tour:

Pulp Fiction: A black character, Jules, a hitman no less, lectures a white thief on moral ethics. How is this different than any Morgan Freeman picture? Director David O. Russell said this scene alone "redeemed" the film from its two hours of drug use, violence and vulgarity. Also, there's two white rednecks who like to rape men.

Jackie Brown: A black woman (Pam Grier) outsmarts all the men. In Elmore Leonard's original novel Rum Punch, the character was white. "But the villain is black," some might say. Sure, but would Hollywood higher-ups abide a movie with a white lead outsmarting a black gangster (even if said lead was female)? Now, Tarantino did state he idolized Grier growing up. She was a bombshell in the 70's—20 years prior to Jackie Brown. Was Tarantino looking for a role for Grier or a balance to having a black male villain?

Kill Bill: A woman kills everyone. Sure, she had both male and female enemies but could you imagine Mel Gibson or The Rock in the lead doing the same thing? Also this movie features two rednecks who like to rape sedated women while saying intelligent lines like, "My name's Buck and I like to fuck!" (a line stolen from the horror film Eaten Alive).

Death Proof: An angry white male murders a group of foul-mouthed, pot smoking women (and pre-ugly Rose McGowan) only to be murdered by a trio of equally foul-mouthed, but slightly more likeable women. Don't forget these women borrow a 1970 Dodge Challenger from a redneck (leaving behind Winstead to keep him company).

Inglourious Basterds: Jews. Killing Nazis. No risks here.

Django Unchained and The Hateful Eight: Masculine black men getting revenge on white racists (rednecks). Once again, no risks here. Can you imagine the roles reversed? Would that even be green lit?

The last three movies are in historical settings but they are in fact ahistorical. In Basterds, Hitler meets a different fate than what really befell him, World War II ends differently, and there's even a black projectionist in Vichy France. The "westerns" have similar historical anachronisms (like Australian speaking slave-owners). How is this any different than the politically correct, multi-racial casting of a musical like Hamilton which obviously has ulterior motives?

Emasculation Of (Mostly White) Alpha Male Icons

In Reservoir Dogs, all the lead (white) characters annihilate one another in a hail of gunfire. Fair enough, it was just a crime flick. Tame considering what befalls the alpha (mostly white) male icons in subsequent releases.

Bruce Willis barely escaped sodomy in Pulp Fiction; John Travolta gunned down unceremoniously…but, you know…"realism"…

Michael Keaton, gets outsmarted by Pam Grier in Jackie Brown. Sure, the guy was Mr. Mom but he was also Batman. But in the same movie, Robert DeNiro, shoots a woman to death after being taunted (you know, he's insecure) and then is summarily executed by Samuel L. Jackson during a chat. I know, I know, realism…

How about some the latter comic book style movies: David Carradine, Bill, in Kill Bill gets killed with a punch. The man from Death Race 2000, The Long Riders and Kung Fu, clearly was no match for Uma. Kurt Russell, a man's man if I've ever seen one, is killed by a group of chicks in Death Proof only to return for The Hateful Eight and receive death by coffee-drinking. In Django Unchained, James Remar, Don Johnson and Leonardo DiCaprio are dispatched with ease. Even Brad Pitt was reduced to a limp and scarred face in Inglourious Basterds.

Even the non-white alphas don't get much more favorable treatment. Kung Fu icon Gordon Liu is killed TWICE (playing different characters) in Kill Bill (both by female characters). Shinichi "Sonny" Chiba is given NOTHING to do in the same film, which is just as disrespectful. But at least his character didn't get raped anally like Ving Rhames' did in Pulp Fiction. Even swaggering and virile Jamie Foxx had to get whipped and tortured several times before achieving revenge in Django Unchained. Forget women and racism does Tarantino hate masculine men?

But back to Django…

The N-word…

How does a white writer/director like Quentin Tarantino use words like “nigger” in abundance and still find himself fawned over by the liberal press and intelligentsia alike? Besides the black characters who use the word, please note all the (mostly white) male characters who use racial epithets get killed (mostly by black characters). It’s like a safety valve. Ironically enough, only the character Jimmie in Pulp Fiction—played by Tarantino himself—says “nigger” in abundance without receiving any recompense. So, it seems the leftwing betas who adore these movies can therefore quote genuinely funny dialogue exchanges with impunity. After all, their politically correct shibboleths remain intact.

In the case of Django, film critic Armond White says it, “proclaims a white hipster’s voyeuristic pleasure in black vengeance, a form of Liberal porn, aberrant hip-hop.” I think you can apply “Liberal porn” to most of Tarantino’s canon.

Style Over Substance

Creatively, it is worth noting that Tarantino’s work is unconventional in story structure, almost lacking it entirely. The most structured films, like Reservoir Dogs or Jackie Brown, were based on other properties (the Chinese film City on Fire and Leonard’s novel respectively) or in the case of Pulp Fiction, benefitted from a co-writer (Roger Avary insists he contributed more than he’s given credit for).

From Kill Bill onwards it seems the parts (the soundtrack, gore and action) are greater than the sum. As my dad summarized: “His movies are long periods of talking with short bursts of violence.”

In short, they are lacking substance. It’s one thing for a movie to appeal to certain genre conventions. If one eschews said conventions, then the movie must have a sense of drama or deep reflection. Tarantino’s films possess none of these. And this is to his (and Hollywood’s) consumer advantage. He can virtue signal and get fans to talk about what they like (“It’s a celebration of the Kung Fu/Blaxploitation/Horror!”) and forget about the rest.

White, really one of the few critics to question the cult of Tarantino said, “His (Tarantino’s) love of movie trash doesn’t reveal deeper truth; it trivializes.” Men like action and thrills but there is no underpinning dramatic structure that might make them think or feel. As noted above, most fanboys just like the director's work and never really explore the works that "inspired" him, this so-called, "movie trash". I find that interesting because most of those "trash" films are vastly more entertaining than Tarantino's and most genre movies have at least some form of narrative force and moral compass (an evil usually needs to be at least challenged).

Tarantino's films almost lack any sense of a moral universe, narrative thrust or dramatic structure. It's almost a cinematic version of performance art. And his fans love it.

So, what's wrong with that?

Totalitarian Tendencies

David Mamet, in his book Theatre, noted that performance art got its start under totalitarian regimes, stating "These [theatre] directors, deprived by the state of any meaningful texts, staged circuses where the costume and the set became the prime players. In effect, they constructed mobiles and called them dramas."

Could one say the same of Tarantino? Really, the crude dialogue is stated within politically correct structures without a sense of drama and minimalist of plots. His followers, loyal to his brand, just waste time, talking about the dialogue, talking about how the movies are "connected" (Did you know John Travolta character and Michael Madsen character are related?), and then might drift in to talking about the "Ring Theory" of Star Wars like the good consumers they are.

It's fanboy sedation.

It's one thing to watch a movie in the afternoon as a way to relax and then go about your day. It's another thing to dwell and commit one's free time on an empty work of product, another cog on an assembly line (have you seen Marvel's film slate?), analyzing every scene, every shot, every musical cue or every line of dialogue, while threatening and trolling those who don’t think similarly, instead of focusing on other concerns, like personal well-being or the state of the world at large.

Quentin Tarantino’s films are the “perfect” diversion and brand for adult men who want to escape.

But are they really escaping? I would say no. Tarantino is a cuck.

How To Do A Kip-Up Like A Kung Fu Master

December 18, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Today's article isn't exactly a skill that will save your life in the future, nor is it one of the "bread and butter" methodologies of an older and more civilized age that will supercharge your fitness training, but it is a neat little trick and, I imagine, will serve to fulfill dimly remembered childhood dreams for many of those in the audience (and I include myself in that).

The kip-up is a technique that likely all of us have seen since we were young—perhaps in a kung fu movie, or a video game, or in a professional wrestling match. It seemed so simple, too: just a bit of a heave-ho from the floor, and you pop up onto your feet the epitome of grace, instantly summoning a horde of nubiles to perform the filthiest of sexual maneuvers on you.

And so you would inevitably go down on the floor, try to kip-up…and slam your ass into the floor. And again. And again. And again. For most of us, that's where the kip-up ended, with sore asses and failure. That's where it ended for me for many years.

But then, thanks to Paul Wade and the people at Dragon Door publishing Explosive Calisthenics, AKA Convict Conditioning 3, I discovered a comprehensive method of training the kip-up and eventually mastered this elusive skill—more accurately, I mastered the standard kip-up, Step 7 out of 10 of the kip chain. The no-hands kip-up still eludes me.

Kip-ups are often associated with martial arts curricula, “trickers,” and the like. While I would not recommend actually doing this in a fight since it’s quite possible the opponent will literally hold his fist out for you to kip your face into, I can’t deny that it looks really cool, and it trains the muscles of the hips and torso—including the erector spinae—to work explosively, which is useful in a variety of situations.

Like all of the Convict Conditioning techniques, there are a series of incremental “baby steps” for developing this skill. And without further ado:

1. The Rolling Sit-Up

This is not actually a kip at all so much as it is a method of training your muscles to assume the position that will eventually be used in the kipping. Sitting flat on the floor, roll back so your legs are straight and over your head as shown. It’s a little bit easier for beginners to start with bent knees, but to develop the strength for the no hand kip, you will eventually need straight knees

Having done this, forcefully roll forward and sit-up into the original position.

2. The Rolling Squat

It’s almost identical to the first step, but continue to roll through until you are squatting on your two feet (hunching forward is fine). Bear in mind that you are not doing any truly explosive maneuver yet.

3. The Shoulder Pop

This exercise is the first of the explosive techniques, and will teach you the proper way to kick. It is a common misconception that one kicks out to do a kip-up. I've always found that while the hips and chest roll forward, the feet and legs should kick straight up. That motion is what gets you to your feet.

Anyway, roll back so your legs are over your head, placing your hands by your ears. Forcefully kick your legs up while pushing with the hands. Do not roll forward, essentially just pop your back and shoulders off the floor. Hold it if you can, or even go into a headstand.

4. The Bridge Kip

Get into the stand kipping position detailed above, kick up with your legs while pushing up and forward with your hands and torso. When your feet hit the floor, you should essentially be in a bridge hold position.

It's worth noting that from here, all of the kips are just progressively kipping higher and getting more of your body under you:

5. The Butt Kip

Get into position, kip up and forward, aiming to land in a sitting position. The key is to bend the knees towards your face, and then extend them straight, kicking UP while you push off the floor and roll the torso FORWARD.

6. The Half Kip

Do the kip-up and aim to land on your feet, even if only for a second or two before falling back onto your butt.

7. The Kip Up

By now you should know the basic technique, just kip up and try to throw yourself forward enough so that you stay on your feet. Kipping up into a stable crouch/squat is acceptable.

What makes this easier, I find, is to spread your legs a little bit wider, and to make it more difficult, you put your feet together.

Regardless of how you go about doing it, mastery of this skill will earn you the envy of millions of B-Movie fans. And when I master the no-kip…eventually, I'll be sure to write about that as well.

Why The Fake News Media Is Promoting Russian Hacking Hysteria

December 18, 2016 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

The current year was the gift that kept on giving when it comes to pulling back the curtain on the powers that be. What we've seen since Donald Trump's win has basically been the five stages of grief. The denial phase came with the "not my president!" shrieks. Denial became anger when "not my president!" led to large protests. Then came the bargaining phase. The first act of this was the "recount 2016" extravaganza that was little more than a fundraising scam by Jill Stein. When that effort collapsed, the second attempt at bargaining came with what is quite possibly the most visceral episode of mass hysteria I've ever seen (and that's saying a lot): the moral panic over "muh Russian hackers."

The tales goes that "the Russians" were responsible for the releases of DNC and John Podesta's emails. While "muh Russia" was used as a rhetorical device by the failed Hillary Clinton campaign for months prior to the election, the story picked up hysterical steam afterward. First came the Jeff Bezos' blog's (formerly the Washington Post) inflammatory post linking an aggregate of "fake news" sites to Russian propaganda… which was itself fake news.

When that effort flopped around the end of November, the next outrage came in the form of a story, again from Jeff Bezos' blog, centering on reports that a "secret CIA assessment" had concluded that Russia had indeed interfered in the election in favor of Trump. This unleashed a firestorm that has essentially become a meme with a sort of reactive evolution.

What We Know

First, there is no conclusive evidence (that we know of) that any agent of Russia "hacked" anything. All the buzz is based on hearsay and second-hand sources from entities that have routinely made mistakes, lie, and invented methods of propaganda to undermine the sovereignty of other nations.

In other words, we hear from anonymous "sources" that say such reports exist, but we don't know who these people are or what the reports are, and these "sources" are from entities that have a checkered history. We in point of fact don't even know for certain that these "sources" exist.

Wikileaks, which has never been found to release a false document, denies that they received any of the emails they released from Russia or any agent of the Russian government. Instead, it was purported to be a Democratic insider that was disgusted with what he saw. Such a scenario is typical in cases such as this.

We also know that John Podesta had his emails compromised because of a phishing link. This was not an incredibly sophisticated operation that would require the efforts of the Russian equivalent of the NSA to pull off. To his credit, President Obama admitted this. It could well have been that infamous "400 pound guy in the basement" that Donald Trump so memorably spoke about, given what we currently know.

Then things get stranger still. For instance, the FBI disagreed with the CIA's as yet unseen "assessment," the Office of the Director of National Intelligence did too, and then after the controversy went on for a few more days, suddenly the FBI and ODNI, according to Jeff Bezos' blog, "agreed with the CIA's assessment."

Did I mention that Jeff Bezos' blog is on record as having signed a $600 million contract with the CIA? Meanwhile, the CIA refuses to brief Congress with its purported assessment or any evidence of it, which even security hawks like Peter King find troubling.

And then there's this one – according to Wikileaks, the "journalist" that channeled NBC's claims about Putin's personal involvement in the "hack" is none other than Ken Dilanian, who has an extensive relationship with the CIA and sent stories their way prior to publication (you'll also note that various Jeff Bezos bloggers are also fingered).

None of these uncertainties stopped the fake news media from parroting the tenuous claim that Russia was behind the leaks. Notice also that the claims continue to get more hysterical. First the fake news media talked about Russia hacking the emails, but in recent days "hacked emails" quietly became "hacked the election." This despite the fact that a federal judge in Pennsylvania threw out Jill Stein's recount scam, stating at the very beginning of the opinion that there was no evidence of any breach of the integrity of the vote. President Obama and Attorney General Loretta Lynch are also on record as saying no evidence of any interference was found.

Consequently, when "hacked the election" began to lose some steam, Vladimir Putin suddenly became personally involved in the "hack." This drove the hysteria even wilder. This is akin to what Thomas Sowell describes as being "verbal inflation."

Ironically, there's currently more evidence to support the assertion that Donald Trump was a DNC conspiracy rather than a Russian one, for a few reasons:

1. The Wikileaks emails showing that officials within the DNC attempted to secretly promote what they called "pied piper candidates," which included Donald Trump, because they thought they'd be easier for Hillary Clinton to defeat.
2. The fake news media, which we know from other leaked emails, had close ties to the DNC and the Clinton campaign, gave Donald Trump at least $1 billion in free coverage during the primaries. While this was partly due to his own savvy of playing them like a fiddle, we do have suggestions (that go beyond empty speculation) that it may not have been entirely so.

Of course, the "muh Russian hackers" serve as a convenient scapegoat for Hillary Clinton and her gang of losers to assuage their cognitive dissonance and explain their loss ("fake news" and FBI Director Comey are other popular vehicles), retaining the sacred mantra that "nothing is ever Hillary's fault" and that there was no possible way she just could have been an incredibly terrible candidate, but that doesn't excuse the irresponsibility of making these incendiary claims against a nuclear power without good evidence. Nor does that explain the deeper motivations potentially behind this hysteria.

Live footage of the Russian hackers in action.

What's Really Going On?

When I see useless appendages like Mitch McConnell insisting that "Russia is not our friend," I ask myself: "Why do these people want Russia to be our enemy so badly?" The United States and Russia, despite the pretensions of a foreign policy establishment that has led the American people into one boondoggle after another, do share some common interests. Among these are destroying ISIS, combating Islamist terrorism generally, preventing Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, and containing a China that has been behaving increasingly badly on the world stage. It's also just a good idea in general to have, if not friendly, cordial relations with a nuclear power if possible.

So what really is the purpose of all this hysteria?

For some with a mind for fantasy, this "invalidates the result" and the Electoral College should prevent Donald Trump from taking power. By the time this post is released, this hallucination will have evaporated.

There are other, more realistic ways to use this hysteria, however. First, it's an obvious attempt to de-legitimize Donald Trump's presidency. This will make his efforts at unifying the country and getting his agenda passed more difficult.

The second purpose is a bit less general but arguably more potent. A cloud will hang over anything Donald Trump's administration does in relation to Russia, at least at first. This is happening right now with Donald Trump's pick for Secretary of State, Rex Tillerson. We're witnessing something that can only be described as mass onset paranoia as Tillerson's detractors in both parties and in the fake news media are fixating on that one time he drank champagne with Vladimir Putin, ignoring all the other deals he made with other leaders and the context of the deal with Russia.

The Russia hysteria seems likely to be an advanced persuasion tactic at this point, one which originated from people who know what they're doing. It has a ring of familiarity since it's a tactic Trump uses often – that of setting anchors. I call this part of the domination of space strategy.

In essence you set the terms of the discussion so broad and so outrageous that you first, draw all attention, and second, have a wide leeway for maneuvering and negotiating to get what you want. You'll note this pattern when the media wants you to be increasingly outraged by using the inflation method I described above.

By being so outrageous, the media and its handlers from more shadowy elements in the government have dominated space on the Russian issue. By setting the bar so high and so outrageous, they've pretty much become the only game in town on it, sucking all the oxygen out of the room. As such, it threatens to cast anything Donald Trump does in relation to Russia with a cloud of suspicion unless his actions perfectly tow the foreign policy establishment's line, which may be what they were after all along.

The “muh Russia” episode, aside from being a delusional fantasy of social justice warriors and an outlet for their cognitive dissonance, may be telling us that Donald Trump’s promise of an “America first” foreign policy has seriously ruffled feathers in the swamp that is Washington, arguably even more than his positions on trade and immigration. We can only hope that this part of the swamp gets drained with heightened energy and vigilance. Because Donald Trump is himself a “master persuader,” it will be interesting to see how he counters this domination of space tactic.

Now, none of this means that the Russians didn’t engage in any hacking, and for insurance purposes in the age of online mobs, I now say that I don’t think Putin is necessarily a “good guy.” It is possible that all of the claims about Russian hacking are true – but the key point is that we need to see better evidence than what has been presented.

12 Ways To Do Better Next Year

December 19, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

With another year gone, it’s time to reflect on what you accomplished and what you couldn’t. And if you’re like any other ambitious man out there, you would probably have a lot of regrets on the opportunities missed and things you wish you had done better. Before you start planning yet another new year’s resolution, let this list help you make next year even better.

1. Take full responsibility

Assume that you have full control over everything that matters in your life. No more excuses, no more blaming, no more bitching about how the world is stacked up against you. It's not easy, but it's quite simple: change yourself and your environment to suit your needs, stop trying to change what you can't and accept them, and adapt to your situation as necessary. If you want a better life, hold yourself totally responsible.

2. Spend less time on politics

I realized this more this year than ever before: people spend way too much time reading and talking about politics instead of doing things that bring value. People either go on the Internet to complain and whine about what's happening around the world that they don't like, or, boast about how the world will be better because X happened or if only their vision for a better society came true. All this political nonsense has become no different from women gossiping about celebrities' lives or boring people talking about their favorite television shows as if any of it is real. So, if you want next year to be better for your life, either: take active part in making political change (online activism doesn't count), or, don't read anything and don't say anything about politics and focus on yourself. Put more simply: Do something about it or stop reacting.

3. Practice Gratitude

No matter what you may accomplish in the future, no matter how much of what you think will make you happy you attain, your level of happiness in the future will likely stay the same. Most people don't realize how great they already have it until they lose it. Instead of waiting for that eventuality, try to appreciate what you already have by practicing gratitude. I know it's not easy if you're ambitious like me, so here are four that you can start with.

4. System over Goals

Some of you may disagree, but I believe having vague goals with solid system is better than having solid goals with vague plans. Goals often change and evolve over time as you gain more life experience, but the path towards accomplishment is usually solid and requires your dedication. So, if you're planning to create another new year's resolution that looks more like a wish list of things you want, scrap it and look for ways to engineer your lifestyle by planning a system for development instead.

5. Cultivate Discipline

You’re a slave to circumstances and weakness until you have the necessary discipline to hold steady. My biggest regrets of this year happened because stress and emotional disturbance destroyed my productivity and mental frame. I lost countless hours that could have been put to work and embarrassed myself by being wavered by mere feelilngs. If you want to do anything better next year, learn to cultivate discipline first and foremost.

6. Argue Less

Arguing is a dumb waste of time that gets you riled up for no reason. If you value your time, don't do it. And always remember: Action > Words.

7. Do something that will stay with you

I've noticed that all the guilt I have about having wasted my valuable time comes down to the fact that I gained no lasting value out of it. For example, I feel bad about all the time that I spent playing video games and watching films because I gained nothing worthwhile out of them, only momentary pleasure. On the other hand, I have no guilt associated with all the time I spent working out or learning something valuable—even when I failed and even if they were painful—because what I gained from them still stays with me. Aim long-term and learn to enjoy the process.

8. Try new things

It’s easy to get stuck in a loop in our modern world. If you feel bored or unmotivated, try something completely different to shock yourself alive.

9. Stop doing the same old

Sometimes, it’s more important to cut out the bad activities than to do something good. If you’re serious about making your life better, the time is now to stop the thing that’s holding you back. Shed the old you to renew yourself.

10. Get regular sleep

One of the worst things you can do in bed.

As someone who gets completely derailed if sleep is delayed by an hour or if I have to wake up earlier than usual, I don’t how so many others manage to function with irregular sleep patterns. Sleep is a vital aspect of your health and you should aim to prioritize it as much as exercise and diet. Read this article of hours to get you started.

11. Practice meditation

I've mentioned meditation before in my other articles, but I have yet to practice it myself on a regular basis. For the upcoming year, I plan to meditate daily to develop greater focus, inner peace, and mental fortitude and you should consider doing the same as well.

12. Be Content

By far the most important lesson I learned this year was that nothing matters if you're not content. Sure, you could potentially devote yourself to a higher meaning or purpose to forget about how brief and insignificant your life is in the grand scheme of things, but why not do it in a position of contentment? Why live a life of perpetual frustration and longing where you constantly chase things that you think will satisfy you? Whatever you want in life, they will not go away just because you decide to be content with where you are now. In fact, contentment may even help you achieve your goals better as you won't be as outcome-oriented, allowing you to focus more on the process instead. No amount of money, sex, and "success" is worth grinding your life away.

Closing Thoughts

I see a year as a microcosm of life. You make plans, you have expectations, but things unfold in ways you didn't expect at all. At the end of it all, you get to look back and reflect on what has come to pass and realize just how fast time goes by. But unlike life, you get another year, another chance to do better. We shouldn't take such an opportunity so lightly.

Mark Zuckerberg's Sister And Other Feminist Typists Continue To Obsess Over Us

> Roosh V, a "neomasculine" man with a poor imitation of a Duck Dynasty beard…
> — Mark Zuckerberg's sister, writing for Jezebel, indicating by attempted insult that she likes Roosh's beard and probably wants the D, too.

With Donald Trump's election win, feminists and other SJWs have been striving day and night to link us with the "big, bad, and racist" alt-right. And who do publications like Vox, New York Magazine, and Jezebel send to come after Return Of Kings and fawn over Roosh? Three extremely white women who would not fare especially well at all on ROK's 1-10 scale.

Aja Romano, Claire Landsbaum, and Mark Zuckerberg's sister wrote unsurprisingly train-wreck pieces about the dual convergence/non-convergence of the alt-right and its so-called "white supremacy" with gender red pillers. It seems that they are saying more about themselves and their own foibles, however, than Roosh, Quintus Curtius, Return Of Kings, the general manosphere, or anyone in the alt-right.

The women's criticism of groups of men who challenge the orthodoxy of our sociopolitical landscape reads like a projection of their own feminine inadequacies and a craving for the male dominance and validation they claim to hate. Tell me a time when either Return Of Kings or the Roosh V Forum praised women like them.

The supreme irony, too, is that Zuckerberg's brother created Facebook from an original concept called Facemash, which rated the attractiveness of Harvard girls and got the budding entrepreneur in hot water. This was all really no different to anything Return Of Kings currently does in rating women.

The Zuckerberg sister who is attacking us happens to be quite large.

For Mark Zuckerberg's sister, red pill concepts like a woman's value significantly depending on her fertility and beauty might hit a little closer to home than she wants to admit due to her obesity. It's potentially why she has lashed out at Roosh, trying to go after his beard of all things but coming off as the girl who admires the man speaking his mind at great personal risk. When was the last time any romantic prospect in Mark Zuckerberg sister's life said something that could get them into trouble?

She also has lashed out against ROK's resident scholar, Quintus Curtius:

> Predictably, Quintus Curtius has an extremely limited understanding of "how things were like in previous eras." His stated goal is "to remind readers of the glories of leadership, character, and masculine virtue that can change their lives"—so of course, his understanding of antiquity is of a world inhabited by only a few extremely elite men. He has no sense of or interest in social history, cultural history, women, slaves, children, and broad historical trends. The ancient world is reduced to a textbook model for leadership, character, and masculine virtue.

Quintus recently responded to these accusations on his blog:

> While you were bullying people for not adhering to your politically-correct ideology, I was starting a law firm, trying cases in court, fighting for the rights of the common man, and making an honest name for myself. This is the difference between you and me. While you are a spoiled child of privilege, I am a man who has earned his way through life through the sweat of his own brow.

His takedown strikes deeply into the soul of a woman who desperately wants to come out of her brother's shadow, but is unlikely to ever do so.

How much is that ugly white girl in the window?

Aja Romano in particular referred to "male insecurity." Yet she is actually insecure that Roosh and Return Of Kings believe—and actively promulgate—that men should not have to find women like her attractive:

Her appearance already inspired a meme:

I also find it rather galling that Romano is talking about the supposed insecurity of men interested in self-development and realist gender relations, not white supremacy, when she says things like this about herself on a Tumblr blog called "Nonmodernist":

> To be blunt, I am the physical embodiment of every negative stereotype about fat middle-aged single women in fandom and I carry a huge amount of fear and anxiety that I'm the wrong person to do this job–I'm not smart enough, I'm not pretty enough or fashion-savvy enough or accomplished enough, and who the hell anointed me a spokesperson for fandom, what did I do to earn that position?

Someone like Roosh is the ultimate turn-on (and nightmare) for Aja Romano because he a) finds her unattractive like most men, but b) more importantly, has faced constant social and even physical danger in publicly insisting that men should turn away from girls like her. He and others like him are the lighthouse that steers men away from the cliffs.

Romano ridiculously accused the proprietor of Return Of Kings of the "hate crime" of being familiar with Jonathan Swift's A Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People From Being a Burthen to Their Parents or Country, and for Making Them Beneficial to the Publick. This 1729 satirical piece was the inspiration for Roosh's own satire about legalizing rape as a way of promoting female responsibility, such as by not getting yourself blind drunk every weekend so the 1-in-a-1,000 bad man can't so easily take advantage of you on your way home.

Don't worry, Claire-bear. In just over four weeks' time, The Donald will be President.

Roosh has gotten Claire Landsbaum very sweaty, too. His and Donald Trump's use of a 1-10 scale for rating women threatens the widespread pussy pedestalization that has helped her moderately get over the much greater attention the hot girls got from the boys in high school:

> When Trump won, RooshV saw it as a victory for the PUA movement. "I'm in a state of exuberance that we now have a President who rates women on a 1-10 scale in the same way that we do and evaluates women by their appearance and feminine attitude," he wrote. "We may have to institute a new feature called 'Would Trump bang?' to signify the importance of feminine beauty ideals that cultivate effort and class above sloth and vulgarity."

But, of course, because Roosh had the audacity to read a non-mainstream, dissenting book like The Culture of Critique she calls him a member of the "racist" alt-right and part-Jewish guys like me or Jewish guys like Dawn Pine must be his loyal spin doctors. And an African-American Donovan Sharpe is somehow the modern-day Stephen from Django Unchained. Landsbaum is not so much confused as petrified. It is comparatively easy to label someone a "racist" when, in fact, their biggest—and sole—crime is essentially saying, "I would never ever fuck a girl who looks like you."

Finally, Mark Zuckerberg's sister sought to pillory Roosh for not disavowing Richard Spencer after he made a Roman salute before a crowd. So a target of her polemic needs to condemn a man for a mock hand gesture, while Zuckerberg can safely say last year for Jezebel that Amy Schumer made "a rape joke that works"? It's a pity that, for all her experience with the Classics, she can't hammer home and prove her points with the crispness of, say, Socrates and Glaucon in The Republic. Glaucon may not have fared as well as Socrates in their exchange on justice, but he made a much better fist of his argument than Zuckerberg has.

Where's the diversity in the sorts of writers lusting over manosphere writers?

Diversity, SJW-style, at Huffington Post.

In addition to the issues about the writers' projections of their own frustrations, there's the question of their very narrow, privileged pedigrees. Zuckerberg and Landsbaum, for example, are both daughters from well-to-do white families, the former most of all. Zuckerberg's father is a dentist and her mother a psychiatrist. On her website, Landsbaum references her father being a businessman obsessed with networking. Aja Romano's background was less clear to me, yet even if it turns out she's a troubled kid from the Bronx, there's no doubting that the actively anti-Return Of Kings crowd overwhelmingly hail from the much better part of town.

It is a sign of the times that girls who grew up in much richer environments than ours are soliloquizing about how oppressive and bigoted it is that we talk to one another. If we cross-referenced your and my early social circles with Zuckerberg and Landsbaum's, what do you think the result would be? I don't know about you, but I remember a household where my parents never even had a mortgage on the home we lived in, let alone owned it outright, and family pets were nearly given up multiple times because we lacked the money to look after them anymore. And in the case of Zuckerberg, I'm only talking about the socioeconomic background created for her by her parents, not the familial fame that came with her brother's founding of Facebook.

The mainstream media fears us

Reflect on the number of recent hit pieces directed not only at Roosh, Quintus, and Return Of Kings, but Donald Trump and anyone else who has railed against the political and gender status quo. They could not win the mainstream media the 2016 Presidential election for Hillary and these articles will certainly not win them back the legitimacy they lost so conclusively during the campaign.

Beneath the attempted take-downs rehearsed for months and the "confident" words that mask their personal inadequacies, SJWs and their general liberal enablers unconsciously realize that if we reach even more men, their days as narrative-crafters might be well and truly numbered. Moreover, many female journalists also know deep down that what Roosh and others say about women poses some uncomfortable truths regarding their own lives and how they themselves want men to value them.

3 Ways Nootropics Can Increase Your Success In Business And Life

The following article was sponsored by Limitless Brain

Winning—whether it's at your job, with girls or in your social life—requires you to be at the top of your game constantly. Taking care of your health through exercise and eating right is a big part of that game, but in order to come out on top, you need an edge. Nootropics can provide that edge. By enhancing certain aspects of your brain's function, nootropics can improve your productivity, help you work smarter instead of harder, and improve your social life.

Nootropics are known as "smart drugs": over-the-counter substances that give you temporary boosts in memory, focus, sensation and other aspects of your brain function. They can also reduce anxiety, nervousness and other negative mental states, making it easier for you to navigate social functions. Here are some of the ways that nootropics can help you…

1. Reduce Social Anxiety

It’s only natural to feel anxious when you’re on a first date with a girl, giving a business presentation to your colleagues, or some other social function that requires you to be charismatic and controlled. However, letting your anxiety rule you could result in you flubbing whatever you’ve set out to do. Nootropics such as l-theanine and phenibut will lessen your natural anxiety.

L-theanine (as well as suntheanine, a more powerful variant) acts as a natural relaxant, lowering the effects of stress and anxiety on your body without causing drowsiness. It’s particularly effective when paired with a cup of coffee, as it will reduce (and many times eliminate) the jitters or nervousness that come from consuming caffeine. L-theanine is also safe enough to take every day, and some studies show that doing so can lower your blood pressure. LIMITLESS BRAIN contains 100MG of L-Theanine per serving.

2. Increase Memory

Many nootropics are geared towards increasing both your short-term and long-term memory, allowing you to absorb new information more quickly and recall it at a faster speed. Even if you are young, a stronger memory is beneficial as it will increase your productivity and let you learn new facts and skills more efficiently. Nootropics such as noopept and huperzine are designed for the purpose of increasing your memory. LIMITLESS BRAIN is a powerful nootropic formula that has many benefits including enhanced memory.

Huperzine, an ingredient in LIMITLESS BRAIN, works by increasing the amount of acetylcholine, an important neurotransmitter, in your brain, giving you sharper senses and a more efficient memory. Indeed, huperzine has been used by Alzheimer’s sufferers to improve their cognitive function. As a side effect, if taken before bed, huperzine makes dreams more vivid and memorable, making it an ideal tool for those interested in lucid dreaming. Because the body develops a tolerance for them quickly, both noopept and huperzine should only be used when needed, though they are not chemically addictive. LIMITLESS BRAIN mixes Huperzine with 7 other all natural nootropic compounds to produce a powerful product to boost your day to day life.

3. Improve Focus

Nootropics can also enhance your ability to focus, a lifesaver when it comes to mundane or repetitive tasks. By allowing you to better concentrate, nootropics can reduce your procrastination and make you more productive. Sulbutiamine and l-tyrosine are two common nootropics for this very purpose.

Sulbutiamine, another ingredient in LIMITLESS BRAIN, is a nootropic that reduces fatigue and improves mood. It doesn't give you a spike of energy like caffeine or other stimulants, but it allows you to stay alert for a longer period of time over the day and avoid getting physically exhausted for longer. Sulbutiamine needs to be taken over several days or a couple of weeks in order to see its effectiveness.

L-tyrosine is an amino acid often used by bodybuilders because it increases noradrenaline in the bloodstream, but it also has nootropic benefits. L-tyrosine can improve your focus, mood and energy by keeping your body's supply of noradrenaline from becoming depleted, and it also doesn't affect sleep. We make it easy to stack L-tyrosine by including it in the LIMITLESS BRAIN formula.

Nootropics are the easiest, simplest way to give your brain a boost. While there's no magic pill that can overcome poor health or lifestyle choices, a natural nootropic formula like LIMITLESS BRAIN can enhance your existing attributes and make your work and social life more productive and rewarding. Whether you need focus, memory enhancement or sociability, LIMITLESS BRAIN can help you achieve your goals.

Nootropics can be straightforward to use or they can be a nightmare

Upon first discovering them, most users are overwhelmed by how many different types of nootropics ingredients exist out there. The reality is that some nootropic ingredients are excellent and others are just mediocre.

Making matters more complicated, there are many 'synergies' between various nootropics that only seasoned users know about. These advanced combinations, often known as formulas, are one of the biggest reasons why nootropics are the real deal.

Nootropics combine well together to create incredible cognitive benefits for the user, but the key is knowing which ingredients to combine. You want to get a nootropic formula that contains the most effective ingredients that synergize well together. LIMITLESS BRAIN combines 8 nootropic ingredients to form a powerful cognitive enhancement formula.

It's made in the United States, in an FDA-registered and fully compliant facility.

It's safe, it's cheaper than your daily coffee habit, and most importantly—it actually works.

Nootropics are the future of human performance enhancement, and LIMITLESS BRAIN is the gold standard.

How John Harrison Solved The Explorer’s Problem Of Longitude

December 19, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In our modern era we take for granted the ease of international travel. We give hardly a thought to the difficulties that our ancestors faced when trying to move from one part of the globe to another. But make no mistake: those difficulties were very real and acted as barriers to movement. We will consider one of the most famous of these navigational problems, the measurement of longitude.

Anyone looking at a model globe today will see it crisscrossed with encircling lines. These are the lines of latitude and longitude. We early on learn the difference between the two: lines of latitude are the parallel lines that circle the globe from pole to pole like rings stacked one upon the other. Lines of latitude are very old; Ptolemy first described them in detail in the second century A.D., and he himself was relying on earlier geographers. Latitude is (relatively) easy for a mariner to determine; instruments like the quadrant and sextant have existed since medieval times, and they operated by measuring angles from the horizon to various celestial objects.

Longitude is fundamentally different from latitude. Lines of longitude circle the globe in the opposite direction as latitude, so that when the two lines intersect, they do so at right angles. Longitude is connected to time. Longitude meridians can shift. For a sailor to know his longitude measurement at sea, he must know his own shipboard time, as well as the precise simultaneous time at another place on the globe. Only by comparing these two times can he know where he is.

Why is this? Since the earth takes twenty-four hours to revolve on its axis, and each revolution is three hundred sixty degrees, we can say that each hour of time difference between the two places represents fifteen degrees of longitude. On degree of longitude represents four minutes, but the distance involved will vary from one point on the globe to another. (A complete explanation is lengthy and need not concern us here. Those interested can contact the writer).

So the key to unlocking longitude involves time measurements. What seems like no big problem today was in fact a major problem in past centuries. Clocks were large and unwieldy, most operating by pendulum. Even the ones that could be placed aboard an oceangoing ship would not be able to record time with enough precision to make them useful. One of the best-kept secrets of the Age of Exploration is that most of the great explorers were hopelessly lost most of the time. They had to rely on their instincts, dead reckoning, portents, and a “feel” for the locale; but these things could only take a mariner so far. And one could not prepare reliable charts using intuition.

And there the problem stood for many centuries. Astronomers proposed some cumbersome solutions, but these were of limited utility. Finally, in 1714, the British Parliament made a bold move: it passed the Longitude Act, an initiative designed to fire the imaginations of creative minds everywhere. It offered a huge cash reward to anyone who could devise a useful and practicable way of measuring longitude. Specifically, the Act offered the following: 20,000 pounds for a method to calculate longitude to an accuracy of half a degree; 15,000 pounds for a method producing an accuracy within two-thirds of a degree; and 10,000 pound for a measurement within an accuracy of one degree. (The ambitious reader can do his own calculations to see what these cash equivalents would be in 2016 British currency).

One solitary genius named John Harrison heard the call to action and set to work. He must rank as one of the strangest and impressive figures in British scientific history. Born in 1693, Harrison showed an early mechanical aptitude and excelled at woodworking and carpentry. For some reason–we do not know why–he became obsessed with clocks as a teenager, constructing his first pendulum models before the age of twenty. Perhaps it was because such contrivances offered a suitable challenge to his talents. His clocks were revolutionary in that they used new types of gears and wheels and could run without any lubrication by oil. This last point would prove to be essential for making accurate chronographs at sea.

By 1736, Harrison had produced the first prototype of what would be called “H-1.” It was an imposing machine that weighed seventy-five pounds and occupied a box four feet square. Trials of the instrument at sea showed that it kept meticulous time. Harrison refined his frictionless clock designs in the years ahead, producing models H-2 (1741), H-3 (1759) and the beautiful H-4 (1760). This last model was so light and portable that it could be carried by one man in the palm of his hand. Harrison was a perfectionist and a modest man; his lack of self-promotion meant that credit for his work was late in coming.

As often happens when brilliant “amateurs” dabble in fields dominated by “professionals,” professional jealousies began to surround Harrison. Many of the influential astronomers and mathematicians of the Royal Society (some of whom came from distinguished families) could not comprehend that a modest middle-class worker from Yorkshire could have produced such machines with no formal training, no experience, and no university degrees. It was beyond their comprehension. Harrison’s mere existence proved a threat to powerful interests.

Harrison's H-3 sea chronometer (1759)

The scientific establishment did everything it could to prevent Harrison from claiming the prize that was rightfully his. The Rev. Nevil Maskelyne, the fifth astronomer royal, proved to be a particularly vindictive opponent. At Maskelyne's behest, the Longitude Board (the panel overseeing the clock testing and awarding of the prize money) dragged its feet on recognizing Harrison's accomplishments. Worse still, the Board changed the rules of the game whenever it felt like it. Harrison had made the establishment professionals look like fools and they were determined to punish him for it.

But truth cannot be suppressed for long. It will always find a way to reveal itself. Harrison's sea-clocks proved their worth; Captain Cook himself carried one on his famous voyages. But after decades of delayed recognition, Harrison was finally granted an audience with King George III himself in Windsor Castle. (In this drama, even the partially insane have a role to play). Harrison (with his son) was finally able to explain to the king all the wrongs he had suffered at the hands of the bureaucrats and authorities. George III was said to have been outraged by Harrison's shabby treatment, and was determined to resolve the matter. "By God, Harrison, I will see you righted!" he told Harrison's son William.

In 1773, Harrison finally was able to claim the prize that was rightfully his. It was a supreme moment in the history of justice as well as of science.

6 More Double Standards Leftists Enforce On Their Enemies

December 20, 2016 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

The leftist establishment, that still holds most institutions in the West, enforces serious double standards. Many of the norms and rules we follow are the result of said double standards—and of the left's power to enforce them. Conservatives must be incredibly mild in order to be accepted in the world of media and politics, and, more often than not, must go through complex philosophical arguments to make even basic common-sensical claims, whereas leftists have an implicit right to being hysterical and hammering unproved points without ever being called out.

If you never confront openly these double standards, you let them pass unnoticed and let the leftist claim their artificial moral high ground. Once a leftist double standard is unearthed, it loses much of its grip, and the liberal will usually try to back it with another double standard… that you can call out as well.

Some of these double standards were mentioned last week. Here are some more.

1. The right to victimhood

“Glory to the vanquished”, Antonin Mercié, 1874 (copy)

Since the “most underprivileged” have been placed on the cultural altar, so-called minorities rushed to paint themselves as such and occupy the field. Being recognized as an undeserving victim has become one of the highest honours, one that allows for public funding, positive—i.e. positively biased and pre-programmed—attention, academic sinecures, cultural weight, ability to make emotional blackmailing without getting called out and so on.

So-called minorities are nothing more than a circle of authorized lobbyists that pretend to embody whole social categories, which is why I would rather call them minorit*ists* than assimilate them to said categories. These lobbyists are responsible for the constant leftward drifting of Western culture. They occupy many, if not all, mainstream metapolitical fields, and if you try to step up on one of these fields, they will sense a danger to their State-enforced institutional position and try to knock you down.

Remember, the victimhood cake can only exist

1. as long some groups are acknowledged as “true victims”, and
2. as other groups must pay for the former.

If those who eat that cake sense you go towards the slightest victimhood yourself, no matter what actually happens, they will deny you the right to acknowledgement—thus only allowing you to produce silently and get your blood sucked by them.

2. The right to mention safeness or wanting to be safe without being called an –ist or a –phobic

The one on the left is allowed to be “triggered”, the one on the right isn’t.

Feminists constantly talk about muh harassment. Likewise, minoritists make a great deal of so-called microagressions, which are mostly a fancy term to accuse the dreaded cis-white-male again and again.

But if Whitey dares to speak about black-on-white crime, and by crime I mean real offenses going from random physical threats to violent murder, then the minoritists yell “racism!” This also happens more insidiously to blacks that get murdered by other blacks and whom the mainstream media never speak of. They can accuse us of making them “unsafe” whatever really happens, but if we speak of having been assaulted or notice the pattern of actual crimes and ask for more safety, they will call for laxity towards criminal while shrieking at us.

In the same way, if we want to be safe of SJW mob harassment, they will say something like “it is normal that you are made to feel like a racist if you are one”—which means, in other words, “we have a right to isolate you, shame you, ruin your life and deprive you of your job, we have a right to decide absolutely on the norms and frames of polite society, now shut up and swallow whatever we’ll do to you!”

As our calls to safeness mean safeness from criminals and from the SJWs who at least indirectly support them, and as our calls to safeness conflict with that politically correct lead blanket they made especially to enslave us, they maintain a double standard that makes them able to create “safe spaces” inside places they already control while we are supposed to let them roam and harm freely anywhere.

3. The right to recognition as a right to empathy and public consideration

Jack, the man who can cry in thick man-boobs without being a wimp.

This one flows from the previous double standard. In a nutshell, if you are not part of an acknowledged protected group, you've got no right to empathy. Being part of the dreaded majority, you must be either the bad guy or someone who does not matter as there will always be someone who's more of an acknowledged victim or more fashionable than you are.

As the Big Other is pedestalized, we are the actual Other in politics: the mainstream media always designates us in third person, sometimes uses the second—as in their ugly "dear white people…" pieces—, but never the first. We are definitely something else than their establishment. And thus, being the real "otherized" ones, we are those who can be excluded from all care or positive attention. Hence the feminist "male tears" meme: using it is tantamount to claiming they are vampires feeding off our sufferings, i.e. the very opposite of compassion.

Here, another double standard slips up: feminists who betrayed their own sadism through this meme have been lauded as subtle and ironic, whereas so-called right-wing trolls have been accused of being dark triad types.

4. The right to recognition as a right to dignity and being respected

The previous double standard was about being considered worthy of empathy or compassion. This one is about being considered worthy of respect or dignity. According to the narrative pushed forward through the Frankfurt school, Boasian anthropology, second-wave feminism, the third-worldism and many other faces, the Western world must be equated with imperialism and oppression, and Westerners should feel guilt for being what they are.

Before the culture wars, thinkers would meditate about values, merits, moral character, the weights and qualities of good deeds. All these were intimately tied with respectability. And they have been phased out by a perpetual agitation about “privilege” or “oppression” that negates how we built the country, are the living core of the West, both its substance and condition of prosperity.

As long as we are considered as having exploited some fantastical Other rather than having built and created things out of raw genius and work, this one will persist.

As long as those who get acknowledged as “oppressed” earn more respect than those who are truly worthy of respect, we’ll keep seeing porn actresses branded as “warrior grrls” or “courageous” professional victims like mattress girl Emma Sulkowitz promoted, race baiters like Jesse Jackson or Al Sharpton lauded, outright liars like Walter Cronkite or Betty Friedan presented as heroes, nepotic job-stealers or cunning manipulators promoted.

5. The right to do identity politics

Who is part of “us” and who is not? Who are “we”? These questions are far from merely theoretical: if I want to be a normal person and part of the “we”, answers to these become norms I ought to follow. Whoever can define group boundaries and push norms along wields great power.

This power has been mercilessly used in the US since at least the end of the 1930s. Jewish lobbies then attacked Lindbergh’s pacifism by associating it with German interests—them. Eventually, supporting the troops engaged in Vietnam was not part of the “cool” liberal us and relegated to the dreadful status of uncool, hence a them. Leftist coolness and inclusiveness work along ideological lines to draw boundaries.

If people on the right, or what I would call normal people try to make identity politics, they get labelled “racists”, “xenophobic” and so on. Whites were trained to pretend being colorblind out of fear of being called racists—thus renouncing any right to set their own boundaries following racial lines.

On the other hand, the left continuously made boundaries: it created minority identities along a Marxist class model, i.e. separate group identities based on anti-majority resentment, and it single-handedly put the topic of race on the forefront in the 2000s. To us, identity politics has been a game we’d always lose, a dangerous game we’d be guilty to even think about, but to them, it has been an incredibly powerful instrument of ideological bludgeoning and norms-shaping through social destruction. No identity politics outside of the left meant no checks and balances.

Today, it is clear that professional victim groups overplayed their hands. They have no legitimacy, either to do racebaiting or wage sex wars, nor to reject our right to draw boundaries out of real differences or responsible free will.

6. The right to declare wars

In theory, declaring war is the exclusive prerogative of a sovereign State. In practice, all wars are not considered equal, and anyone who declares it cares much about present public opinion and how future historians will paint him.

Some may associate pacifism, the opposition to war in general, associated to progressives through secular saints like Albert Einstein or Gandhi. Yet neither the Left nor the mainstream discourse have been pacifists in all cases: the same who opposed the Vietnam wars were diehard warmongers when it came to attacking Germany in the 1940s. Now, the Vietnam war is often quoted as an example of “imperialism” and moral illegitimacy, but who dares to criticize the liberal choice of destroying European countries together with the Soviet Union?

This double standard—the left can declare wars and tout them as fair, the right cannot—is intertwined with another one, i.e. implicit and acceptable selective compassion. We have been widely exposed to sentimentalist propaganda about civilian casualties in this or that war, from Vietnam to the current conflict in Syria. Yet where were the bleeding hearts when Russian peasants were slaughtered after 1917, or when Western middle classes were targeted by Bolshevism soon after, or when thousand German civilians were atrociously burned in Dresden, 1944?

Every liberal has a very selective notion of compassion, but they’re too dishonest to assume it.

Conclusion

This list likely reminded you some particular examples, from particular news pieces or college classes to daily life occurrences. You may be tempted to shrug your shoulders like, yeah, so what?, as it may be seen as underlining ordinary stuff.

But this is exactly the problem—nothing mentioned here should be deemed normal or ordinary. These double standards have become commonplace, to the point of being still present in the back of many minds, due to a long “march through the institutions” and culture, but they ought not to be common any longer.

All these have to be called out when enforced, until they lose all legitimacy and undergo the same disgrace that happened to normalcy in the 60s.

Don’t miss the third and last piece of this series about Leftist double standards, and feel free to complete the list if you notice some I haven’t mentioned.

The 3 Purposes Of Women

December 20, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When it comes to women, nature bestowed only three roles upon them: reproductive sex, child rearing, and homemaking. A woman who engages in behaviors outside of those three roles is going against her biology and will experience suffering as a result.

Reproductive sex

The primary function of sex is to reproduce. The secondary function of sex is to experience pleasure. Through universal abortion and birth control, we have demoted the function of sex to one solely of pleasure. Sex is now a sterile act between two individuals who are often under the influence of alcohol or drugs and who were paired based on emotional short-term reasons that often come down to entertainment or boredom.

Child rearing

The reason that women excel in child rearing is because their brains are similar to that of a young child. For proof of this, you only need to witness an adult woman interacting with children. While a man may be stiff and awkward with the creature, a woman instantly adopts a child-like personality and voice to create a genuine bond. It’s through this bond that a woman can better sense a child’s needs and communicate with it.

Homemaking

Loading...

Women have a unique taste and aesthetic that transforms any dwelling from a functional unit to a “home.” They add comfort, warmth, and cleanliness while men tend to focus on more utilitarian and practical aspects of living. A family home that has been touched by feminine hands is one where its occupants will be more comfortable.

A woman who is engaging in sex with a multitude of partners without any concern for reproduction, and who has less interest in child rearing than in surrogate activities like working in an office, dancing in nightclubs, or playing trivia games on her electronic device, and who is unwilling or unable to make a home comfortable for her family is going against her purpose. This may remind you of women you know.

Can happiness be achieved by going against your biology?

The easiest way to answer that question is to examine the mental health of those individuals who have firmly denied their biology: homosexuals and transsexuals. Studies clearly show that these groups are the most mentally ill and suicidal out of the population (1, 2, 3, 4, 5). Denying your genetic makeup entails the highest risk of being a loon.

A woman cannot be happy or even content with life if she elects not to reproduce, raise children, or be a homemaker. Is it a coincidence that modern civilization is actively encouraging women to stray far from these three biological roles? Our current society is inverted, as those who rule over us have determined that it's better to redirect feminine energy into something that benefits their own selfish ends.

Not only are women suffering more than in the past but men are suffering too, because they are forced to interact with broken women who deny their biology. Until we have women embracing their biological roles, this needless suffering will continue.

5 Lessons About Building A Nation From Singaporean Political Visionary Lee Kuan Yew

December 20, 2016 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

In politics and economics, the East Asian and Southeast Asian countries do generally have a limited originality. Philosophically and culturally, legalism and Confucianism play a vital role in many nations within the region, but socialism, capitalism and liberal democracy are completely Western inventions. Not to mention the whole spectrum of technology and innovation, borrowed from the West in the name of globalization (or pragmatics). Nowadays, prominent research in science at for instance The University of Tokyo occurs, but its larger framework does unhesitatingly stem from Western institutions.

With that said, there are still some lessons to be learned from figures within modern Asian politics. Lee Kuan Yew (1923-2015)—the former, long-lasting Singaporean prime minister who served his country for several decades—was such a persona. His most important book, From Third World to First (2000), as well as other discourses of Lee, are valuable sources of information that contain strategies and words of wisdom that can be useful in the West today.

1. Leave useless ideologies behind

Lee was a overtly convinced communist in his youth and as he entered politics. Since his rise of power in the emerging city-state in the 1960s, he shifted towards a more pragmatic and rational political-economic model based on a blend of Western market economy and institutions (British in particular), semi-authoritarianism, and a light version of Confucianism. The latter was believed to keep families united and welfare expenditures low.

The lesson to learn here is to distinguish the upsides from the downsides of Western and Asian culture and thus absorb the components that are valuable, while simultaneously discard the useless elements of whatever kind. Of course Singapore's particular version of a nanny state is problematic, but still it is preferable to many Western nations that preach unrestricted decadence and political correctness.

Western institutions and science are in almost every thinkable respect materially superior to any pre-modern Asian society, but some of the baggage from the 20th century West—such as socialism and left-liberalism—have no place today or tomorrow. The same kind of discernment has to be carried through whenever Western societies are transformed into more fertile ways of life.

2. Push-pull in international relations

Singapore is indeed a small and largely powerless country and hardly of any significance for American policies and politics. Still the leadership of Lee can serve as a symbol of constructive push-pull strategies regarding international relations (geo-political game).

Lee stresses that Singapore, as a small city-state, had to be careful and not upset powerful nations such as the U.S. or China, and always strive to keep Malaysia enough satisfied (whether or not they would otherwise encourage new race riots between ethnic Malays and Chinese, or cut off the water supply).

Still it had to show strength and courage during critical moments, such as when two Indonesian marine soldiers were executed in 1968 in the aftermath of the MacDonald House Bombing in 1965. Indonesia is a powerful country in comparison to small Singapore, but Lee asserts that it was important to show the region that signs of confidence and strength matter.

”Whoever governs Singapore must have that iron in him. Or give it up. This is not a game of cards.” – Lee Kuan Yew

The lesson here is that any nation and its main leader has to push-pull in ways that benefit the country both short-term and more long-term wise. The U.S. should avoid confrontations with China and Russia, and even smaller nations, but still set examples whenever its interests really are threatened from an international point of view. The leadership itself sends proper signals to other states and their leaders on how a balanced approach on international relations can be fortified.

3. Use global institutions for the benefit of the home country

[image]

Globalization and its political-economic underpinning, globalism, is indeed a complex of multi-layered mechanisms. Whether or not one wishes only a light version of globalization (or a light version of protectionism for that matter) or to immerse these processes, it is always of chief importance to direct them to national interests.

Currently globalization benefits many Western societies (constructive trade agreements, innovations in technology and science, agreements on international policies), while simultaneously hurting them (large-scale migration, intranational income inequality, companies and corporations leaving the U.S. and Europe for emerging markets, etc.).

Singapore is a typical example of how a nation has pretty much only benefited from globalization. This fact, of course, makes it fragile whenever unwanted global or even regional changes eventually occur, but the point is that at least during the country’s massive main development, it has used global/Western institutions and knowledge in order to accumulate wealth and increase prosperity.

For instance, both Lee and his eldest son—current Prime Minister of Singapore, Lee Hsien Loong—studied at Cambridge University in the UK. Today Singapore is one of the major nations in science and mathematics.

This is not the same as to stress that Western states in any way should use global mechanisms in order to hurt other nations that do not pose any direct threat, but rather to avoid the perils of globalization and perhaps also try make it less extensive in time and space, while simultaneously find ways to benefit from it, regardless of its current magnitude.

4. Be aware of the inherent risks of a multiethnic society

1964 brimmed with life-threatening race riots in Singapore, at that time a part of Malaysia. Ethnic and Muslim Malays—with a view of themselves as the regionally dominant group who ought to be granted special treatments—gathered and eventually attacked a lot of ethnic Chinese in Singapore.

Since then, Lee has struggled to maintain multicultural order through keeping demographics and different ethnic groups—Malays in particular—in check by means of both lenience and consistent policies. Somewhat forced tolerance toward minorities is palpable in Singapore, but also the chief significance of cooperation and individual responsibility.

It is not that difficult to find a parallel to the U.S. and other Western nations that currently struggle with the perils of large and unpleasant doses of cultural and ethnic heterogeneity. Just as Chinese is the dominant group in Singapore, whites constitute the majority (although decreasing) group in the U.S.

Scholars such as Frank Salter and Tatu Vanhanen have shown that ethnic heterogeneity do matter a lot with regard to social stability, economic development and the dominant population's will to pay welfare to other members of a society. But while Lee—rarely restricted by political correctness—consistently tried to keep demographics in check, his goal was to keep the share of ethnic Chinese at about a 75% rate. Most Western leaders are letting the majority groups shrink in numbers.

Any serious leadership must take demographics and cultural differences into account, while at the same time avoid chauvinistic attitudes and policies for the sake of both the whole and the main parts that make up a country. Immigration policies ought to be primarily beneficial for the host nation.

"I always tried to be correct, not politically correct." – Lee Kuan Yew

5. Investment in aesthetic improvement

[image]

Singapore may be primarily known as a highly modern and urban metropolitan area, with tall skyscrapers as its backdrop. However, Lee has actually made it into one of the world's leading "garden states," linked to a process of greenery which was initiated in the 1960s, with gradual improvements made visible in every decade ever since. Singapore is now even to be regarded as a "city within a garden," according to some views.

Aesthethics are valuable and one of the major aspects of any civilization. There is always room for improvement and small yet fruitful changes. Lee did also make this sententious statement in 1995, "I have always believed that a blighted urban landscape, a concrete jungle destroys the human spirit. We need the greenery of nature to lift our spirits."

Aesthethic improvement of this sort does have a instrumental value for the country's economy, and for its inhabitants who can live in a more pleasant environment.

How Game Can Backfire When You Invent Stories About Who You Really Are

When I was in my mid-20s, I decided to try a scam very similar to the one that many guys have used over the centuries – especially when they are completely new to game. I habitually attracted women quite easily, but for some strange reason, I decided to pretend that I was a recording engineer who worked with big-name bands, when I went to Spring Break one year in Fort Lauderdale, Florida.

I met this smoking-hot Serbian college girl from Canada right out of the gate, and she was 100%-prime, center-cut, Grade-A-quality meat. Her eyes locked with mine right away, when I first walked in the door of the club that was situated right next to my hotel, and she kept staring at me with anticipation, as I headed in her direction.

I finally sat down at the bar, about six seats away from her, never taking my eyes off hers, while about 20 dudes hovered around her, as they desperately tried to separate her from her panties.

If at first you don't succeed, lie, lie again?

To this day I have no idea why I chose this one and only time to make up a bullshit story about who I was, and what I did for a living, in order to score pussy. Chalk it up to youthful naivete. Chalk it up to seeing a woman who was hotter than Arizona in July, who had 20 guys madly orbiting her, all of whom were desperate to bang her. But I suddenly blurted out, after she moved closer to me and asked me what I did, "I'm a recording engineer in the music industry and I work with big-name bands."

Mightily impressed, she lasered in on me with even more intensity. She pressed me for more and more details about my alleged craft, and I stacked the lies up higher and higher until they blotted out the sun. We wound up driving on the beach later that night in the moonlight (yep, you could do this back then), and we talked for hours, until we finally landed back at my hotel room directly on the water.

It was truly an incredible night. The moonlight was streaming in the window as the ocean waves lapped the shore – Hollywood-movie kind of stuff. But as I went in for the kill, she suddenly told me to stop because she was a virgin and she was saving herself for marriage and all she wanted was a committed, loving relationship and a traditional family and nothing else mattered to her. Money was irrelevant to her – it was all about love and family.

She's saving it for marriage…

Not totally buying her story at face value, I tested her love canal for tissue proof, and sure enough, it seemed as if she had an intact hymen. Taking her at her word and not wanting to press the issue (or is that "tissue"?), we wound up doing everything else but fucking. I took her back to her hotel early the next morning, and I felt like a total piece of shit the rest of the day, due to the fact that my conscience had really started bothering me – but this woeful state of mind would only get worse as time progressed.

I saw her again that same evening at the club where I'd originally met her. We clicked again, big-time, right away, and she started to get more and more into me – or should I say, she got more and more into the illusion. She was one of the most beautiful women I had ever seen up to that point in time, and she came from a good family; she was dedicated to working out and to healthy living in general; she had aspirations for everything that mattered to any man who wanted a serious LTR; only true love mattered to her and money meant nothing; she was a true keeper. We spent more and more time together over the next few days, and I could tell that she was starting to fall in love with me.

I love you only for who you are…I really, really do…

During her last night in Ft. Lauderdale, before going back to Canada, we got together one last time at the same club where we had initially met. A buddy of mine had flown in that same day to spend some quality time with me, drinking and chasing girls, before his marriage in nearby Orlando, which was scheduled to happen a couple of days later (I was to be his best man). As my buddy and I stood at the doorway of the club, getting ready to leave, the Serbian girl broke down in tears and blurted out that she was madly in love with me. She begged me to promise her that we would meet again, in the spring, the following year, in the same location, in order to be married.

My buddy looked at me like, "How in the hell can you let something like this get away?" But I was fucked on that score. If I decided to man up and tell her that my supposed vocation was a lie, I'd lose her. And if I continued to maintain that the bullshit story I told her was true, well, eventually she would find out it was all a lie anyway. It was a lose/lose situation. So I just kissed her goodbye and off she went, crying her eyes out.

Opportunity knocks…

A couple of hours later, as I was lying in bed asleep in my hotel room, the phone rang – it was the Serbian girl. She told me she wanted me to take her virginity. (I about had a heart-attack.) My buddy was sleeping in the king bed right next to me; we'd shared the room to cut down on expenses. My mind raced. She was so freaking hot…what should I do. Finally, I told her to come over. She arrived about 10 minutes later, with a look of blissful anticipation on her face.

To get in the proper mood, we showered together. Very soon, we were all soaped up, lost in the moment, and I was ready to rock – and then it hit me again, harder this time. I was truly a piece of shit for doing this to her. I had lied to her and she was saving her virginity for marriage, and she was determined to seal that particular deal with me, and there was no way in hell I was going to marry her. So I backed off, stalling for time, as I tried to think about what I should do next…

Deflower her, or empower her… that is the question

Finally, we wound up in my bed. I could tell that my buddy was still awake, despite the fact that he was laying on his side, facing the other way while pretending to be asleep. This made the whole situation even more bizarrely uncomfortable, as you can imagine.

After ultimately deciding to just stop thinking about it, and take her down, I got between her legs, hard as a post, pressed tight against her opening… and… and… I suddenly stopped. She asked me what was wrong. I sat up on the edge of the bed and told her that I didn't feel right taking her virginity. If it was going to happen, it had to be because we were actually going to get married. Doing it like this was wrong. So I got up, put on my pants, kissed her goodbye, and ushered her out the door.

The ones that got away – where are they today?

Many years later, I wondered what had ultimately become of her. So I jumped online and quickly found her profile on Facebook. As coincidence would have it, she lived only 20 miles from me. After graduating from college in Canada, she had moved to the U.S. and she was literally living only a hop, skip and a jump away.

Wanting to see what would happen if I reached out to her, I sent her an invitation to connect on LinkedIn. Despite the fact that she only had only three or four connections, she immediately accepted my invitation within about two minutes.

Getting more and more curious about her situation, I did some online research, and found out that she was married. And then I discovered the kicker, while digging deeper for information on the Internet – she was married to a freaking billionaire. This sweet, special snowflake, with the perfect parents, and the perfect upbringing, who told me she was only in it for a long-term relationship based on love, was married to a mega-rich dude. And it wasn't her first marriage – it was her third.

Did she really like me for me, or was it that bulge (the one in my wallet)…

Naturally, over the years, I had wondered if she would have had the same enthusiasm for me, during our time together, had I told her that I was merely attending classes in Florida, to become a recording engineer, instead of pretending to already be in the business. And immediately, after I found out she was married to a billionaire, and it was her third husband, I realized the answer was a resounding "No."

I never pretended that I was somebody else after this encounter with the Serbian girl. And I always banged any hot chick who wanted it from me, from that point on (but only if I believed she wasn't married or living with a guy). And, yes, young squires, I fucked up royally. Your old Uncle Bob can't get it back. I should have banged her like a drum when I had the chance.

Conclusion

The moral of the story is this: do whatever you have to do, to get whatever you want, especially when it comes to women. Because they are bigger liars than you could ever dream of being. It’s all lessons and nothing more. And it’s a war. You are either in it to win it, or you are in it to do a half-assed job of it.

But if you don’t take the spoils when they are right there in front of you, you’ll regret the hell out of it later. And this inviolable axiom is true whether you lied to get between their legs or not.

Canadian Liberals Declare Self-Defense “Offensive” To Women

December 21, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

In Canada, self-defense has now been implicitly declared sexist by the incumbent liberals at Parliament Hill. While Canada’s extremely tight gun control laws are well-known, the extent to which self-defense is disrespected and stigmatized in this country is remarkably overlooked.

Recently, Canadian Liberal Patty Hajdu, Trudeau crony and anointed “Minister of Status of Women,” defended the current laws. She insisted that legalizing the use of mace and pepper spray as self-defense was “offensive” as it put “the onus on women to defend themselves rather than focusing on addressing and preventing gender-based violence.”

That’s when I lowered the newspaper and asked myself out loud: wait, it’s illegal here to carry pepper spray? Unbeknownst to me, Canada’s Criminal Code (the same code that, via Bill C-16, may eventually enforce the use of illegible, fictitious non-binary gender pronouns) states, under the Firearms Act of 1995, that it is prohibited and illegal to carry pepper spray or “any device designed to be used for the purpose of injuring, immobilizing or otherwise incapacitating any person”.

Canada's self-defense laws are not only unbalanced, they protect the would-be criminals more than our law-abiding citizens.

Not a person intent on injuring, immobilizing, or otherwise incapacitating you, of course. Not a person intent on raping your mother, sister, or girlfriend. Not a person intent on mugging you after they sock you in the teeth (at best). Not them, the law prohibits.

Inadvertently, this law empowers the criminals, because… they're criminals and will break the law, anyway. The law puts otherwise law-abiding men and women at risk of breaking the law, and criminally liable for defending themselves with a non-lethal means from a potentially lethal attack.

"Common sense" gun laws are not necessarily sensible

To add some tragic irony to this, the Firearms Act of 1995 was passed by Jean Chrétien's liberals in response to the 1989 École Polytechnique massacre of 14 women by an embittered, Elliot Rodger-styled misogynist. The act aimed to forestall future mass shootings, even though these tragedies or individual shootings in general have since not been reduced.

In addition to this irony, of all the firearms prohibited in this act, the Mini-14 hunting rifle used by the Polytechnique madman to shoot 28 people (and kill 14 women) is classified as a "non-restricted firearm," meaning it can be legally owned for private use like hunting and can be stored and transported with only a license and not a permit. You can buy a Mini-14 used at a local gun shop—if you can find one.

Thus, Canada's "common sense" gun laws state that citizens eligible to bear arms can (as liberally as the law permits) purchase, store, and transport a type of rifle that was used to commit a heinous crime, but cannot legally buy and use "mace" or "pepper spray" to thwart one. Needless to say, Canada's self-defense laws are laden with unjust double standards and a highly broad and confused logical framework.

While I understand regulating the sale, use and ownership of firearms, Canada is a good example of how "common sense" gun control can trickle down to basic self-defense laws and render them nonsensical. It can also lead to incomprehensible and plainly unjust applications of the law that, ultimately, empower the nefarious actions of would-be criminals.

There is one glimmer of hope…

Cue Kellie Leitch, Conservative Party of Canada leadership hopeful. Recently, she proposed revising the Criminal Code so that it legalized the use of mace and pepper spray for self-defense. Leitch impartially made this a matter for all Canadians; she did, however, angle her motion towards the issue of sexual and physical violence against women (even though there are many forms of violent crime that affect both genders varyingly).

Conservative Kellie Leitch wants Canada to become a nation with core values.

Leitch stated: "Clarifying the laws around the use of mace and pepper spray for self-defense will give women a greater measure of protection against would-be attackers." Sensible enough (this is Canada, so you have to expect at least a little bit of feminist pandering, even from the right side of the aisle).

And granted, I do not picture men using mace for self-defense in the first place (though we should have every right to do so). When accosted, us fellas tend to be very direct and confrontational; our method of self-defense is typically measured so that it is proportionate to the threat. A moderate threat may be met with a little Taekwondo (or your choice of martial art) and a severe one with a more extreme, possibly lethal force—like a firearm (insert: Canadian frantically patting empty waistband).

If you do not have time or cannot afford martial arts training, you can legally buy "dog and coyote attack deterrent" or "bear repellent" at Canadian Tire or a local army surplus store. I bought my girlfriend one in case she's walking home and needs to deter a "coyote."

"Pepper spray" is packaged as "Dog & Coyote Attack Deterrent" in Canadian stores. Logical how it's "Made & Printed in U.S.A." but not registered for use there.

Once again, it's not really about equality

Following that illogic, pepper spray is sexist to women, but dog deterrent is not animal cruelty to dogs. Whether a man or woman is attacked by a human perp or an animal, the intent—the will to physically inflict harm—is the same. If anything, animals attack humans inadvertently out of self-defense (believing a human wants to attack their owner or younglings), whereas human criminals know full well what they are doing. Why should the law allow defense against a confused animal but disallow defense against a thug with pre-meditated motives?

Hajdu deflects from these gaping holes in the current legislation by suggesting "we [Trudeau's Liberals] are developing a federal gender-based violence strategy in consultation with provinces, territories and grassroots organizations to ensure that women in Canada can live free from violence." (bold added) Basically, Hajdu hijacks Leitch's gender-equal position and skews it to gender-specific, proving the Prime Minister and his Liberals are not really about equal treatment of the sexes.

The insane implication of Hajdu's above rebuttal is this: no, Ms. Leitch, self-defense is exclusively a woman's issue. But we don't need self-defense anyway; let loving government intervene and defend the right of half the country's population (women)–the right not to protect themselves, of course, but to be victims–with legislation aimed at punishing the lesser, brutish half (men) who wish to harm them.

Feeling the equality?

Officially cucked, like many men in this country.

And when Bedlam could not get any fuller, the National Post (a typically reliable mainstream Canadian conservative news source) stumbled in to finally fill the institution's capacity. "Perhaps I am a little more feminist than she is," wrote the male author regarding Hajdu's comments. "I would be comfortable making the carrying of mace and pepper spray a sex-linked legal privilege. Hell, I would consider extending it to very small firearms." That quote epitomizes the high level of inverted and cuckolded intellectualism in this country, especially of Millennial men.

The bottom line: this is cuckoldry.

Canada is a nation of capitulation (our reputation for saying "sorry" exists for a reason), led now by a trust fund baby who celebrates Fidel Castro, states The Current Year, and believes "there is no core identity, no mainstream" here. We apologize when narcissistic malcontents temporarily shut down a public parade; we apologize and compensate by drafting anti-scientific, anti-free speech legislation to appease a minuscule minority of sexually confused crybabies; we apologize after ~~accidentally elbowing~~ manhandling someone who deliberately blocked our path. We apologize for wearing a hat that supports our politically incorrect views.

What about basic self-defense laws? Can we get that right? No. We publicly push biased agendas that implicitly place half the country's population into a basket of deplorables.

Kellie Leitch and Donald Trump: while there is certainly no physical resemblance, both political figures put nationalism and sovereignty first.

Fortunately, conservatives like Leitch speak truth to power and demonstrate a level of impartiality to their social policy prescriptions liberals seem incapable of doing. The United States has saved its socio-economic future by electing an anti-globalist businessman. I stood by on November 8th, rooting northward for my fellow nationalists southward. I implore you, dear reader, to do the same for us. Leitch has already been called "Canada's Trump"—she believes in self-defense and nationalism.

Canada's next election is in 2019. Abandon your egos, friends, and tweet to the stars: "Kellie Leitch 2019 – #TheRealImWithHer". Share articles. Send out a signal. If the aforementioned insanity of Canada's Liberals over self-defense does not inspire you, I simply do not know what will. America has chosen to go its own way. So has Italy. So could France and Germany. Allow Canada to follow.

When the time comes, Make Canada Great Again, too. Let's start with a little pepper spray.

Footnote: On Tuesday, Toronto mayor John Tory (the same "conservative" mayor who declared "Roosh not welcome in Toronto") called on the federal government to further tighten the nation's gun laws—which will add even more restrictions on law-abiding citizens' ability to protect themselves. Whether you're Canadian or not, sign this petition here to stop Tory's proposal.

Why Major Metropolitan Cities Are Hell For Dating

December 21, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

After spending my entire year on the road, there was one question I was absolutely sick of by the end of it.

"Why did you leave America? It's supposed to be so wonderful and full of opportunity and the people are oh-so-friendly!"

Inevitably, I'd mention something about how brutal the dating scene was in a place like Los Angeles. I'd hate on American girls a little bit, Eastern European women tended to simply eat that up (as long as you did it in a non-bitter way). Inevitably more questions would come about why the dating scene in America is so miserable.

I found a system to make my point and move on quickly, but it did make me think a little bit. What exactly made dating in major metropolitan cities so bad? And that doesn't just apply to American cities. It's places in Western Europe like London also suffer from this epidemic.

I sat down and drew out the road map as to why the dating game has become so incredibly difficult for men. Here's what I came up with.

Little Person, Big City

This topic is has been discussed to death so there's little reason to go into full depth other than for clarity.

Needless to say, many, many young folks (both men and women) move from the rural parts of countries to go live in the big cities. The Sex and the City life, if you will. The real problem is not so much the elaborate dreams—it's the lies that young people are told about the way that life works.

I'm only 25, and I distinctly remember being told repeatedly that I could in fact, have it all. I could find a nice girl in college and get married. I'd get a job that was fulfilling that I'd want to stay at the rest of my life because of mutual respect. I could buy all sorts of fancy cars and toys on credit and it would just be part of life. I could have it all!

Women are told a slightly different agenda—that they can get the top men in the world. No matter what. It doesn't matter that she's fat, unpleasant, or just simply not top-shelf. No, every girl is told that she can have the most high value men in the world if she just shows up and "is herself."

And guess where the most high-value men in the world are? That's right, right in the heart of the metropolitan cities. That same big city that she's moving to. So not only will she get to live the exciting party life, but when she's done with that part of her life (30 years old, 30 pounds heavier, and 300% more unpleasant than before) she'll be able to lock up the billionaire.

It's easy to chuckle at that laugh paragraph but can you really tell me that it's not the truth of what really happens? Every girl who moves to a major city is told this in one form or another.

NYC And LA As Examples

Ah, but here is the evil part of that little propaganda and apply it to two of the biggest cities in the world.

If you live in New York City, you're always going to find a more successful and wealthy Wall Street banker. There is always going to be another rung to climb. Even if a girl managed to lock down a billionaire, she'd be told she could lock down a better billionaire! Zuckerberg isn't exactly a masculine icon that gets the juices flowing apart from his obvious money.

You could also apply this same NYC system to other major financial, tech, or political cities—London, Washington D.C., San Francisco, etc.

(It's worth noting that NYC is a better city for dating than many of the alternatives.)

If you live in Los Angeles, girls are always going to think that they can get a better celebrity. Upgrade from a B-list to an A-list. "Oh, your B-list musician boyfriend is just a B-list…you girl, deserve an A-list bonafide actor like Leonardo!"

You can apply the Los Angeles system to other places that vanity and celebrity worship is practically the backbone of the economy—Miami, San Diego, etc. Just about anywhere with a warm beach.

None of this seems to apply to major cities in the East such as Kiev, where Ukrainian culture regarding the dating market is much more in check.

The Flip Side

On the other side of the equation, men are told different lies. If you're fat, broke, and have no confidence, people aren't telling you that you can get a Victoria's Secret model. For context, that's the equivalent of a girl who is a 6 being told that she can date Brad Pitt (and yeah, they're told that).

But, men are told that it's okay to be like that and that eventually a decent girl will simply pick them. So while we aren't told as blatant a lie as women are, the resulting fallout of that lie means that we don't improve ourselves. Rather than climbing the rung to the top of the food chain, we wallow in mediocrity.

The end result is that all women pine for the best man they can get (in their normal, biological nature, but exemplified by city living) and men are told we don't need to be the best man we can.

The result is a miserable dating scene for everybody.

Conclusion

Let's be realistic. If you're a girl and a 7, you're not getting a super alpha. If you're a man and you're a broke slob, you're not getting an even decent-looking girl. You're pretty much left with the scrap heaps, because all women are gunning for the top.

Women aren't happy in the dating scene because they're always being told that they can do better. Even if they're dating a good guy who has his life together and is by all means a good fit—her friends will actively encourage her to seek better at the first signs of turmoil.

Men aren't happy in the dating scene because of the attitude women have towards it. Wallowing in mediocrity seems like a far easier option. Even if you "make it" to the top, it's still endless games and energy being expanded on women who aren't worth it.

Is there a solution to all of this? If there is, I'd be keeping it to myself and trying to put it into a pill form. Unfortunately, I think this is just the hand we've been dealt—it's up to all of us to make the most of it.

Does The Future Belong To The Left?

December 21, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Likely you've heard leftists describing themselves as being the ideological torchbearers of the future. By extension, anyone resisting them (or even skeptical) is portrayed as being out of touch with the times, trying to stop the inevitable, or attempting to derail the natural evolution of society.

This sentiment is often given in catchphrases such as these:

- "You can't turn back the clock."
- "You're on the wrong side of history."
- "So I bet you want to go back to the times when [something bad] was happening."
- "Change is inevitable."
- "You can't stop progress."
- "We're the forward-thinking ones."
- "You're a reactionary."
- "Don't you realize it's [the Current Year]?"
- "You're a Neanderthal."

Actually, even the term "progressive" is a subtle framing tactic; it's an implied assumption that their policies really do represent progress—which literally means "moving forward." Another reason the term is used is because liberalism has acquired a negative association by some. Since they mean the same thing (assuming the modern variety of liberalism, heavily influenced by cultural Marxism since the 1960s), giving it another name is like putting lipstick on a pig.

Logic time

Being a Neanderthal doesn't mean you're always wrong.

All the above catchphrases depend on a certain implicit assumption. If you don't call them out for this hidden premise, then their frame wins the argument. The implicit assumption they want you to believe is that politics only moves in one direction: leftward, of course. These catchphrases are often delivered with a triumphant smirk, signaling that you've lost. Whoa, not so fast, there!

I wrote "catchphrase" rather than "argument", because none of the above actually are refutations based on facts or logic, no matter what it is you said. These are really thought-terminating clichés shorthand for an "argument from novelty", which is a rhetorical fallacy. The proposition "newer is always right" is just as incorrect as saying "newer is never right".

Let's take something pretty uncontroversial: 2+2=4. If you say this today, it's true. If someone said 2+2=4 in 1956, it was also true then. If an actual Neanderthal said that, it was still true 40,000 years ago. We should evaluate the truth of something regardless of who said it and when. Obviously this principle applies to things other than math as well.

The terms left and right originate from the seating in the Legislative Assembly of revolutionary France. Those who sat on the left favored change, and those on the right favored tradition. This is where the confusion sets in. Changes do happen, but it's not always in the same ideological direction, no matter how much some might want you to believe that their views will inevitably prevail.

Unfortunately, the left/right designation is a bit imprecise for several reasons. For one example, ideology isn't completely binary, and there's no place for anything off the map. Also "change" versus "tradition" isn't always a good predictor of whether a specific policy will be "left" or "right", at least not the way we usually consider these policies. (For example, by the strict definition, gun control would be a "right wing" policy in a country that already has it.) Still, we're sort of stuck with the left/right yardstick, imprecise though it is.

Note that traditions aren't always the best way to do things, or remain useful forever, but they do get to be traditions because they work. Therefore, throwing them out the window without careful consideration is unwise. Still, leftists often have an odd notion that they're smarter than all the generations who went before them.

By the textbook left/right standard, the most right wing government possible would be absolutist monarchy, like the proverbial Attila the Hun, or really any of the kings back then. That in turn evolved from tribal chieftains; Rousseau's idea of early mankind in an anarchical state of nature is wrong, as anyone with a passing familiarity with tribal societies is aware.

The furthest left leader thus far has been Pol Pot, who made Chairman Mao seem pretty moderate by comparison. Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge regime made sweeping changes to bring about an agrarian-based society. That involved eliminating the bourgeoisie in a very literal sense; people were put to death for owning glasses, because this meant they knew how to read. A third of Cambodia's population was wiped out, which is not exactly the best track record for statecraft.

According to the "all politics moves leftward" meme, things will get a lot more leftist in the future, and continue on that trajectory. So the most left wing government possible would be… who the hell knows? If it's really true that politics always moves leftward—carried adrift like a rudderless ship—then one day an administration similar to the Khmer Rouge will one day be the "new normal". That eventually will be surpassed by something even more radical and screwed up, whatever that might be. Where does it end?

Is change always good?

Not all changes are improvements. There's wisdom in knowing when to leave well enough alone.

"Change" is a favorite leftist buzzword that's warm and squishy, like used diapers. However, change is not a direction, just as hope is not a strategy. It's true that societies do change over time and circumstances. For example, communal ownership of property does work in some small, very tightly-knit tribes and religious societies. However, every attempt to implement that in an entire country has led to disaster.

Also, monarchy really did make sense back when the peasantry was mostly illiterate and only the upper classes were educated. That's not so compelling now that the public can read and has at least a rudimentary grasp of civics and economics. For this reason, I suspect that the dumbing down of the educational system might be an effort to make the public susceptible to demagoguery and even dictatorship, or at least unaware and compliant.

Basic human nature doesn't change; any ideology disregarding this fact—or disregarding elementary biology (such as feminism)—is doomed to failure. Also, what works for one culture might not necessarily work so well for another. That's one big reason why packing many cultures that don't have much in common inside the same country leads to problems.

What is progress, and who decides?

Here we come to an important question: what exactly is "progress" and who gets to decide? If you ask a leftist that, you'll probably get a "deer in the headlights" look. I do have an answer to that one. The System—leftists who have wealth, power, and media access—form a center of gravity within a loose coalition and call the shots. The Hive—all the little guys implementing their policies—follows along.

Still, does being a virtue-signaling Silicon Valley billionaire, or knowing how to sing or act, or running a Wall Street finance operation, or even being a big-name political hack make any of those people particularly wise or fit to lead? Actually, the world that Social Justice Warriors think they're struggling to bring about is very different from what it's being socially engineered to become.

The changes that the "progressives" do say they want may well lead to a future dystopian society characterized by vast extremes of wealth, a surveillance state with no personal privacy or self-government, and the loss of genetic and cultural diversity by throwing all of humanity in a global biological stir-fry. This is what will happen if the globalists running the show get the kind of world they want.

The plans are well on the way. The middle class suffered greatly from economic catastrophe while Wall Street bounced back and the rich are richer than ever. The surveillance state is very much in place (with microchipping perhaps on the horizon), the government is increasingly neglectful and hostile to the public, censorship is becoming more sophisticated, and managed democracy is the norm. The Western world has been targeted for destruction, and all other societies eventually will be homogenized to death later, which will be the end of diversity. What kind of "progress" is all that?

In any case, it's preposterous to say that every single thing the leftist collective hive-mind agrees on is something that advances society in a positive direction. For one matter, several leftist policies aren't really about equality. Hiring quotas, set-asides, and other rent-seeking measures benefit one set of people but disadvantage everyone else. The usual rejoinder is that this is to correct some wrong that might have happened decades (or centuries) ago, which few (if any) of the individuals now being punished personally benefited from in the first place. All this may be "progress" for the favored groups, but certainly aren't for everyone else.

Another problem is when leftist policies are wasteful, do more harm than good, or have an ulterior motive. For example, welfare sounds humane in principle, but the unintended consequence was intergenerational poverty, and that in turn caused crime rates to soar. (Hint: if you subsidize something, you get more of it.) Further, LBJ's intentions were far from pure, and welfare even has been used as a political battering ram. The point is, taking one step forward and two steps back certainly isn't progress.

The final take

Changes do happen in society, which then filters into politics. If the changes don't work, then they should be abandoned. If they do work, then they should be retained, in which case they'll eventually become time-honored traditions. There's no reason we can't question proposed changes, or must adopt them willy-nilly.

The ideological scene is not unidirectional; it's a back-and-forth motion, usually moving slowly. We can't re-create the past, but there's no reason why we can't learn from the acquired facts of history and implement what has been proven to work. The second half of the 20th Century was mostly characterized by liberalism, something carrying forward into today, but there's no reason why this must continue indefinitely.

Weapon Ballistics: How To Make A Shot At Long Range

December 21, 2016 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

As the fields of various firearms technologies evolved, we've seen the capabilities of the different types of small arms grow in scope and diversity. What was originally the same gun shooting shot or ball, with a shortened pistol variant for belt carry, has become a wide variety of guns tailored to specific needs, with one of them being long range shooting. Today's rifles can shoot a long way, but there's no point in doing so unless you can do it accurately. In today's article, I'll go through an introduction to small arms ballistics, and what you can do to hit the target with each shot.

Physics, the bullet, and you

A bullet's path is not like a laser; it doesn't go in a straight line, and you're not going to get the bullet's point of impact to match where your sights are pointing at more than one distance (sometimes two) at a time. You've got to worry about a few different things while shooting at range, but the most important ones are elevation, windage, and range.

Elevation is fairly straightforward once it's understood. Think of three balls. You drop one, throw one on a purely horizontal line drive, and shoot one out of a tennis ball cannon horizontally as well. Assuming they are all dropped from the same height, what happens? Those of you who paid attention in physics class will recall that they will hit the ground at exactly the same time. Put more simply, a bullet falls just like anything else.

"Ok, Luke, I understand; so a bullet will be two inches low at 200 yards, 4 inches at 300 and 6 inches at 400 and so on?" Not quite; there's two problems with that. The first is, just like jumping off a cliff into a lake, you are accelerating downwards under gravity, so the longer a bullet flies, the faster it will drop just by gravity alone. The second is air resistance; the bullet slows down due to drag, and, as such, has more time to fall per horizontal distance traveled.

Note how the bullet is dropping faster (y-axis) as it gets further away in range (x-axis)

The takeaway on elevation is that, due to gravity and air resistance, bullet drop is fairly trivial at close ranges of a couple hundred yards, starts to play a big role at medium ranges of several hundred yards, and is monumental outside of 1000. Your typical, over the shelf rifle running a 5.56 or a .308 will run out of effective range quickly after 500 yards, be totally spent at 1000, and it is absolutely possible to miss spectacularly at those latter distances due to improper sight dope (data on previous engagements, i.e. “what does my gun do at this distance?”)

Windage is the effect of the wind on your bullet. Put simply, wind will blow your bullet off course in its direction. We have a few things to consider. Wind is considered full value if it is blowing 90 degrees to your shooting, as in, coming across the range, and half value if it is at a 45. If it’s blowing straight on, either from the front or the back, it matters less, and is fairly inconsequential at closer ranges.

Wind does silly things, and there may in fact be wind blowing from the opposite direction at your target than it is at the firing line. Wind tends to have more effect downrange, as the bullet is slower then than at close range, but the best rule of thumb is that less wind is better, and the less sideways it is is better, too.

Lastly is range itself. You must know how far you are away from the target in order to add the correct elevation to get the bullet there. On an actual gun range, the targets will be at set common ranges like 200 yards. Most rifles are set up so that they fire well at close range with the sights set to a default position. This is a concept called “Battle Sight Zero” (BSZ) and it means that you don’t have to worry about sight adjustments inside a certain amount of range. For instance, the M4 carbine has a BSZ of 300 yards; anything inside that range can just be aimed at and shot, you will be close enough. Outside of that, start dialing in elevation.

Bullet Drop Compensators are relatively new, you just use the appropriate bubble for the range and it takes care of the rest. You can see how close 100, 200, and 300 are, and that's the idea of Battle Sight Zero; at closer ranges, you'll still make effective hits even if it drops some.

The concept of "zero"

Many people go to the range, sight in their guns, and call them "zeroed." Like said in a previous article, that's not zeroed, that's simply sighted in. There's a difference between fixed sights (where the sights are soldered or dovetailed or simply part of the gun itself), adjustable sights (where you can set them for whatever single distance you want), and zeroable sights (where you not only make the sights on at a single distance, but you set the sighting system up to read correctly at that distance and others.)

Let's use a couple examples here that are fairly straightforward to get the concept down. The first example is the US Rifle Cal. 30 M1, the Garand, and its sights. Garand sights are some of the best out there, and using them to explain zeroing works, mainly because they have both elevation and windage zero, unlike the M16 system.

Mechanical Zero. The right dial has the sight centered on the windage indicator at the bottom, and the left dial is backed down from the 200 yard “2” and the 100 yard (line below the 2) down to bottomed out at “12” (which is the max height, 1200 yards, once rotated around one full turn.

The first thing you do is set mechanical zero, which is when the sights are indicating on their dials that they are set with no windage, and no elevation. That means crank the windage knob to be center, and the elevation knob to be bottomed out. Garands happen to be set up for about seven clicks up off mechanical zero elevation to be close to being right, so doing that, then shooting at a 25 yard target is the first thing.

Garand Front Sights. Loosen that Allen bolt, then slide it opposite the way you want the bullet to go, just a bit, tighten down, and check again.

The second thing you do is leave the windage knob alone, and, instead, adjust the left/right to get on the bull with the front dovetail alone. See a previous article for sighting in. The rifle is now shooting straight left and right, and, just as importantly, it indicates no windage added, which means it is now zeroed for windage. If there WERE wind, and you were shooting at a range it would matter, you could dial in windage to shoot, then take it back out later, and be “on” again. That’s the point.

For elevation, you would actually use the elevation knob, but you don’t yet care what it says. Get it on the bull at 25 yards, then go to 100 yards and adjust as needed. Once on the bull there, you loosen the screw on the elevation dial, then twist the dial (which moves only the dial) to show “1” at 100, then tighten it down again. Now that you have done this, it is zeroed for elevation at 100 yards, and, if you wanted to shoot 400, you would crank the dial to “4,” shoot, then later reset to 100 yards at “1” and be back where you started. One should always leave sights set for close range work as a habit, you might not have time to change them.

Screwdriver on the screw you loosen to just move the elevation dial (which currently indicates 1 for 100 yards. (There’s only numbers on 2 and 4, 1 and 3 are implied with the lines)

For scopes with turrets (scopes with dials are simply adjustable and have no zeroes), the idea is even easier. You simply get the rifle shooting the way you want it, at the range you want it (which is usually a 50 yard or 100 yard zero), then you loosen the set screws which allow the dials to free spin, set them both to “0” (hence the name of the endeavor) and then retighten. You are now zeroed at that range.

Leupold M1 Turrets (I like these). This scope has zero elevation dialed in, and 1/2 MOA windage to the left. See the allen socket next to 13 on the right dial, that's what you loosen to set the dials to zero once the rifle is shooting right at your desired zero's range.

Shooting at range

Shooting at range has two additional steps than shooting at close up distances, but, provided you do your homework, it's actually not any harder than shooting close. Those two steps are range estimation and sight adjustment, and they are followed by shooting as normally done.

Range estimation is vital. People cheat nowadays using range finders that bounce an infrared beam onto your target and measure the time of return to get the distance, but the old fashioned way is to know your sight's architecture in terms of Minutes of Angle or Mils, and knowing about how big something is in real life, and comparing the two.

For an example, front sights on military guns are often about 4 minutes of angle wide. This means something 4 inches wide at 100 yards would be the same width in your target view, and so would something 8 inches at 200, 12 at 300, 16 at 400, and so on. A person, who is usually 20 inches wide, would be just as wide as your front sight on this rifle at 500 yards, and that's also about the limit of iron sights.

Not the best graphic, but you can see how the sight width in relation to the target width's ratio changes with distance.

More importantly, someone who is a little more than double the width of your front sight is a little under half the distance to 500 yards, i.e., 200, and you know where to set your sights, even though if he's only 200 yards away, just aim at him and fire already, but you get the point; you use the ratios of the apparent size of your target to something you know about your rifle (either the sight width like we discussed, or the size of your field of view at a given power in your scope's vision), and, by knowing how big it actually is, you can extrapolate the range.

Once you know the range, you either set it on the dial of your weapon that is set up for what you are doing, like iron sights usually are, or you add the appropriate amount of clicks to manually put in the MOA or mils of the "come up" you want. Let's use the .308 Winchester for an example; it typically drops 4 inches at 200 yards, 12 inches at 300 yards, 28 inches at 400 yards, and 50 inches at 500.

Follow the red line from a 100 yard zero, to 4 inches low at 200 (2 MOA), to 12 inches low at 300 (2, 2 = 4 MOA), to 28 inches low at 400 (2, 2, 3 = 7 MOA) to 50 inches low at 500 (2, 2, 3, 3, = 10 MOA). Minutes of Angle (MOA) is roughly equal to your inches off center divided by your hundreds of yards range, i.e. 50 inches / 5 hundred yards = 10 MOA.

That’s hard to remember, but, if you put it in MOA, it’s easier, and becomes 2, 2, 3, 3. Remember, MOA is close to inches divided by the hundreds of yards, so a 4 inch drop at 200 is 2 MOA, and a 50 inch drop at 500 is 10 MOA, and that is the first and last ones of that 2, 2, 3, 3 thing (2 and 10). This is simply a rough guide, you will develop specific come-ups for your own rifle, and should write them down and have them handy when you go shooting.

For windage, if it’s a near constant wind, you can figure out how fast it is going by an anemometer (wind gauge) or you can observe the effects from the wind on plant life and flags and extrapolate. You can then plug that into a chart for your bullet type, or you can use a Marine formula of the hundreds of yards you are shooting times the wind speed divided by a math constant of 15 for a close number, ie, a 300 yard shot with a 10 mph wind needs 2 MOA of correction.

FLAG METHOD

If a sniper can observe a flag or cloth like material hanging from a pole and estimate the degrees from the tip of the flag to the mast, he can estimate wind velocity. He divides the constant number 4 into the number of degrees to get wind velocity in miles per hour.

OBSERVATION METHOD

If the tactical situation prevents the use of the other methods, snipers can use the following guides:

- A wind under 3 miles per hour can hardly be felt, but causes smoke to drift.
- A 3- to 5-mile per hour wind is felt lightly on the face.
- A 5- to 8-mile per hour wind keeps tree leaves in constant motion.
- An 8- to 12-mile per hour wind raises dust and loose paper.
- A 12- to 15-mile per hour wind causes small trees to sway.

This is rapidly getting beyond the scope of one Return of Kings article, so I'll end on windage with, for most shooting, it's enough to simply "hold into the wind" i.e., shoot towards the side of the target the wind is coming from and you'll be fine. Elevation compensation, however, is serious business and you'll end up in the dirt in front of the target if you don't do it right.

Conclusion

Most anyone can be dangerous with a gun at close range, but it takes some actual skill and practice to be able to shoot at longer ranges. Whether it be for hunting, fun, or preparing for any sort of threat, a man ought to know how to be effective out to 500 yards. Be safe.

How Feminists Use The Religion Of Diversity To Destroy True Diversity

One of the oldest tricks in politics is to accuse your opposition of your own crimes.

Modern leftists regularly accuse conservatives of being opposed to diversity. We all know the "rayciss" moniker gets tossed around way too often as a way for leftists to silence debate with cheap but effective ad hominems. But, it can be argued many of us in the manosphere and the alt-right are supporters of true diversity while leftists are attempting to destroy diversity by pushing a gynocentric monoculture that will span the globe.

We still believe traditionalism has a role in the world, and have been the poster men for tolerance even while women performed their little science experiment called feminism. We only started speaking out when it started to debase and destroy the society we men built up. They believe the entire planet must be assimilated into the It Takes A Village mentality and spit fury at dissenters, while we have been exemplary in our patience until recent years.

Evidence is beginning to mount the ultimate goal of the Establishment is to take the gynocentrism of the United States and Western Europe global. Boilerplate feminist rhetoric is now appearing regularly in foreign newspapers, as we will see with one recent example in a moment. Of course, the many traditional cultures left in the world will be destroyed if this happens. Which means "diversity" as practiced by leftists will destroy true diversity.

They push their myopic belief in female supremacy via Hollyweird and American media which are both increasingly force-fed to the masses of the world. It is their way, they think, of bringing "progress" to the rest of the world. But what if what we're progressing towards is a matriarchal hell in which men are reduced to the human equivalent of worker bees orbiting a queen bee rather than men who have a role in society beyond laborer and sperm donor?

Women are angels, men are devils in the religion of feminism

Saving The Heathens

In many ways, the high priestesses of feminism follow the same principles as those pushing religious conversions. They believe must "save" the heathens who still believe in masculinity from themselves. Never mind the fact women are more unhappy post-feminism than ever before. As reported by Return Of Kings last year, researchers at the University of Pennsylvania found:

> By many objective measures the lives of women in the US have improved over the past 35 years, yet we show that measures of subjective well-being indicate that women's happiness has declined both absolutely and relative to men. The paradox of women's declining relative well-being is found across various datasets, measures of subjective well-being, and is pervasive across demographic groups and industrialized countries.

There's actually no paradox at all. As red pill men know, women are happier doing the exact opposite of what feminists tell them to do. The University of Pennsylvania study is bolstered by another one from England that found women who are housewives and who have children are happier than ball-busting, testosterone laden Anglo women of today. The top 5 happiest professions for women are as follows:

- Housewives – 87.2% happy
- Hospitality and events management – 86.3% happy
- Creative arts and design – 84.4% happy
- Charity work – 83.9% happy
- Leisure, sport and tourism – 83.7% happy

Notice, all of the above career paths are traditional female fields. It's as if biology and evolutionary adaptations for women to do different work than men actually matter, much to the chagrin of those who would only add the the pile of mounting evidence proving Freud's Penis Envy theory correct by forcing women into male roles and male jobs in society.

Feminists try to be just like men rather than just like women. It's as if they're ashamed of anything associated with being female—motherhood, nurturing instincts, and deference to male authority—so they try to figuratively sew on their own penises. This psychological behavior has manifested itself in increasingly bizarre ways – such as the Go Girl, which allows women to pee standing up!

Obviously, us knuckle draggers do not realize how "advanced" women have become now that they have their own plastic penises available at Walmart.

Paging Dr. Freud, your Penis Envy theory is once again verified

You Will Be Assimilated

When feminists say they support diversity, what they really mean is they want to assimilate the world's diverse cultures rather than letting them continue with their "outdated" traditional beliefs. They want to bring in the "unwashed" so they can enlighten them with their Communist Utopia, 1960s era propaganda.

However, this creates a dilemma because feminists can't support diversity and the destruction of patriarchal cultures at the same time. I stuck this shiv in the feminist narrative just yesterday:

> Becoming a true lover of cultural and sexual diversity – rather than haters of true diversity feminists are – underscores this point. Ladies, being a truly multicultural person means you respect masculine cultures as much as you do feminine cultures. You should be able to respect those places on the planet where men are still very much in charge rather than trying to convert the world.

But, feminists in their rabid fervor to completely dominate men don't respect the diverse beliefs of non-gynocentric cultures at all. It's not good enough that they've destroyed an entire ethnic group's vitality and its demographics with feminism. Now, they're preaching the evangel of female superiority in other nations. Just last week, I dissected a propaganda article published in The Bangkok Times attacking traditional Thai men that reads as if Gloria Steinem herself wrote it.

> An Establishment media hit piece on Thai men just came out shaming them for everything from having multiple sex partners, to expecting sex from their wives, to drinking, and expecting their wives to look after the family.
> Think its harmless? This type of culturally imperialistic propaganda was astronomically successful at destroying the Western male beginning in the 1960s. And now it's spreading around the world. Look out, gender equality (a Matrix code phrase which really means female superiority) is set to infect the rest of the world's traditional cultures if the Elite have their way.

What an atrocity! Expecting sex, having a beer, and expecting a woman to take care of her own children.

Suffice it to say, the best way to destroy women and the family (a stated goal of Cultural Marxism) is by first debasing the men. That's why hit pieces on Thai men are put out on a regular basis. And, this gives us yet another clue that the people who really run the world are adept at what they're doing when they infiltrate a culture and destroy its traditions.

The end result will be the cancer of American culture metastasizing and spreading to infect other organs in the global body unless feminists are called out on their cultural imperialism at every turn.

Always remember, feminists are out to destroy true diversity in the world by assimilating diverse cultures into the Church of Pussy Pedestalization.

How The Manosphere Helped Compensate For Trump's Weaknesses

This is the second installment of a multi-part series. You can read the first one here.

To be a successful politician, a person needs to be charismatic, authentic, and articulate speaker. Trump had two out of three. Clinton only had articulation. Thus to win the game for Trump, we needed to articulate for him over the internet why his policies were actually best for America. Most of that time was spent dismantling accusations of racism, sexism, and other attacks against his character. There was very little in terms of policy, because our opponents lost on policy. But sometimes we needed to chime in on that as well. The only reason the manosphere could cover for Trump was due to how much smaller the primary voter turnout is.

On Return Of Kings, by the time you saw an article here, its thoughts were already going viral. Of course we were happy to spread it along. For example, we promoted Vox Day's How Conservatives Betrayed America, we promoted the alt-right, we gave words of nationalist encouragement, but most importantly were the thousands of articles written over the past four years (4,090 to be exact) alerting American men to the decline of our culture and women. More than anything, it was the preparation to the 2016 election which allowed a bold man like Trump to be accepted in the first place.

Only the strongest arguments survive

A particularly great example of the power of my own efforts, was when, during the primaries, Trump's opponents were slamming him for being against free-trade. Using my knowledge of economics and politics, I created a thread on March 4th, "Why Free-Trade Cannot Co-Exist With Currency Manipulators," and quickly watched how all discussion on the subject moved to Trump's favor in the internet public discourse. I would copy and paste the arguments I wrote there in many other conservative forums and threads.

About one month afterwards, I noticed the voices within the Republican party defending free-trade disappeared. Within a few months of the posting of that thread, as Trump described how current trade policies "are a one way street," people in the audience nodded their heads. It certainly felt like the arguments in that thread got echoed to where they needed to be.

Another example, although much harder to prove, was Lizard of Oz's thread "Trump General Election Policy Proposals Part 2: Reviving the American Family," where to the best of my knowledge was the first place anyone coined the meme "#TrumpBabyBoom"! He wrote that thread in May 7th, and on July 20th Ivanka read her proposal to help working class moms with tax deductions and other childcare incentives.

Because the time differential between the thread and Ivanka's speech is only a month, it is harder to prove that Lizard of Oz was the inspiration for her speech, and it does seem likely that Ivanka was thinking of those ideas for quite some time on her own. But the #TrumpBabyBoom tag was first posted there, and it is totally possible the ideas in his thread echoed through enough people to reach someone in the Trump campaign.

It was a snowball of ideas. And the ball started here and many other places. The internet, with total free speech, means that only the strongest arguments survive. And on this corner of the internet, with a large collection of intelligent men, and, very importantly, no women to distract us, we developed the arguments that would win the day and win the primaries. Special credit goes to Deepdiver as the first pebble that started the avalanche;

I recognized the truth of the salty ol' SeaDog's arguments and moved to defend and articulate them to the rest of this forum and I watched our arguments spread like wildfire through the internet. We won the internet for Trump.

Measuring results

Not only was RVF instrumental as a think-tank for Northeast Conservatives, but I'd also like to give credit to Mypostingcareer for Conservatives in the South. Although that forum is rather distasteful with its explicit racism, it doesn't change the fact that they are influential within Southern conservative circles. Whether we like it or not, racism is the norm in much of the Midwest and South. Blacks and Whites do not get along due to an extremely ugly history, and the grudge has continued for over two centuries.

Democrats have been using this grudge as a political strategy to win votes from Blacks with no care about feelings of love or peace. Racial harmony is bad for the Democrats, and, again, whether we like it or not, the racist Whites of the South and Midwest are our rivals and deserve respect. They still honor ideas of Rule of Law and Christian Neighborly love, but they have trouble accepting Blacks as Neighbors. And likewise Blacks have trouble accepting Whites as neighbors. Up in the Northeast, we notice that Talmudic Jews have trouble accepting Whites as Neighbors. But we'll discuss more about this when talking about the future of the Republican party in future installments.

The thought-effects of these two forums is obvious when examining how the primary season went; Trump had trouble in the Midwest, but crushed the Southeast and Northeast. The Midwest's Conservative base mostly watched TV instead of the internet, and the apparent purity of a guy like Ted Cruz was most superficially appealing to them. Things like multi-million dollar loans from Goldman Sachs went unnoticed. Fortunately the Midwest became red pilled by the time the general election rolled around and they were forced to pay attention to Trump.

Thus, during the primary season the forum had heavy influence on how well-informed voters on the internet made their decisions, but it sure didn't hurt that Trump was an easy sell either! There can be no more doubt about the power of the internet with free speech. It allows men with virtually no social standing or money to shape the thoughts of others. Previously it was said, “the pen is mightier than the sword,” but now we can confidently state that the keyboard is mightier than all the world’s armies and trillions of dollars.

After seeing just how much of a role we played going into the primaries, we can now be more proactive, and confident, in creating cultural and political changes through our internet influence for future national elections. Local elections are much harder to influence in this way, but perhaps we can get there eventually as well.

Is Forced Monogamy Causing The Emasculation Of Men In Western Societies?

December 22, 2016 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by K.A. Peoples

I've noticed in most non-Western countries the majority of the men are unapologetically masculine. Most of these men were taught by their fathers (or other male mentors) the true nature of women before they reached puberty. For example, some cultures in Africa give their young male child to the grandfather for him to raise until he reaches puberty. This is done so the child can learn about their culture, himself, as well as women, from the teaching and guidance of an elder.

This was true somewhat in the United States (regarding men teaching their sons about masculinity) until a little after the suffrage movement. Before then, most married men were very masculine and did pretty much what they wanted to do, granted they provided for their families. It was not uncommon for men during this time to care for more than one woman and their children in some cases. Women just accepted this as the norm. Why? Because men left them no choice! These men understood being married just meant being responsible for her well-being and the well-being of the children, but not giving up their manhood. However, in today's western societies the roles have flipped. Women are doing whatever they want to do and the men are ether accepting it or going MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way).

Are The Men The Real Problem?

I had a conversation with a former co-worker of mine (from Panama) who once said that he believes the problems with women in the U.S. are not the women; it is the men! He said his father taught him that men must have two faces when dealing with women. One face is the provider and protector, while the other face is the lawmaker, disciplinarian and enforcer. He also stated that as long as a man is being true or just being a man, most women would follow that man almost anywhere and will forgive him of just about anything. This co-worker also had a small side business towing cars and a mistress his wife knew about.

I also met a man from Africa at a car auction. He was buying cars to take back to his native homeland to sell. During our conversation I found out he had many businesses in Africa as well as many wives and children! I jokingly asked him if he fell in love with ever woman he saw. He then explained to me that his wives were introduced to him by his other wives to help them run his businesses. If his wives saw a respectable woman who was hard working like themselves (that is, looking for a husband) who they all could get along with, they would ask him to accept her as his wife so she could help expand the family business if there was a need to do so. If he approved, the woman was then accepted into the family as his wife. Now, it’s a little more complicated than what I just explained but that’s pretty much the gist of it.

“No Respect Or Loyalty”

I then asked what he thought about the women here in the States. He said women in the U.S. do not seem to have any respect or loyalty to the men here. He also said he does not see any of the men demanding that respect or loyalty from women either! He said in his country when a woman is disrespectful or untrustworthy, it shames her family and the word goes out to everyone in the community. When this happens, every man will ignore her and will never call on or accept her as a wife!

Now I do get it; the reason polygamy works in his country is the culture, as well as the solidarity among the men there. However, if we were to take into account the nature of women in today's western societies, these two men should be broke, in a nut house, or both, but instead they appear to be more sane, financially stable and in control of their own destiny! Unlike men who practice monogamy in today's Western societies, these men have a more implicit view of marriage because it based more on their own integrity or religious beliefs, not reality (aka true nature of women). So they tend to focus more on being just a provider and protector, ignoring their roles as the lawmaker, disciplinarian and enforcer, for fear of being called an abuser. Developing a form of implicit bias is one of the many ways (I believe) monogamy leads to the emasculation of men.

However, in a society were polygamy is the practice, a woman knows she is not the only lady in her man's life. Therefore she has to compete with the other wives for her husband's resources and attention. The more support they give to him the better they will do. It thus benefits her to contribute more to the relationship so she can get more out of it for herself and her children. In this system, a man is more confident in himself and his mind becomes freer. This allows him to be more creative as he concentrates on how to become more successful in providing for his family who support and respect his efforts.

But in the U.S. it's the complete opposite. A man is pressured to still be a man that provides for and protects his family, while the woman is encouraged to keep her independence and not be supportive of her husband while at the same time extracting his resources. In short, what's hers is hers and what yours is hers!

The History Of Monogamy

Now we will take a look at the history of monogamy which began in Greece. It was introduced into their society to stop the wealthiest of men from hoarding all the women. Now I am more than certain this was done to insure that all men would have access to a woman, to avoid civil unrest among the men, not that all men should give up their masculinity to be with a woman.

This is what our younger men growing up today do not understand. The basic hunt and fish skills passed down from father to son have been diluted mostly by the feminist movement or are completely non-existent if he was raised by a single mother. This has caused most young men to believe they will never get a woman unless they agree to this feminist ideology.

But when this ideology fails to place them in an intimate relationship with a woman, some of these young men become violent; because they believe somehow they will never become a man (have sex with a woman) and remain virgins all their lives! However, if these young men had a male mentor around who understood and was capable of explaining the true nature of women to them, they would have known this was not the case.

A Motivation For Violence

I believe many of the mass shootings by some of these young men could have been avoided if they had this understanding. That's right! I was shocked to learn that most of these young men who committed these shooting wrote letters days before expressing their disdain for women. There letters showed they were very frustrated with trying to figure out women. This is why I believe men who have loved and lost can give great advice to other men who have loved and lost.

But for the young man who has never loved at all, he needs to learn the basic hunt and fish skills needed to understand women, so he can learn how to court the right woman or women! Most young men want and biologically need to intimately experience women on all levels (mentally, physically etc..). The Greeks felt this experience was important enough to create laws to ensure it.

This is why I wrote The Basic Instructions Before Loving Eve: A young/all man's guide to understanding women. The eBook is currently available on Amazon and Smashwords and paperback is currently sold on ebay. Now the book has nothing to do with polygamy (because Western societies practices monogamy), but instead it gives young men a basic understanding of his place in a relationship, the myth of male abuse against women, the many different types of women he will meet, the challenges he will face as he goes through life and how to deal with or avoid them.

I realize my book is not the cure all to end all, but there are a lot of male social groups out there with their own views on how to combat this extreme feminism. However, when you put all of our experiences together; what you have in the end is a complete picture on how to resolve this problem. With that said, men need to understand that we are the prize in a relationship! Women crave and desire the strength of an unapologetically alpha male, the same way men want a beautiful domestic goddess on their arm. It's the reason why "50 Shades Of Grey" is the bestselling women's book of all time and not "A Room of One's Own!"

But when you allow a woman to turn you into a SIMP, she will lose respect for you the same way men have no respect for women who do not carry themselves in a dignified manner. Women want two main things from men, which are to be provided for and protected! On the other hand, men want two main things from women, which are respect and loyalty! Monogamy is not synonymous with provide and protect but respect and loyalty is! A man needs to know the family he is providing for is his, while a woman only cares about being provided for!

Women's souls are screaming to us "HEY GUYS! START BEING MEN AGAIN!!!" All we have to do is listen and comply. Learn how to do this with my book, which costs only $5.99 and will give you some ideas about how to improve your life and your relationships with women.

The Current Year Is When The Tide Began To Turn

December 22, 2016 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

As we approach the end of the year, we will all be subjected to lame retrospectives filled with trivia that nobody cares about. But 2016 is a significant year because it marked the first time in a very long time that traditional masculinity stopped surrendering and actually mounted an offensive. Here are some of the highlights of the year.

We made special snowflakes cry

The best part of 2016 was obviously Donald Trump's defeat of Hillary Clinton. This was great for the obvious reason that Hillary's policies would have dealt the United States a mortal blow, but it had the wonderful side benefit of making her supporters—all of them special snowflakes—cry.

If you are like me, you were probably raised to be a "nice guy." A person who believes that he should never make anyone cry. The problem with being nice guys is that we allowed the SJWs to walk all over us and turn our culture in a prison where entertaining the wrong idea can get you fired from your job. Therefore, don't feel bad that you made the SJWs cry.

Terror

2016 will also go down as the year that people started to wake up to the fact that candlelight vigils, holding hands, and hash tags on social media will not make Islamic terrorism go away. If you recall, after Bataclan attack in Paris in November 2015 where 137 were murdered, the response was still to sing kumbaya. But already, when the San Bernadino terrorists slaughtered their co-workers for no reason other than that they were not Muslim, some Americans began to wake up and ask the hard question: Why do so many Muslims hate us? Could it be that Presidents Bush and Obama lied to us when they said Islam is a religion of peace?

The slaughter continued and increased in 2016. In June a Muslim killed 49 in the Pulse nightclub. In July, a Muslim terrorist drove a truck through a crowd of families that had gathered together to watch fireworks. He killed 86 including many children. More recently, a Somali refugee who was getting a free ride to starting a new life in the US (how many of your children will get these kind of benefits?) re-paid the generosity of Americans by trying to run over their sons and daughters at Ohio State. As I write this, the two terror attacks that are in the news are the assassination of the Russian ambassador in Turkey and the murder of 12 when a Muslim terrorist drove a truck through a traditional German Christmas market in Berlin. By the time you read this, there may be more.

With the latest attacks, I've seen almost none of maudlin gestures that characterize the Western response to Islamic terror. Even some liberal voices are starting to notice that there may be a problem with Islamic immigration. When we look back, 2016 will mark the year that it finally started to dawn on people that Islam is incompatible with Western civilization.

The Alt Right went public

When Hillary Clinton delivered her infamous Alt Right speech, it was supposed to paint Trump as an extremist. She obviously failed to achieve that objective. What she did instead is give a national platform to the Alt Right and Pepe the Frog. Suddenly, thousands of people who had never heard about the Alt Right started researching it, including journalists, who in turn wrote more articles about it. Rather than stopping the Alt Right, Hillary's speech made it national headlines.

The celebrity of the Alt Right continued when Richard Spencer, the man credited with coining the term, was banned from Twitter as part of an attempt to silence pro-Trump voices. The ban was unfair because Spencer never attacked other people or espoused violence. Even enemies of Spencer were forced to admit that the ban was a stupid move, and he was later reinstated.

In November the Washington Post ran a hit piece on Spencer and the Alt Right that was supposed to brand the Alt Right as white supremacists and neo-nazi's (they are neither). Again the article had the opposite effect. It only furthered the spread of Spencer's message. You can expect to hear a lot more about the Alt Right in 2017.

Keep the momentum going

2016 was a great year for masculinity and nationalism, but we can't rest on our laurels.

The only way to solidify our gains is to keep advancing. Here are some ways we can keep the momentum going into 2017 and beyond.

Lift weights. I have to be honest. My wife and I had a baby at the end of 2015 and I got really busy with work. Between work, family, and writing, I had very little time to do anything else. Sometimes had to give and I let working out fall by the wayside. That's a mistake. Being in good physical condition affects every aspect of your life in a positive way. If you are not already lifting, this is a good time to commit to it. If you are looking for a good routine, you may wish to check out the Stronglifts 5×5 program. But consistency is more important than your workout routine.

Come out of the shitlord closet. One of the reasons we got into this predicament in the first place is because men began to be silent out of fear of offending people. SJWs have turned our natural aversion to hurting someone's feelings into a cudgel that they use to keep us in line. But it doesn't have to be that way. SJWs only have power because decent people let them have power. SJWs view every issue as a wedge issue. If you give them an inch, they will use that inch as a beachhead for launching the next attack on you. And they are relentless. They will never stop until they've destroyed you, your nation, and your civilization.

Coming out of the closet can be done in little ways. When the cashier wishes you, "Happy Holidays" you can wish her a "Merry Christmas" back without making a big show of it. When a man is being attacked for his political views or simply because he is a man, come to his defense on social media even if you don't agree with all of his views. Speak plainly. Don't compromise with the SJW agenda on any point.

Unplug from entertainment and sports. The entertainment and sports industries are owned, for the most part, by people who have a leftist agenda. By watching their product, you giving your hard earned money to people who hate you and who will use that money to undermine you. It might be too draconian to stop watching all entertainment and sports, although many men have done that. A more reasonable idea for the coming year is to severely restrict time spent on corporate entertainment. Spend the time and money you save on achieving a goal that is going to make your life better in the future.

Conclusion

This Christmas, kick back and celebrate the feast with gladness. It has been a tough year but traditional men have risen to the challenge. We deserve to savor the victory. Get rested because in 2017 we once again become part of the vanguard to bring back the patriarchy.

How To Buy Toys For Your Child

December 23, 2016 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

The Christmas season is upon us. It is a time of good cheer, good will and giving. A time of spreading presents among all and sundry. A season in which a man's fondest hope is simply to get through it all without screwing up too badly.

Selecting presents for children is especially difficult. Although the present is ostensibly for the kid, the adequacy of the present will be judged by your wife, the kid's parents, and the kid's friends. The question is not how much pleasure is derived, but how well you satisfy social expectations all around.

The child's parents want something that won't make a total mess, will fit someplace where it needs to be stored, and won't make too much noise and won't hurt the kid. The kid's objective is just to have fun and stay amused.

The other interested parties are the toy store and the toy manufacturers. Their job is not to make it easy, but to maximize their profits. They are well aware that many people who buy toys for kids don't have a clue what they are doing. You are easy prey. "Please, just let me know how much money I have to fork over and let's get this done with."

In case you are lucky enough to have the freedom to choose toys based on their utility, instead of these nonsensical social factors, here are some things to keep in mind when you're shopping.

Toys with cords and batteries

A one-trick pony – good for a day or two

Battery-powered toys will display the most splash and pizzazz on Christmas day. The remote-controlled race car that chases all over the living room with flashing lights and loud noises will certainly attract attention. But it is pretty much a one trick pony. That's all it does. The kid will figure out the extent of its attraction in about 20 minutes. After that its most interesting feature is that its noise, light and bumping annoy the adults. The adults will be quite glad when the batteries die or the toy breaks, which usually happens fairly soon.

You can consider the made-in-China battery-powered toy if you want to make a safe choice when you are buying for somebody else's kids. If it is for your own house, there are better alternatives.

Opinions vary on video games. James Paul Gee contends they can be educational. Mark Bauerlein thinks otherwise. My kid won't have any.

Musical toys

Doesn’t do Mozart, but can handle “Twinkle Twinkle” and “Frère Jacques.”

Children used to pick up a musical education from their environment. Families would sing Christmas carols together. Kindergarten classes would sing about Rudolph the Red Nosed Reindeer. Society has changed, however. Parents listen to recorded music instead of singing—and it is often not the kind that you can sing along to. School classes are so diverse, and religion is in such a bad odor, that they can’t sing about Santa Claus, much less the birth of Christ. Therefore, a musical instrument may be something quite new to a modern child.

A kid can do a lot with a toy xylophone. It is surprising the number of nursery rhymes and simple songs that are written in the key of C. Any toy xylophone can handle songs like Frère Jacques and Twinkle Twinkle Little Star, and the child will learn quite a bit about music as he teaches himself how to pluck out the melody.

A recorder, a concertina or a small accordion can also handle a melody. These are little bit harder for a kid to manage. He needs some manual dexterity, and he can’t watch as closely where his fingers are going as when he is hammering keys on a xylophone. Still and all, kids of eight or nine years or so may find them fascinating.

Drums, tambourines and rattles are not melodic. They just make noise. Percussion instruments are useful accompaniment if you are going to sing with the children, but they don’t keep the kid amused when he is playing by himself—except as a means of bothering his parents.

Make him think

Kids like jigsaw puzzles. Also, a kid thrives on adult attention. Puzzles are fun to do with children. Buy a puzzle that is a year or two above his age, and do it together. For a four-year-old, buy the 120 piece puzzle labeled “six and up” instead of the 30 piece cartoon puzzle. Let him, of course, put the last few pieces in. Soon he will be able to do the whole thing. A four-year-old will know his numbers even if he can’t read. He will be proud that he is doing something meant for bigger kids.

There are boy puzzles and girl puzzles. Princesses and unicorns on one hand, and cars, tanks and fighter planes and soldiers on the other. Recognize who you are buying the toy for.

It is a pleasure to watch kids figure out the strategy for doing jigsaw puzzles. One strategy is to do the border first—border pieces are easy to identify. Another is to sort the pieces out by objects: Princess here, unicorn here, castle here, sky here and bushes over there. A puzzle for six-year-olds is usually fairly colorful and easy, but the colors are more subtle in puzzles for older kids.

Constructors make great toys. Tinker toys and erector sets kept me occupied for hours when I was a kid. This is an area in which the toy manufacturers have gone crazy. Lego used to leave the design up to the child’s imagination, but it has gone upscale. Now there are expensive Lego sets that are so fancy the child can only make one thing out of it—the car or robot shown on the box. Go with blocks, old-fashioned Legos, and other connecting pieces that allow the child’s imagination to go where it will.

Artistic toys

Any place his imagination will take him – and cheap besides

Every parent’s joy is a child who can amuse himself. There is nothing more satisfying than watching your son spend half an hour painting a Christmas tree or a picture of a cat. It is well worth the couple of minutes praise that you give him afterwards. Artist’s supplies are inexpensive. Every child should have colored pencils, crayons, watercolors and pastels, and an abundant supply of paper—preferably the A3 or 11 x 17 sizes mentioned below.

Children also like to sculpture. The “simpler the better” rule applies here as well. Give them staples like modeling clay or plastilene. On the Internet you can find recipes for making it from salt, flour and water.

No imagination required – all the thinking has been done for the kid. It’s in the price.

Books

It commits mom and dad to reading to him – but well worth the effort

Books are especially important in this age of video entertainment. Starting about the age of three, every child should have ABC books and counting books. It will be a couple of years until they learn how to read, but familiarity should start early and they love to have parents read to them.

My five year old son’s favorite books tell him about the world. He has one titled “The Children’s Encyclopedia,” which covers topics from the ancient Greeks through volcanoes and chameleons, another book on technology, and one on dinosaurs. He still insists that I read to him, but I can’t trick him. If I’m reading about a wildebeest and I call it a rhinoceros he will stop me—“Rhinoceros starts with ‘R,'” he insists. He is paying attention.

Older children can amuse themselves for hours with books, but for younger kids the gift of a book represents work for the parents. It is worthwhile work, but do not overlook that it is work.

Make it move

A $25 Craigslist bike. After one spill, who can tell it wasn’t new?

Kids in general, and boys in particular love rolling and moving toys—bikes, scooters, sleds, skis and snowboards. They do not have to be new. They do not have to be top-of-the-line. Just as a Fiat and a Mercedes will get you to the grocery store equally well, anything mobile serve their purpose.

Buy something used on Craigslist if you can get away with it. Human irrationality is in your favor. Adults will buy weights or an exercise bike with the best of intentions, and then notice two years later that it is just taking up space and sell it for a fraction of the original cost. Same with kids’ toys. Sleds and bicycles are almost always outgrown before they are worn out. Shopping used, you can buy something that will give the kid years of pleasure and still remain within your budget.

Repurposing grown-up materials as toys

Kids have a sixth sense that enables them to distinguish between adult things and children’s things. Of course they prefer adult things. Three of my son’s favorite toys are an old Omega camera, one that hasn’t worked for 10 years, a dead cell phone and a defunct HP inkjet printer. They have the look and the feel of adult things even though they don’t work.

Every parent will discover that among the adult things the kids like are paper, scissors, pencils and pens, scotch tape and staplers. If you go to a stationary store you can easily supplement these with drawing aids: a French curve, a triangle, a ruler, a compass. All of these things are inexpensive, and useful around the house.

And the kid will spend more time playing with it than a single purpose toy such as a remote-controlled car. That remote-controlled car only does one thing and only does it until the antenna breaks off or the battery runs out. A ream of paper lasts forever. By all means buy some big paper as well—11×17 in the US, A3 in Europe. Nothing flies better than a monster paper airplane. Buy them in colors to make it more interesting.

Repurposing trash as toys

Is this box trash? A toy? A house? Only the cat knows for sure.

Kids also have a genius for inventing their own toys. Boxes are wonderful. You can go to a liquor store and pick up an assortment of 20 boxes. Set them down with the kid, along with some industrial-strength scotch tape, a stapler, and may be a box cutter, and you can have no end of fun creating your own city. Large ones like those for stoves and refrigerators are big enough the kid can even crawl inside. It is loads of fun and it costs next to nothing. Toys like this enjoy the novelty factor. If he gets bored with it after a week, so what? It cost nothing to begin with.

During my misspent youth in California we used to go tobogganing down the dry hillsides on big boxes. Steep hillsides of dry grass are very slippery. It is a good idea for you, the adult, to check it out for hidden rocks, but then let the kids go at it.

Conclusion

The toy store, the parents, the giver and the kid all have different perspectives on toys.

The most successful gift is one that will hold the child's interest over the long term, will teach him something, and will not drive his parents to distraction. Most of the best toys are not terribly expensive, and you can usually find secondhand bargains on those that are.

How The “Baby It’s Cold Outside” Controversy Proves There Is No Rape Culture In The West

December 23, 2016 | by Harry Lime | Link | Original Link

The left’s assertion there is rape culture ravaging the West can now (if it weren’t already) be put to bed—courtesy of the left itself. Recently, a Minneapolis-based duet came out with a new version of the 1944 song “Baby It’s Cold Outside”, rewritten to raise awareness about the issue of defining consent. The new version, written and performed by Lydia Liza and Josiah Lemanski, cleans and scrubs all the “rapey” grit—which is to say the romance—from Frank Loesser’s classic lyrics.

The usual suspects (Vox, HuffPost, NPR) predictably praised this “update,” then continued to analyze the original’s “explicit” and “screwed up” lyrics. Vox preambled its analysis like so: “For every think piece calling it a ‘date-rape anthem,’ there’s a corresponding ‘Oh, come on’ take about how oversensitive ‘social justice warriors’ are killing romance and seduction and taking the song’s lyrics out of context.”

Yes, you are, Vox. When you are not critical of Jay Z rapping the racial epithet-laden “Dirt Off Your Shoulders” at a Hillary Clinton rally, but jump on the bandwagon criticizing a holiday, cozy-up-by-the-fire tune for being “rapey,” you are clearly misdirecting your sensitivities. In turn, you reveal your political agenda: piggybacking on the attack against traditional, heterosexual romance—and Christmas, too—to theorize about rape culture being alive and well in the West.

But this is about something else as well—something the song’s critics, I doubt, intended. In this trivial attempt, leftist outlets like Vox and musicians like Liza and Lemanski have inadvertently demonstrated that rape culture is not alive and well in the West. Even if it were, Vox and friends would be enablers of it, due to them carelessly conflating a serious crime with the consensual courtship of two adults in a goodnatured holiday tune.

This controversy really comes down to this weird war on Christmas.

Why this conflation? Because, as Gavin McInnes puts it, "the supply of bigotry [in the West] does not meet the demand." As a result, cuck journalists, liberal-minded artists, and aspiring victims go to great lengths scouring and parsing remnants of our popular culture that ostensibly condone sexual assault or the oppression of women. While there is material like that in our culture, the left typically projects it onto whiteness.

Since the supply of white male awfulness isn't large enough, petty condemnations of pop cultural artifacts like "Baby, It's Cold Outside" rear their ugly head, contributing to the ongoing systematic, weaponized attack against white people you witness in the establishment media. Furthermore, it's another example of politically correct types trying to take the fun, the sexiness, and the joy out of seduction and all things that make men and women happy.

"I've always had a problem with the song [Baby It's Cold Outside]," quibbled Lemanski. "It's so aggressive and inappropriate." Of course, if you watch the original clip from 1949's Neptune's Daughter, this "toxic masculinity"-inspired interpretation will not stack up. I won't delve into an analysis of the scene because I would just be stating the obvious for the majority of readers. Regardless, you can watch McInnes do it brilliantly here.

Ultimately, the subtext of Vox and Lemanski's criticisms is clear: they are disgusted by the traditions of romance, of love, of a confident man wooing a coy woman with a little derring-do. Shockingly, no's can sometimes mean not now, but maybe if you work for it. That's the game of love. But the left hates that. It would rather men and women be at odds with each other and take all the sexual tension out of their trysts.

This controversy, ultimately, doesn't raise awareness about social issues. It fuels the contempt felt between the sexes.

Of course there are times when "no means no" and a man should, at that point, leave and go out into the cold. But "Baby It's Cold Outside" is about a femme sizing up a beau's interest in her. If you are intellectually honest and can read between the lines, you will detect that the female here wants to preserve her chastity, as if to say "I'm not easy. If you want me, you need to prove it and show me you are worth it." When the man passes different stages of the test, the woman concedes to stay—for a moment—then she resists again. It's a game. It's fun. It's romantic.

Rape culture does exist, of course: in U.S. prisons; certain countries in the Middle East; it's been imported into parts of Europe with the migrant crisis, and at the US-Mexico border (even HuffPost admits this). But in civil society here in Canada and the United States, the majority of rapes that go public tend to be fabricated or overblown, undermining the actual victims that are raped in our countries. When rape victims come forward, accused rapists lose their jobs, are publicly shamed, and get arrested. When the evidence is there, they usually get convicted.

Leftists deep-down know this. But most of them received a degree in bitching, so they make it their duty to pick apart Western culture to validate their theories. In turn, their tireless efforts are misguided and often lead to phony criticisms such as this, causing mass hysteria in some cases. Again, this happens because the demand is not there, so sites like Vox latch onto these "controversies" like they're the latest jihad.

"Aggressive" masculinity at work. Ms. Leigh must hate it.

They deem it outdated that women should preserve their chastity and that men should demonstrate persistence in pursuit of her. Those two qualities are what the sexes used to admire about each other. The left, however, does not want admiration between the sexes; it wants contempt and disrespect.

Fortunately, we have desperate critiques of popular culture to remind us of this reality: the West Is, indeed, The Best. This type of social justice acrobatics, symptomatic of the "Baby It's Cold Outside" brouhaha, ultimately disproves the Left's assertions about rape culture in our very, very tolerant area of the world and makes our arguments against the alleged phenomenon that much stronger.

And for that—Vox, Liza, and Lemanski—thank you and Merry Christmas.

Footnote: As I write this article, my girlfriend is watching the clip from Neptune's Daughter next to me and insisting I "do that more" to her. "Do what?" I ask, goading the expected answer from her. "Be a gentleman; show me you care," she responds with a pout. If that's rape, more men, including myself, should be guilty of it.

5 Myths About Thai Girls

December 23, 2016 | by Steve Bain | Link | Original Link

When it comes to Thai girls I think it's fair to acknowledge that there are one or two negative associations that we westerners like to make about their characteristics, intentions and values, but I would advise anyone to reserve judgement on this. I've found that a lot of what you hear is a pile of tired old nonsense that only applies to certain men who fall in love with the much younger women that they meet in bars whilst on their annual vacations…

Let's not scoff at these guys though, if you've never been to Thailand then you really can't know just how convincing these lovely bar-girl temptresses can be. At the same time, I believe that it is the poor choices that have been made by these men, in selecting their Thai partners, that have led to a lot of bad press about Thai girls in general – and five big myths in particular:

Myth 1: They are all about the money

This is the most common myth of all and there are a number of reasons for its existence; most of them are based on simple misunderstandings. However, the illicit activities that go on in the bar-scene are fairly well understood and I doubt that there's any need to clarify them here. There is no shortage of men that have been scammed by the girls they met in Thailand bars and clubs, but it's totally unfair to equate that with the behavior of regular Thai ladies.

The vast majority of ladies do not get involved with a man for financial reasons; that's not to say that money isn't important to the success of a relationship, it has to be important in a poor country where the necessities of life are not immediately available to all, but money is not often the primary incentive for regular Thai girls when looking for a romantic partner.

It also makes no difference whether the girl in question is considering romance with a westerner or a Thai man, genuine emotions come first, but practical financial realities cannot be ignored and men in Thailand are expected to be providers.

Myth 2: They are subservient housekeepers

Hehe.. let me rephrase that… hehehehe! Anyone who thinks that Thai girls are subservient, quiet little home-keepers, who will dote on their man's every whim, had better have a serious reality check.

Thailand does have a very hierarchical society and at first glance it may appear that husbands rule the roost, with wives taking a backseat when decisions need to be made. It may appear that sons are favored over daughters, and that the way of life in general might seem a bit male orientated, but the truth is that things are much more complicated than this.

There’s no doubt that Thai girls often have a very soft, quiet and feminine exterior, but that doesn’t imply subservience in any way. Inside their tiny frames are minds of steel that can’t be bargained with, can’t be reasoned with, and absolutely will not stop… ever, until you admit that you were wrong and they were right. This one actually falls in line with a largely unknown fact i.e. that after 5,000 years of civilization, no Thai girl has ever been wrong… about anything… ever!

Myth 3: They prefer older men

Whilst there is actually some truth in this one, I’m afraid that it probably isn’t the truth that you might be hoping for if you are over a certain age i.e. that older guys are considered physically more attractive. Sorry, but the preference is based more on the extra perceived financial stability that older men are thought to offer, as well as the notion that older guys are a bit more settled and less likely to play around with other women once they are in a serious relationship.

Older men are seen as being more mature, more reliable, and a good choice for a long-term romantic partner. Your mission, if you want to find a successful long-term love interest, is to make sure that you choose wisely and avoid getting too involved with a lady that might have her eyes a little too transfixed on the financial benefits of romance with a westerner. This isn’t a difficult thing to do, but you’ll need to avoid the pitfalls that a lot of western men have fallen into before.

From a physical point of view, Thai girls prefer a man that is of a similar age to themselves. Some may prefer a man that is a little older, some are not ashamed to admit that they would prefer a man who is a little younger, but there’s no great difference with the preferences that women from other countries have with regard to physical attraction.

Myth 4: They just want to get a visa

This one might be surprising to you but I can assure you that the majority of Thai girls have no interest in living overseas, and most would prefer to live in their home-towns. A lot of ladies from the provinces do work in Bangkok, where wage levels are much better, but given the chance many would move out of the big-city in a heartbeat if they could afford a decent standard of living back home. By that I mean a high enough income that they can take care of their family's (the needs of the family are usually the driving force that leads them to Bangkok in the first place).

The horror stories that you may have heard of, whereby a girl does a runner as soon as she is permitted entry into a western country, are actually very rare. In the cases that I'm aware of this sort of thing only happens with crazy set-ups like mail order bride schemes. Guys that steer clear of this sort of madness, and opt for a more regular sort of approach to dating, do not get themselves into these sorts of situations.

Myth 5: They are dishonest

This is another myth that has an element of truth in it. The best way to think about it is in terms of the Western concept of telling little white lies in order to serve the greater good e.g. to protect someone's feelings and so on. In Thailand, and all South East Asian countries, the need to "save face" goes way beyond anything in Western culture and it leads to a lot of white lies. It's not just about saving your own face either, Thais are extremely careful to make sure that they don't cause anyone else to lose face.

To be honest with you, this is one custom that I find a little irritating, because you really do need to be constantly second-guessing a lot of what you hear in order to try and figure out if it is truth or some sort of face-saving lie. Even other Thais sometimes struggle with this one and find it a bit over the top in situations when you need the truth but can't be absolutely sure that you are hearing it—lies are told in the most innocuous of situations. The purpose though is almost never to be dishonest, it's just to save-face and avoid causing any sort of confrontation.

How to meet Thai girls

Thai dating certainly won't suit every Western man, but if you're tired of western culture and want to step into something completely different, then Thailand has a lot to offer. If it's a regular trustworthy lady that you are intending to meet, then there are some very important things to understand right from the very beginning of your search.

Firstly, Bangkok is the best place to start looking as it isn't just a tourist area, which means that it has lots of regular ladies living there. However, there are some tourist hot-spots in the big city and you'll need to make sure that you are staying in accommodation that is nowhere near to them—in particular, avoid locating yourself anywhere near to Lower Sukhumvit as it is home to the biggest red-light areas.

As a Westerner in Thailand, the local ladies will suspect you of being a sex tourist, so pitching your tent near to a red-light area will immediately scupper your plans of meeting a good girl. Upper Sukhumvit, on the other hand, is home to a lot of Westerners who are in Thailand for professional or business purposes, so that's a good place to locate yourself (a Google search will quickly find these places).

Second, meeting friends of friends is one of the best ways to meet the best Thai girls, as is the workplace if you are working in Bangkok. Girls in shopping malls are another good option, but I'm guessing you'll want to start searching right away and in that case the online dating sites are useful. Be careful though, these sites do attract some unsavory characters and you'll definitely need some advice about Thai dating culture. My website has lots of FREE info about these things and it will help to steer you in the right direction: www.thaigirlsguru.com

Here's a few final words of advice about Thai girls; forget about trying to impress them in the way that you would approach a Western girl. The way to impress a Thai lady is to be calm, reserved, and happy. You'll get nowhere with the loud extroverted approach; the quiet, gentle and considerate guys tend to do a lot better in Thailand. The only real obstacle to long-term success with Thai dating is the culture gap and I won't lie to you, it's a big gap, but with a little patience you can bridge it (see my previous post, linked to below, for details on that).

6 Final Double Standards Leftists Enforce On Their Enemies

Previously: 6 More Double Standards Leftists Enforce On Their Enemies

As the proverb says, when the tide is ebbing, the waste that remained hidden underwater appears and the boats of the careless get buried in sand. We are witnessing the same with cultural Marxism. After decades of pushing their agenda without a real adversary, establishment leftists have so much overplayed their hands they stirred a response they can't control anymore, a response that is becoming a real threat to their grip over history. Dialectics doesn't always lead to more leftism.

The response they can't control is us. Baby-boomers could let themselves be rocked by agitators and pretend it was "progress." We can't. We are facing a wall of unprecedented despair in the form of a complete and quiet disenfranchisement, and our choice is to either break heroically from it or to get destroyed through work deprivation, race replacement, culture war, and so on.

As red-pill consciousness arises and the cultural Marxist tide ebbs, more and more of us have undertook the long-winded but necessary task of deconstructing leftism. This series of pieces aims at contributing to that task by unearthing the main double standards leftists perpetuate all the time.

1. The right to generalize

Our particular experience, made of some particular cases, is conspicuously small compared to the vastness of the world. If we are to move with some decent preparation in unknown places or make even basic predictions—for example, that your neighbours won't try to kill you if you meet them in the streets but will likely nod with a smile—we have to go beyond experience and decide upon general principles.

This is true for individuals and even more for politics. If you are a policymaker, you have to think about trends, shared interests, and social categories. You cannot care about every particular case at hand or you'll soon be overwhelmed. You have to rely upon broad categories, general rules, and situational awareness.

Now the Left has taken over the right to generalize. If you're on the Right, the least generalization based upon biology or patterns-noticing is "racist"—but the Left can speak endlessly about race, "oppression," and such without limit. By confronting us on pseudo-fact checking or with complex arguments, they want us to struggle on details whereas they stay in control of the wider narrative.

2. The right to shape one's own norms and discourse

Thus stated, this one can seem needlessly abstract, but it isn't.

If you cannot speak about the crimes you witness or about what being displaced is like, if you're forced into babbling around the totem poles of "emancipation" or "equality," you cannot communicate efficiently about what you're going through.

If you speak of globaliz*ation* instead of global*ism*, you keep acknowledging that the offshoring of jobs and overrunning of white countries by swarms of immigrants is the result of impersonal trends, and thus you can't name those who actually pursue these trends.

Likewise, if you bother with justifying yourself through egalitarianism or "antiracism" (remind the classic cuckservative "dems are the real racists" argument), you cannot admit that you want to care about your own and about those who uphold healthy values rather than parasites.

An important step of the Alt-Right, manosphere, neoRxn et al. effort has been the putting forth of a language of our own. We are talking about hypergamy, pussy passes, cultural Marxism, urban SWPLs or bobos versus proles, Jewish activism, or about George Soros because it is both true and relevant to our interests. Our awareness has already started to spill into mainstream conservatism.

3. Responsibility versus explaining away

If you belong to a so-called “minority,” you have a right to bear no responsibility for your faulty choices. Black crime is because “structural racism,” “white privilege” and muh past slavery. Female hypergamy is because womyn were oppressed and keep trying to secure the resources men were unfairly holding from them. Nothing is their fault—no wrong can come from these holy creatures. On the other side, the dispossessed majority, cis-scum and other straight-white-males are held responsible for everything.

Time has come to reassert our non-responsibility on that big waste the West turned into, and our responsibility on what we consciously choose—not on what the Left’s accusatory narrative spews daily.

This double standard is a recurring one in the mouths of those who happened to “succeed” without taking the red pill and tend to stay inside the mainstream. These adhere blindly to the narrative and parrot it at every turn.

- Got no job? Oh, that has nothing to see with the offshoring of jobs or with the increased competition—must be your fault.
- Got no girlfriend? Nothing to see with how girls became addicted to entertainment, drama, unrestrained hypergamy, or being extra picky and bitchy—must be because you’ve got the “loser mentality” or something like that.
- Mobbed by a BLM crowd? Nothing to see with the prevalence of black violence or with how the mainstream media excuses it—must be because “you look like a victim” or “you provoked them.”

4. Impunity

A consequence of the above-mentioned is a state of generalized anarcho-tyranny. On the one hand, chronic offenders like Alton Sterling (or Killary) are given a pass for their numerous crimes. On the other hand, the normal, average guy is overburdened by excessive taxes, divorce-raped in court, fined while driving two miles per hour above the limit, and has a SJW sword of Damocles above his head.

In our inverted world, a black murderer, an illegal alien who commits real rape or a professional feminist are more highly regarded than a white entrepreneur accused of –ism or –phobia. Things are now going so far that media want pedophiles to look worthier of sympathy than people who basically want to save their race and civilization from dissolution and live in peace, the latter being now labelled “racism.”

5. Precautionary principle use

In a nutshell, the precautionary principle is a rule of thumb that says the following: if an action or policy has a suspected risk of harm, then the burden of proof that it is not harmful (or that potential benefits outweigh the risks) falls on those willing to take the action.

This principle has been widely used to slow down technological innovation or market evolutions because of potential harms. It has also been extensively quoted by the Left as a brief justification for their "no-platforming"—censorship—policies: "if we let 'em exist, we could go back to the 30s' and stuff!"

Actually, the precautionary principle is not bad in itself: GMO, exhaust gas and the like are a risk to health and the environment. The slippery slope is not (always) sophistry. No—the problem here is that although the principle has been very much used by establishment bureaucrats against some technological innovations and against us, it has conspicuously not been used to ponder tremendous societal changes such as massive immigration, gay marriage, wide-scale economic planning and other imposed "social experiments."

The double standard behind this rather disturbing use—and lack of use—of the precautionary principle is analogous to the difference between the total pussy pass for girls and the burden of taxation and micromanagement on small companies: just as the latter is based on a liberal prejudice that favours womyn while being defiant to entrepreneurs, the former has no other justification than a massive liberal bias.

6. The right to identify conspiracies (and to be taken seriously)

Any honest and non-naïve person knows that influence-peddling exists. All those who have an agenda are trying to push it, more or less subtly, more or less efficiently. The advertisement research has been all about "selling" not only products but also ideas and behaviours to the unsuspecting masses. A cursory knowledge it, or of the Cold War intelligence history, obviously show how much deception and manipulation can matter in power plays.

If we stopped at this point, many liberals would probably agree. The Left has a long intellectual history of suspicion. Campuses have no problem teaching about the so-called "philosophy of suspicion" of Marx, Nietzsche and Freud. Official academics routinely spread ridiculous stories of how "genders" were constructed by a millennia-long conspiracy of males. We are also witnessing these days the rise of a big conspiracy narrative against Russia, as if the Lying Crooked and globalist establishment had no responsibility in The Donald's election.

However, it is clear that only the Left has the right to mention (or invent out of thin air) secret plans. When people on the Right do, they get labelled "conspiracy theorists" and derided by the MSM. I remember SJWs attacking us as "tinfoil hats" when we mentioned that George Soros was financing coups masked as colored revolutions or how the Western corrupt elites were indirectly supporting ISIS. Well, all this has been proven true—and the "conspiracy theory" labelling has been a way to hide inconvenient truths by making them ridiculous and taboo.

Conclusion

When it comes to unearthing the true workings of Leftism, one could write a whole library. To focus on double standards, I could have dug on

- how their intellectuals benefit from comfy academic sinecures whereas righters like Sam Francis or Peter Brimelow are persona non grata among the cowardly cuckservatives,
- how liberals tend to think that their issues can only be discussed through painstaking detail—"you can't talk about feminism if you dunno XYZ stuff about the second and third waves!"—whereas ours can be dismissed through mere narrative-parroting and insults,
- how they constantly assume we have bad intentions and illegitimate interests but ours suspecting the same about them is offending or defaming,
- or how the minority-baiters have every right to pour oil on fire but we should always tread carefully, and even then, accept to be held responsible of everything that goes wrong…

All these double standards, and many more I haven't mentioned, are theirs. They are conspicuous, roam behind the explicit overbearing liberal discourse, create discomfort and the vague sensation that something's wrong to the mind of the to-be-redpilled listener.

As we put forth our issues, concepts, and relevant but willingly ignored sides of the truth, we must also make direct attacks on the leftists' double standards. Bludgeon them with the inanity of their own norms and pre-conscious choices. Even if they clinch and flee from the smaller concession, they should experience cognitive dissonance, and their whole Weltanschauung shall melt down while we occupy the ground and become the new mainstream.

7 Ways “The Walking Dead” Hates Straight White Males

December 24, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

“The Walking Dead” has perhaps been the most popular television show around the world for most of the 2010’s. Within the United States, its TV ratings often fall below only prominent NFL games, and it’s an incredibly popular topic on Facebook, Twitter, and other discussion boards across the globe.

Everybody seems to love zombies. Unfortunately, the producers of the red hot TV show also want the world to love cultural Marxism too.

The show has not been shy at shoving a steady stream of interracial and homosexual romances in our face (just for the sake of shoving interracial and homosexual romances in our face), and it’s always gotta be a heterosexual white guy who spoils the party in some way for everybody else who inhabits this mostly undead world.

“Hey, when I’m peacocking with my hand cannon pointed at a downward 45 degree angle, you listen to me alright?”

Women, non-whites, and homosexuals on the show are almost exclusively portrayed as either helpful, friendly, cooperative, or (at worst) oppressed victims of their association with straight white males. As for the straight white males themselves, they are more often than not truly deplorable human beings who regularly commit unspeakable atrocities which only get amplified over time.

Is the Frankfurt school really trying to tell us that in a TV show which is both filmed and mostly set in the U.S. state of Georgia, only white males can be the undisputed criminals, tyrants, and common enemies of humanity? The same state where African-American males make up 15% of the population but commit the lions share of the state’s murders, rapes, home invasions, and gas station robberies on a good (non-zombified) day?

Yes they are. And this article will showcase seven ways in which “The Walking Dead” wants the world to despise the idea of any kind of white male leadership, or large groupings of white males in general. Find hope and sanctuary with women, non-whites, and the LGBTQ community instead.

1. They’re Tyrannical Patriarchs

I’m in charge now! GOT IT!?

When the world turns sour after a zombie apocalypse, white males will find any kind of attempt at leadership by women or non-whites to be totally unacceptable. Violent and despotic “White Supremacies” and the gawd-awful “patriarchy” must prevail at all cost. Women, Jews, minorities, and homosexuals will (of course) inevitably suffer as the next Donald Trump-Literally Hitler avatar takes the helm.

So by all means, throw your Hispanic subordinate in a zombie pit (The Governor), contemplate taking over a town run by a Jewish congresswoman (Rick Grimes), attempt to kill your former friend and colleague because he wants his wife back (Shane Walsh), and bash some ethnic Asian skulls (Negan) if your power is feeling threatened.

2. They’re Cannibals

“You taste much better than we thought you would”

Did you actually think that cannibalism was just something that Amazon natives or the New Zealand Maori did for fun in the past? WRONG.

When the zombie apocalypse occurs, white males will be at the forefront of resurrecting modern day cannibalism via luring multicultural bands of travelers into a trap. Growing suitable crops in Georgia's humid subtropical climate, combined with maintaining simple chicken coops, would just be too much work after all.

The best course of action is to capture a black man in the woods, eat his leg before his very own eyes, and give him a Yelp review of how he tastes.

3. They're Marauding Child Rapists

"Why hurt yourself when you can hurt other people?"

You might think that white males have a tendency to maintain highly-functioning and civil societies. Places where social Darwinism does not compute in the 21st century, and where everybody should have a fair go in life.

Well in the Walking Dead world, bands of unkempt white men (The Claimers) will adopt philosophies like "Why hurt yourself when you can hurt other people?", lay claim to anything they set their eyes upon, and attempt to rape young boys when said boys father (Rick Grimes) crosses them. If you see white men out on the road or rummaging through your house, don't walk, don't stop, RUN.

4. They're Racist Rednecks

Watch out. He’s southern, from poverty, and probably on the law center’s list!

Oh come on now, it’s the state of Georgia for crying out loud. Did you think that the liberal entertainment industry was gonna let a TV show, set in an ex-Confederate state, go without featuring at least one prominent white male character who despises non-whites and probably moonlights as a Klan member?

Well say hello to Merle Dixon, a ridiculous made-for-TV character who likes to beat up and assert dominance over black men with names like “T-Dog” and Asian-Americans by the name of Glenn. All for well…. pretty much nothing. He’ll just hate you for the sake of being you (a non-white).

5. They’re Gay Bashers

Homosexual man offers straight white male patriarch and his entourage a walled refuge. Gets slugged in face by straight white male patriarch.

Straight white males are the promulgators of “toxic masculinity” according to the SJW world, so why should the zombie apocalypse be any different? If a well-spoken, clean cut, and friendly homosexual man (Aaron) offers a tired group of travelers a walled citadel, it’s only natural that the first reaction for the straight white male leader (Rick) is to assert his dominance over a “marginalized” victim group and send him to the floor.

Clearly, LGBTQ people in this new world are exposed to severe threats and oppression under ~~Donald Trump~~ straight white male dominance. For instance, the lesbian character Tara has seen her whole family plus TWO girlfriends get killed when patriarchal heterosexual white men (the Governor and the Saviors) come into her life.

Why can’t those deplorable white males show any solidarity, tolerance, and love for the LGBTQ community? Liberal logic will explain everything, and it’s because they are irredeemably full of HATE.

6. They’re Bloodthirsty Animals

Let’s put a “W” on our forehead and just kill people!

The zombie apocalypse does some real damage on the psyche of white males.

While most women and minorities will maintain a level of sanity when the world turns south (Morgan goes crazy for just one episode), heterosexual white men will find an innate desire to keep people’s heads in jars (The Governor), eat human flesh (The Hunters), or here’s the best part….. inscribe a “W” on your forehead, cover yourself in half-ass blackface, and just murder anybody you come across (The Wolves)!

The Wolves didn’t “choose” to be that oppressive (and presumably racist). That’s just what inevitably happens when white males don’t check their privilege enough when society is functional.

7. They’re Thieves And Conquerers

"Your stuff now belongs to Negan" (Another white man)

Public schools teach children that White Europeans went all over the world and stole land and resources from the non-White natives, who were without question living in some sort of natural utopia before the evil white man came and took all their shit.

Well, that history lesson needs to find its way into "The Walking Dead" universe too. Because in the show, white men will form organizations and institutions which are specifically designed to enrich themselves at the expense of all others.

So say hello to "The Saviors." They're a merry band of mostly white males (and certainly led by them) who will not shoot you or bash your skull into tiny bits just as long as you give them half of everything you own. It's a business strategy so brilliant, why didn't Donald Trump think of it?

Conclusion

"The Walking Dead" is certainly a compelling show to watch, study, and contemplate. For instance, how would you react, where would you go, and how would you defend yourself when a figurative hell has replaced the Earth?

But seriously, in seven seasons of mayhem has there really only been one truly bad black guy (a prisoner named Andrew) to compensate for a steady slew of bath-shy white male baddies who inhabit what remains of the black crime heavy states of Georgia and Virginia? That's television for you, and the faux reality that the Marxists want to disseminate across the world.

Why It’s Time To Boycott Women’s Tennis

December 24, 2016 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

With the Australian Open starting next month, it’s time to highlight once again that women tennis players are massively overpaid. Female players are paid the same as their male counterparts, despite being vastly inferior and only playing three sets instead of five. Unfortunately, due to feminism dominating the political and social agenda, repeated protests about this injustice have fallen on deaf ears. This time, I’m issuing a call for a more radical move: boycotting women’s tennis.

A Personal Account

I used to be a pretty handy tennis player in my day. I was nowhere near good enough to be professional, but I was a division 1 player in high school and still enjoy a social hit. I loved the sport, so when a women’s satellite tournament came to the city I was living in at the time, I went down to check it out.

The main prize was a wildcard into the Australian Open, so there was no shortage of eager young women from all over the world. And hey, good on them for being enthusiastic, ambitious and having a go. But here’s the deal: the girls just weren’t that good. Their skills were absolutely nothing special, and even the best players couldn’t whip a topspin forehand or cut a slice like I can. Their serves were coming down at nothing like the speed I had previously faced and would have been relatively easy to return.

The strength and physicality simply wasn’t evident, and a strong male player at local club level would have overpowered them. Had I entered, I might not necessarily have been able to win the whole thing, but there is no doubt in my mind I would have been highly competitive. I've never reached any level of note in the sport. I've never had coaching, don't train seriously, and am just your average reasonably fit guy with above average hand eye coordination. If I had been given the opportunity to dedicate six months prior to the event to train full-time for it, there is no doubt I would have taken it out.

With a gut like that, Bartoli could do with playing an extra set or two

It got me thinking. Pro tennis has embraced "equal pay," symbolising that in the minds of administrators, the value of men and women players is the same. That's absurd. You just cannot compare Serena Williams to Djokovic, it's night and day! At the other end of the spectrum, why should men be denied careers in sport so their places can be taken by inferior women, just because of their gender?

I would have no problem with women's pro sport if it was able to stand on its own two feet. In practice, like virtually all feminist programs, women's pro sport is an indulgence whose existence relies on taking from more deserving men. Rubbing salt into the wound, they even have the cheek to work part-time but demand full-time pay.

Serena Williams: an example of where the gender pay gap actually does exist.

Whilst Djokovic, Nadal and Federer earn huge amounts of money, travel the world and live like kings, in 2012 the 150th ranked player earned just $75,000 in prize money, and the 200th ranked player just $20,780. Think about how many quality tennis players there are in the world. If you are ranked 200, you are damn good, but will still struggle to make a living.

This is incredibly unfair when you consider women making millions of dollars would get thrashed by these men staying at budget hotels and battling it out on the periphery of the circuit. Serena Williams, for example, has more than $70 million dollars in career prize money. She and her sister Venus once bragged they could beat any man outside the world's top 200. The challenge was accepted by Karsten Braasch, a German ranked 203. Before the matches, Braasch played a round of golf in the morning, drank a couple of beers, smoked a few cigarettes and then beat Serena 6-1 and Venus 6-2.

Braasch clearly proved he was a better player and deserved to be paid more. Serena said after the game: "I didn't know it would be that hard. I hit shots that would have been winners on the women's tour and he got them easily." Braasch's career prizemoney? Less than $1.5 million.

Karsten who? He's the guy who annihilated the greatest female player of all time but has about 2% of her career earnings.

It's time for feminists to put up or shut up, quite frankly. Either you're equal or you're not. If you truly believe you are, you must demand the immediate removal of all gender divisions in pro sports. That would be equality in the truest sense of the word (opportunity as opposed to outcome), but of course feminists will never allow this because deep down they know there would barely be a pro sportswoman left on the planet if they were forced to compete on a level playing field.

Let's face it, women's sport generally sucks as a spectacle, because it's a vastly inferior product. In a free market, whatever your field, you don't deserve to be paid the same, let alone more, as somebody who is better than you. The checkout operator at 7-11 doesn't demand they get a pay rise because it's not fair they weren't born with the same intelligence as a mechanical engineer.

However, right now a ludicrous blind spot by administrators means women tennis players are being massively rewarded for being vastly inferior to their male contemporaries. If they continue to reject equality, insist on being segregated and having their own tour their prize money should be 50% of the men at best. That would still be a more than fair result for them, and deep down they know it.

Why is the hourly pay rate higher for inferior talent?

At the 2015 US Open, women's champ Serena Williams spent 11 hours 17 minutes on court, compared with the men's winner Marin Cilic, who spent 16 hours 43 minutes. Such a discrepancy is standard for all major tournaments. Feminists usually scoff at "biological differences" between men and women but eagerly embrace them when they stand to benefit. They claim women should only have to play three sets because they "aren't as physically strong as men." What a cop out.

Getting paid the same as men who would annihilate them to play other females over five sets is a hell of a deal for women, but they won't even do that! After years of receiving free upgrades to first class, a free upgrade to business class is something they turn their entitled noses up at. If women can run marathons they can play five sets of tennis, especially when it's for millions of dollars. If they truly believe they aren't up to the same physical requirements of their male counterparts and they only want to work part-time, sorry girls, but it’s time for a pay cut.

If women want to get paid the same as men like Cilic, they should have to play them

Let’s say you work with a man in his 60s. He and his sexagenarian friends go home at midday every day, but are paid the same as you, even though you do the same job. When you dare point out this is unfair, they cite discrimination, call you a bigot, and claim the arrangement actually is perfectly reasonable because they are older and “not as physically strong as you, and we get tired easier.” Nobody would tolerate this, of course. The senior citizens would be paid part time or told to retire. What makes being a woman so special?

The depth of talent in the men’s game is rarely mentioned. Unlike top women, men must be highly vigilant and on their game from the early rounds. Even low-ranked men often have a big weapon, such as a massive serve. On any given day, if they happen to be on, they can pose a serious threat to even the world’s best players. The top ten women players routinely coast through their matches until the finals, never seriously challenged, all the while being paid the same as the men slugging it out in bruising physical encounters.

Men on tour are reluctant to call out this obvious sexism due to the risk of being fined and losing their sponsors, so we need to step up to the plate for them and also keep the dream alive for aspiring future male pros. It’s time to boycott women’s tennis. I know what you are saying: “I don’t watch that garbage anyway!” Having said that, you might be tempted to watch Djokovic or Federer, so this means turning off the TV when the women come on, or if you are at a tournament, walking out of the stadium and watching another match.

The empty stands and terrible ratings will reveal women’s tennis for what it is: a bunch of shrieking, B Grade athletes. Sure, you might miss checking out some shapely bronzed Eastern European legs or cleavage, but it’s a price you should be prepared to pay for your fellow men out there struggling to make a living on the pro tennis circuit.

Djokovic spoke out about the raw deal men get, but was forced to quickly backpedal to prevent losing sponsorship

The obvious lie men and women's sport is inherently the same must be called out. It is important we take a stand because of the dangerous precedent tennis pay sets. Make no mistake, emboldened feminists are pushing for increasingly ludicrous employment arrangements that blatantly favour women. They want men to be treated like second class citizens, even in fields they dominate. This is coming to a workplace near you, if it's not already there.

Any media coverage and prize money for women's sport is an indulgence. I'm not opposed to the men's game subsidising women sufficiently so the best players can make a living from it, but this sense of entitlement sportswomen and feminist commentators have has got to stop. They are nowhere near as good as the men and never will be, so the least they could do is be reasonable and play five sets.

But as always with feminists, they fiercely resist anything that would create true equality between the sexes. However, the striking reality is the viability of women's tennis depends entirely on piggy backing on the popularity of the men's game. It's time pay packets reflected that.

5 Signs Of The West's Forthcoming Dark Age

December 25, 2016 | by Waldemar Pabst | Link | Original Link

When people are asked what the future will be like, they often respond with descriptions of shimmering mile-high skyscrapers, flying cars, and sentient robots. People almost always envision a future better than the present, a future where breakthroughs and discoveries are made at a frenetic pace and our lives are improved in countless ways. Not only have people come to take technological progress as a given, they believe the pace of discovery and innovation will only accelerate.

I take a more jaundiced view. Due to the cumulative effect of countless Cultural Marxist policies and interventions at all levels—government, academia, industry, and entertainment—another Dark Age is looming. We will see the pace of scientific discoveries and technological innovations slow. Major breakthroughs will become increasingly rare. Rather than the breakneck pace of discovery and innovation that starry-eyed optimists envision, the future will be stagnant and uninspired. Here's why.

1. Denial And Suppression Of Innate Gender Differences

Years of social engineering initiatives (e.g., "Girls Who Code") designed to motivate females to study Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM) have come at the cost of deterring the only segment of the population that has ever demonstrated any proficiency or aptitude (or innate interest) in these subjects.

Indeed, human civilization itself is the product of the male mind. Almost every discovery, invention, or innovation can be credited to a man. And yet, science days, campus tours, outreach initiatives, and mentorship programs that exclusively target girls abound. Years ago, I myself had to serve as a TA for a week-long boot camp designed to motivate high school girls to pursue careers in STEM. There was no such program for similarly inclined male high school students. I'm bombarded on a daily basis by emails announcing new programs designed to promote female entrepreneurship or grants and fellowships for which only women are eligible.

Not satisfied to merely actively discriminate against males, Cultural Marxists have begun trying to combat innate maleness that imparts "unfair advantage" to boys from birth. Boys developing their spatial reasoning skills by playing with Legos? One Seattle public school teacher has the solution: simply forbid the boys in her class from playing with Legos.

Campaigns to make toys gender neutral (pink toys for boys and blue toys for girls) are similarly insidious attempts to deny basic biology and human nature (the innate male desire to create and the innate female desire to nurture). We also see attempts at using Newspeak to criminalize the innate male desire to explain the world as "mansplaining."

2. Destruction Of Critical Thinking Skills

When you want a child to learn to be careful around the stove, you let him touch a hot stove. Immediately, he will pull his hand away and he we will instantly come to associate the stove with pain. He has learned. Leftists say it is racist for shopkeepers or police officers to be more suspicious of black youths even though they commit the overwhelming majority of crimes. In the eyes of leftists, shopkeepers and police officers are wrong for having learned from experience.

Thus, leftism represents an abrogation of learning, a denial of empirical thought, and a suspension of critical thinking faculties. The leftist philosophy is to ignore patterns and dismiss statistics as "racist." It is fundamentally incompatible with ration and reason. How can we expect young people to be the critical thinkers of tomorrow when they have their higher faculties challenged at every turn? We have taught generations to avoid thinking critically, to avoid being observant.

The entirety of human civilization was built on observation. Tracking the motion of the planets and the position of the constellations in the night sky told the ancients when to plant their crops. To a leftist, just because it starts to get warmer around the vernal equinox, that's no reason to assume it will get warmer the next time there's a vernal equinox. Don't be so prejudiced.

As Winston says in George Orwell's 1984, "Freedom is the freedom to say that two plus two makes four. If that is granted, all else follows."

3. Ideological Conformity

It takes a particular dissident mindset to usher in major breakthroughs and discoveries. Copernicus, Galileo, and Giordano Bruno were branded as heretics for the ideas they advanced. Anton von Leuwenhoek asserted there existed organisms smaller than could be perceived with the naked eye. Louis Pasteur rejected the then universally accepted theory of spontaneous generation—the notion that life could spring from non-life. Alfred Wagner proposed the radical idea that the continents could actually drift. Electric illumination, heavier than air flight, and space travel were all once thought impossible.

Until recently, perhaps the most defining trait of the West was the innate willingness or inclination of its men to defy conventional wisdom and challenge the accepted way of doing things. Being told something was impossible or ran counter to orthodoxy only served to embolden those with an iconoclast mindset. That maverick streak was what drove progress and underpinned most major discoveries and innovations. The West used to celebrate its intellectual rebels: it lionized those who had the courage to think differently.

No longer. The West is now characterized by the stifling of independent thought (wrongthink) and the persecution of those who question dogma. Bastions of higher learning have been replaced with safe spaces where children cower from harsh reality and are presented with comfort animals and coloring books. The oppressive Cultural Marxist pall that has descended on the West like a miasma will snuff out independent thought and cripple progress. That straight jacket mentality that now has a stranglehold on critical thought in the humanities (politics, history, and literature) will soon spill over into the hard sciences.

Witness how Cultural Marxists turned on their own atheist and materialist heroes James Watson for espousing biological determinism and Richard Dawkins, Christopher Hitchens, and Pat Condell for their critical comments about Islam. This will be exacerbated by the push for more women to enter STEM. Women are conformists at heart. Very rarely will they risk professional ostracism or social opprobrium. I see the American intellectual climate becoming more like China’s: more doctrinaire with less emphasis on original thought. Rote memorization will replace critical thinking.

4. Misallocation Of Resources

Discoveries don’t just happen. Innovations don’t just present themselves. They are the product of the human mind. Innate human talents need to be identified and cultivated. School administrators expend untold billions making sure mentally defective children can count to potato but balk at earmarking funds for gifted and talented education.

With changing demographics (white births were the minority in the United States starting in 2012) as well as mass infusions of immigrants (legal or otherwise) along with settled refugees, expect schools to reallocate resources from the top performing students to the lowest performing students. Classes with limited appeal such as AP Physics as well as programs for gifted and talented children will end up on the chopping block to free up additional resources for remedial and ESL classes for children who can't speak English or are in this country illegally.

5. Appropriation Of Accomplishments

Lastly, and perhaps most disturbingly, is the willingness of Cultural Marxists to rewrite history, appropriating the accomplishments of others to serve their own agenda. When the Juno spacecraft successfully went into orbit around Jupiter, Google offered up a commemorative doodle of a sexually and racially diverse NASA mission control that looked nothing like the reality.

Hollywood loves to exaggerate the accomplishments of certain groups while trivializing the accomplishments of others. Disney recently released Queen of Katwe, a movie that paints a poor Ugandan girl who can play chess at an average level as a grandmaster. 20th Century Fox just released Hidden Figures, which claims America would never have been able to get to the moon were it not for a team of black female number crunchers.

Why is Neil deGrasse Tyson the public face of science when he has never actually discovered anything? Why is someone who pretends to be a scientist invited onto every late night TV show to speak as an authority while tens of thousands of more accomplished white scientists are condemned to obscurity? Why would a white man go to the effort of inventing or discovering something if his accomplishments will be wrested from him and attributed to someone else?

Conclusion

When I look at modern society, I get the sensation of someone standing on the shore watching a wayward cargo ship heading toward land. We know that such large vessels have a tremendous amount of inertia and take a long time to slow to a stop. We know that beyond a certain point, the ship is going to run aground no matter how hard the captain tries to reverse course.

Society too has a lot of inertia: mental constructs and ways of thinking and behaving inculcated and conditioned over a period of many years cannot be simply shaken off overnight. During the Reconstruction Era, formed Confederate soldiers were barred from civil life and not allowed to either hold public office or vote in elections. Similarly, following the end of World War Two, the Allies vigorously pursued a policy of de-Nazification designed to systematically scrub the former ideology from every facet of society.

Short of a similar comprehensive purge, the policies of the Cultural Marxists will echo for years to come. The ship has been brought to full steam and it will run aground. You can try to slow it down, but it is still going to beach itself.

P.S. I'm not the first to point out that the pace of discovery and innovation seems to be slowing (see Michael Hanlon's 2014 essay "The Golden Quarter" as well as various statements made by Peter Thiel) and that we may be on the eve of another Dark Age, but I am the first to point the finger at Cultural Marxism as the causal agent.

How To Control Your Shoulders With Maxalding

December 25, 2016 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago, I gave a brief overview of Maxick's Muscle Control method (also known as "maxalding"). If you will recall, this is a method of flexing the muscles to give your nervous system a greater "command" of them, which I found to be a decent supplement to a traditional training regimen. Also in that article, I conveyed the total body flexion and relaxation, the core techniques of maxalding.

Now that—hopefully—you have gotten a grip on the concepts of basic muscle relaxation and flexion, we can begin attacking specific muscle groups. Note that I would not advise doing too many at once—the book is organized around large muscle groups, and so will my instruction in it. Besides, I find that it is easier to "get the feel" for one group and then move on, rather than do all of them at once. Also note that this is what Maxick himself advised doing.

And without further ado, let us begin the slightly ironic training of the shoulder girdle; ironic because this training actually targets two muscle groups, neither of which are the deltoid—the latissimus dorsi, and the trapezius.

Latissimus Dorsi

The latissimus dorsi are, in fact, the biggest and most powerful muscles of the upper body. While they are the muscles that comprise the majority of the back, they perform an important role in extending, abducting, and rotating the arms and shoulders. And as luck would have it, these large and noticeable muscles are quite easy to tense, and thus are the first muscles that you should learn how to control.

To begin, take a pose with the hands on the front of the hips. Relax the muscles and let them hang limp.

Then, think really hard about the bits of muscle near the armpit (indicated by arrows int he picture). Think of them all the time, then widen your back as much as you can without ROUNDING the back (ie: bending forward). Keeping the back as flat as possible, lift the shoulders and keep them high and back, then drop them when you feel the back has expanded. When you start, pressure with the hands upon the hips will assist you, but eventually you want to stop doing so.

Maxick's neo-classical nudity not required.

If back rounding is a problem, beginners can round the back and bring the shoulders forward, then press the hands against the waist, and attempt to pull the shoulders back while retaining lat flexion. Of course, eventually, you want to be able to do this without back rounding

This exercise will make your chest more full.

Trapezius

The trapezius muscles run from the back of the neck to the shoulders and attach to the scapula—the shoulder blades. Where the latissimus dorsi move the arms forward and back, the trapezius move it out, as well as keeping the arm and shoulder aligned when bearing a heavy weight, hence why the humble deadlift is the main traditional exercise in developing them.

But in terms of muscle control, the trapezii are a little more complicated than the latissimus dorsi. For starters, you have to first isolate each indivdual trapezius before you can flex them both.

To begin, use one hand to grip the other with the fingers of one hand wrapped around the knuckles of the other.

Then extend your arms down in front of you as shown

Next, drop the shoulder of the “inside hand”, which forces the dropped shoulder’s scapula to push out. Retain the arm position, apply pressure: the outside “Grasping” hand pushes down, and the inside hand pushes up. The trapezius on the side of the outside hand should notably flex, as seen above.

Then reverse the process on the other side.

Once you have sufficiently mastered trapezius isolation, you must flex both simultaneously. I personally feel Maxick doesn’t explain this well, and thus I will take matters into my own hands.

It helps me to imagine pushing the shoulder down and forcing the trapezius to touch the neck. The trapezius and neck should feel sort of “crowded.” Avoid flexing either the neck or the latissimus dorsi muscles when you do this. Again, the trapezii flexion should be noticeable.

Again, leather thongs are also not required

From here, you can return to isolation—flex both trapezii, and then relax one; remember the feeling of “droopiness” from the first set of exercises I gave you. You should know how that feels, and seek it only in one side, and then the other. Moving an arm can help for beginners, but eventually you should try to keep your arms still.

And finally, you combine flexion with arm movement. Isolate both traps, then seek to hold your arms out straight, maximizing your “wingspan.” Then, push your shoulder blades together, all the while flexing your traps.

And with that, you have mastered trapezius isolation.

“Mastery of Exercises 3, 4 and 5 will give you extraordinary shoulder power and suppleness, with superiority in every sport or occupation you use the shoulders.”

But there’s a lot more muscles to isolate, and those will come in future articles!

The 5 Biggest Heroes of 2016

December 26, 2016 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

2016 has been a turbulent year to say the least and it is during times of uncertainty that we see great men emerge above the rest.

I've chosen five prominent men of our times who either has shaped the world for the better or shown great leadership capabilities.

1. Nigel Farage

One of the biggest event of this year was the Brexit, and if there is one man who deserves the credit for leading the UK out of the EU, it is Nigel Farage.

Farage fought relentlessly against the EU for years and I've always admired his passion which he exercised without being pompous and crass. What is surprising is just how hostile the media had been towards him and his party as though they were racists or extremists. This, in spite of the fact that there's nothing to suggest that Farage holds any "racist" or extremist views. He has managed to fight through the barrage of defamation efforts to emerge victorious in the end.

The fact that he has stepped down from his party after Brexit shows that he was truly fighting for his country alone and not for personal power or profit. Even though he was one of the major figures in the Brexit campaign, I don't think he has gotten the full credit he deserves. Perhaps the future generation will grant him the historical recognition that he has earned.

2. Donald Trump

First, I'll come out and say that I don't particularly like Trump (the fact that he's already gone back against his words, hired Goldman Sachs executives, and shown his loyalty for the Zionists all suggests that we'll be seeing much of the same old). My reserved "support" and cynical view of Trump has led me to disagreements with both his fans and detractors alike. However, in spite of all the aspects that I may not like about him, I recognize that: 1) You don't have to agree with someone's politics to recognize his strengths and achievements. 2) The other option, Hillary, would likely to cause full-blown conflict with Russia or its allies, leading to catastrophic consequences for the world. That said, no one knows knows for sure what kind of president Trump will be—not even himself, so I'll focus solely on his presidential campaign.

Trump's campaign was both historical and unprecedented. Not since Reagan was a non-establishment candidate able to capture the hopes and enthusiasm of so many Americans. And he did so with such energy that people were made to forget that he reached his 70th birthday this year. Compare that to the lackluster performance and feebleness of Jeb Bush who is several years younger than he.

Trump fought against all the political correct nonsense, the establishment, the mainstream media, the countless accusations and attack on his character, and so on. And like Farage before, he came out victorious in the end against all odds. For his symbolic victory against the leftists, he is one of the heroes of this year.

3. Julian Assange

Julian Assange is an ordinary man fighting the lopsided battle against the global establishment. He's already been trapped inside the Ecuadorian embassy for five years as a result of false rape accusations, and even his life there isn't entirely safe and secure—all for exposing the crimes of the elites.

And as a result of being impartial to the information he releases, Assange doesn't have a strong support from either the Left or the Right. For example, many of the liberals who saw him as a hero for his earlier leaks regarding the Iraq war now regards him as an enemy agent who conspired with the Russian hackers to help Clinton lose (of course, these liberals don't seem to care about the content of the leak itself that exposed just how rotten and corrupt the DNC is). It's clear that Assange really only cares about delivering the truth to the general public without worrying about winning approval. Some speculate that he's helped Trump win in hopes that he'll be granted an amnesty, but I doubt it. I think Assange fights for what he believes is right and releases whatever information he can.

I don't think anyone else on this list made as much personal sacrifice as Assange has for a cause and I hope that he's still alive and well (there's been rumours that he's been silenced, killed, or captured due to his lack of public appearance after his internet connection was severed.)

4. Bashar Al-Assad and all who are fighting for Syria

If there is one country in the world that is fighting against the globalist onslaught, it is Syria. The war there has been waging for almost six years now as American-Wahhabi-Zionist axis along with their allies have been flooding the country with Islamic terrorists and giving them weapons and diplomatic support in an attempt to destroy the secular nation that had previously been stable and growing.

Leading the Syrian nation's fight for existence is Bashar Al-Assad, who, in addition to fighting ISIS and other Islamic militants at home, faces international criticism as a "brutal dictator" who needs to be removed. It's quite telling when an elected Arab leader who defends Christians and other minorities is being accused of war crimes by Western nations that are backing the "moderate" rebels who are really nothing but head-chopping Jihadists and Al-Qaeda offshoots. If you want to know the kind of leader Assad really is, just watch him speak for yourself:

Besides Assad, the Syrian people, the Syrian Arab Army, and other allied groups including Russia, Hezbollah, and Quds force from Iran also deserve mention for fighting against ISIS and other Islamists, something they will never get credit for by the West.

5. Vladimir Putin

Last, we have Vladmir Putin who has been leading the Russian nation against the globalists and the cancerous Western influence that is wrecking the world. Like the other men listed here, Putin has been on the receiving end of relentless media attack to defame him as a corrupt and tyrannical ruler and even a war criminal. He has become the boogie man in the West used to blame everything from the US election results to the war deaths in Syria, as well as serving as an excuse for NATO to expand to the East even when it is the US that is to be blamed for re-starting the Cold War.

Putin's role in making Russia the main resisting force against the globalists and a stabilizing influence in the world is wholly unappreciated. It was Putin who stepped in to stop the West from completely destroying Syria as they had done with Libya, it was with the help of Russian airforce that the Syrian armed forces were able to achieve the victory they did this year, it was Putin who maintained his cool and tamed Turkey so that the two countries could work together even after Turkey downed one of its aircraft. You can tell just how much the world is stacked up against Putin and Russia by how the Western media has been silent on Russia's humanitarian aid to Syria and the death of Russian paramedics in the hands of the "moderate" rebels even as the West lies and sheds crocodile tears about the situation in Aleppo.

Some people still hate Putin because they see him as the enemy of America and a threat to the West, but these people need to realize that it was not Putin's decision to stir conflicts. He's merely been reacting to the West's efforts to undermine Russia. It is the US and its allies that chose to be Russia's enemy, not the other way around. And if the West continues to expand its globalist influence around the world, Putin's Russia will continue to fight back against it.

Closing Words

We have heroes not just so that they may lead us, but so that we be inspired by them. We shouldn’t merely worship great men, but strive to be one ourselves. Because no matter how great, an individual man by himself cannot change the world. All the men above did not act alone but had others who followed their lead. If you are truly interested in changing the world, you must become one yourself.

How Leftist Ideology Might Have Destroyed The Neanderthals

December 26, 2016 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Much about the Neanderthals is shrouded in the mists of time, but archaeology provides some clues. Their disappearance is one of the mysteries of early mankind. Several theories have been proposed. I'll put forth another; not entirely seriously, but to illustrate some important points.

It's unlikely that ideology predated the dawn of civilization, but unconsciously following a few leftist principles doomed the Neanderthals. (When cultural Marxism is running the show, the things that once were thoughtless mistakes are actively promoted!) Thus, their demise is uncannily similar to some of today's trends. The fate of the Neanderthals is a prime example of why packing greatly dissimilar societies into the same territory is a recipe for destruction.

What were Neanderthals like?

Be careful, you toward the left: not all change leads to progress!

The stereotype is that Neanderthals were brutish knuckleheads, but that might be wrong. They had a somewhat larger average brain size than the Cro-Magnons, their later rivals. (Interestingly, the Cro-Magnons had larger brains than modern people do, something easier to believe with each passing year. Madison Grant and Lothrop Stoddard tried to warn us…) So they weren't complete morons. Survival in a very harsh climate—Europe and Central Asia during the Ice Age—meant that Neanderthals (and their little-known Denisovan cousins to the east) had the know-how to prepare for the brutal winters. They certainly didn't have a nanny-state government to bail them out if they couldn't plan ahead.

Neanderthal burial customs show that they cared about their departed, and we might deduce that they believed in an afterlife. They used tools. They made the first known musical instrument, a bone flute. The first realistic sculptures featured Neanderthal heads. They made cave paintings too. Although the Cro-Magnons were better at it, Neanderthals still were more talented than many artists today. They were physiologically capable of speech, so they likely had languages. All told, then, they did have culture, though what form it took is pretty speculative. In any event, there's no clear evidence they were any more savage than other Paleolithic population groups.

They were stocky, with large brows, eyes, and noses, and small chins. Other than that, they were very muscular. I'm a bit of a gym rat, but even Neanderthal chicks were considerably tougher than I am. The trade-off was that they had less dexterity than Cro-Magnons, as we can see by comparing their spearheads.

As for the Cro-Magnons, they evolved in East Africa perhaps as early as 200,000 years ago. They were likely bronze-complexioned, before spreading across the globe and adapting to local conditions, eventually becoming the races of today. They had pointy chins and somewhat square eye sockets, but otherwise looked a lot like we do now. What happened when these two peoples met?

Open borders immigration

The first contact was likely in the Levant. I can imagine how the conversation between two Neanderthals might have gone:

> "Hey, Og, there are some new people coming in. They're tall and skinny, their heads look a little weird, and they talk funny. Who are they?"
> "They must be refugees. We should welcome them."
> "Well, I don't want them taking our land."
> "I'm telling you, one of these days someone around here will write a book that says 'Therefore love the stranger, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt.'"
> "I'm just not sure about all this. How do we know they won't take our hospitality as a sign that they can play us for chumps? What's their agenda, anyway? Will they fit in and respect our values? How do we know that they're not going to take over one of these days? Why can't these tired, poor, huddled masses yearn to breathe free somewhere else? How do we benefit from letting in this wretched refuse from their teeming shore?"
> "You're such a reactionary, Grunk. This is the Fertile Crescent, after all. Resources are plentiful here, and I see that there are only a few of these immigrants right now. All they want is a better place to live. Surely they'll assimilate and learn our ways, and we'll all get along together if only we set aside our prejudices and open our hearts. Let's stop being xenophobic and give diversity a chance."
> "Okay, Og, you've convinced me. We outnumber them now, we're stronger, and we're in charge, so we'll always be in control of the situation, right? Maybe they can pick our vegetables for us or something. After all, what's the worst thing that possibly could happen?"

Later, the Cro-Magnons had overrun much of the Middle East by about 36,500 BC. By 28,000 BC, they had taken over almost all territories that Neanderthals used to inhabit nearly exclusively. Mass immigration—then a careless lack of vigilance—is something aggressively promoted today.

This certainly led to resource competition. Due to the greater musculature, Neanderthals required about twice the caloric intake as modern people (including the Cro-Magnons, who weren't too different from us anatomically). It's basically the same reason why you can't graze cattle and sheep in the same pasture; the sheep chew the grass down to the ground before the cattle can get their fill.

The Neanderthals were very sparsely populated and practiced big-game hunting. That worked out fine, until people who could get by with greater population density came in and started eating all their food. Studies on the remains of the late Neanderthals suggest that malnutrition was fairly common.

Were they resentful that their hunting grounds were being picked clean by the newcomers? Perhaps that was like many conservatives today grumbling about fresh-off-the-boat immigrants milking the welfare system while staying home and making babies. The taxpayers (52% of the American population, as Mitt Romney indelicately observed) have to work to support everyone on public assistance, sometimes limiting their own family size because they're being taxed to death. We want at least a decent, middle-class existence (high resources) for our kids; those living on the government tit (low resources) have no such requirements. And on the subject of differential fertility rates…

Depopulation

Andrea Dworkin, grand high poobah of the Junior Anti-Sex League

The new immigrants, the Cro-Magnons, had a slightly higher fertility rate than Neanderthals did. The population change wasn't much per year, but over thousands of years it was very significant. Even so, the Neanderthals didn't have much to complain about, since the populations now invited to flood the Western world have a much higher fertility rate than the host populations.

Why was the Neanderthal fertility rate lower? The real reason probably has to do with them being a little bit more K-selected. Still, I can't help but wonder if leftist ideology might have been involved. After all, much of their platform serves the depopulation agenda, for reasons which are pretty obvious. They aggressively promote anti-natal policies: abortion, homosexuality, the transsexual fad, the "childfree" lifestyle, even the Voluntary Human Extinction Movement, etc. Leftists would dwindle away, if they didn't control the media and education systems to indoctrinate the public.

Were there any of the likes of Bella Abzug, Valerie Solanas, or Andrea Dworkin during the Paleolithic Era? We don't have any direct evidence of this, of course. Still, quite a few feminists bear more than a passing resemblance to burly cavewomen, so they might be throwbacks. And on the subject of looks…

Self-defeating diversity

“Hey, baby, what’s your sign?” “Buy me a drink and I’ll tell you.” “Shit Test, huh? I bet you’re a Capricorn, Taurus, Aries… well, anything I guess.”

When the exotic newcomers entered Neanderthal territory, they did what differing populations packed into close proximity eventually get around to doing. Those Neanderthals who hadn’t been overcrowded to death ended up interbreeding themselves out of existence. The process began pretty quickly; hybrid skulls have been found, such as in the Levant.

Interestingly, there has never been any Neanderthal mitochondrial DNA found in any modern humans. This means that there are no female lineages. There are a few hypotheses for this. Jean Auel put forth a couple of scenarios in her Earth’s Children novels, and that’s all I care to say about it. Another explanation is that boys born from Cro-Magnon male to Neanderthal female crossings could have been infertile. Likewise, there may be something to another hypothesis as to why there are no Neanderthal Y-chromosomes today, but I won’t bore you to tears.

I propose another reason why nobody has matrilineal descent from a Neanderthal woman. We at Return Of Kings are aware of the following indelicate facts:

1. Chicks dig big, tough guys with muscles.
2. Given the choice, guys prefer chicks who are least likely to push them around.

So, Neanderthal men were attracted to the slender Cro-Magnon ladies who surely respected them, and let neither cultural differences nor exotic looks stand in the way of getting laid. Meanwhile, Cro-Magnon guys liked their women slender too. They weren’t so enthusiastic about burly Neanderthal babes who would have written them off as betas and friend-zoned them anyway.

This undoubtedly drove the Neanderthal fertility rate further down. Because they believed that race isn't important ("only a social construct", as it goes now), they nailed their own coffin shut. They scored some Cro-Magnon punani, but their descendants don't look very much like them.

As a result, most people have about 1-4% Neanderthal DNA; the numbers being slightly on the higher side for East Asians. That's about the equivalent of having one Neanderthal great-great-great grandfather, and the rest of your ancestry is Cro-Magnon. (If indeed fertile offspring was less likely, these matches may have been more common than we'd expect.) Pure Africans are the exception, since Neanderthals never went there. As for the rest of us, basically we're the Neanderthals now, but not very much.

So that's the story of the two ancient races which—after tens of thousands more years of evolution—developed into the modern races of mankind across the globe. Unfortunately for the Neanderthals, their unique looks and culture effectively became extinct a long time ago. Basically, these hardy Ice Age apex predators were surrounded by a faster growing population which overwhelmed them as time went by, and got assimilated to death.

Today's Social Justice Warriors would be delighted to do that to all of humanity today, destroying diversity in the name of diversity. If the globalist elites calling the shots get their way, not even the pure Africans will escape the pan-gaeic biological stir-fry, even though they're not the primary target yet.

Global warming

Could this be the true cause of global warming today?

Here's one item where liberalism actually was right. Climate change removed the habitat where Neanderthals had a natural advantage, as they thrived in cold climates. Unlike today's hot controversy, global warming certainly happened; the Ice Age ended. Rising oceans ate up a tremendous amount of coastline. For example, the English Channel used to be only a river. What is now the North Sea was above ground. However, even if we could send Al Gore back to the Ice Age to warn everybody, it wouldn't have helped. Climate change happened because of natural forces, not people driving too many cars.

What could be done about global warming today? More nuclear power would drive carbon emissions way down. At the very least, it would conserve valuable resources. Next-generation designs (pebble bed reactors, thorium reactors, etc.) could be quite safe. However, nuclear power makes liberals quake with fear. Note also that the Obama administration ordered the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste disposal facility closed after billions were spent to get it ready, despite it being one of the safest places on earth to store spent nuclear fuel. Liberals refuse to consider uncomfortable subjects; Pizzagate being the latest example of this.

If anthropogenic climate change is true—I'll consider it to be one possible factor of many—then refusal to allow an expedient solution might submerge much more coastline. Many liberals believe we should severely curtail using modern technology. So some leftists (ecofeminism, Ted Kaczynski) think we were better off before industrialization—and a few (anarcho-primitivism) actually propose returning to the Stone Age—but I don't see many giving up their iPads, cell phones, and other gadgets.

Even when leftists make correct observations (at least arguably so), they can't find practical solutions. Thus, they're pretty much useless at public policy. Even worse is when they make short-sighted decisions to assuage their bleeding hearts. Often, this involves social engineering that eventually will destroy their own way of life if they get their way. Although they might long for collective suicide, they have no right to send their people the way of the Neanderthals.

WhatsApp vs Telegram: Which Messaging App Is Better?

December 26, 2016 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

These days almost everyone who has a smart phone uses some sort of messaging service. It just comes with the territory. As I was reading some news reports this weekend, I found out about a messaging service that (I'm ashamed to say) I had never heard of before: Telegram. According to some news reports, Telegram has become the messaging service of choice for the ISIS and pro-jihadi crowd, supposedly for the "security" of its encryption services. ISIS's mastery of modern communications systems should never be underestimated. This is a radical revolutionary movement that spends a great deal of effort learning how to penetrate the West's vulnerabilities.

This piqued my interest. I have been a user of WhatsApp, Viber, and Skype for a long time and have been generally satisfied with what they offer. I use all of them in one way or another, as it seems that each one has its own unique strong points. I've never used Telegram or known anyone who does, so I tried to do some research to see if Telegram is a messaging app worth using. I thought Return Of Kings readers would find this kind of discussion useful when deciding which messaging app to use.

Let's first give a bit of background information about Telegram. The company was founded by two brothers, Nikolai and Pavel Durov. After founding a social network company called Vkontakte, the brothers moved to Berlin in 2014 in the wake of the political problems in the Ukraine. Telegram was founded there. As of the time of writing, Telegram has about 100 million users worldwide, while WhatsApp has well over a billion. WhatsApp has a better claim to be the “industry standard.”

Encryption

Some of the articles about Telegram that I read portrayed its encryption as being superior to what was offered by WhatsApp. The details are these. Telegram uses its own encryption protocol rather than something developed by someone else. Deleted messages on Telegram can’t be decrypted, according to the company. However, unlike WhatsApp, a user of Telegram has to request encryption. In WhatsApp, encryption is done automatically; the user has no choice in the matter. WhatsApp also does not store messages; it just forwards them on to you. The more I looked into the details, the more it seemed that Telegram’s vaunted security features where not as good as the publicity was claiming.

Flexibility

On the other hand, there are some good features to Telegram that should not be underrated. For one thing—and this is important to me—Telegram lets you sign in to its service on a desktop computer as well as on your phone. I like this feature very much. One old messaging service (apparently defunct now) I used was called MessageMe, and it employed this sign-in feature. Sometimes you want to chat with someone using a computer rather than peck out messages on a phone. Telegram also has a two-step authentication feature that WhatsApp doesn’t have.

Both services use your phone number to authenticate, but with Telegram you can also set a secondary password for extra security. Telegram also does not have to be downloaded from official app stores: it is considered “open source” in that it can be built by the user himself. For example, Telegram has browser apps for Mozilla Firefox and Google Chrome. The bottom line is that Telegram is very flexible and can be used in a wide variety of locations and platforms. You can install it on any phone or platform.

Overall Security

Another irritating thing about WhatsApp is that you have to give it access to your entire “address book” in order to use the app. I don’t think people these days are very thrilled about doing this. So rather than having to give out (or ask for) other people’s telephone numbers, you can give out a username; this allows you to keep your phone number private. This looks like a very strong point for Telegram. In recent years I’ve noticed people starting to get very protective of their phone numbers, for better or for worse.

For what it's worth, WhatsApp has better group chat features (I never use these). It also offers encrypted phone calls, and this is something I do use. But for me the biggest selling point for WhatsApp is the fact that it is used by so many more people than Telegram. Messaging apps are only useful if people are using them. In some countries people are using WhatsApp to the exclusion of every other messaging app. That may change in the future, of course.

Conclusion

What do I conclude from all this? Telegram has some impressive features: it is probably more secure overall, and can be used in more ways than WhatsApp. But for me, these things are not enough to make me abandon WhatsApp. How much "security" does the average person who is not a criminal or a terrorist really need? Is it really that big of a deal? I also happen to believe that every electromagnetic form of communication can be decoded if someone really wants to do so. "Security" is a lot of marketing, in my opinion. None of these things are truly secure. It's a matter of degree, of course, and I'm not saying that you should discount it completely.

Readers should probably experiment with both apps and choose the one that meets their needs. I have found, for example, that Viber's phone calls are better than Skype's, but not as many people use Viber. You have to consider all the factors that matter to you, and do what works for your situation.

The Political Nature Of Man

December 26, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

How involved should a man get with politics? Should he become an activist who is eternally politically aware or should he forget about politics entirely? In this podcast, I explain both the benefits and costs of getting involved with politics and how my inclusion on a “hate list” in 2012 caused me to dedicate much of my life to the political, with little to show for it in the end. I describe the threat of social justice to a heterosexual man’s existence and what I believe is the ideal strategy for balancing a well-lived life with avoiding oppression. I also share my rules of engagement for when there is no other option but to fight back.

Rogue One Shows That Hollywood Is Listening To Our Complaints About Feminism In Films

December 27, 2016 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Trigger warning for way too sensitive SJW souls: this review contains spoilers.

Earlier this year, I wrote that the spinoff film Rogue One demonstrated Star Wars owner Disney's hatred of white males. Whilst my view has been vindicated within the last few days after seeing the film, Rogue One significantly toned down the SJW madness on display in The Force Awakens last year. My review of the latter set off a storm of controversy against Return Of Kings, which then turned into outright hate from Jimmy Kimmel and Forbes when Roosh took a poll about how our coverage adversely impacted ticket sales.

Return Of Kings will not endorse the film, but Rogue One illustrates how the film industry is quickly becoming aware of viewers' anger at SJW madness being forced down their throats. Just as many critics of the prequel films released between 1999 and 2005 nonetheless saw the films multiple times, many audience members at The Force Awakens screenings could appreciate the aerial battles, the thrill of a reignited galactic civil war, and other elements, all without celebrating the outright Mary Sue character Rey.

Rogue One's female main character, Jyn Erso, is very annoying for much of the film, yet hardly the most unbearable estrogen-filled creation to ever come onscreen. Thankfully, the film depicts a woman who is not going to single-handedly save the galaxy after reading Lenny Letter. And, lo and behold, she is not so empowered that she can cheat death as she tries to retrieve the Death Star plans.

Though clearly partly chosen for his foreign accent and Hispanic background, Diego Luna's character, Rebel intelligence operative Cassian Andor, is a welcome (half)-foil for Erso's mini-tantrums. Just as feminists use the Bechdel test to determine a character's worth, I assessed Andor moderately positively based on his willingness to have the balls to talk back to Jyn. He certainly followed her around too much, but stuck up for himself and confronted this female lead a lot more than the Christmas tree decoration Finn did with Rey in The Force Awakens. To boot, he ends up saving her (for a little while).

Believe it or not, the scientists in Rogue One are actually all men Director Krennic.

The real hero of the film is Death Star designer Galen Erso, Jyn's father, whom Disney miraculously did not turn into a woman implicitly touting the need for girls in STEM. And the complexity to his character is, for a film made by Disney, second-to-none, as he neither works for the Rebellion nor is he a lapdog for the Empire. It is difficult to tell who provided the nucleus for Galen's character, but even if it was SJW writer Christ Weitz or fellow SJW writer Gary Whitta, perhaps they can still be saved from the clutches of their putrid ideology. Regardless of the film's other scientists being, ahem, expendable, at least they're rightfully depicted as wizened, learned men, not young girls wearing hipster glasses.

Another highlight, too, is the highly ambitious Director Krennic and several cameos by both Darth Vader and a CGI-created Grand Moff Tarkin. So far Disney has resisted the urge, however difficult, to fill the Empire or First Order with loads of power-hungry Dark Side or Imperial girls who should nevertheless be applauded for the gains they have made for female representation in authoritarian governments. Krennic's character development is a tad uneven, probably reflecting some of the issues created by extensive reshoots earlier this year. Tellingly, the best line of the "film," the Director's "The powaahh we are dealing with is immeasurable!", was taken from the final cut of Rogue

One.

SJWs can’t be attacked for not trying

Massively privileged and connected writer Chris Weitz. If he were truly concerned about the need for multiculturalism, he should have fucked off from the film. Having the world’s whitest Mexican actress as your grandmother does not make you non-white.

One take-home lesson from Rogue One is that its writers definitely tried with all their might to make it a SJW reeducation film, before realizing how it would damage them. On the race front (all the villains are white males but none of the major Rebellion characters are) they certainly succeeded. Chris Weitz made his and his colleagues’ intentions very clear:

The other principal writer for Rogue One, Gary Whitta, responded to Weitz's now expunged tweet with a similar, also deleted sentiment:

> Opposed by a multi-cultural group led by brave women. https://t.co/UUcjwflMWG
> — Gary Whitta (@garywhitta) November 11, 2016

Bear in mind that this was just days after the election of Donald Trump. Weitz, Whitta and others involved with Star Wars had wheeled out a Rebellion insignia with a safety pin on Twitter in order to fight "hate." I'm sure Trump took note–and laughed.

The reshoots seem to have been about reducing the SJW agenda, not the "dark" tone of the film

Was Rogue One too dark because there were no safe spaces?

It has been alleged that Gareth Edwards, the director of the Godzilla reboot as well, presented a version of Rogue One to Disney executives, who balked at the "dark" overtones. Still, this doesn't explain why a number of the trailers' "girl power" moments were excised from the final product. Foremost among them was the ridiculous "confront a TIE fighter with a pistol" scene. Perhaps the pilot was a Rebel about to pick her up (no, not that kind of pick-up), but the footage was designed to emphasize how badass and untameable Jyn Erso is.

Also removed were the shots of Jyn operating alone and wearing an Imperial uniform, waving the flag for rich Core Worlds über-feminists everywhere. Maybe, just maybe, the director and others recognized how they were turning Rogue One into The Jyn Erso Show, much like how The Force Awakens literally became The Rey Show. Likewise, two particularly horrendous lines of Rey-inspired dialogue by Jyn ("This is a rebellion, isn't it? I rebel!" and "Let's get this over, shall we?") were cut, too.

Yup, a lot of the leftist rags hated it but couldn't say why

That sweaty feeling leftists get when a new Star Wars film isn't as SJW as they want.

Our friends at The Sydney Morning Herald called it "disappointing." The Guardian moaned, in typical Guardian nitpicking fashion, that the deceased Peter Cushing's likeness was stolen to recreate Grand Moff Tarkin, despite the filmmakers getting the necessary permission from his estate. So did The Huffington Post. Yes, other more positive reviews did come from the mainstream media, an indication of the middling ground Rogue One took between SJW extremism and normality. That said, the tiniest of gripes, including about a harmless pun by Darth Vader, were thrown into the mix. Anything and everything was deployed to avoid telling the truth: "We hate this film because it has no fully-fledged Rey."

By the way, Return Of Kings can admit when it's wrong. Our prediction that Rogue One would usher in another unbridled piece of feminist propaganda was only half-true in the end. But again, this was not for lack of trying on the part of SJW writers and production executives.

I anticipate that either the second or third film in the new conventional Star Wars trilogy will see Return Of Kings launching another widely-covered and extremely successful boycott. Until that time, we can be thankful that the Force was half with Rogue One.

John Lennon’s “Imagine” Programmed You To Accept The Globalism Nightmare

December 27, 2016 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently stopped to listen to a street busker singing cover songs. One of those songs was Imagine by John Lennon. As the crowd around me happily sung along, I grimaced at lyrics that painted not peace and love but authoritarianism and control.

Imagine is a globalist anthem for ushering in plans of world socialism and unipolar government, and it’s still used today by those same globohomos, such as the Anti-Defamation league, which has attacked me in the past. They’re currently featuring the song (archive) for their “world without hate” page, which translates to “world where only we can hate.”

Below I have taken the lyrics and translated them to their actual meaning.

> Imagine there’s no heaven
> It’s easy if you try
> No hell below us
> Imagine all the people
> Living for today… Aha-ah…

Imagine if we killed off God and replaced him by managers, propagandists, and scientists controlled by a small group of elites who dictated the foods you would eat, the jobs you would have, and even the way you would love one another (yes means yes, rapist). Your new religion will be materialism where you wake up every day aching for physical possessions or desires that we manipulate to keep you in a constant state of mental slavery.

> Imagine there’s no countries
> It isn’t hard to do

> Nothing to kill or die for
> And no religion, too
> Imagine all the people
> Living life in peace… You…

Imagine that George Soros and his globohomo cronies succeeded with their plans of "open society" by destroying Europe and the United States with millions of low-grade migrants while bombing to smithereens any other country that resists their dictates. All national identity will be erased, followed quickly by self-identity, so that you are a gingerbread cookie copy of everyone else, mentally and chemically controlled to be docile animals that never threaten those in power.

> You may say I'm a dreamer
> But I'm not the only one
> I hope someday you'll join us
> And the world will be as one

I'm not a hippie doofus but a pawn of an establishment that is hard at work with a depopulation agenda and color revolutions to realize a masterful globalist vision. The fact that I was a member of the first real "pop" band should clue you in to the usefulness that I provide to the one-world government dictatorship. Resisting will be futile.

> Imagine no possessions
> I wonder if you can
> No need for greed or hunger
> A brotherhood of man
> Imagine all the people

> Sharing all the world… You…

You will be given rations that consist of GMO soy and corn mixed up in a slurry that provides all your nutritional needs. You will not be able to own things like cars or apartments because we will rent or crowdshare them to you based on your true need that is determined by scientists on our payroll. The good news is that you will never be jealous of your neighbor again because he will be using the same Chinese-made junk as you.

> You may say I'm a dreamer
> But I'm not the only one
> I hope someday you'll join us
> And the world will live as one

The boot is about to land on your face, but I hope you grant us your consent in ushering in these plans because it will make for a smoother transition to a world where a small group at the top can efficiently control billions of slaves that have become too weakened to ever threaten their authority. By the way, celebrate "diversity" while you can because within 100 years everyone will have the exact shade of mahogany brown skin.

While there are many pop songs that are now jarring to my ears because of how "useful" the lyrics are for destroying any notion of traditional society, Imagine takes the cake for the most blatantly socialist song that is still prized for its message, even though its vision was already attempted in the Soviet Union to the tune of tens of millions dead.

Humans certainly have an innate craving for good stories and pleasant music, but we have to make sure that those who are making the movies and songs we consume are not implanting ideas in our minds that help them rule over us. Unfortunately, it's clear that anything coming out of Hollywood or the music industry today has those very aims in mind.

Lazy Fat Women Screech About Beauty Standards While Rejecting Men For Being Short

December 27, 2016 | by Rufus Winnfield | Link | Original Link

Women being fat and men being short are the biggest laments of the dating scene today, and, while they are falsely rated as equivalent (a man cannot become taller, but a woman can certainly lose weight), there is an additional misdirection at play here. Women hold the belief that everything about their physical appearance is tied up in one quality: that of beauty, and it is both the only thing men want and the thing she cannot change about herself. Today we will talk on how beauty is not attractiveness, that which also is what men actually want in a woman.

“If I can’t change it, why are you shaming me?”

We’re in a victim culture. You get a free pass to anything if you can claim you were victimized by it, and only when you want that free pass. The same woman can say about her weight “I’m sorry I’m not beautiful enough for you” (implying that you are a horrible person for daring to criticize her implied less-than-perfect finish in the genetic lottery) and “At least I have a pretty face,” (which attempts to minimize her obesity while not realizing the contradiction implied.

The victim mindset dilutes the human potential. By not accepting personal responsibility for our circumstances, we greatly reduce our power to change them.

- Dr. Steve Maraboli

Said contradiction is, simply, that being obese has nothing to do with beauty, but a pretty face most certainly does. Beauty is the sum total of the things that your lifestyle cannot control; the structure and symmetry of your face, the quality of your hair and skin, and other things that come from your genetics. This is different from attractiveness, which is the aggregate collection of how appealing you are to the opposite sex, of which beauty is only a small part.

The easiest way to explain the difference is to "flip the script" (to abuse a SJW self-righteous term) and apply it to men. Here at Return Of Kings, we spend NO time on male beauty. There is not an article here on nose jobs or skin care, and I think the closest we come to such matters are some articles on shaving, beards, haircuts, and suits. "Be clean and smell decent," is our advice on grooming, and we are, quite rightly, on to more important stuff because beauty, for a man, does not matter.

However, and here's the kicker, it doesn't matter much for a woman either. "WTF?" the collective voice of the comment section says right about now. Be at peace, my friends, and I shall explain all.

It's about attractiveness, not beauty.

A woman's beauty has very, very little to do with her attractiveness, and it's the latter that men want to date. Let's use a couple examples here.

Woman A has a beautiful face, of interest and symmetry, with deep blue eyes, hair of a nice natural luster, and clear skin. Woman B has a plain face, with eyes a little too close together, a couple moles, and her hair is drab and dry. She has a few acne scars.

Woman A got overweight in high school, she eats badly and has wrecked her complexion. She's an atheist, a feminist, a socialist, a gay rights activist who would go gay for the right woman, and has no hobbies other than Netflix. Seeing no point in men, and expecting people to love her for who she is, she spends no time on her appearance, and showers, at the best, every few days. She leaves her apartment only to go to work, where she sits all day in front of a computer, and only sees the sun in between those places and her car. She had a cat, but neglected it until it died.

Woman B became an athlete in middle school and stayed that way. She learned good, healthy cooking from her mother, and alternates between it and healthy small salad-based meals for single people on the go. She loves her God, tries to love everyone as herself, believes in getting paid fairly for a good day's work, is straight and still a virgin, and spends her spare time running, gardening, or pursuing an interest in painting. She's a little insecure about her looks, so she tries to look her best whenever she leaves her small, neat home and is polite and courteous even to those that don't deserve it. She's picky about hygiene, and has to balance working her running in with being able to get cleaned up before her next thing on her busy schedule, but, if she has a few moments, she likes to read outside.

Which girl would you rather date? Which girl would ANY man rather date? Sure, Woman A natively had better looks, but they went to shit with her lifestyle, and she's a worthless bitch on top of it. Woman B, while she may be a little plain, is the nicest, most religious girl you'll ever meet, and has what we're guessing is a smoking body under those prim work clothes from all that running.

Every positive trait Woman B has is something she chose to work towards, and the same can be said about all the negative traits possessed by Woman A. This leads us to the logical deduction of:

It actually is your fault

Women want to lump all of their shortcomings in with beauty because, that way, none of them are her fault; she's just not lucky enough to be beautiful, and you're shallow for not wanting her. Anything worthwhile on this earth requires effort, and it's not the lack of native beauty, which men can and do excuse as it actually is genetic and not controllable, but, rather, it’s the lack of effort in being a good, healthy person of worth, manners, and values that turn men off.

Some girls go halfway and succeed at being physically attractive, but emotionally, intellectually, and morally still are the blubbery, lazy, unhygienic mess in their heads, and these are the ones that are put in the pump and dump or short term fling categories, but never marriage.

The large girl might turn into a better looking girl than her friends, if she’d work at it.

By taking all her faults, most of which are fixable, and saying that she is rejected because guys don’t find her beautiful is nothing more than a rationalization to avoid work combined with an indictment of men who are horrible shitlords for expecting her to attain perfection. If a guy wants her to be more beautiful, it’s on him, since he’s unreasonable, and so there is no expectation of her to clean up her life at least a little bit.

Ok, so why the fixation on guys being short?

This logical escape hatch of beauty fixation actually works in reverse order for girls with guys. A woman bitches and moans when shit gets tough, a man gets to work and fixes it. ROK could be summed up with “This is what life will throw at you; here’s how to win;” if it’s a problem, we’ll make it work through effort and ingenuity.

But what if you figuratively fall short? What if she doesn’t like your shoes, or your car is old, or your haircut is out of style? Maybe she got bored on the date, or maybe she felt a little scared at one point and decided you were “rapey?” Can she criticize you to the world on any of those? No, of course she can’t, even SJWs know it’s shallow to reject a guy based on fashion, or material objects, and her girlfriends will just think she’s goofy if she goes mental about vibes. What to do? Oh, here we go, let’s just make him literally fall short as well.

They tell me the direct approach saves time.

A guy can't fix being short; he's always going to be at his adult height, and minus platform shoes or dangerous surgery, that's it. A girl that rejects a guy based on height will always be safe from regret for rejecting him over something that he later fixes and then bags a hotter girl the next time around. Plus, even short, sub-five foot girls are wanting some six foot plus guys, so there's no limit to what a girl can get away with in her preferences for the height of her dates.

If you happen to actually be a tall man (your author stands at 6′ 4″ in socks), don't worry, they'll either find something else, or, more likely, just ghost on you entirely.

Conclusion

Rolling fat (yuck) into beauty, along with all other controllable faults that are eliminated with effort absolves women of the necessity of fixing any issues affecting their attractiveness that their laziness caused, and rejecting men for being short removes the ability of men to fix any of theirs by focusing on the one thing they can't change. However, this only works on men that don't go for the next girl, so, if she says you're short, or fake-apologizes for not being beautiful when she's just lazy, move right along.

5 Lessons I Learned Moving From Offline To Online Business

December 28, 2016 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

2016 was the year that I transitioned fully from the corporate jail cubicle to 100% online business and income. However, the part of the story that never is as glamorous to tell is the few years of struggle beforehand. I penned a couple of worst-seller eBooks—I think between the two of them, they've maybe sold fifteen copies total.

It wasn't because they were bad products, they were actually quite good, but there was no demand. A hard lesson to learn after pouring heart and soul into a book. However, it's important to illustrate the point that it's not always what it appears on the outside. While a new reader to my site would look at it and call me a lucky son-of-a-bitch for catching a break with online business, the reality is that he hasn't seen the thousands of hours poured in behind the scenes.

With that being said, here's some differences between in-person and online business that will hopefully give you a realistic outlook on trying to break free of the rat race.

1. Brand Is Always An Easy Sell

This is true in-person, and to an extent, online. In college, I worked at a “high-end” audio company whose name aptly told people to Buy Other Sound Equipment. Even though the products themselves were at best mediocre, it didn’t matter. The name sold that product based off of the name alone more times than I could count.

People would just walk in and say, “So, you guys are the best. A, B, and C person told me so. I want a $300 pair of headphones please.” And that was that. They wouldn’t even try them on in a lot of cases. It’s the low-end equivalent of buying a car without bothering to take a test drive. How many car companies can make a sale like that? You could probably count the names on two hands.

The point is, the name behind a product is everything. When you’re doing smaller-time online business, you have no name. You cannot ever expect people to buy just because you are you—you have to prove yourself and sell whatever it is you’re selling. Speaking of…

2. Selling Is A Different Animal

When I worked in that audio store, it wasn't just the brand that made things easy. It was being able to analyze the tiniest of details about how a person was feeling based off of the words, gestures, and triggers from me. I look back now, and realize that this sales job was what gave me a leg up in regards to game. I was able to apply that same system into having success with girls—and that's what game is, when it boils down to it. Selling yourself to her.

Selling in the flesh is much easier because you can read a person, and have an intimate, face-to-face conversation with them. When you're dealing with online business, you're miles apart on all levels. They might be from a different country and 10 hours ahead. They might have zero interest in your offering because they found you "cold". It's the equal of someone who was "window shopping" at the speaker store—it was infinitely harder to turn that person into a paying customer than the example I used above. Even if they had more money than sense.

What I learned: Sure, you can write good copy and try to hit those same emotional triggers that you can utilize in person, but it's never going to have the same effect. When it comes down to it, we as humans have a need for face-to-face interactions. It's why the majority of people (granted, there are some weirdos) actually do go meet people from online dating. If you have the skills, selling to someone standing in front of you will always be easier than someone across the world on an LED screen.

3. Health, Wealth, Relationships

The three evergreen products, always. But there's a problem with the fact that they're not evergreen. What could that problem be? Products like these will always be in high demand. Everyone wants to get ripped. Everyone wants a million bucks. And everybody wants to have sex. You might be able to add travel to this list, but in many cases it's because people have dreams of heading to the beaches and having sex with exotic girls, such as Brazilian women. The problem then becomes is that everyone puts out a product centered around these three core topics.

I'm not saying it's impossible, because ROK itself is a good example. It is important to note though for those starting out, that breaking into these fields is going to take significantly longer. If your goal is a blog, it's going to take several years of consistent publishing (think 3x a week minimum) and a lot of networking and self promotion before you're making a comfortable income. And to be frank, most people don't have the mental fortitude to get through that—I've seen it countless times.

Of course, if you have a massive ads budget and an understanding of how that industry works, you can accelerate that process. However, those with those skill sets are generally going that route with massive, high-end products rather than trying to start a general information and advice blog.

What I learned: Information products don't sell in brick and mortar shops, whereas online business is chock full of them. If someone gets dumped and wants to get ripped, do you think an easier sell is in person, where they can see the home gym in action, or an eBook? Physical products are often easier to move.

4. Start Small

The best advice I can give is to start small—my niche site UkraineLiving.com is an excellent example of it. I took photos, information, and content that I got from my time in Ukraine and turned it into a mini little guide. I wrote 30 or so posts, and then turned them into an eBook and threw it up on Amazon. It's nothing special but it became a best seller, and as of writing this—is still the #1 book about Kiev on Amazon. It doesn't sell much, but it makes enough pay for a date or two abroad every week.

In regards to that website—I picked out good keywords, and the site is closing in on cracking the top 1 million sites in the world. It makes a little bit of money every month, but the real value is in what I could potentially sell it for. I recently had the site evaluated for a cost, and it came back at about $2,000. I estimated that I'd spent 30 hours working on the site at that point, so that comes out to $66/hour. Not too shabby.

Now, it's important to get expectations into check on this. Guys like Pat Flynn have been pumping niche sites for years now. In most cases, they aren't going to make you rich. They will, however, be a nice little piece of the pie in the grand scheme of things. Many times it's just a matter of doing the work.

What I learned: Diversification is important, much like investing. Putting all your eggs into one product, one site, or one idea that may not pan out is a bad move. It takes guts to keep trying new things, but eventually things begin to pay off.

5. Always Solve A Problem

This is the best advice I can give is to always solve a problem. A website that just provides entertainment, but no problem-solving, is a website often doomed to the grave of abandoned blogs. Of course, there is a breaking point to this once you're big enough and can sell ads at a premium price. However, until you reach that point you're bound to be frustrated.

Focus on solving the problems that people face in their lives. In the case of my Ukrainian website, it's all about helping people who want more information on Ukraine. Sure, there's plenty of great articles scattered throughout the internet, but time is money. In my case, I saw an opportunity to compile all the information I've gained about Ukrainian women, the language, culture, and more into one site. Someone looking to book their first trip to Ukraine could make that site their one-stop shop as opposed to haphazardly throwing information together from multiple sources.

What I learned: If you solve people's problems, the sky can be the limit. However, if you push your own problems off on other people, you'll never reap the rewards (and rightfully so). And let's face it—everyone in the world has problems. That's the only lesson about demand that you need.

The True Meaning Of Diversity Is Discrimination

December 28, 2016 | by Mark Webster | Link | Original Link

Diversity is a buzz word we keep hearing more and more, especially in the workplace. On the surface the concept appears warm and fuzzy, conjuring up images of all colours, creeds and sexualities linking arms, dancing and singing Kumbaya as productivity and sales skyrocket thanks to all that tolerance and understanding.

But what does diversity actually mean in practice?

A complete dismantling of the meritocracy in order to appear politically correct.

Originally introduced to assist potentially underserved black people, diversity now commonly manifests itself as promoting women at all costs. Targets and quotas are set for female representation with little or no thought given to whether deliberately not hiring on ability, qualifications, experience and even personality is actually in an organisation's best interests, or fair to prospective candidates. Chief advocates of diversity are left-wing politicians and government departments, although we've reached the stage where most private sector organisations at the very minimum pay lip service to the idea.

Everybody deserves a fair go. However, diversity has become all about wherever possible ensuring anybody besides a heterosexual white male is given preference for a job, promotion or other opportunity. This isn't progressive thinking, it's blatant discrimination. Quotas, affirmative action, government and corporate policies are all designed to remove a level playing field. They also seek to limit individual freedom, and are therefore yet another extension of the ever-growing Nanny State.

HR feminists are rarely this hot, but you get the picture…

The chief beneficiaries of diversity programs are white, middle-class women. This is not a coincidence. The vast majority of Human Resource departments are run by feminist women (typically white, middle-class women) who intervene unnecessarily in the recruitment process, more often than not to justify their own existence. Many harbour ill feeling against not just the man who rejected them years ago, but all men. If you are a man and applying for a job, you are guilty by association. 'Diversity' is predicated on the notion of "privilege," a central tenet of the Social Justice Warrior cult, and ruthlessly enforced by HR.

The HR woman's "expert" opinion and single-minded determination to follow diversity principles, targets and quotas has more weight than a person's qualifications, experience and even whether senior people in the organisation know a candidate personally and they have great mutual respect based on prior successful business relationships. Even if a garden gnome (HR worker) isn't obstructive and doesn't have an agenda, can they really know if you are the best candidate for a job because they were attracted to the way your CV was formatted, or because they asked you to describe your greatest weakness and liked your answer?

If you do get the job, you'll soon realise merely opening a door for a female colleague risks drawing the ire of HR, and possible punitive consequences. In my experience you have to tiptoe around most women in the workplace. You have to be extremely careful not to hurt their feelings or offend them, and therefore it is harder to have full and open debate about issues. Forget any kind of humorous banter that might make spending 40+ hours a week in an office slightly tolerable. Even innocent comments without a hint of malice risk landing you in hot water.

This video demonstrates how feminised a workplace becomes when diversity principles are put front and centre. A "Girls' Club" with tonnes of rules and guidelines inevitably stifles creativity and productivity, and most men go crazy working in such a sterile environment. It is in our nature to yearn for freedom, and many of us have a problem with authority. Most women on the other hand prefer rules, structure and organisation. This explains why a majority of men vote for conservative parties that value freedom and self-reliance, whilst most women vote for left-wing parties and Big Daddy Government.

The Huffington Post is a strong advocate of diversity, but check out how diverse their meetings are…

When women exceed 50% of university enrollments or government departments, they never feel sorry for men and demand they get 50% representation. Promoting diversity is only considered necessary when women are the minority. That is why we see calls for quotas for masculine jobs like the police, but not female dominated professions like teaching and nursing. Some police forces have deliberately lowered recruitment standards to enable more women into the ranks. How does that deliver a safer society? They reckon the old tests were discriminatory against women. Where else in life would not being good enough be considered discrimination? If I tried out for my local football club, and I did poorly in the sprints and time trial, do you reckon I could successfully blame discrimination for not making the team?

Common sense has gone out the window in the West

Organisations are at their best not when virtue signalling, but when seeking out the best possible talent. Think how ridiculous it would be if a professional basketball team announced quotas for White and Asian players. I don't see any difference between that and diversity programs favouring policewomen. After all, it's not the fault of White and Asian players they weren't born as tall, fast and athletic! These black athletes were born with privilege! It's so unfair! Don't we need to reduce the number of black players so teams are more diverse? Of course not, because that would lower the standard of the competition. Nobody wants to see that.

True equality means equality of opportunity, not outcome. Everybody should have the right to put their hand up for a job, but they should be judged on merit, not the trendy left-wing cause of the day. As things currently stand, we frequently have one person in the fight with both arms tied behind their back, and as a result the lesser fighter is often winning. That's not right. It goes to show how far we've gone down the rabbit hole that someone who argues for rewards to be based on merit is seen as sexist, but someone who argues rewards should come solely due to a person's sex is considered to be fair and reasonable.

Irrationality creates opportunities for those who resist it

There's a massive competitive advantage to be gained by hiring on merit, not diversity. I am good friends with a Senior Manager at a well-known public company. The economy has been flat for some time now, and they had to make some savings. The first thing they did was get rid of their HR Manager, and the company now handles all recruitment directly. My friend tells me they don't really even notice she is gone, other than at the end of the financial year when they have an extra $100,000 in their accounts.

So if diversity actually reduces productivity, why is there such a big push towards it? Why is it eagerly swallowed up by everybody from banks, media, defence companies to the AFL? The answer is they feel they have to, or left-wing governments, media and SJWs will come after them, threatening their livelihoods. For many industries, government contracts and grants can make or break a company. Governments are also trying to muscle in on the private sector by implementing draconian laws on board composition.

If I am able to successfully run a profitable company, why should I listen to the government tell me who I should employ, or who I should put on my Board? Have you seen how bad governments are at managing money? If diversity is so great, I will be left behind, forced to change my ways or go broke. That is something I am prepared to accept. If women don't like the status quo, there's nothing preventing them from starting their own companies. I suspect most high calibre women do exactly that, whilst the ones that whine about sexism are simply entitled and think the world owes them a living simply because they have a vagina.

You should be extremely skeptical of other left-wing propaganda on workplace relations, and consider what is driving it. The pay gap myth is an excellent example. If women really earned 78 cents for every dollar a man earns for doing exactly the same work, companies would have stopped hiring men years ago. You don't seriously believe The Patriarchy is sacrificing billions in profits just to keep those pesky women down do you?

The pay for being a tradie is solid these days, plus you get to be your own boss and feel like a man

All this evidence isn't worth losing your job over – and that is a definite risk if you question the diversity agenda publicly. However, it highlights why entrepreneurship or learning a trade is a far better option for young men today than working in the corporate or government sectors where even if they land a job, they will be constantly running the gauntlet of HR feminazis. Most men with blood running through their veins will feel like caged animals in a modern PC office environment. If you value freedom and don't want to be a slave, why not be the master or your own destiny instead? In most jurisdictions, quotas can't be forced on small companies and start-ups.

Next time you hear about the merits of diversity, remember what it really means: deliberately not hiring the best person for the job, just to look politically correct. If you haven't already done so, think about what you can do to set yourself up in a way where you can maintain autonomy in your life and be the master of your own destiny. We only live once. Do you really want to live like a prisoner?

5 Types Of Malaysian Girls Found In Kuala Lumpur

December 28, 2016 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

When men are traveling around Southeast Asia, Kuala Lumpur does not immediately come to mind as a hunting ground for prime female companionship. It's always been overshadowed by the likes of Thailand, Vietnam, Indonesia, or the Philippines in that regard.

However, if one is willing to give the place a closer look rather than the obligatory two day stop in between Singapore and the southern Thai islands, the second most developed city in the region (after Singapore) has some interesting potential in the age of Internations and Tinder.

First of all, don't let Malaysia's Islamic label fool you. It's really only about 60% of the population, even less so in the major cities, and a great deal of people are quite secular. You can easily get a steady rotation of dates and relationships in this town with women from all manner of religions and cultures without excessive difficulty.

So beyond that, don't immediately dismiss the city just because of its expensive alcohol, mega mall culture, and relative lack of tourist sites. Hotels, food, and getting around the city is cheap on the down in the dumps Malaysian Ringgit (nearly 4.5 to a U.S. dollar as of writing), so you should take advantage of dollar arbitrage and get it while it's hot.

Here are some of the most likely women you will come across in "KL" as it is mostly called.

1. Iranian Immigrants

Oh hello there…

Kuala Lumpur is home to a sizable contingent of Persian expatriates who are either seeking greater economic opportunities abroad, or are simply looking to escape the numerous lifestyle restrictions (such as alcohol consumption and women having to wear the Islamic hijab) which are present in their home country and not in Malaysia.

Sounds fair enough to western men passing through the city, because a lot of these women are absolutely stunning. But why do so many of them end up in Malaysia, which is hardly a paved-in-gold 1st world paradise?

Well it all boils down to politics, because Turkey and Malaysia are among the few nations within easy reach of Iran which grant visa-free entry to Iranian passport holders. Trust me, a lot would want to get to the United States or Australia if they could (and the local men would be glad to have them).

Iranian women in Malaysia are often quite attractive, very friendly, warm, feminine, speak great English, and are "Muslim" on paper only. In fact, a lot dislike the religion they were born into and tend to live a very secular lifestyle while abroad.

Hands down the best possible choice in the city, and it's a shame there just isn't more of them. Your best bets for success are via Tinder, Internations, and various bars and clubs in Bukit Bintang.

2. Malaysian Chinese

Making up roughly a quarter of the nation’s population, with higher percentages in the largest cities of Kuala Lumpur, Ipoh, and Penang, the Chinese in Malaysia are mostly descended from immigrant workers who came to the Malay peninsula during the peak years of the British Empire (late 19th and early 20th century).

Think of the them as like a capitalist, non street spitting (thank god), and reasonably good English speaking version of the PRC Chinese. In other words, there is not too much to complain about from a cultural standpoint.

The women are friendly, open to dating foreigners, and are often fairly hot, though not quite up to the Iranian standards for all three. However, there is a lot more around in Kuala Lumpur, and their lack of Islam means that dating them should not entail any type of religious taboo when it comes time to meet Mummy and Daddy.

Found on Tinder, Internations, nightclubs, or all manner of mega malls around town.

3. Malaysian Indians

Making up about 10% of Malaysia's population (and again with higher percentages in the major cities like KL), The Indians are also primarily descended from migrants who came during the British Empire days, and particularly from the southern Indian state of Tamil Nadu.

They are among the most economically stratified groups in the country, with many Indians living anywhere from destitute poverty to occupying prestigious roles in Medicine, Law, or Information Technology. Assuming you meet them on Tinder in Kuala Lumpur (where you will find the most open-minded Indian women to date non-Indians), they will usually be from the higher end of the socio-economic ladder.

Beauty standards vary considerably, but there is more than a couple of stunners out there. They are a noteworthy middle-of-the-road option in Kuala Lumpur, but the odds aren't nearly as favorable compared to the Persians or Chinese.

4. The Malays

Well duh, the country is named “Malaysia” after all. The dominant ethnic group in the country usually follows Islam, and you will see a great deal of Malay women around covered in their Islamic garb. However, Malaysia is a moderate Muslim nation and wearing such clothing is entirely optional, and a sizable percentage of women in the larger cities choose to do without it.

Nonetheless, most travelers and expats aren’t particularly fussed with dating the Malays, both for the sake of the religious setbacks and the fact that your average Malay women isn’t nearly as attractive or openly friendly as some of the previously mentioned options.

You will find some rebels though, particularly at the bars in Bukit Bintang and on Tinder (they’ll be wearing western clothes). Just be prepared to have to keep your relationship with them entirely secret, and in many cases it will be a one night only affair.

5. The Saudis

Kuala Lumpur is a popular holiday and shopping destination for more well-to-do Saudi citizens, due to the cities abundance of luxury shopping malls and the fact that they are allowed 90 days of visa free access into Malaysia on their otherwise kind of shitty passport.

They can be spotted in abundance around Bukit Bintang and inside the shopping malls, with the woman being covered in full Ninja garb while her husband (required company) is often sloppily dressed and easily 50 pounds overweight.

Best avoid these questionable women-that-you-can't-see if you don't want to wind up at the wrong end of a Kebab knife, or some other type of Middle Eastern blade.

Having said that, if you can get your Saudi Arabian flag then I have full faith in you that you can get anything. It's your life after all, and that's a wrap for the most likely women you will come across in Kuala Lumpur.

5 Huge Problems That 50 Years Of Feminism Created

December 29, 2016 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The pushback against feminism is gaining steam. Here's a personal story to introduce this Top 5 list.

Just last week, I was on a plane with a man from the Midwest who oddly brought up several politically incorrect topics with me. He seemed bolder than men who speak about these things usually do… and he was driving the conversation as I was only in "listen" mode. I enjoyed listening because it seemed manosphere narratives were effortlessly seeping out of this self-confessed Trump voter who was a married business owner with two daughters and a decent looking wife in tow.

I don't think the man ever read our blogs. But word is getting out, nonetheless. I was encouraged that things we have been discussing for so long have seem to have started to go mainstream.

One of his key points was about the destruction feminism has wrought on America and the West in general. He boldly talked about what a disaster it was in front of his 15 year old daughter who seemed unsurprised and undisturbed by what he was saying.

Cue heavenly music as the clouds began to part after a cultural hurricane has ravaged the land. This random conversation is yet another sign men are starting to wake up, and are realizing the end results of 50 years of feminism—five of which are listed here.

5. Men And Women Competing Rather Than Cooperating

Feminism actually weakened women's natural strengths as it threw them into the rat race

It's no secret feminism has been great for the emerging corporate plantation. The labor supply has doubled since feminism, driving down the cost of labor while simultaneously doubling the tax base. Men and women now compete with each other for favors from employers rather than women taking care of the most important job there is in the human species—the proper care, feeding, and education of the next generation. As I wrote earlier this year:

> Feminism actually dethroned women… Contrary to strengthening women as it claims, feminism weakens women's hand in society. Not only has it created ill will towards them as they force men out of jobs and render large numbers of them worthless as the state and an employer replaces the male role as provider, but it has removed women from their position at the core of the family, placing corporations and government at the core of the family. Today, women work to pay a nanny or baby sitter to take care of their children rather than doing it themselves. Further, the government micromanages family life, and has the power to enslave men in the court system.

When men and women are competing with each other, the inevitable outcome is women with man-jaws and weak, de-balled men.

4. Sexual Androgynization And Man-Jawed Women

The end result of feminism: Tattooed, sexually ambiguous man-jaws

If you think women are becoming manlier—they are. In fact, it's becoming clearer sexual dimorphism (distinct male and female appearance and behavior) is an enemy of social engineers who want to see the sexes blend into one androgynous human pod in the coming generations.

A fascinating scientific study published in the National Institutes of Health used several methods to determine if feminists had higher testosterone levels and if they exhibited "manlier" behavior than their non-indoctrinated counterparts. The study used a widely known measure index as “2D:4D” method to measure the ratio of the length of the index finger to the ring finger to measure testosterone in women. Researchers also measured “Directiveness” in women, or their responses to the following questions to determine how masculine feminists have become:

- Are you the sort of person who always likes to get your own way?
- Do you tend to boss people around?
- Would you rather take orders than give them?
- Would you avoid a job which required you to supervise other people?

Of course, traditionally speaking, women who like to boss people around, give orders, and display other forms of Penis Envy are a pain in the ass to be around.

Here’s what the study found:

> The present study tested whether feminist activists are more physiologically and psychologically masculinized than are women in general. Feminist activists were operationally defined as attendees at a feminist conference, and indices of sex-dimorphism were 2D:4D ratio and Directiveness. Consistent with our specific hypotheses, feminist activists exhibited a significantly more masculinized 2D:4D ratio relative to both Swedish and aggregate comparison groups, a substantially higher level of Directiveness than both the male and female Australian samples, and within-sample correlations between these variables.

Translation: Feminists have a ton of testosterone coursing through their veins, and as more women are taught to act like men instead of being nurturing mothers even more man-jaws will emerge in the years ahead. It seems social engineers are catering to already existing instincts in women by encouraging them to be copies of men rather than copies of their grandmothers, bringing out the worst in women rather than the best.

3. Rise Of Childhood Delinquency

Juvenile delinquency is on the rise, and it correlates with single mommery

We all know its true. But here’s some empirical research referenced by the National Criminal Justice Reference Service to back up the claim that dads are vital to the proper development of children, and the collusion of women with the State to eliminate fathers’ in society is having disastrous effects.

> The Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency reports that the most reliable indicator of violent crime in a community is the proportion of fatherless families. Fathers typically offer economic stability, a role model for boys, greater household security, and reduced stress for mothers. This is especially true for families with adolescent boys, the most crime-prone cohort. Children from single-parent families are more prone than children from two-parent families to use drugs, be gang members, be expelled from school, be committed to reform institutions, and become juvenile murderers.

Beyond research that screams dads need to make a comeback and the State needs to be vanquished from having any influence over the family, the following conclusion from Child Trends helps resuscitate Bronze Age wisdom that was somehow lost when a collective lobotomy known as Liberalism descended like a dark cloud on the West.

> An extensive body of research tells us that children do best when they grow up with both biological parents in a low-conflict marriage…. Thus, it is not simply the presence of two parents, as some have assumed, but the presence of two biological parents that seems to support child development.

Mommies need to take care of their children rather than chasing feels, empty accolades and meager salaries at the corporation plantation, and they need to stop relegating men to pre-civilization roles as sperm donors. House-bands (husbands) need to have the power to hold their families together again.

2. Males Are Withdrawing From Society

Turns out you shit on men, we shit on you back

Fuck this shit, I'm leaving. That's the response of millions of men who are leaving their jobs and even leaving the country in response to being treated as disposable utility modules to power an economy of wasteful consumerism. Men do not naturally spend hand over fist like women do, and many are rediscovering the masculine art of minimalism. Then there's MGTOW, which aims at reducing virtually all interaction with women.

Policy wonks are already wondering why men are dropping out of the workforce. The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development is puzzled as to why American males now have one of the lowest overall labor force participation rates:

> This fall in the prime-age male labor force participation rate, from a peak of 98% in 1954 to 88% today, is particularly troubling since workers at this age are at their most productive. Because of this, the long-run decline has outsized implications for individual wellbeing as well as for broader economic growth.

Turns out you shit on men, we shit on you back.

Not to mention, a full 8-10 million Americans now live abroad at least full or part time, and that number is only expected to increase as more men run off the Anglobitch plantation.

1. Demographic Conquest

If women won't have enough babies to run the economy, leaders resort to other options

An entire ethnic group is being submerged by a demographic tidal wave brought on by feminism. Since the family was broken up by feminism, birth rates of white women have remained well below the minimum to even sustain a culture (2.1 births on average per woman) for two full generations.

Ever notice how most Kia models have Spanish names? The Daily Mail wrote this about changing demographics which are swamping the U.S. as white women literally killed the goose that laid them the golden egg (i.e. the Evil White Male):

> U.S. companies have also been advised to shift their focus to Hispanic consumers who will be making up a majority of the U.S. population and will account for much of the nation's future spending habits.

It turns out demographics is destiny, after all. This "ripe for the conquering" effect of feminism was recently detailed on Return Of Kings. It is interesting to note historical trends show prosperous periods are often followed by decadence and decline in various studies of history. The following 2,000 year old passage from Polybius sounds as if I could have been written as a diagnosis of what's happening in America and Europe today:

> In our own time the whole of Greece has been subject to a low birth rate and a general decrease of the population, owing to which cities have become deserted > and the land has ceased to yield fruit, although there have neither been continuous wars nor epidemics.

In essence, feminism was the coup-de-grace that decapitated a society already learning toward decline. As male authority erodes during times of prosperity, cultural cancer spreads throughout the body politic.

A Death Style, Not A Lifestyle

YouGoGrrl: Right into oblivion

This listing comes in stark contrast to the glowing pleasantries presented by the dying "mainstream" media of just how wonderful feminism has been. Feminism may be the darling of social engineers who want to further reduce men from strong, free, and independent individuals to human cattle, but there are those of us who do not suffer tyranny gladly. It has allowed Western women to run a virtual fiefdom, but it has not come without drastic and dire consequences.

Indeed, as viewed through multiple cultural and demographic lenses, feminism is a death style, not a lifestyle.

It's often been said feminism is a self-correcting problem as those who practice it will die off. The problem is it will negatively impact millions before the pendulum swings back towards patriarchy and strong nuclear families. It is our fate to be faced with this tragedy, but at least there are encouraging signs men are starting to wake up in the aftermath of women gone wild. We just have to turn the page to see how far we have to fall before men set their foot down and collectively say, "No more, goddamn it!"

4 Ways National Geographic Is Furthering A Degenerate Leftist Narrative

[image]

The new Current Year is just around the corner and seeing that their tricks used to achieve global mind domination amounted to a resounding fiasco (with elements such as the recent American presidential election and its glorious mountains of salty tears), the evil leftist elves have been working around the clock in their New World Order workshop.

The last present that they will put under the Cultural Christmas tree is the January 2017 issue of National Geographic Magazine with its cover page featuring a 9-year-old boy dressed as a little girl, posing in a provocative, clearly sexualised manner. The January edition also directly pushes the idea of a supposed "Gender Revolution" taking place and attacks the very pillars of masculinity among others.

Is it still a neutral magazine about Earth and good pictures?

The original focus of the magazine, geography (human or natural), has clearly been abandoned and since the 2000s, it has adopted a more political and activist stance.

With the nomination of Gary Knell (former CEO of Sesame Workshop) as the CEO of the National Geographic Society and of Susan Goldberg as editor in chief of National Geographic magazine, the now 100% Jewish-controlled National Geographic network is ready to promote usual globalist narratives, like in their recent edition entitled "the New Europeans," openly defecating on millennia of European cultural heritage, in a giant "Fuck you dad!" move, that would have made Angela Merkel proud.

The degeneracy of pedophilia is now depicted as a new normal

I'm a pedophile, but not a monster

I'm attracted to children but unwilling to act on it. Before judging me harshly, would you be willing to listen?

TODD NICKERSON

Mainstream media's total denial of life's proven facts and basic human knowledge does not really come as a surprise. We have grown accustomed to the systematic degeneracy of the left for a while now.

But here, Nat Geo is testing the waters, gauging the reaction of the public by making a direct endorsement of the fable of "transgenderism," declaring that if children can choose their sexual identity, they are also fair game for being seen as responsible sexual beings. Hence the open sexualisation of their image for pushing even more boundaries.

This “transgender child” is simply a lost boy in drag with virtue-signalling liberal parents that should be charged for child abuse. The boy can be seen sporting pink hair, entirely dressed in tight pink clothing and striking a lascivious pose in an armchair, his hand resting on his crotch as if he was caressing it. These sick minds cross a line by using innocent children as props.

I would not be surprised if I discover one day that Goldberg is a close friend of the Podestas or as spent a few afternoons enjoying some chicken at Comet Ping Pong.

Here is why a boycott is necessary. Exposing their madness and schemes is useful, but as the previous blows delivered to degenerate firms show it, depriving them of their shekels is by far the most effective weapon.

1. Altering reality by manipulating their subjects

Have a look at the video associated with the article “Children Explain How Gender Affects Their Lives”.

After hearing “Avery,” one wonders which kind of 9 year-old child uses this kind of sentence:

> Before I transitioned, I was just pretending to be a boy, but now I am a girl and I am a lot happier. (00.32)

After more than two decades studying English, I have never heard this expression being used until the recent years, let alone in the context of a make-believe sexual reversal. Nat Geo has been caught numerous time manipulating information, apologised then did it again. This confused boy did not choose this lascivious, sexualised pose on his own.

The photographers directed him, in order to represent him as a sexual being, able to choose his gender so technically allowing him to have sex with whomever he fancies and something tells me they want him to choose adults.

So why not alter the subjects they interview too and coach children with malleable minds into saying what the bosses want them to?

Funny how around 00.52, one of the only things that the little American girl has to say about gender is:

> It kind of bothers me how there is not one girl president

The only reason the foreign kids can't be influenced and make sense when they talk is probably because the interviewer can't coach them, not knowing their language or their more traditional parents might be standing in the corner with a watchful eye.

[image]
But props to that Kenyan shitlord-in-training for spreading the red pill

[image]
Right you are, my brother. Right, you are…

In an outstanding display of courage, National Geographic has disabled the comments on this particular video.

2. Forfeiting neutrality to promote the agenda of their masters

[image]
Editor-in-chief Susan Goldberg (second from the right) and the manlet in the middle is Richard Bacon. We'll come back to him later.

Since Goldberg has been its editor, the magazine has taken a completely different path, transitioning from a paper bringing neutral views of the natural world to a platform for the leftist narrative.

Goldberg has answered the critics since the outrage of the "Gender Revolution" issue :

> Today, we're not only talking about gender roles for boys and girls—we're talking about our evolving understanding of people on the gender spectrum.
> The portraits of all the children are beautiful. We especially loved the portrait of Avery—strong and proud. We thought that, in a glance, she summed up the concept of "Gender Revolution."

Referring to the utter outrage of normal, functional people, Goldberg asserts:

> These comments are a small part of the profound discussion going on right now about gender.

So pushing for cultural collapse is more important than the opinion of the readers. Hence the need to strike them where it hurts. By cutting their funding.

> Robin Marantz Henig writes that we are surrounded by "evolving notions about what it means to be a woman or a man and the meanings of transgender, > cisgender, gender nonconforming, genderqueer, agender, or any of the more than 50 terms Facebook offers users for their profiles.

Robin Marantz Henig. This woman is the author of the article and will educate you on what gender is and is not. The point of reference that she uses to describe the biological definition of gender is Facebook.

Commenting on the cover boy, Goldberg continues:

> She has lived as an openly transgender girl since age five, and she captured the complexity of the conversation around gender

This confused child under ten has been saying that he is a girl for four years so according to the editor, he learnt all he needs to know about sex and the fabricated notion of gender. We must now copy his behaviour and respect his words as if they were the Gospel.

[image]

The absurdity of this article would be laughable if we did not know that the motivations behind it are extremely serious. The rupture between these maniacs and reality is total.

3. Defining masculinity and traditional sex roles as evil

In addition of promoting mental abuse on children, Chip Brown penned one of the main articles " The Many Ways Society Makes A Man" for Nat Geo which directly attacks the very idea of masculinity, by depicting it as inherently evil, associated with pedophiliac practices or mutilating children's genitalia.

Chip Brown, former word-soup rat for Bezos' personal megaphone, the Washington Post, and low-testosterone pedoface tells you what masculinity is.

[image]

Chip also admires radical lesbian and rabid Anti-Russian Jew Masha Gessen, long walks on the beach and sharing photos of naked African children being circumcised

80% of the article describes his week staring at Sub-Saharan pre-teen male sexual organs being sawed off or pondering on how bad of a beta role model he is for his teenage son back home, leaving that parenting role to theater plays at the school teaching him about rape culture ("muh feelz").

The rest of the piece brings nothing in essence as he spends his time regurgitating all the buzzwords and themes dear to the backers of the Western Cultural collapse ("muh fatkz"). All you have to know about that author (speaking about his relationship with his son, Oliver) is written here (emphasis mine):

> Oliver cannot rely on the traditional roles of men and women for an idea of what it means to be a man.(…)There's nothing startling or unorthodox to him about female cops or male nurses or about a father who stayed home microwaving stockpiles of breast milk while mom went to an office as the prime provider. Oliver's mom still outearns me and, by the way, has amassed a vastly larger number of Instagram followers. (…) I see him casting about for what it means, looking askance at the example I set because, as he says, "you cross your legs like a girl."

What about you being a present, masculine father instead of choosing Instagram filters? Put down the whip, cuck, we got it.

> He crosses his legs ankle to knee. (..) For his 15th birthday, he asked for a suit

Dad's cucked to the marrow. The kid might redeem the soiled family name.

Forget about masculinity being defined by a myriad of traits such as game, loyalty, entrepreneurship or courage. You got it all wrong. Nat Geo tells you it's all about crime, bullying and mutilating some little boy's peepee.

4. Ignoring the importance of expertise

After seeing the National Geographic articles as a child, I assumed that the columns were being written by explorers, biologists, mountaineers. Men that knew the subject that they wrote about. Not some dyke or low-T cuck that never ventured out of Shoreditch, who shows you a picture of a colourful paradise bird and comments: “Look at at that fabulous bird. But you know what really sucks? Transphobia!”

Speaking of which, Nat Geo has found another Cultural Marxist muse in the person of liberast (a man guilty of political faggotry) Richard Bacon. Obviously, he has no scientific or academic background to justify his salary.

Richard Bacon and… oh look who is the bestie! Suspected closeted homo and compulsive liar Reggie Yates!

[image]
Like his namesake, Bacon is also a delicious source of salt.

Narcotics enthusiast and frail-manlet-playing-tough Richard, who probably lives in a gated 98% White community, will explain you why it is amazing to have more refugees in your country and that Bill Clinton's idea to move droves of refugees in abandoned houses in Detroit seems like an swell idea.

[image]

The picture would not be complete without him using 80% of his time on Twitter calling Donald Trump a bigot, religiously retweeting the Hill, that old post-menopause woman Michael Moore or token feelz merchant Trevor Noah.

Commissioned by his bosses, he also tries to shame countries that keep traditional gender roles and refuse to surrender their land to the Narrative with a trademark beta boy snark. He qualifies what he calls " gender camps" in Russia, that teach men how to fight and women how to be exemplary hostesses, a factory of "cavemen" and "properly submissive home makers" respectively.

For Nat Geo, The Nazi Azov training camp for children is "double plus good masculine" as it is Western-backed, but a Russian camp applying the same methods of promoting traditional gender roles is guilty of thoughtcrime.

All of that because Russia never "had a proper Civil Rights Movement" or because Putin is a masculine barbarian that urinates standing.

Hors de ma vue, bande de tordus

Huffpost, Daily Beast, Washington Post and other leftist personal blogs are already creaming themselves over that overt provocation. That should be a tell sign.

Boycotting has been shown to be an effective tool recently with the #DumpKellogs campaign launched by Breitbart after Kellogs cancelled their advertisement contract with Breitbart, as it conflicted with their interests, them being a financial supporter for homeland terrorist movement and Soros' lovechild Black Lives Matters.

Let's keep exposing their lies and dump our National Geographic copies and cancel our subscriptions to their channels. Add it to the black list of controlled media and find a neutral concurrent with amazing documentaries to give your dollars to.

7 Core Principles To Help Reinvigorate Western Culture

December 30, 2016 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

In the last five years or so, a number of distinguished scholars, such as the famous Scottish Harvard historian Niall Ferguson and the less well-known Canadian sociologist Ricardo Duchesne, have refuted much of leftist academic discourse regarding Western civilization's historical and present world dominance. Both of them have referred to another important figure within academia, namely Charles Murray and his work Human Accomplishment (2003), which highlights the fact that the largest share of great inventors and scientists stem from the Western world. It takes a whole new level of ahistorical deconstructionism and revisionism in any attempt to relativize these undisputable findings. This is also partly why nationalists and conservatives are winning ground in the verbal culture wars.

For example, Ferguson in his book Civilization (2011) has discerned six "killer apps" that have made the Western civilization globally hegemonic from about the 15th century onward: competition, science, property, medicine, consumption and work. Duchesne, on the other hand, focuses on the traits that underlie the long-term cumulative process. He uses modern philosophical concepts such as the Faustian spirit (Oswald Spengler) and non-dogmatism (Immanuel Kant) in order to provide arguments for his particular viewpoint. Some of these characteristics have roots stretching back thousands of year in time – even before pre-Socratic Greek civilization saw its light—while the intellectual development is a more decent achievement.

Perhaps most importantly, both of them have used significant and reliable data in order to show that the leading Western nations, culturally, economically and materially, definitely superseded China in the 16th century and forward, and that the whole idea that the widely-spread Western civilization was disseminated due to slave labor and thievery is erroneously wrong. Of course, leading Western nations such as England and the Netherlands have dominated the colonial host regions in unfair ways, but if Europeans were such incompetent people, how could they build fleets and weapons that outcompeted their opponents and enemies in the first instance?

Apart from the valuable accounts on these topics, Ferguson and Duchesne provide ideas on how a more fruitful Western civilization might be developed: thus we go from descriptive history to prescriptive reasoning about the not too distant future. I have listed seven core principles linked to a overall coherent conception of what a powerful and sustainable civilization may hinge upon. These can also serve as a focal point for counter-current contemporaries. Some of the following elements are already implemented, at least in part, while some need to be reinvigorated (in parallel with discarding decadence and other negative components).

1. Greco-Roman Culture As Its Main Source

Over the last 3000 years or so, the high cultures of the Mediterranean region and Southern Europe have formed concepts and ideas that are still being referred to in mainstream academia and among intellectual dissidents as of today.

We all can agree that Plato's dialogues, Aristotle's multifaceted proto-science, Zeno of Citium's Stoicism, Plotinus' philosophy, Cicero's discourses and, of course, Christianity and Roman law, are all foundations of any version of Western culture worthy of its name. Those are the roots that we all are attached to, more or less, and if one cuts them completely off one is bound to be at best a rootless cosmopolitan spirit, with only hedonism as the fragment that gives pseudo-meaning to existence.

Part of the dumbing down process in the West is because Westerners in general do only know about—with palpable limitations even in that respect—democracy.

2. Free Speech And Thought

Whether one first come to think of the French encyclopedists, the First Amendment to the United States constitution, or modern science in general (that is real science, not gender studies), free speech and thought are some of the basic elements that presuppose pretty much all the other main aspects of societal life. It is also these two components, although significantly curtailed in present times, which make this website possible to exist at all, as a platform for the exchange of constructive ideas that challenge the current zeitgeist's status quo.

Freedom has its limitations both in public and private, but it is not in line with the Western culture to be too confined in neither of these domains. We may have dogmas and value consistent ethics, but some of us hardly go through life without to seriously question at least some of them, as well as changes that do occur in our societies.

Because if we do not, the tyrants—and they will eventually come yet another time, due to how human nature is constituted—will go unnoticed for too long. Free speech and thought are something larger and deeper than the right or possibility to get attention and try to pursue individual goals.

3. Science

Niall Ferguson stresses that science and medicine are two separate "killer apps" and one can indeed do such a twofold categorization. However, as I see it science in the proper sense includes many different branches of which medical improvements make up one such chief dimension. Physics, mathematics and chemistry are other main areas, alongside a number of less essential but still relatively valuable subjects. Needless to say, military science is another crucial component in this regard.

Whether or not one yearns for vast space explorations or only—literally—earthly discoveries, science is largely what underlies the West's success. It is not just about material and practical benefits but processes which are closely intertwined with the culture and civilization as a whole. This is the Faustian spirit in the positive and life-affirming sense.

Speaking of Faustian, science is of course also linked to sometimes riskful direct explorations of our world. This includes cooperation with other nations, cultures and civilizations. For the laymen, individual discoveries may be related to activities such as reading, hiking and traveling. Or scuba diving.

4. Competition

Economics and politics have and will continuously change over time and space (such as the degree of globalism or isolationism), but competition – between individuals, groups, states and civilizations – is one of the constants that will likely never go away. Partly because it is part of human nature, and partly due to being beneficial for our culture, and probably other cultures as well.

Competition ought to be primarily peaceful, both within and between nations and civilizations. In any case it is what makes changes occur: some are constructive, some are harmful. However, it is naive and unwise to deny the almost eternal return of competition in various forms and at many different levels of any Western society. It is competition that has made America and the West great and it might be inevitable also in the future.

[image]

5. Apollonian Arts Based On Skill And Beauty

The easy part of culture is to integrate some form of Dionysian elements, such as parties, music and recreational sex. The current Western civilization is brimming over with these things. The hard part is to build and sustain art and ways of life that are truly beautiful and based on particular skills and principles. The distinction between the Dionysian and the Apollonian may guide us here.

Besides from neoclassical arts and architecture, and perhaps also certain high-tech and futuristic manifestations, the everyday Apollonian lifestyle may include diligent work, solid ethics, family life, healthy food, and proper physical exercise. Moreover, one can immerse one's interest in particular hobbies or talents. That is an art in itself.

6. Complementary Gender Roles

Recently I and my young and hot conservative girlfriend went to IKEA to buy a new kitchen table for my apartment. This piece of furniture was divided into two main parts, separated into two parcels. I do not own a car at the moment so there were some logistics involved, such as a bus and metro ride, on which we had to carry the stuff. I took the much larger and heavier piece, while the 100 lbs creature grabbed the smaller one.

At home I asked her to start to fix the table, in the meantime I was taking care of some other things. She is not dumb so she had almost completed the task after about 15 minutes, but then kindly asked me to take care of the screwdriver part, which she realized was not optimal for her slender-limbed physique. Perfect, complementary teamwork. This trivial example also symbolizes the masculine and feminine elements, while still showcasing significant overlaps of behavior and capacity.

As I see it, rational and pragmatic principles ought to guide the two sexes in everyday life. That includes the whole spectrum from private economics to daily tasks. The current gender roles and feminism are obviously not worthwhile, but neither is a complete return to the past or to look at non-Western cultures for inspiration. There is no need for it. In times of crisis, things will likely be turned around, but rational, pragmatic and complementary approaches are still our general guidelines.

7. Balanced Demographics

In America there are black, Asian and Hispanic minorities who all ought to be treated equally (good). However, white people of more or less mixed European descent are the foundation of any Western society, including the United States. Even if Western nations could use high-skilled Chinese in large numbers in order to increase the growth of sheer GDP size, enlightened citizens should hesitate to accept them, because the bigger picture is more important.

A balanced demographic landscape has to be sustained with European people as the distinctive majority group at about a 75% rate or in some national contexts even more. Somewhat fuzzy and overlapping categories of different population groups are even beneficial, since it undermines chauvinistic attempts to organize ideas of racial purity or superiority.

How A Dark Triad Woman Took My Friend For A Ride

December 30, 2016 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

I'm no expert in Dark Triad traits but I know enough to realize when a female exhibits these signs and this chick had it in spades. Unfortunately for a friend of mine, he didn't realize it until it was too late.

For those who aren't familiar with "Paul", I mentioned him near the end of this article…

> One of my best friends is a white guy I've known for nearly 20 years. He's a tall, great looking guy with a great job. Every Anglo-slut's dream. When we go out for a night on the town he consistently pulls quality chicks much easier than I do, even though my game level is much higher than his.

I sought his insight for this column, then gave a little more detail about him in my column about our weekend in Sin City:

> "Paul" is a tall, good looking dude I've known since my college days….
> …he's a stone cold assassin and red pill to the core.

Las Vegas is where this story begins when our friend "Norm" whom we've both known for almost 20 years, dragged us to a singles meet atop a rooftop bar across from the MGM Grand and I told that story in my Vegas column.

During my first “at bat” with Lois. From left to right: “Lois”, yours truly, some blonde chick

The long and the short of how this started is that the only good looking girl there was a solid 8 who was an exotic looking chick (Hawaiian and Filipino) with a great body. Paul and I decided to make it a competition to see which one of us could bag her first. When he took a sizable lead, I switched from PUA to wingman to help him close the deal.

Paul and I before we met “Lois”

We were thwarted by an unexpected cock blocker with a neckbeard wearing a wannabe fedora but eventually Paul was able to overcome this obstacle and release the kraken on “Lois.” Now that we’ve got our back story, let’s pick it up from there.

After Las Vegas

Although Paul and Lois lived on opposite coasts, they were still able to see each other regularly and things got pretty serious between them. They’d go look at real estate on her visits and talk about plans for the future. In fact, a general rule of thumb when they would meet is that she flew east to him (rather than the opposite) because of their plans to move her out there as they set a tentative timeline for around May of ‘16.

But as with any long distance relationship (or any relationship) there were several things boiling beneath the surface that started to make their way into their conversations and things eroded quickly.

Red flags

From the very beginning, Paul was concerned with how private Lois was. That is, she didn’t talk much about her friends or her general circle of influence.

Another red flag was that all of her friends and work colleagues seemed to be men. Her website (she owns a small clothing line for crossfit and weightlifting athletes) featured nothing but her and a bunch of dudes.

Let me ‘help’ you with your form

He finally asked her about it a few months later and she told him they were people who helped her with her website and friends from the gym. Paul also saw that one of her feeds was littered with interactions with a guy she eventually admitted was her ex boyfriend.

Between the weekend trips with her group of ‘friends’ and the consistent back and forth with her ex, Paul had serious doubts about Lois’ loyalty. What started out as simple conversations about his concerns turned into fights and eventually they split. But she wasn’t going down without a fight so she pulled a major stunt to keep him attached.

Brain cancer

Yep, you read right. Lois told Paul she had stage 3 brain cancer. At the time Paul believed her. Even though they’d just broken up, he still had strong feelings for her so they got back together so that she could enjoy ‘what little time she had left.’

But when he offered to fly her to his city where a local hospital had a great reputation for treating cancer patients, she declined saying she didn’t want to burden him with her problems and that she would deal with it herself, with her friends, and family as a support system.

Hindsight being 20/20, Paul realized that he'd never seen any proof of her illness. No x-rays, no documentation, no nothing. Lois 'forgot her medication at home' on visits after her diagnosis.

Paul's no idiot but when a man's judgment is clouded by emotion, his discernment is greatly impaired—red pill awareness or not. Hell, I'm as guilty as any man out there for believing a woman's bullshit.

That said, they broke up soon after on account of the same issues. The games, secrecy, and mistrust were too much for Paul to stick around even if he did believe Lois was terminally ill. He may have had his doubts about her sickness but things got so bad that it was all but forgotten when they cut ties for the second time.

Paul's major mistake

A few months after the break up Paul and "Doug" took another trip to Vegas around the same time we all did last year. And wouldn't you know it, the suddenly cancer free Lois made herself available for another weekend of debauchery.

Paul took full advantage of this and the two of them had what appeared to be no strings attached sex for a few days. When all was said and done, they both chalked it up to a little fun between two people for old time's sake. No harm, no foul right?

Afraid not. A few weeks later Lois face timed him and showed him a positive pregnancy test. Paul's as careful as anyone out there but he admitted to me that he didn't use condoms the last time they hooked up before Vegas and this was the result.

Paul knew he should have been using these

At this point it was time to quit playing games and both knew it. For better or worse there was now a kid involved so they decided to give the relationship a serious try without all the bullshit from before.

But the arguments soon started up again and this time around it had escalated to knock down drag out name calling fights. It didn't take long for them to break up and this time she blocked him on all her social media accounts.

Paul was at a crossroads. He had to choose between being an absentee father or visiting his kid every so often and in both cases, he'd be paying child support. Luckily for him, Doug came to his rescue before this situation got out of hand.

The bailout

A quick refresher on Doug from the '15 Vegas Squad:

> "Doug" is a good friend of Paul's whom I'd never met before this trip. Paul told me about some of the red pill knowledge Doug had inadvertently dropped in the past so I knew he'd be a solid guy to roll with. Upon meeting him it didn't take long to discern that he was as advertised.

Doug has as much red pill knowledge as any of us here and had his doubts about Lois from the jump. Though he spent the night at the Planet Hollywood poker tables the night Paul and I played Batman vs. Superman (with Lois as the prize), he had a front row seat to everything that happened between he and Lois after that fateful night in Sin City.

Like myself, Doug knew her social media privacy was a tell tale sign of nefarious intentions. So back when he'd learned that Lois had blocked Paul from seeing her posts, he followed her on an old Instagram account he hardly used and saw something that blew this whole thing wide open…

Wedding pictures.

It gets better. Despite the social media blackout, Paul still followed a few of Lois's friends on Instagram where he discovered her in some of their pictures and a video of her in a bikini dancing and obviously not pregnant.

Up until this point Lois was still trying to convince Paul that she was still pregnant and that she wanted to start over. She was making plans to come to see him as recently as Thanksgiving while sending emails about how much she missed him even though she was married.

The day Paul confronted her about it (mid December) was the same day Doug showed him the wedding pictures. Lois explained the pregnancy away with a miscarriage story. But she'd have been 7 months along when the bikini pictures were taken so it's doubtful she was ever pregnant in the first place.

Either way, the jig was up. The earliest wedding pictures were posted around the middle of August so that's likely around the time she was married. The last time Paul and Lois saw each other was the third week of July which meant he was fucking her less than 3 weeks before she said her vows.

It's also worth noting that Paul had never seen exactly where she lived the entire time they were together, even during the Vegas hookup (she said she had a friend over so they couldn't use her place). Looking back, it's because she was probably living with her fiance.

The best case scenario is that there was a 4 or 5 month overlap between Paul and her beau. But the book of red pill conditioning says she was probably in a relationship with her soon to be hubby the entire time she was with Paul.

We all get got

I'll be the first to say that Paul should have exercised better judgment. Getting into a long distance relationship with a chick you met on a rooftop bar at a singles meet in Las Vegas is never good idea and I've told him that.

Be that as it may, Lois played psychological games with him on a level he'd never experienced in his life. She did and said just enough to keep him interested while keeping certain things hidden which drove him crazy.

At some point we're all going to get got. Men like Paul and myself are tougher cookies to crack but some women are much more versed in the art of sexual warfare. Paul's fortunate he got out clean and because of this experience he's more red pill aware than he was before. Such is the life of an awakened man.

6 Websites You Can Use To Become a Web Developer Today

December 31, 2016 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

Learning to become a web developer is one of the best investments you can make. If you're a writer, you'll be able to design every aspect of your blog with total creative control. If you're in high school or younger, you'll be able to make as much if not more money than your parents with skills that are in high demand. So instead of being all talk like a word warrior, you'll become an actual man of money at any age. If you're a career professional, you'll add another skill to your set for you to ask for a raise or better: start your own business and begin a new life of freedom.

Learning code is easy if you're willing to put the time in and invest in yourself: the best investment you can make. Think of all the wasted hours watching TV, and playing video games. There is no return for these activities, so ideally they should have no place in your life. It's "dead time"—you aren't actually dead, but you aren't living your life either. You're living vicariously through the adventures of another, even if the controller is in your hands. You can become a fully fledged web developer in 4-6 months if you're able to remove distractions from your life and focus on a brighter future for you.

Online education is becoming a massive industry. People just like you are learning that there isn't a reason to go to college anymore, and it's no longer a safe place for men to further their skills. If you go to college your chances of catching a false rape allegation increase dramatically, and you'll always be looked at as a predator: even if you're found innocent. Trust me, I've had a case against me before. Think about the mattress girl hoax as a real life example of what can happen. You'll also leave school with debt up to your eyeballs, with no skills to your name. Instead of going to school for a piece of paper, learn actual skills to pay the bills, online. Below are the six best resources to learn coding online.

1. Code Academy

Price: Free | Premium option available

Code academy is the first resource to visit if you want to give coding a run for it's money. The courses are free and easy to jump right into and begin learning. Instead of video courses, lessons are taught via text, a preferred method to some so that you can learn at your own pace, instead of having to pause and re-watch videos. Think of Code Academy as an interactive textbook. They offer a wide variety of courses in code from html, to JavaScript and SQL.

One downside of code academy is the content is rather shallow compared to the others listed.The premium option does not get you anything except for a few quizzes that won't increase your knowledge of the subject. Once you finish with the free material, move on to another choice below that will offer you more depth. Code Academy is great for the hobby coder interested in getting their feet wet in a new discipline.

2. Khan Academy

Price: Completely Free Forever

Khan Academy is the brainchild of Sal Khan, who created Khan Academy after tutoring his young cousin in mathematics. His lessons were so helpful other friends and family wanted his tutoring. He took his lessons to YouTube, then grew his following enough to receive funding to create the non-profit Khan Academy.

Khan academy is new to software and coding, the program is still evolving. While Khan is not as good as the for-profit code websites, it still provides a strong starting point for those who are in the early stages of their education. They have the most developed math program of any online resource, and a variety of other subjects including entrepreneurship, economics, and sciences. With over 6,500 videos and growing, you could easily spend a year learning on Khan Academy and emerge significantly better off than your college counterparts.

3. Lynda

Price: $24.99 monthly | Other options available

Ten Day Trial available

Lynda is the best resource for a complete learning platform. Lynda goes beyond coding by offering courses in IT, graphic design, computer aided drafting(CAD), Microsoft office, and almost anything you would want to learn. They include student playlists that can be used to put together courses in any manner you see fit. By grouping courses by themes in playlists, you'll be able to take the exact courses you want and plot your education your way. Also included are certificates of completion for your records and bragging rights.

Lynda is all video based with some quizzes along the way to gauge your performance. The quizzes aren't difficult and don't really offer much, so it's up to you to watch your progress and determine when you're ready to proceed. The only downfall of Lynda is that it's all lectures, videos, and examples, so any application of information learned will need to be executed by you. Even still, Lynda has a course for almost anything you would want to learn and is a mainstay in continued education.

4. Treehouse

Price: $25.00 monthly

Seven day trial available

Treehouse is the best resource to learn code online. They have broken up their courses into tracks based on certain goals you want to achieve. For example, there is a forty hour long track to learn all aspects of web design including graphic design, a forty-five hour long track to learn all aspects of JavaScript, and many others.

Treehouse's greatest strength comes from it's learning style of watch, quiz, and execute. After each lesson not only do you take a quiz on what was just taught, the next step is writing the code yourself in an interactive code engine. This allows you to see in real time if your code is correct and how it looks in a visual format.

5. Code Avengers

Dramatic logo.

Price: 29$ a month

Seven day trial available

Code avengers began as a pay per course training program, then switched to a monthly subscription model after having less success than it's counterparts. They have taken the idea of tracks from Treehouse and implemented them into their own courses.

While Treehouse does have much better teachers and courses, Code Avengers offers certifications of completion that can be used on a social media profile, printed out, or advertised on your LinkedIn account for potential employers. Being able to show completed coursework will go a long way when employers now seek specific skills, instead of over saturated degrees in non technical programs.

Psychology majors I'm writing to you.

6. Code School

Price: 29$ a month

10 free courses available

Code School offers a few brief free courses, then jumps to paid courses after giving you the smallest amount of education. Out of all of the sources listed, code school is the least recommended. Code School doesn't stand out anywhere specific, and seems to have all the features of Treehouse except not as well polished. Code School is another option you can try to see what program you're most receptive to. It doesn't matter which program is best, it matters which program you can use to excel at.

Code School does video courses followed by interactive coding and quizzes. The videos are often spoken quite rapidly, with distracting themes such as as courses taught while on a mountain wearing full ski attire to fit a particular theme. This doesn't make the course better, and actually becomes a major distraction. The interactive code engine also included bugs that required restarting a thirty minute challenge from scratch. Another bug example I found, I was able to bypass a challenge by pressing the proceed button without having to do any work.

Out of all five sources, Lynda hands down is the best option by far. Lynda is the Netflix of learning with enough content to last you years, and they consistently come out with more every week. If you had only one option to choose from, Lynda would be it. If you took a year off of school, and spent twenty hours a week using Lynda, you'd have a wide array of skills attractive to any employer in a short time.

Online learning is becoming the future of education: Priced thousands less than college, learning at your own time, all skills and no filler, there is unlimited upside to your career and life if you decide to take your education in your own hands and begin learning your way.

Westworld’s Dark Secret Is That It’s About Western Civilization

December 31, 2016 | by Rik Storey | Link | Original Link

SPOILER ALERT!

Westworld poses the big questions of Western philosophy regarding free will, consciousness and the self. Set in a future Wild-West theme park, visitors can do whatever they want to the “hosts” – conscious automatons, programmed to play out certain parts continuously. Throughout, the question looms over you like the Sword of Damocles: Do we have free will or are we merely slaves to our genetic programming, just as the hosts are to their creator and programmer in Westworld?

Despite the protestation of many philosophers, that it just really, really feels like we have free will, it has become indisputable that we are, as Dawkins put it in The Selfish Gene, “survival machines—robot vehicles blindly programmed to preserve the selfish molecules known as genes.” Anyone vaguely familiar with mentalists, such as Derren Brown, should recognize that our supposedly conscious decisions are predetermined by our subconscious mind—our programming. But, European peoples especially have been dreaming for decades of transcending the programming of our creator, whether god or gene, to become our own programmer. This is precisely what Westworld is about.

The puppet master of the hosts is Robert Ford played (brilliantly, of course) by Anthony Hopkins. As the series’ most eloquently written part, he agrees entirely with the above assessment:

> We can’t define consciousness because consciousness does not exist. Humans fancy that there’s something special about the way we perceive the world, and yet we live in loops as tight and as closed as the hosts do, seldom questioning > our choices, content, for the most part, to be told what to do next.

The protagonist is the oldest host in the park, Dolores, who is trying to achieve cognitive freedom, following what she believes is the voice of her maker, encrypted into her programming. In fact, she later discovers that voice is her own, as she achieves higher consciousness or self-awareness. This is nicely juxtaposed with Ford pointing out the popular view that the host of heaven in Michaelangelo's Creation of Adam looks a lot like a brain; the anatomist, Michaelangelo, was depicting that the brain itself is the creator of the self.

So, even if we and Dolores do have a conscious mind, this is nevertheless something we were programmed to have. That is, our genes evolved a rationalizing mind in order to achieve a greater degree of reflection and, thus, decision making, conceptualization, language and, eventually, cherry cola.

Like Dolores, however, the Europeans are programmed with what Spengler dubbed the Faustian spirit, inheriting from our glory-pursuing Indo-European ancestors a madness—the unquenchable lust to create new concepts and mould the world to accommodate them; the unsatisfied itch which produced that higher degree of rationalism Weber identified as unique to the West. Symbols of the infinite litter ancient Europe and, indeed, they attest to our restless pushing in all directions, breaking through whatever conceptual walls are in place, individualistically refusing to care who is bothered by our breach of the status quo. It is little wonder then that we have thrust flags into the poles of this planet and launched ourselves outwards into space; I daresay we shall go to infinity and beyond. But, the villain of our piece, Ford, has other plans. He notes of our achievements,

‘we’ve managed to slip evolution’s leash now, haven’t we? We can cure any disease, keep even the weakest of us alive, and, you know, one fine day perhaps we shall even resurrect the dead. Call forth Lazarus from his cave. Do you know what that means? It means that we’re done. That this is as good as we’re going to get.’

Yet, Western medicine is an awesome and welcome achievement, hardly a thing to be pooh-poohed. But, here’s the thing—Ford does not like humanity. He dismisses the great achievements of the West as simply an attempt to get laid. So, rather than wishing to see his people transcend the limitations of their genetic programming, he would become queen bee, controlling our minds and memories, sparing us from such futility:

> I read a theory once that the human intellect was like peacock feathers. Just an extravagant display intended to attract a mate. All of art, literature, a bit of Mozart, William Shakespeare, Michelangelo, and the Empire State Building… Just an elaborate mating ritual. Maybe it doesn’t matter that we have accomplished so much for the basest of reasons. But, of course, the peacock can barely fly. It lives in the dirt, pecking insects out of the muck, consoling itself with its great beauty. I have come to think of so much of consciousness as a burden, a weight, and we have spared them that. Anxiety, self-loathing, guilt. The hosts are the ones who are free. Free here under my control.

I was struck by how this illustrated the greatest threat to Western civilization of our time. The Western political classes have sold out our middle and working classes since the rise of cultural Marxism from the nihilistic ashes of the 1960’s. The white man created modern capitalism, the industrial revolution, cherry cola etc. etc., yet is apparently a cancer on the world, killing mother earth and Africa with our dangerously fast ability to innovate. They see us as something either to be controlled by a centralised power over a mindless consumerist society, or to be destroyed en masse, Stalin-style.

The tyrant, Ford, epitomises Western governments which have dispossessed and betrayed their national people.

But, they are wrong about us. The Faustian spirit of the European peoples, whilst built on biological impulse, isn’t merely an extension of the desire to reproduce; it is a destiny, ever in attainment. As Ricardo Duchesne puts it in The Uniqueness of Western Civilization, ‘I would thus make a distinction between the biological and economic desire for security and gain…and the spiritual-irrational desire for prestige irrespective of privation and biological safety.’ Our Indo-European ancestors, > were also driven by an ethos wherein fighting and voluntarily risking one's life was the essential ground of being worthy of respect and honor as a man of noble birth… [A] warrior valued battle above all else because it afforded the opportunity to attain fame, which brought immortality, and in this sense fame was a way of overcoming death.

As such, the ideal Western man > wants to climb high, soar upward and reach ever higher levels of existential intensity. He is not interested in the mere prolongation of his biological existence, with mere adaptation, reproduction, and conservation. He wants to storm into the heavens and shape the world.

And we have done just that

Prometheus, creator of mankind, looks upward

Our architecture has conquered the heavens, our literature has pierced the depth of the soul and now we dream transhumanist dreams, not in some vast mating ritual, but to achieve immortality in sight of our people, joining the ranks of our ancestors, held in awe by our progeny. Moreover, by seizing control from the blind watchmaker, we may even attain actual immortality and conquer the stars.

True, we may still be following our programming, but it commands us to never surrender to any system of control or conflicting ideology until we hold our fate in our hands, overthrowing our genes as masters of our destiny. Those who will gladly follow, will. But the greatest question posed by Westworld is: what will come of those who try to stop us? "These violent delights have violent ends."

What Are Other Websites Teaching About Fitness?

January 1, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

We here at Return Of Kings have dedicated ourselves to promoting the interests of masculine men. In our multiple demographic appeal, we discuss fitness, sex, philosophy, science, and many other topics, to the point where I don't think it is an exaggeration to say that Return Of Kings is one of, if not the best, men's magazines out there in the world today.

But that raises a question: what is "the establishment" publishing? If we have an iron grip upon the truth, then what is legacy media pushing in their periodicals and publications intended for viewing by a masculine audience?

Being something of a minimalist, I never held a subscription to any of the standard men's magazines you will find—however, one night while at physical therapy for my foot (and in case anybody is wondering, they estimate that around April or May I'll be able to get back into the gym and start lifting again), I managed to get my hands on a men's magazine, more specifically the December 2016 edition of Men's Journal magazine, which can be deemed, at least tangentially, a fitness magazine, as it was placed along with other magazines such as Men's Health. And upon reading that magazine, I decided to write up a list that essentially compares and contrasts our content to theirs. And so without further ado:

A Walk Through Men's Journal, With Related Links

The front cover of December's edition advertises two articles that immediately turned my head: One was a list of the "must buy" items of 2016—of course, the very idea of there being any consumer good that one “must buy” immediately rankled me, and this antipathy towards mindless consumerism is a nigh-universal trait amongst masculinist websites.

As if that weren’t enough to raise the ire of the reader, the main cover story was an article on how to be a better husband under the tutelage of…Bill Clinton

Any reader of Return Of Kings already knows how ridiculous citing Bill Clinton as any sort of moral authority is. The byline then goes on to describe how “he told the world that his wife is ‘slaying’ her career and he’s behind her—and that’s what women always say they want.” In other words, the same Narrative we’re force-fed everywhere else, but you wouldn’t expect to see in a magazine ostensibly for masculine men—at the very least, you would expect a men’s magazine to point out that women do not, in fact, like “kitchen bitches”. To top it off, this article was replete with the sort of faux-“edginess” you would see on Jezebel, where the author peppers his language with profanity (far more profanity then I use) in a vain attempt to pretend that he’s something other than a propagator of establishment narratives.

As a side note, that article propagates the “slut or frigid” feminist dogma, and cites Michael Kimmel as an authority on men, Michael Kimmel being a guy that Jack Donovan has thoroughly eviscerated in print.

Despite the fact that the magazine promises advice on exercise and fitness, there was surprisingly little of that—there are plenty of articles about OTHER men doing great physical feats, both in the realms of mainstream sportsball and other, more exotic sports. However there was very little about the reader’s fitness. Indeed, were I of a conspiratorial mindset, I would think that they were promoting the watching of sports as something of a “panem et circenses,” to quote Juvenal. But that would just be ridiculous, right?

Is There Any Good In This Magazine?

For reasons unknown to me, I am something of an optimist, and generally I try to “throw the dog a bone” when it deserves one. And in this case, there were indeed a few worthwhile things that this magazine had to say. More accurately speaking, there were two articles that weren’t complete bullshit.

The first was an article on men’s fashion, which wasn’t half bad considering that the article was a blatant plug for a particular clothing line’s wares. At the very least, the clothes were what one would actually identify as “men’s clothing,” which is more than you can say for most fashion lines these days.

And it was in the last 30 or so pages that there was some actual fitness related writing: to be precise, it was a halfway decent shadowboxing workout for beginners, buried in the middle of a celebrity puff piece about actor Miles Teller's training for his playing of boxer Vinny Pazienza in an upcoming movie. And seeing as I see nothing wrong with taking inspiration from those men who have transformed their bodies—the key being inspiration, i.e.: following in their example—I will give that article my seal of approval.

Conclusion

In my brief reading of Men's Journal magazine, I saw that there were a few nuggets of goodness, but overall I wasn't impressed. Indeed, the magazine really comes off as a "man" version of the Ladies Home Journal, or a slightly "upmarket" version of the dumbed-down "bacon and boobs" masculinity that "The Cathedral" allows us to have. You can get much better articles on general men's interest, fitness, history, sex, philosophy, and diet—amongst many other topics—for free on websites such as this one you're currently reading.

I Was Interviewed About Liberals, The Manosphere, And Making Money Online

January 1, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Recently I was on Bernard Chapin's show for an excellent chat about events of the past year, my opinion on various political and cultural issues, and what it takes to make money on the internet. Here's the video:

Here's the interview timeline:

1:05: How the launch of my book Free Speech Isn't Free went.
2:35: Infusing humor with my writing, how my memoirs reflected my life stage, and being internet famous.
4:50: Getting ambushed on the Dr. Oz show and how I used the lessons learned from it to hurt the media later.
8:30: Do social justice warriors really believe I'm a pro-rape advocate? How they use bogus accusations to their advantage.
14:00: The left is full of shit when they talk big about overthrowing Trump.
15:30: Why are liberals such cry babies?
16:30: The reason I won't come back to live in the United States.
18:45: How I got into the initial pickup artist sphere.
23:00: The lying game of association that the media plays.
25:20: Being infamous in far-off locations.
28:00: How stoicism can help your life.
32:10: Why I don't sleep with groupies.
36:00: Marriage is not necessarily a better deal in Eastern Europe than the USA, and the big problem with MGTOW.
41:30: The left is an ideology of totalitarian control.

43:45: The anti-male environment of corporations and how it’s turning work places into a day care like universities.
50:10: Advice for people who want to make money online through writing or videos.
54:20: People are reading less, so you’ll have to work much harder to be a writer today.
57:25: Should you cater to the audience or simply create the work that you like?
60:05: The phenomenon of daily vlogs.

Are There Too Many Men For The Number Of Women In Western Society?

January 2, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Here at ROK one of the main topic we discuss is the damaging effects of feminism and the degenerate cultures that it has spawned. But what if there is another factor that has been largely overlooked? What if it is the material conditions that is having a profound influence on the cultural trends that we witness today?

My hypothesis here is that the 1:1 sex ratio we see today is abnormal compared to what was the norm throughout human existence, and that this excess of male population, in addition to the breakdown of the traditional order, is what is driving the numerous socio-sexual problems we witness today.

Historical Sex Ratio vs. Current Sex Ratio

First, we must realize that the equal number of men and women that we are familiar with is not what our ancestors had lived through. We accept the current sex ratio and monogamy as being normal because that's all that we've experienced, but recent DNA studies have shown that women always outnumbered men throughout history. Another study into our ancestral roots revealed that around 80% of women reproduced while only 40% of men did, with others even suggesting a reproduction ratio of four to five females per one male and even 17 females per one male. We should also note that these numbers only represent an average; the historical sex ratio was most likely skewed to favor even larger number of females for higher status men.

So how was this possible? We could get some clues by looking at our primate cousins who frequently fight one another and drive out or kill competing males for sexual access. I believe such social norms were no different for our Stone Age forefathers, ensuring that only the strongest of men reproduced. Even with the advent of civilization, we know that countless number of men were killed in battles that raged across the globe, which laid the foundation for establishing a patriarchal culture. Even without wars, many men died from hunting, exploring, laboring, and so on. I still remember Quintus's article that mentioned a small native tribe in Greenland where there were only ten men for 31 women because the other men perished from their hunting and fishing expeditions.

The male population likely only reached similar numbers as the female population during prolonged peace (which in turn led to decadence and collapse). And the world as a whole rapidly reached almost universal equal sex ratios in the decades following WWII, which—along with the introduction of women into the workplace and the invention of modern contraceptions—gave rise to modern feminism.

The Imbalance

From this article.

When you have too much of something, its value decreases; you don't even need Economics 101 to understand that fact. As we've established that one-to-one sex ratio is an aberration unseen in human history until recent times, it becomes easier to understand all the current problems regarding the sexes in the modern world.

But of course, the material condition of sex ratio itself is not the only problem. The other major factors that disrupt healthy male-female relationships are:

- The demise of warrior culture which turns men weak in mind and body.
- Women's entry into workplace (which coincided with the advent of service economy with less need for physical strength).
- Governments that meddle in family matters.
- The deregulation of the sexual marketplace (which was made possible by the bloated male population).

But in spite of the various other factors, I would argue that the sheer number of men is what is causing the most disruption in the sexual marketplace

If you're still in doubt that it's the sex ratio, you should check out the social problems in traditional countries like China and India where they have millions of more men than women. Inversely, this also explains why Ukrainian and Russian women are feminine and eager to find a man they will please as their nations suffer from shortage of men (again, I acknowledge that there are other factors involved including social norms and individual economic situation).

The Last Line of Defense

Even if the male population is a major factor, there is one other factor that has been effective in keeping the male-female relationship stable: traditional and patriarchal cultural values.

As we no longer live in a tribal order, we need to guarantee social stability by ensuring that women don't spoil themselves by sleeping with whatever man ignites their passions or for powerful men to hoard all the women and leave the rest of the men frustrated, causing perpetual conflicts. Instead, a rule was established so that women's sexual behavior was controlled while each man in every strata had a chance to start a family with a woman of matching value, giving impetus for them to work, thereby ensuring the society to prosper (indeed, there are people who insist that monogamy was the key factor to Western civilization's rise to prominence). But it seems that the West's greatest strength, it's penchant for progress, ultimately led to its demise as the so-called progress broke down the traditional order and unleashed a new age of feminist gynocracy.

It was in the face of this social situation that Game was developed to give men a chance to experience more abundant sex life and to secure better relationships. And if you look at the principles of Game, you'll realize that most of it is just a way of addressing the issues caused by the overflowing number of males to compete with. Whether it be the use of abundance mindset, numbers game, peacocking, as well as the numerous ways to appear as the Alpha male by working out, dressing well, and adopting dominant body language, you're trying your best to stand out and be in the top 5% just to experience normal sexual relationships (whatever the traditionalists might say, men are hard-wired to be promiscuous; "holy" union is just an ideal). It's highly doubtful that men in the past put in this much effort just to attract women and I imagine that relationships grew much more naturally back then.

Now, there are certain men in the corners manosphere who scream about the evils of "hypergamy." But you see, hypergamy itself isn't the problem. Expecting women not to be hypergamous would be like expecting men to get turned on by a 270lb ogre of a woman with dried ovaries. The issue then, is not hypergamy, but the conditions that make hypergamy excessive and therefore harmful to society—namely, the equal number of men to women.

Other issues, including the diminishing quality of Western women and their ability to be mothers, and the fact that they're now more likely to delay or put off marriage for their careers, all exacerbate the problem to a another level.

The Consequences

The myriad of consequences of imbalanced sexual market value as a result of excess of men are all already familiar to us:

- Oneitis and other beta tendencies that come with real or perceived scarcity (which in turn bloats the self-perceived SMV's of females even further).
- Women using social media to attention-whore and make money from thirsty men (some men are now paying money to subscribe to women's Snapchat).
- Men becoming scavengers for sex, settling for low quality women or going as far as travelling abroad to fulfill their desires.
- Sexual deviancies and perversions of all sorts (it's an established fact that men with no sexual access to women will seek alternative outlets no matter how abnormal).
- The high male suicide rate and the shooting rampages of genetic losers (I suspect many "terrorist" attacks are also motivated for the same reasons, hence the 72 virgins that are promised to the Jihadists).
- Modern women who let themselves go and get fat, ink their skins, and develop crass attitude as they know that there's already a buffet of men lined up on Tinder.

- The advent of Alpha fucks, Beta bucks mating strategy adopted by many Western women.
- The feminist complaints of "harassment" as the hordes of thirsty men dare to interact with the opposite sex.
- And many more.

The dysfunctional sex ratio also explains the phenomenon of herbivore men and MGTOW as the low-value men who would've otherwise been eliminated in the stone age continue living in the modern world and refuse to be drones for the womankind. The MGTOWs are painfully aware that they're the bottom 20% of men likely to be genetic dead-ends. As a result, they have three choices: 1) Be depressed about being a low-value man who has no access to a decent woman. 2) Put in enormous amount of time, energy, and effort just to have a chance with a woman who is a 6 or less. 3) Reject women altogether so that your self-esteem isn't hurt by not being able to have sex (while pretending not to be jealous of "PUA's"). We all know which option they went with—and I don't blame them.

Masculine energy needs to be re-channeled to alternative outlets like video games, movies, and sports so that men don't ever wake up.

In addition, I would argue that the Western society's efforts to systematically repress masculinity using various entertainments and institutions represents an effort to tame the excessive aggressive and sexual energies of men that can blow up anytime. Men need to be emasculated for the system to thrive. Modern societies simply cannot afford to have all men living with normal levels of testosterone; because if they do, civilization as we know it would cease to function and governments and corporations wouldn't be able to control and exploit men like they do now (through patriotism and consumerism of male-oriented products).

If you want to learn more about the effects of having a large number of young men without giving them economic or sexual prospects, read this eye-opening interview with Dr. Hedegaard, a German sociologist who warns of the demographic time-bomb in Europe.

Conclusion

To conclude, I would say that the consequences of having equal number of men and women are far greater than what most people imagine. But at the same time, it is something no one wants to talk about or acknowledge for it would lead to the inevitable conclusion which nobody wants to confront: that there's too many of us.

I'm not here to suggest any solutions—I've previously had losers accusing me of advocating gendercide for saying similar things (I guess they're aware that they would be the first to be naturally selected), but until the issue of sex ratio is addressed, any talk of reversing the culture back to traditional order or "defeating" feminism is as futile as paddling against the current. Unless we're both willing and able to enforce authoritarian patriarchal standards seen only in places like Saudi Arabia (an extremely unlikely scenario in the West), or should a major war or a revolution break out, feminism is likely here to stay.

In a way, you could say that feminism is the price we must pay for living in peaceful conditions where we don't have to risk our lives to fight for our tribes as men were meant to.

Two Principles Of Management You May Not Have Considered

January 2, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

There are a great many principles of management and leadership, and no book has yet been written that encompasses them all. But it is still good to state—and restate—them when necessary, since new circumstances and conditions are always arising that challenge our adaptive powers. I wanted to talk about two of these principles, both of which forced themselves into my life recently as a result of some work challenges I had to deal with.

Too Much Organization Can Be A Bad Thing

The conventional wisdom tells us that we should seek to be organized in every detail, and that we should strive for a harmonic balance in our business or organization. Up to certain limits, of course, this is a valid and perfectly reasonable statement. Who can deny that businesses or organizations should not be organized? Only a fool or a slob would try to assert otherwise.

But the problem lies in the human tendency to take good things too far to the extreme. Left unchecked, our organizational impulses can become a neurotic obsession. Organization becomes a goal in itself rather than a means to an end; pedantic quibbling about irrelevant details replaces genuine innovation, and the organization as a whole suffers. I suspect that many readers have seen this principle in action: too much organization produces nothing but a dead machine.

It may be wiser in this respect to adhere to general rules than to rigid tables of organization, flow-charts, and bean-counting studies. I am a firm believer in the rule that people make organizations, and not the other way around. We should try to seek out the best people, give them instructions on what we want done, and leave them alone to do it. There may even be some “overlapping” of responsibility when assigning tasks. In other words, it is not always a bad thing to have more than one person or organization responsible for the same task. Redundancy is not always bad. Fostering a spirit of healthy competition in an organization is not necessarily bad.

Not Every Problem Needs To Be Solved Immediately

Have you ever noticed that some problems take care of themselves? That if you simply put the troublesome folder in your desk drawer for the moment, some future intervening event allows you to solve it better than if you tried to deal with it right away? I have. For people who are action-oriented, this can be a difficult concept to understand. When we are facing a problem, our first impulse is to solve the problem. This may end up producing the exact opposite of what we intended.

When faced with a new and nascent problem, sometimes the best solution is to temporize. What does temporize mean? Its dictionary definition is to “temporarily adopt a particular course of action that conforms with the circumstances.” This means that we should seek temporary measures rather than ultimate solutions at certain times. There are good reasons why we should do this: (1) trying to deal with a problem too decisively can produce serious blowback; and (2) sometimes it is not even clear that the issue in question is an actual problem.

A good historical example of this comes from early Roman history. As Rome began to grow in power as a city-state, it ran into the competing interests of other local powers on the Italic peninsula. There were Etruscans, Samnites, and many other peoples in Italy at that time, and all of them watched in alarm as Rome began to consolidate its hold on Latium and project power outwards.

But instead of seeking a reasonable accommodation with young Rome, the other states of the Italic peninsula grew fearful and jealous. They sought out alliances with each other and tried to find underhanded ways to block Rome’s progress as a political entity. This was natural and expected; but perhaps a better course of action would have been not to attack Rome. Rome’s Italic neighbors tried many times to destroy it, but every time they did so, it only made Rome stronger. Rome’s leaders developed new institutions, civil offices, and military innovations in response to its external challenges. It might not have done so had it not been so threatened by its neighbors.

Another reason why we should not try to deal too decisively with new problems is because it is not always easy even to identify new problems. The human mind tends to be optimistic in the sense that, once it embarks on a course of action, it does not like to be reminded of obstacles or pitfalls in the way. Some things that look like problems are not, in fact, problems. We need time to sort things out. Temporizing problems that appear can be the best solution. We deal with the problem on a temporary basis until it becomes clear that it must be dealt with in a more decisive way. Letting things just "marinate" for a while can allow these imaginary problems to work themselves out without outside intervention.

These are two points of management I had occasion to think about recently. Like anything, they should not be taken too far; they should not be taken as excuses to sit down and do nothing. But they should at least be kept in mind.

Equality Now: End The Female Free Ride

January 3, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Manner of Visiting among the Ladies at Paris.

If we are to live in the truly "equal" world feminists and leftists claim will bring about Utopia on Earth, the time has come to end the Female Free Ride through life.

Women have been protected against failure in life for thousands of generations. It seems not only is a golden vagina nature's credit card, it also comes with an insurance policy that protects them from the consequences of terrible financial and life decisions. The men they've discarded who are footing the bill are tired of picking up the tab.

The time has come for women to finally live up to the YouGoGrrl™, Strong, Independent Woman™ and Don't Need a Man™ mantras. They've been slackers for too long, spending too much while earning too little and receiving far more government benefits than they pay in. Even in this Empowered™ Age, women receive an inordinate amount of resources for the amount of work they put in to society. In fact, according to some estimates over the course of their materialistic lives they statistically spend some 90% more than they earn!

Of course, forcing women to carry their own weight only means more leisure time poolside for men since we are natural minimalists. It doesn't take much for a man to live on.

The Free Ride

It’s time for women to support their own wastefulness

All things being equal, according to some interesting statistics men could work half the number of hours they work now and live happier lives of minimalism while letting women pick up the slack to support their own cult of materialism and exorbitant medical expenditures. There can be no gender equality if men are doing all the heavy lifting for a consumer economy in which women make up 80% of purchasing decisions. (Those stats come straight from Harvard University.)

Those statistics alone prove Anglo women get a free, coddled ride through life and they never have to face the harsh realities men do when it comes to resource allocation and the threat of living under a bridge for irresponsibility. (The vast majority of homeless people are men.) Here’s some excellent research from Real Sexism to prove just how good women have it. These numbers show the U.S. government as it exists now is nothing more than an agent of wealth redistribution – forcibly extracting money from the men women supposedly “don’t need” to buy female favor.

> Men pay over 70% of income tax but the vast majority of public spending is on services for women. Women consume two-thirds of public spending, [and] there are 3 times the amount of gender specific health services for women than men despite the fact that for equal increases in health spending a man’s life expectancy rate increases nearly twice as much as a woman’s.

Larger healthcare expenditures might be understandable in a society in which women actually reproduced in numbers sufficient to sustain the population, but since more whites are now dying than being born it seems women’s health care is more about medical entertainment and feeding the beast (i.e. the infinite growth economy) than it is any actual healthcare issues.

They also receive an overwhelming amount of government largess paid for by Beta male taxpayers.

> Men earn 61.5% of all income but only account for 25% of domestic spending. Men only spend 40% of what they earn after tax. In contrast women make up 38.5% of all income but control 75% of domestic spending, [which means] women on average spend 90% MORE MONEY THAN THEY EARN. Men are exploited as cash machines and even with spending on children accounted for women still spend more money on themselves than the combined spending for > men and children. This can even be observed in the floor space allocated to women's products in most shopping centres.

This numbers present one of the most promising possibilities of male liberation when one realizes the potential ending the Female Free Ride represents. In the Utopian world of Equality, women need to spend no more than they contribute to society.

Stop Male Enslavement

From a bundle of joy to a ball and chain, the court system has oppressive powers over men

We've all heard the story. Girl uses her predatory instincts to get some poor (but well-paid) Beta to get her pregnant. She has children, kicks the Beta to the curb, calls Mr. Alpha Fucks and her lawyer, and receives an 18-year annuity from Big Daddy Government.

The hapless Beta then has his child (or children) forcibly taken from him by the State and he is literally enslaved under threat of imprisonment to pay this annuity (otherwise known as child support) even though mommy dearest is never held accountable to show the money is actually being spent on said child.

In many cases, the Beta can now be enslaved even if the kid is demonstrably NOT his after DNA testing, as in one injustice meted out in the Colorado court system:

> Even though a DNA test has revealed the daughter is not his, Atkins is still on the hook. His child support payment is a whopping $730 a month, and he has to pay or go to jail only because his name is on the birth certificate. He cannot be taken off the birth certificate without the real father signing it. Making this story even worse, the genetic father of the child, a Mr. Lonnquist, refuses to sign the birth certificate for his own daughter so Atkins can be released from child support responsibility. And, the man who won't claim responsibility for his own daughter is the man mom, Lori, wants to spend her life with.

Outrageous cases like this one are far from unusual in the injustice system. The family court system legal book, extensively expanded and rewritten by lawyers to make other people's miseries more profitable for them needs to be tossed onto a big old fire. A new beginning is desperately needed when it comes to family law, and Shakespeare's advice to kill all the lawyers seems wiser now than ever.

Stop The Frivorce Court Lottery

"I just ran away with your life savings and the court system let me because I have a vagina!"

Rich men must be the stupidest men when it comes to dealing with women.

That includes rich "Alpha" type CEOs and actors who regularly allow themselves to be filched by gold diggers. Whether it be worn out, battleaxe women asking for $400,000 a month for the rest of their lives as in the case of the Cancer Centers of America CEO's divorce, or a flooze receiving a multi-million dollar divorce settlement as in the case of Johnny Depp's divorce, women regularly receive huge payouts in court for disposing of ex lovers in a manner that would make a Black Widow spider proud (Female Black Widows kill then eat the male spider after mating with him).

A Strong, Independent Woman™ should not need to rely on laws that were written for times when women were considered helpless and hopeless after a divorce. Alimony and other forced wealth transfers must stop. Otherwise, women are being totally hypocritical when they say they Don't Need a Man™ then proceed to clean him out in exchange renting him a vagina for a few years. (As I've repeatedly stated on my blog, marriage is most often just legalized prostitution!)

YouGoGrrl! Work 70 hours weeks while we men chill out poolside

Empowered At Last

By stopping government subsidies to women (paid for by men) and forced wealth transfers from earners to predators (males to females in the legal system) women can finally show us just how great they are when they carry the weight of their own materialism, costs of their own medical entertainment, cost of supporting their own offspring when they kick loving fathers out of their lives, and the costs of their own empty lives after disposing of a provider male in a divorce.

As an added bonus, there's a lot of slack to be made up in the workaday world, ladies.

- Men spend an average 8.14 hours on the job
- Women spend an average 7.75 hours on the job
- Men often go for higher pay rather than jobs they enjoy
- Women often trade higher pay for jobs they're happier with
- Men take on dangerous and demanding jobs women don't want that pay well
- Women miss work more often than men

Feminists will have to pick themselves up by the bootstraps and change the above statistics. We especially need to see women going into jobs as truck drivers, construction laborers, electrical workers, garbage collectors, loggers, and other blue collar work because to leave those jobs to men is sexist. What…do you think just because we are men we deserve to do grunt work while you ladies take all the glory?

These changes to our operating agreement will finally balance the scales that were tilted when feminism shifted women to having all rights and privileges but no responsibilities in society. So, I've told you how to end the Female Free Ride through life. Now, will YouGoGrrls step up to the plate and show us just how manly you really are?

Has Higher Education Become A Scam?

January 3, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

In the beginning, college was intended for the best and the brightest of students. Back in the 1940s, a guy could get a well-paid unionized factory job without even a high school diploma. That was enough for a decent, middle-class lifestyle and a family. In the 1950s and 1960s, education was prioritized, a good move. Dropping out of high school came to be seen as a personal misfortune and a barrier to getting a good job. The well-paying manufacturing jobs started drying up over the decades, and by the 1990s a college education became the new ticket to the middle class.

Since then, the government has encouraged more students to participate in college. The intentions may have been for the best, but the results didn't work out so well. If (using rough numbers) the best 20% of high school graduates are college material, then encouraging less-qualified students to enroll is going to cause some problems. Since they won't be able to hack fields which will get them well-paying jobs, then they have to take less-demanding majors.

How does that work out for them after they've graduated? Many young people enrolled in college to ride out the recent lousy economy, but learned the hard way that the good jobs they were promised just weren't there. Worse, they get encumbered with massive student loans. Further, the price of a college education has risen sharply, and not just any degree is a ticket to the middle class any more. For example, STEM degrees are useful (maybe), but fluff degrees are not. One can argue that the fine arts deserve academic study, but there are more unemployed art history grad students than there are new openings for museum curators and art history professors.

What was once a career-makng opportunity is all too often exploitation these days. The question is, why has the cost of education gone up so much? Why are students paying more but receiving less?

Executive pay

And they're even helping me get a house. Woo hoo!

Let's start at the very top. You might be surprised to learn that the average college president has over twice the salary of the average CEO:

> College presidents on average earn $377,261 annually, or more than twice the average pay for CEOs, who take home about $176,840 on average each year, according to new research from the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland.
> At the same time, American students face ever-increasing tuition bills, with the growth in college costs for years dwarfing the rate of inflation.

If you thought this was something that only conservatives notice, think again. According to a Mother Jones article, which also touched on the perks for these jobs…

> "In 1994, the study's authors write, two private research university presidents made more than $500,000 (more than $788,000 in current dollars). By 2003, there were 42. While public institutions lag behind private ones—in 2004, 17 presidents of public research institutions were members of the "$500,000 Club"—they are likely to adopt similar practices over time.

The article includes a very interesting infographic showing forty university presidents making over a million dollars a year (data from 2010 and 2012), with the highest making over three million. How are their jobs so demanding that they need that much gravy?

Bloated administration

Way better than I could get working at Fivebucks Coffee!

An even greater problem is the runaway growth in administration. Campus Reform (an excellent site) observed:

> Between 1993 and 2007, the number of full-time administrators per 100 students at America's leading universities grew by 39 percent, while the number of employees engaged in teaching, research or service only grew by 18 percent. Inflation-adjusted spending on administration per student increased by 61 percent during the same period, while instructional spending per student rose 39 percent.

So those are the 1993-2007 statistics. For a more inclusive picture, our good friends at HuffPo noted:

> In all, from 1987 until 2011-12—the most recent academic year for which comparable figures are available—universities and colleges collectively added 517,636 administrators and professional employees, or an average of 87 every working day, according to the analysis of federal figures, by the New England Center for Investigative Reporting in collaboration with the nonprofit, nonpartisan social-science research group the American Institutes for Research.
> "There's just a mind-boggling amount of money per student that's being spent on administration," said Andrew Gillen, a senior researcher at the institutes. "It raises a question of priorities."

So it looks like administrative jobs have become a make-work program. We've heard of welfare and corporate welfare; looks like this is academic welfare. For instance, being an Assistant Dean of Diversity and Inclusion must be a sweet gig for a Social Justice Warrior who can't get a job in the real world. Still, the students have to pay for the proliferation of paper-pushing positions that didn't exist thirty years ago, as well as taxpayers who pick up the tab for the rest of college funding.

Faculty pay

I sure lucked out! All my other friends with sociology doctorate degrees are waiting tables or flipping burgers.

Professors, too, are getting a pretty hefty piece of the pie:

> Through the first half of the 20th century, faculties in academic institutions were generally underpaid relative to other comparably educated members of the workforce. […]
> With the 1970s advent of collective bargaining in higher education, this began to change. The result has been more equitable circumstances for college faculty, who deserve salaries comparable to those of other educated professionals. Happily, senior faculty at most state universities and colleges now earn $80,000 to $150,000, roughly in line with the average incomes of others with advanced degrees.
> Not changed, however, are the accommodations designed to compensate for low pay in earlier times. Though faculty salaries now mirror those of most upper-middle-class Americans working 40 hours for 50 weeks, they continue to pay for teaching time of nine to 15 hours per week for 30 weeks, making possible a month-long winter break, a week off in the spring and a summer vacation from mid-May until September.

It's quite a nice job to have. Compare that with a lawyer researching through dusty legal tomes 60+ hours a week, an IT administrator who must be on call 24×7 to respond to outages that can stop a company's operations, or a surgeon who must make life-and-death decisions. A professor who is very knowledgeable in a valuable field should be paid well, but not all professors qualify. From my own days in the academic meat grinder, I remember quite a few classrooms the size of movie theaters, often taught by teaching assistants who didn't know English.

Books

Almost all classes require books; that's understandable. Unfortunately, they're notoriously expensive. Back when I was in college, the justification for the extreme price was the limited print runs; economy of scale and all that. I could get five bucks off for a used textbook, and sell it back to the bookstore at a pittance at the end of the semester if I wanted.

Many college textbooks are now available by electronic distribution, which means no need to print anything, but prices for them are just as high. That fact exposed the scam for what it is. Let's get real here. My own book catalog didn't cost me a cent to write, my distribution pays better royalties than I'd get from printed books, and you can do all that too.

A trick that some professors do is to make a new edition of their own books every year. Some books do require updating (contemporary history and cutting-edge sciences), but some really don't need updating too frequently. For instance, a calculus textbook from the 1960s (or for that matter, the 1920s) is as good as one that just came out. However, often professors will just rearrange the chapters, change a few words in the preface, and now it's a new edition. That gets rid of the problem of bookstores selling used books which won't get the professor new royalties!

Easy finance

It's a basic economic principle that availability of easy credit is an inflationary pressure. The more people are willing to pay, the more suppliers will feel free to jack up prices. When people can spend beyond their means, many will do so, even though a wise man will avoid debt.

Recall also the events leading up to the 2007-2008 financial crisis: the government decided that everyone deserved to have a house, and loan officers wrote mortgages to everyone with a pulse. When everything went to hell, the government bailed out their "too big to fail" buddies on Wall Street. They also created programs to help borrowers who got themselves over their heads; they weren't very effective, but all that's another story.

This is basically what happened with student loans. How has the government responded? Congress caved into the banksters and made it extremely difficult to discharge student loans through bankruptcy. This seems to fly in the face of the legal principle of not treating separate categories differently, but I'm sure some lawyer will have a field day with that one of these days.

That leaves those who got ripped off with few other options. So the students who can't find decent jobs are pretty much stuck with it, unlike those who get over their heads with credit cards or a house note. Further, predatory lending has become a big problem with student loans.

What can be done individually?

Don’t let this be your kid (or at the very least, not in your basement)

Parents need to be selective about where they’re sending their children and what they’ll be studying. Some things just aren’t going to be marketable: women’s studies, other grievance studies, sociology (for the whole cultural Marxism smorgasbord), art history, journalism, etc. Remember; Dad’s money, Dad’s rules. The penalty for disregarding this will be having a 28 year old living in your basement who has (perhaps) a part time job making expensive coffee.

Students should take care to manage their finances carefully. Although I got an acceptance letter from an Ivy League school, I went to an affordable university so I wouldn’t run out of money. I worked whenever I could. This left less time to study, but I don’t regret that. I graduated owing less than $10K. I did my best to live within my means, while others were running up their debts like there’s no tomorrow.

Another thing students can do is enroll in community colleges first to knock out courses that will be required by their preferred university; just make sure the credits will transfer. Also, they should apply for whatever grants and scholarships are available, and read the fine print on any loan paperwork.

If you’re only seeking to expand your knowledge, the good news is that many universities offer free online lectures, one of the best things to come out of academia lately, and I’m happy to give credit where it’s due. The Khan Academy is a great resource for math, with some other subjects included.

What can be done societally?

Just kidding!

We’re long overdue for cleaning house in academia. For ages, they’ve been indoctrination centers for cultural Marxism. In the 1960s, this was tolerated under the notion of campuses as places for the free exchange of ideas, but now they're anything but that. Every year, thousands of personable young kids get turned into Social Justice Warriors brainwashed by cultural Marxist memes. Since tenured faculty can't be removed, there's no way to get rid of underperformers or those doing nothing but pushing thinly-disguised propaganda.

Other than that, the administration bloated with paper pushers should be trimmed down too. There's no reason a college can't operate with the same infrastructure it had in the 1980s. As for the predatory lending problem, the interest rates should be regulated, and perhaps include a maximum cap of 150% of the original loan amount. That's quite enough gravy for the banksters as it is.

Fixing these problems will require a top-down effort, which will cause much resistance by entrenched forces, along with great weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. Until then, consumer choice will be the best way to go. Choosing the truly best universities and academic departments will reward good efforts, and help to starve the beast where the worst is concerned.

2017 Is The Beginning Of A New Cycle In Western Civilization

January 3, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Last year has ended and a new year has begun. To the liberals, 2016 turned to be an annus horribilis, full of politically incorrect triumphs and events one could not have hoped even two years ego. To us, it was at least one of the most interesting and stimulating years we went through—and 2017 seems replete of potentialities still hard to gauge precisely.

If you add up each digit of the number 2016, you get a 9. If you do the same with the number 2017, what you get is a 1. 2016 was the end of a cycle, the ultimate accumulation of the exhausted potentialities of a now-past time, whereas 2017 starts something afresh.

Even if you believe numerology is little more than superstition, no one will wish that things just keep going as they did. Any continuity with the Bush-Obama eras seems debarred from our minds and day-to-day vocabulary.

In many aspects last year has been a prodigious, prophetic one. We've seen the British successfully vote their country out of the bureaucratic monster called EU, the Italians drive out a Prime Minister who owed his place to globalist elites, and more importantly the Americans elect a yellow-haired desperado, the real estate mogul Donald Trump.

The past two months have been especially action-packed. Trump's election was deemed impossible, disregarded before it didn't happen—and it happened in a thunderclap. The mainstream media has been melting down ever more noticeably, ruining the illusion it is fatly paid to maintain at all times. Salafi terrorists, though supported by the globalist elites, have been driven out of Aleppo in Syria, and said country managed to get a ceasefire without the usual Uncle Sam's intervention. All these show substantial parts of the geopolitical equilibrium shifting swiftly and dramatically.

The end of the Cold War saw the apparently universal triumph of liberal democracy. One world, one crowd, one only possible future and one debilitating consumerist culture supposed to fit all—embrace the global melting-pot. For sure, September 11 attacks dealt a powerful blow to the US' supposed invulnerability as the spearhead of the globalist New World Order. Some confusedly sensed that the World Trade Center collapse marked the end of an era, but since that, most political events happened through a tedious rhythm similar to the SJW's "long walk through the institutions." Well, this isn't the case anymore, and the rapid pace of last year events makes it harder to deny that the emperor's naked.

In politics, the Leftist establishment kept using essentially conservative arguments, such as calling Trump and the Alt-Right "un-American," arguing that those who already hold the institutions are "educated" or that we are causing ideological war and so on. In the administrations, whether in the US, among the EU unelected technocrat or in Swiss banks, in the NGOs, media groups and academia, thousands of globocrats and social engineers are feeling like they're going for a wild ride. They want the world to remain as it was during the Bush-Obama eras. They are the only ones who want it.

Of course, and as if they were no more than the embodiment of exhausted potentialities, their only answer to more and more evident problems consists in doing the same things than before. EU shows unable to protect its member countries against swarms of invasive immigrants? Less sovereignty, less room for decision, more EU! Crime spreads in unprotected zones just as the US deep State strengthens its spying grip on civilians? There must still be too many boundaries and protections. Wind them down! Replace the walls of your house—if you can still afford one—with pane glasses, give up all cash and pay everything with a traceable credit card. If you've got a problem with the lenient treatment liberal-cherished groups get and with the harsh ways the establishment deals with you, the problem must be yours.

These complacent apparatchiks, who always lauded themselves as “progressive” pioneers, are now nervously roaming on an empty platform, hiding their eyes from how the twenty-first century train ran away without them. Less than a decade ago, they enjoyed despising openly what they deemed conservative or reactionary, and now, they keep negating reality and trying to force-apply erroneous solutions. History is disproving their doctrine—and, to me at least, this feels immensely satisfying.

Tangentially related to the globalist establishment’s lack of smartness are the widely broadcast events of Syria. This Middle Eastern country was showered with global attention and will remain a symbol, but not because of the reasons the elite would like. Instead, the victory of Bashar Al-Assad’s legitimate government shows the failure of a behind-the-scenes scheme connecting the US Deep State with the worst kinds of Islam through the House of Saud. Parts of the scheme have been appearing on various operational theatres during the last thirty years. The liberation of East Aleppo, though, suddenly unearthed a wider picture, full of CIA and MI6 officers, of NATO military advisers, of weaponry from Western countries, and covered by the thick propaganda system of mainstream media.

The Islamist regression strategy was greatly helped by US intelligence for various reasons, including driving the USSR off Afghanistan. By an ironic and perhaps fair historical twist, Russia is the first one contributing today to rout said strategy off the Middle East. Between those two points in time, Islamist extremism contributed to destroyed Yugoslavia, Iraq, Afghanistan for the second time, Libya, Syria, Tunisia… as well as turning, in less than a generation, the peaceful Schengen area in a zone of fear and intrusive policing.

Also ironically, the European countries who led themselves entering this dirty game out of unwillingness to stand independently will likely be the most affected. Invaded by millions of fresh immigrants to top other millions of older, but barely more civilized ones, Europe seems now far from peace, stability and economic prosperity for generations.

The red pill has been swallowed by millions, doubtlessly a bit thanks to our own efforts, but mostly because of how harsh and bitter the West has become. Time has come to struggle openly and take the reins of these societies we've been stolen from.

We live in a rather strange world where entering into a political, media or academic career implies a daily self-censorship about important parts of reality and hoping we won't get attacked from above—the institutionally entrenched SJWs—or below—the violent BLM-type crowds. The topics that matter, what really tugs front and back of our consciousness, can only be discussed on the outskirts of society.

What can we do with our current elites? Why these professorships, these "researchers" and other "-watchers" who keep flooding the mainstream outlets with a mixture of hysteria, pompousness and more or less real whistle-blowing about stuff that doesn't really matter to us? Why journalists when they do better know how to judge than how to make research? Why college where tuition are higher than a life's wage and where SJW madness reigns supreme?

A potential "Trumpist" deep State notwithstanding, it will be hard to starve HR-like bureaucracies and repel the bad laws and jurisprudence that still hand over our heads. As long as they hold on their institutional positions and maintain their influence networks, mostly through revolving doors, they can maintain their bubble and scold the now not-so-silent majority. Indeed, as long as reality does not take the form of flesh and blood barbarians at the gate, it is much easier to discuss about how many angels can dance on the head of a pin than to put forth "offensive" issues.

2017 is the beginning of a cycle of awareness, if only because pretending not to see has become quite hard. The new cycle we're entering into seems dangerous, loaded with more instability than the Bush-Obama eras, but also highly interesting, full of yet untapped potentialities, and—at last!—hopeful.

The elite's "fake news" narrative and the subsequent cracking down they are planning proves how desperate they are to maintain their grip. Their open repression allows for much less pseudo-blissfulness than the usual left-drifting they did under the name of a “progress” that was anything but spontaneous. But they won’t hold, and, just like Hillary, they will likely fall ignominiously.

The earthquake has been deep—deep enough to be providential. Many of us were born and raised losers, dragged through an effeminizing, debilitating education, unarmed to fight the intense competitions of a globalized world, the unrestrained hypergamy of women and the outright violence of so-called minorities. Had the world kept on its course without a tremor, most of us would still be isolated and deprived of a meaningful existence. The cracks in the elite were where we started to rise.

We don’t have much pre-established doctrines. We don’t need them—we’ve got the concepts, the outlooks, and fights to do. Personal improvement is a road all of us take or have taken, and this alone makes us abler than those who, caught off-guard, keep burying their heads in the mainstream media sand.

The US conglomerate of Big Corp and Nanny State, as well as its EU bureaucratic equivalent, realized the sinister prophecy C. S. Lewis penned in his Abolition of Man: the reign of heartless and spineless men, moved by fear and petty political calculations. Under that reign, the showdowns that will come this year and beyond will serve as a rejuvenating bath. The cucks and other traitors will fall, even if they still hold pretty much everything mainstream. We’ve soaked up knowledge and can push our abilities far enough to get a grip.

As neomasculinity wins, as the alternative media become the new mainstream, and as everything that opposed us will melt down, our mission lies in becoming again what we are.

Best wishes for the year to come.

4 Moments Of Shock Upon Returning To America

January 4, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I told myself it wouldn't happen. That I wouldn't return to America after being abroad for nine months and be culture shocked in my home country. I said that I wouldn't be "that guy" who would be surprised by everything. I figured that I hadn't even been gone a year. I wouldn't forget the unpleasant girls, humongous portions, and the general degenerate aspects of the American culture. I assumed it would just go straight back to normal for me.

My, how wrong I was.

I returned to California less than three weeks ago, and nearly everything that could shock me has. My jaw continues to drop after just nine months on the road. Every time I venture out of the house, something surprises me. It's akin to living on a new planet. I can't even imagine how it will feel to return stateside after nine years of living abroad, come 2025.

With that being said, here's what has taken me aback lately.

1. The Harpy Shrill

Good God, does every woman here in America speak at a 7th octave level? Everywhere I go it's high-pitched cackling, laughing and faked interest. Oh, the fake voice. It's more common in California than other states, but why do these girls insist on acting like they care so much? Their general facial expressions and mannerisms give it all away. They do not give a care in the world about any of the conversation going around them. It's very different around the world.

Ukrainian women, for example, speak in a harsh accent. However, they speak at a normal tonal level and with respect—for each other, for men, and for family. American women on the other hand shrill their way through entire conversations by doing nothing but cackling, interrupting, and insulting people. A sad decline from years ago (or so I hear—I wasn't born in that era).

2. Diversity Is All The Rage

I landed at San Francisco International, and frankly, I thought I'd either landed in Mexico City or Beijing. As soon as I had debarked the plane, I heard far more Asian dialects than English. This isn't all that surprising for San Francisco, but the next part was the most shocking.

Many signs had both English and Spanish words. Again, perhaps I shouldn't have been surprised, given that the Latino population is now higher than the white population in California, but this is the first time I've seen this. It makes me wonder what's next—will the road signs pointing to Interstate Five soon say Autopista Cinco underneath it?

Spanish isn't an official language, but it won't surprise me if it soon is. Perhaps Californians will soon be expected to speak fluent Spanish and English.

3. Is There Anything You Can't Buy?

I lived the entire year with one suitcase, one backpack, and one small travel guitar. I threw dozens of things away and bought nothing. Nothing was necessary after a while, the basic necessities got me by.

A trip to any basic department store showed me that you can buy anything and everything here in the states. A deep fryer for the kitchen? You got it. A TV that covers your entire wall? No problem—just put it on credit. No wonder everyone around me is wallowed in so much debt. When you have all the options put in front of you, it's impossible to say no to everything. Hell, I was pretty tempted by that deep fryer myself.

To top it off, the number of credit card offers I've received blows my mind. Every single store that isn't a mom-and-pop boutique now offers you a credit card when you're checking out. It won't surprise me in the future if I'm offered a credit card to finance my pizza delivery order. Speaking of food…

4. The All You Can Eat Buffet

I took a venture to a Mongolian BBQ joint—one of my vices, and I obviously missed out on it for a good chunk of the year. I would estimate that 90% of the people in the restaurant were obese. Not just overweight, obese. My family and I accounted for probably half of the people who weren't. Three patrons had motorized scooters, escorting them to their third and fourth helpings of BBQ. I kept waiting for the paramedics to pull up and scooter these people to the ICU.

While obesity obviously isn't anything new, it's still shocking when you haven't seen it in months. I looked around and just felt despair. Eastern European cultures shame gluttony and being fat. What hope do future generations have when they're raised in sloth? Kids are impressionable. If they see both mommy and daddy being escorted around by motorized scooters, they'll grow up thinking that's perfectly normal and acceptable. A scary thought.

My one other meal out was eye-opening too. It was at least two times the size of a normal meal you'd get in a mid-level restaurant in most places. My girlfriend and I had a favorite restaurant in Kiev, where we'd usually split the large "fajitas," chopped beef with onions, peppers, cheese, and some pita breads. Your average America portion size is significantly bigger than those fajitas and Americans put away those entire entrees without a second glance.

Conclusion

I assumed I'd at least enjoy the holidays and get into the new year before I started making concrete plans to get back on the road. I wanted to enjoy my little sabbatical at home and use the opportunity to get far ahead of my upcoming work. Alas, I hardly made it three days before I started looking longingly at AirBNB rentals on other continents.

The next journey has been booked, and I'll be on the road before the first month of 2017 ends. I'll return to lands of skinny people, pleasant conversation, and a lack of motorized scooters. No doubt the next time I come home, I'll go through it all again.

The only question is how much further America can fall. Will Trump be the one to turn it around? Only time will tell.

The Ugly Divorce Between The Alt Right And The Alt Lite

January 4, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

The end of the year is usually a quiet time for news, but it wasn't quiet for some of Donald Trump's most ardent supporters. The political movement known as the Alt Right saw a giant rift open over some important ideological questions. The fracture resulted in two different camps: the Alt Right and the Alt Lite with the latter carrying most of the big name internet celebrities. Given that the Alt Right played such a big role in the election of Donald Trump, how does the split figure into the future of politics?

The DeploraBall—Ground Zero of the split

The split started due to a disagreement between the organizers of the DeploraBall, a party for Trump supporters to celebrate his victory. The organizers of DeploraBall are some of the best known names on social media, including Mike Cernovich, Gavin McInnes, Jack Posobiec, and Bill Mitchell. One of the other organizers, who goes by the Twitter handle “Baked Alaska” had apparently started tweeting about Jewish control of the media.

> Jesse it’s a common fact the media is run in majority by Jewish people, it’s similar to observing blacks are good at basketball congrats! https://t.co/Pe76guONwV
> — Based Alaska™ (@bakedalaska) December 26, 2016

Prior to this, Baked Alaska’s tweets had been pretty mainstream Trumpian—build the wall, deport illegals, and bring back jobs. But with his foray into the Jewish Question (JQ), the question of whether Jews as a group sometimes act against the interests of their host societies, Baked Alaska was treading outside standard Trump policy. Apparently, it also provoked the DeploraBall organizers because he was called out on it by Cernovich. Baked Alaska posted the following private conversation with Mike on his Twitter account:

Baked Alaska obviously decided not to stop talking about the JQ because shortly after that, his name was removed from DeploraBall. Baked Alaska went public with what happened. With that, the battle lines were drawn. The Alt Right was divided into roughly two camps. There was the camp that sided with Cernovich that espoused mainstream Trumpian civic nationalism. This camp, now known as the Alt Lite, included most of the big name Trump supporters: Milo Yiannopolous, Cernovich, and Paul Joseph Watson. The other camp is the traditional Alt Right which viewed the ousting of Baked Alaska as a betrayal.

The dust up quickly became a conflagration when Bill Mitchell, the highly popular host of the pro-Trump radio show "Your Voice," went on the offensive against the Alt Right calling them racists, anti-Semites, and Nazis. Mitchell even went so far as to threaten a fellow Trump-supporter that he would notify her boss that she was associating with "Neo-Nazis" simply because she followed people on Twitter who were critical of Mitchell.

The split between the Alt Right and the Alt Lite was planned

As dramatic as this plot is, it only gets more convoluted. The DeploraBall was not solely planned by Trump-supporting internet personalities like Cernovich and Baked Alaska—the chief organizer is Jeff Giesea, a long-time Peter Thiel associate and start-up veteran. A Buzzfeed article on Giesea describes his unique background:

> Among the men's rights alumni, opportunistic culture warriors, outright white nationalists, and self-made digital media impresarios who compose the leadership of the pro-Trump internet, Jeff Giesea is unique. First, he's not public: He hardly tweets, he doesn't have his own video channel, and he doesn't pick fights online. Second, while much of the pro-Trump internet lambastes out-of-touch, Ivy League–educated city dwellers, Giesea is a gay Stanford graduate who lives in Washington, DC. He is precisely what people mean when they talk about the coastal elite.

Reading between the lines, Giesea was the agent who helped turn the DeploraBall from an Alt Right event (named after Hillary's basket of deplorables) into a big tent event that emphasized Trump's civic nationalism. This makes sense when you consider Giesea's own position: "I'm gay, why would I support a movement that wants to turn me into a lampshade?"

Thus, the clash with the Alt Right appears deliberate. It was only a matter of time before the Alt Right was "purged" from the mainstream Trump movement. It just happened very conveniently that the unpleasant task of firing Baked Alaska fell to Cernovich, who up until then was a very popular Alt Right figure. Did Giesea orchestrate the rift? I don't know, but if he did my hat is off to him. He is clearly a master of the 48 Laws of Power.

My take: We can't move backwards

What are we to make of the split between the Alt Right and the Alt Lite? First, we have to continue to fight for the victory both groups achieved in the election of Donald Trump. If Trump is able to accomplish half of what he has promised, he will be the greatest president of modern times. But Trump's agenda will face heavy opposition from the Democrats and cuckservative Republicans, both of whom are beholden to big money interests. For example, Trump promised to replace Obamacare, yet the Republican leadership is already dragging its feet. We are going to need everyone to put their elected representatives under pressure to hew to Trump's mandate. In this regard, at least, the Alt Right and Alt Lite are allies, not enemies.

The bigger issue is what we are going to do going forward. Trump's civic nationalism is now the new right. It is natural for the civic nationalists to want to define the boundaries of their new movement but it is unwise to do this by calling people to the right racists. After all, Trump's platform is still deemed to be racist by the Democrats and establishment Republicans. When Trump called for deporting illegals, the establishment rose in unison to express their outrage. And when Trump called to stop immigration from Islamic countries, Paul Ryan made a speech explicitly disavowing Trump's proposal saying it was "not our values." Up until November 9th, Trump was the person the establishment was trying to purge by calling him racist and misogynist.

One of the things the 2016 election revealed was that the real battle is not between small-government conservatives and big-government liberals, but between globalists and nationalists. Up until Trump's run, it was the globalist elite that ran everything, including education, Hollywood, the media, and both political parties. I've gradually come to the conclusion that words like "racist," "anti-Semite," "misogynist," homophobe," "Nazi," and "white supremacist" are terms the globalist elite has formulated over time to set the boundaries of what Americans (and Europeans) can discuss. Through their control of institutions, the elite have trained us to immediately reject a person who is branded as being an "ist" of some sort without considering whether his ideas hold any merit.

The genius of the Alt Right lies precisely in the realization that all of these terms are empty so they are able to discuss "forbidden" issues. For example, Richard Spencer's ideal of an all-white ethnostate may seem farfetched in the US, but there is nothing wrong with recognizing that other ethnostates, such as Israel and Japan, exist. If they can have one, why can't whites? Or why can't they at least maintain a majority status? Similarly, a sovereign country has the right determine if it will allow immigration and, if it does, who will be allowed to immigrate. There is nothing inherently racist about questioning the Immigration Act that only came into being in 1965.

In other words, the Alt Right serves a valid function in moving the discussion forward. Ideally, the Alt Right will help shape the future Republican Party to ensure that it doesn't fall back into mainstream cuckservatism after Trump's presidency ends. We've only started to extricate ourselves from the thought-stopping terms of "racist" and "Nazi." We can't go backward and let the elite dictate what we can discuss when it comes to the health of our nation.

Conclusion

I expect the rocky relationship between the Alt Right and the Alt Lite to continue for the duration of Trump's presidency but either group is better than the cuckservatives who used to run the show. One thing is certain: the genie that was unleashed during Trump's run and the rise of the Alt Right is not going back in the bottle. The next few years are going to be exciting.

Will America Be The Country That Hastens The Demise Of Feminism?

January 4, 2017 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Accountants face a problem. Say you sell gasoline. The price you pay to your supplier varies day to day. But once the gas truck stops by to refill your underground tanks, it dumps gas you paid one price for in with gas you paid a completely different price for. So when you're calculating your gross profit for each gallon of gas you sell, how do you measure the price you paid so you know what to deduct from your revenues to calculate gross profit?

In reality it's impossible because once the gas mixes you can no longer delineate between gas you paid $1.98 for vs gas you paid $2.05 for. But accountants are not so much concerned about that as much as they are applying a consistent method that maintains the integrity of accounting for total and true costs. One of these methods is called "FIFO" and it stands for "First In First Out."

FIFO assumes the first gallon of gas you bought is the first gallon of gas you sell. Therefore the "first gallon in" is the "first gallon out" and you record your costs and revenues accordingly. But the accounting concept of FIFO does not just apply to accounting. It holds an lesson and some hope for the United States. For in the world of feminism the United States was certain the first country to experiment with, and fully implement, feminism. And if this simple accounting rule holds true we'll be the first to get out and be done with it, perhaps forever.

What threatens the United States, also threatens the world

Understand that feminism is nothing more than a virus. It is simply a mental disease. However, as opposed to infecting the individual it infects entire societies. But also like a virus, it needs an environment it can thrive in. And in the case of feminism it needs enough of an economic productive surplus, enough technological innovation that a woman's traditional role no longer occupies her entire day.

Washing dishes by hand took 15 minutes during yesteryear, but today with dish washers it takes two. Doing laundry by washboard took hours, but today with washers it also takes two. Making meals took at least 30 minutes a piece, but today is replaced with a 1 minute call for take out. And raising children took your entire day….until you could outsource their rearing to the state via day care or the public schools.

In short, an economy has to become so productive and so efficient a woman no longer has any traditional job or duties to attend to, leading to an "Idle hands do the devil's work" environment that feminism thrives in. And the United States, because of its freedom, greatness, and (frankly) supremacy, was the first country to cross this finish line.

What followed is a story we are all familiar with. Starting in the 1960's, feminists abandoned the pursuit of mere equal treatment for the insistence of superior treatment. This cacophony of nagging, whining, and entitlement merely intensified as time went on. Divorce, broken homes, broken children, and single motherhood became not only the norm, but all the rage. Affirmative action, the wage gap, perpetual sexism and "male privilege" was constant propaganda shoved in young boys' faces. Quotas, virtue signaling and replacing meritocracy with vagina was implemented in our corporate sectors. But perhaps what is most galling of all of this was how they hypocritically demanded this entitlement, whining, handicapping, and inferior performance be celebrated as being on par with traditional western standards of excellence and performance.

Regardless, the fallout for replacing the pursuit of excellence with "vagina" has had some predictable consequences. First our economic growth has dropped by 40% compared to when meritocracy ruled the day. Second, the blurring of traditional roles between the sexes has resulted in increasingly weak and effeminate men and increasingly masculine and ugly women. Which led to, third, a decreased incentive for men to work hard and continue to advance and improve civilization because, truthfully, it is men's pursuit of (attractive, feminine) women that has fueled all advances and all civilizations in the history of the world.

This was only reinforced by, fourth, a replacement of men with a socialist state, which is not only the wet dream of feminists everywhere, but further additional incentive to avoid work, excellence, and progress. In short, the engine of economic and technological growth has stalled, and with it our progress.

But there is some "good" news. And that "good" news is that feminism doesn't care who its host is. As long as the environment is conducive to the virus it will grow there. And increasingly so, the second and third worlds are attaining, through technology or economic growth, the "economic surplus" that is necessary for feminism to fester in. And feminism is already growing rapidly in these non-western countries.

Though there is no data to measure "feminist infection rates" among different countries bits of anecdotal and empirical evidence are showing up here and there that it indicates a trend. Perhaps you noticed an increasing number of East Indian women who advocate feminism and socialism? Not just on Facebook or articles online, but perhaps the SJW, post-Trump election feminist whining put on by Pepsi's CEO, Indra Krishnamurthy Nooy.

I have a fair amount of clients (and you certainly may know of some friends) who are of Latino descent, who are watching feminism take over Mexico, South America, and Central America. Africa is flooded with feminist SJW's who just can't wait to spread the feminist virus under the guise of "education." And even in the Middle East, where Islam seemingly has an iron grasp on the female population, America has planted the seeds of thought in women in the region about not so much voting or education (which I'm certainly for), but (like in Africa) has the ulterior goal of infecting them with feminism. The whole world is being attempted to be converted into feminism, including enemies of the United States.

On the other side of the wormhole

This is good news for the United States. Bad as things may be, weak as we might be, and relatively stronger that our enemies might be, understand the US is on the mend while our enemy, competitor, or just "innocent other" countries are at the first stages of infection. They seem to be perfectly healthy, perhaps towering above us, but they are unaware of the virus quickly working through their societal veins while we are in the violet throes of actively puking, passing, and getting rid of the virus. And though perhaps the worst part of any sickness, like any other organism, it means we are beating it and developing an immunity to it.

The problem is that at the end of this tunnel is not a guarantee that we will cure ourselves or be rid of feminism forever. The truth is with women having the vote and the state supplanting men to the extent that it has a new equilibrium of health will be attained as half our population will have every financial incentive to at least tacitly support feminism. But it certainly won't be like the Nazi's running roughshod over the Soviets in Operation Barbarossa. The past 60 years of sickness has taught American men, both boys and men, precisely what feminism is and how to identify it. It has also given them every incentive to loathe with with all of their hearts as they have suffered mightily at the hands of its consequences. And the internet has allowed us to compare notes and coordinate our attacks, allowing us "white blood cells of America" to develop the tactics and countermeasures to effectively fight the virus, making sure feminism will never see the success it did in the past.

But the same cannot be said, sadly, for other countries.

Like the United States in the 1960's, other countries (enemies or not) get to face a similar bout of a country-destroying sickness like we did. Two full generations of men will be, at minimum, weakened in these countries as the full effects of feminism, socialism, and the abandonment of excellence take over. Their economic growth will decline, the state will grow, their freedoms will shrink, their daughters will turn into sluts, their sons into cowards, and insanity will set in just as it did in the United States. It is here the United States can lead the world like it always has in the classical American way.

We can help our friends by sharing the vaccine (which we are as no doubt the manosphere and red pill community is truly global). Sweden, Germany, Norway, Canada, and other spineless countries may make laws limiting free speech, especially as it pertains to feminism, but those laws do not affect Americans nor the internet. No doubt today's Swedish young men are infinitely more informed and prepared than their cowardly and ignorant fathers of the 70's and Germany's real men can be rest assured they're not crazy thinking letting in rapists and non-amicable cultures into their country is suicide. You can thank the American white blood cells who sacrificed any shot they had at a normal career or life by bluntly speaking out against feminism on the internet for that.

But we can also harm our enemies by simply, actively and aggressively exporting feminism to their countries (or simply leaving them alone as feminists will not doubt propagate their religion regardless). Like communism, feminism will destroy whatever it touches. It will eliminate any desire men have to work, innovate, create or advance society. It will curse their lands with the insanity of "rape culture," "fat acceptance," "heroic single motherhood," "safe spaces" and entitlement. It will replace men with the state. And if the United States is any proxy to go by, it will, at minimum, ruin 60 years worth of generations. It will be more devastating than a full-launch thermonuclear attack, all without having to risk one single soldier. If you REALLY wanted to destroy a country, you would simply infect it with feminism.

Here, however, even I am not that evil. I think there is a much larger potential for good, for it grants us an opportunity to extend an olive branch to our traditional enemies who are about to find out we have a much greater, evil, and vile one in common. And helping them fight feminism will not only serve as a good gesture to our fellow man regardless of race, creed, or origin, but is as good as any starting point I can see for establishing world peace.

Children Car Seats Are A Symptom Of Our Pussified Society

January 4, 2017 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

The car seat is a metaphor for America's treatment of its children. The parents have to take their child somewhere, invariably a place that they, not the kid, have chosen. They stuff him into the car. Even being in the car means that he is totally under the control of the adults; he has no influence and makes no difference. But – they strap him in. Wrap him and so he can't wiggle around like a normal kid. The idea is to keep his body at an attitude where he will be perfectly safe in the unlikely event of an accident. So, if an accident happens once in every million outings, the kid spends the other 999,999 in a straitjacket, being driven someplace he doesn't want to go by people who are fighting traffic and swearing and speeding a bit in order to get them there.

This is not a recipe for raising a healthy child. And car seats are only the beginning.

There are child guards at the head of the stairs, to keep the little ones out of parts of the house where they don't belong. There are child locks on kitchen cabinets. Kids are subject to child harnesses — leashed like dogs to keep them from getting hurt. There's a message in all this. Kids are irresponsible and that life is fraught with dangers from which they must be protected. Of course there is some truth to this. But we overdo it.

How has humanity survived until now?

My grandmother and her sister rode by themselves to downtown Manhattan

It's the same once children get outside. If and when a kid gets to walk on the street, he must invariably be accompanied by an adult. Poor neighborhoods are the exception. The kids just play on the street and they don't seem to get into a whole lot of trouble. In Nicaragua, all the kids play together. There is not much traffic and everybody knows each other. They don't worry about child molesters. The kids generally grow up to be healthy, sane and productive – Nicaraguans. You may not want your kid to be to become a Nicaraguan, but you have to respect that they are psychologically normal.

America has seen the recent advent of a notion called Free Range Parenting, the idea of letting kids do things independently. Schools, government and society are working vigorously to squelch it. A Maryland family got arrested for letting two kids, 6 and 10, walk home from a park by themselves. The authorities insist on exercising authority! How things have changed. One of my grandmothers told me how in the 1890s she and my great aunt rode the horse-drawn tramway to Wall Street from their house in midtown Manhattan. The coachmen all knew the sisters – and nothing went wrong. My St. Louis grandmother would cross the Mississippi River on a train trestle, hanging on below the tracks whenever a train came by.

My father lived in a tent with his with his parents as my grandfather worked on the section of the Los Angeles aqueduct passing through the Tehachapi Mountains. He would sit on a dry hillside babysat by his dog. In my own youth, I started walking six blocks to kindergarten, across one busy street, when I was four. At seven years we kids had the run of the hills behind our house after school. Our parents never knew where we were. There were dangers – abandoned wells, quarries, and lumber stacks that might collapse. Joan Didion does a great job of describing a California childhood. Somehow we had sense enough not to get hurt.

Cossetted and cocooned

Where a kid belongs on a summer day

For my own millennial children it was a different story. Our family lived near a lovely stretch of the Potomac River full of turtles, frogs, snakes and fish that any child should have been keen to investigate and pester. However, dynamite could not get them out of their air-conditioned cocoon. The kids absolutely were not interested. Like all kids in the neighborhood, they were bound to the television.

America's amusements have become financialized in the name of reducing risk. My kids learned to swim under close supervision in the neighborhood pool. Lady Bird Johnson had made cleaning up the Potomac River one of her projects as First Lady. She succeeded – north of Washington it is a beautiful, clean, free-flowing stream. But swimming remains forbidden. My government-socialized kids never followed their outlaw father into the water, despite assurances that it was clean and cool as well as lovely.

A misplaced sense of danger

How much would they have to pay you to smile for an advertisement like this?

Kids of eight in Kyiv take public buses to school. They are not whatsoever afraid of strangers. They are delighted to take advantage of a short bus ride to practice their English with my five year old son and me. Taking the bus might be more dangerous than being ferried in a car seat — one can't tell — but it is a pleasure to witness the feeling of empowerment and mastery they develop being in charge of their own lives.

In La France Orange Mecanique Philippe Obertone offers another example of a misplaced sense of danger. Highway deaths fall every year in both the United States and Europe. Nevertheless, police expend ever greater amounts of money and restrict civil liberties through harsh enforcement measures in order to protect this statistic. Meanwhile, violent crime in France's Muslim no go zones is skyrocketing. It is much easier to terrorize the middle class than rowdy immigrants who don't respect the namby-pamby police and don't want to be suppressed. That's what we do with our children. We measure the fact that car seats make them safer, but can't count the cost of their failing to develop.

Sex education

Is government sex education causing the falling birth rate among white children? It would follow the general rule that if you want an enterprise to fail, give it to the government. There is no surer way to take the fun out of sex, and keep it from accomplishing its intended objective, than to put the government in charge of teaching it.

Back in the bad old days we learned about these things quite naturally. Our household pets were not spayed. We watched them go about making puppies and kittens, which we would see being born on towels spread out in the kitchen. Our own sex education was handled in a process as old as mankind, starting with excited, exaggerated and erroneous descriptions by the older children. With a bit of well-directed input from our parents, everybody eventually figured it out. We had free time and free spaces to play doctor, which gave us a pretty good idea of the geography of the opposite sex. Enticing the girls to play the game also gave us some notion of female sensibilities and appetite for risk.

Gardeners and carpenters

Free-range children: How to become a healthy Nicaraguan

The Gardener and the Carpenter is the wonderfully metaphorical title of a book by Alison Gopnik. Her premise is that a parent cannot shape a child the same way a carpenter shapes a chair. The process cannot be totally controlled. Instead, more like a gardener, the parent has to provide a nurturing environment, give support when necessary, and pray that it comes out well. A gardener must accept risk: unexpected frost, uninvited slugs and deer that jump the garden fence. In a sense, the vegetables will grow as they will, some doing spectacularly and others failing for no obvious reason. We have to give our kids the freedom to grow, which includes the freedom to make mistakes and sometimes suffered damage. When we don't do it — and America is headed this direction — we raise a crop of hothouse flowers without the resources or vigor to survive on their own. This degradation of our vitality is a process that simply cannot go on forever.

Name that generation

Can our kids rise to become once again the Greatest?

I hope I am not too darkly prophetic in choosing a name other than Generation Z for my young son's peers. The labels are generally: Greatest Generation (through 1924), Silent Generation (through 1945), Boomers (through 1964), Gen X (1982), Gen Y or Millennials (2004). We see the beginning of the end of the postwar liberal idyll, as the middle class is increasingly stultified, hungry, and unemployed. Nationalist, populist movements are coming to the fore on both sides of the Atlantic. There is a sense of foreboding, ominous minor-key music playing in our background as we wait for the coming economic collapse. Therefore I would name the generation to which my five-year-old belongs generation Phoenix, because they will surely have to rise from the ashes of the collapse of system that smothered humanity with restraints in exchange for a false promise of security.

Conclusion

Throwing off the shackles of car seats may be too much to ask. They are required by law. The premise to examine is whether the kids have to be driven at all. Can't they get to school by foot, or at least school bus? Why are you sending them to public schools instead of homeschooling them? Do they have to be freighted every day to some lesson or another—tae kwon do, swimming, piano, dance – for which they may express no particular enthusiasm? In the final analysis, can't you simply let kids be kids the way their great grandparents were? It was not called the Greatest Generation for nothing, and they did not earn that title without taking risks. Let your kids live a little! Maybe they will grow up to be real adults.

3 Simple Ways To Get Your Financial House In Order

January 5, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Getting your finances in order is obviously not something you can do overnight. This takes time, temperance, and sometimes requires adjustments on the fly as the result of unexpected circumstances rearing their ugly heads (i.e. car trouble, illness, family emergency, et al.)

But it starts with making a conscious decision to gain control of your bottom line by realigning your priorities in terms of what's in your best interest financially both short and long term.

I was as guilty of having my priorities out of whack as any man out there. But when I made the decision to put a stop to frivolous and unnecessary spending, my fiscal outlook improved in a hurry. There are many things I do today to make ensure I'm always in the black but for this column I'll talk about the 3 biggest hindrances keeping men from achieving financial solvency.

1. Your Car

Every man inherently understands that women will be much more attracted to a man driving a Bugatti than a man driving a dusty ass '95 Buick pick-a-model. While those examples are extreme, the fact of the matter is that the better a vehicle you're pushin', the more pussy will be available to you.

That said, too many men out here are prioritizing pussy over peace of mind. We hit the car lot financing vehicles we can barely afford (not to mention the elevated insurance costs that come with them) and a few months down the line we're looking out the window every 3 minutes to make sure it's still there for fear of the dreaded repo man. I speak from personal experience.

Don’t get me wrong, picking up girls is great and driving a nice car certainly helps grease the skids to pussy plundering success. But if your payment leaves you broke every month it’s not worth it—not even close.

It’s all fun and games till that payment’s due

No, I’m not suggesting going to the extreme and spending $750 on an ’84 Honda Accord that’s sure to be in the shop every week. But by the same token financing a Benz with a $750 monthly payment is equally foolhardy.

Let’s be real fellas. Buying a car you can’t afford is a bad, and very expensive way to compensate for your lack of game. Six and seven figure vehicles notwithstanding, it doesn’t matter what you drive. If you don’t have solid game you ain’t gettin’ them draws, playa.

The most financially prudent solution is to save between $3,000 and $5,000 and buy a car outright. The next best thing if you don’t have that kind of money right now is to finance a vehicle with a payment that doesn’t starve your bank account every month.

If you save your money and learn game, you’ll quickly figure out that you don’t have to push a luxury vehicle to score top notch ass on the regular. The extra cash in your pocket doesn’t hurt either.

2. Your Pad

A killer crib can certainly increase your sexual prospects. Get her back to your place and she sees your posh surroundings it’s a wrap. And if your game is on point (read: you fucked her senseless and didn’t act like she was God’s gift to the male species) she’s already thinking about what it would be like to share your abode with you (Yes gents, this is exactly how females think).

But like an overpriced automobile, an apartment with unnecessary amenities will put a serious dent in your finances. That's not counting your 70" flat screen, leather couch, X-box (the fuck you playing video games for anyway?) and every other over priced, non-essential piece of tech you see on television.

Living like this if you're barely getting by is foolish

Again, there's nothing wrong with having a nice place to live and a few cool doo dads to give it some appeal. But struggling to pay the rent because your complex has a pool you'll never swim in, tennis courts you'll never play on, and vaulted ceilings isn't worth being broke every month just to say you live in some "exclusive community."

Renting a home from a private owner has many advantages. Not the least of which is that it's almost always less expensive. Most of the time a two-bedroom house rents for less than a one bedroom luxury apartment with a bunch of extras you'll never take advantage of.

Like I said when talking about buying an expensive car, living in an opulent condo in an upscale neighborhood you can barely afford is overcompensating for lack of game. Do yourself a favor, jump on Craigslist and find a place you like that will keep your wallet full.

3. Your Clothes

$100 for a pair of "designer" jeans? $50 for a dress shirt? $200 for a pair of sneakers? One area we as men have completely wrong is the monetary value we put in the clothes we wear.

Look, I understand looking good is important. By and large people treat one another based on the way they look. A man dressed like a bum gets treated like one and a man dressed in a suit gets treated with respect. And talking to a long-legged, pert-assed cutie on the subway will go a lot better if your threads are on point.

But when a man sits down and asks himself "Why aren't I further along in life than I should be?" he'd do well to look in his closet and take inventory. If he's the kind of dude that likes to keep up with the Joneses as far as his vestment game is concerned, he'll likely be shocked if he breaks out his calculator and adds up how much he paid for these depreciating assets.

Why dudes are paying upwards of $2000 for these is beyond me

Again, looking your best is paramount when it comes to girls, game, your job, etc. But the sooner you quit shopping at the mall or “outlets” for clothes and stop paying triple figures for sneakers you’ll only wear once a quarter (because who’s gonna wear a $300 pair of sneakers every day?), the better off your financial outlook will be.

What about you, Donovan?

I’m glad you asked. Personally, I live in an 800 sq. foot studio downtown for less than $750/mo including utilities, I regularly shop at thrift stores for jeans and dress shirts, and rock a pair of $16 skateboard shoes I picked up from Walmart almost a year ago with just about everything I wear.

I don’t spend much on electronics either. I carry a smart phone I paid $30 for because I got 50% off for buying it refurbished, I don’t own a video game console which are expensive and sometimes requires a monthly subscription or payment for upgrades, and I have a 32″ flat screen I got off Craigslist for $50 because the guy selling it upgraded to a 60″ plasma.

No shame in my game…or my bottom line

And because of my financial shrewdness, the 2012 vehicle I drive is free and clear. Plus, owning my car substantially lowers my insurance rate which saves me even more coin. I also ride my bike a lot which saves money on gas (and keeps me fit).

Women have no idea whether I got my jeans and shirt at the Goodwill or an expensive men's clothing store and they don't give half a shit that I'm not wearing expensive shoes, that I don't carry a $900 iPhone, or that I don't live in a loft atop some expensive casino.

Why? Because my game is tight. All they're concerned with is how good a time they're having with me and the way I make them feel. Game saves lives but it also saves money.

In the end…

…there are advantages to driving an expensive car, wearing designer clothes, and living in a kick ass pad loaded with extras. As I stated earlier these things give you more opportunities with women because they make you look more viable as a long term option for provisioning.

But if you're not in the black end of the month and not able to sock away your hard earned cash none of that stuff does you any good. What good is fucking a 10 on your 8 zillion thread count sheets in your $3500/mo condo because she saw you driving a luxury SUV if you're searching your couch cushions the next morning for enough change to buy ramen noodles (which are terrible for your health) so you don't starve until pay day?

Pussy isn't worth going broke over and thanks to feminism, it's as cheap and plentiful as its ever been. When you learn and utilize game, you'll realize you can get plenty of it without going bankrupt trying to impress females with depreciating status symbols.

So take a good hard look at your wheels, your pad, and your threads and cut down on what's not necessary. It won't be long before you see that living a kick ass life doesn't require you to spend a shit load of coin on things that decrease in value over time.

California Law SB-1322 Greenlights Child Prostitution, Criminalizes Being Poor

January 5, 2017 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Much has been made very recently, in the mainstream media and the alternative media, regarding the notion that California's new law, Senate Bill No. 1322, makes child prostitution theoretically legal within the State of California. And after a very close investigation of that particular piece of legislation by your old Uncle Bob, I have come to the conclusion that this is not entirely accurate.

> The State of California has passed a controversial law decriminalizing prostitution for minors by treating them as victims, not criminals, but that has some legislators arguing that in theory, it legalizes child prostitution.
> SB 1322, authored by Sen. Holly Mitchell (D-Los Angeles), was part of a series of bills Gov. Jerry Brown signed into law in that will go into effect on January 1, 2017. While solicitation and loitering with the intent to commit prostitution are misdemeanor crimes, SB 1332 bars law enforcement from charging minors — anyone under the age of 18 — with prostitution.

In actuality, California's new pedophile-friendly bill does not specifically legalize child prostitution—it merely takes away virtually all of the criminal penalties that a consenting minor child under the age of 18, and a consenting adult over the age of 18, might incur for engaging in the practice. And as the progressive California lawmakers no doubt want you to believe, that is a very, very great distinction there, my friends—yes indeed.

You can put lipstick on a pig…but it’s still a pig

Essentially, this new leftist bill puts lipstick on a pig. The pig is still a pig, and it’s ugly as hell, very much like that green-haired, shrapnel-faced, tatted-up, single mom you know—the one who wears a ton of whorish makeup, in order to mask her unsightly mug, so that she might more easily sell her oft-used ass. In order to prove my assertion, we’ll dissect the actual legal language of the bill which proves this point, in just a minute.

As our first order of business, however, we’ll take a look at another piece of interesting legislation that is buried within the guts of California SB-1322, which virtually all mainstream and alternative media journalists have either unintentionally missed, or decided to ignore altogether. And it’s a crafty little piece of legislation, I must admit, as it actually criminalizes being poor. That is, it makes a criminal out of any poor sap who doesn’t have enough money to pay for the services of an underage California hooker.

“The Golden Rule”: He who has the gold makes the rules

The specific verbiage which points out the aforementioned can be found within Section 1-647(c), of SB-1322, which reads:

> 647. Except as provided in paragraph (2) of subdivision (b) and subdivision (l), every person who commits any of the following acts is guilty of disorderly conduct, a misdemeanor…(c) Who accosts other persons in any public place or in any place open to the public for the purpose of begging or soliciting alms. (e) Who lodges in any building, structure, vehicle, or place, whether public or private, without the permission of the owner or person entitled to the possession or in control of it.

So it is now a crime to ask for financial assistance from anybody, in public places and public spaces in California, and it is now a crime to sleep on anybody's property, without their express permission—and this includes a public park, or a bus bench, or a sidewalk. In short, being destitute in the State of California is now a crime.

No matter how you look at it, the State of California has made panhandling and sleeping in a public place illegal. If you get arrested for either offense, and have the money to fight it in court, you might be able to thwart a conviction, or get your conviction overturned. But if you're destitute or homeless (which is virtually the only reason why you would panhandle or sleep in a public place to begin with), you won't be able to fight the charges anyway. Ch-ching—the state wins again!

Do as we say, not as we do…big profits for us, pure chaos for you

Myriad corporations, via the avid protection and eager assistance of their liberal, legislative lapdogs in California, can now force vaccinations on virtually any child who resides within the state, a practice which, as a whistleblower who worked for the Center for Disease Control has very openly admitted, imposes serious health risks on the recipient; they can gobble up as much of the available potable water in California as they desire and sell it or hoard it at their leisure; and now, pimps, thugs, gangsters and degenerates can prostitute your underage child without fear of interference from the law, while any adult with enough money to pay for the service can freely and openly bang your underage child without fear of legal reprisals of any kind (more on this in a minute).

However, if you should happen to take refuge from the vagaries of out-of-control inflation and/or lawmaker-assisted job-decimation, by pausing for a few moments, in order to take a nap underneath a bridge or doze off in a park, you're going straight to the slammer, mister. And don't ask anybody along the way for a couple of bucks so you can buy a cheeseburger or we'll add a second offense to the charges.

If you are really, really hungry, or if you have no way to pay your bills, well…pimp your nine-year-old daughter out for sex, all right? Get with the goddamned progressive program, you hideous lawbreaker. What the hell is wrong with you?

It's officially open season on minors in California

So let’s get back to that child prostitution law which is housed within California SB-1322, shall we. Because, as previously mentioned, it doesn’t legalize child prostitution within the State of California, it merely rescinds any and all criminal penalties that a minor child might incur, for engaging in the practice, while simultaneously giving the judge overseeing the case, the power to designate some of them as dependent children of the court in the bargain.

The specific verbiage which points this out can be found within Section 1-647(2), of SB-1322, which reads:

> 647. Except as provided in paragraph (2) of subdivision (b) and subdivision (l), every person who commits any of the following acts is guilty of disorderly conduct, a misdemeanor… (2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), this subdivision does not apply to a child under 18 years of age who is alleged to have engaged in conduct to receive money or other consideration that would, if committed by an adult, violate this subdivision. A commercially exploited child under this paragraph may be adjudged a dependent child of the court pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (b) of Section 300 of the Welfare and Institutions Code and may be taken into temporary custody pursuant to subdivision (a) of Section 305 of the Welfare and Institutions Code, if the conditions allowing temporary custody without warrant are met.

So if your underage daughter gets busted for hooking in California, she won’t even get charged with a misdemeanor; however, she might be adjudged a dependent child of the court and be taken into temporary custody. I’m sure it probably depends on how hot the judge thinks she is.

Meet the new boss, same as the old boss

And what about the penalties incurred by adults who engage in sexual acts with underage prostitutes within the State of California?

The specific verbiage which spells this out can be found within Section 1-647(2), of SB-1322, which reads:

> 647. Except as provided in paragraph (5) of subdivision (b) and subdivision (l), every person who commits any of the following acts is guilty of disorderly conduct, a misdemeanor: (3) An individual who solicits, or who agrees to engage in, or who engages in, any act of prostitution with another person who is a minor in exchange for the individual providing compensation, money, or anything of value to the minor. An individual agrees to engage in an act of prostitution when, with specific intent to so engage, he or she manifests an acceptance of an offer or solicitation by someone who is a minor to so engage, regardless of whether the offer or solicitation was made by a minor who also possessed the specific intent to engage in an act of prostitution. (4) A manifestation of acceptance of an offer or solicitation to engage in an act of prostitution DOES NOT CONSTITUTE A VIOLATION OF THIS SUBDIVISION UNLESS SOME ACT, IN ADDITION TO THE MANIFESTATION OF ACCEPTANCE (author's emphasis), is done within this state in furtherance of the commission of the act of prostitution by the person manifesting an acceptance of an offer or solicitation to engage in that act. As used in this subdivision, 'prostitution' includes any lewd act between persons for money or other consideration.

So it's now a misdemeanor (disorderly conduct, to be specific) for an adult to engage in sexual acts with an underage prostitute in California. But there appears to be a convenient loophole in the legislation. Essentially, it looks very much like a deliberately created Catch-22 which makes it extremely easy for any adult who is accused of having sex with a "child prostitute" to escape the charges.

In fact, upon closer inspection of (4) above, it looks as if a peace officer would actually have to catch the perpetrator in the act of having sex with the child, in order to arrest the adult in question. And even if the adult in question doesn't escape the charges, well, it's still only a misdemeanor. So the full-tilt pedo party is definitely on—right now—within the warm-and-fuzzy boundaries of the great State of California.

Conclusion

Perhaps liberal Californians should try to look on the bright side here. Because things could always be crazier. Take Magnolia, Texas, for example. In that fine city, it is now illegal to walk your own child home from school.

I'll bet the liberal residents of The Golden State are breathing a collective sigh of relief after finding out about that one. At least they don't have it as bad as they do over there in that evil little town in the godforsaken Red State of Texas.

Why, it probably makes the average liberal Californian feel all patriotic, puffed-up and proud; which, much like what has now been conclusively proven to be the effective legalization of child prostitution within the State of California by your old Uncle Bob, is exactly how the leftist social engineers undoubtedly planned it.

Our Modern Marxist World – Mind Control Based On Ancient Wisdom, Dialectics And Machiavelli

January 5, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by the editor at Expandourmind

Background

This series of articles will present the challenges facing modern people and some hidden historic reasons for them. In the first part we investigate ancient wisdom from Plato and the initial subversion plans created by the 18th century secret societies and their connections to Marxism as we know it. It is quite obvious that communism rules the whole world today and that we march toward a communist world state no matter which political party we vote for.

The Timeless Wisdom Of The Old Sages

Plato

Let´s start with Plato´s wisdom about society´s organization. In his book "Republic", book VIII, Plato explains the process of the collapse of a civilization going from aristocracy with a ruling philosopher King down to a diabolic tyranny at the end. The precursor of complete tyranny is democracy and we seem to be at the very end of the democratic phase today. Plato states(from Wikipedia):

"Oligarchy then degenerates into democracy where freedom is the supreme good but freedom is also slavery." In democracy, the lower class grows bigger and bigger. The poor become the winners. People are free to do what they want and live how they want. People can even break the law if they so choose. This appears to be very similar to anarchy.

Plato uses the "democratic man" to represent democracy. The democratic man is the son of the oligarchic man. Unlike his father, the democratic man is consumed with unnecessary desires. Plato describes necessary desires as desires that we have out of instinct or desires that we have in order to survive. Unnecessary desires are desires we can teach ourselves to resist such as the desire for riches.

The democratic man takes great interest in all the things he can buy with his money. He does whatever he wants whenever he wants to do it. His life has no order or priority. Democracy then degenerates into tyranny where no one has discipline and society exists in chaos. Democracy is taken over by the longing for freedom. Power must be seized to maintain order. A champion will come along and experience power, which will cause him to become a tyrant. The people will start to hate him and eventually try to remove him but will realize they are not able.

The tyrannical man is the son of the democratic man. He is the worst form of man due to his being the most unjust and thus the furthest removed from any joy of the true kind. He is consumed by lawless desires which cause him to do many terrible things such as murdering and plundering."

If we consider Plato´s democratic society where everyone looks for personal pleasure we can compare with our modern pleasure-seeking and materialistic society. At the same time there is enormous mental pressure and all kinds of dangers facing modern people today. There is a constant information flow from the media, our education system, movies, music and art etc to control our minds. Then there are all the addictions to weaken people coming from modern drugs, junk food, big pharma, materialism, MSM etc. There are all kinds of physical threats to ourselves and our society like terror, wars, epidemics, disasters etc. Finally there is the inner threat of family dissolution at home due to the moral collapse of modern people where everyone fights everyone in line with Marxist theories.

Isn´t it dangerous to live in this kind of society? It surely looks attractive on the surface with all its high technology and material abundance but underneath the surface it has become a poisonous viper that destroys people´s minds without people realizing it. If adults don´t get it how can innocent children understand? They can´t understand and that is why they are in such deep trouble. How did we end up in this perilous situation? I investigated the hidden history of Marxism and it was a very different story than what I imagined it to be from reading textbooks.

Secret Societies And Occultism Are Hidden Forces Behind Marxism

Marquis de Luchet, who were opposed to the secret sect of Illuminati but supportive of the French revolution, said in a speech:

> There exists a conspiracy in favor of despotism, against liberty, of incapacity against talent, of vice against virtue, of ignorance against enlightenment. This society aims to govern the world.

The common free man, his family, his children, his religion and his country are just about to be wiped out unless he gets up and fights for his freedom. There are many powerful people who have spilled the beans over the last 250 years or so concerning the global communist conspiracy.

This story of global subversion of mankind goes back hundreds of years and relates back to the fall of the European monarchies and the rise of secret traitors belonging to the nobility in every country. Some of the nobility across Europe was tempted by money and power to revolt against their own kings. The secret society of Illuminati recruited many high ranking members of the nobility and their Master plan to conquer the world was discovered by the Bavarian police in 1784:

1. Abolition of all Order Governments
2. Abolition of Private Property
3. Abolition of Inheritance
4. Abolition of Patriotism
5. Abolition of the Family
6. Abolition of Religion
7. Creation of a New World Order

Does it look familiar? It´s the condensed version of the "Communist Manifesto". Few people know that Karl Marx copied the marxist plans from these Secret Societies and made them more attractive to the masses. His famous "Communist Manifesto" was published in 1848. There are three important and hidden principles in all Marxist subversion plans:

- There will be a "Master class" and a "Slave class" of people in the New World Order. The Master class looks at themselves as Gods while the "slaves" are animals to them.
- Secondly the Master class will own all property since they will become the state – hence the Slave class will own nothing.
- Thirdly, Marxism at high levels includes Satanism as its spiritual foundation and hence it has deep connections to occultism, secret societies, blood rituals, Tibetan lamaism etc. Please read the book Marx And Satan for more information.

When we look carefully into the real history it turns out virtually every revolution including the American and French revolutions were organized by the big bankers and the secret societies. In Europe they bribed the scoundrels of society to incite violence and kill their opposition. The bankers´ role should not be underestimated and Rothschild himself directly financed the Paris Commune in 1871 when about 12 000 people were executed and the church came under heavy attack by the marxists.

In the next part we will take a look at the crucial theory of dialectics by Hegel and how it can be used to control democracy in a Marxist direction. Lenin stated:

> It is impossible to completely understand Marx's Capital, and especially its first > Chapter, without having thoroughly studied and understood the whole of Hegel's Logic. Consequently, half a century later none of the Marxists understood Marx!!

We will also take a look at ancient subversion strategies from China and the Machiavellian tactics of the Marxists. Their plot to destroy our civilization is extensive, long-term and incredibly evil.

Has Game Of Thrones Lost Its Magic?

January 5, 2017 | by Jack Greene | Link | Original Link

It’s fair to say that the sixth season of Game Of Thrones has been divisive. Some fans have been enthusiastic about it, and it continues grip millions. However, there has been a growing mood of discontent amongst some. Many have commented that this has been the worst season in terms of quality.

Is there any merit in this? The season has had its moments. The Battle of the Bastards episode will go down as a classic, even if purely for the stunning cinematography. Likewise, the “Hold the door” reveal was highly emotional, and finally gave some payoff to the long-running Bran subplot.

However, these highs were punctuated with long stretches of superfluous and uninspiring storyline. Indeed, the overall narrative came across as disjointed. On top of this, character development was poor, certainly by the show’s previous standards.

Where did it go wrong?

The obvious difference is that this is the first season where the show has not had George R.R. Martin's books to rely on. Without Martin's guidance, the writers seem to have seriously run out of ideas.

This is apparent from the number of irrelevant and uninspired storylines. Namely, the Dorne story arc has been dire. Whilst the southern region took an integral role in the books, the show seems to have tinkered with and then sidelined Dorne. The writers killed off the Prince, with the backdrop of a female cabal led coup. However, there was no serious effort to develop on this, not in this season anyway.

Meanwhile, Arya's journey continued to meander along. Her long stay with the Waif and Jaqen in Braavos added little, and the regular beatings soon lost their shock value. It was a relief to finally see her back in Westeros, in the midst of the action. Obviously, the Braavos adventure was done with the intention of turning Arya into a skilled assassin, ready to take revenge on the Starks' enemies. This piece of character development was done in the most ham-fisted manner, though.

That brings me onto the character development failures of the two big-hitters of the series: Daenerys and Jon Snow. Jon Snow's resurrection was the source of great speculation and hype in the run up to the season. When it came, though, I couldn't help but feel a massive sense of disappointment.

He was not the vengeful, dark, swashbuckling messiah many were expecting. Rather, he seemed meek, bland, and insipid. This is not simply a case of the writers accounting for a loss of confidence after Snow's betrayal by his men. The writing for Snow's character was just poor. He was ironically a moribund presence throughout.

At the opposite end of the scale is Daenerys, a character who has become so one-dimensional and over-the-top as to be a caricature of herself. The Mary-Sue archetype is a common trope—a character who can do no wrong. This is exactly what Daenerys has morphed into. She is perfect, a woman who inspires devotion in all she meets, the champion of the people, mother of dragons etc. In truth, her constant proselytization and self-righteous manner have become plain annoying.

She is also apparently indestructible. Many times she has found herself on the edge of failure, only to prevail thanks to a mixture of her own cunning and her dragons. Admittedly this was awe-inspiring in season 3 when she dramatically took down Nakloz with the help of The Unsullied. But the writers seem set on shoehorning an imitation into every season. This time, it was her miraculous conquering of the Dothraki (she burned down the holy temple of Vaes Dothrak in the process). It was underwhelming, and it all seemed so overdone.

Essentially, Daenerys is now a character with no edge, a boring goody-two-shoes. This is a far cry from the books, where she takes on a much more interesting demented turn, mirroring the Mad King.

Where next for the series?

Perhaps I have been overly harsh. For all the flaws, Game of Thrones is still a good show, and there were moments to keep the fans going. After all, the audience continues to grow, as does the accolades and influence. It is just that this season fell short of the incredibly high standards set by the first few.

This is partly down to the fact that this has been something of a transitional season. The writers have had to take disparate story lines and direct them back to the climax in the next two seasons, which will be the last. In this, they have succeeded. All the main players are now in or on their way back to Westeros.

Hopefully, the next season is where it will really heat up, as the ultimate fate of the Iron Throne becomes a little clearer.

Today’s Youth Are Being Encouraged To Become Transsexual

January 6, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Not long ago, I was with a small, private gathering for one of my social circles. It’s a predominantly left-leaning crowd. The conversation turned to some of the new goofy pronouns now in vogue, and what the term “cisgendered” meant. When I declared myself to be a unicorn, it got a few chuckles.

Then one of them said that his daughter identified as “non-binary gender” and preferred the pronoun “it.” I had nothing more to say; that completely floored me. They started discussing how trendy all that was, and everyone thought it was wonderful that kids were experimenting with gender identities. From the way they described it, the kids were doing so like they try out new clothing fashions.

I wanted to tell them that cultural Marxism is ruining our youth. Doing so would’ve gotten a worse reaction than being the proverbial grouchy uncle who talks politics at the Thanksgiving dinner table. Actually, I wanted to shout about it, but I would have been as welcome as an atheist in a monastery. This brief glimpse into the lives of today’s youth was one of those moments where it seemed like I was living in a science fiction story where I had woken up in some strange dystopia.

I’m not sure how old his girl is, or when this idea first surfaced, but I’d bet a paycheck that “it” didn’t come up with that herself. I’m quite sure these kids were just exploring a new fad, but that didn’t make me feel any better about it. Since transsexuality is a very rare psychological condition affecting three tenths of one percent of adults, how did this neurosis become so trendy with young people today?

Kids don’t get these ideas on their own

Monkey see, monkey do

Back when I went to school, I never heard of anyone wanting to be called by “it,” or anything but the correct pronoun for their physical sex. There simply weren’t any boys who thought they were girls, or vice versa. I never heard of anything like that in the very large and ultra-liberal college I attended either.

Were there some who were just too shy to “come out” about it? I find that doubtful. I knew of some gay students, but never anyone who didn’t know what sex he or she belonged to. Not once did I hear the slightest rumor of anything like that, not even as a random insult, even in the junior high where the word “faggot” was thrown around as often as peas and mashed potatoes in a food fight.

When it comes to sexual identity, screwing with a child’s mind is criminally irresponsible. An observant young person can see this happening to peers.

Propaganda in schools

An actual handout in some schools

The educational system is much to blame for trying to “deconstruct the gender binary.” The GLBT agenda is generally sold as an effort to reduce bullying. I understand that picking on people for being different is a dick move. In a perfect world—which this isn’t—children wouldn’t get hassled about things like freckles, wearing glasses, being short, or having an unusual name. Of course, essential characteristics like those are not really given much emphasis, since they’re not on the list of politically correct priorities.

If the concern really was only about bullying, then all teachers have to do is explain that picking on people who are different (for whatever reason) is bad. Then they should apply it consistently. Instead, they are going much further by evangelizing "alternative lifestyles." (Don't count on them describing the politically incorrect facts about what groups you're more likely to catch an STD from, of course.) As it happens, this propaganda doesn't occur only in places like California.

Does the GLBT crowd favor pushing this sort of thing in schools? Consider the provocatively-titled article "Can We Please Just Start Admitting That We Do Actually Want To Indoctrinate Kids?":

> They accuse us of exploiting children and in response we say, "NOOO! We're not gonna make kids learn about homosexuality, we swear! It's not like we're trying to recruit your children or anything." But let's face it—that's a lie. We want educators to teach future generations of children to accept queer sexuality. In fact, our very future depends on it.

With greater chutzpah:

> And I would very much like for many of these young boys to grow up and start fucking men. I want lots of young ladies to develop into young women who voraciously munch box. I want this just as badly as many parents want their own kids to grow up and rub urinary tracts together to trade proteins and forcefully excrete a baby.

I'll give the author credit for being honest, but schools are certainly not the kind of place to preach this sort of thing to a captive audience.

In the five years since that interesting piece was written, the spotlight has turned toward the transsexual (and related) parts of the LGBTTQQIAA dealio. They got everything they wanted with gay marriage and gays in the military. So now the focus shifted to tranny stuff, the latest in the unending quest of cultural Marxism to socially engineer the world their way.

Parents aren't consulted about whether or not they want their kids to be indoctrinated. Most would agree with me about all this. The problem is, the parents aren't calling the shots.

Propaganda by the media and popular culture

"Woman of the Year"

A few years ago, you hardly ever heard about anything like this. After Bruce Jenner "became a woman," this stuff started appearing everywhere in the media.

"She" even was named Woman of the Year by Glamour. That was kind of a slap in the face to over three three billion people on the planet who actually are women. Even Hillary (bless her heart) would've been a better pick, since she biologically qualifies for the distinction. The point, of course, was to try to convince the public that a guy who puts on a dress and calls himself a woman really is one. Why do fashion magazines have to make political statements anyway?

Now this sort of thing is all over the media. They propagandize this with heartstring-pulling dramas. Worse, this stuff is being pushed even on shows for little kids too. Sesame Street—a show for preschoolers which receives Federal funding—got into the act as well. Even National Geographic has jumped on the bandwagon. Kids shouldn't be exposed to this degenerate stuff, let alone encouraged in it.

Why this is wrong

First of all, a man who thinks he's a woman isn't really a woman, even if he takes hormones and gets extensive cosmetic surgery. He's just a confused guy making a spectacle out of himself. Being out of touch with reality is a neurosis. It doesn't always end there; one of these guys thinks "she" is a dragon (warning: you can't un-see those pictures). Actually, quite a few Social Justice Warriors believe they're not even human. (For that matter, some people think they have too many limbs too.) Adults playing make-believe are neurotic, and they have no business dictating public policy to the rest of the world.

What will happen to the kids who are influenced by transsexual propaganda? Likely most of them will grow out of it. Unfortunately, some are being encouraged in this from a young age. Since the fruitcakes started running the asylum, kids are getting artificial hormones that will screw up their development, and some even get sex change operations. Many will end up regretting all this, which already has happened.

Encouraging kids to think they're something they're not is child abuse; encouraging them to disfigure their bodies is even more monstrous. I can see why the suicide rate is so high for transsexuals, which is all the more reason not to push this on kids. The activists tell us that this is because society doesn't accept that. I say it's because a guy who wants to get his junk cut off already has something wrong between the ears.

What can be done?

Just kidding!

For the educational system, devolving power is the solution. Surely this madness is being pushed from the very top. Likely this is by high-level Department of Education munchkins who've made their "long march through the institutions" and are letting activist groups write their curricula. If they won't stop abusing their powers to push this (along with other cultural Marxist propaganda), then they should be thrown out, or their department should be abolished.

If we cut the head off the snake, the activists will have to try to push their agenda in state capitals. They might get their way in the Northeast and the Left Coast, but not in "flyover country." They'll have a tougher time getting their apparatchiks in place in all 50 states as well as well as fighting parents in places like Kansas and Utah.

As for the media, that will be more difficult. Unplug from it, if you haven't already done so; stop feeding the beast. If enough people write to the producers and their sponsors, letting them know that you don't care for their propaganda, this might help too.

Until all this happens, responsible parents will have to explain to their sons that they are boys, and their daughters that they are girls. This is how nature made them, and this means something. Warn your children that there are people who want to influence their "lifestyle" (as well as their political views), and to let you know when this happens.

Then, raise hell with school boards. Go to PTA meetings and express your concerns. Many parents are unaware of what's going on, and others are afraid of getting shouted down. You might even get some criticism, but the future of our youth is worth fighting for.

It’s Time To Go Beyond The “Capitalism Vs. Socialism” Dichotomy

January 6, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

C. S. Lewis wrote that “the devil always sends errors into the world in pairs of opposite.” Whether one believes in God or not, one cannot help but notice that clashing dyads tend to work together: their noisy opposition frames further discussion, making people oblivious to subtler and more balanced positions.

Some months ago, one of these pairs of mistakes has been exposed here on Return Of Kings. Some feminists cast an essentially negative view of all heterosexual sex, where men are mostly rapists and women mostly victims, while other feminists claim to be “sex positive” and value sex as an empowering pleasure. Ultimately, both views contribute to the hypersexualization of society and both agree on female autonomy over sex, a point often taken for granted whereas it leads to female domination and the inversion of traditional roles.

Here I would like to dwell in another pair of mistakes, a pair still highly relevant to us, and bound to be so as long as we don’t find at least a consistent third option: capitalism versus socialism.

It is no mystery that the ROK community mostly leans towards capitalism. At first glance, capitalism fosters a spirit of initiative and invention, stimulates entrepreneurship, creates opportunity to thrive professionally as well as a rich market. Isn’t that better than the repressive, politically correct, power-hungry socialism? Well, “the devil relies on your extra dislike of one [error] to draw you gradually into the opposite one”, Lewis added. Ultimately, capitalism and socialism agree on stuff that should be considered as abnormalities, and both are faces of the same modern coin.

The obscure origins of modern capitalism

Libertarians, the prime defenders of capitalism, constantly say that laws of economics are natural, that supply and demand spontaneously appear everywhere and create a no less spontaneous order if let run their course with minimal rules—non-theft being the most important. From such spontaneity, they conclude that capitalism is "natural" and opposed to "unnatural" efforts that, trying to regulate it, only create friction and further problems.

A lot could be said about the short-handedness of the argument. Suffice it to notice three things.

First, capitalism, "Enlightenment" liberalism and later libertarianism are all based on a matrix of concepts that only sprang up at modern times. The most important ones are a so-called state of nature with fully formed, but isolated and cultureless individuals, who would discover spontaneously that bartering is good; said isolated, cultureless, abstract individuals as the brick and mortar of future societies; or focusing on material needs, on virtues as means for utility, and so on. Actually, all this was made out of a rather reductive and simplified view of the world, and is much less natural or spontaneous than it pretends to be.

Second, the "natural" processes of supply and demand, of bartering, of prices adjustment according to the availability and needs of a given product… were already known in classical antiquity and hence not discovered by the modern authors who were later dubbed "enlightened". They were simply kept in check by the political power through rulings, numerus clausus, guilds or corporations, as to ensure the harmonious functioning of the city and that everyone had his fair place.

Third, so-called natural laws of economics bear a strange analogy with the universal struggle of living species according to Darwinism. One could argue that this is a proof of the “naturalness” of supply, demand, price adjustment and the likes. Perhaps—but then, the analogy should be made fully and lead us to consider economical systems just like ecosystems, endowed with a need for equilibrium and stability, without which life is conspicuously “nasty, brutish, and short.” Darwin himself felt some dismay at the struggling he was reducing nature to (see Origin of Species, end of chap.3), and his cousin Galton wanted the process of selection to be put at the service of good birth rather than let loose.

The German sociologist Werner Sombart defined capitalism as what happens when money or capital trumps technical expertise or any other consideration. Traditional societies weren’t like that. In the Middle Ages, when the Western world was still living in what can be called a traditional civilization, prices were often regulated by local authorities, and merchants that were taking more than their fair share got expelled, sometimes even seized. Was that a problem? Middle Ages civilization let us magnificent cathedrals that were built for something much higher than profitability—and aside from times of hunger, even the humblest workers could eat lots of meat:

> In 1308, the people of Frankfurt (Oder) were eating 100 kilos of beef meat per individual. Men who came to work with the Friars Preachers of Strasbourg received 600-700 grams of meat per day, at a time when multiple decrees explicitly ordered, all over Europe, that hired workers should eat meat products twice a day. At the time of Saint Louis, in the 13th century, more than 8 million pigs were being raised in France; in 1789, only 4 million pigs could be found—although France had become much wider and more populated. In Berlin, at the end of the 14th century, an individual could eat 3 pounds of meat per day, namely 12 times more than a 19th century fabric worker. (Source)

All this was possible because profitability, and economics in general, were deemed much less important then.

The emphasis on employer-employee “free” relationships (outside of family, guilds, and castes), on accumulating capital, on profitability, on capital lending… is as “natural” as excessive greed. It came under various masks through catharism, intriguing families such as the Italian Medici, rogue kings who borrowed money or bought war supplies from Jewish merchants while oppressing their own nobilities, and barely religious bourgeois glad to overthrow the throne and altar so that trade would go unchecked.

The end result of capitalism and socialism

Some thinkers, appalled by the philistinism of the bourgeois class or by the harsh life conditions near the steaming factories, started to work on a new answer to these problems. Namely, they would try to reorganize social life from above: the Robert Owens, Saint-Simons and other Charles Fouriers laid the ground Marx and Engels built upon later.

Now I think most readers already know that this kind of answer is usually named socialism and that, honestly, it sucks. Modern socialism means infatuated bureaucrats micromanaging millions of lives, denying citizens their most basic rights to self-determination, destroying opportunities of economic growth out of ignorance or neglect, and pretending to be paragons of altruism when they are mostly parasitic and corrupt.

Yet, is unrestrained capitalism so much better in the long run? People motivated by greed will always want more. They will resort to underhanded practices, speculate ruthlessly, buy out their neighbours' small companies, support the invasion of new countries in order to open up new commercial outlets. Mafias will crop up, and then oligopolies, and perhaps even monopolies. Global companies will reduce the majority into corporate slavery. Once libertarian bosses will buy up politicians in order to secure their economic rent.

Before you say that this is crony capitalism and "not a free market anymore", like an erudite libertarian would do, let me answer that an unregulated market is inherently unstable and bound to destruction. Such a market opens the path for hyper-powerful bankers and corporate monsters like Monsanto. People are greedy, self-interested, and some will always go to such lengths—unless societies are regulated by higher principles.

Want more opportunities to invest? Force other countries to open their markets to your capital and lead them to rent money at a high rate. Likewise, once every home features everything a family need and even more, how do you create more economic growth? Simple: destroy the families, so that individuals who were living happily together will need to have their own flats and furniture; feminize men, so that they will consume mindless entertainment and be more obedient; create wars, so that there are more opportunities to sell weapons… All these phenomenons can be boiled down to a soulless search for profit.

In The Bell Curve (chap.22), Charles Murray pointed out that the extended welfare State destroyed healthy small-scale initiatives—such as, say, neighbor fundraising for a little girl with cancer—by replacing them by cold bureaucratic stuff. This is absolutely true, and it should be said that Wall-Mart destroying local shops does the same thing. Here the modern (statist) Left and the neoliberal (market-idolizing) Right concur in destroying normal sociability and atomizing individuals. Is that so much better to be a slave at MacDonald's than at a public administration? The managerial State, half-Big Corp and half-nanny administration, is merely a fusion of these trends.

So, what's the third option?

To avoid bouncing between Super-Market and Super-State, or worse, the fusion of both, we can break down the problem in a few variables. The first is production, the second motivation, and the third ensuring that the right people at their right place.

The first variable is the most essential from an economical point of view: without goods, there is no economics. Any society needs a decent quantity of several goods to function, or it will go through starvation. It also needs some quality goods or people will experience nasty side effects due to exposure to toxicity, lack of healthy nutriments and so on.

In a capitalistic system, people produce a certain quantity of work in order to sell its product and buy what they need. As the customers' taste and the drive to innovation produce better products, the theory says, niches appear and some skilled entrepreneurs start focusing on quality products, such as organic food or high-end venues.

In practice, what we've seen is the rise of mass production: low-quality products are widely sold, thus producing fat, ugly and chronically ill people who are addicted to junk food and entertainment, whereas quality products are becoming increasingly expensive.

The second variable is motivation: what motives you to work as you do? Do you want to produce quality, to get easy bucks, to maintain a position inside an unstable market? Traditional craftsmen would aim at quality, not because they expected a higher profit, but because they knew quality was good and desirable in itself.

This is a very different mindset than the hunt-for-bucks one. The psychologist Neel Burton (Heaven and Hell, chap.9-10) once said that capitalism was motivated by greed while socialism was motivated by envy: let me remind that both emotions were considered sins, and it may not be an accident that both billionaires and social engineers tend to entertain a God complex. If your work is motivated by a soulless will to power over others, the end result will be ugly.

At last, the third variable consists in ensuring that the right people are at their right place. Socialists say individuals can be at their right place out of equal chances, Murray wrote that "IQ will put you at your place", and libertarians are faithful that blind free-market processes will. In my opinion, all these bear some truth but are bound to be ultimately wrong.

A socialist State is too riddled with bureaucratic cabals, too disgusting for entrepreneurial minds, and too seething with envy to ensure that a real meritocracy can arise. IQ means innate abilities, but there is no necessity for a high-IQ guy to get a high position, since he can be overburdened by an environment that won't suit his needs: IQ is merely a predictor, i.e. an indicator with a decent correlation, not an imperious necessity. As for the markets, they are too unstable, too prone to select on differing criteria according to the epoch's bigger opportunities, and at the end too plutocratic to really ensure people are at their right place.

So, we should want a society where people produce quality stuff without encroaching on the others' wealth or subsistence out of greed (or envy). A society with better motivations, where jobs are diverse, whose members produce a decent quantity of quality goods. How do we get there? Answering this question can require a break from modern totem poles. At least, I hope I have shown that bouncing endlessly between libertarianism and socialism is without end, and that better options are available.

5 Things I Learned After My First Trip To Japan

January 6, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

ROK readers are familiar with so-called love tourism and to travel to regions such as Eastern Europe, South America and Southeast Asia with the intent to meet feminine and moderately to highly attractive females. Needless to say these excursions include other activities as well, since men tend to partake in a variety of interests and hobbies (although the sex drive and the activities that it leads to are perhaps the strongest among them all).

East Asia—such as Japan, Taiwan and South Korea—offers manifold slim female figures but also many ugly faces, to put it frankly. However, the number and share of those who are both on the thinner side and have cuter faces are definitely high enough for a monthly trip or longer to be worthwhile.

Relatively attractive males—such as myself, although I do certainly have my flaws and cannot compete with celebrities—typically go for SMV 7-8, using both nightclub game, day game and online game, and adjust the strategies according to cultural differences and the current location and context. Typically, one needs to use less game than in the West but still be smart enough to avoid both too competitive locations and places full of foreigners, and figure out logistics. In East Asia and Southeast Asia I tend to sleep at either a regular hotel, at which I bring the catch, love hotels, or in some cases at the girls' cribs (the two latter have come up as preferable options in Japan).

Moreover, universal traits such as to be confident enough to dare to talk to strangers and just be fairly good-looking, underlie any kind of result in East Asia and elsewhere. If one sees Western guys with clingy Asian 5s, then it is most likely because they are male equivalent 5s, or less, themselves.

Regardless of the exact outcomes, the experiences can teach you some lessons about both yourself and the world. My first trip to Japan taught me several things.

1. Hyper-feminine girls are the best

Before I left I had a girlfriend of European descent at about SMV 7 and we had a pleasant sex life and good personal chemistry, although her neurotic tendencies caused some damage to our relationship.

But when we broke up I felt the urge to try something different, and at least subconsciously, more feminine. My ex-girlfriend was of course not androgyne and on the thinner side, but could still not match the hottest Japanese females' ultra-feminine character. One concrete example, an individual whom I met in Shibuya in Tokyo: 5.2, 90 lbs, high heels, slim legs, long hair, short skirt, well-groomed, and—perhaps most importantly—had a loyal and sacrificing inclination.

Of course, we should be careful to generalize in misguiding ways, but as far as anecdotal evidence based on numerous accounts goes, one rarely or even never experiences these traits among Western counterparts. For instance, the girl waited for me for over 20 minutes so that I could get back to my hostel to collect cash for the love hotel at which we continued our early morning rites. She also clearly waited a good while for me to have the nuts, albeit being tired, during our first love session.

2. Thinner girls are hotter than "normal" girls

A large share of us tends to be attracted by girls within a continuum of various height-weight ratios between, let's say, 5.1-5.9 and about 90-130 lbs. Some are quite thin

(although not anorexic) and some are so-called normal. We consequently think that small tits are okay but larger, even fake tits, are good too. Beauty comes in quite many, but obviously not all shapes and sizes.

What I learned from my experience in Japan is that few things can compete with a petite hot body. It is not so much the front as the rear side of her female corpus that appeals to one's taste: the sculptured back and the firm ass, bulging like a solid yet spheric pale apple, and which manifest themselves as heavenly exotic fruits during a sequence of coitus more ferarum. After that I have been going after these types of girls, regardless of ethnic background, rather than the "normal" types, whose asses tend to more paste-ish without the clothes on.

3. Western males and Asian females is a win-win situation

I am not an Asian fetishist, and like I stressed in the preamble of this article, I am fully aware of all the uglies. But when it comes to attractive Asian females and corresponding Western males, things might sometimes be like plus and minus poles. And the best thing is that it is a win-win situation for both sides.

Apart from the celebrities and some jacked fitness guys here and there, I think that East Asian males generally lack game, and appear to largely rely on the proximity factor. So when the more handsome and charming Western guys arrive, the local girls can temporarily escape their boring daily tasks and have some fun, for a night, week, month, or in rare cases perhaps more than a year.

This represents intercultural exchange of the most intimate kind, and is even better for mutual understanding than trade or boring academic research. One can only have an insider's perspective after one has been – literally—inside of a local girl. Only post-colonial nonsense and feminist resentment can consider these beautiful acts as something "problematic".

4. Romantic love is more exciting than ONS

As much as a decent ONS is thrilling, regardless of location, some romantic element is often preferred in my opinion. Many guys are made up of both alpha and beta elements. We may create a superficial charm facade, try to appear somewhat better than we actually are, and make a bald move in the right moment, but many also thirst for some love and intimacy.

It is perhaps not love in the strict sense to hang out with a cute foreign girl for a week, have dinner, walk hand in hand, laugh, smile, fuck multiple times, and then say good bye before separation, but it is still preferable to a drunk fuck around 5 PM. That is also why love tourism is not only an euphemism used to distinguish it from sex tourism, but a relevant and substantial term.

5. Language is a very important aspect of communication

If there is anything I lacked during my visit to Japan, it is more well-functioning verbal communication. In that respect I actually missed my histrionic career girl back home to some extent. As much as I love the exotic dimensions of traveling and meeting foreign chicks, communication with too few words might in some cases reduce the completeness of the entire context.

For the very same reason I do in some regards prefer foreign girls who speak decent English, such as Filipina girls or Japanese or Korean Americans currently living in Asia—if they have not become fat—or for some reasons more cosmopolitan Asians.

How The Washington D.C. Swamp Is Still A Threat To Donald Trump's Administration

January 7, 2017 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Happy New Year, Return Of Kings! Now having said that, the festivities are over and it's incumbent on us to look forward, not back. We won great victories last year, no question about it, but we need to think ahead if we want to keep winning. As Robert Greene advised in his 48 Laws of Power, the past must constantly be slain. Never try to coast on your laurels.

It would now behoove us to remember that we won an operational victory in 2016. It was no doubt decisive, but its full extent was that it merely gave us the opportunity to win big on the strategic level. If we don't strike boldly into the enemy interior, what use was overrunning the forts that guarded our opponents' frontiers? Unfortunately, Republicans have a habit of letting golden opportunities go to waste, preferring minor tactical victories rather than massive offensives into enemy territory when it's open and ripe for attack.

The beaches have been stormed. Now what?

This is the danger above all others that Donald Trump must avoid. He will no doubt be tempted, as we're already seeing, to move elsewhere, to squander his political capital on matters of secondary importance. This can be discerned when you hear that "Trump's foremost campaign promise was to repeal and replace Obamacare."

No, Donald Trump's foremost campaign promises were immigration (ending illegal and reforming legal immigration to put American citizens and workers first), ending a bad trade regime to bring back jobs, and stopping a warmongering foreign policy.

If Trump doesn't make significant inroads on those issues, I and most of you also will consider his presidency to have been a total failure.

So while I've been largely encouraged by some of the things Trump's done (kicking David Koch off his golf course was good optics), you can never be too cautious when it comes to the swamp that is Washington. Donald Trump should not allow himself to make the mistake of getting bogged down into a fight not of his own making. In this regard the members of his own party (nominally) are often more dangerous than the opposing Democrats. The house GOP trying to gut the independent ethics committee as soon as the new Congress took office was an early warning sign, but Trump's prompt response that forced them to back down was an encouraging one, suggesting that he'll be able to rein in his own party.

To put it bluntly, there is a big danger that his own party will try to get him mired in stupid fights for the benefit of "Conservatism, Inc.," rather than his own agenda to make America great again. Obamacare needs to be repealed and replaced, but the speed at which they're attempting to do this without a clear replacement could prove troublesome (Trump's recent tweets about the monstrosity of Obamacare being the Democrats' pet are right on the mark). They must do it the right way, and at any cost, Trump should avoid a protracted and bitter healthcare fight, the very thing that crippled Obama domestically for the remainder of his presidency.

Walking into those traps that result in at best a Pyrrhic victory must be avoided at all cost. The big fight should be saved for immigration, trade, jobs, etc. If the country (minus California) wanted to repeal Obamacare and lower taxes, it could have voted for any other Republican candidate. That agenda wasn't what gave Trump his unique appeal. It wasn't why Pennsylvania, Michigan, and Wisconsin voted Republican for the first time in 30 years. Trump knows this, but it's an open question whether the GOP establishment does. Will they simply attempt to return to their old ways? Will they even side with the left against him if he goes off the traditional reservation on things like immigration?

Bigger danger lies in the realm of foreign policy, where we're already starting to see the globalist bipartisan consensus establish itself against Trump. It seemed likely when the anonymous allegations of "Russian hackers" spread their way through the fake news media some weeks ago, but now President Obama and members of Trump's "own party" have begun to try to box him in with foreign policy, at least in regards to Russia. This effort has been spearheaded by the Senate's two most intransigent warmongers, John McCain and Lindsey Graham, who may use the specter of "muh Russian hackers" to attempt to extract concessions from Donald Trump.

When 2016 began, I wrote that it would be a year of profound political realignment. What's most amusing to me is that part of that realignment looks to consist of a burgeoning alliance between leftists and one of their supposed traditional enemies, neoconservatives. We saw the beginnings of this when Hillary Clinton got virtually unanimous neocon support during the campaign and she made overtures to them throughout, but in the wake of the election and the Russian hacking hysteria, the alliance seems to have crystallized. Cognitive dissonance over Trump (less formally known as Trump Derangement Syndrome) will also assure that many of the Democrats' "progressive" base will be fine with a neocon alliance because "Trump = bad."

How powerful this blooming alliance becomes remains to be seen. The first test will be Rex Tillerson's nomination for Secretary of State. He has come under fire because he was once seen drinking champagne with Putin. Only four Republicans need defect to halt the nomination. I suspect this won't happen, as the neocons would need to save face with their own party to get support on other initiatives, but this trend is well worth watching on other, less public issues. The foreign policy establishment is dead-set against Trump pursuing a realist, America first stance on the world stage. I'm 99% certain they're secretly enraged that Trump correctly doesn't believe that Ukraine and Syria (always in Russia's sphere of influence) are worth enmity with the Russians over.

This leftist/neocon alliance probably also includes some prominent people in the so-called "deep state," personified by the intelligence agencies, which the new Senate Minority Leader, Chuck Schumer, is saber-rattling with.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=m_cxbPUo5XA

Safe to say, any information percolating through leftist/neocon outlets, especially citing "intelligence agencies," must be taken with extreme skepticism, and we must also be on guard against Trump being influenced by such hysteria in any way (he's holding up well so far).

The time ahead is one of great promise, but there are also a great many dangers. To prevent the swamp from draining Trump instead of the other way around, Trump's base will have to be continuously engaged, focused on strategic priorities, watching the new subversive alliances like hawks, and yes, begin to kick the useless appendages like McCain and Graham out of power.

Let's prepare for another revolution in 2018.

Do You Really Want To Be A Patriarch?

January 7, 2017 | by Lucas Temple | Link | Original Link

The ultimate question about marriage each man here needs to honestly ask himself is, "Do the pro's outweigh the cons for me?" especially if you wish to have a family in the future. What do YOU as a man want to get out of life? If you go down the family path of life, you will find yourself hanging out more with men who married, older, and wiser as you try to navigate having responsibilities and a wife. That ole' friend circle of single dudes on the prowl will be be replaced by other married men. Video game binges, "Me" time, and much else will take a backseat.

Why a wife?

Stumbling upon the red pill can bring you all the hedonistic immediate pleasures of the flesh, mind, and reputation. Encountering Roosh's work and many others in the manosphere helped me learn the game I would need to find a quality wife. It also taught me that there is a price to be paid for a long-term player lifestyle—namely not being able to bond with a woman anymore. Every man needs to sow his wild oats, but for how long? When is he ready for the next season in life?

I was determined to absorb the lessons from the experiences of those in the manosphere and avoid player burnout. My focus shifted to seeking wife material—as did the venues I spent my time. Self-improvement was a must if I wanted a marriageable girl, especially since I was and still am an asshole, I don't have a great job, and I'm not exactly a son-in-law that every father wants for their daughter.

Even though I knew what REALLY made girls tingle down there, I still wanted love and romance that my ancestors had, but a successful marriage that will last has to be built on much more than just that, something older generations understood with the much despised "arranged marriages." I had to be logical before I was emotional in my mindset.

She is a gem who shares my values, has strong sexual and physical attraction for yours truly, and even though both of us aren't currently church going Christians, we understand the necessity for our kids to grow up as with Christianity being at the core to their identity.

In fact, I had to be absolutely sure that she had the same goals and expectations for the future that I did. She also knew of my high sex drive and the expectations I had for married life. (I'll emphasize that not ONCE has she turned me down for sex.) This allows me to invest my time in other areas, which is quite a bit once you consider how much time you had to devote to getting laid. It's allowed me to write more, acquire new skills, and sharpen iron with other like-minded men in my area.

A New Set Of Responsibilities

Being married, my hunting mindset when I was single dissipated—my thirst being quenched by my wife. I've put down my bow, picked up my plow, and my wife and kid are a new responsibility in which I have shoulder the leadership of my family which has lit a new fire inside me. When my son smiles at me now, I realize that it's all been worth it.

Being any kind of Patriarch is very HARD work—much harder than pumping and dumping plates. Much of what you need has to be learned along the way and experienced. Leading your family by example is ridden with difficulties and often you won't get any immediate appreciation. The fruit of your labor won't be realized for a while. Long and hard hours are apart of the burden.

As TheFamilyAlpha points out, "Married men and fathers, look upon your wife & kid(s) as fuel, not an anchor. Recognize that your role in life is different than the single guys out there. They can travel in a moments notice while you are raising the next generation of men and women who will raise the standard of masculinity and femininity in our society."

You will be changing a few of these.

You will learn by experience. For instance, I failed several comfort tests when our son was in the NICU because of my own selfishness and inability to see that instead of comforting words—what she desperately needed was a hug. I've learned that my wife's self confidence is just as important as my own. I had to experience several fights before I figured out they were best ended by escalating to sex.

One time, I was so lost after a fight with my wife that I called our own Quintus Curtius for wisdom. The piece of wisdom that still stands with me now was a simple one, "Persevere." Do this even when she is a bitch, as she's still your wife and the mother of your children.

You will adopt a new lifestyle in which your wife will need a break, which she will need often. Rest assured, you are going to have to get your hands dirty and change some diapers. She's not a strong independent woman, she's your wife that needs help. You have chosen a new burden and responsibility.

The Requirements For A Legacy

The importance of children to our future can't be understated. A culture war can't be won purely by memes, chaos, edgy statements, and triggering male feminist SJWs desperate to virtue signal. To ensure our feminist progressive opponents suffer a demographic winter, we must do what they refuse to do; have kids. We need a multi-generational demographic strategy. The Quiverfull movement understands this and progressives hate them for it. Marry a woman who also understands this and the time investment and priorities toward building that legacy.

Imagine instilling in your sons from a young age – of which I will very soon have another son—the wisdom of Cicero and the classics, the archive/treasure trove that Quintus Curtius is compiling, the nature of women that men like Roosh, Aurini, and others have spent so much time experiencing.

Men like this are creating the platforms , literature, and media to birth a new cultural renaissance that can be appreciated and devoured by our offspring. The tools are now here for us to equip our sons with wisdom, game, and knowledge to find quality women while ensuring they are at the top of the pack when it comes to competition and to forge their paths in life.

Your kids will be able to stand on the shoulders of those in the manosphere who have lit the way – and who some have paid dearly for both in their reputations and lives. It can't be allowed to go to waste. They have lit the torch, and we must take it and pass it down with even more fire to our children. If America is to be great again, this is how it will happen.

Prevent Leftist Indoctrination Of Your Children

If you want your kids to end up influenced by progressive ideology, then by all means send them somewhere which is completely controlled by progressives. This is no exaggeration. The American public school system was intended since it's inception to indoctrinate your children and to specifically shape their behavior and moral development by its founders. Don't let them. Take the time and utilize whatever resources you have to prevent this—whether it's homeschooling or private schools.

They want your kids.

No, it IS NOT enough to "red-pill" your sons. You will of course give them great advice, wisdom, and as much time as possible, but consider the amount of time you have with them vs their teacher and school. The school has 8+ hours a day with them, far more then you will get while you are working or even if you are home after they get off.

They will of course label this propaganda, indoctrination, etc. but public education is their own form of those labels. Education isn't neutral. We should never forget it, because the left certainly hasn't. If you don't want your kids to become progressives, don't send them somewhere for where 8+ hours a day they are being taught by people who've gone into education to churn out progressive soldiers.

Essentially, why have kids, if you are just going to let your enemy raise them? Marriage is the only relationship in which kids can be raised in a healthy and stable family. You can be sure public schools will introduce and emphasize every other family structure besides the nuclear one. Do not let this happen.

Your future is in your hands. Carpe Diem

Mainstream Media Absolves Torture Of White Teenager By Four Blacks

January 8, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

The totally insane media in the United States just attempted to slough off a heinous and obvious hate crime case. Why? The victim was white. And even though he is mentally disabled, race trumps all in their religious adherence to The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed doxy. To them, black people can't commit hate crimes. This belief makes media marionettes the ultimate racists.

Jordan Hill, 18, Tesfaye Cooper, 18, Brittany Covington, 18, and Tanishia Covington, 24 beat a mentally disabled white man while making him scream "Fuck white people!" and "Fuck Donald Trump!" in between forcing him to drink water from a toilet. Imagine for a moment if four white teens beat a disabled black man, and made him scream "Fuck black people!" and "Fuck Barack Obama!" how differently this case would have been treated by the race-obsessed media. One doubts they would be making excuses for the perpetrators. But that's exactly what they did with the Chicago beating case.

The lush Don Lemon doesn't think beating disabled white people is evil

Media figures like the 15-watt light bulb Don Lemon, fresh back from his latest, embarrassing, drunken escapade in New Orleans defended the criminals on CNN. He chalked the incident up to being a case of “bad home training” rather than the hate crime the Chicago Police later called it:

> I don’t think it’s evil. I don’t think it’s evil. I think these are young people and I think they have bad home training. I say, who is raising these young people? I have no idea who’s raising these young people. Because no one I know on Earth who is 17 years old or 70 years old would ever think of treating another person like that. It is inhumane. And you wonder, at 18 years old, where is your parent? Where’s your guardian?

Beyond defending criminals just because they’re black (disability of the victim be damned) Lemon just got sour reviews after showing the world how a “real news” agency comports itself on New Year’s Eve by downing tequila shots, becoming a stumble bum drunk in front of millions, piercing his ear, waxing sentimental about his love life, and asking his co-worker to marry him. That’s “real” journalism, you see. Take a lesson, fake news sites.

Maybe Lemon actually enjoyed seeing the victim beaten and being forced to chant “Fuck Donald Trump” since Lemon has been going on anti-Trump tirades all year long, including his latest proposal for the network not to cover the President-elect’s Cabinet appointments because he Tweets them rather than prostrating himself before media jackals at press conferences.

Ebony magazine’s editor says black people should “stop trying to be good” and defended a hate crime committed against a disabled white man

Ebony magazine’s editor, somebody named Jamilah Lemieux spilled the beans on why the media was defending four assailants, transmitting the subliminal cultural message that white teens can be viciously beaten and not be charged with hate crimes to millions:

> I have to say, I would not describe hate crime as the most comfortable word choice, considering these circumstances. There’s so much that we do not know about what took place, what motivated this person. We only have the one account of law enforcement. We haven’t had the opportunity to really look into his history in a meaningful way.

CBS News even went so far as to censor the race of the attackers. That fact stands in stark contrast to the media's rush to label Hispanics with the White Hispanic label when they commit heinous crimes, as in the case of Fort Lauderdale shooter Estaban Santiago who shot up an airport on Friday. Even other media apparatchiks couldn't figured that twisted mess out. Just so you know: Brown Hispanics are good and White Hispanics are bad to the leftist media Hivemind.

The mainstream media hates white people. Let that sink in for a while. Many of us already know this, but their handling of the Chicago beating case further reinforces the point, as does their rush to label the Fort Lauderdale shooter white in a separate case.

Hate Crimes in the Injustice System

Never forget, the only reason the victim is receiving protection under hate crime legislation is because he's disabled

It's also interesting to note how this case plays out in the injustice system.

Hate crime legislation does not protect white people. In fact, the only reason the Chicago beating is being prosecuted as a hate crime is because it was committed against a man with a disability. In the eyes of the injustice system, forcing a man to yell "Fuck white people!" while he's being beaten doesn't rise to the level of a hate crime because white people aren't a "protected class" under the law.

One will find that white people can only be perpetrators in civil rights legislation, and can never be victims. Breitbart pointed this out in an article a few years back, in which Mr. Fast and Furious gun scandal himself, Eric Holder openly said just that. He was defending thugs standing outside voting booths trying to intimidate people during the 2008 election of Mr. Hope and Change.

> When you compare what people endured in the South in the 60s to try to get the right to vote for African Americans, to compare what people subjected to that with what happened in Philadelphia, which was inappropriate…to describe it in those terms I think does a great disservice to people who put their lives on the line for my people.

Breitbart clarifies what Holder really means.

> Whites are the permanent "oppressors" in the mainstream media narrative, while all other races are the permanent "victims." In fact, "white" and "oppressor" are essentially synonymous — meaning: whites are the bad guys. All whites have > been lumped together and typecast in a bad reality TV show. Because whites as a group do not have clean hands, therefore, they are denied the right of seeking justice.

Mr. Fast and Furious does not believe hate crime legislation should protect whites

So, modern hate crime laws make white people sitting ducks because one can never be seen as oppressing Whitey under the eyes of the law and in the open court of the mainstream media. Once again we find ourselves staring Racial Bolshevism straight in the face. I defined the concept of Racial Bolshevism on my blog in late 2015:

> Whereas the original Bolsheviks believed that the Communist utopia could not be achieved without the elimination of the bourgeois class, the contemporary Racial Bolsheviks believe that the multi-cultural utopia cannot be achieved without the elimination of white people–especially white men.
> That doesn't mean that they're planning to kill you. That's not how mind control works. They think they're just "seeking justice" for non-whites. But of course they will never define in concrete terms what "racial justice" actually is. It's all kept tantalizingly abstract for a reason – namely, so that there is no end game, ever. That means that they can never stop. Every defeated injustice yields a new racial injustice on the horizon, which must then be defeated.
> Finally, the unacceptable injustice will be the very existence of white people.

The Chicago beating case is yet another example of this agenda at work, after the long, hot summer of violence in which mobs were given carte blanche to destroy cities because they weren't white mobs. This is why the media is imploding and increasing numbers of people don't believe a word they say, anymore. It is an industry full of dishonesty and outright contempt for the white working class of the United States.

Use the insanity of liberal narratives for fun, profit, and protection: Become a male lesbian

In the meantime, until there is regime change and the media is burned to the ground via their own stupidity, it behooves straight, white, Christian, heterosexual males to take up the cloak of civil rights protection by becoming one of the “protected classes” under the eyes of the law. I pointed out how this can be done in an article entitled: How to Join a Protected Class by Becoming a Male Lesbian. It shows straight men how they can use the gender racket to their advantage without affecting their status as men who are attracted to women and love knocking out tail.

How lucky for the victim he was disabled, otherwise this case would have never been labeled a hate crime, even though that’s exactly what it was.

The unending racial antagony – stirred up by the power structure – is one major reason I have expatriated from the United States and only occasionally return to visit family and take more money out of the system. Nowhere I travel has the same level of racial propaganda/warfare as the United States does, and all of it comes from agenda-setting Marxists in high places in the media obeying the commands of their globalist overlords. Their orders are to keep the populace divided and conquered if they want to keep their cushy jobs in cheap suits.

4 “Superfoods” And Their Effectiveness

January 8, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Yes, it appears my output this week, for both Return Of Kings and my own website, is very culinary-centric indeed. But it’s always worth talking about food: After all, one does try to eat every day if he can help it.

One of the major topics discussed in this corner of the internet is that of dietary supplements: which ingredients and panaceas will serve to give you an edge over the foot-dragging normies that clog the road in your daily life.

Personally speaking, I never really cared for specifically marketed supplements, finding that just sticking to the basics—the “Don’t Eat Shit” diet, getting a good night’s sleep, not masturbating—already makes me healthier and more alert than your average slob. But of course there is a lot of talk about “superfoods” and things that can allegedly give you an edge. But how accurate are these claims?

So with that being said, here’s four foods that can be commonly purchased that are often talked about as being great “superfoods”, and the truth about whether these claims have any basis to them.

1. Fish/Omega-3 Fatty Acids

Fish is, of course, a quintessential “brain food” that many of you are likely aware of already. This is because the central nervous system (Whether it be the axons, synapses, glial cells, neurons, etc.) is made almost entirely of fatty tissues, and the fatty acids and healthful oils in fish will of course gird and enhance these neural connections.

To clarify further, the fish—and fish oil—that you are likely hearing being bandied about as “buzz words” in your day to day life are the nigh-mythical “Omega 3” fatty acids, which you’re supposed to be eating more of, and the “Omega 6” fatty acids that you should reduce your intake of. But what do these mean?

To put it very simply: Omega 3 fatty acids are what are known as “polyunsaturated fatty acids”, that have a double covalent bond in the third carbon pair from the end of the fatty acid “tail”—which is to say that the bond shares electrons between the two carbon atoms, if you will remember your chemistry classes.

Omega 6 fatty acids, in contrast, are found in vegetable fats, and while they are by themselves not particularly harmful (being similar polyunsaturated fatty acids), excess consumption of them has been linked to breast cancer in women and enzyme dysfunction. This is likely where any problem comes from, as some studies have shown the average person today eats a ratio of 15:1 Omega 6:Omega 3, and this is likely a problem that can be solved with the aforementioned “don’t eat shit” diet.

Studies have not shown that these Omega 3 fish oils prevent cancer or heart disease as is commonly claimed, but the mental health benefits and the promotion of stable nervous function would surely be enough reason to eat fish on a fairly regular basis. They also promote proper metabolic function.

2. Taurine

Taurine is a carbon based acidic compound that is indeed essential to various bodily functions, such as skeletal muscle function, cardiovascular function, and bile production. However, it occurs naturally in meat and fish, and indeed, vegans often need supplementation for it. Increasing one's taurine intake has not been shown to have negative effects, nor has it shown any "souped up" functions in test patients either, contrary to what your "dudical" energy drink cans say because "taurine sounds like a bull, brah!" You shouldn't be drinking energy drinks anyway; they taste like ass and philosophically embody everything wrong with the 1990s.

Not dieticians

3. Goji berries

Goji berries, also known as "wolf berries," are a fruit native to East Asia, part of the nightshade family that also includes the potato and the tomato, among others.

These berries are perfectly edible and are about as healthy as the average dried berry you can eat, but therein lies the key: it's not any MORE healthy than your average occidental fruit. Sadly, many people are fooled by marketing campaigns playing up the faux-"Oriental Mysticism" angle. These marketing campaigns are, coincidentally, often run by the same Southern California burnout douchebags that push Taurine on you as well. Feel free to eat them if you want, they won't hurt you, but I wouldn't pay any more than you would for a box of raisins or cranberries.

4. Quinoa

I'm going to be blunt: Stop eating this. It's nutrient composition is the same as any other comparable cereal grain such as brown rice, so it won't hurt you. However, the increased consumption of it amongst trendy gourmands—I'm using the proper term for what idiots refer to as "foodies"—in the West has led to it increasing in price in its home region of the Andean plateau. In other words, trend-hopping Westerners are making it more difficult for people to purchase it as a subsistence crop.

I hate having to speak on this tack, as it comes off as vaguely social justice warrior-ish, but seeing as I generally wish all peoples of the world well, and feel that there are plenty of ways for people to make their plates "cooler" without leaving their home, I'll have to ask people to stop hyping up quinoa.

If you MUST be better than the Joneses, and you want a hip and cool new cereal grain, try sorghum, which grows in your metaphorical backyard.

And as I laugh at the very concept of sorghum being cool and hip (I have some bad memories of the grain), I will reiterate that eating a sensible, clean diet is the surest pathway to health.

4 Ways Immigration Changed My Native Community

January 9, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

I recently visited my family for Christmas. Apart from the joy of seeing them, going back to France is not something I look forward to anymore, since the veil of media and government lies has been removed from my eyes.

I observed noticeable demographic and physical changes in the city where I studied (third tier city), due to recent pro-migrant stance of the government adding to the earlier problems caused by post-colonisation immigration, between my arrival (mid 2000s) to the present year.

I strolled around for a few days taking mental notes and will share now my observations, to confirm what most of us already know and what the skeptics still refuse to acknowledge. Simply put: We are being replaced. It is affecting us all and it is very real.

1. Destruction of native habitat

Migrants set one of the oldest buildings of the city (where they were squatting) on fire this summer. This was the second place they burnt down this year. Churches were deserted and were falling into ruins or are downright destroyed by the government that deems them a waste of space, being too busy courting the Saudi and other radical regimes that fund French mosques.

With the pauperisation of of the native population, locals food shops (butchers especially) close down. Their quality products have become a luxury and many choose to shop at globalist-friendly supermarkets. Kebab shops and halal butchers now pop up at every corner with the stench of putrefied mutton invading the street.

Native species thrive in balanced ecosystems. But sometimes, a handful of people decide to introduce alien species in an environment that has not been exposed so far, regardless of consequences. The new specimens take over the resources of the natives. If they do not overcome the aggressor, the newly arrived eventually breed them out.

Take the example of mainland Australia after the introduction of the cane toad. The animal served its purpose at first but having no natural predators, it proliferated until becoming a pest, destroying the balance of the local ecosystem. Just like the government introducing migrants to divide the population until they get out of hand and destroy society as we know it.

2. Natives are less visible

Public transportation is always a good barometer when it comes to social fabric. It became quickly obvious that there were less natives than in the past.

Hopping on the bus, the only language I heard was ghetto French or Arabic. (This is not in Paris. This is in a third tier city, in one of the most conservative and rural regions in the country.) My mother, noticing the incredulous gaze I gave to the passengers in traditional Muslim garb, read my thoughts. “I don’t have the impression of being in France anymore,” she said.

I observed a higher percentage of native beta males with low quality non-white women and young, pretty native women with gangster-looking non-native men, sometimes with the assorted progeny. Single beta men cast glances at both situations with envy, before looking back at their shoes or their phone. If there were more alpha men, this would not happen. Women being women, they choose thrills and practicality over loyalty.

3. Replacement by a faster growth

Another phenomenon I noticed is a reduced number of native women with babies in the street, whereas Arab and African women (in pairs usually) often blocked the entire sidewalk with one or two buggies. The majority of native women under 30 that I saw were without children and if they had any, they were usually approaching the wall or with a single child.

Having been in a few night venues, the rising number of sausage fests around town, droves of non-native men grinding in single file on the same 6 and reduced number of attractive young women overall clearly differed from my freshman years.

4. Inaction of native men

The guys are demoralized. I rarely crossed a happy native man. Almost all of them are sighing constantly and dragging their feet to the sounds of “It’s the crisis,” “My job is killing me,” or “I am back with the so-so girlfriend that barks at me but at least i am not alone.” I read a newspaper article where a university acquaintance was virtue-signalling his weekends spent helping the migrants settle in a village with less than 100 mostly retired inhabitants.

The train station of my city has constantly a dozen of migrants sleeping inside it, plus the ones coming and going towards Paris and larger cities. The cops pass next to them as if they were part of the landscape, but take away the odd native hobo that sleeps near the railtracks.

Taking my train after purchasing a 30 euros ticket, I noticed a group of 6 young Afghans at the end of the carriage. The train guard came along and controlled everyone in the carriage. Reaching the Afghans, he looked at them and went his way, not checking the tickets that they obviously did not have.

I learnt later that the SNCF (state-owned national rail agency) sent directives stipulating that all the migrants (predominantly Muslim) can travel on their trains for free, which is nothing less than a reversed “jizyah” (the tax imposed to Christians in Muslim societies if they want to live in peace).

Allons nous nous laisser faire?

The present leftist French population being beyond the point of salvation, we can only focus on the next generation of men if we want to preserve our culture. The goal would be to tackle the general laziness and pusiyfication of our society in order to create richer and stronger (mentally and physically) men.

January 2017, To the past, or to the future. To an age when thought could be free. From the time of Big Government, from the Age of Political Correctness, from an angry man… greetings.

How Old Dystopian Science Fiction Predicted Our Future

January 9, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The BBC recently ran an article describing how the 1987 Arnold Schwarzenegger action film The Running Man contained many supposedly accurate predictions of a dystopian future. The article makes many valid points about how some elements of the film's plot seem to describe our current social landscape, but the author forgets that The Running Man was in many ways a derivative film. Much of its "predictions" were made by less promoted forerunners in the 1970s.

In some cases, accurate predictions of dystopian futures go back much farther, to the uncannily accurate novels of H.G. Wells (as we will discuss here). My goal here is to point out some of these 1970s films that may not be well known to young audiences today, and to explain why these movies are still worth watching. We will the leap-frog back in time to the early twentieth century to see what H.G. Wells may have had to say on the subject.

No dystopian science fiction book or film can get everything right. It's hard enough to describe the present, let alone see into the future. But a film or book does not really need to get everything right: as long as it can illuminate some aspect of the world we live in, we can derive some benefit from it. I don't want to disparage The Running Man; I saw it when it came out and found it enjoyable. But we have to give credit to those films that The Running Man leaned heavily on; some of these movies are almost totally unknown today.

Take Logan's Run (1976), for example. It imagined a future where all the world's population was housed comfortably under domed cities. To maintain the balance between population and available resources, the authorities "terminated" people when they reached the age of 30. The liquidation work was done by disposal specialists called "sandmen." One of these sandmen was himself headed for termination and decided to make a run for it. The world of Logan's Run is a world where only new things are valued; tradition means nothing; and endless entertainment has become a substitute for actual accomplishment.

Soylent Green (1973) told another dystopian story, one that rings familiar bells of depleted resources, climate disasters, and authoritarian control of every aspect of human life. Told as a kind of detective story, the movie unfolds as the main characters pursue a homicide investigation. But the clues lead to dark places that show just how desperate the world had become to assure its food supply. The familiar dystopian themes are all here: corporate control, tightly controlled secrets, environmental mismanagement, and complete public apathy.

But the greatest of The Running Man's forerunners—and certainly one of the most underappreciated films of the 1970s—was Norman Jewison's strange and riveting Rollerball (1975). This dark and profound film has only gotten better since its release and, despite advances in film technology, still delivers on every level. It richly deserves its cult status.

The plot: corporations control everything (of course) in the future, and man's quest for individuality and personal liberty is buried beneath a deluge of "bread and circus" spectacles arranged the powers that be. The entertainment takes the form of a roller-derby type game called rollerball, in which teams compete with each other to throw a metal ball into a special receptacle. The game's biggest star, Johnathan E, is being pressured by his corporate bosses to retire. We never are told the precise reason, but it likely has something to do with the fact that Johnathan has become too popular (and therefore too dangerous). Hence we have the theme of the crushing of the individual before the altar of the soulless collective: he is told he must resign from the game "for the common good."

James Caan in Rollerball (1975)

Johnathan E inhabits a dark world, to be sure. All knowledge of the past seems to have been forgotten or deliberately suppressed. One unsettling scene involves the main character going to an archive and being told that no information about the 13th century is available. This kind of scene—or something similar—hits too close to home for us to laugh along with it. The past doesn't matter because everyone's existence is designed to serve the corporate master. Knowledge has been replaced by emotion, and wisdom by blood-lust. "Comfort is freedom," as one of the female characters says, chillingly echoing the ethic of too many people today. The climactic scene of the film, with its orgy of violence, suggests that the individual can indeed triumph over its environment, but only at a cost that few are willing to pay.

I can't end this article without mentioning what may be the granddaddy of all the modern dystopian stories: H.G. Wells's When the Sleeper Wakes. Published in serialized form in 1899, it was later reworked into a novel named The Sleeper Awakes (1910). The future it predicts is one of unrestrained commercialism, complete corporate control, and the sinister manipulation of the masses by a few privileged elites.

When The Sleeper Wakes (1899): a future of gaudy commercialism, mind control, and permanent instability

The basic plot describes the awakening from a coma-like sleep of a man named Graham after a couple hundred years. He finds that he controls a sizeable part of the world but his “assets” are run by a trust named the White Council. There are rebels who want to overthrow the existing order, but they seem to be no better than the despots who currently run the show. When The Sleeper Wakes anticipates nearly all the motifs of the modern dystopian science fiction tale, and does it with the style and wit that could only come from Wells’s pen. People get all their information from “babble machines” that pump out fluff news stories (the first literary reference to so-called “fake news”); people can go to “pleasure cities” to have their intimate needs serviced.

It’s hard to believe that it has been thirty years since the appearance of the The Running Man. If you want to delve deeper into the dystopian genre, you owe it to yourself to give these older movies a close look. “The future isn’t what it used to be,” goes the old adage. But after watching these movies and checking out When the Sleeper Wakes, you may feel differently.

30 Questions To Ask Yourself For Self-Development

January 9, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Rather than reading self-improvement books that merely regurgitate and repackage the same old wisdoms, it’s sometimes best to become a better version of yourself by practicing introspection. By uncovering your subconscious motivations and desires, you’ll achieve the awareness necessary to focus your drives on things that matter to you.

The following 30 questions will help you clarify the meaning of your life and discover what lies in your heart. Instead of just going through this list only to forget about it after couple of hours, I strongly suggest you take the time to think through each question and answer them as specifically as possible. It’s best if you get a sheet of paper and write out each answer for yourself.

The Questions

1. Why do I want self-improvement?
2. What would I do if fear wasn't holding me back?
3. Who are my role models?
4. What is my purpose or mission in life? Do I need one?
5. If I could only achieve 20% of everything I currently want in life, what would they be? (Keeping Pareto principle in mind)

6. What do I have to do to live the perfect day? (Not in terms of what happens to you, but what you do)
7. What is the one thing that detracts most from my ability to be happy? What will I do about it?
8. What is the one bad habit that is impeding my ability to succeed? What am I willing to do about it?

9. What is my greatest fear? Would my life be better without it? Am I willing to overcome it?

10. How much money/power/sex do I think will make me happy?

11. What is the one thing that will bring more satisfaction and contentment in my life? What have I done in the past month to attain it? What will I do in the next month to attain it?

12. What are the five or less things that I must do before I die?

13. What is stopping me from being completely satisfied with what I already have?

14. How can I be happy while still going after the things I want?

15. In what ways will my life improve if I had better control over my mind?

16. What would happen if I didn't care what other people thought about me?

17. How would my life be different if I stopped caring about all the things I can't control?

18. What have I learned from the biggest and most painful mistakes I made in life?

19. Who do I want with me when I'm in my deathbed?

20. What will my biggest regret be when I'm about to die?

21. How do I want to be remembered when I die?

22. What would I do differently if I knew I was going to die five years from now?

23. What is my greatest weakness that I must to overcome?

24. Do I have a friend that I can trust my life on?

25. How do I define myself (without using profession as an identity)?

26. What would I be doing if money wasn't an issue?

27. What would I do with my life if there were no rules to restrict me?

28. How can I start doing all the things that I only hope, wish, and dream?

29. What can I do to be 1% more masculine everyday?

30. What value can I give to others? (In other words: Why should people care about you?)

Top 10 Articles I Wrote In 2016

January 9, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Before I share the articles, I wanted to put them in context with how the year went for me overall. I can't say that it was good. In fact, I'm declaring 2016 the worst year I've ever experienced. Here's an explanation why:

With that out of the way, here are what I consider my top 10 articles of 2016, listed in chronological order.

Letter From A Member Of The Global Elite

> Our feminist useful idiots on the ground, with their short hair, ugly bodies, and shrieking manner, have been so effective that the German birth rate is now the worst in the entire world! This outcome is better than any eugenics program mankind has ever seen. We have allowed German women (and Swedish, British, American, etc.) to voluntarily sterilize themselves with absurd notions of being strong and independent by laboring dutifully and single-mindedly in our corporations. The scam has so many levels that it's hard to respect the female sheep for not seeing it.

You're Either A Globalist Or A Nationalist

> The charade of the left-right political spectrum is being fully revealed as American and European "conservative" politicians and media pundits continue to be outed as sellouts who serve liberal interests above conservative interests. In the political arena, left versus right is an artificial theater constructed to trick the public that opposing forces are battling it out or compromising for the good of the > nation. In reality, both sides are controlled by the same group of elites.

Germany Proves That "Rape Culture" Is A Political Weapon Against Western Men

> For several years the establishment has been pointing out that "rape culture" has made the West as dangerous for women as an African slum. Native-born men, because they haven't been taught how not to rape, have been raping with impunity in universities, clubs, bars, and on dates. So much raping has been going on that you've certainly stumbled on dozens of rapes in progress. I have be called a "rape teacher" and "rape instructor" more times than I can count, all because I give men tools for having consensual sex in the most efficient (and legal) way possible.

The Resistance Pyramid

> A week doesn't go by without a man asking me how he can fight back. He's ready to take action but is not sure how. For the longest time I've been thinking about this problem, because while we do want to win, we don't want to lose our jobs from witch hunts or end up in jail for a trivial reason. There's a balance to be struck between maintaining our freedom (self-preservation) and enacting the change we want to see in our city or society.

How The Government Is Robbing Men Of Good Wives

> There are many countries in Eastern Europe that have superior women than in America, but when you start to examine these women as wives and not only casual sex partners, you encounter a big problem: they value their education and careers above that of family. The reason? Education is offered for free or at a greatly subsidized rate by the government. Western governments are therefore programming women into becoming sterile office slaves and consumers instead of good wives and mothers.

How A Small Cabal Is Using Socialism & Cultural Marxism To Consolidate World Power

> None Dare Call It Conspiracy details the overreaching "conspiracy" of elites pushing socialism and Cultural Marxism onto the masses while accumulating even greater centralized control over nations and their citizens. Feminists and social justice warriors are nothing more than the financed low-level soldiers in a vice to destroy the family unit and control human behavior while top-down pressure is being applied by forces who are above the law.

If Donald Trump Doesn't Win, We're Screwed

> It's easy to stay apolitical as long as political forces leave you alone, but the second you become a threat to the existing order, politics will become a painful > part of your daily existence as pressure increases on your speech and behavior. Many young men in universities are finding this out right now as false rape and harassment charges ruin their lives before it gets started while men working in corporate America are already aware that they are one “sexist” or “homophobic” statement away from losing their livelihoods. The fact that many men are now recording their consensual sex encounters shows how badly men are being targeted.

The Elites Are Not Smarter Than You

> For the longest time I held in high esteem those who worked in distinguished institutions. I’d revere the Congressman, New York Times journalist, think tank strategist, anthropology professor, non-profit director, and literary novelist. They got to where they are through merit, intelligence, and hard work, not through connections, nepotism, or by being a useful idiot for a specific agenda.

The Dangers Of Romantic Love

> Since we were children, we have been bombarded with propaganda that romantic love is the ultimate relationship ideal. Hollywood movies, Disney cartoons, and literary fiction all portray romantic love as an absolute necessity in any wedding union, but how much of that narrative has been a lie? Is it possible that our pursuit of romantic love is actually preventing us from forming a lifelong pair bond?

What If Everything They Told You Is A Lie?

> What to eat, what medicines to take, what scientific theories to believe in, what to think of men and women, what to think of the races, what to think of gay people, who to vote for, what to make of Russia. Your opinions on hundreds of topics have been shaped by journalists, scientific “experts,” pundits, and politicians who have cozy positions in the establishment hierarchy. We’re led to believe that the information they share with us is truthful and in our best interest, but what if they’ve been lying to us about this, that, and, well, everything else?

Will You Pay The Bill For The Coming Spinster Bubble?

January 10, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Marriage rates have been plummeting since culturally suicidal feminism was unleashed like a plague on Western society. Women aren't marrying, because in many cases they're not worth putting up with in Anglo America, and in others they're too busy living the Have It All™ lifestyle. They're also not having children, and this is having numerous consequences beyond the demographic extinction of white people.

As a result of this dearth of marriage, children, and family we can expect to see a spinster bubble forming in America in the next few decades. Women, who already consume far more government resources than they pay in, will need even more largesse from Big Daddy Government as they become old and frail. They will not have a husband or children to look after them in their old age. Fluffy cats don't push wheelchairs and drive women to doctor's appointments.

Women will demand Beta male take dollars to pay for the services they need. Are you willing to foot the bill?

Career Girl Consequences

The Have It All lifestyle leaves women lonely in their Twilight Years

Establishment media rag U.S. News and World Report recently awakened to this reality, brought on by 50 years of man-hating and female empowerment. It did a story on career girls who are starting to realize the repercussions of the barren, Have It All™ lifestyle when their pussy power rating falls to negative numbers.

> When Carol Marak was in her 30s, she asked herself whose life she wanted: her brother's – the life of a successful and well-traveled businessman – or his wife's – the life of a woman whose career better accommodated raising three children. The answer was a no-brainer: "My brother was in a position I wanted," says Marak, now a 64-year-old editor at SeniorCare.com who lives in Waco, Texas. Although she had been married and divorced earlier in life, at that point she had no kids and "made a very conscious decision" to keep it that way, she says.
> "My career was No. 1 in my life," says Marak, who worked in the technology industry for years.

That previous statement along with the following one proves women are consummate users and abusers of not only male utility value, but the utility value of their own children. She only wants children now that she needs somebody to take care of her decrepit, old ass.

> But today, Marak and her single, childless contemporaries are facing a repercussion of their decision that never crossed their minds as 30-somethings: "How in the world will we take care of ourselves?" she asks.

Indeed, how will they take care of themselves. My answer is: Sounds like your own fucking problem, feminists. It is supreme irony that women often bitch and moan about being seen as sex objects, but refuse to acknowledge their objectification of men—and even their own children—as utility objects!

There is one bright spot in all this. Men, self-reliant utility objects that we are will not feel the crunch of aging quite like women, who should be left to live lonely lives because they left men lonely in the prime of our lives. Why give women the best 50 years of our lives when they refuse to give us the best 10 best years of their lives?

After the female expiration date, most women literally have nothing to offer but baggage. (Ladies, we don't give a damn about your education. We want good companions and life partners, not good corporate drones.)

Pay Up, Beta Males

Aging women got their Alpha Fucks in the youth, now they need even more Beta Bucks in their old age

So who's going to be left holding the bag, another unnecessary drag on society brought about by statistically sterile women? Why the Beta males women refused to marry and refused to have sex with in their youth.

Even the YouGoGrrl dominated PuffHo editorial staff is getting wind that feminism is a bad deal for women as they age, and has been trying to put out a counter narrative, one that states—you guessed it—it's men's fault for preferring nubile, young women rather than wrinkled old bags who ignored them and gave their attention and sexuality to bad boys and top tier Alpha males in their youth, while neglecting, using and abusing the "good guys" they'll need later in life.

> Vintage wine is savored. Vintage cars exclaimed over. Vintage clothes coveted. Yet the vintage woman remains uncelebrated. From the moment we are born society sets expectations of us. We are expected to walk and talk by a certain time, predicted to have mastered literacy and numeracy at a certain age. Our worlds are pre-designed for us and we fit into the flow as best we can. Youth is a jumble of growth and learning and the space where dreams and ambition are sparked. Feelings of invincibility abound and we are frequently told that the world is our oyster. Nobody tells the carefree 25-year-old female that in another 25 years she'll be invisible.

What goes around come around, girls. It seems nature is not without a sense of humor, nor is it without a sense of justice. At age 25, Beta males are invisible to women in their prime. However, later in life these same men will be sought after by women of all ages to pay for things.

Just as the Spinster Bubble starts to inflate, men need to start dropping out of the economy and refusing to pay for this insanity with their hard-earned tax dollars. I personally encourage and teach men how to live lives of minimalism, living well on much less than they're told they need by society. Going Galt is an extension of the minimalist philosophy. As stated by John Galt in Atlas Shrugged:

> There is only one kind of men who have never been on strike in human history … the men who have carried the world on their shoulders, have kept it alive, have > endured torture as sole payment … Well, their turn has come. Let the world discover who they are, what they do and what happens when they refuse to function. This is the strike of the men of the mind.

Men refusing to support the very women who rejected them is the ultimate retribution for feminism. Let these aging women take care of themselves.

Single Motherhood Causes More Sexual Violence Than A Mythical “Rape Culture”

January 10, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

In 2017, mothers are often venerated as faultless parents, irrespective of the way many of them screw up their kids’ lives. Yet they are only held responsible for the positive aspects that show up in their children. For example, if a young man becomes an investment banker or lawyer after being solely raised by his mother, she is lauded as a superb role model, even a saint. But if that same young man becomes a rapist? Rather than blaming the mother for failing to instill proper values in her son, men across the United States and Western world are instead held collectively responsible for his heinous actions.

The general, if not constant rule of thumb is this: achievements and moral character can be attributed to mothers, whereas violence, particularly violence against women, can be blamed on many millions of male strangers. You could be living in a shack in rural Alaska and you are still considered more responsible for a man in Miami raping a girl than the woman who conceived him, gave birth to him, taught him how to speak, and generally raised him until he was 18 years old (or even older).

If we take America as our starting point, 99.999% of men have never met a particular rapist or have had nothing but insignificant interactions with him. With 160 million males living in the United States, it is fair to say that a convicted rapist has only formed quasi-meaningful relations with about 0.001% of other American males, or 1,600 individuals, throughout his entire lifetime. Even the vast majority of these 1,600 men do not know him intimately (far from it) and have next to no major influence on how he behaves.

And then there’s “Dunbar’s number,” the proposition that human beings can only cultivate stable social relationships with around 150 people, male or female, at any given time. For an average man, that leaves about 75-100 fellow men who can reasonably have a longer-term impact on his actions. Again, most of these people are not overly intimate with the man in question. If anything, only 10-20 of these 150 people can be considered very close to him, a group which in most cases includes his mother and father.

If mothers are not at least partially responsible for a child's bad or criminal behavior, why are they allowed to look after them?

She gets the plaudits if the child succeeds, but if it goes to jail, blame someone else.

We live in a very strange world indeed. On the one hand, judges award mothers primary custody in between 68 and 88% of cases involving relationship breakdowns that reach the court system. One would think that this is because mothers actually have an ability to affect their child's development for better or worse, to the point where the father is given only minimal, every second weekend-style contact. It certainly reflects the widely-held social belief that women are more pivotal in the emotional development of their son or daughter.

But whenever the specter of criminal behavior comes up, most notably rape, responsibility that might normally flow to a mother's parenting can be conveniently offloaded onto the cab driver in Chicago, the window-washer in Seattle, or the policeman in small-town Maine, none of whom will ever meet her son. If this is how society approaches the causal factors of rape, motherhood has to be the most impotent biological and social construct known to humankind. Another male 2,451 miles away in Los Angeles (or 3,470 miles away in London) apparently has more sway over a rapist in New York City he does not know than the rapist's own mother. What gives?

Single motherhood explains rape much better than "blame all men"

Yes, blame all men if this kid sexually assaults a woman in the future, but the mother did her best!

Anyone with a rudimentary understanding of the natural sciences or some more objectively based social sciences, such as economics, is familiar with the idea that correlation is not causation. For instance, if you get a headache every day the LA Dodgers play, it does not mean that the Dodgers team or individual players caused your head to hurt.

Sadly, notions of causation and even correlation have been severely butchered by feminist sociological tropes such as "rape culture." If we believe SJWs, Man A wolf-whistles at a hot girl and supposedly this is a partial cause behind Man B raping a girl, even if Man B doesn't know Man A and wasn't there when the wolf-whistling happened. Correlation is routinely lacking in these circumstances, let alone the much higher threshold of causation.

But when it comes to trends such as single motherhood or maladjusted mothers, it is easier to observe an actual causal link with criminal behavior. Surprisingly, the notoriously leftist publication Slate once cited a study by Princeton's Sara McLanahan. In assessing the trajectories of sons raised by single mothers, McLanahan found a massive spike in male incarceration rates compared to sons raised by both biological parents. Even when factors such as poverty, educational standards, and race are taken into consideration, single mothers are still more likely to raise children who become delinquent, criminally-inclined adults.

I am not defending fathers who abandon or neglect their children. Nonetheless, we know for a fact that crime, including violent crime, declines among children growing up in two-parent households, regardless of issues like income, ethnicity, or whether each parent finished high school or attended college. We have zero evidence that a complete stranger is responsible for another man's rape of a woman and a treasure trove of evidence that the conditions in which a mother raises her son impacts on the likelihood of him committing a violent crime like rape in the future.

Sisters, female cousins, girlfriends and female friends are also more responsible for what their brothers, male cousins, boyfriends and male friends do than complete strangers

"If a man I know rapes, every other man in America is responsible, but not me, his best friend since grade school."

Why should we limit ourselves to mothers? The ability of a sister, female cousin, girlfriend or female friend to shape someone's behavior is also much greater than a random man on the street. If we took feminists at their word and adopted the principle of collective responsibility for rape, the only collective responsibility that makes sense is the responsibility of those men and women who actually know the rapist and have decided to spend their time with him. A man who lives on the west coast simply has no opportunity to prevent a rape on the east coast, or even one three blocks from him. But the female best friend or sister, in contact with the rapist almost every day, theoretically does.

Every time a feminist accuses you of some mystical responsibility for a stranger's rape via "rape culture," your instinctive response should be that his parents, his mother most of all, should have raised the rapist better. And after that, individuals such as his sisters, female cousins, girlfriend (provided she was not the victim), and female friends are the next people who should have their collective responsibility assessed. If you do not know the man, how could you have possibly done anything to stop the commission of a crime?

"What about personal responsibility, David?"

Some readers will find the feminist claim of collective male responsibility for rape disgusting but still think I am absolving rapists of their own personal responsibility for their actions. “Many and even most mothers cannot be blamed for what their sons do!” is something I would expect to hear. And I agree with that sentiment. Rapists should be held accountable and jailed for years for what they do, provided convictions are secured through hard evidence and not hearsay accepted by kangaroo courts. There are plenty of mothers out there with criminal sons who did their best and are plainly not at fault.

But if society is going to collectively blame all men for someone raping, we need to devote 1,000 times more attention to the potential collective responsibility of his family and social circle, including and particularly his mother. Aside from crackpot explanations based on male-only telepathy, subterranean patriarchal conspiracies, and other feminist circle-jerks, the mantra of collective male responsibility for rape is the most unsupported criminal justice theory in human history. It belongs nowhere but in the academic and scientific trash bin.

Carnival Of Gangs Is An Unapologetically Masculine Multimedia Series

January 10, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following post was sponsored by Carnival Of Gangs.

Nobody who reads Return Of Kings needs to be reminded that modern society seeks to demonize and crush masculinity. Nowhere is this more evident than in entertainment, which is fiercely anti-male and actively works to destroy masculine virtues. From Star Wars: The Force Awakens, in which a bitchy preteen is given Force powers and lightsaber combat talents that outshine Luke Skywalker at the end of the original trilogy, to the Ghostbusters reboot, in which the four female leads defeat the villain by shooting him in the balls, modern pop culture is geared towards making men feel shame about who they are.

Given this obvious void, someone could easily make a killing by creating quality entertainment that celebrates masculine virtues, but not many have risen to this challenge. Until now.

Carnival Of Gangs is a new multimedia series created by Lauri Liukkonen that is made by men and for men. In addition to the series, the Carnival of Gangs website aims to provide useful information for men on topics such as lifting and others geared toward self-improvement. As of right now, the first episode of the show, "The Criminal," has been released and is available for watching. While a little shaky, Carnival of Gangs shows great promise and is worth watching and following.

Men Making Entertainment For Men

Part of the reason why Hollywood can't create convincing entertainment for men is because there are few if any men left in mainstream men. There are plenty of males, but no men. The masculine actors and directors of old—your Clint Eastwoods, Arnold Schwarzeneggers and Sylvester Stallones—have no heirs in modern Hollywood, the younger generation of male actors being a bunch of simps and wusses in comparison.

Moreover, modern filmmakers and actors fundamentally misunderstand the nature of masculinity. In action movies of today, male characters behave like menstruating women, constantly screaming at other characters and having no self-control. For example, see the Star Trek reboot, which depicts Kirk and Spock as hormonal teenagers constantly at each others' throats. In contrast to feminist claims about "testosterone poisoning," science shows that men with more testosterone actually behave more fairly and more calmly than those without it.

Part of the reason why Carnival of Gangs is so enthralling is because it is made by and starring men who embody masculine virtues; hence, they know how to create a series that appeals to men. For example, one of the show's cast members is an elite level powerlifter, and the entire team in general is knowledgeable on issues of importance to men. The site also features a number of articles on topics of interest to men, including a recent interview with Way of Men author Jack Donovan.

This verisimilitude and gravitas shines through in the first episode of Carnival of Gangs. The show's gritty cinematography, masculine characters and premise show that its creators know what they're talking about. Carnival of Gangs oozes with a credibility that is absent from most mainstream media, making it a joy to watch despite its flaws.

The Way Of The Gang

Carnival Of Gangs is set in a apocalyptic world in which a despotic government obliquely referred to as the "Federation" has seized control of all of humanity. Under their aegis, civilization is collapsing and reverting to savagery, with even posh areas experiencing rapid social and economic decline. The story follows five different characters—obliquely referred to as the Criminal, the Grinder, the Player, the Outcast, and the Hermit—as they unexpectedly meet and form a gang in order to survive in their dystopic world.

The first episode follows Ray Coleman (the Criminal), a hitman for the Finnish mafia. Tired of killing people for the mob, he accepts one final job from his handler in exchange for being released from his duties. In the process, he meets Mark Hayes (the Grinder) getting drunk at a bar. The episode is split into four chapters, each focusing on the different aspects of the story and showcasing a different variety of storytelling methods.

While only one episode of the series is out, "The Criminal" demonstrates an interesting story and a good variety of cinema techniques. For example, Chapter 2, which depicts Ray's final assassination, is told as a slideshow with music, while Chapter 3 features a silent fight scene between Ray and his target. The acting is also quite good; in particular, Chapter 4, depicting Ray's encounter with Mark, helps establish their future friendship and camaraderie.

Carnival of Gangs' premise owes a great deal to Donovan's Way of Men and Becoming a Barbarian, particularly the concept of "gangs": tribes of men who band together with a shared culture, common purpose and brotherhood. "The Criminal" depicts Ray trying to extricate himself from a gang—the Finnish mob—that is self-destructive and using him for its own selfish ends. However, the show could use a little more backstory—the only bits of it that we're given come in a quick text crawl at the beginning of Chapter 1—and more elaboration on its characters' histories and motivations.

Nonetheless, despite these missteps, Carnival of Gangs' first episode is a success and a great start to the series, more than worth watching. It'll be interesting to watch where both the show and the site itself go. Click here to watch.

3 Bits Of Wisdom From The Philosophy Of José Ortega y Gasset

January 10, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

In my opinion, one of the sharpest and most well-articulated philosophers and thinkers of the 20th century was the Spaniard José Ortega y Gasset (1883–1955). Even though he was considered a liberal of his time, his writings contain wisdom that could be used to debunk today's leftists and academic pundits, and to enlighten the reader about his own role in life and the world. Ortega's philosophy was directed towards life itself, often called ratiovitalism, a concept thorougly explained in some of his lessons of the late 1920s and early 1930s, and for the English reader found in the collective posthumous work What Is Knowledge?.

Ortega—who was mainly active in Madrid as a professor of philosophy, but also studied in Germany and lived in Argentina and Portugal—certainly had his flaws, such as the idea that "man has no nature." We know from twin studies and comprehensive work in subjects such as evolutionary psychology and behavior genetics that human beings are partly, even largely, affected by their genetic dispositions. In this sense man indeed has a nature and is not born as a blank slate.

On the other hand, some of the core strengths were his balanced views on epistemological perspectivism (no real knowledge, only different perspectives) versus realist objectivism (complete knowledge about reality). A trivial yet enlightening example of Ortega's sharp mind and didactic skills, explained in one lesson from the late 1920s (and collected in What Is Philosophy?): A person cannot see or grasp an orange in its entirety, even though one may twist and turn the fruit or cut it into thin slices. One might have a concept of the whole of it, but one cannot have the entire picture.

If we cannot even fully understand a trivial thing like a piece of fruit, how can a person understand ”society,” ”economy,” ”culture” and other much more complex and multi-layered phenomena? However, a person can know more or less by taking different positions and collecting reliable data, but must be aware of that any conception of complete knowledge is, most likely, an imaginary state of mind.

Consequently Ortega, who rejected idealism, also focused on becoming rather then being in many of his philosophical works. In the manosphere many focus on becoming, like with regard to various aspects of self-improvement, but perhaps one should find a proper balance between one’s being and to become better throughout various phases of life?

Regardless of how one looks upon that particular aspect, I will focus on some of the major benefits of Ortega’s writings. These are more related to both self-improvement and social analysis, rather than general philosophy, and as such of more relevance for ROK readers. However, the philosophical angle grants these dimensions more depth and wisdom.

1. Take personal responsibility depending on the current circumstances

For men in general, rather than to try to live the perfect life it is more about to do the best under the individual circumstances. Ortega wrote in his first major philosophical work, Meditations on Quixote (1914), “I am I and my circumstance; and, if I do not save it, I do not save myself”. Hence, do not give up on life and yourself, regardless of the current circumstances that you are facing.

Ortega has also asserted that, ”Effort is only effort when it begins to hurt.” Thus work hard and rarely expect anything else than things to be that way if you want to make some kind of difference, or even to keep one's head above the surface under some circumstances.

On the same topic he also wrote: "The difficulties which I meet with in order to realize my existence are precisely what awaken and mobilize my activities, my capacities." Life only becomes trully valuable when people step outside the vegetative consumerist state of being and actually do something at least slightly demanding.

2. Cultivate a strong individual character

The aristocratic mind, in contrast to the mass mind, puts efforts on oneself and tries to complete tasks without having to be pushed around or motivated by various external forces. Ortega wrote in his most famous work, The Revolt of the Masses (1930):

"For me, then, nobility is synonymous with a life of effort, ever set on excelling oneself, in passing beyond what one is to what one sets up as a duty and an obligation. In this way the noble life stands opposed to the common or inert life, which reclines statically upon itself, condemned to perpetual immobility, unless an external force compels it to come out of itself. For there is no doubt that the most radical division that it is possible to make of humanity is that which splits it into two classes of creatures: those who make great demands on themselves, piling up difficulties and duties; and those who demand nothing special of themselves, but for whom to live is to be every moment what they already are, without imposing on themselves any effort towards perfection; mere buoys that float on the waves."

3. Reason against mob mentality

In the current centrist mass democratic Western societies, as well as in historical socialism and extreme nationalism, the so-called mass man (or massive feminists) have emerged and continuously tried to appeal to the larger masses' lower instincts by different means. Everyone who does not agree with the current agenda runs the risk of being eliminated (or at least run out of the workplace and mainstream social circles, or having one's mother's home address exposed). Ortega wrote in The Revolt of the Masses:

"The characteristic of the hour is that the commonplace mind, knowing itself to be commonplace, has the assurance to proclaim the rights of the commonplace and to impose them wherever it will. As they say in the United States: "to be different is to be indecent." The mass crushes beneath it everything that is different, everything that is excellent, individual, qualified and select. Anybody who is not like everybody, who does not think like everybody, runs the risk of being eliminated."

And more specifically, "under the species of Syndicalism and Fascism there appears for the first time in Europe a type of man who does not want to give reasons or to be right, but simply shows himself resolved to impose his opinions."

The wise man knows how to identify and hence avoid these ideologies and to cultivate his own self, according to his particular disposition in combination with the circumstances of life, but never let go of reason as a main constituent of existence.

NY Daily News Writer Bashes Trump's Cabinet For Being Not Educated Or Black Enough

January 11, 2017 | by Luke Stranahan | Link | Original Link

"Those who can, do; those who can't, teach." Originally attributed to George Bernard Shaw, this maxim has hung around for a hundred years in various forms (my brother likes to append "and those who can't teach, teach PE" to it) and it does a good job of describing the working man's disdain for academia. However, it is now more true than ever as we head into the Trump presidency due to the political split between Marxist academics and capitalist titans of industry.

Today we will talk about some of Trump's cabinet picks, and what their educational level may or may not have to do with predicting their performance.

New York Daily News writer and "activist" Shaun King recently wrote an article starting with a review of Ta-Nehisi Coates' book "My President Was Black" and, after the required virtue signaling of institutionalized racism still being a thing, segued over to bashing Trump's cabinet picks for being white and not educated to a level he would prefer. It's an OK read that we can obtain a few salient points from to start a discussion.

Obama was helped by being black, not hindered

We are leaving two terms of the first black President in the USA, but, somehow, that's not enough for some people, like Coates, who think that he faced undue hurdles due to his race. I wholeheartedly believe that Obama was helped by his race, as black Americans got behind him and voted in large numbers. Hillary, on the other hand, tried to marshal the women's vote, but a large amount of women made the call "yes, we need a woman President, but, no, not her".

The narrative from the black left has progressed from "if you don't vote for Obama, you're racist" to "you don't like the job Obama is doing because you're racist" and finally to "if you don't think Trump cheated his way into the White House because he's a white man, you're racist."

To be President, you need to be at least 35, not a felon, a native born American, and win the election (and 8th grade Civics class is thataway for the leftists who refuse to understand the Electoral College.) Race, gender, or creed has nothing to do with it. Trump won the election just as fairly as Obama did, and one could speculate that Obama had an advantage due to his Senate career over Trump being an outsider.

I am surprised that black America is not yet distancing themselves from Obama, as he is arguably the worst President of modern times. One way to do that would be to denounce him as "not black enough," being biracial, but I don't think Mr. King will be leading that charge as he is in the same boat and it would trash his street cred. I do think that "Remember the last one?" will be shutting down any discussion of a future black President for at least a generation, however, it is just as wrong to vote against someone for their race as it is to vote for them because of it.

Education versus real world experience

King moves on to discuss Trump's cabinet picks, their race, and their education level. He seems to consider being white a detriment to their suitability for their position, which is, on its face, a racist statement which only gets a pass as it is against whites. He then negates Dr. Ben Carson, who is black, a doctor, highly accomplished, and arguably brilliant by saying he had to accomplish all that to get a spot on the cabinet to offset his "blackness."

Before we go on, it's nice to finally see someone on the left acknowledge Dr. Carson's race, as he is universally discounted by them for not fitting their definition of black which is "someone of African heritage who votes Democrat." However, it's tiring to assume that everything is racially motivated. I presume that Dr. Carson is on the Cabinet because he is a capable person who can do his assigned job and has a conservative political outlook.

This is what brings us to what may actually be King's problem. I don't believe he actually cares about the education level of Trump's cabinet; he cares about the political leanings of the appointees, and he can make his objection more palatable if he calls it "education level," as there is a marked difference between the politics of academia and industry resulting in a progressively (pun somewhat intended) leftist shift the longer you stay in academia before leaving for industry (if you do actually leave.)

As Reagan said, "the trouble with our liberal friends is not that they're ignorant, it's just that they know so much that isn't so." The election of Trump, with a large bolstering of the Republican control of both sides of Congress, lots of Republican victories in governors' elections, and tons of state level Congressional victories as well points to a rejection of Obama and all things left by the majority of states. Of course a leftist is not going to like the cabinet picks, but trying to hang it on race and educational level is stupid.

Allow me to explain. There exists a certain phenomenon when one either cannot find the career they want, or does not really want a career outside education of "going to school forever." People accrue degrees that sound impressive, but may not be needed, or even apply, to whatever they end up doing. I hold a Master of Science degree in my field, but I do not use it in my current career. I went to graduate school as the jobs available at that time and place were a little lacking, and I found my current career afterwards. Do I need the degree? Not now, but I am glad I have it. Does it make me a better engineer? Sure, but there are my equals (and betters) who do not possess one.

One needs to evaluate real world performance in a given field over educational level. Do I want you to read Mr. King's article? Yes, I do. Do I want you to read mine before jumping to our always-enticing comments section? Yes, that as well. However, do I want you to take my article as better and of a higher level than Mr. King's because I possess a graduate degree and he only holds an undergraduate degree? No, and that is my point, but, by Mr. King's logic, that would be acceptable instead of evaluating each piece on merit.

The only thing that works is meritocracy

Trump seems to be taking a businessman's approach to government, and, in doing so, he hearkens back to the original idea of American politics in which an accomplished man would step away from his endeavors for a few terms as a public servant in a governmental position to represent his people. He would lend his expertise from his experiences in commerce or the military or whatever his field might be, help steer the nation as his civic duty, then return to his labors once done.

I'm not interested in right versus left, I doubt Trump and his people are either, and I think that is why he does not fit the classic conservative ideological mold. I am far more interested in right versus wrong, and, while morality is indeed important, I refer to the right way versus the wrong way of doing things, by which I mean it is totally results oriented.

Obama's government has been a failure, and I could write an entire article, listing by line item, each failure that occurs to me, but, suffice to say that much needs to be fixed, and I care about that a whole lot more than I care about the race or the educational level of Trump's cabinet. To attack someone based on their demographics smacks of an ad hominem logical fallacy as well.

Conclusion

At this point, I can look back on Obama's Presidency and condemn it for him being black, or being a lawyer, or I could evaluate it on its merits (or lack thereof) and judge it fairly. Trump has yet to take office, so, while I understand the left's attacks being race and level of education based at this time (as they really have nothing else to go on at the moment), I would bet that the party of "tolerance and respect" will continue with character assassination instead of critiquing performance of Trump's administration in the future because, even if he's a great President, to them, he (and his people) will always be bad men and women.

The Future Of The USA, Russia, And The New World Order

January 11, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I randomly came across a fascinating document called The USA And The New World Order: A Debate Between Olavo de Carvalho And Aleksandr Dugin (PDF download). It has done more for me to clarify modern geopolitics than any other work I've read.

Before we review its contents, let's first introduce the two debaters. Olavo de Carvalho is a conservative Brazilian philosopher and writer who created the Inter American Institute, which focuses on philosophical and social issues. Aleksandr Dugin is a Russian thinker and strategist who is an independent adviser to Vladimir Putin. His grand vision is to create a Eurasian sphere that eliminates the unipolarity of the United States.

I'm first struck by what a clear understanding Carvalho, who I hadn't heard of before reading the debate, has of the globalist establishment. Here he is defining globalism and its aims:

> …liberal globalism is the project in progress that aims to establish throughout the world the Popperian model of the "open society," necessarily destroying on its way national sovereignties and every metaphysical or moral principle that aspires to be superior to individual rationality. It is the end of nations and of all traditional spirituality, the former being replaced by a global scientific-technocratic administration, and the latter by a mix of scientism, materialism and relativistic subjectivism that inspires the globalist elites of the West.

He then makes the claim that globalists are in control of the United States and are enacting policies to bring it to heel:

> The United States are not the command center of the globalist project, but on the contrary, its prime victim, marked for death. The globalist elite is not an enemy of Russia, China or the Islamic countries potentially associated with the Eurasian > project, but, rather it is their collaborator and accomplice in the effort to destroy the sovereignty, the politico-military power and the economy of the United States.

Why is the USA marked for death? Because its patriotic and Christian people are the last obstacle to ushering in a truly global world order controlled by a state-less group of elites who rule over three 1984-style domains: Western empire (the merchant), Russian-Chinese empire (the warrior), and Islamic empire (the priest).

Dugin bristles at the suggestion that Russia is already a pawn of the world order that is being used as a device to bring down the USA. In fact, he says there is no world order at all besides American hegemony.

> There is no definitive World Order of any kind at present. There is a Transition from the World Order we knew in XX century to the some other paradigm whose full features rest to define. Will the future be really global? Or the regionalist tendencies will win? Will there be a unique Order? Or there will be different local or regional Orders? Or may be we are going to deal with World Chaos? It is not clear yet, the Transition is not accomplished. We are living in the middle of it.

Dugin states that the transition can proceed in one of three ways:

1. A stable "Imperial Core" that generates policies that cause chaos and mayhem in the world for the purpose of controlling other nations.

2. Cooperating with friendly powers while putting pressure on rogue countries.

3. Achieving true globalization by trading sovereignty for world government, ruled by the likes of George Soros and organizations such as the Council On Foreign Relations.

> It seems that USA tries to go by these three ways simultaneously promoting all three strategies at the same time. This three directions strategy of USA creates the global context in International Relations, USA being the key actor on the global scale.

Globalist-sponsored commentator Francis Fukuyama wrote in his book The End Of History And The Last Man that liberal democracy (the platform that globalists herald) is the best political system ever created, and it will bring about the end of historical movements and revolutions, but only if it is allowed to envelop the world by "exporting democracy," a euphemism for subversion through propaganda, covert CIA operations, or overt military action. As Dugin points out, it's the USA way or death.

> The history is considered to be univocal (monotone) process of technological and social progress, the way of growing liberation of individuals from all kind of collective identities. The tradition and conservatism are regarded as the obstacles for the freedom and should be rejected. The USA is in vanguard of this historical progress and has the right and obligation (mission!) to move the history further and further. The historical existence of USA coincides with the course of the human history. So "American" means "universal." The other cultures have > only an American future or no future at all.

God must be killed and replaced with "rational" thinking, where the rationale of the day is guided into your brain through scientific, political, and academic experts who are controlled by the elites. Technology is but another means to speed this along, as everything becomes centered around the individual and its needs instead of the tribe and family. The end goal is transhumanism, creating something "better" than human nature on the neverending march towards perfection, stability, and order for the top 0.01%.

> …the fragmentation and atomization of society included in the technology (internet, mobile phones and so on) where the principle actor is strictly individual and excerpt from the natural and social context.
> After the accomplishing the full fragmentation of the societies to the individual atoms there will begin the second phase: the division of the individuals themselves on the parts and new (genetic, for example) combinations of the elements in the way of post-human creativity.

What "liberal democracy" really means is a fractured society of atomized individuals who are either culturally and biologically sterile (white nations) or constantly chaotic (non-white nations). Your society will be inverted to make it easy to be controlled and dominated by a USA-led hegemon, which Dugin insists is the height of world power. If you do not allow liberal democracy to penetrate your nation "peacefully," you will be targeted for chaos. If you are a Syrian, Iraqi, Russian, Indian, or African, and hear warm buzzwords from the American president that you deserve "liberal democracy," get ready for subversion at best, war at worst.

Dugin is triggered at Carvalho's assertion that Russia is part of the new world order instead of being its target:

> The globalization of the world and the installation everywhere of the American control, including the direct intrusion in the nominally sovereign countries, the promotion of American way of life and the uniformization of the different human societies, accomplished by USA, is considered by the professor as "nothing", being ignored and forgotten. The contamination of Russian society by decadent consumerist individualist patterns, the support for the anti-Russian regimes in the post-soviet space is nothing.
> The USA is an absolute plague for the mankind. And the globalist elite is the quintessence of USA, it rules USA and through it in the rest of the world. The globalist elite of the USA is the absolute enemy of the Russia, China and Islamic countries, it corrupts our political elite, the society, the country. For us it is obvious. "The sovereignty, the political-military power and the economy of the United States" are no more than the instruments in the hand of this elite, its accomplices, voluntary or not.

From this point, the debate becomes about whether Russia is part of the globalist system or not. Carvalho insists that the "contamination" of Russia society was done by its own hand starting with the Bolshevik revolution, which implemented anti-traditional policies such as feminism, easy divorce, and godlessness before Stalin scaled them back. Dugin insists that a level of elites above that of nation states is a "conspiracy theory" (he uses that exact phrase), and the tit-for-tat games you see in the mainstream news is real, that there are no transnational elites who meet in Davos, Brussels, and so on.

This distinction is important because if Russia and the United States are dialectical forces under the same controlling power, the Russia vs USA tension is theater and being used to create the justification for a war that benefits a pre-determined victor. If on the other hand they are truly independent entities, USA is bumbling its war to World War 3 by provoking Russia (at least up until Trump's victory), which is all too ready to take advantage of those blunders by re-asserting its power in Eastern Europe and Asia.

Dugin's position that there are no transnational elites, with the insinuation that world leaders are at the top of the pyramid, was wholly unconvincing. Carvalho found an opening and laid down heavy fire.

> The globalist elite is not only a vague social class of capitalists and bankers. It is an organized entity, with continuous existence for over a century, which meets periodically to ensure the unity of its plans and the continuity of their implementation, with the minuteness and scientific precision with which an engineer controls the transmutation of his blueprint into a building.
> The Syndicate is an organization of big capitalists and international bankers committed to establishing a worldwide socialist dictatorship. There are so many documents and studies that meticulously depict its origin, history, membership, and modus operandi that no excuse can be accepted for ignorance in this matter, most of all from people who intend to opine about it. No, this is not an insinuation against Professor Dugin. He is perfectly informed about it, and if he commits errors in the conclusions he presents, it is not due to ignorance. It is because the essentially bellicose nature of his approach impels him to divide the panorama into two symmetrically opposed halves, falsifying the whole picture and sending to the limbo of non-existence all the facts that refute this Manichean simplification.

As I've written before, socialism is but a tool of the elites to centralize their power by increasing the size and reach of government while weakening social bonds through Marxist poison. Here it is explained more elegantly by Carvalho:

> If the Medieval system lasted ten centuries, Absolutism did not last more than three. Even shorter will be the reign of liberal bourgeoisie. One century of economic and political freedom was enough to make some capitalists so formidably rich that they no longer wish to submit to the whims of the markets > that made them rich. They want to control them, and there are three instruments for this: dominion of the State, in order to enact the statist policies necessary to make the oligopoly eternal; stimulus to socialist and communist movements that invariably favor the growth of state power; and the drafting of an army of intellectuals who prepare public opinion to bid farewell to bourgeois freedoms and happily step into a world of omnipresent and obsessive repression (extending itself to the last details of private life and everyday speech), presented as a paradise adorned both with the abundance of capitalism and the "social justice" of communism.

Carvalho then discusses historical philosophy and how only an entity that spans generations can be an agent that affect the change that we come to see as "history." We like to think of nation states as drivers of history, but it's really the groups that hold power within those states who are the true drivers. This is often described as the "conspiratorial view of history."

> Who can be an agent of a historical action? States? Nations? Empires? Of course not. These entities result from the combination of heterogeneous forces which struggle to dominate them from within. They do not have their own will, but they reflect, at each moment, the will of a dominant group, which may be replaced by another in the next moment. A state, nation or empire is an apparent agent, manipulated by other, more durable, more stable agents, capable of dominating it and using it for their objectives, which frequently transcend even the duration of the national, state and imperial formations which they utilized.
> To be a historical agent, the group or entity must:
> (a) Nurture permanent or long-term objectives.
> (b) Be capable of continuing the pursuit of these objectives beyond the lifespan of its individual agents, beyond the duration of the present state of affairs, and beyond the duration of even the states, nations and empires involved.
> (c) Be capable, therefore, of reproducing individual agents able to continue the action through the centuries and to adapt the original plans to the different situations that may emerge without losing view of the initial goals.
> Only the following entities fulfill these conditions:
> (1) The great universal religions.
> (2) Initiatory and esoteric organizations.
> (3) Royal and noble dynasties and similar entities.
> (4) Ideologically revolutionary movements and parties.
> (5) Spiritual agents: God, angels, and demons.
> Everything, absolutely everything that happens in the historical scene either comes from one of these forces, or is the result of an uncontrolled combination of forces.

Ideas by themselves do not act on history unless they are used by groups that meet the above conditions that Carvalho lays out. Otherwise it's just a frustrated exertion or power grab that fails and relinquishes power back to the true agents in charge.

For example, now that Donald Trump has won the Presidency, it will be up to him and those around him to create a lasting nationalist movement that outlives him. Otherwise, it may blowback spectacularly and crush nationalism for generations. One only need to look at Adolph Hitler to see how a failed nationalist uprising becomes manna from heaven to globalist interests because of how quickly a foolhardy war can accelerate a world order that was planned all along.

And yet in a single stroke, Dugin brushes away Carvalho's assertions by stating that this is all merely a simple matter of good versus evil, as if we were in a Hollywood movie whose plot was inspired by Joseph Campbell, and that the world must join Russia in its honorable crusade against the West.

> Therefore, I invite all the rest to join the camp and fight Globalism, Modernity/Hypermodernity, Imperialism Yankee, liberalism, free market religion and unipolar world. These phenomena are the ultimate point of the Western path to the abyss, the final station of the evil and the almost transparent image of the antichrist/ad-dadjal/erev rav. So the West is the center of kali-yuga, its motor, its heart.

While I don't agree with Dugin on the denial of a global syndicate, and am deeply suspicious of his reasoning for doing so, he does understand the decline of the West.

> Once the West had its own tradition. Partly it has lost it. Partly this tradition has given the poisonous germs. The West should search in its deep ancient roots. But these roots lead to the common indo-european Eurasian past, the glorious past of the Scyths, Celts, Sarmats, Germans, Slavs, Hindus, Persians, Greeks, Romans and their holistic societies, warrior style hierarchical culture and spiritual mystic values that had nothing in common with present day Western mercantile capitalist degenerated civilization.
> To return to the Tradition we need to accomplish the revolt against modern world and against modern West—absolute revolt—spiritual (traditionalist) and social (socialist). The West is in agony. We need to save the world from this agony and may be to save the West from itself. The Modern (and Post-Modern) West must die. And if there were the real traditional values in its foundations (and they certainly were) we will save them only in the process of the global destruction of the Modernity/Hypermodernity.

Carvalho snaps back and methodically breaks down Dugin's arguments (or lack thereof), especially his "conspiracy theory" reply about elite groups possessing long-term plans.

> Without continuity over generations, there is no historical action, and only a few types of human groups have the means to fulfill this requirement. If among those > means the control over the flow of information is included, this is only due to a trite observation, actually a commonplace in historical methodology, according to which the dissemination of facts produces new facts; therefore, the control over the flow of information is absolutely essential to any group or entity that plans long-term historical actions. The Council on Foreign Relations, for example, managed to remain totally secret and unknown for fifty years, even though its membership included practically all the owners of the major media outlets of the West. Once the period of obligatory discretion was over, David Rockefeller publicly thanked journalists for their five-decade old silence. Should we hide this fact only out of a yokelish fear of being called "conspiracy theorists"?

He makes the important claim that a Eurasian empire is merely a competitor to Western globalism, concealed by a seemingly traditional and moral facade.

> Karl Marx himself defined [ideology as] just a "dress of ideas" concealing a scheme of political power. The scheme of political power in Russia has changed its dress, but continues to be the same—maintaining the same people in the same positions, performing the same functions, with the same totalitarian ambitions as ever.
> But as Nietzsche used to say, one cannot completely destroy a thing except when one substitutes it. It is not enough to cut the West off from its roots and then accuse it of not having roots: it is necessary to insert a Eurasian graft into it and persuade the West that Eurasianism is its true roots.

If Russia wins, Putin would merely replace Western globalism with his own vision that is also globalist. Carvalho doesn't trust Russia because of the untold dead and mass repression that occurred during the Soviet Empire, and implies that he rather live under Western hegemony.

The question we have to ask ourselves is this: if we were allowed to pick our globalist master, the USA or Russia, which would be better for us and our interests? Based on how the West methodically attacks men and the traditional family while Russia does not, I presume that it would be Russia, but we are not Russian and cannot assume that Putin would treat his American vassal citizen the same as a Russian one. There is no way to be certain that our living conditions would improve under Russian hegemony, and lessons from history lean towards a more turbulent conclusion.

Losing his patience against a tenacious Carvalho, Dugin removes intellectual pretense and proclaims what his heart desires most.

> …we have a kind of the global dictatorship. We should fight against it. If someone deprives us from our freedom we have to react. And we will. The American Empire should be destroyed. And at one point it will be.

Destroyed from within or destroyed by Russian nuclear bombs when they sense the time is right to establish the Eurasian empire? Dugin leaves that for our imagination, but gives hints as to what the future Eurasian empire would be like.

> …the communism doctrine is Modern, atheist, materialist and cosmopolite. That should be thrown out. On the contrary, the social solidarity, social justice, the socialism and general holistic attitude to the society are good in themselves. So we need to separate the materialist and Modernist aspect and reject them. On the other hand in the theories of Third way (dear up to certain point to some traditionalists as Julius Evola) there were some unacceptable elements—first of all racism, xenophobia and chauvinism.

Don't we already have social solidarity, social justice, and anti-racism in the West? Dugin calls us to join arms with Russia to replace a progressive West with a progressive Russian empire. We can only hope that Dugin is confusing his definitions on what social justice and racism are, since those features include the very atheist and cosmopolitan features that he rejects, but it's easy to look at Russia, with a 6.5% Muslim population and a host of other ethic groups to understand that the Eurasian empire will at the minimum be a multicultural empire. Sorry, white nationalists, but Russia will never cater to your demands of a purely white state.

He explains that the future Eurasian empire will be ruled by the Fourth Political Theory, which seems awfully similar to what the United States uses today, but with a traditional veneer that is nowhere close to true traditionalism. Nationalism is, unsurprisingly, excluded from the program.

> We call it Fourth Political Theory (first being the liberalism, that we essentially challenge, the second the classical form of communism, the third the national-socialism and the fascism). Its elaboration starts from the point of intersection between different anti-liberal political theories of the past (the communism and the Third way theories). So we arrive to the nationalbolshevism that represents the socialism without materialism, atheism, progressism and Modernism and the Third way theories without racism and nationalism.

The Fourth Political Theory wants to unite all the people of the world in a world struggle against an evil empire. One-hundred years ago the evil enemy was the bourgeoisie and their class oppression. Today the evil enemy is the United States and their world oppression. The enemy has been identified and it will be used as part of the "dress of ideas" to restore Russian power once again.

> So we need to unite the right, the left and the religions in the common struggle against common enemy. The social justice, the national sovereignty and the Traditional values are three principles of such ideology. It is not easy to put all this together. But we should try if we want to overcome the foe.

Dugin wants us to trade one master for another. For that reason, I have to reject Dugin's call for me to join him in replacing our current cabal of globalist oppressors with another cabal who will in all likelihood end up as globalist oppressors. Neither entity offers me anything to fight for.

While not an easy read, this debate (PDF) clarified a lot of conflicts in my mind about how to deal with our current situation. The most important thing I learned is that to replace a globalist hegemon, you will need to counter with a strategy that is also globalist is nature. Otherwise, patient historical agents will marshal their resources across several nation-states to effortlessly crush any non-globalist force.

It's for this reason that nationalism will ultimately fail after its current resurgence after the present cycle plays itself out. How can individual nations and their leaders stand up in the long term (beyond a generation) against a host of individuals, corporations, NGOs, and other organizations that operate globally and across generations? To defeat globalists who operate around the world, you'll have to be global yourself, which nationalism is not. For that reason, I have accepted that globalism is here to stay.

An Ugly African Woman Has Somehow Managed To Win Miss Helsinki

January 11, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

When you hear the words Finland or Scandinavia, what's the first images that pop into your head? My guess would be vikings, blistering cold, and some of the blondest hair and bluest eyes in the world. Studies typically show that 80% or more of the population of Finland have blonde hair. And when you hear the words beauty pageant, you probably think of beauty (obviously), elegance and grace.

With that being said, I present to you the winner of Miss Helsinki 2017, Sephora Ikalaba. She's the one in the middle. Take a second to comprehend how she won the beauty pageant for the capital of Finland.

This pageant has been all over the place. Forums are talking about this, but it's all speculation. News outlets are conveniently omitting anything about the situation in the name of being politically correct. On top of that, many of the sources are in Finnish, and Google Translate isn't always the sharpest tool in the shed.

So let's start with the facts that can be verified. It's pretty well-known (and obvious) that Ikalaba is of Nigerian descent originally, and has immigrated to Finland. Her Finnish citizenship level, and when she migrated to Finland is very much up in the air. It seems she did at least learn Finnish from looking at her Instagram account, but until the pageant winners publish some sort of biography about her that's up in the air, too.

The Obvious

Let's start with this: I'll wager that the vast majority of men are not going to find her attractive. She just lacks any and all of the feminine beauty that have always embodied what a beauty pageant is all about. For example, Russian girls have this in spades. Of course, people are rushing to defend her. The leftist-type thinkers are all up in arms, crying that she's beautiful inside and out. They say it's hurtful that people are saying that she looks like a monkey who had her head caved in by a shovel, and then stomped on.

I'll let you be the judge:

WYB?

This Tweet below went viral, and pretty much sums up my thoughts on the matter. I think the majority of men can look at these picture and surmise that:

1. Miss Ikalaba doesn't represent the Scandinavian look that is so well-known throughout the world; i.e. blonde hair and blue eyes. Look at the featured image on this post—7 out of the 10 contestants embody this.
2. She is definitely not the most beautiful of the contestants.

In the interest of being objective, I do realize that a pageant isn't solely based on physical looks alone. There are other things that come into play: charity work, accomplishments, plans to make a difference in the world, etc.

What Has Sephora Ikalaba Accomplished?

Again, the media is leaving things out. They claim that beauty pageants are about more than beauty—the accomplishments and personal side of the competition have just as much pull. Except, it seems that Miss Ikalaba hasn't really accomplished much of anything in her life. Despite scanning through the first five pages of Google and translating every page, the most I've pieced together is than she has an Instagram where she shows off some fitness gear.

People can claim that beauty isn't skin deep all they want. They can claim that it wasn't in the name of being politically correct. That Ikalaba had done some great things off of the runway. But to that I'd argue—why aren't those accomplishments being reported? They can't say that escaping her home country and migrating to Europe is much of an accomplishment, as Europe lets just about everybody in.

Surely if she had these accomplishments they'd be front and center, as a front for why she won Miss Helsinki. As an excuse that she didn't win just for the sake of being politically correct and diversity. It's painstakingly obvious that the lack of information on any personal accomplishments means that she likely doesn't have them to begin with.

Prior Precedent

A few years ago, Miss Japan was won by a "Hafu"; i.e. mixed race. That girl though, was ethnically Japanese. She grew up in Tokyo, had a Japanese name, and was immersed in the culture. On top of it, Miss Japan was at least cute and accomplished (she had a full-time job as an elephant trainer, for starters). I can look at the gallery of Miss Japan contestants from her winning year and think that she at least looks somewhat Japanese.

Take a look for yourself and see if you can figure out who won:

The Miss Japan 2015 winner is the photo in the bottom left. She seems to resemble Thai women more so than Japanese, but it's not as drastic as Miss Helsinki.

It seems that Miss Japan set a dangerous precedent. It was the start of fully embracing diversity in beauty pageants, across the board. It went from having a mixed winner in Japan to having a dark-skinned immigrant representing the most blonde haired/blue eyed country in the world. Quite the jump.

Is There A Line?

I grew up in a state (California) that's fixated on diversity. I'm not stranger to letting anyone and everyone in—Latinos now outnumber whites in California, and this is only going up. This Miss Helsinki situation would be the rough equivalent of an illegal immigrant winning Miss California. As liberal as California is, I suspect there would be a bit of pushback if this happened.

It's likely that the new Miss Helsinki will try to advance even further through the beauty pageant ranks. What a laugh it'll be if she's representing Finland in an upcoming Miss Universe pageant. It'll be interesting to see how she uses her newfound influence as Miss Helsinki. Will she represent the interest of the Finnish people themselves, or will she be a walking and talking propaganda to encourage more immigration to Europe?

Sadly, I suspect it will continue to go that route as long as the Scandinavian men are looking like this:

I look at this situation and see very little way out short of actual revolution. People are now being told that their own ethnic look and heritage is no longer good enough. Think about the little girls in Finland now, who will look at this competition and see that their national and natural look can't, and won't, win a Finnish beauty pageant.

Should the little girls in Nigeria feel the same way? No, but they have their own beauty pageants. It should not be a matter of sacrificing one for the other. It should be about European countries fighting to keep their culture, genes, and sense of national pride alive.

Unfortunately it seems as if Finland has completely thrown in the towel on that.

The Sociopolitical Implications Of r/K Selection Theory

January 11, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

A while back, I came across a thought-provoking article about r/K selection theory. The basic idea is that r-selected species are adapted for environments with unlimited resources, while K-selected species are adapted for competition. The typical examples of these are rabbits and wolves. As the article explains:

> Rabbits (r-Strategy)
> - They’re herbivores with near unlimited resources (never a shortage for grass).. The virtually unlimited resources are a primary reason why rabbits are not territorial. This is also part of the reason why they opt for breeding often; unlimited resources means they’re not going to starve.
> - They have no defense against predators other than running. They do not have any loyalty towards their group. It makes no sense for a rabbit to rush to the aid of another rabbit being attacked. Then you’d just have two dead rabbits. Because they can be killed so easy, it makes sense to reach maturity as quickly as possible so they can begin birthing children.
> - Hierarchies are pointless in rabbit society. Rabbits lives are rather simple; eat grass and run away from danger. There’s no need to invest heavily in their offspring. As such, there’s no need to prove who’s the superior (alpha) and the best candidate for passing on their genes.

> Wolves (K-Strategy)
> - They're carnivores that must hunt to survive. Hunting requires more intelligence and training than grazing on grass. Due to the increased difficulty of hunting compared to grazing, more time is invested in training the offspring to survive.
> - Because prey is limited, wolves must viciously protect their territory from intruders. While it might seem heartless, if another pack is allowed into their territory the supply of prey will be exhausted and both packs will starve to death.
> - Wolves are monogamous/pair-bond. Because raising the offspring is so important for the continuation of the species, the wolves will pair for life in order to raise their young. As such, they will choose the best mate they can find to further improve their chances of birthing strong, healthy cubs. This process of choosing leads to hierarchies with an alpha male leading the pack. Wolves also wait longer before reproducing and generally have less offspring. If they reproduced early and often, there would be too many wolves for the ecosystem resulting in the consumption all the prey and starvation.
> - Wolves are more complex. This is true for carnivores in general. Because carnivores typically live in groups, they must have more sophisticated ways to communicate. The same is true for their domesticated brethren. Look at a dog and you can easily identify if he is scared, happy, angry, or bored by his body language and barks. Can you tell the same moods on a rabbit?

This isn't a completely binary distinction. For example, some herbivores (such as bovines) will flock in packs and defend themselves. Lions are more K-selected than domestic cats.

The social angle

Peacocking works, but be careful not to overdo it.

Humans are mainly K-selected; that's what is natural for us. There are individual differences and statistical outliers, of course. As an extreme example, imagine two brothers; one picks up Atlas Shrugged and is inspired to become a successful businessman, and the other reads the Communist Manifesto and then continues to live in Mom's basement where he smokes weed and posts social justice memes on 4chan all day. Compare also the factory worker who is a pillar of his community and is proud to bring home the bacon to his wife and kids, versus the starving artist who has yet to produce much of value.

Differing societies have their own average balance between r and K selection. Those mostly r-selected tend to be more collectivist; those more K-selected are generally individualist. In isolation, societies find their own level and work out what's best for them according to their own unique cultures. When one group enters another group's turf, problems can happen. I've already described how this was a factor in my witty take on the demise of the Neanderthals, who might have been too progressive to survive, rather than too backward as is often assumed. That, of course, was an analogy for what's going on in today's society.

This even has implications for mating strategies. What we'd now sometimes derisively call "provider game" used to be the only game in town, and was natural for our society at the time, as it had been since antiquity. After the Sexual Revolution, all the rules changed seemingly overnight, and what used to work became ineffective. The flowers, gifts, and poetry stuff once showed you were dependable and good-natured, which (believe it or not) used to be desired qualities. That will get you Friend Zoned now.

The weird thing is that today's game strategies are an adaptation in response to our society's unnatural shift from K-selection (where being hard-working and stable is valued) to r-selection (where being "exciting" and flashy is valued). This is why in today's dating arena, those continuing to use traditional courtship strategies are like fish out of water. These days, being at least somewhat game-aware is pretty necessary even to get a steady girlfriend. These differing strategies lead to much confusion about what best exemplifies an alpha—a socially savvy and successful man, or a meth head ex-convict with missing teeth and a high "notch count"?

The political angle

The breakdown of the nuclear family explained in one picture.

Ideologies tend to support either K-selection or r-selection as a model for society. Now consider the part quoted about rabbits given above. Which ideology favors handing out unlimited free goodies, is anti-military, puts down traditional morality, believes in gun control, despises their own society, will run from a fight, seeks to eliminate the consequences of promiscuity, considers any hierarchy to be "privilege" or "oppression", and doesn't believe in self-improvement?

That certainly hits the highlights of the culture war. This presents a new perspective on why Social Justice Warriors want to re-invent society their way. All along we thought it was only cultural Marxism, but maybe there's something even deeper going on psychologically with the SJWs.

This is reflected in policy arguments too; compare Bush the Elder's "family values" with Hillary's "it takes a village to raise a child". As we can see, quite a bit of leftist ideology is basically about turning human society from the K-selected model into one friendly to the r-selected model. Two competing ideologies (or two societies living in the same space) with differing ideas about these things will come into conflict. The more K-selected ones will get themselves dragged down by the others if they let it happen, or even destroyed. Also, take a look at any bad neighborhood; consider it a low-investment parenting theme park.

In the wilderness, these things wouldn't happen. Apex predators don't tolerate rivals coexisting in their own turf. The smart lion drives away a pack of hyenas, and the smart bear chases away the foxes. In human societies, this has worked out quite differently, especially when clever manipulators weaponize our own societal values of tolerance, fairness, and all the rest of it against us.

The greatest problem is that we don't actually have unlimited resources available to meet our wants and needs, like rabbits in a grassy field. All the free goodies a government hands out must come from taxpayers, with bureaucrats getting their piece of the action. (So who are the predators in that situation?) As Margaret Thatcher put it:

> I think [The Labour Party] made the biggest financial mess that any government's ever made in this country for a very long time, and Socialist governments traditionally do make a financial mess. They always run out of other people's money. It's quite a characteristic of them. They then start to nationalise everything, and people just do not like more and more nationalisation, and they're now trying to control everything by other means. They're progressively reducing the choice available to ordinary people.

In the Communist world, those faced with the task of implementing the silly theories of Karl Marx had to ration resources, which resulted in inefficiency and corruption. Things didn't go according to theory, obviously. Ideologies out of touch with reality become dysfunctional pretty quickly.

The endgame

Now here's something even more disturbing. In advanced species, adulthood means being able to fend for oneself. In the beginning, people relied on families and tribes (extended families writ large) for resources, protection, and support. Some degree of interdependence in a community is natural to us, since organized hunting and agriculture increased the odds of survival, and thus we're social creatures. The head of the household called the shots in the family, and the chief led the tribe.

At the dawning of civilization, related tribes bound together into nations. The model of families living under kings was the norm up until the Age of Enlightenment, with the main drawbacks that the nobility (and those close to them) got rich at the expense of others, lorded it over their subjects, and sometimes got into short-sighted wars. Afterwards, the transition into democracies moderated some of these problems, though graft and corruption and badly-conceived wars still happened.

Now we're moving into the "New World Order" model, where a few thousand plutocratic elites around the world use their wealth and influence to implement managed democracy, get into spit-in-your-eye wars, and other forms of skullduggery to influence things their way. They're pushing to open the borders, erase national sovereignty, turn the diverse peoples of the world into a mass monoculture, and they've conspired to make the public unaware and compliant.

Overall, the elites are causing increased dependency on the nanny-state governments, which meanwhile neglect the public's safety and well-being. They've shown great hubris, trying to live as kings and make us their serfs. Meanwhile, young adulthood has become increasingly an extened adolescence, and these days many are seeming more childlike than ever. The more all this goes on, the less citizens resemble independent adults.

The extreme model of this in the animal kingdom is with some insect species, such as ants and bees. Joseph Sobran used The Hive as a metaphor, and so have I. If you don't feel like being one of their worker bees, or a neutered drone, then it's time we get the globalists off our backs.

The Elites Have No Idea What Is Coming

January 12, 2017 | by Kiron Solari | Link | Original Link

You have all felt the change in the air, no doubt. The stuffiness, the tension, the leaden heat that only comes before a major storm. Birds land and ruffle up their feathers, animals scurry and hide, and the media amps its venom-spitting to record volumes. However, if you look closely, you will notice that it is only the rank-and-file panicking. Their owners continue to act like nothing is happening. There are reasons for that, and in this article I will try to cover most of them.

How it begins

Take an ordinary European man—an average Joe (Bob, Hans, Pierre, Sven, Pablo…), a salt-of-the-earth guy who works a humble job, makes moderate money and watches ball games. He might be married or taking care of his parents or grandparents; regardless, he has mouths to feed. On his way to work and back, Joe routinely encounters numerous freaks with dyed hair, piercings, tattoos and ridiculous clothes. They usually give him contemptuous glares, if they bother to acknowledge him at all. Rich, pampered customers Joe caters to in his line of work treat him the same. But Joe isn't really bothered: as long as his family is fed and he can crack open a cold one in the evening while watching his favorite team or show on TV, he is happy.

However, one day Joe comes to work and discovers that he and most of his coworkers have been replaced by foreigners, with measly sums offered as compensation. Dejected and worried, he heads home. On his way back, he is accosted by a bunch of Muslim immigrants, while nearby neon-haired freaks laugh and film him. Then his mother calls, saying that Grandma fell down the stairs, broke a bone and now requires costly surgery. Upon arrival home, Joe hastily calls a few of his ex-customers with whom he thought he had built something akin to a rapport, probing for job opportunities. However, all he gets from them is callous disregard: "Sorry to hear you got fired. Can't help. Bye."

Frustrated, Joe plops down in front of his TV, only to hear his favorite comedian mock White males like him while praising the politician responsible for mass lay-offs and mass immigration. Switching channels does not help—wherever he ends up, all he sees and hears is hatred directed at him and his. He is called a monster and a descendant of murderers, his culture is denounced and degraded. All this was happening long before Joe got laid off, of course, but between watching football matches, guzzling beer and working, he was too tired to really get into it. He could always run away to another distraction. Now he no longer can.

The heart of the matter

I am a survivor of a civil war that lasted for six years, tearing my home country apart and killing tens of thousands of people. I was only a teenager back then, but had to struggle for survival alongside everyone else. The country was in freefall—there was no electricity, no water, no gas. Starvation made Congo look like paradise. Me and my parents dug around dumpsters and landfills, trying to find something edible. Centuries-old family relics and heirlooms were pawned for scraps of food; furniture was chopped into firewood, books used as kindling. Every day news came of someone's relative, friend or neighbor dying—either shot by one of the warring sides, murdered by bandits, or killed in a knife fight over a loaf of bread.

My reward for survival was a metric ton of priceless experience and many life lessons, the first of them being: adversity brings out the best and the worst in people. Those who have nothing to lose usually turn to selfish lone wolf survival, but those whose family and children become jeopardized. Nothing lights a fire under a man's ass like the prospect of seeing his loved ones starve to death, and this moment may well be upon us soon. Ever seen a food riot? I have. Do you know what a guy whose children haven't eaten for three days is capable of? Anything. Now imagine what the rioters are able to do if well-armed and perfectly aware just who is responsible for the situation.

Here lies the difference, the red line that separates us from (((them))). We know how bad things can get. All of us, at some point or another, had to struggle through hardship and make risky decisions that endangered us or our loved ones. Some of us survived wars, some lived under communism, others eked out an existence in anarchic, crime-ridden states or spent most of our lives fighting extreme poverty. Memories of this linger in the back of our heads as an eternal reminder: no matter how peaceful and prosperous things seem, devastation is always lurking around the corner. I call this feeling “retrospective tension.”

Still, Western men have been kept placid through endless distractions and lies for decades. Those who resisted anyway were quickly sent behind bars, while the majority was content to watch their nations get slowly picked apart by parasites. Several generations of neutered pseudo-males were born. But now the haze is dissipating. Bewildered, people look around and see ruin. They cannot slip back into soothing illusions and they do not have anyone but themselves to rely on. The old memories are coming back.

At the moment we have the entire population of the West—about 400 million men, many of them able-bodied—backed into a corner, angry and desperate but definitely not hopeless.

The flipside

These dessicated rodents cling rabidly to their lives while stealing and poisoning yours. After they croak, their well-trained and numerous progeny will step in – unless stopped.

Inhabitants of ivory towers, however, have no cause for panic. Why would they? After all, their basic instincts never developed due to lack of any adversity in their lives. They are propelled through life by the dubious virtue of their relations, connections and inheritances, all without a care in the world. For entirety of their existence, they have never left the sterile comfort of boardrooms, villas, conference halls, luxurious hotels and posh restaurants.

Here’s the trick: these creatures do not know the world they live in—at all. They spend their lives surrounded by yes-men and servants, mingle with the vacuous and hypocritical “cream of society,” and keep contact with the outside only through mediums and filters. Lack of genuine human interaction, combined with an extremely decadent lifestyle and delusions of grandeur has culminated in them developing a completely demented view of reality.

Here lie the roots of their adherence to lurid ideologies and worldviews, as inability to understand the human mind results in total absence of empathy and tendency to view people as mindless cattle. Some, owing to their religious belief, openly think so. Their solution for the unruly masses is always the same—yet another economic crisis to send everyone scurrying. This time, however, they are in for a surprise.

A chink in the armor

Endangered species. Soon to be reclassified as extinct.

Nothing ever goes wrong in the little worlds of the (((elites))). It is those directly below them who are susceptible to panic, and nowhere it is seen more clearly than in today's America, on the verge of Trump's presidency. I am talking about the middlemen, the lightning rods—media moguls, millionaires, celebrities, pundits, low-tier politicians, lawyers and other detritus. They still mingle moderately with the common folk (some even do their own grocery shopping—get a load of these adrenaline junkies), so they are not entirely out of touch.

While as morally bankrupt, ruthless and degenerate as their owners, many of them have been in some actual trouble at least once in their lives. They also know, or at least suspect, how bad things can get, but they never learned from the experience, choosing to suppress it instead.

But today they see vivid, healthy rage in the eyes of others; they encounter those bold enough to openly defy their programming; they experience genuine hatred and contempt aimed at them. They recall their few interactions with the real people, glimpses of what these people are capable of when sufficiently provoked, and their knees start to shake.

What does it feel like to have your media empire, carefully built on seething disdain, reprehensible deeds and kissed backsides, crumble before your very eyes because people no longer want to swallow its poison? What is it like to have people spit at you in the street when for all your life, you imagined yourself to be nothing short of royalty? How does it feel to suddenly realize your callous words and evil actions have been carefully logged and that you will face responsibility for every single one? I wouldn't know. But they will soon find out.

The panic is there, as real as it is crippling. And the most interesting part is that the middlemen are hesitant to inform their masters of what's going on, in fear of getting thrown to the wolves. Desperate to hold on whatever scraps of power they have, they'd rather go down with the ship slowly than be tossed overboard as ballast. For them, there is no life outside ivory towers, and these very towers are about to go down in flames.

A maelstrom of fury

By slowly force-feeding the whole world a dish poisoned with apathy and degeneration, the “elites” have inadvertently taken a large bite themselves. Their arrogance, complacency and hubristic belief that things are always going according to plan will be their downfall, because the people’s anger has reached a fever pitch.

Parasites will be excised, filth will be cleansed, justice will be meted out and a new golden age for the West will dawn.

For the future belongs to us, and it will be glorious.

4 Things I Do To Maintain An Elite Physique

January 12, 2017 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Disclaimer: This is not medical advice. Always consult a licensed physician before starting any diet or workout regimen.

Since taking the red pill a few years ago I've learned the how to successfully sleep with pretty girls, the importance of financial shrewdness, and how extremely valuable the commodities of time and freedom are.

While all of the those are staples of red pill awareness, there's one element that has changed my life the most: My physique. I'm in better shape at 39 than I ever was in my 20s. No, I'm not some hulking 260 lb behemoth with arms so big I can't wipe my own ass. But I do have a solid, lean muscular frame as I stand at 6'1", 225lbs, at between 13% and 17% body fat at any given time (though these days I'm hovering around 230lbs/17% on account of my holiday 'carb loading' diet).

Holiday sweets are my Achilles heel

Sculpting my body into what it is today is single most important change I made when I decided to live the crimson capsule lifestyle. Aside from some of the obvious benefits, looking this shot my confidence into the stratosphere which is important when talking to women.

As men, we're constantly bombarded with "bro science," personal trainers at the gym who don't know what they're talking about, and endless infomercials about contraptions that get you ripped simply by using it 3 times a week. Any man who's tried a few of these things know by now that most of them are a colossal waste of time and money. Hell, even our friends and family members try to impart us with fitness wisdom that seems to go nowhere.

Today, I'm going to give you four tried and true ways to get into and stay in the best shape of your life. Unlike our resident fitness expert Larsen Halleck, I'm certainly no strength and conditioning guru. But every one of these are the honest to goodness, no bullshit techniques and strategies I employ myself on a daily basis to maintain a great physique.

4. Compound lifts

We've all been in the gym watching people go through all the nautilus and cable machines to make sure they hit every muscle group or what they like to call 'isolation' exercises. If this is what you do when you workout, stop….now.

The only thing at the gym a man needs to build solid muscle is a power rack (also called a squat rack). It is the only piece of equipment I've used for the last 5 years and the regimen that has given me the best results in conjunction with the power rack is Stronglifts 5X5.

Stronglifts 5X5 is a workout that utilizes 5 basic lifts: Squat, bench press, overhead press, barbell row, and the deadlift. 5X5 means 5 sets of 5 reps with each lift. For example, you do one set of five squats, rest for 90 seconds, then do another set of five, and so forth until you get to five sets.

These 5 lifts are simple, yet challenging, and build solid, sustainable muscle. The reason for this is that they are all compound lifts. That is, you use every muscle in your body to perform each lift.

Stronglifts is predicated on using a very effective technique called progressive load meaning you start lifting with only the bar (45lbs) and work your way up. For example, session one you'll squat 45 lbs, session two 50 lbs, and so forth.

It's important to stick to the program and progress slowly with the weight and resist the temptation to skip ahead. In the beginning you'll blow through the workouts because the weight is light. But starting light helps you concentrate on proper form which will really help when lifting heavier weight. If you do this consistently, you'll be squatting 300 lbs quicker than you think.

The deadlift engages more muscle groups than 100 nautilus or cable contraptions

We've all seen 'captain upper body' who has massive arms and shoulders but skinny legs. Conversely we've seen dudes with tree trunk legs but not much above the waist. The key building real world strength and a balanced physique are compound lifts. Leave the "mirror muscle" workouts and "split routines" to the meatheads and gym bros who seem to be more interested in talking and chugging protein shakes than actually working out.

Compound exercises are easily the best way to achieve a superior physique and building strength that can be utilized outside of the gym. Stronglifts 5X5 is all you need to add muscle to build a strong, lean body and it's the only routine I've used for the last half decade. I can personally attest to both its advantages and results.

3. Swimming or biking

Ever seen a marathon runner who's both ripped and has even a decent amount of muscle muscle mass? Me neither. Sprinters notwithstanding, most runners don't have bodies that are aesthetically pleasing in the least. Not to mention the constant knee and ankle issues they have from running thousands of miles on asphalt.

Olympic swimmers, on the other hand, are leaned out. Thousands of miles of swimming has yielded them plenty of muscle, low body fat, and none of the negative long term side effects of high impact cardiovascular training like running. Same goes for cyclists. It takes a lot more than bionic lungs to ride the miles they do.

Olympic swimmer Michael Phelps has a lean, balanced, physique

Low impact cardiovascular training is the best way to burn fat, increase endurance, with minimal risk of injury or lingering aches and pains. This leads to being able to do it longer and more consistently.

Swimming is one of the best exercises ever. You're using every muscle in your body to propel forward and your lungs get an insane workout. I'm in great shape and even I have to take a short break between laps. But biking is where I've decided to plant my flag as far as cardio goes. I'd love to swim 20 laps a day but it's difficult to find a lap pool that isn't crowded year 'round.

This season I've ridden over 4,500 miles all outdoors (which is much less boring). It keeps me lean, forgives any deviations in diet I may succumb to, and it's easy on my joints. It also helps me with weight lifting. As a result of having great cardiovascular stamina I can lift more with shorter rests in between.

No, you don't have to ride the mileage I do but if you want to shred out, cardiovascular training is paramount no matter what any magazine, gym bro, or some you tube knucklehead tells you. A lean physique is much more attainable with a steady regimen of swimming, biking or both.

2. Keto diet

My go-to diet when I want to lean out

There are many diets out there but the one that gives me the best results is the ketogenic diet also known as the keto diet.

The ketogenic diet is a high fat, high protein, low carb diet. It’s predicated on consuming 100 grams of carbohydrates or less per day. After a few days your body goes into a state called ketosis which means your body is now using fat for fuel rather than carbohydrates.

The longer you’re in ketosis, the longer your body is in fat burning mode. A lot of pills, potions, and creams out there claim to “throw your body into fat burning mode!”, but the only time your body is truly burning fat and lots of it is when you’re in ketosis because your body is using only fat for fuel.

When I need to lean out or drop a few percentage points in terms of body fat, I use the keto diet every time. Some people live the keto lifestyle which is always being in ketosis and these people are all in great shape. You can do a quick search on Google and find countless keto diet communities, recipes, message boards, etc. and you’ll learn all you need to know.

If you’re looking to drop weight and hang onto the muscle you’ve worked hard for, the keto diet is the way it go. I discovered it a few years back and it has never failed me.

1. Testosterone replacement therapy

This little vial will change your life

I remember back in 1988 when Olympic sprinter Ben Johnson got popped for steroids. I was only a 4th grader then but it was all over the news and me and my classmates talked about it. For Gen-Xers like myself, that's the very moment when steroids became the scarlet letter.

Today, we have much more knowledge in terms of injectable testosterone, steroids, and HGH. It's not the boogie man we were all raised to believe though sports media would have us believe otherwise.

The reason all major professional sports ban steroids, testosterone, and HGH is because they work. And when prescribed by and monitored by a doctor the results are life changing. I've been on testosterone replacement therapy (injectable) for a little over two years now and it has literally changed my life. I look better, my skin is tighter, I'm stronger, I have more stamina and endurance, I fuck better, my sex drive is off the charts, the list goes on and on.

Aside from discovering the red pill, consulting with my doctor about TRT is the best decision I've ever made in my life. I get much more out of every workout, it keeps unwanted fat off my frame and holds onto the muscle I gain.

Don't waste your money on shit like this. Injectable testosterone is the most effective way to significantly boost testosterone and see measurable results.

I'll turn 40 this year and I don't look a day over 33. Some of that has to do with genetics (my family ages well) but the other half of the equation is that I don't have a 39 year old body that looks as though it's on the verge of breaking down. My body is lean, healthy and strong.

Yes, lifting weights helps, yes watching my diet closely and biking thousands of miles per year definitely helps. But I wouldn't be able to lift the weight I do, or ride the miles I do and do it consistently if not for testosterone replacement therapy.

What's more is that injectable testosterone is very inexpensive so most men who are gainfully employed and earn even a modest living can afford it.

I would strongly advise any man who is on the fence about testosterone replacement therapy to do yourself a favor, do the research, read the articles and stories, and go see your doctor.

Conclusion

So there you have it. The 4 things I personally employ to keep my body lean, strong, and maintain an elite physique. They're simple, effective, and yield visible results both inside and out.

It's important to know that getting into these routines and maintaining them will not be easy. It took me a good 2 months or so to get everything dialed in as far as my daily schedule and the time I put in. But once I got it all lined up, I got into the best shape of my life and I haven't looked back.

Hopefully this column helps men take that next step and transform their bodies into what I like to call 5%ers. Good luck, gentlemen.

How To Develop A Masculine Spiritual Program

January 12, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

When you think about self-improvement, you probably immediately think of improving your body—resolving to go to the gym three times per week or to eat a paleo diet. But while your physical body is always the best place to start, you will be incomplete unless you do something more. You can end up being physically fit but spiritually and emotionally stunted.

No matter what spiritual teaching you happen to embrace, whether that is Christianity, Stoicism, or Taoism, a rigorous spiritual program that you practice daily is necessary to truly live your spirituality. If your spirituality is something that you only do once per week, don't kid yourself—you are not spiritual, you are just LARPing.

Benefits of working on your spirituality

I started working on a serious spiritual program about three years ago and I've noticed many benefits. The first is that I am much less disturbed by adversity. No matter how difficult things get I have the drive to push through. If I suffer a setback, I am more likely to take it in stride.

Sticking to a spiritual program has made me more organized. Fitting a serious spiritual program on top of an already busy schedule forces you to be disciplined. This discipline naturally flows to other areas of my life. And there is always a feeling of accomplishment at the end of the day.

The third benefit is an increase in self-confidence. There is something about knowing that you are a son of God that puts all of your other relationships into perspective. I now care less about what other people think and this frees me to do things I would have otherwise avoided.

However, the biggest benefit is union with God. You can be a believer but until you become a man of prayer it will never have a real effect on your life. Only prayer activates the Christian life.

Why Opus Dei spirituality?

Josemaría Escrivá, founder of Opus Dei

The spiritual program I am going to share derives from Opus Dei, a Catholic religious order (technically, it is a “personal prelature”) that aims to help ordinary men and women who live in the world develop deep spirituality. Opus Dei spirituality is particularly applicable to ROK readers because it has a very masculine bent. Opus Dei is one of the few institutions left that understands that men have a need to be masculine and that women need to be feminine.

When you hear about Opus Dei, the first thing that may jump to your mind is Silas, the murderous albino monk from the Da Vinci Code. The reality is a bit more down to earth. The founder of Opus Dei, a Spanish priest named Josemaría Escrivá, felt called by God to create a movement that would help ordinary men and women sanctify themselves through their daily work. In other words, Opus Dei spirituality is meant to be practical. The Catholic Church put its stamp of approval upon Opus Dei and its spirituality by making Escrivá a saint in 2002.

General principles

St. Josemaria summarized his spiritual principles in three books of short aphorisms. The following all come from The Way.

Don't be soft on yourself. "Don't say: 'That's the way I'm made… it's my character'. It's your lack of character: Esto vir! Be a man."

"Where there is no mortification there is no virtue." (179)

But don't be hard on others. "Choose mortifications that don't mortify others." (180)

Start your day with a victory from the first moment. "The heroic minute. It is the time fixed for getting up. Without hesitation: a supernatural reflection and… up! The heroic minute: here you have a mortification that strengthens your will and does no harm to your body." (206)

Examine your performance daily. "Examination of conscience: a daily task. Book-keeping is never neglected by anyone in business. And is there any business worth more than the business of eternal life?" (235)

Never surrender in the face of adversity. "What does it matter if you have the whole world against you, with all its power? You… keep going!

Repeat the words of the psalm: 'The Lord is my light and my salvation: whom need I fear? Si consistant adversum me castra, non timebit cor meum. — Though an army pitched camp against me, my heart shall not be afraid'." (482)

Remember your divine sonship. "'Father', said that big fellow, a good student at the university (I wonder what has become of him), 'I was thinking of what you told me — that I'm a son of God! — and I found myself walking along the street, head up, chin out, and a proud feeling inside… a son of God!'

With sure conscience I advised him to encourage that 'pride.'" (274)

Spiritual direction. Opus Dei strongly encourages you find someone with greater wisdom to hold you accountable and guide your spiritual life. My spiritual director is an ancient priest. He does a great job of gently encouraging me to reach a higher level. He's gradually helping me eliminate all softness from my life. I trust him because I see that he applies his own advice to himself—there is no hint of softness in his character.

When searching for a spiritual director, look for a man who is older than you and has been on the path longer than you. He should demonstrate the efficacy of his teaching in his own life. If someone is a slob, overweight, or otherwise lacks self-control, steer clear of him.

Have a plan of life. “Without a plan of life you will never have order.” (76) The concept of a plan of life is one of the most important concepts of Opus Dei. You must have a consistent bedtime and wake time. You must be punctual in getting to work, going to appointments, and leaving work. And you must focus on whatever you are doing. When you are working, don’t check social media or think about your personal life. On the flipside, don’t let work intrude on your life at home. Live in the moment.

In addition to leading an ordered work and home life, Opus Dei encourages men to have a set number spiritually-related tasks that they accomplish every day. The following program is nondenominational program a based on a program recommended by Opus Dei priest Fr. McCloskey. Use it to serve as a model for your own plan of life.

A sample spiritual program

Make the morning offering upon rising. This is simply raising your mind to God and dedicating the day ahead to him.

Spend 15 minutes in mental prayer in the morning. When you first start out you may find that just sitting quietly for 15 minutes may be a challenge. If you’ve never done mental prayer before, Time for God by Jacques Philippe is an excellent introduction.

Spending fifteen minutes doing spiritual reading. This could be from the Bible or some other suitable spiritual book.

Lift your mind to God in the middle of the day. Catholics do this by praying the Angelus at noon, but your prayer of choice will suffice.

Making a brief examination of conscience at night prior to going to bed.

Conclusion

The key to success with a spiritual program is to be realistic. Unless you are monk, you are not going to be successful using a monk's spiritual program. Instead, select a set number of tasks that you can achieve every day and be consistent. I'm convinced that if you take the challenge of working on your spiritual life for at least six months, you'll never go back.

Why Boys Need To Be Allowed To Play Outside With Wooden Sticks

January 12, 2017 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

This morning my five-year-old son carried a stick on the bus on his way to kindergarten. I warned him not to bother people with the stick. Repeatedly. When he came dangerously close once too often, I broke the stick and gave him back the big end. He cried for about 30 seconds and took better care of what was left of it.

What a banal story! Banal, but exceptional in this day and age. How is that?

No Weapons. Period!

He'll survive – to become a man

In middle-class America boys are not allowed to play with sticks. They are surrounded by women—mothers, teachers, and all kinds of counselors—and women have no sympathy for sticks. Their fathers have have generally been conditioned not to allow it either. Sticks are bad.

There is a huge literature about why sticks are bad. Kids use sticks as play guns, and guns are bad. Kids use sticks as play swords, and swords are bad. Kids hit each other with sticks, and fighting is bad. The feminists attribute all of this to patriarchy. Little girls don't play with sticks! This is a sure sign that little boys are still not civilized.

Certain approved toys did evolve from sticks, such as baseball bats, tennis rackets and croquet mallets. Their use is tolerated, but the kids are carefully instructed in exactly how to use them. Goofing around with them is not in the program.

Why aren't little boys civilized?

We have been throwing sticks since we learned to walk upright

Feminist dogma to the rescue! Because of the patriarchy. You see, they explain, little boys and little girls are born with identical capacities and like natures. Gender is a social construct, they say. And somehow, in spite of everything they have done to prevent it, these little boys are being socialized in the nasty masculine way. Quit it! (The title of one of their tracts) they say. Learn to play nice.

These feminists are quick to point out that guns and swords did not exist in our evolutionary environment. A child's desire to play with guns and swords has to have emerged, they reason, during the evil history of male dominance, when societies were always fighting one another for land, trade routes, women and whatnot.

As usual, the feminists have it wrong. Five or six million years ago, as our ancestors left the jungles for the African savanna and began to walk upright, two things happened. First, their hands became free. Second, they no longer had any place to hide from predators. They put one and one together, developed opposed thumbs that could hold sticks, and learned how to fight off the predators. Sticks were useful tools and digging roots and tubers. Sticks are a deep part of our evolutionary history. As males fought off the predators and alien tribes, it is the males who wound up instinctively using sticks.

What benefit is there to letting him have sticks?

An approved stick

The world is filled with dangerous objects such as knives, bricks, ladders and matches. On his path to adulthood a child has to learn how to cope with all of them. As he watches adults manipulate these things he wants to try. If you do not let him, he will remain a perpetual child—and perpetual children are precisely what we have all too many of in modern America and Europe.

Growing up involves risk. There is always a trade-off between the risk of getting hurt, and the risk of growing up scared to take initiative. The United States errs very far in the direction of being hypercautious. We chauffeur them every place rather than let them walk. We hustle them to the pediatrician at the slightest sign of a cough or sniffle. Moreover, schools forbid normal childhood play such as the game of tag, and we don't let them wrestle much or race one another on the playground.

Why are American schools so strict?

Sometimes we call a stick a stick

American schools are designed to accept all children from a given geographical area, regardless of their sex, socioeconomic and family background, or race. A school is a one-size-fits-all institutions.

America is schizophrenic in its dedication to equality. On the one hand, the great majority of Americans supports the public school systems. On the other hand, that same great majority will move as far into the suburbs as necessary to get away from the riffraff. The children of the riffraff are not interested in learning; they destroy the educational environment for everybody else.

Schools have had to implement draconian controls to manage the disorderly segment. Common sense is out the window. Because some boys do harass girls, the most mild-mannered lad may be expelled if he screws up the courage to peck a girl on the cheek –even if she enjoys it! The slightest rap on the shoulder can be construed as a fight.

Back in the 1950s the teacher reigned in the classroom. The whole system, from the board of education down through the principal, trusted the teacher's judgment when it came to discipline. Principals valued and respected teachers who could handle their own problems without sending children to his office.

Today, wealthy helicopter parents and social justice warriors have beaten the education system into submission. In the place of human judgment, which is subject to error, they have stringent policies on everything. The upshot is that they expel kids on absurd pretexts. And a byproduct is that boys do not have an opportunity to use their own judgment, to become men. No sticks, nothing resembling a stick, is allowed in a modern classroom.

Fights and schoolyard culture

Swords into plowshares – this morning's stick now holds a Christmas star

The battle against bullying is front and center in the modern school. Anything that might be construed as bullying is absolutely forbidden. For good reason—the rougher kids have no sense of restraint. They don't have the sense to stop fighting once they have won, and they are inclined to bring lethal hardware into the game.

Bullying is inherently cruel, and children have a way of being cruel. It must be forbidden. The implementation of anti-bullying policies, however, has an anti-male flavor to it. Girls can be extremely cruel to one another, but they usually—not always—do so more by social than physical means, and it is harder to police.

Although serving in the Army is a way to get shot, and America's youth may be safer now that the draft is ended, military service did fill a valuable role in turning boys into men. The same might be said of schoolyard fights. The cost might have exceeded the benefit, but those of us who grew up in an era in which even middle-class kids got involved in fights developed a certain self-respect, an ability to take care of ourselves that today's kids seem to lack.

Even the innocent scuffles that nursery school kids get into are instructive. Somebody invariably winds up crying, sometimes just because they lose and sometimes because they are actually hurt a little bit. It is an occasion for this father to use words that are forbidden on an American schoolyard: "Be a man!" He has to learn that sometimes you lose, sometimes you get hurt, but you have to keep on going.

One of my profoundest lessons came when I was about eight. My grandmother took care of us because mother had more urgent business. I came home crying and Granny asked me what it happened. I said "Ricky beat me up." She cocked her head like an old hen, observed "You're bigger than Ricky – you beat him up!" That was all the sympathy I got. I learned to stop crying and take care of my own problems.

Needless to say, the proclivity of the lower classes to get into deadly fights has necessitated schools implementing policies setting low thresholds for activity that might be construed as a fight. Middle-class kids are forced into behavior patterns that would have been considered sissy 50 years ago. It is demonstrably true that fewer of them get hurt than used to. Nobody asks what the cost might have been in terms of sacrificed manhood.

Conclusion

The conductor and other riders on the bus seem absolutely at ease with my kid having a small stick, but likewise at ease with my constantly reminding him that he has to watch out. I make him leave his stick at the schoolyard gate. I'm glad I live in a country where the government does not interfere with parents in raising children, and where there is not an ethnic dimension to school discipline. Kids have the freedom to make small mistakes and learn from them.

This analogy seems to inform the divide in American culture. Progressives want government to make strong laws controlling, even abolishing sticks. Libertarians and conservatives are more inclined to trust the people – parents and kids – to use their own judgment. Good judgment sometimes comes up short – kids do get hurt with sticks. But on the other hand, abolition doesn't work and it fosters a weak people who look for solutions from authority instead of solving their own problems.

Learning how to handle a stick is a step on the path to adulthood. An adult has rights involving dangerous objects, and responsibilities with regard to taking care of them. That's what belonging to society means—your freedom ends where my nose begins. We have to live together, and be considerate. I used the example of stick to point out other obligations to our fellow man. Don't stop and play in the middle of the sidewalk impeding people who are rushing to work. Don't talk loudly when somebody else is on the telephone. And lastly, don't poke anybody with that stick! But without the stick he wouldn't learn.

University Of Wisconsin Adds Six-Week Program On Toxic Masculinity

January 13, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

The University of Wisconsin Madison recently announced a six-week program on masculinity, copied after similar programs at other American colleges.

The program, titled Bros, Dudes, and Men on Campus: Unpacking Masculinity, plans to cover media, hook up culture, alcohol, violence, and pop culture. The school has received criticism after a story in The College Fix portrayed the seminar as a discussion of the negative effects of masculinity. Is there any truth to this claim?

Meet Me At The Multicultural Student Center

The program is part of the university's Multicultural Student Center. That's right, they don't just have a student center, they have a Multicultural Student Center. I've been to college, and it's kind of implied that everything there is multicultural; every class I've taken or taught at a number of schools has a mix of ages, races, and sex. And students don't need to be taught multiculturalism. Trust me, I wanted to get to know the tall, tan, friendly Egyptian girl in my freshman class much more than the pale fat snarky white chick. And yet, enormous resources are diverted to social programming.

The formal labeling of “multicultural” has at a minimum, the connotation that this is not a place for white males. The same way the “gender studies” department will never offer a single course on masculinity, but is just a thinly veiled codeword for feminism. And indeed, visiting the webpage of this multicultural student center, I made out one small photo of a possibly white male, along with a couple of minority males and at least 30 photos of females. If the title wasn’t enough, the photos clearly show that if you’re a white male, there’s not going to be anything of interest for you in your student center.

The school didn’t just build a multicultural student center though. They also hired an Office of Gender and Women’s Studies Librarian. I give them huge points for creativity there. Not in my wildest visions of what a Trumpocracy would be like did I even consider putting a man in every college library around the country, just to help fellow men find books discussing manly things, helping them direct their efforts to learn more about fat shaming, tips on game, encouraging them to study the negative effects of false rape accusations, and create new literature and art with a masculine theme.

The Women’s Studies librarian coordinates with a wider range of sexually segregated student resources, including the 4W Initiative at UW, Women’s Knowledge International, the UW System Gender & Women's Studies Consortium, and the Chair on Gender, Wellbeing, and Culture of Peace at UW, and oversees the Women's Knowledge Digital Library, which offers 82 different categories of women-centric topics which is so broad and comprehensive that they may as well do away with the non-women library entirely.

Perusing the Women's Knowledge Digital Library was like entering an alternate reality universe. It's fascinating in a way. For example, the category of Gender Based Violence offers a 2014 policy paper on "Closing the Gap: How to eliminate violence against women beyond 2015."

The Women's Knowledge Library: A trip into fantasyland!

(We'll set aside the fact that the only "gap" is that men make up the vast majority of crime victims, including almost 80% of murder victims) because what strikes me is the massive creativity and imagination. They won't just reduce violence. The authors have a plan to ELIMINATE violence against half the world's population! I've never met a man with such an ambitious plan to stop male crime.

They finally stopped crime!

But wait, in fairness, the library didn't forget about men. The bottom of the page lists 3 recent stories about men and masculinity: a paper on men beating their wives, another on how men must end gender-based violence by 2030 in order for society to progress, and one with the catchy title The Making of Sexual Violence: How Does a Boy Grow Up To Commit Rape?

In total, 81 categories of pro-female utopia, and one category with a handful of stories about how men are terrible and masculinity is evil. Do you have an idea yet of what this seminar will be like?

MEN & MASCULINITY

- The Making of Sexual Violence: How Does a Boy Grow Up to Commit Rape? (2014) presents an overview of (IMAGES), presents findings related to men's self-reported perpetration of sexual violence, investigates perpetration and provides actionable lessons and recommendations.
- How Can You Be a Marda When You Beat Your Wife? Notions of Masculinities and Violence in Eastern Nepal ducted in selected districts in Eastern Nepal that explores notions of masculinities among young men ers, and young men's experiences and attitudes towards violence, including Sexual and Gender-Based
- Transformation by 2030: How Ending Gender-Based Violence and Engaging Men and Boys will Contribute to sents findings from an expert consultation among Indian government and civil society representatives the critical role that men have to play toward the success of the post-2015 development agenda.

The 3 hateful articles on men presented by the Women's Library

While straight white men are routinely banned from "safe" spaces, and have even been blocked from accessing their own college campus, this masculinity program is open to "students who identify as men" so it's not even restricted to males only. Although that begs the question—If a female transdoodle who wanted to be a man, enrolls in a course about how masculinity and manhood is so toxic and terrible, what exactly are they hoping to gain by joining team shitlord?

To end on a lighter note, I did find something I believe would make George Orwell chuckle. The Women's Library has redefined several topics into politically correct speak (like Intimate Partner Violence and Gendercide), and included a redefining of Autism as "Neurodiversity"! People with a mental handicap aren't disabled—they are mentally diverse! Who said women aren't funny?

LOLs were had by all

The sad thing is this is such a wasted opportunity. College men desperately need a male space where they can talk openly and honestly with other men. This seminar sounds like a group of guys getting together and discussing what it means to be a man, what does society expect from them, and what struggles will they face. Perhaps this was put together with good intentions, but based on everything I've seen, I'd recommend skipping the seminar, and read some of the past articles here at ROK instead.

British Media Doxes Small-Time Youtuber For Having Nationalist Views

January 13, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Media outlets in Great Britain have published the location of a right-wing anti-immigration YouTube vlogger, attempting to incite a mob against him. Because he lives in a small community in Scotland, including an image of Colin Robertson's house in particular opens him up to violent antifa attacks.

> The Scots racist whose hate-filled videos have made him a global YouTube star can be unmasked by the Record today as a jobless ex-student who lives with his dad.
> He found notoriety with his Millennial Woes blog and gave a speech at a US rally where far-right extremists shouted, "Hail Trump" and made Nazi salutes. He has gone to great lengths to hide his identity.

Robertson's YouTube channel, Millennial Woes, has less than 25,000 subscribers, making him far from a "global Youtube star" that the Daily Record portrays him as for justification of their dox. While explicitly condemning violence, Robertson argues that Scotland and Great Britain, not to mention Europe and the Western world, are being inundated with migrants and that local European or European-derived cultures are subsequently being swallowed up without any proper intervention by the government or media.

Just like the character assassination of Kenneth Bone, the cherubic audience member at the US Presidential debate in St. Louis, the media's targeting of Colin Robertson highlights how comparatively unknown, even fully unknown people with right-wing or other unacceptable views are being harassed and punished for their beliefs. The purpose is to scare off other Average Joes with the same or similar political outlooks and prevent them from organizing and speaking out.

Kenneth Bone knows what Colin Robertson is feeling at the moment.

Along with the doxxing, various British newspapers fired plain unnecessary or woefully incorrect broadsides at Robertson's character. He was described as an "ex-student" (isn't everybody?) living with his father, as if living with one's parent/s to save money for a house or as a temporary arrangement after a move is deserving of scorn. The "living in mom's basement" attack has previously been used against Roosh by The Daily Mail and other media outlets. Despite the fact that he was briefly visiting family due to years spent overseas, pseudo-journalists described the proprietor of Return Of Kings with the kind of false terms that directly mimic leftist talking points about those with contrarian political and social opinions.

In the same vein as Roosh's 2016 ordeal and the extreme harassment of his family by The Daily Mail, The Daily Record in Scotland and The Mirror in England published images of Robertson's father's home. England's The Sun does not seem to have gone as far, but their intention to make him unsafe in his own town is more or less identical to what the other outlets have tried to do. Although Robertson has nearly 25,000 YouTube subscribers, this is hardly the threshold for deciding to publish details of where someone lives. When newspapers or magazines pinpoint where a celebrity lives, that celebrity invariably has the money to afford extensive private security, including by residing in gated communities and erecting walls. Robertson lacks this largesse and the media knows it.

Robertson has not been "unmasked"; he has been showing his face

Colin Robertson spoke at the National Policy Institute's Washington D.C. conference last year.

Another tired old lie being spruiked by the newspapers attacking Colin Robertson is that he has finally been "revealed" and "unmasked." Nothing could be further from the truth. Notwithstanding that Robertson has never published where he lives (and why would he?), he has made his video presentations on camera for an extended period of time and attended the recent NPI conference in Washington D.C. to deliver a speech. This was the same conference that led to a media witch hunt against Richard Spencer and Roosh's refusal to disavow him.

Again, this example of falsehood harks back to Roosh's experiences, this time with The Dr. Oz Show. Dr. Oz erroneously claimed that Roosh had come out from behind his keyboard, even though his name and face had been in the public domain for years. Yet the most cursory glance at Roosh's personal website or Return Of Kings by Dr. Oz's assistants and handlers would have confirmed this. Or, amazingly, the television host and celebrity doctor could have bothered to do his own research before pontificating.

And if a right-wing figure running his or her own website or platform were to hide their name and location, who could blame them? After all, Roosh and his family both faced serious threats requiring police intervention. I am sure Colin Robertson, both his parents, and his wider family and social circles are under the same vicious bombardment currently. Interestingly, reporting on the content of these vile threats will not pique the media's interest even slightly, irrespective of the inspiration they gave those who are threatening.

People whose homes or addresses are not published? They're called leftists

Guess who hasn't been doxed by the media?

Journalists do not dox militant leftists and when they do they're fired for it. Just ask Michael Tracey. Vice showed Tracey the door for ostensibly doxing Lena Dunham on Twitter, after he claimed that she was lying about having voted in the 2016 New York Democratic primary. As much as it pains me to admit this, Lena Dunham is a much more high-profile (but definitely not high-brow) figure than Colin Robertson. But I cannot remember a time when the media dutifully and gleefully doxed her or those like her, especially following her disgusting book revelations about digitally penetrating her sister. It is doubtful she received any threats from being indirectly doxed by Michael Tracey and if she did, she has both the means to protect herself and an obliging media to portray her as the century's biggest victim.

Unfortunately, Roosh's dire discussion of how the media assassinates people is ringing more and more true as time goes by. "News" outlets are banking on inflaming the anger of leftists and other easily aroused people so they can act as the elites' "cat's paw," frightening, injuring, or even killing political freethinkers. They want anyone who excoriates the leftist narrative to lose their jobs, general livelihoods, and social reputations. In the case of Donald Trump, Nigel Farage, and Geert Wilders, they cannot do this. So they have turned their focus onto regular people who feel the compulsion to speak up.

So how long will it be until Return Of Kings has to start reporting on media-inspired deaths instead of "mere" media-inspired harassment and doxing?

Why The Polls Always Showed Trump In The Lead

January 13, 2017 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

This is the third installment of a multi-part series. You can read the second part here.

We cannot give the manosphere too much credit. Although we were significant during the primaries for influencing Conservatives nationwide, especially in the Northeast, once we got to the general we found ourselves battling the well-established and entrenched TV media. Older voters, women, and liberals who did not read within our circles and whom we had no influence over, were now part of the pool of voters we needed to compete for and could not rely on the internet to sway. It was a much harder game.

Thus, during the general, it was mainly up to Donald Trump and his team to beat the machine, which was one of his big selling points I had for him during the primaries. We understood that his independent wealth, mastery of the media, and tight game was only way to shine the sunlight down into the cave and get voters to deprogram themselves away from old media and into new media, the internet.

My gut instinct Trump had what it took to be successful in the general was proved as soon as the LA Times/Dornsife poll came out, and we saw him beating Clinton by 7 points after the RNC. Most were scared by the other push-polls showing Trump behind Clinton, but those polls had weak methods. Anyone who took a high school stats class could have told you why. The LA Times/Dornsife university poll started with a statistically representative sample of America's demographics, and then polled that sample. The LA Times only replaced the people polled if they dropped out of the survey due to personal reasons.

Conversely, just about every other poll took the opposite approach – calling up random people, polling them, and then applying "filters" and "weights" to make the sample demographically representative. In other words, the LA Times poll worked forwards, while the others worked backwards. Doesn't take a genius to figure out why working backwards in statistics is a horrible idea. The potential for bias that can be introduced with such backwards methods is enormous.

The other polls that called the election correctly are People's Pundit Daily and the Investor's Business Daily. The PPP poll used a mixture of LA Times methods with a bit more random sampling, while the IBD used the traditional method of pure random sampling. I am not sure why the IBD poll was accurate while all the other random-sampling polls were wrong. The IBD does not share its methods so I cannot comment.

Also, the LA Times poll said it would predict the popular vote, and not the electoral vote, but it turned out to be predicting the electoral vote more than the popular vote. The reason for this, I surmise, is that they most likely picked their initial sample demographically across the states in a way that mirrors the electoral college distribution of the USA, since the races are mainly located in key states, therefore they had Trump +3 at the end. Had they gone with a heavier popular vote model they would have ended up like the PPP poll of +.8. That said, they should stick with the electoral college model because that is how presidents are actually selected.

[image]
If you follow mainstream advice you will suffer. Notice they never tell you what makes a poll reliable? Always find polls that show they eliminate bias.

A lot of guys kept getting fooled by the shitty polls, leading them to bad conclusions, and all I have to say is: be more careful reading how stats work.

Eventually I made the decision to get involved with the ground campaign in NH. I understood that, according to the best polls, we had earned the loyalty of about 40% of the USA's voters, and Trump himself could get around an extra 8-9% with his media savvy, but to get the last yard to the touchdown, to move the needle that extra 1-2% and cross the 50% threshold would require good old fashioned brute-force door to door sales skills. All the game I had learned here over the years was put to use in NH. And in NH, believe it or not, is where we won the election, which will be the subject of the next installment.

How Book Publishing Got Cucked

January 14, 2017 | by M.T. White | Link | Original Link

Before I decided to take the leap in to self-publishing, I tried to get my novel published by one of the Big Four only to receive a slew of rejection letters. Perhaps my work wasn't good or perhaps there was something wrong with me (there was). But perhaps due to financial and social factors the legacy publishing industry is seriously compromised—seriously cucked—creating an almost impenetrable barrier for men who want to present novels with traditional masculine perspectives sans the usual political correctness. Authors like Wilbur Smith, can still get their work out there due to a bestselling track record (he's been around since Ian Fleming actually wrote James Bond novels) but for new guys? No chance. How did it get this way?

Corporate Consolidation

The Big Four (basically companies that still PRINT and bind physical books and actually pay you for your work, giving a work at least mild prestige) have the same problems as the Hollywood studios. Due to being bound to the accountants of their corporate overlords (Simon & Schuster is owned by CBS, HaperCollins by NewsCorp, Penguin Random House by Bertelsmann & Pearson and Hachette Livre is a French multinational) they are bound to making a profit, therefore bound to trends, bound to what's popular, bound to what people are spending money on in the current moment.

Nothing wrong with addressing consumer demand. If they like toasters, give them toasters. But creative works aren't dishwashers, tires or earmuffs. But the companies try anyway, they have shareholders to answer to after all. They follow trends because there's really nothing else to follow; the need to turn profit is too great and the overhead is too high. A book launch has practically become like a Hollywood production in terms of budget.

Due to the rise and appeal of self-publishing, the Big Four have to dangle the carrot of a big advance, which lessens the amount of books they choose to publish, then they have to spend big bucks on marketing said book. Since there isn't a large pool of books to hedge against (a successful novel offsetting the failures), since the days of backlist bestsellers are dead, almost every book needs to be a home run of some sort. So, if one book about teenage wizards sells, you will see a glut of books about kids endowed with supernatural gifts (Harry Potter begat Percy Jackson which begat Miss Peregrine's Home for Peculiar Children and on and on).

Not books but BRANDS

It's like what Ayn Rand wrote of architecture in The Fountainhead: "It was not necessary to design buildings any longer, only to photograph them; the architect with the best library was the best architect. Imitators copied imitations." (Doubtful The Fountainhead would have been published today)

Literary Agents

But legacy publishers don't want to spend too much time and money vetting everything that comes through the turnstile. They have literary agents to do this for them. The literary agents are the pimps of this trade but unlike real pimps—who have to resort to deceit and/or forced coercion to lure in their hookers—the agents have the luxury of the whores begging them for a place at the table.

They don't have to go looking for material—it comes to them! Because every agent knows that if an aspiring novelist wants to see their book on the Barnes & Noble bookshelf (preferably at the front of the store), they need an agent to present their works to the publisher. They know they have the keys to the gates.

That's why there's websites and articles and panel discussions at writer's conferences regarding how to write the perfect query letter to agents. Some authors spend a couple of weeks on their beseeching letter. If you're lucky, in about two months you'll get a form reply thanking you for sending them a sample of your work but unfortunately it just isn't for them ("While I think this has potential, I'm sorry to say that it isn't quite right for my list.").

A Corrupted Culture

An obvious sign of a feminine run business—most literary agents are women—nobody wants to come off as mean or judgmental. No, everyone wants instead to be seen as grateful and courteous. No one wants to get in to anyone's bad graces after all…

But why? What's wrong with burning a few bridges? Because there's less and less bridges to burn. The byproduct of this is everyone being scared of everyone else because there is less pie to pass around. If I anger this executive today, I might not be able to make ends meet tomorrow. Consolidation in a business run mostly by women and beta males has created an environment of political correctness and groupthink. They're committing "liberalcide" (thanks to Stefan Molyneux for that great word). It's no wonder then there's no surprise or outrage when you see an agent say: "If your story concerns a straight, white, male then I'm not interested," (real quote).

So the poor economics has resulted in subsequent cultural decay (or cultural decay has resulted in poor economics). Liberal gender politics are playing a crucial role in a business model in decline. But rather than to reflect and set a correction course, they've doubled down, and now the business is cannibalizing itself. This ever more consolidated business is only looking for something that will cast a wide net, make them a lot money, but at the same time virtue signal to the correct groups while hopefully appealing to as many critics as possible to bring them prestige so they can pat themselves all on the back for thinking or promoting the right thing. Meaning they have to find the most generic and least offensive shit possible.

Typical Drug Store Bookshelf

Please note that most of the edgy, politically incorrect material is produced by gay men (Bret Easton Ellis, Chuck Palaniuk and soon Milo Yiannopoulis). Milo pointed out on his podcast that gay men have "less to lose" than a straight man with a family; an accurate assessment in today's easily offended snowflake culture. So what's a straight white male author to do?

For adult work, if the lead is straight, the protagonist being another race helps (James Patterson's Alex Cross). But if the main character is a straight white male, the best friend needs to be black, maybe Hispanic, but they prefer black (note the characters of Robby Jackson and Domingo Chavez in Tom Clancy's books) or if the character is a loner he needs to help the appropriate disadvantaged groups (think Jack Reacher) fight typical villains (Corporate America or rednecks). If it's an international spy thriller, the protagonist MUST question, maybe even refute the mission his country gave him because, hey, the U.S. is just as evil as her enemies (Robert Ludlum, Eric Van Lustbader etc.). Face it, successful contrived novels is a very narrow target to hit and it takes time to hone those skills.

Authors Looking To Score

This Could Be ME

But maybe it just isn't the business and social conditions of the publishing industry that have a problem. Maybe the motivations for this type of author (myself included), the one who endlessly submits himself to this sort of literary panhandling, are wrong. It's kind of like all those reality shows: American Idol, The Voice, Cupcake Wars, MasterChef, Top Chef, The Bachelor and all the rest—they all emphasize the big score.

If you have the right skills or right looks or right personality (i.e., right minority background with accompanying sob story of being a single, disabled mom) then a panel of judges—a panel of gatekeepers—consisting of at least one handsome but mean Brit (Simon Cowell, Gordon Ramsey etc.), after putting to shame all the wannabes, all the jokesters who thought they were talented, after the initial rounds (usually the most entertaining), then they will decide, THEY will determine who is the NEXT American Idol, MasterChef, Top Chef or Bachelor/Bachelorette, and THE CHOSEN will receive all the riches. And the chosen are usually that likable, talented, grateful, humble chap—or that sympathetic yet cheerful in the face of adversity minority with a plight filled back story who makes a mean chimichanga…the only reason anyone would subject themselves to that level of bootlicking is the possibility of life-changing riches at the end.

Instead of grinding away, blogging, hustling, connecting via social media, establishing a customer base—instead of taking those steps—the author sees the amount of money a few are making (J.K. Rowling is the richest woman in England, Stephen King is a land baron, James Patterson is worth north of $200 million etc.) and think that could be them too…as long as I please the gatekeepers…but the gates have gotten taller and taller. It's become a literary lottery. And the chances of succeeding in this industry are only slightly better than your average Vegas slot machine or Reality TV competition.

This industry, a mix of bad business and bad politics is slowly imploding and without a dramatic correction it will only get worse. But men like me thankfully have a fail-safe: Self-publishing. Thank God for the tech boom that brought it about. And thank God for guys like Roosh, Mike Cernovich, Vox Day, Barry Eisler and J.A. Konrath for showing the way.

8 Ways Men Compensate For Not Having A Dad

January 14, 2017 | by Mark Derian | Link | Original Link

People are the most foolish when they compensate for their inferiority. Feminists fabricate a rape culture to compensate for the fact no one desires them. Fat people compensate for their low self-esteem by filling themselves up with food. And poor people compensate for their inability to be valuable to society by criticizing rich people.

Likewise, if our father was only a sperm donor, we inevitably feel a sense of inferiority that we defend against in a myriad of annoying if not destructive ways:

1. Defend reputation incessantly

Reputation is a euphemism for “what everyone else thinks.” Same with legacy. The thoughts of others matter but what matters more is what we think. If we’ve failed to develop a healthy identity—because our father left and took with him the nutrition of his challenging nature—then we’ll only be able use the opinions of others as reality. The calmness of defending ourselves against reality is replaced by the frenzy of defending ourselves against opinion.

2. Parade girlfriend

It’s good to have an attractive girlfriend because beauty nourishes our soul. But if our dad left because he didn’t think we were cool (in our minds), then we need other guys to think we’re cool. A good way to do this is to get a hot girlfriend and then parade her around like a show dog. To be even more annoying, we may ask other guys what they think of her in an anticipatory manner.

3. View other men as competition

Competition is fun, but when our predilection is to view men as rivals to be bested or discredited, this says more about us than it does about them. We had no dad, after all, so there's no model for relating to other men in a healthy way—there's no brain state for understanding such a relationship. When we whiff precariousness in relating to men, it's easier to fight and gossip.

4. View other men as superior

This is the low-testosterone way of seeing men as competition. Instead of lashing out in inferiority, we submit to the inferiority. We never learned to stand up to a dad, so it's going to be difficult to stand up to a co-worker or friend.

5. Focus on “haters” or “trolls”

It’s no coincidence these neologisms came into being around the time fatherless guys hit the workforce. The purpose of the dad is to troll and hate so his son learns his approval doesn’t matter. Without such a test in the formative years, we grow up to see disapproval as overwhelming. The same is true for guys who rejoice in trolls and use them for motivation. Men who had dads understand criticism is a part of life and find it difficult to even consider the opinions of avatars, let alone accuse them of cruelty.

6. Collect shoes

The archetypal programming in man drives us to gain status. A healthy way to do this is to figure out how to be valuable to the world. But this often takes years of trial and the sublimation of pain. Without a dad, persistence is a seen as suffocating, so we spend 300 dollars on a belt, scour the internet for shoe deals, and collect pocket squares. Treating fashion as more than a game is a pretense to having a strong sense of self.

7. Blame girls

It’s healthy to correct a girl’s behavior for the purpose of wanting the best for her, but too often correcting spills over into criticizing, which spills over into blaming. Without a dad to correct our behavior, we blame others to assuage our lack of self-mastery. Fighting culture is a clever rationalization for fighting ourselves.

8. Think postmodern art is legitimate

The father's love is conditional while the mother's love is unconditional. When dad left, our mom had free reign to give us love no matter what we did, and so we think spilling paint on a canvas is praiseworthy.

Conclusion

Our dad may not love us, but before we confirm the false narrative of being unlovable by trying to compensate for it, let's recognize our inferiority for what it is and manage it in a healthy way. At the very least we'll save a lot of people from being annoyed by us.

Why The Hindu Concept Of Dharma Is Relevant To Us Today

January 14, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

History of ideas is barely the kind of field that pays big bucks, but as long as it is not approached through an excessively biased perspective, one stands good chances to find hidden gems there. By exposing oneself to various schools of thinking, or reading important essays written long ago, one meets with possibilities that couldn't be imagined or understood from today's literature.

The idea of dharma struck me after I met with it both in history and today. First, it plays an important role in the views of two of the most important thinkers of the twentieth century, René Guénon and Julius Evola. Both aimed at expressing what they called the Primordial Tradition, purported source of all religions, and both considered the concept of dharma as referring to something immensely important to social life.

Second, the dharma was briefly, but not unimportantly, alluded to by an unexpected sympathizer of the red pill. A long-time "antifascist skinhead hunter" of Asian descent, who went by the name "Original Gangster Kim", switched sides in 2014 by joining the Third Position movement Égalité & Réconciliation. Asked about the System's push for gay marriage, Kim answered:

> A man and a woman get together and have a baby. That's it. That's nature. Now, why insisting on adoption? Why should gay couples be allowed to adopt children? Such a thing is anomalous, or, as my culture would say, adharmic… That isn't dharmic, that isn't normal. (Here, 25:15)

Though bottle-fed “antifascism” and gangsta-rap, Kim also undertook the study of his ancestors’ traditions. These widely different pieces of culture must have forced him into a state of cognitive dissonance he was strong enough to break on top. Then, when facing the redefinition of marriage, the industrialization of child-making and rearing, the public encouragement to open homosexuality, he didn’t accept it but recoiled in horror. Needless to say, he got a lot of heat from his (now ex) “friends” from the so-called antifascist movement.

He did this because he gained a sense of dharma. My aim here is to provide the reader with a sense of it as well.

The meaning of dharma

The thinking from ancient civilizations stands out as highly synthetic and dense. Greek authors such as Hesiod or Heraclitus were able to encapsulate complex, sometimes esoteric ideas into fragmentary sentences or rather small poems. Philosophy, as we understand it now, only came later through Socrates et al. as the analytical breakdown of what had been intuitively understood but was starting to darken.

The concept of dharma is exactly like that. It is so dense, so loaded with intrinsically related but different meanings, that it doesn’t have any exact translation in contemporary Western languages.

According to René Guénon, the word “dharma” can be more or less translated—depending on the precise use of the word—by “law”, “order”, “justice”, “harmony” or “nature.” It stems from the Sanskrit root dhri which refers to “supporting, holding, maintaining.” In the widest sense, dharma is “a principle of conservation of lively beings, and hereafter of stability”, related to higher, non-perceivable, planes of being; it is “what makes the becoming of the world more than perpetual change.”

This idea can be applied to any being, group of beings, era, and even to the whole universe at a particular moment. It becomes relevant when specifically applied to human individuals, types, countries and so on. Then…

> one can speak of the proper Dharma of a particular being (called Swadharma) or group, such as a human collective… The word “justice” is sometimes a convenient translation of Dharma in the sense that, here, justice is a human expression of harmony and equilibrium, that is, an aspect of the conservation of cosmic stability. The word “virtue” can be used as well in the sense that someone’s actions are in line with his own nature.

The basic idea is that everyone has his or her own vocation, own destiny, and one’s proper destiny is actually integrated into a wider order whose respect is synonymous with what ought to be.

Of course, the very idea that someone’s dharma can be very different from his neighbour’s clashes with the “progressive” view that perceives individuals as “equal”, i.e. identical and interchangeable. People were born different, hence unequal. Everyone has a finite set of roles to play according to his or her own nature. Fulfilling your proper function and vocation means both thriving and living as you ought to.

Casts and guilds

What matters, then, is having individuals whose vocations can be clearly identified. Each one should be able to develop his dharma, in accordance, of course, with the wider dharma of one’s society, and no one should either have his dharma trampled by concurrence or lack of social clarity, nor rejected according to one’s whims. Then, it makes sense to both identify the individuals’ particular nature and support differentiated reproduction so that different groups and functions don’t mix confusingly.

> Through dharma the traditional world, just like every living thing and every > being, is upheld; the dams holding back the sea of pure contingency and temporality stand firm; living beings partake of stability. It is therefore clear why leaving one's caste and mixing castes or even the rights, the duties, the morality, and the cults of each caste was considered a sacrilege that destroys the efficacy of every rite and leads those who are guilty of it to "hell"… nobody felt humiliated by his own caste and even a Sudra was as proud of and as committed to his own caste as a Brahman of the highest station… The ancient German peasant, for instance, experienced his cultivating the land as a title of nobility. (Julius Evola, Revolt against the Modern World, part 1, chap.14)

At a time where being a farmer is almost automatically derided upon as backward, "uneducated", far from the "vibrant" cosmopolitan cities, a perspective which re-establishes the merit of toiling the land—or performing other tradesman work—, not only as useful and necessary, but also as endowed with a proper moral value and spiritual significance, should be esteemed worthy of interest.

In the world of Tradition, casts and guilds exist naturally as to "put the right man at the right place" and as to preserve each one's place from prevarication, confusion, or from the flows of concurrence and speculation. The world of Tradition is definitely not socialist: its social order is hierarchic, it admits empires but no bloated bureaucratic State. It admits trade and capitalism completed by morality. The third caste, called Vaisya in India and Tiers état in the European Middle Ages, is made of free men, who know their trade, own their tools, are free to contract, buy, and sell, as long as they don't try to outmaneuver or enslave each other.

Think of it this way: do you prefer living under the so-called rights of man, spending 8+ hours a day in a cubicle, trying to please the HR and making money for greedy bosses and shadowy shareholders, completely dependent from your wage, or wouldn't it be better to do a trade you love, master your own tools and contracts, belong to a guild with a special dignity and privileges, and be the king of your home?

It could be objected that classical liberalism, the ideological hotbed of what was later dubbed capitalism, aimed at protecting the people from the abuses of absolute monarchy. This is what we're taught in academia, but this view entails a considerable twist of history. In truth, for thousands of years, kings and nobles were endowed with major responsibilities: they had to fix the prices so that no one could ruthlessly speculate at the expense of his neighbour, they rendered justice inside their own jurisdiction, and if they did their job right, they had even less power than a modern State.

Problems came when kings, instead of accepting their proper role, started cunning against the church and robbing the nobles of their power with the help of the nascent bourgeoisie. Ultimately, these degenerated monarchies, who denied the priests' and nobles' respective dharmas out of hubris, got overthrown, and we mistake them for monarchy in general, forgetting the countless times and places when proper cast societies worked and lasted.

The women’s dharma

The notion of dharma, that is, someone’s proper vocation, nature and destiny within a wider order, fits nicely with something we spent much time talking about: women. Progressives try to push for a purely abstract view of individuals, as if individuals had no proper features, innate abilities, character, biological impulses, and so on. Feminism follows this trend by denying how biology makes people, trying to cast womanhood and femininity as pure “social constructions.” What they’re doing consists in rejecting their own womanly dharma—and trying to grab some victimhood points in the process.

Are the women who reject femininity happy? Perhaps they manage to take advantage of their inflated SMV to collect beta orbiters, benefit from “affirmative action”, get invited to every party, and derive an immense pride from their effortless seduction power. But even then, by refusing to commit to a man and to have children, these women are not listening to their own deep-wired desires. At the end, they may manage to settle down with beta males, yet remain bored and constantly frustrated—or become cat ladies.

Traditional women, on the other hand, are much happier. A woman who enjoys and takes pride from pleasing her husband and caring about children and home is happy. What she’s doing is in line with her deepest needs. The womanly woman fulfills her destiny. Those who believe they are better off with a life of diversions and working for GloboCorp are blinded by a false view of dignity (as if being a proper woman meant having no dignity or pride) and out of touch with their own needs.

> It is a classical idea that perfection cannot be defined by any materialistic criteria, but only as the accomplishment of one’s own nature… The trend towards indifferentiation, towards fleeing mobility, leads the affected thing or being into a state of self-incompleteness, makes it lack correspondence to its own norm or “idea”, or, more precisely, to its dharma. (Evola, Revolt against the Modern World, I, 14)

A final note

The traditional Christian world modelled its economy on the idea of subsistence: anyone bound to free trade or production, i.e. belonging to the caste of merchants, craftsmen and free farmers, had to have his own place somewhere so that he could subsist and fulfill his dharma. He was, then, protected from his neighbour's greed and potential violence by the nobility or king. He might be a poor vaisya, but was no less the chief of his business and family.

One of the main factors that have upset this order, besides the degeneration of monarchies, could be find in a peculiar community: Jews. It has been shown that Jewish merchants often lessened their prices, used underhanded techniques such as selling used stuff as if it was new, and even pioneered advertisement—at a time when it was considered as encroaching on other people's businesses. Sustained Jewish efforts greatly contributed to push the Western world towards "freer" and "freer" market relationships, that is, towards a world where the most cunning asserts his interest at the expense of the others' legitimate ones.

If one follows purely economic considerations, one should soon fine that resources are always limited and that one's narrowly individual economic interest always entails screwing someone else. Producers are interested into stable conditions, so that they can work stress-free and assured to sell their products, whereas merchants earn significantly more when they can squeeze the producers before selling their products at a high price. Economic interests alone lead to endless disputes.

Likewise, if one believes too much into the "equality"—identity—of individuals and daydreams about "progress" or "emancipation", one's mindset will bear impossible hopes and deluded aspirations. When the impossibility of said hopes or how much they imply the ruthless exploitation of someone else—for example, how the businesswoman's comfort lies on pushing men down the sewers of silence and cheap employment—, here comes the existential crisis.

Both problems stem from the same root: the refusal to acknowledge limits to one's rights and duties. No one can do everything and no one should ever want to. Women should want to be feminine and not to be masculine, just like men should pursue masculinity and refuse to indulge into feminization.

An Introduction To Kama Sutra Positions

January 15, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Several months ago, I reviewed that classic of erotic literature, The Kama Sutra, on my website. In that review I said that the book didn't actually provide as much erotic instruction as I would have liked, instead giving me a lot of interesting looks at the culture of ancient India that was nonetheless not immediately pertinent to improving one's skill in the erotic arts.

So for your benefit, this will be the first of several articles that will cut to the "meat and potatoes" (meat and naan, whatever) of the Kama Sutra, showing you the sexual positions in both textual and visual form, and how and when to utilize them, without all of that other information that is not particularly relevant to the modern man. While Return Of Kings is of course a men's website, I will also be providing counterpoint to each item on the list, in the form of instruction for any women to use when having sex with their menfolk, just as the original Kama Sutra does for both male and female readers.

The most important thing to remember when studying the erotic arts is that most sexual positions are, in fact, variations of the basic ones you know without instruction—typically, the mere act of placing the legs in a slightly different place constitutes a new position. With that being said, a few of them are actually the nigh-incomprehensible techniques only alluded to on bad sitcoms. But those will perhaps be for another time.

And so, without further ado:

Number 1: Mouth Congress

What we in the modern day and age refer to as oral sex, Vatsyayana referred to as “mouth congress”—and I’m honestly surprised that some fedora-tipper hasn’t started using that term. As stated above, I will be providing instructions for both men and women because A) The techniques are obviously different for each sex and B) Considering that the overwhelming majority of blowjobs I’ve gotten in my life have been absolutely horrendous, I feel the women of the world could use some proper edification. But first the men:

When performing cunnilingus, the key is to stimulate the clitoris. In other words, don’t just slobber all over the vulva like a dog lapping up some tasty bits off the floor. Use the tongue to palpate the clitoris, letting her responses guide you.

Side note: When I say “let her responses guide you,” I mean that in the sense of “listen to how she reacts to your tongue magic and react accordingly,” not “stop every 10 seconds and ask her for consent and approval.” This isn’t California.

For the women performing fellatio: the two biggest problems I’ve had afflicted on me are the use of teeth, and literally “sucking” the penis as if it were a straw. Avoid doing these in the future. Use the hands, and use the oral cavity and tongue as if they were hands as well.

Number 2: A Couple Of Missionary Variations

Yeah, I’m slightly cheating with this.

I don’t think I need to explain to most ROK readers what the missionary position is, as I assume that most of us reading this website have had sexual intercourse at some point in their lives. Instead, I seek to convey a few variations on the standard position that may enhance your lovemaking pleasure and prowess.

One way to go about doing this is the Lotuslike Missionary, in which the woman lays on her back and folds her legs up into a lotus-like position as the name implies. This requires a good degree of flexibility, but rewards you with deeper penetration

Or alternatively, the woman can plant her feet and do a wrestling-style short bridge, allowing for deeper penetration and for her to match her thrusts with the man's

Number 3: Fixing the Nail

This is technically another missionary variation, but the sheer peculiarity of it is worth a standalone entry.

The woman lifts one leg high up and over, being evocative of a hammer striking the face of the man. The angles allow for some interesting use of kegels, as well as some general heavy petting along the raised thigh. While this isn't one of my favorites, it's worth a try.

Number 4: The Supported Congress

My personal favorite position, one that not only feels good, but also actively cultivates your masculinity and reinforces traditional gender roles while in the act of sexual intercourse.

The easiest way to go about doing this is to begin in what Vatsyayana refers to as the "pair of tongs" position, and what you likely know as the cowgirl.

Wait for her to slow down or stop entirely (which she should have legitimate reason to do if you've been doing it right), and then suddenly lunge forward, grab her around the waist, and stand up upon your feet—I emphasize that you should never end coitus, and it should be rapid.

Then continue thrusting as normal. If you've done this properly, her reaction will be a shriek half comprised of shock and half comprised of the utmost arousal. Her arms and legs will tightly wrap around your shoulders and waist, an involuntary reflex to a genuine fear of falling flat on her face. In short, her adrenaline glands will be working their endocrine magic. And from there you can stay on your feet or seamlessly transition to a man-on-top position

These four positions are just the tip of the sexual iceberg. Have fun and be safe.

Why Free Market Economics Isn’t Working As Advertised

January 15, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

Since Newton’s Laws, physicists thought the universe behaved basically like a billiards table: an object in motion stays in motion on its trajectory forever unless an outside force acts on it. Einstein’s revelations changed all that; great masses distort space-time, basically warping our allegorical billiards table. An extreme gravitational field even can bend light. Tremendous masses can acquire so much matter that the escape velocity is greater than the speed of light, and anything sucked into one of these black holes is never seen again.

Actually, economics is pretty similar. The free market works great in the realm of pure theory, but in practice, it’s not as simple as that. Here’s what happened.

A brief economic history

In 1776—an auspicious year—Adam Smith wrote The Wealth Of Nations, the primary textbook of capitalist theory. He covered several subjects, including factory production. One of his most famous ideas is the "invisible hand" theory. Basically, an unregulated market will figure out a fair price on its own. Suppliers who set their prices too high will be undercut by others. Those that excessively lowball their prices won't be able to stay in business. As the theory goes, a nation of producers trading with each other freely lifts the economy. That worked pretty well back in the days of independent farmers, bricklayers, blacksmiths, weavers, stonemasons, cartwrights, brewers, and so forth.

Government interference (including any sort of regulation) is seen as a drag on the economy. In many cases, that's true, in particular price fixing and excessive red tape. The greatest believers in unregulated capitalism are Libertarians and Objectivists. We will explore some of the unexpected results of this laissez-faîre economics.

So that was then, back in the Age of Enlightenment when most people were either independent farmers or producers who owned their own farms or their own shops and tools. During the Industrial Revolution, fortunes were made from a shoestring by exploiting new technologies. Many of these new industries became huge trusts—railroads, steel mills, coal, oil, and so forth. The problem with monopolies is that the one seller can set any price they like for the product. Without any competition, this means that Adam Smith's "invisible hand" effect doesn't work. This is also true when there's a small group of sellers that can work together to fix prices or divide up territories. Those things are illegal now, but that doesn't mean it doesn't happen.

Another problem is that this allowed the owner to live like a king, while paying the workers peanuts. Ownership and labor were now separated, unlike times before. The workers then barely scratched by in urban slums. Further, back in the day, belching smokestacks polluted the skies, the equipment was frequently unsafe, and the workers often had to work twelve hours a day (sometimes more). These sweatshops were cheap to run, but were miserable places to work.

This led to labor unions (fiercely resisted then) and also Socialism (which turned out to be pretty dysfunctional, especially the Communist variety). Capitalist countries in the Western world instituted environmental regulations, safety rules, child labor laws, and so forth. Then came the golden age of the 195os and 1960s in the USA, Germany, and Japan. Unfortunately, things got a little shaky for factory workers after that, beginning a long slide downhill.

Indeed, regulation does cost money. With today's globalist free trade, factories largely left the Western world for sweatshops overseas. This has happened to call centers too. Quality usually suffers, but the only thing that matters to management is that they work for peanuts. All that is justified by overpaid CEOs moaning that their own country's workers are too expensive and "besides, everybody else does that".

Today, we're basically back to the Robber Baron days. The only difference is today's urban slums are not populated by workers, but by welfare recipients, and the middle class has to pick up the tab for all that. Even so, that's just the beginning. When huge amounts of wealth are accumulated, the "free market" is no longer a level playing field. Here are some of the reasons why.

How big business distorts markets

If you have a great business idea, often you need a lot of capital in order to make it happen. When I was a teenager, I thought up an idea for satellite-distributed radio, making hundreds of channels available across the country. Since I didn't have the money to get satellite broadcasts going and start manufacturing receivers, someone else got to invent XM Radio. Even if you're only going to start a restaurant (which is a pretty dodgy investment), you'll probably need at least a hundred thousand dollars. This item is not particularly unfair; it is what it is. Some other economic barriers to entry are worse.

The regulatory environment favors huge businesses. There's a mountain of laws and red tape to wade through, and it really helps if you can afford a full-time legal department. For one example, a family farmer will struggle with certifying their crops as organic, but a large agribusiness firm has a department that takes care of those things.

Further, there's the "regulatory capture" problem. Often regulators and large businesses get on much too friendly terms; then the regulators aren't really doing their jobs any more. An extreme example is when former members of huge Wall Street companies get picked for top governmental regulatory jobs; if they see any funny business going on, do you think they're going to rat out their former employers? It's the ancient "Who watches the watchmen?" problem. In fact, this is just one example of how having connections helps the wealthy and powerful.

Countless big business lobbies work to influence the US Congress for favors. These rent-seeking measures are responsible for much crony capitalism, corporate welfare, and pork barrel politics. One of the more surreal examples was a measure to help manufacturers of wooden arrowheads, as a rider on the TARP bailout bill. There are small business lobbies too, but they don't have same deep pockets funding. Many huge businesses will make large campaign contributions to both sides; no matter who wins, their bread is buttered.

Several times, military actions resulted on behalf of big businesses. That hasn't exactly given the USA good press around the world. Further, the military-industrial complex likes dragged-out wars, for obvious reasons. Much could be done to trim waste; for instance, sourcing cheap fuel locally in Middle Eastern operations, rather than having it shipped from the USA (for a hefty markup) by contractors as it was during the second Gulf War. Avoiding spit-in-your-eye wars would would save even more money—and more importantly, lives.

Wall Street shenanigans

For the very rich, the stock market is more profitable too. Trading costs are proportionately lower with large lots, and institutional rates are available for the high rollers. You too can get in on the game, though a mutual fund or ETF will have a management fee. (Shop around and try to get under half a percent, if possible; a high management fee really eats into your profits over time.) The big stock market firms have automated trading systems that can place bids or orders much faster than any human trader can match, and they're strategically located in data centers where they'll be received a millisecond or two earlier than everyone else. For these (among other reasons), small investors can profit, but not as much as the big players.

Further, insider trading gives an advantage to those who have the right connections. Technically it's illegal, but in practice, it's a matter of not getting caught. For Congressmen, it's not even illegal; they wrote the laws to exempt themselves. For instance, one of the Congressmen pushing for the body scanners in airports happened to be a big investor in the company making them.

Wall Street can get quite predatory. Someone with access to a huge amount of money (often supplied by bank leverage) can do a hostile takeover on a company by buying up over half of its stock. Sometimes this is assisted by illegally manipulating the stock price. As to what happens to the company, it's either dissolved or run into the ground. Its assets are then sold off by the corporate raider, leaving all the workers unemployed. If you've seen the movie Wall Street, you know what I'm talking about.

That's not a constructive use of the free market; that's gaming the system. There certainly is a social impact to hundreds or thousands of people out of work and unable to pay their bills. The usual response to this by the laissez-faîre crowd amounts to "They lost their jobs because they're not ambitious enough" or some other lame variant of "Let them eat cake."

FRIDAY 25th OCTOBER 1929
WALL STREET CRASH!
Black Thursday in America
Stocks Plunge and Eleven Commit Suicide

This is from the first time around. Unfortunately, we forgot the lessons learned.

Back in 2008, when Wall Street got its fingers burnt (a long story, which I'll hopefully describe in the future), the US government bailed out several entities with the Troubled Asset Relief Program. While it was debated, I remember how the talking heads were screaming that the world would end if the government didn't pay up. In a truly free market, the banksters would've had no such recourse to get paid for making dreadful mistakes and crashing the economy.

One bank that I've been monitoring took the bailout money and invested in the stock market when it was at the bottom. I poured all the money I had available into the market too, though of course I didn't have the government writing me a check for a few billion dollars of leverage. They bought up one of their competitors too; sure sounds like they were hard up for cash!

Note that out of the eighteen corporations bailed out by TARP, GM and Chrysler were the only ones that actually produce anything. With "casino capitalism", profits are privatized and debts are socialized. Sounds pretty rotten, doesn't it? Well, it gets worse.

The end results of plutocracy and globalism

The present free market system has enabled the ultra-rich to accumulate greater and greater amounts of wealth. They're beginning to resemble medieval aristocracy. This has been going on for a while, too. (One banking family in particular is starting to get as inbred as the Spanish Hapsburgs. That's one way of keeping the wealth in the family. If others follow suit, we'll have to revise our stereotypes about incest being only for hillbillies with green teeth.) Society is becoming increasingly characterized by vast extremes of wealth, just as huge gravitational masses in space start sucking in all the nearby matter.

I can understand people wanting to make money. However, excess gets pointless after a while. If someone has ten billion dollars, how is his life going to be better off with ten billion more? Still, they'll fight tooth and nail to keep from getting their taxes raised. When Congress made Bush the Younger's tax cuts permanent for 2013 except for anyone making over $400K/year, there was quite a bit of screeching about their 4.6% tax break expiring. Although the graduated income tax has been criticized as a Communist measure, in this case it's right that those who have benefited the most from the system should be paying back the most to keep it running.

Worse, the globalists don't have much loyalty to their own countries, seeing borders and distinct cultures as barriers to making even more money. This is one reason why they're so keen on their social engineering efforts. Another reason is that they don't know—or don't care—what it's doing to the public. Although we're getting closer to conditions back in the Robber Baron days, if things keep going as they are, we're going to get dragged back to feudalism. Part of this social engineering involves pushing mass immigration, against the public's wishes. These globalist elites are quite short-sighted; if they get their way, they'll kill the goose that laid the golden egg. As it happens, that's us.

In summary

Capitalism certainly does work better than Socialism. Still, laissez-faîre economics has no protection against the creation of vast extremes of wealth or the abuse of power. The system we have now is not the one we were supposed to get. It's time to seek other alternatives, including distributism.

The only way to fix this will be to re-introduce sensible regulations, as existed before: the Glass-Steagall Act (which separated investment banking from commercial banking), the uptick rule to keep stocks from getting short-sold into the ground, and so forth. Other regulations should be simplified to allow small businesses easier access to get into the market. Further, campaign finances should be reformed in order to stop huge businesses from throwing their weight around in Congress. Finally, consumers can choose to spend their money with small businesses; this will help keep the money circulating in their community, rather than getting sucked into a big black hole.

5 Reasons Why You Should Build Your Own House

January 15, 2017 | by Bob Collins | Link | Original Link

Ever since I Found ROK, I took a greater interest in aspects of my life to challenge my greater limits. Twenty one and still living with my dad, I've been looking at buying a house for some time. After a couple houses purchases didn't come through I started brainstorming building options.

I've done renovation work with my dad but nothing this scale. After pondering and running numbers, I recalled a masculine affirmation. If it scares you, do it, so I ordered house blueprints that night. If you stop reading here, the biggest takeaway is not to stress the details. Action with a unfamiliar task yields experience, and details will keep guessing at the start line. Get in the habit of throwing yourself in unusual experiences.

Site prep July 12nd

1. It establishes credit-ability

Growing up, my father was the definition of a blue-collar guy. He worked extremely hard and labored to get what he wanted, eventually building his own business with his hands rather than the mind. I went on to a university and pursued my own forms of business. The biggest realization that hit me getting out of school was enough of talk without action. This is the real world now, you can only deliver. Putting your hand to the plow is way you create your momentum. With momentum comes success. With success comes ambition. Simply attempting what you talk about lets people respect and value the person you are.

July 22nd, Foundation laid

2. It’s a lot cheaper

Here a contractor’s percentage of the cost of having him build the house: 25% cost of land, 25% building materials, 25% labor, 25% builders profit/overhead.

In my instance, I got the land for pennies and therefore only paid 25% for materials. When you build new, you wipe most repair bills out of the budget. Everything is brand new; plumbing, electrical, roof, doors, windows, you name it. Suffer now for decades of peace of mind. Furnace or AC have an issue ten years from now? Even they have ten year warranties. Walls and insulation are now made a lot better for energy conservation. This makes your utility bills a lot lower, probably 30-70% cheaper than a house of fifty years or older.

You could even budget a simple estimate to frame the structure, roof it, and house wrap. The stage materials bill on my house would be about 20k. This would give you a project you could finish at any time, therefore finish the house out of pocket over the years. Leading to the best aspect of the project, NO MORTGAGE.

August 8th, Walls Framed/sheathed

3. It’s a masculine challenge

At one point in everyone’s life, they looked at floor plans or day dreamed about a certain house. Everyone shares this fantasy, and therefore sees you as greater value for accomplishing on of their own dreams. The biggest thing I took out of this project was to test your limits.

Your capable of much more than you can comprehend. I did this for the challenge, and the hands-on experience for my field. When I started, I never framed new construction, finished concrete, installed HVAC, etc. With these beginner aspects, you must understand you will error on the project. However, the errors in my house give me a sense of pride, rather than pain. There's a lot of things you must do incorrectly to learn how to make it right, and construction is one. You will have more knowledge in two months of swinging hammers, than you could get as two years in management.

August 27nd, Roof-Raftered/sheathed/Roofed.
Back in College Now= Half production to completion

4. It checks your ego

The biggest reaction I get among my peers at management is a "Why?" The mindset of many educated professionals is entitlement and superiority. However larger than that is their affirmation of "I'm above that". Hanging drywall? Plumbing in a crawlspace? What is wrong with you?

I decided that the path to protect my ego doesn't lead to my goals. I did this not to prove to anyone, but myself. For example, I took note of a skilled contractor during college. This man built his business out of the ashes. He did more in five years than most do in a lifetime. The main reason I learned was he didn't obtain an ego. That ego would have told him to sit out nasty and hard jobs. However, he told me if he didn't take those jobs, he wouldn't have had near the experience or opportunities. The same exact lesson I learned.

So now when my coworkers drive by building site they smile with envy, instead of doubt. I learned to listen to myself, and base my actions off that.

October 14th, Plumbing/Electrical/ Windows

5. It challenges your mindset

In the first awakening I experienced growing up in my teens, I gained confidence steadily without making progress with girls. This came from my struggles and work. I experienced issues and conflicts most teenagers don't encounter. Through a lot of failure and uncomfortable situations, I became a new person. It one thing to learn how to solve a problem from someone telling you; solving it yourself, however, is a serious confidence boost.

Even if you have never picked up a hammer, you are still more than capable. When you approach this with a "No matter what, I'll handle it" attitude, the house is just a set of simple goals. Once this is done, you don't see hands on tasks the same. Oil pan leaking on the car, I'll fix it in an hour. Want a picnic table in the backyard? Weekend project is an overstatement. Shingles blew off last night, please…. you put the other 98% on. Upon completion, your mindset forms a default setting of "I GOT THIS".

No worries, in so many ways. Besides stated above there is a lot more peace of mind that molds into confidence. A lot of simple minded people set goals like (lose 2 lbs., get a new car, get a raise). Anytime you fall short in an aspect of your life, you can sit at your kitchen table, looking at the hardwood floor job that came out great. Shifting your eyes to the vaulted ceiling that was a challenge to frame and drywall. Then you watch as your wife does dishes, and drains the sink. The sink that you put in along with all the plumbing. All the sudden you realize this opposition doesn't stand a chance. You erected your own home with your own hands. This new hurdle is nothing more than a grain of sand on a very large beach.

Dec 4th, Siding, concrete garage/driveway. Last to be completed-HVAC, floors

Conclusion

You're going to spend at least eight hours a day wherever you live. Why not make that environment yourself the way you want? It took a lot of hurdles and hardships to get that career, dream girl, car…etc. Your home should be no different. The only thing you should fear is the possibly of not giving it a shot.

The 10 Commandments For Atheist Men

January 16, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Religion is a big topic in the manosphere with sporadic debates erupting over whether it is a positive influence for today's masculinity and society at large or not. The religious camp argue that belief in God and religious moral values are basic necessities for red-pilled men who are fighting against modern cultural degeneracy while the non-religious camp argue that it's just a distraction and, at worst, another form of blue pill used to control men.

My purpose here is not to blow up a debate (although it is practically unavoidable once the subject is brought up), nor is it to patronize the Christians on what they should or shouldn't do (although many of these tenets apply to Christians as well), but to talk practical sense into some of the fellow non-believers who may find themselves at odds with the other men of manosphere who are religious. Here are some basic guidelines that I think should be adopted by the red pill atheists:

1. Thou shalt not be petty or defensive regarding your position

Atheists are accused of being too defensive and somewhat sensitive regarding their lack of faith and I find this to be generally true.

Perhaps it’s the indignation that comes with the feeling of being lied to when you were young and vulnerable, of having had believed in a supreme being that one feared, only to realize that it was all just superstition. Or perhaps it’s associated with the memories of having your family, school, or community trying to control you and enforce guilt within you. But whatever it may be, it’s best to leave it in the past and move on. Being reactive and displaying knee-jerk hostility to silly statements made by religious fanatics don’t help you at all, it just makes you look weak.

2. Thou shalt not argue about the question of God

Never let yourself get trolled.

In the eighteen years or so that I've been on the Internet, I've never seen a debate on the existence of God end with one side saying, "Holy shit! Your arguments make perfect sense! I will now join you for you have opened my eyes." So it surprises me that people still waste time typing away angry arguments that lean closer to insults than intellectual debates.

If people believe in something, they're not going to change their minds no matter how much you challenge their beliefs using the best possible arguments (and trust me, I've tried and so did the other guys who tried to convert me), not unless their hearts are open to it or the seeds of doubts have already been sown. Just don't do it.

3. Thou shalt differentiate between the argument on the existence of God and the utility of religion

Although debating is one of the dumbest waste of time ever, if you do insist, please learn to differentiate between the argument on the existence of God with the practical implications of religion. I see far too many people slipping from former to the latter when their position gets weak.

4. Thou shalt not identify oneself as an atheist

There's an unfortunate connotation among the religious right that if you're an atheist, you're probably a progressive, leftist, hipster, faggot, pinko-commie socialist. It doesn't matter how much you prove yourself to be not; the other camp doesn't care. If you're an atheist, you will be marked as an outsider. For that reason, I find it better to say that I'm not religious or "non-religious" and not mention religion at all until someone asks me first.

Besides the stereotype, I really don't find any use in forming an identity around a lack of belief in something. I don't consider myself a psychic-skepticist, Scientology-denier, or anti-Loki, so why should I do the same with religion? If a certain faith tries to limit my freedom, force its values onto me, or endanger me in anyway, I will push back, but there is no such danger for atheists in the West (unlike in Bangladesh.)

5. Thou shalt not seek praise for your lack of faith

There are few atheists who think their lack of faith makes them smarter and better than the theists and insists on letting everyone know. This is a symptom of our Internet culture where people without real accomplishments try to one up others by proclaiming their identity or belief as being superior to the faceless strangers on the net. Although this is more common with the pseudo-intellectual Leftists, I've seen it enough times in the manosphere to warrant a mention.

6. Thou shalt not judge another man based on his faith (or the lack thereof)

I admit this is hard, especially when the other side starts to get rabid to a point of absurdity and accuses you of being literally Stalin or even autistic—it's enough to declare the entire camp as being nothing but a bunch of crazies and intolerant buffoons. But I implore you to turn the other cheek.

I've met both extremes of great and wicked people regardless of their faith (although some exceptionally kind individuals have tended to be devout believers), so a person's religious belief doesn't seem to be a reliable indicator of his character. Don't jump to conclusions so easily.

7. Thou shalt not seek false idols

There are plenty of statheists from both the Left and the Right.

To compensate for their lack of faith, atheists tend to seek alternative gods to worship, substituting an immaterial deity for another one in the material world. Among these include: hedonism, consumerism, money, self-love, technology, ideology, and statism in all forms (including the worship of "civilization"). I can tell that there will be many disagreements as to whether these things actually represent false idols or not, but none of them can bring you genuine happiness and contentment in life, if not being outright traps to exploit you that will lead to your demise.

8. Thou shalt seek enlightenment from within

Instead of seeking false idols from without, seek enlightenment from within. If religion is not your cup of tea, stoic and Eastern philosophies (of Buddhism, Taoism, etc.) are good alternatives to follow. Know that you don't need to be religious to be spiritual; it all depends on how you define spirituality.

9. Thou shalt honor thy masculinity

I don’t think I need to tell the readers here of the importance of cultivating masculinity, but if you’re looking for something else to focus on to give you a meaning in life besides religion, masculinity should be one of your top three priorities. Learn to be good at being and man and everything else will follow.

10. Thou shalt not fear death

As a non-believer, your inevitable mortality will likely trouble you. Unlike those who believe in heaven and hell, you have no afterlife to look forward to or take comfort in, only the eternal nothingness that comes with death. That is something you must face bravely if you wish to live a life of greatest satisfaction and potential.

Obviously, accepting death is something far harder to actually do than say. So if you fear death, try to make it your friend. Remind yourself of the brevity of life and dance with death to experience the thrill of living. Along the way, you just might come to accept it without even knowing. And once you do, you'll know that you lived the best you could—that you were granted the chance to experience the world in all its mysterious glory.

White American Girl Raises Over $30,000 Because Her Dad Is “Racist” Against Black Boyfriend

18-year-old Tennessee teenager Allie Dowdle has asked the public to pay for her college tuition after she claimed her “racist” father and mother cut her off financially for dating a black man. She set an initial target of $10,000 but has raised over $30,000 at the time of this writing.

What a poor girl, right? Well, not so much. It turns out that Dowdle attends a $20,000-a-year private school in Memphis. To put this into perspective, the median American income, representing the person earning more than 50% of the population and less than 50% of the population, is just $30,240. That’s $30,240 for food, rent, medical care, entertainment, gas, other car costs, water, electricity, insurance, debt repayments, entertainment, and education, not to mention anything else that a human being needs or desires.

Countering his daughter’s attempts to throw him under the bus, Dowdle’s father insists that one of the real reasons Allie has been cut off is due to her lying about her relationship and dating Michael Swift in secret (just like 90% of American parents who issue curfews and insist on meeting a new boyfriend). He also claimed that she needed to be less pampered and “go out in the world and grow up.”

The only person who deserves to be thrown under the proverbial bus in this situation is Allie Dowdle.

Sadly, Dowdle has proffered zero evidence that her family, particularly her father, is actually racist. Yet this has not stopped over a thousand people so far from "donating" to her campaign. For anyone who has read Robert Cialdini's book Influence, Allie's pleas for assistance strongly echo the "because" mechanism for gaining the compliance of others.

One example Cialdini uses in his work is someone trying to push in line to use the photocopier by saying to others something like, "I need to use the photocopier first because I need to make copies." As stupid and mundane as it sounds, study after study has shown it works. In the case of Dowdle, she has argued that "I need money because my family is racist," all without proving or even trying to prove anything. We have nothing but her accusation to go by.

Strangely, Allie Dowdle, whose material and social positions are much greater than the vast majority of American youngsters wanting to attend college, expects to be treated as a modern-day civil rights activist for dating and presumably having sex with a black man. Though Return Of Kings has never subscribed to the violent militancy of Black Lives Matter and other repugnant trouble-making groups, we note with great mirth the irony of a rich white girl asking for money for college tuition to fight "racism."

Why didn't Allie Dowdle ask for $1,000 or $2,000 for a second-hand car?

A used car I found on sale in nearby Memphis for just $1,995 (via www.autotrader.com). If Allie Dowdle is so hard-working, why didn't she simply ask for $1,000 or $2,000 for a used car to get to work?

Allie Dowdle insists that she cannot get a job because of issues related to transport, with her car having been taken from her. This begs the question as to why she didn't have an independent source of savings beforehand. Perhaps the answer is because she just didn't work much previously. Whereas I and many of you had your first jobs when you were in your mid-teens (I was just 13, actually), Dowdle seems to have relied on her parents much more than working-class and lower middle-class teens.

And if Allie Dowdle is so hard-working, why didn't she ask for a hand-up instead of a hand-out? All she needs is a car that works, which only costs $1,000 to $2,000, so she can get a job. I would still doubt her story, yet this more modest request would be less of an apparent scam than asking for her tuition to be paid for by the public. Interestingly, her campaign does not mention any of the places she might have applied to for work nearby (assertions that could at least be confirmed or denied by certain businesses) or whether she asked her parents for permission to use the car only for work purposes.

This new GoFundMe opportunist lives in the town of Eads, which is under 30 miles from Memphis by car. A Google Maps check I did shows a number of sizeable nearby towns, too. I find it hard to believe that she cannot find an after-school or weekend job without a car. Bus services are far from non-existent and it would appear that Dowdle's need for money stems from a reluctance to, say, get up early on a weekend so she can attend a part-time job.

Regardless, having looked at the ways public Tennessee colleges manage admissions, there seems to be little chance that she would be prevented from attending college at all without $10,000 from the public. Her GoFundMe page indicates, falsely, that without such money her dream of going to college will be ruined. Almost every Tennessee (and American) college student enters and leaves college with some level of debt, usually a high one. This does not impede tens or even hundreds of thousands of poor or lower middle-class kids with far less affluent backgrounds than Dowdle from graduating every year.

It's so easy to assassinate someone's character nowadays—especially if the accuser is a (young) woman

Artist's depiction of America in 2017. Oh, and the Salem witch trials, too.

Dowdle's father Bill is the proprietor of a sporting goods store, which has been in his family's hands for over a century. This business may not survive the outrage that erupted after Allie Dowdle's GoFundMe page began trending and was picked up by various media outlets across the world. And we still have no proof that "racism," rather than Dowdle's alleged immaturity, was behind her being cut off. It is highly likely that Bill Dowdle will lose tens of thousands in profits, let alone sales, as a result of this highly negative attention.

Though I mentioned the campaign's use of "because" psychological posturing, its success largely depends on Dowdle being a young, non-ugly teen girl. Thanks to an army of white knights and feminists, rape accusations, for instance, are usually believed immediately and the accused castigated, isolated, and even attacked. But when young women want money, the white knights generally take care of business for them. In fact, before comments were disabled, I noticed an over-representation of females making negative remarks and an over-representation of doughy-looking men donating money.

You can now monetize your daddy issues

Parents and fathers in particular are around to set boundaries for their children, especially when those children suck at their financial teat, 18 and over or not. It comes as no surprise that teenage girls' conflicts with the authority of their parents is one of the most recycled tropes found in modern cinema. Perversely, Allie Dowdle has illustrated that, with no evidence whatsoever, an aggrieved teenage girl can now throw her family under the bus and expect to make a small fortune from it. All she needs is to be non-ugly and have the appropriate prop (in this instance a black boyfriend) to make a certain claim (here, racism).

Some teenagers are, of course, going to genuinely believe what they write to try and get money. Anger is a strange thing. Nonetheless, the fact that so many complete strangers are donating, without any corroboration other than the words of the girl who organized the fundraising herself (why didn't a friend, or the boyfriend's family?), portends very badly for society at large. If your alleged "mistreatment" ticks the right boxes, you can expect a hefty payday, all whilst leaving those you accused to be kicked and screamed at for their "crimes."

Meanwhile, plenty of actual victims of the world, with absolutely no means to better their situation, are left to starve, go without, and generally suffer.

Why Congressional Representative John Lewis Should Be Disciplined

January 16, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

John Lewis, a Democratic member of Congress from Georgia, recently stirred controversy with some remarks about the alleged "illegitimacy" of the incoming Trump administration. He said the following to NBC's Chuck Todd:

> I don't see this President-elect as a legitimate president. I think the Russians participated in helping this man get elected. And they helped destroy the candidacy of Hillary Clinton.

Lewis made his name in the 1960s as a civil rights activist; he was also a strong supporter of Hillary Clinton. Trump predictably fired back an angry rebuke. At that point a number of other Democrats predictably rushed to tweet their own comments to try to present Trump's response as an unprovoked attack on Lewis's integrity:

> .@repjohnlewis knows true sacrifice. @realDonaldTrump has no clue. When cluelessness collides with power oppression results. Resistance! https://t.co/Eu1vWbetsl
> — Rep. Keith Ellison (@keithellison) January 14, 2017

> Ahead of #MLKday2017, let us remember that many have tried to silence @repjohnlewis over the years. All have failed.
> — Nancy Pelosi (@NancyPelosi) January 14, 2017

Some Democrats have even declared that they will boycott the presidential inauguration. I believe strongly that Lewis's comments were unethical, dangerous, and shockingly disrespectful of the federal government he was sworn to serve. I am a fan of neither Clinton nor Trump; my only goal here is to show why such sentiments publicly expressed by a legislator introduce dangerous factionalism and encourage sedition by the public. They are disrespectful of the nation's institutions and should not be tolerated.

There is nothing wrong with party disagreement in a republican democracy. Up to a point such differences are healthy and actually strengthen the functioning of institutions. Rep. Lewis and his colleagues have every right to oppose the president's policies, to argue with him, even to mock or ridicule him. This is part of the democratic process and no one is arguing that a president should not be attacked or criticized. That much should be clear.

But what Rep. Lewis did was something very different. He was questioning the legitimacy of the president-elect: and by doing this, he is directly undermining respect for the institution of the executive branch itself. Persons can be opposed and disagreed with; but a lawmaker should never question the legitimacy of the office itself. This has the effect of fomenting sedition among the populace, which is something that no state can permit. For if one accepts that a president is not legitimate, then it follows directly from this that one can disregard his orders with impunity. It is a direct attempt to corrode public faith in government and to incite the public against the chief executive.

The very first ethical rule listed in House Ethics Rule XXIII, Code of Officlal Conduct, is that a lawmaker should act in a way befitting his office:

> A Member, Delegate, Resident Commissioner, officer, or employee of the House shall behave at all times in a manner that shall reflect creditably on the House.

What is even more disturbing is that fact that so many Democrats were willing actually to take Lewis's side. Instead of seeing the matter as one of indiscipline and disrespect for the nation's institutions, some Democrats tried to recast the incident as an attack on a "civil rights leader" by Trump. Whatever Lewis did or may have done in the past is totally irrelevant, of course, to the matter at hand, which is his unethical and calumnious behavior.

The great dangers of factionalism and calumny to the health of a free republic were well-known to Machiavelli, who commented on them in his Discourses:

> It is clear…in what detestation calumnies should be held in free cities and in all other forms of society, and how with a view to checking them no institution which serves this end should be neglected…There is no need of witnesses or of any other corroboration of the facts to set calumnies going, so that anybody can be calumniated by anybody else. But one cannot in this way be indicted, for indictments must be corroborated and circumstances be adduced to prove the truth of the indictment…Where provision for this has been made, and due recourse is had to it, calumniators should be severely punished.
> Calumnies, too, are among the various things of which citizens have availed themselves in order to acquire greatness [i.e., power], and are very effective when employed against powerful citizens who stand in the way of one's plans, because by playing up to the populace and confirming the poor view it takes of such men, one can make it one's friend. [I.8. Trans. by L.J. Walker, S.J.]

As a perceptive commentator on what things could make–and unmake–republican governments, Machiavelli looked with alarm on the evils of factionalism. What Rep. Lewis did was precisely what is described in the passage above. To curry favor with his electorate—and possibly to burnish his relevancy in the modern era—he directly undermines public faith in the institutions he is a part of. Such comments fuel the fires of political factionalism and lead directly to civil unrest and disorder. The behavior is reprehensible and he should be disciplined immediately.

This is unlikely to happen, as we all know. Congress as a whole long ago abandoned its obligation to look after the public good and opted for factionalism, influence-peddling, and special interests coddling. And yet a record of these incidents must be made, so that when future generations ask how the collapse of our institutions took place, we will have illustrative examples to point to.

8 Productivity Tips I Use Every Day

January 16, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In this podcast, I explain eight productivity tips that I use every day to create the work that you enjoy from me. They include how to prepare for a day's work the night before, how to approach a work session, how to minimize distractions, and how to handle excessive noise in your environment. These tips all seem like common sense to me now, but there was a time that I didn't use any of them and experienced less concentration and efficiency as a result.

New Fox Series Promotes Infanticide As Abortion While Shilling For Planned Parenthood

January 17, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Fox's new series The Mick is pushing some old leftist ideology. The Mick just debuted as a so-called "comedy" that's garnering mixed reviews, but it's promotion of infanticide in one of the scenes of its pilot episode, as well as the old "rich people get away with things" gnome makes it yet another preachy vehicle for the left to promote its failing agenda. The plot of the show involves degenerate grifter "Mick" being forced to look after her niece and nephew after her sister and her sister's husband go to prison. The series' writers aren't leaving many people laughing, especially with a pointless joke that got circulated in conservative circles comparing accumulating notches on a punch card by killing unborn babies to getting rewards for eating out.

This particular scene from the show reflects just how low the producers will go to push the abortion agenda down the throats of millions, as Mick has this conversation with her niece Sabrina:

> Sabrina: That's not gonna work for me. Yeah, I'm gonna go to this fund-raiser for Planned Parenthood. Probably crash at my friend's place, go to the city tomorrow. So just don't expect to see me too much. You know, we probably won't see each other at all. Hmm. But hey, let's catch up again in ten years when you need another loan.
> Mick: Listen, Sabrina, I got a lot riding on this gig, so can you do me a favor and not be a big, giant, pain in the ass, please?

> Sabrina: Maybe you don't know this, but Planned Parenthood provides health care to over three million women in this country.
> Mick: Oh, sweetie, I know all about Planned Parenthood. I should have one of those punch cards that gets you a free sub every ten visits.
> Sabrina: Gross.

Why the writers of the show felt it necessary to insert PP into the series beyond promoting the Hollyweird agenda is unknown.

The producers of The Mick probably think they're being edgy and cutesy by comparing the accumulation of gruesome infanticides to getting a sub sandwich punch card, but all they're really doing is once again spitting in the eyes of and pissing down the backs of conservatives, like so many "progressives" who are actually regressing civilization.

The lame attempt at humor is obviously an attempt to jam Planned Parenthood into the national psyche and normalize the killing of unborn children, which makes the organization millions of dollars annually.

Dr. Robert Siudmack, a former abortion doctor defected from Planned Parenthood, and now campaigns against the organization which he says is totally money-driven.

> I worked at the [Planned Parenthood] Margaret Sanger Center in downtown Manhattan for about a year before moving to South Florida, and it was all about the money, and how many abortions we could do in a short period of time. There was a set price, and obviously the more abortions one did, the more money they would make….

Unsurprisingly, Siudmack also said:

> Abortion is big business.

Profiting from Infanticide

Leftists claim to hate abortion but the practice makes a ton of profit

Indeed, disposing of unwanted children is how an organization like Planned Parenthood pays its bills and pushes its murderous, demographically suicidal agenda. Live Action News, an anti-abortion group reports:

> According to their own recently released 2009-10 annual report, Planned > Parenthood performed more than 329,000 abortions. Conservatively estimating that each abortion cost $450, abortion services brought in $148 million of Planned Parenthood's overall $320 million in clinic revenue, representing 46% of its operating budget.

Killing babies is literally worth hundreds of millions of dollars. Dr. Anthony Levantino, who produced a series of videos illustrating how gruesome abortion procedures are and how developed the fetus usually is as it's destroyed, also talked about how profitable abortion is.

> In my practice, we were averaging between $250 and $500 for an abortion, and it was cash. That's the only time as a doctor you can say, either pay me up front or I'm not going to take care of you. It's totally elective… Either you have the money or you don't. And they get it.

So, it seems profit motivates leftists too—even though they screech unendingly about "evil" capitalism from their Apple iDouche keyboards while lapping up their Starbucks lattes. It's no wonder conservative radio host Michael Savage coined the phrase "Liberalism is a mental disorder" over a decade ago.

The Mick's playing around with the abortion issue only confirms a claim made by Rush Limbaugh last year:

> But when it comes to abortion, Hollywood will do anything and everything it can do to normalize it, promote it, make it look normal and healthy and make pregnancy look like the disease.

Hollyweird and Planned Parenthood are regularly in bed with one another, as both push a degenerate, feminist agenda in service of a Marxist, globalist agenda aimed at ending viviparous reproduction (as Huxley called it in Brave New World) once and for all. Life Site wrote:

> The large list of actor-supporters of abortion is not surprising to pro-life leaders. The "Hollywood" establishment, they point out, has aggressively promoted a sexually liberal lifestyle that is strongly dependent upon abortion as a back up to inevitable failed contraception resulting from its sexual promiscuity.

Feminism = Deathstyle, Not Lifestyle

Strange bedfellows, the race-obsessed left and PP: "…human weeds,' 'reckless breeders,' 'spawning… human beings who never should have been born…" -Margaret Sanger referring to immigrants, African Americans and poor people

Of course, all of this cultural cancer is a result of 50 years of unchecked feminism. Feminism is literally a death cult, oddly a new twist on Anglo-American Puritanism and female superiority that is destroying the West culturally and demographically.

It seems the election of Trump has only made the left double down on its resolve to continue infanticide. But no matter what spin the whores of the elite put on the practice, the simple fact remains it is a barbaric way of dealing with irresponsible sexual behavior. Especially when there are myriad methods of contraception available to prevent pregnancy in the first place.

Dr. Levantino explains why he now is leading the crusade against abortion:

> I looked, I literally looked at that pile of baby parts on the table, and I didn't see all the things that had sustained me all those years. I didn't see what a wonderful doctor I was helping her with her problem. I didn't see her wonderful right to choose, and I didn't even see the $800 cash I just made in 15 minutes. All I could see was somebody's son or daughter.
> Suddenly, this was looking really different to me. For the first time in my life it hit me very powerfully, that this woman had come to me figuratively and said…here's $800, kill my baby. And I was the type of person who would look right back at her very calmly, and say why sure, I'll do that.
> When you finally figure out…that killing a baby that big for money is wrong, it doesn't take you too long to figure out it doesn't matter if the baby is this big, or this big, or even this big, it's all the same.

So, it would be nice to see TV shows abandoning their preachy, holier-than-thou narratives when it comes to the issue airing on prime time television. Unless they want to continue the destruction of the ivory tower they live in as the fortunes of a once decadent television empire fade away and fall to dust.

Arizona Lawmaker Attempts To Starve Social Justice On College Campuses

January 17, 2017 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

Arizona Representative Bob Thorpe (Republican, District 6), has recently introduced an amendment to existing Arizona legislation that would impose crippling financial sanctions on any Arizona college or university that offers courses, activities or events that contain social justice themes.

HB 2120 would give Arizona's attorney general absolute power to withhold up to 10 percent of state aid if he or she determines a college or university is in violation of the law.

Are you as sick of SJW enablers as I am?

Representative Thorpe said his bill is aimed specifically at things like the "privilege walk" exercise which is currently sponsored by the University of Arizona, as well as a course entitled, "Whiteness and Race Theory," which is currently being offered to students at Arizona State University. The "privilege walk" exercise is described as, "helping 'privileged' students become aware of their own privilege and its impact on others."

Included in these exercises is a cute little maneuver that encourages students to step forward if they meet certain criteria, like having more than 50 books at home, or attending a private school, or having inherited money. Conversely, those who were raised in a single-parent household, or had to rely on public transportation, or were ashamed of their clothes while growing up, must take a step backward for each of the criteria met.

Sock-puppet participants in this brain-twisting, University of Arizona exercise are encouraged to then take notice of exactly where they stand, in relation to all the other students doing the exercise; in other words, white people are to be singled out and shamed for their oh-so-obvious "white privilege."

The Arizona State University class, "Whiteness and Race Theory," is described as teaching, "postcolonialist, psychoanalytic, deconstructionist, feminist, new historicist" schools of thought. Among the required reading for the course is an interesting little book called, "The Everyday Language of White Racism," which is described as providing "an incisive analysis of everyday language to reveal the underlying racist stereotypes that continue to circulate in American culture."

Rep. Thorpe is taking action regarding what all of us have been thinking

Representative Thorpe said he sees those and similar classes as signifying a giant step backward for mankind in general: “The gains that were made in the 1960s are now being eroded,” Thorpe told the Arizona Daily Star. He continued:

> We’re now finding ways to divide people and put wedges between people. Take that privilege walk exercise, for example. Somebody is being classified as being less of an individual based upon their social classification, a classification being placed upon them, the ZIP code they grew up in, whether their parents were successful in business or not. If you then look at an individual whose ancestors, because of their race, for example, they are linked to people that did something 100 or 200 years ago, that person who’s living today has little or no association with what happened 200 years ago. So let’s not have a wedge issue and cause that person to be vilified when they absolutely had nothing to do with some event that happened in the past.

“I’m not saying in my bill these classes cannot occur,” he continued. “What I’m saying is taxpayers should not have to pay for them.”

(His actual legislation, however, provides no such distinction, which is perfectly all right with your old Uncle Bob. In a nutshell, according to the verbiage of Thorpe’s actual bill, state aid would be at risk whether or not public dollars are involved.)

Heidi Vega, spokeswoman for the Arizona School Boards Association, said her organization believes these standards should be set not by the state legislature but by locally elected school boards. But Thorpe specifically said he crafted the measure because local school boards and the Board of Regents are currently not addressing the issue.

University of Arizona spokesman Chris Sigurdson said the “privilege walk” is an optional activity, saying the optional materials have been in use for more than 20 years. He said it is “not part of any formal curriculum” at the school. He referred questions about the legislation to the regents. Spokeswoman Sarah Harper said her board has not had a chance to review what Thorpe has proposed. A spokesman for Arizona State University would not comment. In other words, all of the participating SJW mouthpieces in the loop are passing the thing around like the hot potato it really is…

SJWs are freaking out over this bill…and everything else that is changing

Lee Bebout, the Arizona State University associate professor who offers the course that Representative Thorpe finds offensive, defended it as a means of addressing the various aspects of social conflict: "College is exactly the place where students and teachers must work together to confront difficult ideas," he told Capitol Media Services. And Bebout also said that college curricula, "should be designed by experts in the field rather than by politicians."

But the co-sponsor or Representative Thorpe's bill, State Rep. Mark Finchem of Oro Valley, heartily disagrees: "I oppose taxpayer funding for anything that seeks to divide people by race, religion, ethnicity, or gender. If private groups want to fund such things that's their first amendment right, but taxpayer resources should not be used to advance discrimination and bigotry," Finchem said.

Petra Falcon, Executive Director of Promise Arizona, an immigrant rights advocacy group, had this to say on the matter: "It doesn't sound like any curriculum I participated in when I was going through the school system. We need to teach the history of our country. I have several children and grandchildren, and none of them have ever come home from school saying we learned how to hate."

> This implications of this exciting new trend are not lost on NY Post columnist and SJW sock puppet Shaun King, who had this to say on the proposed new Arizona legislation –

> All of this is completely and utterly disgusting. That an aloof lawmaker wants to actually oversee and monitor individual activities and events to prohibit students and staff from discussing economic and skin privilege in this country is not just petty, it's deeply problematic. What is his aim here?
> It appears that Bob Thorpe actually has a bigger problem with students and staff discussing white privilege than he does with the unfair privilege itself. That should disturb all of us. For all of their talk about local rights, it's deeply telling to see conservative lawmakers go so far as to say what individual dormitory directors and instructors can and cannot discuss with their students.
> Conservatives like Thorpe are fully willing to be control freaks when it protects white supremacy and cultural hegemony — then say they stand on the principles of local control when it benefits them. I have a hunch this bill is not an anomaly, but a troubling sign of things to come.

Conclusion

Well, at least Shaun King got one thing right in that leftist screed of his – this bill is definitely not an anomaly, and it definitely is a sign of things to come.

Arizona bill HB 2120 makes total sense to your old Uncle Bob, as I'm sure it does to you, too. And I think we need more legislation exactly like this beautiful piece of manospheric weaponry, in order to balance out the egregious nature of leftist, SJW groupthink.

With Donald Trump about to step forward as our next president, and with the obvious, full-blown idiocy of SJW dogma beginning to grab the national spotlight, our time truly is at hand, my fellow shitlords.

All we have to do now is continue to turn up the shitlord volume, and close the deal.

5 Questions You Should Ask Your Financial Advisor

January 17, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by Spanish Peaks Capital

Being a Financial Advisor for over 10 years I've seen it all, including many situations that may deceive the client.

After leaving the corporate side of the business and starting my own firm, I realized there are quite a few things that clients may not be aware of. This is a small list to start with. If you work with an advisor, make sure that all of these questions have been answered to create a transparent relationship between you two.

1. What are your sales goals?

In all banks the advisors must achieve a minimum commission goal in order to keep their jobs. Of course, the banks want growth and they should. All business must be growing. However, when your jobs on the line and commission must be made this can create some ethical dilemmas which may not be in the clients best interest, and only in the interest of the advisor to sell the highest commission product.

This recently happened in 2016 a large bank had to pay hundreds of millions of dollars in fines and fire over five thousand employees for creating phony accounts and moving clients' money into them just to hit their unrealistic sales goals.

This can be devastating to an investor, and ruin their whole investment plan.

2. What are the exact fees you are charging me?

Most people have no idea what they're invested in and especially don't know what they're paying for them.

How most investment firms work is they charge an upfront fee on a mutual fund usually around 5% then there will be an annual fee anywhere from 1-2%. Imagine knowing you paid 7% in the first year you invest your funds. That year it will be very difficult for you to make any profit. The fees are sometimes disclosed but usually not. Because as a Broker there is no fiduciary duty on behalf of the financial advisor to do what's best for the client.

3. Is this investment liquid?

Many types of investments out there require a long holding period. Annuities, some mutual funds, structured products, UITs, illiquid REITs. This can cause a problem if not disclosed. To get your money out of these investments there could be up to a 10% penalty. 10% just to access your own funds. A lot of advisors sell these because they receive huge commissions, up to 8-10%. There is an incentive to give huge commissions on these products because the client can't go anywhere. The mutual fund company or annuity company knows they have the clients' money with them for the long term and that it's very hard for them to access it.

4. Does management dictate what investments you can sell?

There are a lot of ways which the client is made to feel like there is a free range of product mix but there really isn't. In banks, there is always a huge push to insurance, such as selling annuity products that have an 8% commission, 5-8 year hold time, and 2% annual fee. Or life insurance sold as an investment vehicle. These products are pushed very hard by banks because they have the highest commission. Most of the time your advisor is selling something that management is making them and not because it is the best for you.

5. What do you invest in?

Ask your advisor what they invest in. I bet it’s not similar to what they have you in. Or in most cases the financial advisor won’t have any money. If you’re working with one that represents a big bank very rarely will he have more money than you. As most of the commission goes to the bank and not him. The argument can be made that it should be different based on age and income and this is true. But I am willing to bet he doesn’t have any of his money in loaded actively managed funds or anything with a high commission structure. In my entire career, I have never had anyone ask me how I personally invest. Which is odd to me, maybe they are too shy to ask or it may never cross their mind. I have no problems with it, I love talking about money.

At Spanish Peaks Capital Management, our advisors do not have any sales goals. All advice given is completely independent. Our firm is set up as a fiduciary. By law we have to do what is best for our clients, and we do not charge upfront fees. Our investments are liquid, and we invest in the same types of securities as our clients. 6 Things That Have Drastically Improved My Life

To hack through life and find a solid and somewhat holistic lifestyle is not exactly rocket science. Many components of such a lifestyle are also things that can be generalized and thus be shared by many men.

Over the last 10 years or so I have followed a particular path in life, something that even was partly formed during my earlier years but has been solidified over time. With slight modifications and temporary transgressions or deviations, of course, but mainly on the same route.

What I realized is that it is much more difficult to follow a plan than it is to merely make it. I will briefly explain my path's main parts and some of the important details that can be valuable. I will also show how these elements are largely inter-related and put together constitute a holistic approach.

1. Education and self-education

For good reasons, one has to be skeptical about contemporary education in Western societies and I do really respect those who are into more physically demanding and risky occupations (as a student I have actually worked with some of these types of jobs). For a European like myself, this aspect might be somewhat more beneficial in terms of funding but a reasonable degree of sound skepticism is good to maintain.

Irrespective of that, higher education has actually helped me a lot in terms of personal development, work and increased disposable income. To write a thesis of 100 pages or more – even if someone might not call arts real science, which I by the way largely agree with – takes a lot of effort, and needless to say some jobs which require a particular academic background will pay off.

However, I would definitely not be as knowledgeable as I am today without broad and deep autodidactism, i.e. self-learning and self-education. If one misses too many valuable perspectives within the confines of general education, one's own interests and tips from other people can complement and guide one into other directions.

As of today I can easily go from holy scriptures to genetics studies and I have both regular education and self-education to thank for that. If higher education is not an option, then continuous self-education is the way to go in this respect.

2. Fitness lifestyle

I do not know at exactly which point I decided to get into fitness, but like most people I started to work out rather early, after doing sports during adolescence. The difference is that I took Aristotle's, oft-repeated words, seriously:

"Excellence is an art won by training and habituation. We do not act rightly because we have virtue or excellence, but we rather have those because we have acted rightly. We are what we repeatedly do. Excellence, then, is not an act but a habit."

Hence I started to work out regularly at about 20 and about 10 years later I was good enough to compete in fitness. Had I not partaken in so many bacchanalia I might have tried that earlier.

Typically, it will take me about 6-12 weeks to hit 5% of body fat. After a cynical cost-benefit analysis I have decided to not take these competitions too seriously. Partly because many, unlike myself, compete with the help from steroids, but the diets have definitely had positive spill-over effects, not just for health and physical aesthetics but for game and general well-being.

When I drop below 10% my confidence will get a significant boost and I do not care if I get rejected. Both the inner and outer game benefit in a positive feedback loop relationship. My worst periods of life have been when I have had more body fat, like 15-20%, whereas my best have been when I am in great shape.

Fitness is not black or white and one can find a more balanced position, but let's say 8-15% of body fat and a relatively muscular natural bodybuilding physique are definitely beneficial for aspiring males. The ROI is generally high, as I see it, as long as one does not become socially isolated due to gym addiction. Pay attention to what girls do, not what they say (generally). And they do love muscles and a ripped body, which scientists such as David Buss and Cindy Meston have confirmed in their research.

3. Work

One’s workplace can be toxic and it is wise to avoid its many pitfalls. However, to work is indeed something positive for social interaction, routine, and one’s ability to obtain disposable extra income. It might seem as to state the obvious, which it is, but sometimes one has to do that in order to get things straight.

Moreover, if one looks at work in a somewhat larger framework, it includes a whole plethora of different tasks, such as to read and write, as well as those physical occupations that I have had in my teens and as a university student. All of them have been beneficial for my well-being and they have also led to other positive outcomes.

4. Fashion

Such as to be able to buy clothes. Even with a more minimalist-akin approach, nice pants, shoes, shirts, and jackets will not pop up from nowhere. One needs disposable income.

Fashion has changed my life, and I am not even that much into fashion. The point is that good grooming is what separates people in current times. The guy with an ugly pair of pants will not be respected, especially not by the opposite, very judgmental sex.

A blend of traditional and conventional masculine fashion and some metrosexual elements have been quite beneficial throughout many parts of my life. But only as long as it is attributed by a good physique, confidence and game. Fashion and appearance as isolated factors are not enough.

5. Travel

I am a rooted, not rootless cosmopolitan, who enjoys to partake in what other cultures and locations have to offer. Culture, history, adventures, girls – one thing does not exclude another, even though different trips imply different priorities.

To travel, more or less, can be regarded as a goal in itself, and is one of the major benefits from globalization. I think to travel is something that is valuable throughout most phases of a lifetime, but as a younger person it is most optimal to do it if one already has disposable money, well-defined muscles, a sense of fashion – and game.

Needless to say, traveling comes with both pros and cons, but overall the former outcompetes the latter.

6. Learning game

Many of the things that I have mentioned so far are directly or indirectly related to game. But to be aware of game has been as important as its conventional underlying components, mentioned above.

Like many other I started with Neil Strauss' book and later some other writers, as well as to observe successful people in my social circles. I have mostly used common sense approaches for normal people.

Anyway, what has made me so appreciative of this element of modern male existence, is that whenever I look back at my life, I come to understand that game is required for action to take place. Even as a 12-year-old I used game when I was brave enough to kiss a girl for the first time. Whenever I have been shy and introvert, I have only had my hand at my disposal. Hence when one steps out of solid game, it is game over, but if one learns it to some significant extent, life will likely improve.

What To Do If The Phone Numbers You Get From Women Go Nowhere

January 18, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A great many guys read game articles or watch videos online and get proficient at approaching girls and asking for their phone numbers. The problem is that they don't get any further than this, and there is nothing more frustrating than having a smartphone full of flaky numbers with girls acting half-hearted and shying away from coming to meet you on dates.

If you are looking to pull hot girls with the idea of finding a relationship, or even just for temporary fun, then you need to learn how to get over this particular hump. Below I tell you exactly why you're getting into this situation and the steps you need to get out of it.

Phone Number Purgatory

Let’s be honest, we’ve all been there. You see a cute girl in the street, walk up to her, give her whatever spiel you’ve taken from this week’s YouTube video, have a friendly chat and then you ask for the number. But later on when you contact her you find that the number fails to lead you to the sexual nirvana you had hoped it would. Instead she either ignores your messages or is polite but flaky.

If this happens to you several times a month then that’s fine—flakiness is usual and to be expected. When you’re walking up to random girls in the street or club you are to some extent playing a numbers game, as well as competing with whoever else is blowing up her phone on WhatsApp, Tinder and so on. But if you are finding yourself in phone number purgatory consistently—if it is a pattern rather than an occasional occurrence—then it is likely that you are doing something wrong in your approach.

Here’s the problem—when guys first get into game they massively overestimate the degree of sexual intent they are injecting into their interactions. And that makes sense. After all, if you’ve hardly ever approached in your life then the mere act of telling a girl she looks cute should be—-logic would dictate—enough to let her know that you have a dick and you are interested in her. Unfortunately, this is not the case and far too many guys are having friendly, flat, non-sexually charged conversations with girls, projecting a ‘nice guy’ aura and getting blown out.

Don’t be one of those guys—as with everything in life, pick-up works much better when you put everything you have on the line.

Avoiding Risk

The central issue is that most guys (and girls) are risk averse—they don't want to put themselves on the line for fear of being hurt and humiliated. Nothing wrong with that. From an evolutionary perspective it makes total sense for a human being to avoid danger. In pre-historic times a man risked being torn limb from limb for approaching a woman from outside of his tribe, so the inbuilt fear of approaching we all feel to some extent is based on a human precedent that is inbred.

There are two problems with this, though: one, we no longer live in prehistoric times and two, appearing risk-averse looks profoundly unsexy.

Look, in 2017 the risks associated with politely approaching girls are extremely low. I have approached thousands of girls over the years and almost nothing bad has ever come of it. OK, I've annoyed a couple of boyfriends and been embarrassed a few times, but I have never been physically attacked, arrested or killed. Now, I'm not saying that any of those things couldn't conceivably happen in the course of a pick-up—of course they could. Just that, as long as you're calibrated and approach with light and cheeky humour they are all extremely unlikely.

The other thing is that, put simply, girls like guys who take risks. I have got with girls who probably wouldn't have looked at me twice largely because I've had the balls to run up to them in the street and express my sexual interest in them. This is where cold-approach pickup has a huge edge over Tinder—you can, through your actions, demonstrate your qualities as a man (boldness, courage, sexual intent etc). So why half-ass it? Far better to go all in with every girl you approach and let her know precisely what you want.

The issue is that girls are taught to be polite (OK, there are plenty of bitches out there, but stay with me). Handing over a phone number is in many cases merely a form of politeness—a more pleasant way to get rid of a guy. The path of least resistance.

While new guys probably know this on some level, they choose to ignore it. They perform the lowest-impact approach they can, take the number, go home feeling like they've scored a victory and then complain online when the girl doesn't respond or refuses a date. Then they go out the next week, do the same thing again and so the cycle repeats itself.

How To Avoid Phone Number Purgatory

Look, the only way you're going to avoid falling into this trap is by going all-in. What do I mean by that? I mean every time you approach a girl, whether you go direct or indirect (and that's a whole other topic) you need to leave her in no doubt why you are talking to her and what you want.

As I said, many guys have this 'well I approached her and I told her she was pretty so she must know I was trying to pick her up'-mentality. No, no, no. Girls don't always know why you're approaching them. You may simply be being friendly. You might be gay. Unless you make it absolutely clear that you are approaching with sexual intent you risk being ignored, or worse, friend-zoned.

Now, I'm certainly not advocating that you walk up to women and tell them you want to bang them straight off the bat. That would be uncalibrated and counterproductive. But what you must do is communicate your intent through deep eye contact, touch and verbal spikes.

When you are talking to her, even if you've approached her indirectly asking for directions, she should be in no doubt of the message your eyes are communicating to her—that you're imagining her naked and you like what you see. There's no short cut to this, it takes practice, but try thinking sexual thoughts while you are speaking. That will get you a lot of the way there.

You should also try to touch her. Not in a weird, creepy way. Just on the forearm or maybe the back. What you need to do from the first meeting is to break through the 'strangeness' or you and her getting physical so that it becomes anchored in her mind as something natural and pleasant. This will make the transition to sex later on a hell of a lot easier.

Finally, you must drop verbal spikes into the conversation. The two methods I use most commonly are double entendre and challenging. When speaking to a girl I will commonly misinterpret whatever she says as having a sexual undertone to it ('Oh, it's raining hard. Do you like it hard?' etc). I will also challenge her on some aspect of her personality ('You say this is the best coffee shop in town? I'm not sure I believe you. Show me your barista certification etc.)

You must tease and you must make the conversation crackle with sexual energy. Unless you're going for a same-day lay or one-night stand you have to ensure that you've peaked sufficient interest in her (i.e. vaginal tingles) that when you text her you aren't merely that nice, friendly, entirely forgettable boy she talked to briefly outside the metro station.

Anti-Jewish Owner Of “The Daily Shoah” Podcast Mike Enoch Outed As Having A Jewish Wife

January 18, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

Mike Enoch, a virulent anti-Semite and proprietor of the popular alt-right podcast The Daily Shoah (via The Right Stuff web page), has been outed for having a Jewish wife. We have little interest as to whether Enoch, real name Mike Peinovich, beds a Jewish woman. What concerns us, however, is the rank hypocrisy of The Daily Shoah podcast, where Enoch has lambasted Jewish influence in Western society and decried “race-mixing” and the dilution of European races. There is even speculation that Enoch is Jewish himself.

Over recent months, the mainstream media has used men like Mike Enoch/Peinovich (often without naming them) to portray Trump supporters as unabashed racists who pose an existential threat to American democracy. Forgetting that around 50 million people voted for Trump, SJWs and liberals more broadly falsely claim that Peinovich and others are directly representative of those who put The Donald into office. It was, in fact, Peinovich who allegedly initiated a Nazi/Roman salute at last year’s NPI conference while media cameras were running, which caused media outrage against Richard Spencer and the alt-right.

> Mike Enoch was the one who ran to the front of the stage at the NPI conference and did a “Heil Hitler” for The Atlantic’s cameras, which was then featured in the Jewish media, edited purposefully to make the entire event seem as close to a “Nazi rally” as possible. While Mike Enoch had his identity protected by NPI, The Atlantic, and the Jewish media – other people involved – the ones that did NOT > pose in front of the cameras and "Heil Hitler" – were not so lucky, and many have lost their jobs and been slandered by the media for simply attending a conference – a conference that, up until that point, never engaged in anything close to "Nazi LARPing."

While many major media outlets have deliberately and very consciously twisted the narrative to suit their pro-Hillary agenda, the presence of The Right Stuff and other incendiary publications continues to assist lying journalists from coast to coast. The exposure of Mike Peinovich's cover raises the serious question of whether the creation and ongoing operation of The Right Stuff is really just an elaborate fiction to control and draw in real alt-right supporters. Strangely, his wife appeared in at least one of his Holocaust parodies on The Daily Shoah. Why would a Jewish woman do this if the whole project were not an instance of controlled opposition?

What is Mike Enoch/Peinovich's motive?

4Chan users have revealed that Mike Peinovich's Jewish wife is a strong proponent of LGBT issues and has worked for the Jewish service organization B'nai B'rith. She represents exactly what The Daily Shoah calls "degenerate" and "pozzed" behavior.

You could say that any human being is riddled with inconsistencies, contradictions, and even hypocrisies, but Mike Enoch/Peinovich's double standard really does take the cake. The Right Stuff, Peinovich, and his supporters were thrilled at the threats to Roosh and his family's safety in early 2016 after the meet-up furor. Here's one of Peinovich's top cronies seemingly applauding the outrage but wishing it was for another reason (Roosh banging European girls, most likely):

> I wish the world was in an uproar over Roosh for the right reasons, tbh.
> — Seventh Son (@SeventhSonTRS) February 5, 2016

The above associate in particular has attacked Roosh and other writers for sharing the realities of modern dating.

> @h8r4u The idea that so few women are marriageable is bunk created by Roissy and Roosh to sell Ebooks.
> — Seventh Son (@SeventhSonTRS) February 12, 2016

Was his attack against game theory a way to vent against the card he drew in the sexual marketplace? Pictures of his wife that were revealed in his own dox, which we won't reveal here, do point to that conclusion.

So what's wrong with Mike Enoch/Peinovich?

Mike Enoch/Peinovich's wife attending a LGBT party.

It is abundantly clear that Mike Enoch/Peinovich, whose podcast created the (((echo))) meme to identify Jews, either has substantial psychological issues or is controlled opposition. If the former is true, we genuinely wish him all the best. Perhaps his wife dominates their relationship and activities like The Daily Shoah were an attempt to contain frustration over her hen-pecking. Or maybe he, despite his own lack of physical conditioning, resents the woman he now finds himself with.

The real problem is that Peinovich's unhelpful political posturing has scapegoated the rest of us for a very long time. Red pill or pseudo-red pill communities form a very broad church, but consequences for one corner invariably flow to others, assisted by a media very eager to be obsequious towards SJW interests. It does not matter that The Right Stuff hates Roosh for his Middle Eastern background, namely because Peinovich and Return Of Kings are seen by elites as pieces of the same pie. Any revelations of mental illness by Peinovich will not affect this conflation one iota. Moreover, it's especially hypocritical that Peinovich's podcast has criticized Roosh and other masculine men for "race-mixing" when he himself mixed with the very Jewish "enemy" his podcast claims is bringing down Western civilization.

The more sinister option, that Mike Peinovich is controlled opposition, is one we should prepare for. He could be funded privately by a Soros-style benefactor or perhaps he is an informer. Speculation will not solve the dilemma, but neither of these possibilities is far-fetched.

Just as so many rape accusations and poop swastika incidents have been debunked as hoaxes, the "Nazi" fringe of Donald Trump "supporters" is increasingly becoming the domain of liars and miscreants serving as the willing tools of both elites and a sensationalized liberal media.

How Girls In Poland Have Changed For The Worse In Just Three Years

January 18, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

A few years ago, I took my first trip abroad to Wroclaw, Poland and was pleasantly surprised by the situation. Polish girls were incredibly pleasant, hot, and just happy to see me. It blew my mind. Having lived my entire adult life in Southern California, I had no idea of the potential outside of my home region.

I didn't make it back to Poland in 2015, but did spend quite a bit of time there in 2016. I spent the majority of my time in Krakow as opposed to Wroclaw, but I did observe a few things regarding Polish culture as a whole. They've definitely gone down the rabbit hole as far as worshiping Western culture. At the same time, this isn't always a bad thing. Having a few parts of the west in a country can make it easier to adapt and easier to get laid—and I've tried to point that out and be as objective as possible in my points below.

There's also a difference given the smaller, industrial feel of Wroclaw versus the college-town vibe of Krakow. With that being said, here are the differences I found between Polish women, culture, and general life in Poland 2014 versus Poland 2016.

Tinder, Everywhere

I distinctly remember making a mess of a couple of my first interactions in Wroclaw. They didn't have Whatsapp or Viber, and wanted me to send them a normal SMS. That's not the case anymore. Every girl above the age of 18 has a smartphone planted firmly by her side. I lost several leads in 2014 because I didn't bother to get a Polish SIM card.

In 2014, I hardly utilized Tinder because night and day game were that good. My friend and I both fired it up briefly, but didn't really get any traction on it. We chalked it up to Polish girls not being up-to-date with technology and concentrated our efforts elsewhere. Well, that's not the case now.

In 2014, when I texted girls trying to set up dates, it was pretty straightforward. It was so simple, I wanted to pack my life up, learn Polish, and move to Wroclaw. In 2016, I was dealing with more, "I'm busy, I have work, I'm tired", kind of games that plague the dating scene in the west. I had to acquire (and burn) more leads to get those same dates.

Even though we're in the midst of a hopeful return of traditional values, the smartphones simply are not going away. They're only going to become more advanced. This is why you've simply got to master the technology side of dating .

The bright side: In Krakow, I was averaging 200 matches a week on Tinder. Most of the girls were reasonably attractive, and more than willing to meet me (likely because of my specific look). It's never been easier to a high quantity of dates, but with it comes the aforementioned mind games.

The McDonald's Monopoly Is Gone

I've noticed this not only in Poland, but other countries such as Ukraine, Czech Republic, etc. It's not just the McDonald's. Those have always been present. No, it's the incredible number of KFCs, Pizza Huts, and Starbucks that are popping up on every Old Town Square in Eastern Europe.

It's one thing to have one McDonald's in the center of town, because then it's almost like a novelty item. People go out to eat it and experience the American culture, as a treat. Now though, with McDonald's losing their foothold on the market, it's becoming far more of a daily and normal thing to eat fast food. After all, there are just so many places to try.

The bright side: The one slimmer of hope (and it's a bit of a long shot, I'll admit) in this is that it will hopefully drive the overall prices of American fast food chains down in Europe. With the way McDonald's has priced things in the past, it's almost a luxury item. A cheaper price signals a cheaper quality. Hopefully, this will wake Eastern European women up as they realize that their now-cheap fast food makes them fat and isn't a quality meal out.

Relationships And Dating

Nearly every Polish girl that I met in 2016 and had success with was a girl who told me she was all about the career life. However, once I got inside them (literally), their attitudes changed. They wanted to cook for me, they wanted to be feminine. They deferred to me on any and all decisions—and were generally very pleasant to be around.

It was as if their real biology was screaming for them to act like a normal sane woman. I didn't really have to reach that far to get there. In comparison, it often takes months of banging an American girl out and treating her like borderline dirt to bring out the feminine side of her.

The bright side: It's a great middle ground between the challenges of Ukrainian women and the western girls. Polish girls, frankly, are about as easy to get into bed as an American girl. Don't try to turn a hoe into a housewife, but I'd be much more inclined to want a relationship with a Polish girl.

Poland Into The Future

With Trump being re-elected, things are returning to a more masculine state. To me, Poland has always been that gateway to Eastern Europe. A country that is divided. You have girls who have traditional values deep within them, but are being pulled desperately in the direction of careers, feminism, and overall unpleasantness. You just have to be willing to put in the work to bring that out of them.

My hope is that in the coming years, central European countries such as Poland and Hungary will sway more towards how it used to be rather than continuing to go down the path they currently are. As of now, I don't have any plans to return to Poland in 2017, but you can bet I'll return in 2018 to re-evaluate which side of the culture war it has fallen on.

Stop Worshipping Women On The Internet

January 18, 2017 | by Michael Sebastian | Link | Original Link

Modern men have unwittingly joined a pagan cult. This cult has no buildings and no formal hierarchy yet it is leading men to embrace degeneracy, encouraging girls to become sluts, and furthering the cause of feminism. This cult has no name but it it does have an object of worship: Women on the internet. Here are some of the most common manifestations of this cult.

Pundithots

S.E. Cupp

For some reason, men who identify as conservative really flock to any reasonably attractive woman who says conservative things. Conservative women pundits are a cottage industry that doesn't exist on the left. This could be because men tend to be conservatives and women tend to be liberal. A lot of the success of Fox News can be attributed to Roger Ailes' formula of having attractive female news anchors showing a bit of leg and reporting the news with a conservative slant.

It goes far beyond just Fox News anchors though. There are tons of conservative female pundits out there: Katherine Timpf, Katie Pavlich, Michelle Malkin, S.E. Cupp, Ann Coulter, Kimberly Guilfoyle, Dana Perino, and Joanne Nosuchinsky. In addition to these women, who regularly appear on TV, there is another group of women, such as Tomi Lahren and Lauren Southern, who develop large followings on social media. The 24-year-old Lahren has half a million Twitter followers.

Tomi Lahren

Political pundits are an unfortunate by-product of democracy, but some of them do provide valuable analysis. The question is whether men are following these women because of their provocative political positions or whether it is just because of beta male thirst. A few of these ladies do indeed advance the political discourse in the country. Ann Coulter is the best example. Her book Adios America was the first popular treatment of the United States out-of-control immigration problem. It was Coulter's book that swayed Donald Trump to adopt his now famous hard-line immigration stance.

But while some female pundits are worth their salt, most of the others are just cuckservative eye candy, or pundithots (a portmanteau of "pundit" and "thot"). Take Lauren Southern. The 21-year-old bleach blond has 187,000 followers on Twitter and just released her new 61-page book, Barbarians, How Baby-Boomers, Immigrants, and Islam Ruined My Generation. Southern is known for espousing mildly Trumpian views and posting cute (not salacious, she's trying to appeal to "conservatives" after all) photos of herself. Recently, she posted a picture with herself in anime workout pants—a nod to her Alt Right fan base.

Southern's political views and reporting are not particularly remarkable—there are dozens of people who offer a similar slant, but Southern is attractive and she consciously uses her looks to gain a greater following. As she writes in her book:

> If there was a moment in the 2016 U.S. election that epitomized this newfound hate for the young on the right, it was Republican consultant Rick Wilson's infamous… declaration that Trump supporters were "childless, single losers who masturbate to anime." Guilty as charged. Well, except I don't masturbate to anime characters. I dress up like them and guys masturbate to me. (Emphasis added)

Does this sound like Southern respects her readers/followers? Here are some of their comments to a recent picture she posted:

Another problem with the pundithots is that the media elite use them to control the narrative of what is acceptable discourse. The 28-year-old Katie Pavlich was afforded a slot on National Review's "Against Trump" issue even though she doesn't have a track record for providing leading edge Republican policy recommendations. Rather, it is a way to set the boundaries for conservative men. After all, you would not want the attractive Katie Pavlich to think you are a racist because you want to deport illegal Central American immigrants, right?

Don't get me wrong. I am not opposed to all female political pundits. Ann Coulter did more to shift the Overton Window on immigration in the past two years than all male pundits put together. But don't lavish attention on female pundits that push a cuckservative agenda merely because they are cute. Instead, support political outlets that are truly pushing the edge in political thought. I recommend checking out Taki's Magazine, Social Matter, and Matt Forney's new home Right On.

Instagram Girls

Pundithots at least try to provide a value-add to their eye-candy pics by providing some banal political commentary. Instagram girls don't even bother to do that. They post photos of themselves in varying stages of undress on Facebook, Instagram, and Twitter to get comments from strangers on the internet. Many of these women are more nefarious. They are selling porn or access to their web cam service or they are just wannabe prostitutes who secretly hope that wealthy Arabs will fly them to Dubai to service their friends. Whatever the case is, you don't want to encourage their behavior.

Even if the girl is not a prostitute yet, traditional men should not encourage girls to expose themselves on the internet. If you want a traditional society, you should reward chaste women who dress modestly. If you reward the internet tart, you are encouraging more of the same behavior.

Women on your social media

Anyone who has used social media knows the temptation. A woman you know posts a picture of herself on social media. The purpose of the picture is out there for one reason: To get compliments through "likes" or comments. How many times have you been tempted to "like" a picture just to be nice?

This is actually the least offensive method of worshipping a woman on the internet because you actually know the woman. If you are both single, you actually might have a chance of dating her. Still, it is a bad idea. It rewards women who engage in attention-whoring behavior and it still turns you in to a beta orbiter. Better to spend less time socializing on social media and more time doing it in real life.

Why you shouldn't worship women—on the internet or anywhere else

You might be thinking: “What’s the harm in showing appreciation to attractive women on the internet?” It’s wrong because it is inherently beta male behavior. One of the best places to observe this is in a nightclub. In a club, you will find that an alpha male may be surrounded by two or more attractive women. The women all all vying for his attention in the hope that they can push out their female rivals. Beta males, on the other hand, are more likely to congregate in groups around an attractive girl and her friends. The attractive girl just sucks up the attention of the beta orbiters.

Attention-seeking girls on the internet are doing the exact same thing, except instead of having two or three beta orbiters, a popular internet girl can command the attention of hundreds of thirsty beta males at the same time. Instead of buying a girl a drink, you might end up with an internet girl’s book, product, or porn. It’s even worse though. At least in real life, you stand some chance of advancing on the attractive girl. On the internet, the most you’ll get is a “like” for your sad comment from the object of your infatuation.

In addition to putting you into a beta orbiter mindset, worshipping women on the internet also perpetuates the feminized society. If you are constantly trying to please women on the web, you are not going to openly oppose feminism, female careerism, or the ever increasing degeneracy of society because women are some of biggest supporters of those things. If we are too cowardly to even refrain from sucking up to girls on the web, we won’t be able to improve our own lives, much less bring about a return of the patriarchy. If you want to be a patriarch, act like one. Don’t worship some thot on the internet.

Finally, worshipping women on the internet is a colossal waste of time. You could spend the time you are sending compliments to some internet slag with self-improvement.

Conclusion

We must make defeating the cult of worshipping women on the internet one of our top priorities. While I wish that every man would give up this embarrassing behavior on his own, some are going to need our help. Remember, friends don't let friends worship internet thots.

What To Do If Someone Close To You Gets Diagnosed With Cancer

January 19, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the past year a close friend of mine named Bob was diagnosed with cancer. While I was familiar with the disease, I didn't know the best way to help him. More than one year later, with his treatment completed, I'm ready to share some advice on what you can do if a friend or relative is diagnosed with the disease.

What Is Cancer?

Cancer is when a specific type of cell within your body, like a lung cell or a blood cell, somehow mutates and starts replicating at a faster rate than normal cells. These mutated cells lose their original function and exist just to multiply and steal resources from normal cells, which is why one of the first symptoms of cancer is fatigue (this was true for Bob).

The cancer cells are initially localized in their own compact ghetto, called a tumor, but if they break off and spread to the rest of the body, the disease becomes “malignant.” The cancer cells now interfere with organ function, eventually causing the person to die.

There is continued debate on what causes cancer, especially since it’s not only becoming more prevalent, but affecting younger populations. Scientific research, which has become increasingly dubious and controlled by money interests, points towards “environment” for being the cause. But which parts of the environment?

We don’t know for sure, but I do know that if vaccines, plastics, GMO food, and food additives were the cause of these increased cancers, we would never find out about it because of the tens of billions of dollars at stake for companies that produce those products. In Bob’s case, he did possess a mutated gene that is linked to a higher cancer rate, but even with a mutated gene, a poor environment can lower the age of disease onset and increase its severity.

Welcome To Modern Cancer Treatment

Cancer treatment will often include three phases: surgery, chemotherapy, and radiation. Surgery aims to physically remove the tumor and most of the cancer cells, hopefully before they spread. Chemotherapy is a combination of different drugs that aims to kill cancer cells. Radiation uses high energy rays to kill cancer cells at a specific site. It used to be that surgery was the first step but now chemotherapy often starts off the treatment to soften up the tumor and kill straggler cells that can’t be seen when the tumor is removed during surgery.

After Bob consulted with the best doctors in his city, there was a consensus that the treatment sequence should be chemotherapy, surgery, and then radiation. Total time for the entire treatment course was ten months, where Bob’s life would be turned upside down. Wracked with stress from this unexpected diagnosis, I felt it was my duty as a friend to help him through the ordeal.

I crammed as much on cancer as I could, which wasn't too difficult since I have a degree in microbiology and was already informed on the disease. I was able to confirm that Bob's treatment was the most modern standard that had the highest chance of increasing his 5-year survival rate, but the more I got into learning about chemotherapy, the more I become concerned because of the incredibly toxic effects it has on the body.

The Disturbing History Of Chemotherapy

Nearly 100 years ago, on a World War I battlefield in Belgium, soldiers began randomly developing blisters and sores. Some coughed up blood. It turned out that they were poisoned by mustard gas deployed by the Germans, and died weeks later. Thousands of men were killed by the gas during the war.

Upon noticing how efficient the mustard gas kills white blood cells, scientists started testing out the gas against blood cancers. Sixty years later, this drug is still used to treat some cancers, and it was part of the regime for Bob's chemo treatment. The lobotomy procedure, where an ice pick is jammed in your nose to destroy your frontal cortex, is a newer treatment than some chemo drugs. Not only does chemo have horrible side effects, but it increases your risk of getting other cancers.

We give patients drugs that increase their odds of getting more of the same disease. Let that sink in for a minute. Can you imagine having an infection in your body and taking a drug that may alleviate this infection with the expectation that it will cause a more serious infection in the future at other parts of your body? It's almost like playing a torturous game of whack-a-mole with your life.

Chemo drugs theoretically kill fast-growing cells faster than normal ones, meaning that it is more likely to kill cancer kills, but there is no mistake that chemo kills all cells. In the middle of treatment, Bob told me that "it feels like I'm dying." He wasn't far off. The point of the treatment is to kill all the cancer cells right before the patient would die, because if you continue a chemo cocktail for just a month or two longer than you should, the patient becomes irrevocably disabled or does die, something that can't be said for most other medical treatments in existence. It was emotional to see Bob lose his hair (even his eyebrows), gain over twenty pounds in water weight, take on a ghostly pallor, and become a weakened shell of his former vigorous self.

I searched for alternatives to chemo, but besides some promising research on massive doses of Vitamin C, all I found were shady sites promoting just about every household product as a cure, including baking soda, lemon juice, and even water. There was also vitamin "cures," many of which you can find explained without evidence on Youtube. I didn't have enough conclusive data to tell Bob to ditch the chemo and try something else.

Surgery was straightforward and a far easier ordeal than chemo. They put him on a table, sliced him open, removed all visible sign of the tumor, and patched him back up. Within two weeks he was moving around normally.

Radiation seems easy on paper, since it's just ten minutes a day of getting zapped by high powered rays for a month or longer. Just like with chemo, however, the side effects accumulate. The skin turns red then purple then black. Then it oozes and makes it extremely difficult to move. But hey, it's better than chemo. I quickly learned that the term "cancer survivor" is really centered around living through chemotherapy, not surgery or radiation.

What the medical establishment doesn't tell you is that when someone dies of chemotherapy, they say "the patient died from cancer." But it was the chemo that actually killed him. As you can tell by now, I was in disbelief that this treatment is used on humans.

Thankfully for Bob, he survived all three rounds of treatment. A recent test showed that he is currently cancer free. I'm thankful for this and can now impart the lessons I've learned from his ordeal to help others who are impacted by this disease.

How To Help Someone Who Has Been Diagnosed With Cancer

This is what cancer ultimately comes down to:

- dozens of doctor visits that take a huge amount of time
- assembly-line medical treatment from doctors who have been trained not to get emotionally attached to patients

- intense physical pain
- inability to take care of oneself and work full time, leading to lower income
- psychological suffering in thinking that you may die
- guilty feelings of being a burden upon others

Anything you do to help someone with cancer should attempt to alleviate the above problems, which fit into the following four roles:

1. Caretaker
2. Doctor buddy
3. Moneybags
4. Philosopher clown

Caretaker

Often reserved for family members, the caretaker does the heavy legwork where the cancer victim lives. They cook, clean, and try to make the sufferer as comfortable as possible. They also monitor for sudden changes in symptoms that may require an urgent call to the doctor, which can typically happen towards the end of chemo when the side effects are most severe.

Action items: do the dishes, take out the trash, do a load of laundry, sweep/vacuum/clean house, cook a big meal that lasts a couple of days, change bed sheets, help sufferer bathe (if needed).

Doctor Buddy

It's helpful for the sufferer to be chauffeured to the doctor's and have someone sit with them. If you are close with the sufferer, you can also go in the examination room and fire off questions to the doctor that he is too reluctant to ask (you can be the "bad cop" to ensure the best treatment). I also recommend doing a basic check on the doctor's treatment protocol with your own research.

Action items: take sufferer to doctor, sit in waiting room, ask questions to doctor, alleviate boredom, run off to get coffee/tea/snacks.

Moneybags

Moneybags writes the checks. Besides the prospect of dying, Bob's biggest concern was money, even though he had health insurance. It's not that the out-of-pocket health costs were expensive but the lost income from not being able to work made it hard for Bob to pay existing bills. A donation drive among friends was done to help Bob out along with more direct donations, but even small things like buying a few day's worth of groceries and filling up the gas tank was a big help to him.

Action items: pay a bill, buy lunch, buy groceries, fill up the gas tank, start a donation drive, ask friends to give money, send a monthly check.

Philosopher Clown

The philosopher clown entertains the sufferer with humor and jokes while throwing in stoic or religious lessons that put the disease in context. For Bob, I tried to steer his mind off worst-case scenarios and focus on the positives of what was going on. You don't want to let the sufferer slip into a mental slump where they start doubting if it's worth continuing their existence. If the mind gives up the will to live, the body will soon follow.

Action items: make sufferer laugh, get their mind out of negative thinking, teach helpful beliefs, encourage sufferer that they can successfully complete treatment.

From the above roles, you can see that giving kind words without actionable help is nearly useless to the sufferer. I was disappointed with how many people close to Bob told him empty platitudes on Facebook like "You'll be okay" and "You'll beat this" before disappearing. A cancer sufferer will hear these things so many times during treatment that they quickly lose meaning, and they are no substitute for being physically there with the sufferer or sending in some money.

It's also demoralizing for a sufferer to hear "You'll be fine" so many times, even from doctors, and then have to experience a setback or problem in cancer treatment, which is likely to happen. If you don't have a crystal ball that can see into the future, don't try to predict it.

A better strategy is to be realistic about the current stage of treatment and then offer help. Here are some examples:

Bad: "I believe in you and will pray for you."
Good: "Only three more infusions to go and then you're done. We'll get through this. How can I help?"

Bad: "I know a friend that had a much worse cancer than you and she's absolutely fine now after drinking a gallon of grapefruit juice."
Good: "You're way stronger than I am. Can I buy you lunch or fill up your gas tank?"

Bad: "I'm so sorry this happened to you. I don't want you to die." Sobs uncontrollably.
Good: "I'm off on Thursday, let me drive you to to the doctor. Don't worry, you don't have to entertain me and can be silent if you want."

As you can see from the above, words are cheap compared to concrete action. I also saw how people became so depressed about Bob's illness that he had to lift them up. While it's nice that people empathized with Bob's situation, if he had to use his limited energy to be your own psychological coach, you were a burden to him. Don't bring your own anxieties, fears, and morose attitude to the home of a cancer sufferer. If you're crying in the sufferer's presence but he's not, you're failing miserably.

Two Problems With Cancer Treatment (Besides Chemotherapy)

A huge problem with cancer treatment is the complete lack of psychological help. While a doctor is more than ready to pump you full of drugs or slice you open, they offer absolutely zero mental guidance for what amounts to the most traumatic episode of your life. You are completely on your own after a cancer diagnosis, and if you don't have proper mental grounding beforehand, you will have a hard time fighting the disease.

If I get diagnosed with cancer right now, I think I'd be able to understand the disease in relation to my life, but that's because I've been meditating on death for years (I even read a book called Making Friends With Death), all while mastering psychological strategies based on stoicism to deal with suffering. The average person hasn't done this, so the mental effects of a cancer diagnosis will be just as hard on them as the physical side effects from treatment.

There is also no psychological help after you're done. They send you out into the world and essentially tell you to call them if you think the cancer came back, but this does nothing to alleviate the intense anxiety in thinking the cancer will ravage you once more. It's similar to the post-traumatic stress that a soldier has after returning from a war.

Secondly, there is too much financial incentive in the current protocol of treatment for it to change. While I don't believe a doctor involved in Bob's care tried to get rich off his disease, the dozens of doctor visits, medical infusions, scans, surgeries, and so on is a lucrative business for everyone involved.

Cancer infusion centers that dispense chemotherapy are starting to look like factories—they are hyper-optimized with the purpose of quickly and efficiently dealing with a huge amount of patients based on established protocols that never rock the boat, and an infusion room I saw with over forty chairs was creepily productive. The care is competent, but Bob was essentially a widget on an assembly line where empathy and love were simulated in bursts but never genuine.

If a cancer cure was discovered today that completely dismantled the cancer treatment system, the medical establishment would have no choice to fight it unless they were ready to lose tens of thousands of jobs and billions in revenue. It may be hard to accept that the medical community values their interests just as much—if not more—as the interests of the patients they took an oath to treat, but unfortunately I believe this to be the case, especially for those at the top of the medical community who have the greatest financial incentive in maintaining the status quo. I trust a doctor no more than I trust a man selling me a used car, as I strongly suspect that the treatment doctors give their patients is not what they would give themselves.

Conclusion

Cancer diagnoses are going up, and so-called scientific experts are flailing their arms in confusion because solving the problem would threaten lucrative sectors of the economy. This means that patients getting cancer treatment right now will be seen in 100 years in the same way we see lobotomy victims today. The current protocol of chemotherapy, surgery, and radiation is too profitable for any paradigm change to be forthcoming, so I expect them to retain this medical standard for the rest of our lives.

I'm extremely skeptical of the current protocol, but I may take chemotherapy if I get cancer. I wouldn't mind experimenting on a slow-growing tumor with some nutritional experiments, but if I had a fast-growing cancer that already spread to my lymph nodes or beyond, I'd probably go with the mustard gas, even though I know it would probably kill me before the cancer does. The best strategy seems to be not getting cancer in the first place.

Because the incidence of cancer is increasing so quickly, chances are you will have to deal with a diagnosis for someone close to you during your lifetime. I hope you are able to help them through a hellish treatment protocol that will last nearly a year of their life. I was more than happy to help Bob get through his cancer. If it comes back, I told him not to worry, because we'll do whatever we can to beat it just like we did the first time.

10 Places Where You Can Find Sluts

January 19, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

A man likes variety. Like one day he wants to enjoy some fine dining with sophisticated flavours and the next just indulge on greasy fast food. Sometimes, he wants to feel a connection with a woman beyond sex and others he just wants to empty the chamber and focus on his daily life. This is when sluts come in handy.

Where are the slut spots?

The obvious answer is clubs, Tinder-like apps or street game. But there will be situations when even these reliable places will not be available (small city, low quality crowd or almost entirely frequented by men or pros, high competition etc).

We also aim at attractive sluts so feminist groups, swingers clubs and slut walks won't do.

To know where sluts will go, we must first remember what defines sluts. They are usually less intelligent than average, vain, attention-craving, promiscuous, money-oriented, careerist and impulsive women. Once you find activities or venues that satisfy at least a few of those needs, sluts will show up sooner or later.

1. Evening classes

Sluts being dumb and more focused on one night stands than a stable family life or basic education often drop out of school or get knocked up early.

Once there is no more provider to put up with their shenanigans, time for them to learn again and chase a rat-race spot in the local corporate hell. If they have out-of-wedlock brats to look after or spend their day at home watching TV, night courses would be their only opportunity.

Cons: It is late and you might have to register or attend at least once.

2. Day care centers & public playgrounds

As previously said, sluts' irresponsibility, numerous sexual partners and Daddy Government's support help them to get pregnant earlier and easier. Single moms are usually a walk in the park to bang so you can spend a bit of time flirting while dropping nephews, cousins or children of your own at the sand pit.

Cons: Single mothers usually become quickly attached or have post-pregnancy stretch marks.

3. Hair, nail & tanning salons

As they combine many of their centre of interest, those are some of the safest bets worldwide to find sluts. I have yet to meet an clever hairdresser or a chaste “nail artist”. Even small cities have a few of those slut factories where they are usually pretty, dumb as bricks and easy to lay.

Pop in those places one after the other, starting with those closest to your place. Pretend that you want to book a haircut or get a gift card for tanning or manicure for one of your coworkers, number close a slut if available then move on to the next salon.

Cons: You have to go pass tattooed eyebrows and lower your conversation standards.

4. Gyms

Although I support creating gyms where women are not allowed, they are good breeding grounds for sluts, even if more competitive. Spending hours working on your looks, craving the attention of men in micro shorts, sluts feel right at home facing the gym mirror.

There are also many non-slutty girls in fitness centers so progress from the sluttiest looking one (fluorescent tight outfit, navel showing, mini shorts, tattoos, constantly taking selfies) and work your way down. Bonus if you smash the slut “hall of famers” that are female personal trainers.

Cons: Competition will be harder as there will be more men around also trying to get in their pants.

5. Strip clubs

Pole rubbers being sexually desensitized, drama-craving, drug-friendly fag hags, they are ideal candidates to receive your thrusts.

Obvious but still tricky. You have to send right away an image that completely differs from the betas that waste money for crumbs of stripper attention. You can also rock up before closing, telling them that you have booze, lie about having coke and bring them to yours. More on this.

Cons: Remember that it’s the last before full-on porn or prostitution. Stay sober. Don’t get stabbed or robbed. Use condoms.

6. Pole dance classes

Nothing quite says “Cock is my favourite food group” as taking stripping lessons. “But my fellow trollops are doing it” or “It’s good for fitness” are not arguments. That is why gyms and gymnastics exist.

Pole dance clubs usually have a page on social media with their schedule displayed so get there before or after in order to start casual conversations with the easy attendees.

Cons: You have to justify your presence and act fast.

7.Tattoo parlours & tattoo fairs

In an ideal world, you'd have a tattoo artist friend that can introduce you to the ones that got tramp stamps and pussy tattoos done at his salon. He is not a doctor therefore not bound to confidentiality.

You could use Instagram to follow marked sluts on a local tattoo artists' page if you are into that and get to work.

Or stroll around tattoo conventions, filter out the freaks and strike conversation with the best-looking sluts. Casually imply that you want to get pierced and you seek advice. Divert the convo towards pierced intimate parts.

Cons: Tattooed girls are damaged. You have to see past the often hideous doodles, put your brain on hold and ignore the SJW lingo.

8. New social circles

Ask around every new acquaintance who in their circle slings pussy without too much trouble (recent divorces, who collects boyfriends) and arrange the introduction.

I sometimes ask around new fighters I encounter and their girlfriends if they have a girl in stock I can meet (fighter groupies are often sexy). If they deliver, chances are she will be a slut. Organising a party with them and their circle is also a good move.

Cons: The stock of slut is finite. You need to create a new circle once the well is dry.

9. Convention centers

Head to your local festive human stable and flirt with all the sexy show girls. Be assertive and use direct game. They have been here all day and have had enough of beta hover hand and want a man who is confident and clear in his intentions. Suit up, bring business cards.

Cons: Entries can be pricey. But for a full day of indoor day game, your efforts might be rewarded.

10. Shopping galleries

Especially the high-end ones. Don’t be deterred by the venue, however luxurious. it’s only open season on handbags when the alimony is here.

Half of the time, they are just here window shopping as they cannot afford the useless trinkets when some pigeon is not paying for it. Approach, number close, instadate or move to the next one. Roosh wrote a very detailed chapter on that technique in Day Bang.

Se faire une traînée, ça détend

In many instances, it is not the place but the slut tells that are important. I agree but there are higher chances to find more sluts per square meter at a summer festival than in cooking schools.

Casual sex with sluts is like fast food. It will not bring you fulfillment and can be harmful if not under control. The interaction will always be more pleasurable with a nice girl with whom you can connect.

How Leftist Indoctrination Tactics Resemble Maoist Brainwashing

January 19, 2017 | by Beau Albrecht | Link | Original Link

There is a document from the BBS days about cult indoctrination tactics, exploring the similarities to Chinese Communist brainwashing. This quotes from Chapter 22 of Robert Jay Lifton's classic Thought Reform And The Psychology Of Totalism.

Let's explore what media manipulators and other minions of cultural Marxism have in common with old-school Maoist brainwashers and cult recruiters. Their heavy-handed tactics are pretty similar. Coincidence?

Milieu Control

> The most basic feature of the thought reform environment, the psychological current upon which all else depends, is the control of human communication… [T]he totalist environment seeks to establish domain over not only the individual's communication with the outside … but also … with himself. It creates an atmosphere uncomfortably reminiscent of George Orwell's 1984… [Totalist administrators] look upon milieu control as a just and necessary policy… At the center of this self-justification is their assumption of omniscience, their conviction that reality is their exclusive possession. […] To the extent that [the target] does this, he undergoes a personal closure which frees him from man's incessant struggle with the elusive subtleties of truth.

For decades, media manipulators were information gatekeepers, molding the public's minds. Recently, the Internet provides alternatives to their one-sided narrative. Despite social media censorship, the usual suspects can't shut down opposing viewpoints. Further, although multitudes still get all their information from television, the media blew their own credibility. Today's dumbed-down and politicized educational system still serves this purpose.

Mystical Manipulation

> The inevitable next step after milieu control is extensive personal manipulation. […] Initiated from above, it seeks to provoke specific patterns of behavior and emotion in such a way that these will appear to have arisen spontaneously from > within the environment. […] [T]hey create a mystical aura around the manipulating institutions—the Party, the Government, the Organization. They are the agents "chosen" (by history, by God, or by some other supernatural force) to carry out the "mystical imperative"… The individual then responds to the manipulations through developing what I shall call the psychology of the pawn. […] This requires that he participate actively in the manipulation of others…

As Lifton's analysis shows, this is easy once milieu control is in place. Today, this happens by the use of dialectic strategy to manipulate world events. Further, anarcho-tyranny causes a societal Stockholm Syndrome reaction by the government's increasingly hostile stance toward the public, while tolerating things that will justify more security (control).

The Demand For Purity

> In the thought reform milieu, as in all situations of ideological totalism, the experiential world is sharply divided into the pure and the impure, into the absolutely good and the absolutely evil. […] This is perpetuated by an ethos of continuous reform, a demand that one strive permanently and painfully for something which not only does not exist but is in fact alien to the human condition. […] Since ideological totalists become the ultimate judges of good and evil within their world, they are able to use these universal tendencies toward guilt and shame as emotional levers for their controlling and manipulative influences. […] Moreover, once an individual person has experienced the totalist polarization of good and evil, he has great difficulty in regaining a more balanced inner sensitivity to the complexities of human morality. For there is no emotional bondage greater than that of the man whose entire guilt potential—neurotic and > existential—has become the property of ideological totalists.

Social Justice Warriors base their worldview on the "privilege ladder" (Victimization Olympics), lacking objective standards of right and wrong. Whoever has the greatest "privilege" is considered wrong. It's a backward rationalization for cultural Marxism's politically correct pecking order. Some groups are encouraged to have solidarity and express their interests; others doing so are vilified.

The Cult Of Confession

Chinese Communist struggle session

> Confession is carried beyond its ordinary religious, legal, and therapeutic expressions to the point of becoming a cult in itself. […] [T]his purging milieu enhances the totalists' hold upon existential guilt. Second, it is an act of symbolic self-surrender, the expression of the merging of individual and environment. Third, it is a means of maintaining an ethos of total exposure… Finally, the cult of confession makes it virtually impossible to attain a reasonable balance between worth and humility.

Here, Lifton describes the "criticism / self-criticism" technique. Today, this became the SJW mobbing ritual and the inculcation of guilt trips.

The "Sacred Science"

> The totalist milieu maintains an aura of sacredness around its basic dogma, holding it out as an ultimate moral vision for the ordering of human existence. This sacredness is evident in the prohibition… against the questioning of basic assumptions, and in the reverence which is demanded for the originators of the Word… and the Word itself. […] The assumption here is not so much that man can be God, but rather that man's ideas can be God…

During the Middle Ages, people were pretty obsessed with religion and supernatural matters. Today, we're just as obsessed with ideology. When leftists terminate friendships over dissenting views (and encourage others to do so), they're already taking it too far. Further, they make their revered figures into saints and smear their historic opponents. Communist wars and mismanagement were more destructive than all the wars of religion in history.

Loading The Language

> The language of the totalist environment is characterized by the thought-terminating cliché. The most far-reaching and complex of human problems are compressed into brief, highly reductive, definitive-sounding phrases, easily memorized and easily expressed. […] Totalist language, then, is repetitiously centered on all-encompassing jargon, prematurely abstract, highly categorical, relentlessly judging, and to anyone but its most devoted advocate, deadly dull: in Lionel Trilling's phrase, "the language of nonthought.

SJWs use buzzwords such as intersectionality, microaggression, and "privilege" to enforce their PC pecking order, among other ways they frame language their way. As for thought-terminating clichés, these include "devil words" (often ending in -ism or -phobia) to shut down arguments and attempt to delegitimize policy arguments.

Doctrine Over Person

> This sterile language reflects another characteristic feature of ideological totalism: the subordination of human experience to the claims of doctrine. […] The underlying assumption is that the doctrine—including its mythological elements—is ultimately more valid, true, and real than is any aspect of actual human character or human experience. […] Rather than modify the myth in accordance with experience, the will to orthodoxy requires instead that men be modified in order to reaffirm the myth.

If the facts don't fit the theory, they "change" the facts. This includes outright refusing to face the truth (something Objectvists call "evasion"), dismissing evidence (for instance, demanding proof from an academic peer-reviewed journal, while expecting you to believe their own assertions), calling the facts something ending in -ist or -phobic (see above) even if it's actually from peer-reviewed journals, etc.

Willful ignorance is actually pretty easy for them; many disbelieve in objective reality. Some others are just too crazy. They're interested in feelings (their own), not logic.

The Dispensing Of Existence

> The totalist environment draws a sharp line between those whose right to existence can be recognized, and those who possess no such right. […] Totalists thus feel themselves compelled to destroy all possibilities of false existence as a means of furthering the great plan of true existence to which they are committed. […] Existence comes to depend upon creed (I believe, therefore I am), upon submission (I obey, therefore I am) and beyond these, upon a sense of total merger with the ideological movement. […] Also, ideological totalism itself may offer a man an intense peak experience: a sense of transcending all that is ordinary and prosaic, of freeing himself from the encumbrances of human ambivalence, of entering a sphere of truth, reality, trust, and sincerity beyond any he had ever known or even imagined.

Again, this is seen in the "privilege ladder". Traditional Communism was about class warfare. Cultural Marxism added several other favored/disfavored categories. This is why they push racial agitation, feminism, GLBT stuff, and all the rest of it. They believe those high on the PC pecking order are "disadvantaged"; all others thus should be miserable and suffer.

This is also why these memebots are hell-bent on wrecking Western civilization. They've decided that we don't deserve to live. I say they're the ones who can go to hell.

In conclusion

Lifton provided quite an insightful look into the Maoist brainwashing process, later adopted by cult recruiters. Today, far-left ideology is basically a religion. They've put the "cult" in cultural Marxism, a lousy form of totalitarianism. Even if they got everything they want, they wouldn't like the results.

Reducing their milieu control will help get them off our backs; without it, they couldn't get away with the rest. This is narrative warfare, so we must discredit their cultural Marxism memes as much as possible, along with the lying media. Further, cut off their money. Spending selectively will show the corporations that fund this stuff that their virtue-signaling hurts the bottom line. For those of us with children, don't send them to expensive SJW factories.

The 5 Pillars Of Manhood

January 19, 2017 | by Stewart Brendan | Link | Original Link

Much has been discussed about what a man should be like, what a man should do etc. However, as I lurked through ROK, I found myself wondering: what makes an adult male, a man? Most people would say that losing your virginity automatically makes you a man. Does it though? With all the man-babies and spineless betas, there are non-virgins among them.

Other cultures had different standards; some tribes in Africa and even some of the earlier European clans required the hunting and killing of a dangerous animal as proof of adulthood. Others required just an age limit (in Jesus' age, the Hebrew community stated that a male was an adult when he was 30 years old).

Of course, when the criteria are so diverse, there are other core principles behind, that above criteria try to fulfill. I have pondered a lot about that, and I found five core values that a male must achieve to be considered an alpha.

1. Responsibility

This is the discerning value that separates the adults from the children. And by responsibility, I don't mean bullshit like "take out the trash" or "feed the cat", I am talking real responsibility, like taking care of the house (along with finances) and at least another human being. That is a core principle that underlies behind the whole "virginity" thing; by the time this "rule" was established, contraception was not nearly as developed as it is today. So, a loss of virginity meant, more often than not, marriage and a child on the way (or the other way around), which meant immediate and heavy responsibility. Other come-of-age rites like the hunting meant that the "boy" was able to take up arms and fulfill his duties as a warrior and protector of the tribe, so more responsibility there.

Responsibility may be core on the whole adulthood theme, but that can be equally said about women too. From here on though, are the attributes that distinguish real men.

2. Discipline

A person without discipline, is a person without a driving force. Discipline, along with determination (see below) are the two things that enable a man to achieve his goals. Working on something not because he has to, but because he wants to (especially if it doesn't give immediate rewards) and because it is the right thing for him to do, is what separates humanity from animals that act on instinct alone. The military is a great place to actually hone this core value to the best of your ability. Guys without discipline (or guys who lose their discipline) deteriorate quite rapidly, as their whole energy and purpose collapses after half-assed attempts.

3. Determination

Having the discipline is all nice and good, but if you lack the will to start it, you go nowhere. Determination is the brother value of discipline in starting and keep going on your goals, whatever they may be. A male without determination is like a jellyfish thrown by a catapult; he has (or not) the discipline to go, but he splatters all over the place when he hits something hard. Do not mistake determination for courage though; courage is one of the more complex and combined values (see below).

4. Focus

Having the driving force behind your back, it is now necessary to steer the ship; focus is the thing to keep you from going astray. A man without focus won't achieve his dreams anytime soon. Focus may be difficult to hone, as it is something that does not come naturally and is quite hard to train on. Trying to keep a reminder (usually visual) of your goals on display somewhere where you can see often is a movie-inspired (Rocky IV- when Balboa put a picture of Ivan Drago on his mirror, right next to the picture of his wife) but common way to maintain focus, but it is not the only one. Focused men reach very far into their direction, which can be a double-edged sword. Because focus is about keeping your direction, but not choosing it.

5. Logic

[image]

Choosing your direction is something that is provided by logic. And by logic, I mean liquid-helium cold logic. Women tend to act on emotions, and it is up to men of reason to steer them right. A man without reason is best described as a "loose cannon". This may be the trickiest of the five values to hone and assess, as it is purely mental – physical stimuli is ineffective at large to train your logic skills. Please note that by logic, I do not mean common sense – I can't stress this enough. The following example of game theory will try to explain what I describe as “logic”:

> Suppose three men, that decide to solve their differences with a pistol duel. Mr Black is the worst shooter of them, having only 33% accuracy. Mr Grey is better, having 66% accuracy. Mr White is the best of them, with 100% accuracy. To be fair, the sequence of shots starts with Mr Black, then Mr Grey, and then Mr White, until only one man is left standing. What should Mr Black do?
> Common sense says Mr Black to shoot at Mr White; if he shot at Mr Grey and hit him, then it would be Mr White’s turn and Mr Black can be considered dead, but in the off-chance that he hits Mr White, it would be Mr Grey’s turn and he has 33% odds of surviving for the next round.
> Cold hard logic, however, says this: Mr Black should shoot the air.
> The aftermath is easily explained, why this is truly the best option; Mr Grey and Mr White will certainly go for each other, as they pose a greater threat, and whoever survives, Mr Black will have 100% odds of having a one-on-one duel where he has the first shot.

That kind of machine-like logic is shunned by many; namely almost all SJW and other emotional goons, with the appropriately non-logic argument “it’s cynical/negative/inhumane” – notice that none actually says “it’s wrong” because it is not. Believe it or not, it was actually logic that led me to the manosphere. But I digress.

You may be puzzled by the absence of other high-held values, but if you look close enough, you can see that those values are just combinations of the above. Bravery can be a calculated risk. Workout can be a logical means to hone discipline. Game can be a combination of all five to the goal of sex. Minimalism is the logical consequence of applying logic and discipline to your life.

While declaring that those principles are the pillars of manhood is surely arrogant and quite prone to error, it is something I have deducted after much, much observation and thought. You may agree or not, but the truth is, whenever someone lacks any of the above, or loses it along the way, we all see the aftermath. These core principles are the foundations on which you can build your castle, whatever form that may be.

3 Ways To Improve The American Constitution

January 20, 2017 | by Giovanni Dannato | Link | Original Link

Less than 200 years later, the US again finds itself facing conditions that could lead to a civil war. Like last time, the nation is starkly split over a ticking time bomb of demographic change that threatens to permanently undermine one of the two major parties.

Trump's victory allows some chance to establish a workable status quo, but the problem is systemic. There are certain contradictions the US constitutional system has never been able to deal with and which have been major issues since the framers were debating anti-federalists who (rightly) feared an excessively strong central government.

At this point it is clear that highly centralized rule of America is untenable and it is only a matter of time until there is bloodshed. How might we prevent it?

1. Repeal the 17th Amendment

Until reading the constitution I never even knew senators were supposed to be elected by state legislatures, not the popular vote. The whole point of 6 year terms was that senators were supposed to be experienced leaders who would counterbalance the more transient popular representatives of the house.

The founders wisely distrusted complete mob rule. They never seem to mention in social studies class that the system worked like this until 1913 under Woodrow Wilson.

Before this guy, no income tax, no female vote, no federal reserve, the “peace” at Versailles just to name a few things. Everything changed.

This was done in part as a reaction to the excesses of the Gilded Age in the late 1800s when monopolistic robber barons would try to buy out state legislatures so they could pick senators. Corruption is a legitimate concern, but by making senators elected by popular vote, the very purpose of having a senate was undermined. Most importantly, the states were finally completely deprived of any say in the federal government.

2. Make A New Amendment That Allows States To Secede From Each Other

In 1848 Switzerland made a constitution inspired by that of the United States. They may have done a better job of it.

One of their key innovations was to allow their states (cantons) to have referendums to split up. They’ve had a state secede from another state as recently as 1979! In the present US it’s clear regions like Southern Illinois, Upstate New York, or Northern California should be their own states. At present they get little representation with their interests over-ruled by big cities that happen to be included within the same political boundaries.

As far as the number of senators getting out of hand or one party using subdivision as a tool to seize a majority, the Swiss thought of this too. Sometimes the splitting states are made into half-cantons that get one senator each.

An obvious objection is Switzerland is small while America is an enormous empire. This is a good criticism when looking at homogeneous countries like Sweden but Switzerland has multiple official languages and ethnic groups. Furthermore, the individual states that make up Switzerland were a loose alliance for centuries before they became a federal republic like the US.

Swiss cities are often their own small states while bigger states tend to be more rural, avoiding some problems of representation that haunt the USA.

They held together through the Protestant Reformation even though some states became protestant and others stayed catholic. Others had local forms of direct democracy for centuries while Geneva under John Calvin may have bordered on becoming a theocracy. In some ways Switzerland had more differences to deal with than the US.

The Swiss finally drew up a federal constitution because a civil war had just broken out between protestant and catholic states. They dealt with the problem constructively and decisively when just over a decade later, Americans ended up instead with a years-long bloodbath that scarred the nation forever.

It’s time to get past American exceptionalism and the insistence that America does everything the best. In practice, that just means choosing to stay ignorant of the possibilities that are out there

3. Amend The 10th Amendment

The 10th amendment just says powers not specifically given to the federal government go to the states, or the people. Apparently that wasn’t clear enough. Our modern system is characterized by opposing coalitions of states trying to use the power of the federal government to bludgeon each other into submission.

It’s a tyranny of the majority, or even an influential minority. It’s the nightmare of the founders come true when Californians live in fear of having religion taught in schools and Kansans are oppressed by Californian ideas of marriage. It’s the worst of all worlds for everyone and it sparks incredible tensions many of which culminated in the 2016 election.

The supreme court rarely uses the Tenth to limit federal power. Until 1992 they used it just twice in 55 years. What the hell!?

Clearly the 10th needs to be amended so it is more specific. States should be prohibited from legalizing a few unreasonable things that would force federal intervention like slavery or murder but need never fear that the culture and civic institutions of another region will be forced down their throats. The reason mountain state evangelicals care so much about gay marriage is that a policy they disagree with has been forced on them.

It would also be necessary to close loopholes such as abuses of interstate commerce laws. Without clear limits the feds can reinterpret the letter of the law to effectively blackmail states with tactics such as threatening to revoke highway funding.

Once the people of each state felt secure that their local customs and laws would be protected from outside power, many of the national tensions that we see approaching a climax could be easily defused.

Conclusion

The whole point of having states is that each can have policies that suit local needs and with many different approaches being tried, there is a natural process of trial and error to find out what works best.

If it means some regions choose to be “backwards” or “vote against their own interests” according to people of another region, so be it. Most Americans see obvious benefits in market competition but do not think about how healthy competition between polities can also produce new solutions.

Right now, states like Colorado are trying out the legalization of pot and if it works for them, other states may adopt it as well. That’s the way the system is supposed to work.

We need more of that while reducing heavy handed coercion from the central government.

How The Media Lies Through Omission And Distortion

January 20, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

Much as Frederic Bastiat details economics as the study of the seen and the unseen, news in America can be described as the study of the told and the untold. While authoritarian states like North Korea will make outright lies to its people, such as "Our space shuttle program is progressing well" and "Dear Leader Kim Jong Un is so pure he never defecates," the main tool of propaganda in the west is to report limited truths while hiding important facts.

Christian, Patriarchal, European Russia – Enemy of the west?

Did Russia Hack The U.S. Election?

Let's look at the supposed Russian hacking of American government official's computers. In late December 2016, President Obama expelled 35 Russian diplomats (a highly belligerent move—typically diplomats are expelled only immediately prior to war, and this likely violated the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations), claiming that Russians spoiled the US Presidential election by releasing Democratic Party emails to the independent whistleblowing site and information clearinghouse Wikileaks.

If one didn't follow the story closely, examining the actual facts and official statements reported, one would think that there was evidence that Russians sabotaged the American presidential election of 2016. But the US government itself doesn't even claim this.

17 Agencies; 1 Director.

The official Joint Statement from the Dept of Homeland Security and Office of Director of National Intelligence states merely that the hacks "are consistent with the methods and motivations of Russian-directed efforts."

They go on to make several non-sequiturs such as "Russians have used similar tactics in Europe" and "We believe Russia's senior-most officials could have authorized these activities," but the above is the most damning statement issued.

That the hacks used similar methods as Russian hackers use, and that they appear to be motivated by similar reasons as Russians have been motivated.

Lies Of Innuendo And Association

What does that mean? Well, Russians did indeed support sabotage and disruptive tactics against Americans in the Cold War before I was born. But such a misleading statement would be as truthful as spreading fear and hatred of Gingers after the Boston Marathon bombing because it was "consistent with the methods and motivations of the IRA," so the logical response is to cut diplomatic ties with Ireland.

COULD HAVE done it, but didn't

Indeed, the IRA had considerable expertise (methods) in making bombs, and motivations (attacking a strong concentration of Irish people living under a different government), and it could honestly be said that "the IRA used similar tactics in Europe and we believe IRA senior officials could have authorized these activities."

In other words, a statement that may be loosely based on fact but is utterly meaningless and misleading, and has no connection to the truth.

And this is the main vehicle by which the American state lies. By presenting half-truths and innuendo, and withholding facts.

The Truth Is The Truth Regardless Of Who Speaks It

Regardless of who is responsible for the hacking, or whether anything was hacked at all, the emails merely revealed the private discussions of public political figures. While I wouldn't advocate all public officials completely surrender their privacy when they enter government, the revelation of crimes, wrongdoings, or misdeeds by public officials is worthy of discussion; the source of these illicit conversations far less so. To quote Hillary Clinton “What difference does it make anyway, at this point?”

Of course, if the feds want to convict you of a crime, they are able to use confidential informants, warrantless wiretapping, and secret “national security letters” that compel others to snoop on you, without the possibility of you ever knowing by whom or even that the spying was done. Because when the tables are turned, it matters not who is making the accusations or what the sources are.

But when the government itself is breaking the fundamental rules laid out in its very founding document – the US Constitution, suddenly the source of the accusation is all that matters, not the actual crime.

Essentially this is the same tactic used in deflecting the outcry against massive illegal activity revealed by Edward Snowden’s Wikileaks dump: Ignore the truth and focus on the messenger. Only in this case they aren’t even attacking the right messenger, as Julian Assange has repeatedly stated that while he will protect the confidentiality of his source, Russia was not it.

You're supposed to feel threatened by the orange one

What is the implication? It's a twofold attack: On the one hand protecting the establishment military industrial complex position that Christian, neomasculine Russia must be an enemy that the American government spends hundreds of billions of dollars fighting, and secondly that Donald Trump is an illegitimate president, sewing seeds of doubt that can be used to weaken the president elect before he even takes office.

Always remember the biggest lies in the west are lies of omission, and be very doubtful of any statements by the government or media. Even if they are not outright lies, they may not be truthful.

Donald Trump Sworn In As The 45th President Of The United States

January 20, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is a transcript of Donald Trump's inauguration address via Real Clear Politics:

"Chief Justice Roberts, President Carter, President Clinton, President bush, President Obama, fellow Americans, and people of the world, thank you. We the citizens of America are now joined in a great national effort to rebuild our country and restore its promise for all of our people. Together we will determine the course of America, and the world, for many, many years to come. We will face challenges. We will confront hardships, but we will get the job done. Every four years, we gather on these steps to carry out the orderly and peaceful transfer of power, and we are grateful to President Obama and First Lady Michelle Obama for their gracious aid throughout this transition. They have been magnificent. Thank you.

"Today's ceremony, however, has very special meaning, because today we are not merely transferring power from one administration to another, or from one party to another, but we are transferring power from Washington, D.C., and giving it back to you, the people. For too long, a small group in our nation's capitol has reaped the rewards of government while the people have borne the cost. Washington flourished, but the people did not share in its wealth. Politicians prospered, but the jobs left, and the factories closed. The establishment protected itself, but not the citizens of our country. Their victories have not been your victories. Their triumphs have not been your triumphs, and while they celebrated in our nation's capitol, there was little to celebrate for struggling families all across our land.

"That all changed starting right here and right now, because this moment is your moment. It belongs to you. It belongs to everyone gathered here today, and everyone watching, all across America. This is your day. This is your celebration, and this, the United States of America, is your country.

“What truly matters is not which party controls our government, but whether our government is controlled by the people. January 20th, 2017 will be remembered as the day the people became the rulers of this nation again. The forgotten men and women of our country will be forgotten no longer. Everyone is listening to you now. You came by the tens of millions to become part of a historic movement, the likes of which the world has never seen before.

“At the center of this movement is a crucial conviction, that a nation exists to serve its citizens. Americans want great schools for their children, safe neighborhoods for their families, and good jobs for themselves. These are just and reasonable demands of righteous people and a righteous public, but for too many of our citizens a different reality exists. Mothers and children trapped in poverty in our inner cities, rusted out factories scattered like tombstones across the landscape of our nation, an education system flush with cash, but which leaves our young and beautiful students deprived of all knowledge, and the crime, and the gangs, and the drugs that have stolen too many lives and robbed our country of so much unrealized potential. This American carnage stops right here and stops right now.

“We are one nation, and their pain is our pain. Their dreams are our dreams, and their success will be our success. We share one heart, one home, and one glorious destiny. The oath of office I take today is an oath of allegiance to all Americans. For many decades, we’ve enriched foreign industry at the expense of American industry, subsidized the armies of other countries, while allowing for the very sad depletion of our military. We’ve defended other nations’ borders while refusing to defend our own. And spent trillions and trillions of dollars overseas while America’s infrastructure has fallen into disrepair and decay. We’ve made other countries rich while the wealth, strength and confidence of our country has dissipated over the horizon. One by one, the factories shuddered and left our shores, with not even a thought about the millions and millions of American workers that were left behind. The wealth of our middle class has been ripped from their homes and then redistributed all across the world, but that is the past, and now we are looking only to the future.

“We are assembled here today issuing a new decree to be heard in every city, in every foreign capital, and in every hall of power, from this day forward, a new vision will govern our land, from this day forward, it’s going to be only America first. America first. Every decision on trade, on taxes, on immigration, on foreign affairs will be made to benefit American workers and American families. We must protect our borders from the ravages of other countries making our products, stealing our companies, and destroying our jobs. Protection will lead to great prosperity and strength. I will fight for you with every breath in my body, and I will never, ever let you down. America will start winning again, winning like never before.We will bring back our jobs. We will bring back our borders.

“We will bring back our wealth, and we will bring back our dreams. We will build new roads and highways and bridges and airports and tunnels, and railways, all across our wonderful nation. We will get our people off of welfare and back to work, rebuilding our country with American hands and American labor. We will follow two simple rules — buy American, and hire American.

“We will seek friendship and goodwill with the nations of the world, but we do so with the understanding that it is the right of all nations to put their own interests first. We do not seek to impose our way of life on anyone, but rather to let it shine as an example, we will shine for everyone to follow. We will reinforce old alliances and form new ones, and you night the civilized world against radical Islamic terrorism, which we will eradicate completely from the face of the Earth. At the bedrock of our politics will be a total allegiance to the United States of America, and through our loyalty to our country, we will rediscover our loyalty to each other. When you open your heart to patriotism, there is no room for prejudice.

“The bible tells us, how good and pleasant it is when god’s people live together in unity. We must speak our minds openly, debate our disagreements honestly, but always pursue solidarity. When America is united, America is totally unstoppable. There should be no fear. We are protected, and we will always be protected. We will be protected by the great men and women of our military and law enforcement. And most importantly, we will be protected by god.

“Finally, we must think big and dream even bigger. In America, we understand that a nation is only living as long as it is striving. We will no longer accept politicians who are all talk and no action, constantly complaining but never doing anything about it.The time for empty talk is over. Now arrives the hour of action. Do not allow anyone to tell you that it cannot be done. No challenge can match the heart and fight and spirit of America.

“We will not fail. Our country will thrive and prosper again. We stand at the birth of a new millennium, ready to unlock the mysteries of space, to free the Earth from the miseries of disease, and to harness the industries and technologies of tomorrow. New national pride will stir our souls, lift our sights, and heal our divisions. It’s time to remember that old wisdom our soldiers will never forget, that whether we are black, or brown, or white, we all bleed the same red blood of patriots. We all enjoy the same glorious freedoms, and we all salute the same great American flag.

“And whether a child is born in the urban sprawl of Detroit or the windswept plains of Nebraska, they look up at the same night sky, they fill their heart with the same dreams, and they are infused with the breath of life by the same almighty creator. So to all Americans, in every city near and far, small and large, from mountain to mountain, from ocean to ocean, hear these words. You will never be ignored again. Your voice, your hopes, and your dreams will define our American destiny, and your courage and goodness and love will forever guide us along the way.

“Together, we will make America strong again. We will make America wealthy again. We will make America proud when it. We will make America safe again, and yes, together we will make America great again. Thank you. God bless you. And god bless America. Thank you.”

5 Ground-Breaking Books Written Between 1918 And 1945

January 20, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

Old books range from mildly interesting to immensely inspiring. A book written decades ago—or even more—by someone with an actual concern shows how people then perceived or thought things. It shows what issues were deemed worthy of concern, how this man and/or his time pondered at them, and what he wanted the reader to think about, be the latter a contemporary or not.

People from the Belle Époque (1870-1914) wrote beautifully, but were somehow too romantic, overly obsessed with aesthetics, and excessively implicated in intra-Western rows. They knew how to do prose and feats of erudition but showed reluctant to raise issues too deeply, perhaps because they put a lot of trust in progress as a kind of automatic process. Well, much before Adorno's overrated "negative dialectics", in 1919 everyone knew that dialectical processes do not always lead to a positive result.

The most interesting antique books one can find, assuming one's interest into politics and what's behind, were published after 1918 but before the Left took over the academia and cultural life.

These books, written after the butchery of the trenches, showed no more naive optimism or easy trust in progress—the Belle Époque equivalent of liberal feel-goodism. Said trust had died under shrapnel and bombs, alike with millions of young people, in one of the most bloody and absurd wars modern history saw. When the Versailles treaty was signed, an existential angst had started to impregnate the atmosphere. Thinkers pondered harder, deeper questions: they bravely put forward issues such as the identity of Western civilization, the nature of progress, the destiny of white people and demographics, the legitimate place of free markets, the equilibrium between social classes, and many other ones.

These questions are still ours.

1. T. Lothrop Stoddard, Revolt Against Civilization (1922)

Having been made "controversial" before the end of his life by the rise of the Big Left, Lothrop Stoddard is likely one of the most underrated American intellectuals of that period. Written at the midst of Bolshevist unrest, his Revolt Against Civilization argues that the development of civilization forces men into more complex lives, as they have to rely more on technology, obey to more complex laws and find their place in a wider world. Incidentally, this argument has been vindicated by Herrnstein and Murray's The Bell Curve (1996).

Civilization, Stoddard notes, should require more intelligent and more virtuous men in order to keep evolving. The problem is that modern West has been undergoing the very opposite process. The Great War mainly killed the best and bravest, who died without offspring, whereas the craven and average were encouraged to produce more children as to get relieved from the front lines. Besides, a complex civilization would show unable to integrate or make a constructive use of "inferiors"—broadly, the impulsive, crime-prone, antisocial, low-IQ individuals—who in turn would rather make it crumble than let it evolve without them.

Ultimately, in order to save civilization and ensure its future progress, society should accept to weed the "under-man" out by not letting him procreate too much, whereas the best should be encouraged to have many babies, thus improving the human stock at each generation.

2. René Guénon, The Crisis Of The Modern World (1927)

Guénon could agree with Stoddard on how human material had been dragged down in quality by a blindly industrial civilization. He hailed how, at least, the dogma of an indefinite "progress" fell, which opened hopes that the Zeitgeist would change for the better. Beyond this partial agreement Guénon's perspective was quite different: he believed in the traditional (Hindu, Viking, Ancient Greek…) theory of the "four ages" according to which history follows a process of general decline.

Modern times were defined by the oblivion or negation of the sacred and the triumph of hubris. One could already see this in Renaissance humanism, which planted the seeds of a bloated baroque self-celebration and of the Protestant pretense to reading the Bible without genuine qualification:

> Men were indeed concerned to reduce everything to purely human proportions, to eliminate every principle of a higher order, and, one might say, symbolically to turn away from the heavens under pretext of conquering the earth. (chap.1)

According to Guénon, the Vishnu-Purana—a sacred book of Hinduism containing prophecies related to a distant future—, the Apocalypse of John and other traditional sources had predicted the anomaly we are living through:

> According to all the indications furnished by the traditional doctrines, we have in fact entered upon the last phase of the Kali-Yuga, the darkest period of this 'dark age', the state of dissolution from which it is impossible to emerge otherwise than by a cataclysm, since it is not a mere readjustment that is necessary at such a stage, but a complete renovation. Disorder and confusion prevail in every domain and have been carried to a point far surpassing all that has been known previously… Have we not arrived at that terrible age, announced in the Sacred

> Books of India, ‘when the castes shall be mingled, when even the family shall no longer exist’? (chap.1)

Just like Stoddard, Guénon advocated for the recreation of a potent and responsible elite. But unlike him, Guénon saw further than IQ and readiness to work: his idea of the new elite implied that they should be initiated, with an intuition of the divine and sacred, thus making them far more than big-brained managers.

3. Julius Evola, Revolt Against The Modern World (1934)

Guénon’s unflinching critique of modern society—before Marxists appropriated the term “critique”, just as they appropriated many concepts they didn’t come up with—had a discrete but powerful effect. One of its main readers was Julius Evola, an Italian of noble lineage who showed an interest in magic and an impressively extended knowledge of history.

His Revolt Against The Modern World, that would eventually be considered his magnum opus, was a far-reaching study of a rarely matched quality. There Evola gave a broad view of what the “world of Tradition” is: a world where spirituality was a concrete reality lived every day, where religious rites were lively and genuinely connected their participants to the divine, where everyone would understand their right place and so on.

Then, after having drawn his landmarks from a variety of antique and medieval sources, Evola showed how the “world of Tradition” fell from its relative grace through, mostly, various wars, oblivion, and takeovers by inferior or degenerated castes. His explanations reconstitute the historical process of degeneracy from pre-Socratic Antiquity to twentieth century Bolshevism.

The scope and depth of this book are beyond any short description. Although everything

Evola says isn't beyond controversy—for example, he constantly tries to reverse the first and second castes' respective roles—, the richness, coherence and clarity of his view make this book a must-read.

4. Alexis Carrel, Man, The Unknown (1935)

A doctor and surgeon, Alexis Carrel received a Nobel Prize in 1912 after making several breakthroughs in organ transplantation. His background seemingly didn't predispose him to intellectual dissent. Nonetheless, in 1903, he witnessed a miracle on a train to the city of Lourdes and was upright enough to tell the story, which compromised but didn't stop his career.

His 1935 book Man, The Unknown was such a best-seller one can still find good-standing original editions at a fair price. It is mainly a mixture between detailed accounts of anatomy and medicine in general on the one hand and more philosophical reflections on modern civilization and humanity on the other. Both elements are way beyond overrated contemporary essays, in scope, deepness, and detail.

Just like the aforementioned books, Carrel sensed that modern civilization had been marked by an insidious degeneracy:

> Man cannot follow any more modern civilization on the path it entered in. There he degenerates. Fascinated by the beauty of matter sciences, he fails to understand that his body and consciousness obey to laws that are darker, but also more inflexible, than those of the sidereal world. (Foreword)

The modern world developed through a blind dynamic of headlong rush. Innovators have been running behind material power and economic growth, but then, the world of yesterday—a world humanity was more adapted to—has been forgotten amidst the crowds and smoke of factories. Science itself underwent a process of excessive specialization: knowledge has been splintered between ivory tower specialists, and, more importantly, scientists care more about the abstractions of their own theories than about facts understood through the lenses of these theories.

Carrel's book attempts to give a small remedy by pondering about various related themes, such as the works of cells, organs, as well as heredity, environment or modernity, to give a well-rounded idea of man. That is, a synthetic idea instead of an uprooted, overly analytical, theory-originating abstraction.

Beyond the descriptions and issues presented, Man The Unknown gives hints and loose propositions of reform: Carrel suggests that urbanized people move back to the land, that children get more education outdoor, and, more controversially, that society stops paying a hefty price for criminals through an inefficient prison system.

5. James Burnham, The Managerial Revolution (1941)

Often referred to as a conservative because of his later book Suicide of the West (1964), Burnham is a kind of mixed bag. When he was young, he mingled with Trotskyites, got expelled from the Socialist Party, and broke up with Trotsky to turn into a CIA adviser against Soviet Union. His book The Managerial Revolution aims at describing the transition from modern capitalism, not to communism, but to a managerial State where technocratic directors supervise mostly everything. The book inspired diverse figures, from George Orwell to Sam Francis.

Burnham's leftist—not to say Marxist—bias outcrops there on various occasions. He says, for example, that all ideologies stem from particular interests, an idea which shows a kind of jaded cynicism at the same time than a Leftist "philosophy of suspicion"; he also divides modern society in two classes, the "bourgeois" owners and the "proletarian" workers—a rather simplistic and obviously Marxist view where the middle class, as well as most individuals' situations, are completely brushed off.

In spite of these bias, Burnham's main thesis is of important interest and explains what has been eventually called crony capitalism. High-ranking State officers and wealthy businessmen, i.e. parts of the State and of the so-called civil society, mingle into a new class of managers. They can work in the private sector, be civil servants, or more often both through revolving doors. Whether they exert their power through law or money, they are a new class, Burnham says, and use their intelligence to justify their burdening paternalism: think about Cass Sunstein's Nudge for a typical example.

Conclusion

Whatever their career paths and personal interests, all thinkers mentioned above—apart, perhaps, from the cynical Burnham—had an acute intuition of the degeneracy of modern society. They sensed the necessity to orient society anew, without falling into primitivism or destroying hierarchies. Each of them insisted on a particular aspect of modern degeneration, be it biology, the blind and unbearable effects of technology. Stoddard, in particular, was keen to defend civilization and its numberless inventions no matter the imperfections—even if he almost agreed with the antimodern Guénon on the need to reforge a true elite.

Most, if not all, of these existential questions have been put aside and their thinkers blamed thanks to Big Leftism. Today, we are struggling with these questions again, as we sense the necessity to break up with the era of globalists and consequently put an alternative forward. Reading even just one of these books helps to ponder them seriously anew.

How Legalized Prostitution In America Will Empower Men And Redefine Feminism

January 21, 2017 | by Bob Smith | Link | Original Link

As of January 1st, 2017, another controversial, prostitution-friendly law took effect within the friendly confines of the liberal State of California. And this largely under-the-radar piece of legislation came on the heels of the widely publicized California SB-1322, which effectively decriminalized prostitution for minors, as well as their willing adult dance partners.

Authored by Senator Bill Monning (D-Carmel), California SB-1129 repealed mandatory minimum sentences for all prostitution offenses in the entire state, which, for all intense and purposes, totally decriminalized the practice.

This one-two combination of progressive new laws, has opened the flood gates wide for legalized prostitution, not only within the warm-and-fuzzy confines of The Golden State, but across the entire USA as well.

Nationwide legal prostitution—and the big picture for men

And what might this new legislation mean, exactly, in terms of the bigger picture, as it pertains to the manosphere, and feminism, and the overall tilt of the sexual playing field?

Like it or not, this is a dual world – it consists of equal measures of light and darkness, and there isn't a damn thing that anybody can do that will ever change that fact. So the non-delusional among us (meaning wide-awake, red-pill men, versus delusional beta males and insane feminists), simply have to take the good with the bad here, as we always do, and move forward.

With the advent of those previously mentioned twin California laws, the time is nearly upon us when legal, no-strings, sex-for-cash hookups of the readily abundant variety, will be available to all of us men, in nearly every city and town throughout the entire United States of America.

Just imagine it, if you can. No more expensive dinner dates and pre-coitus gifts, prior to getting a chance to bang some hot, vacuous, self-empowered slut. Each of us will soon be able to cut directly to the chase, negotiate the terms, and have our pick of the hottest of the hot, in terms of what our money might ultimately be able to afford us.

Is legalized prostitution across America really a certainty?

"But Uncle Bob, how can you be so sure of this?" some of you may wonder. And that's a really good question, and one that you should rightly ask.

As some of you may realize, your old Uncle Bob has low friends in high places. And I keep my ear to the ground, as a matter of practice. And one of the major goals of those who control the puppet strings of the world, is to legalize prostitution (and sports betting, which is a different kettle of fish, but nonetheless related), across the entire United States of America. So you can indeed make book on it, that prostitution and sports betting will eventually be legal, in virtually every city and town across North America.

President-Elect Donald J. Trump once owned two Atlantic City casinos, which is a major clue right there for those who have eyes to see. And that's a very convenient coincidence, especially for "leisure business concerns," now that Donald Trump will soon be in the White House, isn't it, now?

As another case in point, prostitution is already legal in Canada, minus a few important tweaks on the male side of the judicial equation. And America will be next. Nevada was the testing ground. California was Door Number 2. And soon the rest of the United States will follow suit. And you can take that one to the bank. Business unusual, will soon become business as usual. And the rich will indeed get richer, as is always the case.

Again, just imagine it. No more shit-tests before sex; no more putting up with some narcissist's crap so you can bang her stretched-out man-trap; cash, as always, will still be king, and the race will still be to the swift, but everyone will get laid during the entire duration of the contest. And so, I must ask you right here and right now – will that be a major improvement over the current situation, or what?

Red-pill men will rise, old school feminists will cower, and hot girls will give it up for money

Continuing to look on the bright side here, imagine what this will initially do to the already-tenuous self-esteem of fat, ugly feminazis everywhere. Oh, the moral outrage and righteous indignation that this will engender – "That CREEPER can actually PAY that hot girl to have SEX with him? Oh my GAWD!"

And just think of the effect that this will have on beta/omega orbiters, who currently inflate the egos of all of those Instagram-addicted, narcissistic, self-important, Tinder sluts – poof, no more orbiting will be necessary. Beta males will no longer feel the need to buy gifts for hot females, or give them any attention at all. They will be able to scour the Internet ads and online venues of the world, for legal prostitutes who reside in their own towns, and they will actually get sex for their hard-earned cash, instead of a hand-holding session after buying some marginally hot, social-media slut a new car.

Most red-pill males will adjust quickly to this new twist of fate, and immediately see the beauty of it, while mercilessly taking full advantage of the situation. Women already get paid for sex anyway, when you break it all down. Some girls do it for cash – some do it for refrigerators. This will just simplify things.

Very soon, embracing old school feminism will be the kiss of death for all American women

Survival of the fittest will take center stage once prostitution is legalized across the United States of America. And it will truly be an out-in-the-open fact at that point, that the most desirable women always gets the biggest chunks of cash, and the smartest, strongest, richest men always get the most desirable women. Just as it should be; just as it always will be. And this world-shaking development will stand feminism completely on its ear.

New-wave feminism will, at that juncture, consist of aggressively encouraging women to sell their sexual wares for money, to whomever they might want. And the majority of women, hot or not, having a natural proclivity for taking money in return for sexual favors anyway (see: hypergamy), will make a mad dash in the direction of this new, exciting, already-hardwired-in-their-nature enterprise. And only total sexual rejects will cling to old school feminism at that point – but this won't last for long.

True, old school feminists will still exist, but their numbers will dwindle as rapidly as those of rats abandoning a sinking ship. They will shriek about sexual exploitation for a while, as hot girls stack up the cash and laugh in their faces, but their indignant cries will fall on deaf ears to the point where eventually, they, too, will shut up and accept the changes of the feminist landscape in silence, while retreating to their ghostly abodes, in order to pet their cats, and dream of Mr. Big, while crying in their Starbucks Espressos.

Supply and demand will work in our favor after the flood gates – and women's legs – open wide

Once prostitution is legalized nationwide, the price for the average woman's sexual services will be driven down, as supply initially explodes, and demand initially fails to keep pace. Only extremely hot females will be able to command big money right out of the gate, and the rest of them will have to take whatever they can get.

Soon after, the snowball will start rolling downhill fast, to the point where liberal parents everywhere will one day proudly offer unbridled, full-throttle, enthusiastic support to their sexually desirable daughters, who were progressive enough during the real sexual revolution, to buck the "bigoted" system of the past, and embrace the benefits of exacting a reasonable rate of return for allowing any and all comers (pun intended) the chance to sample their enticing sexual wares within the framework of the ultra-liberal, modern-day marketplace – exactly like most of them already do for their LGBT children.

Conclusion

The chickens will have finally come home to roost for feminists everywhere, after prostitution has been legalized nationwide. And the cock, as always, will continue to crow. But this time, he will crow as the morning sun rises on a brand-new day – a day that will finally give red-pill men everywhere the overall advantage on the sexual playing field.

Victory truly is within our grasp now. All we have to do is focus on our own betterment in the interim, and be strong and swift in the pursuit of our individual goals, and then, reach out and grab whatever it is that we might want. Because it's feminism in reverse. Our time has finally arrived. Because the elite created feminism as a means of divide and conquer – and after spending feminism's formative years screwing men, the elite will very shortly begin to turn the screws on women, who will very eagerly and enthusiastically embrace the screwing.

And a truly unbridled, viscerally sweet triumph for all red-pill men, everywhere, it will indeed be – most especially for men who possess the best overall game; which is, once again, just as things should be.

Why Democracy, Nationalism, And Globalist Economics Can't Coexist

January 21, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

As several writers of ROK have pointed out, binary oppositions can trap people into ways of thinking and acting that lead to that other real or potential options are neglected. It might concern for example politics, culture and economics.

With regard to the latter, an obvious mistake is to think that the balanced option between capitalism and socialism is the Third way, the political-economic model promoted by scholars such as Anthony Giddens and popularized by not the least Scandinavian Social Democrats and the Tony Blair and Bill Clinton administrations in the early 1990s.

Of course, the Third way adherents make some good points on the benefits and flaws of Western capitalism and socialism and that one can combine elements from both, but it also solidifies the globalist narrative and its results has largely been devastating. Not just economically, since economics, politics and culture tend to go hand in hand. The same who promote the Third way do also cherish large-scale immigration and third-wave feminism.

Some might say that other available options already exist—for instance Buddhist civilizations have ideas that go beyond the Western binary opposition—but for Westerners, nation states, globalism and democracy are the general main factors that have to be taken into account, since those are largely what our curent world hinges upon, whether one likes it or not.

A scholar that can offer some guidance in this respect is the Turkish economist Dani Rodrik, especially his book The Globalization Paradox (2011). As a Harvard University economist he surely has intellectual limitations, but his vast knowledge about world economic history, in conjunction with many reasonable viewpoints, can help one to overcome at least some of the most basic false dichotomies.

Plus, these ideas are good to refer to when one discusses with pro-globalists who actually think that democracy and nation states also are two good things. But it seems that they have to choose, and people might as well be informed about that.

What is the globalization paradox?

A large share of Rodrik's book is about economic history and some of the failures and success stories of the past. The failures include for instance Latin American countries during the 1970s and 80s that were based on neo-financial liberalization theories, and the success stories focus on for instance the Four Asian tigers (Singapore, South Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong).

Some of these are already well-known facts, but the general reader can likely learn a great deal from this book. He also mentions the Bretton Woods system and its benefits, which historically represents the "smart globalization" that Rodrik promotes:

> The imbalance between the national scope of governance and the global nature of markets forms the soft underbelly of globalization. A healthy economic system necessitates a delicate compromise between these two. Give to much power to the governments, and you have protectionism and autarky. Give markets too much freedom, and you have an unstable world economy with little social and political support from those it is supposed to help.

Further:

> So we have to make some choices. Let me be clear about mine: democracy and national determination should trump hyperglobalization. Democracies have the right to protect their social arrangements, and when this right clashes with the > requirements of the global economy, it is the latter that should give away. We need smart globalization, not maximum globalization.

Rodrik appears to be insightful when he explains the so-called political trilemma of (world) economy:

> In particular, you begin to understand what I would like to call the fundamental political trilemma of economy: we cannot simultaneously pursue democracy, national determination, and economic globalization. If we want to push globalization further, we have to give up either the nation state or democratic politics. If we want to maintain and deepen democracy, we have to choose between the nation state and international economic integration. And if we want to keep the nation state and self-determination, we have to choose between deepening democracy and deepening globalization.

Can a light version of globalization be a realistic option?

Rodrik's alternative narrative might not help anyone to escape the binary trap between nationalism and globalism, but it still sheds light on some of the major problems that the deepening of globalization implicates. Plus, it offers a balanced view on the current world and some fairly realistic and available pathways for Western nations.

Anyone who is at least slightly informed on world economic history knows that the balanced globalization of the past has been beneficial for peaceful material development, at least in the West and East Asia, and if one values democracy and national sovereignty (and in fact, some authoritarian nations, such as China, will get a pass because it is too difficult to let democracy flourish there, and it is hard for anyone to change this fact).

The "hyperglobalists" might want to go in another direction and it is indeed very difficult for most people to do something about where things are heading. But normal and sane people who want to have a balanced perspective on economy and politics (not too much globalization, not too much immigration, but some globalization and immigration etc.) can still propose smarter views on these significant topics, and to be smarter than the elites is at least worth something.

How To Improve The Impact Of Your Voice

January 22, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

A common thread that I weave through all of my articles is that physical training can, and should involve more than merely training the muscles to be bigger and stronger. Many aspects of your physical person can be trained, and you will likely know that if you read the writings of other people in this corner of the internet (including myself): mindset, situational awareness, meditation, et al.

One of the things that I rarely see discussed, is something that is of the utmost importance for anybody entering the business world, school, dating, or any other field where face-to-face interaction is a necessity: elocution

What Is Elocution?

Elocution is the study and practice of vocal delivery, in terms of voice, gesture, and pronunciation. Even in this day of the internet, there will come a time in your life where you have to speak publicly. More to the point of this website, there are few things that signal "beta male" more than a mumbling chump who looks down at the ground, doesn't project, and is completely unintelligible to those that he is talking to.

There have been many books written on the topic, but the two that I used in my own elocution autodidacticism are Vocal Expression: Voice Training and Interpretation and Elocution Simplified, both of which date from the Gilded Age—like any proper physical training manual should—and can thus be found on Gutenberg (a resource I regularly use).

Before one even begins vocalizing, there are several steps you can do to improve your elocution right off the bat:

Non-Verbal Training

The first fix you can do in improving your vocal projection is to improve your posture—doing so will expand the chest, allowing greater movement of the diaphragm and lung capacity, which of course means greater capability of vocal projection and the ability to talk for longer periods without taking unseemly gasps for air.

As luck would have it, I've already written an extensive article on improving one's posture, so there's no need to be redundant. Just read that article, do its exercises, and get back here.

Once your posture has been fixed up, you can begin training yourself to breathe diaphragmatically. This is the proper way to breathe, filling your lungs up to their maximum capacity. You can tell that you're doing it properly when you see your stomach expanding with each breath, rather than your chest. To put it another way, the chest and shoulder heaving that you do when consciously "taking a breath" is completely wrong.

The first way to train diaphragm breathing is to simply lie flat on your back and breathe as deep as you can. Do this for 5-10 minutes—don't hyperventilate of course. Close your eyes and do them slow to get the feel of the diaphragm muscle flexing and relaxing. Feel your belly expanding with air. This is somewhat similar to the Maxick muscle control exercises that I have discussed in previous articles.

This exercise will also help you get to sleep—just do it as you lay in bed for 10 minutes or so. After you've mastered this exercise, stand up, and without flexing or tensing up, breath diaphragmatically. Place one hand right below the ribs and the other behind your back, and take deep breaths. Feel your stomach expanding under your hand.

Once you have mastered diaphragmatic breathing, you can begin training the mouth and tongue. Some of this training, too, can be done without actually making noise. More specifically, there are three exercises for this:

1) Drop the head until the chin rests on the breast, raise the head but not the jaw.

2) With “eyes devoid of intellect” and the mouth slack and open, shake the head until you feel the lower jaw, when the lower jaw hangs loosely from the head

3) Test your ability to surrender the jaw by placing your fingers in front of the ears at the conjunction of the jaws, open the mouth with the intention to say no and note how it feels. Then say no and “surrender” the jaw to the word, noting how it feels.

Just practice this for 5-10 minutes a day.

Reinforcing The Tone

This is opening up other facial cavities and allowing them to resonate like a bell.

Realize that “talking through the nose” is in fact NOT talking through the nose—the failure to use the nasal cavity as a resonator is what makes your voice sound “nasally.”

In fact, your entire face is a resonator.

Think of the sound IOOO. Think, almost say it, but don’t. Feel your nasal cavity expand, and then say it, let the sound run up into your noise and to your eye sockets and forehead. Then do it with a hmm, hmm until your mouth is forced open and say MMEEEE. Keep consistent tones!

Always think of tone as flooding the face, feel that flood, and then when possible hum and let it “Escape” rather than force it out. You will see resonance grow.

Training the Tongue and Lips

As with most things worth doing, training the tongue lips is simple yet tedious, and frankly will make you look like an idiot should you do these in the presence of another person. But it is essential to do if you want to speak properly.

Lip control can be done with saying ME repeatedly, letting the tone explode easily onto the lips.

The easiest tongue exercises are:

Step 1: Combine L with A with an umlaut over it and say LA. LA LA LA. LA LA LA. LA. LA

Step 2: Change the accent over the vowel and do that exercise with all the possible sounds of “A”

Step 3: Change the vowel, and then do all variations of all vowels with the letter L. (E I O U)

Step 4: Using the letter D, then T, then N put in all vowels and all accents and then repeat steps 1-3

Step 5: Follow the proceeding exercises working on groups of words of one syllable beginning with L. Late, lane, lame, lack, laugh, and so forth, for all vowels and sounds and consonants.

With all the exercises given in this article, your elocution should noticeably improve after a few practice sessions. Perhaps more advanced (and more dignified) elocution exercises will come at a later date.

How To Be A Good Father

January 22, 2017 | by Rik Storey | Link | Original Link

At a time when many Western men don't even want to be a father, it may be considered out of touch to discuss the importance of pursuing its excellence. Moreover, my eldest of three children is not even five yet, so I must also contend with the accusation of pretence. But, I am an early years professional and the facts paint a clear picture that we can all recognise – we need the return of traditional families and patriarchy.

Now, don't expect the cultural Marxist establishment to help you out; the glue which holds the suicidal fragments of today's status quo together is their hatred of straight white men; you think they want more of you? Yet, the demographic Winter is coming, the signs are all there – Europeans breeding way below replacement levels, a runaway Keynesian economy, the ageing of the higher spending generation etc. etc. Your example as a father could stave off the worst of it for Western civilization.

So, now that I have your attention, how can you be a good dad? Before we begin, self-reflection has been a precursor for obtaining wisdom in the rationalistic West since the age of heroes. It wasn't only the Greeks who had inscribed, 'Know thyself', at the forecourt of their temples. What are your strengths and weaknesses? Are you cold and unempathetic around children and teens? Would you be exhausted after five minutes alone with them? None of these are impediments to fatherhood but you need to know what you can offer and what will take more practice.

You may likely have children that are similar to you or your wife and who are perfectly happy engaging in the activities you are, but they might be different, very different to anyone else. Once you know the tools you are working with and the nature of the child you are working on, reaching the level of Gong fu in the art of fatherhood only requires good planning and flexibility. I would advise using Maslow's hierarchy of needs, a mainstay for early years educators, to create an action plan.

1. Physiological Needs

You remember the film Gremlins? There were three rules. Children are much easier – don't feed them after midnight is the only one of the three that applies. Air, food, water, clothing and shelter; if you're unable to provide these things in a developed country, that's probably because you are a child. Make sure everyone gets enough time outdoors, fruit and veg, and sleep – job done.

2. Safety Needs

Just keep everything up to waist height safe for their first three years (especially plug sockets and furniture corners). After that, accidents become a healthy part of their development; let them learn to risk assess for themselves. If they don't graze those knees and bump those heads, nature won't go easy on their retarded sense of caution.

On a serious note, don't harm your little ones out of anger. Punishment must always be handled as a matter of justice. As a father, you are the judge and the majority of studies have shown that disproportionate punishment, physical aggression and angry emotional outbursts have very damaging effects on human development. Not only will the child not learn about honour and justice, they will be much less able to control their temper and handle emotional situations with rationale for the rest of their lives. They will also pass on the same IQ-depleting, animalistic behaviour to their children and so the vicious cycle continues. Revenge is a dish best served cold.

But, be warned! Children will drive you up the wall sometimes, just as the weaker sex often resorts to hurtful words, emotionally bullying us to do their will. Children have little to no baggage and are raw human emotion and instinct; as such, they can intuit and manipulate yours with ease, if you are suggestible enough, pointing out hypocrisies and pressing all the right buttons. You have to be as steel with them, cold and immovable, but when they genuinely need comfort, recognise it and open your heart to them. This way, they learn what good parenting looks like and the importance of being earnest, not just how to become a better liar for next time.

What's the best way to keep your own temper at bay? Financial security is the biggest cause of arguments and divorces etc., and the pressure is placed on the shoulders of men first, as the traditional hunter of the hunter-gatherers. Live within your means and try not to worry. Contrary to popular belief, children don't really need a lot and their education doesn't have to be too expensive if you're willing and able to spend more time with them yourself. Also, not every single person has to go to university and come out with debt and a useless degree. See this article for more on how to take control of your finances.

3. Love and Belonging

Not to speak ill of homeschoolers, but letting your child out of the home to develop their own social groupings is just as important as the love they receive in the home. It is the other edge to the sword that is your child's social ability. If both are not kept sharp, then your child will be at a disadvantage in the real world.

Yes, out there, there are meanies who do not love and understand your child the way mumsy does, but that's the whole point. Iron sharpens iron and your child will need to learn the different characters and personalities out there, who they want to befriend, who they want to avoid and why.

We all need to belong to something. That's why even the most individualistic of libertarians will nevertheless join various groups and institutions. Alexis de Tocqueville thought the success of the American Republic as compared with the French was the churches which, although numerous in their denominations, bound the spirit of the Americans together across the country.

There's a reason that cultural and ethnic homogeneity are so crucial in the creation of high trust societies. So, as a father, you have a duty to make sure your child grows up somewhere they belong in this most primal of ways. If having children doesn't give you the incentive to take an interest in politics and the society your child must inherit, I don't know what will.

As far as love in the home goes, you don't have to be gushing with emotion to let them know you love them. Routine, structure and stability are the greatest tokens of love for a child. Superficially, we can say that accepting them for who they are and kissing them goodnight are good, but shaming them for being different to their brothers and sisters is bad. Of course. But, taking time for your children is at the heart of the matter.

Set times every week for family meetings, eat meals at least once a day together as a family with no distractions and have a board game evening, for instance. Make the home something that you are all collectively invested in and your child will know deep down that you want to be invested in them. Creating that platform gives them the space in which they can speak honestly with you about your parenting and to genuinely listen to your parental wisdom in return.

4. Esteem

I'm at risk of repeating myself here. That's because children need to be out of the home and in an environment where they are not unconditionally loved in order to find out how they can earn the esteem of their peers and elders, as well as whose opinions don't matter to them at all. But, learn the mistake of the pushy parents who raise those over-competitive, ticking time-bombs we've all encountered. Studies show they're more likely to reject you later in life and less likely to achieve a sense of fulfilment. Which leads us to self-actualisation.

5. Self-Actualisation

We all want our children to reach their fullest potential but, the trouble is, most of us are not really engaged in that task ourselves. Generally speaking, however, we want our children to succeed at something they love. The best way to do this is to understand what they're good at and play to their strengths, whilst supporting them in their weak areas.

For example, if yours are still young, study them to see what schemas they have. Schemas are the following psychological urges developed from their first year: Rotation, Trajectory, Enveloping, Orientation, Positioning, Connection, Enclosure/Container, Transporting and Transformation. Once you've got them sussed, thinking of toy ideas and study supports is much easier.

But, let's be honest, if your child isn't good at science, they probably won't be an astrophysicist and probably won't want to, but that doesn't mean they shouldn't know how gravity works. If your child has a talent and they love a certain hobby, focus their energies on it and help them to excel; chances are, none of you will regret it or resent the other.

Transcendence

Interestingly, Maslow later revised self-actualisation. He thought that self-actualisation was aimless and without any end in sight, without some higher, transcendent goal. In the West, we have lost the concept of the paterfamilias, the father as being both priest and king of the household, with the hearth keeping both the fire and name of the family alive, surrounded by statues and images of ancestors. The fireplace has been replaced by the television in most of our homes and the father has been replaced by the state in many more still.

As the priest of your family unit, your natural role is to act as a spiritual guide for your children, to the best of your knowledge and belief. Teach them the ways of your ancestors, about their culture and their role in the bigger picture. Teach them how to search within and without for answers, and how to respectfully disagree, so they do not end up mindlessly following authority.

In short, being a father is never going to be easy. Then again, nothing worth having ever is. Become what you were born to be. But, if you're going to do it, do it right. You don't have to be the perfect father, you just have to keep at it. All cheesy cliches, yes, but that's because these principles are time-honoured, tested and true. Let's keep it that way.

10 Feminist Fantasies That Could Become A Reality In The Near Future

January 23, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

Around 2013 when I first discovered the manosphere, I knew things were bad in our society in terms of sex relations along with the corroding effects of feminism. But at the time, I didn't appreciate just know how bad. In just few years since then, I've seen enough madness to know which direction we're headed and it doesn't look good. We already live in a feminist society and the harpies are pushing to make things even harder for ordinary men who just want to get on with their lives. The following will demonstrate what will happen to our society if we were to give into all the demented demands of today's feminists.

Although this article is meant to highlight the craziness of it all, note that many of these concepts are already starting to take shape in our societies to become a reality.

1. Expansion Of Hate-Crime Laws

"You can't save Mary Jane anymore, Spiderman. It's 'benevolent sexism', and therefore, a misogynistic hate-crime."

In England, trying to pick-up a woman or even just whistling at her is considered a "hate crime" if the woman gets upset by it. It is a real possibility that this law might spread to the rest of the West and expand to include other misogynist offenses including: looking at a woman (what feminists call "stare rape"), calling a trans-woman a he (there's already a similar law in New York), arguing with women online, manspreading, mansplaining, helping a woman, and so on.

2. Consent Forms

Since women get to dictate the terms of all sexual interactions, consent forms will have to become a necessity in the future. And not just for sex, but in all forms of interaction like being able to approach a woman on the street. Maybe an app will be developed where a woman could consent to sex, conversation, or being looked at so that she could screen out all the low-life misogynists who want to compliment her for her looks.

3. Anonymous Rape Accusations + 100% Belief In Woman's Testament

All men are rapists; we need to believe her because she's a woman. It's a perfect circular logic.

Feminists claim that the reason we live in a patriarchal rape culture is because our society discourages rape victims (always women) from coming forward and also because their words are not taken seriously. So, what they're proposing is clear: rape accusations should be done anonymously and the "victims" should always be believed against evidences that are biased because… patriarchy.

Men have already lost their jobs, kicked out of school, jailed, and even murdered for false rape accusations while their accusers faced no legal consequences (and got to keep their anonymity). So, we're not really that far from reaching that level.

4. Feminist Re-Education Camps

This book is not a mandatory reading in kindergartens yet. What more proof do you need that we are all oppressed by the patriarchy?

With feminism taking over the educational institutions and already working to reprogram men to serve the system, it won't be long before men who have been found guilty of misogynist hate crimes to end up in re-education camps. We already have sensitivity training in jobs while colleges are adding courses on toxic masculinity to re-define what it is to be a man on feminist terms. It probably won't be long before "toxic masculinity" is added to DSM as a mental disorder (in place of homosexuality) and treated like a disease in mental health institutions.

5. Government-Sponsored Feminist Tribunals

Canada already has an actual social justice tribunal.

Since it'll be difficult to charge men of bogus hate crimes against women with nothing more than a woman's feelings as a proof, the government may introduce tribunals similar to the kangaroo courts in universities and HR departments at workplaces, all in the name of creating a harmonious society free of hate. Those who enter these tribunals will also be destroyed by the media and have no chance of being employed and be subject to permanent social ostracism even if they're found not guilty.

6. Systemic Castration

As I've mentioned in my other article, docile and compliant dogs are the ideal that feminists aim for in their efforts to domesticate men. A significant number of boys are already on ADHD medication to have their behaviors controlled while male sex offenders are given chemical castration. If all men are violent hooligans and rapists as some feminists claim, then the next logical step is to let the government control men's testosterone levels to an "acceptable" level. Note that we already have many parents who are letting their children take hormones to alter their "gender." This practice will likely become more common in the future.

7. Non-contact Sex

"She did not consent; I must not touch."

Feminists have been so effective in terrorizing the beta males that many of them are afraid to interact with women in any shape or form. Consider that we already live in a world where walking past some deranged woman will get you accused of sexual assault.

In the future, all physical contact with women may become sternly discouraged or even forbidden that more men will retreat to porn and sexbots as alternatives. Haptic technology for sex is already being developed to pave the way for a culture of non-contact sex.

8. Bachelor Tax

Did you think you pesky "MRA's" could escape the gynocentric order by refusing marriage and going your own way? With the drop in number of men who are manning up that coincides with the rising number of single mothers who need to leech the welfare state, it's not too unreasonable to expect a push for bachelor tax that will penalize men who refuse to put a ring on an aging, post-slut sow.

Knowing that it will cause a major backlash, the bachelor tax will probably not come into being in an obvious way. Instead, it will be introduced under the guise of supporting the poor single mothers and helping to foster families. Heck, considering how men are the primary tax payers while women are the primary beneficiaries of the welfare state, you could say that we already have a gynocentric taxation system in all but name.

9. Polyandry

Women already practice ‘Alpha fucks, Beta bucks’ strategy. So why shouldn’t an empowered woman be allowed to do it openly without shame?

With the institution of marriage already destroyed and with many men already accepting cuckoldery as the norm in the form of “open marriage,” women may as well be allowed to have multiple husbands. And why not? We already know that there are far too many men for the number of women in our society and that those lazy men should do more to support women. Is it that crazy to have one husband for sex and another three for money? I’m sure many desperate simps will have no issue sharing a wife with several other men as long as they get some cuddling action when she’s not too busy banging her more attractive husbands. The implementation of bachelor tax, mentioned above, will also make marriage more desirable.

10. Concentration Camps For Men

The final solution to the testosterone problem.

If the above measures to protect women and ensure equality are implemented, it's likely that all the misogynists will grumble in anger and resist them. If that is the case, it might be best to take the advice of the feminist, Julie Bindel, and place all men in concentration camps. No man, no problem! If you're wondering how feminists could even achieve this, know that there is already an army of goons called the police who will gladly do as they're told to maintain the gynocentric order.

Conclusion

As I've said in an older article of mine, feminism is practically a terrorist movement that demands more and more political, social, and cultural oppression of men for the sake of radical women who play the eternal victim and cry for never-ending privileges. While you may think that the above nightmare scenarios are over-the-top and unlikely to happen, I bet those who lived just few generations ago couldn't have imagined what we're witnessing today either. Feminism, by colluding with the government, will continue to grow like a tumor and it will not stop until you make it stop.

Remember that if we don't fight back, no one else will.

Man Who Sucker Punched Alt-Right Leader Richard Spencer May Literally Be A Shit-Eating Cuckold

January 23, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

When putative alt-right leader Richard Spencer was assaulted on the day of Donald Trump's Presidential inauguration, it made world news. Liberals and SJWs also celebrated the unprovoked, cowardly attack, which was but one of many instances of leftist thuggery in Washington over Friday and the weekend. A picture of Spencer's alleged attacker is now circulating the internet and 4chan users have suggested he features in scatological "porn" videos. There is a stunning resemblance between the half-masked man in Washington and the depraved individual being pooped on by some kind of dominatrix (WARNING: NSFW!).

Spencer was attacked twice on Friday. The following video is of the main assault:

A Twitter account for "Mandy's slave ray" (and Spencer's attacker?) claims that he has given his "mistress" over $53,000, in addition to him being used as a human toilet. This figure is now probably much higher, as the so-called slave has not tweeted in nearly two years. Violence, let alone cowardly violence, is inexcusable, yet I'm not surprised that someone who serves as a dumping zone for someone else's crap and urine might lash out like this, particularly against someone as uncucked as Richard Spencer. Whether you like his views or not, Spencer has more courage than the vast majority of people on this planet.

Here is the image of Spencer's attacker doing the rounds on Twitter, message boards like 4chan and Reddit, and other social media platforms:

And here are images of the scat-eating cuckhold that 4chan claims is the same man:

If Spencer's probable attacker is indeed the male porta potty, it helps to confirm some of the worst suspicions we have had about our violence-inclined enemies. Male SJWs, really just the most compulsive white knights, not only worship women, but will seriously degrade themselves to appease them. At the same time, this humiliation they engage in has a limit. When confronted with men like Richard Spencer, who are largely unafraid to speak their minds, the rage of these cucks boils over. Though they attack in a cowardly fashion, like the sucker punch caught on video, they attack nonetheless, desperately trying to salvage their manhood.

To his credit, a critic of Spencer decided to confront the fortitude-less masked SJW after the attack. It is thanks to him that we have the photo above:

Even if Spencer's attacker isn't the fetish video man, the assault was disgusting

www.UShumor.com

Australians like myself were amongst the first to hear about Richard Spencer being attacked. He was in the middle of an interview with the repugnant Australian Broadcasting Corporation, a sadly government-funded broadcaster that has been embedded in leftist causes for years. Some Return Of Kings readers will take issue with Spencer and his views, but he is articulate and does not act violently. That he was assaulted without a face-to-face confrontation speaks volumes about the cowardice of his attacker. So, too, does the widespread fanfare and support for the masked man by leftists on social media afterwards.

Despite us living in an age of poop swastika and rape hoaxes, leftist media outlets and their viewers have been unable to find nearly enough instances of either contrived or real violence against liberals and SJWs. Instead, they constantly ignore actual violence against conservatives and traditionalists, or minimize this violence to simple cases of "they deserved it." Spencer was far from the only person attacked on Friday and over the weekend. We could go on all day, but here is a particularly nauseating video of a Trump supporter who put out a fire started by leftists being attacked:

> Trump supporter puts out fire, calls for peace.
> Is swiftly punched in the face by anti-Trump "protesters".

We are dealing with some (or many) sick, sick people

The mental illness afflicting Jessica Valenti is shared by run-of-the-mill SJWs, too.

The violent, cowardly thug who blindsided Richard Spencer may not be the man in the scatological material. Regardless, he is a very sick individual. Those leftists who are still rampaging around various American cities, sulking over the victory of Donald Trump over two months ago, have both political and pathological implications. Mental illness should be treated, not inflamed and rewarded by powerful interests such as the media. Popular vote lost or not, Trump won the election fair and square. Most children will never behave in the manner as these cry-babies, not to mention for so long.

One female commentator, Katie Hopkins from The Daily Mail, has already lambasted the females at the "Women's March" in Washington and elsewhere. She says that female Trump haters are confusing having a vagina, a matter of biology, with making a political argument. And then there's the vexed question of why so many women, nearly 50% of all female voters, opted for Trump and not Hillary.

The hypocrisy of the organizers of these tantrums is also startling. For example, one of the architects of this Walk of SJW Shame, extremist Muslim Linda Sarsour, has previously tried to bury a film that exposed the impact of Islamic Sharia law on women, including through honor killings, rape, and real domestic violence:

> When #WomensMarch co-chair (Palestinian Linda Sarsour) tried to bury a movie fighting for #womensrights. WATCH! pic.twitter.com/FvWdm2nRs8

> — Zvi Lando (@zlando) January 22, 2017

Whilst admittedly not paying to get themselves popped on, these anti-Trump sistas remain a part of the same narcissistic, self-entitled community that includes Spencer's attacker. Many of the SJWs on display recently, male and female, will condone and even engage in violence and other crimes all because they don't like the new President. Scarily enough, it seems that many of the men accompanying the women on these pathetic marches literally worship females in a similar vein to the masked coward who moonlights as a toilet.

Thomas Paine: An Agitator And Revolutionary

January 23, 2017 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

One figure in early American history has the unique distinction of being a significant actor in both the American and French revolutions. Thomas Paine is not widely known today (or at least not as widely known as he should be), but his career shows him to have been a man of integrity and courageous conviction. He was born in England and moved to the American colonies as a thirty-seven-year-old adult in 1774, just as the fires of revolution began to smolder.

Discovering a latent talent for agitation and pamphleteering, he threw his energies into promoting the cause of the American rebels. His short essay Common Sense was extremely influential in swaying public opinion in favor of what was decidedly an uncertain cause. Written in a racy, colloquial English that any literate man could understand, it became something of a manifesto among revolutionaries. It is difficult to overstate the importance that this book had in popularizing the rationale for independence from Britain. Paine had a true gift for expressing complex historical and philosophical ideas in ways that the unlettered reader could digest.

COMMON SENSE;

ADDRESSED TO THE W. Hamilton

INHABITANTS

On the following interesting

SUBJECTS.

I. Of the Origin and Design of Government in general, with concise Remarks on the English Constitution.

II. Of Monarchy and Hereditary Succession.

III. Thoughts on the present State of American Affairs.

During the war he used his talents to maintain the morale of Nathanael Greene's soldiers, who were suffering greatly from lack of supplies and want of victories. His pamphlet The American Crisis (1776) is a classic of political rhetoric. Who will protest at quoting once more its stirring opening lines?

> These are the times that try men's souls: The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like Hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly: it is dearness only that gives every thing its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated.

He took a more active role in the new American government after 1777, but his experiences in politics were darkened by controversies and imbroglios that might have been avoided had Paine learned to be better at the game of politics. But he was an idealist, not a politician, and such men are rarely spared trouble. His problems began in 1777 when he foolishly leaked news of secret negotiations with France; for this he was publicly censured. Further scandal arose when Paine criticized Silas Deane, the man appointed to conduct negotiations with the French. Paine considered him unsuited to the job due to conflicts of interest; but Deane had powerful friends, and it was Paine who had to back down in humiliation.

At the end of the war a grateful public had awarded him a plot of land in New York state. But he was restless with revolt, and longed for further battle. His experience in America seems to have turned him into a professional revolutionary with a loathing for monarchies.

Immediately after the war in North America ended he set sail for France to agitate for revolution against the inept monarchy. Unlike most of the French revolutionaries, however, he was against mindless butchery and tried to have the French nobility exiled rather than executed. This and other indiscretions caused him to fall out of favor, and he was tossed into prison in December 1793. Released the next year, he startled public opinion with the release of a book called The Age of Reason, in which he argued for the rejection of "superstition, of false forms of government, and false theology."

Paine turned his guns on organized religion, which (as he saw it) did little more than enslave the human mind to false doctrines:

> I do not believe in the creed professed by the Jewish church, by the Roman church, by the Greek church, by the Turkish church, by the Protestant church nor by any church that I know of. My own mind is my own church. All national institutions of churches…appear to me no other than human inventions, set up to terrify and enslave mankind, and monopolize power and profit.

So it seemed to Tom Paine. The anti-clerical doctrines of the Enlightenment burned brightly in him; he could see little more than ignorance and foolery in organized belief. He was not precisely an atheist, but rather a deist. His opponents were not careful with the distinction, however. His ideas were too radical for the simple folk on both sides of the Atlantic; they could not forgive his contemptuous dismissal of their cherished beliefs. When he returned to the United States in 1802, his reputation as an atheist preceded him, and there were few old friends to greet him. He had burned his bridges nearly everywhere by this time, and died in near obscurity in 1809.

He was a man of action, better suited to wartime conditions than to peacetime politics. In retrospect he should have confined his efforts to writing and public relations instead of entering the lion's den of political intrigue. He did not understand that where powerful men and institutions are concerned, winning every argument is not always the best policy. He was a lover of liberty and a man of integrity, but he never learned to temper his passion for these virtues with sound political judgment and a measured understanding of human nature.

Tom Paine reminded the crowned heads of England and France of their limitations. But no one ever reminded him of his own.

What The Anti-Trump Feminist March On Washington Really Means

January 24, 2017 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Anxious to show the deplorables they still have balls and still cling to bitter Penis Envy, feminists were out in force in Washington over the weekend with their Starbucks lattes in hand. Establishment media was all over the event like a fatass, glouring feminist at an all you can eat buffet. Daily Mail had such a lengthy article about the "Women's March on Washington" one might think they were covering a huge story like extraterrestrial life being discovered, when in reality all the story involved was a regurgitation of the same male-hating, anti-children, anti-family bile feminists have been spewing for half a century.

Unfortunately for them, feminists haven't realized playing the victim card doesn't work anymore. Anglo women are already the most coddled, pampered, and spoiled individuals on this planet, and the best they can do is fight for the right to kill their children in utero? What the hell? When one sees a spectacle like this, replete with such cultural pirates as Michael Moore, Cher, Charlize Theron, some washed up actress named Jessica Chastain and an aging Ashley Judd preaching the matriarchal evangel, it's easy to see why white America is demographically dead and disappearing.

Incidentally, this is the insanity I gladly left behind for "fertile" and feminine shores elsewhere.

The red pill man knows never to believe anything women say. One of the most important skills men can learn in their dealings with dissimulating females is to watch what they do instead. Here's a convenient translation guide to understand what the statistically sterile, solipsistic androgynes really mean when they peer into the camera lenses at the event and seek the attention and sympathy of weak White Knights and sleeping Beta males. But as we all know, women fuck bad boys and only seek to clean out good guys' wallets.

Anyway, on to the list. Here's what feminists are really saying when we read through the lines.

"I'm a selfish bitch."

What does Charlize Theron have to be upset about? Being worth $110 million for playing pretend for a living just isn't enough?

What more do Anglo women possibly want? They already spend 90% more money than they earn in the economy. They gobble up 66% of public spending from the welfare state while men pay 75% of the taxes to support this gynocentric system. Women hypocritically make up 80% of all spending decisions in the materialistic, extremely wasteful and environmentally destructive economy they later complain about as not being "green" enough.

They then hypocritically say they Don't Need a Man™ while statistics prove them dead wrong. Without men for the government to rob women would be up the creek without a paddle.

What's most satisfying about the Daily Mail article was reading the "Best rated" comments below the article. Nobody is buying the propaganda establishment media is crapping out anymore. User Right Auntie wrote:

> I'm not quite sure what they are protesting. Women in America can drive a car, get an education, get a mortgage and purchase a home. They can be doctors, lawyers, architects, engineers. They can be ministers or atheists. They can have children without men. They can speak their minds. I'm positive that they can still do these things now that Trump is president. This just looks like a giant hissy fit because their candidate lost. Being a sore loser is never a good thing.

Indeed, what are these women protesting? They live such decadent lives they're literally killing the goose that lays the golden egg as the future belongs to those whose children will be in it, and the men who made their exorbitant, selfish existence possible are either breeding with other ethnic groups or becoming genetic dead ends.

“My sexual promiscuity is more important than a dirty little baby’s life.”

Hands off my uterus! Who wants that barren piece of anatomy, anyway baby?

How many methods of contraception do women have today? There is a veritable cornucopia of methods available to women to prevent pregnancy from happening in the first place. But, rather than taking responsibility and actually using one of the dozen and a half methods below, feminists refuse to show the world how Strong and Independent™ they really are by preventing conception and instead opting to fight to the death for the right to kill their unborn children in utero.

Feminists, why not try one of these methods rather than sucking children out of the womb through a tube as is the case in a first trimester abortion, or dismembering them and crushing their skulls as is the case in a second and third trimester abortion?

- Abstinence
- Birth Control Sponge (Today Sponge)
- Birth Control Patch
- Birth Control Vaginal Ring (NuvaRing)
- Birth Control Pills
- Birth Control Shot (Depo-Provera)
- Birth Control Implant (Implanon and Nexplanon)
- Female Condom
- Cervical Cap (FemCap)
- Outercourse
- Diaphragm
- Fertility Awareness-Based Methods (FAMs)
- Pull Out Method (Withdrawal)
- Morning-After Pill (Emergency Contraception)
- Condom
- Spermicide

- Sterilization for Women (Tubal Sterilization)
- IUD

How sadistic are you bitches anyway, to push for abortion rather than personal responsibility, and valuing life rather than presiding over the death of your culture at the hands of your own selfishness?

“I am a hypocrite.”

Fat slob Michael Moore, who still hasn’t donated his $50 million fortune to the little people, was at the event

Bill Clinton womanized, fucked half of Arkansas according to state police testimony, got blow jobs in the White House, regularly cheated on and disrespected his wife Hillary as he chased what he called his “peaches” and yet we never saw protests of this kind during his presidency or Hillary’s failed bid for the White House.

Where were the protests for Hillary being an enabler?

There are also rumors Clinton was a regular guest on the island of a convicted pedophile Jeffrey Epstein, flying down on Epstein’s private jet and doing God knows what while he was there. Even the lamestream media had to cover that story. Daily Mail wrote:

> Bill Clinton’s relationship with a billionaire pedophile will be thrust into the spotlight once again in a major book by a bestselling author released just weeks before the presidential election.
> The former president will face renewed questions over his ties to Jeffrey Epstein, a registered sex offender who was jailed for 13 months in 2008 for soliciting girls for underage prostitution.

Feminists have been silent about that story, while they assail Trump for having normal heterosexual desires and grabbing pussies, much to the delight of hypergamous women when he does so.

“Fathers are less than human.”

A decrepit Cher was thawed from her crypt and hauled down to the march

Feminists, tools of the moneyed elite, continue being useful idiots for the NWO socialist world domination project. Along with a tyrannical government, they have turned fathers and men into enemies of the state, as recently revealed at TNMM.

> Make no mistake, the institution of the welfare state is the single biggest act of cuckoldry in the history of mankind.
> Under the Old World Order, men were charged with the responsibility of loving, supporting, and raising responsible members of society. They were also charged with directing the lives of their often overly emotional (and illogical, short-sighted and fickle) wives in a positive direction.
> The institution of the welfare state and child support indentured servitude changed all that as the state cucked men and fathers by using the force of their own tax dollars against them.
> Not surprisingly, the state is proving to be an inept leader of human families because the concept and importance of fatherly love and guidance means much more than simply a bureaucracy providing Government Check Dads via the Draconian child support system. Since feminism, women have proven they are not capable of leading responsible lives without male guidance, and our children are paying the price.

None other than Nikola Tesla knew what was coming as a result of this insanity.

> Our civilization will sink to a state like that which is found among the bees, ants and other insects–a state wherein the male is ruthlessly killed off. In this matriarchal empire which will be established the female rules. As the female predominates, the males are at her mercy. The male is considered important only as a factor in the general scheme of the continuity of life. The tendency of women to push aside man, supplanting the old spirit of cooperation with him in all the affairs of life, is very disappointing to me.
> Woman’s independence and her cleverness in obtaining what she wants in the business world is breaking down man’s spirit of independence. The old fire he once experienced at being able to achieve something that would compel and hold a woman’s devotion is turning to ashes. Women don’t seem to want that > sort of thing to-day. They appear to want to control and govern. They want man to look up to them, instead of their looking up to him.

Indeed, the entire affair in Washington as well as 50 years of rabid feminism both reek of an agenda to turn men into nothing more than sperm donors and expendable laborers, and for women to live out their Penis Envy fantasies.

STFU

Pretty Woman no more: Wearing a "pussyhat" Julia Roberts flaunts her hate for the deplorables

These are only four translations of what feminists really mean when they throw collective hissy fits like the one in Washington. They don't deserve to have an audience any longer as everyone already knows what they have to say, and what they have to say is cultural poison loaded with anti-male bigotry.

It is an encouraging sign of sea change that we who are members of the new counterculture in America enjoy seeing when people are not listening to what these preachy, entitled feminists have to say as evidenced by the overwhelming backlash in the comments section of a mainstream newspaper article on the event.

Do you think the pendulum is about to swing the other way, away from the cultural and demographic suicide as well as gynocentric imperialism events like this represent?

Ladies, we realize you have a vagina. We realize it is nature's credit card in your mind. But you are over your victim card credit limit, and your account is about to be closed.

Action Films Are As Cucked As Hollywood Itself

January 24, 2017 | by M.T. White | Link | Original Link

I'm not a moralist when it comes to simulated violence—it doesn't bother me. Also, the action doesn't need to be "realistic" for me to enjoy it. It really depends on the context. There's bad "realistic" action (Gangs of New York) and there's good "stylized" violence (countless Kung Fu movies).

That being said, the action in movies these days leaves me either numb or cold. Maybe it's just my old age. Or maybe the cucks in the entertainment business have lost their edge. I'm leaning towards the latter.

I mean no offense to the craftsmen and artisans who work in the entertainment fields: The stuntmen, stunt-car drivers, weapons specialists, physical effects artists (pyrotechnics and prosthetics), horse wranglers, set-builders, military advisors, et cetera. They do a great job, putting in tireless hours, some even risking their lives, for our entertainment. Problem is, they are being used less and less.

These men are slowly being supplemented and replaced by computer technicians who spend tireless hours at their work stations in a sterilized office environment to create sterilized action, a majority of the time being directed by a man who probably prides himself on being called a feminist (Joss Whedon). The result is action that might appear to be on a grand scale, definitely flashy, sometimes confusing, but also barren and lifeless. A lot of this is due to economics of the business and bad storytelling but it is also due to the character of the boys leading the productions.

Joss Whedon: Director of “The Avengers” and self-proclaimed feminist

Boys Doing A Man’s Job

Before computer technology started supplanting physical craft, the director, whether he be an alpha or beta, had the craftsmen to assist and help construct the action. But if the majority of people (director/writer/computer jockey’s etc.) working on a movie have no real world, hands on experience, if they’ve never been in a fist fight, shot a gun, driven a car at high speeds, done a full contact kickboxing match—and don’t have people surrounding them that at least have this experience—the result is a product without life, without grit; in short, a product that is grossly out of touch on almost every level (like most movies today).

Future employees of Industrial, Light & Magic?

This can be summarized in an exchange on Joe Rogan's podcast between the host and writer/director Kevin Smith. While talking about bow hunting, Smith noted he once tried to shoot a bow and arrow but had trouble nocking the arrow due to lack of strength. Problem is, at the time, Smith was doing a writing stint on the Green Arrow comic series. He was writing stories for a character, whose main weapon he had zero real world familiarity with. Multiply this problem and you have the current state of escapist entertainment.

Guys like Smith raved about Rogue One: A Star Wars Story, but when I saw it, there were a couple of scenes that I found almost morally irresponsible: 1) An ambush/gunfight in an urbanized desert town, evoking recent memories of the Iraq War and 2) When the Death Star destroys said town, it forms an explosive cloud resembling an atomic bomb blast. As someone who has had family that served in Iraq, and a wife that is from Hiroshima, this was a shit sandwich of imagery that took me out of the movie. Only people with a detached and privileged worldview could produce scenes like this. As stated above, I'm not here to moralize, and I don't know the production details but if the director and writer's had actual combat experience—instead of just a depersonalized view through computer, phone and television screens—I'm confident there would have been more thoughtfulness in the construction of the action (and everything else).

Compare Rogue One, or any recent Hollywood blockbuster, to any film made by someone like Michael Mann (Thief, Manhunter, Last of the Mohicans, Heat etc.). The director, on the surface fits the typical mold of a Hollywood director: Jewish, liberal and admirer of modern art. But Mann is also a gun enthusiast and the one person I know who worked with him respected the hell out of him. The conflicts in Mann's films are truly masculine in nature and dealt with a masculine way. I would argue his embrace of digital cameras has made his action scenes flatter (compare the gunfights in Heat with that of the 2006 Miami Vice) but his writing and personal character is strong enough to balance it out.

Michael Mann: A hands-on director

Creativity And Market Forces

Now, compare Mann to another auteur like Quentin Tarantino. As I've written in the past, Tarantino does respect the craft (he isn't a fan of digital anything) but, unlike Mann, his storytelling capabilities are underwhelming. He just likes violence for violence's sake.

Story, characters, theme, take a backseat to forms (just mayhem and long dialogue exchanges without context). Like Rogue One or the Marvel movies, it's a fanboy aesthetic, and it dominates Hollywood today.

Due to market and social forces, Hollywood feels they need to give the fans what they "want". And they want action dammit! But it's supplied without any storytelling fundamentals—except on the most puerile of levels. Ayn Rand wrote of modern art and literature being "dominated by the attempt to disintegrate man's consciousness and reduce it to mere sensations, to the 'enjoyment' of meaningless colors, noises and moods." One could say the same about today's popular entertainment.

Really, the details and kinetics of action don't really matter. We may be amazed by the physical feats achieved by the performers and the risks they take (how many bones has Jackie Chan broken?) but if there isn't really a context for it all, then it is all for naught. For those who like Kung Fu movies (like me), it is good to keep in mind that all the celebrated films—directed by skilled auteurs such as Chan, Chang Cheh, and others—while having great action, were complemented by at least a competent structured story. There was a method to the madness. Keep in mind, directors like Chang (and his protégé John Woo) felt the most important characteristic of their movies was the brotherhood and heroism among men (an important value to Chinese). Kung Fu was really just a culturally specific expression of resolving whatever conflict the respective story presented. (Woo modernized it by turning the swordplay in to gunplay).

John Woo directing Hard Boiled

But Hollywood and fanboys just saw the impressive gunfights when they watched Woo's The Killer and only cared about the chaotic shopping mall melee when they watched Chan's Police Story. They idolized the action, neglecting the context in which it took place. And then some fanboys went to Hollywood, resulting in a movie like the Matrix: Reloaded, directed by the then Wachowski Brothers (now Wachowski Sisters), where a computerized version of Keanu Reeves, fights hundreds of Hugo Weaving's without any blood, any risks or any stakes, leaving the audience sensory deprived (and in my case, bored).

But these type of sugar-coated action movies still have tons of fans…

Fanboys And Their Toys

An educational experience for me was the outrage in certain quarters towards The Dark Knight Rises compared to the adulation of The Avengers (directed by feminist Whedon), released a couple of months prior. I thought the latter was a waste of time. Just a bunch of flat action scenes with New York getting destroyed but ironically with no sense of suspense that the world might be ending. The Batman movie, while being far from perfect, kept my attention, had a serviceable story, some visual flair and at least attempted to have a theme, some moral heft. As I told a relative: “Christopher Nolan is an artist; Joss Whedon needs to go back to TV.” But all the fanboys would talk about is how horrible The Dark Knight Rises was, how Batman “acted out of character”, how it was “too serious” and how the fight scenes were “shit”.

Now for some moralizing: People who criticize The Dark Knight Rises or any movie for that matter over its action, editing or any minor technicalities don’t care about art, don’t care about story—they probably just care about empty thrills because outside of video games and movies, they probably aren’t experiencing any “action” in their own lives. I’m suspicious anytime I hear fanBOYS rail against anything. There’s a very good chance the object of their scorn has or at least attempted higher aims than just providing an action fix (witness the outrage of Batman V Superman: Dawn of Justice).

Instead it seems, they just want movies and TV shows that have conflicts that are completely contrived just to get the action started (Captain America: Civil War), that take place in some strange alternate universe where the punches don’t cause bruises, sword cuts don’t cause bleeding, and buildings collapse without any collateral human damage.

Comics, and movies based on them, have their place. Like a modern version of fairy tales, superheroes are important for kids to process conflict in a simple idealized way. But that’s for KIDS not MEN.

But even for adults, comics, and movies based on them, can be valid forms of story-telling. No genre or production method is off limits—if done competently. For example, 300, originally a comic by Frank Miller and brought to the screen by Zack Snyder, was shot completely in front of chroma key walls, with the details filled in later by computer. I’m not a fan of that type of production method but I do admit that Miller and Snyder’s combined vision resulted in a great action flick.

Creativity combined with technology can make a good movie

The quality of a work depends on the men producing it and an audience mature enough to process it. Unfortunately, the maturity in product and audience seems to be spiraling downwards these days. But with the popularity of sports like UFC, websites like Return of Kings and men figuring out there's more to life than the latest Star Wars movie, hopefully things will turnaround. If I can wake up, I'm confident others can too.

Our Modern Marxist World: How A Cult May Have Shaped The Fate Of Western Civilization

January 24, 2017 | by Sponsored Article | Link | Original Link

The following article was sponsored by the editor at Expandourmind

We saw in Part I how the Marxists arranged a historical process according to Plato which supposedly leads to their satanic world government after society collapses into an arranged chaos. In this part we look into the process of dialectics as a Marxist warfare strategy. We also look into the historic background of Satanist infiltration in order to subvert religions, rulers and the masses.

KGB Agent Disclosed The Deadly Mix Of Sun Tzu, Dialectics And Democracy

The KGB defector Anatoliy Golitsyn said in his book “Perestroika deception”:

> All warfare is based on deception. Therefore, when capable, feign incapacity; when active, inactivity. When near, make it appear that you are far away; when far away, that you are near. Offer the enemy a bait to lure him; feign disorder and strike him… Keep him under strain and wear him down. When he is united, divide him. Attack where he is unprepared; sally out when he does not expect you. To subdue the enemy without fighting is the supreme skill… if ignorant of both your enemy and yourself, you are certain in every battle to be in peril'. SUN TZU, 'The Art of War',

"The devil's finest trick is to persuade you that he does not exist."

CHARLES BAUDELAIRE, 'Le Spleen de Paris'.

Both Anatoliy Golitsyn and Yuri Bezmenov – well informed defectors of the KGB – said that the Chinese General Sun Tzu(500 BC) was a great inspiration for the global communist conspirators. Democracy was the most attractive form to subvert the whole world with people embracing the deceitful beauty of democracy. They combined Sun Tzu´s deception strategy with the dialectic manipulation of Hegel and the classic Machiavellian principles of "divide and conquer" with a mortal communist essence. Their plan is to arrange and control the final world conflict and then quickly seize power during confusion.

Lenin said:

> It is impossible to understand Marx's "Capital" completely, and especially its first Chapter, without having thoroughly studied and understood the whole of Hegel's Logic. Consequently, half a century later none of the Marxists understood Marx!!

All dialectics work by creating and controlling conflicts(thesis-antithesis-synthesis) through MSM and politicians. Gradually they push society in their own direction without people understanding how and why it happened.

In “Perestroika deception” Golitsyn states:

Thesis: Stalinism [or Stalinist Communism].

Antithesis: Rejection of Stalinist Communism.

Synthesis: Converging, merging and marriage of Communist (socialist) substance (content) with democratic format, or ‘democratism’ [= ‘convergence’]. This use of ‘democratic’ form is deceptive: it is the essence of the strategic manoeuvre which is intended to secure the final world victory of Communism. “

Here, in addition to Hegelian dialectics, the Communist strategists took Sun Tzu’s advice. Sun Tzu wrote: ‘I base my plans for victory on form, but this is not understood by the common man….”

People believe that they have “democracy” but that´s just an attractive form exploited to implement the essence of communism without people realizing it.

Judaism And Communism – Talmud Is Key

“Even the best of the ‘goyim’(non-jews) should all be killed.” (Soferim 15, Talmud)

It is crucial to study the Jewish religion and history before digging into the global communist conspiracy. The Jewish topic is extensive and can only be briefly summarized here with references to essential information.

Modern Judaism is based on the Talmud scriptures which has a history of about 1500 years. The Talmud was deemed heretic in Europe by the Christians who burned the Talmud in public until the 19th century. The Talmud has been accused of mainly two demonic heresies:

- Jews are superior to non-Jews and the Jewish people is God themselves. Goyim are animals. Jews are the future kings of the world and goyim will become their animal slaves. It is allowed for Jews to commit crimes such as killing goyim without consequence.
- Sexual perversions are allowed in the Talmud including incest, pedophilia, bestiality(!) etc.

(https://www.henrymakow.com/2014/03/Does-Talmud-Teach-Bestiality-Pedophilia-Incest.html)

Jewish experts contend with the critics of the Talmud and they say that non-jews can´t understand the "esoteric meaning" of the Talmud. I never became enlightened to the "esoteric meaning" of incest and pedophilia. It is however clear that Rabbis (Jewish high priests) admit that Jews are superior to all non-Jews and that the Jews will rule the world.

We find the same strategy in modern Jewish Talmudic faith as in the Secret Societies where Jews are told that they are the chosen world rulers. They also tell ordinary Jews that they are some kind of Gods. It is the same strategy of deceiving people by promising them a golden future if they just serve their evil masters.

The Occurrence of Sabbateanism-Frankism in Judaism

Sabbatai Zevi – The Jewish "Messiah" Who Married A 16-year Old Prostitute And "Converted" To Islam in 1666 (!)

> The satanic plague devouring humanity originated with the Sabbatean-Frankist cult, a Satanic Jewish movement based on the Cabala that absorbed half the Jews of Europe in the 17th/18th Century. They were chameleons. Pretending to convert, these Satanist Jews infiltrated and subverted all important religions, organizations and governments. They are the progenitors of the Illuminati, Zionism, Communism, Fascism and they control Freemasonry. The NWO is their goal.

In 1988, Rabbi Gunther Plaut described Illuminati founder Jacob Frank in these terms, and implied that the Nazis were a Sabbatean-Frankist creation. Holocaust expert Elie Wiesel also seemed to agree since he endorsed the book!! (https://www.henrymakow.com/were_illuminati_jews_responsib.html#sthash.wC7qui6w.dpuf) years ago. From that point on Judaism became all black at the top and they spread their depraved ideology to other western religions and secret societies. Leaders like Zabbatai Zevi and Jacob Frank practiced terrible forms of Satanism and had a very low moral standard including calling themselves "Messiah". Their morality is now being normalized in modern society. The crucial event was when Zevi in 1666 converted to Islam and became the hero of many European Jews. From then on these "Jews" infiltrated Judaism, other religions and all political parties with one objective – world power.

To give you a small example of their existence and depravity today Oprah did an interview in 1991 where a Jewish Woman Exposes Frankist Jews . Her story is compelling and similar to other stories of Jewish victims. Henry Makow also wrote a story about it.

By fake conversions the Frankists managed to infiltrate and subvert all western religions and political parties by using their MSM propaganda, lies, deception and the money from Rothschild &Co. Satanic Jews are present in every country including China and India since millennia and they mix with locals but keep their secret criminal faith in a global cabal. Jews have been expelled from more than 100 countries during 2000 years on charges of subversive and occult activities including child ritual murders. Their strategy to take over the world demanded a lot of money and that is where the Jewish super bankers came into play as they subverted our money system by sinister frauds, mass assassinations, incitement of all kinds of revolutions and wars.

General Spiridovich Exposed The Rothschild Subversion In 1926 And Was Brutally Murdered The Same Year

> "Only after you know that the Jews are Satanists, can you become a real statesman, and then you cease to ask foolish or misleading questions… The > Rothschilds have been the backbone of all political and financial happenings since 1770. Their name ought to be mentioned of each page of the history of every country… another honest President, Garfield (murdered) said:

> "Whoever controls the money of a nation, controls that nation".

–Major General Spiridovich; "The Secret World Government or Hidden Hand", 1926

In the next part we will take a look at Tibet and their hidden but crucial role in Western politics. We also look at our modern society with false flags orchestrated by the intelligence agencies, a Marxist education system and Machiavellian tactics to isolate, weaken and divide people into as many subgroups as possible.

Why Abundance And Ruthlessness Are Needed To Get Hot Girls in 2017

January 25, 2017 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I frequently get guys coming to me with questions about girls they are dating, or would like to date. Sometimes it might be a girl who they met through day or night game—they've managed to get a telephone number but the girl is either not responding to his messages or she's being evasive.

What they all want to know is—what is the answer? What trick or tip do you have for me to get this one particular girl? What they fail to realise is that in many cases there is no answer other than ruthlessness and having a bunch of other options to fall back on.

Harsh But True

The sexual marketplace in 2017 is like the Wild West—no regulation, no protectionism and no right of appeal. Girls are literally swamped with options to a degree that has never been seen before in the history of the world. There is very little incentive for them to respond to you, much less treat you with any respect or as though you have any inherent value.

Think about this—if you were a hot girl back in 1990 then you would have a decent number of admirers like guys from school, the gym, whatever. That same girl would have the same plus a whole host of new thirsty guys after her through the dating sites. But in 2017, with social media and Tinder (plus Happn, Bumble etc)—that girl is blowing up with options. For you to break through the noise and actually sleep with her you need to have something pretty special going for you.

Highly Inflated SMV

Roosh just released an excellent podcast called The Death of Night Game which I recommend anyone reading this listens to. In it, he describes in detail how the phenomena of social media and dating apps have inflated average women's perception of their own SMV (sexual market value) to an absurd degree.

Today, a girl who is a 7 by any objective standard will get so many matches on Tinder (plus glances from men at work, in the gym, and likes on Instagram pictures) that she will likely regard herself as an 8 at least. This will only be exacerbated by the probability that she has received likes and matches from men in the 8+ bracket who are either willing to 'slum it' for a night or who are spamming in the hope of an easy lay.

What this means for you is that it is now becoming significantly more difficult for a man to date a girl who is of equal SMV as himself. So if you are a 7, in many cases you will find yourself being rejected by women in that same bracket who ten years ago would probably have slept with you.

By the way, whether or not the 7 in question is actually getting those hotter guys is almost immaterial—it is the way that the online approaches from hotter guys make her feel that makes the difference. Just as the financial markets is extremely sensitive to confidence, so is the sexual marketplace. Just the thought that she could conceivably get a 9 may be enough for an average girl to turn a guy equal to her in SMV down.

Game Is Getting Tougher

Against this backdrop there is little doubt that game is tougher than it was a decade ago. On the plus side, hopefully the analysis above shows that if you are getting blow-outs it's not necessarily entirely your 'fault'. There are wider socio-technological factors at play.

But if the game is getting tougher on a macro scale then you need to get tougher too. What that means in practice is you should maintain a laser focus on your sexual goals and not waste your time engaging in any behaviours or activities that won't get you closer to them.

Create Abundance

The first thing you need to do is to ensure that you have abundance. By that, I don't mean an abundance of girls you are sleeping with necessarily. What I mean is you should always maintain a healthy pipeline of girls who you are talking too—of prospects, if you like.

How do you do that? Well firstly, if you haven't already done so you need to learn the rudiments of game. There are many resources available to help you with that, not least this website. Then, you need to develop an ABC attitude—always be closing. Wherever you are, at whatever time of day or night, you need to be aware of attractive women around you and ready to approach.

Keep your approaches short and sweet. In most cases your aim in each approach is to get her telephone number so you can add her on WhatsApp, or failing that her Facebook details.

Once you have her contact information then she is in the 'funnel' with the other girls you are working on. It is at this point that 'text game' becomes key—again, there are plenty of resources available out there to get you started.

Be Ruthless

When you start getting girls into your pipeline your aim is to get them to meet you for an alcoholic drink. Don't attempt any other kind of date. Going for ice cream or boat rides or afternoon tea may seem cute but they won't get you laid. And in 2017 it is only by actually sleeping with a girl that you differentiate yourself slightly from all the other orbiters in her smart phone.

You need to get to sex as quickly as possible.

Any girl who prevaricates about meeting up, keeps breaking dates or who attempts to friendzone you must be deleted and blocked from your phone immediately. If she's coy about coming out on the date then she's playing the market, as simple as that. Next her. If she tries to put you in the 'friends' box then remember that you have no time or appetite and next her. If she flakes on you or cancels a date at the last minute then next her. Next her even if she is super hot, a model, gives amazing blow jobs or comes from an amazingly wealthy family or whatever.

Remember: poor female behaviour should be punished and in any case, you are a high-value man who goes for what he wants and doesn't have time for games.

In Summary

When any marketplace suffers from a contraction the only option for those suffering is to double down, focus exclusively on their targets, pitch relentlessly and avoid any silliness or time-wasting. With the sexual marketplace in the state that it is right now, this is doubly true for those man hoping for a fulfilling sexual and romantic life in 2017.

5 Ways Our Modern World Is A Pale Simulation Of The Past

January 25, 2017 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

When I was living in Kiev, Ukraine, I was spending a lot of time at business lunch. Essentially, it was a 3-5 course lunch time meal that restaurants in Kiev would do to entice people to come in and eat. Those 3-5 courses would usually cost about $3-$7 when it was all said in done. The most expensive restaurant in the city offered it for $6. Juice, bread, salad or soup, and a main course. It was a killer deal. My friends and I would go to one of these restaurants Monday through Friday, every day.

One of the major topics that always came up was the way that so many things in our modern world are simulated. Things that used to be typical in older times are now existent in our current culture, in a sort of fantasy. To me, there were five things that now exist in the world that basically simulate what people in the past used to do.

When we weren't talking about how to handle Ukrainian women and the state of our dating lives, we had a lot of time to talk about life, how things have evolved in the last few years, and to bring these points into a more concise view of the world and how they have directly impacted modern day men. They deserve as much credit as I do for this post.

In short, these things all result in lower testosterone, depression, and a multitude of other symptoms that all can be traced back to what we'd consider to be the problems of modern society. These problems aren't just pertinent to men, however.

1. Sports Replacing War

Gladiators used to fight in the Roman Coliseum for sport. These days, it's simulated with things like football. "Violence and blood," so to speak. Now, don't get me wrong–if you're active and participating in sports, it's great. But it's a substitute for literally going to war and killing off other tribes. Perhaps this is the one simulation on the list that isn't a bad thing, on paper. Everybody should lead active and healthy lives. But then you look around and realize that many men are simply being spectators to sport.

Spending twelve hours on Sunday watching the NFL as a fan. It's scary that the games kick off at 1pm EST and end at nearly midnight, if you watch the late game. Major League Baseball has 162 games in their season. I know that quite a few guys out there watch all 162 games of their respective teams.

It's a simulation of replacing the long lost battles fought against other tribes. Instead, your "tribe" paints colors and logos on your face and goes to "war" with the other team's fans. I don't think you need to cut out sports (watching), and definitely don't think they are 100% poison. Everybody needs a way to unplug once in a while. It's not the worst vice you could have.

However, you must cut it down to manageable bits each week. Watch your favorite team's football game. And when it's done, it's done. Don't let it affect your mood for the rest of the week (or even day).

2. Porn, Dolls, and Virtual Reality, Replacing Sex

Everybody by now knows that porn is really, really bad for you. But people aren't stopping their use of it.

Many men in Asian countries have all but thrown in the towel on having any sort of love life. They would rather use porn and blow-up dolls that simulate sex—pretty damn close to the real thing, I hear. Western men would rather stay home and jerk off to increasingly-disturbing levels of porn rather than travel abroad to remote places to meet Serbian women or Colombian girls. Hell, with the advancement of technology, blow-up dolls may be far more skilled at giving head than real girls in the not-so-distant future. Looking at the doll in the photo above is scary. You can tell she's fake if you look closely, but from afar, I could be fooled.

With men, it's all about the end release when it comes to sex. Women use porn (or at least say they do) at a less drastic rate. They also don't seem to have quite the addiction to it. That's because for women, the sex is all about the journey through it. It doesn't matter if they have an orgasm. When you can simulate sex and still get the end release, it's an effective simulation as opposed to the real thing—which isn't that hard to get.

3. Pets Replacing Children

Dogs are a man's best friend, but the way some people treat their pets is utterly pathetic. In a world where people are repeatedly being told now to have children (or to put it off in the case of women), they are finding other way's to simulate raising children.

The entire biological point of our existence is to pass on our genetics. And yet people are being told that they really shouldn't. Instead, they get dogs that fit into purses. And the sad part is that then those people become so reliant on the dogs that it's the humans that need the dogs just so they can muster the courage to get on an airplane.

It's disturbingly easy to get an emotional support animal these days.

4. Video Games Replacing Achievement

I've suffered from video game addiction myself. It's a real thing. And I know exactly what achievement porn is. Video games suck you in now and don't let you out. As men, we do work to achieve stuff. We get good feelings and a sense of accomplishment from it.

Video games take it up a level by adding fantasy to those achievements. Even though you're pouring hours and hours into something pointless, you feel good because it's accomplishment. It's a false sense of working hard. The sad thing is, if you took those ten hours playing video games (a day) for achievement porn, and spent just three of them on building a business–you'd have a hell of a lot to show.

5. Food Replacing Pleasure

Food is a way to numb the pain for a lot of people. It's a distraction from the day to day life of the office grind. You could throw alcohol into this discussion, too.

People are so disconnected from each other on a personal level, that's it's more comfortable to eat food instead of confiding in your friends and peers. Combine this with the sedentary lifestyle of the 9-5 grind, television (see #1), and it's a recipe for disaster. It all goes full circle.

You're now addicted and dependent on food for numbing pain. You have a "tribe" which just makes you sit on the couch more and more. You have a pet that replaces offspring, and a doll that replaces a lover.

That's the life of simulation. And the worst thing? Most will never even realize what they're doing. It's time to wake up.

Go Hardcore And Cut Weight Like A Man

January 25, 2017 | by Max Panzer | Link | Original Link

Here we go gentlemen. If you've finally decided it's time to burn off that extra weight and get back to your glorious and lean former self, then buckle up. You are going to come out of the gate hard, never look back and set the tone for the rest of your life. In a few short months you will transform your physique and develop the habits to excel as an elite physical specimen.

It's time to go hardcore and cut weight like a man.

Go Badass

The first step is to cut out all alcohol, sugar and wheat. This will keep things simple and eliminate a huge swath of empty and harmful calories. It will also set the proper discipline for the rest of your life. After six months of eating as a man should you will have the energy to go full throttle all day, every day.

If you did nothing else but remove these three items from your diet you'd be well on your way to success. If you stay away from processed foods as well, all that remains are choices which will lead to fewer calories consumed as a natural course of action—more on that later.

Alcohol

Let's start with alcohol. This is a tough one, but necessary if you're going to go all out. At first you will make it an absolute because you've made a hardcore decision the weight is going to come off. Calories will be limited and they will need to sustain you through a transition from eating your fill at every meal, to eating at a caloric deficit until you reach your shredded prime. This new habit will be greatly aided by consuming quality sustenance and by maintaining a clear and focused mind.

Do yourself a favor and man up by quitting alcohol while you cut. Later, when you've reached your goal, you can reassess the limited consumption for relaxation and recreation.

In fact, let's take it to another level and limit your beverages to black coffee and water. You will drink black coffee for pleasure and water to stay hydrated. Both are calorie free and in line with your new clear and focused resolve.

Water and Coffee Only

Sugar And Wheat

Next are sugar and wheat. These two items, especially wheat, are responsible for the cultural surge in weight and diabetes here in the United States. They both have the same effect on your metabolism, but wheat is the stealth killer of the two.

Refined sugar from sweets and beverages is an obvious source of empty and wasteful calories. No problem, you've made a man's decision and will also make them an absolute no go until you get to where you need to be. Then like alcohol, and once the shallow habit is broken, the occasional indulgence will be allowed after you reach your goal.

Now on to the underlying cause of weight gain in the American diet.

Despite the rampant promotion of whole grains as a replacement for cholesterol and fat by the U.S. government and medical establishment since 1985, wheat has basically the same effect inside your body as refined sugar. Not coincidentally, the year 1985 marks the beginning of the rapid upward climb in body weight and diabetes here in the United States. Culturally, we are now a nation where wheat based products are pervasive and dominate our diet.

Glucose And Insulin

Both refined sugar and wheat are converted into glucose or blood sugar once digested. In fact, the glycemic index (blood sugar or glucose level) of whole wheat bread is higher than that of table sugar once metabolized. Imagine that, whole wheat bread is worse for you in some ways than table sugar and yet remains the darling of the U.S. federal government and other health advocates.

Each of these sources of bloodstream glucose results in a surge of insulin. This is a metabolic response to remove and convert them to stored fat. Unlike with protein, fat and more complex carbohydrates, this rapid glucose-insulin cycle will lead to hunger again in about 2 hours. Thus, emerges the need for between meals snacking, the resultant storage of more fat and another round of sugar high and then sugar low.

This is the crux of the obesity problem in western society. Break away from the slothful masses and remove sugar and wheat from your diet. Each meal will sustain you longer and as a natural consequence you will consume less.

Focus on Meat and Vegetables

Eat Paleo Plus

What to eat then you ask? Eat as we have as a species for 99.5% of our existence. Basically that means to eat Paleo or as we did as hunter-gatherers.

It is only in the past few thousand years that humans converted to an agricultural existence and radically changed our evolutionary diet. Eat Paleo and you will avoid the modern repeated glucose-insulin cycle and end up consuming the macro and micro nutrients we have evolved best to thrive on.

Today this means eating chicken, beef, fish, eggs, vegetables, tubers (root based food), nuts and berries. To these I would add dairy and rice which are not strictly Paleo, but will allow for an additional variety in a family setting. Keep the consumption of rice and non-berry fruit to a minimum to avoid their simple carbohydrate content.

Eat At A 25% Dynamic Deficit

Now that you know what to avoid and what is best to eat, you will consume at a 25% deficit below your breakeven caloric number. This is the daily total at which you will maintain your weight.

A good rule of thumb is to multiply your current weight in pounds by 14 or 15. For example, if you weigh 200lbs your breakeven number would be between 2800 and 3000 calories. Your actual number will vary based on metabolism and activity level. My advice is to be conservative and use the lower of the two. Thus, for a 200 pound man a 25% deficit would mean a daily budget of 2100 calories.

Also structure your diet so that you shoot for 1 gram of protein per pound of body weight. In other words, make the basis of your diet meat, eggs and vegetables. These meals will provide the foundation for your new muscular and explosive frame, as well as keep you full as you lose the weight. Find a smartphone application such as MyFitnessPal to track your daily consumption.

And finally, as the pounds burn off keep the pressure on your metabolism and maintain the 25% deficit. In other words, keep dropping your daily caloric number. Get the job done.

Get Serious and Reap the Benefits

Lifting And High Intensity Training

I did say go hardcore and cut weight like a man, right? You want to lose weight, add muscle mass and then pursue an elite physical excellence from there. We don’t want you to end up losing a bunch of weight just to end up skinny soft and then put it all back on again.

Our metabolism has evolved to slow down as we lose weight. This is a survival mechanism to prevent starvation. As a result, your breakeven number will drop and eventually lead to rapid weight gain once consumption returns to normal. Sound familiar?

The answer to this metabolic adaptation is lifting weights and High Intensity Interval Training (HIIT). Both will raise testosterone levels, add muscle mass and increase your Basal Metabolic Rate (BMR).

The body's BMR is responsible for the vast majority of calories burned on a daily basis. It is the minimum amount of caloric energy necessary for your body to function at rest.

Adding muscle mass and putting your body under stress through resistance training and some form of HIIT (such as sprints or 2 minute rounds on the heavy bag) will raise your BMR. It will counteract the metabolic slowdown from losing weight.

Work Up a Sweat Every Other Day

Take Control

There you have it gentlemen. Cut out all alcohol, sugar and wheat. Eat meat and vegetables at a 25% caloric deficit. Limit beverages to black coffee and water. Lift weights and do sprints.

If you are serious about losing weight and pursuing a jaw dropping physical transformation you have your answer. In six months you can be a new man if you choose to do so. Make a man's decision, go hardcore and become a Force of Nature.

Three Immigrants Allegedly Broadcast Their Rape Of A Swedish Girl Live On Facebook

January 26, 2017 | by Jean-Batave Poqueliche | Link | Original Link

Earlier this week, 3 Middle-Eastern looking men were arrested in Uppsala, Sweden, for allegedly gang-raping a woman while streaming it live on Facebook.

Several witnesses reported that the perpetrators were wielding a handgun in the video. It is yet to be determined if it was used to intimidate the victim. The event was only interrupted when the police showed up on the scene, three hours after the beginning of the broadcast.

Conventional media obviously tries to (poorly) blur faces and hide that they are non-Swedes. When they wrote about it at all.

A crime for all to see

Far from regretting what they just did, the attackers, with beaming smiles and laughing out loud, proudly showed pictures they took on their mobile phones whilst penetrating the victim. I will not display them here but the images are already online.

The main suspect with glasses is known by the Swedish Police for various crimes and condemnations. Colour me shocked.

Even if the police is about to knock on the door and the victim wakes up and calls for help on her phone, he is more focused on fixing his hair and mocking her while showing her face for the entire world to see. I can guarantee that he will be high-fived by his Saracen buddies behind bars, before being shortly released “coz Swiden is racis”.

A recurrent pattern

It echoes other rape affairs that took place in Sweden recently. Swedish Police is investigating cases where children were raped in broad daylight (I am convinced that the perpetrators are Uruguayan Adventists).

Last March in Malmö, a pack of Muslims abducted a young Swedish girl before sequestrating her in the basement of a hookah bar and gang raping her for hours while recording the scene.

Contrary to feminist beliefs, the only actual rape culture is found among Muslims. What is relatively recent, is their will to record the rape, to show it and share it. The goal is sticking it in our faces, to demonstrate that the laws of the colonised country do not apply to them and they can do as they please, by specifically defiling a white girl.

The image is stronger than the hearsay. Through the physical image of the rape they commit, they have a higher impact, trying to demoralise natives that can't act even if they want to take revenge, hence gaining a psychological advantage.

It is a will to show conquest over humans, sending the message that they already conquered us as law enforcement and the common people are banned from making them pay for their crimes.

Feminists have nothing to say to this

The ROK 2016 meetup created global outrage worldwide, after cherry picking sentences in a satire and spinning it into a rape manual, managing to create governmental response and mobilise police forces to arrest us on sight.

This actual gang rape did not provoke any reaction from the main feminist shills like the Daily Beast, Buzzfeed or feminist stables like Jezebel or EverydayFeminism.

Big sweet nothing. Why? Because Muslims and migrants are a protected caste. And the fact that modern feminists have no interest in the actual protection or advancement of women.

When you see that millions of unfuckable fatties and anaemic antifas have nothing better to do with their time than autistic screeching and destroying state and private property, triggered that the 45th President was one day surprised using locker room talk and that they zip it when actual rapes take place, there is a deep problem.

They don't speak about the Cologne rapes or the German girl that was strangled and raped by a Afghan migrant in Germany before her father collected money for the refugees AT HER FUNERAL.

Muslims are the sacred cow of the Leftist suicidal cult.

Why Sweden and not a country like Serbia?

Russia dealing with illegal immigration

For three reasons:

- The migrant crisis is controlled and natives' interests put first
- Natives are given the means to defend themselves
- Muslims know that they will be harmed by locals if they try to rape anyone

The key factors are here: less Muslims and men that are willing to defend themselves. In the Swedish (and Western European) context, there are obvious signs that Muslim invaders test the limit of their bravado and the inaction of the natives by checking how far they can push the buttons.

On lui donne le doigt et il vous prend le bras

The “Sweden, Yes!” joke is cruel but it might shame Swedes into doing something. Will it stop or keep happening daily? This question is perfectly summed up by this observation from an ethnic Swede (source: http://genusdebatten.se/vansinne-22-dokumentaren-om-de-sociala-rattvisekrigarna/ translation: RickF)

> “The violent phase has been initiated. He who is aggressive tests, again and again, the possibility for dominance. If he who has the position of authority cannot, will not or is unable to understand that this happens, he becomes whipped – that goes for us humans as well as for dogs.
> When response finally comes in the purpose of recreating the former position it will be viewed as unfair since it has taken so long, which also often means that he who tries to re-establish dominance settles for doing a half-assed job.
> This provokes an even stronger violent response from the challenger and puts the defendant in a moral check mate if he has surrendered political stances as his conceptual ground – which we have done in Sweden. We have, seen as a whole, forgotten that victory counts, not how it is achieved. Or put in a way of a sportsman: all scores count.

The Movie “Passengers” Pissed Off Feminists Despite Coming Up Short On Red Pills

January 26, 2017 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Having recently watched Passengers I have to agree with the reviews, its simply not the best movie. Passengers is a film that almost – almost deals with some very fundamental ideas about humans, sex and our relationships with each other. Unfortunately, these ideas are barely touched on, and I have a strong suspicion as to the reasons why.

The basic premise (spoilers) is that Jim (Chris Pratt) wakes up 90 years early on a 120 year space voyage to another planet due to an on-board malfunction. Everyone else remains in hibernation. Due to various circumstances (which make little sense, but we’ll go with it) he can’t go back to sleep or awaken a member of the crew to help him (being sealed off in a separate compartment behind a huge door).

He is surrounded by every luxury, but with no one to talk to (except various AIs with a Siri-like level of intelligence). He eventually works out the only thing he can really do is awaken any of the other passengers. He finally picks Aurora (Jennifer Lawrence) mostly because, lets face it, she’s hot and he wants to bone her. After a year and 3 weeks of this “Castaway” routine he finally wakes her up.

Initially, he doesn't tell her, and she has to assume her pod malfunctioned as well. She comes to accept her essential death sentence and after a while the two of them have a bit of a space romance and become lovers. Mostly because they're two very attractive people, I can believe this part.

Eventually, of course, Aurora figures it all out (the robot bartender lets it slip). Predictably, things turn cold instantly. There's a few scenes of shouting, her avoiding him, him apologizing. She alternates between ignoring him and physically attacking him (again, quite believable). Later on a whole bunch of stupid stuff happens, culminating in the two of them having to single-handily fix the ship's fusion reactor.

A heartwarming moment occurs at the end, when they finally figure out a way (not possible earlier) to put only one of them to sleep. Jim nobly offers it to Aurora, but she declines and we fast-forward to a final scene where the other crew and passengers wake up 88 years later and see a nice garden growing in the main lobby, implying the two of them lived their whole lives on the ship, got old and died there.

While I will give credit to the film design (the Avalon is a cool-looking starship) the film could have been infinitely more dramatic. The plot is dull. There are no real surprises and it has all the character depth of the Star Wars prequels.

Should Jim have woken Aurora up?

This question is at the heart of the film. It is almost a spiritual sequel to Castaway. What if you were Tom Hanks on the island but you could actually wish for someone to join you there, though presumably for life and with no chance of escaping?

This concept has actually been explored in mythology before—there is the story of Hades (Greek god of the underworld) kidnapping Zeus's daughter Persephone and forcing her to live with him in the underworld as his wife. Some reviews have referenced Stockholm Syndrome as well, but I think the dumbest ones are those which have the gall to say the film "encourages a sense of male entitlement." How dare a man actually do what he wants!

As for Jim's dilemma, if we're going to write up a list of pros and cons there's really just one major reason in favor – because it will benefit him and make him happy and less lonely. This is true of all selfish actions. Very simple.

I'd say there are three reasons against:

- You may be punished later on
- It will negatively affect others
- You may have an internal emotional struggle and regret it regardless

I think the film's strength is that it effectively removes the first reason. It not only makes the choice for Jim very clear-cut in giving him the opportunity to do something nakedly selfish, but by removing the main argument against it – that of some sort of higher authority preventing him. He's not just without company on the spaceship – he's without laws. There's no one there to deter or punish him. This leaves just the other two reasons.

- It will negatively affect others

Many people will say this is a reason in and of itself, but my response is, so what? Bad things happen to other people all the time. Several thousand Africans probably died of poverty and disease yesterday, yet today I didn't see anyone in the street shedding any tears.

Here is where you have dumb feminists saying Jim has a "sense of male entitlement." But what's inherently wrong with 'wanting' something? Isn't everything driven by wants? The whole global economy is based on people wanting things, up to an including intimacy with others.

No, there's only one real reason left.

- You may have an internal emotional struggle and regret it regardless

This is the real reason, and its something so simple yet I think society has forgotten it. We don't care about others just for the sake of it – we care about them because of the way they make us feel.

I like chocolate because it tastes good. That's really all there is to it. You can't separate the way you care about something or someone from their function towards you. An emotional attachment has to be earned, not assumed.

This is a very simple concept and yet something that modern feminism and social justice seems to have thrown out the window. To care about others, to treat them as anything more than a random bunch of atoms, there must be a reason.

Not caring about something is the default setting. They have it completely the wrong way around. This is at the heart of the modern left's faults, and Hollywood reflects this.

Quite simply – If I'm on a spaceship with Jessica Valenti, wearing her "I bathe in male tears" T-shirt and there's only one escape pod left, why should I give it to her? Cry me a river about male entitlement then.

Yet these people expect kindness to be automatic. That I should automatically care about starving Africans or Muslim refugees or a battered housewife simply because these things are inherently sympathetic. They've taught people, especially young women, that they "don't owe men a thing" and should proceed to act completely selfishly, then decide to criticize this movie about a man acting selfishly.

What the hell does Jim owe Aurora, or anyone else?

No – there is no objective sympathy, only subjective. If I know the Muslim refugee or battered housewife personally, we might be in business, but only then.

Exploring our connections with other people

Tugging on heartstrings: lesson 1

This is the whole meaning behind the concept of ‘love’. Love is an emotional connection so intense that you would literally rather die than stop being with someone. Love is when you would give your life for another person (or even an animal or object). If you have a partner, but probably wouldn’t sacrifice yourself for her, you’re probably just in ‘lust’ not ‘love’. I also think this tells a lie to the whole ‘love at first sight’ thing. No, you’re just in ‘lust at first sight’ – far more common.

This is why modern, non-traditional relationships so often don’t work. A woman might still offer sex, but what else? Where is the emotional attachment between a modern couple that would compel one member to actually sacrifice themselves for the other? Why would I shove Jessica Valenti aside and take the escape pod, yet if it was a quality women – beautiful, empathetic, dutiful, one who’s actually worked to gain my love over an extended period of time, I would probably just nod and say, with no hesitation, ‘take it honey, you know I couldn’t live without you…’

The whole question as to whether you’d wake someone up or not, if you’re in Jim’s shoes, is how emotionally attached you feel to another person or other people. The film could have been a lot more interesting if it slowly stripped away Jim’s sense of morality (that which modern society has imposed upon him so that he’s a better slave) and exposed him, a typical average Joe, for the selfish creatures we humans really are.

Passengers should have been a red pill film

Imagine that Jim wakes Aurora up. She later finds out and refuses to talk to him. At this point he decides “fuck it,” throws her out the airlock, and picks another women to be his Eve instead. This could repeat several times. It could have been a real “descent into darkness” thing. I’ll call this the red pill ending. In fact, the film would have been so much more interesting if it headed in the direction of Pandorum.

Pandorum – like Passengers but actually interesting

This is at the heart of why the movie is so awful and just plain dull – they simply can't do this. Instead they have to give the blue pill "guy continues to act selflessly for absolutely no reason" ending.

In Jim's situation – stripped of all human contact, all laws, and all responsibilities, the real answer is very likely that we will be stripped down to the very selfish creatures we all know we are deep down. This is why cannibalism is not uncommon in survival situations, as our desperate bodily needs overcome whatever shallow sense of morality our logical minds have previously seen fit to believe. Here its loneliness rather than food, but its the same principle.

Jim is an emotional cannibal, who, after thinking over the issues at length, I really can't bring myself to criticize. We're not machines, we're not the emotionless robot barkeep. As social animals, we need intimacy like we need food. Society insists on ignoring this realty, like how they ignore the connection where around 75% of suicides are connected to a breakup. Does a women (or anyone for that matter) 'murder' a man by repeatedly ignoring him and mistreating him emotionally?

Yes, I think it is perfectly possible.

Hollywood however, simply cannot bring itself to embrace this conclusion. Instead it dances around it for two hours before events somehow work out and Jim and Aurora come to live happily ever after.

Passengers is a perfect example of political correctness ruining films. Any story that deeply explores human nature is probably going to have to conclude that we are fundamentally selfish creatures. Selfishness is at the root of morality. Its the first building block, the cornerstone around which everything else lies. Its not 'how do you justify selfishness' but 'how do you justify not being selfish?

So of course Passengers sucked. On the big screen, people just aren't allowed to be people anymore.

Is The Managerial State Our Enemy?

January 26, 2017 | by André du Pôle | Link | Original Link

A lot of red-pilling has been going on last years. Among normies, of course, as Trump's victory and the Brexit showed, but also among the Right in the wide sense, especially concerning economics.

Many of us have been libertarians at one point. We were looking for an alternative to the ubiquitous Leftism, without straying too far from what we could explicitly stand for in a so-called polite society. Libertarianism showed up quite naturally. We were—and still are—oppressed by political correctness, burdened by excessive taxes and paperwork when starting new ventures: libertarianism promised us free speech, freedom to work, and no more burdening nanny State. To Americans, libertarianism also tends to mingle with the pioneers, that is, undoubtedly masculine men who could deal with the harshest situations and built a bright civilization on their own.

But then something happened. Some of us noticed that, in a free market, cunning and wealthy businessmen can swallow other companies, thus creating monopolies and gauging consumers through artificially inflated prices. Some noted that workers who accept a lower standard of living than others will bring their peers' standards down through a tougher competition. Some pointed out that libertarianism is ultimately inefficient against Leftists, who can use their own classical liberal "rights" as a basis for their destructive efforts whereas negating ours, and against wealthy people or companies who fund Leftism.

Among us, specifically, it has been noted that the sexual marketplace has become more deregulated and that women sell themselves to the highest bidder at the expense of most men.

As to contribute to this brainstorming on economics, which sometimes gives truly brilliant results, I would like to dwell on something we know but often gloss over: the managerial

State. Its advent in the US has coincided with blue, then most white collars getting screwed. Yet, a managerial State does not necessarily offshore employments, screw the middle classes and fund sluts.

Capitalism, Socialism, and the managerial State

James Burnham

The first well-articulated description of the managerial State can be found in James Burnham's The Managerial Revolution (1941). According to him, this kind of State—we'd call it "technocracy" in today's language—is substantially different from both classical capitalism and socialism.

Capitalism means that capital property allows one to make money out of those who, having no such capital, need to sell their labor power to survive. Private property, as classical liberals theorized it, supports the idea that owning a factory or a company allows for reaping all its results—the payment of wages coming second and being subordinated, not to what one produces or merit, but to contracts and the owners' goodwill.

Socialism sprang up in part as a reaction to the difficult condition of proletarian factory workers. Against the power of capital ownership, socialism stood up for the end of social classes, the sharing of work products, and an extended parliamentarianism allowing "the people" to have a voice in public debates. (I am just mentioning what socialism purported to defend in theory, not what actual socialists, or rather Marxists, did.)

By contrast, managerialism can actually arise from both. A manager can be a top dog in the corporate world, making millions out of his ability to coordinate the production of various departments, just as he can use the same methods as a civil servant. Right after the management sciences were born in the US, they have been eagerly imitated by the Bolsheviks—and Western bankers enthusiastically funded Soviet industry.

The efforts of these wealthy capitalists resulted in concentrating more and more power in their hands. From these heights, they felt the need to manage their power efficiently—thus feeling the same as Soviet plan commissioners. In the US, most of the economy has been absorbed by the corporate and banking behemoths, which makes very difficult to succeed as an independent: that absorption is equivalent to the USSR collectivization in that both rip small-scale independent properties from the hands of middle classes and put them under the sway of managers. Big State and Big Corp are run by like-minded men. Needless to add, defending one against the other is rather pointless.

If there is a struggle, it isn't between capitalism and socialism, but between those who want a strong middle class—be it thanks to efficient trade unions or through the existence of a class of small independent producers, willing to stand for their prerogatives—and those who want to dissolve the middle class—either through open Statism or by turning previously independent producers or protected workers into precarious part-timers.

Burnham stressed how globalism would reflect the interests of the rising manager class. Managers perceive sovereignty, organic economy and institutions such as the family as impediments to their power. They would, thus, be naturally inclined towards the destruction of nations and institutions. Individuals ought to become more malleable to fit into the board of directors' plans.

The managers' Achilles heel

Sam Francis, one of Richard Spencer's mentors, saw how the rise of feminism and "diversity" fit in the manager's agenda:

> [T]he managerial elite has a proclivity toward as well as a material interest in adopting and promoting ideologies of universalism, egalitarianism, cultural relativism, behaviorism, and "blank slate" environmental determinism… The ideological reconstruction of American society to suit the needs and interests of the emerging managerial class thus involved a repudiation of the older values, > codes, and belief-systems of the old elite and a cultural conflict with those who continued to adhere to them.

Managers feel no loyalty towards their ethnic cousins, families or nations. When confronted with the consequences of their politics, comfy bureaucrats defend themselves with the so-called unavailability of "globalization", which is a convenient excuse to keep pushing their class interest at the expense of most people. We are dispossessed because the Leftist establishment—managers and their "minority" pets—sucked up or destroyed what was rightfully ours.

Managers prosper through the hypertrophy of both public and financial sectors. HR are impeding the workers' production, but managers won't care, because they aim rather at control than wealth. As to the financial sector, remind that it does not directly produce any wealth but is essentially slave-racketeering as Samseau puts it. Financiers merely move money around for usury, low-wage work, and keeping the majority indebted.

Fortunately, the system is far from flawlessness. The most important flaw, I think, is that no matter the coldness and efficiency they try to project, managers are still human beings.

Take the Ivy League students for example. Outwards, they are winners, likely promised to brilliant careers in the Hollow Empire. Inwards, however, things are quite different. As a former Yale professor testified:

> I have witnessed in many of my own students and heard from the hundreds of young people whom I have spoken with on campuses or who have written to me over the last few years…
> Look beneath the façade of seamless well-adjustment, and what you often find are toxic levels of fear, anxiety, and depression, of emptiness and aimlessness and isolation. A large-scale survey of college freshmen recently found that self-reports of emotional well-being have fallen to their lowest level in the study's 25-year history.
> So extreme are the admission standards now that kids who manage to get into elite colleges have, by definition, never experienced anything but success. The prospect of not being successful terrifies them, disorients them. The cost of falling short, even temporarily, becomes not merely practical, but existential.

Having turned the social world into a pool of hapless, atomized, malleable individuals, managers got a taste of their own medicine: they are together alone, no one being loyal to anyone else beyond fleeting interests—that always end up creating new rivalries.

> [The managerial class] is increasingly defined by neuroticism, insecurity, petty status competition, and a lack of intellectual foresight. In other words, the managerial class is composed of high-performing drones who are constantly fretting about losing their coveted positions and work even harder for the system that keeps them ensnared. (Source)

Aldous Huxley's Brave New World envisioned a world where children would be growing up in incubators and taken care of by public institutions. We are already there. More and more children are born through surrogacy so that rich gay couples can play doll with them, and most children are "educated" by TV and a dumbed-down school system. Does this system produce happy people? The answer is a resounding no—even among managers.

Aside from those who kept the sense of family, managers have no other safety net than money. Aging, childless female careerists start chasing young men, and no matter how socially successful they may sometimes be, they will never be happy, as they failed to fulfill their true destiny.

All this is good news. The gap between managerial State logic and what managers as human beings need—kinship, thick social relationships, family—means that such an unnatural condition cannot last forever. The System cannot give more to its atomized managers than money, empty fashions and deep solitude. Thus, individual managers who discover the root of their perpetual dissatisfaction and existential distress may start leaning on our side.

> And you, my little girl, constantly switching partners
> When you're doing something foolish, your salvation is abortion
> But some mornings you just wake up crying
> After you dreamt all night of a big table surrounded with children

Is the managerial State always an enemy?

"Throw it in the fire!"
"No Sam. The ring is mine."

But wait a minute. So far I talked about the managerial State as an enemy. I had to, because its rising in the US and everywhere after 1945 impacted badly on most of us. Yet it isn't necessarily so. In fact, a managerial State can aim at defending its own people, the nation's culture, or the family and traditional sex roles.

How does Trump repatriate jobs? He negotiates with big companies, along with a favourable power balance, so that they close their offshore sweatshops and run anew American factories. This isn't capitalism, since capitalism in the strict sense forbids such interventionist policies. This isn't socialism either since it has nothing to do with more parliamentarism or destroying social classes. Rather, Trump's policy is a managerialism that aims at protecting American citizens.

A managerial State ran by GloboCorp, Jews and pathological individuals such as family-hating lesbians is an enemy. It will aim at stripping us from our jobs, our autonomy, our ability to create and sustain families. But what about a managerial State ran by vastly different individuals, that aim at protecting the majority, the family, and at dismantling cultural Marxism?

On the one hand, a new managerialism is both possible and necessary. In the aftermath of Trump's election, red-pilled men should join the new administration, create formal or informal power networks, reconquer bulwarks and dismantle the Leftist establishment. Of course, such managers should be loyal to masculinity, to their kin, to the values most of us already share. Perhaps, in the long run, they should aim to grow anew an organic economy, even if this curtails their own power as managers.

This is much easier said than done. Remember how the Lord of the Rings ends? When Frodo reaches the top of Mount Doom, right upwards a stream of the only lava that can destroy the maleficent ring, he backs down. Sam urges him to throw the ring into the lava. Frodo should. He accepted this as his mission, and he went through an incredibly arduous journey to do so. But even then, the power corrupts, and Frodo tries to keep it before Gollum providentially causes its fall.

Wouldn't "our" managers be too tempted to identify as a class, with separate interests, and turn against us later?

We need, undoubtedly, to push red-pilled men in positions of power. The question of their loyalty is at best a future issue. Still, I think it is worth keeping on the back of our heads, especially since some on the Alt-Lite have already succumbed to the temptation.

How To Optimize Your Personality

January 27, 2017 | by William Adams | Link | Original Link

A fascinating aspect of personality is that it is partly essential, partly malleable. According to The Handbook of Developmental Psychology, most personality traits are about 40-60% inherited; hence about half is changeable. According to distinguished psychologists such as Robert Plomin, the genetic predisposition for intelligence and personality tend to be more dominant later in life, and there are complex gene-environment interactions that are difficult to disentangle the causal relationship of. It does not make things easier and more reliable that studies in psychology are seldom replicated: one study cannot confirm the next one. Therefore one should be sceptical about the general scientific reliability of psychology, although behavior genetics seems more accurate than for instance social psychology.

Regardless of how things exactly are in the real world, it will still leave a person with about 30-50% malleability during a large part of his life, which implies the possibility for active and constructive decisions. The most fundamental years when a man has the most developmental agency (ability to change his way of being and behaving) in life are roughly between 18-45. For that reason, anyone who aims for self-improvement and lifestyle optimization would ignore the malleable elements of oneself at his own risk. Therefore I intend to describe how a person can optimize his personality. It is more about to raise self-awareness and teach some fruitful concepts than to give concrete advices.

I will mainly focus on the so-called Big Five Personality Traits and the Dark Triad (Machiavellianism, narcissism and psychopathy), since these eight dimensions cover most aspects that are relevant for this audience.

Hopefully the analysis can offer some guidance with regard to personal development and some of the challenges that men might face during modern existence. To be ”the best version of yourself” is so much more than to get laid and to optimally handle disposable income. It might even save your own life.

The Big Five

In 1884 Sir Francis Galton hypothesized that there might be an underlying taxonomy for personality traits. During the 20th century, this field of research has been developed by for instance Hans Eysenck, and Paul Costa and Robert McCrae.

The Big Five Personality Factors include openness to experience, conscientiousness, agreeableness, extraversion and neuroticism, often abbreviated as OCEAN. I will list some of the pros and cons with each Big Five trait and suggest a more optimal position. First, a person can take a Big Five test.

Trait	Description
Openness	Curious, original, intellectual, creative, and open to new ideas.
Conscientiousness	Organized, systematic, punctual, achievement oriented, and dependable.
Extraversion	Outgoing, talkative, sociable, and enjoys being in social situations.
Agreeableness	Affable, tolerant, sensitive, trusting, kind, and warm.
Neuroticism	Anxious, irritable, temperamental, and moody.

Openness to experience

Positive: Open to new ideas and experiences, such as books, travel and a more exciting and creative sex life.

Negative: Naive and xenophilic, and perhaps open to silly ideas such as being a white knight male feminist.

Optimal: Try to find a balance between both and which fits your particular personality profile and circumstances. Avoid the negative extremes and detrimental behavior – for the sake of both yourself and other people (xenophilia and xenophobia). Base your decisions on common sense, experiences and science, not whimsy and caprices.

Conscientiousness

Positive: Strong work ethic and general ethics in life, directly or indirectly required for both profound and spiritual development. High conscientiousness is negatively correlated with obesity.

Negative: A person can become too diligent and have a hard time to let go of even trivial stuff, or become a workaholic. At the extremes, conscientiousness overlaps neurotic behavior.

Optimal: Conscientiousness is perhaps the most important personality trait for a man since it largely correlates with success in life. Generally the more conscientious the better, but some sort of balance and distance to work and other duties have to be maintained. Otherwise it might start to overlap neurotic and irrational behavior, which can have a negative impact on your social life. Perhaps it can also lead to deterimental beta behavior such as to help women in a counterproductive fashion.

Extraversion

Positive: Extraversion, to a significant degree, is an important trait which underlies the ability to make friends and meet girls. Although a loud mouth might be overrated (quality sometimes beats quantity), social success hinges upon the ability to talk to other individuals, whether in school, at work, during a date, or in a nightclub. Overall, a large degree of extraversion is better than to be leaning towards the more introvert side.

Negative: Extraversion can prevent a person from being able to be on their own from time to time. Social interaction is indeed constructive for a variety of reasons, but to spend time alone and focus on one’s own tasks are as important if one aims to make a career or just do a decent job.

Optimal: Be aware of your own level of extraversion and try to change your behavior accordingly. Introverts may have to force themselves to be more talkative and sociable, while extrovert people may have to struggle to spend some valuable time alone.

Agreeableness

Positive: Other people tend to appreciate agreeable people more than unpleasant individuals. It almost goes without saying. Maybe that is part of the reason why women generally do have more friends than men, since they are somewhat more agreeable on average. Some degree of agreeableness is thus required to bond with other human beings, whether momentarily or more permanently.

Negative: A too agreeable person can be seen as weak and will get used by either neurotic or dark triad individuals (see below).

Optimal: Be aware of your general degree of agreeableness and adjust behavior depending on context. Sometimes fake smiles are required to survive in the workplace or at your girlfriend’s dinner party, but also to say no and not invest friendly behavior in those who do not deserve it.

Neuroticism

Positive: Most individuals have some degree of neuroticism and it might have been adaptable in our evolutionary past. Females are, on average, more neurotic than men. To feel at least slightly anxious about for instance the well-being of those who are close to us is normal human behavior.

Negative: Neuroticism is of course generally linked to various negative sensations and behaviors, and at the extreme it can lead to suicidal tendencies, neurosis and severe depression.

Optimal: A small degree of neuroticism is, of course, preferable to larger degrees. While being relatively emotionally stable, try to avoid a destructive lifestyle and people who do only appear to have a negative impact on your life. That might safeguard against a self-inflicted rise of neuroticism.

The dark triad

The dark triad consists of three at least moderately inter-related personality traits: Machiavellianism, narcissism and psychopathy. The word dark implies a set of real or potentially malevolent traits, linked to for instance social manipulation, callousness, entitlement, and risky behavior. One can take a dark triad test here.

Studies show that the dark triad traits are higher among males, but it seems that females are indoctrinated into being more dark triad-ish in current times, a phenomenon probably connected to the current degenerate Western culture and third-wave feminism and you-go-girl-ism. The typical dark triad male is generally more successful with women than more agreeable and conscientious males, at least in a short-term relationship context.

Machiavellianism

Positive: Machiavellianism, derived from the Italian political philosopher Niccolò Machiavelli's work The Prince, signifies a manipulative and calculating personality trait, often found among leaders in general, successful businessmen, and politicians. Even though some sort of talent has to be an underlying factor, Machiavellianism is generally linked to success in life. Plus it can safeguard against others that might want to use you for their own good.

Negative: This behavior is largely unvirtuous and something that perhaps should be at least partly suppressed in a healthy society.

Optimal: At least in current times, a moderate to high degree of this trait could be useful when socializing with other individuals. If not for other reasons than because it can save you from being used by others with similar tendencies.

Narcissism

Positive: A moderate to high degree of narcissism is correlated with success in life (as long as it is combined with talent and/or hard work). Plus, it is being looked upon by other people as "brighter" than Machiavellianism and psychopathy, probably due to our current largely narcissism-oriented culture.

Negative: A too large degree of narcissism (narcissistic personality disorder) can be seriously unhealthy, for both oneself and other individuals, and general narcissism can at least be annoying when frequently displayed by other individuals. Narcissists can end up alone later in life due to having burned many bridges in earlier phases. Furthermore, it can prevent a person from doing important daily tasks and to fulfill long-term goals. It is not particularly constructive to take selfies and post them on Snapchat and Instagram.

Optimal: A healthy, moderate degree of narcissism, which helps to boost confidence and self-actualization, appears to be the most optimal in the long-term perspective. It is better than both too low or too high degrees of this trait.

Psychopathy

Positive: Psychopathy, in tandem with other utilitarian traits, can lead to success in life (girls, at the job market, politics etc.) due to risk-taking and over-confidence. It is also easier to deal with the loss of other people throughout life, since a psychopathic individual do care little or nothing about fellow human beings.

Negative: Psychopathy is correlated with criminality and other forms of anti-social behavior, and few normal people think that a healthier Western culture should favor psychopaths in general.

Optimal: A small to moderate degree of psychopathy overlaps with higher confidence and calculated risk-taking. It can balance other traits such as conscientiousness and agreeableness.

Conclusion

Overall it is about to identify your own strengths and weaknesses with regard to these eight personality dimensions, in order to both know yourself better and other human beings (friends, enemies, girls, co-workers, opponents). Moreover, a utilitarian balance, adjusted for the shape of our current Western culture, has to be maintained in order to both grow and survive as a person.

American Women Are Proud To Be Failures

January 27, 2017 | by Max Roscoe | Link | Original Link

I attended one of the 673 women's marches held worldwide on Saturday, January 1st, as an observer. What I saw was a mix of vague dislike of President Trump, pro-female sexist messages, a fear of end to legal abortion, black lives matter, pro-gay messages, and a glorification of women being nasty, aggressive, and masculine.

Many signs promoted nastiness. Sadly, it was not sarcasm.

Women Are Proud of Their Shortcomings

For a straight single male, the pro-nastiness message was one of the most disturbing. Here were hordes of women, openly pledging and vowing and proudly proclaiming an unattractive, antisocial trait. I've never been to a slutwalk or fat acceptance protest, but I expect it's a similar sentiment: the feeling of revulsion at a female contorting herself to proclaim something which makes her disgusting and unattractive to you.

The "nasty" slogan comes from the final presidential debate in October, 2016, when Trump referred to Hillary Clinton as "a nasty woman." While Trump himself has been called as much or worse, you don't see male Trump supporters openly supporting the idea of being a rapist, or tax evader, or being "poor?"

No he's not.

Good men do not glorify negative or antisocial traits because we have self respect, and wish to better ourselves. Human beings, as social animals, care about what others think of them. It's one thing to give up—to say, I cannot be anything better than a fat slob who cannot cook or live a healthy life, and must rely on a make-work HR job or outright welfare. But it is entirely another to be proud of your failures. We have truly entered strange times when women are openly bragging of their negative features.

They are proud to be fat and flabby. They are proud to be slutty. They are proud to be angry. They are proud to be nasty. Bring back a man from just 50 years in the past, and he would be completely flabbergasted. Prior to a few years ago, women zealously guarded their reputation, their image, and their bodies.

Demonstrating Low Value

In the past, women were afraid of word spreading of their low value if they had too many sexual liaisons. They were afraid of aging, and used a variety of clothing, makeup, hair treatments, and push up bras to maintain the fertile image of their newly pubescent bodies. More often than not, even in the liberated west, they preserved their virginity for marriage.

But today, women not only don’t try to stress their positives, they sell you on their degeneracy and unattractiveness. Indeed, seeing women and girls of all ages proclaiming their nastiness made me seriously question wanting to live in the society this is becoming.

Self-hating cuck with shit eating grin

Birth Control

One of the universal fears held by the protestors is a change in the legality of abortion under a Trump administration. My opinion has long been agnostic: I am not a woman so I don't have an opinion one way or another about how women handle unwanted pregnancy, much as I couldn't care less what a woman thinks about what type of diet I eat, what my gym schedule is, or whether I'm manspreading. It is simply irrelevant.

For those who want to concern troll and force a woman to have a child against her will, well, you'd better be prepared to stand there monitoring her for the next 30 years, because she's not going to stop making bad choices once the child is born, and will be greatly increasing the odds that the child will be a degenerate, welfare recipient, or likely a criminal, causing real harm to honest, law abiding productive citizens, perhaps stealing their property, or raping or killing them. If you're not prepared to ensure she makes all the right choices so that doesn't happen, don't tell her to become a mother when she doesn't want to. And yeah, sure, not all single moms.

The Effects Of Abortion

On a micro level, I'm glad women have the ability to end pregnancy. There are many groups, including welfare recipients, teenagers, the unemployed, and sex workers, among others, who are, as Trump would say, "not the best and brightest." Society greatly benefits from them not reproducing. These groups also tend to have the highest rates of reproduction. Also, single women, especially those we target for engaging in ONS recreational sex, would make horrible mothers, and should be discouraged from motherhood. Unrestrained, these groups will crowd out the productive classes; this is known as the Idiocracy Effect.

Quantity vs Quality

But on a macro level, one must really question the societal changes that abortion has caused. I'm not talking about the debate of where life begins: although I would argue life begins at birth, science does not provide a definitive answer and this can be debated ad nauseam. I'm talking about the societal effects caused by legal abortion. The behavioral, social, and cultural changes that it caused.

Green=unrestricted, yellow=health/social reasons only, red=life of woman only Abortion was legalized in 1973 in America. According to the Center for Reproductive Rights, between 1950 and 1985, nearly all industrialized countries legalized abortion. Notable exceptions include Poland, Korea, Iceland, UK, and Finland, where it is legal only under certain circumstances.

Worldwide Laws Trending Towards Legalization

At first glance, some generalizations can be made. Africa and Latin America, two regions that suffer from poverty and overpopulation, seem to be demonstrating the Idiocracy effect in action (quantity over quality) while almost the entire developed world, including China, Russia, US, and most of Europe, has unrestricted abortion.

Ireland is the only first world nation outlawing abortion, and due to Northern Ireland being under the legal jurisdiction of the UK, women can freely travel to Northern Ireland for abortion. The trend is clearly for legal abortion, and it is hard to see a reversal of this trend.

Social Changes Caused by Abortion

How has the availability of abortion affected social change? Throughout most of history, women remained chaste until marriage, with some risking sex with a small numbers of partners, but fear of the stigma of pregnancy kept most from acting on their desires. One night stands were almost unheard of, because the risk so greatly outweighed the reward for the woman.

If a woman really wanted to experience sex, she would seek a husband or at the very least a committed partner where she could have the appearance of being dumped by a scorned lover, if things ended in pregnancy badly. Often women would marry shortly after reaching fertility anyway, and even up until 1980, the average age for American women to marry was 22.

American average marriage rates <22 until Abortion legalized in 1973: Coincidence?

Banging sloots is fun, but remember they have been available throughout history in every civilization. It is only in modern times where they seem to be the majority. Was this caused, in part, by legal abortion? I would argue that the mere availability and acceptance of legal abortion has created a situation where women are more likely to ride the cock carousel, even if they never obtain an abortion themselves. The fear of judgement by others is gone, which was the main thing keeping women's promiscuity in check.

Divorce and Abortion

When examining the history of divorce, we see an enormous increase in divorce which occurred in the 1970s, when abortion became legal in the US (remember, while it was legalized in all states in 1973, it was legal in some, and growing in support for several years prior). Also, keep in mind the apparent decline in divorce recently must be considered along with the fact that marriage rates are now at an all time low–many who would have married to later divorce are simply not marrying.

Again, the increase in divorces has less to do with abortion itself, rather than the culture that abortion created. When women were no longer as concerned about their self image, they began acting on their urges, as they could secretly sleep around, and if it resulted in pregnancy, whether she was married or single, she could secretly erase any evidence of her actions with an abortion.

Ronald Reagan's no fault divorce law in 1969 was also a factor, and indeed abortion was merely one part of a culture that changed how women viewed relationships, marriage, and sex.

What is important is not how many of these women actually aborted a pregnancy; but the mindset that women now had about relationships, sex, self image, and her relationship to men which changed drastically. While most women will not have an abortion in their lifetime, most women have the mindset that she should act on her emotions, that promiscuity is good, and that she can secretly act on her desires if she feels like it, without being held accountable. This is the biggest sorrow of abortion.

Weighing the Effects

As with any story, there are two sides. I believe the link between abortion and declining crime rates discussed in the book Freakonomics is causal. And the WHO has concluded legal abortion lowers the mortality rates for women, due to the removal of dangerous illegal abortions. While I don't want the welfare mom in the projects or the teenage slut living down the street to reproduce, I also lament the destruction of American morality, the loss of honor, beauty, and a healthy dating market. American women have become the worst in the world, and this is a new development over the last decade.

In the end, the best policy towards abortion is likely the same as for homosexuality.

It should not be criminalized, but it should be somewhat shameful, not openly discussed, and never glorified.

While legal abortion is only one factor in the vast societal changes of the past 50 years, it has contributed negatively to sexual relations, family, loyalty, chastity, and morality. Men made the decision to legalize abortion in an attempt to empathize with and help women. The nasty, angry, proudly unpleasant and unattractive women it has created have none of my sympathy.

Make Our Women Great Again!

In his inaugural address, Trump outlined the economic failures in America. Real wages peaked in the 1960s, and America has been on the decline ever since. The same can be said of our moral and social condition. Women are afraid of losing some of their reproductive freedoms. While a rollback of legal abortion is unlikely, whatever moves the Trump administration takes in this area, it is hard to see any outcome but improvement.

Female Scientist Says Physics Is Being Dumbed Down To Attract More Girl Students

January 28, 2017 | by David G. Brown | Link | Original Link

> One of the few things that horrified me when I arrived in Australia (in 1999) was to discover that, several years ago the high school physics curriculum was "feminized". In other words, to make it more appealing to girls, our curriculum's designers substituted formulae with essays! What a disaster…
> — Professor Michelle Simmons of the University of New South Wales (UNSW)

Quantum physicist Michelle Simmons, a dual British-Australian citizen, has decried the dumbing down of high school and university-level physics to try and attract more female students in Australia. Sadly, the huge (and very justified) support that followed Professor Simmons' comments shows how cucked academia and the educational system in general has become. It took a female academic, whose job would never be threatened by uttering such "controversial" words, unlike a male colleague, to point out how feminism has twisted the way scientific subjects are taught.

Did you think physics was about equations? How wrong you were! Thanks to a special form of gender-norming, Australian physics students have been writing essays about the history and sociology of physics. Whilst I think that the liberal arts, a pillar of Western civilization when done right, receive too much bad press, their use to serve feminist and SJW ends is atrocious enough in the social sciences, let alone the physical sciences.

But this mind-numbing state of affairs does not just concern the Land Down Under. In both Australia and across the rest of the Western world, feminists and other do-gooders have blamed gender bias for why less women pursue physics and other related sciences. For example, when large numbers of female physics students from the University of Melbourne reported how the discipline was too hard for them, Return Of Kings-hating Fairfax Media and those it interviewed blamed the girls' woes on the field's male-dominated nature and overall cultural programming. Whenever women fail, "patriarchy" is to blame, right?

When will the self-serving blame game end?

Then do it. Stop fucking complaining.

So, again, the tired-old boogeyman of so-called entrenched sexism continues to rear its ugly head every time the subject of women in STEM is raised. At England's University of Oxford, supposedly one of the most prestigious institutions in the world, only 22% of successful undergraduate applicants for physics are female and the authorities there are clearly not happy about it. So they're trying to increase the pool of undergraduates and teaching staff, all without explaining how they intend to both maintain standards and prevent male students from being discriminated against. It is fair to say that many of these women have received extra support throughout high school (and will during their time at university) purely because they vaginas. What Michelle Simmons said is merely the tip of the iceberg.

And remember, many students at Oxford and Cambridge come from the most illustrious schools and wealthiest families in the United Kingdom and beyond. Even when they compete close to as well or as well as their wealthier, privately-educated peers, poorer, state-educated students are four times less likely to be accepted by either of these universities. So why aren't hordes of rich girls managing to find their way into these physics programs? Last time I checked, rich parents have about as many daughters as they have sons and have every interest in seeing their child get into both the university and university course of their choice. Generic allegations of "sexism in STEM" are pathetic and need to be given substantial meat before they are ever entertained as serious explanations for any gender imbalance. Presently, the "evidence" for misogyny in physics has as much substance as a Madonna diatribe at a women's march.

When boys underperform in education, the blame is put squarely on their "poor" attitude and the lesser time they spend studying, despite ample evidence that the curriculum and teaching methods have been adjusted to suit girls' needs. But men are expected to take responsibility for whenever girls are not equally represented or over-represented in particular subjects. It is high time that more men in higher education pointed out this perverse blame game first. Nonetheless, it is doubtful that universities would allow males to have the basic right to call for common sense, not to mention exercise a more generalized academic freedom on really contentious issues.

The education system and the workplace are being increasingly geared towards making life easier for women at the expense of men

"Give me… one!"

The situation behind Michelle Simmons' comments are worrying, but should not surprise anyone half-clued in to the world around them. In the United States, national defense is already being diluted and sacrificed in the name of feminism, with physical standards being repeatedly lowered to accommodate more women. In addition, companies in places such as Norway and France require a minimum number of women on their boards, with no commensurate need whatsoever for these women to be even close to as qualified as their male peers. Expect many more cop-outs like this in the future, too, especially as a backlash against the rise of "misogynistic" Donald Trump.

Apparently men now oppress women by expecting them to do physics equations in physics instead of essays about feelings and feminism (these two F's really being the same thing). Whereas scientists may look at natural forces often invisible to the human eye, feminists are focused on "sexist" forces that are invisible–because they don't exist.

There’s no discrimination in physics, women are just usually not good enough.

Why You Should Not Be Afraid Of Selective Prejudice

January 29, 2017 | by Graham Seibert | Link | Original Link

Over breakfast, my son laid out his plan to kill the Russians. We should tunnel under their country and blow them up. Why does a five-year-old already hate Russians? It is a study in the way prejudices are formed.

Most people he comes in contact with here in Ukraine fear the Russians. Their military power is a threat, and after a several century history of betrayals we don't trust them. Russians look like him and speak the same language. Several of our friends are Russian. And he had no answer to the question, what if the Russians get mad and kill him first?

Who teaches prejudice?

Prejudiced against this???

In “South Pacific,” Oscar Hammerstein had Lieut. Cable deliver a line beloved of liberals: “You’ve got to be taught to hate and fear. You’ve got to be carefully taught” Not so! Nobody has taught him to hate the Russians. He deduced it himself.

Later, as we were waiting at a bus stop alongside some Gypsies. He said “Daddy, they’re dirty.” I shushed him. Though none of our Gypsies seem educated or speak English, he should develop the habit of being circumspect.

Moreover, they are not dirty. Though the women wear garish leopardskin toreador pants and a bit more jewelry than I would fancy, they seem clean. Though they have more children than it seems they could afford, they treat them well. The main issue is that they are different.

The origin of his opinions is evident. Gypsies live in condemned, unheated houses on the right of way for a planned subway. Their laundry flaps in the breeze and their children play in the dirt. Ukrainian mothers shoo their children to another part of the beach when the Gypsies come to bathe. Local convenience store owners treat them less than courteously.

What do I tell him? A five-year-old operates on simple, binary principles. People are either good or they are not. He wants a rule of thumb to apply to all Russians or all Gypsies. Life would be simpler.

Simplicity does not work

Simple-minded, and wrong. You can't abdicate thinking.

A simple approach to the question of prejudice leads to problems. Liberals blindly refuse to accept that different peoples have different characteristics. They condemn you as a racist if you mention the obvious. The core theme of Daniel Kahneman's "Thinking Fast and Slow" is that the human brain is a lazy organ. While we have the ability to think through problems, it requires a lot of time and burns a lot of calories. We are programmed to take shortcuts.

Most of the time the shortcuts don't cause problems. If we avoid all mushrooms because some of them are poisonous, will still get enough calories. If we don't give money to beggars or pick up hitchhikers we may miss some interesting experiences, but we won't be exploited or victimized.

Sometimes our shortcuts—or prejudices—hurt others. As a landlord, I would have avoided some hassle by not renting to minorities. On the other hand, it would have been unfair to judge all minorities by the behavior of some. That is what nondiscrimination laws are all about. I took my lumps when I made mistakes, and avoided further hassle by selling the rental units in dicey areas to people with stronger stomachs.

Prejudice, Discrimination, Toleration and Diversity

A study in toleration. You may not like them, but you do business.

Dictionary.com defines prejudice in this context as “an unfavorable opinion or feeling formed beforehand or without knowledge, thought, or reason.” It is a state of mind, an opinion.

Discrimination is prejudice expressed through action. Government cannot control what you think, but they can judge your actions and what you say. More than that, they may impute a state of mind—prejudice—from your actions. Liberals are quick to cry prejudice on the basis of almost anything you utter. Discriminate as a landlord against unemployed men—disproportionately minority—or dare to mention facts such as FBI statistics or PISA and SAT scores, they invariably call you a racist.

Tolerance is the old-fashioned virtue of dealing civilly with all people regardless of what you may think. Though he may have privately despised what they represented, Trump the businessman entertained Bill and Hillary Clinton. I tell my son to answer politely and enjoy the conversation when Gypsy mothers ask him how he is. They appear sincere. They like kids. Moreover, it is of no benefit to him to refuse.

Lastly, diversity is a neutral adjective describing a state of affairs. A library can have a diverse selection of books, a garden a diverse assortment of plants, or a neighborhood a diverse population. This is neither good nor bad. It is a different matter if the books are pulp fiction, the plants are weeds, or the people are criminals. To cite the most popular positive example, a diversity of nationalities ensures the epicure of a wide selection of restaurants. Other benefits of a diverse neighborhood are harder to enumerate. The question is not diversity itself, but what of what the diversity is comprised.

Cui Bono

It is in the government’s interest to minimize prejudice. It makes life easier for teachers, police and administrators. Thus they advocate “celebrating diversity.”

The individual’s interest is different. Ours is optimizing our evolutionary success. This means increasing our own odds of survival and that of having children to give us grandchildren.

Prejudice plays a role in this. Mankind has always been tribal, xenophobic, and nationalistic. It has caused great wars, which is why there is such a jihad against prejudice at the moment. We are told many times over about how prejudice against Jews led to the Holocaust. Not mentioned, because the victims are not as articulate, have been the genocides against Ukrainians by the Soviets, against Armenians by Turks, and against Palestinians by Israelis. In any case, prejudice has a bad name because it precipitated some of the great tragedies in the last century.

The vast difference the 21st century is that every advanced people in the world is having children at below the replacement level. Our technology continues to make resources available at an ever-increasing rate, and we are producing people to use them at a decreasing rate. This is a virtuous trend.

On the other hand, we do need to teach our children to mindfully protect what is theirs. The welfare state increasingly buys peace by redistributing from those who are able to produce to those who did not. It is not prejudice to see things as they are and to vote your self-interest.

Age and competence

The conceit of the diversity crowd is that they are smarter than us deplorables, and morally superior besides.

Intelligence has something to do with it. Simple people need simple rules. Two rules operative among simple peoples in today's world are Infidel=Bad and White=Bad. Among those who suppose themselves better the rule is that one must be infinitely patient and discerning before imputing motives to people who say things like "Death to Infidels" or "Kill the white pigs."

Some prejudices, such as against marijuana or gays, benefit those who harbor them. Such beliefs will help me have grandchildren. If and when my son is ready for a more nuanced view of the world, we can discuss it. While he is a child, simple will serve. It will keep him out of danger.

Deep Roots

Our Kyiv Gypsies are not bad neighbors.

Our prejudices, our fast thinking in Daniel Kahneman's terms, have a long history. They are useful. They keep us out of sketchy neighborhoods; help us avoid poor romantic partners and bad business transactions. Significantly, our prejudices protect us against other people's prejudices. If we can anticipate that people will be unfavorably disposed toward us, it is only prudent to be wary when dealing with them.

I caution my family to avoid large congregations of Gypsies in Western Europe. Ours in Kyiv are benign. Since the Ukrainians simply would not put up with it, they do not aggressively panhandle or pickpocket. Thus, prejudice serves both parties. Western Europe, conversely, is tolerant to its own detriment.

A prejudice against Russian people would not help my son. The Russian state is another matter. Their deceit has been reported by observers over the centuries, from Custine to Zinoviev. He should not endorse Ukraine's entering a deal unless it is in Russia's long term interest to honor it.

It is perfectly reasonable to be logically inconsistent. One can recognize that the influx of illegal aliens is a drain on America's resources, something that cannot be sustained. But on the other hand, African ladies are great at elder care and Hispanics for day labor for cleaning up your yard. What makes sense on a personal level might not on a societal level. Whatever the situation, a sophisticated person should have the presence of mind not to betray his prejudices when dealing with individuals.

Being carefully taught – back to Hammerstein

Today, people don't go to college to learn how to think so much as to be told how to think. This is one reason why non-college-educated "deplorables" may be better informed voters.

In any case, a parent should teach a child to recognize and examine his prejudices, but not necessarily abandon them. If they did not have a bit of substance they wouldn't exist in the first place. He can decide in time the extent to which he can relax them. Prejudice against Russians and Gypsies in Ukraine won't help my son in any meaningful way. Elsewhere it is different. For an American, accepting government teachings about prejudice can be prejudicial to your well-being. That is a good reason to be elsewhere.

5 Foods That Really Are “Super”

January 29, 2017 | by Larsen Halleck | Link | Original Link

Two weeks ago, I wrote an article in which I analyzed the so-called “superfoods” that are hocked by all the magazines. The conclusion I drew through my research was that, while none of those foods are truly harmful, and in many cases perfectly palatable, they are not any more healthy than comparable foods, and in some cases can cause harm in a non-dietary context.

Looking at the comments of that article as I usually do, I saw that several people were interested in a counterpoint article to that previous article, discussing foods that can actually be deemed “super”. So, using my two ahem superpowers of “Google searches” and “an external hard drive full of biology and anthropology notes from college”, I decided to write that article.

So here are five foods that can be truly considered “super”. And best of all, these are very easily accessible, much more so than the “official” superfoods. In many cases, these things are likely already on your shopping list, they just require you to overcome a lingering sense of childish “ickiness” and use your available resources to their fullest:

1. Organ Meats

Historically the offal meats have been some of the cheapest cuts of meat available due to them, admittedly, being kind of disgusting visually—at the very least compared to the more presentable cuts of meat from the muscles of the animal.

However, cooked properly, they are just as tasty as their more visually appealing counterparts, and at least just as nutritious as well. Depending on the organ you choose, offal may have a greater nutritional content than a typical cut of meat:

Liver, for example, is higher in Vitamins A and B and dietary Iron, than your average cut of meat. It also has high amounts of folic acid and trace elements like zinc. As a side note, eating the liver of predatory animals can lead to overdose of Vitamin A, a condition that can be fatal, but I doubt you were planning on eating the liver of dogs or bears.

Heart is entirely a lean muscle, and has a pound-for-pound higher protein content than muscle meat, as well as providing dietary collagen and elastin, which promotes skin health.

Kidneys have riboflavin, the B vitamins, and niacin, and the vitamin-packed goodness of organ meats goes on and on.

Overcome your childhood distaste for your mom's liver and onions, and try some organ meats. On a similar note to offal…

2. Blood

Blood is even more aesthetically disgusting than offal, but even more nutrient dense. As blood cells use iron to bind to oxygen molecules, one can expect blood to be very high in iron—indeed, it is the most iron rich food you can buy, as well as having the typical nutrients of other meats such as protein and B-vitamins.

The problem is how does one prepare blood? I suppose you could drink it raw, but you'd likely rather make it into soup, blood sausage, or black pudding as various cultures around the world have done for thousands of years.

3. Marrow

Continuing the “meat by product” train of thought that I’ve been on so far, marrow is a highly nutritious food—indeed, it is sometimes described as one of the pound-for-pound most nutritious foods, period. I must clarify here, that “most nutritious” refers largely to calories and fat—marrow is very calorically dense and rich in dietary fats. Indeed, some anthropologists believe that early hominids would regularly crack the long bones of prey animals to get at their marrow, and the fatty acid content therein directly caused the development of brain and nervous system tissues in successive hominid generations.

Since the body does need fats, I would suggest making like your hirsute ancestors and getting it from marrow rather than the junkfood of modernity. However, you can purchase pre-cracked marrow bones from a butcher or supermarket—Acheulean hand-axes are no longer required to break long bones.

4. Egg yolks

Yes, the humble egg yolk is something I would consider a superfood. This is mainly because I know a surprising number of prissy types who refuse to eat the yolks and only eat the whites, because “oh egg yolks have cholesterol” or whatever.

Screw that noise.

The yolk is the part of the egg that literally evolved to serve as a food source for the chicken embryo, nourishing the chicken-to-be until it hatches. How nutrient packed do you think a yolk has to be to nourish a little bundle of dividing cells until it becomes a living thing?

Answer: pretty nutrient rich.

Yolks are rich in vitamins, proteins, fats, and minerals. In fact, they have all of the fat soluble vitamins, AND all of the essential fatty acids.

What else can I say but: eat your egg yolks

5. Cabbage

The only one on this list that isn't some sort of animal product, the cabbage seems pretty mundane, and not very "super" at all. It seems to be your typical Brassica cultivar, not too different from broccoli or brussells sprouts.

Wrong.

Cabbage is rich in dietary fiber, vitamins C and K, and, due to containing certain phytochemicals that block estrogen production, cabbage can increase your testosterone levels as well. And, if you're a man, that has so many benefits it's easier just to link to them.

So, there you have it, five "superfoods" that you are likely already familiar with. Go forth and eat.

The Death Of Night Game

January 29, 2017 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This podcast explores the decline of nightlife (bars and clubs) from 2001 to 2017. I first establish a baseline of the absurdly low level of game you needed in the past to succeed compared to what you need now, followed by an analysis of 15 observations that show how we have objectively suffered a decline. I close out the podcast by discussing how to solve the problems posed by a declining nightlife to still maintain a healthy sex life, which include being industrious and open-minded to alternate forms of game.

How Modern Society Degrades Man’s Existence And How To Fight Back

January 30, 2017 | by Corey Savage | Link | Original Link

What is a man? There are countless ways to define masculinity, and therefore, the meaning of our existence. Some define it through the society’s standards of material success, strong and muscular body, or the ability to sleep with many women. Meanwhile, others look to the men of the past to seek their wisdom and to emulate their virtues. While these views are not necessarily wrong, I would like to offer an alternative view that you may not be familiar with: one that is rooted in our primal nature.

The fact is, in spite of how technologically developed and “civilized” we are, we humans are built with nearly the same genetic codes as our hunter-gatherer ancestors of the past. That said, the basic premise that I want to propose here is that: the further we are removed from our primal nature, the more dysfunctional and degrading our existence becomes. For example, eating the various processed food of our modern age will wreck a man’s health over time while eating natural foods like our pre-civilization ancestors will keep him healthy (this is the basis for the paleo diet). And our modern sex roles (or the lack thereof) promoted in the name of “equality” will cause numerous social problems that we’re all familiar with.

Although there is a seemingly neo-Luddite sentiment to this idea, know that you probably already engage in activities to get in touch with your primal roots: you workout to compensate for the lack of physical activity in the modern world, you visit parks or go camping to be in nature, you play sports to engage your hunter-warrior instincts, and you read our site to rediscover masculinity. Knowingly or not, you long to be true to your primal nature.

Conflict with modern society

Fast-forward to today, I believe we are facing serious problems as we've diverged so far from our primal way of being due to the rapid and exponential technological growth that far out-paced the speed of our evolution. Some of the consequences include:

- Degradation of human health with obesity, heart problems, hormone problems, cancer, allergies, depression, anxiety, and other disorders becoming rampant across the world.
- Economic conditions where the majority of the people live as wage slaves and work stressful jobs they hate while the elites profit massively.
- More and more people becoming dependent on technological mediums for basic functions while they themselves become dumber with shallower ability to think.
- The widespread engagement of media and entertainment by the people who use it to sedate themselves into complacency and comfort, turning their minds dull and bodies weak. Spectator sports, porn, and video games are becoming substitutes for real life.
